The respondent's points were: That upon the answers of the jury to the questions raised at the trial, the verdict was properly entered for the Richardsons in both actions; that Stanton was bound to make his ship reasonably fit to carry a reasonable cargo of any of the goods described in the charter-party as a condition to Richardsons' liability to load; that Stanton was bound to have his ship in all respects fit to carry a reasonable cargo of wet sugar within such a time as would not have frustrated the object of the adventure; that even if the Richardsons would have been bound to wait under the charter party until the ship had been made in all respects fit to carry the cargo, they were exonerated in this case from so doing by reason of the substitution of the Milton for the Ile of Wight, with the consent of Stanton; that by the terms of the charter-party, it was an express condition precedent to the Richardsons' liability to load, that the vessel when receiving cargo should be a good risk for insurance, and that at no time prior to the shipment of the cargo on board the Milton was the Ile of Wight a good risk for insurance within the meaning of the charter-party; that Stanton is responsible to the Richardsons for the loss occasioned by the unfitness of the ship to carry the cargo, and by the want of reasonable skill and care on the part of the captain; that Stanton was never ready and willing to carry in the Ile of Wight the cargo which had been provided by the Richardsons, and was never in a position to maintain an action against the Richardsons for not loading.

A. L. Smith (E. Ridley with him) for the appellant.—Where there is a particular express warranty, the court will not extend it by implication (Dickson v. Zizinia, 10 C. B. 602), and the stipulation in the charter-party that the ship should be surveyed excludes any implied warranty as to seaworthiness. It was, in fact, a stipulation for limited liability. The ship was surveyed and reported a good ship, "and fit to carry a dry and perishable cargo to any part of the world." [COCKBURN, C. J.—Every carrier must be taken to impliedly warrant road worthiness.] The ordinary express warranty that the ship should be tight, staunch, and strong, not appearing is an argument that the charterer accepted the report of the surveyor in lieu of it. [COCKBURN, C. J.—If those words had been struck out of a printed form, I might be disposed to agree with you; but such is not the case. There was no need to insert such words; they are mere surplusage.]

Sir J. Karstake, Q. C. (Butt, Q. C. and J. C. Mathew, with him), for respondent, was not heard.

The judgment of the court was delivered by COCKBURN, C. J., as follows:—We are of opinion that the judgment of the court below ought to be affirmed. If words of warranty of seaworthiness had been purposely struck out of a printed form, there might have been some force in the argument that the report of the surveyor was intended to be conclusive, but that is not the case here. Taking the whole charter party together, we think that there is an engagement to carry sugar, wet or dry (and it is to be noticed, that the rate was to vary according as wet or dry sugar was shipped); the shipowner, therefore, was bound to carry sugar wet or dry. Wet sugar was tendered to him for carriage, and upon shipping it, he discovered that the pumps of his ship were inadequate to carry off the viscous matter which was formed. That is his affair. He is unable to meet the exigencies of his contract; he promised to carry wet sugar, and he fails to do so.

Judgment affirmed.

WOOD v. WOAD AND OTHERS.

Mutual marine insurance association — Rules giving committee absolute power to expel members — Exercise of such power by committee.

The declaration alleged that the plaintiff was a member, and the defendants were the committee, of a mutual marine insurance association, by the rules of which the committee, if they should at any time deem the conduct of any member suspicious, or that he was for any other reason unworthy of remaining in the society, should have power to exclude a member by directing the secretary to give him notice in writing that the committee had excluded him, and after the giving of such notice such member should be excluded, and have no claim nor be responsible for or in respect of any loss or damage happening after such notice. Averments, that the plaintiff, as such member, having deposited with the treasurer of the society the proper entrance fee, and having his ship entered in the society's books, was entitled to receive, and, but for the grievance thereafter mentioned, would have received an indemnity—for any loss or damage to his said ship by the perils of the sea, &c. Yet the defendants, well knowing the premises, but wrongfully, collusively, and improperly contriving to deprive the plaintiff of the benefit of such indemnity did, wrongfully, collusively, and improperly, expel the plaintiff from the said society, on the alleged ground that his conduct was suspicious, or that he was, for some other reason, unworthy of re-maintaining in the said society, without any just, reasonable, or probable cause, and without having given the plaintiff notice that his conduct was to be investigated and adjudicated upon, and without giving him an opportunity of being heard, and without, in fact, hearing him, in vindication of his conduct as a member of the society; that his ship sustained damage by the perils of the sea shortly after his said expulsion, and by reason of such expulsion he lost the benefit of the said indemnity, &c., and was otherwise injured. On demurrer it was—Held (per totam curiam), that the declaration was bad, and the action not maintainable.

Per Kelly, C.B. and Amphlett, B., on the ground that the plaintiff not having had an opportunity, which the committee were bound on the broad principles of law and justice, to have given him, of being previously heard in his own defence, the act of expulsion was void, and the plaintiff consequently was still a member of the society, and might enforce his rights in equity, and so had sustained no legal damage.

Per Cleasby and Pollock, BB., on the ground that the declaration contained no sufficiently definite allegation of fraud or (per Pollock, B.) of "conspiracy" to show a cause of action, or to make the defendants responsible.

Per Amphlett, B.—Had the plaintiff's expulsion been effected by fraudulent means on the part of the committee, the plaintiffs would have sustained an actionable injury, and have been entitled, upon the allegations in the declaration, to recover damages.

Quære, per Cleasby, B., whether the committee are in any case in the absence of fraud liable to an action for the way in which they may have exercised their functions.

ACTION by the plaintiff against the defendants as the committee of a mutual marine insurance association, for the alleged wrongful, collusive, and improper expulsion of the plaintiff as a member from the said association.

By his declaration the plaintiff charged that before and at the time of the committing, &c., the plaintiff was a member of a certain mutual marine insurance association or club called the Goole Marine Insurance Society, which said association or club had been formed and established, and was, and still is established and carried on for the purpose of mutually insuring and indemnifying the several members thereof against losses and damages by the perils of the seas, rivers, navigations, and waters, enemies, pirates, jettison, other than that occurring to deck cargo, and fire happening to or done by their respective vessels and parts of vessels, entered and insured respectively by them on the books of the said society, upon deposit with the treasurer of the said society of a sum equal to 8l. per cent. on the amount of the sum for which such vessels should be insured, and upon other terms contained in the rules of the said society; and the plaintiff, as such member as aforesaid, and having deposited with the treasurer of the said society such sum as aforesaid, had a certain ship or ships duly entered in the books of the said society, upon and in accordance with the terms aforesaid; And the defendants were the committee of the said society, and one of the said rules of the said society was as follows, viz., "That the management of the affairs of the said society shall be at all times hereafter conducted by a committee of not less than nine persons (either members of the society or not) one of which shall be appointed the president of the society; that such committee shall have the entire control of the funds, affairs, and concerns of the society, and shall determine upon the admission, rejection, and exclusion of any vessel insured or proposed to be insured by it, and their determination shall be final and binding on all parties, unless where they afterwards see cause to alter, and do alter the same; provided that no member of the committee shall act as such in the settlement of his own loss; that the ordinary meetings of the committee shall be held in the first week of every month, at Goole, aforesaid, on such day and time as the president for the time being shall determine; that a majority of the committee present at any meeting shall have full power to act, provided such majority do not consist of less than three in number." And a certain other rule of the said society was as follows, viz.: "That if the committee shall at any time deem the conduct of any member suspicious, or that such member is for any other reason unworthy of remaining in this society, they shall have power to exclude such member, by directing the secretary to give such member notice in writing that the committee have excluded such member from this society, and after the giving of such notice such member shall be excluded, and have no claim, or be responsible for or in respect of any loss or damage happening after such notice." And the plaintiff, as such member of the society, and having deposited with the treasurer of the said society such sum as aforesaid, and having his ship or ships so entered in the books of the said society as aforesaid, was, under and in accordance with the rules of the said society, entitled to receive, and, but for the grievance hereinafter mentioned, would have received, from the funds of the said society an indemnity for any loss or damage to his said ship or ships so entered as aforesaid, by the perils of the seas, rivers, navigations, and waters, enemies, pirates, jettisons, other than as aforesaid, during his membership of the said society. Yet the defendants, well knowing the promises, but wrongfully, collusively, and improperly contriving to deprive the plaintiff of the benefit of such indemnity as aforesaid, to which he was so entitled as aforesaid, did wrongfully, collusively, and improperly expel the plaintiff from the said society, on the alleged ground that his conduct was (in the terms of the said 47th rule) suspicious, or that he was for some other reason unworthy of remaining in the said society, without any just, reasonable, or probable cause whatsoever for such expulsion, and without having given the plaintiff any notice that his conduct was to be investigated and adjudicated upon by the said committee; and without giving the plaintiff, or any person or persons on his behalf, any opportunity whatsoever of being heard before them, and without, in fact, hearing the plaintiff or any person or persons on his behalf in defence and vindication of the defendant's conduct as a member of the said society, with reference to the said ground of expulsion, and that before and at the time of his said expulsion from the said society, he had a certain ship called the Progress duly entered in the books of the said society, and had deposited with the treasurer of the said society such sum as aforesaid, and the said ship sustained certain damage by the perils of the sea a few days after the expulsion of the said plaintiff from the said society, and, but for the said expulsion of the plaintiff from the said society, he would have been entitled to receive, and would have received, 92*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.* from the funds of the said society, as an indemnity for the said damages so sustained as aforesaid, and that by reason of his said expulsion he has lost the said sum of 92*l.* 2*s.* 8*d.*, and has been otherwise, by reason of the said wrong of the defendants, greatly damaged and injured.

Pleas: 5. Further, to the said first count, that the defendants deemed the conduct of the plaintiff suspicious, and, in the exercise of their power in that behalf given to them by the said rules, excluded the plaintiff by directing the secretary of the said society to give notice in writing that the committee had excluded the plaintiff from the said society, and such notice was given, and all things were done, and happened, and existed, to entitle the committee to exclude and expel the plaintiff from the said society, and which is the expulsion complained of. 6. And for a further plea to the same count, the defendants repeated the allegations in the fifth plea made, excepting that they deemed the conduct of the plaintiff suspicious, and instead thereof alleged that they deemed that the plaintiff was unworthy of remaining in the said society for other reasons than deeming his conduct suspicious.

Demurrer, and joinder in demurrer, to the first count in the declaration, on the ground that it disclosed no cause of action.

Demurrer, and joinder in demurrer to the fifth and sixth pleas, on the ground that the facts therein respectively alleged are no answer to the plaintiff's cause of action in respect of his expulsion from the said society without being heard in his defence.

Points for argument on the part of the defendants.—1. That no action at law lies against the defendants for the improper exercise of their powers as the committee of the society under the rules set out. 2. That the first count discloses no cause of action which can be held good without contravening 30 & 31 Vict. c. 23. 3. That the first count discloses no cause of action, because it is not alleged that the plaintiff's ships were insured by the society. 4. That it discloses no cause of action, because no harm is properly alleged to have been caused to the plaintiff from acts of the defendants. 5. That it discloses no cause of action, because it was not necessary, on the true construction of the rules, to give the plaintiff an opportunity of being heard, or notice that his conduct was to be inquired into. 6. That it discloses no cause of action, because the wrongful acts of the defendants therein alleged did not deprive the plaintiff of any rights or claims against the society. 7. That the first count does not properly allege a conspiracy by the defendants to injure the plaintiff. 8. That it discloses a partnership between the plaintiff and the defendants, and no cause of action which can be maintained at law. 9. That plea 5 is good in substance, because it traverses the wrongful acts of the defendants in the first count alleged. 10. That plea 6 is good in substance, because it shows that the acts of the defendants in the first count com-

Points for argument on behalf of the plaintiff.—1. That the averments in the declaration show a collusive and therefore a fraudulent exercise of the powers of the defendants, as individual members of the committee of the club against the plaintiff, and that such fraudulent exercise of the said powers gave the plaintiff a good cause of action against the defendants. 2. That the demurrer admits the expulsion of the plaintiff to have been a purely arbitrary act on the part of the defendants, without any reasonable or probable cause whatever, and that such act having been accompanied by fraud and misconduct on the part of the defendants (as also admitted by the demurrer) gave the plaintiff a good cause of action against the defendants. 3. That the omission of the defendants to give the plaintiff notice that an inquiry into his conduct was about to be made, and an opportunity of being heard upon such enquiry, was a tortious act in itself, for which the 47th rule afforded no justification. 4. That the rights of property being involved, the discretionary powers conferred by the 47th rule rendered it imperative on the defendants to exercise a judicial, and not an arbitrary discretion. 5. That it is not competent for the defendants to contend that the expulsion of the plaintiff was a void act, thus taking advantage of their own confessedly wrongful act. 6. That, assuming the expulsion to have been a void act, an action is maintainable by the plaintiff in respect of such expulsion, accompanied as it has been by the damage alleged in the declaration. 7. That the word "deem" contained in the 47th rule, does not mean "deem" without any cause whatever; nor does it mean "deem," without giving the person whose conduct is to be inquired into, an opportunity of being heard, but that it means "deem" judicially, and that the fifth and sixth pleas are bad, inasmuch as they do not traverse the averments in the declaration that the defendants expelled the plaintiff without any cause whatsoever without inquiry. 8. That the said pleas respectively amount to nothing more than averments of the exercise of the powers conferred upon the defendants by the 47th rule, without affecting to answer the averments in the declaration showing a wrongful exercise of those powers. 9. That the unworthiness of the plaintiff alleged in the sixth plea, did not disentitle him to have a fair hearing on the part of the defendants.

In addition to the count demurred to, there was the ordinary money count; and the defendants also pleaded various other pleas (in addition to pleas 5 and 6 demurred to), e.g., not guilty—denial of plaintiff's membership—plaintiff's ship not duly entered in society's books—that defendants were not the committee—never indebted, and payment before action. Issue was joined on all the pleas, and at the trial of the action, which took place before Pollock, B. and a special jury, at the last Summer Assize (1873) for Yorkshire, at Leeds, a nonsuit was entered by direction of the learned judge, and a rule was subsequently obtained, in Michaelmas Term last, by D. Seymour, Q.C., on the part of the plaintiffs, to set that nonsuit aside, and for a new trial, on the ground that the action was maintainable on proof of the facts stated in the first count of the declaration. That rule was argued some time ago in this court, and judgment was reserved until after the argument of the above-

Waddy, Q.C. (with him was S. Tennant), for the defendants, in support of the demurrer to the declaration, and in support of the pleas, contended, in the first place, that the declaration was bad inasmuch as it contained no allegation that the plaintiff's ship was insured. [KELLY, C.B.—Supposing that the plaintiff was not in strictness validly and legally insured, yet, if he has been wrongfully expelled from a society in order to enter into which he had paid money, does not the declaration show a good cause of action?] Re the London Marine Insurance Association, Smith's case (before the Lords Justices in Chancery) (21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 27; L. Rep. 4 Ch. App. 611; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 280), is an authority showing the necessity for the existence of a valid stamped policy. To the same effect also is the case of Fisher and others v. The Liverpool Marine Insurance Company (Limited) in the Queen's Bench (ante, p. 44; 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 867; L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 469). Secondly, on the face of the declaration it is shown that there was an absolute and unconditional power in the committee to expel the plaintiff from the society without being in any way controlled, or called in question for the exercise of, such power. [AMPHLETT, B. referred to the case in Chancery (before Wigram, V.C.) of Blissett v. Daniel (10 Hare, 493), where it was held that the power must be exercised with good faith, and that it was not properly exercised at the exclusive instance, and in consequence of the representation of one partner to his co-partners, made without the knowledge and behind the back of the partner to be expelled, and without giving him the opportunity of stating his case and removing any misunderstanding on the part of his co-partners; and that the expulsion was therefore void.] There was no suggestion or allegation in the declaration here that the defendants had acted in the matter otherwise than with perfect good faith.

Seymour, Q.C. (with him was Lewers) for the plaintiff, contra, in support of his declaration.—Good cause of action is shown on the face of the declaration, and therefore the declaration can be supported. It discloses a duty on the defendants not to expel the plaintiff without first giving him notice of their intention to expel him, and the grounds on which they propose to do so, so that he may have an opportunity of being heard in his own defence. The allegation is, that they did the act complained of "wrongfully, collusively, and improperly." It is true that the word "fraudulently" is not expressly used, but it is submitted that "collusively" here, means fraudulently, and nothing else. In Battersbury v. Vyse (8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 283; 2 H. & C. 42; 32 L. J. 177, Ex.), Pollock, C.B., in discussing the meaning of the word, says (in 32 L. J.) collusion implies fraud, and "to collude" is so treated in Webster's Dictionary, where one definition of the word is "a secret agreement for a fraudulent purpose." [AMPHLETT, B.—In Gill v. The Continental Union Gas Company (27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 424; 41 L. J. 176, Ex.; L. Rep. 7 Ex. 332), Bramwell, B. says (at page 337 of 7 L. Rep.) "the word collusion only signified that the defendant and the company agreed together." It is submitted that here, coupled with the words "wrongfully and improperly," it means more than that, and imports or will at all events sustain, an imputation of fraud. Again, they are not to exclude a partner without "deeming" his conduct suspicious. According to Johnson, to "deem" is to exercise a judicial discretion, and what that is will be found admirably defined in Rook's Case (5 Co. Rep. 100a) and Keighley's Case (10 Ib. 140a). The defendants' conduct was the reverse of judicial; their duty was to hear before they struck. Nothing short of express words can have the effect of making a man contract himself out of the right of being heard before he is condemned. In an old case, Re v. The Chancellor &c. of the University of Cambridge (1 Stra. 557), Fortescue, J. (at p. 576), says: "I remember to have heard it said by a very learned man, upon such an occasion, that even God himself did not pass sentence upon Adam before he was called upon to make his defence—'Adam,' says God, 'Where art thou? Hast thou eaten, &c.;' and the same question was put to Eve also." So in Ex parte Ramshay (18 Q. B. 173; 21 L. J. 238, Q. B.) Lord Campbell, C. J., delivering the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, says (at p. 190 of 18 Q. B., and p. 239 of 21 L. J.): "We are to see that judges and functionaries vested with judicial authority do not exceed their jurisdiction. The Chancellor has authority to remove a judge of a County Court only on the implied condition prescribed by the principles of eternal justice—that he hears the party accused." These authorities sufficiently show that the committee ought to exercise their functions honestly, fairly, and according to "the principles of eternal justice," which it is submitted they have not here done. [POLLOCK, B.—What damage do you say has been done to the plaintiff? It may be the defendants have not acted rightly, but is it actionable? KELLY, C.B.—Your difficulty is as to the expulsion. If it be a valid act, you have no remedy, and if it be void, you are still a member and are not damaged. POLLOCK, B.—The declaration does not charge that the defendants conspired.] I submit it shows malafides, on its face, and uses words equivalent to a charge of conspiracy, that they "wrongfully and collusively contriving," &c., &c. The damage need not necessarily be a pecuniary one. Any damage, mental, moral, physical, or social, is sufficient. [KELLY, C.B., referred to Beaurain v. Sir W. Scott (3 Campb. 387), in which an action on the case was held maintainable against the Judge of the Ecclesiastical Court for excommunicating the plaintiff for disobedience of an order which the court had not authority to make, or where the party had not been previously served with a monition, nor had due notice of the order.] The damage here is of the same character as in that case, namely, the pain and annoyance of publicity and notoriety, injury to the character, feelings, and pocket of the plaintiff. [CLEASBY, B.—In 3 Blackst. Comm. book 3, ch. 7, p. 101, it is laid down as clear law (citing 2 Instit. 623, as an authority), that "if the judge of any spiritual court excommunicates a man for a cause of which he hath not legal cognizance, the party may have an action against him at common law, and he is also liable to be indicted at the suit of the king."] Fraudulently to do a void act is to do a wrong, and having done a fraudulent, even though it be a void act to the plaintiff's injury, they cannot take advantage of their own wrong, and say it is void. [AMPHLETT, B.—They do not say so; your dilemma is, that if it is void, you are not injured; and if it is not void you have no remedy.] In either case, whether combining to do a void act wrongfully, or, if not void, doing it maliciously, the plaintiff has a remedy. To be driven to Chancery for redress is a wrong and a damage, for which an action will lie: (Dixon v. Fawcus, 3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 683; 30 L. J. 137, Q.B.; 3 El. & El. 537.) As Holt, C.J., said, in Ashby v. White "Every injury imports a damage, though it does not cost the party one farthing, and it is impossible to prove the contrary; for a damage is not merely pecuniary, but an injury imports a damage where a man is merely hindered of his rights" (1 Sm. L. C. 2nd edit. p. 125). He cited also and referred to 2 Lindley on Partnership, p. 908, as to actions against partners.

Ex.]

WOOD v. WOOD AND OTHERS.

[Ex.

Innes v. Wylie, per Lord Denman, C.J., 1 Car. & Kir. 257;

S. Tennant, in reply.—"Expel" does not necessarily mean an assault vi et armis, but merely that he was no longer entitled to be a member. He cited Hayman v. The Governing Body of Rugby School (30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 207), where, on demurrer to the plaintiff's bill, praying for a declaration that under the circumstances in the bill, the resolution of the governing body dismissing the plaintiff from the head-mastership of the school was invalid, it was held, by Malins V.C., that the governing body had power to dismiss the plaintiff without notice, and without assigning any reason; and that, having exercised their power fairly and honestly, and not corruptly, or to effect some collateral purpose, their decision was not liable to be controlled by the court. Here no conspiracy is alleged. The defendants are not in the position of judges, and have only acted in conformity with their rules. The plaintiff's remedy is in a court of equity.

KELLY, C.B.—This case certainly involves some very important considerations, and, but that from two or three different points of view we have all come to the same conclusion, namely, that the action is not maintainable, I should have desired time before I had expressly delivered the grounds upon which, in my opinion, the defendants are entitled to the judgment of the court.

The facts, as they appear upon the record, are that the plaintiff was a member of an association or co-partnership, instituted and carried on by the co-partners, for the purpose of enabling each and every of them to effect insurances with the society upon ships of which they might be the owners; and amongst the rules of the association are those which are set forth upon the record, viz., "that a majority of the committee present at any meeting shall have full power to act, provided such majority do not consist of less than three in number," and "that if the committee shall, at any time, deem the conduct of any member suspicious, or that such member is, for any other reason, unworthy of remaining in this society, they shall have power to exclude such member, by directing the secretary to give such member notice in writing that the committee have excluded such member from this society, and after the giving of such notice such member shall be excluded." I must not be understood to say that a body constituted like this committee is bound to allege or state any reason for any decision they may pronounce, but it appears that, without anything on the record to show why or on what ground they have so acted, a committee of the necessary number have held a meeting, and have come to a decision deeming the conduct of the plaintiff suspicious, or deeming him unworthy of being in the society, and have accordingly given a notice to the plaintiff that they have met, and that by reason of his conduct having been deemed suspicious, he was unworthy to remain a member, that he was to consider himself excluded, and they did accordingly exclude him from the society, and gave him notice that the society would be responsible for no claim in respect of any loss or damage arising therefrom; and he brings this action, treating the decision or notice, or the act of compulsion in question of which he complains, as a ground of action, and alleging that he has sustained damage for which he claims compensation in the court now before us; and to that count the defendants demurred, and the question is, whether it is sustainable. I am of opinion that it is not; but not on the ground that the act done by the committee is justifiable in law, it being expressly alleged on the record that it was done and the plaintiff expelled, without his having had an opportunity of being heard in his own defence, and without having had notice, so that he might have had the means, if such existed of showing that there was no ground for any suspicion against him, and that his conduct had not been, in the due and proper sense of the word "suspicious," or still less such as to make him unworthy of remaining in the society. On these grounds it is that this is treated as an actionable wrong, for which damages are claimed.

Now, I am of opinion that the committee, before they were justified in giving notice to the plaintiff of his expulsion from the society and before they came to the decision that his conduct had been "suspicious," or such as to render him unworthy of remaining in the society, were bound to give him notice that they were about to consider that question, so that he might have an opportunity of defending himself against any charge or suspicion which might have been made or entertained against him. If the case rested there, and but for the considerations arising on the record, I should have been of opinion that this was a wrongful act; and, if it had been such as, in contemplation of law, to have occasioned damage to the plaintiff, that the action was maintainable, and that he might have recovered damages; but when we look at the nature of the act of expulsion, and that its effect, if it had any effect at all, was to cause him to cease to be a member of the co-partnership, and that the only damage which he could possibly have sustained from the committee having deemed his conduct suspicious, and such as to render him unworthy of remaining in the society, would be that he was deprived of some right, privilege, or benefit to which he would otherwise, under the rules, have been entitled, the question arises whether, by reason of this notice of expulsion, he ceased to be a partner. If he thereby ceased to be a partner, then inasmuch as he had paid a deposit of 5*l.*, and had caused the name of a ship belonging to him to be entered in a book, and would have been entitled to proceed to effect an insurance thereon at any time he thought proper, he would have been deprived of that advantage, and would have sustained damage. But I am of opinion that the act itself being unjustifiable and unlawful, for the reason that I have already stated, was void, and that consequently he did not cease to be a partner, but that he remained, and is at this moment, a partner and entitled to enforce any rights that he may possess as such.

The great question in the case then is, whether the act was void. It has been argued with great force, and the argument is well entitled to our serious attention, that these rules are absolutely unconditional in their terms. I quite agree that if the committee exercised the power they possessed under these rules, honestly, properly, lawfully, and in good faith, their decision could not be questioned. Their decision may have been wrong, and unfounded, and without sufficient reason, or without any reason at all; but I am aware of no power in the law to call in question or interfere with the honest and bonâ fide decision pronounced under rules so expressed by a committee existing, like the present, under these articles of Association. Whether they had been right or wrong, and whether they had proceeded on insufficient grounds, or on no grounds at all, if they thought fit to allege that, in their judgment, the conduct of the plaintiff was suspicious, or that his conduct was such as to render him unworthy of remaining in the co-partnership, their decision would have been final, and not open to be questioned in a court of law. But I am of opinion that, upon the well-known principle of law that no one should, in any court, or before any tribunal or body of persons authorised to act in any manner whatsoever, be condemned unheard and without having the opportunity given to him of appearing and defending himself against the charge, the defendants were bound to give the plaintiff notice that this charge was about to be brought against him.

Many cases have been cited, in some of which the rule has been laid down in very strong and forcible terms. In other cases it has appeared that, by the particular nature of the tribunal, or of the body of persons by whom the decision complained of has been pronounced, it was not open to question; or as in a case (Copin v. Adamson) lately before us with respect to a foreign judgment, there may be circumstances under which notice would be the legal effect of the proceedings in question; but the general rule is, as I have before said, that no man should be judged and condemned unheard. The principle is clearly and expressly stated by Parke, B., in his judgment in the case of Re Hammersmith Rentcharge (4 Ex. 87; 19 L. J. 66, Ex.). Although Parke, B., differed in that particular case from the majority of the court—and I am not prepared to say that that majority were not right on this particular point—after alluding to cases, in which the rule had been invariably laid down and acted upon, he expresses himself as follows: "In Capel v. Child" (2 Cr. & Jer. 558; 1 L. J., N. S., 205, Ex.) Bayley, B. says, that he knows of no case in which you are to have a judicial proceeding, by which a man is to be deprived of any part of his property without his having an opportunity of being heard. This" Parke, B., proceeds to say, "is an extremely strong case, and shows how powerful the principle of justice is in all judicial proceedings:—Quicumque aliquid statuerit, parte inauditâ alterâ, æquum licet statuerit, haud æquus fuerit." I entirely adopt that principle, and apply that observation to the present case. I come next to the case in Chancery of Blissett v. Daniel (10 Hare, 495), which is almost parallel and identical with the case now before the court. There a number of persons had entered into a co-partnership, with power to a certain number of the partners absolutely and unconditionally to dismiss and expel from the partnership any other partner as they might think proper. I will read the marginal note, because it shows how similar to, if not identical with, the present case, that case was. It is as follows: "Articles of partnership provided that it should be lawful for the holders of two-thirds or more of the partnership shares, for the time being, to expel any partner by giving him notice thereof under their hands, in the form thereby prescribed, and that immediately after giving such notice, a notice of the dissolution as to the expelled partner should be signed by the partners and published, with power to any other of the expelling partners to sign the name of the expelled partner; and it was provided that if a partner became bankrupt, insolvent, or was expelled, his interest should cease, as to profit and loss, as if he had died on the day of such bankruptcy, insolvency or expulsion, and that the amount of his share should be ascertained, and payment secured by the same arrangement as would have been applicable in case of his decease; and it was also provided, that the shares of retired, deceased, bankrupt, insolvent or expelled partners should be disposed of in such way, either to or between some or all of the continuing partners, or by the admission of a new partner or partners, as the holders of a majority of shares should determine. The articles provided that, in the case of making certain arrangements, there should previously be a meeting of the partners in committee, but did not express that any such meeting should be necessary previous to the exercise of the power to expel. The articles also provided for the adjustment of the partners' accounts within sixty days after the 30th June in each year, when an inventory of all the stock, debts, &c., should be made, with proper allowances, so as to ascertain the partnership property, profit and loss, and the shares of the respective partners, which shares were to be carried to their respective accounts; and it was provided, that the share of any partner who might wish to retire, if his retirement were consented to by the majority of the others, was to be taken by the continuing partners at the amount at which the same stood at the time for making the yearly rest or settlement next preceding; and that the surviving partners were also to take the shares of a deceased partner at the amount at which the same stood at such next preceding yearly rest or settlement. Held, that the power of expulsion of a partner might be exercised by two-thirds of the partners without any previous meeting of the partners in committee upon the question, and without any cause being assigned for such expulsion: but that the power must be exercised with good faith, and not against the truth and honour of the contract." If it were necessary to consider the effect of the words "wrongfully, collusively, and improperly and without any just, reasonable, or probable cause," in the present declaration, it might be that there is enough on this record to show that the decision in the case which I have just referred to would be conclusive here. But that is not the ground on which I desire to put the present case. The marginal note to Blissett v. Daniel proceeds as follows:—"The power was not properly exercised at the exclusive instance of one partner, and in consequence of his representation to the other partners, made without the knowledge and behind the back of the partner who was to be expelled, and without giving to such partner the opportunity of stating his case, and of removing any misunderstanding on the part of his co-partners." In that case the circumstances were entered into more fully, and more in detail than we are permitted by the form of this record to do here. But we may suppose the most favourable case that can be imagined on the part of the committee, and that there had been some complaint made before them affording just ground of suspicion, into the consideration of which they were about to enter, and that perhaps there was something which, unless explained, might have shown suspicious conduct on the part of the plaintiff, such as to render him unworthy to be a member of the society. That case of Blissett v. Daniel is a direct decision in point that it was incumbent on the defendants to give the plaintiff the opportunity of stating his case, and that it was unlawful and unjustifiable to come to a decision of expulsion without his knowledge and behind his back. Having said that, we must now consider the legal effect of what has been done. It appears to me that the act was unlawful, and therefore absolutely void, and that it had not the effect of causing the plaintiff to cease to be a member of the association. In this very case of Blissett v. Daniel, the decree that was made was as follows: "Declare that the notice of expulsion given to the plaintiff on the 29th Aug. 1850, was void, and that the plaintiff did not, by virtue thereof, cease to be a partner in the co-partnership firm in the pleadings mentioned."

I apprehend that the present plaintiff has not, by reason of this notice of expulsion, which I hold to be absolutely void in law, ceased to be a member of the co-partnership, and that he may file a bill in equity, and thereby entitle himself to all the benefits which may belong to him as a co-partner. Had it appeared that any one or more persons had, by some unlawful act prevented the plaintiff from deriving some benefit to which he was entitled under the articles of co-partnership, this action might have been maintainable for the wrong so done; but the present action is founded entirely on the act of expulsion. In contemplation of law he had sustained no damage at all from that act, he is exactly in the condition he was in before this notice was served upon him, and whatever rights he possessed then, he possesses still. This act is a void act, and the notice is merely waste paper.

But it has been urged by Mr. Seymour that, even though the act done were absolutely void, yet if it were a wrongful act, the party aggrieved thereby might maintain an action for damages in respect of it; and that the damage suffered need not necessarily be pecuniary, but that any damage, mental, moral, physical or social, would be sufficient to support the action.

I had hoped that the case of Beaurain v. Scott, in 3 Camp., to which I referred during the argument, might be an authority in support of that argument. On looking into that case, however, we find that the act done there, viz., the pronouncing sentence of excommunication, is an act of a peculiar kind. It is the act of a judge of an ecclesiastical court, and is in itself, if unauthorised, an indictable offence, and is of that public and important nature that it involves damage in law; and, therefore, although for the reason appearing in that case the sentence was void in law, yet the action was held maintainable by reason of the particular nature and judicial importance of the act done. It may further be observed that, in carrying the sentence into effect, which may be taken to be the act of the judge himself, the excommunication was publicly read during divine service from the pulpit of the parish church at which the plaintiff attended, and to which he belonged, and that his good name and fame were thereby injuriously affected. But the present is a case of a totally different nature. I wish I could feel myself at liberty, under the authority of Beaurain v. Sir W. Scott, to hold that this action is maintainable, but when we come to look at it, the notice of expulsion really had no effect at all, it was mere waste paper; and had the plaintiff at once treated it as absolutely void, for the reason that he had not been heard in answer to the charge, and had called upon the defendants to admit him into the association, and to respect his rights as usual, he might, had they not done so, have proceeded (and indeed may yet proceed) to enforce those rights in a court of equity.

I must declare this action to be not maintainable, and consequently that the demurrer to the declaration must be allowed. On the same ground, I am of opinion that the nonsuit directed by my brother Pollock must stand, and that the plaintiff's rule to set it aside must be discharged.

CLEASBY, B.—I have come to the same conclusion, but not exactly on the same grounds. My ground is, not that in this case there is an absence of damage, because I should have thought that wherever there is an injury to a right there arises a cause of action; and if the right of this plaintiff was to be a member, and to have all the profits of membership, his de facto exclusion from the society is a damage. It is plain that from the moment of the giving the plaintiff notice of his expulsion he became excluded, and had no claim whatever in respect of any loss or damage happening thereafter. As I have said, I should have thought that that was in itself an injury to his right sufficient to give him a cause of action.

But I must say I am not satisfied that the committee are, in any case, in the absence of fraud, liable to an action for the manner in which they may have exercised their functions. Let us see what their powers are, and whether they are liable to an action because they do not give a member notice of their intention to exercise them. It appears that one of their rules is, that the management of the society's affairs shall be governed by a majority of not less than nine; there appear to be twenty-two here, and they need not necessarily be members of the society. What are they to do. They have the entire control of the funds, affairs, and concerns of the society; they are to determine upon the admission, rejection, or exclusion of any vessel proposed; and, if they think the conduct of any member suspicious, they have power at once to exclude him, by directing notice to be served upon him. Now, supposing them to have acted bonâ fide, are they to be liable in respect of every vessel which has been proposed, and which they have rejected, or which they may have improperly admitted, or for the manner, or the negligent manner in which they have proceeded, on a vessel being proposed and rejected. So with respect to the management of the settlement of the claims, are they to be liable to an action at the suit of every disappointed person who makes a claim and does not receive satisfaction? All this is quite independent of the redress which could be got in a court of equity in case the funds were not properly administered.

WOOD v. WOOD AND OTHERS.

Now, in consequence of the peculiar nature of the business of the society, the committee were expressly authorised to do that which in ordinary circumstances is a most unsafe thing to do, namely, to act on a mere suspicion. Suspicion generally disqualifies a person from exercising judgment in anything he has to deal with, but here the committee were to act upon it if they entertained it, and were not to wait for real grounds, which would have to be investigated, the only result of which investigation would be that, if any question were put to them, they would be justified in saying, "we act on a general suspicion, and not upon any particular ground." That being so, can it be made a ground of action that they have acted upon suspicion merely? I do not think it can be. I do not think they can be exposed to an action for a mere irregularity, or for negligence in their mode of proceeding.

I will now deal with the other part of the case, namely, the plaintiff's allegation that the defendants "wrongfully, collusively, and improperly" did the act complained of. The word "collusively" is an ambiguous word, and is used very loosely here. It does not, in my judgment, put the defendants to the proof that there was an absence of mala fides on their part. The case of Batterbury v. Vyse, cited by the learned counsel for the plaintiff, was very different from the present one. There the collusion alleged, and the way in which it was alleged, involved the charge of mala fides of a particular nature, because the defendant there having made a contract for the execution by the plaintiff of works which were to be paid for on the certificate of the architect only, as a precedent condition, the action was brought against the defendant, and the ground of complaint was that the architect's certificate being a condition precedent to payment, the architect had, in collusion with and by the procurement of, the defendant, neglected to certify, whereby the plaintiff was unable to obtain payment. There a specific act was charged. It does not appear to me that there is any such specific charge here, supposing even that, if there were, it could be made the subject of an action against persons in the position of the defendants, acting, as it were, in a judicial capacity, and not as partners, upon which, however, I do not at present, nor is it necessary that I should, venture to express a decided opinion. But I do say that here there is not a sufficiently definite allegation of fraud to make defendants responsible.

POLLOCK, B.—I am also of the same opinion. This is a question involving and depending upon very many important principles of law, and some of them first principles.

In the first place I think there is no force in the objection made by the learned counsel for the defendants that the plaintiff had not insured his ship. I think the allegation that he was a member of the society and had paid his membership money is quite sufficient to give him an interest in it. I think also that there is nothing in the objection that the plaintiff is a member of a copartnership, because, although, as between the plaintiff and the other members it would be necessary for him to go into equity to enforce any rights he might have against the whole body, still it is perfectly competent to him to have an action against these twenty defendants, provided they were guilty of such a dereliction of duty as to give him a legal cause of action. Does the declaration then, disclose such cause? It states that "the defendants did wrongfully, collusively, and improperly expel the plaintiff from the said society." It seems to be conceded that the word expelled here must not be taken to be used in the sense of having physically turned him out of any room, but to mean the same as the word "exclude," as used in the rule under which the committee were acting on this occasion; that is to say, that they passed a judgment on him, saying he was no longer to be considered a member. On this part of the case I trust it will not be supposed that I think the mode of proceeding was a proper or right one on the part of the defendants. It will not be supposed that I think they were doing what was right and proper, under the circumstances, in meeting together and passing a resolution to exclude the plaintiff without hearing him. But whether that was so improper an act as to entitle the plaintiff to proceed in equity against the whole body of this association to restore him to his membership is one question, and whether it was such a wrongful act on the part of the defendants as to render them liable to an action at law is another question; and in my judgment the allegation of "wrongfully, improperly, and collusively," does not go to establish what the plaintiff ought, in this case, to have established, and what by the use of the word "fraudulently" he might have done, namely, that the act was done by fraud, and by an actual fraudulent use of the power given to the defendants by this rule. The words "wrongfully and improperly" may be rejected. The word collusively is a word of vague and ambiguous meaning. It may mean a fraudulent collusion, or a collusion without fraud at all. It is a sound and wholesome rule of pleading that words should be taken most strongly against the pleader, and if words of doubtful meaning, equally capable of an honest and a dishonest meaning are used, they should be construed in their honest and innocent sense; if that were not so, a cause might go to trial at Nisi Prius, and a proposition be put before the jury in doubtful language, capable of meaning any one of several things, and so great difficulty and inconvenience would arise. I am of opinion that these words do not disclose a cause of action.

But now, supposing the plaintiff to be correct in his view of the case, it being admitted that there was no physical expulsion of the plaintiff it merely amounts to this—that the act the defendants have done is a void act. If so, it seems to me to follow that no action can be maintainable. I am sorry to differ from my brother Cleasby, but it does seem to me very doubtful whether there has been a legal right infringed, so as to entitle the plaintiff to maintain his action, although he shows no damage. Again, there are cases, no doubt, where there is no damage or anything more than nominal damage in which an action would lie, if the defendants could be charged with conspiracy. If a man commits an offence by which a person is put in peril for a while, that person may recover. That is not the case here. The plaintiff is still a member of the society. He is in this position: either he is expelled or he is not. If he is expelled by a right and valid decision of the committee to that effect, then no action lies. If, on the other hand it is a merely nominal sentence of no validity whatever, by reason of his not having had notice and opportunity to defend himself, then, however wrong the society may be in removing him, the removal is altogether a void act, and gives the plaintiff no right of action.

[Ex.]

WOOD v. WOOD AND OTHERS.

As to the nonsuit, it appeared to me at the trial that the declaration was purposely framed to put before the jury a question which ought never to have been brought before them; and, it being admitted by the plaintiff's counsel, that he could not amend it by making a stronger case against the defendants, I felt it my duty to insist that the word expelled, as here used, did not mean physical expulsion, and that the word collusively was a vague and ambiguous expression which might mean either this, that, or the other.

AMPHLETT, B.—I am of the same opinion. I should not have added anything to what has been said by my learned brothers, but that, although we agree in the conclusion we have arrived at, there is some difference as to the grounds on which we have arrived at it. Therefore, perhaps, I may in a few words say what portion of that which has been already said I agree with, and what is the real ground on which I have come to the same conclusion.

Now, it appears to me, and has throughout the whole of the argument, that the question here depends upon this, whether or not the plaintiff has, in consequence of the acts of the defendants, ceased to be a member of the partnership. If he has not ceased to be a member, it does not appear to me that by this brutum fulmen, as it would be in that case, any wrong really has been done to him, for which he ought to recover damages. But, on the other hand, and this appeared to me to be the only way in which the case for the plaintiff could be successfully argued, if it could be brought to this, that the expulsion of the plaintiff had been effected by fraudulent means on the part of the committee, then undoubtedly the plaintiff would have suffered a great injury, and in my judgment would, upon the allegation in this declaration, have been entitled to recover damages. I thought at first that it was possible that the case might be argued in this way, though I have subsequently arrived at a different conclusion, namely, that it might be said the members of this partnership had agreed to give the committee plenary powers to act for all the other members of the partnership; and when they came to the conclusion that this man was not fit to remain a member, that, so far as the partnership was concerned, however wrong or negligent the conduct of the committee might be in coming to that conclusion, I thought it might be argued that the expulsion was complete, and that he must seek a remedy against the committee for that expulsion, because it was effected, and he no longer remained a member of the society. It appears to me that the allegations in the declaration are quite sufficient to support an action, because, although the word "fraudulent" is not used, the allegation is, "That the defendants, well knowing that if the plaintiff remained a member of the society he would be entitled to be indemnified out of the society's funds, and wrongfully, collusively, and improperly contriving to deprive the plaintiff of the benefit of that indemnity, wrongfully, collusively, and improperly" expelled him, upon the alleged ground that, according to the terms of the 47th rule, his conduct was "suspicious," and that he was not a proper person to remain a member of the society. If the expulsion had been carried into effect by that conduct on the part of the committee, I should not have doubted, but for the doubt expressed by my learned brothers, that these allegations would have been amply sufficient to support an action. The case, then, according to my view, comes to this,—that, upon the allegation that he had been "wrongfully, collusively, and improperly" expelled without being heard in his own defence, I think it is impossible to hold that the society, having established the committee as a tribunal to determine these questions, could derive any benefit from—I will not use the word fraud in any other than a legal sense—but will say, the collusive and improper exercise of discretion by the committee.

Then comes the question whether they were justified, under any circumstances, in expelling a man from the society, by deeming his conduct (to use the words of the rule) "suspicious," or that he was unworthy to remain a member, without communicating with him, and giving him some opportunity of explaining before they deemed him to be a character of that description. The case which recommends itself to my sense of justice is a decision which was come to after great consideration in Blissett v. Daniel, that, where there was an absolute power for two-thirds of the members of a partnership to exclude another without any cause being assigned at all, they would not be considered to be exercising that in a bond fide manner, if, because some one member had said "I think we should get rid of that man," and persuaded them to get rid of him in that way; and it was held that they ought to have given him an opportunity of being heard, and for this reason, that one man may have had a prejudice against him and gone to the others behind his back and stated the grounds of that prejudice, and prevailed upon two-thirds to sign his expulsion, whereas, if he had been heard, very possibly he might have removed the impression the others had derived at from something said behind his back. If, the very day after that decision in Blissett v. Daniel, the partners had met and had come to the decision that the plaintiff should be removed from the firm, if the court had decided that they were acting bond fide, and not out of spite to him, or for any illicit purpose, but only for the benefit of the partnership, that decision of removal would have been perfectly right. So, here, if the committee had called the plaintiff before them, although they had not been able to show by evidence that he ought justly to be deemed a "suspicious" person, and although they were not able to give legal proof of his conduct, there can be no doubt that they would have been entitled to expel him. But, according to the allegations in this direction they never gave him the opportunity of explaining his conduct, and I entertain no doubt (always supposing that these allegations could have been proved), that the plaintiff by going into a court of equity would be restored to his rights.

If, then, that is so, what damage has he really sustained? He has not ceased to be a member; he has still all his rights of membership, and the mere fact that the defendants have done something which is illegal and void, does not appear to me to authorise him in coming to this court to recover damages; and for why? why, for an ineffectual attempt to expel him from the partnership. Moreover, it appears to me that there would be great inconvenience in trying the question whether the plaintiff has been expelled or not, in the absence of the other numerous parties who are interested in the matter. All the partners are interested in having that question decided, and if this action proceeded, we should be trying it behind their backs; a matter that ought not, I think, to be left out of consideration. Indeed, the court has, on various occasions, refused to entertain actions by one partner against another very much on that express ground. If they find the matter is so connected with the partnership that complete justice cannot be done in a court of law, the courts of law have said that such an action could not be allowed, very much on the same principle that it would be very inconvenient to maintain this action. If this action could be maintained, what would be the result? Take the case of Blissett v. Daniel. It would be a surprise to lawyers to be told (which would almost follow from Mr. Seymour's argument) that not only could the plaintiff in that case get relief by filing a bill in Chancery, but, would also be entitled to damages from his partners in an action against them in a Court of Chancery. The answer here is, you are not injured, because if you go into a court of equity it would hold that you have not been expelled, and that no action will lie. For these reasons I agree with the opinion expressed by my Lord and my learned brethren, and think that the demurrer to this declaration ought to be allowed.

THE GREAT WESTERN INSURANCE COMPANY OF NEW YORK v. CUNLIFFE.

Marine insurance—Principal and agent—Allowances—Discount—Negligence—Jurisdiction.

A marine insurance company, carrying on business in New York, employed the defendants, in 1858, as their agents in this country for the purpose of taking risks, and adjusting and paying losses, for which they were to receive a commission of five per cent. upon the premiums paid in each year. The company also effected insurances in this country through the defendants.

On the 8th Dec. 1865, the defendants received instructions from the company to reinsure fifteen ships upon which their lines were full. The defendants endeavoured to effect the insurances, but in consequence of news of a disastrous gale, they were unable to do so except at exorbitant rates; they therefore wrote the same day to the company, informing them thereof, and stating that they left it to the company, if they deemed it necessary, to insure on their side, where it could be done at a profit, instead of here, where it would have to be done at a loss. After sending this letter, the defendants made no further attempts to insure these ships. Before the company received this letter, one of the ships which the defendants were directed to reinsure was wrecked, and thereby a loss was incurred by the company.

On a bill by the company praying for an account of the transactions between them and the defendants, and for damages in respect of the loss occasioned by the defendants' negligence in not reinsuring the ships as directed:

Held (reversing the decision of Bacon, V.C.), that a claim for damages by reason of the negligence of an agent, could not be enforced in a suit in equity for an account of the transactions between principal and agent, but that the plaintiffs' remedy was by action at law.

Under the "credit" system of conducting marine insurance business, which was the system adopted by the defendants, it is customary for the underwriter to allow a discount of twelve per cent. to the broker upon the balance, if any, owing to the underwriter upon the settlement of accounts with the broker at the end of each year.

In the agreement between the company and the defendants, no mention was made of the remuneration to be received by the defendants for reinsuring ships in this country.

In 1866 the company, who had hitherto been ignorant of the discount allowed by underwriters to brokers, were informed by the defendants that they were remunerated in that way, but the company made no complaint about it. They now contended that the defendants, being their agents, were not entitled to receive any benefit in the course of their agency except for their principals, and prayed that the defendants might be ordered to account to the company for the discount received by them in respect of insurances effected for the company:

Held (reversing the decision of Bacon, V.C.), that as no remuneration was provided in the agreement for insurances effected by the defendants, they were entitled to retain for their own benefit the discount allowed to them by the underwriters.

This was an appeal from a decision of Bacon, V.C.

The hearing in the court below is reported ante, p. 219, where the facts of the case are fully stated.

The Vice-Chancellor ordered the accounts to be taken as prayed by the bill, and directed that in taking those accounts the defendants should be charged with the damages occasioned to the plaintiffs in respect of the loss through the defendants' neglect to reinsure, and also with the discount received by them from the underwriters over and above the commission of 5 per cent.

From this decision the defendants appealed.

John Pearson, Q.C. and Millar, for the appellants.—We are entitled to retain the discount allowed us by the underwriters, for in effecting insurances we acted as brokers and not as agents, and are therefore entitled to the usual brokers' remuneration; there being nothing in the agreement between us and the company about remuneration for effecting insurances. By the agreement we were appointed agents for adjusting and paying losses in London, and for taking risks only, and nothing can be imported into the agreement which is not there. The transactions between the broker and underwriter are distinct and separate from the transactions between the broker and the assured. The law of principal and agent does not apply to the matter of this discount received by us from the underwriters, for we did not act as agents in the matter. The practice as to these transactions is stated by Parke, B. in Power v. Butcher (10 B. & C. 329), and it is still more fully stated by Blackburn, J. in Xenos v. Wickham (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 537; 14 C. B., N.S., 460), so that the custom by which a broker receives discount from an underwriter is thoroughly established and recognised. The discount is paid not upon any particular premium, but upon the balance of accounts between the underwriter and the broker in respect of all his clients at the end of each year. As to the claim for damages in respect of the loss sustained by reason of our failure to reinsure, the remedy is at law and not in this court. The accounts between us and the company are not so complicated as to render them unfit to be the subject of an action at law, and all the questions in this case are rather questions that ought to be tried by a mercantile jury than by a court of equity. But we were not guilty of any negligence; as agents we were bound to use the same discretion and diligence as our principals would have used on their own account, and we were justified in not reinsuring when we were unable to do so except at exorbitant rates. On finding ourselves unable to reinsure at the ordinary rates, we at once adopted the course which the case of Gallander v. Oelrichs (5 Bing. New Cas. 58) shows to be the proper one, and wrote to our principals, stating that we could not insure at the ordinary rates. But at all events, we are entitled to set off against the damages the amount saved in respect of the other fourteen ships by the same alleged act of negligence. They also cited

Airy v. Bland, 1 Camp. 534n.;

Minnett v. Forrester, 4 Taunt. 541n.

Kay, Q.C. and Marten, Q.C. for the respondents.

—The defendants acted as our agents in effecting the insurances. They were in a fiduciary position, and could not accept a gratuity. They must, therefore, account to us for the discount received by them from the underwriters:

Queen of Spain v. Parr, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 555; 39

Turnbull v. Garden, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 218; 28 L. J.,

N. S., 331, Ch.

Their neglect to reinsure was a breach of trust, and the defendants, therefore, cannot set off against the loss the amount that has been saved by their neglect and breach of trust. As for the objection that our claim for damages ought to be enforced in a court of law, we contend that this court has jurisdiction to assess the damages in taking the accounts between us and the defendants, which are too complicated to be dealt with in a court of law. They also cited

Sweeting v. Pearce, 1 Mar. Law Cas O. S. 134;
5 L. T. Rep. 79; 30 L. J., N. S., 109, C. P.

Without calling for a reply,

Lord Justice JAMES said: I am of opinion that the decree of the Vice-Chancellor must be discharged. Though filed as a bill for a general account between principal and agent, the bill was really filed for the purpose of getting the opinion of this court upon three questions, and three questions only, which are the sole questions that have to be determined. That is the mode in which the bill itself states the case. The plaintiffs say that there are three questions. The first is that relating to the neglect to reinsure, which was followed by the loss of the ship; the second is the question of interest; and the third is the question of discount. Those are the only questions which have arisen; the plaintiffs say that certain questions have arisen, and they state the questions. That being so, there is no doubt upon the face of the bill an admission against the plaintiffs that but for those questions there would be nothing to litigate about in this court or any other court. That is really the case, and there is nothing to do here except to settle those questions.

Now how do those three questions stand? First of all, with respect to the interest, I am of opinion that the case intended to be made by the bill wholly failed. The case made by the bill, and the case intended to be made by the bill, was not that the defendants were not entitled to claim interest with respect to the moneys which they paid, but that, instead of charging interest from the end of the year, which was the proper time to do it, they charged the interest from the time at which the actual sums were paid during the year; and the plaintiffs allege, therefore, that the interest during that portion of the year ought to be disallowed. The answer to that, as stated by Mr. Pearson, is this: "If we had been minded to do so, we were entitled to have charged interest from the time the premium was paid, or supposed to have been paid, but we did not do so; we only charged interest from the end of the year which is upon the pleadings admitted to be right." It appears to me that the defendants say: "We never did charge interest in that way." There is the allegation; the accounts are produced, and there is no trace of any such interest being charged except at the end of the year. That was the mode of charging interest up to the end of the year, year by year, upon the account as it then stood, and that system went on from the beginning to the end of the agency. The course of dealing between the parties is established by a succession of accounts.

Then the next question is as to the discount, or whatever it may be called, the allowance or gratuity which the brokers receive from the persons with whom they effect insurances. And upon this part of the case the plaintiffs say: "You are our agents, and in the course of that agency you have received a gratuity which you ought not to keep yourselves. You are mere agents, and, according to the principles of this court, a mere agent has no right to receive any benefit himself in the course of his agency; he has no right to make any profit in the shape of discount or anything of that kind." I believe the principle is laid down in one or two cases which were before me, and in which I acted upon it; it applies to the case of an agent dealing with his principal's money, making purchases for him, or something of that kind, and receiving something in the shape of a gratuity for it. The question in the present case is, whether the agent has been otherwise reimbursed, and whether he has received a gratuity of which his principal can be supposed to have been ignorant. But here—whether the defendants are called insurance brokers, or insurance agents, or merchants doing brokerage business or insurance business, the mere name is a matter of not the slightest consequence whatever—here what was done was this: the defendants were merchants in London minded to do reinsurance business as agents of the plaintiffs, and minded to do other business connected with it, and apparently doing insurance business, not only for the plaintiffs but for other clients who came to them. As stated on the part of the plaintiffs, they were agents to underwrite and to settle losses in respect of policies, and whether they be called agents or not, they were agents or brokers to effect reinsurances in those cases in which reinsurance was thought right by the principals in New York. That was a part of their business. The other part of their business, it is quite clear, was that which was thought to be the most profitable, because it appears from the correspondence that the defendants represented that they would not carry on one part of the business without that; and it was not likely that the plaintiffs would get any other persons to act as agents, without allowing them to obtain the profits of that particular business. Now, with regard to the other part of the business, which is the underwriting and the settling of losses, an actual agreement was made, the terms of remuneration being reduced into writing; but with regard to the effecting of reinsurances, not only were the terms of remuneration not reduced into writing, but no remuneration ever was paid by the plaintiffs, or supposed to be paid by the plaintiffs to the defendants at all. Yet this business was done by the defendants to obtain profit, as they knew it to be a profitable part of their business. It was not profitable by reason of anything which was to be paid by the plaintiffs to them as their paid servants. The view taken by the Vice-Chancellor seems to have been, that the defendants were paid agents of the company, who could not do this business themselves; but they were not paid servants to do the work, receiving remuneration for it; but they were left to make the profit which was incidental to the business itself. That was the character of their employment, otherwise it would not have been a profitable employment. The profit was not to come from the plaintiffs in the shape of any direct payment: it was to be profit which should enure to the defendants in the ordinary course of that kind of business. That was the business of going to underwriters, and getting the underwriters to accept the risks, paying them the premium for it. That is a well known business. In going to underwriters to obtain the insurances, they also go to Lloyd's to the persons connected with that kind of business. Whether he be called a broker or not, the person who is the agent for the merchant for this purpose, does and effects the insurance and he receives a discount of five per cent. In the particular form which was adopted in the present case, the defendants received a discount of five per cent., which they put into their own pockets. They were paid by the underwriter instead of by their principal. And then by a practice quite as well known, recognised by everybody connected with the business, recognised in the courts of law in this country, and referred to over and over again, upon the settlement of the accounts they received a gratuity of twelve per cent. upon the balance, if the balance happened to be a favourable one—that is, if the underwriter finds it to be a profitable account, he gives twelve per cent. upon the balance to the broker who brought the business to him. It is not upon the particular transaction, as I gather, but it is upon the whole result of the transactions which the broker has introduced to the particular underwriter; all the business done between them during the whole year is taken into account. That is the established remuneration which a broker receives for doing that business. In my opinion that is as right a thing as the five per cent. discount. The plaintiffs have never disputed that the defendants were entitled to retain in their own pockets the five per cent. They say: "We knew that, but we did not know of the other." They never inquired. They say: "We meant it to be according to the usual practice," and they never made any inquiry about it until the year 1866, when it appears, upon their own case, that they had some correspondence with the defendants, who told them what the nature of their profit was. That was communicated to the chairman and some other leading officer of the company in 1866; it was known by two persons, one of whom was the chairman, I think, and the other the deputy-chairman of the company; both these persons knew it in the year 1866. It is not pretended that there was a shadow of complaint by these gentlemen at the time; they allowed the matter to go on during the remainder of the year 1866, during the whole of the year 1867, and during a part of 1868, without the slightest suggestion that there was anything wrong in what these parties were doing, and they continued upon the footing that that was to be the mode of their remuneration. There is the fact that this mode of remuneration was known to the company in the year 1866, and the defendants were allowed to go on doing their work upon that understanding. I think that the dispute on the part of the plaintiffs is deficient in honesty as well as in law. I think that they ought not to have disputed the matter when they had allowed the defendants to go on after 1866, even if they had any reason to find fault before. That disposes of the question of interest, and of the question of the so called discount.

Then with regard to the third point; I am clearly of opinion that this never could be the subject of a suit in equity. I asked in vain for any authority in which it is laid down that where there is an outstanding account between principal and agent you can introduce into that account a mere item of damages occasioned by the negligence of the agent in disobeying some instructions of his principal. The most analogous case to it is that which I suggested, of taxing a solicitor's bill and taking cash accounts. I have never heard that, in such a case as that, one can introduce into the account the loss sustained by the negligence of the solicitor in carrying on the action improperly, or never investigating the case at all. That must be left to the common remedy of an action at law for negligence. One case with regard to a solicitor was, I think, referred to, in which the demurrer to a cross bill was overruled; there the solicitor, having security for his costs, filed a bill to enforce that security, and there was a cross bill saying that there was nothing due because there had been so much negligence that the solicitor was not entitled to recover. That was totally different; that case was as to the amount due upon the security and the question raised by the cross-bill would necessarily arise with regard to enforcing the security. But with that exception, that single exception, no case is suggested in which an action for negligence has been brought into this court merely because there has been some money account between the person who has been the employer and the person who has been the employed in the matter in which the alleged negligence has arisen. I am therefore of opinion that this bill was not right. The answer contains the same objection as if the bill had been demurred to.

THE GREAT WESTERN INSURANCE COMPANY OF NEW YORK v. CUNLIFFE.

I am of opinion that the demurrer would have been allowed and ought to have been allowed, if there had been a demurrer to the bill; and, that being so, I am of opinion that as all the three points which have arisen and which are the only points raised by the bill being decided against the plaintiffs, the only consequence is that the bill must be dismissed with costs.

Lord Justice MELLISH.—I am of the same opinion. The first question I have to consider is, what remuneration were the defendants entitled to charge the plaintiffs for acting as agents for the plaintiffs in effecting reinsurances and making themselves liable to pay the premiums on those reinsurances to the underwriters? Now the plaintiffs, being a large insurance company in New York, by the letter of the 15th June 1858 proposed to the defendants to act as their agents for the purpose of paying the amount due on policies when losses occurred which they were going to make payable in England. That was the principal matter for which they wished to employ the defendants, and they asked what would be the charge the defendants would make if they were appointed agents for that purpose. And the defendants answered that their charge would be $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; and that those were the usual terms for paying and settling claims. Then the plaintiffs accept that offer, and mention in the letter in which they accept it that "we shall frequently have reinsurance and other business negotiations to make through you," but they ask no question as to what will be the charge which the defendants will make for effecting such reinsurances. The defendants accept the employment and accordingly the business goes on and is transacted between the two parties, and large quantities of reinsurances are effected. In the accounts, so far as we have them before us, they simply charge the plaintiffs with the full amount of the premiums with interest payable from the 1st Jan. succeeding the time when the particular insurances are made; and the plaintiffs go on settling the accounts, and paying from time to time during the eight years, making no objection to that mode of charging. From that it is obvious that they were not charged any brokerage, nor did they pay any. Then it is quite obvious that they must have known, and they do not deny that they did know, that the defendants were to be remunerated by receiving a certain allowance and discount from the underwriters with whom they made the bargains. It is easy to ascertain by inquiry what is the usual and ordinary charge which agents who effect reinsurances are entitled to make. If a person employs another who, he knows, carries on a large business, to do certain work for him, and does not choose to ask him what his charge will be, and in fact knows that he is to be remunerated, not by him, but by the other party, which is very common in mercantile business—if he knows that the agent is to be remunerated by the other party with whom the business is transacted, and he does not choose to take the trouble to inquire, and does not think it worth while to ask, what the amount is, he must pay the ordinary amount which such agents do charge. What is the ordinary amount? There is no dispute about it. Mr. Lathers speaks about it; in his affidavit he says—"The ordinary course of transacting marine insurance business at Lloyd's is according to one of two systems known respectively as the cash system and the credit system." Then he goes on to describe the cash system, and then he says—"The credit system is as follows: The broker, as in the former system, is debited with the premium and credited with the five per cent. for brokerage in his account with the underwriter upon the insurance being effected. The account is continued up to the 31st Dec. in each year, and in this account the underwriter is debited with the losses which have arisen upon the risks protected by insurances, and if upon the balance of the account the amount of the premiums less brokerage exceeds the amount of the losses, so that the underwriter has money to receive, the underwriter allows to the broker a reduction of twelve per cent. upon the balance which the broker pays to the underwriter. On the other hand, if the losses exceed the premiums less brokerage, the broker does not receive any allowance upon the amount of the premiums which he pays in account. This deduction or allowance of twelve per cent. is called 'discount.'" That, he says, is the ordinary remuneration which a broker receives. Now what are the reasons alleged by the Great Western Insurance Company why they should not pay to the defendants the ordinary charge—it seems to me immaterial whether you call the agent a broker or not—why they should not pay the ordinary charge, admitted to be so, which is allowed to and received by agents who effect insurances? It is thus stated in Mr. Lathers' affidavit.—"In the year 1866 I and the plaintiff company for the first time discovered from the information obtained by Mr. John Bains Parker, the Vice-President of the company, who was then in England, that the firm of John Pickersgill and Sons, although crediting or allowing to the plaintiff company only the brokerage of five per cent. as allowed by the underwriters, in fact obtained from the underwriters an additional allowance or discount as stated in the bill of complaint. The fact is that the firm of John Pickersgill and Son conducted the business of the said reinsurances according to the credit system, and thereby obtained the said discount of twelve per cent. on the balance payable to the underwriters at the end of the year. I had not, nor to the best of my knowledge, information, and belief, had the said company or any person on their behalf, any information or intimation of the said John Pickersgill and Son obtaining such benefit or advantage until the discovery of the fact thereof in the year 1866 as aforesaid."

Now the sole question to be decided is whether the circumstance that the Great Western Insurance Company—the business having been carried on, I think, from 1858 to 1868—did not discover this practice as to the underwriters allowing the twelve per cent. upon any profit that might be made upon the business as between the broker and the underwriter, until the year 1866, is any reason why they should be allowed to reopen this matter, and have an account, and obtain a share or the whole of the twelve per cent. for themselves. Even if they had never discovered it until after the whole account was closed, I am of opinion that if a principal employs an agent, and does not state what his remuneration is to be, and the agent goes on and transacts business on that footing, the principal knowing that the agent is to receive his remuneration from the other persons with whom he deals, and not choosing to ask what the amount is, he is bound by what the custom and usage is, though he does not know it. Secondly, I entirely agree with what the Lord Justice has said, that they having discovered it in the year 1866, ought to have stopped at once and not to have gone on dealing for two years more without making any objection, and then saying what they did. There is no reason to suppose that Messrs. Pickersgill and Son would have consented to act for them on any other than the ordinary footing, and if the plaintiffs had gone to them in 1866 and said "You must give us the twelve per cent.," they would have said, "No, thank you; go and take your business elsewhere, and see if you can find another broker who will do your business for less." The case seems to me also quite clear on the question of interest, because the matter has been settled ever since the time of Lord Mansfield, with reference to this very peculiar business of insurance agents and brokers, that though the premium may never have been paid by the assured to the broker, and may not have been paid by the broker to the underwriter, yet, as between the assured and the broker, it is considered to have been paid from the moment of the insurance being effected, and the broker makes his own bargain with the assured as to when the premium is to be paid to him, and the broker makes his own bargain with the underwriter when the premium is to be paid to him. The bargain was, as is proved by the account—and there is nothing unreasonable in it—that the defendants would give the plaintiffs credit up to the end of the year, which is exactly the same time as, according to the credit system, the underwriter gives; and if it was not paid at the end of the year, then interest, as on a mercantile account, was to be charged from that time. That appears to me to be perfectly correct, and there seems to me to be no reason at all why this account should be taken and the matter reopened for the purpose of making fishing inquiries, for which there is no occasion or ground whatever, whether payments were made to the underwriters on the 1st Jan. or some time afterwards. It appears to me that there is no right to make any such inquiries.

I also entirely agree that, as to the last matter, this is not a case for a court of equity, but is only a case for a court of law. I should say that though generally I am very sorry to send suitors from this court to bring their suits in another court, yet in this particular instance I cannot help thinking that it is really a case for a mercantile jury sitting at Guildhall to say whether there has been negligence in not reinsuring this ship, for which the defendants ought to be liable. I am very glad not to be obliged to express an opinion one way or the other on the subject, no case having been cited to us in which the court of equity ever has taken upon itself to decide such a question.

I am of opinion that the court is not called upon to decide it, when the objection is taken, as it is here.

CORY v. PATTON.

Marine assurance—Concealment of material fact—Insurance made by agent subject to approval of assured—Knowledge of assurer after initialling of slip, but before ratification and before execution of policy.

A slip being in practice the complete and final contract between the parties to a contract of marine insurance, although not enforceable at law or in equity, there is no obligation on the assured to communicate a material fact that comes to his knowledge after the initialling of the slip and before the issuing of the policy; nor does the fact that the contract has been entered into by the agent of the assured and the slip been initialled by the underwriter, subject to the approval of the assured, and that the ratification of the assured does not take place until after the material fact comes to his knowledge, entitle the underwriter to have the fact communicated to him.

In an action upon a policy of marine assurance, the plaintiffs replied to a plea of the concealment of a material fact, that, before they had knowledge of the fact, their agent had entered into an agreement with the defendant to effect this assurance by the latter's initialling a slip; and that if they had communicated the fact to the defendant when they first knew it, he would still in honour, conscience, and good faith, have been bound to subscribe his name to the policy sued upon. The court had held this replication good on demurrer, and the jury at the trial found a verdict upon it for the plaintiffs.

Held, upon the authority of Hagedorn v. Oliverson (2 M. & S. 485) that the admitted circumstances,—defendant having entered into this agreement with plaintiffs' agent subject to plaintiffs' approval, and plaintiffs' ratification not having taken place till after he obtained knowledge of the material fact concealed,—made no difference to the legal validity of the verdict upon the replication.

This was an action upon a policy of marine assurance tried before Cockburn, C.J., at Guildhall. A verdict was found for the plaintiffs, but leave was reserved to the defendant to move to enter a non-suit.

CORY v. PATTON.

Defendant pleaded as a 6th plea, concealment of a material fact, viz., that the said ship having set sail and departed on the said voyage with the said goods on board had met with an accident and misfortune whilst proceeding on the said voyage.

To this the plaintiffs replied that before they had any knowledge of the material fact, they, being at a distance from the defendant, by a letter written by them to their agent instructed their said agent to effect the said insurance, and the plaintiffs said that they had no knowledge of the said material fact until after the lapse of a reasonable time for their agent to agree with an underwriter or underwriters to insure the said goods, and to settle with him or them the terms and premium on and for which the said insurance should be effected, and the plaintiffs said that in the ordinary course of business their said agent ought to have agreed and settled as aforesaid before they, the plaintiffs, knew of the said material fact; and the plaintiffs said that before they knew the said fact the said agent did apply to the defendant as such underwriter as aforesaid to insure the said goods and settle and arrange with the defendant the terms and premiums on and for which the defendant would insure the same, and the defendant made a binding agreement with the said agent to insure the same on those terms and for that premium, and became in honour, conscience, and good faith, though not in law bound to submit a policy for insuring the said goods on those terms and for that premium, and the plaintiff said that if the said material fact and plaintiff's said knowledge of it, and the premises aforesaid had afterwards been made known to the defendant he would still in honour, conscience, and good faith, have been bound to subscribe himself to the plaintiffs for such a policy as aforesaid, and the plaintiffs said that the policy in the declaration mentioned was the policy which the defendant was so bound to subscribe as aforesaid, and the plaintiffs said that they, the plaintiffs, knowing as the fact was that in due course of business at the time when they first had knowledge of the said material fact either a policy for insuring the said goods in pursuance of their instructions would be effected, or that such an agreement would be made by some underwriter or underwriters which would in honour, conscience, and good faith bind him or them to subscribe a policy for effecting the said insurance, did in good faith abstain from communicating the said material fact to their said agent or to the defendant which is the concealment in or the 6th plea mentioned.

This replication had been held good on demurrer (ante, vol. 1., p. 225; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 161; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 304); and the jury found that the alleged practice of merchants was proved. It was admitted, however, that the slip was initialled subject to the approval of the plaintiffs as to the amount of premium, and that they did not ratify their agent's contract until after they knew of the accident to the ship. The point reserved by the Lord Chief Justice was whether these admitted circumstances, which are more particularly described in the judgment, made any difference to the legal validity of the verdict upon the replication.

A rule nisi had been obtained, calling upon the plaintiffs to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside and a nonsuit entered in pursuance of the leave reserved on the grounds that the custom found by the jury was not sufficient in law to support a verdict for the plaintiffs, and that upon the whole case there was no evidence to support the replication, or any amended replication; also why a new trial should not be had on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence.

Hugh Shield showed cause.—The effect of the decision of the demurrer in this case was that the limit of the term for obligatory disclosure of material facts is when the underwriter signs the slip; this may be either law or custom, and the plaintiffs have both in their favour. [BLACKBURN, J.—The question is whether the duty to disclose a material fact does not continue until the ratification of the contract. QUAIN, J.—It has been held that the subsequent ratification of an unauthorised stoppage in transitu has not the effect of altering retrospectively the ownership of the goods, Bird v. Brown (4 Ex. 786). COCKBURN, C.J.—The underwriter said to the assurer's agent, I enter into this contract on condition that your principal ratifies. Is that not on the implied condition that the state of things then existing must also exist at the time of ratification?] There is no evidence of any such condition on the underwriter's part when he initialled the slip; and the jury have practically found that the custom alleged in the replication was proved, and that it was not dependent upon the priority of the plaintiffs' knowledge, or their ratification.

Matthews, Q.C., and Watkin Williams, Q.C. supported the rule for the defendant.—The custom proved at the trial did not touch the question of ratification. [QUAIN, J.—Why does not the custom, that nothing after the slip can affect the assurer's duty to disclose, include ratification?] There was no binding agreement between the parties before the plaintiffs knew of the material fact concealed. Until ratification there was nothing to bind the plaintiffs, and therefore until then the defendant could not be bound. The fact that the slip was initialled, subject to approval, is cogent evidence that until ratification it was not intended to be binding, as the House of Lords held with respect to a paper containing heads of an agreement sent to a solicitor to reduce into form: (Ridgway v. Wharton, 6 H. of L. Cas. 238.) At p. 305, Lord Wensleydale said: "These cases often occur in courts of law, and the question then always is, whether the parties mean to embody the contract, made by parol, in writing? If they do, nothing binds them till it is written." It was held in Routledge v. Grant (4 Bing., 653), the defendant having offered to purchase a house, and to give plaintiff six weeks for a definite answer, that before the offer was accepted, the defendant might retract it at any time during the six weeks. So in Cooke v. Oxley (3 T. R. 653), defendant having proposed to sell goods to plaintiff, gave him a certain time, at his request, to determine whether he would buy them or not. Plaintiff within that time determined to buy them, and gave notice thereof to defendant; yet the latter was not liable in an action for not delivering them, for the plaintiff not being bound by the original contract, there was no consideration to bind the defendant. Lord Kenyon said: "Nothing can be clearer than that at the time of entering into this contract, the engagement was all on one side the other party was not bound; it was therefore nudum pactum." [BLACKBURN, J.—Is not Hagedorn v. Oliverson (2 M. & S. 485, cited in Story on Agency, sect. 285,) exactly in point with regard to the present case?] There the insurance was in the name of the broker, as well as other persons, and the contract existed from the beginning; it was not dependent upon the approval of a principal. The policy was effected in the usual form by plaintiff as well in his own name as for and in the name of all and every other person, &c., for the benefit of S., an alien enemy, and plaintiff procured a licence to legalise the voyage, and a loss happened; and two years afterwards, S., by letter to the plaintiff, adopted the insurance: it was held that the plaintiff might recover against the underwriter, averring the interest in S. There the broker and underwriter professed to make a final contract between them; there was nothing wanting but mere ratification. [BLACKBURN, J.—Nor is there here.] There is nothing here to show more than a proposal on the underwriter's part. [COCKBURN, C.J.—The initials on the slip go further than that.] They do not constitute a contract with the principal. Until both parties were bound there could be no contract. Here there was no binding contract on the broker before knowledge of the accident was obtained; much less, therefore, was there a contract binding upon the principal.

MULLER v. BALDWIN.

COCKBURN, C.J.—We are all agreed that the plaintiff is entitled to our judgment, and that the rules should be discharged; but we will take time to give our reasons. Cur. adv. vult.

July 6.—COCKBURN, C.J., delivered the judgment of the court (Cockburn, C.J., Blackburn, Quain, and Archibald, J.J.).—This was an action on a policy of insurance on goods.

The plaintiffs, who are colliery owners and merchants at Cardiff, having had a cargo of coals shipped on their account on board the ship Ceylon, by their agents at Newcastle, wrote on the 19th April 1870, to insurance brokers in London to effect an insurance thereon, limiting the amount of premium to 30s. a ton. The broker's clerk thereupon proceeded to Lloyd's, and saw one Rutherford, who was in the habit of underwriting for the defendant, and whose authority was not disputed; and on Rutherford refusing to insure the cargo at less than 35s. a ton agreed to give that amount of premium, whereupon Rutherford initialled the slip. It did not appear that the broker had a discretionary authority to exceed the limits prescribed by the plaintiffs as to the amount of premium, and it must be taken that the slip was initialled subject to the ratification of the plaintiffs, more especially as in this instance the letter of the plaintiffs to the brokers was shown to Rutherford, who thereupon, according to his own account, initialled subject to approval. By the practice of Lloyd's, as stated by Mr Rutherford in evidence, "if an agent agrees to give a higher premium than his instructions warrant, and the underwriter initials knowing it, if the principal ratifies, the underwriter is bound." The plaintiffs in the present case did in fact ratify what the brokers had done, and, if this were all, the case would be free from difficulty. But it so happened that between the time of initialling the slip and the signing the policy, viz., on the afternoon of the 20th April, the plaintiffs became aware of the loss of the Ceylon, but failed to communicate that fact to the defendant.

The case came before this court on demurrer (ante, vol. 1, p. 225; 36 L. T. Rep. N. S. 161, and L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 304), but, as the facts then stood on the record, the fact that the slip was initialled subject to ratification by the assured, was not before the court. Upon the facts as then appearing on the record, this court gave judgment in favour of the plaintiffs on the ground that, according to the usage of those engaged in marine insurance, the initialling of the slip constitutes a complete and final contract binding upon them in honour and good faith, whatever events might subsequently happen, and [that consequently the assured need not communicate to the underwriter facts material to the risks insured against, which came to his knowledge between the time of initialling the slip and that of signing the policy; and the only question now before us is whether the fact appearing on the trial—that the slip was initialled subject to ratification by the assured—constitutes a material difference from the facts as appearing on the record when the former judgment was given, and—by reason that the contract was still open, as was contended on the argument before us—entitles the underwriter to have the loss communicated to him.

Upon this point we have entertained considerable doubt, but as the case of Hagedorn v. Oliverson (2 M. & S. 485) appears to us to be in point, and to govern the present case, we think ourselves bound to abide by that decision, leaving the defendant to take the case to a court of appeal if he shall be so advised.

Tyne coal dues—Coal exported—To be used on board steamship—Bunker coal—35 & 36 Vict. c. xviii.

By the Tyne Coal Dues Act 1872, sect. 3, there shall be payable to the commissioners in respect of coals and other articles exported from the port of Newcastle-upon-Tyne the following dues, that is to say, in respect of coals, one penny per ton of twenty hundredweight.

Held, that coals carried away from the port for the purpose of being consumed beyond the limits of the port, although on board, and for the use of the ship carrying them, are coals exported within the meaning of the Act.

THIS was an appeal from the decision of the judge of the County Court of Northumberland, holden at Newcastle, given in the above action.

The following are the facts of the case:

Previous to the passing of the River Tyne Improvement Act 1850, the Corporation of Newcastle-upon-Tyne held the town and port of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and divers dues in fee-farm under the Crown, and were conservators of the port extending from a point in the sea at the mouth of the River Tyne to Hedivin streams, about seven miles above the town of Newcastle-upon-Tyne. By that Act the conservatorship of the River Tyne and the powers of the corporation became vested in the Tyne Improvement Commissioners.

In the preamble to the Tyne Improvement Act 1850, it is recited (inter alia):

MULLER v. BALDWIN.

That the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, by virtue of prescription and various charters, demand, take, and receive certain dues called "town dues" on coal cinders, grindstones, and salt exported from the said port, which are referred to as the "coal dues."

By the 48th section of the same Act it is enacted (inter alia), that three-eighth parts of all the coal dues from time to time paid to the corporation after paying, deducting, allowing and satisfying out of the aggregate amount of such dues, all the costs, charges, damages, and expenses of and incident to recovering, collecting, and receiving the same, should from time to time be carried by the treasurer for the time being of the borough of Newcastle-upon-Tyne to the credit of a separate and distinct account, to be called the Tyne Improvement Fund account, and the moneys from time to time carried, and to be carried to such account, should, subject to the provisions of the Act, be the fund for payment of the expenses of carrying the Act into execution by the commissioners, and be called the Tyne Improvement Fund.

Under the provisions of the River Tyne Improvement Act 1850, the Corporation of Newcastle continued in receipt of the coal dues from time to time, paying over to the Tyne Improvement Commissioners the net proceeds of three-eighth parts.

In the year 1870, after a protracted negotiation, the Tyne Improvement Commissioners came to an agreement with the Corporation of Newcastle for the purchase of the five-eighths of the coal dues which remained the property of the corporation, under the Act of 1850. The basis of the negotiation was the annual produce of such dues, and it was part of that agreement that in future these and all other dues should be received directly by the commissioners.

This agreement between the Corporation of Newcastle and the Tyne Improvement Commissioners was carried out by an Act of Parliament passed in the year 1870, which is hereinafter referred to as the Tyne Improvement Act 1870. It is by this Act enacted:—

Sect. 3. That the five-eighth parts not by the River Tyne Improvement Act 1850 directed to be carried to the credit of the Tyne Improvement Fund of all the coal dues, and which said five-eighth parts were, by the same Act, directed to be carried to the borough fund of the borough, shall on the 1st Jan. 1871 be transferred to the commissioners, and shall thereafter belong to the Tyne Improvement Fund, and be dealt with by the commissioners as part of such fund, according to the provisions of the said River Tyne Improvement Act 1850, and the recited Acts passed subsequently thereto, and all the interest of the corporation in the said five-eighth parts of the said coal dues, shall thereupon be vested in the commissioners.

Sect. 4. From and after the transfer of the said five-eighth parts of the coal dues the commissioners shall, in respect of such five-eighth parts, be entitled to use, exercise, and enjoy all the rights and powers which they are or may be entitled to use, exercise, or enjoy in respect of three-eighth parts of the same dues which were transferred to the commissioners by the River Tyne Improvement Act 1850, including the rights and powers given by the 14th section of the Harbours and Passing Tolls, &c. Act 1861, in as full and ample a manner in all respects as if the said five-eighth parts had been transferred to the commissioners by the River Tyne Improvement Act 1850.

Sect. 5. From and after the transfer of the said five-eighth parts of the said coal dues to the commissioners the whole of the said coal dues and the said ballast dues and import dues and all other dues and payments which, by the River Tyne Improvement Act 1850, were directed to be from time to time carried by the treasurer of the borough to the said Tyne Improvement Fund shall be paid to and received by the commissioners and be by them paid to the credit of such fund.

By the 7th section it is provided that the commissioners shall pay to the corporation the sum of 130,000*l.* in consideration of the relinquishment and transfer of the dues; and by the 8th section that the corporation shall have an equitable lien on the dues for principal and interest.

In the course of the year 1871 negotiations took place between the Tyne Improvement Commissioners and the various parties interested in the trade of the Tyne, which led to the passing of the Tyne Coal Dues Act 1872.

The Act is entitled an Act to abolish the Tyne coal dues, and in lieu thereof to provide new dues to extinguish the right to increase rates under the Harbours and Passing Tolls, &c., Act 1861, and to extend the time for the completion of the piers and other works,

It is enacted by this Act:

Sect. 2. The expression "coal dues" means the dues heretofore payable on coals, cinders, grindstones, and salt exported from the port.

Sect. 3. That on and after the 1st June 1872 the coal dues shall be abolished, and in lieu thereof and in extinction of the right, power, or claims by the commissioners under the Harbour and Passing Tolls, &c., Act 1861, to indemnify themselves for the loss of compensation paid to them for differential dues by raising any of the rates which they have power to levy, there shall be payable to the commissioners in respect of coals, cinders, coke, grindstones, and salt exported from the port the following dues, that is to say, in respect of coals, cinders, and coke, 1*d.* per ton of 20*cwt.* in respect of grindstones, 3*d.* per ton of 20*cwt.*; and in respect of salt, 1*d.* per ton of 20*cwt.*; which dues shall be called "River Tyne Export Dues," and shall be carried to the account called the Tyne Improvement Fund, and shall be applicable to all purposes to which the Tyne Improvement Fund shall from time to time be applicable.

Sect. 4. The corporation shall be entitled to a lien or charge in equity on five-eighth parts of the said River Tyne export dues for the several instalments of purchase money and interest payable to the corporation under the Tyne Improvement Act 1870, or so much thereof as shall from time to time remain unpaid.

Sect. 5. The commissioners shall be entitled to use, exercise, and enjoy all the rights and powers for recovering and receiving the River Tyne export dues which, before the passing of this Act, they were entitled to use, exercise, and enjoy in respect of the coal dues, as well as all the rights and powers which the commissioners are or may be from time to time entitled to use, exercise, and enjoy for recovering and receiving any other rates, tolls, and duties from time to time payable to them.

Sect. 6. From and after the passing of this Act all right, power, and claim of the commissioners and of the corporation under the Harbour and Passing Tolls, &c., Act 1861, with the consent of Her Majesty in council, to indemnify themselves for the loss of the compensation payable to them for differential dues which ceased to be paid from and after the 1st Jan. 1872 by raising the amount of any rates they had power to levy, shall be extinguished.

When in the year 1870 the Tyne Improvement Commissioners became entitled to the receipt of the whole of the "Tyne coal dues," without the intervention of the corporation, they found it to have been the uniform practice of the corporation, with one exception hereafter to be mentioned, not to charge the coal due on coals carried out of the port on board steam vessels and intended to be used for the purpose of raising steam power to work the engines of the vessels which carried the coal, such coal being called "bunker coal, or coal for ship's use."

The Tyne Coal Dues Act 1872, came into operation on the 1st June 1872, and on the 1st April 1873 the commissioners, for the first time, claimed the right to levy under that Act, as being dues by that Act authorised to be taken on bunker coal or coal for ship's use, and in pursuance of such claim they demanded from the plaintiff under the following circumstances the sum of money in dispute in this action.

On the 19th April last a Norwegian steam vessel, called the Hakar Adolstein, sailed from the port of Newcastle-on-Tyne with 530 tons of coal alleged to be bunker coal, or coal for ship's use, on board. The defendant, who was the duly authorised collector of dues for the Tyne Improvement Commissioners, demanded from the plaintiff, who was the master of the said steam vessel, a due of 1d. per ton, amounting to the sum of 2l. 4s. 2d., in respect of the said 530 tons of coal. The plaintiff at first refused to pay upon the ground that the coal was intended solely for ship's use, but afterwards, as the defendant, who was also collector of customs, stopped his vessel, he paid under protest the sum demanded, and then brought in the County Court this action to recover back the sum so paid.

The following is a copy of the particulars of claim as stated in the plaint:

To dues illegally charged on 530 tons coals shipped on board my vessel Hakar Adolstein for ship's use at 1d. per ton—2l. 4s. 2d.

The cause came on before the County Court Judge on the 31st Oct. last, when the following admissions were entered into.

We, the attorneys for the above named plaintiff and defendant, mutually agree to admit at the trial of the cause the following facts, viz:

1. That the above named plaintiff was in the month of April last, master of the Norwegian vessel Hakar Adolstein, and the above named defendant was at the same time the authorised collector of the dues of the Tyne Improvement Commissioners.

2. That in the month of April last, there was shipped on board the said vessel Hakar Adolstein, and carried therein, out of the port of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, 530 tons of coal of 20cwt. each, and that the said vessel cleared for the port of Christiania, in Norway, taking in goods at Newcastle for New York, and the said vessel proceeded to Christiania, and from thence via Bergen to New York, her ultimate port of destination.

3. That the said vessel is a steam ship.

4. That 45 tons of coal would be required for the purpose of navigation from the Tyne to the port of Christiania, and 300 tons for a voyage from Christiania to New York.

5. That the sum of 2l. 4s. 2d. claimed to be due to the Tyne Improvement Commissioners in respect of the said coals, was paid by the plaintiff to the defendant under protest, and that the said plaintiff is entitled to recover so much of the said sum, if any, as shall have been erroneously paid.

On the trial evidence was given of the usage of the port as regards bunker coal or coal for ship's use from the year 1840, and it was proved that, with the exception of about ten days in the year 1870, the Corporation of Newcastle had never attempted to levy dues on such coal, that at the expiration of these ten days the corporation had stopped the levy, and had returned the sums paid during these ten days to those who asked for a return, and that the commissioners had not (until ten months after the passing of the Tyne Coal Dues Act 1872) attempted to levy dues in respect of such coal, and it was also proved that dues are not charged on coal used for raising steam in the steam tugs employed in towing vessels in and out of the harbour. Evidence was also given, but objected to by Mr. Bruce (as counsel for the defendants) as not binding the commissioners, that coal taken out of the port for ship's use does not appear as coals exported in the customs' returns, and that steam vessels leaving the port with coal for ship's use only are treated as being ballast and not as carrying cargo. And reference was made, Mr. Bruce again objecting on the same ground, to the use of the word "export" and its meaning in the Acts relating to the customs.

A report made by the Coal Dues Committee of the Tyne Improvement Commissioners, dated Nov. 1871, and also a report made by the Finance Committee of the Tyne Improvement Commissioners, dated 10th April 1873, were put in evidence on behalf of the plaintiff at the trial.

The Tyne Improvement Acts 1850, 1852, 1857, 1859, 1861, 1865, 1866, 1867, 1870, and 1872, and the Tyne Coal Dues Act 1872 were all put in evidence and form part of this case, and reference may be made by either side to any or all of them or any part thereof.

The judge of the County Court gave judgment for the plaintiff.

"I order," he said, "1d. per ton on 345 tons (which is the admitted minimum quantity of coals required for a voyage to New York under the condition in evidence in this case) to be returned to him, and, in default of a prescribed scale of charges, and in the absence of any evidence to guide me, I allow on this occasion, without attempting to lay down any rule, 20 per cent. additional, as a margin for consumption in port and for contingencies on the voyage out." The amount recovered was 1l. 14s. 6d.

The questions for the opinion of the court are—first, whether the learned judge of the County Court was right in deciding that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the said sum of 1l. 14s. 6d.; secondly, if the plaintiff is not entitled to recover the said sum of 1l. 14s. 6d. is he entitled to recover any other sum, and if any, what sum?

Sir J. B. Karlake, Q.C. (with Russell Q.C. and Gainsford Bruce (argued for defendant, the appellant.—All coal taken out of the port is exported coal, and the purpose for which it is shipped cannot be of any consequence in interpreting the 3rd section of the Act of 1872; nor can it matter what had been usual before that Act was passed. There can be no reason for drawing the line as the County Court judge has done, nor indeed is it possible to draw any line which can be applied generally. That the word "export" applies to goods intended to be consumed on the voyage of the ship which carries them appears from the Customs Law Consolidation Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 96), which prohibits the exportation and importation of spirits from the Channel Islands, but expressly excepts spirits really intended for consumption on the voyage.

that it was intended to continue the rates and dues in the same manner as they had before been imposed, and the evidence is sufficient to show that "bunker coal" had not been treated as if exported. As to the meaning of the word, the County Court judge is right in saying it must be correlative to "import," and can relate only to goods sent out of the country for merchandise. Webster's dictionary defines it, "To carry out; but appropriately and perhaps exclusively, to convey or transport in traffic produce and goods from one country to another, or from one State or jurisdiction to another, either by water or land." Other dictionaries give similar meanings. This is the obvious sense in which the Legislature has used the word, and if there is danger of abuse, the Legislature alone can interfere.

Sir J. B. Karslake, in reply.—The definition of "export" in the dictionaries will not help the plaintiff's contention; it might be an authority for non-payment of dues upon coal required to Norway, but it does not support the decision of the County Court judge. A steam tug, which merely passes in and out of the port, might perhaps be exempt from these dues, for she could not be said to export coals at all. Here, however, the ship took a whole cargo of coal, for her own use certainly, but chiefly for use after she had called at a foreign port. Why should she not sell the coals there instead of using them herself? and why should she not be exempt for the coal required to bring her back from New York as well as for the voyage out?

Cur. adv. vult.

June 5.—LUSH, J., delivered the judgment of the court (Mellor, Lush, and Archibald, JJ.—The question raised by this appeal is whether coals taken out of the port of Newcastle in a foreign steamer for the purpose of consumption on board in the course of a foreign voyage are liable to the coals due of 1d. per ton granted to the Tyne Improvement Commissioners by the Tyne Coal Dues Act 1872, on all coals exported from the port of Newcastle. The learned judge of the County Court considered that having regard to the usage of the corporation, while the coal dues belonged to them, of treating coals taken on board for consumption as exempted from duty, the term "exported" must receive a qualified interpretation, and be taken to mean coals exported for the purpose of commerce as distinguished from what are called "bunker coals," that is coals taken on board for the purpose of consumption on the voyage.

We agree as to the reasonableness of making a distinction between coals taken away for sale and coals taken for the necessary use of the vessel; but we are constrained to differ from the learned judge in his construction of the Act. There is nothing in the language of the Act to show that the word "exported" was used in any other than its ordinary sense, namely, "carried out of the port;" and considering how easily and how extensively the privilege of storing for use may be abused, and what quantities may be carried away under the name of bunker coals, we think that if it had been intended to exempt from duty coals taken on board for fuel, some limitation as to quantity would have been imposed. Nothing would have been easier than to insert a proviso to that effect. We cannot, however, speculate upon the intentions of the Legislature which are neither expressed in terms nor conveyed by implication.

Our duty is to interpret the words of a statute according to their plain and grammatical meaning, when, as in this case, they are not controlled by anything to be found in the context. Construing the words of the Act upon this principle, we feel bound to hold that coals carried away from the port, not on a temporary excursion as in a tug or pleasure boat which intends to return with more or less of the coals on board, and which may be regarded as always constructively within the port, but taken away for the purpose of being wholly consumed beyond the limits of the port, are coals "exported" within the meaning of the Act. We therefore give judgment for the defendant.

SMIDT v. TIDEN.

Bill of lading—Freight payable as per charter-party—Two charter-parties, one to broker by master, the other by broker to charterer without master's authority—Payment of freight—Implied contract—Consensus ad idem.

Plaintiff, as master of a ship lying at London, entered into a charter-party with L., a ship-broker, to carry a quantity of iron from Hartlepool to Gothenburg, at 7s. 3d. per ton, freight to be paid in London, and the owner to have an absolute lien for freight. On the day following, L. chartered the ship to defendants to carry the same quantity of iron from Hartlepool to Gothenburg, at 8s. per ton, with similar provisions as to payment of and lien for freight, and a clause in these terms—"The brokerage of 5 per cent. is due on the execution of this charter to L., by whom the vessel is to be entered and cleared at the port of loading." L. had no authority to act as broker for the plaintiff, or to receive the freight, and neither plaintiff nor defendants had any knowledge of the charter entered into by the other. The iron being shipped, the master, without requiring payment of the freight, signed and gave out bills of lading, making it deliverable to "order or assigns, he or they paying freight for the said goods as per charter-party." At the port of discharge the iron was delivered without the lien being insisted on. L., in the mean time, obtained payment from the defendants of the freight of 8s. per ton, and afterwards stopped payment, leaving the freight of 7s. 3d. unpaid to the plaintiff. Plaintiff having brought an action against defendants to recover the last-mentioned freight:

Held, that under the circumstances there was no contract between the parties, and the defendants were, therefore, not liable.

The bill of lading was not a contract, or evidence of a contract, between plaintiff and defendants, there being no consensus ad idem; and no contract to pay freight to the plaintiff could, under the circumstances of the case, be implied.

THIS was an action brought for the recovery of 147l. 11s. for the freight, or in respect of the putting on board and carriage of certain railway iron of the defendants, in a steamship called the Gothenburg, of which the plaintiff was master and, by consent of the parties, the following case was stated without any pleadings.

1. The plaintiff was and is the master of the said steamship Gothenburg. The defendants are merchants carrying on business in the city of London.

2. On the 17th July 1872, a charter-party was entered into in London between the agents of the owners and Mr. G. B. Lyth, a shipbroker, carrying on business in London, whereby the said ship was chartered to the said R. B. Lyth, to carry 407 tons of railway iron from Hartlepool to Gothenburg. The charter-party (No. 1) was in the following terms:

London, 17th July, 1872.

It is this day mutually agreed between _____ of the good steam ship or vessel called the Gothenburg, of the measurement, &c., now at Rotterdam, and R. B. Lyth, Esq., of Leadenhall-street, merchant, that the said ship being tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, shall with all convenient speed sail and proceed to West Hartlepool, or so near thereunto as she may safely get, and there load from the agents of the said freighters 407 tons of railway iron, owners having liberty to take part cargo from Rotterdam to Gothenburg, or to fill up with coals for ship's benefit at Hartlepool, which the said merchant binds himself to ship. The cargo to be brought alongside, &c., and being so loaded shall therewith proceed to Gothenburg, or so near thereunto as she may safely get, and deliver the same on being paid freight as follows, at the rate of 7s. 3d. per ton of 20wt, delivered in full of port charges and pilotages, the act of God, &c., always excepted. The freight is to be paid as follows, in cash in London, on receipt of bill of lading; the rails to be supplied to the steamer as fast as she can take in and stow, and to be received as fast as she can deliver, three days in demurrage over and above the said laying days at 20l. per day. The owner and master to have an absolute right of lien on the cargo for all dead freight and demurrage, and all other charges whatsoever. The master to sign bills of lading as presented without prejudice to this charter. Penalty for non-performance of this agreement estimated amount of freight steamer to be addressed to the charterer's agents at Gothenburg, who, however, are not to charge more than the usual clearance charges in addition to the ship's expenses.

In the margin was this clause: "The brokerage is at five per cent. by the ship on the amount of freight, primage and demurrage, and is due to C. Moller on the signment of this agreement. The vessel to be addressed to, and reported to Hoffman, Shenck, and Co.

3. On the 18th July 1872 the said R. B. Lyth chartered the said ship Gothenburg to the defendants by a charter-party made entirely on his behalf, and not on behalf or with the authority or knowledge of the plaintiff or the owners of the ship.

This charter-party (No. 2) was in similar terms to the former, and was for the carriage of 407 tons of railway iron from Hartlepool to Gothenburg, on being paid freight at the rate of 8s. per ton: "The freight to be paid in cash in London, less insurance, on signing bills of lading. . . . The brokerage of 5 per cent. is due on the execution of this charter to R. B. Lyth (ship lost or not lost), by whom (or his agents) the vessel is to be entered and cleared at the custom house at port of loading."

4. At the time of signing the bill of lading, and of the shipment of the goods as hereinafter mentioned, the plaintiff had in his possession a copy of the aforesaid charter-party (No. 1), and neither the plaintiff nor the owners of the ship had any notice or knowledge of the other charter-party (No. 2); and the plaintiff only became acquainted with its terms after this action was brought, nor had the defendants any notice or knowledge of any other charter-party than the second (No. 2), nor did they know that the said R. B. Lyth had no authority from the plaintiff to enter into the same.

5. The Gothenburg duly proceeded to West Hartlepool, and on her arrival there the defendants shipped on board of her a cargo of railway iron for the freight in respect of which this action is brought, and the defendants presented for the plaintiffs signature bills of lading dated 31st July 1872, which he signed and redelivered to the defendants, and of which the following is a copy:

Shipped in good order and condition by Tiden, Nordenfelts, and Co., in and upon the good steamship called the Gothenburg, whereof is master for the present voyage Smidt, now lying in West Hartlepool, and bound for Gothenburg, 1987 rails, weighing 406 tons, 13 cwt., 1 qr., being marked and numbered as in the margin, and are to be delivered in the like good order and condition at the aforesaid port of Gothenburg (all and every the dangers and accidents of the seas and navigation of whatsoever nature and kind excepted) unto order or to assigns, he or they paying freight for the said goods as per charter-party, average accustomed. In witness whereof, &c.

6. The said iron was duly delivered at Gothenburg by the plaintiff, to the order of the defendants under the said bill of lading, on or about the 25th Aug. 1872.

7. On or about the 2nd Aug. 1872, the defendants paid to the said R. B. Lyth the amount of the freight stipulated for by the aforesaid charter-party (No. 2). Shortly afterwards the said R. B. Lyth stopped payment.

8. No payment has ever been made to the plaintiff, nor to the owners of the Gothenburg, nor to anyone on their behalf, either in respect of the said charter-party (No. 1), or in respect of the said bill of lading, or in any way in respect of the said cargo, nor had the said R. B. Lyth any authority to receive payment on his or their account.

9. The question for the opinion of the court is, whether under the above circumstances the plaintiff is entitled to be paid by the defendants freight or moneys in respect of the shipment, carriage, or delivery of the said iron. If the court should be of opinion in the affirmative, then judgment shall be entered up for the plaintiff for 147l. 11s., and interest thereon at the rate of 5l. per cent. per annum from the 31st July 1872. If the court shall be of opinion in the negative, then judgment with costs shall be entered up for the defendants.

Cohen, Q.C. (with him Hollams) for the plaintiff. —The real question is whether payment to Lyth can be held to be payment to the plaintiff; and it is submitted that it cannot. It cannot be said that the shipowner, by not exerting his lien, and by giving up the goods before the freight was paid, led the other to believe that he was paid, for here freight had been paid long before the delivery up of the goods. Lyth did not act as agent for the plaintiff, but as charterer, and the defendants, thinking he was plaintiff's agent, paid him. If a person ships goods on board a vessel under a bill of lading there arises a contract on his part to pay the freight on delivery of the goods, and independently of any express contract by charter-party. In Domett v. Beckford (5 B. & Ad. 524) Parke, B., said: "As soon as these goods (which were the property of the defendant) were shipped in the plaintiff's ship, to be carried from Jamaica to London, the defendant, even before any bills of lading were signed, became liable by law to pay freight, unless that liability be controlled by special custom, and of that there is no proof."

Q. B.]

SMIDT v. TIDEN.

From the fact that goods were laden on a ship to be conveyed from Jamaica to London, the law will imply a contract by the owner of those goods to pay for the carriage." And to whom is the payment to be made? Clearly to the shipowner or his representative. Sandemann v. Scurr (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 446; L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 86; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 608) shows that the shipper can bring an action for negligence. [ARCHIBALD, J.—Was there any charter-party in Domett v. Beckford?] No. [LUSH, J.—That makes a difference.] The ship here was not put up as a general ship; and the fourth paragraph of the case shows that the defendants did not pay Lyth as charterer, but as agent for the plaintiff.

R. G. Williams, Q.C. (with him Lanyon), for the defendants, contended, that under the circumstances there was no liability on their part to pay. There is really nothing in the charter-party to show that Lyth was acting as agent; he proposed to act for himself, and was dealt with by the defendants, not as agent, but as principal. [MELLOR, J.—What, then, is the meaning of the last clause as to brokerage, in the charter-party?] Where the charterer does not employ a broker he not unfrequently stipulates for payment to himself of brokerage. The master, under the circumstances of this case, signed the bills of lading as agent for the charterer, not the owner. The ground of the judgment in Sandemann v. Scurr (ubi sup.) was that the shipper had no notice of the charter-party; if he had such notice, the liability would, no doubt, have been held to be on the charterer. The master is the charterer's agent to carry out the charterer's contract. [LUSH, J.—But the charter is not a demise of the ship, but only a contract by the owner to carry goods at such rates as the charterer shall procure them at.] In Major v. White (7 C. & P. 41), Parke, B., laid it down that, if a person ship goods on board a vessel, knowing that she is chartered, the consignee of the goods can maintain no action against the owner of the ship, if the goods be injured by bad stowage. The same view is expressed by Lord Tenterden in Colvin v. Newbury (1 Cl. & Fin. 292): "Two propositions of law are clear as applicable to a case like this: the first is, that in the common case of goods shipped on board a vessel belonging to a person, of which the shipment is acknowledged by a bill of lading signed by the master, if the goods are not delivered the shipper has a right to maintain an action against the owner of the ship; the other, which is equally clear, is this, that if the person in whom the absolute property of the ship is vested, charter that ship to another for a particular voyage, although the absolute owner provides the master, crew, provisions, and everything else, and is to receive from the charter of the ship a certain sum of money for the use and hire of the ship, an action can be brought only against the person to whom the absolute owner has chartered the ship and who is considered the owner pro tempore, during the voyage for which the ship is chartered. It cannot be maintained against the person who has let out the ship on charter, namely, the absolute owner." Marquand v. Banner (6 El. & Bl. 232), was also referred to. [ARCHIBALD, J., referred to Gilkiesson v. Middleton (2 C. B., N. S., 134).] That case was dissented from by the Privy Council in Kirchner v. Venus (12 Moore P. C. C. 361). See also

How v. Kirchner, 11 Moore P. C. C. 21; Maclachlan on Merchant Shipping, p. 433, and the cases there cited; The Mercantile and Exchange Bank v. Gladstone and others, L. Rep. 3 Ex. 233; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 641; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 87.

There is another ground on which the non-liability of the defendants may be based, namely, the existence of a mutual mistake so that there was no contract between the parties, no consensus ad idem. In Benjamin on Sales it is said: "From the general principle that contracts can only be effected by mutual assent, it follows that where, through some mistake of facts, each was assenting to a different contract, there is no real valid agreement, notwithstanding the apparent mutual assent." In Raffles v. Wichelhaus (2 H. & Colt. 906), to a declaration for not accepting Surat cotton, which the defendant bought of the plaintiff, "to arrive ex Peerless from Bombay;" the defendant pleaded that he meant a ship called the Peerless which sailed from Bombay in October, and the plaintiff was not ready to deliver any cotton which arrived by that ship, but only cotton which arrived by another ship called the Peerless, which sailed from Bombay in December; and the court held, on demurrer, that this was a good plea, there being no consensus ad idem.

Our. adv. vult.

June 5.—The judgment of the Court (Mellor, Lush, and Archibald, JJ.) was now delivered as follows by LUSH, J.—This is an action to recover freight for the carriage of railway iron from Hartlepool to Gothenburg under the following circumstances: On the 17th June 1872, a charter-party was entered into between the plaintiff, as master of the ship Gothenburg, then lying in the port of London, and one Lyth, a shipbroker, whereby the plaintiff engaged to proceed forthwith to Hartlepool and there take on board 407 tons of railway iron and carry the same to Gothenburg, on being paid freight at the rate of 7s. 3d. per ton; the freight to be paid in London on signing bills of lading; the owner to have an absolute lien for all freight, dead freight, demurrage, and all other charges. The master to sign bills of lading as presented, without prejudice. Having obtained this charter, Lyth, on the following day, the 18th June, chartered the Gothenburg to the defendants to carry the same quantity of railway iron from Hartlepool to Gothenburg at 8s. per ton, freight to be paid in London, less insurance, on signing bills of lading. This charter contained a similar clause of lien for freight, dead freight and demurrage, and a clause in the following terms: "The brokerage of 5 per cent. is due on the execution of this charter to R. B. Lyth, by whom the vessel is to be entered and cleared at the port of loading."

It was argued, and with reason, from this latter clause that the defendants knew they were treating with a broker, and not with the owner; but it was proved as a fact that Lyth had no authority to act as broker for the plaintiff either to effect the charter or to receive the freight.

Neither the plaintiff nor the defendants had any notice or knowledge of the charter entered into by the other of them until after delivery of the cargo. The master knew nothing of the charter-party between Lyth and the defendants; the defendants knew nothing of the charter-party between the master and Lyth. The vessel proceeded to Hartlepool and there took in from the defendant, the 407 tons of railway iron. Having shipped the cargo, the defendants presented a bill of lading, making the cargo deliverable to "order or assigns, he or they paying freight for the said goods as per charter-party," which the master signed, and gave out, without requiring payment of the freight. At the port of discharge the iron was delivered without the lien being insisted on; meanwhile, and on the 2nd Aug., Lyth obtained payment of the freight of 8s. per ton from the defendants, pursuant to his charter, and shortly afterwards stopped payment, leaving the freight of 7s. 3d. per ton unpaid.

It thus appears that each of the parties to the action acted under a mistake. The master supposed that the bill of lading which he signed, referred to his charter-party with Lyth. The defendants, on the other hand, supposed that it referred to the charter-party which they had made with Lyth. Each of them was ignorant of what was in the mind of the other; each acted in good faith, and neither of them did anything calculated to, or which did in any way mislead the other.

Under these circumstances, the bill of lading being ambiguous, and equally capable of being applied to the one charter-party as to the other, we cannot hold it to be a contract, or evidence of a contract, between the parties. It does not express what was common to both minds, and therefore it is not binding upon them.

But it was contended that, putting aside the bill of lading, the mere shipment of the goods raised an implied contract by the shippers to pay a reasonable freight to the master for the carriage. Under certain circumstances this may be so; but no such implication can arise in the present case. The diversity of mind and purpose which vitiates the bill of lading and prevents that from being evidence of the contract, existed at the time of the shipment. The goods were put on board in the supposed fulfilment of one charter-party, by which the shippers were to pay 8s. per ton to Lyth; and they were accepted in supposed fulfilment of another, by which Lyth was to pay 7s. 3d. per ton to the master. At no stage of the transaction were the parties ad idem.

It follows that there was no contract, express or implied, upon which the plaintiffs can recover against the defendants. Had he insisted on payment on signing the bill of lading, as he might have done, or had he enforced his lien at the port of delivery, he might have protected himself from loss; not having done so, he has no means of obtaining payment from the defendants. We therefore give judgment for the defendants.

PETROCOCHINO AND OTHERS v. BOTT.

Bill of lading—Responsibility of shipowner in respect of cargo—When terminated—Delivery of cargo on to the quay—Usage at the port as to delivery of cargo—"Delivery from the ship's deck."

Goods were shipped under a bill of lading which contained these words, "to be delivered from the ship's deck, where the ship's responsibility is to cease." The usage at the port required that the unloading should be done by the dock company, at the expense of the shipowner on to a quay, and then that the consignee should send lighters into which the goods were delivered also by the dock company, and also, if within a specific time, at the expense of the shipowner. The usage was followed, but one bale of goods was lost after delivery on to the quay, and before delivery into the lighters.

Held by Brett and Denman JJ. (Honyman J. dubitante) that the shipowner was not responsible for the loss to the consignee.

THIS was an action tried before Brett J. at the sittings in London after Hilary Term 1873, when a verdict was directed for the defendant, leave being reserved to the plaintiffs to move to enter the verdict for them for 41l. Accordingly a rule nisi was granted on 18th April, against which cause was shown on 24th Jan. 1874.

The action was upon a bill of lading by the plaintiffs, who were merchants in London and Calcutta, and was brought for the non-delivery of goods by the defendants, the shipowners, in accordance with the bill of lading. By the bill of lading the goods were shipped on board the Zeno bound for the port of London, and were "to be delivered in the like good order and condition from the ship's deck, where the ship's responsibility is to cease." The cargo of the plaintiffs consisted of hides, and one bale was lost. It appeared that the Zeno was reported as having arrived in London on 4th May 1872, and the custom of the Port of London is that when a steamer comes into the docks she has to unload on to a quay, and the goods so unloaded are subsequently fetched away by lighters of the consignee. The dock company unload by means of their own servants, but the shipowners have to pay for the work so done. Notice is sent to the consignee of goods immediately on a ship's arrival, and if he applies within twenty-four hours the cost of delivering them into his lighters, which is also done by means of the dock company's servants, is defrayed by the shipowner, but if there is any delay beyond that time, then the goods are warehoused by the dock company, and the owners of the cargo pay the expenses of their doing so. The employment of the servants of the dock company is compulsory upon the shipowners, and the freight release is delivered up before any of the cargo is touched.

In this case notice was duly sent to the plaintiffs, and their agents Culverwell, Brooks and Co., employed a man called Gray, to go with lighters and bring the bales from the docks. It was proved that the cargo was in the ordinary course unloaded on to the quay on 4th May, that everything was taken out of the ship, and that all the bales were delivered on to the quay. The plaintiffs were interested in sixty-nine bales only, and it was proved that their bales were taken away by Gray's lighters on the 6th, 8th, 14th and 30th of May; one bale was lost, but there was no evidence to show how.

The jury were asked: First, were 69 bales marked P. B., delivered from the ship to the dock company on the quay?—Answer, Yes. Secondly, were 69 bales marked P. B., delivered by the dock company on board the lighters, sent by Culverwell, Brooks, and Company?—Answer, No.

On these answers it was contended that the second finding of the jury was equivalent to a verdict for the plaintiff, and the rule granted was in this form, "Why the verdict entered for the defendants should not be set aside and entered for the plaintiff on the ground that the second finding of the jury was equivalent to a verdict for the plaintiff, and why a new trial should not be had on the ground that the first finding was against the weight of evidence."

Cole, Q. C. and R. E. Webster, for the defendant, showed cause.—The terms of the bill of lading are important; they are "to be delivered in like order and condition from the ship's deck, where the ship's responsibility is to cease." Now the goods were delivered from the ship's deck within the true meaning of the bill of lading. The jury have found that they were delivered on to the quay, and the custom of the port of London was that they were unloaded by the dock company's servants, and were fetched from the quay afterwards by the plaintiffs' lighters. We contend therefore that as soon as the shipowner has placed the goods on the quay, his dominion over them ceases, and the dock company are thenceforward the agents of the consignee. It is true that if application be made by the consignee within twenty-four hours, the cost of delivering into his lighters has to be defrayed by the shipowner. This, however, does not make the dock company agents only of the shipowner; they are the agents of both parties for the purpose of delivery. For to whom does the consignee apply? Not to the shipowner, but to the dock company.

[BRET, J.—The dock company insist on the shipowner employing their men as agents in unloading.] Yes, that is so, and it may be argued that immediately upon the assumption of the duty of unloading by them the dominion over the goods, and the responsibility of the shipowner is at an end. All this is proved to be in accordance with the usage of the port of London, and the charter-party must be taken to have been made by persons knowing the course of business, and recognised custom at the port of discharge. And the fact that this bill of lading is not in the ordinary form, but contains the stipulation I have read; agrees exactly with the supposition of a knowledge of the practice. The case of Gatliffe v. Bourne (Bing. N.C. 314), shows that unless delivery is controlled by special limitations, the practice usually observed at the port is sufficient; and here the practice of the port of London has been followed, and, taken together with the terms of the bill of lading, absolves the shipowner from all liability after the goods have been delivered from the ship's deck.

H. Graham (Thesiger, Q. C., with him) in support of the rule.—The defendant's construction of the bill of lading involves a contradiction. The bill of lading says the delivery is to be to Messrs. Petrocochino Brothers or their assigns. Now the dock company cannot be either, and at the most a delivery to them is all that is proved. It is suggested that they were agents, and this would not be enough; but it is not clear that they were even agents, for they were paid by the defendant entirely. They were not employed for the plaintiffs' convenience, but for the defendants' in order that the ship might be cleared. Then the defendants do not get any receipt from the dock company, so there cannot be a complete delivery as this is not done. [BRET, J.—The consignees do not give a receipt.] No, but the dock company were throughout treated as the agents of the defendant, and this shows that possession by them was possession by the defendants. Then the clause which has been laid so much stress on, "to be delivered from the ship's deck, where the ship's responsibility is to cease," applies solely, as I contend, to unloading into lighters. In Catley v. Wintringham (Peake's N.P. Ca. 202) it appears that the master of a vessel is bound to guard goods loaded into a lighter sent for them by the consignee until the loading is complete. Cur. adv. vult.

April 30.—BRET, J.—This case has stood over, owing to doubts entertained by my brother Honyman; but as he will be unable to be present in court for some time to come, we must act upon our own judgment without his assistance.

The action is brought upon a bill of lading: the goods of the plaintiffs were put on board the defendant's steamer to be carried from India to the Victoria Docks in London. The case was tried before me; and it appeared from the facts as established by the finding of the jury that sixty-nine bales were put on board the steamer at Calcutta, and were discharged on the quay in London; but that only sixty-eight were loaded on board the lighters sent to receive the sixty-nine bales on behalf of the plaintiffs. The value of the missing bale was 41l. It was urged before us by the plaintiffs' counsel, that the shipowner was liable to make good the loss, and that there had been no delivery to the consignees; for delivery to the dock company at the quay was a delivery for the convenience of the shipowners. The defendant contended that he was not liable for any loss after the goods had left the ship.

By the bill of lading the goods were to be delivered in London to the plaintiffs from the ship's deck, where the ship's liability was to cease. These last words are very important, and the contract was so far fulfilled that all the bales were delivered in London from the ship's deck. The general rule is that where goods are to be delivered at a port, the usage of that port is to be followed: and when by that usage delivery is to be made in a prescribed manner, that manner must be complied with, unless it be inconsistent with the terms of the bill of lading. In London the course of business is for a steamship to unload at a quay, and for the dock company afterwards to put the cargo on board lighters: the shipowner pays the dock charges if the goods are applied for within twenty-four hours; otherwise the dock company put them into a warehouse, and the consignee becomes liable for storage. In any view the cargo is not delivered direct to the consignee.

Now the dock company seem to be proper intermediaries for the delivery of the cargo to the consignees: the goods are forwarded by two steps, viz. delivery on the quay, and delivery from the quay. The bill of lading evidently refers to the course of business in the port of London, and its terms are apt and well chosen for that purpose, and it follows that the responsibility of the shipowner ceased when the goods of the plaintiffs were taken off the steamer's deck and put upon the quay; he is not liable for the loss of any part of them happening after the cargo was unloaded. Whether the dock company are liable to the plaintiffs, I give no opinion.

As the verdict at the trial was entered for the defendant, this rule must be discharged.

DENMAN, J.—The only doubt which I entertained was occasioned by the hesitation of my brother Honyman; otherwise I see no reason to hesitate as to our decision. I entirely agree with my brother Brett, and I need say no more than this. I do not know what would now be the opinion of my brother Honyman; but I am sure that I should not adopt any other conclusion than that arrived at by my brother Brett,

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

May 12 and June 24, 1874.

ALLISON v. THE BRISTOL MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Marine insurance—"Freight" and "freight payable in advance"—One half freight payable in advance—One half payable on delivery of cargo—Loss of ship—Half cargo saved—Total or partial loss.

The plaintiff's ship was chartered to carry a cargo of coal from Greenock to Bombay, where the plaintiff was to be paid at the rate of 42s. a ton "on the quantity delivered." It was also agreed that one half of the freight should be paid "on signing bills of lading," and the remainder "on right delivery of the cargo." The coal was shipped, and one half the freight paid, and the plaintiff afterwards effected two policies of insurance with the defendants, one being for 500l. on "freight" valued at 2000l., the other being for 700l. on "freight payable abroad," valued at 2000l.

During the voyage the ship was wrecked, but one half of the cargo was saved and delivered to the consignees at Bombay.

The defendants refused to pay for a total loss, and made a payment into court of 440l. in respect of the two policies, as for a partial loss, on the ground that one half the freight had been earned.

The Court of Common Pleas (Bovill, C.J., and Brett and Grove, JJ.) having given judgment for the plaintiff, it was on appeal:

Held by Cockburn, C.J., Mellor, J., and Amphlett, B., assentientibus Cleasby and Pollock, Bb., (reversing the decision of the court below), that the defendants were liable as for a partial loss only, and that the plaintiff could recover nothing more than the sum of 440l. paid into court.

Per Cockburn, C.J. and Amphlett, B.—As payment of freight in advance cannot be recovered back in case of loss, it is paid in respect of and is distributable over the entire cargo, so that the shipowner cannot appropriate the whole of the amount prepaid to that portion of the cargo which is delivered, but can only have the benefit of the prepayment pro rata.

Per Mellor, J.—The prepayment of the freight transferred the risk from the shipowner to the charterer, and the shipowner, thus losing only one half, could recover no more than he had lost.

Per Amphlett, B.—The prepayment of the freight was not a payment on account of freight actually earned, but on account of what might contingently be earned in respect of the whole cargo.

Per Cleasby, B.—The shipowner was entitled to recover the whole of the unpaid half of the freight, inasmuch as he had insured and lost it.

THIS was an appeal by the defendants from a decision of the Court of Common Pleas (Bovill, C.J. and Brett and Grove, JJ.) discharging a rule to set aside a verdict entered for the plaintiff upon admissions taken at the trial, and to enter instead the verdict for the defendants, if the court should think there was no loss of freight beyond what the defendants had paid.

The facts are fully stated in the judgment of Amphlett, B. For a full report of the case below see ante, p. 54.

The plaintiff's points for argument:—That the policies being upon freight attached to such interest as the plaintiff in fact had in the freight of the vessel upon the insured voyage; that the plaintiff having been paid half the freight for the insured voyage in advance, had no interest in such half, and that his interest was limited to the remainder or unpaid half of the freight for the voyage; that the policies therefore attached to the unpaid half of the freight for the insured voyage; that as half the cargo, and consequently half the freight upon the insured voyage was lost, the plaintiff having already been paid half the freight for the voyage, lost the whole of the remaining or unpaid half of the freight, which was the freight insured by the defendant; that there was therefore, under the circumstances, a total loss of the subject-matter of this insurance.

The defendants' points for argument.—On the true construction of the charter-party, the sum paid in advance in England, namely, one guinea per ton of coal shipped, was not freight properly so called. It was compensation paid for taking the goods on board and undertaking to carry them. The only freight stipulated for was one guinea per ton on each ton carried and delivered. The plaintiff having carried and delivered one half the cargo, was entitled to claim freight on that half, and his failure to collect it from the shipper affords no ground of claim against the underwriter; the contract in this case must be read distributively. It is not a lump sum for an entire cargo; it is a separate contract for each ton of coal. The shipper bound himself to pay one guinea on each ton rightly delivered, and the court below has by its judgment erroneously absolved the shipper from this payment; the shipper was not to return the one guinea received in advance on any of the tons received on board, but the judgment appealed from

(a) Honyman J. was present during the argument, but in consequence of illness did not sit during Easter and Trinity Terms, compels this return by allowing the advance on the lost goods to be set-off against the freight on those delivered. The plaintiff has repaid the shipper the advance of one guinea per ton on the last half of the cargo; for the plaintiff has (by the payment of the premium of insurance) provided at his own expense the fund out of which the shipper has got back one guinea per ton on the lost half. Yet the court below has decided that the shipper is entitled to set-off against the plaintiff's claim the whole of the advance, and has thus practically awarded him payment twice of the advance made on the lost half of the cargo. It appears from the statement of facts that the shipper has received from his underwriters the whole cost of the lost goods, and the whole amount of the advances made on them to the plaintiff, so that as to the lost half of the cargo he is in the same position as if he had never shipped it. If he is now allowed to take the other half without any payment for carriage and delivery, he will make a clear profit of one guinea per ton on this second half at the expense of the shipowner, a result that seems to demonstrate that there is error in the judgment appealed from.

Curr. adv. vult.

June 24.—The following written judgments were delivered:

AMPHLETT, B.—The action in this case was brought by the plaintiff, the owner of the ship Merchant Prince, on two policies of insurance on the freight of that ship on a voyage from Greenock to Bombay, to recover for a total loss.

The first of the said policies was dated the 13th April 1867, whereby the defendants insured 500*l.* on "freight valued at 2000*l.*:" and the second policy was dated on the 23rd April 1867, for 700*l.* on "freight payable abroad valued at 2000*l.*" The plaintiff also effected two other policies with two other underwriters on the freight payable abroad of the Merchant Prince, for the same voyage as above, for the sums of 500*l.* and 300*l.* respectively.

The said ship was chartered for the voyage in question to a Mr. De Mattos, by a charter-party dated the 7th March 1867, which provided that the ship should load a full cargo of coals at Greenock for Bombay, "freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo, at and after the rate of 42*s.* per ton of twenty per cent. on the quantity delivered." And it was further provided that such freight was to be paid, say one half in cash on signing bills of lading, less four months' interest at bank rate, but at not less than five per cent. per annum, five per cent. for insurance, and 2½ per cent. on gross amount of freight in lieu of consignment at Bombay, and the remainder on right delivery of the cargo, less cost of coal short delivered, in cash, at current rates of exchange for bills on London at six months' sight. On the 15th April 1867, bills of lading were signed by the captain of the said ship for 2178 tons of coals, and on or about the same day the plaintiff received from De Mattos 2286*l.* 18*s.*, for which the plaintiff gave the following receipt, indorsed on the bill of lading:—
"Received from W. N. De Mattos, Esq., the sum of 2286*l.* 18*s.* sterling, being advance of half freight on within shipment, the owner having paid all charges, including consignment, commission at Bombay, as per charter-party, 2286*l.* 18*s.*" On the 20th April 1867, De Mattos effected an insurance on the said cargo of the Merchant Prince for the said voyage. The insurance was stated in the policy to be on 2178 tons of coal, and increased value thereof, by prepayment of freight, value at 4500*l.* On the 27th April 1867, the said ship left Greenock for Bombay, and on the 8th Aug. 1867, she struck on a reef and there became a total wreck. About 1050 tons (which may be referred to as a moiety of the coals forming the cargo) were saved from the wreck and ultimately landed at Bombay. At the trial, a verdict was by consent entered for the plaintiff for the full amount, with leave to move to enter the verdict for him or to reduce the damages, and a rule nisi having been granted by the Court of Common Pleas, cause was show against it in Trinity Term, and the same was discharged and judgment given for the plaintiff for the full amount of his claim with interest.

The judgment of the Court of Common Pleas proceeded upon the principle that, according to the true construction of the charter-party, the prepaid moiety of the freight was to be taken in payment of the freight upon the saved part of the cargo, in which case the latter would be satisfied, and there would be a total loss of the other moiety of the freight to the shipowner: and the question we have to determine is, whether that judgment is correct.

It may be observed, in the first place, that the effect of that judgment is, that the charterer, while setting off the whole of the prepaid moiety of the freight against the freight on the saved moiety of the cargo, is at the same time entitled to recover a moiety of what he so paid in advance from his own underwriters, and will thus obtain for himself at the expense of the shipowner or his underwriters, a bonus or profit of 1*l.* a ton in respect of the coal lost over and above the value of such coal. It is, I think, impossible not to suspect some error in a judgment which has led to a result so strange and inequitable. It was said, indeed, in argument before us, that this startling result arises from the mode in which the charterer effected his insurance, and that the apparent anomaly would not have existed if valued policies had not been allowed by our law, and the charterer had effected an insurance simply on the prepaid moiety of the freight; but I cannot concur in this view, for suppose he had insured separately the prepaid moiety of the freight in identical terms with the insurance effected by the shipowner in respect of the other moiety of the freight, the underwriters of the last mentioned moiety would, according to the principle of the judgment, have borne the whole loss, and the other underwriters nothing; a result which appears to me equally strange and inequitable as the former. I venture, however, with great deference, to think that the assumption upon which the judgment proceeds is erroneous, and that the prepayment of a moiety of the freight ought not in this case to be taken as a payment on account of the freight actually earned by delivery of the cargo, but on account of what might contingently be earned in respect of the whole cargo.

No doubt it might have been stipulated, as it frequently and perhaps generally is in practice stipulated, that the prepayment of freight should be taken as a payment on account of freight actually earned; but in the charter-party in question there is no express provision to that effect, and I am of opinion that there are sufficient indications to be found in it that it was not so intended by the parties. Freight is by the charter-party to be paid after the rate of 42s. per ton on the quantity delivered, and such freight is to be paid one half in cash, on signing bills of lading, with certain deductions, and the remainder on the delivery of the cargo. Now all this proceeds upon the assumption that the whole freight will be earned, and does not contemplate or provide for the case of a loss either total or partial. It is clear that the half to be prepaid must be calculated on the whole cargo, without reference to possible loss, and, as it is admitted on all hands, that according to English law, however much it may be disapproved of by high authority, no part of such prepayment could be recovered back in any event, it appears to me that the most reasonable construction of the charter-party is to hold that for all purposes the prepayment should be taken as made in respect of the whole cargo, and, consequently, in the event which has happened, distributable between the part lost and the part saved. This view of the case appears to be strengthened by the deduction allowed for insurance, which denotes, according to Lord Selborne in Watson and Co. (apps.) v. Shankland (resp.) (ante, p. 115; 29 L.T. Rep. N. S. 349; L. Rep. 2H. of L. Sc. Ap. 304) (which in other respects has not, I think, any material bearing on the present case), that it was in the contemplation of both parties that each should bear the risk of or insure for one moiety of the freight. This construction, too, has at least the merit of doing complete justice between the parties in every event. In the actual case before us, the result will be that the charterer will have to pay to the shipowner, to the relief of the latter's underwriters, one moiety of the freight upon the cargo saved, and be recompensed for the same out of the moneys received on his own policy, which virtually covers freight as well as cargo. If, on the other hand, the shipowner and charterer had each insured for the value of moiety of the freight, the loss would have fallen, as in justice it ought, equally between the respective underwriters. Or, lastly, if neither had insured, or, in other words, if each had been his own insurer, each would have borne a moiety of the loss, which again would be quite just, inasmuch as the premium of insurance in respect to the charterer's moiety was allowed to him out of the prepayment of freight.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover from the defendants as for a total loss, and, it being admitted that in that case the defendants have paid into court all that is due from them, I think that the judgment of the court below ought to be reversed, and the rule to enter a verdict for the defendants made absolute.

CLEASBY, B. (delivering the judgment of himself and Pollock, B.)—In this case the plaintiff, a shipowner, claimed a total loss upon valued policies on freight, the voyage being from Greenock to Bombay. The defendants paid into court half the amount. The plaintiff alleged that he had insured the freight which he was to receive at the termination of the voyage, and that, in consequence of the perils insured against he was entitled to receive none, there was a total loss. The defendants contended, that, in the events which had happened, the plaintiff was entitled to receive, at the termination of the voyage, half the freight insured, so that there was a partial loss only. Thus the subject of dispute between the parties, viz., the right to freight at the termination of the voyage, under the circumstances, depended upon the proper construction of the charter-party, which was admitted to be the only question raised in the case, and was the only one argued before us.

[The learned judge recapitulated the leading terms of the charter-party and the facts, with dates, and proceeded:] The question is, Was the captain bound to deliver the cargo which arrived free of freight beyond that already paid, or could he have insisted upon payment of the one half freight upon the quantity delivered?

There is nothing unusual in the terms of this charter-party. It is quite common for the shipowner to be put in funds by a prepayment of freight, although, properly speaking, freight is what is earned by the carriage of goods to their destination, and when that is done the deductions made in the present case are intended to put the shipowner in the same position as if the freight had been paid at the end of the voyage, the first deduction being interest for the estimated duration of the voyage of four months which the owner gained by the prepayment; the second the amount of insurance which he saved by having the payment actually made, and no longer subject to risk requiring insurance; and the third, the consignment commission, or the commission which he would have to pay to the broker to whom the ship was consigned at the other end for collecting the freight. All this is only a mode of calculating the amount to be paid for one half the freight, and clearly imposes no obligation upon the charterer. According to the law of England, a payment made in advance on account of freight cannot be recovered back in the event of the goods being lost and incapable of delivery. This must be considered as settled, having been decided as long ago as 1683, and not departed from since, though Cockburn, C.J., has expressed a wish that the law was otherwise, and in conformity with the law of most other countries: (see Byrne v. Schiller, ante, vol. 1, p. 111; 23 L.T. Rep. N. S. 741; L. Rep. 6 Ex. 325.) And the consequence is, that the amount so prepaid for freight is no longer at the risk of the shipowner, but at the risk of the charterer, and he has an insurable interest which he may, if he thinks proper, insure as a part of his insurance on the cargo or otherwise. But whether he does or not can make no difference as to the freight which becomes payable upon the shipowner being ready to deliver at the port of destination. If there had been a charter in the present case without any clause for prepayment of one half, and the goods had been put on board and half lost, what would have been the freight payable? Undoubtedly freight at the stipulated rate upon the half cargo carried to its destination.

The meaning of the word "freight" must be the same, in my opinion, whether there be a prepayment or not, and thus in the present case all the freight which became payable was the one half which had already been satisfied, and so the other half which was insured was totally lost. And this is the meaning of the word "freight" expressed in the charter-party—"freight to be paid upon unloading and right delivery of the cargo at and after the rate of 42s. per ton upon the quantity delivered."

ALLISON v. THE BRISTOL MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED).

[EX. CH.]

Some confusion is introduced into the case by the circumstances that the payment to be made is of one half of the freight, and this gives rise to the idea that there is afterwards a joint risk in the whole freight, whereas it is in reality a case of debtor and creditor, and not of joint risk and a payment of a sum on account of freight to be earned and fixed by agreement of the parties at half the estimated freight. But, to get rid of this source of error, suppose that the payment was of 1000*l.* on account of freight. The owner would make certain deductions on account of the earlier and sure payment, and, receiving the balance, which might be 950*l.*, would give a receipt for 1000*l.* on account of freight (as he has in the present case for 2286*l.* 18*s.*) Upon the arrival of the ship, it must appear that the freight earned came to 1500*l.* The charterer gets the full benefit of the 1000*l.* paid, and pays the balance 500*l.* If he has insured his prepaid freight for 1000*l.*, he can be entitled to receive nothing, because he has lost nothing by perils, but had the full benefit of his prepayment. If the freight due on the arrival of the ship had been 750*l.* from cargo being lost to a larger amount, he would have the benefit of his prepayment to the extent of 750*l.*, and would be entitled to receive the 250*l.* lost from the underwriters as a partial loss. The case here is the same. There is a receipt for 2286*l.* 18*s.*, the amount of half the estimated freight. It is still a payment on account of freight, and De Mattos was entitled to and had the full benefit of it.

I will only add upon this part of the case, that the error (if I may be allowed the expression) is in concluding that because the shipowner and charterer are each interested in one half of the freight, therefore their interest in the whole is the same. But that is not the case, because, independent of the equality of amount, there is a priority of payment. The prepayment should satisfy that which was first earned to the amount of the prepayment. It is like the case of a mortgage for 2000*l.*, to which two persons are entitled in halves, but one not to be paid off in preference to the other, so that if the security is insufficient, the part only should be paid. Each is interested to the same extent by half, but they have not the same interest in the whole.

The learned counsel for the defendants relied very much, in the course of his argument, upon the deduction of the five per cent. for insurance of the half freight, which he repeatedly described as money paid to the charterer, to be applied for that purpose, so as to give the shipowner an interest in its being so applied, and make the insurance accrue to his benefit. But this appears to us to be a mistaken view of that deduction, which is in reality only a mode of arriving at an equivalent for what the shipowner would receive at the end of the voyage, and placing the charterer in the same position as the shipowner would have been in as regards insurance, and with the same option to insure or not. The learned counsel also relied very much upon the obvious gain to the charterer, if he insured his cargo at a value increased by the prepayment, in the event which happened, viz., of one half being lost by the perils. It was said that he would be repaid one half of his advance by the underwriters on the goods, and then have got the one half of his goods delivered free of freight, and so have the benefit of the whole advance. This was explained by the learned counsel for the defendants, but not so fully as it might have been, probably because he thought the matter too clear to need further explanation. It is accounted for in this way. If the charterer had insured his real interest at risk, viz., the prepaid freight, 2286*l.*, then, if at the end of the voyage the freight payable had amounted only to that sum, he would have had the full benefit of the payment made in discharge of the freight, and would of course have recovered nothing under his policy, and no profit could have been made. But by means of a valued policy on the goods in which the value of the goods is increased by the amount of prepaid freight, this falsehood (as it may be called) is introduced, viz., that all the goods are supposed to be so increased in value, whereas in reality those only are increased in value which arrive at their destination; and thus, if any be lost, the charterer recovers not upon the real value, but upon that value increased by the proportions of freight, and he so makes a profit by insuring the goods beyond their value. He may do this in any case by insuring beyond the value, if the underwriters agree to it, and they cannot object to it because they get paid the premium in proportion. This is the explanation of the profit made by Mr. De Mattos, viz., that the goods lost were insured beyond their value, so as to secure a profit instead of a mere indemnity.

We cannot depart from the settled meaning of the word "freight," and the meaning expressly given to it in this charter-party, viz., the amount to be paid at the end of the voyage for what is ready for delivery at the stipulated rate. This had been wholly satisfied by the advance made, and so the shipowner was entitled to receive no more, and the captain was right in delivering the half cargo free of freight.

The case of Watson and Co. v. Shankland (ante, p. 115; 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 349; L. Rep. 2 H. of L. Sc. App. 304), was referred to on the argument by Mr. Benjamin. In that case a question of Scotch law arose upon a charter in similar terms to the present, and the question was, whether a sum paid on account of freight could, upon a loss of the cargo, be recovered. The argument appears to have been, that according to Scotch law it must be taken to be not a prepayment of freight properly so called, but an advance on account of freight. The judgment of the house of Lords was, that it was unnecessary to decide whether it was a prepayment or an advance, because, assuming for the sake of argument that it was not a prepayment, but an advance, still it could not be recovered back by reason of the neglect to insure. And upon the assumption that it was not a prepayment but an advance, it was necessary to account for the deduction and give some meaning, and the meaning given would be an improper one if it was founded upon the assumption, argumenti causâ, unless the assumption agreed with the real fact. In the present case we know that the commission deducted was not upon the assumption referred to, but upon the fact of prepayment, and that it was not in reality what was suggested in that case, but was, as it is called in the receipt, consignment commission, which is saved by the prepayment. The result is, that the freight which was insured was wholly lost by the perils, and the judgment of the court below, which is founded upon that conclusion, must in our opinion be affirmed.

I beg to add one other remark upon the construction of this contract. Charter-parties containing provisions for prepayment, or advances to the masters with the same effect as prepayment, have been usual as long as I remember, and it is not too much to say that thousands of such charters have been effected upon which the captains of vessels have acted in all parts of the world, with the responsibility of delivering or refusing to deliver the cargoes; and in order to discharge their duty, they must have made themselves more or less acquainted with the effect of prepayment. And their duty ought to be a plain one, and not depend upon nice distinctions, and it is a plain one if they have to consider only what is the freight earned and what amount has been prepaid. In the present case there appears to have been no question between the shipowner and the charterer as to the proper mode of performing the contract. The captain delivered the goods free of freight, because a sum of money equal to the freight earned had been paid. But a third party, the present defendants, now say that the captain was so ignorant of his rights as to have delivered goods free of freight when he had a claim of 1000*l.* It would be strange, and he may have acted in ignorance of the proper effect of the agreement. I could not properly construe an agreement, especially in a court of error, by what the parties understood to be the effect of it, but I must say my own clear view of the legal effect of an agreement in common use is confirmed by finding that the parties to it, who may be taken to be well acquainted with such agreements, acted in conformity with that view.

MELLOR, J.—The plaintiff was the owner of the ship Merchant Prince, and the defendants are an insurance company. The action is brought to recover against the defendants, as for a total loss, on several policies of assurance effected by the plaintiff with the defendants, on freight valued at 2000*l.*, and if, under the circumstances of the case, the plaintiff is entitled to recover as for a total loss, the judgment of the court below must be affirmed; but if the loss is to be considered as a partial loss only, the defendants have paid into court sufficient to cover such partial loss, and the judgment of the court below must be reversed.

The facts are singularly few, and the question turns entirely on the true construction of a charter-party, dated the 7th March 1867, made between the plaintiff and one W. N. De Mattos. [Terms of charter-party, &c., recapitulated.]

It was admitted, on the argument before us, that the question turned upon the proper construction of the charter-party, and the payment of one half freight in advance on the signing of bills of lading. It was contended for the plaintiff that the freight, being made payable on unloading and right delivery of the cargo, at and after the rate of 42*s.* per ton, was a mere mode of estimating the total freight, and that the words such freight is to be paid, "say one half in cash on signing bills of lading, less four months' interest," &c., secured as a payment of the total freight, and assuming the total freight to which he would have been entitled on unloading and right delivery at Bombay to be 4000*l.* in round numbers, he had only received 2000*l.*, and was entitled to claim from the defendants for the residue, as representing his loss by the perils insured against. I cannot accede to that view of the case, and I do not think such is the true effect of the charter-party. The agreement that the freight was to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo, at and after the rate of 42*s.* per ton of 20*cwt.* on the quantity delivered, is followed by a stipulation that such freight "was to be paid, say one half in cash on signing bills of lading, less four months' interest at bank rate, but not less than five per cent. per annum, five per cent. for insurance, and 2½ on gross amount of freight in lieu of consignment commission at Bombay, and the remainder on right delivery of the cargo," &c. Not only, therefore, was one half of such freight to be paid in case on signing bills of lading, but there was a deduction of five per cent. for insurance in respect of the amount paid in advance. And the charterer did accordingly, on the 20th Aug. 1867, effect an insurance "on 2178 tons of coal, and increased value thereof, by prepayment of freight, valued at 4500*l.*" It was agreed on all hands that no part of the freight so paid in advance could ever thereafter be recovered back from the plaintiff by the charterer, and, consequently, the sea risk of so much of the freight as was paid in advance was transferred from the plaintiff to the charterer. It seems to me that the effect of the contention on the part of the plaintiff must be that the payment in advance was really a payment of the freight upon one half of the cargo, leaving the freight on the other half of the cargo to be paid on right delivery. The agreed freight was to be at and after the rate of 42*s.* per ton on the quantity delivered, but there is nothing by which half the cargo can be separated from the remainder, and ear-marked as the portion in respect of which the freight was paid in advance. The whole cargo was insured by the charterer as made more valuable by the prepayment of half freight in advance, and it appears to me that under the words, "at and after the rate of 42*s.* per ton on the quantity delivered," both the freight and payment must be distributed over the entire cargo, and that the payment in advance was equivalent to the payment of 1*l.* 1*s.* on every ton of the cargo, so as to reduce the amount of the freight payable by the charterer on delivery to the like sum per ton.

I cannot agree that the true mode of estimating the loss sustained by the plaintiff is to lump the freight at, say 4000*l.* for the voyage, and seeing that, inasmuch as he received payment in advance of 2000*l.* only, that, therefore, his loss is the difference between that sum and 4000*l.* I think that he lost by the perils of the sea 1*l.* 1*s.* upon all the coals that were lost, and became incapable of delivering by reason of such perils, and that, under the circumstances, it constituted a partial loss only, and that he was only entitled to be indemnified by the defendants to that extent. And as the amount paid into court covers that loss, the defendant is entitled to succeed, and the judgment of the court below ought to be reversed.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I concur in the conclusion of my brothers Mellor and Amphlett in this case.

The facts are simple. The plaintiff claims for a total loss on a policy of insurance on freight to be earned on a voyage of the ship, the Merchant Prince, from Greenock to Bombay. If, according to the terms of the charter-party, the plaintiff, as between himself and the charterer of the ship, was, under the circumstances, entitled to claim a portion of the freight, he cannot recover on a claim for a total loss. The question turns, therefore, on his right under the charter-party; in other words

THE RACER.

on the true construction of the charter-party [Terms of the charter-party recapitulated.] Bills of lading were signed by the captain for a certain amount of coals, and a sum was thereupon paid by the charter to the owner, calculated to amount to one half of the freight so as to satisfy the stipulation of the charter-party. A portion of the cargo was lost on the voyage by the perils insured against. The remaining portion was delivered up by the captain on the completion of the voyage to the consignees of the charterer, without any further demand of freight, on the assumption that the freight was only demandable in respect of the portion actually delivered, and that such freight was satisfied by the amount paid in advance on account of freight. But the insurers are not bound by the acquiescence of the shipowner in this view of his rights, and if the shipowner was entitled in point of law on the true construction of the charter-party to claim additional freight, the insurer is justified in insisting that there has not been a total loss of freight; and if this contention is right, the loss can only be a partial loss, in which case, there having been a payment into court as on a partial loss, the defendants will be entitled to our judgment.

The question depends on whether the remainder of the freight being payable on the right delivery of the cargo, the portion of the freight paid in advance can be appropriated to the amount of cargo actually delivered, or whether the amount so prepaid must be considered as paid in respect of the entire cargo and distributed over the whole cargo, including the part of it which was lost, as well as the part delivered. It appears to me that this question must be considered irrespectively of the insurance which the shipowner or the charterers may have effected for the protection of their actual or supposed interests; in other words, according to the terms of the charter-party, and the rights and liabilities of the parties as thereby created. Now I cannot but suppose that, on a charter-party of this description, a payment of freight in advance, which, by the English law, in case of the loss of the cargo, cannot be recovered back, presupposes in the contemplation of the parties, a delivery of the entire cargo, and is paid in respect of the entire cargo; and is therefore distributable over the entire cargo; and for which reason it is not, as it appears to me, competent to the owner of the cargo to appropriate the whole of the amount prepaid to that portion of the cargo which is actually delivered, and he can only have the benefit of each prepayment pro rata on the cargo delivered.

On this short ground I am of opinion that one half of the freight remained payable on the cargo delivered, and that, consequently, there was no total loss, so that the claim of the plaintiff, as for a total loss, fails.

ADMIRALTY COURT OF THE CINQUE PORTS.

Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

THE RACER.

Salvage—Pilotage—Ambiguous signal—Interpretation—Condition of vessel.

Where a vessel makes an ambiguous signal, it will be construed by the Court of Admiralty according to the condition of the vessel when boarded; if she is damaged and is in need of assistance, the signal will be treated as signal for assistance, and those answering it as salvors; if she is not damaged and wants only a pilot, the signal will be treated as a signal for a pilot only.

THIS was a cause of salvage instituted on behalf of the owner, master, and crew of the lugger Stag, of Dover, against the schooner Racer, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and the cargo now or lately laden thereon, and the freight due for the transportation thereof, and against the owners of the said schooner, her cargo and freight, and their bail intervening.

The petition, which sets out the facts of the case, was as follows:

1. The Stag is a lugger belonging to the port of Dover, of about 16 tons builders' measurement, and of the value of 170*l.*; on the occasion hereinafter mentioned she was manned by a crew of five hands all told.

2. About 7 a.m. on the 20th Jan. 1874, the Stag was cruising between Sandgate and Folkestone; the wind at the time was blowing a strong gale from the S.W., accompanied with thick driving rain, and there was a heavy sea. Under these circumstances the crew of the Stag sighted the schooner Racer, the vessel proceeded against in this cause; she was then about four miles from and standing in towards the land with her ensign flying just above her topgallant yard, as a signal for assistance. Those on board the Stag at once made for the Racer, and about 8 a.m. came up with and spoke her. The master of the Racer said he wanted to go to Dover, and requested some of the lugger's crew to come on board. The crew of the lugger told him it was impossible for them to board where they then were, and said he must follow in toward the land where they would make an attempt to do so; accordingly the Stag, follow by the Racer, stood in toward the land.

3. The Racer, at this time, had lost her topsail, mainsail, and main boom, her boat was stove in and useless, the cooking galley washed down, her bulwarks started from stem to stern, and part of her steering gear had been carried away.

4. After some time some of the crew of the Stag ventured, at great risk to their lives, into the lugger's boat, and after considerable difficulty managed to get under the schooner's lee. The Racer was at the time rolling nearly gunwale under; the waves on several occasions, nearly threw the lugger's boat on to the schooner's deck and it was only by great exertions that the men in the boat were able to keep her clear. After some time the captain of the Racer, choosing his opportunity, caught hold of Henry Landall, one of the lugger's men, by the shoulders, and Landall managed to get on board. When Landall got on board, he told the master of the Racer to get his tackle and hoist the boat in, or the boat's crew could not possibly get on board, but while the master of the Racer was getting the tackle ready the sea was such that it was found impossible to keep the lugger's boat near, and she was obliged to return to the lugger. In getting on board the lugger, the men in the boat ran considerable risk, and in securing the boat her main thwart was broken, three of her planks and her gunwale were stove, and two oars were lost. When the boat's crew had succeeded in getting on board the lugger, she bore up for Dover, and arrived there about 11 a.m.

5. The said Henry Landall took charge of the Racer. He found only one seaman, a Portuguese, and two coloured boys on deck, and thereupon asked the master where the crew were. The master replied that they were asleep; but on going down below, the said Henry Landall found only a boy, who was lying on the cabin floor, completely disabled from a severe injury to his head, having been knocked down by the main boom. The said Henry Landall also learned that the mate of the vessel had been washed overboard and drowned in the course of the voyage.

6. About 11 a.m. Henry Landall gave orders to get ready, and assisted himself to clear away the starboard anchor and chain. He then made for Dover under fore-topmast-staysail, fore-trysail, and square topsail, the later being in ribands. All the other sails had been blown away; and the vessel being so shorthanded, and without proper sails, Landall had the greatest difficulty in making Dover Harbour; but being thoroughly acquainted with the locality, he was enabled to steer the Racer through the broken water close to the Admiralty Pier and so make the harbour. The master of the Racer was utterly unable to have taken the vessel in himself, as he was wholly ignorant of the set of the tides and currents.

7. As the Racer entered the harbour she was boarded by two more of the lugger's crew, who, with Landall, took her through the Wellington Bridge gates, and moored her in safety.

8. It is always a matter of difficulty to make Dover Harbour with a south-westerly gale, and the difficulty was on this occasion greatly increased by the strong flood tide which was running tending to set the ship past the entrance, and also by the vessel being shorthanded and almost crippled.

9. By the aforesaid services, which were promptly and efficiently rendered, the Racer, her cargo and crew, were rescued from a position of considerable danger and placed in perfect safety. In her then condition, if she had failed to make the harbour, she would undoubtedly have been carried out into the North Sea, as it would have been impossible for her to get into Ramsgate or any other neighbouring port.

10. In rendering the aforesaid services, the plaintiffs ran considerable risk both to their lives and property.

11. The Racer is a schooner of 149 tons register, and was bound on a voyage from Bahia to London, laden with a cargo of coffee. The value of the ship was 950*l.*, and her cargo and freight 6000*l.*

The answer filed on behalf of the defendants was as follows:

1. On the morning of the 20th Jan. 1874, the Racer, being bound on a voyage from Bahia to Antwerp, was off Folkestone, and as she required certain repairs, the master determined to put into Dover, and accordingly made the ordinary signal for a pilot.

2. Soon afterwards the lugger Stag came up and hailed the Racer, and those on board her, on being informed that the master of the Racer wanted a pilot for Dover, offered their services as pilots.

3. The wind was in the south-west, with a fresh breeze, and there was some sea. The Stag and the Racer stood in together towards the land, and then a boat from the Stag put off to the Racer, and one of the plaintiffs, with no serious difficulty or risk, boarded the Racer from the boat.

4. The said plaintiff then proceeded to pilot the Racer into Dover Harbour. The Racer had suffered certain damage, but there was no difficulty in bringing her to the harbour, and she sailed into the harbour with great ease. The steam tug of the harbour was at hand, and her services were offered to the master of the Racer, but the master of the Racer declined them as being, as they in fact were, unnecessary. Some damage had been done to the steering gear of the Racer, but that was repaired before the said plaintiff came on board.

5. The allegations contained in articles 1, 3, and 11 of the petition are true, except that the Racer was bound to Antwerp and not to London, and it is true, as stated in article 5 of the petition, that one of the seamen had been disabled from a severe injury to his head, having been knocked down by the main boom, and that the mate of the Racer had been washed overboard and drowned in the course of the voyage, namely, on the 3rd Nov. 1873.

6. Save as hereinbefore appears, the several allegations contained in the petition are untrue.

7. The service rendered by the plaintiffs was nothing more than pilotage service rendered to a vessel which had suffered some damage.

The plaintiff filed a conclusion admitting that the Racer was bound for Antwerp, but denying the other statements in the answer, except so far as they were consistent with the plaintiff's petition.

Evidence was called for both plaintiffs and defendants, and it resulted in substantially establishing the allegations in the plaintiff's petition.

R. E. Webster, for the plaintiffs, submitted that on the facts there was a salvage service entitling the plaintiffs to salvage reward.

W. G. F. Phillimore, for the defendants.—On the facts it is clear that there was no salvage service. The service was pilotage to a damaged ship entitling the plaintiffs only to double pilotage and the amount of damage done to their boat: (The Enterprise, 2 Hagg. Adm. Rep. 178*n.*) The signal was really a signal for pilot and not for salvage assistance. At any rate it cannot be put higher than an ambiguous signal; and where such a signal is given the question whether the service is to be considered salvage or pilotage must be judged by the result. In The Little Joe (Lush, 88), the salvors, who went out to a vessel hoisting an ambiguous signal, recovered no remuneration, because they rendered no service. Here they are entitled to pilotage only, as they have rendered only pilotage service.

R. E. Webster, in reply.—The true rule, as laid down in The Little Joe (ubi sup.) and other cases, is, that an ambiguous signal is to be interpreted according to the state of the ship at the time it is given. If the ship really wants no more than a pilot, she is liable only for pilotage; but if her condition is such that she requires further assistance, the signal is to be read as a signal of distress. The Enterprise (ubi sup.) is only a very short report, and does not disclose the facts upon which it was decided. In The Astecs (21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 797; 3 Mar. Law. Cas. O. S. 326), it was argued that because the salvors rendered assistance at the master's request to a vessel damaged but not actually in distress at the time they boarded her, they could not recover, but it was held that it was impossible to get rid of the salvage character of the service when they had once been engaged as salvors. The Bomarsund (Lush. 77) shows that the condition of the ship to which the services are rendered is the main point to be considered where the signal is ambiguous:

The Hedwig, Spinks Ecc. & Adm. Rep. 21;
The Dosseler, 10 Jur. 865.

These men get their living in the meritorious occupation of rendering assistance to vessels in distress, and this court always encourages them and does not criticise their acts too narrowly.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The first question which I have to consider is, whether the service rendered by the plaintiffs was purely pilotage or partakes of a salvage character.

There is no dispute that a signal was made from the Racer; that signal was a Union Jack with a portion of the ensign torn away and hoisted above her topgallant-yard. This signal, I am of opinion was an ambiguous signal; and my predecessor, very early in the exercise of his jurisdiction in this court, laid down a rule—to which I think he always adhered—as to the character he should give to an ambiguous signal, and the interpretation he should put upon services rendered under such a signal. In The Hedwig (Spinks Ecc. & Adm. 21), Dr. Lushington said:

THE PIEVE SUPERIORE.

"Now the vessel having sustained damage, and two of her crew having received considerable injury, a signal was hoisted; and, according to the rule which I laid down on a former occasion, I hold it to be a signal for assistance and not for a pilot. But, again, what was the nature of this case? Was it a case in which the words 'pilotage' or 'pilot' could with safety and propriety be applied? Why, the vessel was thirty-five miles out at sea. There are no pilots to be found there; that is out of pilotage ground altogether. It is true the vessel might require nothing but to be conducted to a place of safety; but that is not pilotage, it is salvage assistance." And in the note to that case, there are these words: "In the case of the Helix (April 4), the court said, I have determined to decide the questions in this way: if a vessel is in a damaged state I shall determine that it is a signal for assistance, because the vessel wants it; but where the vessel is not in a damaged state, and a pilot only is wanted, I shall construe it to be a signal for a pilot. That seems consistent with probability." To that ruling the learned judge substantially adhered in subsequent cases. It is true that the circumstances in the various cases before him might vary, but to the rule there laid down he adhered.

The condition of the Racer at the time of the services appears from the petition. That condition is there pleaded, and has been admitted by the defendants; and, moreover, it was proved in evidence that her master thought his ship in such a condition as to compel him, although on a voyage to Antwerp, to put into Dover for repairs. I am of opinion that the service must therefore be considered a salvage service and not mere pilotage. But at the same time, the services were of a very simple and ordinary character, and do not call for large remuneration. In truth, the case ought not to have been brought into court at all, and I can only express my regret that no tender has been made; if there had been a tender I should not have thought it right to allow all costs, but only a sum nomine expensarum. But I have to deal with the facts of the case as they are before me; and, looking at the damage sustained by the salvors and the values at risk, I shall award costs.

Damage to cargo—Jurisdiction—Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), sect. 6—"Goods carried into any port in England or Wales"—Ship calling for orders—Goods delivered at foreign port.

When a foreign ship carrying cargo, acting in pursuance of the contract of affreightment, which gives the option of several ports of call, English and foreign, puts into an English port of call for orders, she carries her cargo into the English port within the meaning of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), sect. 6; and though she be ordered to a foreign port, and there discharge her cargo, the Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction to entertain against her a suit by the assignees of the bills of lading of the cargo, for damage to cargo, and to arrest her on her return, after discharging, to this country.

THIS was an appeal from an order of Sir Robert Joseph Phillimore, the learned Judge of the High Court of Admiralty of England, made in a cause of damage to cargo, and rejecting the admission of a petition on protest to the jurisdiction of the court filed by the appellant.

The appellant is the owner of an Italian barque called the Pieve Superiore. The Pieve Superiore having been arrested by the respondents, the appellant appeared under protest to the jurisdiction of the court, and filed the petition in question, setting out the grounds on which he submitted that the High Court of Admiralty had no jurisdiction in the suit.

The petition was, so far as material, as follows :

1. By charter-party, dated London, the 30th March, 1872, and Genoa, the 6th April, 1872, between the defendant and Ferdinald Schiller, for self and partners of Messrs. Borradaile, Schiller, and Co., of Calcutta, merchants and freighters, it was mutually agreed that the above-named ship should, with all convenient speed, having liberty to take outward cargo ^{and} or passengers from Europe to a port on the way for owner's benefit, sail and proceed thence to Akyab, for orders to load at either Akyab, Rangoon, or Bassein, and there load from the agents of the said freighters a cargo of rice in bags, which the said freighters bound themselves to ship, and being so loaded, should proceed therewith to Belle Isle, Scilly, Queenstown, or Falmouth, at the option of the master, for orders whether to discharge at a good and safe port in the United Kingdom, or on the Continent between Havre and Hamburg, both ports inclusive, or so near thereunto as she might safely get and deliver the same in any dock freighters might appoint agreeably to bills of lading, on being paid freight as therein mentioned, the master to sign bills of lading at any current rate of freight required without prejudice to such charter-party, but not under chartered rate.

2. Pursuant to the said charter-party the said ship proceeded to Rangoon, and there loaded a cargo of rice in bags, for which the master of the said vessel signed and delivered a bill of lading, which, so far as material, was, and is in the words and figures following, that is to say :

Shipped in good order and well conditioned, by Gladstone, Wyllie and Co., in and upon the good ship or vessel called the Pieve Superiore, whereof is master for this present voyage Consigliere, and now riding at anchor in the Rangoon River, and bound for Belle Isle, Scilly, Queenstown, or Falmouth, for orders to discharge at a port in the United Kingdom, or on the Continent between Havre and Hamburg, both inclusive, 5000 bags rice, each 210lb. net, 5300 bags, each 198lb. net, being marked and numbered as per margin, and are to be delivered in the like good order and condition at the aforesaid port of _____, as ordered (all and every the dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature or kind soever excepted), unto order or to its assigns, he or they paying freight for the said goods at the rate of 3*l.* 15*s.* (three pounds fifteen shillings) sterling per ton of 20*cwt.* net weight, delivered with average accustomed. In witness whereof, the master or purser of the said ship or vessel hath affirmed to three bills of lading all of this tenor and date, one of which being accomplished, the others to stand void.

Dated in Rangoon, this 26th March, 1873.

F. CONSIGLIERE.

3. The said vessel sailed with the said cargo from Rangoon, and the master, in the exercise of his said option, proceeded therewith to the said port of Falmouth for orders, and there received orders from the plaintiffs or their agents to proceed with the said cargo to Bremen, which is a port on the Continent between Havre and Hamburg, and to discharge the said cargo at Bremen.

4. The said master accordingly sailed from Falmouth in the said vessel with the said cargo to Bremen, and there delivered the said cargo.

5. The said vessel after having discharged her said cargo of rice at Bremen left Bremen on a new voyage for Cardiff, to load coals there, and subsequently arrived at Cardiff, where she has been arrested by the plaintiffs in this suit.

6. The plaintiffs allege themselves to be assignees for valuable consideration of the said bill of lading, and alleged that the said cargo of rice suffered damage in the said vessel, and they have instituted this suit as such assignees for the recovery of losses which they alleged themselves to have sustained by negligence or misconduct, or by breach of duty or breach of contract on the part of the master or crew of the said vessel.

7. Save as aforesaid, the said cargo of rice was never brought into any port in England or Wales.

8. The defendants submits that the said cargo of rice was not carried into any port in England or Wales within the true intent and meaning of the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, and that by reason thereof this honourable court has not jurisdiction to entertain this suit.

The petition concluded with a prayer to the judge to pronounce against the jurisdiction of the court, and to dismiss the suit with damages and costs.

The respondents thereupon gave notice that they should move the judge in court to reject the admission of the petition by reason that under the circumstances therein stated the court had jurisdiction to entertain the cause.

The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim by the owner or consignee or assignee of any bill of lading of any goods carried into any port in England or Wales in any ship, for damage done to the goods or any part thereof, by the negligence or misconduct of or for any breach of duty or breach of contract on the part of the owner, master, or crew of the ship, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court at the time of the institution of the cause, any owner or part owner of the ship is domiciled in England or Wales: Provided, always, that if any such case the plaintiff do not recover 20*l.* he shall not be entitled to any costs, charges, or expenses incurred by him therein, unless the judge shall certify that the cause was a fit one to be tried in the said court.

It was admitted by the respondents that the Court had not any jurisdiction to entertain the cause, unless such jurisdiction was conferred by sect. 6 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861.

The motion came on for argument, and the learned judge of the Court below, after hearing counsel on both sides, made an order on such motion rejecting the admission of the petition with costs, and ordering the appellant to enter an absolute appearance in the cause, but he gave leave to the appellant to appeal: (See ante, p. 162; 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 702.)

From this order the shipowner appealed, and submitted that the order appealed from ought to be reversed, and that the motion ought to have been rejected with costs for the following amongst other reasons,

1. Because upon the facts stated in the said petition the High Court of Admiralty has not jurisdiction to entertain the cause.

2. Because upon the facts stated in the said petition the cargo of rice therein mentioned was not carried into any port in England or Wales within the true intent and meaning of the 6th sect. of "The Admiralty Court Act 1861."

Milward, Q.C. and Clarkson.—The words of this section, although general in terms, must receive some limitation; if they do not, then a ship chartered to carry goods from one foreign port to another foreign port, and compelled to put into an English port by stress of weather, would be amenable to the jurisdiction for a breach of contract committed on the voyage, although there was no contract obligation to put into the English port at all. The mere accident of putting into an English port can give no jurisdiction. The question to be considered is whether there is any intention of dealing with the cargo within British territory. The waiting for orders in an English port is a mere accident of the voyage, and if a ship waits without injury to her cargo, or without breach of contract, she does not carry her cargo into an English port within the meaning of the words of the Act. Where a contract is entered into for the carriage of goods from this country to a foreign port, and is broken by the shipowner, the Admiralty Court has no jurisdiction, even if the ship returns; how can there be any jurisdiction, then, over a foreign contract to deliver abroad where there is no breach connecting the ship with this country? The inconvenience of holding otherwise would be immense to shipowners and shippers by general ships. There must be, as we submit, a contract to deliver in this country before the mere bringing into an English port will give jurisdiction to the court; but even if the meaning of the words is more extensive, there must be such a carrying into port as shows an intention to deal with the goods there in a way which gives a right of action.

Butt, Q. C. and Cohen, Q. C. (Gainsford Bruce with them) for the respondents.—There can be no doubt that these goods were carried into an English port within the literal meaning of the Act, and the defendants have failed to shew a more restricted meaning, stopping our right of recovery. The mere fact of the port into which this ship came being a port of call only will not deprive the court of jurisdiction, as a breach of contract occurring in or before putting into such a port might give a right of action covered by the Act. In The Bahia (Br. & Lush, 61) the ship put into an English port by accident only, and yet it was held that there was jurisdiction. The Kasan (ubi sup.) and The Ironsides (ubi sup.) at most show that there must be a carrying into an English port from a foreign port by the ship proceeded against. There is no greater inconvenience in arresting a ship in the middle of her voyage in such a case as this, than in arresting a general ship at a port of call in a case where there is undoubted jurisdiction; the same argument would apply to all cases of collision, salvage, &c. The inconvenience does not counterbalance the advantages given by the Act to British owners of cargo. If the defendant's contention is right, the master might, after leaving Falmouth, have transhipped his cargo, and returned to this country without proceeding to Bremen, and yet the Admiralty Court would have no jurisdiction. The case has in effect been decided.

Milward, Q. C., in reply.

The arguments will be found more fully reported in the report of the case in the Court below, where they were substantially the same as on appeal.

May, 12, 1874.—The judgment of the court was delivered by Sir MONTAGUE E. SMITH.—This is an appeal from an order of the Judge of the High Court of Admiralty, rejecting a petition on protest to the jurisdiction of the court, in a cause in rem instituted against the ship Pieve Superiore, for damage to cargo under the 6th section of The Admiralty Court Act 1861.

The facts alleged in the petition on protest are: that the appellant, the owner of the ship, lived in Genoa; and that, on the 30th March 1872, a charter-party was made in London between him and Mr. Schiller, on behalf of the house of Borrodaile, Schiller and Co., merchants of Calcutta, by which it was agreed the ship should proceed to one of certain named ports in India, and there load a cargo of rice in bags, for which the master was to deliver bills of lading. The ship accordingly went to Rangoon, and was there loaded by Messrs. Gladstone, Wyllie, and Co., with a cargo of rice; and in pursuance of the charter, the master signed bills of lading, describing the ship to be "hound for Belle Isle, Scilly, Queenstown, or Falmouth, for orders to discharge at a port in the United Kingdom, or on the continent between Havre and Hamburg," and making the cargo deliverable to order, or assigns, on payment of freight at the rate of 3*l.* 15*s.* sterling per ton. It is further alleged that the ship went into the port of Falmouth, with her cargo, for orders; and whilst lying in that port, the master received orders to go to Bremen to discharge; that she went there and discharged her cargo, and afterwards sailed to Cardiff on a new voyage, and was arrested in that port in the present suit.

The concluding paragraphs of the petition are the following: "The plaintiffs allege themselves to be assignees for valuable consideration, of the said bill of lading: and allege that the said cargo of rice suffered damage in the said vessel; and they have instituted this suit as such assignees for the recovery of losses which they allege themselves to have sustained by negligence or misconduct, or by breach of duty, or breach of contract, on the part of the master or crew of the said vessel. Save as aforesaid, the said cargo of rice was never brought into any port in England or Wales. The defendants submit that the said cargo of rice was not carried into any port in England or Wales within the true intent and meaning of the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861; and that by reason thereof this honourable court has not jurisdiction to entertain this suit."

The petition on protest being filed before the plaintiff's petition setting forth the particulars of his damage, ought to state the facts which show want of jurisdiction. But this petition does not allege whether the misconduct or breaches of contract complained of arose before or after the ship left the port of Falmouth. It is consistent with it that the causes of complaint or some of them, arose before she left that port, and their Lordships think it must be assumed that this may have been so in dealing with the question raised by the protest. The only objection taken to the jurisdiction is "that the said cargo of rice was not carried into any port in England or Wales within the true intent and meaning of the 6th section of 'The Admiralty Court Act 1861.'"

The section is as follows: "The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim by the owner or consignee, assignee, or of any bill of lading of any goods carried into any port in England or Wales in any ship, for damage done to the goods, or any part thereof, by the negligence or misconduct of, or for any breach of duty or breach of contract on the part of the owner, master, or crew of the ship, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the Court, that at the time of the institution of the cause, any owner or part owner of the ship is domiciled in England or Wales."

Their Lordships are satisfied that this enactment does not confer a maritime lien, for the reasons given in the judgment of this committee upon the effect of the previous clause of the Act (the 5th) in the case of the Two Ellens (ante, vol. 1, pp. 40, 208; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 592; L. Rep. 4 P. C. 169). The clause in question does no more than give to the Court of Admiralty jurisdiction to entertain suits in cases that can be brought within its scope, and which, it is to be observed, may be instituted in personam as well as in rem.

The clause is undoubtedly framed in large and general terms, and Dr. Lushington, a judge of high authority, in a judgment delivered soon after the passing of the Act, thought it was intentionally so framed: (The Bahia, Br. & Lush, 61.)

It was insisted for the appellant, and not denied by the respondent's counsel, that the words "carried into any port" must receive some limitation, otherwise, it was said, if a ship with cargo on board, being under no obligation to enter an English port, was driven to take refuge in such a port by stress of weather or other accident, the jurisdiction will be founded. The learned counsel for the appellant, however, felt great difficulty in defining what the limitation should be, but ultimately contended that to bring a claim within the clause, the goods must be carried into a port in England or Wales, for the purpose of delivery, or in which, from circumstances, they become deliverable. The latter branch was introduced with reference to some decisions which had upheld the jurisdiction, notwithstanding that the entry into an English port was not contemplated by the contract. But supposing the suggested definition to be correct so far as it goes, their Lordships are not prepared to hold that it contains an exhaustive interpretation of the clause.

Cases must frequently arise at ports of call and intermediate ports, giving occasion for the remedy it was intended to afford to English merchants against foreign shipowners, by proceedings in the English Court of Admiralty. Besides the instances where causes of action have arisen before the arrival of the ship at such ports, take the cases of damage done to goods, or of unjustifiable delay, in the port of call itself; or the case of a ship bound, without calling for orders, to go direct to London to discharge her cargo, and the master improperly putting into some other English port, and refusing to take the cargo on. Instances of this kind would certainly be within the scope of the mischief intended to be dealt with; and their Lordships are reluctant in construing the Act so to interpret words, large enough in their ordinary meaning to embrace such cases, as to exclude them from its operation, and thus leave foreign masters who may have broken their contracts free to take away their ships from this country in the sight of English consignees, who would be powerless, as they were before the Act, to stop them.

The Legislature has used the words "carried into any port in England or Wales," and may have done so designedly to meet cases of the kind to which reference has just been made. It has said nothing of delivery, nor of the purpose for which the goods may be carried into port. The general words of the clause "any claim . . . for any breach of contract on the part of the owner, &c., of the ship" must undoubtedly be construed to have relation to the contract in the bill of lading: and it may have been the intention of the Legislature to give the jurisdiction only in the case of claims arising on contracts to carry the cargo to some port in England or Wales. It is not, however, necessary to consider whether the operation of the Act ought to be limited to this extent, for if it were there would not be an absence of jurisdiction in the present suit. In this case the parties contemplated that the goods would, or at least might, be carried into and delivered in an English port, and the bill of lading signed by the master at Rangoon in pursuance of a charter-party made in London, so provided. The master in fact put into the port of Falmouth for orders in part fulfilment of the contract of carriage, and might, in further fulfilment of it have been ordered to discharge there, or at some other English port. Their Lordships think that under these circumstances the jurisdiction, at least in respect of then existing causes of suit, arose when the goods were so carried into the port of Falmouth, and was not taken away when the ship was subsequently ordered to a foreign port to be discharged.

If the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty over the claim were attached, that court, in their Lordships' opinion, would be competent at any subsequent time to entertain a suit either in personam or in rem by arrest of the ship whenever it came within reach of its process. They therefore think, assuming the jurisdiction to have once attached, that it was competent to arrest the ship in this suit on her arrival upon a new voyage at Cardiff. The arrest, however, there being no maritime lien, could not avail against any valid charges on the ship, nor against a bona fide purchaser; for, as already stated, the object of the statute is only to found a jurisdiction against the owner, who is liable for the damage, and to give the security of the ship, the res, from the time of the arrest. This is clearly explained by Dr. Lushington in The Alexander (1 W. Rob. 288-294), and The Pacific (Br. & Lush. 243), and by this committee in The Two Ellens (ubi sup.) of Admiralty, ought, according to the general rule applicable to such statutes, to be construed liberally, so as to afford the utmost relief which the fair meaning of its language will allow. And the decisions upon it have hitherto proceeded upon this principle of interpretation.

One of the earliest decisions (The Bahia, ubi ante), gives the widest interpretation to the word "carried." In that case the cargo was consigned to Dunkirk. The ship, in consequence of an accident, put into the port of Ramsgate, and the master refused to carry on the cargo to Dunkirk, or to give delivery at Ramsgate. It was there contended by the defendant's counsel, but without success, that the words "carried into any port in England," meant so carried under a contract to that effect. In upholding the jurisdiction of the English Court of Admiralty, Dr. Lushington, after stating the facts, said "That this is a great grievance cannot be denied, and the court ought to give, if necessary, great latitude to the construction of the Act of Parliament, in order to extend the remedy to this case. However, it appears to me that the section was carefully worded to give the utmost jurisdiction in the matter. It uses the words 'carried into any port in England or Wales,' and does not use the words 'imported.' I apprehended the phrase 'carried into' was advisedly used instead of the word 'import.'" It does not appear that this decision was appealed from.

The present Judge of the Court of Admiralty, Sir R. Phillimore, adopted the view of Dr. Lushington in deciding the case of The Patria (L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 459). There, a German ship bound under a bill of lading to take a cargo of coffee to Hamburg, put into Falmouth shortly after the commencement of the French and German war—Hamburg was then blockaded. On the removal of the blockade the master refused to go on to Hamburg, or to deliver the cargo at Falmouth, and Sir R. Phillimore sustained the jurisdiction of the court over claims arising on these breaches of contract; and again there was no appeal.

There was recently another important cause in the Court of Admiralty, also arising out of the war between Germany and France, which came before this tribunal on appeal (The Teutonia, ante, vol. 1. p. 214; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 521; L. Rep. 4 P. C. 172). In that case the Teutonia, a German vessel, called at Falmouth, one of the ports of call under the bill of lading, for orders, and was ordered to Dunkirk to discharge. On nearing the French port she found that war was imminent, and put back to Dover. She was again directed to go to Dunkirk, but the master refused to go there, or to deliver the cargo at Dover without payment of freight. For this refusal a suit was brought against the ship in the English Court of Admiralty under the clause in question. It failed on the merits, but the previous decisions were apparently acquiesced in, for no objection was taken to the jurisdiction.

In the case of The Bahia and The Patria (ubi sup.), the arrival at an English port was not contemplated by the contract, and the ship put into our ports by reason only of circumstances extrinsic to it; nor did they then enter them for the purposes of discharging their cargoes, which only in any sense became deliverable there by reason of the subsequent refusal of the master to take them on to the port of destination. Their Lordships, in pointing out the distinction between these cases and the present, must not be understood to question their authority. They are fully sensible of the difficulty of construing this loosely drawn clause, and giving a satisfactory interpretation of it. It is sufficient for them to decide that under the circumstances of this case, to which they have above adverted, the objection taken in limine to the jurisdiction is not, upon the facts disclosed in the protest, sustained.

For these reasons their Lordships think the order of the Judge of the High Court of Admiralty is right, and they will humbly advise Her Majesty to affirm it, and to dismiss this appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

DUDGEON v. PEMBROKE.

Marine insurance—Time policy—Unseaworthiness—Illegal voyage.

When a jury have found that a vessel was not unseaworthy to the knowledge of the owners, they can recover on a time policy, even though the unseaworthiness as a fact materially contributed to the loss.

Where a ship, not licensed by the Board of Trade to carry passengers, does carry them, if such carriage is the act of the master alone without the knowledge of the owners and contrary to their intentions, the policy is not vitiated by the illegal carriage of passengers.

Wilson v. Rankin (2 Mar. Law. Cas. O. S. 161, 287; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 162; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 20), approved.

DECLARATION against underwriter on a time policy for twelve months, from the 24th Jan. 1872, on a steamship called The Francis, on ship valued at 8000*l.*, machinery at 4000*l.*, claiming a total loss.

Pleas, First, denial of making and subscribing the policy; secondly, denial of plaintiff's interest; thirdly, that ship, &c., was not lost by the perils insured against or any of them; fourthly, that defendant was induced to become an insurer to the plaintiffs, and to subscribe the said policy as alleged by misrepresentation made by the plaintiffs and their agents in that behalf to the defendant of facts then material to the risks of the said policy and material to be known to the defendant; fifthly, that before and at the time of the making of the alleged insurance, the plaintiffs and their agents wrongfully and improperly concealed from the defendant certain facts and information which they before then knew and had received, and of which the defendant then was ignorant, which said matters so concealed as aforesaid, were at the time of the making of the said insurance material to the risks of the said insurance and material to be known to the defendant; sixthly, that after the making of the said policy of insurance, the plaintiffs well knowing that the said ship was wholly unseaworthy, wrongfully and improperly, and without any justifiable cause or reason, caused, and ordered her to proceed from the port of London, in such wholly unseaworthy condition as aforesaid, on the voyage on which she was afterwards lost, and the said ship remained, as the plaintiffs always well knew, in such wholly unseaworthy condition from the time she left the said port as aforesaid, until she was lost as aforesaid, and the said ship, machinery, and premises were lost as alleged by reason of such unseaworthiness of the said ship, and not otherwise; seventhly, that the said ship was before and at the time of the making of the said policy, and up to the time of the alleged loss a passenger steamer, within the 318th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and after the making of the said policy of insurance, and before the alleged loss, the said ship was sent by the plaintiffs, being the owners of the said ship, with passengers on board on a certain voyage, and proceeded to sea on such voyage, being the voyage on which the said ship, machinery, and premises were lost as alleged, without the owners of the said ship having transmitted to the Board of Trade the declarations required in that behalf by the provisions of the said statute, and without the owners or master of the said ship having received from such board such a certificate as is provided for by the provisions of the said statute in that behalf; and the plaintiffs, as the owners of the said ship, had not nor had the master of the said ship ever received any such certificate as aforesaid, before the time of the alleged loss, up to which said time the said passengers had from the commencement of the said voyage remained and continued on board the said ship, all which several premises the plaintiffs always well knew, and by reason of the said premises the said voyage became and was illegal, and that the plaintiffs caused the said policy to be made for the express purpose of covering the said ship, machinery, and premises, and indemnifying themselves against the loss thereof on the said illegal voyage; eighthly, never indebted.

Issue on all the pleas.

Demurrer to the sixth and seventh pleas, and joinder in demurrer.

The case was tried at Guildhall, before Blackburn, J., and a special jury. The material facts proved at the trial are stated in the judgment infra. Certain questions were put by the learned judge to the jury, which questions with the answers of the jury thereto are also fully set forth infra. On the findings of the jury the learned judge directed the verdict to be entered for the plaintiffs on the third and sixth pleas. A rule nisi for a new trial was subsequently obtained, which now came on for argument along with the demurrer.

Milward, Q.C., Watkin Williams, Q.C., and A. L. Smith showed cause against the rule, and argued in support of the demurrer.—They contended that the findings of the jury justified the entry of the verdict for the plaintiffs. Whatever was meant by the representation that the vessel had been thoroughly repaired, the question was left to the jury, who pronounced upon it. The policy was a time policy, and in the case of such a policy there is no implied condition as to seaworthiness: (Gibson v. Small, 4 H. L. Cas. 353.) In Russell v. Thornton (4 H. & N. 778; in error 6 H. & N. 140) the time policy was held void, because the assured's agent concealed the material fact that the vessel had been aground, had received some heavy blows, and had made her way in a sinking state to the port of Carthage, where she then was. The principle that the causa proxima, not the causa remota, is to be regarded applies here, the proximate and immediate cause of the loss being the stranding of the vessel: it would be different if the loss were proximately occasioned by the absolute inherent defect of the vessel, viz., if through such absolute inherent defect a vessel goes down at her moorings, it could not be said that she was lost by perils of the sea. [COCKBURN, C.J.—But the stranding of a vessel may be by reason of her inherent unseaworthiness.] In Ionides v. The Universal Marine Insurance Company (1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 353; 14 C. B., N. S., 259) the policy on 6500 bags of coffee on board a ship belonging to the Federal States of America contained the following warranty:—"Warranted free from capture, seizure, and detention, and all the consequences thereof, or of any attempt thereat, and free from all consequences of hostilities, &c." The vessel, owing to the extinguishment by the Confederate troops of a light usually burning there, ran ashore on Cape Hatteras without any possibility of getting off again, and the officers of the Confederate States took and retained the captain and the rest of the crew on shore as prisoners. The wreck took place on the 17th July; on the 18th the weather was rough, and nothing could be done, but on the 19th certain persons, appointed by the Federal Government for the purpose, came down and got 150 bags of coffee on shore apparently undamaged, and it was proved that they might have got on shore 1000 more but for the interference of the Confederate troops. The weather becoming again boisterous the ship broke up and all the cargo on board was lost. It was held that under these circumstances the insurers were liable as for a partial loss in respect of the coffee which remained on board incapable of being saved, the proximate cause of the loss being a peril of the sea and not the hostile act of the Confederate troops in extinguishing the light. The principle of this decision is applicable here. So is the ratio decidendi of Livie v. Janson (12 East, 648). There an American ship insured from New York to London, "warranted free from American condemnation," for the purpose of evading her national embargo, slipped away in the night, was, by force of the ice, wind, and tide, driven on shore, where she sustained only partial damage, but was seized the next day, and afterwards with great difficulty and expense got off and finally condemned by the American Government for breach of the embargo; and it was held that as there was ultimately a total loss by a peril excepted out of the policy, the assured could neither recover for a total loss nor for any previous partial loss arising from the stranding, &c., which in the event became wholly immaterial to the assured. Lord Ellenborough said: "The object of the policy is indemnity to the assured, and he can have no claim to indemnity where there is ultimately no damage to him from any peril insured against. If the property, whether damaged or undamaged, would have been equally taken away from him, and the whole loss would have fallen upon him, had the property been ever so entire, how can he be said to have been injured by its having been antecedently damaged? To put one instance to the same effect: supposing ship and cargo to be damaged in the early part of a voyage by the ordinary sea perils, and afterwards wholly destroyed by fire before the voyage is finished; of what consequence to the owner is the damage which may have occurred from one or several successive causes of injury before the fire? and if the property, whether undamaged or not, would have been equally annihilated, is not its previous deterioration rendered wholly immaterial?" This was the ground on which the court in that case gave judgment for the defendant, as subsequently stated by Lord Ellenborough, namely that "the immediately operating cause of the total loss was one from which and its consequences the defendant was by express provision in the policy exempted." In Dixon v. Sadler (4 M. & W. 405), to a declaration on a time policy, stating a loss by perils of the sea, the defendant pleaded that though the vessel was lost by perils of the sea, yet that such loss was occasioned wholly by the wrongful, negligent, and improper conduct (the same not being barratrous) of the masters and mariners of the ship, by wilfully, wrongfully, negligently, and improperly (but not barratrously) throwing overboard so much of the ballast that the vessel became unseaworthy, and was lost by perils of the sea, which otherwise she would have encountered and overcome. The jury at the trial having found a verdict for the defendant, the underwriter in this issue, it was held on motion for judgment non obstante veredicto, that the plea was bad, and that the underwriters were liable for the consequences of the wilful, but not barratrous, act of the master and crew, in rendering the vessel unseaworthy before the end of the voyage, by throwing overboard a part of the ballast. Parke, B, in delivering the judgment of the court, said: "The question depends altogether upon the nature of the implied warranty as to seaworthiness, or mode of navigation, between the assured and the underwriter in a time policy. In the case of an insurance for a certain voyage, it is clearly established that there is an implied warranty that the vessel shall be seaworthy, by which it is meant that she shall be in a fit state as to repairs, equipment, and crew, and in all other respects, to encounter the ordinary perils of the voyage insured, at the time of sailing upon it. If the assurance attaches before the voyage commences, it is enough that the state of the ship be commensurate to the then risk; and, if the voyage be such as to require a different complement of men, or state of equipment, in different parts of it, as if it were a voyage down a canal or river, and thence across the open sea, it would be enough if the vessel were, at the commencement of each stage of the navigation, properly manned and equipped for it. But the assured makes no warranty to the underwriters that the vessel shall continue seaworthy, or that the master or crew shall do their duty during the voyage; and their negligence or misconduct is no defence to an action on the policy, where the loss has been immediately occasioned by the perils insured against." Next, as to the seventh plea, alleging the illegality of the voyage on the ground that passengers were carried without the requisite certificate from the Board of Trade in accordance with the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, ss. 303-318). Sect. 318 of the Act provides that "It shall not be lawful for any passenger steamer to proceed to sea, or upon any voyage or excursion with any passengers on board unless the owner thereof has transmitted to the Board of Trade the declarations hereinbefore required, nor unless the owner or master thereof has received from such Board such a certificate as hereinbefore provided for, such certificate being a certificate applicable to the voyage or excursion on which such ship is about to proceed," &c. And sect. 319 enacts that "If the owner or master, or person in charge of any passenger steamer, receives on board thereof, or on or in any part thereof, or if such ship has on board thereof, or on or in any part thereof, any number of passengers which, having regard to the time, occasion, and circumstances of the case, is greater than the number of passengers allowed by the certificate, the owner or master shall incur a penalty not exceeding 20*l.*, and also an additional penalty not exceeding 5*s.* for every passenger over and above the number allowed by the certificate, or, if the fare of any of the passengers on board exceeds 5*s.*, not exceeding double the amount of the fares of all the passengers who are over and above the number so allowed as aforesaid, such fares to be estimated at the highest rate of fare payable by any passenger on board." In Redmond v. Smith (7 M. & G. 457), the court, in an action on a policy of insurance, held bad on general demurrer a plea alleging that there was no agreement signed by the master and seamen, or any of them, specifying what wages each seaman was to be paid, the capacity in which he was to act, or the nature of the voyage in which the ship was to be employed, as required by 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 19, s. 2. Tindal, C. J., said (p. 474): "A policy on an illegal voyage cannot be enforced; for it would be singular if the original contract being invalid, and therefore incapable to be enforced, a collateral contract founded upon it could be enforced. It may be laid down, therefore, as a general rule, that where a voyage is illegal, an insurance upon such voyage is invalid. This has been decided in many cases. But it appears to me that the 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 19, was passed for a collateral purpose only; its intention being to give merchant seamen a readier mode of enforcing their contracts, and to prevent their being imposed upon. The present case is undoubtedly brought within the provisions of the 1st section of this statute by the allegations contained in the sixth plea. The 4th section enacts that if the master does not comply with the previous requisitions, he shall be liable to a penalty; but it is nowhere said that such non-compliance shall make the voyage illegal," &c., reasoning which is strictly applicable to the circumstances of the present case, where a penalty is also imposed on the master for non-compliance. See also Sewell v. The Royal Exchange Assurance Company; (4 Taunt. 856.) It is submitted further that the captain, not having authority to take passengers on board, was not the agent of the owner for that purpose, and that his act cannot bind the owner or affect the policy. In Wilson v. Rankin (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 161, 287; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 162; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 20), the master without the knowledge or privity of the owner stowed a portion of the cargo on deck, and sailed without any certificate from a clearing officer that the whole cargo was below deck, contrary to 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, ss. 170, 171, and 172. This court held that although the master had general authority from his owner to stow the cargo, no authority could be implied to load it so as to violate the statute, neither was it an act of the master which the owner must be presumed to have assented to; that the fact of the ship having sailed without the certificate did not render her unseaworthy at the commencement of her voyage so as to prevent the policy attaching, and consequently that the plaintiff, the shipowner, was not precluded from recovering on his policy against the underwriter. Farmer v. Legg (7 T. R. 186) was also referred to. In Cunard v. Hyde (El. Bl. & El. 670) it was held that where a master sails without the certificate required by the Customs Consolidation Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 107) or loads in the mode prohibited by that Act, an insurance on the cargo is not thereby vitiated, unless the insured be, at the time of effecting the insurance, privy to the act of the master. Lord Campbell, C. J., said: "It is quite clear that the insured cannot be liable to lose the benefit of the insurance on account of the misconduct of the master, unless they were privy to and cognisant of such misconduct at the time when the insurance was effected. This I should have said, even if the statute had contained a positive prohibition, instead of merely imposing a penalty. The object of the enactment was to protect human life and property in the case of goods shipped at the time of the year mentioned in the clauses. It would be monstrous injustice to say that the owners of the goods are to lose their insurance wherever the master violates these regulations; such was not the object of the Legislature. If anything illegal were contemplated by the owners it would be another question; without that, we cannot hold the contract of insurance void." Finally, it is submitted that the weight of the evidence was in favour of the vessel being seaworthy.

Butt, Q.C., Sir J. B. Karlake, Q.C., and Cohen, Q.C., in support of the rule and of the pleas demurred to. It must be taken to be settled (by Gibson v. Small, 16 Q. B. 128; 4 H. Cas. 353, and Fawcus v. Sarsfield, 6 E. & Bl. 199) that in time policies there is no implied warranty of seaworthiness; and it is not contended here that there was any such implied warranty. Nor can it be said that the ship was lost through her inherent unseaworthiness. Phillips (Marine Insurance, vol. 1, par. 1132) says: "The commonplace maxim that in cases of doubt to which of two or more perils a loss is to be assigned, 'Causa proxima non remota spectatur,' has been not unfrequently resorted to, by which was meant, originally at least, that a loss is to be attributed to the peril in activity at the time of the ultimate catastrophe, when the loss is consummated. But much of the jurisprudence is contradictory to the maxim taken in this sense, and it seems to have served rather to divert attention from the proper inquiry, and to becloud instead of elucidating the subject. I understand the result of the jurisprudence to be that in case of the concurrence of different causes, to one of which it is necessary to attribute the loss, it is to be attributed to the efficient predominating peril whether it is or is not in activity at the consummation of the disaster." This amounts to a denial of the proposition that because a vessel goes down in sea water, and nothing but its inherent unseaworthiness is the cause, it is lost by a peril of the sea. The cases usually cited against the view now contended for are Green v. Elmslie (Peake's N. P. 212) and Livie v. Janson (12 East, 648). In the former case the vessel was driven by stress of weather on an enemy's coast and there captured.

DUDGEON v. PEMBROKE.

There was then a complete loss by an excepted peril; if not captured the vessel might have been safely got off. In the latter case there was a total loss, also by the capture of the vessel. Hagedorn v. Whitmore (1 Stark N. P. 157), where a merchant ship (under a mistake) was taken in tow by a British ship of war, and was thereby exposed to a tempestuous sea, which injured goods on board of her, and which was held a loss from the perils of the sea, Lord Ellenborough, C.J., saying that "the loss might have been alleged to have been occasioned by capture and detention, since it was not occasioned by the act of an individual but by the captain of one of His Majesty's ships, settles nothing as to the point now in dispute. The same may be said of Dixon v. Sadler (5 M. & W. 405, confirmed in error 8 M. & W. 895), where the loss was occasioned by the throwing out of ballast. The reasoning of Erle, C.J., in Ionides v. The Universal Marine Insurance Company (ubi sup.) is in favour of our contention: "The maxim 'Causa proxima non remota spectatur' is peculiarly applicable to insurance law. The loss must be immediately connected with the supposed cause of it. Now the relation of cause and effect is matter which cannot always be actually ascertained; but if in the ordinary course of events a certain result usually follows from a given cause, the immediate relation of the one to the other may be considered to be established. Was the putting out the light at Cape Hatteras so immediately connected with the loss of this ship, as to make the one the consequence of the other? Can it be said that the absence of the light would have been followed by the loss of the ship, if the captain had not been out of his reckoning? It seems to me that these two events are too distantly connected with each other to stand in the relation of cause and effect;" and on this reasoning the decision of the court proceeded. Hahn v. Corbett (2 Bing. 205) was a clear case of loss by perils of the sea, the ship being stranded on a shoal within a few miles of the port of destination, was disabled from proceeding, and lost; and then while laying in the sand, was seized by the commander of the place where she was stranded, and the goods confiscated by him. Montoya v. The London Assurance Company (6 Exch. 451), Naylor v. Palmer (8 Exch. 739; 10 Exch. 382), and Bondrett v. Hentigg (Holt. p. 149), were also referred to. Whenever the loss is directly referable to the act of the assured himself, the underwriter is discharged. In Bell v. Carstairs (14 East, 374), where a neutral ship insured here, was captured by a French ship and condemned in the French court as prize, on the ground that the ship was not properly documented, according to the existing treaty between France and the United States, it was held that the neutral assured could not recover their loss against the British underwriter, although there was no warranty or representation that the ship was American; the neglect of the shipowners themselves, who are bound at their peril to provide proper national documents for their ship, being in such a case the efficient cause of the loss. (See Duer on Insurance, vol. 2, p. 635). Lord Ellenborough in that case said, "It is material to look at the alleged ground of condemnation in order to see whether it has been occasioned by any act or neglect on the part of the assured; for if it has been so occasioned it would not be a loss against which the assured would, upon any principle of reason or justice as applied to this species of contract, be required to indemnify him; the indemnity stipulated on his part being only against the perils described in the policy, as far as they operate upon the policy insured adversely, and not through the medium of any act or neglect on the part of the assured himself providing the loss of the policy insured." It is submitted that sending a vessel to sea in an unseaworthy condition is as much a breach of duty on the part of the assured, as sending her to sea without the proper documents. It is now a misdemeanour to send a ship to sea in such a condition. (See 34 & 35 Vict. c. 110, s. 11.) If the plaintiff had been damaged by his own wrongful act he cannot recover. In Thompson v. Hopper (6 El. & Bl. 172) the court held that a good defence is shown by a plea alleging that the plaintiff, knowingly, wilfully, wrongfully, and improperly sent the ship to sea at a time when it was dangerous to go to sea in the state and condition in which she then was, and wrongfully and improperly caused and permitted the ship to be and remain on the high seas near to the sea shore for a great length of time in the state and condition aforesaid, and without a master and without a proper crew to manage and navigate her on her voyage, during which time the ship by reason of the premises was wrecked. "Although," said Lord Campbell (p. 191) "I still deny any warranty of seaworthiness, I think that, if this plea be true in point of fact, the loss must be considered as accruing from the wrongful act of the insured, which can give them no claim to indemnity. . . Here we have personal misconduct charged upon the plaintiffs, which misconduct produced the loss. By the English law of insurance, the assured are not obliged to keep the ship seaworthy throughout the voyage, or during the period of the risk; and if she is lost by supervening unseaworthiness arising from the negligence of the captain, the underwriters are liable, as if the ship were burnt from his negligence. But it is a maxim of our insurance law, and of the insurance law of all commercial nations, that the assured cannot seek indemnity for a loss produced by their own wrongful act. The plaintiffs' counsel said truly that the perils of the sea must still be considered the proximate cause of the loss; but so it would have been if the ship had been scuttled or sunk by being wilfully run upon a rock. According to the statement in this plea, the plaintiffs efficiently caused the loss by their wrongful act; and if so, I think there was no necessity expressly to characterize that act as being either felonious or fraudulent." On the trial of this cause, there was evidence from which the jury might have drawn the conclusion that though the unseaworthiness of the vessel was not the immediate cause of her loss, the loss would not have occurred if the ship had been seaworthy when she went to sea. No question on this was left to the jury; and it was held that the plea was proved if that misconduct of the plaintiff occasioned the loss, though it was not its immediate cause; and a new trial was granted on this ground. Lord Campbell, C. J., said: "In holding upon the demurrer that the third plea was a good bar to the action, we did not proceed on the narrow ground that the unseaworthiness was the direct and proximate cause of the loss. We considered that the plea was framed upon the principle that a man shall not be allowed to avail himself of his own wrong." Further on his Lordship says: "The maxim 'In jure non remota causa sed proxima spectatur,' is qualified by our legal maxim. 'Dolus circuitu non purgatur;' and dolus means any wrongful act tending to the damage of another." Is it to be said, then, that, to exempt the assurers from liability the misconduct of the assured must be the direct and proximate cause of the loss. We think that, for this purpose, the misconduct need not be the causa causans, but the assured cannot recover if their misconduct was causa sine qua non. In that case they have brought the misfortune upon themselves by their own misconduct, and they ought not to be indemnified. The very object of insurance is to indemnify against fortuitous losses, which may occur to men who conduct themselves with honesty and with ordinary prudence. If the misconduct is the efficient cause of the loss the assurers are not liable. For this doctrine it will be enough to cite the leading case of Bell v. Carstairs (ubi sup.). It may be taken that the plaintiff cannot recover where the loss is occasioned by his own wrongful act; and it is not laid down anywhere that this wrongful act must have been wilfully or intentionally done by the plaintiff. According to this principle, if the inherent unseaworthiness of the ship was the real cause of her loss the owner cannot recover. [BLACKBURN, J.—How can an act be wrongful unless there is an implied obligation to do or not to do some particular thing which obligation is not performed?] Gibson v. Small (ubi sup.) and such like cases do not decide that there is no duty on the part of the shipowner to send the vessel to sea in a seaworthy condition, and since those cases were decided, it has been made a statutory misdemeanor not to do so. Apart from this statute, a moral duty existed: there is now a corresponding legal duty. The inherent vice of the goods constituting a cargo is not insured against: why should the inherent vice of the vessel be? [BLACKBURN, J.—Neither side asked me at the trial to leave to the jury the question whether by the negligence of the plaintiffs or their agents, the vessel was sent to sea in an unseaworthy condition. We must take it, however, that in point of fact the vessel was sent to sea in an unseaworthy condition, and that owing to that she was lost.] If the loss was occasioned by neglect of the owner, it is submitted that he cannot recover. In Bell v. Carstairs (ubi supra). Lord Ellenborough, C. J. said: "It is material to look at the alleged ground of condemnation in order to see whether it has been occasioned by any act or neglect on the part of the assured; for, if it has been so occasioned, it would not be a loss against which the assured would, upon any principle of reason or justice as applied to this species of contract, be required to indemnify him." The third plea, in Thompson v. Hopper (ubi sup.), which was held to be a bar to the action, is almost identical with the sixth plea here. [BLACKBURN, J.—Though not identical, it is no doubt in substance the same.] And the question of notice is of no importance. Throughout the judgment of the majority of the court in that case no stress is laid on the fact of notice. [BLACKBURN, J.—The judgment went on the ground that the cause of the loss was the personal wrongful act of the plaintiff.] Nothing, however, is said as to knowledge. [BLACKBURN, J.—But is not that implied in the language of Lord Campbell?] That knowledge is not necessary is decided by Fawcus v. Sarsfield (6 El. & Bl. 199), where it was held that where a vessel is sent to sea in a state not fit for the particular voyage, and without encountering any more than ordinary risk, is obliged, owing to the defective state in which she sailed, to put into a port for repair, the shipowner, though the defects were not known to him, and he has acted without fraud, cannot recover against the insurer the expenses of such repairs as were rendered necessary in consequence of the unseaworthy state of the vessel, though there be no warranty of seaworthiness. If the expense of repairs would not fall on the underwriter, why should the consequences of non-repair fall on him? [BLACKBURN, J.—Does that decision amount to more than this: that the underwriter is not liable for what may be mere wear and tear, and not the less irresponsible for that, because increased by the unsound state of the vessel?] The whole court held good the fourth plea, which was in these terms: "that the said vessel sailed on the said voyage in the declaration mentioned in an unseaworthy and unsound state and condition for the said voyage, and continued in the said state and condition during all the time in this plea mentioned; and that neither at the time when she so sailed, nor at any time before the final loss in the declaration mentioned, was the said vessel staunch and strong, or reasonably fit to withstand and safely encounter or bear the ordinary force and violence of the winds and waves on that voyage; and that she did not from the time of her so sailing on the said voyage up to the time when she so put into the said port, meet with or encounter any storm or tempest, or any more severe weather, &c., than is usual or ordinary on the said voyage, or than a vessel, reasonably sound, strong, and fit for that voyage, could and would have encountered and borne without damage or injury; and that the said leakiness, damage, and injury, by reason of which the said vessel put into the said port for repairs, and the necessity for the said repairs being done, were caused by and arose from the said bad and defective condition of the said vessel, and the exposure of the said vessel in the said condition to the usual and ordinary force and violence of the winds and waves on that voyage." And nothing whatever is said in the judgments in that case about wear and tear. That plea is substantially the same as the sixth plea here; and it is submitted that the judge was wrong in directing the verdict to be entered for the petitioner on that plea. Then as to the seventh plea, alleging the illegality of the voyage, it is submitted that that plea is good, and that the plaintiff cannot recover. It is made a penal offence by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, to enter on such a voyage as this without the requisite certificate from the Board of Trade. Farmer v. Legg (7 T. R. 186) is, it is submitted, a direct and conclusive authority. There, in an action on a policy of insurance on an African vessel engaged in the slave trade, the principal question was whether the ship had been navigated in the manner prescribed by 31 Geo. 3, c. 54, s. 7, which rendered it necessary that the certificate of the captain's having served, as that Act required, should be attested by the owner or owners of the ship or ships in which the service was performed. Lord Kenyon, at the trial, being of opinion that the certificate did not answer the requisition of the statute, nonsuited the plaintiff, and the court discharged a rule to set aside the nonsuit.

BLACKBURN, J.—We will take time to consider our judgment upon the more important points of law, and as to the large sums of money at stake. But with reference to the 7th plea, as to the vessel carrying passengers without the necessary certificate from the Board of Trade, we can give judgment at once. [His Lordship read the plea at length.]

Now the second case of Cunard v. Hyde (ubi sup.) decided that where the deck cargo was put on board, with the privity of the owner, in order that the Act of Parliament might be defeated, and that the vessel should make an illegal voyage, that was a good defence to the action; in other words that the plea was good. For the same reason I think that the plea here is good. But in the present case the jury have found that these persons were not passengers—a finding as wrong as can be—and also that it was not the intention of the shipowner that the vessel should carry passengers. The question then comes to this, whether the act of the captain, if he chooses to do it, thereby making himself liable to a penalty, in taking passengers on board without the knowledge of the shipowner has the effect of making the voyage illegal so as to vitiate the policy of insurance. I think, on the authority of the first case of Cunard v. Hyde (ubi sup.), that a plea alleging that would not be a good plea. On this plea, therefore, our judgment must be for the defendant on the demurrer. But so far as the verdict affects that plea, our judgment must be for the plaintiffs.

QUAIN, J.—I am of the same opinion.

AS SOON as we see from the Act of Parliament that its object was to prohibit a voyage, then the illegality attaching to the prohibited voyage attaches also to the policy covering it. The law on the subject is summed up in Duer (Lect. iii. sect. 50) thus: "It is not in all cases that the breach of a statutory provision by the owners or master of a vessel, even when it induces a forfeiture, by a necessary consequence avoids the insurance. Its influence upon the contract depends on the nature, consequences, and design of the prohibition. We have seen that an illegal traffic is never permitted to vitiate the contract, unless it occur in the course of the voyage insured, or of an entire voyage of which that insured is a component part. By parity of reasoning, the statutory provision, the breach of which discharges the insurers, must bear a direct and immediate relation to the voyage insured. It must operate, either by its terms, or by a necessary inference, as a prohibition of the voyage, where no such connection subsists between the actual voyage and the provisions of the statute; where, consequently, the relation between the illegal act and the policy is not direct, but remote and incidental, so that neither the design or tendency of the latter is to aid or promote the commission of the former, the validity of the contract is not impaired or affected. In each of the cases that have been cited the statutory provision alleged to be violated, bore a direct relation to the voyage insured. It was, in effect, a prohibition of the voyage unless performed with the crew or master that the law required. Hence the insurance shared, of necessity, the illegality of the voyage to which it referred. But it is obvious that the acts inducing a forfeiture or other penalties, may be wholly unconnected with the particular voyage. They may not expressly or impliedly render the voyage illegal; and, in such cases, although the insurers are certainly not liable, in the event of the seizure of the vessel, they continue liable for all risks that their contract properly embraces."

Now the words of the Act of Parliament in the present case are: "It shall not be lawful for any passenger steamer to proceed to sea, or upon any voyage or excursion with any passengers on board, unless the owner thereof has transmitted to the Board of Trade," &c.; and "If the owner or master, or other person in charge of any passenger steamer, receives on board thereof, &c., the owner or master shall incur a penalty," &c. What is alleged in the plea was therefore directly in the teeth of the Act of Parliament; and I think, therefore, that the defendant is entitled to judgment upon the demurrer to this plea. But I entirely agree with my brother Blackburn that the plea was not proved, and that there was no evidence in support of this part of it, viz., "All which several premises the plaintiffs always well knew." The plaintiffs knew nothing at all about it, and the captain of the vessel had no authority whatever to take these persons on board and to bind his master by such an act. I think that the verdict should be entered for the plaintiffs.

Judgment for defendant on the demurrer as to the rest.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 6.—The judgment of the court (Blackburn and Quain, JJ.) was now delivered as follows by BLACKBURN, J.—This was an action against an underwriter on a time policy for twelve months from the 24th Jan. 1872 on the Frances steamer, on ship valued at 8000*l.*, machinery at 4000*l.*, claiming a total loss. The material pleas were the 3rd, that the ship was not lost by the perils insured against; 4th, misrepresentation; 5th, concealment; 6th, that after the making of the policy, the plaintiffs well knowing that the ship was unseaworthy, wrongfully, and without any justifiable cause, sent her to sea from the port of London on the voyage on which she was lost; and the ship remained, as the plaintiffs always well knew, in such unseaworthy condition from the time she left the port aforesaid until she was lost; and the ship was lost by reason of such unseaworthiness and not otherwise. There was a seventh plea of an alleged illegality, the questions on which we disposed of at the time this rule was argued, and which need not further be noticed. Issue was taken on all the pleas. The trial came on before me and a special jury at the Guildhall, where a very great deal of evidence was produced on both sides, the trial occupying seven days.

The outline of the case, as far as is necessary to make the points of law intelligible, was as follows:—The ship at the time of the insurance called the Frances was an iron steamship. She was originally built at Amsterdam in 1858, and launched in 1859, for Spanish owners. She was not classed in this country, but there was evidence from which the jury might fairly conclude she was then properly built of good iron. There was no direct evidence as to how the Spanish owners employed her. The defendants gave evidence that in 1868 the ship which was then called the Paris was lying at anchor in the harbour at Cadiz, and lay unemployed there for about eighteen months. In Sept. 1871, the Paris was lying at Birkenhead afloat, and offered for sale. Two witnesses were called by the defendants, who inspected her with a view of purchasing her. Neither made a regular survey, but both came to the conclusion that she was very dirty and had been much neglected, and was probably corroded, and they did not purchase. In that month of Sept. 1871, the plaintiffs, who are iron shipbuilders at Millwall, contracted with the Spanish owners at Millwall, to build them a new ship and to take the Paris, then lying at Birkenhead, in part payment, at about 4000*l.* She was then brought round to Millwall from Birkenhead with her original boilers on board. They were not fit for use, and she was consequently towed round. The senior member of the plaintiffs' firm gave evidence that the original boilers being still on board, led him to conclude that she could not have been much used, and that led him to think well of her. The boilers were taken out, and the vessel was offered for sale to the agent of a firm at Hull, who, after examining her afloat, but not making a regular survey, advised his principals not to buy her. He was called as one of the witnesses for the defendants. Messrs. Dudgeon were owners of two steamers running between London and Gottenburgh for goods and also carrying passengers. They were called the Mary, and the Louisa and Fanny. One of them, the Louisa and Fanny met with a collision, and Messrs. Dudgeon resolved to repair the Paris and run her on this line, and to change her name to the Frances, in compliment to the daughter of one of the partners. She was put in the dry dock and scraped perfectly clean. Messrs. Dudgeon, who were called as witnesses on their own behalf, swore distinctly that they believed her to be quite capable of being made fit for the service; that orders were given to Mr. Harrington, a marine surveyor and engineer, to see that she was properly repaired; and that their people at Millwall were instructed to execute whatever repairs were required, and that there was no stint whatever as to the amount of the repairs, and that they fully and still believed she was made seaworthy. Mr. Harrington confirmed this; and gave positive testimony that everything was done that was required and that in his opinion she was made a thoroughly good strong ship. The old boilers being taken out, the boiler space was all open to view, but the ceiling was only partly removed, and the cement was not removed at all, so that the whole of the inside was not visible. There was contradictory evidence amongst the skilled witnesses as to whether the removal of the ceiling and the cement was necessary or not. Mr. Harrington swore positively that it was not at all required. There was strong evidence on the part of the plaintiffs' shipwrights and the dock people that everything was done that was requisite. It was difficult to dissect the accounts so as to say how much was due to the putting in of new boilers and how much to the repairs of the hull, the work being done by the plaintiffs' own workmen. It was difficult to ascertain the money value of what was done, but there was evidence that a great deal had been done and much expense incurred. It appeared, however, clearly as a fact that the screw tunnel was left untouched and was in a decayed state. The surveyor of the Board of Trade surveyed the outside of the hull, but, owing, it was said, to want of time, she was not surveyed inside, and consequently did not obtain a passengers' certificate, and ultimately sailed for Gottenburgh on the 3rd Feb. 1872 without one. In the mean time the Frances had been insured. There was a little, but very little discrepancy between the witnesses as to what was said at the time of making the insurance. The clerk to the broker said that the burthen of what he said to the defendants' representative was that the Frances was a steamer which Dudgeon had taken in exchange; that he had thoroughly repaired her—was going to put her into his Gottenburgh trade similar to the Louisa and Fanny and the Mary. On cross-examination he stated that he did say she was "thoroughly repaired," but did not, he thought, say "practically rebuilt," and that if he said she was "new," he must have said it in the sense "new to that trade." The underwriters' representative said that several ships were laid before him for time policies on steamships, that he unwrote without remark those which he had previously known, and amongst others the Louisa and Fanny, which he knew as a first-class steamer engaged in the Gottenburgh trade, but that he did not know whether those steamers carried passengers or not. When he came to the Frances he asked what she was, and as nearly as he could recollect the answer was, "She is a new Gottenburgh steamer like the Louisa and Fanny. I do not mean to say she is a new vessel. She is an old boat bought by Dudgeon, who has spent a lot of money on her, and she has been thoroughly repaired and virtually rebuilt." On the 3rd Feb. 1872, as already stated, the Frances sailed for Gottenburgh with some machinery on deck, but no other cargo, so that she was somewhat crank. As soon as she got out to sea she began to make water. There was no weather to justify this; and though there was some discrepancy between the witnesses as to the quantity of water she made, it was certainly more than could be accounted for by any weather she met. She arrived safe at Gottenburgh. When she got into smooth water she ceased to leak, and though she was examined, the case of the making water could not be discovered. She took on board a cargo of oats and iron, and a deck cargo of wood, and sailed on the 11th Feb. at 7 a.m. for London. All went well till the morning of the 12th Feb. when she had got out of Vigo Sound into the open sea, then it began to blow. There was contradictory evidence as to the weather; but the evidence most favourable for the defendant admitted that it blew, that there was a heavy rolling sea, and that it was necessary to put a sail over the stoke-hole to prevent the sea from getting in. The evidence most favourable for the plaintiffs made the wind a gale, but not such as would make a good ship behave as the Frances did. All agreed that she began to labour and to make water so that the fires were put out. Part of the deck cargo was thrown overboard and the fires relighted with the rest. After twelve hours of pumping the pumps got choked with the oats. There was evidence that if the screw tunnel had been in proper order this would not have happened. All hands were engaged in baling to save the ship. On the night of the 14th Feb., having ascertained whereabouts they were by the Spurm Light, they endeavoured to get to Hull. The ship being waterlogged did not readily answer her helm. Partly from this and partly from the thickness of the weather the ship went ashore on the morning of the 15th Feb., about 5 a.m., having been in this state of distress since the morning of the 12th Feb. One of the boats was swamped, but the crew were all saved by a fishing smack. Part of the cargo was afterwards saved, but the vessel could not be got off, and broke in two, and finally, after some months, went completely to pieces. There was very contradictory evidence from surveyors who had seen the wreck as to the state and condition of the plates, &c.

DUDGEON v. PEMBROKE.

When the evidence was completed I stated to the counsel that I proposed to ask the jury on the merits seven questions, which I reduced to writing. These were, first, was the representation made by the broker at the time of the making of the insurance as to the condition of the vessel, and as to the extent of examination, substantially correct? secondly, did that representation involve in it a statement that the vessel was to carry passengers, and consequently had been surveyed by the Board of Trade? thirdly, was there a concealment from the underwriters of anything materially affecting the insurance which the plaintiffs knew, and the underwriters did not? fourthly, was the fact that the ship had not been surveyed and certified for passengers, under the circumstances, one which was material? fifthly, was the vessel seaworthy when she started? if not, sixthly, was this known to the plaintiffs? seventhly, was that unseaworthiness the cause of the loss? Neither side suggested any other question, and the counsel addressed the jury. In summing up, I explained to the jury that though in a time policy there is no implied warranty of seaworthiness, yet that any representation made to the underwriters is treated as the basis of the contract; and if (whether innocently or knowingly there is a substantial difference between the representation and the fact, making the risk materially greater than represented, the policy is not binding; and that a concealment of something known to the assured and not known to the underwriters, which would materially make the risk greater, has the same effect. I pointed out to them that there were two questions of fact for them as to the representation; first, what was the effect of the representation; secondly, was it substantially true? I assumed, if I did not in express terms say, that the loss on this evidence was a loss by the perils of the sea, but that the question whether the assured could recover for such a loss might depend upon the answers to the fifth, sixth, and seventh questions; telling them that in asking the seventh question I did not mean to ask them whether it was the sole or immediate cause of the loss, but whether the making water was occasioned by unseaworthiness, and the loss arose from her being water-logged in consequence of that unseaworthiness, so that it would not have happened but for the unseaworthiness.

The jury, after being out some hours, could not agree on their answers to the first, fifth, and seventh questions. They were desired to endeavour to agree. After I had left the court they agreed on their answer to the first question, but were finally discharged without agreeing on the fifth and seventh. Their written answers finally taken were, to the first question, Yes; to the second, third, and fourth, No; to the fifth, The jury cannot agree; to the sixth, No; to the seventh, The jury cannot agree. On these findings I directed the verdict to be entered for the plaintiffs on the third and sixth issues.

In the ensuing term a rule for a new trial was obtained by Sir John Karslake generally. It was agreed that if the plaintiffs were entitled to retain the verdict, it should be ascertained by an average adjuster what deduction, if any, should be made for salvage. Cause was shown during the last term before the Lord Chief Justice, my brother Quain, and myself, but my Lord having been absent from court, on account of indisposition, during a considerable part of the argument, takes no part in the judgment, which is that of my brother Quain and myself alone.

We think that the defendant is entitled to treat the case as if the jury had answered the two questions on which they were unable to agree, in his favour; and that if, on that supposition, the plaintiffs would not be entitled to retain their verdict, then there should be a new trial to ascertain the facts.

The points made in the argument were—first, that the verdict that the representation was substantially correct was not consistent with the actual finding, that the jury could not agree as to whether the ship was in fact seaworthy, or (as we think that the defendant is entitled to treat the case for the purpose of the argument) a finding that she was not seaworthy, or at least that this finding was against the weight of the evidence. No complaint was made of the direction in point of law as to this question. We think, however, that it was a question for the jury what the effect of the representation was, and that they might properly think it did not involve a representation that the vessel was actually made seaworthy, but only that the plaintiffs had bonâ fide done, without stint or scamping, all that competent advisers thought necessary to put the vessel in thorough repair, and reasonably believed that their outlay had been sufficient to make her fit for the service. If the jury took this view of the representation we think they might reasonably find on this evidence that it was substantially true, even though the vessel, owing to some oversight or neglect on the part of those superintending the repairs was not in fact made seaworthy.

The other points made were that if the vessel was not seaworthy, and the loss was caused by the unseaworthiness, the vessel was not lost by the perils insured against, and that the verdict on the third issue should not therefore have been entered for the plaintiff. And that though the jury found that the plaintiffs did not know of the unseaworthiness, that did not disprove the substance of the sixth issue. We think, however, that even if the jury had expressly found that the vessel was not seaworthy, and that the loss was occasioned by that unseaworthiness it would have afforded no answer to the action, and that the substance of the sixth plea would not have been proved. The judgment of this court on the demurrers in Thompson v. Hopper (6 El. & Bl. 172) has never been reversed, and is binding on us. In the case of Thompson v. Hopper, on appeal (1 E. Bl. & E.), there was much discussion and difference of opinion as to what was the proper guide to be given to a jury on the question whether the unseaworthiness caused the loss. Had the finding of the jury been in favour of the defendants on the sixth question, I intended to endeavour to raise the precise point for a court of appeal. As it is that point does not arise. Thompson v. Hopper (ubi sup.), on demurrer, decides that there is, in such a case as the present, no warranty of seaworthiness at all; and that even if the assured knowingly send a vessel to sea in an unseaworthy state, it affords no answer to an action on a time policy for a loss not shown to have been produced by that unseaworthiness. But in the same case it was decided that if the assured sent her out in a state not fit to go to sea, knowing it, and the loss was produced by that unseaworthiness it does afford an answer. Lord Campbell says, at p. 191, "But it is a maxim of our insurance law and of the insurance law of all commercial nations, that the assured cannot seek an indemnity for a loss produced by their own wrongful act. The plaintiffs' counsel said truly that the perils of the sea must still be considered the proximate cause of the loss, but so it would have been if the ship had been scuttled or sunk by being wilfully run upon a rock. According to the statement in this plea, the plaintiffs effectually caused the loss by their wrongful act." This judgment proceeds on the same principle as that of Bell v. Carstairs (14 East, 374), where it was held that a ship having been captured and condemned for want of proper documents the shipowners could not recover for the loss, though the owner of goods, if not one of the shipowners, might recover on a policy of goods. The reason of the distinction is pointed out by Lord Ellenborough: "The owner of goods was not liable to suffer in respect of his insurance on account of any defect in the documents belonging to the ship, with the procurement or existence of which he has no concern. . . . In the present case, on the ground that the three subjects of insurance were condemned on account of the common default of all the proprietors in their joint character of shipowners . . . we are of opinion that the assured cannot claim from the underwriters an indemnity for a loss thus occasioned by themselves." At the time when Bell v. Carstairs was decided, there were no special pleas, everything being open under the general issue; but it is clear, we think, that the effect of this judgment would have been (after the new rules) to support a plea in confession and avoidance to this effect. "True it is that the ship was lost by a peril insured against, to wit, capture, but the loss was occasioned by the fault of the plaintiffs themselves, and therefore the underwriters are not bound to indemnify them against it." We are bound by authority to hold that there is no warranty of seaworthiness in this policy, and the jury have negatived knowledge on the part of the plaintiffs. We think, therefore, that we cannot hold that the remaining averments in the sixth plea, even if proved, would show that the loss was occasioned by a wrongful act on the part of the plaintiffs, and consequently that the substance of the plea was not proved.

But a further question is raised on the third issue. It is said, and we agree, that the underwriters are not bound to indemnify the assured against every loss that occurs during the period insured, but only against those occasioned by perils insured against. And if the damage or loss arises from no unusual cause, though the winds and the waves may be concerned in it, the loss is wear and tear, for which the underwriters are not responsible. If there has been an unusual cause, it is perils of the sea, for which they are responsible: (Magnus v. Buttmer, 11 C.B. 876; Paterson v. Harris, 1 B. & S. 336; and The Merchants Trading Company v. The Universal Marine Company, not reported.) But in all cases the law regards the proximate cause of the loss. And it would be difficult to find a better example of what Lord Bacon calls the infinities of the "Causes of causes, and their impulsion one on the other," than is afforded by this case. The ship perished because she went ashore on the coast of Yorkshire. The cause of her going ashore was partly that it was thick weather and she was making for Hull in distress, and partly that she was unmanageable because full of water. The cause of that cause, viz., her being in distress and full of water, was that when she laboured in the rolling sea she made water, and the cause of her making water was that when she left London she was not in so strong and staunch a state as she ought to have been. And this last is said to be the proximate cause of the loss, though since she left London she had crossed the North Sea twice. We think it would have been a misdirection to tell the jury that this was not a loss by perils of the seas, even if so connected with the state of unseaworthiness as that it would prevent anyone who knowingly sent her out in that state from recovering indemnity for this loss.

Two cases were on the argument relied on, viz., Fawcus v. Sarsfield (6 E. & B. 192) and The Merchants Trading Company v. Universal Marine Company (not reported, but of the judgment in which we have been furnished with a copy). We think neither case conflicts with our decision. In Fawcus v. Sarsfield the plaintiff claimed on a time policy on ship for the loss sustained by putting into a port of distress and there unloading and repairing the vessel, which had become leaky, as the declaration alleged, by the perils of the seas. The plea which the arbitrator found to be true in fact was that the ship was unseaworthy and met with no extraordinary peril, and that the leakiness arose "by and from the said bad and defective condition of the vessel and the exposure of the vessel to the usual and ordinary force and violence of the wind and waves on that voyage." This seems to be an allegation that the loss was from wear and tear, aggravated by the original bad state of the vessel, and if so the plea was no doubt good. In the Merchants Trading Company v. The Universal Marine Company, it appears that the action was on a voyage policy on the ship Golden Fleece from the Mersey to Cardiff, whilst there, and thence to Alexandria. On the trial before my brother Lush it was proved that the Golden Fleece being to all appearance seaworthy, left the Mersey with a few tons of coal on board, and therefore substantially in ballast, and arrived safe at Cardiff, where she went into the docks and there loaded a full cargo consisting of 2000 tons of coals. She left the docks and anchored in the Penarth Roads, outside Cardiff, in the morning, and on that same night, whilst riding at anchor, suddenly filled with water and foundered, there being neither wind nor sea, or anything to account for the going down. The evidence of those on board when she sank seems to make it probable that one of the coal ports had given way. On this my brother Lush appears to have correctly explained to the jury that if when she started on the voyage from the Mersey she was not seaworthy, it was a defence; and he further told the jury that the underwriters were answerable for casualties arising from the violent action of the elements as distinguished from the silent, natural, gradual action of the elements upon the vessel itself, which latter properly belonged to wear and tear; that what the underwriters insured against were casualties that might happen and not consequences which must happen. He told the jury that under the circumstances proved in the case before them, the one question which would solve it all was this: Was the leak from which the vessel foundered attributable to injury and violence from without, or from weakness from within? For, that if it was not attributable to perils of the seas, that is, as he explained it, the violent action of the elements from without, or any other casualty involved in perils of the seas, the jury could come to no other conclusion than that it was due to an inherent infirmity in the ship itself. On this direction the jury found for the defendant. The verdict was entered for the defendant, both on the plea denying seaworthiness and on that denying that the loss was by perils of the seas, and the Court of Common Pleas refused a rule for a new trial, holding the direction unexceptionable. And we quite agree that the direction was unexceptionable; for if the vessel was so weak as to give way from the mere pressure of the water on her coal port, without anything more, the proximate cause of the loss was that weakness. But it scarcely needs pointing out how very different the facts proved as regards the loss of the Golden Fleece were from those proved in the present case as to the loss of the Frances, which, however unseaworthy she may have originally been when leaving London, had crossed the North Sea twice, and was finally lost because she went ashore, after contending with the wind and waves during some days.

We have therefore, come to the conclusion that the rule should be discharged. No point was reserved at the trial, but we give the defendant leave to appeal on all questions arising on the findings of the jury and the direction as to the first six pleas. We give no leave to appeal on the issue on the seventh as to the supposed illegality.

Rule discharged.

EXCHEQUER CHAMBER.

APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Reported by H. LEIGH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

June 20 and 26, 1874.

(Before BLACKBURN, MELLOR, BRETT, GROVE, and ARCHIBALD, JJ.)

THE LIVER ALKALI WORKS COMPANY (LIMITED) v. JOHNSON.

Common carrier—Carrier by water—Inland navigation—Barge owner letting his barges to anyone for particular voyages—Carrying one person's goods only at a time—Liability of such barge owner—Custom of England as to carriers by land and by water—Distinction between—Limiting the liability by special exceptions.

Where a barge owner made it his business to let out his barges on hire, under the care of his own servants, to any persons applying for them, from time to time, to carry cargoes, not between any fixed termini, but to and from different points or places on the river Mersey, as each customer required, each voyage being made under a separate agreement, and each barge being let to and carrying the cargo of one customer only at a time, it was Held by the Court of Exchequer (Kelly, C.B., and Martin, Bramwell, and Cleasby, BB.), in an action against the barge owner for not safely and securely carrying certain goods of the plaintiffs, that he was liable, as a "common carrier" for the loss of the goods, although it had occurred without any negligence on his part, And, on an appeal to the Court of Exchequer Chamber, it was Held (per totam curiam), affirming the judgment of the court below, that the defendant was liable.

By Blackburn, Mellor, Grove, and Archibald, JJ., on the ground that a person so exercising the business of a barge owner does, in the absence of something to limit his liability, incur the liability of a "common carrier," in respect of the goods he carries, and that it was not necessary to inquire whether he was a carrier so as to be liable to an action for not taking goods tendered to him.

By Brett, J.—That the defendant was not a "common carrier," and was in no way liable as such, because he did not undertake to carry goods for, or to charter his ship to, the first comer; but that he was liable as a shipowner, by a recognised custom of England, whereby a shipowner carrying goods for hire, whether by inland navigation, or coastways, or abroad, undertakes to carry them at his own absolute risk, the act of God or of the Queen's enemies alone excepted, unless by special agreement, on a particular voyage, he limits his liability by further exceptions; but was not liable as a "common carrier" upon the custom applicable to that business or employment.

This is a case on appeal from the decision of the Court of Exchequer of Pleas in a cause instituted in the Common Pleas at Lancaster. The action was brought to recover 179*l.*, being the value of sixty-two and a half tons of salt cake, the property of the plaintiffs, which were lost while being carried in a lighter or flat of the defendant, in the river Mersey, under the circumstances hereunder mentioned. The cause was tried before Martin, B., at the Liverpool summer assizes, 1871, when that learned judge directed the verdict to be entered for the plaintiffs, reserving leave to the defendant to move to enter the verdict for him as hereinafter explained. Afterwards, in Michaelmas Term, 1871, the Court of Exchequer of Pleas granted a rule nisi to enter the verdict for the defendant. This rule came on to be argued before the Court of Exchequer of Pleas sitting in banco, when that court discharged the rule. Notice of appeal against the decision having been duly given, the following is stated for the purpose of the said appeal to the Exchequer Chamber.

1. The declaration contained three counts. The first count stated that the salt cake was shipped by the plaintiffs on board the defendant's flat for carriage from Widnes, in the river Mersey,

EX. CH.]

THE LIVER ALKALI WORKS COMPANY (LIMITED) v. JOHNSON.

to Liverpool, and the breach complained of was that, although not prevented by certain excepted perils and casualties, the defendant had failed to carry and deliver the salt cake. The second count complained that the salt cake was so negligently carried that the same was lost to the plaintiffs; and the third count complained that, by reason of the defendant's careless and improper conduct whilst the salt cake was in his custody, and by reason of his not taking the necessary steps to preserve the same, such salt cake was lost.

To this declaration the defendant pleaded four pleas. The first traversed the delivery of the said salt cake to the defendant on the alleged terms. The second plea (limited to the first count) denied the breaches there alleged. The third plea (limited to the second and third counts) was not guilty; the fourth plea (limited to the first and third counts) stated that the defendant was prevented carrying and delivering the salt cake by certain excepted perils, namely, by the dangers and accidents of the sea, river, and navigation. Upon these pleas issue was joined. A copy of the pleadings accompanies, and may be read as part of this case.

2. The plaintiffs carry on their alkali works at Liverpool, and the defendant is the owner of several flats or lighters which are employed in the carriage, as from time to time engaged by different persons, of goods to and from various points along the river Mersey as occasion may require.

3. On the 16th Jan. 1871 the plaintiffs' manager asked the master of one of the defendant's flats, called "Eliza," then lying empty in the Stanley Dock, Liverpool, if the said flat could be sent to Widnes, for the purpose of carrying the salt cake in question from Widnes to the plaintiffs' alkali works at Liverpool, and, such flat being disengaged, the master caused it to be taken to Widnes for the purpose of carrying the plaintiffs' salt cake, and he there received from the plaintiffs' servants the salt cake in question. There were on such flat the goods of no other person save those of the plaintiffs. With such cargo the flat, duly manned, proceeded down the river towards Liverpool, on the 19th Jan. 1871. A fog having come on the flat dropped anchor two or three times on its passage down the river, and finally, between three and four o'clock p.m., on the 20th Jan. 1871, being then abreast of the north end of the Clarence Graving Dock, the flat struck on the ground, and, as the tide was falling, she remained there. At the ebb the flat was left nearly dry, and when the tide rose again it was found that she was considerably strained and filled with water. Ultimately the master and crew, finding that they could not keep down the water by pumping, proceeded to secure the flat by her anchor, and by ropes made fast to the pier head, until prevented by the pier master. Several attempts were made to remove her but without success, and in the result the flat and her cargo were carried off by the tide and were wholly lost.

4. On behalf of the defendant a witness was called, who stated as follows: "I went to the plaintiffs' manager to draw some freight. He said that he had taken the freight on account of damage. I told him we could not be answerable for damage to cargo; it must be entirely at his own risk when he put goods on board the flats. I told him that it was quite possible that one of the flats might go down any day, and he might lose the whole cargo. He said the best way would be to insure. I said, 'Yes, it would.' I said it was not reasonable that we should be called upon to insure the cargo at the low rate of freight of 7d. per ton."

5. The plaintiffs' manager said that such conversation had taken place, but stated that it took place after the voyage in question, during which the loss had occurred, and did not refer to the loss in respect of which this action is brought; he said that after such loss he stated that he would insure, and thereafter he did in fact insure.

6. The questions of fact contested at the trial were, first, as to whether or not the defendant had been guilty of any want of care in or about the carriage or safeguard of the plaintiff's goods, or in or about the navigation of the defendant's flat on the voyage in question; and secondly, whether the said conversation took place before or after the voyage in question; and these facts having been left by the learned judge to the jury, the latter found that the defendant had been guilty of no want of care in the premises, and that the said conversation took place after the voyage in question.

7. On the part of the plaintiffs, evidence was given that they had employed the defendant to carry goods for them for several years, and at a uniform rate of freight. On the part of the defendant two witnesses were called. The first witness, Richard Gregson, stated that he was the master of the flat Eliza; that he carried goods for different people; and that that flat was engaged from time to time, as required, for special cargoes of different persons. He said an engagement was made for each voyage, and to carry the goods of one person only on each voyage. He said the defendant's flats did not carry the goods of several people on board at one time, and that they were engaged from time to time to carry from different points up the river, to different places and docks lower down the river, at Liverpool and Birkenhead. The second witness called for the defendant, and who managed his business, stated that the defendant's flats were employed in carrying the goods of the persons who from time to time employed them, each cargo only consisting of the goods of the particular person employing the flat on each occasion. He said that they carried for anyone who chose to employ them, but that an express agreement was always made as to each voyage or employment of the defendant's flats. There was no cross-examination on the part of the learned counsel for the plaintiffs as to the evidence of the defendant's witnesses.

8. Upon this part of the case no question of fact was submitted to the jury.

9. There was no evidence that particular flats were as a rule, selected by customers; nor was there any evidence that they were not, as a rule, so selected.

10. The plaintiffs' counsel then contended that the defendant was a common carrier, and that the defendant was liable, assuming the loss of the salt cake to have been caused by perils of the sea, river, and navigation. The learned judge for the purposes of the day, directed the verdict to be entered for the plaintiffs, and reserved leave to the defendant to move to enter the verdict for him, if the court should be of opinion, on the facts herein appearing, that the plaintiffs had failed to establish the fact that the defendant was a common carrier, and that the defendant, on the facts stated, was not liable for the loss of the salt cake.

11. The Court of Exchequer having, in Michaelmas Term 1871, granted a rule nisi to enter a verdict for the defendant; the court afterwards, in Easter Term 1872, discharged the rule, as already mentioned. A copy of the rule nisi, and of the rule discharging the rule nisi, accompany, and may be referred to as part of this case. The case will be found reported below; ante, vol. 1, p. 380.

The question for the opinion of this court is, whether the decision of the court below in discharging the rule is right. If the Court of Exchequer Chamber should be of opinion in the affirmative, then the said rule and the verdict for the plaintiffs are to stand, and judgment is to be entered for them for the amount, together with their costs of suit. But if in the negative, then the said rule is to be made absolute, and the said verdict for the plaintiffs is to be set aside, and a verdict entered for the defendant, with judgment for his costs of defence.

The defendant's (appellant's) points for argument: First, that the facts stated in the special case do not show that the defendant was or held himself out to be a common carrier; secondly, that the description of the general business carried on by the defendant given in the special case shows that he let out the flats to specific persons for specific cargoes for specific voyages (see pars. 1, 2, and 7); thirdly, that the defendant's flat, the Eliza, was specifically hired or chartered by the plaintiffs to carry the specific cargo in question from Widnes to Liverpool; fourthly, that by so letting or chartering the Eliza the defendant did not incur the liabilities of a common carrier; fifthly, that the legal effect of this contract of letting or chartering was that the flat Eliza should be fit for the purpose for which she was let or chartered, that the defendant should exercise reasonable care and skill in the carriage and delivering of the cargo loaded in such flat, and that the defendant should not be liable for inevitable accident or the perils of the navigation from Widnes to Liverpool; sixthly, that the special case showed that the flat Eliza was fit for the purpose for which she was chartered; that due care and skill were exercised by the defendant, and that the goods in question were lost through inevitable accident and the perils of the navigation, and that consequently the defendant is not liable (see pars. 3 and 6).

Points of argument on the part of the plaintiffs (respondents): First, that upon the facts stated in the case the defendant is liable as a common carrier in respect of the cargo in question; secondly, that he exercised a public employment and carried goods for anyone who chose to employ him; thirdly, that it is no matter whether he carried the goods of different people in his flats at the same time, or the goods of one personally; fourthly, that it is not necessary to constitute a common carrier that he should ply between fixed termini; fifthly, that there was no evidence to show that the defendant ever refused to carry goods for anyone applying to him, or that particular flats were selected by his customers; sixthly, that there was no evidence to show that the defendant before the voyage in question entered into any special agreement relating to the carriage of goods, except such as any common carrier may enter into and still remain liable as a common carrier; seventhly, that the fact that the plaintiffs insured their cargo after the loss in question cannot affect the defendant's liability in respect of such loss; eighthly, that the defendant's liability cannot be affected by the amount of freight paid by the plaintiffs; ninthly, that upon the facts stated in the case the defendant is liable as an insurer of the cargo in question, having held himself out to the plaintiffs as a common carrier.

C. Russell, Q.C. (with him was Butt, Q.C.), for the appellant, contended that the judgment of the court below was wrong, and that upon the facts it was clear that the defendant was not, and did not hold himself out as, a "common carrier." No doubt it is laid down in the books, and may be stated to be the law, that a "common carrier" is "a person who undertakes to transport from place to place, for hire, the goods of such persons as think fit to employ him; and such," it is said, "is a proprietor of waggons, barges, lighters, merchant ships, or other instruments for the public conveyance of goods." (See notes to Coggs v. Bernard (Lord Raymond 999), 1 Sm. L. Cas., 2nd edit., p. 101; 5th edit., p. 198; 6th edit., p. 206.) The case of Morse v. Slus (1 Vent. 190, 238; T. Raymond, 220; 1 Mod. 85; 2 Lev. 69; 2 Keb. 866; 3 Ib. 72) will be relied on by the plaintiffs as an authority for the owner of "flats," such as the defendant in this case, being liable; but it is submitted as most probable that the ship in that case was put up as a "general ship," and that the goods were put on board her in that character. Again, the present was a case of a particular hiring for a particular job, and the agreement was really similar to a charter-party. The defendant did not carry for the public generally, but the goods only of the one person who hired him for the particular voyage. A "common carrier" is "bound to convey the goods of any person offering to pay his hire, unless his carriage is already full, or the risk sought to be imposed upon him extraordinary, or unless the goods be of a sort which he cannot convey or is not in the habit of conveying" (1 Sm. L. Cas. ubi sup.) But how can it be said that the defendant here would be liable to an action for refusing to carry? [BLACKBURN, J.—Have you any authority that a person putting up a ship as a "general ship" is liable for refusing to carry particular goods? BRETT, J.—What is the definition of a "general ship?" I thought it was advertising that a ship would take any goods brought to it. If that be so, how can it be said that he would not be liable for refusing to carry goods brought?] In Abbott on Shipping (10th edit. p. 233; 11th edit., part 4, c. 4, p. 277) it is said that "when a ship is intended to be employed for the conveyance of merchandise as a 'general ship,' it is usual to give notice of the intention by printed papers and cards mentioning the name and destination of the ship, her burthen, and sometimes her force; sometimes expressing also that the ship is to sail with convoy, or with the first convoy for the voyage, or other matters relating thereto"—in fact, holding out that she is ready to take the goods of any and every body who may send them. The law is similarly laid down in Story on Bailments, beginning at sect. 495. Sect. 501, p. 440, 8th edit. is important: "When it is said that the owners and masters of ships are deemed common carriers, it is to be understood of such ships as are employed as general ships, or for the transportation of merchandise for persons in general; such as vessels employed in the coasting trade, or in foreign trade, or on general freighting business, for all persons offering goods at freight for the port of destination;" and Story, J., goes on to say that in such cases it makes no difference whether the whole cargo belongs to one or to many shippers, "so always that the ship retains her character and employment of a general ship or common carrier;" citing Sheldon v. Robinson (7 New Hamp. 159, American). "But," he adds, "if the owner of a ship employs it on his own account generally, or if he lets the tonnage, with a small exception, to a single person, and then, for the accommodation of a party or individual, he takes goods on board for freight, not receiving them for persons in general, he will not be deemed a "common carrier," but a mere private carrier, for he does not, under such circumstances, hold himself out as engaged in a public business or employment." Now that is an à fortiori case, for there the whole space would not be let out. I concede that, a ship being held out as a general ship, it is immaterial that the whole space is occupied by the goods of one person. [MELLOR, J., referred to Angell on Carriers, (American) (4th edit., p. 78), commenting on Lord Holt's remarks on Morse v. Slue (ubi sup.)] BRETT, J.—Is the man who keeps and lets out for hire furniture vans for removing goods from one part of London, or one part of the country, to another, a common carrier? I should say he was not. What is at the bottom of the term "common carrier" is the plying between certain definite and fixed termini; and that is the definition given in Parsons on Shipping, vol. 1, pp. 245, 246. [BLACKBURN, J.—What do you say to the case of Dale v. Hall (1 Wils. 281)? That seems to me to be the strongest case against you.] There, no doubt, it was held that a "hoyman" who undertakes to carry goods must deliver them safe, at all events, except damaged by the act of God or by the king's enemies; but the word "common" carrier must be imported there. The decision goes no further than that in that particular case the keelman was a "common" carrier; and, looking at the small value of the plaintiff's goods there, 24l., it may be fairly assumed that it was a small part only of the keel's cargo. [BRETT, J.—What is the meaning of the old term "hoyman"?" I think it doubtful whether it is equivalent to a flat or barge owner of the present day.] See Richardson's Dictionary, "Hoyman;" and as to their liability, Jones on Bailments, pp. 106, et seq. Then, lastly, this was an excepted loss, as occurring by the act of God. In Angell on Carriers (4th edit., p. 133, sect. 155), it is said: "In all the cases the term 'act of God' was applied to a sudden failure of the wind, whereby the vessel tacking was unable to change her tack, and so went ashore." It is equivalent to the term—vis major of the civil law.

The "fog" named in par. 3 of the case, which was the cause of the accident, was an occurrence over which the defendant had no control, and for which he was not answerable. By putting him into the category of a "common carrier," the court will be fixing him with a liability which he never had in his mind, and which the plaintiffs themselves never contemplated at the time of the original hiring. (He referred also to 26 Geo. 3, c. 86, s. 1, and cited and relied on the ruling of Lord Abinger, C.B., in Brind v. Dale, 8 Car. & P.

207; 2 Moo. & Rob. 80, as strongly in the defendants' favour.)

T. H. James (with him was Aspinall, Q.C.), for the plaintiffs (respondents), contra.—It is not necessary for the plaintiffs to go so far as to say that every ship or barge owner who lets out his ship or barge, &c., is a "common carrier," but here the defendant held himself out as ready to let out his "flats" to the public indifferently; and if that be so, then it is immaterial whether or not there was a contract for any particular flat. The defendant is not shown to have had any other employment. [Per curiam.—It is not material, if he carried on this particular business, that he might have carried on some other.] The fact of its being his only employment, as far as appears from the case, shows at least that it was not a casual hiring. It is not the case of a shipowner who can and does refuse his ship at his pleasure. Here the defendant regularly let out his flats to any and every one; he never refused anyone, and he carried as a common carrier. [BRETT, J.—The burden of proof is on you to shew that he was a "common carrier," and that he never refused to carry the goods of anyone coming to hire his flats. BLACKBURN, J.—It will be better than saying he is a "common carrier," to say that he carried goods with the liability of a "common carrier."] The distinction between a "common carrier" and a shipowner is, that the former holds himself out as ready to carry for anyone; the latter merely as ready to treat with anyone. The first never refuses. [BLACKBURN, J.—Do you say that if the defendant refused anyone coming and saying "I want a flat for such and such a purpose," he would be liable to an action?" I do. [BLACKBURN, J.—What is your authority for that?" I rely on the latter part of paragraph 7, which is equivalent to an admission to that effect, and the onus, I contend, is on the defendant to rebut the assumption of his liability. Nothing has been shown here of any express agreement altering his general liability as a carrier. [MELLOR, J.—Paragraph 2 states a distinct fact. The other paragraphs are recapitulations of the evidence. BRETT, J.—Would not the statement in paragraph 2 apply equally to any shipowner in Liverpool?" It may be somewhat vague, but the distinction is between a carrier who holds himself out as ready to carry for all, and a shipowner who is willing to treat and may decline. As Kelly, C.B. said in his judgment in this case below, "If the hiring of the vessel were in the nature of a charter-party, the liability would not arise, but, looking at the nature of the employment, we do not see that there is any single matter which can be assimilated to a charter-party. When the plaintiffs engaged the defendant to bring down the salt cake there was nothing to specify what vessel was to be employed, and in fact the cargo may have been put upon any one of the vessels belonging to the defendant. Taking, therefore, all the facts into consideration, we are of opinion that the defendant was in this instance a common carrier." (ante, vol. i., pp. 380, 381.) In all the cases and authorities the definition of a "common carrier" is "one who undertakes to carry for hire the goods of all persons indifferently." Gisbourne v. Hurst (1 Salk. 249); again, the cases of Coggs v. Bernard (ubi sup.), and Morse v. Slue (ubi sup.), referred to by the other side, are distinct authorities that hoymen, ferrymen, bargemen, and masters of ships, who carry goods for hire, are, in the absence of a special contract to the contrary, "common carriers." In Laveroni v. Drury and another (8 Ex. 166; 22 L. J. 2, Ex.), the damage done to goods on board ship by rats was held not within the excepted perils in an ordinary bill of lading, and the shipowner was held liable, although there were cats on board; and Pollock, C.B., in his judgment, there referred (at p. 173 of 8 Ex.; p. 4 of 22 L. J. Ex.) to the principle laid down in Dale v. Hall (ubi sup.), as affording the only true rule of ascertaining with accuracy and certainty the liability of the master and owner of a general ship, viz., "that primâ facie he is a 'common carrier,' but that his responsibility may be either enlarged or qualified by the terms of the bill of lading." Bacon's Abridgment, Carriers A. and B. (citing Jackson v. Rogers (2 Show. 327), and Rich v. Kneeland (Cro. Jac. 330), Smith's Mercantile Law (4th edit. p. 262; 8th edit. p. 267), and Jones on Bailments, 3rd edit. pp. 106 et seq.), are to the same effect, and show that the rule applies equally to bargemen, lightermen, and boatmen on navigable rivers. The defendant here, too, comes within Story's definition in his work on Bailments (8th edit., par. 495, p. 440), that is, he exercised his business "as a public employment," undertook to carry goods for persons generally, and held himself out as ready to engage in the transport of goods for hire as a business, not as a casual occupation pro hac vice. The test, as Story puts it, is that the carrying shall be a public employment, and the business habitual and not casual; and in enumerating "common carriers" by water, he classes amongst them "masters of steamboats engaged in the transportation of goods for persons generally, for hire;" and also lightermen, hoymen, bargemen, ferry-men, canal boatmen, and others employed in the like manner" (Ibid., par. 496, p. 444); and then, in a note discussing the case of Brind v. Dale (8 Car. & P. 207; 2 Moo. & Rob. 80) cited by my friend on the defendant's behalf, he says, "Is a ship engaged in general freighting business, or let out generally for hire for any voyage which the freighter may require, less a 'common carrier' than a regular packet ship which plies between different ports?" In Riley v. Horne and others (5 Bing. 217), Best, C.J., says that from his liability as an insurer the carrier is only to be relieved by two things, viz., the act of God and the king's enemies. Lyon and another v. Mills (5 East 428) is a strong authority for the plaintiffs, and it is clear that, in the absence of the notice in that case, the lightermen there would have been fixed with the liability of a "common carrier." The use of the lighters there was similar to that of the flats here. Ingate v. Christie also (3 Car. & Kir. 61), and particularly what was said by Alderson, B., there, shows what is the true criterion of liability in such a case (see also Kent's Commentaries, 12th edit., par. 602). On both principle and authority the judgment of the court below is right, and should be affirmed.

O. Russell, Q.C., in reply, distinguished some of the cases, cited, and quoted Kent (Comm. 10th edit., p. 828), as treating the question of liability to an action for refusing to carry, as the strongest test of whether or not the individual is a common carrier.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 26.—Their Lordships having taken time to consider, BLACKBURN, J., now delivered his written judgment as follows, in which Mellor, Grove, and Archibald, J.J., concurred, and then read the judgment of Brett, J., who concurred in the decision, but not on precisely the same ground as the rest of the court.

BLACKBURN, J.—It appears by the case stated for this court on appeal, that the defendant was engaged in carrying from Widnes to Liverpool some salt cake of the plaintiffs in a flat on the river Mersey. The goods were injured by reason of the flat getting on a shoal in consequence of a fog. This was a peril of navigation, but could in no sense be called "the act of God or of the Queen's enemies." The jury found that there was no negligence on the part of the defendant. The question therefore raised is, whether the defendant was under the liability of a bailee for hire, viz., to take proper care of the goods, in which case he is not responsible for their loss; or whether he had the more extended liability of a common carrier, viz., to carry the goods safe against all events but acts of God and the enemies of the Queen.

We have purposely confined our expressions to the question "whether the defendant has the liability of a common carrier," for we do not think it necessary to inquire whether the defendant is a carrier so as to be liable to an action for not taking goods tendered to him. The rule imposing this extended liability on common carriers was originally established, as Lord Mansfield, C.J. states in Forward v. Pittard (1 T. R. 27), on the ground of public policy; "to prevent litigation, collusion, and the necessity of going into circumstances impossible to be unravelled, the law presumes against the carrier, unless he shows it was done by the king's enemies or by such act as could not happen by the intervention of man, as storms, lightnings, and tempests." And as Lord Holt explains it in the celebrated judgment in Coggs v. Bernard (ubi sup.), as existing in the case of one that exercises a public employment; "and this is the case of the common carrier, common hoyman, master of a ship, &c., which case of a master of a ship was first adjudged, 26 Car. 2, in the case of Morse v. Slue (Raymd. 220, 221; Ventris, 190, 238) . . . And this is a politic establishment, contrived by the policy of the law, for the safety of all persons the necessity of whose affairs oblige them to trust these sorts of persons, that they may be safe in their ways of dealing." It is too late now to speculate on the propriety of this rule. We must treat it as firmly established that, in the absence of some contract, express or implied, introducing further exceptions, those who exercise a public employment of carrying goods do incur this liability.

It appears from the evidence stated that the defendant was the owner of several flats, and that he made it his business to lend out his flats, under the care of his own servants, to different persons as required from time to time, to carry cargoes to and from places in the Mersey, but that it always was to carry goods for one person at a time, and that "they" (the flats) "carried for any one who chose to employ them, but that an express agreement was always made as to each voyage or employment of the defendant's flats," which means, as we understand the evidence, that the flats did not go about plying for hire, but were waiting for hire by any one. We think that this describes the ordinary employment of a lighterman, and that, both on authority and principle, a person who exercises this business or employment does, in the absence of something to limit his liability, incur the liability of a "common carrier" in respect of the goods he carries.

It was argued before us that the defendant could not have this liability unless he held himself out as plying between two particular places, or had put up his flat, like a general ship, to go to some particular place, and to take all goods brought to him for that voyage. It was urged that in Morse v. Slue (1 Ventris, 190, 238), the goods were probably put on board a ship put up as a general ship. It certainly may have been so; but the count is set out in 1 Ventris, p. 190, and is general, that by the law and custom of England masters and governors of ships which go from London beyond sea, are bound to keep safely, &c., the same goods, &c., and the ultimate decision was that this count was proved. Hale, C.J., had, a difficulty (see the report in 1 Mod. 85) from the fact that the ship was bound to foreign parts, and that the shipowner would not, by the civil law or the maritime law, be chargeable for piracy or damnum fatale (a difficulty, it may be remarked, which does not apply to the present case, where the whole transaction is in England), but nothing is, in any report, said as to the ship being a "general ship," and on that count no judgment could have been given on that ground. And the ultimate decision and the special verdict has always been understood to apply equally to all ships employed in commerce and sailing from England, as is shown by the forms of charter party and bill of lading in ordinary use in England, which always contain an engagement to deliver the goods in the same condition in which they were received aboard, and, when Lord Tenterden first wrote, contained only an exception of the dangers of the seas.

Now the exceptions in each class of instrument are made more extensive; and certainly it is difficult to see why the liability of a shipowner who engages to carry the whole lading of his ship for one person should be less than the liability of one who carries the lading in different parcels for different people. And to come nearer to the present case, we find that "lightermen" are specially named in Bacon's Abridgment, Carrier A., and in the notes to Coggs v. Bernard 1 Sm. L. C. (ubi sup.) And in Lyon and another v. Mellis (5 East 428) the course of business of the defendant in that case is thus described: "The defendant kept sloops for carrying other persons' goods for hire, and also lighters for the purpose of carrying those goods to and from his sloops; and when he had not employment for his lighters for his own business, he let them for hire to such persons as wanted to carry goods to other sloops." If there be any difference between the employment of the now defendant, as described in this case, and the employment of the defendant in Lyon and another v. Mellis, it would seem that the latter was less clearly a public employment. The great point discussed was whether a notice limiting the liability of the defendant was, as Lord Ellenborough, C. J., states it, "illegal" as "being to exempt him from a responsibility cast upon him by law, as a carrier of goods by water for hire;" a proposition which could not well have been discussed by anyone who did not think that the defendant had, but for the notice, incurred that responsibility. The point actually decided was that the terms of the notice did not relieve the defendant from liability for furnishing an unseaworthy lighter. As to this Lord Ellenborough says: "Every agreement must be construed with reference to the subject matter; and looking at the parties to this agreement (for so I denominate the notice), and the situation in which they stood in point of law to each other, it is clear, beyond a doubt, that the only object of the owners of lighters was to limit their responsibility in those cases only where the law would otherwise have made them answer for the neglect of others, and for accidents which it might not be within the scope of ordinary care and caution to provide against."

We think that Mr. James, in arguing for the plaintiffs in this case, was right when he relied on the case of Lyon and another v. Mellis as an important authority in favour of his clients. It is true that the point was not precisely decided in that case; and, if it had been, it would not have been binding upon us in a court of error. But the opinion of Lord Ellenborough, and (as far as we can judge from the report) of everyone concerned in that case, was, that it was too clear for argument that, but for the notice, the lighterman, acting as the defendant did in that case, would have been liable to the same extent as a "common carrier." Lord Abinger, C. B., in Brind v. Dale (2 M. & Rob. 80; 8 Car. & P. 207), expressed a strong opinion that a town carman would not be considered a "common carrier;" but he reserved the point, and, as the jury found in favour of the defendant on the question whether the goods were received by him as a common carrier, it never was reviewed in banco. The ruling of Alderson, B., in Ingate v. Christie (3 Car. & Kir. 61), is in express conformity with what appears to have been Lord Ellenborough's view in Lyon and another v. Mellis; and no English authority has been cited in conflict with this doctrine.

We think, therefore, that the judgment of the court below was right, and that it should be affirmed.

MELLOR, GROVE, and ARCHIBALD, JJ., concurred.

BRETT, J.—I cannot come to the conclusion that the defendant in this case was liable whether he was a common carrier or not, because I conclude that he was liable, notwithstanding that I am clearly of opinion that he was not a "common carrier."

It seems to me that it is of the very essence of the definition of a "common carrier" that he should be one who undertakes to carry the goods (not being dangerous or of unreasonable weight or bulk) which are first offered to him. He who does not so undertake is not a "common carrier." The force of the word "common" is, not that the carrier's business is a public one, or in common with others but, that he undertakes to carry for all indifferently, in the sense of for the first comer—that is, "for all in common." It is clear to my mind that a shipowner, who publicly professes to own ships and to charter them to anyone who will agree with him on terms of charter, is not a "common carrier," because he does not undertake to carry goods for or to charter his ship to the first comer. He wants, therefore, the essential characteristic of a "common carrier," and he is therefore not a "common carrier;" and therefore does not incur at any time any responsibility on the ground of his being a "common carrier." The defendant in the present case, in my opinion, carried on business like any other owner of ships or vessels, and was not a "common carrier," and was in no way liable as such.

But I think that, by a recognised custom of England—a custom adopted and recognised by the courts in precisely the same manner as the custom of England with regard to "common carriers" has been adopted and recognised by them—every shipowner who carries goods for hire in his ship, whether by inland navigation or coastways or abroad, undertakes to carry them at his own absolute risk, the act of God or of the Queen's enemies alone excepted, and unless by agreement between himself and a particular freighter, on a particular voyage or on particular voyages, he limits his liability by further exceptions. I think that this liability attaches to shipowners carrying goods, by reason of a recognised custom which may be pleaded as the custom of England, just as the custom of England as to common carriers may be pleaded. But it is a custom wholly independent of the similar custom with regard to "common carriers." The similarity of the two customs has occasioned phraseology to be used in some cases which has raised an inaccurate idea that shipowners are "common carriers," but I am of opinion that they are not. They are not bound to carry for the first comer.

I therefore hold that the defendant is liable as a shipowner upon the custom applicable to him as such, but is not liable as a "common carrier" upon the custom applicable to that business or employment.

THE PROVINCIAL INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA
v. LEDUC.

Marine insurance—Policy—Warranty—Construction of—Abandonment—Acceptance—Silence of underwriters—Dealing with ship—Constructive total loss—Partial loss—Estoppel—Insurable interest—Evidence—Canadian Civil Code.

Where a warranty or condition in a policy of marine insurance is expressed in clear terms, evidence will not be admitted to show that it is to be construed contrary to the apparent meaning of those terms, although the desired construction may be that which has ordinarily been put upon it by persons making use of that form of policy.

Where a ship is insured on a time policy at and from Montreal, to trade between the Island of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Cuba, &c., and Quebec and Montreal, and the policy contains a stipulation in the following words: "Not allowed under this policy to enter the Gulf of St. Lawrence before the 25th April, nor to be in the said Gulf after the 15th Nov.; nor to proceed to Newfoundland after the 1st Dec., or before the 15th March, without payment of additional premium, and leave first obtained, war, risk, and sealing voyages excepted;" the policy is not to be construed as declaring that the vessel may proceed from any of the ports named in the policy to Newfoundland on or before the 1st Dec., notwithstanding it might have to pass through the Gulf after 15th Nov.; but under that clause the vessel is neither to be in the Gulf after the 15th Nov., nor to proceed to Newfoundland from any port after the 1st Dec.; and if the ship enters the Gulf after the 15th Nov., she commits a breach of warranty within the words of the policy, and the underwriters are not liable for any loss occurring in consequence of that breach, unless they accept abandonment with a knowledge of the breach.

When notice of abandonment of a ship is given to underwriters, mere silence on their part will not operate as an acceptance of abandonment; but if the underwriters, on a loss occurring, and after notice of abandonment duly given, take possession of a ship by their agent, take her to a place of safety, repair her, and detain her in their custody for an unreasonable time without giving notice to the assured that they are acting on his behalf, and that they do not accept the abandonment, their acts will amount to a constructive acceptance of abandonment; nor will the fact that the insurers think fit to libel the ship in the Admiralty Court for salvage reward affect their liability, if the assured has not interfered in the salvage suit nor taken any steps to assert his continued ownership.

Acceptance of abandonment by underwriters is irrevocable, and makes a partial loss tantamount to a total loss, and the insurers are precluded from relying upon a subsequent recovery of the property because they are estopped from saying that the loss is not total; and, although by the Canadian Civil Code, art. 2545, abandonment cannot be made of a stranded ship if she can be raised so as to be sent forward to her destination, this article does not apply to cases where abandonment of a stranded ship has been accepted by underwriters, but must be read in conjunction with other articles (2547, 2549), by which abandonment and acceptance vest the property in the insurer, and cannot be defeated by subsequent events, as in English law.

A warranty in a time policy upon a ship for certain voyages, that the ship shall not proceed to or be at certain places after given dates, has not the effect of leaving the ship totally uninsured by the policy if, in breach of the warranty, she proceeds to, or is at those places after those dates, so as to preclude recovery in all cases; and if the underwriters, after a loss occurs whilst the ship is upon a voyage in breach of the warranty, duly accept abandonment, they will be estopped from setting up that there was no loss within the policy or the breach of warranty.

Where a ship is purchased in the name of two persons, A. and B., but the purchase money is by arrangement between them paid by A. only; and B., in order to give some security to A. for the payment of his share, authorises A. to insure the ship in his (A.'s) name alone, and in case of the loss of the ship, to receive the whole insurance money, and to pay himself the amount due to him from B.; A. has an insurable interest in the whole ship, and may, in an action on a valued policy, recover in his own name the full amount insured. A statement by B. to a third person of this arrangement with A., being a declaration against his (B.'s) interest, is evidence against the insurers to show A.'s insurable interest.

A shipowner whose ship is mortgaged may, if he remains in possession, insure his ship to the full amount of her value.

THIS was an appeal from two concurrent judgments of the Court of Queen's Bench for the Province of Quebec, Canada, bearing date the 22nd March, 1872, one of which modified on appeal a judgment of the Superior Court for the Province of Quebec, Canada, bearing date the 31st March 1870, in favour of the respondent by increasing the sum for which judgment was given for the respondent, and condemned the appellants to pay the plaintiff the full amount claimed by him, and costs, and the other of which dismissed with costs the appeal of the insurance company.

This was an action brought by the respondent, Joel Leduc, against the appellants upon a valued time policy of insurance for 5000 dols. on a ship called the Babineau and Gaudry.

The facts, which, except as hereinafter stated, were not disputed, were as follows:

On the 3rd Jan. 1867, Joel Leduc, the present respondent, insured with the appellants (who are an insurance company carrying on business at Toronto and having agents at Montreal and other places in Canada) a ship named the Babineau and Gaudry for 5000 dols. The policy was, as far as is material for the present appeal, in the following terms

J. Leduc, of Montreal, Province of Quebec, as well in his own name as for and in the name and names of all and every other person and persons to whom the same doth may or shall appertain in part or in all, doth make insurance and cause to be insured, lost or not lost, the sum of 5000 dols. upon the body, tackle, apparel, and other furniture of the good schooner Babineau and Gaudry, whereof is master for the present voyage Benjamin Vigneau, or whoever else shall go for master in the said vessel, or by whatever other name or names the said vessel or the master thereof is or shall be called.

Beginning the adventures upon the said vessel, tackle, apparel, &c., at and from Montreal to trade between the island of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, West India Islands, Cuba, safe ports in the United States and Quebec and Montreal, to and from ports in the Lower Provinces, risk commencing at noon of 15th Dec. 1866, and ending at noon of 15th Dec. 1867.

And it shall and may be lawful for the said vessel in her voyage to proceed and sail to, touch, and stay at any port or places if thereunto obliged by stress of weather or other unavoidable accident, without prejudice to this insurance. The said vessel, tackle, &c., hereby insured are valued at 7000 dols.

And it is agreed that in case a total loss shall be claimed for or on account of any damage or charge to the said vessel, the only basis of ascertaining the value shall be her valuation in this policy, and if not valued herein, then her actual value at the time of the inception of this risk at the port to which she then belonged.

Not allowed under this policy to enter the Gulf of St. Lawrence before the 25th April, nor to be in the said Gulf after the 15th Nov. Nor to proceed to Newfoundland after the 1st Dec. or before the 15th March, without payment of additional premium, and leave first obtained, war risk and sealing voyages excepted.

The evidence as to the interest possessed by the respondent in the Babineau and Gaudry was as follows:—

By a notarial contract, dated the 7th March 1866, the vessel was sold to the respondent and one Benjamin Vigneau for 1400l. which the respondent and the said Vigneau bound themselves jointly and severally to pay, by the instalments mentioned in the contract, so as to cover both the price of the vessel and certain moneys due upon mortgage upon the vessel, and the vessel was then registered in their joint names; there was evidence that Vigneau, who was captain of the vessel, being unable to provide the instalments, the respondent in fact paid the whole of the instalments as they became due, but there was no evidence that Vigneau had ever given up to the respondent his interest in the vessel, or in any way rendered his interest in it a security for the sum so advanced to him by the respondent, and the vessel continued registered in their joint names till the date of the loss hereinafter mentioned. The mortgage debts and the full price of the vessel were not fully paid until 15th Nov. 1869.

There was no evidence that the respondent intended to insure the vessel for the benefit of anyone but himself, nor was there any evidence that Vigneau had authorised him to insure his share of the vessel, except a statement by the witness Jean Vigneau, that his brother, Benjamin Vigneau, had told him that he was indebted to the respondent, and that, to give him security for what he owed him, he had authorised the respondent to insure the vessel Babineau and Gaudry in his own name; that if the vessel perished, the respondent might receive the amount insured, and so pay himself his debt.

At the time the insurance was made the vessel was at the port of St. John, Newfoundland, preparing for a voyage to the West Indies, which she subsequently completed. On the 16th Nov. 1867, the day after the date fixed by the policy as the last day on which the vessel was to be in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, the Babineau and Gaudry sailed from Montreal on a voyage to the port of St. John, Newfoundland; and on or about the 1st Dec., while still in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, she was overtaken by a violent storm and totally lost upon the island of Anticosti.

The whole of the crew were drowned, and news of the wreck did not reach the respondent till the 18th May 1868. On the 19th May the respondent served upon the appellants' agent at Montreal, Mr. McCuaig, a notarial protest which contained a claim for payment of the full sum insured, 5,000 dols., and a formal abandonment to the insurance company of the wreck. The protest stated all the facts then known to the respondent respecting the voyage and wreck of the vessel, and, inter alia, that the ship had left Montreal for St. John's on the preceding 16th Nov. Mr. McCuaig's answer to this claim was that he would forward it to the head office; and he did so forward it, although the manager of the company said that he did not see the protest till 18th June, when a copy was sent from another source. The company returned no answer to the notice of abandonment and ultimately refused to pay the claim.

About the end of May Mr. Croker, the manager and secretary of the appellants, having seen a notice in the newspapers that the wreck had been discovered upon the island of Anticosti, instructed Mr. McGregor, the company's marine inspector, to proceed there to look after the interests of the company. The appellants' manager denied having seen the protest at this time, or that they knew that the schooner had been in the Gulf of St. Lawrence after the 15th Nov., but could not explain how the protest had not come to hand.

Mr. McGregor proceeded to Anticosti, and found the vessel lying bottom upwards on the shore. After taking measures for the sale of the remains of the cargo, he proceeded to raise the vessel, and succeeded, at an expense of 3000 dols., in bringing it to Montreal.

The appellants subsequently proceeded against the ship in the Court of Vice-Admiralty at Quebec for the salvage expenses which exceeded the value of the vessel, and she was sold, after the commencement of this action, by order of the said Court of Vice-Admiralty for the benefit of the salvors and fetched only 350 dols., which was paid to the appellants. There is no evidence when the proceedings in the Court of Vice-Admiralty were commenced, but Mr. McGregor stated that he took steps for obtaining repayment of the salvage expenses before the vessel reached Montreal. There was no evidence of the acceptance of the respondent's notice of abandonment by the appellants other than the facts above stated; and it was proved by Mr. Croker that Mr. McGregor had no authority to accept a notice of abandonment, and that the head office had no opportunity of communicating with him after his visit to Anticosti till his return.

The present action was commenced on the 14th Nov. 1868, and the declaration filed the same day set out the policy of insurance, and stated that the vessel left Montreal on the 16th Nov. 1867, bound to St. John's, and that she was lost on the island of Anticosti between the 1st and 5th Dec. next following, and that the respondent gave notice of abandonment of the vessel, which the appellant accepted; the declaration concluded for payment of 5000 dols. and interest.

The declaration as originally filed, contained also an averment that respondent was the sole owner of the ship; but it was subsequently amended by leave of the court, and a statement inserted of the purchase of the ship by the respondent and Vigneau, and the payment of the price by the respondent only, and an allegation that Vigneau authorised the respondent to insure the whole ship in his own name and at the same time gave up to him all claim on the ship.

The respondent, on the 3rd Dec. 1868, demurred to the declaration on the grounds that the policy contained a warranty that the ship should not be in the Gulf of St. Lawrence after the 15th Nov. and should not proceed to Newfoundland after the 1st Dec., while the declaration also showed that the vessel was lost while in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, after the 15th Nov., and while proceeding to Newfoundland after 1st Dec.

They also filed two special pleas, embodying the same defences and the general issue, and, after the declaration had been amended, they filed a supplemental plea, alleging that by law no person could be interested in a vessel such as the Babineau and Gaudry, unless registered as owner, and that according to the register, and in fact the respondent was only part owner of the ship, and had no other insurable interest in it.

The respondent, on 4th Dec. 1868, joined issue on the defendant's demurrer and plea, and filed special rejoinders which, in effect alleged: first, that the true interpretation of the warranty in the policy was that the ship should not be in the Gulf of St. Lawrence when entering the river after the 15th Nov., but might leave Montreal for Newfoundland any time up to 1st Dec.; secondly, that the appellants, having accepted the notice of abandonment after notice that the ship left Montreal on the 16th Nov., were thereby estopped from setting up any breach of the warranty.

The evidence given at the hearing has in substance been already stated.

The plaintiff tendered evidence to prove that it was the custom or usage of trade and navigation, of vessels going east to leave the port of Montreal at any time during the month of November, though not after the 1st Dec.; and that in going west it was not usual for vessels to enter the Gulf of St. Lawrence later than the 15th Nov. because the ice then began to come down the stream, and rendered it dangerous to ascend the river. Evidence was also tendered to show that the commercial import of the concluding clause of the policy was that in going east the vessel was not to proceed to Newfoundland after the 1st Dec. or before the 15th March; nor in going west, to enter the Gulf of St. Lawrence before the 25th April, or to be in the said Gulf after the 15th Nov., without payment of additional premium, and leave first obtained. This evidence was objected to by the defendants, and admitted subject to the opinion of the full court.

On the 31st March 1870 Mackay, J., delivered the judgment of the Superior Court in favour of the respondent, on the ground that the appellants were estopped—by their acceptance of the abandonment, and their appropriation of the vessel—from urging objections founded on the alleged breaches of condition. The judgment overruled the demurrer, and compelled the appellant to pay to the plaintiff the sum of 3500 dols. (half the amount at which the vessel was valued) with interest thereon from the 16th Nov. 1868 (the date of the service of the writ), and costs.

The respondent, and also the appellants, appealed from the said judgment to the Court of Queen's Bench for the province of Quebec.

The Court of Queen's Bench, on the 22nd March 1872, gave judgment in the appeals, and thereby annulled the said judgment of the Superior Court of the 31st March 1870, and condemned the appellants to pay to the respondent the sum of 5000 dols., with interest thereon from the said 16th Nov. 1868, and costs, on the ground that the allegations in the declaration were fully established by the evidence; and that by reason thereof, and of the abandonment made by the plaintiff, and the total loss of the vessel, and of the acceptance of such abandonment by the defendants, the plaintiff was entitled to claim the full amount for which the vessel was insured. Duval, C.J., Caron and Drummond, JJ., concurred in this judgment, Badgley, J., dissented therefrom altogether, and Monk, J., dissented as to the amount recoverable, holding that the plaintiff could only recover half the amount insured, 2500l.

The judgments of the judges of the Queen's Bench at Quebec were destroyed by fire (which burnt down the court house) except that of Badgley, J., which was, after setting out the facts given above, as follows:—

Badgley, J.—Before proceeding to notice the grounds of contention offered by the parties, some points of difficulty resting upon the alleged facts of the case will be removed and put aside. As matter of fact and as admitted by Leduc's amendment, his title of ownership of the vessel was for but one-half, and his claim to the sole interest in the insurance money rests upon his alleged advances for Vigneau of the latter's share of their joint purchase money stated in the deed of sale to them jointly of the vessel. The proof of the fact was upon Leduc, and it is elementary to say that the evidence adduced by him is insufficient both in law and fact, that the objection taken by the insurers against its admission was well founded, in the face of the deed of their joint purchase and of their registered rights under the vessel's registry, and that his interest in the insurance money does not exceed one-half share thereof. As matter of fact, it is admitted by the declaration that the vessel was in the Gulf of St. Lawrence after the 1st Dec. 1867, the time prohibited; therefore by that breach of one of the express warranties above referred to, the breach of the warranty in that respect from that moment avoided the contract of insurance ab initio; and as the contract cannot co-exist with its breach, therefore under the circumstances, there was no existing binding contract upon the insurers when the alleged abandonment was made. As matter of fact Leduc's averment in his declaration, that the insurers dispatched a duly authorised agent to recover and raise the vessel on their own account is without proof; and, on the contrary, the witness Crocker says, that McGregor was sent as was customary in such cases to look after the interests the company might have in the cargo or the vessel; that it was always the custom with the insurers to send a marine inspector, that is himself, to a wreck where a loss occurred, in order to save anything in case the company might have an interest in doing so, if not for the benefit of the parties concerned, the object in doing so being to keep the expenses as low as possible. This custom of the insurers is corroborated by the evidence of their witness Davidson, as being general amongst insurance companies. Finally the decree of the Vice-Admiralty Court in their favour proving them to be mere salvors of the vessel. As matter of fact, no express acceptance of the abandonment by the insurers has been proved by Leduc. Mr. Crocker says that McGregor had left for Gaspé before the company at Toronto had received the copy served in Montreal, and that he was never instructed to accept an abandonment. That could only be accepted at the head office, in Toronto, and that only in writing; that the company had never accepted them otherwise, and that they were not aware of the position of the vessel or any circumstance of the wreck at the time McGregor went down there. It is also proved that McCuaig was their special agent at Montreal, only to receive applications for insurances and premiums and to transmit them to the head office for determination there, issuing interim receipts, but not authorized to issue policies. In fact that the alleged acceptance was only implied from the circumstances of the insurers having saved the vessel, and taking her in charge, to prevent her destruction. No question has been raised in the cause, that the repairs to the vessel were not necessary nor done in reasonable time, nor that their cost as decreed by the Vice-Admiralty Court was unreasonable. The remaining contentious questions raised by the parties are as to the legal nature of the loss suffered by the vessel, Leduc's right to abandon her for total loss, and the effect of the insurers' salvage of the vessel assumed to be a legal acceptance of Leduc's alleged abandonment. In the elucidation of these points recourse must be had to our provincial law as enacted in our Civil Code. By the Art. 2521 of the Code, losses for which insurers are liable are either total or partial. By the Art. 2522 the former are where the thing insured is wholly destroyed or lost; the latter when by reason of any event insured against, the thing though not wholly lost or destroyed, becomes of little or no value to the insured, &c., &c., or as more forcibly expressed by the French version, when it is sans valeur ou d'une valeur minime à l'assuré &c., &c. Now the only loss alleged in the declaration is that "le dit navire aurait péri corps et biens dans le Golfe Saint Laurent, faisant un naufrage entier et complet," which is the absolute total loss of the Code article, where the thing insured is wholly destroyed and lost, in other words submerged in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. As matter of fact the alleged total loss is not true, and has been disproved, but it is the only one alleged, and the insurers cannot be made to suffer from any other description of loss or cause of action than that charged; and in strict justice the appellant's action should be dismissed, unless under the rule of practice he should elect to amend his declaration to meet the proof of the case, as it admits of no effective abandonment with its alleged acceptance as set out in the declaration. But assuming the appellant's position of a constructive total loss in this cause, id which he may claim as for a total loss upon abandonment made, "The notice must be explicit and must contain a statement of the grounds of abandonment, and these grounds must exist, and be sufficient at the time of the notice": (Art. 2544). But by the next following Art. 2545, abandonment on the ground of the vessel being disabled by stranding cannot be made, if she can be raised and put in a condition to continue her voyage. And in such case the recourse of the insured against the insurer is for the expense and loss occasioned by the stranding. Now in this case, the grounds for the abandonment given in the notice are that the vessel had become a constructive total wreck, whereas the vessel was stranded only; she was got off, repaired and restored to condition to continue her voyage, had it been required, and was navigated from Anticosti to Gaspé, and from Gaspé to her home-port Montreal. The restored vessel plainly falls within the operative effect of the exception of the Art. 2545 and was not subject to or effected by abandonment. The grounds stated in the notice showed that the vessel was not totally lost, that even her constructive total loss did not exist, and that the facts stated were not sufficient at the time of the notice to constitute a total loss, and were worthless and ineffective to support Leduc's claim for a total loss of the restored vessel; which, by his declaration, he admits, had been restored to condition, and had reached Montreal before the institution of this action. Now by Leduc's factum before this court, the abandonment is assumed to be absolute and effective, and the action is in effect mainly upon the alleged acceptance by the insurers, not upon their expressed acceptance, but upon alleged facts of the insurers in connection with the vessel, which at best could constitute an implied acceptance only. The acts alleged are, that the insurers sent a special agent to the place of the wreck, that they took possession of the vessel, raised and repaired her, and afterwards sold her for their own profit and advantage. It is scarcely necessary to repeat that the vessel was derelict and abandoned by her owner, that the insurers took charge of her to prevent her utter destruction and repaired her as salvors, for which they obtained the Vice-Admiralty Court decree, which has not been contradicted nor denied by Leduc; and that finally the vessel was sold under admiralty process issued against the vessel for the payment of the salvage expenses incurred by the salvors, the insurers. It is manifest that the alleged acceptance is merely an implied acceptance, depending upon the effectiveness of the abandonment upon sufficient grounds existing at the time of the notice by Leduc, and accepted as such at the time by the insurers. Now, apart from the palpable fact of the restoration and recovery of the stranded vessel which prevented abandonment at all, it may be observed upon this point of "acceptance," that according to 2 Arnould, p. 992, "If the underwriter on receipt of the notice, either in reply by his word or writing, or implied by his acts, shows his willingness to adopt the abandonment in the terms proposed by the insured, he is technically said to accept the notice of abandonment, which he cannot afterwards dispute, unless the notice be false and therefore a 'mere nullity';" aliter he is bound to pay the sum insured without reference to the subsequent restoration of the property. Arnould adds, at the same time, that the universal principle is, that unless he has precluded himself from objecting against the validity of the abandonment, no abandonment can have any effective operation unless the state of things was such as to justify it at the time it was made. Hence, the term valid abandonment means one warranted by the state of things when the notice was given. And by the principles of English jurisprudence, it is established that the facts were such as to justify the assured in giving the notice when he did so, yet he cannot insist on it as for a total loss, if before he commences his action the thing insured be restored to him, or in the words of Lord Ellenborough, "the nature of the damnification at the time when the action is brought is the criterion of the rights to recover as for a total loss; and if at the time what had antecedently been a total loss, has by subsequent events ceased to be so, and become an average loss only, a compensation for that alone can be recovered": (4 M. & S. 584.) And as observed by Le Blanc, J. (10 East, 846): "It does not follow that a man has a right to abandon, because he has a right to give notice of abandonment on the faith of the intelligence received." And Arnould maintains this rule to be in the true principles of indemnity in marine insurance. The operative effect of the exception of the Art. 2545, brings the restored vessel within the principle of the rule stated by Lord Ellenborough, as to a demand for total loss of a restored vessel at the time of the demand. The plain rule of law being that when a vessel is in existence, the insurer is only held to make good loss sustained as measured by restoring it to its original condition: (8 B. & C. 561; 2 M. & G. 593; 6 ib. 792; 3 Bing. N. C. 266; 1 Com. Bench Rep. 168; 3 ib. 781; 6 ib. 391; 4 ib. 343.) The English rule has been also settled of late years, and adopted in the great commercial states of New York and Massachusetts, and by the courts there held, that the success of the insurer in getting the ship afloat and repairing her, defeated an abandonment which had been made while she was on the rocks and in such condition as to render it probable that she was irretrievably wrecked: (Wood v. Lincoln Insurance Company, 4 Mass. Rep. 479; so in Peele v. Suffolk Insurance Company, 7 Pick. 254.) The Supreme Court of Massachusetts overruled the opinion of Story, J., in a previous case in the distinction taken by him between the actual and the presumptive state of the vessel, and decided that the successful efforts of the insurers to save her would invalidate an abandonment without regard to the probability of success at the time when the abandonment was made. So in De Blois v. Ocean Insurance Company (16 Pick. 303, 310) and in Chase v. Commonwealth Insurance Company, it held "that the successful result of efforts made by underwriters to get a stranded vessel afloat invalidated an abandonment whilst she was still on the beach; the validity of the abandonment was not to be determined by the supposed damages, and the insurers were under no legal obligation to allow the vessel to lie on the beach and be there destroyed, but might lawfully by their own act relieve and repair the same vessel, and demonstrate that such a claim was unfounded." This principle was also adopted by the New York Courts, and harmonizes with the construction given to the general principles of insurance laws which are universally "to have the indemnity and not the profit of the insured for its object; and that the actual and not the supposed loss should be the measure of the rights of the parties": (See Emerigon, ch. 17, sects. 1 and 6.) The Massachusetts rule approximates in effect to that of the English law, of the state of the loss at action brought; and is in accordance too with 2545 Article of our Code, that there can be no abandonment for constructive total loss where the vessel is recovered. Moreover, it will be observed that these rulings were upon recoveries of the stranded vessels by their insurers, no law preventing their taking such protective measures and in so acting in the interest of all concerned; on the contrary, it is a known principle of insurance law, and proved to be one customary and usual by the evidence adduced in this case, that insurers not only may, but customarily do so. The Code has no restriction or provision contrary to insurers, or excluding them from so acting, but is content to provide for the legal effect and result of the recovered vessel upon the rights of the parties. The power and ability of insurers to act for the present benefit of those interested are distinctly recognised by Weskett on Insurance, tit. Abandonment, No. 7, who cites from Valin 183: "The insurers may take such measures for recovery as to them may seem good." This course is very frequently adopted by insurers in fire policies, and no conceivable good ground can exist against it in marine insurance, especially, as here, where the vessel was derelict, abandoned in fact and in law by the insured himself, although contrary to the requirements of Art. 2537, which held him bound to do in good faith all in his power, between the time of the loss and abandonment, to save the effects insured, yet instead of which, or instead of acting at all, he forthwith abandoned as appears upon insufficient grounds, although the Art. 2541 allowed him reasonable delay to inquire into and investigate the sufficiency of the facts and information communicated to him, and left the saving of the derelict vessel to the efforts of the insurers. That the acts of the insurers were of common usage and custom are proved in evidence, and supported by Valin, lib. 3, art. 46, and by Emerigon, sects. 12, 13, ch. 17, who protect the insurers in such cases of stranding as this. Implications of acceptance of abandonment for constructive total loss are not favoured and can have no effect or validity in contravention of the positive fact upheld by the Art. 2545, of the actual recovery of the stranded vessel. Besides 2 Phillips, No. 1692, says, "There is no established mode of accepting any more than of making an abandonment, whether the insurer accepts or not is a matter of construction of his words and conduct, any act done for the purpose of making the most of the property to whomsoever it may prove to belong ought not to be construed against the party who thus consults the common interest." And he cites cases, amongst others, an agent of the insurers on freight taking charge and superintending and saving cargo &c : (1 Johns, 205, and others; see also case 1 Esp. Rep. 73.) The circumstances of the case are of course to be considered, but the mere fact of taking possession of the ship, and keeping her in possession to repair, in themselves therefore are no implied acceptance under any circumstance, unless it be for a greatly unreasonable time, in which the circumstances of the case necessarily enter for consideration, but that unreasonableness must be affirmatively established by evidence by the insured, who would take advantage of it. By 7 Pick, 254, "The reasonableness of the time must depend upon the circumstances of the case, and in order to form a right opinion of such a case the vessel must be considered alone and separately." Now what were the circumstances in this case? She was stranded, say 2nd Dec. 1867, derelicted, visited first by McGregor, 15th June, who returned to Gaspé for materials and men to raise her, his return probably early in July, getting her in order to cross to Gaspé, putting her in condition there, and navigating her to Montreal early in September. These circumstances do not show unreasonableness of time for repairs, the previous interval, from time of stranding to taking possession, not counting from the known unapproachableness of the locality where the stranding took place, and Phillips, No. 1526, holds "in case of shipwreck or stranding without such injury to the ship as to prevent it from being got afloat and repaired within reasonable time and at reasonable expense, the assured has no right to make abandonment of the ship." The case of Turneaux v. Bradley (Park on Ins, 8th edit. p. 365, cited 2 Arnould, p. 1085) has reference to this, "A ship insured for six months from July 1777, from Cork to Quebec, was on arrival at Quebec removed into the basin for the winter, but before expiry of six months was driven thence by force of drift ice, and run upon the rocks. This was in November, and the condition of the ship could not be ascertained till the next spring, when on survey she was found to be bulged and much injured, but not irreparably so. In consequence of the alleged difficulty of obtaining repairing materials, the master sold her where she lay," and in action by assured against the insurer, the court unanimously held against the claim, and refused recovery as for total loss, not by reason of the enforced delay from November to the spring, which was allowed ex necessitate, but on the other alleged ground of want of material, which was not established. Again, in all cases of implied acceptance, apart of course from the recovery of the vessel, as by 2245 Article C. C., the first question is to ascertain with what intent the insurer's acts were undertaken because the implication is made to rest upon the efforts of the insurers, for common interest, to save and repair a stranded vessel from total destruction on the beach, where she would otherwise lie, possibly in the special interest of the would-be abandoning insured. In this case no intent had been shown to accept abandonment, on the contrary a diversus intuitus to the abandonment and acceptance is proved by both Crocker and McGregor; the former swears that the notice was not received at Toronto by the company previous to their having despatched their salvage agent McGregor to examine into the state of the matter; he had left and was in Montreal on the 24th May, and this was done by the company upon previous information from Scott, their agent at Quebec. Mr. Crocker proves the actual receipt of the notice on the 15th June, McGregor being told by the insured on 24th May of the notice having been left at McCuaig's office, and McGregor being told of it were in themselves, as to both McGregor and McCuaig, of no moment, as neither of these persons was an agent for the company to act upon an abandonment, neither having power from the company to accept or refuse abandonment for them. It is plain that the act of the company as to Mr. McGregor's proceedings throughout, were altogether diverso intuitu from the abandonment or its acceptance; and hence being unconnected with this form, and for the purpose of salvage only for the common interest, a perfectly legal act in itself, their act through him was not an implied acceptance of the abandonment. The legal effect of the abandonment moreover, if possibly valid to notify it, consists in the right to abandon according to the terms of the notice. Leduc, claiming to be sole owner, professes to abandon, and transfer the whole vessel, and all his rights as such sole owner. But he was only half owner, and had no right to transfer more than his own proprietary right and title in the subject vessel. The transfer by abandonment is an entirely different thing and right, from rights belonging to the assured under insurable interest. Arnold says, "The power to abandon is only a criterion of insurable interest in those cases where the subject is capable of abandonment." Here, by the 2545 Article, the recovered vessel was not capable of it; Leduc could only transfer his own half, because abandonment is a transfer and substitution of the insurers in the proprietary rights of the abandoner in the thing insured, whatever may be the extent of his insurable interest in it. The vessel having been recovered, there could have been no effective abandonment when the action was instituted, and therefore no acceptance of abandonment by the defendants either formally or impliedly; the loss therefore could only have been partial, and the action being as for a total loss, which could have no existence, should have been dismissed. Under the circumstances of the case, I think the judgment appealed from is incorrect, and I would maintain the appeal of the appellants, and dismiss that of Leduc.

The Court of Queen's Bench dismissed the appeal of the insurance company, and pronounced the plaintiff entitled to recover the whole sum insured, 5000*l.*, and from this judgment the insurance company appealed to the Judicial Committee for the following among other reasons: First, because the respondent broke the express warranties in the policy that the ship should not be in the Gulf of St. Lawrence after the 15th Nov., or proceed to Newfoundland after the 1st Dec., and has therefore no legal claim against the appellants. Secondly, because a breach of an express warranty is not waived by an acceptance by an insurer of the notice of abandonment given to him by the insured. Thirdly, because there was an actual total loss of the ship, and the respondent's notice of abandonment was therefore invalid and had no effect. Fourthly, because the appellants never accepted the abandonment of the ship by the respondent, and were not estopped by their conduct from setting up the breaches by the respondent of the express warranties in the policy. Fifthly, because the respondent was only owner of a moiety of the ship and could not therefore recover more than half the amount insured, or give a valid notice of abandonment at all events except in respect of his interest in the ship. Sixthly, because the respondent only intended to insure his own interest in the ship and had only an insurable interest in one-half of it. Seventhly, because the declaration was bad in law for the reasons stated in the appellants' demurrer, and the respondent has failed to prove any liability on the part of the appellants to pay to him the whole or any part of the sum insured. Eighthly, because the judgment was erroneous both upon the facts and the law of the case.

The Articles of the Canadian Civil Code, cited in argument and in the judgment, are as follows:—

2490. Warranties and conditions are a part of the contract, and must be true if affirmative, and if promissory must be complied with, otherwise the contract may be annulled, notwithstanding the good faith of the insured, They are either express or implied.

2491. An express warranty is a stipulation or condition expressed in the policy, or so referred to in it as to make part of the policy. Implied warranties will be designated in the following chapters relating to different kinds of insurance.

2497. Marine policies in cases of doubtful meaning are construed by the established and known usage of the trade to which the policy relates; such usage is held to be a part of the policy when it is not otherwise expressly provided.

2521. Loss for which the insurer is liable is either total or partial.

2522. Total loss may be either absolute or constructive. It is absolute when the thing insured is wholly destroyed or lost. It is constructive when by reason of any event insured against the thing, though not wholly destroyed or lost, becomes of little or no value to the insured, or the voyage and adventure are lost or rendered not worth pursuing. Before the insured can claim for a constructive total loss he must make an abandonment as declared in the following section.

2538. The insured may make an abandonment to the insurer of the thing insured in all cases of its constructive total loss, and may, thereupon, recover as for a total loss. Without abandonment he is entitled in such cases to recover as for a partial loss only.

2543. The abandonment is made by a notice given by the insured to the insurer of the loss, and that he abandons to the latter all his interest in the thing insured.

2544. The notice of abandonment must be explicit, and must contain a statement of the grounds of abandonment. These grounds must exist, and be sufficient at the time of the notice.

2545. Abandonment on the ground of the ship being disabled by stranding cannot be made if she can be raised and put in a condition to continue her voyage to the place of destination. In such case the insured has his recourse against the insurer for the expense and loss occasioned by the stranding.

2547. Abandonment made and accepted is equivalent to transfer, and the thing abandoned, with the rights pertaining to it, becomes from the time of abandonment the property of the insurer. The acceptance may be either express or implied.

June 2, 3 and 4.—Sir John Karlake, Q.C., and Bompas, for the appellant.—By the express terms of the policy the ship was not allowed to be in the Gulf of St. Lawrence after the 15th Nov., nor to proceed to Newfoundland after the 1st Dec. She was in the Gulf after that date, and there was a breach of an express warranty. Hence the ship was upon a voyage not covered by the policy, and so if there was a total loss the appellants were not liable for it. The plaintiff must allege that the voyage was within the policy, but this he cannot do, because the appellants specially exempt themselves from covering any risk in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, after the 15th Nov. But even if this be a constructive total loss, the same rule applies, because it is not covered by the policy. Even if we accepted the abandonment under a mistaken view of the facts we should not be estopped from denying our liability. [Sir R. F. COLLIER.—If you might give leave beforehand to proceed upon the voyage at this time, why could you not sanction the proceeding afterwards? Sir BARNES PEACOCK.—The condition might be waived.] The assured, in order to give a valid notice of abandonment, must have sustained a loss within the policy. [Sir M. SMITH.—Suppose you had sold the ship? They might have sued us for the proceeds. It is alleged that taking possession of her was an admission that she was lost within the meaning of the policy. It is true that the appellants' agent went down to the place of the wreck, but he went there to do his best for all concerned, and not to act for the company alone; this was shown by the fact that he instituted a salvage suit against the ship and cargo to recover reward for the services rendered. This would have been unnecessary if the appellants had been owners of the ship. A warranty in a policy of insurance is a condition or contingency, and unless that be performed there is no contract: (De Hahn v. Hartley 1 T. R. 343.) If there is no contract there can be no waiver, and hence there was never a valid abandonment so as to create a constructive total loss, for which the appellants are liable. Sect. 2549 of the Code does not apply to a case where there has been no loss under the policy, but only to cases where there has been a loss, but a question may arise as to whether that loss is total or partial; it is only applicable to cases where there has been a valid abandonment: (See Civil Code of Canada, Arts. 2521, 2522.) There was an actual recovery of the stranded vessel, and hence there could be no abandonment (Art. 2545); this was a case of stranding within that Article.

[Priv. Co.]

Secondly, even if the respondent were entitled to recover on a proper form of pleading, he cannot recover here as he claims only for a total loss occurring in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, whereas this is at most a partial loss made constructively total by abandonment.

Thirdly, the respondent can only recover in proportion to his own interest in the ship. The evidence clearly shows that he was joint owner with Vigneau, and as he insured only in his own name and not as Vigneau's agent and does not claim in Vigneau's interest, he can only recover the amount of his own interest. The allegation is that the respondent is interested in the whole amount. The question is, did he intend to insure the whole value? and if so had he any insurable interest in that value? Vigneau owed him money, but this could give no interest in the ship without some form of mortgage or other security. The property in the ship remained in Vigneau, and the respondent could not insure it for his own benefit: (Irving v. Richardson, 2 B. & Ad. 193), and it is clear that he did not intend to insure for Vigneau's benefit. The interest covered by the insurance depends on the intention of the parties. The respondent says that he intended to insure his lien on one half the ship as well as his own property in the other half. He believed he had a right to such a lien, and, hence, an interest on the whole ship. He did not intend to insure more than his own interest and he now finds that he has only an interest in half. He cannot now claim to have insured Vigneau's interest as well as his own. Unless he had not only authority from Vigneau to insure, but intended to insure Vigneau's interest, the appellants can be liable only to the extent of the respondent's interest. This question of insurable interest is fully discussed in Ebbsworth v. The Alliance Marine Insurance Company (ante, p. 125; L. Rep. 8 C. P. 596; 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 479).

Wills, Q.C. and Pauli for the respondent.—The real meaning of the conditions in the policy, stipulating that the ship shall not be in the Gulf of St. Lawrence after the 15th Nov., nor proceed to Newfoundland after the 1st Dec., is that the ship shall not come up the Gulf towards Montreal after 15th Nov., but may leave Montreal for another port after that date, provided she does not proceed "towards" Newfoundland after 1st Dec. The words "proceed to Newfoundland" must be construed as "proceed towards Newfoundland," or "set sail for" that place (Colledge v. Hartly, 6 Ex. 205), and if this construction is put upon them, the condition involves an absurdity if the ship may not be in the Gulf, going outward to another place after 15th Nov.; the ship within the policy may, on or before 1st Dec. proceed from any of the ports named in the policy to Newfoundland, and for that purpose pass through the Gulf after that date; hence, to make the condition as to the ship being in the Gulf after 15th Nov. reasonable and intelligible, it must apply only to a voyage in which the ship enters the Gulf going towards Montreal. At any rate the clause is ambiguous, and may be explained by parol evidence as to the usage of trade (Civil Code, Art. 2497); and by the evidence given it is shown to be the custom for ships not to enter the gulf later than 15th Nov., on account of the descending ice, and, moreover, the interpretation contended for is that which was put upon the clause by the appellants' own agent, who effected the policy.

Secondly, even supposing the condition in the policy is against the respondent, nevertheless the appellants have rendered themselves liable for the loss by accepting notice of abandonment. The acts of the appellants' agent amounted to an acceptance of abandonment. The respondent gave due notice, and to this notice the appellants sent no reply. Silence on the part of underwriters after notice of abandonment is in itself sufficient acceptance (Hudson v. Harrison, 3 Brod. and Bing. 97); but in this case the underwriters dealt with the ship as their own property; they raised her and took her to Montreal, and for that purpose must have repaired her; at Montreal she was sold in a suit of salvage instituted by them. This was done after the notice of abandonment had been given, and must be construed as an acceptance of abandonment.

Phillips on Insurance, § 1693;

Peele v. The Merchants' Insurance Company, 3 Mason's C. C. Rep. 27;

Peele v. The Suffolk Insurance Company, 7 Pickering's (Massachusetts) Rep. 254;

The Cincinnati Insurance Company v. Bakewell, 4 B. Monroe's (Kentucky) Reports.

The mere fact that the ship was sold in a salvage suit instituted at the instance of the appellants or their agent will not free them of their responsibility if they have acted unreasonably in not giving notice to the owner of the meaning and intention of their acts. If then they have constructively accepted abandonment they are now estopped from denying a loss within the policy. They cannot now set up that there has not been a total loss, even if there has been none in law, nor can they contend that they are liable only for a partial loss; they are estopped by their own acts. The very nature of an estoppel is that something done by a person or allowed by him to be done prevents that person from setting up the truth. It does not matter if the true state of things is known to one only or to both of the parties. For instance, in the case of lessor and lessee, where the lease has been avoided by the breaking of a covenant by the lessee, the subsequent receipt of rent by the lessor estops him from setting up the breach, whether the breach is known to both parties or not; where an arbitrator omits to make his award in due time, but both sides go on with the reference, both are estopped from setting up the lapse of time; where a bill is drawn by a person under disability, even if known, that person is estopped from setting up his disability; but estoppel does not depend upon the knowledge of the parties. In this case both parties had perfect knowledge of the true state of facts, and yet long after acquiring that knowledge act as though the true state of facts would not be raised. Once abandonment has been accepted the insurers cannot be allowed to say that the loss is not total. They have admitted the loss to be of that description, and have agreed to take possession of the property, and by the abandonment, the whole interest of the respondent has passed to the appellants.

Smith v. Robertson, 2 Dow's. Parl. Cas. 474;

Canadian Civil Code, Art. 2547;

The Cincinnati Insurance Company v. Bakewell (ubi sup.).

Admitting for argument that the condition is against the respondent, the contention that the ship was upon a voyage for which she was not insured is untenable; she was insured upon a voyage from Montreal to Newfoundland, subject to a warranty that she should not go on that voyage at a particular time; having gone on that voyage at that time she committed a breach of warranty. But that breach the appellants have waived by accepting abandonment with knowledge of the facts: (See Arnould on Insurance, 4th edit., p. 859, note.)

Thirdly, what was the insurable interest of the respondent, and what amount is he entitled to recover? The respondent had an insurable interest in the ship, and this was a valued policy. It is the rule that where there is an insurable interest and a valued policy the amount recoverable is according to the valuation, and the parties are bound by that valuation: (Arnould on Insurance, 4th edit., pp. 284, 301). [Sir BARNES PEACOCK.—If a ship is valued at 7000*l.*, and the plaintiff has only an insurable interest in half, can he recover under a valued policy for 7000*l.*, the full amount?] Yes, unless there has been a fraudulent over-valuation. The valuation is conclusive of the interest of the assured unless there is fraud. It is laid down in Arnould p. 284: "The difference in point of effect between a valued and an open policy is, that under an open policy in case of loss the assured must prove the actual value of the subject of insurance; under a valued policy he need never do so, the valuation in the policy being conclusive between the parties except in the case of fraud." [Sir BARNES PEACOCK.—The assured need not prove the value of the thing insured, but must he not prove the extent of his own interest?] It has been distinctly held that where an assured is interested in any part of the thing he may recover on a valued policy in his own name to the amount of the valuation; it must be taken that the value insured is the value of the plaintiff's interest:

Ferse v. Aguilar, 3 Taunt. 506;

Ebbsworth v. The Alliance Marine Insurance Company (ubi sup.);

Robertson v. Hamilton, 14 East, 522.

Moreover, the plaintiff had an insurable interest in the whole of the ship. He had advanced money to pay the purchase money to Vigneau the co-owner and had such control over the share of the latter as entitled him to insure it in his own name: (See Phillips on Insurance, §§ 180, 208, and the cases there quoted.) The evidence establishes that the plaintiff had authority from Vigneau to insure Vigneau's interest in the ship and to receive the amount of any losses paid. But even without any express authority to receive the amount of losses the respondent being authorised to insure was Vigneau's agent and can sue in his own name to recover Vigneau's loss: (See Phillips on Insurance, §§ 383, 1965.)

Bompas in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 26, 1874.—Judgment was delivered by Sir BARNES PEACOCK.—The respondent, Joel Leduc, is the plaintiff, and the appellants, the Provincial Insurance Company of Canada, are the defendants in a suit brought in the Superior Court for Lower Canada, district of Montreal, upon a policy of inurance upon the body, tackle, apparel, and other furniture of the schooner Babineau et Gaudry.

The policy was effected by the plaintiff as well in his own name as for and in the name and names of all and every other person and persons to whom the same did, might, or should appertain, in part or in all, 5000*dols.* upon the said ship, &c., beginning the adventures at and from Montreal to trade between the Island of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, West India Islands, Cuba, safe ports in the United States, and Quebec and Montreal, to and from ports in the Lower Provinces, the risk commencing at noon of the 15th Dec. 1866, and ending at noon of the 15th Dec. 1867. The vessel, &c., were valued at 7000*dols.*, and it was agreed that, in case a total loss should be claimed for or on account of any damage or charge to the said vessel, the only basis of ascertaining the value should be her valuation in the said policy. The vessel was warranted free of war risk. The policy contained a stipulation in the following words: "Not allowed under this policy to enter the Gulf of St. Lawrence before the 25th April, nor to be in the said Gulf after the 15th Nov. Nor to proceed to Newfoundland after the 1st Dec., or before the 15th March, without payment of additional premium and leave first obtained, war risk and sealing voyages excepted."

It may be taken as against the plaintiff that the vessel left the port of Montreal on 16th Nov. 1867, for the port of St. John Newfoundland, and that she was wrecked between the 1st and 5th Dec. 1867, about twenty miles below the West Point of the Island of Anticosti, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. (See the plaintiff's declaration, Record, p. 14; and his protest, Record, pp. 19 and 20 pars. 5, 7, 8, and 9.)

It was contended on the part of the plaintiff that notwithstanding the vessel was lost in the Gulf of St. Lawrence after the 15th Nov. 1867, the case did not fall within that part of the warranty or condition by which it was declared that she was not to be in the said Gulf after 15th Nov. The argument in support of that contention was that the words, "to proceed to Newfoundland," must, according to the decision of Colledge v. Hurty (6 Ex. Rep. 205) be read in the sense of "to proceed towards," or "to set sail for" Newfoundland, and that if read in that sense, it would be inconsistent to allow a vessel to set sail from Montreal to Newfoundland on or before the 1st Dec., and not to allow her to enter the Gulf of St. Lawrence after 15th Nov. It was, therefore, urged that the first part of the condition by which it was declared that the vessel was not allowed to enter the Gulf of St. Lawrence after the 15th Nov., applied only to the case of entering the Gulf for the purpose of proceeding upwards; and in support of that argument the evidence of Bazil de Roy was referred to, in which he stated that it was the custom of navigators to leave the port of Montreal at any time in the month of November, for the purpose of going down the Gulf, but that for the purpose of going up the river, they did not generally enter the Gulf later than the 15th Nov., and that the reason was that the ice then began to descend, and the navigation became dangerous (Record, p. 77).

Mr. Routh, a commission merchant, who was the agent of the defendants at Montreal, through whom the policy was effected, stated that he understood by the clause that the vessel was not to be in the Gulf after the 15th Nov., that is to say, coming west; and going east not to proceed to Newfoundland after the 1st Dec., &c. On cross-examination, he stated he did not undertake to do anything beyond giving his opinion of the reading of the clause.

Their Lordships are of opinion that the clause is very clear, that the opinion of Mr. Routh is not admissible, and that to put upon the clause such a construction as that contended for would be to make a new agreement for the parties, instead of construing that which they made for themselves.

The only way in which a doubt is created as to the construction of the clause, is by reading the latter part of it, as declaring that the vessel might proceed from any of the ports mentioned in the policy to Newfoundland on or before the 1st Dec., notwithstanding they might have to pass through the Gulf after the 15th Nov. That, however, is not the true construction of the clause. As their Lordships read it, the vessel was neither to be in the Gulf of St. Lawrence after the 15th Nov., nor to proceed to Newfoundland from any port after the 1st Dec. There is nothing inconsistent or unreasonable in giving effect to the words used, and in holding that the vessel, whether proceeding from Montreal or from any other port, was not to be in the Gulf of St. Lawrence after the 15th Nov.

Their Lordships are therefore, of opinion that the appellants are not liable for the loss unless they have rendered themselves liable by accepting the notice of abandonment.

As regards that question, it may be taken as proved that, within a reasonable time after the plaintiff first heard of the loss of the vessel, he gave notice of abandonment to the company's agent at Montreal. (See Appellant's case, in the appeal to the Court of Queen's Bench, Record, p. 60.) It is there said, "The respondent heard of the loss of the vessel on the 19th May 1868, and thereupon left the notification and protest with the company's agent at Montreal. This document does not appear to have reached the company's head office at Toronto until the 19th June following".

Mr. McCuaig, the agent, however, gave evidence to the effect that the notice of abandonment was, to the best of his knowledge, served upon him on the 19th May 1868, and that the said paper was sent by him to the head office of the company at Toronto on the same day or the next day (Record, p. 82).

Their Lordships see no reason to doubt the truth of that statement. Mr. Crocker, who was a director and the manager and agent of the company up to the month of Aug. 1870, when examined as a witness for the defendants, declared that the copy of the notice of abandonment was received at the office of the defendants in Toronto on the 18th June 1868 (Record, p. 64, line 20). On cross-examination, however, he stated that he did not receive a copy of the notice through Mr. McCuaig, that he received it from Mr. McGregor, who sent it to him from Quebec. That copy, if sent by Mr. McGregor from Quebec, must have been a different copy from that sent by Mr. McCuaig. Indeed, one of the learned counsel for the respondents was forced to admit upon the argument that the copy notice sent by Mr. McGregor and the notice of which Mr. McCuaig spoke, must have been different copies. The protest and notice of abandonment is set out at p. 19 of the Record. It gave notice of the time and place of the wreck, demanded payment of the 5000 dollars for which the vessel was insured, and relinquished and abandoned to the defendants all the rights, claims, title, and interest of the plaintiff in the said vessel.

Both the Superior Court and the Court of Queen's Bench on appeal, found that the abandonment was accepted by the defendants. Two of the learned judges of the Court of Queen's Bench dissented from the judgment of that court; Mr. Justice Monk, however, dissented only on the question of damages: Mr. Justice Badgley alone dissented as to the acceptance by the defendants of the abandonment. It was proved by McGregor that on the 24th May he was instructed by the manager of the insurance company to proceed to Gaspé, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, to look after any interest the company might have in the cargo or in the vessel. He also stated that the defendants had constantly acted as salvors and saved vessels, and been allowed salvage for such service. But, whether the defendants had acted as salvors on other occasions or not, the instructions which Mr. McGregor received, and upon which he acted, were to look after any interest the company might have in the cargo or in the vessel. He stated that he went to Anticosti, and was there on the 15th June; that he went to the vessel, which he found about twenty miles from the lighthouse, near the centre of the island, on the south-west side; that she was lying bottom up, with her bow out in the Gulf, and her rigging, anchor, and chains lying just at her bow; that a hole had been cut in her side for the purpose of taking out her cargo. He further stated, that after disposing of her cargo, he got material and men, and went back to the island and took the vessel off, and brought her to Gaspé, where he left her and went home. He said, "After I got to Toronto I endeavoured to get the salvage," but he was wholly silent as to the person from whom, and the manner in which, he endeavoured to get it. He proceeded: "When I found I could not get it, I went down in September, and brought the vessel up to Montreal, where she has since been proved." It was proved that the sale was made after a decree of the Vice-Admiralty Court, in a proceeding in rem for salvage (p. 54), and it is stated by Mr. Justice Badgley that she was sold under Admiralty process: (Supp. Record, p. 6).

The case of Hudson v. Harrison (3 Brod. & Bing. 97) was cited as an authority to show that the silence of an insurer has been construed to be an acceptance of an abandonment. It is not necessary to go to that length in this case. Their Lordships consider that Mr. Justice Story was correct in stating that an insurer is not bound to signify his acceptance of an abandonment. If he says nothing and does nothing, the proper conclusion is that he does not mean to accept. In the case of Peele v. The Merchants' Insurance Company (3 Mason's C. C. Reps. 27; Phillips on Insurance, 3rd edit., 391), it was held by Mr. Justice Story that the floating and repairing of a stranded ship by the underwriters, though it was done with the intention of surrendering to the assured, was a constructive acceptance of an abandonment. In the case of Peele v. The Suffolk Insurance Company (7 Pickering's Reps. 254; Phillips, 390), the Supreme Court of Massachusetts held that though the underwriters had a right to keep possession of a ship for a reasonable time to repair it, yet that their keeping it for an unreasonable time for that purpose was a constructive acceptance of the abandonment. It has also been held that, if the underwriters take possession of a vessel after an abandonment, and proceed to repair without giving notice of their object, it is an acceptance: (The Cincinnati Insurance Company v. Bakewell, 4 B. Monroe's Rep., Kentucky, 541.)

In the present case the defendants were not merely silent, but they were active, and by their agent, Mr. McGregor, took possession of the vessel after notice of abandonment had been sent to the head office at Toronto; and the vessel was kept in the possession of the defendants from the time it was raised and taken into Gaspé until it was arrested at the instance of the defendants by the Vice-Admiralty Court, and it must have been repaired before it was taken to Montreal.

Mr. McGregor stated, in his evidence, that he left the vessel at Gaspé when he returned to Toronto; but there can be no doubt that it was left in the charge of some persons on behalf of the company from that time until the month of September following, when he returned to Gaspé, and took the vessel up to Montreal; and, at all events, the vessel having been raised and taken into Gaspé by the agent of the defendants, must be assumed to have remained in their possession until proved to have been delivered over. There is no evidence that the plaintiff, at any time during that period, had notice of the object with which the defendants took and retained possession of the vessel, or that they disputed their liability for the loss upon the ground of a breach of warranty, or that they repudiated the notice of abandonment. There was nothing to lead the plaintiff to suppose that the defendants repudiated altogether their liability under the policy and the notice of abandonment, and that they were acting, not as insurers, but as mere ordinary salvors, who had no interest whatever in the vessel, and their Lordships cannot believe that they acted merely in that capacity. The remarks of the court in the case above cited of the Cincinnati Insurance Company v. Bakewell, are very applicable to the present as regards that suggestion.

Mr. Justice Badgley considered that the decree of the Vice-Admiralty Court in favour of the defendants proved them to be mere salvors of the vessel: (Supp. Record, p. 6, line 43.) But their Lordships do not concur in that view. That decree is dated the 23rd April 1869. It does not appear, nor is it very material, at what time the suit in the Vice-Admiralty Court was commenced. It is, however, stated by Mr. Justice Badgley (Supp. Record, p. 5), and the fact is probably so, that the vessel was libelled, pending the present action in the Superior Court. It was, however, a proceeding in rem, and not against the plaintiff personally. It would have been no answer in that proceeding for the plaintiff to have alleged that he had no interest in the vessel; that by virtue of the insurance, the loss, the abandonment, and the acceptance thereof, the vessel had become the property of the defendants. If the defendants thought fit to libel their own vessel for salvage, it was no concern of the plaintiff's, nor was he bound to appear. He could not have defended that suit without alleging that he had an interest in the vessel, and thereby prejudicing his own action on the policy and his contention that the defendants had accepted the abandonment.

Mr. Croker stated that McGregor was never instructed to accept an abandonment, and that abandonments could be accepted only at the head office and by writing; but McGregor was instructed to look after the interests of the company, and if his acts in pursuance of those instructions, coupled with the nonrepudiation of the notice of abandonment, amounted to an acceptance, or were evidence from what an acceptance might be inferred, the defendants are bound by those acts. The question as to whether the abandonment has been constructively accepted is a mixed question of law and fact. Unfortunately, we have not the reasons of the majority of the judges. Their Lordships are of opinion that the acts of the defendants, by their agent, McGregor, in regard to the vessel after notice of abandonment, and especially their repairing the vessel and retaining it in their possession from the time when it was raised up to the time of their libelling it in the Vice-Admiralty Court, without repudiating that notice or informing the plaintiff as to the character in which they were acting, were evidence of an acceptance of the abandonment. They would not reverse the concurrent decisions of two courts upon a question of fact, except upon the clearest conviction that they were wrong. In the present case, they are of opinion that the courts were correct in finding that the abandonment was accepted. Their Lordships' view upon this part of the case would be the same even if Mr. McCuaig had not forwarded the notice of abandonment to the head office before the 18th June.

Then, as to the effect of that acceptance, it was contended that, as there was no loss for which the defendants were liable, the notice of abandonment was inoperative, and that the acceptance of it could not convert a partial loss for which the defendants were not liable into a total loss for which they were liable. Articles 2521 and 2522 of the Civil Code were referred to, and it was urged that there could be no loss within the meaning of the Code unless it was caused by an event insured against. Mr. Justice Badgley was of that opinion, and he considered that at most there was only a partial loss, which could not, under Articles 2544 and 2545, be converted into a total loss by notice of abandonment. That learned judge said, "implications of acceptance are not favoured, and can have no effect or validity in contravention of the positive fact upheld by Article 2545 of the actual recovery of the stranded vessel." (Supp. Record, p. 10, line 6) He was also of opinion that the fact of the restoration and recovery of the stranded vessel prevented abandonment at all.

It appears to their Lordships that the learned judge did not sufficiently advert to the distinction between a mere notice of abandonment and a valid abandonment, or a notice of abandonment which has been accepted.

Their Lordships are of opinion that the present case did not fall within Article 2545, upon which Mr. Justice Badgley so much relied. It was not a case of mere stranding. The vessel could not have been raised and put into a condition to continue her voyage to the place of destination. Further, it appears to their Lordships that Article 2545 must be read in conjunction with Articles 2538, 2543, and 2544, and that it does not apply to the case of an abandonment

THE PROVINCIAL INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA v. LEDUC.

which has been accepted. It puts the case of stranding very much upon the same footing as that upon which it stands under the law of this country. Abandonments made and accepted are treated of in Article 2547. It is there said: "Abandonment made and accepted is equivalent to transfer, and the thing abandoned, with the rights pertaining to it, becomes from the time of abandonment the property of the insurer. The acceptance may be either express or implied.

Article 2549 of the Code was intended to prevent a notice of abandonment when accepted from being defeated by any subsequent event.

The Superior Court held that the plaintiff was estopped, by the acceptance, from urging against the plaintiff objections founded upon the breaches of condition, and awarded the plaintiff half the amount, viz., 3500 dollars, of the declared value of the vessel. The Court of Queen's Bench, Mr. Justice Badgley dissenting, held that the allegations set forth by the plaintiff in his declaration, which included an allegation of acceptance, were fully proved; and that by reason thereof and of the abandonment accepted by the company, the plaintiff was entitled to recover the full amount insured, viz., 5000 dollars. Mr. Justice Monk dissented on the question of amount only. He considered that the plaintiff was entitled to recover but only one-half of the amount insured.

Their Lordships are of opinion that by the acceptance of the abandonment, the defendants became liable as for a total loss. In Smith v. Robertson (2 Dow's Parl. Cas. 474), it was held that the insurers could not be allowed to say that the loss was not total after they had acquiesced in the abandonment as for a total loss, and had thereby admitted that the loss was a loss of that description. In that case the insurer had no right to abandon, but merely a right to give notice of abandonment. But the moment the notice was accepted, the abandonment took effect; the loss immediately became tantamount to a total loss; and the insurers were precluded from relying upon the subsequent recovery of the property because they were not allowed to say that the loss was not total. This case, as it appears to their Lordships, gets rid of the objection of Mr. Justice Badgley to the form of the plaintiff's declaration at page 7, line 25, Supplemental Record. He there says: "Now the only loss alleged in the declaration is, that le dit navire aurait péri corps et biens dans le Golfe Saint Laurent, faisant un naufrage entier et complet, which is the absolute total loss of the Code article, where the thing insured is wholly destroyed and lost, in other words submerged in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. As matter of fact, the alleged total loss is not true, and has been disapproved, but it is the only one alleged, and the insurers cannot be made to suffer from any other description of loss or cause of action than that charged; and in strict justice the appellant's action should be dismissed, unless, under the rule of practice, he should elect to amend his declaration to meet the proof of the case, which as it is, admits of no effective abandonment with its alleged acceptance, as set out in the declaration."

Their Lordships would deeply regret if an objection to the mere form of the declaration, which does not affect the merits of the case, should compel them to decide against the plaintiff, but they are relieved from that difficulty by the above-mentioned case in the House of Lords, in which it was held that the insurers after acceptance could not be allowed to say that the loss was not total.

It was contended that the vessel was not insured at the time when she was lost, as the insurance did not extend to a loss in the Gulf of St. Lawrence after the 15th Nov., and that an abandonment can be of no avail when there is no insurance. But the vessel was in fact insured: the loss occurred during the time and upon a voyage described in the policy, but there was a breach of one of the warranties or conditions expressed. In the case of The Cincinnati Insurance Company v. Bakewell, the insurance was merely against a total loss. But it was held that the insurers could not, after acceptance of an abandonment, rely upon the fact that the loss was not total, and, consequently, that it was a loss within the terms of the policy.

There is no distinction in principle between an express and a constructive acceptance of an abandonment. The effect produced upon the rights of the parties is the same in both cases. Suppose the defendants, upon the receipt of the notice, had written to the plaintiff and said that, as the loss took place in the Gulf of St. Lawrence after the 15th Nov., they did not consider themselves in strictness liable to make good the loss; that they found upon inquiry that Mr. Routh, their agent at Montreal, through whom the insurance was effected, was under the impression that that part of the warranty which declared that the vessel was not to be in the Gulf of St. Lawrence after the 15th Nov. applied merely to the case of its going west, and that, under those circumstances, they did not consider it right to avail themselves of the breach of warranty; that they accepted the abandonment, and would make the best they could for themselves of the salvage, and would settle as for a total loss. Or suppose they had gone further, and stated that they concurred with Mr. Routh in his construction of the policy, and that they accepted the abandonment. Suppose that, after they had raised the vessel they had sold her for 10,000 dollars in excess of the salvage expenses, it is clear that the plaintiff could not have turned round and claimed the full amount of the proceeds of the vessel upon the ground that the loss was not caused by a risk insured against, and that he had, consequently, no right to give notice of the abandonment. If the plaintiff could not have treated the abandonment as a nullity, surely the defendants cannot be allowed, after acceptance, to rely upon a breach of the warranty or condition of which they had full notice at the time of their acceptance of the abandonment. Estoppels are mutual. If the mouth of one party is closed, so also is that of the other. By the abandonment and the acceptance of the abandonment the matter was closed. The whole interest of the plaintiff in the thing abandoned was transferred to the defendants and became their property: (Art. 2547).

There are many cases in which it may be very doubtful whether, in point of law, the particular facts amount to a breach of warranty. But if, after a constructive total loss and notice of abandonment, the insurer, with full knowledge of all the facts, accepts the notice of abandonment, he cannot, when called upon to pay the amount insured, resile and rely upon a breach of warranty.

The effect of acceptance is, as remarked by Mr. Arnould, well expressed by Boulay Paty—Cours de Droit, Comm., tit. xi, sec. 7, vol. 4, p. 380:—"Par leur acceptation volontaire il s'est fait un pacte entre les parties qui a tout terminé." (Arnould, p. 1173, note x.)

The only remaining question is as to the amount to which the plaintiff is entitled. Jean Baptiste Vigneau proved that his brother, Benjamin Vigneau, who was the captain of the vessel and was lost in her, told him that he was in debt to the plaintiff, that, in order to give him a guarantee for the debt, he had authorized him to insure the vessel Babineau et Gaudry in his own name alone, to the end that if the vessel should be lost the plaintiff might receive the whole of the insurance money, and pay himself the amount which Benjamin Vigneau owed him.

Their Lordships consider that this declaration of the deceased against his own interest was evidence sufficient to prove that the plaintiff was authorized by Benjamin Vigneau to insure the half of the vessel which belonged to him, and to receive the amount insured. This coupled with the interest which the plaintiff had in the other half of the vessel, entitled him to insure the whole vessel, and to recover the full amount insured.

Mr. Justice Badgley appears to have overlooked the evidence of Jean Baptiste Vigneau, when the learned judge stated that the plaintiff's interest in the insurance money did not exceed one-half share thereof. It is clear that an agent who insures for another with his authority may sue in his own name: (Phillips on Insurance, par. 1965). The mortgage did not affect the plaintiff's right, to insure for the full amount of the value of the vessel. The vessel, or the value of it may be the only means which he has of paying the mortgage debt.

Their Lordships are of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench was correct, and they will humbly advise Her Majesty to affirm it, with the costs of this appeal.

Judgment affirmed and appeal dismissed.

(Present: The Right Hons. Sir JAMES W. COLVILLE, Sir MONTAGUE E. SMITH, Sir R. P. COLLIER.)

THE AMERICAN AND THE SYRIA.

Collision—Steamship towing—Duty to keep out of way of sailing ship—Duty of sailing ship to keep her course—Responsibility of tow for negligence of tug—Governing power—Disabled ship—Salvors' negligence—Tug and tow belonging to same owners.

A steamship towing another ship is within the meaning of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea relating to steamships, and is not by reason of her incumbered condition altogether absolved from the duty of keeping out of the way of a sailing vessel; still allowances should be made, under the circumstances of each case, for the comparatively disabled condition of the incumbered steamer, and the duty of additional precaution is imposed upon a sailing ship approaching a steamer so incumbered.

Where a ship is ordered by the regulations to pursue a certain course in relation to another vessel, she has a right to presume that that other vessel will do her duty, and also observe the regulations; hence a sailing ship, approaching a steamship towing another ship, has a right to hold on her course until there is immediate danger of collision, in the expectation that the steamship will observe the regulations and keep out of her way.

Where a collision takes place between a tug towing a ship and another ship, the question whether the tow is liable to make good damage done by the negligence of the tug, depends upon the determination of the question whether the "governing power" is in the tug or in the tow. If the tug is in the service of and under the orders of the tow, the tow is answerable for the negligence of the tug as for the negligence of a servant; but if the tug is, although rendering service to the tow, not under the control of the latter, but is itself the governing power, then the tow is not liable for the negligence of the tug.

Where the master of a steamship, finding another steamship belonging to the same owners with her engines disabled, undertakes, not in pursuance of any specific contract made with the master of the disabled ship, but out of his sense of duty to his employers and in the hope of obtaining salvage reward, to tow the ship home, the towing ship is not under the control of the tow, nor is the governing power in the tow, so as to render the tow responsible for the negligent acts of the tug. Nor does the fact that both ships belong to the same owners render the towed ship responsible for the acts of the tug.

THIS was a consolidated cause of damage instituted on behalf of the owners of the late ship Aracan, and of her master and crew, against the steamship American, and against the steamship Syria, and against the Union Steamship Company (Limited), of Southampton, the owners of those steamships intervening. There was also a cross cause instituted by the defendants against the owners of the Aracan, which was heard at the same time and on the same evidence. The allegations of fact on behalf of both plaintiffs and defendants appear sufficiently from the pleadings in the High Court of Admiralty. The plaintiff's petition was as follows:

1. Between 10 p.m. and 11 p.m. on the 8th March 1874, the ship Aracan, of 788 tons register, manned by a crew of twenty-four hands all told, whilst on a voyage from London to Hong Kong with a general cargo, was in the English Channel off Portland.

2. The wind at such time was about west-south-west, a moderate breeze, the tide was about two hours flood, and of the force of about a knot and a half per hour, and the weather was fine, and there was moonlight, and the Aracan was close hauled by the wind on the starboard tack, and sailing at the rate of about five or six knots per hour, and heading about south. Her proper regulation side-lights were duly exhibited and burning brightly, and a good look-out was being kept.

3. At such time a bright light, which proved to be a masthead light of the above named steam vessel American, was seen at the distance of several miles from the Aracan, and bearing about four or five points on her starboard bow, and some time afterwards the red light of the American, and the red light of the above named steam vessel Syria, which proved to be in tow of the American, was also seen. The Aracan was kept close hauled by the wind on the starboard tack, in the expectation that the American and Syria would take proper measures for keeping out of the way of the Aracan, but, instead of so doing, the American, with the Syria in tow, came on and caused immediate danger of collision; and although the helm of the Aracan was put hard aport, the American with her port side came into collision with the stem and port bow of the Aracan, and slewed the Aracan round with her head towards the eastward, and the Syria struck the Aracan on her port side, and so much damage was done to the Aracan that she foundered with her cargo and certain private effects of her master and crew. Her master and crew were saved by getting on board the Syria.

4. The said collisions and the losses of the plaintiffs consequent thereon were occasioned by the negligent and improper navigation of the American and Syria, or by the negligent and improper navigation of the American.

5. The said collisions were not in any way occasioned by any negligence on the part of those on board the Aracan.

The defendants' answer was

1. Shortly before 10.20 p.m. of the 8th March 1874, the screw steamship American, of 1356 tons nett register tonnage, propelled by engines of 320 horse power, and navigated by Edward George Baynton, her master, and a crew of sixty-eight hands, was in the English Channel, off Portland, which bore north by west, and was distant about sixteen miles, proceeding on a voyage from the Cape of Good Hope to Southampton, laden with a general cargo of merchandise, and having in tow the screw steamship Syria, of the burthen of 1959 tons gross register, which was disabled in her machinery.

2. The wind at this time was about west, the weather was fine but dark, and there was a light haze on the water. The tide was flood, of the force of between one and two knots an hour, and the American was proceeding under steam only, steering east by north half north, and making about five knots an hour, with the Admiralty regulation lights, to wit, two bright white masthead lights placed vertically, about nine feet apart, upon the fore topgallant stay (to indicate that she was towing another vessel) a green light on the starboard side, and a red light on the port side, all of which were duly exhibited and burning well and brightly. The Syria also had a green light on her starboard side, and a red light on her port side, both also duly exhibited, and burning well and brightly. A good look out was being kept on board both the above named vessels.

3. In these circumstances, and whilst the American was thus proceeding, the green starboard light of a vessel (which afterwards proved to be the Aracan) was seen bearing about four and a-half points on the port bow of the American, and at the distance of about three-quarters of a mile off. The helm of the American was then ported and put hard aport, but the American having the Syria in tow, only a slight alteration could be made in her course.

4. The Aracan was on the starboard tack, and as she approached the American, she improperly deviated from her course, and ran into and struck her upon the port side, just before the main rigging, and did her considerable damage. The Aracan then fell to starboard of the American, and the Syria ranged ahead, and shortly afterwards the Aracan, with her port side, came into contact with the stern of the Syria.

5. The master and crew of the Aracan were by means of the boats of the Syria, safely got on board the latter vessel, and conveyed to Southampton.

6. The Aracan, whilst approaching the American, before the collision, improperly starboarded her helm.

7. The Aracan, prior to the occurrence of the said collision, did not duly and properly port her helm.

8. The said collision, and the losses and damages consequent thereupon, were caused by the negligence of those on board the Aracan, and by their improper navigation of that vessel.

9. No blame in regard to the said collision is attributable to those in charge of the American or Syria, and the said collisions are, so far as they are concerned, the result of inevitable accident.

10. Save as herein appears, the defendants deny the truth of the statements contained in the plaintiffs' petition.

The pleadings were thereupon concluded.

April 15 and 16.—The cause came on for hearing before Sir R. Phillimore, assisted by Trinity Masters. The allegations of fact in the plaintiffs' petition were substantially proved by the plaintiffs' witnesses. It was shown that the Aracan was close hauled on the starboard tack, and that she was kept on her course, her officers believing that they were bound so to keep her and that it was the duty of the steamer to have kept out of the way, and that her helm was put hard aport only when there was immediate danger of collision. The plaintiffs' witnesses alleged that if the American and the Syria had, instead of holding on as they did, starboarded on sighting the Aracan, they would have gone under the Aracan's stern.

On behalf of the defendants it was shown that the facts stated in the first two paragraphs of their answer were true. It was further shown that the green light of the Aracan was sighted by the look-out of the American at the distance of about three-quarters of a mile, and bearing about four and a-half points on the port bow of the American. This light was at once reported by the look-out; at first the look-out got no answer from the officer of the watch; the look-out again reported the light, and then got no answer. The officer of the watch thereupon ordered the helm of the American to be put a-port and then hard-a-port, and the order was obeyed, but the American having the Syria in tow, answered her helm very slightly. The defendants' witnesses alleged that it would not have been possible, by reason of the difficulty of managing the two vessels together, to have kept out of the way of the Aracan by starboarding and going under her stern. It was also alleged by them that the Aracan did not continue her course, but starboarded her helm instead of porting and going up into the wind as she ought to have done under the circumstances. It was further alleged that the Aracan showed only her green light to the American, and that the blow which the Aracan struck the American's bow. This last allegation was contradicted by the plaintiffs, who called two passengers from the American (soldiers returning from Ashantee), who swore that they both saw the red light of the Aracan shortly before the collision. The length of the American was 325ft., the length of the Syria 317ft., and the scope of hawser between them 540ft., making a total length of 1182ft.

April 17 and 18.—Butt, Q.C., (E. C. Clarkson with him), for the plaintiffs,—First, on the question of law, I submit that it was the duty of the American, as a steamship, to keep out of the way of the Aracan. By the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, Art. 15, it is the duty of a steamship to keep out of the way of a sailing ship, and by art. 18, a sailing ship meeting a steamship must keep her course. If, then, the Aracan kept her course, the American was bound to keep out of her way, unless there were circumstances within art. 19 taking her out of the rules. The question then will be, is a steamship towing another to be considered as within the scope of the regulations, or is a steamship towing another to be taken as incumbered, and, therefore, an exception to these regulations? [SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—Is there any authority for the position that a steamer towing can, by reason of such towing, avoid her obligation to keep out of the way of a steamship? I should be inclined to hold, until some very good reason to the contrary, that such a steamer is no exception to the general rule.] It has been so decided in several cases since the regulations became law :

THE ZEPHYR.

THIS was a cause of damage instituted by the owners of the steam tug Emperor against the brig Zephyr. The Emperor was towing a laden brig from Yarmouth to Lowestoft. The Zephyr was bound in ballast from Ipswich to Blyth, and the collision took place off Corton, at about 5 p.m., on the 22d Jan. 1864. The case of the tug was that she was steering about S. and by W., when the Zephyr was seen about three-quarters of a mile off bearing S. $\frac{1}{2}$ W., and steering N. by E., with her red light only visible; the tug kept her course, when the red light of the Zephyr suddenly disappeared, and the latter crossed the tug's bows, showing her green light; she continued her course, when her green light disappeared, and she bore about S.W. by W. on the tug's starboard beam, when she bore down right before the wind and ran into the tug, striking the tug on her starboard fore sponson; as soon as it was seen that she was so bearing down the tug's engines were stopped, and her helm ported, but there was no time to alter her course. The defence of the Zephyr was that whilst she was under all plain sail, carrying her proper lights, and heading N.E. by E., the tug was made out at some distance, about two points on her port bow; neither the tug nor the tow had any lights exhibited; the Zephyr's helm was ported, but the tug did not port, but starboarded, and so brought about the collision.

Dr. Deane, Q.C., and Dr. Wambey appeared for the plaintiffs.

Brett, Q.C., and E. C. Clarkson, for the defendants.

Dr. LUSHINGTON, addressing the Elder Brethren after reading the rules as to lights, said:—Now, gentlemen, if you think that in any degree the absence of lights on board this tug contributed to this collision, there is no doubt in point of law, whatever other findings or conclusions we may come to, that the tug was to blame. Having disposed of that part of the case, I must next request your attention to another part of these Parliamentary regulations—for such they are—as to what are the rules applicable to these two ships, and respecting that there is no doubt also. It is the 15th article of the Steering and Sailing Rules: "If two ships, one of which is a sailing vessel and the other a steamship, are proceeding in such directions as to involve risk of collision, the steamship shall keep out of the way of the sailing ship." That brings me at once to the consideration of this question. No doubt these two vessels were approaching each other; but were they approaching each other in such direction as to involve risk of collision?

The learned judge then examined the evidence on this point and continued.] It will be entirely for you, and not for me, to say whether, the tug being two points on the Zephyr's port bow, there was really any risk of collision if these vessels had kept their courses, because it is risk of collision alone which renders it peremptory for the tug to give way. This statement as to the position of the two vessels is not contradicted. I know not, as far as relates to the tug, I need say more, because, according to her own account, she intended to do nothing, and all she represents herself to have done here, was almost at the moment of collision she stopped her engines, and her master put his hand upon the tiller but had produced no effect, and no measures were adopted by her in order to avoid the collision if it was incumbent upon her to adopt them. There is a part of these rules which applies to the Zephyr, that is Art. 18: "Where by the above rules, one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course, subject to the qualifications contained in the following article." You see, gentlemen, to a certain extent, at least, as far as my knowledge and experience goes, this is a new direction, because it is not that two vessels shall, if there is risk of collision, both put their helms to port, but that if one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course; therefore it is a peremptory direction for the Zephyr to have kept her course unless she falls within the following rule: "In obeying and constructing these rules, due regard must be had to all dangers of navigation, and due regard must also be had to any special circumstances which may exist in any particular case rendering a departure from the above rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger." I take it that the meaning of that rule is to impose the obligation as strictly as possible of obeying the 18th rule, as far as is consistent with not incurring immediate danger. You will have to consider in this case whether the Zephyr did or did not comply with the 18th rule. The charge made by the Zephyr as to the tug, is that she starboarded her helm. If there be any improbability in the story that the tug starboarded as alleged, there appears to me to be an equal improbability in the other story that the brig first starboarded and then ported. The point is for you to determine.

The learned judge and the Elder Brethren having retired for consultation, upon their return

Dr. LUSHINGTON said: We are all of opinion that the tug was solely to blame for this collision.

THE ZENOBIA.

THIS was a cause instituted by the owners of the ship Gala against the barque Zenobia. The Gala, a ship of 815 tons, was bound from Dunedin, New Zealand, to London, and the Zenobia, a barge of 415 tons, was bound from Waterford to Shields. The collision occurred off the South Foreland about 2 p.m. on the 11th June 1865. The case of the Gala was that she was proceeding in tow of the steam tug Warrior about E.N.E. with both wind and tide strongly against her, at the rate of about a knot and a half through the water; that she was in charge of a duly licensed pilot; that there were several vessels in sight, some beating and others running; that the Zenobia, which was beating up channel, was seen standing towards the Gala on the starboard tack; that when the Zenobia had approached the Gala within two or three cables' length, she was about five or six points on the Gala's starboard bow; that if she had continued her course the Zenobia would have passed well astern of the Gala, but that instead of doing so, the Zenobia, when she was within about a cable's length of the Gala, luffed up as if for the purpose of going about on the other tack, and then filled again and ran stem on into the starboard quarter of the Gala, and did her considerable damage. The defence of the Zenobia was that whilst proceeding under topsails, courses, staysails, and jib, close-hauled on the starboard tack, heading north, and making about five knots an hour, the tide being flood and of the force of about three knots, the Gala was seen in tow of a steam tug at the distance of between one and two miles, bearing about W. by N. coming up channel, and the Zenobia was kept on her course close-hauled to the wind, in the expectation that the steam tug and ship would pass clear under her stern; that the steam tug and Gala approached the Zenobia and instead of passing under her stern, they proceeded to pass ahead of that vessel, and thereby rendered a collision with the Zenobia imminent, whereupon the helm of the Zenobia was put hard-a-starboard and her port main braces were let go, and an attempt was made to square the main yard of the Zenobia, but before this could be done the vessels came into contact.

Dr. Deane, Q.C. and Murphy for the plaintiffs.

Brett, Q.C. and E. C. Clarkson for the defendants.

Dr. LUSHINGTON addressed the Elder Brethren as follows: Gentlemen,—It appears that the steam tug was going up channel with this large ship in tow, and the barque was close-hauled on the starboard tack, with her head to the north, and the wind was E.N.E. Regarding the tug, I apprehend there is no case which relieves her from the duty of getting out of the way of the barque under those circumstances. There is no case that I am

ing vessel the starboard tack vessel, and hence, under the old rule, it was the duty of the steamer to keep out of the way. The master of the Aracan performed his duty by keeping his course. If he aware of, and certainly neither the case of The Cleadon (Lush 158; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 41) which has been adverted to, nor that of The Arthur Gordon (Lush 270; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 88), goes to that effect. It was the duty of the tug then, provided it was practicable, and could be done without danger, to get out of the way of the barque, which was close-hauled; and accordingly to my construction of the rules it was the duty of the barque to keep her course, unless there was an imperative necessity for her departing from them in order to avoid immediate danger. The first question is, did the tug do all she ought to do, and could do to avoid the collision, and was she in point of fact prevented from taking more effectual measures to avoid collision from the state of the wind and tide and the smallness of her power, and has she any excuse to set up upon that ground? And, on the other hand, did she do anything which would accelerate the collision and produce greater mischief? As to the tug, I cannot understand anything but that she starboarded at a time which does not appear to me to be of importance in the case. The Zenobia states that she came under the starboard helm, and so continued, and did the utmost in her power to avoid the collision by going astern of the tug. The Gala asserts that she did not act so, but that when she came a certain way, approaching the Gala, she then ported, whereby she stopped her own way, and the consequence was she could not go ahead, and tried to go astern.

The learned judge and the Elder Brethren having retired for consultation, on their return

Dr. LUSHINGTON said: We are all of opinion that the sole blame is to attach upon the tug and the Gala, and none at all upon the other vessel; and I must, therefore, dismiss the suit with costs.

ADMIRALTY COURT.

March 16, 1865.

THE DAVID CANNON.

THIS was a cause of collision instituted by the owners of the tug Great Conquest and of the ship North East against the American ship David Cannon. There was also a cross suit. The North East was proceeding in tow of the Great Conquest for Tuskar, having left the Mersey the day before the collision. The wind was about N.W., and their speed about five knots; the tug and tow had their regulation lights burning, and the tow also carried a light on the after side of her funnel as a guide to the North East in steering. They sighted the David Cannon running as they said, free. They first saw her loom about three points on the tug's port bow, distant about a mile; they then saw her green light and starboarded slightly; they then saw her red light, and they thereupon put their helms hard-a-port. The David Cannon, as the plaintiffs alleged, starboarded and ran into the tug. The tug was sunk, and the North East, coming into collision with the David Cannon, was damaged. The David Cannon was charged with a want of lookout, improperly starboarding, and not carrying proper lights. The David Cannon was proceeding to Liverpool. The wind was, according to the account, N.N.W., and she was close-hauled on the port tack, heading N.E., going five knots, her crew keeping a good lookout, with her regular lights burning, when the bright light of the Great Conquest was seen about three points on her lee bow, three or four miles distant; then a red light came in view, and when both lights had approached the David Cannon within half a mile the green light of the tug also became visible, bearing three points on the starboard bow of the David Cannon, and all three lights remained visible until they had approached to within a quarter of a mile and then the green light disappeared. Then for the first time it was ascertained that the tug was towing a ship. Until the green light was lost the David Cannon was kept close to the wind, but when the green light disappeared, it not being possible to avoid the collision by porting, the helm of the David Cannon was put hard down to lessen the blow, and the tug was hailed to put her helm hard down; but had done otherwise, he would have been to blame in case of collision. Secondly, on the facts it is established that the Aracan did not starboard into the American. The American did hold on her that the collision immediately occurred, causing damage to the David Cannon; both tug and tow coming into collision. The tug and tow were charged with want of a good look out, with improperly starboarding their helms, with not carrying their regulation lights duly placed and duly burning, with not casting off the towing hawser soon enough, and with not keeping out of the way of the David Cannon.

Dr. Deane, Q.C., appeared for the tug.

Milward, Q.C., and Butt for the North East.

Brett, Q.C., and Cohen for the David Cannon.

Dr. LUSHINGTON, in addressing the Elder Brethren, said:—Gentlemen, We must first see by what rule this case is to be governed, and whether any exception is engrafted upon the generality of that rule, and whether this case falls within the exception. The 15th rule is this: "If two ships, one of which is a sailing ship and the other a steamship, are proceeding in such direction as to involve risk of collision, the steamship shall keep out of the way of the sailing ship. The rule throws upon the steamship the burden of keeping out of the way. You will observe here that in one respect the tug entirely answers the description, because she is a steam vessel; but you will also observe that there is nothing said about the steamer having any vessel in tow. As to the duty of the other vessel likely to be in contact the 18th rule says, "Where, by the above rules, one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course, subject to the qualifications contained in the following article." If we were to take these two classes practically to operate together, we should say, of course, the tug was to keep out of the way, and that the David Cannon was to keep her course. But there are certain exceptions. Article 19. "In obeying and constraining these rules, due regard must be had to all dangers of navigation, and due regard must also be had to any special circumstances which may exist in any particular case, rendering a departure from the above rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger." Undoubtedly exceptions might arise under this article, but it does not appear to me, I must candidly state to you, that any exception does arise in this individual case under this rule. It appears to me that the 19th rule was framed for the purpose of the protection of a vessel that was required to keep her course, and not for any other purpose. I am not clear in my own mind that the case of The Arthur Gordon and The Independence, decided by the Judicial Committee, is altogether overruled and got rid of by this rule, and I am also not clear in my own mind at all, whether an ancient rule and principle, much known and acted upon several times in this court, does not apply, viz., that whatever be the rules or regulations which govern ships generally, yet in cases of immediate danger, it is the duty of every ship to avoid a collision. The learned judge having adverted to the case of The Arthur Gordon and The Independence, said: It will be for you to consider whether, looking at the circumstances of this case, there is anything which would induce you to think that the steamer should not be so strictly confined to the words of these regulations; and also whether the David Cannon was not bound to take some steps other and different from what she did take. Now there is no doubt whatever that the Great Conquest did starboard her helm to a certain extent. To what extent she starboarded, and whether it was sufficient to bring about the present collision, you will consider, having regard to the pleadings and evidences. If you should come to the conclusion that that starboarding produced the collision, the case for the plaintiffs must fail. You will also consider whether the not happening to see the two mast-head lights of the Great Conquest by those on board the David Cannon in any degree operated so as to cause this collision. According to the statement of the David Cannon, they saw, three or four miles off, a bright light, and they did nothing but follow their course. They saw the red light, then they saw the green light, then all three lights, and finally, they lost the green light; and then they say at the last moment, in consequence of the other vessel porting, they, in order to lessen the blow, course and ported, so as to bring about the collision. If she had starboarded instead of porting there would have been no collision. Thirdly, a great part of the damage done to the Aracan was occasioned by the Syria coming into collision with her. This collision might have been avoided by those on board the Syria, and those on board of her are to blame for that collision.

Milward, Q.C. (Gainsford Bruce with him), for the defendants.—The defendants do not contend that because a steamship is towing, that she is not a steamship within the meaning of the rules, but the plaintiffs' contention is, that by the regulations a steamer is under the same liability whether she is towing or not. No doubt it is the duty of a steamship to get out of the way of a sailing ship, but subject to articles 19 and 20 of the Regulations. Such an interpretation of the rules has the effect of making them accord with the practice of seamen before the rules came into operation, and does not alter the law, and it is clear that such a case as this ought to be governed by the practice of seamen. Before the passing of the rule, the law was laid down in The Cleadon (Lush. 158), where it appears that the rule as to a ship's keeping her course is the same as now, and that there was no means of knowing that a ship was in tow as there were no distinguishing lights, and yet the sailing ship was held to blame. [SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—In that case the sailing vessel executed a wrong manœuvre, whilst here the plaintiffs allege that they did nothing. The defendants say the Aracan starboarded, and if they did they might come within the decision in The Cleadon. The plaintiffs do not deny that proposition. Hence the main question is, whether they starboarded? There is this further question, whether the Aracan, seeing that the American took no steps to keep out of her way, ought not to have adopted some manœuvre to have avoided the American and the Syria. In The Arthur Gordon—The Independence (Lush. 270, 277) it is strongly laid down that a tug and tow are exceptions to the rule that a steamship must keep out of the way of a sailing ship. [SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—Are there any cases showing that the principle applies to a steamship towing after the passing of the rules? There are cases where it has been held to be a question of whether there are special circumstances arising in each case :

thinking a collision must actually take place, starboarded. It is said on the other side, that if the David Cannon had kept her course, there would have been no collision, that if she had ported there would have been a greater freedom from collision, but that starboarding as she did brought about that calamity which actually took place. Those are the matters for your consideration.

The Court and Elder Brethren then retired for consultation, and upon their return,

Dr. LUSHINGTON said: We are of opinion that the David Cannon is solely to blame for this collision, on the ground that she did not keep her course, as she ought to have done. We do not feel that any blame attaches to the tug, and, of course, not to the ship. I wish to add a suggestion of the Trinity Masters, though it is not any ground of our judgment, but that it should be known that they deprecate exceedingly the way in which the lamps were carried on board the David Cannon, as likely to lead to a great deal of mischief and confusion.

Decree accordingly.

[SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—It would be a most serious thing to lay down that a steamer towing a ship was exempt from the liability ordinarily attaching to a steamer. In giving my judgment I ought to be most careful to avoid laying down anything of that sort in general terms, unless I am convinced that such is the true construction of the sailing rules. Apart from that question, it might be a fair contention in this case, that there were special circumstances in this case requiring special action.] That is my submission. The plaintiffs saw that the American was towing up channel, must have judged of the enormous length of the tug and tow together, and of the difficulty of manœuvring, and yet took no steps to avoid us. In Huntley v. Palmer (Mitchell's Maritime Register, Feb. 3, 1871), Blackburn, J., intimates an opinion that a steamer towing is not a steamer within the meaning of the Act, and is not even under as much control as a sailing vessel. The Syria was not sufficiently under control to enable her crew to prevent her coming into collision with the Aracan, but the damage done by that collision was so slight that it did not contribute in any way to the loss of the Aracan.

E. C. Clarkson, in reply.—A steamship towing is within the rules, just as any other steamship, and the rules were passed so as to express this meaning. The first rule defines a steamship within the rules to be any ship under steam; Rule 4 defines what lights shall be carried by a tug towing; and Rules 15 and 16 define the duty of a steamship meeting a sailing vessel. Hence, it is clear that the Legislature had in contemplation vessels towing others, and they have made no distinction between tugs and other steamers as to their duties in relation to sailing ships, and their duty is, therefore, to keep out of the way of sailing ships. If it should be held that a steamer towing need not keep out of the way of a sailing ship close-hauled on the starboard tack, then such a steamer may force all other ships to give way, whatever the circumstances. The cases cited were decided before the rules, and hence if the rules are applicable the cases do not apply. Art. 15 applies, not only when a collision is imminent, but when there is risk of collision; whilst Art. 19 applies to cases of immediate danger, and a steamer towing cannot claim the protection of Art. 19 if it has wrongfully failed to obey Art. 15. There was a duty upon the Aracan to keep her course, and this she performed. The American ought to have slackened speed on perceiving danger.

SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—This is an important case of collision between two, if not three vessels, that is to say, between the ship Aracan, of 780 tons register, which came into collision with the screw steamship American, which screw steamship was towing a disabled screw steamship called the Syria, and the action is brought in this court by the Aracan against both vessels.

The collision took place between ten and eleven o'clock at night, on the 8th March in this year, off Portland in the English Channel, and the direction of the wind is variously stated at from W. to W.S.W. All the vessels carried their proper lights, the American carrying two masthead lights, her own masthead lights and that of the Syria, according to the rule, which prescribes that a vessel in towing another shall carry such lights.

[Priv. Co.]

THE AMERICAN AND THE SYRIA.

[Priv. Co.]

The parts of the vessels which came into contact were the port side of the American and the stem and port bow of the Aracan, and the port side of the Aracan and the starboard side of the Syria, according to the statement on behalf of the Aracan. According to the statement on behalf of the American, the bowsprit of the Aracan came into contact with the engine room skylight of the American, and then the stem of the Aracan struck the American on the port side just before the main rigging, and no doubt that is the place where the main blow was struck, "the port side of the Aracan afterwards came into contact with the stern of the Syria."

Now the Aracan was close-hauled on the starboard tack, and she says that she saw the American four or five points on her starboard bow, that is to say, she saw first of all a masthead light, one only, that of the American, four or five miles off, if not more, and four or five points on her starboard bow, and afterwards she saw two red lights, that of the American, the towing vessel, and that of the Syria, the towed vessel; she says that, in expectation that the American and Syria would take the proper course in keeping out of her way, she, the Aracan, executed no manœuvre at all until just before the collision, when she put her helm hard a-port in order to avoid the violence of the blow. Within a short time after the collision, forty minutes I think, according to the evidence, she foundered with her cargo.

The American's narrative is, that she being a very large steam vessel of nearly, I think, 1400 tons, and the other, the Syria, being nearly 2000, had towed the Syria, which was entirely disabled, owing to an accident which had happened to her screw, all the way from Ascension Island, that the towing was a work of considerable difficulty and anxiety, owing to the Syria being perfectly unmanageable, or at least answering her helm with very great difficulty. The American says that she saw the green light of the Aracan about four and a-half points on her port bow, and at the distance of three-quarters of a mile, and she ascribes the collision to two causes; first of all, that the Aracan improperly starboarded her helm and so caused the collision, and secondly, that she did not, prior to the collision, duly and properly port her helm, as it is suggested it was her duty to do.

Now I will take the last objection first, because it carries a question of law which has undergone some discussion in this case.

The question is, whether a steamer in tow of another is or is not subject to the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, which were passed and made binding by the Act of Parliament in 1862.

Now, the first article defines what a steamship shall be, and it says that, "in the following rules every steamship which is under sail and not under steam, is to be considered a sailing ship, and every steamship which is under steam, whether under sail or not, is to be considered a ship under steam;" and the 4th article, it is observed, provides for steamships towing other vessels, and says that "steamships when towing other ships shall carry two bright white masthead lights vertically in addition to their side lights, so as to distinguish them from other steamships. Each of these masthead lights shall be of the same construction and character as the masthead lights which other steamships are required to carry." Therefore, a steam vessel towing another was in the contemplation of those who drew up these rules, and the 15th article says: "That if two ships, one of which is a sailing ship and the other a steamship, are proceeding in such directions as to involve risk of collision, the steamship shall keep out of the way of the sailing ship." The 19th article says that "in obeying and construing these rules, due regard must be had to all dangers of navigation, and due regard must also be had to any special circumstances which may exist in any particular case, rendering a departure from the above rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger."

And the next article, the 20th, is "that nothing in these rules shall exonerate any ship or the owner, or master or crew thereof, from the consequences of any neglect to carry lights or signals, or of any neglect to keep a proper lookout, or of the neglect of any precaution which may be required by the ordinary practice of seamen, or by the special circumstances of the case."

Now, first of all, I am clearly of opinion that the effect of these rules is to place a steamship towing another vessel in the same category, speaking generally, as other steamships, that is to say, that the fact of her towing another vessel does not exempt her from the obligation otherwise imposed upon her by these rules. That I think was in substance my decision in the case of The Warrior (ubi sup.), which has been referred to, and to that decision I adhere, nor indeed was the argument put so high as to dispute that by the learned counsel for the American in this case. It was not contended that the mere fact of a steamship being in the act of towing another exempted her from the mere obligation of these rules, but it was said and contended with great force that the 19th and 20th articles taken together show that when there were special circumstances it was the duty of the vessel, which otherwise ought to keep her course, to execute a proper manœuvre herself, and it was contended as a matter of fact that those special circumstances existed in the present case, and that is the first point to be determined, whether there were in this case such special circumstances as required the close-hauled starboard tack vessel not to keep her course, but to execute some other manœuvre.

Now I have conferred with the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House upon this, as upon the other points of the case, and speaking now of the time when these vessels were first seen, that is to say, when the American was seen at a distance of from four to five miles, or from three to four miles off by those on board the Aracan (her mast light was seen, and afterwards her red light), speaking first of all of that state of things, I am of opinion that there were no special circumstances which rendered it the duty of the Aracan to port her helm or to starboard her helm, but that it was her duty, according to the provisions of the article, to keep her course. It is quite true that she must be taken, according to the evidence, to have been aware that at that distance these two vessels were going somewhere in the direction of E.N.E., while she was going in the direction of S.; she must be taken to have been aware of that fact, and that the one was in tow of the other at the distance, which I have mentioned, of from three to four miles; but it was, in the judgment of the court, not incumbent on her upon that ground to do otherwise than obey the rule which required a close-hauled starboard tacked vessel to keep her course.

The question, therefore, which really remains to be considered in this case, and which is the one which has from the first appeared to me of principle importance is, whether the other averments or objections set up in the answer of the American be well founded in fact or not, namely, that the Aracan did not keep her course, but starboarded her helm.

Now that is the question upon which the evidence is, as we would expect it to be, extremely conflicting, though I do not think there is any reasonable doubt upon which side, when carefully examined, the evidence preponderates. There is very strong and positive evidence given on behalf of those who were on board the Aracan that almost at the very time of the collision her sails were shaking, and that she had continued on her starboard tack. There is very strong evidence also that her port side was stove in, though it is true that unfortunately, the Aracan herself having perished, the court is deprived of the information which a distinct inspection of the vessel would otherwise have given upon this point. On the other side it is contended generally that it was the starboard side that was stove in more than the port side, though the port side was also injured, and that from the first to the last the evidence produced on the part of the American is to the effect that her sails were "ramp full," as the expression is, and that in fact she had starboarded according to the averments in the answer, and thereby produced the collision.

Now there are two witnesses in this case on whom, in the conflict of evidence, the court thinks it is justified in placing considerable reliance. There were two invalidated soldiers on board the American, from the Ashantee Coast, who were coming home, and who were on deck at the time of this collision; and, though it is perfectly true, as remarked by the counsel for the American, that if there were any question of navigation or nautical practice or science, their opinion might be very little worth having, that observation does not appear to me to have much weight in the present instance, when the question is, whether they did or did not see the red light of the Aracan before the collision. If they did see this red light of the Aracan, if it was visible to those on board the American before the collision, and they did see it, then it would be very strong evidence to show that the story told by the Aracan was true, and that she had not starboarded her helm at the time she was alleged by the American to have done so. And the court has considered this question of evidence in conference with the Elder Brethren, and has arrived at a very clear conviction that there is no reason whatever to distrust the statement made by those two soldiers. They gave their evidence with great clearness and great precision, and apparently have no interest whatever in the result of this case; and they appear to me, as indeed they did also to the Elder Brethren, to be the witnesses of truth in this case.

I have therefore arrived at the conclusion that the evidence preponderates in favour of the averment of the Aracan, that this collision was not produced by her starboarding her helm, but that she kept her course.

Now, I must observe also, that the American, according to her own statement, only saw the green light of the Aracan at a distance of three-quarters of a mile. The Aracan's green light is proved to have been one of the best quality, and the night was one upon which it would be probable that the light would be seen at the distance required by the rules, namely, at two miles, certainly at a very considerable further distance than that of three-quarters of a mile.

I therefore arrive at this not unimportant conclusion, that if the look-out had been proper, the green light of the Aracan would have been seen at an earlier time, and it would have been competent to the American to have executed the proper manœuvre for getting out of her way; but, more than that, even at the time when the green light is said to have been seen the first time, namely, at three-quarters of a mile distance, it appears to me, on looking at the evidence, and remembering the manner in which it was given by the witnesses, that there was a delay between the report of the look-out on board the American and the execution of any manœuvre on the part of those who had command of the American, which contributed to this collision. I observe that Smith, who was stationed forward to look out, says he saw a ship's light, and he reported a light on the port bow, and it appears there was no answer to this first report, though, as he says, very soon afterwards he sung out a second time, "green light" on the port bow, and was answered "all right." I think, therefore, that not only was this green light not seen in proper time, and thereby the proper manœuvre not executed in proper time, but even when it was seen, there was a culpable delay between the report of it and the execution of a proper manœuvre.

Now, the Elder Brethren are of opinion, and this is a point upon which they are more competent to judge than I am, that the proper course for the American to have taken would have been to have slackened her speed and starboarded her helm, and so gone under the stern of the Aracan, and they are of opinion that she might very well have slackened her speed, going five knots, that there was no difficulty in her being still under control if she had slackened her speed, and that was the course she ought to have pursued.

The accident, therefore, was certainly not inevitable, and might have been avoided if the American had taken the proper steps at the proper time.

I have also considered whether there were any special circumstances which required the Aracan, on her part, to execute any manœuvre whereby this collision might have been avoided, and I take it to be a sound principle of law, which cannot be too carefully or uniformly applied to cases of this description, that the vessel which is ordered by the regulations to pursue a certain course, has a right to presume up to the last moment that the other vessel will do her duty, and also observe the regulations; and it is quite clear that if the American had done her duty on this occasion, the collision would not have happened.

I do not, therefore, think it necessary to inquire whether, by any possibility, something done on the part of the Aracan might or might not have avoided or lessened the evil of the collision, because I am satisfied that up to the last moment, in this case, she had a right to presume that the American would do her duty, and that if the American had done her duty there would have been no collision.

Therefore I pronounce the American alone to blame; I do not pronounce the Syria, but I pronounce the American to blame for the collision.

Butt, Q.C.—The question of how far the decree holding the American to blame throws liability upon the Syria will have to be considered. Unless the court is prepared to pronounce definitely that the Syria is also to blame, either for her own negligent acts or as responsible for the acts of her tug, I must ask that the question should be left open, and should not be mentioned in the decree, so that the plaintiffs may be enabled to enforce the decree against the Syria, if they are entitled by law so to do, or that we may have an opportunity of arguing the question.

Milward, Q.C., claimed that the decree should dismiss the Syria from the suit, as the court held that she was not to blame.

SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—I have pronounced the American alone to blame, and if the legal effect of the judgment is to create liability on the part of the Syria, I must condemn both ships, but that is a question which will have to be argued before I decide it.

May 5.—The question of the liability of the Syria to be condemned in the damage done to the Aracan came on for argument.

Butt, Q.C. and E. C. Clarkson for the plaintiffs.

The collision having been occasioned by the default of those on board the American, the question for decision is, whether a decree is to be made against the owners of the American and their bail alone, or against the owners of that vessel and of the Syria and their bail. The only distinction that can be drawn between this case and that of a hired tug towing a ship is, that here both vessels belonged to the same owners, and we submit that such a distinction can have no effect in law upon the form of the decree. If the Syria had engaged a tug to tow her home, and the tug had damaged the Aracan, the Syria would have been liable for that damage. The employment of a ship belonging to the same owners can make no difference in principle. In The Cleadon (Lush. 158), it was held that a tug and tow are, for the purpose of considering the manœuvres they are bound to execute, to be treated as one vessel, and this decision is confirmed in the Arthur Gordon—The Independence (Lush. 270, 278). If a tug and tow are to be treated as one vessel for one purpose, then they ought to be so treated for all. If this were a joint tort, both might be condemned, although belonging to the same owners. Even where the negligent act is that of one of several co-owners, the others are liable for the act of the one, who is to be treated as agent of the others: (Moreton v. Hardern 4 B. & C. 23.) The crew of the American were engaged in the service of towing the Syria, and were for the performance of that service the servants of the owners of the Syria, and hence the Syria and her owners must be held liable for the negligent acts of the crew of the American. [SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—It is important to consider whether the American was employed for a towage service. If she was a salvor there may be a distinction.] There was an employment by which the crew of the American were engaged out of the scope of their contract to bring home the Syria. Whether this employment was in the nature of salvage or towage can make no difference, because it is a contract the consideration for which could be recovered at common law in an action for work and labour, and hence the American became for the time the servant of the Syria. If the governing power was in the American, she was still the servant of the Syria, and if the governing power was in the Syria, the collision must be considered as having been occasioned by her direct default. Moreover, upon the facts, we submit that the negligence of the officers and crew of the Syria contributed to the collision. [SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—I found as a fact, with the assistance of the Trinity Masters, that there was no negligence on the part of the Syria herself, apart from the American.]

Milward, Q.C. (Gainsford Bruce with him).—The real principle underlying these cases is, that where a tug and tow come into collision with another ship, through the fault of the tug, the tow is liable for the collision only where the governing power is in the tow. Where the tow has on board a pilot or other person who directs the movements of both tug and tow, then the tow is liable for the acts of the tug. The duty of a tug towing a ship, in ordinary circumstances, is to obey the orders of the pilot on board the ship, save only where the tug sees that the pilot is taking both the tug and tow into obvious danger, and has the means, and can consistently with a due observance of the law, avoid that danger:

The Duke of Manchester, 2 W. Rob. 477;

The Christina, 6 Notes of Cas. 9; 3 W. Rob. 27;

Moore P. C. C. 379;

The Julia, Lush. 224.

The tug is the servant of the tow, and is bound to obey the orders of those on board the tow in such circumstances. Here, however, there was no contract between the parties. This is shown by the fact that if the American had declined to complete her service, there would have been no remedy either against her or her crew. The American was a salvor, and was not only the motive but also the governing power.

Butt, Q.C., in reply.—The pilotage question does not affect this case. The only question here is, whether the American was the servant or the agent of the Syria. Even if the American was a salvor, which I cannot admit, it would make no difference. Salvors rendering assistance to a ship, and bringing her into collision, would render her liable, as they would be her agents to perform the salvage service.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 16.—SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—In this case I have already pronounced the steamship American, which was towing a disabled steamship the Syria, to blame for a collision with the Aracan. The question whether the Syria, the towed vessel, was also to blame, stood over for consideration. The exact point has, I think, not yet been decided; but the principle that two vessels in the relative positions of the American and Syria constitute in intention of law, at least so far as cases of collision are concerned, one vessel, has been decided; and upon reflection, I think this principle carries me a great way to a conclusion that the Syria is also to blame.

I should observe also, that both the American and the Syria belonged to the same owners, and that both vessels came into collision with the Aracan, although the damage inflicted by the Syria was extremely trifling.

In the case of The Cleadon (ubi sup.) the Privy Council said, the Cleadon being in tow of the steam tug it is admitted in the case that she and the tow must be considered to be one vessel, "the motive power being in the tug, the governing power in the vessel that is towed."

In the subsequent case of The Arthur Gordon (ubi sup.), this judgment was referred to, and it was said: "Their Lordships never intended to lay down in the case of The Cleadon, that a steamtug in charge of a ship must be considered as a free steamer," but the proposition as to the towing and towed vessels forming one vessel in a case of maritime tort, does not appear to have been questioned.

The decision in the present case is, I am aware, of great consequence to the parties, inasmuch as it is probable, so I am informed, that the defendants, as owners of the American alone, under the exemption of limited liability, will not be obliged to pay the full amount of the damage inflicted on the Aracan, and of course, their additional liability as owners of the Syria, will make a great difference in this respect. It appeared to me at first sight that the fact that the towing vessel was a salvor and not a hired tug, might make a difference in the application of the law, inasmuch as it was contended that the governing power was not in the towed but the towing vessel; but on reflection, I think this distinction does not affect the case, whether the governing power be in the towed vessel, as according to the judgment just referred to it would usually be, or whether it be in the vessel which was by towing performing an act of salvage, in either case I think the two vessels must be considered one in the present instance.

I therefore pronounce the Syria also to blame for this collision.

A decree having been made by the learned judge in accordance with the above judgments, the owners of the American and the Syria appealed therefrom, for the following amongst other reasons:

1. Because the evidence proved that the Aracan improperly deviated from her course under a starboard helm.
2. Because, even assuming that the Aracan kept her course until there was immediate danger of collision under the circumstances proved in evidence, the Aracan was to blame for neglecting to take measures to avoid the collision.
3. Because the 15th article of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea does not apply to the circumstances of this case.
4. Because the collision happened without any negligence on the part of the American, and without any negligence on the part of the Syria.
5. Because, under the circumstances proved in evidence, the American adopted the proper measures, and did all that could be done by her to avoid the collision, and the Syria did all that could be done by her to avoid the collision.
6. Because it would have been impossible for the American and Syria to have slackened speed so as to have gone under the stern of the Aracan.
7. Because it was not proved that those in charge of the American, or that those in charge of the Syria, had been guilty of any negligence.

The appellants further submitted that the decree appealed from ought to be reversed, so far as it relates to the Syria, for the following amongst other reasons.

1. Because the Syria being towed was under the direction of the American, and she ought not in law to be rendered liable for the default of those on board the American.

2. Because the American and the Syria were, in law as well as in fact, two separate ships and not one ship.

3. Because the question whether or not the Syria is to blame, must be determined altogether without regard to the circumstance that the American and Syria belonged to the same owners.

4. Because the Syria did not contribute to the loss of the Aracan, and did not cause any damage to the respondents.

The reasons submitted by the respondents for supporting the decree were as follows:

1. Because it was the duty of the Aracan, being a sailing ship, to keep her course, and of the American and Syria to keep out of her way, and the evidence established that the Aracan did keep her course until the American and Syria had caused immediate danger of collision, when she ported, as she was entitled to do, and the evidence established that the collision was occasioned by the negligent navigation of the American.

2. Because the collisions were occasioned by the negligent navigation of the Syria.

3. Because the American having been engaged in the service of the Syria at the time of the collision, the Syria, and the appellants as her owners, were and are liable to the respondents in respect of the said collision, even if there was no actual negligence on the part of those on board the Syria occasioning or contributing to the collision.

4. Because the decree appealed from is in accordance with the evidence, and right in point of law.

July 10, 11, and 14.—Milward, Q.C. and Gainsford Bruce, for the appellants.—First, upon the facts, the evidence establishes that the Aracan improperly starboarded, that she improperly kept her course until there was immediate danger of collision, although the circumstances required a deviation from it; that the American was guilty of no negligence, nor was the Syria, and porting was the right course to adopt under the circumstances, and that it was impossible for the American to have slackened speed, considering the necessity of keeping her position with regard to the Syria.

Secondly, Art. 15 of the Regulations does not apply to the circumstances of this case. In The Independence (4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 565; 14 Moore P. O. C. 103; Lush. 270; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 88) it is laid down that a steamer in tow is not mistress of her own motions; she is under the control of and has to consider the ship to which she is attached, of which it is for many purposes to be considered a part, the motive power being in the steamer, and the governing power in the ship towed. The American could not by starboarding have gone off in time to have avoided the Aracan, nor could she have slackened speed, as she would have brought the Syria down upon herself. It was the duty of the Aracan, seeing the immense length of the tug and tow, and the consequent difficulty of manoeuvring, to have assisted the American in avoiding collision by going up into the wind. These were special circumstances, taking the case out of the operation of Art. 15. Although the above case was decided before the Regulations became law, it applies equally, because they have not altered but only formulated the law as it stood before. A ship has no right to carry on her course to the manifest danger of another: (The Mary Bannatyne, Stuart's Vice-Adm. Rep. 353.)

Thirdly, even supposing the American to blame for the collision, the Syria is not to blame, either in fact or in law; in fact, there was no negligence, and the only ground upon which the Syria could be held liable, would be that she is legally responsible for the acts of the American as her agent or servant. But the American was not the agent or servant of the Syria. She was not employed by the master or crew of the Syria, nor was she under their control. In the United States the question has been much considered, and it has been there held that the responsibility of the tug or tow is to be determined by inquiring which vessel is the principal and which the servant; if the tug has the sole control of the movements of both, then she alone is responsible:

The Energy, L. Rep. 3 Adm. & Eco. 48;
 Kent's Commentaries, Vol. 3, part v., sect. 17, par. 8;
The Niagara and The Elizabeth, Stuart's Vice-Admiralty Rep. (Canada) 308; Sproul v. Hemingway, 14 Pickering (Mass.), 1;
The Alabama, 1. Benedict, 476;
The Epress, 1 Blatchford, 365;
The Hector, 4 Blatchford, 200, affirmed Sturgis v. Boyer, 24 Howard Sup. Ct. Rep. 110.

Here the American had the sole control, and received no orders from the Syria, but was both the motive and the governing power. The Cleadon (4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 157; 14 Moore P.C.C. 92; Lush, 160; 1 Mar. Law. Cas. O.S. 41) does not apply to this case, because there it was shown that the tow had the control, and on that ground only were the tug and tow held to be one ship. The master of the American in towing the Syria home, was acting partly from what he considered his duty to his owners, and partly in order to obtain salvage from the Syria and her cargo, but in no sense did he act as a servant of the Syria, having no contract and being under no obligation to render assistance to that particular ship.

But, Q.C. and E. C. Clarkson, for the respondents.—First, there was negligence on the part of both the American and the Syria, causing the loss of the Aracan. There was no negligence on the part of the Aracan. She kept her course, in fulfilment of her duty as a sailing vessel. A sailing vessel meeting a steamer must hold on her course up to the last moment, and is only entitled to deviate from it to avoid immediate danger within Art. 19 of the regulations. The 18th article, compelling ships to keep their course when another is to be kept out of the way, is to be read in conjunction with the 19th article, and the meaning of the two together is to impose the obligation of obeying the 18th article as far as consistent with not incurring immediate danger. This has been decided in several cases:

The Warrior, 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 101; L. Rep. 3 Adm. & Eco. 553; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 400;
The Emperor, The Zephyr, see note, ante, p. 352;
The Galat, The Zenobia, see note, ante, p. 352;
The David Cannon, see note, ante, p. 353;
The Pennsylvania, 3 Benedict, 215.

The 19th article was framed for the protection of a vessel keeping her course, and not to compel her to deviate under any given set of circumstances. [Sir M. SMITH.—It is evident that under these rules, special circumstances are only to come into play whilst the rules are being obeyed.] A sailing vessel is entitled to hold on till the last, in the expectation that the steamship will avoid her, and special circumstances only arise when it is at the last moment discovered that there is immediate danger of collision; then the sailing ship is entitled to deviate, but not otherwise. If it was competent for the American and Syria to go under the stern of the Aracan, no special circumstances arose in this case. The steamships should have starboarded. They had to clear only the length of the Aracan, whereas she would have had to clear the length of the tug, towrope, and the tow, and this she could only have done by going up into the wind, being closehauled. The crew of the American ought to have seen the lights of the Aracan sooner, and then there would have been plenty of time to starboard. If they could not starboard they might have slackened speed, and so kept out of the way. The Aracan had the right to expect them to keep out of the way. [Sir R. P. COLLIER.—Primâ facie, no doubt; but supposing the Aracan saw that the steamer was not keeping out of the way.] She had the right to expect that some measure would be taken, up to the last moment.

Secondly, the evidence establishes that the Aracan did not, by starboarding or otherwise, deviate from her course, but that she only ported at the last moment to avoid immediate danger.

Thirdly, as to the liability of the Syria for the acts of the American. The American cases cited are reviewed in Parsons on Shipping, vol. 1, p. 534, and there shown to be irreconcilable. If the Syria is not herself to blame for the collision, she is responsible for the negligence of the American. Conceding that the American was a salvor, her services were rendered under an implied contract, and whilst performing that contract she was the servant of the Syria. It might be said that, in the case of a derelict ship, the salvor's act would not bind the owners of the derelict, but where a salvage service is rendered under an arrangement, whether express or implied, made with the master or owners of the salved ship, the latter are responsible for the acts of the salvors, just as if they had employed a steamtug to render ordinary towage service. In this case the liability is even more plain, because both the vessels belonged to the same owners, and the master and crew of the American were the servants of the owners of the Syria, and were acting in pursuance of their duty towards those owners. The master of the American having undertaken to tow the Syria, must necessarily have been under the control of the latter vessel as to speed, direction, and such orders as were necessary to regulate these, and hence the "governing power" within the meaning of The Cleadon (ubi sup.) was in the Syria. But even if the "governing power" was not in the Syria, the negligent act of the American was the act of a servant or agent acting within the scope of his employment, and the principal is responsible for that act. According to the English decisions, the tug, if in fault, is liable, but the ship is also liable as the principal. The tow is liable both for her own acts and for those of the tug: (The Unity, Swab. 102.) [Sir R. P. COLLIER.—The Syria was incapable of being navigated in this case, and was wholly under the control of the American. Does not this make a distinction between this case and the ordinary English cases of tug and tow?] The English law treats tug and tow as one vessel, and that creates liability in both. This liability must be decided now as the Court of Chancery will not decide the collision clause in case of a claim for limited liability. The Merchant Shipping Act 1862, s. 54, gives the right to limitation where the injury has been caused by the improper navigation of the defendant's ship. It is necessary to decide the liability of the Syria, as the amount of liability in respect of the American is not enough to satisfy the plaintiffs' claim.

Milward, Q.C., in reply.

July 24.—The judgment of the court was delivered by Sir R. P. COLLIER.—The American and the Syria are two large steam vessels belonging to the Union Steam Navigation Company, plying between the Cape of Good Hope and London.

The Syria, on her voyage home, became disabled, through some damage to her machinery, and put in at Ascension Island. The captain of the American, also on his voyage home, calling at Ascension and finding the Syria disabled, determined to tow her home, and attached her to his ship by long hawsers. He entered the British Channel with the Syria thus in tow, and was at a distance of about sixteen miles off Portland, at 11 p.m. on the 8th March 1874, when the collision, the subject of the suit, occurred. The American had two white lights on her foremast, and both vessels had the usual red and green lights; the night was moderately clear, the wind west, or west-south-west. The American, with the Syria in tow, was steering east by north-half-north, and going at the rate of about five knots an hour.

The Aracan was a sailing ship of 788 tons register, and was going down the channel on a voyage from London to Hong Kong, and was beating against the wind.

There were cross suits in the Admiralty Court.

The account of the Aracan is substantially this: that she was close hauled by the wind on the starboard tack, heading about south, when she saw "the white light" (she never saw the two white lights) of the American, at a distance of between four or five miles; that at a distance of two miles she made out the red lights of both vessels, and understood that one was towing the other; that, acting under the 15th and 18th Admiralty Rules, she kept her course, expecting the towing steamer to get out of her way by starboarding her helm and passing to the stern, until finding a collision imminent, she ported her helm as the best mode of lessening its force.

The case of the American and Syria is, that the captain of the American saw the green light of the Aracan first at a distance of a mile or three-quarters of a mile, although a good lookout was kept. That impeded as he was by his "tow," he was unable to starboard his helm sufficiently to pass to the stern of the Aracan, that he could not slacken his pace, because he would not have had sufficient steering way, and might have run a risk of fouling his tow or the hawsers, and that nothing remained to him but to port his helm, thereby giving the Aracan "more room;" that he did this, and that his ship went off one point on the port helm; that the Aracan starboarded her helm and so caused the collision, whereas she ought to have ported it, and either turned round on the opposite tack or have passed under the stern of the Syria.

The learned judge of the Admiralty Court found that the Aracan was in no respect to blame, and that the collision was wholly caused by the negligent navigation of the American

He appears to have found as a fact that there was no negligence on the part of the captain or crew of the Syria conducing to the accident; but after hearing further argument on this subject, he came to the conclusion that, in point of law, the Syria must be pronounced also to blame, on the ground that she must be taken to have been, in intendment of law, one vessel with the American.

The present appeal is from this judgment.

The appellants have much relied on the case of the Independence, decided by this Board, and reported in 14 Moore's P.C.C. p. 103, where a distinction is pointed out between the situation of a steamer unencumbered, and of a steamer with a ship in tow. Lord Kingsdown there observes: "A steamer unencumbered is nearly independent of the wind. She can turn out of her course, and turn into it again, with little difficulty or inconvenience. She can slacken or increase her speed, stop or reverse her engines, and can move in one direction or the other with the utmost facility. She is therefore with reason, considered bound to give way to a sailing vessel close hauled, which is less subject to control and less manageable. But a steamer with a ship in tow is in a very different situation. She is not in anything like the same degree the mistress of her own motions; she is under the control of, and has to consider the ship to which she is attached, and of which, as their Lordships observed in the case of the Cleadon, she may for many purposes be considered as a part, the motive power being in the steamer, and the governing power in the ship towed. She cannot, by stopping or reversing her engines, at once stop or back the ship which is following her."

It is true that this case was decided before the promulgation of the present Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, which in terms direct that, where the courses of two vessels involve risk of collision, the steamship shall keep out of the way of the sailing ship, and that the sailing ship shall keep her course, subject to due regard to dangers of navigation, and to special circumstances rendering a departure from the rule necessary in order to avoid immediate danger.

But the rule of navigation, though formulated, can scarcely be said to have been altered by the Regulations, and the distinction taken between the relations of an encumbered and an unencumbered steamer is manifestly a just one and still applicable. It does not go the length of absolving altogether the encumbered steamer from obedience to the rules which apply to all steamers, but it necessitates allowances being made under the circumstances of each case for the comparatively disabled condition of the encumbered steamer, and imposes upon the sailing ship approaching her the duty of additional caution. It may be observed that, in 1863, an additional article was promulgated, requiring the towing steamer to exhibit two white lights instead of one, doubtless for the purpose of warning all approaching vessels that she was encumbered, and not in all respects mistress of her movements.

Their Lordships have given the benefit of all these considerations to the American, but are unable to come to the conclusion that the judge of the Admiralty Court was wrong in pronouncing her to blame. They do not think (and in this they are confirmed by their assessors) that her not seeing the green light of the ship until the vessels were within a mile or three-quarters of a mile of each other, is sufficient to convict her of negligence in not keeping a sufficient look-out. But they think that to attempt, with the long mass behind her, to cross the bows of the ship was an extremely hazardous, and not a necessary act. Their Lordships are of opinion that she might have slackened speed, as it was her duty to do, even if she could not have starboarded, and that the collision might have been avoided.

The American charges the Aracan with starboarding; she denies it. There is much conflicting evidence on the subject, and the learned judge, who had the advantage of seeing and hearing the witnesses, believes the case of the Aracan. Their Lordships though not quite satisfied on this subject, after consultation with their nautical assessors, are not prepared to reverse this finding.

She saw at a considerable distance, according to her account two miles, two large steamers, one towing the other, with a great length of hawser between them, and she saw the red lights of both. It has been contended that, inasmuch as she must or should have seen that the leading steamer was not starboarding but was porting, or, if not, keeping on her course, that she ought not to have persisted in her endeavour to pass before the bows of the steamer, but should have ported her helm, stopped her course, and turned round on the other tack. Considering, however, that the Aracan might reasonably have expected the American to keep out of her way, by either starboarding her helm and slackening her speed, and that if the Aracan had stopped with a view to tacking, this very manoeuvre might have thrown her in the way of the American if the American had starboarded; their Lordships are unable to pronounce the Aracan to blame for keeping her course as it was her duty to do, unless departure from it was necessitated by special circumstances to avoid immediate danger.

For these reasons their Lordships are of opinion that the American was to blame for the collision.

The question remains whether the Syria, though free from blame in fact, must nevertheless be held to blame by intendment of law. The decision of the learned judge upon this point appears to be based upon the principle shortly stated by Lord Kingsdown, in the passage which has been before cited as that on which The Cleadon (14 Moore, 97) was decided, viz., that the motive power was in the tug, the governing power in the ship towed. The judge of the Admiralty Court applying this principle to the present case, held that the American and the Syria constituted one vessel in intendment of law. This is no doubt an accurate representation of the relations usually subsisting in this country between the tug and the tow. The tug is in the service of the tow, the tow is answerable for the negligence of her servant, and is for some purposes identified with her. Some American cases have been cited which, though differently decided, illustrate this principle.

It appears that, in the large American rivers and lakes, it is usual for a tug, which is spoken of as a public vessel, to take a number of small vessels in tow, some alongside of her, some astern. She assigns to each of these vessels its place, and they are under her direction. Under these circumstances, the American Courts have held that a vessel towed is not liable for the negligence of the tug, because the "governing power" is in the tug, not in her. The master of the American appears to have undertaken to tow the Syria, under circumstances quite exceptional. Their Lordships collect that he determined to take home the Syria, partly because he thought it his duty to his employers, who owned both vessels, partly with a view to obtain salvage from his owners, and the owners of the Syria's cargo (which he succeeded in doing). There is no evidence of his having been hired by the captain of the Syria, or having acted in any way under the captain of the Syria's control. On the contrary, it would appear that the "governing power" was wholly with the American. Under these circumstances, their Lordships are of opinion that the principle on which the Cleadon was decided does not apply to this case: that the Syria cannot be deemed in intendment of law one vessel with the American, or liable for her negligence. Nor do they think that the fact of the American and Syria belongs to the same owners affecting the question whether or not the Syria was to blame.

Their Lordships will, therefore, humbly advise her Majesty that, in the suit of the owners of the Aracan against the owners of the American and Syria, the judgment be varied by declaring that the American alone was to blame; that in the suit of the owners of the American and Syria against the Aracan, the judgment be affirmed. There will be no costs of these appeals.

Judgment varied accordingly.

MAVRO AND ANOTHER v. THE OCEAN MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Marine insurance—General average as per foreign statement—Determination of voyage at an intermediate port—Jurisdiction of Consular Court at Constantinople to make order for adjustment of average.

A policy of insurance on wheat on board a certain vessel from Varna to Marseilles, contained the words "general average as per foreign statement." There was a suing and labouring clause, and among other things corn was declared to be warranted free from average unless general.

The ship was injured by straining in a storm, and was towed into Constantinople when some of the wheat was found to be damaged, and the ship herself unable to proceed without undergoing thorough repair.

The British Supreme Consular Court was applied to by petition, and surveyors were appointed, who recommended the sale of the damaged portion of the cargo, and the transshipment of the rest, and an order of the court was made in accordance with this recommendation. Subsequently the court duly appointed average adjusters, who investigated the various claims, and they, following the decision of the Judge of the Consular Court to whom the question was submitted, made up the average adjustment according to the law of France, and the average adjustment was registered and homologated by a decree of the court.

The damage to the wheat was treated as general average, and properly so, according to the law of France. Upon action brought to recover a general average loss.

Held first, that the Consular Court at Constantinople, having made the orders, must be taken to have had the necessary jurisdiction. (a)

Secondly, that the voyage was necessarily broken up at Constantinople.

Thirdly, that upon the true construction of the policy, this was not a particular average loss, but in consequence of the voyage being properly broken up at Constantinople, brought within the words of the policy, a general average as per foreign statement.

Harris v. Scaramanga (ante, vol. 1, p. 339; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 697; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 481), and Hendricks v. The Australian Insurance Company (ante, p. 244; 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 419) followed.

THIS was a special case stated by an arbitrator for the opinion of the court. The action was brought on a policy of insurance on wheat, and advances valued at 9200*l.* at and from Varna to Marseilles on board the vessel General Chassé.

In the declaration the plaintiffs sought to recover: first, a general average loss; secondly, a total loss; thirdly, a loss under the suing and labouring clause in the policy. The defendants paid into court the sum of 110*l.*, which the plaintiffs denied to be sufficient to satisfy their claim.

The policy contained the following provisions:—

General average as per foreign statement.

And in case of any loss or misfortune it shall be lawful to the insured, their factors, servants, and assigns, to sue, labour, and travel for in and about the defence, safeguard, and recovery of the aforesaid subject—matter of this insurance, or any part thereof, without prejudice to this insurance.

And it is declared and agreed that corn, fish, salt, fruit, flour, and seed shall be and are warranted free from average, unless general, or the ship be stranded.

By the consent of the parties after issued joined,

(a) Although this is a decision to the effect that the Consular Court at Constantinople had, for the purposes of this case, jurisdiction to make the orders in question, it cannot be taken as a decision to the effect that the British Consular Courts in the Levant have general jurisdiction over average adjustments and statements. The decision of the Common Pleas decides only that the facts laid before them in this particular case are sufficient to enable them and to bind them in this case to decide that the Consular Court has jurisdiction in such matters until its decisions are reversed on appeal to the proper tribunal. In effect, the Common Pleas decides that it is not for them to investigate the question of jurisdiction where that jurisdiction has been exercised by custom by a properly constituted court for a considerable period; they consider that the Consular Court in such a matter is the best judge of its own jurisdiction, and (they treat it in the same category as a foreign court, and respect its interpretation of the law administered in it until that interpretation has been varied or reserved by its Court of Appeal. At the same time, there can be no doubt that it has been the custom of the British Consular Courts in the Levant to exercise jurisdiction in similar cases, and this custom is in unison with that followed by the Consular Courts of all nations in the Levant: (See Messina v. Petrocchino, ante, vol. 1, p. 294.) This custom has been so useful, and the jurisdiction exercised so salutary in its effects that it is to be hoped that the Court of Appeal would consider long before deciding that no such jurisdiction existed.—Ed.

and by the order of Grove, J., on 18th Jan. 1872, there was stated for the opinion of the court, the following:—

CASE.

1. The plaintiffs carry on business as merchants and brokers in London and Marseilles, and the defendants are an insurance company carrying on business in London.

2. In Sept. 1867, Mr. Sovrono, who was a Greek merchant domiciled at Constantinople, and who was desirous of consigning to the plaintiffs at Marseilles for sale a cargo of 29,156 kilos of wheat belonging to him, chartered the vessel General Chassé, which was a British vessel belonging to Guiseppe Saliba, a Maltese subject, resident at Constantinople, to carry the said cargo of wheat from Varna to Marseilles, and caused the same to be shipped on board the said vessel at Varna on or about the 18th Dec. 1867. Mr. Sovrono also made advances to the master of the General Chassé amounting to the sum of 149*l.* 9*d.* on account of the freight payable under the charter-party. The plaintiffs and the said Sovrono were jointly interested in the adventure relating to the said cargo of wheat.

3. On the 22nd Nov. 1867, the plaintiffs effected with the defendants a policy of insurance for 1000*l.* (a copy of which policy, marked A., is annexed hereto, and is to form part of this case). This insurance is declared to be "upon 29,156 Constantinople kilos wheat, and advances valued at 9200*l.* general average as per foreign statement on the ship General Chassé, at and from Varna to Marseilles," and it is also declared to be warranted free from average, unless general.

4. On the 6th Nov. 1867, the General Chassé, with the said cargo of wheat on board, sailed from Varna for Marseilles. Very soon after leaving port she encountered heavy gales and thick weather, which continued for some hours before she came to anchor in the Bosphorus, as hereinafter mentioned. In fair weather the vessel would have taken from four to five days to have made the voyage to the Bosphorus.

5. On the 7th Nov., during a heavy gale from the north it became necessary, on account of the vessel nearing land, that she should carry a press of sail in order to prevent her making further leeway. This was accordingly done, and in consequence the vessel laboured very much, and shipped heavy seas, which carried away the jolly boat, and other parts of the vessel's apparel and furniture. It was also found necessary to throw overboard sundry articles which were on deck, in order that the working of the ship might not be impeded. The next day there was a strong gale from the north, and as the vessel got very near the land it became necessary, for the safety of ship and cargo, that a still further press of sail should be carried in order to avoid a lee shore. More canvas was accordingly set. This caused the General Chassé to strain very much, several of the sails were split and carried away, and she soon sprung a leak; the leak was, however, kept under by pumping, wheat being constantly pumped up with the water.

6. On the 24th Nov. the General Chassé was brought to anchor at Bajuk Limon, in the Bosphorus, and on the following day having been taken in tow by a steam-tug, which it was necessary to employ by reason of the vessel's damaged and disabled condition, she was brought to anchor at Tophate, in the port of Constantinople.

7. On the 27th Nov. the master of the General Chassé petitioned the Judge of Her Majesty's Supreme Consular Court of Constantinople to appoint surveyors to survey the vessel, and accordingly surveyors were appointed by the court, who, on the 28th Nov. 1867, surveyed the vessel in the presence of the said Guiseppe Saliba, her owner, and Mr. Sovrono, and recommended that the voyage of the vessel should end at Constantinople, and that the cargo of wheat should be sold by public auction for the benefit of all concerned, thereupon the master petitioned the court that an order might be made for the immediate sale of the cargo by public auction, and this order was made on the same day.

8. On the 2nd Dec., Fourtuné Jourdain, agent of the Assurance Maritimes de France, prayed the said court for leave to intervene in the proceedings on the ground that the cargo was insured in his company. Such leave was accordingly granted to him, and upon his application the sale of the cargo was suspended, and a fresh survey ordered by the court.

9. On the 7th Dec., Mr. Henry Lamb petitioned the said court for leave to intervene in the proceedings as agent for the Maltese Underwriters, and leave was granted to him on the same day; also Mr. Hopper, Lloyd's agent, addressed a petition to the said court, stating that he approved of the steps taken by M. Jourdain, and praying that as an agent for Lloyd's he might attend the fresh survey, and his prayer was likewise granted.

10. On the 10th Dec. the fresh survey took place in the presence of the surveyors and Messrs. Jourdain and Hopper. It was found that about one fifth part of the cargo of wheat was damaged, and it was recommended by the surveyors that the sound portion should be at once transhipped, and the damaged portion sold by public auction.

11. The damage which the cargo was found as aforesaid to have sustained (so far as could be ascertained), had been caused by the General Chassé having carried a press of sail, and by her having consequently strained and shipped heavy seas and sprung a leak under the circumstances above-mentioned.

12. After the said survey of the 10th Dec., Messrs. Sovrono and Hopper petitioned the court to order the damaged portion of the cargo to be sold, and the sound portion to be transhipped; and the court having made an order in accordance with such petition, the damaged wheat was sold by public auction, and the undamaged wheat was in the beginning of Jan. 1868, transhipped on board an Austrian vessel, the Francisca M., in which it was safely conveyed to Marseilles, its original port of destination.

13. There were no public warehouses or docks at Constantinople for warehousing wheat. There was no evidence to show what it would have cost to have warehoused the wheat in private warehouses. It was also uncertain whether it would have taken one or two months after the discharge of the cargo to have repaired the General Chassé, on account of the difficulty in procuring a proper berth for the vessel at Constantinople, and also on account of the possibility of bad weather interfering with the repairs. Under these circumstances it was considered advisable to tranship the sound wheat as aforesaid. It was also considered advisable to sell the damaged wheat, because it could not be transhipped together with the sound wheat without damaging the latter, and because it was not worth transhipping separately.

14. The General Chassé was afterwards repaired at Constantinople, and on the 21st Feb. she was fit to proceed to sea with cargo.

15. On the 3rd March 1868 Mr. Sovrono petitioned the court to appoint average adjusters to adjust the average in respect of the General Chassé and her cargo, and to ascertain the contribution due from the parties interested.

16. The court accordingly appointed average adjusters. They were sworn by the learned judge of the said Supreme Consular Court, and proceeded to hold meetings in the building of the court. At these meetings Mr. Sovrono and Messrs. Jourdain and Hopper were present, and they or their counsel were heard in support of their respective claims and contentions, but there was no agent of the defendant's present.

17. During the discussions before the average adjusters, the question having arisen as to the law by which the average adjustment ought to be governed, it was submitted to the learned judge of the court, who decided that it ought to be governed by the law of France as being the country to which the port of destination of the cargo belonged.

18. In pursuance of this decision the average adjusters made up the average adjustment according to the law of France, and such average adjustment was afterwards registered in the court and homologated by a decree of the court.

19. The law by which the average adjustment ought to have been regulated according to the law and usages prevailing at Constantinople, and applicable to the General Chassé and her cargo under the circumstances of the case, was the law of France, and the said average adjustment was made up in all respects in conformity with such law.

20. Assuming that Her Majesty's Supreme Consular Court could acquire jurisdiction over the aforesaid matters by the force of custom, there was not sufficient evidence of such custom to prove that it had in this matter acquired jurisdiction, but the plaintiffs rely on the documents marked B, which are contained in the appendix, and are to form part of the case, for the purpose of establishing that the court had jurisdiction.

21. In the said average adjustment, the damage which the cargo of wheat had sustained, as aforesaid, was treated as general average, and the sum payable by the defendants under the policy sued on, in accordance with the said average adjustment, would be 275*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.*

22. The defendants contend that they are not liable in respect of any damage to the wheat, and they have paid enough money into court to cover the plaintiff's claim, in respect of all items contained in the said average adjustment with the exception of the item representing the damage of the wheat.

23. The court is to be at liberty to draw inferences of fact.

24. A copy of the pleadings is hereunto annexed, marked C., and is to form part of this case.

25. The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the defendants are, or are not, liable as aforesaid to pay the plaintiffs a sum not exceeding that paid into court. If the court should be of opinion in the affirmative, judgment is to be entered for the plaintiffs for such sum and such interest, if any, as the court may direct, together with costs, the court being at liberty, if it should think proper, to refer the amount for which the verdict is to be entered to the decision of Arthur Coben, Esq., Barrister-at-Law, upon such principles as the court may direct. If the court should be of opinion in the negative, then judgment is to be entered for the defendants with costs.

The following extracts from the Orders in Council respecting the administration of justice in the Ottoman Empire, dated 30th Nov. 1864, show the orders referred to in par. 20 and relied upon by the plaintiffs.

6. All Her Majesty's jurisdiction exercisable in the Ottoman dominions for the judicial hearing and determination of matters in difference between British subjects and foreigners, or for the administration or control of the property or persons of British subjects, or for the repression or punishment of crimes or offences committed by British subjects, or for the maintenance of order among British subjects, shall be exercised under and according to the provisions of this order, and not otherwise.

8. Nothing in this order shall be deemed to deprive Her Majesty's Consular Officers of the right to observe and to enforce the observance of any reasonable custom obtaining within the Ottoman dominions, or to deprive any person of the benefit thereof, except where this order contains some express and specific provision incompatible with the observance of such custom.

26. All Her Majesty's jurisdiction, civil and criminal, exercisable in the Ottoman dominions shall, for and within the district of the Consulate-General of Constantinople, be vested exclusively in the Supreme Consular Court as its ordinary original jurisdiction.

39. The supreme and every other consular court shall be a court of law and equity, and (subject to other provisions of this order) shall have and may exercise all jurisdiction, power, and authority, legal, equitable, or other, which any Consul of Her Majesty by custom has or may exercise in the Ottoman dominions.

41. The Supreme Consular Court shall be a court of Vice-Admiralty, and as such shall, for and within the Ottoman dominions, and for vessels and persons coming within those dominions, have all such jurisdiction as for the time being ordinarily belongs to Courts of Vice-Admiralty in Her Majesty's possessions abroad.

On this case the plaintiffs' points were first, that the loss was a loss by the perils insured against in the policy; secondly, that the average adjustment was a "foreign statement" within the meaning of the clause in the policy, and was consequently binding and conclusive against the defendants as to the matters therein treated as general average; thirdly, that the loss in question was properly treated as a general average loss; fourthly, that the Supreme Consular Court is a court of competent jurisdiction, and that the decision of that court as to the law by which the average adjustment ought to be governed is binding; fifthly, that the homologation of the said adjustment by a decree of the Consular Court renders the adjustment binding on the defendants as a decree of a court of competent jurisdiction; sixthly, that the ship's port of destination for the discharge of the cargo being Marseilles, the defendants are bound to indemnify the plaintiffs against any loss which is a general average loss according to the law of France.

The defendants' points were first, that the plaintiffs were not shown to have been bound to contribute in general average under the adjustment; secondly, that the adjustment under the circumstances was not such an adjustment as was contemplated by the policy; thirdly, that the voyage was not shown to have been necessarily broken up at Constantinople and that the general average should have been settled upon the arrival in safety of ship and goods by adjusters conversant with the law and custom of the port of destination; fourthly, that the Supreme Consular Court had no jurisdiction over the settlement of the general average or the matters referred to in the case, and had no power to register the adjustment; fifthly, that the damage to cargo was a particular average loss from which the defendants are exempted by the terms of the policy; sixthly, that the defendants have paid into court sufficient to cover all that the plaintiffs have had to pay by way of contribution in general average, and are not further liable; seventhly, that the damage to the wheat by sea water was particular average according to English law from which the defendants are exempted by the terms of the policy, and that what took place at Constantinople did not extend their liability.

Watkin Williams, Q.C. (McLeod with him), for the plaintiffs.—The question is, where are you to state the average? here the adventure was abandoned at Constantinople; there was an agreement to that being done, the cargo and ship parted company, then it became necessary to state the average; and it was properly stated at Constantinople? Now the rule is, that the place at which general average shall be adjusted is the place of the ship's destination or of the delivery of her cargo, and then the law by which it is to be adjusted is the law of that place, see Simonds v. White (2 B. & C. 805). But where the voyage is terminated at an intermediate place, it would seem that that is the place at which the adjustment should be made. In Fletcher v. Alexander (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 69; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 432; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 375), Bovill, C.J., says: "In this case, the adventure being in progress, the vessel, in consequence of the damage she had sustained, put back to Liverpool. The ship might have been repaired, and might have prosecuted her voyage and completed the adventure. . . . The ship was otherwise employed and the voyage was broken up at Liverpool; Liverpool, therefore, was the place at which the average contribution was to be adjusted; the adjustment must be according to the law of England; and it seems to me that the value must be determined at Liverpool." The shipowners and freighters had a right to terminate the voyage at Constantinople under the circumstances, and the owner was not bound to repair. Worms v. Story (11 Ex. 427) shows that there is no obligation to repair, but if the owner elects to repair, he must do so properly, and must not go on with the ship in an unseaworthy state. This was a judgment of Parke, B., and is approved by Willes, J., in Blasco v. Fletcher (1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 380; 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 169; 14 C. B., N. S., 148), and in De Cuadra v. Swan (16 C. B., N. S., 772). Here there was an agreement of all the persons who had a right to be consulted. [BRETT, J.—The rule is that the owner is only not bound to repair if the damage is so great that it cannot reasonably be repaired.] He cited further Butt, Q. C., and J. C. Matthew, contra.—There is nothing in the case to show that the average adjustment was properly made at Constantinople. Why was the adventure terminated there? It is said that a captain is not bound to repair his ship, a proposition founded on a dictum of Parke, B., in Worms v. Storey (ubi sup.). But it cannot possibly be that such a general rule as that was intended. [Lord COLERIDGE, C. J.: It must mean, "not absolutely under all conceivable circumstances"]. The consent of the shioowners and the shippers is not sufficient. [BRETT, J.: The advice of the surveyor was to sell the damaged portion, and tranship the remainder, and the court ordered it to be done. If the Captain had sent on the cargo, there is authority that the adjustment should have been made at Marseilles.—MELLOR, J.: You put the order of the court no higher than a private agreement]. The jurisdiction of the court is exercisable by custom only, and the orders in council only confirm it. In the case there is no finding as to the custom. [BRETT, J.: The Consular Court is made a court of vice-admiralty]. Yes, but a vice-admiralty court has no power to order transhipment. In Power v. Whitmore (4 M. & S. 141), Lord Ellenborough says: "Although by the comity which is paid by us to the judgment of other courts abroad of competent jurisdiction, we give a full and binding effect to such judgment, as far as they profess to bind the persons and property immediately before them in judgment, and to which their adjudications properly relate, yet we feel that we should carry that principle of comity further than reasonably ought to be done, or ever hitherto has in practice been done, if we should draw from the recital of facts and usages which are contained in those judgments, general evidence of the existence of those facts and usages, and allow them to be available for all causes and purposes, and consider them as applicable to, and obligatory upon other persons than the immediate parties to those judgments in which the recitals occur." On the next question, as to the words of the contract, Harris v. Scaramanga (ubi sup.) is not applicable. Here we have paid the owner of the cargo all that the owner of the cargo was ordered to pay under the average adjustment at Constantinople; and what he is seeking to recover from us is that which, beyond all doubt, but for these words, "as per foreign statement," would be a particular average loss. What, then, is the real meaning of those words? It must be that the underwriters indemnify the assured against any loss he incurs by reason of a foreign custom. Then the words "warranted free from average unless general," must be taken to mean "unless general by English law," and by English law the damaged wheat would not be general average. [Lord COLERIDGE, C. J.—Does he not agree to pay general average according to foreign law?] No; whatever is general average, that is to say, by English law, shall be paid in accordance with any foreign custom to be introduced in stating it. [BRETT, J.—How do you get over the nineteenth paragraph? The adjustment was made in all respects the same as it would have been at Marseilles.] That is not clearly so, for there would have been a great difference in the expenses of stating the average.

Watkin Williams, Q. C., in reply.—There may have been various considerations as to the details in the place where the average was stated, but the law was the same in Constantinople as at Marseilles. Then as to the termination of the voyage: It did terminate at Constantinople, with the consent of all parties, as found in the case; and the only question is, has there been a general average statement binding upon the people concerned, independently altogether of the policy? If there has, then the underwriters must pay upon the footing of it.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 8.—The judgment of the court was delivered by Lord COLERIDGE, C. J.—This was an action on a policy of insurance on a cargo of wheat.

The ship, being disabled and some of the cargo damaged, put into Constantinople. Proceedings were taken in the Consular Court there, the result of which was that by the order of the court the damaged portion was sold and the sound portion transhipped. The entire cargo belonged to the plaintiff, an adjustment of average was by order of the Consular Court made at Constantinople; in which the average adjuster treated the damage to the wheat as general average. The policy contained the words, "General average as per foreign statement," and "free from average unless general." The defendants have paid into court sufficient to cover the plaintiffs' claim on all the items of the average adjustment except the item of damage to the wheat. This item they deny their liability to pay.

They relied mainly upon three points: First, that the Consular Court at Constantinople had no jurisdiction to make the orders which were made in this case; secondly, that the voyage was not necessarily broken up at Constantinople, and that the average should have been adjusted by an adjuster at Marseilles upon the arrival of the ship and goods in safety there; thirdly, that the words "free from average unless general," were intended expressly to exclude such an item as the one in dispute, which, by the law of England, would not be a general average loss at all. By the twenty-third paragraph of the case the court is to draw inferences of fact, and this enables us easily, and, as we think, satisfactorily to dispose of the first two points in the case.

We are clearly of opinion upon the facts stated in the case that the court at Constantinople must be taken to have had jurisdiction to make the orders which it did, and which were acquiesced in at the time.

We are also clearly of opinion upon the facts found in the case that it must be taken that the voyage was necessarily broken up at Constantinople. Some reliance was placed in argument upon the fact that the law of Marseilles, in the port of ultimate destination, was the same on the subject of general average as the law of Constantinople. But this fact alone would not be conclusive on the subject, and we notice it only to show that we have not overlooked it.

There remains only the question upon the true construction of the policy, and with respect to this the cases of Harris v. Scaramanga (ante, vol. 1, p. 339; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 697; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 481), and Hendriks v. The Australian Insurance Company (ante, p. 244; 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 419), appears to us to be undistinguishable. The latter case was very recently argued before us, and we adhere to the opinion we then expressed.

We think therefore that there should be judgment for the plaintiffs.

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

May 5 and 14, 1874.

THE DIANA.

Salvage—Practice—Collision—Right of party to blame to intervene in salvage suit—Conduct of suit—Bail—Costs.

Where a ship has been found to blame in a cause of collision, and a cause of salvage has been instituted against the other (the injured) ship, the owners of the ship found to blame have a right to intervene in the salvage cause to protect their own interest; and if they choose to put in bail to answer the claim of the salvors in lieu of the bail given by the owners of the injured vessel, the High Court of Admiralty will give them the conduct of the defence of the salvage suit; under such circumstances the owners of the injured vessel are entitled to have their bail released, and to be paid their costs up to the time when the new bail is put in.

THIS was a cause of salvage instituted by salvors against the German brig Diana. The Diana had been injured in collision by the American ship Kendrick Fish, and in a cause of collision instituted by the former against the latter vessel, the Kendrick Fish had been held alone to blame, and her owners consequently became liable to pay the salvage expenses incurred by the Diana.

May 5.—The case now came before the court, upon motion by the owners of the Kendrick Fish for leave to appear in and to defend the salvage cause against the Diana.

Butt, Q.C., for the owners of the Kendrick Fish, in support of the motion, contended, that as the interests of their clients alone were concerned they had a right to appear.

W. G. F. Phillimore, for the owners of the Diana opposed the motion.—The owners of the Diana are primarily responsible to the salvors, and moreover they are responsible to their bail for the conduct of the cause; the witnesses are all in the hands of the Diana's owners, and, according to the practice of the court, the conduct of the suit is invariably left in the hands of the owners of the salvaged ship. Under any circumstances the owners of the Diana ought to be paid the costs they have incurred in the salvage suit up to the present time. They have prepared their answer, and are about to file it.

Butt, Q.C. in reply.

Sir R. Phillimore.—The owners of the Kendrick Fish are entitled to appear if they think fit to protect their own interests. With regard to the owners of the Diana, they are entitled to all their costs of the salvage suit up to the present time, and they may file their answer, but after that the question of costs must be left an open question to be decided by the court hereafter. The Kendrick Fish may appear, and if the Diana incurs unnecessary costs she will do so on her own responsibility.

May 14.—Butt, Q.C., moved on behalf of the owners of the Kendrick Fish, for the appointment of a day for the examination of witnesses.

Dr. Deane, Q.C., and W. G. F. Phillimore, for the owners of the Diana opposed (beginning by arrangement).—It is contrary to the practice of the court for the vessel, from whom the ultimate recovery will be had, to conduct the suit, and if the application is granted the effect will be to place the conduct of this cause in the hands of the owners of the Kendrick Fish. Having the conduct of the suit may give him opportunities of framing the examination of our witnesses, who will be theirs also, so as to affect the question of the amount of damage done in the collision, and so influence the inquiry before the Registrar and Merchants. They may be at liberty to intervene, but they should not be allowed to conduct the cause. Bail was put in for the owners of the Diana, and that bail is entitled to the protection of the owners of the Diana. [Sir R. Phillimore.—Apart from the question of practice it is obvious that the Kendrick Fish is the more interested, as she will have to pay.] The Diana is primarily liable, and will have to pay in the first instance. If the salvage suit had been tried first, the Diana alone could have defended. In probate suits the residuary legatee cannot take the conduct of a suit out of the hands of the executors, although he is the most interested. What privity is there between the bail, and the Kendrick Fish? [Sir R. Phillimore.—Suppose the owners of the Kendrick Fish give bail?] Then she must at the same time pay all the costs hitherto incurred by the Diana. This will be the first case in which a salvaged vessel has not been allowed to conduct her own suit. [Sir R. Phillimore.—The effect will be that the parties most interested in the result will conduct the suit.] No offer has hitherto been made to release the bail. [Sir R. Phillimore.—I might make it a condition that the bail should be released.]

Butt, Q.C., for the Kendrick Fish.—As an intervener I am entitled to examine witnesses, and ask for the appointment of a day for that purpose. [Sir R. Phillimore.—The Registrar tells me that according to the practice of the court an intervener may examine witnesses.] That is all I claim. [Sir R. Phillimore.—Suppose you have the carriage of the suit will you put in bail?] The owners of the Kendrick Fish have already put in bail to answer the damage, and that includes salvage.

W. G. F. Phillimore.—We are primarily interested in examining our crew, to make the salvage as small as possible. We shall have to pay the salvage in the first instance, and shall not recover it for some time, and then shall have to run the risk of the bail of the Kendrick Fish not being solvent.

E. C. Clarkson for the salvors.—Why should not the usual course be followed? It is doubtful whether an intervener can file an answer, and there is now a motion before the court to compel them to do it, and that motion I now press. They now ask to examine witnesses before filing an answer, and to this we object. [Butt, Q.C.—We have made a tender, and as soon as that is accepted or rejected we will file an answer.] Under any circumstances we object to the release of the Diana's bail. It is our only security in this suit, and we shall not consent to release it unless we get equally good security.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I am of opinion that the Kendrick Fish must ultimately pay all the costs (after taxation by the Registrar) incurred by the Diana before the order enabling the Kendrick Fish to intervene, but the question is not now before me; all I have to consider now is whether the interveners are entitled to examine witnesses. I shall grant the interveners' motion, but I think that they ought to be substituted altogether for the Diana.

E. C. Clarkson.—I have no objection if they give proper security.

Dr. Deane, Q. C.—I expressly apply for the release of the Diana's bail.

E. C. Clarkson, I assent thereto, on bail being given by the Kendrick Fish.

Butt, Q. C.—We will put in bail.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Then I shall order the Diana's bail to be discharged on the owners of the Kendrick Fish putting in bail in the salvage suit. I shall grant Mr. Clarkson's motion, as to the filing of the answer, but subject to question of tender. The interveners must file their answer as soon as the salvors have accepted or rejected the tender.

Salvage—Derelict—Shipowner's lien for freight—Loss of right to carry on cargo—Sale by order of court—Misconduct of salvors—Dispossessing original salvors—Right of recovery—Rival salvors—Pleading—Adoption of allegations of misconduct in answer—Cross-examination—Practice.

Where a ship and cargo are brought into port by salvors, and a suit is instituted in the High Court of Admiralty to recover salvage reward, that court will, on the application of the salvors, acting with the assent of the owners of the cargo, order a sale of the cargo to prevent deterioration from damage done, although the shipowner, desirous of carrying on the cargo so as to earn freight, opposes the sale, and offers to give substantial bail for both ship and cargo; but such sale will be ordered subject to all questions of right to freight.

Where a ship, injured by collision without fault of her master and crew, is abandoned by them, and is afterwards taken possession of and brought in safety into port by salvors, who institute a suit against ship and cargo, the shipowner, having by the abandonment put an end to his contract of carriage, loses all claim to have the cargo put into his possession to enable him to carry it on and so earn his freight, and all claim to be paid full freight out of the proceeds of the cargo, if sold by order of the court. Nor can the shipowner have any claim for pro rata freight unless there be a new contract express or implied to pay the same, and if the shipowner refuses to consent to a sale of the cargo by the court when applied for by the salvors and owner of cargo, unless he be paid full freight, no such contract can be implied.

Where in a cause of salvage against a derelict ship rival salvors institute separate causes and file separate petitions, alleging misconduct against one another, the Court of Admiralty will not allow the defendants, in their answer to the petition of one set of salvors, to plead that in the petition of the other set there are allegations of misconduct, and that they, for the purpose of the cause, and not otherwise, adopt these allegations; they must either make the allegations of misconduct as their own statements, or omit them.

Where rival salvors file separate petitions, alleging misconduct against each other, and the defendants in their separate answers repeat the charges of misconduct made by each salvor against the other, so that the answers are contradictory, the defendants will not be allowed, on the hearing of both causes at the same time, to cross-examine one set of salvors to show that they, and not the other set, have been guilty of misconduct.

If first salvors lawfully in possession of a derelict ship are wrongfully and violently dispossessed by second salvors, who succeed in bringing the ship into safety, the second salvors will receive no benefit from the service they may render, but the whole reward will go to the benefit of the original salvors.

THESE were causes of salvage instituted by various parties against the barque Kathleen, her cargo and freight. On 27th Jan. 1874, a cause of salvage was instituted on behalf of the owners and master and crew of the steam tug Palmerston; in this suit appearances were separately entered by the owners of the Kathleen and by the owners of her cargo. On 30th Jan., the judge having heard the proctors for the plaintiffs and for the owners of cargo, ordered a commission of unlivery, and that the vessel should be removed to a place of greater safety. On 2nd Feb. a cause of salvage (No. 6733) was instituted on behalf of the owners, masters, and crews of certain English luggers, the William and Mary, the Ocean Ranger, the Mary Ann, the Four Sisters, the Sarah Elizabeth, the Black Bess, and the Stormaway, against the Kathleen, her cargo and freight; and in this cause also appearances were separately entered on behalf of the respective owners of ship and cargo. On 3rd Feb. another cause (No. 6740) was entered on behalf of the owners, master, and crew of the Palmerston, and to this also separate appearances were entered; this cause was entered on account of some mistake in the præcipe in the first mentioned cause, and on 9th Feb. notice was given that that cause would be no further proceeded with. On the same day (9th Feb.) the plaintiffs (in cause No. 6733) applied to the court with the consent and at the request of the owners of cargo for a sale of the cargo, and an order for its sale was made; this order was applied for and obtained without notice to the owner of the Kathleen. On 13th Feb. the proctors for the owners of the Kathleen entered a caveat against the payment of any sum out of the proceeds of the sale of the ship and cargo, or either, when brought into court, and against release of the cargo.

Feb. 18.—The case came before the court on the following notice of motion:

I, William Flux, solicitor for the defendants, the owners of the Kathleen, in this cause, give notice that we shall by counsel on the 18th Feb. 1874, move the judge in court to order that the order made therein on the 9th Feb. 1874, for the sale of the cargo of the said vessel, shall be set aside, or the sale therein directed to be suspended, until the payment into court of a sum equal to the gross freight of such cargo, or why the said defendants on giving bail to the value thereof, should not be allowed to carry the same forward to its destination in order to earn the freight, or to order that if the said order for sale is allowed to stand, the said defendants shall be paid the amount of the said freight out of the proceeds of the said sale, and that the plaintiffs pay to the said defendants the costs of this motion, on the ground that the said order for sale was obtained by the plaintiffs without any notice to the said defendants.

From affidavits filed it appeared that the commission of sale was, as is usual, put into the Marshal's hands for execution, and he sent down a competent person to examine the cargo, who recommended that it should be removed to London as it could there be more easily dried and would then be more likely to realise a better price. From an affidavit filed by the agent of the owners of the Kathleen, it appeared that the Kathleen had been seriously damaged by collision before the alleged salvage services, and had been abandoned by her master and crew; the cargo was cotton, and had been shipped at Charleston, U. S., for Bremen, at a freight of 2200*l.*; and the owners claimed to be entitled to carry the cargo on from Dover, where the ship and cargo then were, to Bremen, so as to earn the freight; they objected to the cargo being brought to London for sale, on the ground that the expense of so doing would exceed the expense of taking the cargo to Bremen; they were desirous of forwarding it to Bremen as soon as it was discharged from the Kathleen and offered bail in respect of it to the salvors. From affidavits filed on behalf of the owners of cargo it appeared that some parts of the cotton were wetted and other parts saturated with salt water, and that the iron bands round the bales were rusting and damaging the cotton; that the cotton was daily deteriorating in consequence of its wetted condition, and if carried to Bremen it would lose much in value, and be scarcely marketable, whereas if taken to London it would get there in a day or two by rail and be sold at once, thus giving the purchasers time to dry it before it became so damaged that it could not be put into a merchantable condition; the owners of cargo submitted that as the ship had been brought into Dover derelict without the assistance of owners, master, or crew, of the ship, she was no longer in their possession, and they had lost their lien on the cargo.

Aspland, for the owners of the Kathleen, in support of the motion.—The shipowners are entitled to a stoppage of the sale in order to be enabled to carry the cargo on to Bremen and so earn freight or to have their full freight paid here either to themselves or into court. In the Soblomsten (L. Rep. 1 Adm. and Ecc. 293; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 393; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 436), where freight was similarly claimed out of the proceeds of sale of the cargo, it is said, "By British law the following points seem to me settled: first, that upon the vessel becoming disabled at an intermediate port, the master is allowed a reasonable time within which to reship or tranship, so as to earn his freight; second, that the whole freight is payable if by default of the owner of cargo the master is prevented from forwarding the cargo from the intermediate port of its destination: (Cargo ex Galam, Bro. & Lush. 167); third, that no freight is payable if the owner of cargo against his will is compelled to take the cargo at an intermediate port; fourth, that to justify a claim for pro rata freight there must be a voluntary acceptance of the goods by their owner at an intermediate port, in such a mode as to raise a fair inference that the further carriage of the goods was intentionally dispensed with: (Vlierboom v. Chapman, 13 M. & W. 238)." In that case the owners of cargo only stood by, and did not prevent a sale; here they have promoted the sale. In The Teutonia (ante, vol. 1, p. 214; L. Rep. 4 P. C. 171; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 48), the principle of The Soblomsten is upheld. The ground of their opposition is that the cargo will be destroyed by waiting, and hence they claim the right to sell it; we are entitled either to carry it on, or if they prevent us we may claim full freight. [Sir R. PHILLMORE.—The cargo has been damaged by an accident, and is in course of deterioration. Have not the owners a right to sell it here? Subject to our right to carry on or get full freight. [Sir R. PHILLMORE.—Even if it should be destroyed by the delay would you claim a right to carry on? No, it is our duty to take means to preserve it, and we should be bound to dry it before carrying it on: (Notara v. Henderson, ante, vol. 1, p. 278; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 225; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 442.) We are entitled to our freight; if we are not paid it we may carry on subject only to a cross action in case we thereby damage the cargo. [Sir R. PHILLMORE.—What is the legal consequence of obtaining from the court an order for the sale of the cargo. Does it not oblige the owners to pay either full or pro rata freight? The sale took place on the motion of the salvors made at the request of the owners of cargo. [Sir R. PHILLMORE.—That seems to be an acceptance of the cargo short of its destination, and if so, the shipowners are entitled to pro rata freight.] That is the case only when the shipowners consent to deliver the cargo short of its destination; here, however, they have never abandoned their right to carry on and claim full freight. The owners of cargo are not entitled to take it out of the shipowners' hands as long as they are willing to carry it on. Pro rata freight is due only when two conditions are fulfilled; first, when there is a voluntary acceptance of the cargo by the owners of cargo; secondly, when there is a consent of the shipowner to deliver short of the agreed destination:

Vlierboom v. Chapman, 13 M. & W. 230;
Tindall v. Taylor, 4 E. & B. 217.

In effect the contract can only be dissolved by the consent of both parties, and if the owners of cargo think fit to take the cargo here without the consent of the shipowners, they must perform their part of the contract by paying the whole freight. The fact that the ship was abandoned does not take away the shipowners' claim to freight. An abandonment is not a total loss, and does not dispossess the owners of their property or rights, the legal possession of the ship and cargo remains in the owners, the salvors being their agents only:

Thornely v. Hebson, 2 B. & Ald. 513.

E. C. Clarkson for the salvors.—In so far as the motion affects the salvors as to costs, I oppose it. But it is to the salvor's interest to establish the claim for freight. The shipowner did not by the desertion of his crew lose his lien on the cargo, and his contract still remains. The ship having been arrested by the salvors, the shipowner does all he can to recover possession by entering an appearance, and the arrest of the court is only for the purpose of protecting the salvor's lien, and does not deprive the owner of his right of property. This court has given salvage reward in respect of freight in many cases of derelict ships, and if the owners of cargo are right here the court has always been in error. This is not a question of lien, it is a question whether the shipowners can or cannot fulfil their contract. If they can they are entitled to do so or to recover their freight. Hence it comes to be a question of whether the court will order a sale, and out of the proceeds thereof the payment of freight or a delivery up of the cargo to the shipowners, on their giving bail, in order to enable them to complete their contract. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I am strongly of opinion that I ought to order a sale.] Then will the court allow the cargo to be sold and subsequently released without payment of freight? [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—That involves the question of whether any freight is due upon cargo which is so damaged that it cannot be carried on without serious injury, and which is in consequence stopped and sold here?—As that is caused by the acts of the owners of cargo, freight is recoverable.

W. G. F. Phillimore for the owners of cargo.—The ship was found derelict and brought into port and arrested by salvors. She has been unloaded and there is now no cargo on board. Are the shipowners still in possession of the ship and cargo so as to entitle them to freight? The real question here turns upon the question of lien. So long as the cargo remains in the possession of the shipowner, the owners of cargo cannot touch it without the payment of the full freight, by reason of the lien which the shipowner has in respect of that freight. Here, however, the lien is gone by the abandonment of the owner, and by the substitution of the salvor. The ship and cargo are now in the possession of the court holding for the salvor. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The marshal tells me that the shipowner was a consenting party to the unloading of the cargo. This may be important in considering whether he preserved his lien, or whether he can claim full or only pro rata freight.] It is clear from the affidavits that the cargo ought to be sold at once, in consequence of its rapid deterioration. Here the cargo was so damaged that it could not be carried on without drying it. Before any right to freight accrues to the shipowner it is his duty to take the cargo out and dry it, and carry it on to its destination: (Notara v. Henderson, ante, vol. 1, p. 27; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 225; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 442.) That case decides that a master has no right to carry on a cargo in a damaged condition for the purpose of earning freight. His duty may be to sell it, or otherwise deal with it, even if he thereby lose his chance of earning freight. This doctrine obviously arises out of the decision of Lord Stowell in The Gratitude (3 C. Rob. 240), on the duties of a master. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—But that does not affect the right to pro rata freight. There can be no doubt as to a master's power to sell.] In Notara v. Henderson (ubi sup.) it is laid down that no right to pro rata freight can arise without a compromise between the parties. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Do not the circumstances of this case show that there was a compromise here, by the unloading at Dover and sale of the cargo at the request of the owners of cargo.] No such inference of fact can be drawn here, because the respective owners of ship and cargo are at complete issue as to what should be done with the cargo. The abandonment of the ship was a loss of lien on the cargo; she was left, as her crew say, to save life, but was afterwards brought into safety by salvors. The presumption is that there was neglect of duty on the part of her master. Hence it is clear that there was an absolute surrendering on the part of the shipowners, through their agent, of all intention of completing the contract and of all rights of lien.

Aspland in reply. Neither the court nor the salvors have the legal possession of the ship and cargo. The salvors are in the position of legal agents, having a lien upon it, and the court aids them to retain that lien. But the salvors' possession, subject to their lien, is the possession of the owners: (Thornely v. Hebson 2 B. & Ald. 513). They hold for the benefit of themselves and the owners, the legal possession remaining in the owners. The shipowners have never abandoned their lien. An abandonment of a ship is not a refusal to complete the contract which she is then bound to perform, but rather a confession of inability to complete at the time, with a reservation of the right of so doing, if other persons should succeed in getting the ship to a place of safety. There is no intention on the part of the shipowners to take this cargo on to Bremen in its damaged condition; they propose to dry it first, and so perform their duty as carriers. Notara v. Henderson (ubi sup.) is a strong authority that the owners of cargo cannot claim to take the cargo out of our possession without the payment of full freight.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I think that the duty of the court in the present stage of the case is clear. The evidence presented to me to-day establishes that this cargo is fast deteriorating through the damage it has sustained by salt water, and that it is for the advantage of all parties that a sale should take place at once. One thing alone is sufficient to induce me to make this order of sale, and that is, the owners of the cargo have expressed their wish for the sale in order that further deterioration may be prevented. And, as I understand the matter, the owners of the cargo press for this sale even if it should turn out that they are bound to pay freight for the cargo whether in full or pro rata. Hence I must order the sale to take place, and, for that purpose, that the goods be removed to London. As to the other question, I shall at present express no opinion. The matter will so rest that the shipowners can apply at a later stage of the case for the payment to them of their freight, and the question can then be raised in a more formal manner on petition, so that not only my opinion can be taken but also that of the court of appeal. That seems to me to be the right way to deal with the question of law, which is one of considerable importance and difficulty. As the proceeds of the sale of the cargo will be paid into court, the shipowners will have full security for their claim for freight if it should turn out that they are entitled to it.

May 5.—The case again came before the court on motion on behalf of salvors to reject an answer filed by the defendants.

Subsequently to the above proceedings the two causes (Nos. 6733 and 6740) were consolidated and another cause (No. 6769) was instituted on behalf of the owners, master, and crew of the French lugger St. Claire, and pleadings were filed.

ADM.]

THE KATHLEEN.

[ADM.]

The petition in the consolidated causes (Nos. 6733 and 6740) alleged that the English luggers on 25th Jan. left Hastings to fish; that the Ocean Ranger when about eighteen miles to the southward of Hastings, sighted a vessel in distress and made towards her; she proved to be the Kathleen; when the Ocean Ranger got up to the Kathleen it was found that she had been in collision with some other vessel, and that she had a large hole in her port bow, extending below the water line, and that her sails and rigging were much damaged; the Kathleen had been abandoned by her master and crew, but when the Ocean Ranger got up to her a French fishing boat, which proved to be the St. Claire, of Boulogne, was lashed alongside the Kathleen; the Ocean Ranger made fast to the French boat, and three of her crew got on board the Kathleen. The French boat had on board a quantity of sails, provisions, and several coils of rope, including the hawsers and a quantity of running gear and blocks, evidently taken from the Kathleen. When the three men from the Ocean Ranger got on board the Kathleen they found some of the crew of the French boat engaged in getting some spare sails out of the sail rooms, and putting them on board the French boat, whilst others were cutting away the running gear of the Kathleen and getting it on board their boat. The crew of the French boat had stripped the cabin of the Kathleen of everything, even to the cabin stove, and they also took away the ship's compass, leaving her without any compass. After the lapse of about an hour, the Black Bess arrived, and after she arrived some of the Frenchmen cut away the spanker of the Kathleen, and took it away and put it into their boat, whilst others were cutting away the guys and braces, which they also put into their boat. The other Hastings lugger then arrived, and the Mary Ann was sent for a tug, but could not find one until she got to Dover; the master of the Elizabeth asked the assistance of the Frenchmen in saving the ship, but it was refused; the Frenchmen took one of the pins out of the wheel and tried to unship it, but were stopped by the crews of the English luggers; the Frenchmen, having laden their boat with tackle and articles belonging to the Kathleen, left her, and took with them the small boat of the Kathleen; they were asked to leave the small boat, but refused. When the Frenchmen left, the English crews were obliged, in consequence of the braces having been cut, to attempt to steady the sails that were standing by means of ropes, and it was with great difficulty that ropes could be got, so completely had the Frenchmen stripped the ship. The petition then went on to allege that the English luggers towed the ship through an increasing sea for some distance, with much risk, and ultimately, with the assistance of the tug Palmerston, of Dover, she was beached under the lee of the Admiralty Pier at Dover, where her damage was partially repaired and some of her tackle landed; she was then taken to a place between the piers at Dover, and some of her cargo discharged, so as to lighten her and let her get alongside the pier for final discharge, which she eventually did. It was further alleged the master and crew of the French vessel had no intention of saving the Kathleen, and that she was saved by the exertions of the plaintiffs alone, for which they claimed reward.

The petition filed in the other cause (No. 6769) alleged that the St. Claire was a French lugger, manned by six hands, all told; that she sighted the Kathleen on the morning of the 25th Jan., about twenty miles N.N.W. of Etaples, on the coast of France; that the Kathleen then had a signal of distress flying, and that her people seemed to be passing to and from between the Kathleen and another large vessel not far from her; the crew of the St. Claire hoisted a signal to know if assistance was wanted, but got no answer; soon after the signal of distress was hauled down and the third vessel went away; the crew of the St. Claire then boarded the Kathleen and found her deserted and injured by collision. The cargo being light, there was no danger of the vessel sinking so long as the deck did not give way; but as the water was rising in the hold, it was deemed expedient to remove the sails and other perishable stores to a place of safety. The master of the St. Claire, therefore, with the assistance of one of his men, proceeded to pass such perishable stores as were portable into the lugger. They then got the mainsail of the Kathleen (which was partly set) round, and hoisted a stay sail between the stump of her foremast and her mainmast, so as to be able to steer her, and having taken on board one of the trawling warps of the St. Claire, they made it fast and got everything ready to tow the Kathleen to Boulogne-sur-Mer. The weather was almost calm, and the crew of the St. Claire waited for a breeze to spring up. Towards evening the wind freshened, blowing from the N.W., and, with the assistance of the St. Claire, the Kathleen began to slowly move towards Boulogne, and as the wind continued a fair breeze, she would in all probability have arrived there without difficulty or further assistance about the time of high water but for the events following: About an hour before sunset an English fishing boat came alongside, and about three-quarters of an hour after she came up six or more English fishing boats came up, and about twenty fishermen from them* boarded the Kathleen and pushed the master of the St. Claire and the man who was assisting him in the navigation of the Kathleen away from their work, and threatened to throw them overboard, and otherwise illused them and put them in terror. The men from the English boats cast off the tow rope from the St. Claire, and forcibly took possession of the Kathleen. The master of the St. Claire, seeing that it was impossible to retain possession against the numbers on board, left the Kathleen, under protest, with the man who had been assisting him, and returned on board the St. Claire, where he held a consultation with his crew. The English fishermen turned the head of the Kathleen towards the English coast, and the master and crew of the St. Claire finding that they could do nothing further proceeded at once to Boulogne. Immediately on their arrival at Boulogne-sur-Mer, the master of the St. Claire delivered the goods and stores saved from the Kathleen, which were on board the lugger, to the proper authorities, and gave information of the circumstances before stated. The Kathleen was taken to Dover by the English fishermen, and the master and two of the crew of the St. Claire followed her there. The petition further alleged that at the time the crew of the St. Claire was dispossessed there was a fair wind for Boulogne, which was easier of access than any port on the English coast, and they could easily have taken the Kathleen into Boulogne, and were in the act of so doing; that by the wrongful act of the English fishermen the Kathleen and the cargo were subjected to greater risk and expense, and that if the service had been completed by the crew of the St. Claire they would have effected a much better salvage than that which was effected; and that the owners, masters, and crews of the English fishing boats had by their misconduct and violence forfeited any claim they otherwise might have had for salvage services, and under the circumstances before mentioned the plaintiffs were entitled to recover such salvage reward as they would have been entitled to if the Kathleen and her cargo had been salvaged by their unassisted services.*

To the petition in causes No. 6733 and 6740, the defendants, owners of ship and cargo, filed an answer alleging that the Kathleen came into collision with another vessel, sustained the damage stated in the petition, and that on the morning of the 25th Jan. the crew of the Kathleen were taken on board the other vessel and taken to Deal; before losing sight of the Kathleen her crew saw the French lugger St. Claire approach the Kathleen, and the crew board her. The statements in the petition were not admitted to be true, save as appeared in the answer. The Kathleen was brought into Dover as in the petition alleged, but of what occurred on board of or in relation to the Kathleen from the time when those on board the Mallowdale lost sight of her until she was brought off Dover the defendants had no knowledge. The answer then stated that a cause of salvage No. 6769 had been instituted, and was then pending in this honourable court on behalf of the owners, master and crew of the lugger St. Claire, against the Kathleen and her cargo and freight, and against the defendants intervening, and in the petition filed in the said suit it was alleged on behalf of the plaintiff therein, that upon some of them going on board the Kathleen they intended and prepared to tow her, and were in the act of towing her to Boulogne-sur-Mer, and would in all probability have taken her to Boulogne without difficulty, but that about twenty English fishermen, &c. [The answer then set out the statements in the petition in cause No. 6769, which are marked above within asterisks thus*, and then continued.] "For the purpose of this answer, (but not further or otherwise, the defendants herein being necessarily ignorant of the actual facts), the defendants herein adopt the several allegations in the said petition on behalf of the St. Claire contained, and say that the same are respectively true." The answer further alleged that the beaching of the Kathleen after her arrival at Dover was against the remonstrances of the master, and was an improper proceeding, causing unnecessary damage to the cargo. The answer concluded by praying the judge to determine whether either and which of the conflicting allegations and claims made on behalf of the plaintiff and the owners, master, and crew of the St. Claire are in whole or in part well founded, and in case he shall find anything due to the plaintiff to pronounce such a moderate sum to be due, &c.

To the petition in cause No. 6769 the defendant filed an answer which commenced with similar admissions and denials as the answer in the other cause, and continued as follows:

3. A cause of salvage has been instituted, and is now pending in the Consolidated Cause No. 6733 and 6740, in this honourable court on behalf of the owners, masters, and crews of the vessels William and Mary, Ocean Ranger, Mary Ann, Four Sisters, Sarah Elizabeth, Black Bess, and Stornaway, and on behalf of the owners, master and crew of the steam tug Palmerston against the barque Kathleen, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and the cargo now or lately laden therein and the freight due in respect of such cargo, and against the defendants, and on the petition filed in the said suit it is alleged on behalf of the plaintiffs therein that some of them went on board the Kathleen and found the Frenchmen (meaning the crew of the St. Claire) engaged in stripping the Kathleen of its sails, running gear, cabin furniture, and compass, with which they sailed off in their boat taking with them also the small boat of the Kathleen. That the master of the Sarah Elizabeth asked one of the plaintiffs if they (the Frenchmen) would assist in saving the Kathleen, but he refused to do so; that at the time when the said Englishmen went to the assistance of the Kathleen the master and crew of the St. Claire were not attempting and did not intend to attempt to save her, and they subsequently refused to join the English crew in their attempt to save her, and that by the services of the plaintiffs therein the Kathleen and her cargo were saved from total loss, for which services the said plaintiffs claim full salvage reward.

4. For the purposes of this answer (but not further or otherwise, the defendants being necessarily ignorant of the actual facts) the defendants herein adopt the allegations in the said petition on behalf of the said English boats contained, and aver that the same are respectively true.

The answer concluded by praying the judge "to determine whether either and which of the conflicting allegations and claims made on behalf of the plaintiffs, and of the owners, masters, and crews of the said English boats and steam tugs, are in whole or in part well founded," and in case he should find any, to be due to the plaintiffs for their alleged services, to pronounce such a moderate sum to be due, &c.

To the answer in the consolidated causes, Nos. 6733 and 6740, no objection was taken by the plaintiffs in that cause, and the plaintiffs filed a conclusion denying the allegations set forth in the answer as being contained in the petition in cause No. 6769, and also the other allegations of the answer.

To the answer in cause No. 6769 the plaintiffs in that cause objected, and gave notice that they should move the judge to reject the 3rd and 4th articles of that answer, upon the grounds that the same were impertinent and embarrassing, and contained matters of hearsay, and referred to pleadings in another cause, and to condemn the defendants in the costs of the motion.

G. Bruce for the owners, master, and crew of the French lugger St. Claire, plaintiff in cause No. 6769.—The pleading is bad. It should either definitely allege misconduct or omit it altogether. As the allegation of misconduct stands at present it depends rather upon the question whether the plaintiffs in the other cause pursue their claim than upon the actual fact. The defendants must allege such facts as we can answer. To leave our misconduct dependent upon allegations of a petition filed by rival salvors is embarrassing.

Butt, Q.C. and Aspland, for the defendants (the owners of the Kathleen), contra.—The ship having been abandoned, the defendants' only means of knowledge of the facts are the allegations made by the plaintiffs. These allegations would be a good answer if they alleged the misconduct directly, but as the defendants are unwilling to allege misconduct, except where it has actually taken place, they could only allege what they heard from the other plaintiffs, leaving it to the rival salvors to prove or disprove their respective statements. This form of pleading is necessitated by the want of interpleader issues in this court. It is impossible for the defendants to decide whose is the misconduct, and to charge misconduct directly without the means of proving it, is contrary to the practice of this court.

THE KATHLEEN.

W. G. F. Phillimore for the defendants (the owners of the cargo of the Kathleen), against the motion.—The pleading must be read as if for the purposes of this case the defendants adopted the allegations of the other plaintiffs' petition, and alleged them as statements of their own.

Sir R. PHILLMORE.—I have nothing to do at present with other pleading in other cases; the only question which I have to decide is whether the pleadings in the present case are in proper form or not. Now I am clearly of opinion that they are not in proper form. The defendants must either elect to leave the matter on the statements of the salvors, not denying their statements, but pleading ignorance of the real state of facts, and to let them contest the right to recover, or they must positively and directly raise the question of their misconduct on the pleadings, by alleging that misconduct as a distinctive allegation made by themselves, the defendants. I am of opinion that this is an improper mode of pleading, and that the two articles of the answer must be reformed. Such a mode of pleading is wholly without precedent in this court.

June 19, 20, and 22.—The defendants having amended their answer in cause No. 6769, and alleged the misconduct of the French salvors as a substantive fact, not adopting the statements of the English fishermen, but giving the facts as their own statements, the two causes came on for hearing at the same time; the two sets of salvors were separately represented by counsel, and the owners of the Kathleen and the owners of her cargo were also separately represented. Evidence was given by the English salvors in support of their petition, and by the French salvors in support of their petition. Counsel for the defendants wished to cross-examine the plaintiff's witnesses as to the misconduct alleged in the answer, but the court declined to allow such cross-examination, on the ground that the answers filed in the causes practically contradicted one another, and they were thereby precluded from setting up in one case what they repudiated in the other. The effect of the evidence is sufficiently stated in the judgment.

Day, Q.C. and Gainsford Bruce for the French salvors, contended that their clients had rendered meritorious service.

Cohen, Q.C. and E. C. Clarkson, for the English salvors.—If a salvor, hoping to save property, is utterly incapable of so doing, he cannot recover reward merely because he remains by the ship, no success, no salvage reward. There must be a willingness to assist in the actual service which brings the property into safety. The French crew were not willing to assist in bringing the ship into Dover. They rest their claim solely on being dispossessed by the English crew. There was no violent dispossession, there having been no intention of getting the ship into a place of safety.

Milward, Q.C. and Aspland for the owners of the Kathleen, contended that the French salvors had rendered no service entitling them to reward.

Butt, Q.C. (W. G. F. Phillimore and Stubbs with him), contended that even if both sets of salvors were entitled to reward they ought not to have more than if one set only were entitled.

Day, Q.C. in reply.

Sir R. PHILLMORE.—In this case two causes of salvage have been instituted, the one by the owners, masters, and crews, of certain English luggers, the other by the owners, master, and crew, of the French lugger St. Claire. Before going into the case it is necessary that I should refer to the pleadings, and the effect they have had upon the cross examination of the plaintiff's witnesses by the defendants, and the ruling of the court thereon. For this purpose I must look at the pleadings, and examine the dates on which they were filed. The petition of the French salvors is dated 2nd March 1874, and that of the English salvors 11th March 1874. The answer, filed on behalf of the barque, and adopted by the owners of her cargo, was not filed until 11th April. Consequently the defendants had both petitions before them when drawing their answers. In the answer to the petition of the English salvors the defendants have adopted the allegations of misconduct made in the petition of the French salvors "for the purposes of their answer and not otherwise." In their answer to the French salvors' petition they have absolutely adopted the allegations of misconduct made against the Frenchmen in the English salvors' petition. In this state of the pleadings—a novelty in this court, as one answer absolutely contradicts the other, although there is practically only one cause, and not two, before the court—the court was of opinion that counsel for the owners of the barque and her cargo were not at liberty to cross-examine the witnesses produced on behalf of the French salvors, because, having adopted their statements for one purpose, they cannot use them to contradict those witnesses for another purpose. To that ruling the court adheres after considerable reflection. Now the vessel and the cargo to which this service was rendered was a derelict, which had come into collision with the ship Mallowdale on 24th Jan. The Mallowdale has been pronounced to blame for that collision in a suit in this court brought by the owners of the Kathleen and her cargo. I advert to this because the Mallowdale remained all night with the Kathleen, and it was next morning thought impossible to save her; she was, therefore, deliberately abandoned and deserted by her master and crew. It is not, therefore, in the power of the owners of the ship and cargo to complain of hardship in having to pay remuneration for services to which alone they are indebted for whatever remained of their property. The value of the salvaged property, ship and cargo, is 14,000*l.* There is no doubt as to some of the facts here, there is no doubt at all that the French salvors were the first to come up to the Kathleen, and they seem to have reached her about 10 a.m. on 25th Jan. It is of importance to ascertain the position of the Kathleen then, was she, as the Frenchmen say, eighteen miles from Boulogne, or was she fourteen miles from Hastings, as the Englishmen said? I have carefully gone through the evidence with the Elder Brethren, and guided by them, and looking at the place of collision, I think it right to adopt the opinion of the Elder Brethren, namely, that the ship was in the place where she was put by the English sailors. Perhaps neither party is quite right, but the English account is more nearly accurate. The course which the Frenchmen admit they adopted was, that, thinking, not unnaturally, that the Kathleen would sink, they proceeded to take on board a number of things which they afterwards took into Boulogne, and for which they received salvage remuneration according to the French Law. It would be very unjust to condemn either of the sets of salvors of any intention of plundering. The truth is, that both parties, thinking that it was very doubtful whether the vessel would not sink, thought it expedient to take as much out of her as they could before they proceeded to see if she could be saved or not. The French sailors, having laden their vessel with a variety of articles then proceeded to try and tow the Kathleen. They got a hawser on board for the purpose, and, according to their own account, had towed her some three leagues or more at the time when the English sailors came up. The Englishmen say that the Frenchmen had never attempted to tow the vessel at all, but were simply engaged in cutting away sails and rigging with the intention of carrying away as much as they could and making off as soon as possible to Boulogne. The difficulty in reconciling the evidence of the two sides is greatly enhanced, because it is clear that neither party understood the language of the other. The Englishmen say that the Frenchmen, sometime after leaving, returned and offered to assist in towing; that they threw out a rope, but the Englishmen would have nothing to do with them, because they had declined their assistance in the first instance. The Frenchmen say that they were towing when the Englishmen came up, and that their hawser was cast off by the latter, and that they were willing to assist, but they said nothing about returning. It appears to the court that the truth lies between the two statements, and that the Frenchmen did intend to take part in the towing, but that they were, rightly or wrongly, intimidated by the acts of the Englishmen, in consequence of the mutual ignorance of each other's languages. I do not mean to say that the Englishmen used any actual violence to dispossess the Frenchmen; if I did come to any such conclusion I should have to pronounce that the Englishmen are not entitled to any salvage reward. I think it desirable that I should state the law upon this point, as such cases may arise again, and it is important that both French and English fishermen should know what the law is. Lord Stowell, in The Glendenhall (1 Dods. 414, 416):—"Those who have obtained possession of a ship as salvors have a legal interest, which cannot be divested before adjudication takes place in a court possessed of competent authority; and it is not for the king's officers, or any other person on the ground of superior authority, to dispossess them without cause. Cases may certainly exist in which the interference of the king's officers may be not only justifiable, but even laudable; they may find persons in possession who are unfit, from inexperience, to be trusted with valuable property, or who have been guilty of gross misconduct, which may render their removal proper and necessary. But these necessities must be made apparent to the court; and persons taking possession and bringing in a ship under such circumstances must understand it as their duty, in the first place, to justify themselves for the steps they have taken.

. . . The court is asked to give a larger sum, on account of a greater number of salvors; the owners, therefore, are materially interested in resisting the additional claim which has been set up. The merchants ought not to be charged with a higher rate of salvage on account of the unnecessary interference of the second salvors. The original salvors are likewise interested in this claim, for it must operate as a discouragement to salvors to be liable to be turned adrift and baffled by an opposition of this kind. I have no hesitation, therefore, in confirming the doctrine I have over and over again laid down, that persons dispossessing original salvors without reasonable cause shall receive no benefit from the services they may afterwards perform, but the whole reward shall go to those who have been wrongfully dispossessed. Those who are wrongdoers shall take no advantage from their own wrong. The exertions they may use in bringing the ship shall endure not to their own profit, but to the profit of those who would otherwise have performed the service." That is Lord Stowell's judgment, and I think it is a very clear and perfect exposition of the law. But I am not of opinion that the Englishmen intended forcibly to dispossess the Frenchmen, and to prevent them from taking part in the service. I am clearly of opinion that it was not in the power of the French lugger to render any efficient service by herself; nor indeed could any successful service have been effected without the assistance of steam power; but I do think that the French lugger was intending, at the time when she thought the English sailors would not allow her any longer to perform salvage services, to tow the vessel, and that she was endeavouring so to do, and this endeavour I shall take into consideration in awarding salvage reward. It is difficult to arrive at the truth of these statements, but taking the probabilities and the admitted facts, this seems to be the fairest conclusion at which I can arrive. There can be no doubt that the Englishmen, when they had taken possession of the ship and were engaged in towing her, behaved well, and took the best means in their power to effect their object, and showed that they were not actuated by purely selfish motives in sending for a steam tug. After consultation with the Elder Brethren, I am of opinion that the English salvors incurred no danger in the services they rendered to the Kathleen, with this exception, that those who were put on board the barque to make fast the tow rope, and who remained on board whilst she was being towed by the tug, were exposed to considerable danger, and are therefore entitled to a larger proportion of remuneration than the others. The English fishing boats appear to have towed the barque about seventeen miles in seventeen hours, and the court is of opinion that this was a very meritorious service, as it brought the Kathleen so much nearer the tug. It has been truly said that according to the evidence in the case, it was very improbable that the Kathleen would have been saved without the interference of steam power; and that it was most probable that she would have gone ashore at Dungeness but for the assistance of the steam tug. But, at the same time, it must be remembered that those who brought the means of saving the ship were the English boatmen, and, though they did not possess steam power themselves, they sent for it, and through their agency the vessel was saved. The tug itself also incurred considerable peril whilst she was towing the Kathleen in consequence of the disabled condition of that vessel. It only now remains to state the conclusion at which I have arrived as to the amount of salvage that ought to be awarded. The value of the property must be taken at 14,000*l.*, and out of this I award to the Palmerston 1500*l.*; to the various luggers, seven in number, 1750*l.*; that is to say, to the Stornoway, which came up later, I award 200*l.*, to the Ocean Ranger I award 300*l.*, and to the rest of the English luggers 250*l.* each. Then I shall award 100*l.* to the French salvors. I shall only give one set of costs. I am at a loss to understand why the salvors could not have consolidated their suits and have proceeded upon one set of pleadings.

Clarkson.—Then a difficulty will arise as to who is to receive the costs allowed.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I will avoid that difficulty by awarding a sum for costs nomina expensarum; to the English salvors 200*l.*, to the French 100*l.*

July 14.—The question of the liability of the owners of cargo to pay freight to the owners of the Kathleen now came on for argument. In accordance with the direction of the court a petition had been filed by the shipowners claiming the payment of the freight out of the proceeds of the sale of the cargo. The petition was as follows:—

1. The Kathleen was a barque of 462 tons (registered tonnage), or therabouts, and December 1873, was laden at the Port of Charleston, in the United States of America, with a cargo consisting of 1620 bales of cotton, under several bills of lading, whereby the same was to be delivered at the port of Bremen (the dangers of the sea excepted) under the order of the several shippers or assigns, he or they paying freight for the said cotton at certain rates per pound of invoice weight (amounting for the whole of the said cotton to the sum of 2081*l.* 16*s.* 1*d.*) and primage and average (amounting to the sum of 104*l.* 1*s.* 10*d.*)

2. The Kathleen sailed from Charleston with the said cargo on board, and was proceeding on her voyage to Bremen on the 24th Jan. 1874, when she was run into in the English Channel, off Hastings, by the Mallowdale, an iron ship of about 1200 tons (registered tonnage), which struck her on the port bow, cut her down, and otherwise did great damage to her. For this collision the Mallowdale was solely to blame.

3. On the morning of the following day (the 25th Jan.) the master and crew of the Kathleen were compelled to leave her as she had become unmanageable, and were taken on board the Mallowdale, (which had remained by the Kathleen during the night) and landed at Deal.

4. After the master and crew of the Kathleen had so left her, a French lugger, the St. Claire, of Boulogne, came up to the Kathleen, and some of the crew of the St. Claire went on board the Kathleen, and remained there until after a number of fishing boats from Hastings had come up, and the men from the said Hastings boats had taken charge and possession of the Kathleen.

5. Eventually the said Hastings men with the assistance of a lugger from Deal, and of the steam tug Palmerston from Dover, succeeded in bringing the Kathleen and her cargo to Dover, where she arrived on the 27th Jan.

6. A salvage suit (No. 6725) to which the owners of the Kathleen duly appeared, but which has since been abandoned, was instituted on the 27th Jan. on behalf of the owners, master, and crew of the steam tug Palmerston against the Kathleen, her cargo and the freight due in respect thereof, and on the same day the ship and cargo were arrested in that suit, and on the 30th Jan. a commission of unelivery issued in the said suit, under which the said cargo was unladen.

7. On the 2nd Feb. the salvage suit No. 6733 was instituted in the sum of 3000*l.*, and on the 5th Feb. the salvage suit No. 6740 was instituted in a like sum against the Kathleen, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and the cargo then lately laden thereon, and the freight due in respect thereof; and the ship and cargo were arrested in the said suits respectively. The said two last mentioned suits, which were instituted on behalf of the said English boats hereinbefore mentioned and of the steam tug Palmerston, have since been consolidated. A salvage suit (No. 6769) was also instituted on the 23rd Feb. in the sum of 3000*l.*, against the said vessel, her cargo, and the freight due in respect thereof, on behalf of the owners, master, and crew of the said French lugger St. Claire; and the Kathleen and her cargo have been arrested in that suit also.

8. Appearances were entered in the various suits hereinbefore mentioned by Messrs. Stokes, Saunders, and Stokes who were duly authorised in that behalf, on behalf of all the owners of the cargo of the Kathleen. And appearances were also duly entered by the said William Flux, on behalf of the owners of the Kathleen, to the said last mentioned suits respectively.

9. On the 9th Feb. Messrs. Clarkson, Son, and Greenwell, solicitors for the plaintiff in the suit No. 6733, at the instigation and request of the several owners of the said cargo, acting by the said Messrs. Stokes, Saunders, and Stokes, but without the consent or knowledge of and without giving any notice to the owners of the Kathleen, or any person acting on their behalf, although appearances had then already been entered as aforesaid on their behalf, moved for and obtained an order from this honourable court directing that the said cargo should be sold.

10. The said cargo had been wet, and had suffered considerable damage from sea water, but the same could at the time when the said order for its sale was obtained, have been re-shipped and carried on to Bremen so as to arrive there, and the same would have arrived there in a merchantable condition as cotton, and the owners of the Kathleen could and were always ready and willing and desired and intended to re-ship and carry the same forward, taking due care of it, and using all necessary precautions against its further deterioration, and would have so done, and duly delivered it, upon payment of freight according to the aforesaid bills of lading, if they had not been prevented from doing so by the proceedings on the part of the owners of the said cargo herein alleged.

11. The owners of the Kathleen had not, nor had the said William Flux, or any other person acting on their behalf, any notice or knowledge of the said order having been applied for or made until the 12th Feb., when the said William Flux accidentally became acquainted with the fact. He thereupon immediately gave notice to the solicitors for the plaintiffs in the said suit No. 6733, and to the solicitors for the owners of the said cargo, that he should move the right honourable the judge to set aside the said order for sale, and to order that the owners of the Kathleen should be allowed, on giving bail in the said salvage suits for the said cargo to carry the same on to its destination in order to earn freight, or to order that, if the said order for sale were allowed to stand, the owners of the Kathleen should be paid the amount of the said freight out of the proceeds of the said sale.

12. The said motion was heard on the 18th Feb., and was opposed on behalf of the owners of the said cargo, who asked the court and urged that the said cargo should not be allowed to be reshipped and carried on to Bremen, but should be brought to London and there sold. The owners of the Kathleen in court offered to give bail for the cargo as aforesaid, and insisted on their right either to carry on the said cargo so as to earn freight, or to be paid freight if the owners of the said cargo preferred to require delivery and take the same out of their hands at Dover. The right honourable the judge, after hearing counsel on all sides, directed that the sale theretofore decreed of the said cargo of the Kathleen should be proceeded with, and that for the purposes of such sale the said cargo should be brought to London, and decreed a commission for the removal thereof accordingly, reserving all questions as to freight.

13. Pursuant to such last-mentioned order, the said cargo was removed to London, and sold by auction on 12th March, and realised 14,932*l.*, and the net proceeds of such sale (amounting to upwards of 13,900*l.*) are now in the registry of the court.

14. In the circumstances above stated, the owners of the Kathleen submit that they are entitled to the freight, which they would have earned by carrying the said cargo on to Bremen, if they had not been prevented from doing so by the intervention of the owners of the said cargo, and their election to take the same out of the shipowners' hands without their consent at an intermediate port, and that they are entitled (subject to the rights of the salvors of the said ship and cargo) to a lien upon the proceeds of the said cargo, now in the registry, in respect of such freight; and if not entitled to the full amount of such freight, that they are entitled to freight pro rata, or to a reasonable remuneration for the carriage of the said cargo from Charleston as aforesaid. By the exertions and expenditure of the owners of the Kathleen, in carrying the said cargo from Charleston to Dover, the same was greatly increased in value.

15. The owners of the Kathleen, upon the arrival at Dover of the said cargo in a wet and damaged condition, and before the said order for the sale thereof was made, incurred various expenses in, about, and with a view to the drying and improvement of the condition of the said cargo, and its preservation from further damage and deterioration from damp, and also in general average expenses. The said expenses were reasonably and properly incurred in the interest of the owners of the said cargo, and the said cargo was greatly benefited thereby. The owners of the Kathleen submit that they are entitled (subject as aforesaid to the rights of the said salvors) to a lien upon the proceeds of the said cargo for such expenses so incurred for the preservation thereof.

The petition concluded by praying the right honourable the judge to declare that the owners of the Kathleen were entitled (subject to the rights of the salvors of the Kathleen and her cargo) to a lien upon the proceeds of the sale of the said cargo for the freight or other remuneration due to the said owners of the Kathleen in respect thereof, and for the expenses reasonably and properly incurred by them in preserving the said cargo from deterioration when the same had been brought to Dover, and in general average expenses, to refer it to the registrar and merchants to ascertain the amount thereof, and to direct that (subject to the rights of the said salvors) the said owners of the Kathleen should be paid the amount that might be due to them in respect of the premises out of the proceeds of the cargo, and to condemn the owners of the said cargo in the cost of the proceedings, and that otherwise right and justice might be administered in the premises.

The owners of cargo filed the following answer:

1. The allegations contained in Articles 1 to 9 of the petition, both inclusive, are true.

2. The said cargo had been wet, and had suffered considerable damage from sea water. It could not have been re-shipped at Dover. If it could have been re-shipped it would have been only so re-shipped after great delay and with much damage, and it would not have arrived at Bremen in a merchantable condition as cotton. If it had so arrived in a merchantable condition as cotton it would have been as cotton of greatly inferior kind and value. It was proper and necessary, in order to avoid a great depreciation in value, to sell and deliver the said cargo as quickly as possible.

3. Save as hereinbefore appears the several allegations contained in Article 10 of the petition are untrue.

4. As to the notice of motion stated in the 11th article of the petition, and the order of the right honourable the judge stated in the 12th article thereof, they refer to the said notice of motion, and the minute of the said order, but save as aforesaid the allegations contained in Articles 11, 12, and 13 are true.

5. The several allegations contained in Articles 14 and 15 of the petition are untrue.

6. By reason of the premises above stated and admitted, the owners of the Kathleen have no claim against the said cargo or the owners thereof for any freight; and if any expenses were incurred by the owners of the Kathleen, as pleaded in the 15th article of the petition, the owners of the Kathleen have no claim against the said cargo or owners thereof for any such expenses.

7. The owners of the Kathleen did not in any case fulfil their contract to carry the said cargo to Bremen, and are not entitled to any freight, or to any sum in respect of freight, or to any remuneration for carriage of the said cargo.

The owner of the Kathleen concluded the pleadings, denying the allegations of the answer, save as appeared by the petition.

At the hearing evidence was given on behalf of the shipowners showing that the cotton might have been carried forward to Bremen, so as to arrive in specie and fit for use as cotton, and that in fact the time occupied in transshipping and forwarding it would not have occasioned any appreciable depreciation in the value of the cotton, but the witnesses admitted that some depreciation would have taken place, and that it was an advantage to have it sold in London. The shipowners were ready to carry on the cotton, and would have done so, but for the order of sale. It would have been carried forward, so as to arrive in Bremen before it was actually sold in London, and the rate for carrying would have been 17s. 6d. per ton.

Milward, Q.C. and Aspland for the shipowners.

—So long as the cotton could have been carried forward so as to arrive in specie, and the shipowners were willing to forward it, we are entitled to our freight. It may have been a wise discretion on the part of the owner of the cargo to have it taken out and sold in this country, but that will not justify them in saying that the contract of carriage is at an end. The owner of cargo ought to prove it impossible that any considerable part of the cargo could arrive in specie before they can support their present contention. They repudiate all freight. The strongest position which the owners of cargo can take is that the cotton would have been depreciated by being carried forward. Hence we are entitled to full freight, or at least to pro rata freight. In The Teutonia (L. Rep. 4 P. C., 71; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 48; ante, vol. 1, p. 214) it was held that if the owner of cargo demands his goods short of port of destination he is entitled to full freight. In The Soblomsten (L. Rep. 1 Adm. & Ecc. 293; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 393; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 436) the ship was not a derelict, but, with that exception, the facts were similar to these, and it was there held that the owners of cargo having submitted, without objection, to a sale of their cargo, they had waived their right to have the cargo carried forward, and had impliedly accepted it short of its destination so as to create an implied contract to pay pro rata freight, which seems to have been all that was claimed. In the present case the acts of the owners amounted to a promise to pay at least pro rata freight; they actively interfered, and the order for sale was made on the application of the salvors acting at their instigation, and the sale took place after the court had ordered that the sale should be subject to any questions of freight due. No liability attaches to the shipowner for not carrying on in this case. The damage preventing the completion of the contract in the first instance was occasioned by the collision; an excepted peril, being a peril of the seas. After the arrival of the ship at Dover we were willing to carry on the cargo. The fact that cargo is damaged gives no right to the owner to take it out of the hands of the shipowner, except on the payment of freight. Notara v. Henderson (ante, vol. 1, p. 278; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 225; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 442) was an action against a shipowner to recover damage to a cargo of beans by salt water; the ship had been in collision, for which she was not to blame; the collision occurred at an intermediate port: her master refused to deliver them at the intermediate port, except on payment of full freight; the owners of the cargo offered pro rata freight, but this was refused; the master carried the goods on to their port of destination without taking any steps to dry them; the action was brought to recover the injury sustained over and above that caused by the wetting from the collision by reason of the beans being left in a wet condition. It was alleged to be the duty of the master to take them out and dry them before carrying them on. Willes, J., in delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, says: "The law up to a certain point is clear and well settled by authority; the shippers, though on the spot, were not entitled to the possession of the beans for any purpose, without paying the full freight to Glasgow. The freight was not due, but the shipowners were entitled to retain the goods as security for earning it. The offer of pro rata freight may have been reasonable, but it was one which the shipowners were not bound to accept; and it must be treated as an attempt to compromise, not affecting the right of the parties, though it may bear upon the reasonableness of the course pursued, assuming such reasonableness to be material in determining the question of neglect. It was argued for the shipowners that the fact of the shippers being upon the spot negated any implied duty on the part of the master, as agent of necessity, to take care of the goods; but this argument will not bear examination. The shippers were present, but they could not lawfully touch the goods without leave. The shipowners refused to let them do so without payment of a sum not yet earned, and insisted upon retaining the goods, with the rights and consequently the duties of the original bailment, whatever those might be. The shippers thereupon insisted upon the goods being properly taken care of by the shipowners, who retained the control of them as a pledge for their freight." We had a clear right to carry on the cargo, even if we did not take proper measures to dry it; although the owners of cargo might have had an action against us for neglect in this respect. Freight is due upon the arrival of the cargo at its port of destination, whatever its condition: (Dakin v. Oxley, 15 C.B., N. S., 646). We, however, must be assumed to have been ready to take all proper measures to preserve the cargo, nor would the expense of drying and transshipping, if necessary, for the preservation of the cargo have fallen upon the shipowners, but upon the owners of the cargo—

Secondly, how far does the fact of the ship having been abandoned and a derelict when found by the salvors affect our right to recover freight? Salvors taking possession of a ship take it only as agents for the owners, and no rights are altered by the service, and the shipowners are entitled to recover possession subject only to the salvor's lien. The abandonment does not take the right of property out of the true owner, and if he claim its return on being brought into port, the salvors hold possession for him only; he is never adversely dispossessed—

The Aquila, 1 C. Rob. 37;
Thornley v. Hebson, 2 B. & Ald. 513.

In Briggs v. The Merchants' Assurance Company (13 Q.B. 167) it appears that the court allowed a shipowner to give bail for both ship and cargo which had been abandoned, and consequently to retain his control over the cargo. The American law is the same as the English. In Jordan v. The Warren Insurance Company (1 Story's C.C. 342), Story, J. says, "Now nothing is better founded in the law on this subject than that the shippers are bound to pay the full freight for the voyage if the cargo is carried to the port of destination, and specifically remains, notwithstanding at its arrival it is, by reason of sea damage, utterly ruined and worthless. This doctrine, although formerly a matter of some doubt, is now firmly established, and, indeed, must be manifestly correct upon principle. It is as clear that, after shipment of the cargo on the voyage, the shippers have no right to demand it at an intermediate port, short of the port of destination, without payment of the full freight for the voyage, whether the cargo arrive there in a damaged or in an undamaged state." In The Propeller Mohawk (8 Wallace U.S. Sup. Ct. Rep. 153, 161), it is said, "In cases where the disaster happens in consequence of one of the perils within the exception in the bill of lading, or charter-party, the only responsibility of the vessel is to refit and forward the cargo, or the portion saved, or if that is impracticable to forward it on another vessel, and the owner is then entitled to freight. If part of the cargo is so far damaged as to be unfit to be carried on, the master may sell it at the intermediate port, as the agent for the shipper, for whom it may concern, and carry on the remainder. In this class of cases the vessel is only responsible for carrying on the cargo, being exempt from any damage by the exception in the contract of affreightment. And it is perfectly settled, that if the shipper voluntarily accepts the goods at the place of the disaster, or at any intermediate port, such acceptance terminates the voyage and all responsibility of the carrier, and the master is entitled to freight pro rata itineris." Our contract never having been put an end to we are entitled to full freight, as we always insisted on carrying on the goods till sold by the court; or, at least, to pro rata freight, in consequence of the action of the owners of cargo in having the goods sold here.

Butt, Q.C., and W. G. F. Phillimore (Stubbs with them), for the owners of cargo.—We submit that no freight is due. A condition precedent to the right to recover full freight is delivery at Bremen, and there has been no such delivery. [SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—But if the court has by its action stopped delivery, which would otherwise have taken place, must not the shipowner still retain his rights whatever they may be?] Even on equitable grounds the shipowner is not entitled to full freight, as it would have cost him something to carry the cargo forward, but the real answer to the claim for full freight is that the contract has never been performed. But can the shipowner claim pro rata freight? To entitle a shipowner to recover pro rata freight, there must have arisen a new contract, either express or implied by law from certain facts. Where a hindrance to the completion of the voyage arises at an intermediate port, and the owner of cargo accepts the goods at that port, the law implies a contract on the part of the shipowner to pay freight pro rata itineris peracti. The consideration in that case is that the goods are delivered to the owner at an intermediate port, and that the master thereby agrees to surrender the lien to which he is entitled to enable him to earn the full freight. In this case the shipowner had become dispossessed of the goods. He had abandoned them sine spe recuperandi. It is immaterial whether the abandonment was right or wrong; the possession was out of the owners of the ship. The possession was in the salvors, and afterwards in the court. The master never became repossessed, and so never had the opportunity of giving up his lien to the owners of cargo, and creating a new contract to pay freight pro rata. The possession of the salvor, if for the benefit of any person except themselves, was for the benefit, so far as the cargo was concerned, of the owners of the cargo. The damage to the ship by the collision came between the expected perils of the bill of lading, and the shipowner is not liable for non-delivery, but the bill of lading goes no farther; it excuses the shipowner, but does not create a new contract. Moreover, pro rata freight can only be due when both parties consent to a delivery at the intermediate port. Here neither party would consent to the payment of pro rata freight. The shipowners claimed full freight, or the right to carry on. Hence it cannot be said that the shipowners were assenting parties to any contract stipulating for the payment of pro rata freight. They cannot now ask the court to set up a contract which they have hitherto refused to adopt. In all the cases cited the shipowner continued in possession of the goods, and in such cases it must be admitted that he may retain the goods and carry them on in the exercise of his right of earning freight. Here, however, there is no possession by the shipowner. Even where goods are sold by a master in the exercise of a wise discretion, before arrival at the port of destination, he is not the agent of the owners of cargo to accept delivery for them, and so create a contract to pay pro rata freight: (Vlierboom v. Chapman, 13 M. & W. 230). The master is bound, no doubt, to carry goods on if the merchant does not interfere, but not otherwise: Tronson v. Dent, 8 Moore P. O. C. 419) and he can only recover freight in case of such carrying on or such interference. In Notara v. Henderson (L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 346; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 577; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 419) it is said: "What then ought the master to have done? If he had been in a foreign port, where the freighter was not and could not have been consulted, it would have been his duty either to provide for sending home the cargo, when sufficiently dry by another ship, or for selling it on the spot, as might best serve the interest of the freighter. He could not have justified the taking them on in their then condition, if any better course could have been adopted, and if he sold them he would not have been entitled, according to the decision of the Court of Exchequer in the case of Vlierboom v. Chapman (ubi sup.), even to freight pro rata." A new contract is absolutely necessary to found the claim to pro rata freight. In the same case in the Exchequer Chamber (L. Rep. 7

THE KATHLEEN.

Q. B. 234) it is said: "There are unquestionably cases in which the exercise of such a duty would be incumbent upon the master as representing the owners of the ship, and for their interest. As for instance, in the case of a perishable cargo so damaged by salt water that it could not in its existing state be taken forward in specie to the port of discharge, so as to earn the freight, but which could, at an expense considerably less than the freight, be dried and carried on. In such a case to earn the freight, it might be for the interest of the owner of the ship to save the cargo by drying. To sell it or abandon it would give no right to freight pro rata against the owner of cargo, nor any right to recover against the underwriter on freight." If in the opinion of the court the cargo was in such a state that to save further deterioration it was right to sell it in London, then the master, if he had been in possession, ought to have sold it there, and then he could have recovered no freight; he cannot put the case higher than if he sold it himself. The contract of affreightment was at an end by reason of the happening of an excepted peril, and the shipowners set up this peril as an excuse for not performing their contract; how can they now say that the contract is subsisting? If the contract is so at an end the duty of the master, if he had brought the ship into port, would have been to sell the cargo: (The Gratitudine, 5 C. Rob. 240). But on the sale there would have been no right to freight.

Milward, Q. C. in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 22. Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The Kathleen, a vessel laden with cotton, coming from Charleston to Bremen, came into collision with a vessel called the Mallowdale on the 24th Jan. last. The damage which she received induced the master to abandon her; no blame attaches to him on that account; she was abandoned and became a derelict. She was afterwards saved in her shattered condition by certain salvors, English and French, and brought with her cargo into Dover on the 27th Jan. I awarded 3350*l.* salvage remuneration with certain costs. On the 30th Jan. I made an order for unelivery of her cargo. On the 9th Feb., on an affidavit of the owner of the cargo as to the deterioration of the cotton, I ordered a sale to take place. On the 16th Feb. the unloading was completed. On the 18th Feb. the shipowner offered to carry on the cotton to Bremen. I ordered the sale, however, at the request of the owners of the cargo, reserving all questions as to freight. The sale took place on the 12th March. The ship sold for 580*l.*, and the cargo for 14,000*l.*; the freight claimed is 2300*l.* The money (the produce of the sale of the cargo) has been paid into court, and I am now asked, after payment of the salvage reward, to deduct the freight amounting to the sum mentioned before the residue be paid out to the owner of the cargo.

Whatever right the shipowner had, has been preserved to him, for, as Mr. Justice Story said, in the case of The Ship Nathaniel Hooper (3 Summer's Rep. 553): "The possession of the property by the court through its officers, is a possession protective of the interests of all concerned, and not displacing the rights or lien of any party."

It is urged on behalf of the shipowner—first, that the cotton could have been carried on in another ship, and would have arrived at Bremen, though partially injured, in specie. Secondly, that he was willing and ready to carry it on in another ship; thirdly, that the collision was not in any way imputable to him or the consequences of his fault; fourthly, that the collision was one of the excepted perils in the contract contained in the bill of lading. All these propositions are true.

It was further urged that it must be presumed that he would have taken proper measures for drying the cotton before it was transhipped. The cases of Notara v. Henderson (L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 217), and Blasco v. Fletcher (14 C. B., N. S., 147), and other cases were relied upon. It was contended, therefore, that the shipowner was entitled to full freight, or at least to pro rata freight. The latter question may be conveniently disposed of first.

There is no express contract for a pro rata freight. According to the decisions at common law, however, a title to pro rata freight may arise out of a new implied contract with the shipowner to which both parties assent. But it was truly observed by Mr. Butt, that in this case neither party consented. The shipowner resisted as much as he could the delivery of the goods, and each party stood upon what he considered to be his rights; the shipowner to carry on the cargo, the cargo owner to receive the goods. Moreover, it has been proved by the evidence, that the shipowner demanded full freight. I am of opinion that no pro rata freight is due.

The only question, in truth, is whether the shipowner is entitled to the full freight. I have been referred, by the industry of counsel, to a great many cases, and they contain valuable principles of law, but in all of them I think the element of mixed fact and law present in this case is wanting.

In this case the vessel was a derelict; in other words, the owner through his agent, the master, had abandoned all possession of the ship, and at the time of abandonment had certainly lost all right to freight or to carry on the cargo. It has been urged that the salvors have only a lien for their remuneration, and this is true. But it is also true that they are in lawful possession, and cannot be displaced by the owners. When the salvage suit begins the property is placed in the custody of the court, which is bound to do what is best for it. In this case the court ordered the sale of the cargo for the benefit of the parties interested. If no claimant appears the property in the ship would after a certain length of time belong to the Crown. Sir John Nicoll in the case cited by counsel (The Dantzic Packet, 3 Hagg. 385) draws the distinction between salvage rendered to a ship in distress and a ship abandoned. "It is different," he says, "in the case of a derelict; there the first occupant has a vested interest and an exclusive right of possession, if alone he can save the property; he takes possession, indeed, for the benefit of the Crown, in the first instance, but subject to a liberal remuneration." It is, indeed, true that the original shipowners are allowed a persona standi in this court, and receive the remainder of their abandoned property after the legal charges on it have been satisfied; but the same can be predicated of the owners of the cargo, which, if the contract still subsisted between them and the shipowner, would not be the case; for the ship would have a right to represent the cargo as well as the ship. In fact, the possession of the cargo abandoned by the shipowner vested first in the salvors and afterwards in this court before it could be restored to the owners.

On the whole, I am satisfied that the contingency provided for in the bill of lading as nullifying the contract, namely, "the danger of the seas," has happened, and that the original contract between the owners of the ship and of the cargo is at an end. I shall, therefore, grant no freight in this case.

AMERICAN REPORTS.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Reported by E. D. BENEDICT, Proctor and Advocate.

THE STEAMSHIP PENNSYLVANIA.

Collision at Sea—Steamer and barque—Foghorn and bell—Speed in fog—Contributory negligence—Presumption.

A steamer going at the rate of seven miles an hour in a fog, came into collision with a barque, which was lying to and making a headway of a mile and a half an hour. Those on the barque were ringing a bell, but were not blowing a foghorn. The barque was sighted by the steamer's lookout about three or four hundred feet distant, a little on the steamer's starboard bow. Her helm was first ported, then starboarded, and then ported again, and she struck the barque about midships, sinking her almost instantly.

Held that the steamer was in fault in going at too great a speed in the fog. That the barque was in fault in not blowing a foghorn instead of ringing a bell. That the presumption was that this fault of the barque contributed to the collision. That it was impossible to rebut that presumption, and that the damages must be apportioned (differing from the Privy Council in the case of the Pennsylvania (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 55).

THIS was an appeal by the owners of the Pennsylvania, from a decree of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York, holding her liable for the loss of the barque Mary A. Troop, which was sunk by a collision with the Pennsylvania on 15th June 1869. The evidence in the case did not vary materially from the evidence in the suit brought against the Pennsylvania by the owners of the cargo on board of the barque, the decision in which is reported in 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 55, except that it was more complete as indicated in the judgment.

For the barque, B. D. Benedict.

For the steamship, William Allen Builer.

STRONG, J., delivered the opinion of the Court:—It may be that when the barque was discovered by those on board the steamer it was too late to avoid a collision. The two vessels were then not more than three or four hundred feet apart, and the steamer had the barque almost across her bow. Yet it is possible that if her helm had been put to starboard instead of to port when the lookout announced "bell on the starboard bow," and had been kept ported, the collision might either have been avoided or have been much less disastrous. By porting her helm she was turned toward the point where the bell indicated the barque was, and this apparently increased the danger of a collision. But if this is not to be attributed to her as a fault, there is no excuse to be found in the evidence for the high rate of speed at which she was sailing during so dense a fog as prevailed when the vessels came together. The concurrent testimony of witnesses is that the objects could not be seen at any considerable distance, probably not farther than the length of the steamer, and yet she was sailing at the rate of at least seven knots an hour, thus precipitating herself into a position where avoidance of a collision with the barque was difficult, if not impossible, and would have been, even if the barque had been stationary. And she ought to have apprehended danger of meeting or overtaking vessels in her path. She was only two hundred miles from Sandy Hook, in the track of outward and inward bound vessels, and where their presence might reasonably have been expected. It was, therefore, her duty to exercise the utmost caution.

Our rules of navigation, as well as the British rules, require every steamship, when in a fog, "to go at a moderate speed." What is such speed may not be precisely definable. It must depend upon the circumstances of each case. That may be moderate and reasonable in some circumstances which would be quite immoderate in others. But the purpose of the requirement being to guard against danger of collisions, very plainly the speed should be reduced, as the risk of meeting vessels is increased. In the case of The Europa (Jenkins' Rule of the Road at Sea, p. 52), it was said by the Privy Council: "This may be safely laid down as a rule on all occasions, fog or clear, light or dark, that no steamer has a right to navigate at such a rate that it is impossible for her to prevent damage, taking all precaution at the moment she sees danger to be possible, and if she cannot do that without going less than five knots an hour, then she is bound to go at less than five knots an hour." And we do not think the evidence shows any necessity for such a rate of speed as the steamer maintained. It is true her master, whilst admitting she was going seven knots, states that he don't consider she could have been steered going slower—could not have been steered straight. And two other witnesses testify that, in their opinion, she could not have been navigated with safety and kept under command at a less rate of speed than seven miles an hour. These, however, are but expressions of opinions based upon no facts. They are of little worth. And even if it were true that such a rate was necessary for safe steering, it would not justify driving the steamer through so dense a fog along a route so much frequented, and when the probability of encountering other vessels was so great. It would rather have been her duty to lay-to. But there is the evidence of one who had been a ship-master, and who once crossed the Atlantic as a passenger in this steamer. He states that on the passage she did not, to the best of his knowledge, average over four knots during twenty-four hours, and that he noticed no difficulty in her steerageway at that low rate of speed. As he was in the habit of going to sea he would probably have noticed difficulty if there had been any. This is a fact of more weight than any mere opinions unsupported by observation or trial. We think, therefore, it must be concluded that the steamer was going at an undue rate of speed, and that it was her fault that she came into a position from which she could not, or certainly did not, escape without colliding with the barque.

It is next to be considered whether any fault of the barque contributed to the collision. That she was in fault is beyond controversy. She was in plain violation of the rules of navigation, which required her to blow a foghorn. Both our own and the British shipping Acts enact that sailing ships when under way shall use a foghorn, and when not under way shall use a bell. The British Merchant Shipping Acts expressly declare that owners and masters of ships shall use no other fog signals than such as are required by the regulations, and that if in any case of collision it appears to the court before which the case is tried that such collision was occasioned by the non-observance of any regulation made by the Act, or in pursuance thereof, the ship by which the regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made a departure from the regulation necessary. Our own statute does not contain this provision expressed, but its meaning is the same. The barque in this case was a British ship, as was the steamer. She was under way, moving slowly, indeed little, if any, more than a mile an hour, with her helm lashed three-quarters to port, but on her starboard tack, carrying two close-reefed topsails, foresail, fore topmast and mizzen staysails, and with no sails aback, so far as it appears. She was constantly changing her position. It was her duty, therefore, to blow a foghorn, and not to ring a bell. By ringing a bell, as she did, she gave a false signal, and, so far as she could, assured all approaching vessels that she was not under way. There is some evidence that a bell can be heard as far as can a foghorn, and some that it can be heard farther. On the other hand there is evidence that a foghorn can be heard farthest. However this may be the barque had no right to substitute any equivalent for the signal required by the navigation rules. In the case of The Emperor (Holt's Rule of the Road, 38), it was said "it is not advisable to allow these important regulations to be satisfied by equivalents, or by anything less than a close and literal adherence to what they prescribe." In addition to this it may be remarked that a bell can never be an equivalent for a foghorn. It gives different information. Both may notify an approaching vessel that the signalling ship is in the neighbourhood, but the one gives notice that the ship is moving, and the other that the ship is stationary.

Concluding then, as we must, that the barque was in fault, it still remains to inquire whether the fault contributed to the collision—whether in any degree it was the cause of the vessels coming into a dangerous position. It must be conceded that if it clearly appears the fault could have had nothing to do with the disaster, it may be dismissed from consideration. The liability for damages is upon the ship or ships whose fault caused the injury. But when, as in this case, a ship at the time of the collision is in actual violation of a statutory rule intended to prevent collisions, it is no more than a reasonable presumption that the fault, if not the sole cause, was at least a contributory cause of the disaster. In such a case the burden rests upon the ship of showing not merely that her fault might not have been one of the causes, or that it probably was not, but that it could not have been. Such a rule is necessary to enforce obedience to the mandate of the statute. In the case of The Fenham (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 329), the Lords of the Privy Council said "it is of the greatest possible importance having regard to the Admiralty regulations, and to the necessity of enforcing them, to lay down this rule: that if it is proved that any vessel has not shown lights, the burden lies on her to show that her non-compliance with the regulations was not the cause of the collision." In some cases it is possible to show this with entire certainty. In others it cannot be. The evidence in the present case leaves it uncertain whether if a foghorn had been blown on the barque, it would not have been heard sooner than the bell was heard, and thus earlier warning have been given to the steamer—seasonable warning to have enabled her to keep out of the way. It was not without reason that the statute required a foghorn for ships under way, and a bell for those not under way. The Legislature must have known it was important ships should have the earliest possible notice of the proximity of other moving vessels. They might be approaching each other. If so, they would come together sooner than they could if one of them was not under way. It may be assumed therefore, that the Legislature acted under the conviction that a foghorn could be heard at a greater distance than a bell, and required the use of one rather than that of the other for that reason. To go into the inquiry whether the Legislature was not in error—whether in fact a bell did not give notice to the steamer that the barque was where she was as soon as a foghorn would have done—is out of place. It would be substituting our judgment for the judgment of the law-making power. It would be admitting the validity of an equivalent for that which the statute has made a positive requirement.

Then how can it be shown on the part of the barque that the failure to use a foghorn certainly contributed in no degree to the collision? How can it be proved that if a foghorn had been blown those on board the steamer would not have heard it in season to have enabled them to check their speed or change their course, and thus avoid any collision? Though there were two look-outs on the steamer, each in his proper place, the barque's bell was not heard until the vessels were close upon each other. Who can say the proximity of the vessels would not have been discovered sooner if the barque had obeyed the navy regulations? If it be said this is speculation, it may be admitted, but it is speculation rendered necessary by a certain fault of the barque. It is equally speculative to conclude that the collision would have taken place if a foghorn had been used instead of a bell, and infer therefrom that the fault of the barque had no relation to the disaster. The truth is the case is one in which, while the presumption is that the failure to blow a foghorn was a contributory cause of the collision, and while the burden of showing that it was in no degree occasioned by that failure rests upon the barque, it is impossible to rebut the presumption. It is a well known fact that in some states of the atmosphere a foghorn can be heard at much greater distances than others. How far it could have been heard when this collision occurred can never be known. Nor can it be known what precautions the steamer would have adopted if the true and proper signal had been given her. Hence, it appears to us the barque has not proved that her failure to obey the shipping regulations was not a concurrent cause of the injury she received, and, consequently, as both vessels were in fault, the damages, according to the Admiralty rule, should be divided.

We have not overlooked the fact that in a libel by the owners of the cargo of the barque against the steamer for damages resulting from the same collision, it was held by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England, that the disaster was chargeable to the steamer alone: (The Pennsylvania, 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 55.) But with great respect for the tribunal that thus decided we do not feel at liberty to surrender our judgment especially in view of the fact that the case is now more fully presented and the evidence is more complete than it was in the British Court.

The degree of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause is remanded with instructions to enter a decree in accordance with this opinion.

THE HERMINE (a).

Seamen's wages—Shipping articles—Duration of voyage—Merchant Shipping Act, 1873—Wrongful discharge—Foreign ships—Jurisdiction—Leaving ship without permission of master—Desertion—Setting aside inequitable contracts. Under the Merchant Shipping Act of England of 1873, the shipping articles need only specify the maximum duration of the engagement of a seaman, and the places or parts of the world to which it does not extend:

Held, that a specification of the places to which the voyage or engagement might extend, was an implied agreement that it was not to extend to any other, and, therefore, a sufficient compliance with the Act.

A Court of Admiralty will not decline jurisdiction of a suit by foreign seamen against a foreign vessel to recover wages, where it appears that the voyage has been completed or broken up, or the seamen have been discharged by the wrongful act of the master.

Semble, that the court will not decline jurisdiction where it appears the seamen have been discharged with their own consent before the expiration of the voyage, without the payment of wages already earned, or any agreement or understanding concerning them.

A seaman is bound to stay by the vessel according to his agreement, whether the master takes any means to compel him to do so or not, and, therefore, where seamen leave a vessel before the completion of the voyage, although with the knowledge of the master, and upon his promise that they should not be arrested therefor, but without his consent, they are guilty of desertion.

(a) From the written judgment of the learned judge as given in the Chicago Legal News.

AMERICAN REFS.]

THE HERMINE.

[AMERICAN REFS.]

Contracts with seamen upon a discharge before completion of voyage concerning wages already earned, will be set aside or discharged by Court of Admiralty if inequitable.

Quantum meruit, what seamen entitled to on.

This was a cause of wages instituted by certain British seamen against the British barque Hermine.

The facts sufficiently appear from the judgment.

A. C. Gibbs and Hughes, for the libellants.

W. H. Effinger, for the claimants.

DEADY, J.—Peter Whelan and five others bring this suit against the British barque Hermine, to recover the sum of 489.98 dollars, alleged to be due them as wages for service as seamen on said barque, on a voyage from Liverpool to this port.

The libellants shipped on the Hermine at Liverpool on the 21st Jan. 1874, as ordinary seamen, on a voyage from Liverpool to Portland (Oregon), and any ports and places in the Pacific, Indian, and Atlantic Oceans, China and Eastern seas; thence to a port for orders and the continent of Europe (if required), and back to a final port of discharge in the United Kingdom; term not to exceed three years; at the monthly wages of 3*l.* 5*s.*"

It is alleged in the libel that the libellants, during the voyage, were "fed upon very poor food, of such poor quality as to endanger their health and render them liable to scurvy and other sickness," and that therefore they asked for their discharge at this port, "unless they could be better treated and fed," and that thereupon the master discharged them, but refused to pay them their wages.

The answer of the claimants, G. H. Fletcher and Co., of Liverpool, denies that the libellants were poorly fed or otherwise improperly treated on the voyage, or that they left the vessel on that account, or that the master discharged them, and avers that the libellants deserted the vessel, and thereby forfeited their wages.

The Hermine arrived at this port on the 5th Aug., and a few days afterwards the libellants asked the master, Alfred H. Hiscock, for their discharge. He replied, that he was willing to discharge them if they would forfeit the wages earned, as he would have to pay double or more wages for seamen in this port to take their place. Roberts wanted 15 dollars, but finally agreed to take 5 dollars. Rogers agreed to the same terms; and the others said they would forfeit their wages if the master would give them a legal discharge.

On the following day, Monday, Aug. 10. the libellants, by the direction of the master, met him at the British consul's office. The matter was then stated to the consul, who declined to discharge the men unless they were paid in full. This the master declined to do, and the consul directed the men to return on board. Some conversation then ensued between the master and the men, the latter being still anxious to leave the vessel, the result of which was, that the former promised if the libellants left he would not arrest them. Thereupon the libellants returned to the vessel, and after some hours the muster followed. The result was that the master paid the men from 3 dollars to 4 dollars apiece, except Roberts, to whom he paid 8 dollars, when they took their effects and quietly went ashore on the same day. In addition to these sums, they had each received a month's wages in advance, and 6 dollars from the slop chest on the voyage.

The master did not expressly assent to the libellants quitting the ship, but he had good reason to believe they would do so, and took no means to prevent it. In fact, the money paid libellants was given to and received by them with the tacit understanding that if they were allowed to clear out without being troubled or arrested, they would make no further claim against the vessel.

The libellants had no cause to complain of their treatment on the voyage. On the trial they testified that the beef and bread were bad, but the weight of evidence is, that both were as good as is usually furnished at the port of Liverpool. They were otherwise very well supplied and cared for, and were in good health during the whole of the long voyage. Neither did they complain of bad food or ill-treatment of any kind to the British consul, although they had ample opportunity to do so, if they desired; nor did they leave the vessel on that account, but, so far as appears, for the purpose of bettering their condition in a pecuniary point of view. The wages out of this port average 40 dollars per month—more than twice the rate at which they were engaged to serve on board the Hermine for the next two and a half years.

It is admitted that the answer correctly describes the voyage set out in the shipping articles, but the libellants maintain that the description of the voyage beyond this port is so vague and uncertain as to render the contract so far void, and therefore the libellants are entitled to their discharge and wages here, as being the legal end of the voyage.

The contract having been made in a British port for service on a British vessel, its validity must depend upon the law of that country. This is the general rule of law, and it is particularly applicable to cases like this in the Admiralty Courts, which "are in some sense international courts charged with the duty of declaring the law applicable to ships." (The Acme, 2 Benedict, 386; The Jerusalem, 2 Gal. 191; The Infanta, 1 Abb. Ad. R. 263.)

Sect. 149 of the English Merchant Shipping Act 1854 provides that the shipping articles shall, among other things, contain the following: "The nature, and as far as practicable, the duration of the intended voyage or engagement." The Merchant Shipping Act 1873, amends this section, so that the agreement, "instead of stating the nature and duration of the intended voyage or engagement," may "state the maximum period of the voyage or engagement, and the places or parts of the world (if any) to which the voyage or engagement is not to extend."

No English authorities have been cited upon the construction of this provision, but I think that under the Act of 1873, if not the one of 1854, the description of the voyage is sufficient. The maximum duration of the engagement is fixed at three years, and although the articles do not expressly "state the places or parts of the world" to which it is not to extend, I think they do so sufficiently when they mention "the places, &c." to which it may extend. By a necessary implication, all other "places or parts of the world" than those mentioned are excluded from the engagement—it does not extend to them.

Upon this point counsel for libellants cited Snow v. Wope (2 Curtis, 301), in which the agreement was held void, because the articles only described the voyage as being "from the port of Boston to Valparaiso, and other ports in the Pacific Ocean, and from thence home direct, via ports in the East Indies or Europe," without any limitation upon the time to be occupied in making such voyage. The court held that the agreement was void because it did not comply with the Act which required that the agreement should declare "the voyage or voyages, term or terms of time," for which the seamen may have shipped. But in the case at bar, the duration of the engagement is limited, and it is to be inferred, from the opinion of the court in Snow v. Wope that, if there had been a like limitation in that case, the court would have held the agreement valid, notwithstanding no definite or specific voyage was described in it.

On the part of the claimant it is objected that, this being a suit for wages earned by foreign seamen on board a foreign vessel, the court ought to decline the jurisdiction, and remit the libellants to the tribunals of their own country.

Upon this point counsel cites The Napoleon (Olcott, 208); Graham v. Hoskins (id. 224); Davis v. Leslie (1 Abb. 123); The Infanta (id. 263); Bucket v. Klorkgeter (id. 402). The rule established by these cases is to the effect that the court will not take jurisdiction in such cases, unless it is necessary to prevent a failure of justice, as where the voyage has been completed or abandoned, or the seamen discharged or the contract otherwise dissolved by the wrongful act of the owner or master. These cases were all decided in the same court, and they carry the rule against the jurisdiction to the extreme. In considering this question in Benedict's Admiralty Practice, § 282, it is said that "nothing within the territory of a nation is without the jurisdiction. . . . In the present state of international intercourse and commerce, all persons in time of peace have the right to resort to the tribunals of the nation where they may happen to be, for the protection of their rights. The jurisdiction of the courts over them is complete, except when it is excluded by treaty." In The Jerusalem (2 Gal. 198), Mr. Justice Story states the rule as follows: "Where the voyage has not terminated, or the seamen have bound themselves to abide by the decisions of the tribunals of their own country, foreign courts have declined any interference, and remitted the parties to their own tribunals for redress. But where the contract has been dissolved by the regular termination of the voyage, or by the wrongful act of the other party, the cases are not unfrequent in which foreign courts have sustained the claim for mariners' wages."

In any view of the matter, this appears to be a proper case for exercising the jurisdiction. The libellants allege that they were discharged by the master in this port without the payment of wages. If the libel be true, the voyage is terminated as to them by the wrongful act of the master. Under such circumstances, it would be mere mockery, and a denial of justice, to remit the libellants to the forums of Great Britain, for, being discharged in this port, they are practically denied the means of access to such forums. Indeed, I think the court ought not to decline the jurisdiction, even if it appeared that the libellants were discharged with their own consent, without the payment of wages, or any agreement or understanding upon the subject, or upon terms that are manifestly inequitable and unjust. In such cases they ought to recover, as upon a quantum meruit. Being separated from the vessel with the consent of the master, if they are not allowed to enforce any claim which they may have against her in this court, it is a practical denial of justice.

Upon the facts of the case, the libellants appear to have been guilty of desertion. They cannot complain that the master was aware of their intention to quit the ship, and took no means to prevent it, or to compel their return after they had left. That is a matter between him and his owners. He may have had good reason to believe, as he stated in his testimony, that they would leave the ship in spite of him, and that it was no use to try to prevent it; that they shipped with the intention of making their way to this coast, and then deserting the vessel.

However this may be, the libellants were bound by their contract with the owners to stand by the ship until the completion of the voyage, unless they were actually discharged by the master, or so maltreated as to justify their leaving without his consent. They had no right to leave the ship simply because they could do so, or because the master assured them that he would not trouble them for it if they did. Even if it could be said that the master connived at their quitting the ship, their act was none the less desertion. In so doing they wilfully violated their contract with the owners, and they cannot now evade responsibility therefor, by showing that the master was aware of their intention, and took no means to prevent it.

Of course the master is the agent of the owners, and if it appeared that by any artifice or representation he had induced the libellants to quit the vessel under an impression that they had a right to do so, the case would be altered.

But I do not think there is any ground for supposing that the master desired to get rid of these men without paying them their wages. No motive is shown for any such conduct, and, so far as appears, the vessel can gain nothing by their leaving, even without their pay. But with the libellants the case is otherwise. They evidently acted upon the fact that they could command more than double the wages, in or out of this port, they were receiving on the Hermine. The pretence that the food was substantially bad, or that they were otherwise ill-treated, is evidently an afterthought. If the food was bad, they could and should have complained to their consul, especially when they were before him on this very subject of being discharged.

But supposing it to be true that the libellants not only left the vessel with the knowledge of the master, but also with his consent, still I do not think they are entitled to recover.

In the first place, upon this theory of the case, all the circumstances attending the payments made them before leaving go to prove that such payments were made and received in satisfaction of any claim the libellants might have against the ship for their services. It was competent for them to agree with the master to quit the vessel, and receive so much for their services. True, a court of admiralty, in the interests of the seamen, will look into such contracts and dealings, and if any substantial advantage has been taken of them, so far disregard them and do justice in the premises.

AMERICAN REPS.]

THE MERRIMAC.

[AMERICAN REPS.]

In the second place, if the libellants were discharged without any understanding or agreement as to the payment of wages, then they ought to recover such sum, if any, as under all the circumstances they are equitably entitled to—as upon a quantum meruit. Under the circumstances what are their services worth to the vessel? Allowing the monthly rate of wages mentioned in the articles, according to the libel there is due to the libellants about 81 dollars apiece at this port. To supply their places from here to Liverpool, allowing four months for the voyage, at 40 dollars per month, will cost 160 dollars per man. The difference between that and the price the libellants agreed to perform the same services for is 90 dollars per man—more than the sum claimed by the libellants. It follows that the libellants, having failed to perform their contract, are not equitably entitled to anything, because all the circumstances considered, their services are not worth so much to the vessel as they have received for them.

And this is so upon the supposition most favourable to the libellants—that the Hermine will return to Liverpool direct; for by the terms of their contract they might be required to serve two and one half years before being discharged, and to supply their places during all this time, at the enhanced wages of this port, or the other seas mentioned in the articles, would add very much to the loss sustained by the vessel.

Let the libel be dismissed, and a decree entered for the claimants for costs.

Where a man on the tow furnished a line to the tug at the request of the master of the latter, but stated at the time that he did not think it sufficient to tow with:

Quere, should the line be considered as furnished by the tow and at her risk, or otherwise?

The contract to tow the scow and her cargo from Astoria to the Cape, was a contract for the hire of the tug for the carriage or transportation of the same for a compensation, and was therefore a bailment of the kind denominated Locatio operis mercium vehendarum, in which the master of the tug was the bailee, and responsible for ordinary skill and diligence.

The tug M. left Astoria with the scow J. F. in tow, 200 feet astern, on the last of the ebb tide, for Cape Disappointment, and met the flood tide and S. W. wind abreast of Sand Island, as might have been reasonably expected, where such tide and wind always make a rough sea, and in attempting to tow said scow against the same, the tow line of the tow and also of the tug parted, and the scow went on Chinook Spit and was lost;

Held that the tug did not exercise ordinary skill and diligence in undertaking the voyage on the last of the ebb tide, or in attempting to tow the scow against the flood tide and wind; and therefore is responsible for the consequent loss of the same.

Under the circumstances of the employment, with the exception of steering the tow, working her pump, and hauling her end of the tow line, the tug is responsible for the navigation of both vessels; and her duties were those of a private carrier for hire, just as much as if she had had her upon her own deck instead of astern, at the end of a tow line.

Where a tug negligently places a tow in a peril from which she is lost, it is no excuse that the tow might have been saved, but for a mistake of or want of skill in the crew of the latter, in bending a tow line in a dangerous and sudden emergency, or the want of extraordinary ground tackle.

Where a tow has parted from the tug and gone adrift, and is in great peril, and the latter, at the request of the crew of the former, attempts to take them off, and in so doing collides with the tow and sinks her, the tug is not responsible for the consequences of such collision, unless it was intentional or the result of gross negligence.

This was a suit instituted to recover damages for the loss of the John Francis and her cargo. The defendant's vessel was engaged in towing the John Francis. The facts are fully set out in the judgment.

John A. Woodward and H. H. Northup for libellant.

W. Strong and Joseph N. Dolph for respondent.

DEADY, J.—This suit is brought to recover 2500 dollars damages sustained by the libellant in the loss of the John Francis, and her cargo of eighty cords of ash wood, through the negligence of the tug Merrimac while engaged in towing said John Francis from Astoria to Cape Disappointment, on 9th Sept. 1873.

The vessel lost was a "schooner scow," of 95½ tons burden, 120 feet in length, 21 feet in breadth, and 4½ feet in depth, with two masts and a rudder and steering gear; she was decked over, fore and aft, carried an anchor weighing 280 pounds, with 30 to 40 fathoms of chain; she was built in 1866 for the wood and hay trade on the Columbia river, at a cost of 4500 dollars. Some time in 1872, libellant bought her for 1100 dollars, and afterwards put 800 dollars worth of repairs, rigging and sails upon her. The Merrimac is a single engine propeller, of 50 or 60 horse power, and 48 tons burden, and has been engaged for some years in towing on the Columbia river, and over the Bar to and from the sea. About 1st Sept. 1873, the libellant met the master of the Merrimac, Richard Hobson, at Portland, where conversation was had between them to the effect that the former expected to be at Astoria in a few days with his scow, bound for Cape Disappointment, when he would want a tug, and that the latter would be ready to tow him over. Early in the morning of the 9th, the John Francis arrived at Astoria from the mouth of the Sandy in tow of the libellant's little steamer—the Wasp.

(a) This report is taken from a report of the case in the Pacific Law Reporter, supplied by the learned Judge deciding the case.

The Merrimac having heard the previous evening that the scow was on the way, came over to Astoria from Cementville in the night to meet her. Here the libellant and the master of the tug met and made a contract whereby the latter agreed to tow the scow over to the Cape for 20 dollars, nothing being said as to who was to furnish the tow line. This was about 8 o'clock and near the last of the ebb tide. The master of the tug directed the libellant to have the anchor of the scow lifted, and let her drift out from the wharf and he would come around with the tug and take her in tow, and in the meantime the libellant was to take the Wasp in shore and secure her, and come off to the scow in his skiff. The tug came alongside of the scow, and asked libellant's brother, who was the only person on board, to give him the line that was lying on the forward part of the scow, which he did. The tug then steamed along slowly, with the scow astern, for nearly a mile, when the libellant and another brother came on board the tow, and the tug steamed away at the rate of four or five knots an hour. The distance from Astoria to the Cape is about fifteen miles. Abreast of Sand Island and about four miles from the Cape, they met the flood tide and wind from the south-west. At this point the sea is always rough during the flood tide. The wind and tide being on the tow's quarters, she began drifting to leeward, when the tug turned up to the tide and the strain or surge parted the line some feet outside of the scow. The tug then backed up and gave the tow her line, which very soon parted short off some 15 or 20 feet from the scow. Thereupon the tug gave the tow the long end of her line and directed it to be bent on to the long end of the tow's line, which was done; but the knot slipped while being drawn through the water and the line parted before it was drawn taut. By this time the scow had drifted within 100 feet of Chinook Spit, and the master of the tug directed the tow to drop her anchor, which was done in about three fathoms of water, with twenty-five fathoms of chain. This was near the first black buoy. The scow, under the force of the wind and tide, dragged her anchor slowly in the direction of the spit, and the men on her called to the tow to come and take them off. The tug backed up to windward and alongside the scow, but as she reversed her engine to go ahead it caught on the centre for a moment, and she drifted closer to the tow. As she passed the bow of the scow a swell caught her and carried her across it, where her propeller got foul in the anchor chain, until it was paid out further, when she got away. During this time the guard of the tug struck the bow of the scow at one corner, and broke it down, so that the sea poured in and filled her in a few moments, whereupon the crew of the tow ran aft, jumped into their skiff and got on board the tug, which was distant some 200 yards waiting for them. The tug proceeded to the Cape and returned at ebb tide, but the scow had drifted so far into the breakers, that it was not considered safe to go to her with the tug. By the next morning at 10 o'clock, her bow was pulled out of her with the fastening of the anchor chain, and she went on to the spit and was lost. The cargo of wood floated out as soon as she filled and was lost.

The line taken from the tow was a $4\frac{1}{2}$ inch line, about 40 fathoms in length, and apparently in good condition. Henry Wilson, who gave it to the tug, testifies that the Merrimac came alongside, and Hobson asked him if the line lying forward on the tow "was strong enough for a tow line." He answered, "I do not know; I do not believe she is," when Hobson sang out, "Heave that line, and do not stand there to look at it." Hobson testifies—I asked Wilson, "If that was the line he was going to tow with?" What he said in reply I do not recollect." I then ordered him "to give us the line quick before we drifted away." Ingalls, who took the line from the tow, testifies: "We went alongside and asked if they had a line, and they began to hunt one up. They said they had one, and I took the line myself and made it fast to the bits." J. W. Bloomfield, a passenger on the tug, and the person to whom the wood was sold to arrive at the Cape, testified that "Hobson asked one of the men on the scow whether he had a good line. The man said he did not know whether the line was good or not. I think the man was Wilson's brother. Hobson said, 'Hurry and give us the line anyway.'" Upon this testimony I conclude that the transaction of taking the line from the tow took place substantially as stated by Henry Wilson. The line of the Merrimac was a $4\frac{1}{2}$ inch Manila rope of about 40 fathoms in length. It had been spliced and subjected to severe strain in towing rafts of saw logs. Either of them were probably sufficient to tow the scow in smooth water, or with the tide, but not against the flood-tide between Sand Island and Chinook Spit, as the fact of their parting as they did abundantly proves.

In this case the result is a safe criterion by which to judge of the sufficiency of the lines: The Steamer Webb (14 Wal. U. S. Sup. Ct. Rep. 406, 414.)

The contract being silent as to who should furnish the tow line, the respondent alleged and gave evidence tending to prove that there was a custom at the mouth of the Columbia river that in such cases the tow should furnish the line. The evidence in support of the usage is weak—comes mainly from witnesses who are interested in tugs—and in my judgment falls far short of establishing any such custom. The most that can be claimed for it, is that it establishes a usage in the case of sea-going vessels, particularly when being towed astern, that the tow shall furnish the line or pay the tug extra for furnishing it, but in the case of scows and the like, that the tow shall furnish the line if she has one, but if not, the tug shall furnish it without extra charge. Besides, it is clear, that no usage upon the subject was known to the libellant, and before he can be affected by a custom so recent and local as this is claimed to be, knowledge of it must be brought home to him: (2 Parsons on Contr. 57.) My impression is that the undertaking to tow the scow from Astoria to the Cape, bound the respondent to furnish the necessary means to do the service with, and, in the absence of any custom or understanding to the contrary, to furnish a sufficient tow line, as a part of such means. But the tow did furnish the line, and I think the tug ought not to be held responsible for its sufficiency, unless it appears there was some understanding that it was to be used at the risk of the latter. If the master of the tug called for the tow's line, and it was given and used without anything further being said or done by either party, the reasonable inference would be that the parties understood the contract as requiring the tow to furnish the line, or that they thereby modified or supplemented it to that effect. But in this case, the man on the tow, in giving the line, also said he did not think it was sufficient, and there is reason for holding that if the master of the tug took the line, notwithstanding this opinion, he took it upon his own judgment and risk. He testifies that he thought the line was sufficient. Still, when the master of the tow came on board, he made no objection to the use of the line, and manifestly did not think it insufficient. Upon the whole, it is not clear to my mind whether the circumstances under which the line was given and taken from the tow constitute an implied agreement that it was to be used as the line of the tow and at her risk, or otherwise. As the case may be satisfactorily disposed of upon another ground, it is not necessary to definitely decide this question.

The contract to tow the scow and her cargo from Astoria to the Cape was one of the hire of the carriage or transportation of the same for a compensation, and was therefore a bailment of the kind denominated, Locatio operis mercium vehendarum. The services of the tug and her master and crew were hired by the libellant for that purpose. This constituted the libellant the bailor and the respondent the bailee of the scow and her cargo: (Story on Bailments, Section 370; Edwards on Bailments, 338.)

This is a bailment which is beneficial to both parties and the bailee is responsible for ordinary skill and diligence: (Ed. on Bail. 371; Story on Bail. 457.) But he is not a common carrier, and may contract for a more restricted liability than the law imposes upon him: (Alexander v. Greene, 3 Hill, 19; The steamer Webb, 14 Wal. 414.) Counsel for respondent insists that this hiring did not amount to a bailment of any kind, and in support of this proposition, cites a dictum of Bronson, J., in Wells v. The S. N. Co. (2 Comst. 208), to that effect. It was decided in that case that the proprietor of a tow boat was not a common carrier, as to the boat towed, but the dictum that such proprietor was not a bailee, and that the transaction was not a bailment, is in direct opposition to the language of all the authorities, as well as that of the learned judge elsewhere in the same opinion, and in Alexander v. Greene (sup.)

The master of the tug being a bailee for hire, and, as such, responsible for ordinary skill and diligence in the performance of his contract, what was his duty in the premises? Impliedly he undertook to furnish a tug, properly equipped and of sufficient capacity and power to take the scow to the Cape, and for the exercise of ordinary skill and prudence in selecting the proper time to make the voyage, with reference to the craft to be towed, and the wind and tide or other ordinary peculiarities of the navigation, and in the conduct of the enterprise in the case of any unlooked for or extraordinary emergency.

Of course the relations between the tug and the tow may be modified by express agreement or the reasonable implication arising from the circumstances and nature of the employment in a particular case, so as to make the tug the mere servant of the tow, and under its direction. In such a case the liability of the tug may be limited to the mere point of furnishing a sufficient motive power for the tow, while the whole responsibility as to the time and manner of making the voyage or transportation would rest with the tow: (Sturgis v. Boyer, 24 How. U. S. Sup. Ct. Rep. 121.)

In this case the scow being towed astern, a distance of some 200 feet with her own master and crew aboard, the tug is not responsible for the manner in which she was steered. It is evident from the circumstances that the tow relied upon her own steering gear and crew to keep her in the proper place in the channel, so far as the course of the tug would permit: (Sproul v. Hemmingway 14 Pick. Mass. 7.) Neither is the tug responsible for any injury which may have happened to the tow by reason of any defect or deficiency in her condition, construction or appointments, considered as a scow. It was implied in the contract to tow her, that the John Francis was as seaworthy as vessels of her class and construction ordinarily are.

But as to all the other matters involved or to be performed in the undertaking, I think the tug is responsible for any lack of ordinary care or diligence on the part of the respondent.

The water to be crossed was not an ordinary one. The peculiar difficulties and dangers of the voyage were well known to the respondent, and almost unknown to the libellant. The vessel to be towed was a flat-bottomed one, with a square head and stern, well loaded down with wood. She could be towed to the Cape on the ebb tide with comparative safety, while it is almost certain that she could not be towed against a flood tide between Sand Island and Chinook Spit.

Under the circumstances there was a want of ordinary skill and diligence on the part of the respondent in leaving Astoria with this scow in tow for the Cape on the last of the ebb tide. He could not expect to carry it with him, and must have known that he would meet the flood tide and wind at Sand Island, where it always makes a rough sea, against which it would be dangerous to tow the scow: (The Brooklyn, 2 Benedict, 552; The Caleb, 4 Ben. 15; The Olive Baker, Ib, 174; The Blanche Page, Ib. 186; The M. A. Lennox, Ib. 190; The Deer, Ib. 335.) To obviate the force of these facts counsel for respondent claims that the voyage was delayed half an hour waiting for the libellant to join the scow, after the tug had hitched on to her, and that this was the cause of being caught in the flood tide.

Taking all the circumstances into consideration, I do not think this proposition is supported by the evidence, and if it was, it does not justify the respondent in putting the scow into the peril from the effects of which she was lost.

The testimony as to the time which elapsed between the hitching on to the scow and the libellant's joining the latter, varies from fifteen to thirty minutes, and as to the distance made in the meantime, from a quarter of a mile to a mile.

The weight of the evidence is that the time was not to exceed twenty minutes and the distance not more than three quarters of a mile. The tug was making four to five knots an hour until she met the flood tide, and had the ebb served, she would have made the Cape in something more than three hours. The evidence is not clear and direct to the fact, but the reasonable inference from all the circumstances is that the tug did not make more than two and a half knots an hour against the flood tide. The witnesses all agree that the vessels met the flood tide abreast of Sand Island, and this is very probable when it is remembered that they left Astoria on the last of the ebb tide—near low water. As indicated by the chart, this is about four miles from the Cape. If then there had been no delay in starting, the tug would have met the flood tide in apparently the roughest place in the channel—about two miles from the Cape—and encountered substantially all the perils she did, with, in all probability, the same results.

But, for the sake of the argument, admit that the loss occurred on account of the delay. That does not excuse the respondent. The delay occurred while the respondent was in command and the scow was under his direction; and it does not appear that the libellant occupied any more time in making the Wasp fast and getting back on the scow than was necessary and anticipated, and allowed for when the contract was made. By his undertaking he was bound to know whether it was prudent to start when he did or proceed on the voyage after the libellant came on board. The libellant gave no direction in the premises from the time the contract was made until he called to the tug to take them off the scow and assumed no risks save those which the law had necessarily cast upon him.

But suppose that the respondent had good reason to believe, when he started, that he could make the Cape without encountering the flood tide, still when the fact proved otherwise, I think it was his duty, as a prudent man, to return to a place of safety and await the high tide and smooth water; particularly when it is considered that the only tow lines on board were insufficient to draw the scow through that sea, even if she could ride it.

With the exception of steering the tow, working her pump and handling her end of the tow line, the tug is responsible for the navigation of both vessels. Her duties were those of a private carrier of the tow for hire, just as much as if she had had her upon her own deck instead of astern at the end of a tow line. In Sturgis v. Boyer et al. (24 How. 122), it was held that "whenever the tug, under the charge of her own master and crew, and in the usual and ordinary course of such an employment, undertakes to transport another vessel, which, for the time being, has neither her master nor crew on board, from one point to another, over waters where such accessory motive power is necessarily or usually employed, she must be held responsible for the proper navigation of both vessels." While in this case the tow had her master and crew on board, yet they had nothing to do with the navigation of either vessel, except to steer the tow in the wake of the tug, to work her pump and handle her end of the tow line. In other respects the navigation of the tow was as much under the control of the tug as if there had been no one on board of her. The master of the tug selected his own time for starting, as he said that the scow could not be towed over the route except in time of smooth water. While they were under weigh no communication passed between them, except when the tug backed down to give the tow her line.

Respondent also insists that if the two pieces of lines had been properly bent together, the knot would not have slipped and the scow might have been saved. Each of these lines had just snapped like a mere thread, and there is nothing in the evidence or circumstances which makes it even probable that the increase in length, caused by fastening them together, would have made them sufficient to tow the scow against that tide and wind if the knot had held.

The fault alleged is, that the libellant did not seize the knot. But certainly it could not have been expected that when the scow was about going into the breakers the libellant would take time to go aft and get some small cord and deliberately seize this knot. Nothing of the kind was directed or suggested by the respondent when he gave the order to bend the lines together. Apparently the knot was well made, but while being drawn through and against the water it loosened, and, as the line became taut, slipped. But even a mistake in this matter by the libellant would not excuse the tug, which had already negligently brought the scow into this peril: (The Webb, 14 Wal. 417.)

As to what followed after the scow cast anchor, I do not think it material. It is possible that the scow might have ridden safely at the place she was left by the tug, until the turning of the tide, if her anchor had been larger and the chain longer. But the peril which resulted in her loss, had already been incurred by the negligence of the respondent: (The steamer Webb, 14 Wal. 417; The Merrimac, Ib. 203; U. S. Co. v. N. V. and V. A. S. Co., 24 How. 313.) The libellant was not bound to have provided his scow with ground tackle sufficient to hold her in such an extraordinary position as that. In my judgment, her ground tackle was sufficient for all ordinary emergencies.

So, with the collision that occurred in attempting to take the libellant and his brothers from the tow, after the anchor was dropped. The responsibility of the tug under the contract to tow the scow, was at an end. For the time being, the undertaking had been abandoned by the tug. In going to the scow, at the request of the libellant, the tug was employed more as a salvor than otherwise, and is not responsible for an injury to the scow caused by a collision under such circumstances. There is no doubt but that the collision occurred, and that the scow was sunk and the wood washed away as the immediate consequence of it. But I do not think the tug was handled so unskillfully or carelessly as to make her liable for the consequences.

In the bill of particulars the scow is charged at 1800 dollars, the wood 400 dollars, and the furniture, stores, clothes, &c., at 301 dollars. I find their value as follows: Scow, 1200 dollars; wood, 280 dollars; other articles, 150 dollars; making in all 1630 dollars. The wood cost libellant $2\frac{1}{2}$ dollars a cord, on the bank, at Sandy, and he had sold it, to arrive, at the Cape for $4\frac{1}{3}$ dollars. I have allowed $3\frac{1}{3}$ dollars per cord for it at Astoria. These are coin valuations, to which I add 10 per centum for the difference between coin and currency, which makes 1793 dollars. The libellant within a day or two of the disaster went out to the wreck and recovered the anchor and chain from the sand and some blocks, ropes and rigging from the hull of the scow. Of these he has sold all but the rigging for 73 dollars, which he values at 40 dollars. Allowing him $\frac{1}{3}$ of this amount for saving these things, the remainder 75.33 $\frac{1}{3}$ dollars must be deducted from the above, which leaves the sum from which the libellant is entitled to a decree 1717.66 $\frac{2}{3}$ dollars and the cost of suit.

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

May 22 and June 2 and 3, 1874.

THE ROEBUCK.

Master's wages—Forfeiture—Drunkenness—Disobedience to owner's orders—Desertion.

Occasional drunkenness in port on the part of the master of a vessel will not, if unaccompanied with neglect of duty, work a forfeiture of wages.

Seemingly, that constant drunkenness on the part of a master, whether there be a proof of neglect of duty or not, will work a forfeiture of either the whole or part of his wages, according to circumstances.

Where a master receives express orders from his owners as to the voyages which he is to make and the ports to which he is to take the ship, and those orders are given under and with a view to a state of circumstances (political) out of which danger might arise to the ship, and which are known to and discussed by the master and owner at the time when they are given, the master is not justified, out of an alleged apprehension of that danger, in taking the ship on other voyages, and to other ports; and if he does so take the ship, he will not be entitled to recover his wages for the time during which she is engaged against the owners' orders, even if the voyages are for the owners' benefit.

A master's wages may be forfeited by desertion, but there can be no absolute desertion of his ship working a forfeiture of the whole of his wages if there be an animus revertendi upon the part of the master.

Where a master quits his ship and remains away for such a time and under such circumstances as lead his owner reasonably to suppose that he has no intention of returning, the owners will be justified in removing the vessel from the place where it is left, and appointing another master; and the original master will not be entitled to recover his wages for any period after the time when he so quits the ship.

This was a cause of wages instituted on behalf of James Gordon, master mariner, against the barque Roebuck, and her owner intervening. The facts are stated in the pleadings and the judgment of the court. The petition filed on behalf of the master was as follows:

1. On the 17th July 1871, the plaintiff entered into an agreement with one Duncan Macdonald, of Glasgow, in the county of Lanark, then and until the 26th Aug. 1873, the owner of the above-named British barque or vessel Roebuck, by which the said Duncan Macdonald hired the plaintiff to act as master of the said barque or vessel for the space of two years, at wages after the rate of 12l. per month, and it was also agreed by and between the said parties that one half of each such monthly sum should, during the continuance of the aforesaid term of hiring, be regularly paid by the said Duncan Macdonald, as owner of the said barque or vessel as aforesaid, to the wife of the plaintiff, then residing at Glasgow aforesaid.

2. On the 27th Aug. 1873, one Kenneth Macdonald, of Dundee (hereinafter called the defendant), became the registered owner of the said barque or vessel.

3. On the 25th July 1871 the said barque or vessel was lying at the port of Liverpool, and the plaintiff, on or about the last-mentioned day, joined her there as master of her, in pursuance of the above-mentioned agreement.

4. The plaintiff continued to act as master of the said barque or vessel, in pursuance of the above-mentioned agreement, from the day in the last preceding article mentioned up to and until the end of April or the beginning of May 1872, at which date the plaintiff was, by the said Duncan Macdonald, wrongfully and unlawfully deprived of his command as master of the said barque or vessel, and of the benefit of the above-mentioned agreement, and was then wilfully abandoned and deserted in the manner in this petition hereinafter described.

5. On or about the 31st July 1871, up to which time the said barque or vessel had been lying since the before-mentioned 25th day of the same month in the port of Liverpool, the plaintiff sailed as master of the said barque or vessel on the following voyage; that is to say, having loaded a cargo of coals at Liverpool, he sailed from Liverpool for Monte Video, where he arrived on or about the 30th Sept. in the same year; sailed thence on or about the 30th Nov. following for Buenos Ayres, and arrived there on or about the 1st Dec. 1871; sailed thence for Port Santa Cruz on or about the 23rd Jan. 1872, and arrived there on or about the 15th Feb. 1872; sailed thence on or about the 22nd March 1872, for Sandy Point, in the Straits of Magellan, and arrived there at the latter end of March 1872. The then owner, Duncan Macdonald, was at Sandy Point, and came and thenceforward remained on board the said barque or vessel; sailed thence on or about the 15th April 1872, for the Santa Cruz River, and arrived there on or about the 25th day of the same month, and the said barque or vessel was there anchored in a safe place not far from the mouth of the said river.

6. Whilst the said barque or vessel was lying at anchor in the Santa Cruz River, as in the last preceding article mentioned, the plaintiff was ordered by the said Duncan Macdonald, who was then on board of the said barque or vessel as aforesaid, to go ashore on the east of Patagonia, and on behalf of the said Duncan Macdonald to proceed to a certain island known as Mount Lion Island or the Rookery, and lying close to the mainland of Patagonia, about twenty or twenty-five miles to the southward of Mount Entrance, in order to see on behalf of the said Duncan Macdonald what guano, if any, was on the said island, and to choose a good and safe place for anchorage in the vicinity of the said island.

7. In obedience to the said order of the said Duncan Macdonald, and at his request as aforesaid, and for no other reason whatsoever, the plaintiff, on or about the 26th April 1872, did go ashore and did then proceed to the said island for the purposes in the preceding article mentioned, and whilst engaged in the performance of the same, at or near the said island, was there wilfully abandoned and deserted by and by the order of the said Duncan Macdonald, as in the next following article described.

8. The plaintiff was always ready and willing, and it was always his intention, after the performance by him on behalf of the said Duncan Macdonald as aforesaid of the purposes for which he had proceeded to the said island, by the order and at the request of the said Duncan Macdonald as aforesaid, forthwith to return to and rejoin the said barque or vessel, but before he could do so, and whilst he was engaged at or near the said island on behalf of the said Duncan Macdonald as aforesaid, as the said Duncan Macdonald well knew, the said barque or vessel, having the said Duncan Macdonald on board as aforesaid, and under his direction sailed away, and the plaintiff was thereby left deserted and abandoned at or near the said island.

9. The plaintiff continued, after being deserted and abandoned as hereinbefore described, to make every effort to rejoin the said barque or vessel, and in so doing suffered many grievous privations and hardships; but since the said desertion and abandonment he never saw her again until he reached Buenos Ayres, on or about the 8th July 1872, when the said Duncan Macdonald, unlawfully and contrary to the tenor of the before-mentioned agreement, refused to allow the plaintiff to rejoin the said barque or vessel, or to act as master of the same.

10. Up to the 21st Nov. 1873, or thereabouts, the plaintiff was unable to obtain employment in any homeward-bound vessel, but upon or about that day the plaintiff shipped on board the steamship Caroline, bound for Antwerp as acting second officer, and he arrived on board the said steamship at Antwerp on or about the 2nd March 1873. The plaintiff thence forthwith proceeded to Liverpool, and there reported himself to the Superintendent of the Mercantile Marine Board on or about the 8th of the same month.

11. There were on board the said barque or vessel at the time when the plaintiff left her, as in the seventh article hereinbefore mentioned, numerous chattels, clothes, instruments, certificates, papers, and other effects, the private property of the plaintiff, which the plaintiff was then obliged to leave behind him in the said barque or vessel, and none of which the plaintiff has since been able to recover.

12. Seven monthly sums of 6*l.* each were paid by the said Duncan Macdonald to the plaintiff's wife in part performance of the agreement in the first article above-mentioned, and the last of such payments was made to her on or about the 27th Feb. 1872, and the plaintiff himself received from the said Duncan Macdonald sums of money amounting to 41*l.* 16*s.*, which are credited to the defendant in the schedule annexed to this petition, but save as herein stated the plaintiff has not, nor has his said wife received any payment or payments from or on account of the said Duncan Macdonald, or otherwise on account of the owners of the said barque or vessel in respect of wages, or in respect of any other matter in reference to which he now claims.

13. The plaintiff, during the whole of the aforesaid voyage of the said barque or vessel, well and truly performed his duty as master of the same up to the time when the said Duncan Macdonald caused him to be abandoned and deserted as aforesaid, and unlawfully and without any just cause or excuse deprived him of the command of the said barque or vessel as aforesaid, and of the benefit of the agreement hereinbefore mentioned. Yet the said Duncan Macdonald caused the plaintiff to be abandoned and deserted as aforesaid, and prevented him from further performing the said agreement, as the plaintiff was at all times ready and willing to do, and save as aforesaid, the said Duncan Macdonald did not pay, nor has the defendant, although requested so to do as and 'being the owner of the said barque or vessel, paid to the plaintiff the sum due to him under the terms of the said agreement, or otherwise in respect of the premises, and the same still remains owing and unpaid to the plaintiff.

14. The plaintiff claims as due to him the amount set forth in the schedule annexed to this petition.

The Schedule referred to in the above petition.

The answer filed on behalf of the defendant was as follows:

1. The defendant admits the statements contained in the second article of the petition of the plaintiff to be respectively true.

2. The statements contained in the first article of the said petition are respectively untrue, in so far as they represent the engagement of the plaintiff by the said Mr. Duncan Macdonald, the former owner of the Roebuck, to have been for a period of two years. The said engagement was for a voyage from Liverpool to Monte Video and Port Gallagos, in Patagonia, and back to the United Kingdom.

3. The terms of the agreement between the plaintiff and the said Mr. Duncan Macdonald were not reduced to writing, but the said Mr. Duncan Macdonald expressly told the plaintiff at the time of engaging him that any disobedience on his part to the orders given to him by the said Mr. Duncan Macdonald for the conduct of the said voyage and adventure would subject the plaintiff to dismissal and forfeiture of wages.

4. The outward cargo of the Roebuck for the said voyage and adventure consisted of 651 tons of coal, shipped by the said Mr. Duncan Macdonald to Monte Video, for sale there on his account, and a large amount of stores and merchandise, in value upwards of 600*l.*, shipped for Port Gallagos, to be there delivered to one Don Louis Piedra Buena in exchange for guano, which the said Don Louis Piedra Buena had contracted to supply to the said Mr. Duncan Macdonald in return for the said stores and merchandise. The homeward cargo of the said voyage was to consist of the said guano.

5. The said Mr. Duncan Macdonald expected himself to meet the Roebuck at Monte Video, and to direct the remainder of the said adventure in person. In case, however, he might not be able to effect this, the said Mr. Duncan Macdonald, shortly before the Roebuck set sail, gave the plaintiff explicit written instructions for the conduct of the said voyage and adventure.

6. According to the said written instructions, the plaintiff was, after discharging the said coals at Monte Video, to proceed straight to Port Gallagos, and there obtain guano from the said Don Louis Piedra Buena in exchange for the said stores and merchandise. The said instructions contained also directions to the plaintiff on no account to part with the said stores and merchandise without first getting possession of guano in exchange, and not to give more than a certain price, therein named, for the said guano.

7. The Roebuck sailed from Liverpool on the 31st July, and reached Monte Video on the 13th Sept. 1871. About a month after her arrival there the said Mr. Duncan Macdonald arrived thither, pursuant to his intention as aforesaid, and after seeing the said coals nearly all discharged, the said Mr. Duncan Macdonald, early in November, determined to precede his said ship to Port Gallagos. The said Mr. Duncan Macdonald accordingly ordered the plaintiff immediately the few remaining coals had been discharged to follow him with the Roebuck to Port Gallagos. The said Mr. Duncan Macdonald then went to Port Gallagos.

8. After the departure of the said Mr. Duncan Macdonald from Monte Video as aforesaid, the plaintiff, in violation of the said orders given to him at Monte Video by the said Mr. Duncan Macdonald personally, as well as of the written instructions aforesaid, instead of proceeding with the Roebuck to Port Gallagos, proceeded with the said barque upon the voyages enumerated in the fifth article of the said petition. This the plaintiff did in collusion with the said Don Louis Piedra Buena, and in the manner hereinafter mentioned.

9. The said Don Louis Piedra Buena having come to Monte Video soon after the departure of the said Mr. Duncan Macdonald, the plaintiff unlawfully entered into an agreement with the said Don Louis Piedra Buena, by which both parties agreed not to recognise the said Mr. Duncan Macdonald in their dealings in respect to the said Port Gallagos portion of the cargo of the said barque, and the purchase and shipment of guano in exchange for the same. The plaintiff at the same time unlawfully entered into an agreement with the said Don Louis Piedra Buena for the purchase and shipment of the said guano on terms and conditions altogether contrary to the said written instructions given to the plaintiff by the said Mr. Duncan Macdonald.

10. After remaining three weeks at Monte Video, the plaintiff, acting in collusion with the said Don Louis Piedra Buena, sailed with the said barque in ballast to Buenos Ayres, reaching that place about the 1st Dec. 1872, and at Buenos Ayres the plaintiff chartered the said barque to a firm of Roquaud and Co., for a voyage to Santa Cruz with stores and building materials.

11. The plaintiff remained with the Roebuck for seven weeks at Buenos Ayres, and toward the end of Jan. 1872 the plaintiff, taking on board the said Don Louis Piedra Buena, sailed in the said barque for Santa Cruz, besides the said cargo shipped pursuant to the said charter-party, the plaintiff took a large number of passengers to Santa Cruz.

12. On the arrival of the Roebuck at Santa Cruz on the 15th Feb. 1872, the plaintiff landed the said cargo and passengers, and, also contrary to the written instructions of the said Mr. Duncan Macdonald, the plaintiff there delivered to the said Don Louis Piedra Buena the Port Gallagos portion of the original cargo of the said barque, without receiving any equivalent for the same.

13. The plaintiff remained with the Roebuck at Santa Cruz, till the latter end of March 1872, when he sailed with the said barque for Sandy Point, which is in the Straits of Magellan, a long way past Port Gallagos aforesaid, passing Port Gallagos without calling there; the plaintiff brought the said Don Louis Piedra Buena and some associates of the said Piedra Buena on board the said barque to Sandy Point, where the said Piedra Buena had a residence.

14. The plaintiff brought the Roebuck to Sandy Point about the beginning of April 1872, and was there met by the said Mr. Duncan Macdonald, who had for the last five months been endeavouring to obtain tidings of his missing ship.

[ADM.]

THE ROEBUCK.

15. The said Mr. Duncan Macdonald then charged the plaintiff with having run away with the said barque, and threatened the plaintiff with legal proceedings on their return to England, and the said Mr. Duncan Macdonald thereupon remained on board his ship to look after his interests.

16. The Port Gallagos portion of the cargo of the said barque having been delivered by the plaintiff in violation of his orders, and without any equivalent, to the said Don Louis Piedra Buena, at Santa Cruz, the said Mr. Duncan Macdonald, in order to procure an equivalent for the same from the said Don Louis Piedra Buena, entered while at Sandy Point into an agreement repudiating that made by the plaintiff as aforesaid with the said Don Louis Piedra Buena, to supply the said barque with a cargo of guano, at Mount Lion Island, the place mentioned in the sixth article of the petition of the plaintiff.

17. On the arrival of the Roebuck at the said Mount Lion Island, the said Don Louis Piedra Buena went ashore, promising to return to superintend the shipment of the said guano.

18. Subsequently, in consequence of a message from the said Don Louis Piedra Buena, the plaintiff, contrary to the wishes of the said Mr. Duncan Macdonald, went ashore for the ostensible purpose of selecting, with the assistance of the said Don Louis Piedra Buena, an anchorage at which the said barque might safely take on board her said cargo of guano.

19. When the plaintiff so quitted the said barque, the plaintiff promised to return to her on the next or the second day after his departure, but nothing was seen of the plaintiff till the fourth day after his said departure, when he was seen on horseback on shore, in the company of Don Louis Piedra Buena, by a boat's crew of the Roebuck. The plaintiff did not offer to return to the said barque with the said boat's crew, but rode off with the said Don Louis Piedra Buena in an opposite direction. On the day following, nothing could be seen of the plaintiff by those on board the Roebuck.

20. The said Mount Lion Island is within easy distance of Santa Cruz, where there are two settlements, and the said Don Louis Piedra Buena also had a residence in the vicinity of the said island.

21. On the next day, the sixth after the plaintiff's said departure from the Roebuck, the wind setting in strong on shore, it became impossible for the said barque to continue any longer off the said Mount Lion Island with safety, and the said Mr. Duncan Macdonald, acting on the advice of the mate of the said barque, gave orders for the said barque to put to sea.

22. The statements contained in the seventh and eighth articles of the said petition, with reference to the alleged abandonment of the plaintiff by the said Mr. Duncan Macdonald, at Mount Lion Island aforesaid, are respectively untrue. On the contrary, the plaintiff there deserted from and abandoned the said barque without intent to return, or, if otherwise, the plaintiff's recent conduct and the plaintiff's connection with the said Don Louis Piedra Buena gave the said Mr. Duncan Macdonald reasonable and probable cause for supposing that the plaintiff had so deserted from and abandoned the said barque without intent to return as aforesaid, and the plaintiff was left behind as aforesaid by reason of his own negligence, and justifiably, in order to preserve the said barque from being wrecked on the said island.

23. Subsequently, in July 1872, when the Roebuck was at Buenos Ayres, the plaintiff presented himself, and thereupon the said Mr. Duncan Macdonald, as he lawfully might, refused to reinstate the plaintiff in the command of the said barque, and appointed another master at the request of her Majesty's consul at Buenos Ayres.

24. During all the said voyages and the stay of the Roebuck at the said several ports, the plaintiff was constantly intoxicated, and incapable, through his drunkenness, of discharging the ordinary duties of a master of a vessel.

25. During the said period of five months the plaintiff had ample means of communication with the said Mr. Duncan Macdonald, but never attempted to avail himself of the same.

26. The plaintiff has never accounted to the said Mr. Duncan Macdonald for a large portion of the proceeds of the said coals shipped to Monte Video, which the plaintiff there received, nor for the freight under the said charter-party from Buenos Ayres to Santa Cruz, nor for the passage money of the said passengers conveyed by the plaintiff as aforesaid from Buenos Ayres to Santa Cruz, nor for the value of the goods delivered by the plaintiff to the said Don Louis Piedra Buena at Santa Cruz, nor for divers moneys of the said Mr. Duncan Macdonald by the plaintiff wrongfully expended in disbursements in respect of the said voyages, and wrongfully appropriated by the plaintiff to his own use during the continuance of the same.

27. The statements contained in the eleventh article of the said petition are respectively irrelevant and repugnant, and save as herein appears the statements contained in the several articles of the said petition are respectively untrue.

28. The misconduct of the plaintiff as above-mentioned has been such as to enure to a total forfeiture by the plaintiff of all wages in respect of the said hiring of the plaintiff by the said Mr. Duncan Macdonald, or, if otherwise, the sum paid to the plaintiff by the said Mr. Duncan Macdonald or his agents in advances on account of wages, and in allotment money to the wife of the plaintiff, exceeds the sum mentioned in the said petition and the schedule thereto annexed, and the sums due and owing by the plaintiff to the said Mr. Duncan Macdonald in respect of the matters in the twenty-third article of this answer mentioned, form a set-off and counter-claim to the claim of the plaintiff within the true intent and meaning of the 191st section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, which said set-off and counter-claim is for a sum greatly exceeding any balance of wages due to the plaintiff in respect of his said hiring by the said Mr. Duncan Macdonald.

To this answer the plaintiff replied as follows :

1. Save as appears by the petition filed in this cause, and by the articles hereinafter following, the plaintiff denies the truth of the several allegations contained in the said answer of the defendant.

2. With regard to so much of the eighth article of the defendant's said answer, as alleges that the plaintiff proceeded upon the voyages enumerated in the fifth article of the plaintiff's said petition, contrary to all order or instruction alleged in the sixth, seventh, and eighth articles of the defendant's said answer, to have been given by the said Duncan Macdonald to the plaintiff, that the plaintiff should proceed straight from Monte Video to Port Gallagos for a cargo of guano, to be there supplied by the Don Louis Piedra Buena, in the defendant's said answer mentioned, the plaintiff while otherwise wholly denying the truth of the several statements contained in the said sixth, seventh, and eighth articles, as of those contained in the other several articles of the defendant's said answer respectively, admits that he was ordered or instructed by the said Duncan Macdonald to proceed straight from Monte Video to Port Gallagos for the said guano ; but says that he was justified in not so proceeding thither for the reasons set forth in the next article hereinafter following.

3. Shortly after the said Duncan Macdonald left Monte Video, as in the seventh article of the defendant's said answer mentioned, and before the plaintiff could proceed from thence with the said barque, the plaintiff learnt from trustworthy sources of information at Monte Video, that the said Port Gallagos was not a port to which such a vessel as the said barque was could safely get, and further that ships proceeding to Port Gallagos or to the ports adjacent thereto for guano would be seized, and that in fact ships so proceeding were being seized, owing to certain disputes which had then arisen between the Argentine and Chilian Governments as to their territorial rights in that district, and by reason of the premises the plaintiff justly believed it to be his duty as master of the said barque, and acting for the best interests of the said Duncan Macdonald, not then to proceed to Port Gallagos, but as he did not know and had no means of knowing where the said Duncan Macdonald then was, and save as herein aforesaid, had no instructions how he should act to arrange, as in fact the plaintiff did, upon the best terms he could get for the shipment of the said guano upon the said barque, by the said Don Louis Piedra Buena, at some other most safe and convenient place. It was for this lawful reason and purpose, and for no other, that the plaintiff, with the privity and approval of the agents for the said barque at Monte Video, and with all possible diligence proceeded as he properly might upon the several voyages enumerated as aforesaid in the said fifth article of the plaintiff's said petition.

THE ROEBUCK.

4. The statements made in the twenty-sixth article of the defendant's said answer, respecting an alleged wrongful expenditure and wrongful appropriation by the plaintiff of moneys of the said Duncan Macdonald, are respectively untrue. There is nothing due or owing from the plaintiff to the said Duncan Macdonald, and if the allegation contained in the aforesaid article, that the plaintiff never accounted to the said Duncan Macdonald is in any respect true, the plaintiff says that he has always been ready and anxious to account to the said Duncan Macdonald; and the said non-accounting, if any, is wholly due to the wrongful act of the said Duncan Macdonald in causing the plaintiff to be deprived of the possession of his papers, as in the eleventh article of the plaintiff's said petition mentioned, and to the wrongful refusal and neglect of the said Duncan Macdonald to restore to him any of the said papers, or to allow him to have access to the same, or to the necessary materials for making up the accounts or otherwise, in any way to come to account with the plaintiff, although often requested by the plaintiff so to do.

The defendants rejoined, and concluded as follows:

1. With the exception of the statement that the plaintiff violated the orders of the said Mr. Duncan Macdonald in proceeding upon the voyages enumerated in the petition of the plaintiff, all the statements contained in the said reply of the plaintiff are respectively untrue.

2. The orders so admitted by the plaintiff to have been violated by him as aforesaid, were given to the plaintiff with express reference to the said alleged territorial disputes, the existence of which the plaintiff falsely asserts that he learned after the departure of the said Mr. Duncan Macdonald, and the said disputes were discussed by the said Mr. Duncan Macdonald and the plaintiff both on previous occasions, and particularly on the occasion of the said Mr. Duncan Macdonald giving the plaintiff the orders so admitted by the plaintiff to have been violated by him as aforesaid.

3. The said disputes, if such existed, did not concern the barque Roebuck.

4. The said port of Port Gallagos was a good and safe port for such a vessel as the said barque.

5. The said written instructions given by the said Mr. Duncan Macdonald to the plaintiff contained precise instructions as to the mode of selecting a perfectly safe anchorage for the said barque in the said port of Port Gallagos.

May 22, and June 2 and 3.—Kennedy, for the plaintiff.—Three charges are made against the plaintiff: first, drunkenness; secondly, desertion; thirdly, wilful disobedience to orders. First, as to drunkenness: forfeiture of wages is the legal consequence of drunkenness only when the performance of the master's or seaman's duty is thereby interfered with: (The Atlantic, 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 674; Lush, 566; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 274.) [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—It cannot be deduced from the last-mentioned case that a master does not forfeit his wages if he is constantly drunk, although his drunkenness may not interfere with the performance of his duties.] In Button v. Thompson (20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 568; L. Rep. 4 C.P.330; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O.S. 231), it was held that "drunkenness and abusive language subversive of discipline" did not work a forfeiture of wages already earned. On the facts, I submit that there was no habitual drunkenness on the part of the master, and, such as there was, he never was drunk on duty or during times when there was any duty to be done by him as master of the ship.

Secondly, as to desertion. In order to establish a total desertion, operating as a forfeiture of all wages, there must be an intention proved on the part of the master or mariner absolutely to quit the ship; there must be no animus revertendi, or there will be no forfeiture: (The Two Sisters, 2 W. Rob. 125, 138) On the facts, I submit that there was no desertion. The plaintiff went ashore, with the owner's consent, leaving all his property in his cabin, and his intention clearly was to return as soon as he had transacted the business upon which he landed, which was ship's business. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The real question is, whether he intended to return after he met the ship at Mount Lion Island.] He would not have gone there at all if he intended to desert, and the fact of the ship leaving that place was a desertion by the owner of the plaintiff.

Thirdly, as to the plaintiff's alleged disobedience to the orders of his owner. To work a forfeiture of wages for disobedience to orders, the disobedience must take place with a guilty intention, a corrupt motive, and the order must not be impossible of performance. If the violation of orders be bonâ fide for the good of the shipowner and of the whole adventure, although it might be an error of judgment, I submit it would work no forfeiture. The evidence of guilty intention or misconduct on the part of the master, when it is sought to show that he has forfeited his wages, must be conclusive:

The Thomas Worthington 3 W. Rob. 128, 134;
The Joseph Dexter, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 820; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 248.

[Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Do you carry your contention so far as to say that, if I consider it proved that the owner gave at Monte Video his distinct and positive orders, in view of possible hostilities between the Chilian and Argentine Governments, and the master violated those orders by preferring to follow his own judgment, he would not forfeit his wages.] In The Camilla (Swabey, 312, 314), it is said: "Two questions then arise: First, whether, assuming all the facts pleaded to be true, a forfeiture of the wages up to the day the master left the ship has taken place? secondly, if not, whether the master was lawfully dispossessed?" At the hearing I pressed the learned counsel for the owner to state what were the principles or authorities upon which he could support his argument that a forfeiture had taken place. Upon that head I could obtain no satisfaction, nor was I surprised, for I believe none are to be found. I do not say, however, that a case might not exist in which the court would refuse to pronounce for wages, such as the master not discharging the duty of master at all, making over the command of the vessel to another person—a case which might be imagined—but I know of no case where the master has actually discharged the duty, as in the present instance, where facts of this description have been admitted as an answer to his demand; precedents, of course, were not to be found in this court, for the jurisdiction has too recently been conferred upon it to allow of any arising. I can find none at common law, and, for the reasons I am about to state, I think none can be found. I am of opinion that neither error, nor want of seamanship, nor improper refusal to sign a bottomry bond, could, in an action at law, where a master was suing for wages, be admitted as evidence in bar, or even in reduction of his claim, if he had actually continued in command of the ship. But, then it may be said, is there no remedy against the master if in essential respects he has broken his agreement? That, I apprehend, is not so. I conceive that any injury the owner may have received under such circumstances might be elsewhere the subject of a cross-action. I apprehend that the law on this subject is to be found in the judgment in Mondell v. Steel (8 M. & W. 458), and in the Notes in Smith's Leading Cases to Cutter v. Powell. It is with great reluctance that I have entered upon the consideration of what is done at common law, because I well know how easily I might fall into a mistake; but the circumstances of this case have compelled me so to do, and for this reason, that the jurisdiction as to the claims of masters for their wages is, by the 191st section of the Merchant Shipping Act, conferred upon this court, and masters are thereby entitled to all the remedies which belong to mariners; and I conceive that the true intent of the section is, that I shall deal with all such cases on the same principle as a court of common law would do; and that the statute intended only to give masters a remedy against the ship, and to give this court an equitable jurisdiction to take cognisance of and settle disputed accounts. In this case the question is not one of disputed account. Nothing stated in the answer of the owner is in the nature of a set-off; the claim is not a debt, or anything like a debt; it is a claim for unliquidated damages; nor do I think the peculiar terms of the contract render it otherwise. For these reasons I am of opinion that, even if the evidence supported the allegation, I must still pronounce for the claim of wages up to the time of dismissal." Hence, even if the court finds disobedience to orders by the master, the owner's remedy is by cross-action at common law, not by an attempt to have his wages forfeited in this court. Wages can only be forfeited where the master wilfully refuses and neglects to perform his contract, and in this case there has been no refusal or neglect; and, moreover, it is for the owner who makes the charges upon which he relies, to prove them strictly before he can make out a case of forfeiture:

THE ROEBUCK.

[ADM.]

The Thomas Worthington (ubi sup.)
The Two Sisters (ubi sup.).

[SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—The question of disobedience involves three points: First, was there disobedience to the owner's written instructions; secondly, was there disobedience to his verbal instructions at Monte Video; thirdly, did the owner by his acts waive or condone the plaintiff's disobedience?] The practical effect of the written instructions given at Liverpool was that the master should go to a named consignee and get cargo from him at a named place, if possible. He goes to the consignee and finds he cannot get cargo at the place named, and acting on the instructions of the consignee, he goes elsewhere and employs the ship for the benefit of the owner. This was reasonable conduct on the part of the master, and in adopting it he took every measure to secure the ship from danger. The intermediate voyages taken by the master were for the benefit of the owner, and not for that of the master, as the accounts would show; and these voyages were all properly conducted and were to ports where it was most likely that a home cargo could be procured. Again, by continuing the master in command of the ship after leaving Port Gallagos, the owner waived all former misconduct of the master, if he had been guilty of any. The master is entitled to full wages up to the time of the arrival of the ship in England.

Butt, Q.C. and Warr, for the defendant.—First, the plaintiff was guilty of wilful and reiterated disobedience to positive orders given to him. He was bound to go to a named place, and did not go; he was ordered not to give up cargo without payment, and he gave it up; he was ordered not to give more than a certain sum for guano, and he made an agreement to give considerably more than that sum. Again, a document was found in his cabin, by which the consignee of the owner repudiated all dealings with the owner, and agreed to deal only with the master. There was no condonation of the master's disobedience; the owner was obliged to keep him on at Sandy Point to enable him to get his ship back to a civilised port; no other master could have been found there; moreover, the evidence of the plaintiff's misconduct was not so clear then as when his papers were found.

Secondly, as to desertion, whether he deserted or not, the owner had reason to believe he would desert, from his previous conduct, and was justified in going away with the ship, and leaving him when he did not return to her. If he was justifiably left, wages after that time would not be recoverable. Up to the time of the arrival of the ship at Sandy Point, the plaintiff's wages are, as we submit, forfeited by the plaintiff's misconduct. From that time to the time of the plaintiff's desertion, it would be difficult to support a forfeiture; but a very different question arises as to the wages the plaintiff would have earned if the ship had continued under his command. He claims for two years. If he had not gone on the intermediate voyages he would have been back in England sooner than the ship arrived there. Hence, even if this contract is for a specified time, and we submit it is not, the plaintiff's own misconduct compels an inquiry with the length of time that would have been occupied in the voyage. We submit that a master cannot recover wages which he would have earned, but did not, by reason of his not continuing the voyage. Neither Button v. Thompson (ubi sup.), nor The Two Sisters (ubi sup.), are any authority to show that such recovery can be had. Therefore we submit to the five months' intermediate voyages the plaintiff can recover nothing; that from the time of leaving Sandy Point to the time he left the ship at Mount Lion Island, he may recover, but that after that time he can recover nothing.

Kennedy, in reply.—Whether there is or is not a regular contract for a specified time, still, if the dismissal at Mount Lion Island was wrongful, the plaintiff is entitled to damages in respect of breach of his contract; and those damages must be measured by the time which it took to complete the voyage: (The Great Eastern, L. Rep. 1 Adm. 385.) There is no evidence to show that any of the misconduct alleged could be brought home to the plaintiff. The plaintiff had no interest in desertion.

SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a cause of wages instituted on behalf of James Gordon against the barque Roebuck, to recover his wages due and earned during the time he was master of that vessel, to the amount set forth in the schedule to that petition. The history of the case extends over a considerable period of time, and I have had very great difficulty in ascertaining the material dates, in consequence of the evidence of the principal witnesses on both sides having been so badly given; but I have, to the best of my ability and with great pains, endeavoured to extract from their evidence those dates, which I will now enumerate.

On the 17th July 1871, the plaintiff entered into an agreement with Mr. Duncan Macdonald, the then owner of the Roebuck who subsequently parted with his interest to the present defendant, to serve as master of that vessel on a voyage from Liverpool to South America and back, and was duly appointed. The first document of importance to be consulted in this case is the bill of lading, which in terms is as follows :

THE ROEBUCK.

Shipped, by the grace of God in good order and condition, by Duncan Macdonald, merchant and shipowner, Glasgow, in and upon the good ship or vessel called the Roebuck, whereof is master for the present voyage James Gordon, and now lying in the harbour of Liverpool and bound for Monte Video and Port Gallagos, Patagonia, to say : three crates crockery, &c. (the other goods being chiefly ropes, hardware, and provisions) marked and numbered as in the margin, and are to be delivered in the like good order and well conditioned at the aforesaid Port Gallagos, Patagonia (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature and kind soever excepted), unto Louis Buena, merchant, self or his assigns, he or they paying freight for the said goods so far, if any, as not already paid for and charged in the account of the said goods, payment of which account is to be given to the master of the said ship ; he shipping other goods on discharge or return for and to the said merchant as the master may purchase or agree in absence of his owners, so far as such may cover accounts, with primage and average accustomed. In witness whereof the master or purser of the said ship hath affirmed to two bills of lading, all of this tenor and date, the one of which two bills being accomplished, the other one to stand void. And so God speed the said good ship to her destined port in safety. Amen.

Dated in Liverpool, 25th July 1871.

JAMES GORDON.

There is no doubt, therefore, from this document, as to the port in which the goods were in the first instance to be delivered.

The next document is the instructions given by Mr. Macdonald to the plaintiff as to the conduct of the voyage. It is as follows :

Dear Capt. Gordon.—The following goods, shipped on board the Roebuck at Liverpool, on account of the owner or Capt. Louis P. Buena, of Santa Cruz and Sandy Point, and to be delivered to him at Port Gallagos as conditionally instructed, three crates of crockery ware, fourteen coils rope, &c. (the rest being hardware and provisions). The whole cost, freight, and charges of the above goods to Capt. Louis P. Buena come to 600*l.*, exclusive of interest from date of the goods being shipped, and for which you can take from him guano or other produce he may have of value in return, he reserving his whole produce for me of whatever kind suitable for being brought to the English market, as formerly agreed to by and between us when I was at Santa Cruz in January last.

With regard to the guano exclusively belonging to himself, and which no other parties can touch, he was to work it himself and keep all for me, but only the price at which he was to charge me for guano was not fixed, but that depends very much on where it is got, the expenses attending its being collected, cleaned, and putting it on board ship. But unless the guano is good, dry and clean, well freed from sand and stones, I would not like to pay more than 10*s.* per ton for it, and our own men taking it off with the ship's boats and loading it; 10*s.* per ton would pay Capt. Louis and his companion very handsomely for collecting, cleaning, and drying and lordship, but, however, you will see what their ideas are in this respect; at all events—

And these are very important words : Do not promise or sign anything that would make the cost exceed 15*s.* or at the outside 20*s.* free on board, including all labour, boating, and lordship. I may be able to be there with you myself, but if I am not you must do your best to make the best bargain with them you can for me—

And then follow still more important words :

You must take care and not part with the goods until you get possession of the guano from them, and a written contract with them for what they are to charge me for everything. I think you will find Capt. Louis a gentleman.

You proceed to Monte Video in the meantime with the coals. You are consigned to Mr. C. D. Horne ; he will sell the coals for you for the best price that can be got. I have no doubt his commission for doing so, collecting the money, and doing all the ship's business that you require any broker to do, is to be 2½ per cent. on the gross price of the coals. That was what he told me he would charge when I saw him last, and promised on these terms that I would consign to him.

Then follow some immaterial directions, and the instructions continue :

On leaving Monte Video you go direct to Port Gallagos, where I showed you on the chart, about 52 degrees south latitude, and where I ordered Capt. Louis P. Buena to meet you. You get about 200 tons of very good guano there on the small island on the north east side, a little inside the entrance to the river. When making the port keep to the south in shore, and low land to the left, giving a wide berth to the bar and shallow banks outside the mouth of the river for miles. See chart.

Then follow very minute directions how the bar lay, and as to the best way in which the entrance might be effected and the ship securely anchored, which I need not read, and the instructions proceed :

If Capt. Louis does not meet you here, you will require to explore the coast northward in quest of guano yourself, calling at the places I pointed out to you on the chart.

The rest of the instructions are unimportant in the present inquiry. They were signed by Mr. Macdonald. Now the next document to be noticed is the plaintiff's appointment as master of the ship, which was in the form of a letter under date of the 17th July, and is as follows :

Glasgow, 17th July 1871.

Capt. Gordon.

Dear Sir,—The result of our interview to-day, and the recommendations I have had from Mr. George Paterson and the other certificates you showed me, I hereby engage you as master of my barque Roebuck, now in Liverpool, on a voyage from there to South America, outward with a cargo of coals to Monte Video, and thence southward for guano and otherwise, as I may direct you. Your wages to be 12*l.* a month, and I agree to pay to your wife one-half of the said wages monthly, during the time you are in my employ. You are to join the vessel and enter on your duties on Wednesday next, in Liverpool, and to follow what directions I may give you then and from time to time thereafter, so far as the same shall be practicable, and do your duty as master and attend to my interest in that capacity to the best of your abilities, which I trust will prove to our mutual interest and satisfaction.—I am, yours truly,

DUNCAN MACDONALD, Sole and Managing Owner.

The vessel sailed from Liverpool on the 31st July 1871, and the plaintiff claims wages up to the time of the vessel's return to Liverpool in July 1873, and the question in the case before the court is, whether the plaintiff is entitled to the amount he claims as master, at 12*l.* a month, or whether he ought, in accordance with the defence set up by the late owner, to be held to have wholly or partially forfeited such wages.

There is no doubt that a master may so misconduct himself as to incur either of these penalties, and this position is to be deduced both from general principles and from the authority of cases decided on those principles. Therefore, the question I have to decide is, whether he has misconducted himself at all, and has thereby incurred a forfeiture of wages, and to what amount, or whether he is entitled to the entire sum he claims. The defence contend that there has been a forfeiture of wages in whole or in part, upon three grounds ; first, on the ground of disobedience to orders; secondly, on the ground that the plaintiff deserted his vessel; and, thirdly, on the ground that he was guilty of drunkenness.

THE ROEBUCK.

On the 30th Sept. the vessel arrived at Monte Video, and there commenced delivery of the coals she had on board, and had not finished the delivery when Macdonald arrived, about a month afterwards. There seems to be a doubt as to the exact time he actually did arrive on the first occasion at Monte Video; but I think the evidence shows it was about a month after the ship; at any rate, when he did arrive, it appears that he went to Buenos Ayres, and then returned to Monte Video before the ship sailed. It does not appear from the pleadings that he went on a visit to Buenos Ayres and returned; but the fact that he did so was shown by the evidence. In connection with this fact it is material to observe that, with regard to the question of forfeiture of wages by reason of disobedience, Mr. Macdonald admitted that up to the time of his second arrival at Monte Video there was not any blame attaching to the plaintiff.

Some time after Mr. Macdonald's arrival at Monte Video, and whilst the coals were still being finally delivered, an important conversation took place between Mr. Macdonald and the plaintiff. It was to this effect: Capt. Gordon having heard rumours of belligerent relations arising between the Chilian Government and the Argentine Confederation, told Mr. Macdonald that it was considered dangerous, in the opinion of persons whom he had consulted, to take the ship to Port Gallagos, and also that he had received information that there was very bad harbourage at that place, and upon that ground also it would be imprudent to go there. Now I see no reason to doubt Mr. Macdonald's evidence on this important point, which was to the effect that he told Gordon in answer, that he had considered both these matters and that he must, nevertheless, give him positive and precise orders to take the goods to Port Gallagos, according to his original instructions given to him at Liverpool. There can be no doubt whatever that those instructions were perfectly plain, precise, and explicit on that point, so far as the written document goes, and that they were confirmed by the oral instructions given in the conversation, to which I have referred, at Monte Video.

The next event of importance is the letter of the 30th Oct., from Mr Macdonald to Capt. Gordon. This letter is written from Buenos Ayres; when Mr Macdonald left Monte Video I do not exactly know:

210½, Calle de la Filonda, Buenos Ayres,
30th Oct. 1871.

Dear Capt. Gordon,—I enjoy the society of my dear nephew so much, and he mine, that I shall not leave for a few days yet. I also heard from Capt. Louis Piedra Buena, of Sandy Point, who is not at home. His wife, who could not write or read English, got my letter interpreted and wrote her brother here, who I saw to-day; he had her letter with him; he lives in the country, or rather out of town; he invited me to go out with him this afternoon, but, as I had another engagement to meet other friends to night, I deferred my visit till to-morrow, when he is coming to town again, and will bring Mrs. Piedra's letter. The guano is waiting, and all secured for me. I will explain this more fully when I go down to see you. Make all possible efforts to get Wilson to send plenty of lighters to get the cargo discharged with all despatch. I hope, as he did nothing last week, he will give you plenty of lighters now. I send you this by Capt. Coal, who will hand it to you. Tell Capt. Louis I will give him 60s. for nitrate from the West Coast to the U. K. in case he does not get better in the Plate. Write to me to-morrow.—I am, dear Sir, yours truly, DUNCAN MACDONALD.

And here it is not wholly unimportant to observe that this letter was sent to Gordon on the 30th Oct., showing clearly that at that date the instructions were still considered as holding good. On the 30th Nov. the Roebuck left Monte Video, but instead of going to Port Gallagos, five months were occupied in different voyages. According to the statement of Capt. Gordon, these voyages were as follows:—The Roebuck arrived at Buenos Ayres on the 1st Dec. 1871; left that port again on the 23rd Jan. 1872; arrived at Santa Cruz on the 15th Feb. 1872; left there on the 22nd March 1872, and arrived at Sandy Point about the end of March. In the meanwhile the ship was earning freight, but did not go to Port Gallagos at all. The statement on behalf of Mr. Macdonald was, that he was in pursuit of his ship for nearly five months, and could learn nothing of her. It is an admitted fact that she did not go to Port Gallagos for those five months, and that during that time she was cruising about as described; at the same time there is no doubt that she was during those months carrying freight, as I understand, for her owner's benefit.

The master set up as a defence for his conduct that he thought he was justified in so employing the ship by the danger of going to Port Gallagos, and the bad state of that port, and by—and here his excuse seems somewhat mysterious—his arrest and his being compelled by Don Louis to go to Buenos Ayres; and, in fact, by reason of his having no choice but to go on the voyages and not to Port Gallagos, owing to his having been consigned to and being in the power of Don Louis. Hence it appears that he was keeping away from his owner from the beginning of November till the beginning of April. And here, I must observe, that on being asked why he had no communication with his owner, he said he thought his owner was going to England when he left Monte Video, after his second visit to that place, and, accordingly, he wrote to him at Glasgow. This is obviously absurd, as was rightly observed by Mr. Butt, on the face of the ordinary course of navigation, because the master knew that his owner had gone in the first instance from Sandy Point to Monte Video on their way to England. Indeed, there was no ground which would warrant such a supposition. Shepherd, the mate of the Roebuck, said that he had heard Mr. Macdonald give the orders to Capt. Gordon at Monte Video, and say that he was going down to Port Gallagos, and that Capt. Gordon was to proceed down after him, and that in answer to these instructions Gordon said that “he would be down there before him, or words to that effect.” There is overwhelming evidence that Capt. Gordon must have known that he could have communicated with his owner if he deemed it necessary. The plain truth seems to be, that some intrigue was carried on between Don Louis and Capt. Gordon, which induced the latter to disobey his positive instructions, and to make these voyages and not to go to Port Gallagos. As a matter of fact, it must be observed that the goods which were entrusted to Capt. Gordon to deliver at Port Gallagos in exchange for guano, were actually delivered to Don Louis at Santa Cruz, and for these goods Mr. Macdonald has not received a farthing remuneration, either in money or goods. He was indebted to Don Louis in the sum of 50*l.*, but even if the debt had been cancelled, he would still have suffered a loss on these goods, not as to the goods themselves, but in other respects, because it must be remembered that the goods were not delivered at Port Gallagos, as ordered, but at Santa Cruz, where the owner could get no guano in exchange.

THE ROEBUCK.

On the 5th April the Roebuck came into Sandy Point Harbour. Mr. Macdonald was there at the time the vessel arrived, and he says that he went on board and rebuked Capt. Gordon for his conduct, but that the latter defied him, as he expressed it. But it is not necessary to go into any further details on this point. Mr. Macdonald was asked why he did not dismiss Capt. Gordon at once, and he answered that, considering the position he was in and difficulty of supplying his place, he thought it better to make the best of bad circumstances, admitting for the time the master's excuse, namely, that he had been disappointed by Don Louis. From Sandy Point Macdonald proceeded in the ship with Don Louis to get guano on the coast of Patagonia.

I must now revert to two documents which would in historical order come before the above facts, but which came into the possession of the defendant owing to their having been left in his cabin after Capt. Gordon left the ship. The first is an agreement between Don Louis and Capt. Gordon as to the terms of loading the ship, and is as follows:

Monte Video, Nov. 30, 1871.

I, the undersigned, do hereby agree with Capt. James Gordon, commanding British barque Roebuck, now anchored in the port of Monte Video, to load the said vessel with a full and complete cargo of guano off the coast of Patagonia, for the sum of 2*l.* sterling per ton of 2240*lb.*; said Capt. Gordon also agrees to render all assistance possible with crew, boats, bags, wheelbarrows belonging to the said vessel, to facilitate the loading of the said ship. Should said Louis Piedra Buena require to ship horses, mules, men, or anything for the benefit of the said cargo, nothing in the shape of charges are to be made against the said Louis Piedra Buena.

Capt. James Gordon agrees to deliver Mr. Louis Piedra Buena all provisions on board to his consignment, in part payment of said cargo of guano.

LOUIS PIEDRA BUENA.

A similar document was given to Don Louis Piedra Buena, signed by Capt. Gordon. Now this was a contract which was entered into without the consent and in defiance of the instructions of Mr. Macdonald. Then comes another document of a very serious character, if it is to be considered as shown in the evidence that Gordon was a party to it. It is as follows:

Monte Video, 1st Dec. 1871.

I, the undersigned, do hereby certify that all business transactions carried on between me and the British barque Roebuck, now under the command of Capt. James Gordon, has nothing to do whatsoever with Mr. Duncan Macdonald, said person having broken his faith with me, leaving myself and family in a state of destitution, from supplying said Macdonald with provisions, said Macdonald having at the same time promised faithfully to remit said provisions per first steamers, according to requirement, but failed in so doing, leaving me destitute, having supplied him with surplus stores. Under the circumstances, I refuse having further business transactions with said gentlemen, and only recognise the signature of Capt. Gordon, commanding said vessel.

LOUIS PIEDRA BUENA.

Now this document was found among the papers in the captain's cabin. This is a very suspicious circumstance; but I do not think that it is enough of itself to bring home complicity to Capt. Gordon, and I think it would be unfair to make him responsible for it, or allow it to affect the mind of the court, as there is no further evidence respecting it. I have thought it right to mention it, to show that it has not escaped my attention; but I must say that I do not attach any importance to it as affecting the decree I am about to make.

Now it appears that before leaving Sandy Point Mr. Macdonald thought it right to enter into another agreement, dated the 10th April, 1872, with Don Louis; and by that document it was agreed that all previously existing contracts between the parties thereto, and between Don Louis and Capt. Gordon, should be cancelled; that Mr. Macdonald having purchased from Don Louis, which purchase the latter agreed to, for the price of one pound sterling per English ton, the guano situate near Santa Cruz River, on the coast of Patagonia, as then pointed out to each of the parties on the Chart, Don Louis agreed to assist in loading the same, and was to receive for such assistance for himself and five men twenty patagones a month and food. Now this would lead to the observation that I had omitted—that among other distinct breaches of his instructions of which the master was accused, it was said that he had, although it was distinctly stated in those instructions that he was under no circumstances to give more than 1*l.* for guano per ton; and that he during five months, to which I have already referred, entered into an agreement to give Don Louis 2*l.* per ton.

Now the vessel leaves Sandy Point on the 15th April, and arrives at Santa Cruz River on the 25th April; and then the history of the case shows that Don Louis having a settlement about 25 miles from that river, went ashore, and sent some men with a message to request that some person should go from the ship to see the guano which was to be found on Mount Lion Island, which lay a little to the south of Santa Cruz River. This island was described as being separated from the main land by the tide during a portion of the day, but perfectly accessible at low water. Now Mr. Macdonald declined to go, and, according to his statement, Capt. Gordon offered to go, and there is no doubt that he did go with the full sanction and permission of his owner. And this brings me to the second charge, which is that of desertion. But before I enter upon the question of desertion, I am bound to say that with respect to the breach of orders, I consider that so far as relates to the five months during which the ship was going from port to port without the consent and against the orders of the owner, disobedience has been fully established; and as to that I must hold, looking at decided cases and principles to be deduced from them, Capt. Gordon has forfeited his wages for those five months, unless there are other facts which take this case out of those principles.

Then I come to the charge of desertion from the ship, which originates in the fact that Capt. Gordon went ashore in the Santa Cruz River to see Don Louis. There can be no doubt that he went with full consent of the owner in the first instance, Capt. Gordon went on shore, and, it appears was not seen till four days had elapsed, although he had promised to return not on any particular day as alleged, but as soon as possible, the question of his return being left to his discretion. On the fourth day, the ship having in the meantime gone down to Mount Lion Island, Capt. Gordon was seen on the shore near that island. A boat's crew went off from the ship to the island, and there was no difficulty in traversing the space between the mainland and the island for three or four hours on that day. Then the story told is very strange on both sides; but the upshot of it all is, that, having been seen talking with the boatswain, Capt. Gordon did not, as might have been expected, go on board his ship. He could have done so if he had wished, and it was his duty to have done so, if he believed, as he said he did, that she was in a dangerous position, but he rode away back again with Don Louis. This state of facts is supported by the evidence of the witness Shepherd, and by the statement of the plaintiff himself. I do not think it necessary to give the details of the circumstances which occurred whilst the vessel remained at Mount Lion Island, but I will state the conclusion at which I have arrived after a careful consideration of the evidence on this second point of the defence, namely, that the plaintiff's wages are not forfeited by desertion.

There can be no doubt that wages may be forfeited by desertion, but the conclusion to which I have come with regard to the second defence to this suit is that the evidence does not establish what the law would call desertion on the part of Capt. Gordon. I agree with the opinion given by my predecessor in the case of The Two Sisters (2 W. Rob. 125, 138), where that learned Judge said: "The facts pleaded are that the mariner quitted the ship, and remained absent for nine or ten consecutive days. The facts, if established, might, I think, constitute a legal desertion, provided an intention really to quit can be inferred from the res gestæ of the case. Without such an intention on the part of the mariner there can be no absolute desertion. If there be an absence from the vessel animus revertendi, whatever its duration, it would not be a desertion forfeiting the whole of the wages." It is possible, I think, that this principle in the passage I have just read may be too largely stated, but I substantially agree that there can be no absolute desertion where there is an animus revertendi, and I am of opinion that the evidence rather preponderates in favour of there being an animus revertendi on the part of Capt. Gordon.

There is one circumstance that ought to be considered at this point of the case, viz., that Capt. Gordon left every article of clothing he possessed except what he was actually wearing on board the ship.

The narrative then goes on to show that the ship lay off Mount Lion Island for three or four days, but Capt. Gordon made no attempt to return on board. The vessel went there under the charge of the mate; and he said that as the anchorage was bad, and the weather became stormy, they were then obliged to leave. The ship then returned to the Santa Cruz River, and after staying there a short time proceeded to Buenos Ayres. Mr. Macdonald did not see Capt. Gordon again until he was at Buenos Ayres two months afterwards, when his conduct was certainly not that of a deserter. He went before the Consul and claimed to be restored to his position as master. It is not necessary to state what passed at the Consulate, but it ended in Mr. Macdonald being satisfied that he ought not to take Capt. Gordon back, but ought rather to take another master. Capt. Gordon went back to England in another vessel a few months later.

I pointed out to counsel that there were two questions on the point of desertion: first, whether the captain deserted his ship; and secondly, whether the owner deserted the captain. The evidence does not show that Mr. Macdonald intentionally deserted Capt. Gordon with the intention of preventing him from resuming command of the ship, but I consider that the acts of Capt. Gordon to be so suspicious that they naturally led to the supposition in the mind of Mr. Macdonald that Capt. Gordon did not intend to return; and in coming to this conclusion I cannot forget his former unjustifiable conduct, and his taking the ship on different voyages for five months without the consent, and against the instructions, of his owner; and I have no doubt that this greatly influenced Mr. Macdonald in his estimate of Capt. Gordon's conduct. Looking to all the circumstances, while I acquit Capt. Gordon of desertion of his ship, I also acquit Mr. Macdonald of any intention to wrongfully desert Capt. Gordon.

Then there is one more question to be considered which was set up in defence, namely, the charge of drunkenness made against Capt. Gordon, incapacitating him from his command. Now there is a very early case in which the specified charges were disobedience, neglect of duty, and drunkenness, against the mate of a ship; and there Lord Stowell, with his usual clearness and knowledge of law, stated his opinion. It was the case of the Exeter, and it is there said: "Upon the matter of drunkenness, the court will be no apologist for that; it is an offence peculiarly noxious on board ship, where the sober and vigilant attention of every man, and particularly of officers, is required. At the same time the court cannot entirely forget that in a mode of life peculiarly exposed to severe peril and exertion, and, therefore, admitting in seasons of repose something of indulgence and refreshment, that indulgence and refreshment is naturally enough sought by such persons in grosser pleasures of that kind, and, therefore, that the proof of a single act of intemperance committed in part is no conclusive proof of disability for general maritime employment. Another rule would, I fear, disable many useful men from the maritime service of the country": (The Exeter 2 C. Rob. 261, 269.) It is true that in that case Lord Stowell was considering the offence of a mate, and not of a master. But in the more recent case of The Thomas Worthington (3 W. Rob. 128, 133), decided by my learned predecessor, I see he says: "Cases, indeed, may occur even in this court where the misconduct may be of such a gross description that, independently of any loss sustained by the owners, the entire forfeiture of wages would ensue; as, for instance, if a master had attempted to commit barratry; or if throughout a voyage he had shown gross incapacity, or had been constantly drunk. In either of these cases would this court be justified in pronouncing for any part of his wages under the contract? Unquestionably not; and if any such case should come before me I should not hesitate for a single moment in rejecting his claim in toto." But I do not think that the evidence in this case brings it within the scope of these observations. It is true, unfortunately, and cannot be denied (and, indeed,

LAING v. ZEDEN.

I must do Capt. Gordon the justice to say he did not deny it) that he occasionally took more ardent liquor than he ought, and it affected him, but not in the way to disqualify him from the discharge of his duties as master. I do not mean to say that if constant drunkenness had been proved, although there had been a failure to show that that drunkenness had resulted in the bad navigation of the vessel, or loss to the owner, he could not by that means have forfeited part, or whole, of his wages, but I do not think that the evidence here comes up to that mark; and although it was proved that he was, as is vulgarly said, sometimes worse for liquor, there is no evidence to sustain the argument in the defence that he was guilty of constant drunkenness, which would incapacitate him from attending to the business or navigation of his ship.

Having arrived at these conclusions on the different points of the case, the question is, what the judgment of the court must be. First I am of opinion that the captain is certainly entitled to his wages up to the time of the second visit of Mr. Macdonald to Monte Video, shortly after which the master ought to have proceeded to Port Gallagos. I think that from that time, and during the time that he was navigating the ship against orders for five months, he is not entitled to any wages. During the short time that elapsed from the period when he left Sandy Point with the ship until the vessel sailed away from Santa Cruz without him after the transactions at Mount Lion Island, he is entitled to his wages. But I do not think that after that time he is entitled to any wages. Looking to all the circumstances, I think that Mr. Macdonald was justified, as I have already stated, in taking the ship away from Mount Lion Island and returning to Liverpool, and taking the vessel out of command of Capt. Gordon on her homeward voyage.

There is one other point that I have omitted to notice, which I have not failed, however, carefully to consider. I suggested myself that it might possibly be found by this court that however much to blame Capt. Gordon might be for disobeying the instructions of his owner during those five months so often alluded to, the conduct of Mr. Macdonald in putting the vessel again under his command, and going with him from Sandy Point to Santa Cruz, might be held to be a condonation of Capt. Gordon's former misconduct. But I think that, looking to all the circumstances of the case, it cannot be so considered. Considering the position in which the owner then was as to obtaining another master, I think it must be taken that he only intended to act under the circumstances as was best for all concerned, without reference to the master's past conduct, and without prejudice to any course he might afterwards choose to adopt with regard to the master's future dismissal.

I shall make an order that the master is entitled to one part, and disentitled to the other part of his wages, as I have expressed above. Of course I shall order a reference to show whether he is indebted to Macdonald, and to settle the balance of accounts, a part of the case I have carefully refrained from entering upon. I shall make no order as to costs.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Reported by E. STEWART ROCHE and H. PEAT, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

(Before the LORDS JUSTICES.)

LAING v. ZEDEN.

Shipowner as stakeholder—Shipper claiming lien—Holder of bill of lading—Interpleader—Parties—Costs—Undertaking as to damages—Inquiry—Where there are two or more claimants of goods in the hands of a stakeholder, the only way in which he can protect himself is by filing a bill of interpleader. If, instead of doing so, he litigates with the claimants separately, he must pay the costs of the successful claimant.

Goods in the hands of a shipowner were claimed by the shipper under an alleged lien, and also by the holder of the bills of lading. The shipper filed a bill to restrain the shipowner from parting with the goods, and the other claimant brought an action on his bills of lading against the shipowner. To restrain this action the shipowner filed a bill, to which he did not make the shipper a party, and an injunction was granted on the usual undertaking as to damages. The shipper's bill was dismissed with costs:

Held (reversing the decision of Bacon, V.C.) that the bill of the stakeholder to restrain the action brought by the holder of the bills of lading must be dismissed with costs, and that the defendant to that bill was entitled to an inquiry as to damages under the undertaking.

This was an appeal from a decision of Bacon, V.C. The facts of the case were as follows:

A suit of Hathesing v. Laing (ante, p. 170; L. Rep. 17 Eq. 92) was instituted by a firm of cotton brokers claiming an alleged equity on certain bales of cotton, shipped from Bombay on board the steamship Alabama, to restrain the shipowners, James Laing and Mary Gourley, from delivering the bales of cotton to the Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris, the holders of the bills of lading.

To that suit the Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris were not made parties, but on the 11th Oct., 1870, the solicitor for the plaintiffs in that suit wrote them a letter inquiring whether they claimed the cotton, and expressing their readiness to enter into any arrangement for the sale of the cotton and the payment of the purchase money into court, until it should be decided who was entitled to it, and requesting an early answer, as it would be better if the Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris claimed the cotton, to make them parties to the suit.

Notwithstanding this letter the Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris on the 29th Oct. 1870, commenced an action on the bills of lading against the shipowners.

Thereupon the shipowners filed their bill in the present suit to restrain the action at law making Zeden, the ship's agent and the Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris defendants, but the plaintiffs in the suit of Hathesing v. Laing were not made parties.

Subsequently the Comptoir d'Escompte were, under an order obtained on the 11th Oct. 1870, made defendants by amendment to the suit of Hathesing v. Laing, the bill in which was ultimately dismissed with costs: (See ante, p. 170.)

Immediately after the decision of Hathesing v.

CHAN.]

ASHCROFT v. CROW ORCHARD COLLIERY COMPANY.

[Q. B.]

Laing, the presnet suit, in which an injunction had been granted, came on for hearing on the question of costs.

The Vice Chancellor held that the plaintiffs, as stakeholders, were entitled to their costs out of the fund.

From this decision the Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris appealed.

Kay, Q.C. and B. B. Rogers, for the appellants.—The bill ought to have been dismissed with costs. [Lord Justice JAMES—We do not entertain appeals on mere questions of costs. Is not this an appeal for costs? When the injunction was granted, it was on the terms that the plaintiffs should give and undertake against damages; and it is open to us now to get an inquiry what damages we have sustained by reason of our money having been locked up for over three years. In Newby v. Harrison (5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 12; 3 De G. F. & G. 287) it was decided that such an undertaking as to damages remains in force, notwithstanding the dismissal of the bill. This suit was purely one to restrain an action which we had a perfect right to bring, and was not at all in the nature of an interpleader suit. The plaintiffs ought therefore to have had their bill dismissed with costs.

Miller, Q.C. and E. Beaumont, for the respondents.—We never opposed the defendants' claim and our solicitor's letter of the 11th Oct. 1870 shows that we were disposed to do what was right. After receiving that letter the defendants brought their action, while the whole dispute might have been settled in the suit of Hathesing v. Laing. This suit is virtually an interpleader suit, and by the Comptoir d'Escompte being made parties by amendment to the other suit all the parties were brought together. We are mere stakeholders, and should not be put to any expense in consequence of a dispute between two parties as to the goods in our hands. They cited Nelson v. Barter (2 H. & M. 334; 10 L. Rep. N. S. 743.)

Without calling for a reply,

Lord Justice JAMES said: I am of opinion that the decision of the Vice Chancellor cannot be sustained in this case. The Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris had a clear legal right to a quantity of cotton not affected by any equity whatever. Having that legal and equitable right, they brought an action against the plaintiffs in the present suit, to which the latter had no defence. Thereupon the bill in the present suit was filed, on which it has been shown that there was no equity. It appears to me that the Comptoir d'Escompte have sustained damages by reason of that proceeding, and that they are entitled to have those damages ascertained. It is said that the plaintiffs in the present suit were mere stakeholders, and that they were therefore entitled to their costs against the Comptoir d'Escompte. The latter have, however, done no wrong. It is said that they ought not to have brought their action after the injunction had been granted in the first suit. But there was no injunction against them, and I do not quite understand how the injunction was granted. It is said, however, that Laing and his co-plaintiff were stakeholders, and that it was perfectly immaterial to them whether they delivered the goods to the Comptoir d'Escompte or to the other claimants. But the only way in which a man can avail himself of such a plea is by a bill of interpleader. The bill of interpleader is not a merely formal thing. It is not a thing equivalent to a bill of interpleader that is required; he must file a bill of interpleader. Such a bill does not always work complete justice, but it does so as far as possible. It gives relief between the two claimants, and it stops other litigation. It gives the stakeholder his costs out of the fund, and the other party is there to indemnify the defendant who is entitled. Here the plaintiffs have not given the Comptoir d'Escompte any chance of getting their costs out of the other party. The costs should come out of the fund, with a remedy over against the wrongful claimant. But it is said that the Comptoir d'Escompte ought not to have brought the action after an injunction was granted. In this suit, however, we know nothing about that injunction. The bill must be dismissed, and dismissed with costs. And we must direct an inquiry as to damages.

Lord Justice MELLISH.—I am of the same opinion. I am quite clear that at law the remedy of the Comptoir d'Escompte was solely against the plaintiffs in the present suit. The defendants had a clear title on the bills of lading against the plaintiffs, who, however, would not deliver the goods to them because a third party, who had no real title, asserted a claim to the goods. The only remedy of a person in the sheriff's position under those circumstances is by a bill of interpleader. If he does not choose to file such a bill, but litigates with both the claimants separately, he is liable to bear the costs of the party who establishes his claim. But it is said that this suit was as good as an interpleader bill. That is not so, for it did not bring the parties together, and it left the defendants no remedy over against the other claimant for costs. I am, therefore, of opinion that the decision of the Vice-Chancellor cannot be upheld, and that this appeal must be allowed.

ASHCROFT v. CROW ORCHARD COLLIERY COMPANY.

Charter-party—Demurrage—Dock regulations—Usual despatch of the port.

Where by a charter-party it is mutually agreed between shipowner and charterer that the shipowner's ship is "to be loaded with the usual despatch of the port, or if longer detained to be paid 40s. demurrage," and that the ship is to be loaded at a named dock, by the regulations of which no shipper could have more than three vessels loading in dock at the same time, and, by reason of the charterer having more than three vessels entered in their books which had to be loaded in the dock before that ship, the ship is delayed an unreasonable time, the contract to load with the usual despatch of the port must be considered as an absolute contract to load with that despatch and within a reasonable time, independently of any other engagements of the charterers, even if it can be shown that at the time of the making of the charter-party the shipowner knew that such persons' engagements existed, and the shipowner can recover demurrage.

Tapscott v. Balfour, ante, vol. 1, p. 501, distinguished.

THIS was an action by a shipowner against charterers tried before Quain, J., at the Liverpool Summer Assizes, 1873, when a verdict of 60*l.* was entered for the plaintiff, leave to move being reserved to the defendants. A rule nisi was obtained in pursuance of the leave reserved, on the ground that the facts proved did not, on the true construction of the charter-party, disclose any liability on the part of the defendants.

The first count of the declaration set out the charter-party, which provided, amongst other things, that the defendants should load the plaintiff's ship "with the usual despatch of the port" of Liverpool. If detained, the plaintiff "to be paid 40*s.* per day demurrage." The alleged breach was not loading with the usual despatch.

The second count was framed upon a memorandum at the foot of the charter-party, by which the vessel was to "load in the Bramley Moore or Wellington Docks, High Level Railway." The breach was not giving, or procuring, within a reasonable time an order entitling the plaintiff's vessel to enter the said docks.

There were also money counts for demurrage.

The pleas merely denied the contracts, the breaches, and the debt.

The judgment of the court contains a full statement of the facts and arguments.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 6.—LUSH, J., delivered the judgment of the court (Mellor, Lush, Quain, and Archibald, JJ.). This was an action for demurrage tried before my brother Quain at Liverpool, when a verdict was entered for the plaintiff for 60*l.*, being for 30 days' demurrage, with leave to the defendants to move to enter a nonsuit, the court being empowered to draw all inferences of fact, and to amend the pleadings if necessary. All questions of reasonableness were to be for the court.

By the charter-party, dated Liverpool, the 22nd Jan. 1873, the master engaged to receive and load on board his vessel the Christiana Davies, of Barrow, a full and complete cargo of coal, about 140 tons, and proceed to Belfast and deliver the same as per bills of lading at certain specified freight, &c. "To be loaded with the usual despatch of the port, and discharged 25 tons working days, or if longer detained to be paid 40*s.* per day demurrage." The defendants thereby engaged to load the vessel "on the above terms." By a memorandum at the foot the vessel was to load in the Bramley Moore, or Wellington Docks, High Level Railway. By the published dock regulations, which it must be taken were known to both parties, it is ordered, amongst other things, that "no vessel is to be allowed to enter the Bramley Moore, or Wellington Docks, to load coal from the High Level Railway, except upon the production of a jerque note, or a certificate from the master of the dock in which the vessel is lying at the time, showing that she is ready to commence loading, and also a certificate from the coal agent that she is to load coal at the High Level. No coal agent to be allowed to load more than two flats at the cranes at the same time, nor to have more than three vessels in the Bramley Moore, or Wellington Docks (both inclusive), loading, and to load at the cranes at one time." "No vessel to be entered in the application or berthing book before she is in either the Bramley Moore, or the Wellington Dock: each vessel to be berthed in regular turn as entered, if the specified quantity of coal is at the Sandhills Station; if not, the next vessel in turn having sufficient coal ready to take the berth. Any vessel losing her turn in consequence of coal for her not being ready at the Sandhills Station, to be considered first on turn when the coals are ready. Flats and vessels to follow the same order as to turn for loading, whether entered for the cranes or the shoot." It was admitted that the master obtained in proper time the requisite certificate from the dock master in which the vessel was lying, and that the defendants gave their certificate in proper time; also that the vessel was regularly put on the dock books, and would have been loaded without delay, had it not been for the fact, which fact was unknown to the master at the time he entered into the charter-party, that the defendants acted as their own coal agents, and that they had at the time three ships loading in the dock, and ten other charters in their books which had priority over the plaintiff. In consequence of these engagements the vessel, was not allowed to go into dock till the 5th March, a period of thirty days after she was ready to do so. The loading was commenced and completed on the following day.

It was conceded that thirty days was an unusual period of detention, and that the delay was caused, not by the pressure of business in the dock, or any inability on the part of the dock company to facilitate the dispatch of the vessel, for vessels booked after the Christiana Davies by other coal agents were loaded and despatched before her, but solely by the incapacity, which the defendants had placed themselves under by their previous engagements, of getting a berth for her at an earlier period. On the other hand it was conceded that the defendants were guilty of no delay which it was in their power to avoid consistently with their previous engagements.

The question is, then, what is the contract which the defendants entered into by the charter-party? The words are not that the vessel is to be "loaded in turn according to the charterer's books or engagements," or to be loaded "next after a particular vessel," or in any other prescribed order, but "to be loaded with the usual despatch of the port."

The defendants' counsel contended that these words apply only to a delay in the process of loading when the vessel has arrived at the berth, and that they have no reference to a detention outside, the loading place, though caused by the act or default of the charterer, and he relied upon the case of Kearon v. Pearson (7 H. & N. 386) in support of that position. That case, however, by no means justifies the argument based upon it. The words of the charter there were in substance the same as here, namely, "to be loaded with usual despatch." The facts were that the loading was, after it had commenced, interrupted by a severe frost, which closed the canal through which the coals were to be brought from the pit, and thus prevented the charterer from getting them to the loading place; and the court held the meaning of the clause to be that the vessel should be loaded with the usual despatch of persons who had a cargo in readiness at the dock for the purpose of loading, and therefore that the charterer was responsible for the delay occasioned by the frost. So far from supporting the argument that the charterer is not liable for delay occasioned by his own act or default, that case establishes that the engagement to load "with the usual despatch" is absolute, and admits of no qualification so as to dispense with performance, even where the performance was hindered by a casualty which the charterer could not prevent. It is true the delay in that case occurred during the process of loading, and the court had not to consider what would have been the effect of a detention at the dock's mouth; but we see no reason for limiting the obligation to the mere process of loading. It undoubtedly includes that process, and requires it to be done with the usual despatch; but we are of opinion that it goes further, and covers the whole period from the time when the vessel is at the port and is placed at the disposal of the charterer there in a condition to receive the cargo. The object is to provide against unusual delay on the part of the charterer in putting the cargo on board, and whether the delay occurs in the course of loading or before the loading commences, whether it consists in keeping the vessel outside or inside the dock, is obviously immaterial. The question is whether the vessel is at his disposal, and whether the detention is his act. If so, the contract is broken as much in the one case as in the other.

It was further contended that the vessel could not be said to have been ready to receive cargo so long as she lay outside the dock, that it is the duty of the shipowner to find his way into the dock, and that he takes the risk of any obstacles which occur to prevent his getting there; and Tapscott v. Balfour (ubi sup.) was relied on in support of this argument.

In the case of Tapscott v. Balfour there was a charter under which the ship was ordered to load in one of the docks mentioned in this charter—the Wellington Dock—which was governed by the same regulations as the Bramley Moore Dock. The vessel was detained there as in this case outside the dock, and for a similar reason, namely, because the coal agent who had the loading for the charterer had not only three vessels in the dock at the time, but two others booked to come in before the plaintiff's. The Court held that the lay days commenced only from the time when the vessel was admitted into the dock, the loss arising from being kept outside by virtue of the dock regulations being a loss, the risk of which was undertaken by the shipowner. At first sight that case appears to bear a close resemblance to the present case, and it is not to be wondered at that the defendants' counsel strongly relied upon it as an authority in his favour. But when examined the supposed resemblance disappears. The words of that charter were "the vessel shall proceed direct to any Liverpool or Birkenhead dock as ordered by charterer, and there load in the usual and customary manner a full and complete cargo of coals." The court held that this stipulation applied to the mode, and not to the time of loading. "There is," says Bovill, C.J., "no express stipulation with respect to the time at which the loading is to commence, except that it is not to commence before the 1st July. Then what is the ordinary rule under such circumstances where the port, but no particular place in the port, to which the vessel is to proceed is named? It means that the time is to commence from the arrival of the vessel at the usual place of loading in that port. The stipulation is in effect that the vessel shall proceed to the Wellington Dock, and there load her cargo. Therefore the lay days do not commence till she has got into the Wellington Dock. If, by reason of the dock regulations, she cannot enter into that dock before a certain time, the loss by such delay must fall on the shipowners."

Assuming this construction of the clause in that charter to be the correct one, the grounds of the judgment are inapplicable to the present case. The intention of the parties here was evidently that the charterer should not, and the words bind him that he will not, detain the vessel, for want of cargo, beyond the usual and ordinary period of delay at the dock. Evidence was given to show that the plaintiff might, if he had chosen, have obtained information from the dock master before he entered into the contract as to the number of vessels which the defendants had in the dock and on their books, but he was under no obligation to do so, and it would have been immaterial if he had, and if it were shown that he knew these facts. We construe the stipulation as a contract by the charterer that he will load with the usual despatch, and it is no answer to say that he was unable to do so; nor would it be any more an answer to say that the plaintiff knew it.

The ground on which leave was reserved having failed, the verdict stands for the amount agreed on at the trial.

APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Reported by JOHN ROSE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Feb. 6 and June 16, 1874.

RODOCANOCHI AND OTHERS v. ELLIOTT.

Marine policy—Terrene risk—Goods in besieged town—"Restraint of princes"—Notice of abandonment—Total loss.

A marine policy in the ordinary Lloyd's form against the usual perils, including "arrests, restraints, and detentions of princes," on goods which are expressed in the policy to be carried by a route, which is (within the knowledge of the underwriters) partly by sea and partly by land, covers the risk of transit both by land and water, and if the goods are lost by the perils insured against whilst upon land, the assured are entitled to recover.

Where goods insured under a policy covering terrene risks, and against (inter alia) "arrests, restraints, and detentions of princes," are in course of their transit detained in a town by reason of that town being regularly besieged, the detention is a "restraint of princes" within the meaning of the policy, which will give the assured the right to abandon and claim as for a total loss. Plaintiffs effected an insurance with the defendant by a Lloyd's policy in the ordinary form, "lost or not lost, at and from Japan ^{and} Shanghai to Marseilles ^{and} Leghorn ^{and} London, via Marseilles ^{and} Southampton, and whilst remaining there for transit," on silks, against the usual perils—"arrests, restraints, and detention of princes," &c., and it was agreed that the silks should be shipped by any of three named lines of steamers, one of which was the Messageries Imperiales. That company, as was well known to underwriters, always sent such goods overland through France, i.e., by the Lyons Railway from Marseilles to Paris, and thence by the Northern Railway to Boulogne, and thence to London.

The silks were shipped at Shanghai, for London, on board a steamer of the Messageries Imperiales, and reached Marseilles on the 27th Aug. 1870. There was then, and from the 15th July previously had been, war between France and Germany. The silks were despatched by the Lyons Railway, and arrived in Paris on or before the 13th Sept. The German armies, which were at that time advancing upon and gradually surrounding Paris, on the 19th completely invested it, held military possession of all the roads leading out of Paris, and prevented communication between it and all other places, by reason whereof it was impossible to remove the silk from Paris.

This state of siege continued, and on the 29th Sept., while the silks were detained in Paris, the plaintiffs gave notice of abandonment to the underwriters:

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below (ante, p. 21), that the policy covered the terrene risk of the land transit, that the goods were lost by the perils insured against, viz., restraint of princes; that notice of abandonment was given in reasonable time; and that, therefore, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the sum insured from the underwriters as for a total loss.

ERROR from a decision of the Court of Common Pleas in favour of the plaintiffs upon a special case, which is set out, with the arguments, in the report below (ante, p. 21).

Day, Q.C. (with him J. C. Mathew), for the defendants.—The doctrine of abandonment in insurance law is that the person abandoning must be in a position to abandon. The plaintiffs, however, had no property in the silks at the time of the so-called abandonment, for they had previously sold the goods to arrive in London, and therefore could not pass the property in them to the underwriters. [QUAIN, J.—But the sub-vendees were interested in the policy which was no doubt made for their benefit.] The sale of the goods "to arrive" was indeed contingent, and did not pass the property in them until their arrival. But when they did arrive they became the property of the purchasers, who, although not bound to take them when they arrived so late, were yet entitled to do so if they chose. [BRAMWELL, B.—This point, which was not made below, divides itself into two: First, could the plaintiffs abandon? secondly, assuming that they could, would the fact of the vendees subsequently taking possession alter the effect of the abandonment?] On the 7th Oct. 1870, when the notice of abandonment was given, the vendees were entitled to the silks. In Jardine v. Leathley (7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 783: 3 B. & S. 700), it was held that the deposit of a policy of insurance on a ship at sea, which is afterwards injured by perils insured against and condemned, does not invest the depository with implied authority to give notice to the underwriters of abandonment as for a total loss. Quere, if there were a mortgage of the ship. But here the plaintiffs, having given the whole interest to the sub-vendees, even although the property had not passed, cannot give notice of abandonment. Secondly, the policy did not apply to the goods in Paris. Primâ facie, a policy of marine insurance contemplates sea and not land risks: (Harrison v. Ellis, 7 E. & B. 465.) The temporary deposit of the goods on a sand bank, in the case of Petty v. The Royal Exchange Insurance Company (1 Burr. 341) was a usual course of proceeding well known to the underwriters. [BRAMWELL, B.—Your general proposition may be correct. Indeed, it is a truism to say that a maritime policy is limited to sea risks, but regard must be had to the words of this particular policy.] (The argument below on the terms of the policy was repeated.) Thirdly, there was no loss; (1), within the terms of the policy; (2), by restraint of princes; (3), entitling the assured to give notice of abandonment. As to Geipel v. Smith (ante vol. 1, p. 268; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 361; L. Rep. 7 Q.B. 404), relied on contra, it is distinguishable upon the plain ground of the wide distinction between an event operating as an excuse for nonperformance of a charter, and one creating a total loss as against an underwriter. He cited also Hadkinson v. Robinson (3 Bos. & P. 392). [QUAIN, J., referred to Aubert v. Gray (3 B. & S. 163).] There the vessel was actually taken possession of by the sovereign, and the goods compulsorily put ashore. So long as the goods are under the control of their owner there is no loss; there must be an exercise of the restraining power in rem.

Field, Q.C. (with him Thesiger, Q.C.) for the plaintiffs.—[BRAMWELL, B.—We need not trouble you upon the question as to the goods being covered by the policy during transit through France, nor upon the point as to whether the plaintiffs were competent to abandon them.] Then, first, there was a restraint of princes of an uncertain and indefinite duration; secondly, there was a loss thereby. [QUAIN, J.—Do you maintain that Hadkinson v. Robinson (sup.) is wrong? If necessary; but we need not. It is obsolete, and moreover in Schmidt v. United Insurance Company (1 Johns. 249, §. 896), Kent, C.J., says, "As to whether a blockade of the port of destination be a peril within the policy, the only case in the English books that appears to have a bearing on the question is that of Hadkinson v. Robinson (3 Bos. & Pull. 389). The court there considered that the port of destination being shut, was a peril acting collaterally only, and not directly upon the subject. But that case arose upon the special memorandum in the policy, which required a peril operating to the total destruction of the article insured. It is not an authority beyond the question arising upon that memorandum; for with respect to the loss of the voyage, by reason of a blockade of the port of discharge, the peril operates as directly as any other restraint or detention" (p. 264). That was a blockade at the port of destina-

Day, Q.C., in reply.—Geipel v. Smith (sup.) made a distinction between a restraint of princes likely to last so long as to entitle the shipowner to say, "I cannot complete my contract," and restraint which would entitle an owner of goods to claim insurance money for a constructive total loss. The American cases cited have now become disused; and, in America, the courts hold that a blockade, whether by blocking a vessel in or out of a port is restraint of princes; but if those were decided by analogy between a blockade and an embargo, there is a wide difference, for an embargo is in the nature of a preliminary declaration of quasi war, whereas blockade, on the contrary, no doubt interferes with the liberty of the ship, but not with the goods. [QUAIN, J.—The enemy would interfere with the goods also if they were going away.] The mere declaration of a blockade is no declaration of war against neutral ships. [QUAIN, J.—From p. 656 of 1 Duer on Marine Insurance, the author seems to think that there is more force in a siege than in a blockade.] In Roux v. Salvador (3 Bing. N. C. 246), Abinger, C.B., says, at p. 286: "There may be a forcible detention which may speedily terminate, or may last so long as to end in the impossibility of bringing the ship or the goods to their destination," when . . . "if a prudent man, not insured, would decline any further expense in prosecuting an adventure the termination of which will probably never be successfully accomplished, a party insured may for his own benefit, as well as that of the underwriter, treat the case as one of total loss, and demand the full sum insured." Here there were no such circumstances as justified abandonment. In 1 Arnould on Marine Insurance, p. 676, the difference between the continental law and our own as to abandonment is pointed out, and it is said that "In this country, however, it has been repeatedly decided, and must now be taken as clear insurance law, that neither interdiction of trade at the port of destination after risk commenced, nor interception of the voyage by blockade, or by the imminent and palpable danger of capture or seizure, amounts to a risk for which English underwriters are answerable under the common form of policy, either as an arrest, restraint, and detention, or in any other way whatever." Cur. adv. vult.

June 16.—Judgment of the court (Bramwell and Pigott, BB., Quain and Archibald, JJ., and Amphlett, B.) was now delivered by

BRAMWELL, B.—The first point made by the defendant in the argument before us very faintly, and not at all in the court below, was that, supposing there was a loss within the policy, there was no right of abandonment, the plaintiffs having sold the goods insured, and the vendees having claimed them on their arrival. The answer is, that if the plaintiffs had the right of abandonment they did abandon, and the abdonees, the underwriters, thereby acquired all the rights of the assured, including their right to the price of the goods from the vendees.

The second point made by the defendant was, that the policy was limited to marine risks. What was in contemplation of the parties does not matter, though we do not doubt that the assured must have had the whole journey in view. We must see what the policy says. It seems to us that it very clearly, in words, includes the whole transit by land as well as by sea. The words are: "At and from Shanghai to Marseilles and London, via Marseilles." The slovenly mode of saying, "^{and} ^{or}" if the words were critically examined, might make a difficulty, though not on this question: but bearing in mind the course of carriage and transit found in the case, there can be no doubt that the voyage or journey described includes a land passage through France. No doubt many of the perils are sea perils exclusively; "perils of the seas" are named, but many are common to land and sea, as "fire" and "thieves." With respect to the argument that, as all risks of craft are mentioned, it follows that while inland there is no insurance, the answer is, that those words are necessary to cover the risk of the original embarkation and final landing which would not be included in the words "at and from," and "shall be arrived at." We see nothing to make us limit the plain words of the policy to the sea part of the transit.

There remains the question of whether there has been a loss from a peril within the policy. For, if so, it seems to us there was a right to abandon, there being a loss of the goods; the assured having lost all control over them for an indefinite time, which might extend to such a period as to cause at least a loss or failure of the particular adventure, and possibly a total loss of the goods, or more or less damage to them. In such a case the assured has a right to throw the risk on the underwriter; (Phillips on Insurance, p. 1620.)

Now, the facts found are, that the goods safely arrived at Paris; that on the 10th Sept. carriage by railway from Paris to Boulogne became, and till after the commencement of this suit continued, impossible, in consequence of the German armies having taken possession of parts of the railway and intercepted all communications thereby between Paris and Boulogne. This was the usual way in which such goods were sent from Marseilles, en route to London. It was not said that they could not have been sent to Havre or other ports, but we think this immaterial. For, supposing they could and ought to have been, but were not, supposing that in this the carriers were guilty of a breach of duty, that would not make the loss the less a loss to the assured. It is afterwards found that while the silks remained at Paris, on the 19th Sept. the German armies completely invested Paris, and that from that day until the commencement of the action they completely surrounded and besieged Paris, and held military possession of all roads leading out of Paris, and prevented communication between Paris and all other places, by reason whereof it was impossible to remove the silks from Paris. The result of this state of things undoubtedly was, that the goods were prevented from leaving Paris, and the whole adventure broken up, and so continued at the time when the notice of abandonment was given, and up to the commencement of the action.

THE MERLE.

[ADM.]

We are of opinion that this amounts to a constructive total loss of the goods by restraint of kings and princes, within the terms of the policy. This is not a mere temporary retardation of the voyage, but a breaking up of the whole adventure.

It is well established that there may be a loss of the goods by a loss of the voyage in which the goods are being transported, if it amounts, to use the words of Lord Ellenborough, "to a destruction of the contemplated adventure:" (Anderson v. Wallis, 2 M. & S. 240; Barker v. Blakes, 9 East, 283.)

But it is said that there has been no loss of the goods by restraint of kings and princes in this case, because there has been no specific action on the goods themselves. It is true that there was no actual seizure or arrest of the goods, nor was there any specific or public order prohibiting the transport of goods from the besieged city; but the city in which the goods were was besieged and completely invested, all commerce was stopped, and the goods were as effectually prevented from coming out as if they were actually seized by the German army. What we have to look at is whether, by the immediate and direct pressure of the German army, the goods were prevented from reaching their destination. A siege like the present, which was intended to reduce the besieged place by famine, is a prohibition of all commerce and intercourse with the besieged place. Neutrals would have no right to cross the German lines in order to bring out their goods, or for any other purpose that would or might in the least interfere with the military operations. In the case of a maritime blockade, neither the ships nor the goods on board of them within the port, and which are prevented from coming out, are seized or arrested, or in the actual possession of the blockading force; there is no specific action on the ships or goods beyond the prohibition against leaving the port. But surely they are "restrained" from coming out and the prosecution of the adventure is thereby effectually impeded. We quite agree with the opinion expressed on this subject by the Supreme Court of the United States, in Oliviera v. Union Insurance Company (3 Wheat. 183), and which was quoted before us, that the inhabitants of a besieged town, or the ships in a blockaded port, may be properly said to be "restrained" from coming out by the action of the besieged army or blockading force. A siege, where the place is completely surrounded and invested, is a stronger case than a mere maritime blockade. In the latter case, the land communications are unaffected, and the commerce by sea only is interdicted. But we are unable to draw any material or substantial distinction between the two, so far as they operate to prevent or restrain all intercourse or commerce, or the entry into or exit of any goods from the besieged or blockaded places. Grotius, Book 3, l. 5, places oppidum obsessum vel portus clausus, exactly on the same footing as regards the right of neutrals to hold commerce with the belligerents; and Lord Stowell's definition of a blockade is still more applicable to a siege like the siege of Paris than to a blockade merely maritime. "A blockade," he says, "is a sort of circumvallation round a place by which all foreign connection and correspondence is, as far as human force can effect it, to be entirely cut off. It is intended to suspend the entire commerce of that place, and a neutral is no more at liberty to assist the traffic of exportation than importation:" (The Vrow Judith, 1 C. Rob. 152.)

If, therefore, the effect of the siege of Paris was to cut off entirely all foreign connection and correspondence, we think that the goods in this case were restrained or prevented from leaving Paris by the operation of that siege. It appears to us that the words, "restraint and detentions of all kings, princes, and people of what nation, condition, or quality soever," are wider and more comprehensive words than those which precede them, and that they include and cover the case now under consideration. And, as a verbal matter, we may observe that "restraint" is a word more properly applicable to persons than to goods, so that a restraint of goods means a restraint of those having the custody of goods. We cannot help thinking that the doubt arises through the speedy arrival of these goods uninjured. Had they been perishable goods destroyed by the delay, it would be difficult to say their loss was not caused by restraint of princes.

For these reasons we are of opinion that the goods insured by the present policy were either restrained from leaving Paris, or were detained within Paris by the immediate and direct action of the German army, and were therefore so lost by one of the perils insured against, as to entitle the assured to abandon them to the underwriters and claim for a total loss. We think, therefore, that the judgment of the court below ought to be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

THE MERLE.

Collision—Damage to pier by ship—Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847—Liability of ship for inevitable accident—Rights of undertakers—Transfer by liquidator under Companies' Act 1862.

The owners of a pier, who are undertakers within the meaning of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847, acquire, under sect. 74 of that Act, a maritime lien in respect of any damage done to their pier by a ship, and may proceed in rem, to recover that damage in the High Court of Admiralty, and the shipowners are debarred by sect. 74, from setting up the defence of inevitable accident.

Dennis v. Tovell (27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 482; L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 10) followed. (c)

(a) COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.

Nov. 13, 1872.

DENNIS (app.) v. TOVELL (resp.) This was a case stated by the Justices of Suffolk under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43. A complaint was preferred before the magistrates against the appellant by the respondent under sects. 74 and 75 of 10 Vict. c. 27 charging that the appellant was owner of a certain vessel called the Ava, which said vessel on the 27th Sept., 1871 did damage to the pier and works of the Harwich

[ADM.]

THE MERLE.

[ADM.]

Where a limited company, duly constituted by provisional order made under the General Piers and Harbours Act 1861 and 1862, as the undertakers of a pier, within the meaning of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847, is voluntarily wound-up, and its property sold by the liquidator, a purchaser of the pier has transferred to him both the property and the rights of the original undertaker, becomes the undertaker, within the meaning of the last-mentioned Act, and can recover against a ship for damage done to his pier by that ship, although such damage be the result of inevitable accident.

This was a cause of damage, instituted on behalf of David Laidlaw and Robert Laidlaw, of London, engineers and ironfounders, owners of the Deal Pier, in the county of Kent, against the barque

Harbour Conservancy Board to the amount of 50*l.* by striking violently against the pier and works and breaking parts of the same, the vessel not being under the charge of a licensed pilot.

Upon the hearing of the complaint it was proved on the part of the respondent that the appellant's vessel did the damage alleged, that the vessel was not in charge of a licensed pilot; and on the part of the appellant it was proved that the damage was the result of inevitable accident caused by stress of weather, and did not arise from any wilful act or negligence of the master or other persons in the said vessel; it was contended, therefore, on the part of the appellant that he was not liable to pay to the said Harwich Harbour Conservancy Board the amount claimed for the damage so done.

The justices were of opinion that the appellant became liable under sect. 74 of the above Act to pay the amount of damage, whether the damage was the result of inevitable or unavoidable accident or otherwise, and ordered the appellant to pay the 50*l.* accordingly, subject to the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench upon this case.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the damage to the pier and works being the result of an inevitable accident, caused by stress of weather, and not arising from any wilful act or negligence of the master or other persons in the vessel, the appellant became liable to pay the amount claimed for the damage done.

Grantham for the appellant.—No doubt the first part of sect. 74 is sufficiently general to cover cases of inevitable accident, but it could not have been the intention of the Legislature to make owners liable for inevitable accident. This is indicated by the second part of the section showing the real intention was only to make liability follow upon negligence, because it makes those in charge liable if the damage occur through their "wilful act or negligence." [COCKBURN, C.J.—It may seem strange, but the Legislature has said that the owner of the ship shall be liable for the accident, however occurring. It may have been supposed that such a case would seldom occur.] The proviso of the section strengthens my contention; if the owner is not liable when he has a pilot on board, why should he be liable in all other cases, even for the act of God?

Philbrick (H. Tindal Atkinson with him), for the respondents, was not called upon.

BLACKBURN, J.—The Chief Justice, who has just left the court, has already intimated his opinion, and he agrees with us that it is clear that the Legislature, whether intentionally or not, has said that the owner of any vessel shall be answerable for any damage done by his vessel to a dock, harbour, or pier. The Legislature has put the owner in the same position as a man who keeps a dangerous animal, who must do so at his peril and be answerable for any injury the animal may do. It enacts simply that the owner shall be liable for any damage the vessel may occasion, whether caused by negligence or wilful neglect, or by inevitable accident from stress of weather. It appears to me that the Legislature has clearly said so, whether it intended it or not.

QUAIN, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Merle, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and the freight due for the transportation of the cargo now or lately laden therein, and against the owners of the Merle, defendants intervening.

The plaintiff's petition was as follows:—

1. At the time of the happening of the collision herein-after stated, the plaintiff's were possessed of a certain pier at Deal, in the county of Kent, called or known as Deal Pier, and of certain works connected therewith, and were at such time the undertakers of the said pier within the true intent and meaning of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847, and sect. 74 of that Act.

2. About between 3 a.m. and 4 a.m. on the 19th Jan. 1873, the above-named vessel Merle came into collision with and did damage to the said pier, and the works connected therewith, to an amount far exceeding the sum of 50*l.* The Merle was not at such time in charge of a duly licensed pilot, whom her master or owner was bound to employ or put her in charge of.

3. By virtue of the provisions of sect. 74 of the said Act, the owners of the Merle are answerable to the plaintiffs for the said damage done to the said pier and works by the Merle.

4. Before, and at the time of the said collision, a light was burning on the head of the said pier, and the plaintiffs allege that the said collision and damage were occasioned by some neglect or default on the part of the defendants, or on the part of those on board and in charge of the Merle, in not sending her to sea in a proper and manageable condition, or in not supplying her with proper ground tackle, or in not taking proper measures and exercising proper care and skill with regard to tending her, bringing her up, sailing her, and managing her so as to keep her clear of the said pier.

The defendants in their answer pleaded that the Merle, whilst on a voyage from London to the West Indies, cast anchor in the Downs; that the weather becoming worse, she bore up for Dungeness to obtain shelter; that whilst anchored off Dungeness, she parted from her cables, and was compelled to run for the Downs, before a hurricane from the S.W. by W.; when off Deal her master again cast anchor, but by reason of the violence of the weather the chain again parted, and the barque was driven ashore to windward of the pier, and then became unmanageable, drifted along the beach, and was forced between the columns of the pier. The answer then continued as follows:

5. Those on board the Merle took proper measures and exercised proper care and skill with regard to tending the Merle, and bringing her up and sailing her and managing her; and everything was done that could be done by them to avoid the said disaster, and to keep the vessel clear of the said pier and to prevent damage to the same.

6. The damage complained of was not occasioned by any negligence on the part of the defendants, or those on board the Merle, but was, so far as they were concerned, the result of inevitable accident.

7. The defendants deny that the plaintiffs were possessed of the said pier at Deal and of the works connected therewith, and that they were at such times the undertakers of the said pier as alleged; and the defendants further deny the several allegations in the said petition, save such as are admitted by this answer.

8. The defendants further say that they are not answerable to the plaintiffs for the said damage, as alleged in the third article of the said petition; and that the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847, does not confer any right upon the plaintiffs to proceed in rem against the Merle, and does not confer any right upon the plaintiffs to proceed in this suit for damage resulting from inevitable accident.

The pleadings were thereupon concluded.

At the hearing, evidence was called by plaintiff to establish negligence on the part of the defendants; but the learned judge, assisted by two Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, ruled that the collision with the pier was occasioned by the Merle becoming unmanageable through stress of weather and the result of inevitable accident.

THE MERLE.

Thereupon the following facts were proved by the plaintiffs, or admitted by the defendants:

The Deal Pier had been constructed under a provisional order of the Board of Trade, made in pursuance of the General Piers and Harbours Act 1861 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 57). The provisional order authorising the formation of the pier is the second order set out in the schedule to the latter Act. The pier was duly constructed under the provisional order by the promoters named therein, the Deal and Walmer Pier Company (Limited), who were registered as a company in 1861, and was worked by them until the 11th May 1866, when the company, by resolution of the shareholders, went into liquidation and was voluntarily wound-up by a liquidator duly appointed under the Companies' Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89). The pier, and all the property and goods appertaining thereto, were sold at public auction by the liquidator, by virtue of the powers given by the last-mentioned Act, and were purchased by and duly transferred to the plaintiffs by deed, dated the 23rd Aug. 1866, and made between the liquidator of the first part, the company of the second part, and the plaintiffs of the third part; and the pier and works thereof became the property of the plaintiffs, in whose possession and under whose management they were at the time of the damage done. Except the provisional order above mentioned, no provisional order or Act of Parliament authorising the plaintiffs to become promoters or undertakers of the pier had been obtained, and their title to the pier was entirely derived from the sale to them by the liquidator of the company.

On these points two questions were raised; first, whether the Harbour, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 27), gives undertakers of a pier the right to recover for damages done to their pier by collision resulting from inevitable accident; secondly, whether the plaintiffs were undertakers within the meaning of that Act.

By the Harbour, Piers, and Docks Clauses Act 1847, it is enacted that

2. The expression "the special Act," used in this Act, shall be construed to mean any Act which shall hereafter be passed authorising the construction or improving of an harbour, dock, or pier, and with which this Act shall be incorporated; . . . and the expression, "the undertakers" shall mean the persons by the special Act authorised to construct the harbour, dock, or pier, or otherwise carry into effect the purposes of the special Act with reference thereto.

74. The owner of every vessel or float of timber shall be answerable to the undertakers for any damage done by such vessel or float of timber, or by any person employed about the same, to the harbour, dock, or pier, or the quays or works connected therewith, and the master or person having the charge of such vessel or float of timber through whose wilful act or negligence any such damage is done, shall also be liable to make good the same; and the undertaker may detain any such vessel or float of timber until sufficient security has been given for the amount of damage done by the same. Provided always, that nothing herein contained shall extend to impose any liability for any such damage upon the owner of any vessel where such vessel shall, at the time when such damage is caused be in charge of a duly licensed pilot, whom such owner or master is bound by law to employ and put his vessel in charge of.

By the General Piers and Harbours Act 1861, it is enacted that

Whereas it is expedient to encourage and facilitate the formation, management, and maintenance of piers and harbours in Great Britain and Ireland; and whereas, in certain cases where it is now necessary to Parliament for special local Acts, the expense of obtaining such special Acts serves to prevent many necessary works being undertaken; be it enacted, &c.

3. Persons desirous of obtaining authority to construct any works under this Act, or to levy rates at any existing or at any new works, may make application by memorial to the Board of Trade to grant provisional orders as hereinafter mentioned.

15. After such inquiries as the Board of Trade may think expedient, and after the consent of the Admiralty, &c., shall have been obtained, and the same shall have been certified to the Board of Trade in such manner as they may require, the Board of Trade may settle and make a provisional order; and every such order shall be made and take effect subject and according to the following provisions: It shall specify who are to be the undertakers of the works. . . . It may incorporate by reference The Commissioners Clauses Act 1847, The Companies Clauses Act 1845, The Companies Clauses (Scotland) Act 1845, The Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847, The Lands Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, The Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act 1845, or any part of such Acts, except so much of the said two last-mentioned Acts as relates to the purchase of land otherwise than by agreement; the expression "the special Act" used in such incorporated Acts, shall be deemed to apply to such provisional order.

16. After the making of any order under this Act the promoters shall deposit a copy of the same at the office of the clerk of the peace of any county, riding, or division in England or Ireland, or in the office of the principal sheriff clerk of any county, district, or division in Scotland in which the proposed works referred to in such order are situate; and notice of such deposit shall be given by advertisement once in the London, Edinburgh, or Dublin Gazette, and in some newspaper circulated in the county as aforesaid; and after it shall have been certified to the Board of Trade by the promoters that such deposit and advertisement as last aforesaid have been made, and that fourteen days have elapsed from the date of such advertisement, the Board of Trade shall, within three calendar months from the beginning of the session of Parliament in any year, cause a Bill to be introduced into either House of Parliament for the purpose of obtaining an Act for the confirmation of such order, and the order to be confirmed shall be specified in a schedule to the Bill introduced for confirming the same, and shall be set out at length therein, and until such confirmation, no provisional order shall be of any validity or force whatever; and every Act of Parliament confirming such order shall be deemed a Public General Act.

By the General Pier and Harbour Act 1861 Amendment Act (25 Vict. c. 19), certain other provisions as to advertisement are enacted, and it is further provided that

19. Subject to the provisions of the Principal Act, and this Act and any provisional order, the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 shall be deemed to be incorporated with every provisional order.

By the provisional order relating to Deal Pier, set out in the schedule to the Piers and Harbours Confirmation Act 1862, and by that Act confirmed, it is provided:

1. The Deal and Walmer Pier Company (Limited), hereinafter called the Company, shall be the undertakers of the works authorised by this order.

Milward, Q.C. and E. C. Clarkson, for the plaintiffs.—First, even though the collision was an inevitable accident, the defendants are liable therefor. By the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847, the owners of vessels are liable to make good to the undertakers of a pier any damage done by their vessel, even if it be occasioned by an inevitable accident. This has been decided by a court of common law, and is binding upon this court:

I must rule in accordance with them, unless the defendants can distinguish them in any way.]

Secondly, the plaintiffs are "undertakers," within the meaning of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847. The Deal and Walmer Pier Company having been duly constituted an undertaking by the provisional order made under the General Pier and Harbour Act 1861, and under the confirming Act of 1862, and having duly made their pier under the powers conferred upon them, were capable of transferring their property and rights in the pier to other persons. This was effected by the official liquidator, acting under the Companies' Act 1862. The liquidator is empowered by that Act (sect. 95) to transfer to the purchaser all the real and personal, and hereditary and movable property, effects, and things in action of the company. This has been done, and the transfer must be taken to carry with it all rights of the company. The words, "things in action," alone show that not merely the rights existing at the time of the transfer, but also those which will come into operation at a future time, pass with the property. Among these rights are the privileges of undertakers, and we submit that with the transfer of the property the rights of undertakers to recover against a ship doing damage to their property, without any exemption in the case of inevitable accident, are transferred.

Butt, Q.C. and Gainsford Bruce, for the defendants.—Assuming that the defendants would be personally liable, upon the authorities cited, to the undertakers of this pier, two questions arise in the case; first, whether the plaintiffs are undertakers within the meaning of the Harbours, Piers, and Docks Clauses Act 1847, and the subsequent Acts; secondly, whether those Acts apply so as to render the ship liable in this court, this being a proceeding in rem, the damage having been found to be the result of inevitable accident.

First, are the plaintiffs undertakers? The Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847, defines the persons who are or may be undertakers, and the special Act and the provisional order therein appoint the Deal and Walmer Pier Company (Limited), as the undertakers to make this pier. The transfer took place in 1866, and although the plaintiffs would acquire any rights of action then existing, they cannot be said to have become possessed of a right which has arisen since, and which belongs only to undertakers, unless by the transfer they have become undertakers. This cause of action did not arise until after the transfer. We submit that the plaintiffs are not undertakers, within the meaning of the Act, and cannot recover without showing negligence on the part of the defendants. The only persons appointed undertakers by the provisional order, are the company; even the words, "or their assigns," are not inserted. It is unreasonable to suppose that by parting with their property the company are able to transfer the exceptional rights which they themselves possess. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Suppose the original undertakers die? Do their rights as undertakers die with them, or do their successors take them?] That question cannot arise in the case of a corporation which need not be dissolved; it might very well be arranged that the shares only should be transferred. If it is dissolved, and the grant of the Board of Trade is to it alone, then no person or persons remain who can be called undertakers. The purchasers of the undertaking do not become undertakers. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The joint operation of the General Piers and Harbours Act 1861, and the Companies' Act 1862, enables the original undertakers to part with their property to purchasers, but do the purchasers in taking the property parted with take also all the rights of the original undertakers?] We submit that the purchasers take none of the rights of the original undertakers, quod undertakers, but only such rights as belonged to them in their ordinary capacity as owners of property. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—By the Companies' Act 1862, sect. 95, the liquidator may sell all a company's property, and "things in action." What is the meaning of "things in action," as there used? Does it not indicate that all rights of action are transferred by the sale?] We submit that it passes only the rights of action existing at the time of the transfer, not rights of action which accrue thereafter; the latter rights must be founded upon something possessed by the holders of the property themselves. The term "undertakers," only includes such persons as are expressly authorised, by the words of their Act or provisional order, to construct or maintain a pier or harbour: (see the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847, sect. 2; the General Piers and Harbour Act 1861, sect. 15; and the General Pier and Harbour Act Amendment Act 1862, sect. 19.) The power to construct or maintain a pier is given under those Acts by the Board of Trade, in the first instance, and by Parliament confirming the act of the Board of Trade; without that confirmation the order of the Board of Trade would be of no effect. The Board of Trade have to exercise a judgment in the matter, and to determine whether it is a proper thing that a pier should be constructed, and whether the promoters of the scheme are proper persons to be undertakers. No doubt undertakers may part with their property, and if they form a company and are wound-up, they will part with it under the Companies Act 1862, but this will not create the purchasers undertakers. The purchasers are not authorised by the Board of Trade to construct or maintain the pier; their qualifications have never been submitted to the Board of Trade. We contend that before the plaintiffs can become "undertakers," they must apply to the Board of Trade for a provisional order, authorising them to maintain this pier, and this order, when obtained, must be confirmed by Parliament. Under the Piers and Harbours Acts of 1861 and 1862, the Board of Trade must necessarily inquire into the persons who are to be undertakers, and the right of petition against confirmation of the order is expressly preserved by the 17th section of the former Act. In The North-Eastern Railway Company v. The Leadgate Local Board (L. Rep. 5 Q.B. 157), a railway, originally constructed without Parliamentary powers, and afterwards sold to a railway company under an Act of Parliament, and enlarged and used for traffic under the provisions of that Act, was rated to a general district rate under the Local Government Act 1858, and the railway company objected to be rated on the ground that the railway, must be considered as "a railway constructed within the powers of an Act of Parliament for public conveyance," within the meaning of sect. 55 of the latter Act, and, consequently, rateable only at one-fourth the annual value; the Court of Queen's Bench, however, held that although the Legislature might have provided for such a case, if it had been brought before it, the words of the Act did not exempt the railway; it could not be said to have been "constructed" under any Act of Parliament. So in this case, the plaintiffs cannot be said to be "persons by the special Act (provisional order), authorised to construct" this pier. They have derived no authority from the provisional order, and are, consequently, not undertakers. Undertakers are, by the Act of 1847, entitled to make bye-laws and to enforce them before magistrates: (sects. 83, et seq.) We submit that the plaintiffs could not make byelaws which would be enforceable by magistrates, and are, consequently, not undertakers.

THE MERLE.

Secondly, a ship cannot be made liable in this court in a proceeding in rem, if it is proved that the damage done was the result of inevitable accident. The Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act gives in strictness no right of action at all, except the right of recovery before magistrates; it is not intended to give the right of proceeding in rem in this court. That depends upon the 7th and 35th sections of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, and if that right is exercised, it can only be exercised subject to the rules of law prevalent in this court, and by those rules proof of inevitable accident entitles a ship to dismissal from the suit. An action in rem only lies for a collision where there has been a maritime tort creating a maritime lien. The Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses, Act, sect. 74, cannot be said to create such a maritime tort. [Sir R. PHILLMORE.—Has not the Legislature enacted that such an act as this shall be treated as a tort?] Not as a maritime tort creating a lien. If this had been a suit in personam, other considerations might arise, but in a suit in rem, there can be no liability, unless the ship itself is liable, and that is not the case where the defence of inevitable accident is established.

Milward, Q.C., in reply.—In the case of The North-Eastern Railway Company v. The Leadgate Local Board (ubi sup.), it was contended that the words, "used as a railway constructed under the powers of an Act of Parliament," could be construed so as to mean "used under an Act of Parliament," only without having been so constructed, but the court held that they must give effect to the word "constructed." In this case, however, there is a great difference; there is good reason for this special right being given to any person or persons who shall undertake to construct or maintain a pier; it is for the public benefit that such piers should be erected on dangerous shores. [Sir R. PHILLMORE.—But the argument is, that the Act meant to give the privilege only after the Board of Trade had had the opportunity of examining the qualifications of the persons promoting the undertaking.] In such a case as this it would not be possible for the Board of Trade to get the plaintiffs before them; no order to construct a thing already constructed could be made. The Deal and Walmer Pier Company (Limited) are the only undertakers named in this order; but suppose a number of individuals had been named, and they were to die without assigning their rights, would the undertaking and the rights under it come to an end? If such were the case, there would be no power to take tolls or even to block up the foreshore with the pier, if its removal were demanded. The pier might be treated as an abandoned undertaking, under sect. 8 of the Piers and Harbours Act 1861, Amendment Act 1862, and be removed by the Lords of the Admiralty. Such a result would be absolutely unreasonable, and would stultify the provisional order.

Secondly, as to this being a proceeding in rem. The 74th section of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847, gives the undertakers a lien for damage done to their works, and they may detain a ship till security is given. Clearly the right court to enforce such a lien is this court, which by the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), sect. 7, has "jurisdiction over any claim for damage done by any ship." And by sect. 35, this jurisdiction may be exercised in rem.

Sir R. PHILLMORE.—In this case there are two questions before the court: first, whether the present plaintiffs, supposing them to be entitled to proceed as undertakers can recover the damages sustained by their property, although caused by an inevitable accident; secondly, whether the plaintiffs, if the defendant's vessel is so liable under the Act, represent the undertakers within the meaning of the Acts which have been cited to-day, so as to acquire undertakers' rights and privileges. Arising in connection with the first point there was a third contention, that even if the plaintiffs could recover at common law, this is a proceeding in rem, and the words of the statute do not apply to a proceeding of that nature.

The first statute referred to was the Harbours, Docks and Piers Clauses Act 1847 (10 Vict. c. 27), and the 74th section of that Act is as follows: "The owner of every vessel or float of timber shall be answerable to the undertakers for any damage done by such vessel, &c." [His Lordship read the whole of the section, as given above.] The next statute referred to was the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 45, entitled, "An Act to facilitate the formation, management, and maintenance of Piers and Harbours in Great Britain and Ireland;" and that Act recites that "whereas, it is expedient to encourage and facilitate the formation, management, and maintenance of piers and harbours in Great Britain and Ireland; and whereas, in certain cases where it is now necessary to apply to Parliament for special local Acts, the expense of obtaining such special Acts serves to prevent many necessary works being undertaken;" and then enacts a number of clauses, the substance of these new provisions being that the Board of Trade shall have power to make orders which, after approval by statute, shall be binding in law.

Now, before I consider the effect of this latter statute, I must deal with the first question, viz., whether the original undertakers had a right of action against a vessel injuring their property, although that injury might have been found to be the result of inevitable accident. The words of the Act itself seem to be quite plain, and make a vessel liable under such circumstances. Moreover, there are two decided cases to which I have already referred during the argument; one is Dennis v. Tovell (27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 482; L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 10), in which the Lord Chief Justice and Blackburn and Quain, J.J., concurred, saying that the Legislature, whether intentionally or not, has made the owners of ships liable for all damage, whether caused by stress of weather or otherwise. The same doctrine seems to have been laid down in another similar case following the previous decision, River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 520; 2 Asp. Mar.

Adm.]

THE MERLE.

Law Cas. 145). The effect of these decisions is to make a ship injuring a pier or harbour, within the meaning of the Act under consideration, liable to make good all such injury. In a recent case I laid down that it is the duty of this court to follow the decisions of the courts of common law on the construction of a statute. I therefore pronounce that, according to the construction of this section, so far as I am compelled to put a construction upon it, it does mean that the vessel is liable to the undertakers for the damage which by inevitable accident she has inflicted.

Now, the second question arises out of the contention that the plaintiffs are not undertakers within the meaning of the Acts of 1847 and 1861, and the question whether the plaintiff has or has not succeeded to the right of the original undertakers, depends upon the construction to be put upon that Act, and subsequent statutes establishing and regulating the undertakings.

I should state here that the original company has been dissolved—it was admitted by the defendants—and that the property has, subject to the construction to be put upon these Acts, devolved upon the plaintiffs.

It has been contended that the right of recovery in cases of inevitable accident vests only in original undertakers, or in such persons as have duly obtained a second order of the Board of Trade, duly confirmed by statute.

The next statute to which I must refer is the Companies Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 89), sect. 95, by which it is enacted that the official liquidator, in the case of a company being wound-up in court, shall have power, by the sanction of the Court of Chancery, to do the following things; “to sell the real and personal property and hereditary and movable property, effects, and things in action of the company, by public auction or private contract, with power to transfer the whole thereof to any person or company, or to sell the same in parcels.” In the present case these powers have been exercised by a voluntary liquidator winding-up the original company out of court, and that case is provided for by sect. 133 of the Companies’ Act, which provides that, among the consequences ensuing upon the voluntary winding-up of the company, “the liquidators may, without the sanction of the court, exercise all the powers by this Act given to the official liquidator.”

Now the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 51 has been referred to to show that the persons who originally undertook the erection of this pier had proceeded regularly, and had had conferred upon them all the rights of undertakers under the Harbours, Docks, and Piers’ Clauses Act 1847. That was an Act to confirm certain provisional orders made under the Act of 1861, and it provides that the provisional orders in the schedule thereto should be confirmed. The second of the provisional orders set out in the schedule relate to the construction and maintenance and regulation of a pier at Deal by the Deal and Walmer Pier Company. Now there is no doubt at all that upon the construction of the various statutes, and upon the facts admitted before me to-day, the present plaintiffs are, under and by reason of the transfer effected by the liquidator of that company, in possession of all the property effects and choses in action of the Deal and Walmer Pier Company, and consequently of the pier damaged by the defendant’s ship; but it is said that, as they are not the original undertakers, and as they have not obtained from the Board of Trade a provisional order confirming them in their possession, and establishing them as the actual undertakers, they must be considered as proprietors of the property and choses in action of the pier company, without being clothed with the rights of undertakers, and that, consequently, they cannot claim the right of recovery in this case against the owner of a vessel damaging the pier, under sect. 74 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847.

The construction of these Acts is by no means easy, and I have had considerable difficulty in coming to a decision upon them, but I have arrived at a conclusion in which I am justified by the consideration of the preamble of the General Piers and Harbours Act 1861, which I have before quoted. I consider that it must have been the intention of the Legislature that the privileges of the original undertakers, have been, by the act of transfer of the liquidator before described, conferred upon the present plaintiffs, and that they have in consequence the same right as the original undertakers to proceed against a ship doing injury to their property under the 74th section of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847. There remains one other point to be considered.

It is said, however, that the original underwriters would have had no right to institute a suit in rem in this court, and at the same time seek to avail themselves in such a suit of the provisions of this section. The material words of the section are, that “the owner of every vessel, &c., shall be answerable to the undertakers for any damage done by such vessel, &c. . . . and the undertakers may detain any such vessel, &c. . . . until sufficient security has been given for the amount of damage done by the same.” Now it is said, as I understand Mr. Butt’s argument, that no maritime tort has been committed in this case, and that there is no lien upon the vessel for the damage done, because the collision, having been found to be the result of inevitable accident, no lien attaches, according to the rule of this court; the reason for this rule being that a lien is only consequent upon some wrongful act done by the shipowner or his servants. It was further contended that, even if a lien was created by the words of the statute, it was not a maritime lien, and would not travel with the transfer of the property to the plaintiffs. This objection has been partly answered by what I have already observed, but I must express my opinion, however, that the section does place such damage as this, even where resulting from inevitable accident, in the category of damage giving a maritime lien upon the ship inflicting it; and more especially I say so when I read the words by which it is provided that the undertakers shall have the security of the ship, and may detain it for the payment of the damage.

I have arrived at the conclusion that all the objections of the defendants have failed, and I must pronounce that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover.

THE C. S. BUTLER.

Collision—Lights—"Ship"—Trinity House lighter—Vessel employed exclusively in river navigation, propelled by sails and oars—Regulations for preventing collisions at sea—Thames Conservancy byelaws.

A Trinity House lighter, which is a vessel propelled by sails as well as oars, but is exclusively employed in the navigation of the river Thames and never goes to sea, is not a "ship" within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Acts, and is not bound to carry, when under weigh in the Thames, the light prescribed by the Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea to be carried by all sailing vessels; and, as the existing byelaws made under the Thames Conservancy Acts 1857 and 1864 (20 & 21 Vict. c. cxlvii; 27 & 28 Vict. c. 113), contain no provision as to the lights to be carried by sailing vessels navigating the Thames. Trinity House lighters are under no obligation to carry lights when under weigh in that river.(a)

THIS was an appeal from a decree of the City of London Court (Admiralty Jurisdiction) in a cause of collision instituted on behalf of the Corporation of the Trinity House of Deptford Strond, the owners of the barge or lighter No. 34, against the owners of the steamship C. S. Butler. The cause was dismissed by the City of London Court with costs, and from this decree the Corporation of the Trinity House appealed.

The ground of the judgment in the court below was that the Trinity House Lighter did not, at the time of the collision, carry a light. No shorthand writer was employed in the court below, and the

(a) The consequence of this decision has been that the Thames Conservancy Board have made bye-laws providing that all vessels navigating the river Thames, whether propelled by sails or oars only, shall exhibit lights between sunset and sunrise.

[There were only two questions in the case. First, whether the barge was a "ship" within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Acts; secondly, whether there was any Conservancy rules requiring her to carry lights. These being the only questions, it is, perhaps, to be regretted that the learned judge thought it necessary to express an opinion as to the extent of the jurisdiction of the Conservancy Board. To hold that the Conservancy Board have no jurisdiction to regulate the navigation of the Thames, so far as seagoing vessels are concerned, if their rules conflict with the regulations for preventing collisions at sea, is to rule that no regulations made by harbour or river authorities are binding upon seagoing vessels unless they are in conformity with the regulations for preventing collisions at sea. Yet it is expressly provided by the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, sects. 31 and 32, that rules properly made by harbour authorities shall be binding "notwithstanding anything in this Act, or in the schedule thereto contained." If this ruling is to be given its full effect, it may have the effect of declaring that a rule which has now been in existence for many years in the river Mersey is not binding—namely, the rule which requires every vessel at anchor to carry two anchor lights. It is true that this rule is made under the Merchant Shipping Act by Her Majesty in Council; but so are the Thames Conservancy rules. The effect of having these rules approved by the same authority as that which makes the general rules is to take away the difficulty as to conflict of jurisdictions. If the Board of Trade, as Her Majesty's Privy Council, see fit to approve a rule for inland navigation different from that which prevails at sea, there is probably some good reason for the difference, and the attempt to reconcile the two sets of rules is scarcely necessary. The dictum of the learned judge in the present case is more likely to encourage litigation than put a final end to all doubt on the matter, more especially as the new Conservancy rules as to lights expressly cover all vessels.—ED.]

case, therefore, came before the Court of Appeal without any notes of the evidence or judgment. The appellants applied to the High Court of Admiralty to decide, as a preliminary question, the question of law as to the obligation of Trinity House lighters to carry lights, and for that purpose to hear sufficient evidence to lay the necessary facts before it. The respondents objected to any evidence being heard by the Court of Appeal, on the ground that an appeal is not a rehearing, but should be heard only on the facts, and evidence produced in the court below, and that the appellants, having neglected to employ a shorthand writer, under the 32nd Rule of the County Court General Orders for Admiralty Practice, they were precluded from producing any evidence on the appeal. The court, however, ruled that it had power to hear evidence so as to bring the facts before it, but that it would only hear such witnesses as had been produced in the court below. Thereupon the following facts were admitted or were proved by a witness called by the plaintiff:

The collision occurred at about 4.30 a.m. on the 27th Jan. 1874, in Galleons Reach, near Woolwich, in the river Thames. The lighter No. 34 was coming up the river, and the steamer was going down. This lighter (like all the other Trinity House lighters) is a barge with a fixed mast and fore and aft sails, employed exclusively in carrying ballast up and down the Thames, and never going below Gravesend; she is propelled by sails, and is regularly worked like a sailing vessel of similar rig when there is sufficient wind; when there is no wind she is worked by means of oars or sweeps. At the time of the collision she was under sail. She had no lights burning at the time of collision, nor do the Trinity House lighters ever carry lights whilst under weigh.

It was admitted by the appellants that if these lighters were bound to carry lights under weigh, they were to blame for the collision.

Butt, Q.C. and Dixon, for the appellants.—The question for the consideration of the court is, whether these lighters are within any regulations as to lights; if they are not bound to carry lights by any regulation, the view of the Trinity House is that they are not entitled to do so. First, do the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea apply? The only rule, if any, applicable is Art. 5, which provides that sailing ships under weigh, or being towed, shall carry the same lights as steamships under weigh, except the white mast-head light. But we submit that a Trinity House lighter is not a sailing ship within the meaning of that rule, which applies only to seagoing ships. By the 2nd section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), the term "ship," in construing that Act, is defined to "include every description of vessel used in navigation not propelled by oars." The Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63) is to be construed with and as part of the former Act (sect. 1), and, consequently, any regulations made under the second Act, and affecting "ships," only affect such vessels as are "ships" within the meaning of the Act of 1854. The Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea are in force by the virtue of sect. 25 of the Act of 1862, and the Order in Council of the 9th Jan. 1863, and these Regulations themselves show that they are intended to apply only to seagoing vessels—they are headed as "Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea." The

THE C. S. BUTLER.

3rd article of these regulations applies expressly only to seagoing steamships; and, moreover, the power which is given by sect. 30 of the Act to enforce these regulations, clearly points to a vessel proceeding to sea. (a) It has been held that a "ship" within the meaning of those Acts is a vessel whose habitual business is to go to sea: (Ex parte Ferguson and Hutchinson, 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 96; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 200; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 8.) Moreover, we submit that these regulations apply only to vessels when at sea, and not even to seagoing vessels when navigating rivers or harbours; they are not binding in rivers. This is shown, not only by the regulations themselves, but also by the 31st and 32nd sections of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, which provide for the making of rules for harbours, rivers, and inland navigations. (b) If the schedule rules were intended to be binding in rivers, there would be no necessity for these two sections. Consequently we say that these regulations do not apply, and that there is no obligation under them upon a Trinity House lighter to carry lights when under weigh.

Secondly,—Are there any other regulations binding upon these lighters, and are they bound, under these regulations, to carry lights? There are regulations made to govern the navigation of the Thames, within the meaning of sects. 31 and 32

(a) The Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, sect. 30. The following steps may be taken in order to enforce compliance with the said Regulations, that is to say:—

(1.) The surveyors appointed under the third part of the principal Act, or such other persons as the Board of Trade may appoint for the purpose, may inspect any ships, for the purpose of seeing that such ships are properly provided with lights, &c.

(2.) If any such surveyor or person finds that any ship is not so provided, he shall give to the master or owner, notice in writing, pointing out the deficiency, and also what is, in his opinion, requisite in order to remedy the same.

(3.) Every notice so given shall be communicated in such manner as the Board of Trade may direct to the collector or collectors of Customs at any port or ports from which such ship may seek to clear, or at which her transire is to be obtained; and no collector to whom such communication is made, shall clear such ship outwards or grant her a transire or allow her to proceed to sea, without a certificate under the hand of one of the said surveyors or other persons appointed by the Board of Trade as aforesaid, to the effect that the said ship is properly provided with lights, &c.

(b) Sect. 31.—Any rules concerning the lights and signals to be carried by vessels navigating the waters of any harbour, river, or other inland navigation, or concerning the steps for avoiding collision to be taken by such vessels, which have been or are hereafter made by or under the authority of any local Act, shall continue and be of full force and effect, notwithstanding anything in this Act or in the schedule thereto contained.

Sect. 32.—In the case of any harbour, river, or other inland navigation for which such rules are not and cannot be made by or under the authority of any local Act, it shall be lawful for Her Majesty in Council, upon application from the harbour trust or body corporate, if any, owning or exercising jurisdiction upon the waters of such harbour, river, or inland navigation; or, if there be no such harbour, trust, or body corporate, upon application from persons interested in the navigation of such waters, to make rules concerning the lights or signals to be carried, and concerning the steps for avoiding collision to be taken by vessels navigating such waters; and such rules, when so made, shall, so far as regards vessels navigating such waters, have the same effect as if they were regulations contained in Table (C) in the schedule to this Act, notwithstanding anything in this Act, or in the schedule thereto contained.

of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862; the Thames Conservancy have the control of the navigation of the Thames, and they have made, under their local Acts (The Thames Conservancy Acts 1857 and 1864, 20 & 21 Vict. c. cxlvii. and 27 & 28 Vict. c. 113), byelaws concerning the lights to be carried by vessels navigating the Thames. These byelaws are entitled "Rules and Byelaws for the Regulation of the Navigation of the River Thames," and were approved in accordance with sect. 31 of the Thames Conservancy Act 1864, by an Order in Council dated the 5th Feb. 1872. These byelaws differ in essential points from the Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea; as, for instance, the masthead light to be carried by a steamship under weigh, and only be visible for one mile, according to the Conservancy Byelaws, whilst by the Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea it should be visible for five miles. It could not be contended that a vessel would be to blame for carrying in the Thames a masthead light shining only one mile, and if a vessel could not be so condemned, it is clear that, in matters relating to the navigation of the Thames, the Conservancy Byelaws do, and the Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea do not, apply. If, then, there were any rule of the Thames Conservancy, requiring a sailing vessel or lighter, such as this, to carry lights, it would be binding upon us, but there is no such rule among the byelaws. There being no such rule, it would be wrong for Trinity House lighters to carry any lights, as it would only tend to create confusion.

E. O. Clarkson, for the respondent.—The Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea, made under the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 were intended to be substituted for the rules contained in the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104). The rules in the latter Act undoubtedly applied to inland navigation, as was shown in The Velocity (21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 686; L. Rep. 3 P. C. 44; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 308). If the present regulations were substituted for the former ones, it is reasonable to suppose that the Legislature intended the present regulations to apply equally to inland navigation. Again, there can be no doubt that, before making these Conservancy rules, the regulations under the Merchant Shipping Acts were held to apply to all vessels navigating the Thames. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE—The tacitly received construction of those Acts must have been that they applied only to seagoing vessels, and not to vessels wholly navigating within the river. The conflict between the Regulations and the Conservancy Byelaws might be avoided if it were held that the latter rules applied only to vessels wholly navigating within the river.] Up to the time of the passing of the Conservancy rules, all vessels above Yantlett Creek were governed by the regulations in respect of the lights they were to carry. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE—The Conservancy Byelaws (Arts. 29 and 32) apply steering and sailing rules, and rules as to lights for steam vessels, to vessels "navigating the river Thames." Must not these be applied to vessels never moving out of the Thames? No doubt, but coupled with the general regulations; and if it happens that the Conservancy Rules do not provide for any particular case, the general regulations must be taken to be binding in that case.

THE C. S. BUTLER.

Secondly, is this lighter a "ship" within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Acts, and as such bound to carry lights. A ship is defined by these Acts (Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 2) to "include every description of vessel used in navigation not propelled by oars." There is nothing in these Acts which requires a vessel to be seagoing before she is a "ship." This vessel has a mast and sails, and is not propelled by oars only, which I submit is the meaning of the definition. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I understand Blackburn, J., in Ex parte Ferguson v. Hutchinson (ubi sup.) to define a ship within the meaning of those Acts to be a vessel the habitual business of which is to go to sea.] But it was never decided in that case that a vessel which did not go to sea might not be a ship, and such a vessel as this is clearly within the apparent meaning of the definitions; that decision was only as to the meaning of the word "ship" for the particular purposes of that case and not for general purposes. Assuming that the Conservancy Rules do not apply, the Regulations for preventing Collisions clearly cover this case, as this is a ship although never going to sea; a yacht never going out of the Thames could not be said to be other than a "ship," and there is no essential difference for this purpose between this lighter and a yacht. The decision in The Owen Wallis (ubi sup.) was in respect of a dumb barge, which falls entirely outside all rules, because it is propelled by oars only. So long as the regulations are not altered by the Conservancy Rules the rules as to side lights in Art. 5 of the Regulations, is binding upon all sailing vessels in the Thames. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Before I can say that, I must hold that this lighter is a "ship" and she is clearly not a seagoing vessel.] In Ex parte Ferguson v. Hutchinson (ubi sup.), Blackburn, J., expressly says that the definition in the Merchant Shipping Acts is not exclusive, but that if a vessel is a ship, although not included within the definition, the Acts would apply. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—But that learned judge says that the criterion by which a vessel is to be judged a ship is, whether she goes to sea.] It is enough if she is capable of going to sea. But even if the regulations do not apply, she still ought to have carried lights, by reason of the general obligation upon all vessels navigating narrow waters, and for this proposition I cite the Thames Conservancy Rules, Art. 29 (j), where it is laid down that nothing in the rules shall exonerate any vessel, or the owner or master or crew thereof, from the consequences of any neglect to carry lights or signals, &c. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—It does seem a reasonable contention that on general principles, and for the interests of navigation, such vessels ought to carry lights.] It being an admitted fact that the absence of lights on board the lighter contributed to the collision, and there being an obligation upon her to do so, either by regulations which apply when the Conservancy Byelaws do not override them, or by the general maritime law which is expressly kept alive by the byelaws I submit that the lighter was to blame for not carrying a light.

Built, Q. C., in reply.—There is not, nor has there ever been, any obligation by the general maritime law upon vessels under weigh to carry lights, and if there is no express provision in the Conservancy Byelaws, nor in the regulations, binding upon this vessel, she cannot be condemned for not carrying a light. Art. 29 (j) of the Bye-laws only applies where there is an obligation by law to carry lights.

July 22.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This case comes before the court in a strange and unusual manner, without evidence or a judgment from the court below. A witness has been examined here, and in his examination, questions of law were raised upon which I was asked to decide, as preliminary to any question on the merits.

The first question is, whether the Trinity lighters are bound to carry the usual regulation lights prescribed by the Order in Council, made in accordance with the Merchant Shipping Act 1862 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 63), to be carried by such vessel. In the definition clause of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), incorporated in the later Act, it is provided that a "ship shall include every description of vessel used in navigation not propelled by oars." That definition is copied into the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), sect. 2, An Act for Extending the Jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court. Taking into consideration the terms used in the 3rd sub-section of sect. 30 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, "to proceed to sea," the judgment in Ex parte Ferguson v. Hutchinson (24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 96; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 280; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 8), delivered in the Queen's Bench, I am of opinion that the criterion as to whether a vessel falls under the category of a "ship," mentioned in the Merchant Shipping Act, is, that it should be a vessel whose habitual business it is to go to sea; and if so, though propelled by oars as well as sails, it is, I think, a ship within the meaning of those Acts. Upon the evidence before me, it does not appear that this vessel goes to sea at all, though it has sails as well as oars, and, therefore, does not come in, in my opinion, within the meaning of the term "ship" in the statutes.

The next question is, whether a vessel of this kind be subject to the rules laid down by the Thames Conservancy, if there be any rule laid down by that body which renders the carrying of lights obligatory by law on this vessel. There is certainly considerable difficulty in reconciling the statutable authority conferred by the Rules and Byelaws of the Conservators with the statutable authority conferred in the Regulations for Avoiding Collisions at Sea. The jurisdiction of the Thames Conservancy extends to Yantlett Creek, and it never could have been the intention of the Legislature, considering the conflicting authorities, to apply it only to seagoing vessels. It cannot be, for instance, that the Thames Conservators should have the power, if they choose to exercise it, to order a port light to be carried on the starboard side of a seagoing ship coming within the port of London. The difficulties of construction are great, but I think the only approach to a reasonable solution of these difficulties is to consider "vessels navigating the river Thames" to mean vessels whose navigation is confined to the river, and which do not go to sea.

I am of opinion that a Trinity lighter, being a vessel of the latter class, is subject to the Conservancy Rules, but I cannot find any rule which orders her to carry a light. I pronounce the appellants' vessel not to blame for not carrying lights; and, therefore, on this ground she cannot be legally said to have contributed to the collision.

Aug. 6.—The case was heard on the merits, and the decision of the court below was reversed with costs.

OPINION by CLIFFORD, J.—Advances were made by the plaintiffs, as alleged in the declaration, to the master and owners of the bark for the purposes of her equipment and to procure a cargo for the vessel, in a voyage from Cadiz, in Spain, to the port of New Orleans; and the plaintiffs also allege that they, through their agents, obtained a policy of insurance, dated 6th Dec. 1867, and executed by the corporation defendants, insuring the hull of the barque in the sum of 9000 dols., in the name of their agents, containing the clauses, "on account of whom it concern" and "lost or not lost," for the protection of those advances. They also allege that the barque, though well officered, manned, and equipped, suffered so much on the voyage, from the violence of the winds and the force of the sea, that the master, with a view to the safety of the officers and crew, and for the preservation of the cargo, found it necessary to put into the port of Saint Jago de Cuba for such repairs as would enable him to prosecute the voyage; that their agents gave due notice of those facts to the president of the insurance company; that the secretary of the company subsequently informed the agents of the plaintiffs that the insurance company had decided to send an agent to the port of refuge to take charge of the interest of all concerned, and the plaintiffs aver that from the moment the agent of the insurance company arrived there he took exclusive charge of the repairs of the vessel, and caused such work to be performed as he, the agent, thought to be necessary, and that he obtained from their agent there the funds necessary to pay for all such repairs. All necessary repairs were made and the barque completed her voyage, and the further allegation is, that after her arrival at the port of destination an adjustment of averages was made by the adjusters of averages in that port, for costs, charges, and damages in making such repairs, and that in the said adjustment they, the plaintiffs, were awarded the sum of 3507 dols. on the said policy of insurance.

Demand of payment having been made, and payment having been refused the plaintiffs commenced the present suit. Service was made and the defendants appeared and filed an answer, which is equivalent to the general issue in an action of assumpsit, and a special plea that the bark, at the time of her departure and throughout both the outward and return voyages, was unseaworthy, contrary to the stipulations of the policy and in violation of its express and implied warranties. Subsequently the parties went to trial and the verdict and judgment were for the plaintiffs, for the amount awarded by the average adjusters. Exceptions were taken by the defendants to the rulings of the court in refusing to instruct the jury as they requested. Three prayers for instruction were presented by the defendants, all of which were refused: first, that if the evidence shows that the insurable interest of the plaintiffs was a bottomry bond on the barque and that the vessel arrived in safety at the port of destination, the jury should find for the defendants; secondly, that it is only when the vessel insured is lost that the assured on a bottomry bond can recover, and that if the proof is that there was no loss or destruction of the barque, the jury should find for the defendants, if the plaintiffs had insured on a bottomry bond; thirdly, that the defendants were not bound to tender back the premiums of insurance before availing themselves of any defence against the validity of the policy of insurance, or for its avoidance by a subsequent cause.

Nothing appears in the record except the declaration, the answer, the verdict and judgment, the three bills of exceptions to the rulings of the court in refusing to instruct the jury as requested, neither of which contains any report of the evidence, and the motion for new trial, which merely states that the verdict of the jury is contrary to law and the evidence, without giving any statement whatever of the evidence which was submitted to the jury. Evidence to show that the action was founded upon a bottomry bond, or that such a bond was offered in evidence, or introduced at the trial, is entirely wanting; nor is there the slightest evidence, direct or circumstantial, to show that any such question as that involved in the third prayer for instruction did or could have arisen in the case, or that the instruction was a proper one, in any view of the controversy, for the consideration of the jury. Viewed in the light of these suggestions, as the case should be, it is clear that the several rulings of the court in refusing to give the three prayers for instruction, may be considered together, as they involve but one question in an appellate court.

Correct instructions, if applicable to the case, the court, as a general rule, is required to give, unless the same are in substance and effect embodied in those previously given by the court to the jury; but the court is never required by law to give an instruction to the jury which is not applicable to the case, even though it be correct as an abstract principle or rule of law; and it may be added that no prayer for instruction, whether presented by the plaintiff or the defendant, can be regarded as applicable to the case when it is wholly unsupported by the evidence introduced to the jury. Competent evidence may be written or oral, direct or circumstantial, but when there is no legal evidence of any kind to support the theory of fact embodied in a prayer for instruction, whether presented by the plaintiff or the defendant, the instruction should always be refused; and such a ruling can never become a good cause for reversing the judgment. It is clearly error in a court, said Taney, C.J., to charge a jury upon a supposed or conjectural state of facts, of which no evidence has been offered, as the instruction presupposes that there is some evidence before the jury which they may think sufficient to establish the fact hypothetically assumed in that way by the court, and if there is no evidence which they have a right to consider, then the charge does not aid them in coming to a correct conclusion, but its tendency is to embarrass and mislead them, as it may induce them to indulge in conjectures instead of weighing the testimony: (U. S. v. Breiting, 20 How. 254). When a prayer for instruction is presented to the court, and there is no evidence upon the subject in the case for the consideration of the jury, it ought always to be withheld, and if it is given under such circumstances, it will, as a general rule, be regarded as error in the court, for the reason that its tendency may be, and often is, to mislead the jury, by withdrawing their attention from the legitimate points of inquiry involved in the issue: (Goodman v. Simond, 20 How., p. 359.)

Attempt is made in argument to maintain that the plaintiffs had no insurable interest in the barque unless it be assumed that it was created by a bottomry bond, but the court is entirely of a different opinion, as it is alleged in the declaration that the advances were made to equip the vessel and to procure for her a cargo in the voyage from a foreign port to the port of destination. Founded as the declaration is upon the policy of insurance it must be construed in connection with the policy.

By the terms of the policy the insurance is upon the barque, her tackle and apparel, which is the proper language to be employed in a case where the assured had an interest in the vessel. Advances made on the credit of a ship for necessary repairs or supplies in a foreign port create a maritime lien upon the ship, and it is well settled law that a maritime lien is a jus in re, and that it constitutes an incumbrance on the property of the ship which is not divested by the death or insolvency of the owner: (The Young Mechanic, 2 Curt. 404; s. c., Ware Adm. R. 535; 1 Pars. M. Law, 489; 3 Kent, Com. 170, 11th edit.; General Smith, 4 Wheat. 438.) Such a lien may be enforced by a process in rem, which is founded on a right in the thing, the object of the process being to obtain the thing itself, or a satisfaction out of it, for some claim resting on a real or quasi proprietary right in the thing: (The Commerce, 1 Bl. 580; Buck et al. v. Ins. Co., 1 Pet. 165; The Maggie Hammond, 9 Wall. 456.) Liens of the kind constitute an insurable interest, and it is quite clear that enough is alleged in the declaration to warrant the conclusion that the advances made in this case are properly to be regarded as constituting a maritime lien upon the barque: (Seamans v. Loring, 1 Mas. 127; 1 Phil. on Ins., 5th edit., s. 204; Hancock v. Ins. Co., 3 Sumn. 132).

Contracts for repairs and supplies may be made by the master to enable the vessel to proceed on her voyage, and if it appears that they were necessary for the purpose, and that they were made and furnished to a foreign vessel or to a vessel of the United States in a port other than a port of the State to which the vessel belongs, the prima facie presumption is that the repairs and supplies were made and furnished on the credit of the vessel, unless it appears that the master had funds in hand or at his command which he ought to have applied to the accomplishment of those objects, and that the material men knew that fact or that such facts and circumstances were known to them as were sufficient to put them upon inquiry and to show that if they had used due diligence in that behalf they might have ascertained that the master had no authority to contract for such repairs and supplies on the credit of the vessel: (The Lulu, 10 Wall. 197; The Patapsco 13 Wall. 333; 2 Pars. on Ship. 322 to 337).

Whenever the necessity for the repairs and supplies is once made out, it is incumbent upon the owners, if they allege that the funds could have been obtained upon their personal credit, to establish that fact by competent proof, and that the material men knew the same or were put upon inquiry, as before explained, unless those matters fully appear in the evidence introduced by the other party: (The Grapeshot, 9 Wall. 141; Thomas v. Osborn, 19 How. 22).

Apply those principles to the case, and it is clear that the objection that the plaintiffs had no insurable interest in the barque utterly fails, and it is not controverted that the advances were made to equip the vessel and to procure a cargo for her in the described voyage; and it is sufficient that such an allegation affords a prima facie presumption that the advances were made on the credit of the vessel, as the record fails to disclose any fact or circumstance to overcome that presumption. Such advances constitute a lien upon the ship, and such a lien gives the lender an insurable interest in the ship: (Seamans v. Loring, 1 Mas. 127; 1 Phil. on Insurance, 5th edit., sect. 204; Godin v. Insurance Company, 1 Burr 499; Lucena v. Craufurd, 5 Bos. & P. 294; Wells v. Ins. Co., 9 S. & R. 103).

Absolutely nothing appears in the record to support the theory that any such defences as those assumed in the prayers for instruction were in fact set up by the defendants in the subordinate court, except what is contained in the prayers for instruction presented to the court. They pleaded a general denial of the allegations of the declaration, and that the barque was unseaworthy at the inception of the risk and throughout the voyage, but no mention is made of any such defences as those implied in the prayers for instruction in any other part of the record, nor is there any evidence whatever upon the subject. Defences in avoidance of the claim made in the declaration must be proved in the court of original jurisdiction, and if not proved there they cannot be successfully set up in the appellate court to support an assignment of error. Other matters were discussed at the bar, but it is not necessary to examine any other of the propositions submitted, as these suggestions are sufficient to dispose of the case.

Judgment affirmed.

DANIELLS v. HARRIS.

[C. P.]

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.Reported by ETHERINGTON SMITH and J. M. LELY, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

April 29 and Nov. 2, 1874.

DANIELLS v. HARRIS.

Marine insurance—Policy on cargo—Extent of implied warranty of seaworthiness—Deck cargo—Jettison to save ship—Risk to ship and cargo on an ordinary voyage.

The warranty of seaworthiness implied in a policy of marine insurance is to be considered with reference to each subject matter of insurance, and the ship can only be said to be seaworthy for the purposes of that warranty if it is seaworthy in respect of that subject-matter.

In a policy on cargo, the implied warranty that the ship is seaworthy, cannot be considered to contemplate the destruction, in order to save the ship on an ordinary voyage, of that very cargo which is the subject-matter of insurance.

Where a policy is effected on deck cargo, it is not a compliance with the warranty of seaworthiness that the ship can, without danger to herself, should she encounter ordinary rough weather, be made seaworthy by the jettison of the deck cargo, which is the subject-matter of the insurance.

It seems, that if the policy had been on the ship and under-deck cargo, and not on the deck cargo, the implied warranty of seaworthiness would have been satisfied by the safety of the ship and under-deck cargo, and would not have been affected by the peril to or loss of the deck cargo, provided that the latter, by reason of the facility with which it could have been got rid of, would have caused no danger to the ship, or subject-matter of insurance.

THIS was an action on a policy of insurance upon wine shipped on board the steamer Murillo, from San Lucar to London, and was tried before Brett, J., at the Guildhall.

The plaintiffs obtained the verdict, and a rule nisi was granted for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection, and also that the verdict was against the weight of evidence. The misdirection complained of was with reference to the meaning of seaworthiness.

One of the questions left to the jury was, was the ship unseaworthy on leaving San Lucar? and the explanation the learned judge gave was to this effect: that although a deck cargo which could not be got rid of might render a ship unseaworthy, yet the jury might take into account the facility that existed of getting rid of wine by staving in the casks.

The facts, which are fully stated in the judgment of the court, were shortly, that the ship sailed from San Lucar in the month of February, having a considerable number of casks of wine stored on deck, and on encountering weather worse than the ordinary rough weather of that time of year in the Bay of Biscay, some of the casks got loose and endangered the safety of the ship so much that the whole of the deck cargo was jettisoned by means of staving in the casks.

The jury were asked: First, was there a concealment of the fact that all the cargo was on deck? secondly, was there a concealment of the number of casks in which the wine on deck was contained? and if yes, was it material? thirdly, was the ship unseaworthy on leaving San Lucar? To all these questions the answer was in the negative.

Benjamin, Q.C. (C. Russell, Q.C. and W. G. Harison, with him), showed cause.—The terms of the policy were: "7000l. on wine in casks on or under deck, so valued at 10s. per cent., to return 4s. 9d. per cent. for interest under deck on arrival." This shows clearly that the underwriters were informed that most of the wine would be on deck. And so we say that the implied warranty as to seaworthiness is modified by the knowledge imparted to the underwriters. In Arnould on Marine Insurance, 4th edit., vol. 2, p. 766, it is said: "Goods carried on deck are prima facie not in their proper place; besides, it is nearly always true of them that they impede the navigation of the ship. On both grounds, it is a received rule that deck lading gives no occasion to general average. But an exception to this general rule may be created by custom, as where it is the custom in a particular trade to carry part of the cargo, or articles of a certain character on deck; for by the custom the deck becomes a proper place for the goods, and those who embark in that trade as merchants, shipowners, or insurers, accept the impediment of deck lading as another peril of the traffic, with the usual incident of general average in the case of deck cargo attaching to the adventure." Here we may similarly say that the casks of wine were in their proper place, because it was known to all parties that they would be carried there, and so the insurers accepted that as one of the risks. And they would know also that it was a risk to the cargo and not to the ship, and did not make the ship unseaworthy, though the goods were more exposed to loss. That this was contemplated is shown by the return of the rate of premium for all goods carried below deck. As the warranty of seaworthiness is only an implied warranty, it is modified by facts which show that the condition of the ship and the mode of loading were known to and in contemplation of the underwriters.

Then, as to the misdirection. What the learned judge said was, "Here again the burden of proof lies on the defendant," viz., with reference to the unseaworthiness of the ship. And, again, "There may be an extra risk to the goods, but if the ship is not risked there is not unseaworthiness." But surely this is a perfectly right direction; it is proper to leave to the jury the consideration of the character of the cargo in determining seaworthiness. In Foley v. Tabor (2 F. & F. 663), Erle, C.J., says: "Seaworthiness is a word of which the import varies with the place, the voyage, the class of ship, or even the nature of the cargo. And you are to take this as the law on the subject, that a ship will be unseaworthy if the risk is materially increased by reason of difficulty in navigating the ship, caused either by overloading or by bad stowage of the cargo." This was in his summing up to the jury, and shows what may be left for their consideration. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—Why are you not to consider the cargo in two ways? If the character of the cargo being heavy, and its being on deck makes her unseaworthy, why may not its being light or easily got rid of, restore her seaworthiness?] It seems only reasonable that it should; the consideration is, whether at the commencement of the voyage the ship was seaworthy with reference to her own safety, not as to the safety of the cargo. The case of Burgess v. Wickham (8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 47; 3 B. and S. 669), shows what limitation is to be fixed to the general and implied warranty of seaworthiness. Blackburn, J., says: I think seaworthiness is relative to the nature of the adventure in every respect;" and Cockburn, C.J., says: "The authorities which bear upon the subject appear to me fully to establish that, while, by the law of England, there is in every voyage policy an implied warranty of seaworthiness, the term 'seaworthiness' is a relative and flexible term, the degree of seaworthiness depending on the position in which the vessel may be placed, or on the nature of the navigation or adventure on which it is about to embark." In that case a ship which, as was known to the defendants, had originally been only a river steamer, was strengthened as far as possible for an ocean voyage; but even when so strengthened, she was not as fit for the voyage as it would have been proper she should be if she had been an ordinary sea-going vessel. Yet it was held that, the facts being known, she was in a condition to satisfy the warranty of seaworthiness, it being limited to the capacity of the vessel. So here, this was a named ship, known to the defendants, with a named cargo, and a named mode of stowing it, all communicated to the defendants; and she was therefore, within the above rule, seaworthy at the commencement of the voyage.

DANIELLS v. HARRIS.

Sir John Karstak-(Q.C., Butt, Q.C., and Cohen, Q.C., in support of the rule.—If the plaintiffs are right their argument goes to this, that as soon as the underwriters know that some cargo will be carried on deck, they must be taken to waive all question of seaworthiness. The direction was in effect this: if the stowing of the vessel was such that if she encountered the ordinary weather of the time of year, the deck cargo would have to be jettisoned, but if she had only smooth weather she might have got safely home, then the circumstances which would make the cargo easily jettisoned would make her seaworthy, though otherwise she would not be so. Now it is admitted that there is a warranty of seaworthiness of some sort necessarily to be implied, and that being so, the direction amounts to this, that a vessel being unseaworthy may become seaworthy by the facility of getting rid of deck cargo if bad weather be encountered. The learned judge adopted the evidence of Bethel, the engineer, and founded his direction upon it. The witness said, "I should have thought she would labour very much, and probably we should have to throw it overboard in the Bay of Biscay, loaded in such a way: and he added that he would not have sailed in her if it had not been a cargo that could be got rid of. It is clear, however, from this evidence, that she would have been called unseaworthy at the time she left her moorings; and if the doctrine laid down be upheld, it must be carried to this extent, that if she had gone down she was still seaworthy. Supposing that they did not succeed in staving in the casks which, in ordinary bad weather, was necessary to be done to save the ship, yet she would be seaworthy. Now, can it be said that the absolute necessity of throwing overboard that which is the subject-matter of the insurance, in the event of that occurring which must be anticipated, admits of the ship being nevertheless seaworthy? We may take another illustration to show the results if the doctrine be carried to its legitimate conclusions. The ship is supposed to have sailed with a sufficient crew. In bad weather the casks get loose, and disable so many of the crew that the rest cannot start the casks and let out the wine. Yet it would have to be said that she was seaworthy, because the subject matter of the insurance was such that if other things had not happened it might have been thrown overboard, and the immediate danger to the ship dispersed, and herself made competent to get to the end of the voyage. What is the true meaning of "ordinary perils of the sea?" Underwriters do not contract to provide against them: as Brett, J., said at the trial, "rough weather must be expected at the time of year." The term seaworthy must include ordinary bad weather, though not extraordinary, and when rough weather is to be anticipated, the vessel must be freighted accordingly. It is never a question whether a ship can encounter extraordinary bad weather, but ordinary perils of the seas. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—Here the loss was occasioned by extraordinary weather.] Yes; and if the ship was seaworthy the underwriters are liable for loss by jettison; but the learned judge throughout told the jury that, in considering whether the ship was able to encounter ordinary perils, they were to take into account the facility of jettison; but it is contended that he ought to have asked them whether the ship, when she left Spain, was fit to carry the cargo as it was, and without alteration, that is, without jettison. The ship must be seaworthy at the commencement of the voyage, and it is not enough that she can be made so in the course of it. The Quebec Marine Insurance Company v. The Commercial Bank of Canada (3 Mar. Law Cas., O. S., 414; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 559; L. Rep. 3 P. C. App. 235) clearly establishes this: that if a ship start with a defect, although it be remedied before loss, yet the warranty of seaworthiness is not complied with and the contrary doctrine which had been deduced from a dictum of Lord Tenterden, in Weir v. Aberdeen, (2 B. & Ald. 320) is shown not to be correct, and certainly was not the ratio decidendi, even if Lord Tenterden be correctly reported. [BRETT, J.—It does not follow that the jury may not say the defect is so small as not to amount to unseaworthiness. Suppose a ship starts with a leak, but the carpenter stops it in five minutes, is she unseaworthy?] Yes. In Phillips on Insurance, sect. 695, it is stated, "The assured is understood to warrant that the ship is at the commencement of the voyage, seaworthy, viz.; that the materials of which the ship is made, its construction, &c., and outfit generally, are such as to render it in every respect fit for the voyage insured." [BRETT, J.—Look at the next paragraph, that says that if the deficiency be temporary, and admitting of a ready remedy, the insurance is not forfeited.] It is not enough to say that the ship can be made seaworthy after the commencement of the voyage; for she must at the time be fit to carry cargo and earn freight. Sect 723 says that, if the cargo has to be reloaded for making repairs, the warranty is not complied with.

So too, the ship must not be overloaded, and Foley v. Tabor (ubi sup.), cited by the other side, really shows that the ship is unseaworthy if the difficulty of navigating be increased by overloading. It becomes, then, a question whether it is usual for cargo to be stowed in such a way as this. In Parsons on Marine Insurance, vol. 1, p. 376, it is laid down that the ship must be adapted to the risk assumed, and must be properly loaded, not only as to the storage of the goods, but also as to weight and quantity: (see Weir v. Aberdeen, ubi sup., and Lidgett v. Secretan, ante, vol 1, p. 85; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 942; L. Rep. C. P. 616). The judgment of Lord Wensleydale in Biccard v. Shepherd (14 Moo. P. C. 471), shows that a ship, being unseaworthy, may become unseaworthy by being overloaded. There additional cargo was taken on board at an intermediate port, and as such additional cargo made the vessel unseaworthy, the assured were held not entitled to recover in respect of the second shipment. See also Gibson v. Small (4 H. of L. Cas. 353), and Bouillon v. Lupton (15 C. B., N. S., 113). But the direction of the learned judge in this case is directly opposed to all these authorities, for he would say that a ship may be overloaded and yet seaworthy, because of the facility of getting rid of the excess load. We contend that seaworthiness has reference to the cargo as well as to the ship, for the latter must be fit to carry the former safely in ordinary rough weather. The implied warranty of the shipowner is, in the words of Lord Ellenborough in Lyon v. Mellis (5 East, 428), "that his vessel is tight and fit for the purpose or employment for which he offers and holds it forth to the public." As between the freighter and the shipowner, the undertaking of the latter is shown to be to have the ship fit to receive any reasonable cargo of the nature that he undertook to carry: (see Stanton v. Richardson, ante, vol. 1, p. 449; ante, p. 228; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 513; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 421) No underwriter would insure at 10s. per cent. if the vessel could not carry her cargo through ordinary rough weather. But Biccard v. Shepherd (ubi sup) is an authority that the underwriter is not liable to the assured if she could not; and in Hare and Wallace's American Leading Cases, vol. 2, p. 753, in the case of Prescott v. The Union Insurance Company (1 Whart. Penn. 399), the direction in the following terms was upheld: "The idea of seaworthiness is not limited to the sufficiency of the vessel merely to save the lives of the persons who may be on board, but extends also to her sufficiency for the safety of the property on board of her.

DANIELLS v. HARRIS.

[C. P.]

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 2—The judgment of the court (Lord Coleridge, C.J., Brett and Denman, JJ.) was delivered by BRETT, J.—In this case the action was brought on a policy of insurance to recover an alleged total loss by jettison of wine, valued at 7000*l.*, loaded on board the steamship Murillo.

The policy was, "at and from San Lucar, on wine in casks or under deck." The wine insured was all on deck, so loaded at San Lucar, after the ship's hold had been filled with other cargo. The insured wine was jettisoned in bad weather by staving in the casks. The ship and underdeck cargo arrived safe.

The defendants pleaded with other pleas, "that the said ship, at the commencement of the said insured voyage in the said policy mentioned, was not seaworthy."

In summing up the case to the jury upon this plea, Mr. Justice Brett commenced by telling them "that the question was, whether the defendant had proved that the ship was unseaworthy. But that means," he said, "not only whether the mere ship, as a built ship, was seaworthy, but whether loaded as she was, with the cargo which she had on board stowed in the way it was, the ship was fit to undergo all the ordinary risks of the voyage upon which she was to sail at the time of year at which she was to sail. If the ship was not seaworthy in that sense, then the policy fails, because the assured of goods is taken to warrant that the ship is seaworthy. It signifies not whether he is innocent, whether it is not in the least degree his fault, if in point of fact the shipowner or the master makes the ship by stowage or otherwise unseaworthy; then in treating the case as between the two innocent parties, the assured and the underwriter, it is the assured and not the underwriter who has to lose. The question is, not whether the goods themselves were at more than ordinary risk; goods on deck are always assumed to be at more than ordinary risk. If the fact of their being on deck does not affect the safety of the ship, their own additional risk is immaterial; the question is, whether the putting the goods on deck did or did not make the ship unseaworthy. The question for you is, whether the ship, that is, including the cargo on and under deck, was in a fit condition on leaving San Lucar to encounter with safety the ordinary perils of an ordinary voyage from San Lucar to England at that time of the year. Your answer must depend upon the view you take of the evidence, and upon the exercise of your own knowledge and judgment."

The learned judge, in commenting on the evidence, said: "No one would be of opinion that, either for the cargo itself or for the ship, it is as good a way to load cargo on deck as to put it under deck, but does it or does it not make a great difference, in your judgment, what kind of deck cargo there is? if the deck cargo had been stiff machinery, heavy rigid machinery, which could not have been got rid of off the deck in bad weather, if the weight of such a cargo had been anything like the weight of this wine, you would probably say that with such a weight on deck, and the impossibility of getting rid of it, the state of things would have been very dangerous for the ship; but then the real point for you is, whether you think it makes a difference in that respect that the cargo could be dealt with as this cargo would be. The weight of it as weight was liquid, how would you get rid of wine encumbering the ship on deck? How long would it take ship's carpenter and his men to stave the casks? What would be the effect on the ship of letting the wine run out? The question is, not of danger to the wine, but of danger to the ship. I apprehend, myself, that you will all be of opinion that having this deck cargo did add to the difficulties of the ship, and that unless it could have been got rid of, and with tolerable quickness, it would have been a danger to the ship to the extent of making her unseaworthy; but the question is, what is the effect, in your judgment, of the facility of starting the wine? I cannot help thinking that the effect of having a deck cargo does necessarily add to the danger of a ship; but the question is, whether it puts her into so much danger as to make her unseaworthy; that is to say, whether it puts her in danger of being unable to meet the ordinary rough weather of the voyage on which she is sailing."

Speaking of what would be an ordinary voyage in this case, the learned judge said: "It would not be right to say that for a ship coming across the Bay of Biscay in February, an ordinary voyage means a voyage without rough weather. It is clear that coming across the Bay of Biscay and up the English Channel at that season, you must meet with rough weather. Therefore it must not be taken to be sufficient that the ship would be able to encounter without danger smooth or fair weather only, but the question is, whether she would be able to encounter without danger rough weather also. But there is at every season of the year some weather rougher than the ordinary rough weather of that season, and although the ship ought to be able to stand, not only the smooth but also the ordinary rough weather of the season in which she sails, yet the value of insurance is, that it insures against damage or loss, by reason of the rougher weather than the ordinary rough weather of the season. Therefore, you are not to consider whether this ship would have been safe without rough weather. She was bound, when she left San Lucar, to be in such a condition, with regard to herself and her cargo, as to be able to surmount the ordinary occurrences of an ordinary voyage in that season, including the rough weather which must be anticipated at that time of year; and the question for you is this—it being a fact clearly proved, as I think, that if the cargo could not have been got rid of, the ship would have been in great danger in a voyage with the ordinary rough weather of the season; the question is, whether your view of that state of things is modified by a consideration of what kind of cargo it was on deck, and the mode in which such a cargo could be got rid of. If you are of opinion that that kind of cargo, although it was too heavy for the comfort of the ship, and as long as it existed of that weight, was a danger to the ship, yet when ordinary danger came on, that is ordinary rough weather came on, it could be got rid of so quickly that practically it did not endanger the ship, although it endangered itself, then you may say that the ship was seaworthy, notwithstanding the weight of the cargo on deck; but if you think that the cargo was such that, with such weather as ought to have been anticipated on such a voyage, it could not have been got rid of before the ship would be in danger, then I think you would say that the ship was unseaworthy at starting. If you think the ship was not seaworthy at starting from San Lucar, within the definition I have given, you will find for the defendant, otherwise for the plaintiff."

The jury having found a verdict for the plaintiff, a rule was moved for and granted, on the ground of misdirection, and the case was argued in Easter Term last.

The first point to be considered is what would be the exact import conveyed to the jury by this summing up. In laying down the propositions of law, as such, we are of opinion that the direction was correct. The first proposition laid down as to seaworthiness seems to us to be entirely right. The terms of the proposition as to what is to be considered an ordinary voyage, seem to us to be right. The question is, what is the effect of the remarks made during the comment on facts. We are of opinion, upon consideration, that they would lead the jury to conclude that they were directed, as matter of law that although they should find, as matter of fact, that if the deck cargo were not got rid of, the ship, with the cargo under and on her decks, would be in danger of destruction in the ordinary rough weather of the voyage insured, yet if the deck cargo could in such weather be got rid of so easily that, by reason of the facility of its destruction, the ship and the rest of the cargo were in no danger in an ordinary voyage, they might find that the warranty that the ship was seaworthy was satisfied in point of law. The real question, therefore, is, whether such a proposition is correct in point of law.

The stipulation as to seaworthiness is a warranty, not express but implied. It is, unless expressly or by necessary implication negatived, to be implied in every marine voyage policy of insurance, whether the subject-matter of insurance be ship, cargo, freight, profits, commission, or other. The warranty thus implied has always been stated in all decided cases, and in all works of authority, in the same terms. Those terms are: "That the assured warrants that at the time when the policy attached, or should have attached, the ship was seaworthy." It is not "that the subject-matter of insurance would be in no danger on an ordinary voyage." The terms which have been used or not, in a policy on cargo, for example, that such cargo will be in no danger if the voyage be an ordinary voyage, but they have been that for such a voyage "the ship was seaworthy." The same terms being so used with regard to all policies, do they mean the same thing in all policies? If they were express words in the policy, being the same words used in documents in pari materia, it should seem that they should bear the same meaning in all. Is it different, because the warranty is an implied one, and the terms which have been used have not been the phraseology of the parties to the contracts, but of those who have declared or treated of the law?

When one asks whether the warranty has the same meaning in all the policies, the question is, whether the same warranty in extent and effect is to be implied in every policy. In considering this question, we must proceed, as in all the other questions which are for ever raised for judicial decision by the never ceasing variety of commercial transactions; we must proceed according to authority, so far as it goes, and then, if the case in hand be outside and beyond the authorities, by applying to it the principles to be extracted from the authorities, that is to say, the principles which were applied to them in their time.

First, then, according to the authorities, has the implied warranty been the same in extent and effect in all policies? It has not. With regard to policies on the same subject-matter, as on ships, the extent of the warranty, as to the condition of the ship, has been held to be different for different voyages, for the same voyage at different seasons, for the same voyage at the same season, according to whether the same ship was in ballast or loaded with one kind of cargo, or another. The required condition of the ship has been held to be different when the ship was to enter under policy in port from what it must be when going to sea under the same policy. It has been held to be different for a coasting voyage, or lake, or river, or canal voyage, from what it must be for an ocean voyage under the same policy. It is unnecessary to cite fully well known authorities. All are brought forward and discussed in Phillips on Insurance, §§ 695 to 723, inclusive. In § 719: "The warranty of seaworthiness varies in different places; a vessel considered seaworthy for a voyage in one place may not be so considered in another; the standard of seaworthiness also varies from time to time in the same place." In § 720: "The requisites as to seaworthiness depend upon the intended use and service of the vessel. The requisites to satisfy this warranty for lying in port, or for temporary purposes, short coasting passages, or navigating a lake, river, or canal, are different from those demanded for navigating the open sea on long voyages." If, therefore, the warranty were set out in detailed terms, instead of in the comprehensive description, "that the ship must be seaworthy," it is obvious that the terms of the warranty as to each of the voyages, or as it were, parts of voyages, or conditions of things mentioned in these sections, would and must be different. If, then, the implied warranty is, as to its extent and effect, different in different policies with regard to the same subject matter, it might be not unreasonably predicated that it might be also different in different policies with regard to different subjects. It might be different with regard to the same voyage, to be made at the same season, if applied to two different subjects of insurance. There seems to be authority for saying that there is a difference. In Phillips on Insurance, § 721: "It follows, if we apply the same criterion, that there may be a compliance with this warranty in a policy on the ship while lying in port, and not one upon the cargo of the same ship. For circumstances may be readily imagined, and often occur, in which the vessel is in reasonable security in port, though goods on board would not be so." In § 723: "There are these two distinctions in the insurance on the ship, and that on cargo and freight, first, in respect of what is seaworthiness in port, and second, as to the time when the policy attaches: and these two distinctions have place, though all these interests are insured in the same policy made or having reference to the time before the cargo is on board." He then points out that, in two cases determined in Massachusetts, on a policy on ship, freight, and cargo at and from a port, the policy on the ship attached because the ship was seaworthy in port, but the policy did not attach as to the cargo or freight, because the ship was not seaworthy for the sea voyage, the warranty as to seaworthiness being as to all the risks, the warranty to be implied in the one policy. These are authorities for saying that there is a difference in extent and effect in the warranty of seaworthiness of the ship in different policies in which the subject-matter of insurance is different; but there is no authority which decides what is the extent and effect of that warranty in the case of a policy on goods.

DANIELLS v. HARRIS.

The real question, therefore, is what is the principle to be applied; and upon this, first, what is the principle which governs the court in determining whether any terms are to be implied in contracts, and, if so, what those terms are to be. When and to what extent is a court of law bound to hold that there is an implied term in a contract? Whenever there is something not expressed which it is clear to all men of ordinary intelligence and knowledge of business must have been either latent in or palpably present to the minds of both parties to the contract when it was made, for otherwise their contract would be, as a business transaction, insensible, or contrary to the universal course.

Applying the authorities so far as they go, and this principle to the present case, it would seem that if the policy had been on the ship, it might well have been held that the extent and effect of the implied warranty would only have reached the safety of the ship. That is to say, if the cargo on deck would, however treated, have been a danger to the ship in an ordinary voyage, the warranty of seaworthiness would not have been satisfied, but if the deck cargo by reason of the facility with which it could have been got rid of, would have caused no danger to the ship, the warranty would have been satisfied. The same if the policy had been on cargo other than the deck cargo. For, in either case, upon the assumption, neither ship nor cargo insured would have been in any practical danger on an ordinary voyage. The only consideration against the affirmative of the proposition in either case is, that the safety of the subject insured is made to depend upon a breach of duty by the ship-owner to the owner of the deck cargo. Yet that, as between the parties to the contract of insurance, would be as inter alios acta, and the underwriter would not be the legal defender of the owner of the deck cargo. Upon either of the policies thus suggested we should have thought the direction which was given in this case would have been correct. But then arises the final question, which is, can the same effect and extent be given to the warranty with regard to a cargo which is the subject-matter insured? Can it be supposed that the underwriter would insure at any premium cargo which, upon the assumption, must be jettisoned if the ordinary rough weather of the voyage should occur? or, on the contrary, may it not be said to be clear to every man of ordinary intelligence and knowledge of business, that neither the assured nor the underwriter on such a policy could have had in his mind, when the contract was made, the supposition that the underwriter would pay for the loss by inevitable jettison of the subject insured? In other words, must not the extent and effect of the warranty in such a policy on goods be, that the ship will be safe on an ordinary voyage without being put to sacrifice the insured cargo?

We are of opinion, upon consideration, that the extent and effect of the warranty that the ship is seaworthy in a policy on cargo can never be implied to be so great as to be considered to contemplate the destruction, in order to save the ship, on an ordinary voyage, of that very cargo which is the subject-matter of insurance. Such a supposition makes the contract, as a business transaction, insensible—the extra premium invariably paid in respect of a deck cargo applies to the extra danger to the cargo in case of weather more rough than the ordinary rough weather of the voyage insured.

We are, therefore, of opinion that the direction, in this case, was wrong, as applied to the policy before the court. It was right in saying that the question was not whether the cargo would be safe on an ordinary voyage, but whether the ship, including the cargo, would be safe. It was right in saying that, in considering that question, the jury should consider the nature of the cargo. But it was wrong in leading or leaving the jury to understand that if the ship could only be made safe for or in an ordinary voyage by the destruction of the insured cargo, they might, nevertheless, say that the ship was seaworthy.

The rule must be made absolute for a new trial.

ERROR FROM THE COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

THE IMPERIAL OTTOMAN BANK v. COWAN.

Sale of cargo to arrive—Supplementary cargo—One bill of lading including both—Waiver of objection to.

Plaintiffs, a continental bank, having contracted to sell and ship to the defendants 1400 quarters of rye, to be paid for by an acceptance at three months, put the rye on board the Agatha. The vessel proved to be capable of containing from 200 to 300 quarters more grain than the quantity shipped, and therefore the plaintiffs filled up the vacant space with maize.

One bill of lading only was given for the cargo, and the plaintiffs wrote on the 24th April to the defendants, with the invoices and drafts: "The maize is on the same bill of lading as the rye . . . as there would, no doubt, be a loss on the maize, we presume you will wish to leave it for account of shippers; but if you will accept the bill we will get an undertaking from the bank to hold you harmless for so doing."

The defendants, who had made a subsale of the cargo, replied: "The drafts and invoices of this cargo, are to hand, and we observe that the bills of lading are in the hands of the . . . bank. We think . . . we are entitled to ask a guarantee from the bank that the Agatha shall deliver the weight specified in the invoice. Would you have the kindness to ask the bank for this, and telegraph to us . . . their acquiescence, or the contrary. We would be obliged also by a copy, or the original, of the charter-party, and copy of the bill of lading for our Government. We leave, as you suggest, the maize to the shippers; the transaction in rye is a very bad one. We return you enclosed draft invoices of maize."

On the 8th May the defendants refused to accept the bill of exchange for the rye, upon the ground that the plaintiffs had not given them a proper bill of lading. In an action for such non-acceptance:

Held (in error from the Court of Exchequer), that the defendants had, by a new agreement, waived any objection to the bill of lading in respect of the maize being included therein, and were therefore liable.

ERROR from a decision of the Court of Common Pleas, upon a special case (ante, p. 57), the substance of which sufficiently appears in the judgment, infra.

Field, Q. C. (with him Holl), for Messrs. Cowan.—The decision below was wrong. The contract was, that the bank should deliver the rye on board a suitable ship, which they would find, and, within a reasonable time after shipment, hand to the purchasers a clean bill of lading, giving them complete control over the goods, so that, in exchange for their acceptance of the bank's draft, the buyers might obtain the master's undertaking to deliver to their order, and be enabled to go into the market and effect a subsale. But the bank gave a bill of lading, including a shipment of maize, therefore, the buyers of the rye would not get their goods without first discharging the shipowner's lien on the maize. Whatever took place subsequently between the parties came too late. The bank had no right to encumber the rye with the maize. [QUAIN, J.—But they acted for your benefit; for had they not shipped the maize, you would have had to pay dead freight. Moreover, you retained both documents in your hands for ten days, having thereby all the benefit of the change of markets.] We did not avail ourselves of any such benefit, and were entitled to retain the documents for that period. Had we instantly rejected the cargo, we might have rendered ourselves liable to an action by the subvendees. Is a new contract to be inferred from our merely waiting ten days? A proper clean bill of lading for the rye should have been delivered to us forthwith (Barber v. Taylor, 5 M. & W. 527), or at least in reasonable time. [Per curiam.—If the vendor was bound to deliver the bill of lading in reasonable time, you on the other hand, were bound to reject it, if at all, in reasonable time. It is argued against you that there was an acquiescence amounting to an assent on your part to receive the bill of lading which was sent.] The bank never asserted that we had accepted the bill of lading, and they treated the transaction as still open.

J. C. Mathew (Bosanquet with him) for the bank.—The court below did not deem a bill of lading indispensable, but thought that the bank were bound to procure the delivery of these goods to us, and that in either of two ways, viz., by tendering a bill of lading to the very amount on the ship, or, without tendering the bill of lading, by delivering the rye at the port of destination. The bank performed their duty when they found a ship reasonably fit to carry 1400 quarters of rye, and they put that cargo on board. [BRAMWELL, B.—Can you contend that the bills of exchange were to be given months before either the goods or the bills of lading came to hand?] In the contract which is constituted by the letters [he referred to them] there is no stipulation as to payment against a bill of lading. The giving of a bill of lading was not a condition precedent to the acceptance of the bill. Suppose the captain had refused to give a bill of lading, and the bank could only forward a mate's receipt, still the buyers of the goods would be bound to take and pay for them. [QUAIN, J.—It is somewhat strong for the bank to say to the vendees, "You shall be liable upon your bill of exchange for 2000*l.*, without having either cargo or documents." Such a contract might be made, but it would be unusual.] This contract was unusual. The danger of not possessing a bill of lading would be nil.

Secondly, assuming it to be a condition precedent that the bill of lading should be forwarded, this bill was sufficient. A bill of lading is not a technical document like a bill of exchange, but is a mercantile instrument capable of much variation. The bank, as Cowan's agents, were bound to do the best they could for him, and did it. They chartered a ship of reasonable size for the rye, and in the ordinary course filled up the vacant space with maize, thereby saving dead freight, and gave Messrs. Cowan an option of taking the maize or of declining it, and in the latter case offered to take it themselves. Then their conduct with regard to the bill of lading was also reasonable, for the captain would naturally object to giving a separate bill of lading and say, "If I hand you a separate bill of lading for the rye, and the maize is left on board, so that demurrage is incurred, I shall not have a lien for it on the rye." It is a question of fact whether the conduct of the bank was or was not reasonable; and Ireland v. Livingstone (27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 79; L. Rep. 5 H. of L. Cas. 395) decides that when a principal puts a foreign agent into a difficulty, and the latter acts reasonably, the principal must abide by what is done on his behalf. [ARCHIBALD, J.—But what difficulty was there here? BRAMWELL, B.—In that case the House of Lords seem to have thought that the agent, to whom a letter of dubious meaning was sent, had only two courses to adopt. But with all reverence for the supreme tribunal, I venture to think that there was a third open to him, for he might have said to his principal, "You have sent me a letter which I cannot construe."] The document tendered was, under the circumstances, a reasonable one: (Tamvaco v. Lucas, 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 66, 231; 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 400; 1 B. & S. 185.)

Thirdly, there has been a waiver of any objection to this bill of lading. And the position of the bank was altered by the non-repudiation by Messrs. Cowan, when the letter of the 24th April was sent to them (§ 15 of the case). There was no distinct repudiation until the 8th May: (§ 21.) [He referred to Kreuger v. Blanck (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 128; L. Rep. 5 Ex. 179; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 470).]

Fourthly, assuming the bill of lading ought to have been corrected, that need not have been done at any earlier date. Messrs. Cowan give a bad reason for refusing the bill of lading, viz., that the subvendees would not take the corn.

HOLL, in reply, was requested by the Court to address his argument to the question of waiver alone.—The circumstances show that it never was the intention of Messrs. Cowan to accept this bill of lading. They were reluctant, however, to reject it until they had satisfied themselves that their subvendees would not accept it, and only kept the matter open a reasonable time, in order to see if they would do so, and to obviate the necessity of acting on their strict rights. There are two material circumstances to be considered: first, that they had not the charter-party before them; secondly, that they had not seen the bill of lading. That appears from the correspondence. The letter of the 27th April 1868 was indeed written by our agents, but they were also agents of the bank. No acts appear to have been done on either side tending to show that either party considered that there had been an acceptance of waiver of the bill of lading.

Feb. 7.—BRAMWELL, B.—We are all of opinion that the judgment below must be affirmed.

The facts are, that the defendants bought, and the plaintiffs sold, 1400 quarters of rye, to be shipped at Salonica "free on board." The plaintiffs, charterers, were employed on behalf of the defendants, to ship and load the rye, and the plaintiffs were to accept in payment of the price a bill of exchange at three months, no doubt meaning three months from the time of shipment. That is clear, either from the original letters or those two which Mr. Mathew says constituted the contract, which would be the same as from the date of the bill of lading, because the date of the bill of lading is the date of shipment. Now the rye was shipped, and the defendants might have received it if they had thought fit. Then the plaintiffs sue for the price, saying that everything had been done necessary for them to do to entitle them thereto, seeing that the rye had been shipped, and the defendants could have had it if they pleased. The defendants say: "We are bound to accept bills of exchange as against bills of lading for the rye only; you shipped rye and maize, and took one bill of lading for both, and we are not bound to take such shipment and such bill of lading." The plaintiffs reply: "You had no right to any bill of lading at all, there was no such stipulation in the contract, and you could have got the rye separate from the maize, by the arrangement which we tendered to you." To which the defendants rejoin that what was done was done in the way of specially indorsing the bill of lading, and tendering was too late, but afterwards: "Supposing you had a right to such a bill of lading as you say we ought to have got, we only were bound to get you such a bill of lading as we could; our conduct was reasonable. We have chartered a vessel which would hold more than 1400 quarters of rye; if we had sent it with rye only, you would have had to pay dead freight, so we, for your benefit, put maize also on board, which we did not ask you to take on your own account, but on ours, and our conduct was reasonable in getting such a bill of lading as we could; but even if it were not, it is incorrect to say that we did not ship rye, but shipped rye and maize. We made one shipment of rye and one of maize, and if we did not get you a proper bill of lading, that would only give a right of cross action, and not give a right to reject the rye and the maize, the property of the rye having vested in you on shipment, and not being divested by the subsequent shipment of the maize under the one bill of lading." And the plaintiffs further say: "Whatever may be the proper solution of all these questions on both sides, you agreed to the shipment as it was made and to the bill of lading as made out, and agreed to take to the rye and accept the bill of exchange, so that, supposing you had a right in the first instance to reject the goods and not pay for them, you had abandoned that right, and engaged to take the rye as shipped under the bill of lading, as made out." If that be so, it is unnecessary to determine the other questions. Then is that so? That depends on two or three letters.

But, first, what was the position of the parties? The ship had been chartered, no supposition existing that it had been unduly chartered, and that too large a vessel had been taken for the rye. It was too large, but it was to the interest of the defendants that something more should be put on board. It is clear, therefore, that in putting the maize on board, the plaintiffs did something, not for their own benefit, but for the benefit of the defendants. And, although I am not about to blame the defendants, whose case is rather unfortunate, for their cargo was rejected, probably if the rye had not gone down in price, there would have been no practical difficulty in delivery, under the bill of lading, of the rye to one person and the maize to another, and no practical difficulty in the bill of lading being so indorsed and so dealt with and such a guarantee taken from the plaintiffs that the defendants could have sold the rye as conveniently as if the bill of lading were made out for rye only. Bearing these facts in mind, let us see what the letters are.

The first, to which I need here refer, is from Messrs. Horsley, Kibble, and Co., the agents of the bank, and is as follows:—“Agatha. Enclosed invoices and drafts for cash. The maize is on the same bill of lading as the rye, and dated the 7th April; as there would no doubt be a loss on the maize, we presume you will wish to leave it for account of shippers.” That means, that although you take to the bill of lading, you will not take to the maize on your own account, “but if you will accept the bill we will get an undertaking from the bank to hold you harmless for so doing.” Now, supposing the defendants had said, in as many words: “We agree, send us the indemnity. You have sent in the bill of exchange, and we will accept the bill, and then when the rye and maize are delivered, although we, on our side, may take the maize, it will be understood that it is taken, not on our own account, but on account of the shippers.” That is their meaning. “The bill of lading is in the banker’s hands; we have sent invoices of the rye only to the buyers.” But what is in fact the answer. “Agatha. The drafts and invoices of this cargo are to hand, and we observe that the bills of lading are in the hands of the Imperial Ottoman Bank. We think, after what has happened with the Charlotte Ida’s cargo, we are entitled to ask a guarantee from the bank that the Agatha shall deliver the weight specified in the invoice . . .” Does that mean, We are not going to take the rye or that we are? There can be but one answer given, viz., that “we are going to take the rye on the terms which you have offered.” Then it proceeds: “Would you have the kindness to ask the bank for this, and telegraph to us on Monday their acquiescence or the contrary. We would be obliged also by a copy, or the original, of the charter party, and copy of the bill of lading, for our government.” That means, as we are going to take the rye “we wish to have precise copies of the document, in order that we may know what our rights and obligations are.” Then they say: “We leave, as you suggest, the maize to the shippers; the transaction in rye is a very bad one. We return you enclosed drafts and invoices of maize, 131l. 9s. 11d.” It is not said in words, but the implication is: “We keep the bill and the invoice for the rye, as we are going to take to them, notwithstanding the terms in which they are shipped.”

Now that correspondence goes on, and for my own part I think that the matter was there concluded; I think that that was a new bargain. I do not know that it was so much a waiver as that it was a new bargain between the parties then concluded. But, however, if we are to look at the whole of the facts, the correspondence proceeds thus: We have your favour of the 25th, and have returned the documents of the maize, per Agatha, to the Imperial Ottoman Bank’s agency here. We think it may be as well for you not to accept the bill for the rye for a few days at least, as we expect the buyers to take up the bill of lading, and thus save the trouble, under discount.” Now it is manifest that the understanding of Horsley, Kibble, and Co. was, that the defendants were bound to take the rye as they suggest,—“The bill is still in the hands of the bankers; let it stay so, because until you get it with the special in-bursement and the undertaking, you are not bound to accept the bill of exchange, as the one is to be exchanged for the other”—that is to say, the bill of exchange for the bill of lading—“do not you accept the bill of exchange for the present, and do not require the bank to give you the bill of lading for the present.” Then they go on to deal with the other matters, pointing out that “the bankers never undertake to deliver invoice weight, but only to ship it, and their agency here would make no undertaking of the kind you refer to.” That was the reply to the defendants’ answer to Horsley, Kibble, and Co.’s first letter. Then the defendants remain silent, not making any objections that they had not got that guarantee from the bank or anything of the kind; they remain silent until the 8th May, when they return the bill for the rye unaccepted.

Now, under these circumstances, the defendants, knowing all that had been done had been not unreasonably done, unless it was in the particular of taking one bill of lading instead of two, that everything else had been properly and well done for their benefit—that there was not, as I have no doubt there would not have been, any practical difficulty in dealing with the bill of lading for the rye, with such an undertaking as was offered—or, looking at the terms of this correspondence, and being bound to draw conclusions of fact upon this matter, it is not the natural and proper conclusion of fact to come to that the defendants agreed to take to the rye as it had been shipped, under the circumstances in which it had been shipped, and to accept the bill of exchange? One difficulty arose from the bill of lading not being sent to the defendants. It is quite true that the plaintiffs would not be entitled to the acceptance of the bill of exchange if they had sent the bill of lading, notwithstanding the new agreement which was come to, as I say, between the parties; but the reason they did not send the bill of lading was, in the first instance, because it was deemed expedient that they should keep it, and the reason they did not send it after the parties were a little at arms’ length with each other, was, because the defendants gave them notice that it was no use sending them the bill of lading with the undertaking mentioned in Horsley’s letter of the 25th. The reason it was not sent in the first instance, was because it was not thought expedient that it should be sent to them, and the reason it was not sent afterwards, when the defendants refused to accept the bill, was because the defendants, in fact, dispensed with any tender of the bill of lading, and the undertaking to hold them harmless, by intimating that though it were tendered they would not accept it.

It seems to me, therefore, that supposing the defendants were right on all the other points, there is here a new agreement come to by which they were bound, and in respect of which they were liable in this action. It is suggested that the meaning of this expression in Horsley, Kibble, and Co.’s letter of the 25th April, “If you will accept the bill,” is “If you will accept the bill for the maize;” but I declare I do not think so. I think it means, “We presume you will not take to the maize; and if you will accept the bill for the rye you will be entitled to the bill of lading, and then we will get an undertaking from the bank to hold you harmless in respect of the maize.” However, I really do not think it much matters, because either way it is an offer on the part of the bank to Horsley and Co., which is accepted either as it is made, or with a qualification by the defendants, because, if it means, "If you will accept the bill for the maize, we will get you an undertaking;" then they say, "We will not accept a bill for the maize, but merely for the rye"—and that is a qualification of the offer which has been made with the consent of the parties.

In either view it seems to me, therefore, to have been a good new agreement between the parties, and therefore the defendants are liable in this action. Of course the cross action will follow the fate of the other. Thinking, as we do, that this action by the bank against Cowan is maintainable, of course we think the cross action is not.

Master — Wages — Costs — Detention money — Reviewing taxation.

In calculating, on taxation of costs in a cause for the recovery of a master's wages, the amount due to the master for detention money and board whilst detained ashore as a witness, the fact that he through his wife carries on a business will not deprive him of his right to be allowed detention money; but if he lives at his place of business during his detention, the fact that he can live more cheaply at home than elsewhere is to be taken into consideration in fixing the amount to be allowed for subsistence money.

This was a cause of wages instituted on the 25th April 1884 on behalf of the master of the ship Royal Family to recover his wages and disbursements. The owners disputed the claim, and made a counter claim against the plaintiff, and the accounts were referred to the Liverpool District Registrar, assisted by merchants. The presence of the master was required to give evidence on his own behalf, and he was detained on this business till 12th Sept. 1874. The registrar and merchants found that he was entitled to the sum of 304*l.* 19*s.* for wages and disbursements, and also to his costs of the reference; and a decree was made accordingly with costs. The costs were taxed by the district registrar, and the master was by the taxation allowed the sum of 100*l.* for the detention and for subsistence money during the time that he was detained ashore for the purposes of the suit. The time of his detention was computed by the registrar from 11th April, the date of the masters discharge, till 12th Sept. The sum allowed was equivalent to rather less than 14*s.* a day, to cover both board and loss of wages. To this taxation the defendants objected on the grounds, first, that it was in itself excessive, being above the rate usually allowed to masters in the plaintiff's position, his wages being only 15*l.* per month; secondly, that it ought not to be allowed at all in this particular case, because the plaintiff was the owner of a public house, and during the time that he was ashore he had been living at this house, and had been exercising his trade as a publican, and had not, therefore, been deprived of his means of earning a livelihood. The facts appeared upon an affidavit of the defendants. In reply, the plaintiff filed an affidavit, from which he stated "that for some years past my wife has been carrying on the business of a licensed victualler at Chester for her own benefit and for the maintenance of herself and children while I have been at sea, and that she still continues to do so in the same manner. That during the time aforesaid I have carried on, and still intend to carry on, a seafaring life, and should some months ago have returned to sea as a master mariner had not my solicitors required my presence before the registrar and merchants to rebut the charges which were brought against me in the defendants' counter claim."

E. C. Clarkson, for the defendants, in objection to the taxation, contended that the amount was excessive, and ought not to be allowed. The time allowed was too long, and could not date from before the institution of the cause.

Butt, Q.C., for the plaintiff, submitted that the plaintiff was entitled to be compensated for any loss he might sustain by reason of his detention, and that, although his wife kept a publichouse, he sustained loss of wages, and was put to a certain expense for his keep during the time he was ashore. It must be taken that he could have got employment at once.

E. C. Clarkson in reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is an application to the court to review the taxation of the plaintiff's bill of costs, upon the grounds which I will presently state.

The plaintiff was a master mariner, and he claimed 315*l.* 18*s.* 1*d.* The claim was disputed by the owners, who claimed on the other hand 2500*l.* The matter went before the Liverpool District Registrar, assisted by merchants, and they determined that the matter required investigation; that 1*l.* 14*s.* 4*d.* only was due to the owners out of the 2500*l.*, and 304*l.* 19*s.* was due to the master, and they allowed him the costs of the reference. On the taxation of costs the district registrar allowed the master 100*l.* for "detention and board," and against this allowance this appeal is made.

Two questions appear to have been raised: first whether, on principle, under the circumstances, any allowance at all ought to have been made to the master; the other whether the allowance made is not upon an excessive scale? It has been contended that, as the master kept a public-house, he does not fall within the principle upon which allowances are always made to witnesses detained to give evidence in a cause, inasmuch as he has not been debarred from earning his livelihood, but has been living by following his trade. I am satisfied upon the affidavit before me, which is not contradicted, that this was a trade carried on by the plaintiff's wife, and that as the plaintiff had been in the habit of earning his livelihood as a master mariner, there was every reasonable probability that, but for his being detained to give evidence in this cause, he would have been earning his livelihood in his usual manner. Therefore, upon principle, he is entitled to some allowance on account of his detention as a witness.

But then it is contended that the allowance made is upon too high a scale. The question is whether on the taxation of costs the 100*l.* is or is not an excessive taxation.

I am of opinion that the scale is excessive. In the first place the allowance was made to run from 11th April, about a fortnight before the suit was instituted, till 12th. Sept. The cause was instituted on 25th April, and he cannot claim before that date; but I think it reasonable to suppose that the plaintiff would have got a ship almost immediately after; and, therefore, if the time is made to run from 1st May, justice will be done. In the next place, the scale is larger than is allowed by this court, and larger than the circumstances required, because, although the fact of his being the licensed victualler does not deprive him of his right to the allowance, the fact that he can, if at home, sleep and live at a cheaper rate, is to be admitted.

I shall allow him 125 days at 10*s.* a day, and ten days at 15*s.* a day for extra expenses. That brings the amount allowed to 69*l.* 10*s.*, and I shall reduce the taxation by 30*l.* 10*s.*

ACHARD AND OTHERS v. RING AND OTHERS.

Ship and shipping—Fire—Extinguishing by scuttling—General or particular average—Custom.

Damage to cargo by scuttling a ship to put out a fire is the subject of general average contribution. There is no valid custom excluding the loss from general average.

The plaintiff chartered a ship from the defendant, and by the charter-party it was provided, "all questions of general average to be settled according to the custom of the London underwriters at Lloyd's."

A fire broke out on board, the ship was scuttled to extinguish it, and the cargo was damaged thereby. The loss was adjusted as general average, and the plaintiff brought the action to recover from the defendant the ship's contribution. The learned judge directed the jury that the loss was general average according to law, and the question was whether there was a valid custom excluding such loss from general average.

The jury found that no such custom existed, and the verdict was entered for the plaintiff.

See Stewart v. West India and Pacific Steamship Company, where a custom excluding damage to cargo for water poured down the hatches to extinguish a fire from general average was recognised, and held to govern the rights and liabilities of the parties: (ante, vol. 1, p. 528; ante, p. 32; L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 362). (a)

The dicta of text writers cannot be considered as any evidence of the existence of a custom.

THE facts of the case were admitted, and the only question to be tried was whether a custom exists at Lloyd's excluding from general average damage to cargo by scuttling to put out a fire.

The ship Cosmopolis was chartered by the plaintiff from the defendant under a charter-party for a voyage from Akyab to London or Liverpool with a cargo of rice. There was a stipulation in the charter-party to this effect, "All questions of general average to be settled according to the custom of the London underwriters at Lloyd's."

In the course of discharging the cargo at Liverpool a fire broke out, and in order to extinguish it the ship was scuttled, and a large proportion of the cargo much damaged; the charterer claimed to recover from the shipowner a proportion of the loss adjusted as general average. The question was, did the clause in the charter-party protect the shipowner—in other words is there a custom at Lloyd's excluding such loss from general average? Cohen, Q.C. and J. C. Mathew were counsel for the plaintiffs.

Benjamin, Q.C. and Baylis for the defendants.

A great deal of evidence was taken with reference to the alleged custom, the general purport of which, and of the arguments of counsel, appears from the summing-up of the Lord Chief Justice.

COCKBURN, C. J.—Gentlemen of the Jury: I think you thoroughly understand what is the issue you are to dispose of, namely, whether there is this custom among the underwriters at Lloyd's where a ship is scuttled with a view of extinguishing the fire that has broken out, and by reason of the water which the ship necessarily takes in when the ship is scuttled, the cargo is damaged, the loss accruing to the merchant shall be considered as particular average in respect of which he must have recourse to the underwriters, and not general average, in which case he would be entitled to come upon the shipowner. You are familiar with the doctrine that where a sacrifice of the cargo takes place for the preservation of the common venture of all concerned, owners of goods and owners of ship, that which is saved must contribute to make good the loss which he sustains whose ship or part of whose ship, whose goods or part of whose goods have been sacrificed for the common benefit.

Now, there is no doubt in this case the damage to these goods would be a loss which would come under the head of general average if it were not for this custom at Lloyd's, that is to say, supposing the custom to exist. Here, a fire having broken out in the ship, the ship was scuttled, and by reason of the ship being scuttled these goods were damaged. The ship is afterwards got up and is saved, but the goods, although still existing in specie, are so much deteriorated as to be of less value than the freight to be paid upon them; therefore there is a loss, and a very considerable loss, to the owner of the goods.

Now, does this custom exist which prevents him having recourse to the shipowner, as the plaintiff in this case seeks to do? It is quite clear that this custom is in opposition to, and in derogation of, the law of the land relating to insurance, and to the matter of average as between the shipowner and the owner of the goods. It would be general average according to the law of the land but for this custom, and therefore the custom militates against, and derogates from, the law of the land, and where a person sets up a custom of that sort in derogation of the law, he is bound to prove it, and prove it fully to the satisfaction of the jury. Where the law attaches certain consequences to any such act, it is competent to the parties by agreement between themselves to insist upon his foregoing the advantage the law gives him, and it is competent to the man to whom the law gives the advantage to waive it if he thinks proper. Therefore, if the parties chose to agree that that which was matter of general average should become matter of particular average, there would be nothing illegal in entering into such an arrangement, but where the law gives any advantage, and they are endeavouring to take away that advantage by reference to a particular custom, there that custom must be proved to the satisfaction of the tribunal which has to administer justice. The question is whether you are satisfied that this custom has been made out.

Now, a good deal of matter has been brought before you which, I think, strictly speaking, is inadmissible, and ought not to weigh in your decision. You have been told of a meeting, and some resolutions to which these average adjusters came (a). That is not at all binding; that is not legitimate evidence in this cause, neither were the passages read from certain authors upon this subject, who give you the result of their speculative opinions, in any way evidence, or admissible to bind you in your decision of this case. You must look to the evidence, and to the evidence alone.

Now, there is evidence certainly that where water has been admitted or thrown into the hold of a vessel for the purpose of extinguishing fire, and thereby damage has been occasioned to the goods contained in the vessel's hold, that has been excluded from matter of general average, and made matter of particular average; but it appears the average adjusters who come to tell you this was the practice do not apply it to the case of scuttling vessels, as regards past experience. Now, the first important witness, Mr. Lindley, whose experience ranges over a longer period than anybody else's, I think, cannot tell you a case of a ship that was scuttled, and so the learned counsel for the plaintiff says fairly enough, "If all that is proved is a custom that has reference to the admission of water into the hold, by its being thrown in, if that is the only case in which this custom is proved to have existed, you now seek to apply it to a new case, which is not identically the same; and, inasmuch as it is admitted on all hands that the custom is an irrational one, an objectionable one, an unjust one, do not extend it one hair's breadth beyond the limit to which it has already been carried." That is a fair argument, but I do not think that it is admissible to the extent that the learned counsel pushes it. I cannot help thinking that, although the second case may not be identical with the first, if the principle which applies to the first, and must be taken to be the foundation of the custom, applies in every point of view to the second, he must consider the second as concluded upon the principles of the first; and I certainly cannot see, nor has he been able to point out, any substantial difference between the case of water admitted into the hold for the purpose of extinguishing fire, and thereby doing damage to the goods; and the case of a ship being sunk into the water in order that the water may have precisely the same effect, that of extinguishing the fire. The water is admitted to the hold by artificial means, such as lifting it in buckets, or by the use of a steam engine, or in any way you think proper, or which your imagination can suggest; water is cast into the hold and puts out the fire, and so damages the goods. What does it matter whether you pour the water by artificial means into the ship's hold, or cut a hole in the side of the ship, and let her down, and so let the water come in? Practically, it comes to the same, and I cannot help thinking that if a custom is shown to exist in one case, and a particular principle is resorted to, it should be resorted to in the other case.

That leaves open the question whether you are satisfied a custom does exist as to casting in water through the hold for the purpose of extinguishing fire. A custom does seem to exist among certain adjusters in London—I may say the majority, and there appears not only to have been an opinion in such cases as the one we are considering that the loss should be set down not to particular average, but to general average, but it appears to have been their practice to do so. How that practice originated appears to be matter of speculation, but I cannot help thinking that the true reason is the one that occurred to myself, and that is that it is so much more convenient. The person who goes to the average adjuster in the first instance is the man who has sustained the loss. The merchant whose goods have been damaged seeks an adjuster to settle his claim, that he may make his claim against whom he may be advised, and naturally enough it will occur to the adjuster, who is his adviser and friend, that it is the far more simple thing, if your policy will cover the loss, to go to the underwriter and say, "My goods have been damaged to such and such an extent. Be so good as to pay me." And inasmuch as it is quite clear that where there is this particular damage the underwriter must pay nineteen times out of twenty; the underwriter pays, and, for aught we know, afterwards makes good his loss by representation to the goods owner, and getting the contribution to which the goods owner would have been entitled. I cannot help thinking that must have been the origin of this practice, but that the practice does appear to have been continued amongst average adjusters upon this evidence cannot be contradicted. The learned counsel for the plaintiffs says it may have existed among average adjusters, but by the terms of this contract the custom, not of the average adjusters, but of the underwriters at Lloyd's, is to be the test. The learned counsel for the defendants says, "Do you show it existed among underwriters at Lloyd's?" And he says fairly enough, "You have not called a single underwriter at Lloyd's or anyone connected with that institution, or familiar with its practice, to show the underwriters acquiesce in this principle." Well, I think what I threw out in the course of the discussion to a certain extent affords an answer, because if you are satisfied that this practice has prevailed uniformly and universally in the

(a) The meeting referred to was a meeting of the principal average adjusters who, in accordance with the decision in Stewart v. The West India and Pacific Steamship Company (ante vol. 1, p. 528), resolved to treat such a loss as this as a general average loss: (See ante, p. 32.—ED.)

ANDERSON v. MORICE.

adjustment of averages by that useful class of persons, the average adjusters, and that underwriters have paid without difficulty and without resistance the claim as so adjusted and made out, it is very difficult indeed to suppose that the underwriters must not have been familiar with and acquainted with this practice. Therefore the learned counsel for the defendants was entitled to say, "it is enough for me to prove that the average adjusters had uniformly acted on this principle and practice to ask a jury to infer that that principle must have been known and acquiesced in by the underwriters at Lloyd's in my case." The custom would be as much custom of the underwriters at Lloyd's as it would be a custom with the average adjusters. So the matter stood on the evidence adduced on the part of the defendants.

Then the learned counsel for the plaintiffs meets that by calling several underwriters or persons familiar with insurance matters at Lloyd's, who all say, "We never heard of such a practice." The counsel for the defendants says, "Though you may never have heard of it, never known of it, never dreamt of it, still, if I can show the practice has existed for a long time so as to become an established practice, it is not because particular individuals have never fallen in with cases of that description, and therefore never had experience of the practice, that the practice is not to be taken to exist." To a certain extent that argument is well founded; but it must be taken with this exception, that it must shake your confidence in the evidence which goes to show this practice, when gentlemen who have been for many years at Lloyd's never heard of it, because they would have been in this position if any one of them had been called upon to pay—suppose, for instance, he had been called upon to pay particular average, and he had refused, and he had been told "Aye, but although you knew nothing about it you are still liable, because of the existence of this custom," there would have been the evident hardship of making a man liable upon a custom, the existence of which is not universally known in the market or the body to which he individually belongs. Certainly, therefore, one would expect that where it is said and sought to be proved that a particular practice derogating from the ordinary law exists in a particular department of business, it would be so general and universal that the knowledge of it would have extended to all the members of that particular institution.

At the same time, if you are perfectly satisfied that this practice did exist, although it has now undergone a change, then although the fact that a certain number of the members of Lloyd's knew nothing about it, might very legitimately tend to shake your confidence in the evidence by which it is sought to establish the practice or the custom, yet if the evidence in favour of the custom so completely satisfies your minds of the existence of the custom, then the ignorance of a particular individual of its existence would not be an answer to the affirmative evidence if that affirmative evidence brought conviction to your mind. You must really upon this evidence apply your minds to the question whether this practice is established or not. It is admitted on all hands to be a bad practice, it is one the abrogation of which we must all be glad of; but still, if the parties contracted on the assumption of its existence, that is to say, if the defendant was perfectly justified in saying, "I have stipulated for the settlement of any claim of general average, according to the custom of the underwriters at Lloyd's," he may say, "I am perfectly entitled to insist on that stipulation as the basis and condition of our contract; though that custom may be one which persons may think wrong, that is nothing to me, I can only conclude our bargain on the terms that that custom shall be part of the conditions of the contract." If he has stipulated for that he is entitled to the benefit of it, whatever you may think of the practice. The only question is, not whether the practice is good or bad, but whether it did in point of fact exist at the time this contract was entered into. The decision of the Court of Queen's Bench (Stewart v. The West India and Pacific Steam Navigation Company, ante vol. 1, p. 528; ante, p. 32) upon the case you have heard mentioned had the effect, and a very salutary effect it was, of leading those who were in the habit of making these adjustments upon the principle in question, to desist from so doing, but that does not in any way affect the question whether that practice existed before.

Now, all I would say in conclusion is, it is not enough to constitute a practice that a certain number of individuals should entertain a belief that that practice or custom exists, and act accordingly, because they may be mistaken; and in a great establishment like the commercial institutions of this country, a practice in derogation of the law, unless it is of general application in that particular department to which it is sought to be applied, ought not to be acted upon. If you believe that throughout the great mass of the average adjusters in London there was this particular practice established, that the matter we are now considering should be deemed matter of particular and not of general average, then the defendant is entitled to your verdict. If you think that custom has not been made out so as to apply to the underwriters at Lloyd's generally, as well as to the average adjusters, then the plaintiff is entitled to your verdict.

You need not trouble about the amount, because that will be settled out of court. The question is, did this practice exist at Lloyd's at the time this policy was effected? That no such practice exists now is certain, because all parties have agreed it shall not be acted upon. Whether it existed before is the question for you to determine.

The jury found for the plaintiff.

COCKBURN, C.J.—You are of opinion, gentlemen, the custom is not made out.

staunch and sound, and had recently been thoroughly repaired, and had a few days before been examined without any defects being discoverable, sank suddenly at her moorings, when she had taken in five-sixths of her cargo. No direct evidence could be given why she foundered, nor could any certain cause be assigned for her doing so :

Held, that these facts raised a presumption of unseaworthiness which mere conjectures and suggestions of a cause could not displace ; but that the evidence of the ship's excellent conduct up to the time immediately preceding the loss, of extensive repairs recently done, of careful surveys recently made, and of the localisation of the injury, was properly left to the jury on the questions as to seaworthiness and loss by a peril insured against, and was evidence on which they were justified in finding a loss from perils insured against, and were not bound to say that the vessel was unseaworthy.

The plaintiff had made a contract in these terms : " Bought the cargo of new crop rice per Sunbeam, at 9s. 1½d. per cwt., cost and freight . . . Payment by seller's draft on purchaser at six months' sight, with documents attached." He then effected an insurance " at and from Rangoon by the Sunbeam on rice, as interest may appear, amount of invoice to be deemed the value." When the Sunbeam sank at her moorings in the Rangoon river she had nearly finished loading ; the rest of the rice necessary to complete the cargo was alongside in lighters. After she sank bills of lading for the rice which had been actually shipped were signed by the captain, and the sellers drew bills of exchange which were accepted and paid by the purchaser, the plaintiff, to whom the bills of lading had been indorsed.

Held, in an action on the policy, that there was no binding appropriation of the rice in the lighters to the contract, that the property had not passed, and the purchaser had no insurable interest in such rice.

Held, as to the rice which was on board the ship when she sank, that there was such an appropriation of the rice already loaded, the ship being named in the contract, as to prevent the seller from withdrawing it without the buyer's consent ; that the buyer would have had an option of accepting or rejecting the incomplete cargo, had it arrived and been tendered to him, and that such option remained to him after the loss, in fact ; that the property in a full cargo would have passed to him at once on the loading, and that his option of rejection could only arise from the cargo being deficient, and if he did not exercise such option, the terms of the contract were applicable to the lesser cargo, and it would, therefore, be at his risk, and the property would have passed to him from the loading ; that the existence of this option, if he declined after the loss to exercise it, did not deprive the purchaser of his insurable interest in the rice to its full value ; that here, therefore, the property was in the plaintiff at the time of the loss, and he had an insurable interest.

Held, further, that even if the property in the rice on board did not pass legally to the plaintiff, he had an insurable interest in it, because he had an existing contract with regard to it from the time of its being loaded, by virtue of which he had an expectancy of benefit depending on the safe arrival of the rice.

Held, that this was a valued policy.

THIS was an action on a policy of insurance on a cargo of goods and merchandise in a ship called the Sunbeam, at and from Rangoon to any port in the United Kingdom or Continent, and was to recover 6000*l.* for the loss of the cargo so insured.

The action was tried before Brett, J., at the Guildhall, during the sittings after Hilary Term 1873.

It appeared that on the 2nd Feb. 1871, the plaintiff, a London merchant, entered into a contract for the purchase of a cargo of Rangoon rice, in these terms :

2nd Feb. 1871.—Bought for account of Anderson and Co., of Borradaile, Schiller, and Co., the cargo of new crop Rangoon rice, per Sunbeam, 707 tons register, No. 1254, in veritas, at 9s. 1½d. per cwt., cost and freight expected to be March shipment, but contract to be void should vessel not arrive at Rangoon before April 1871. Payment by seller's draft on purchaser at six months' sight, with documents attached.

He then, on the 3rd Feb. 1871, effected an insurance with the defendant in these words :

At and from Rangoon to any port or place of discharge in the United Kingdom or Continent, by the Sunbeam, warranted to sail from Rangoon on or before the 1st April, on rice, as interest may appear. Amount of invoice to be deemed the value ; average payable on every 500 bags. The said merchandises, &c., are and shall be valued at 5500*l.*, part of 6000*l.*

The ship sailed from Point de Galle in ballast and arrived in the Rangoon river on the 2nd March 1871, and anchored in the usual place at the mouth of the river Pegu where it runs into the Rangoon, about five miles below Rangoon itself. She was anchored by two anchors, sixty fathoms apart, one up and one down the river. Having discharged her ballast, she began to load rice on the 9th March, and continued loading till the 30th March, at which date there were 8875 bags of rice on board, and 1600 bags, which would have completed the cargo, in lighters lying alongside. The ship then suddenly began to leak very fast, and there was evidence that the water was heard rushing in near the stern ; it was found impossible to get the water under, and it increased so rapidly that on the 31st March, the following day, she sank.

Evidence was given that the Sunbeam had been thoroughly overhauled and reclassified in 1869, that in several long voyages she had behaved very well, that she was quite tight and dry on the voyage from Point de Galle, and that while lying in the Rangoon river she had been examined by the captain and some of the seams recaulked. There was also evidence that heaps were sometimes formed in the river by vessels throwing ballast overboard, that the tide is strong, that the draught of the ship when loaded was 19ft. 6in., and the depth of water at her anchorage was 22ft. at low water.

After the ship sank, the captain signed bills of lading for the cargo which had been actually shipped, which were indorsed to the plaintiff. The sellers drew bills of exchange for the price, which the plaintiff duly accepted and met. A claim was then made upon the underwriters, all the facts being disclosed to them.

At the trial, the defendant contended that there was no evidence of loss by perils of the sea, that the ship was not proved conclusively to be seaworthy, and that the plaintiff had no insurable interest in the cargo.

Upon the above facts and evidence the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, and leave was reserved to the defendant to move to enter a verdict for him, if the court should be of opinion that there was no evidence of a loss by perils insured against, or if the evidence showed that the ship was not seaworthy, or if it showed that there was no insurable interest in the plaintiff.

Accordingly, a rule was obtained by Sir John Karslake, Q.C., in Easter Term 1873, upon these grounds, and also for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, or to reduce the damages, against which, in Easter Term 1874,

Sir H. James, Q.C., Watkin Williams, Q.C., and J. C. Mathew, showed cause.—First, was this ship lost by perils insured against, that is, by perils of the sea? It is not necessary for the plaintiff to prove the cause of the loss; but in fact evidence was given suggesting several causes, any of which were consistent with the fact of the perfect seaworthiness of the ship at the inception of the risk, and which were, in the opinion of competent witnesses, probable causes of the ship sinking so suddenly as she did, and which were perils of the sea. To establish against this evidence that the loss was not within the perils insured against, the defendant must prove that the ship was unseaworthy, and so the two first points must be in effect argued together. It was suggested that the ship might at low water have taken the ground upon heaps of ballast, which it was proved were customarily thrown into the river; that she might have sat upon her anchors, or caught upon one as she swung with the tide, and so have damaged her bottom. Then there was direct evidence of seaworthiness given; it was proved that she had made several long voyages, and had always behaved very well; that she was always tight and dry; that in the immediately preceding voyage she was perfectly seaworthy, and did not leak at all then, nor while she was lying in the river waiting for this cargo, up to the 30th March, the day before she sank. She was overhauled while at Rangoon, and the caulking found to be in good order. The suggestion made by the defendant that her seams had opened, and that as she was loaded they came below the water line and caused the leak, is contradicted by the distinct evidence of the examination of the seams; and to make this available to the defence it would be necessary to show that on the 9th March, at the time when the loading began and the policy attached, she was unseaworthy. But the seams were examined, and where necessary recaulked before the 9th, and during the loading she did not leak at all, though when the sudden and violent leak began—too violent to be accounted for by gaping seams only—she had as much as five-sixths of her full cargo on board, and must have been well down in the water. [BRETT, J.—Sir J. Karslake suggested that it was not the duty of the captain to go round and examine the ship, but of the carpenter, and you only produced the captain.] But if he did in fact examine, that is enough. [DENMAN, J.—May not the ship have been unseaworthy at the time she was lost, though not at the time she was insured?] If there were defects which would have been made good before her voyage she was seaworthy. The condition of her seams would not be an unseaworthiness to affect the policy. One contention of the defendant is, that the captain improperly loaded the ship too rapidly, that having a motive to complete by the 1st of April, he hurried the loading so that the seams had not time to take up as the vessel got down lower in the water; but if this were so, it would be a loss for which the assured are entitled to recover, upon the authority of Sadler v. Dixon (8 M. & W. 895), where it was held that the underwriters are liable for the consequences of the wilful but not barratrous act of the master and crew in rendering the vessel unseaworthy before the end of the voyage, by throwing overboard a part of the ballast. Then, again, it is said, this, not being absolutely proved to be a loss caused by a specific cause capable of being assigned, is not a loss by perils of the sea. But Lord Ellenborough's judgment in Cullen v. Builer (5 M. & S. 461), shows that although the loss of a ship by being fired into by mistake was perhaps not a peril of the sea, yet it would come under the words in the policy, "all other perils and losses." There the cause assigned was expressly not a peril of the sea in the sense of its being ex marinis tempestatis discrimine; here no foreign cause can be assigned, and the presumption, therefore, is, that it was a peril of the sea. But, again, from the case cited, it would seem to be a material question to ask, was not this a peril within the policy, even if it be admitted not to be a peril of the sea, strictly so called.

Then, on the next point, the plaintiff might contend that the property in the rice passed by the appropriation of the goods put and to be put on board, but it is enough to say that he had an insurable interest in that which was on board at the time of the loss. In Joyce v. Swan (17 C. B., N. S. 84), where the price had not been definitively agreed upon, it was held that the property in the goods passed by the contract, the goods having been shipped to order; and Willes, J., goes even beyond this, and says: "I am inclined to go further; for it appears to me that, if what was done by S. and Co. was, to put the goods on board with the intention of fulfilling M.'s order, even if, by reason of some special circumstances, the property did not pass on shipment, yet, by reason of the risk, the buyer might insure the cargo in respect of the interest he had in it. It is like the case of a tenant of a house bound by a covenant to insure; though he has no longer an interest in the house, yet by reason of his covenant, he has an interest in the insurance." See also

Seagrave v. The Union Marine Insurance Company, 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 479; L. Rep. 1 C. P. 305; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 331.

In this case the plaintiff did incur a risk in relation to the non-arrival of the cargo. [BRETT, J.—It is sufficient to say that he would have made profit upon arrival.] The cargo was sufficiently earmarked, because it was in the contract, "cargo per Sunbeam," and it is no valid argument that the whole cargo was not on board, because, suppose the captain had been compelled by bad weather to slip his cable and run to sea with only part on board, and the ship was lost at sea, would not that clearly be a loss of cargo? [BRETT, J.—At what moment do you say the policy attaches?] At the time of shipment. Ebsworth v. The Alliance Marine Insurance Company (ante, p. 125; 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 479; L. Rep. 8 C. P. 596) gives the general test as to insurable interest; it is when there was an existing contract with regard to the goods by virtue of which the plaintiff had an expectancy of benefit and advantage arising out of or depending on their safe arrival. The date of the insurable interest accruing depends on the true construction of the contract, and in no way on the policy; it is a question of purchase and sale. The contract is an executory contract, made on the 2d Feb. 1871, and it says, "Bought, &c., the cargo per Sunbeam." The cost and freight, but not the insurance, are included; it is, therefore, important to have a definition of cargo. As to its not necessarily meaning a whole cargo, and that the court will not take a mere dictionary definition, see Houghton v. Gilbert (7 C. & P. 701); it is a question for the jury to decide whether cargo in the contract is satisfied by such a shipment as was effected here. Sargent v. Reed (2 Strange, 1227) was cited as the authority in that case, but it only goes so far as to say that cargo is an intelligible term as referred to a ship, and did not make a prescription to take three bushels out of a cargo bad as being unreasonable or uncertain. BRETT, J.—Your argument goes to the length that the "cargo of Sunbeam" can exist before a single bag is put on board.] Yes, it exists as soon as it is appropriated to or put into the custody of the ship. Here all but a few hundred bags was loaded, and the remainder was in lighters alongside the ship, and in the charge of the people of the ship. There was here an authority to appropriate the rice to the contract, and so the case comes within the rule in Aldridge v. Johnson (7 E. & B. 885), commented on in Jenner v. Smith (L. Rep. 4 C. P. 270). The vendor had sent down to the landing-place a cargo for the Sunbeam, and thereupon there was an insurable interest in the plaintiff in that cargo. So that we say that here there are all the elements necessary to create an insurable interest within the definition of Lawrence, J., in Lucena v. Craufurd (2 B. & P. N. R. 269), and in Barclay v. Cousins (2 East, 544). In favour of the plaintiff also is Sparkes v. Marshall (2 Bing N. C. 761). Is not the meaning of the contract here that the risk of the shipment is to be the purchaser's? The cargo was at the purchaser's risk, although payment was to be made after arrival. The amount having to be ascertained by subsequent weighing on delivery does not make it less at buyer's risk: (see Castle v. Playford, ante, vol. 1, p. 225; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 315; L. Rep. 7 Ex. 98.) The purchaser here also would have been liable to pay for this cargo even if it had been lost. [BRETT, J.—Would the shipowner be liable for a loss if a barge had sunk?] The charterer is bound to load the ship, and here the whole cargo had been taken from the shore and brought to the ship, and the mate was directing the loading of the last of the bags from the lighters. Jones v. The Neptune Insurance Company (ante, vol. 1, p. 416; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 308; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 702) will be cited on the other side, where "from the loading" was held to mean from the complete loading, but that was a policy on freight, and was distinctly limited as being "from the port of loading," not "at and from," and so had reference only to the voyage, and attached as soon as it commenced. So also Kreuger v. Blanc (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 470; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 128; L. Rep. 5 Ex. 179) which is quite distinguishable in principle from the present case. It was a contract of sale of a cargo, which was held (Martin, B., dissentiente) not to be satisfied by the tender of a part of a cargo, even though the quantity corresponded with the order in the contract. That case was also discussed in Ireland v. Livingstone (ubi sup.) in the House of Lords, and doubt thrown upon it in the judgment of Blackburn, J., so that the court will not be disposed to press it beyond its immediate application, and it is submitted it has no application to the very different circumstances of the present case. They referred also to

ANDERSON v. MORICE.

The Bank of Ireland v. Perry, 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 845; L. Rep. 7 Ex. 14.

Sir J. B. Karstlake, Q.C., Butt, Q.C., and Cohen, Q.C., for the defendant.—There are really only the two questions: First, whether the loss was by perils of the sea; and, secondly, whether the plaintiff had an insurable interest in the cargo at the time of the loss.

It must be admitted that the plaintiff had prima facie a case of seaworthiness, that is to say, if there had been no evidence, the defendant would have had to prove unseaworthiness. But there was evidence which rebutted the prima facie presumption, and the mere conjectural suggestions are valueless. The probability of a hole being knocked in the ship's bottom by a ballast heap is rendered nil by the evidence that there was an active police force at Rangoon, which prevented the discharge of ballast into the river, and it was admitted that such discharge was, as much as possible, prevented; then, the stream runs six to seven knots an hour, and no heap could accumulate. Besides this negative evidence, it was proved that ballast was a valuable article of sale. As to the anchors, the ship was anchored up and down stream and was thirty fathoms from each anchor, and never nearer. But she was a wooden ship, and had not been in dry dock since March 1869, and a 1400-ton ship came into collision with her a few days before—the mate said, without damaging her. So, as far as the evidence goes, it is that she was lost without any cause. But peril of the sea means some cause from without. [BRETT, J.—If the evidence of seaworthiness was conclusive, and she sank without any cause, how would it be?] The onus of proof would be shifted. It is true that a ship may be seaworthy at the commencement of the risk and become unseaworthy an hour afterwards; but in such case the presumption is that she really was unseaworthy before, and the onus probandi is on the assured to show that the inability arose from causes subsequent. This is Lord Eldon's language in Watson v. Clarke (1 Dow, 336). To the same effect is Parker v. Potts (3 Dow, 336), and even more strong is Douglas v. Scougall (4 Dow, 269), where in an insurance case Lord Eldon says that the honest belief of the owners and carpenters is no certain answer, for they may be mistaken in fact, and if a vessel sails and encounters a storm and is damaged, unless the damage done be such as can fairly be considered the effects of the storm, the implied warranty is not complied with. [BRETT, J., refers to Prescott v. The Union Marine Insurance Company (1 Wharton's Rep. Pennsylvania, 399.)] That is an authority that, upon facts similar to these, it ought not to be left to the jury to presume seaworthiness or otherwise. But even assuming seaworthiness, there is still the onus on the plaintiff to show a loss by the perils of the sea. The case of Paterson v. Hurreis (5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 53; 1 B. & S. 336; 1 Mar. Law Cas., O. S., 124) shows that the result of ordinary wear and tear is not a peril of the sea. Cockburn, C.J., says: "The wear and tear of a ship, the decay of her sheathing, the action of worms on her bottom, have been properly held not to be included in the insurance against perils of the seas, as being the unavoidable consequences of the service to which the vessel is exposed." Then it becomes a question for the jury whether the loss in the particular case was caused by perils of the sea, or by the unseaworthiness of the ship: (see Thompson v. Hopper, 6 E. & B. 172; and 1 E. B. & E. 1038, and Fawcus v. Sarsfield, 6 E. & B. 192.) In the latter case Lord Campbell says, "Although she was not seaworthy when she sailed, it must be taken, according to my view of the case, that the policy attached; but, unless this loss arose from perils insured against, it cannot be cast upon the underwriters." It would seem that a peril insured against must be the efficient cause or occasion of the loss: (see Phillips on Insurance, s. 1131.) They cited also

Next on the question of insurable interest. Did the property in the rice pass to the plaintiff? If not, he had no insurable interest. A contract of insurance is a contract of indemnity, and a man can only insure that which he has to lose. The plaintiff here bought "the cargo per Sunbeam"—this means the cargo which the ship carries, not an amount varying as each bag is put on board, but when the whole is shipped: the particular ship was named so as to give control to the person making the contract; she was a ship of a specified tonnage. The contract here could not be carried out in its entirety, and the loading of a portion was not a performance of the contract so as to bind the parties: (Kreuger v. Blanc, ubi sup.) The contract was for unspecified rice, to be put on board a specified ship, so that the appropriation was not a mere matter of volition, some act must be done, and it was not enough to mean to appropriate. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—If the purchaser were present at the warehouse, would not that be enough, on the authority of Aldridge v. Johnson (ubi sup.)?] That is not this case, for the whole cargo was the thing bought, and the plaintiff never intended taking anything else. The drawing and accepting of the bills had no effect in passing the property. That was done after the loss, as was also the signing of the bills of lading. It is submitted that the property had not passed, because there was no cargo, therefore there was no liability. Then, if the property had not passed, did the assured stand in such relation to the goods as to have an insurable interest in them notwithstanding. In Seagrave v. The Union Marine Insurance Company (ubi sup.), Willes, J., says, "The general rule is clear that, to constitute interest insurable against a peril, it must be an interest such that the peril would by its proximate effect cause damage to the assured." And Phillips, sect. 174, says: "The peril or event insured against must be such that its happening might bring upon the insured a pecuniary loss." The case of Warder v. Horton (4 Bing. 529) is cited there as follows: "Where goods being ordered were consigned to the agent of the consignor to be delivered to the party ordering them on payment of the price, and were lost in the transit, it was held that the party ordering them could not recover against his underwriters for their value, on the ground that he was not liable for the price, and so had sustained no loss:" and sect. 178, "A purchaser who is liable for the price has an insurable interest." This, therefore, is the test, and the plaintiff here was not liable for the price. Again, "It is an every day's practice to insure goods before they are bought, yet if one insures them on his own account, the property must pass to him before a loss happens, otherwise he can recover nothing under the policy." See also Parsons on Marine Insurance, p. 191, and the cases illustrating that the passing of the property is always a subject of intention:

The Calcutta and Burmah Steam Navigation Company v. De Mattos, 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 246; 33 L. J. 24, Q. B.; 2 Mar. Law Cas., O. S., 11.

It is submitted that Ireland v. Livingstone (ubi sup.) is not at all in point in reference to this case, being a question between principal and agent and not vendor and vendee. Wait v. Baker (2 Ex. 1) is expressly in favour of our contention that the property had not passed; Parke, B. says, in words which apply exactly to the circumstances of this case: "It is clear that the original contract between the parties was not for a specific chattel. That contract would be satisfied by the delivery of any 500 quarters of corn, provided the corn answered the character of that which was agreed to be delivered." To the same effect are Tamvaco v. Lucas (1 E. & E. 581); Kreuger v. Blanc (ubi sup.); Vernede v. Weber (1 H. & N. 11). Aldridge v. Johnson (ubi sup.), which has been relied upon on the other side, is not really an authority to the extent for which it has been cited. The ground of Lord Campbell's judgment was, that there was an à priori asset to the act of Knight on the part of the plaintiff; but that is very different from this case, where the vendor had absolute discretion as to providing the rice until he provided the cargo, which was the subject-matter of the contract of sale. Nor does this decision appear quite consistent with that in Bryans v. Nix (4 M. & W. 775). (See Benjamin on Sale, 2nd edit. 269; Blackburn on the Contract of Sale, pp. 127, 151, 152.) It cannot here be contended that as soon as each bag was filled with rice, eo instanti the property in the rice in the bags vested in the plaintiff; which are Lord Campbell's words in Aldridge v. Johnson (ubi sup.) There the sacks were the plaintiff's property, and were sent by him to be filled out of the bulk of the barley in Knight's warehouse, and it was held that when measured into the sacks the appropriation was complete, no subsequent assent being necessary. [BRETT, J.—Suppose the insurance to be on profits, how could the plaintiff insure on profits unless he had an interest in the goods?] He could not, and Chope v. Reynolds (5 C. B., N. S., 642) is an authority that under a policy indorsed profit on goods by a particular named ship, the assured could not recover, the ship having been lost, but the goods having been saved and brought by other vessels, and not delivered to him. This case follows the principle in M'Swiney v. The Corporation of the Royal Exchange (14 Q. B. 634). Another test is, whether a court of equity would decree the specific performance of the contract, or would interfere oy injunction to restrain the breach of it. The cases are all collected in Cuddee v. Rutter (White & Tudor's Lead. Cas. 709), and the Master of the Rolls in Fothergill v. Rowland (L. Rep. 17 Eq. 132), comments on them. This is not a contract for the sale of a specific chattel, and could not be enforced by decree. The remedy for any breach would be by action at law. The plaintiff here would not have been entitled to have the rice appropriated to him before the cargo was complete and the vessel had sailed. But the rule is, that the assured must have an interest amounting to property absolute or qualified; in other words such interest as would in law or equity entitle him to have the property appropriated to his own use. A court of equity would not have interfered here to prevent the sellers from parting with this rice to any other persons than the plaintiff, and within the case cited he had therefore no equitable right to the specific rice to give him the necessary interest in it. The case of Ebsworth v. Thé Alliance Marine Insurance Company (ubi sup.), is in the defendant's favour in this view. They cited also Stockdale v Dunlop, 1 M. & W. 224.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 2.—The judgment of the court (Lord Coleridge, C.J., Brett and Denman, JJ.) was delivered by BRETT, J.—In this case the action was brought to recover upon a policy of insurance signed by the defendant, an indemnity in respect of a cargo of rice alleged to have been lost by perils of the sea. The main defences were, that there had been no loss by perils of the sea, that the ship was unseaworthy when the policy attached, and that the plaintiff had no insurable interest in the cargo at the time of the loss.

The plaintiff, a merchant in London, entered on the 2nd Feb. 1871, into a contract with Borradaile, Schiller, and Co., of Calcutta and London, for the purchase of a cargo of Rangoon rice per Sunbeam, at 4s. 1½d. per cwt. The bought note was in the following terms:—"2nd Feb. 1871. Bought for account of Anderson and Co., of Borradaile, Schiller, and Co., the cargo of new crop Rangoon rice, per Sunbeam, 707 tons register, No. 1254, in Veritas, at 9s. 1½d. per cwt., cost and freight, expected to be March shipment, but contract to be void should vessel not arrive at Rangoon before April 1871. Payment by sellers' draft on purchasers at six months' sight, with documents attached." The Sunbeam did not belong either to the seller or the purchaser. She was chartered by the seller's agents, "to proceed to Rangoon to ship and carry a cargo of rice to any port in the United Kingdom or Continent." On the 3rd Feb. 1871, the plaintiff effected insurance with the defendant "at and from Rangoon to any port or place of discharge in the United Kingdom or Continent, by the Sunbeam warranted to sail from Rangoon on or before the 1st April, on rice, as interest may appear, amount of invoice to be deemed the value; average payable on every 500 bags. The said merchandises, &c., are and shall be valued at 55000l., part of 60000l." The Sunbeam arrived in the Rangoon river on the 3rd March 1871, and anchored in the usual anchorage at the junction of the rivers Rangoon and Pegu, about five miles below the town of Rangoon. She was anchored by two anchors in a somewhat peculiar way, much discussed in argument before the jury and afterwards before the court. When the ship was first brought up, it was by one anchor with sixty fathoms of chain; the ship was therefore, then, and when she swung with the next tide, sixty fathoms from her anchors. After she had thus swung, her second anchor was let go; it would at that moment have no effect; it would be under the bows of the ship, which would be held by her anchor with the sixty fathoms chain. But when the ship swung at the next tide she was checked by this second anchor, to which thirty fathoms of chain were then given, which stopped the ship at thirty fathoms from that anchor, and when she had gone thirty fathoms towards the first anchor, the chain of that first anchor was then taken in to thirty fathoms, so that the anchors were sixty fathoms apart, one being up and the other down the river, and the ship was held by her bows midway between them, that is to say, at thirty fathoms from each, held by one or the other, as the tide was on the ebb or flood. The draught of the ship when most loaded was 19ft. 6in.; the depth of water where she lay was 22ft. at low water; the bottom of the river generally was soft mud, of some feet in depth; the tide is strong in the Rangoon river. The ship discharged ballast and began to load rice early in March; the captain was anxious to complete loading by the 1st April, on account of the orders to do so, and to secure a gratuity due to him if he should do so; the rice was brought to the ship in lighters, from stores near the town of Rangoon, and was carried on board the Sunbeam and there stowed by coolies. On the 30th March, the ship was nearly loaded—there were 8878 bags then on board; 1400 more bags would have completed the cargo, and they were in lighters alongside. The loading had been much accelerated during the latter days of loading. On the evening of the 30th March the ship suddenly made a great deal of water; this, in spite of every exertion, increased with great rapidity, so that in the course of the night the ship sank at her anchors and was totally lost, as was also all the cargo then on board.

After the ship had sunk, and after ship and cargo were lost, and in order to enable the plaintiff to claim on the policy, the captain signed bills of lading for the cargo which had been shipped, and the sellers drew bills of exchange for the price of such cargo, which were accepted and met by the plaintiff. The bills of lading were indorsed to him. All this was fully disclosed to the underwriters when the claim was made.

On the trial at Guildhall before Brett, J., in Feb. 1873, the plaintiff gave evidence that the ship was an American built ship of 707 tons register; that she was reclassified in New York in 1869; that she made several long voyages, behaving extremely well; that she carried a cargo of coals in the summer of 1870 from Liverpool to Point de Galle, being on that voyage perfectly dry and tight. She sailed from Point de Galle to Rangoon in ballast, light, and with her topsides out of the water. She sailed on a smooth voyage, with fine weather, but in the hottest and driest months of the year. She did not leak at all on that voyage, neither did she leak at all as she lay in the Rangoon river up to the 30th March. The captain and mate, examined and cross-examined on a commission, gave evidence that the caulking of the topsides of the ship was examined in the Rangoon river shortly before the 30th March, and was found to be in good order.

C. P.]

ANDERSON v. MORICE.

The captain also gave evidence as to hearing, when the ship began to make water, a rush of water into the ship towards the stern of the ship, under the lazarette, in one place, and that he heard no sound of the coming of the water in the forward parts of the ship. The only evidence given by any witnesses on board the ship, or who were at Rangoon at the time, either on behalf of the plaintiff or defendant, was that given by the captain and mate. But on the trial witnesses were called, both on behalf of the plaintiff and the defendant, who gave evidence as to the Rangoon river and the customs and habits therein, and who gave opinions as to how the loss of the ship and cargo might and might not have happened. It was suggested by the witnesses on behalf of the plaintiff, that the ship was perfectly sound, but that she might have sat upon one of her anchors, or have pricked herself in passing over one of her anchors, or might have struck on a ballast heap formed in the river by an illegal practice of ships to throw stone ballast overboard in the river, and by so striking have strained herself, or have displaced her rudder post. The jury suggested that she might have taken the shelving side of the river in swinging, and have so been strained. Evidence was given on behalf of the defendant that, in the opinion of the witnesses who gave the evidence, none of these things could have happened at all, and certainly not without the knowledge of those on board the ship who had never suggested any of them. On behalf of the defendant it was suggested by witnesses, that although the ship was perfectly tight and dry when she left Point de Galle, yet that the voyage in ballast thence to Rangoon, in the hot and dry weather, with her topsides out of the water, might have caused the caulking of her topsides to become dry and leave the seams open, that the caulking might not have been repaired at Rangoon, that the quick immersion of the topsides by the quick loading of the later days might have caused the water to come through the dried-up seams before they could by the immersion take up, and that the insufficiency of the caulking of the seams might have been the real cause of the loss; they suggested that the opening of the seams existed at the time when the loading of ship commenced and the policy attached.

Upon these facts and this evidence the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff, leave being reserved to enter the verdict for the defendants, if there was no evidence of a loss by perils insured against, or if the evidence showed that the ship was not seaworthy, or if it showed that there was no insurable interest. On a motion made accordingly, and for a new trial, on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence, or to reduce the damages, a rule was granted and cause was shown.

It was argued on behalf of the defendant that the fact of the ship sinking in smooth water so soon after the commencement of the risk, raised a presumption that the ship was unseaworthy when the policy attached, and that such presumption was not removed by speculative suggestions; and that, consequently, the jury ought to have been directed to find according to the legal presumption that the ship was unseaworthy. It was further contended that if the ship was seaworthy at the commencement of the risk, yet that there was no evidence that she was lost by any peril insured against, and that the jury, therefore, ought to have been directed to find for the defendants that there was no loss by perils of the sea. It was further contended that there was no insurable interest; first, because no property passed in the rice which was lost, namely, the rice which was on board. The reasons given for this contention were, that the plaintiff had bought "the cargo" of the Sunbeam, and that until the ship had finished loading, "the cargo" did not exist; and if it did, yet that the cargo had not been weighed, and weighing was necessary in order to ascertain the price to be paid, and that the time of payment had not arrived, and that there was no appropriation of a cargo assented to by the purchaser before the loss. Another reason alleged against there being an insurable interest was, that at the time of the loss no liability to pay for the rice attached to the plaintiff, according to his contract with the sellers, and, therefore, he had nothing at risk, and he suffered no pecuniary loss by the destruction of the rice. It was contended that the damages ought to be reduced, on the ground that the policy was not a valued policy, and that the verdict included not only the invoice price of the rice, but 15 per cent. added to it.

It was contended on behalf of the plaintiff that there was more evidence as to unseaworthiness than mere suggestions, that there was evidence of facts fit to be left to the jury on which the jury might properly find that the ship was seaworthy. It was further contended, that if the jury should find that the ship was seaworthy, they were entitled to find that she was lost by a peril insured against, even though they could not determine what the accident was which caused the ship to sink. It was urged that there was evidence of facts which supported reasonable suggestions as to the cause of the ship sinking. As to the question of insurable interest, it was argued that the property in the rice on board had passed, that if not, it was not necessary that it should, that it was so appropriated to the contract that the plaintiff might properly be said to have an interest in a contract applicable to that rice, and that such interest was a sufficient insurable interest in the rice to enable him to insure it as rice. As to the amount of the verdict, it was contended that the policy was in legal effect a valued policy, properly valued at the amount of the invoice agreed upon between the buyer and seller.

Dealing first with the questions raised as to seaworthiness and loss by a peril insured against, we think that where the only evidence of fact as to either of those questions is, that the ship sank in smooth water very soon after the attaching of the policy, the significance of such a fact cannot be displaced by mere opinion founded on mere conjecture. We think that the true significance of such evidence is to be termed a presumption and a shifting of the burden of proof, and that where such a fact is the only fact in evidence, there being no other evidence as to the condition of the ship or as to a cause of loss, it is evidence on which a jury ought to find, and should therefore be directed to find, if they believe the evidence that the ship was unseaworthy at the inception of the risk. But where there is other evidence of the condition of the ship, or of a cause of the loss, then the fact of the ship sinking in smooth water becomes one of several facts which must all be left to the jury. If from other facts, such as a large amount of repairs recently done, careful surveys recently made, excellent conduct of the ship up to a time immediately preceding the loss or otherwise, a jury concluded that the ship was seaworthy at the inception of the risk, then the jury may further find that the loss was occasioned by a peril insured against, though they are unable to ascertain or safely conjecture what it was which caused the ship to sink. The immediate visible cause of the loss in such a case, is the foundering of the ship. If that was not the result of unseaworthiness existing at the inception of the risk, it is difficult to see upon the assumption, which is, that there is no other evidence as to the loss than the fact of the foundering of the ship, how that could have been caused by anything but some extraordinary though invisible and unascertained accident of the seas. We do not consider that the direction of Lush, J., upheld by the Court of Common Pleas, in the case of The Merchants' Trading Company (a)

(a) COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Nov. 25, 1870.

THE MERCHANTS' TRADING COMPANY v. THE UNIVERSAL MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

THIS was an action on a policy of insurance for 2000*l.* effected by the plaintiffs upon the steam ship Golden Fleece at and from the river Mersey and thence to Cardiff, whilst there, and thence to Alexandria, whilst there, and thence home to a port in the United Kingdom, &c., and the plaintiffs sought to recover for the total loss of the ship. The defendants pleaded, amongst other pleas, that the ship was not unseaworthy at the commencement of the risk, and that the loss did not arise from the perils insured against.

The action was tried at the Liverpool Summer Assizes 1870 before Lush, J. It then appeared that the ship in pursuance of her charter-party loaded some cargo (coals) in the Mersey, and left that place and arrived at Cardiff without anything remarkable occurring. Evidence was given that the ship before leaving the Mersey had been thoroughly repaired. On her arrival at Cardiff she shipped over 2000 tons of coal for Alexandria. She left Cardiff docks on the morning of 10th Sept., 1869 with a full cargo on board, in charge of her master and a licensed pilot. The ship came out of dock apparently unhurt and without touching the quay. As she rounded Penarth Point her master thought that the weather was threatening and he consequently directed the pilot to bring the ship to an anchor near Barry island, where there is a very safe anchorage. She steamed to a point between Barry and Sully islands, and anchored there. The weather cleared up in the afternoon; there was not any bad weather during the day. The ship had her steam up ready for going on. The pilot left her at 4.30 p.m. and all was then well. At 9.30 p.m. the master, who had made up his mind to stay in his anchorage till the next morning, had a report brought to him that the water was coming in somewhere about the starboard bunker. He looked into the bunker, and saw that the water was coming in rapidly, but could not ascertain where it was coming from. There was a sound inside the bunker as if of rending iron. The master tried to get steam on the ship so as to work her pumps. This was done for a short time, but the water rose so rapidly that it put the fires out, and listed the ship over to starboard, and in 35 minutes from the time the alarm was given the master and crew had to take to their boats, and in about half an hour afterwards the ship went down. No collision had occurred or other violence been done to the ship, so far as was known to her master and crew, which would account for the water rushing in as it did.

Upon these facts Lush, J. directed the jury as appears by the judgment of the court and they found a verdict for the defendants.

In Michaelmas Term 1870, execution having been in the meanwhile stayed,

Milward, Q.C. for the plaintiffs, moved for a rule calling upon the defendants to show cause why there should not be a new trial upon the grounds, first of misdirection, secondly that the verdict was against evidence, thirdly surprise. The misdirection alleged was that Lush, J. had too much restricted the definition of the

v. The Universal Marine Insurance Company, is in conflict with these propositions. It was suggested that the learned judge had directed the jury that, even though the ship were seaworthy at the in-perils insured against, and that he had wrongly confined the time of the attaching of the warranty of seaworthiness to the departure of the vessel from Cardiff Docks, whereas the warranty would have been satisfied if she was seaworthy when in the Mersey, and he ought to have told the jury so. Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 25, 1870.—The judgment of the Court (Bovill, C.J., Byles, J., and Brett, J.) was delivered by BOVILL, C.J.—

In the case of the Merchants Trading Company against the Universal Marine Insurance Company. The motion was made in this case by Mr. Milward for a new trial on three grounds, first misdirection, secondly verdict against evidence, and thirdly on the ground of surprise. The last ground was disposed of in the course of the argument. On the second ground it did not appear to us there was any sufficient reason for disturbing the verdict, but before finally refusing the rule on that ground we were desirous of consulting Mr. Justice Lush. We have done so, and find that he is not dissatisfied with the verdict, and as our opinion entirely concurs with his there will be no rule on the second ground. The first ground remains to be considered, namely the alleged misdirection of my brother Lush, which was stated to be that he had too much restricted the definition of the perils against which the policy insured, and that he had confined the time of the attaching of the warranty of seaworthiness to the departure of the vessel from the Cardiff Docks. Upon these questions it is material to look at the facts, and the points that were raised at the trial. By the policy the vessel was insured on a voyage from the Mersey to Cardiff, whilst there, and thence to Alexandria, whilst there, and then home to a port, &c. As to the actual voyages the vessel having according to her charter, taken on board a few hundred tons of coal at Liverpool, proceeded to Cardiff, where she shipped a cargo of over 2000 tons of coal for Alexandria. She left the Cardiff Docks on the morning of the 10th Sept. 1869 with this full cargo on board, and on the night of the same day whilst riding at her anchor in Cardiff Roads foundered, and went to the bottom; there was no stress of weather or heavy sea, there were no rocks, and nothing to account for her going down; very strong, and indeed it was contended by the plaintiffs' counsel at the trial) conclusive evidence was given that her coal ports (which at one time it was suggested had been left open) were closed, and remained closed, and there was nothing it was argued by the plaintiffs' counsel to explain the cause of her loss. The account given by those on board was that the water came in rapidly in one place and in considerable quantities; that there was a noise as of the crashing or rending of iron at or near that place, and that the vessel quickly filled with water and sunk. The substantial defence set up by the underwriters, was that the vessel was not seaworthy, and that the loss was occasioned by the inherent weakness of the vessel caused by an originally weakly construction, or by the deterioration the result of neglect, and her consequent inability to carry the full cargo with which she was finally laden, and that she broke up from that cause alone, and not from any extraordinary or unusual peril. The question was discussed at the trial and endeavoured to be solved by evidence given on both sides as to the cause of this sudden eruption of the water in Cardiff Roads. It was contended for the plaintiffs that the vessel was proved to have been thoroughly repaired, and to have been seaworthy on leaving Birkenhead, and that the foundering or sinking of the vessel at Cardiff, could therefore only have resulted from some inexplicable and extraordinary accident which must therefore be the cause of the foundering which was a peril insured against. It was contended for the defendants that no extraordinary perils were proved, and that the fact of this vessel having sunk without any apparent or adequate cause almost immediately after her full cargo was on board, was the strongest evidence of her not having been fit to encounter the ordinary perils of the voyage; that under the circumstances which were proved nothing whatever having been shewn to account for the vessel sinking whilst riding at anchor in smooth water, and so soon after she left Cardiff, ception of the risk, yet she might have foundered through wear and tear caused by no extraordinary action of the sea, and if so, it was not a loss by a peril insured against. It is true that a foundering the natural presumption would arise that the vessel was not seaworthy, and that the loss had arisen from that cause. The warranty or condition of seaworthiness was explained by the learned judge to the jury as follows, namely "that the assured undertakers in a voyage policy that the vessel shall start upon the voyage in all respects fit to encounter the ordinary perils incident to such a voyage," and he told them that if the vessel did not start upon the voyage in that condition, then the policy did not attach at all, and the underwriters were free from responsibility, and that on the other hand if the ship was seaworthy, then the only question was whether the loss happened in consequence of the perils insured against. He further explained to the jury that the terms "perils of the sea" denoted all marine casualties resulting from the violent action of the elements of the wind and waters, lightning, tempest, stranding, striking on a rock, and so on—all casualties of that description as distinguished from the silent natural gradual action of the elements upon the vessel itself, though the latter properly belonged to wear and tear, and that what the underwriters insured were casualties that might happen, not consequences which must happen, casualties which might occur and were incident to navigation arising from the violent action of the elements upon the ship. The learned judge proceeded to say "that in the peculiar circumstances of this case the voyage having scarcely commenced, the vessel being in still water at the time when this casualty happened, this case was distinguishable from the class of cases in its circumstances, and those two questions apparently different in form appeared to him to become merged in the one practical question which was this, Was the leak, the extraordinary leak which occurred while the vessel was lying at anchor attributable to injury and violence from without or weakness within." The learned judge further told the jury that the evidence shut them up to that alternative one, or the other, and that if they found it could not be attributed to perils of the sea, that is the violent action of the elements from without, or any other casualty involved in perils of the sea, then that he did not see but that it was for the jury to judge what other conclusion they could come to than that it must be due to an inherent infirmity in the ship itself. After calling the attention of the jury to the details of the evidence, the learned judge proceeded to address the jury as follows: "That is the whole account of what happened. Do you see in that any evidence at all of what I have described to you as perils of the sea, any violent action of the elements in stranding, collision, or anything of that kind, which would account for the vessel going down. If you do, then the loss is not by the perils of the sea; if there was no peril as I have said the silent natural action of the water on a floating body is not a peril of the sea, but it is wear and tear. According to the description given here the ship was unable to maintain herself afloat in still water lying quietly at anchor. If so there is an end of the case. It was no peril of the sea at all as I have said. That being so, and there being nothing at all to account for that mystery, what is the conclusion? That she must have been in such a condition when she left the dock as she could not encounter the ordinary perils of the voyage, she could not stand in still water at anchor." After some further observations the learned judge concluded as follows: "As I have said the two questions are so mixed up together that if it was not a peril of the sea there is an end of it in that way. If not, this occurring so soon after she left the dock the inference seems irresistible that she must have been in a very infirm state, although not known to the parties when she left the dock, to have been the subject of such a catastrophe within twelve hours after she sailed." As to the first alleged misdirection the question at the trial was whether the vessel sank through unseaworthiness or from some extraordinary and unaccountable accident, and the learned judge compendiously expressed this contention in the question which he left to the jury of whether the leak was attributable to injury and violence from without or to weakness within. It is quite true that the perils mentioned by the learned judge do not include all the risks and perils covered by from such wear and tear would not be a loss by a peril insured against, but it seems equally true that if a ship cannot pass through an insured voyage without foundering from the effects of wear and tear occurring without extraordinary action of sea or wind, such ship was unseaworthy at the inception of the risk; she was then incapable of sustaining the ordinary casualties of an ordinary voyage. We do not understand that either the learned judge or the court in banco treated the question of wear and tear as different from or independent of the question of whether the ship was seaworthy or not, but that the judge was reiterating in another form the alternative question which he had before stated was present in that case, namely, whether the ship founded by reason of unseaworthiness or of a peril of the sea. The statement of the proposition as to loss from wear and tear, or by reason of a peril insured against, contained in Thompson v. Hopper (6 E. & B. 172; 1 E. B. & E. 1038), is in our view entirely consistent with what we have enunciated, and the proposition is not inconsistent with the proposition quoted in argument from Fawcus v. Sarfield (6 E. & B. 192). It becomes necessary, therefore, to consider what was the evidence in the present case.

It is truly stated on behalf of the defendants that the greater part of it on both sides consisted of opinions founded on conjectured facts. And in our judgment some of those alleged facts could not have existed, and of others there was no such evidence as would entitle a jury to found a verdict on their

the policy, but from the nature of the question that was raised in this case which was as to the cause of the sudden rushing of the water into the vessel whether it was the inherent weakness of the vessel in consequence of original defects and construction, or neglected rust, or some unaccountable accident resulting in foundering, and with reference to the evidence the attention of the jury was in our opinion properly called to such of the perils as were material to the point raised for their consideration. As to the second alleged misdirection. In some parts of the summing up the learned judge no doubt referred to the condition of the vessel when she left the Cardiff Docks, but at the commencement, when he was stating the proposition of law, he told the jury that the undertaking of the assured that the vessel should start on her voyage in all respects fit to encounter the ordinary perils incident to the voyage went to the whole voyage, and further no point or distinction had been made, nor any evidence given to show that if she was seaworthy on leaving the Mersey, she could have become otherwise so far as her structure was concerned between the time of her so leaving the Mersey, and her starting from Cardiff, or conversely if she was unseaworthy when she left Cardiff, that she was not equally unseaworthy when she left Birkenhead. It seems to have been considered at the trial that so far as her structure was concerned there was no material difference in her state at Cardiff, from what it had been at Birkenhead. In this case the fact of her sinking in smooth water and calm weather so immediately after leaving Cardiff Docks, was properly treated as strong evidence of inability to carry her full cargo from Cardiff, which was evidence of unseaworthiness at Cardiff, and under the circumstances and according to the sole discussion raised on both sides of the trial it was equally strong evidence of unseaworthiness at Birkenhead. It therefore appears to us that the real and substantial questions raised between the parties were left, and properly left, to the jury, and that the direction of the learned judge having regard to those questions are correct, and we think there are no sufficient reasons for granting a new trial on either of the grounds suggested on the motion for the rule, and therefore no rule will be granted. I should mention that my brother Byles did not hear the whole of the argument, but as far as he heard it he concurs in the conclusion at which we have arrived. Rule refused.—[ED.]

supposed existence in fact. From the position of the anchors, the depth of water, the nature of the river's bottom, and the draught of the ship, we are strongly of opinion that the ship could not have passed over either of her anchors, and, therefore, could not either have sat upon her anchor or pricked herself with her anchor. Neither do we think it possible that the ship could have twisted her anchor chains so as to bring her anchors together, or have lain fixed across a strong tide, so as to have strained herself as suggested, without her position in either respect being remarked by any officer or man on board. We think that such suggestions were unworthy of the name of evidence. We do not think that the existence of ballast heaps could be properly relied on by the jury, if it were necessary in order to support their verdict to rely upon the existence of such heaps being affirmatively proved. If there were no other evidence in the case but the opinions and conjectures of the skilled or experienced witnesses, and the fact of the sinking of the ship at anchor in smooth water so soon after the inception of the risk, we should be of opinion that the jury were bound to find that the ship was unseaworthy. But there was in this case evidence of large repairs done to the ship at no distant period from the loss, there was strong evidence of good behaviour of the ship on voyages immediately preceding the insured voyage, and indeed on the one of which the insured voyage might be said to be a continuance, there was evidence of inspection by the captain of the caulking of the ship whilst at Rangoon, and there was evidence as to the suddenness and localisation of a leak.

We are of opinion that such evidence brought the case within the rule before enunciated, and which obliged the judge who tried the cause to leave the questions as to seaworthiness and loss by a peril insured against to the jury. If the judge who tried the cause had had to find the verdict, and had been at liberty to conjecture, it is right to say that he would have acted upon the theory, as the most probable, of the seams of the top sides having been generally opened on the voyage from Point de Galle, and would have found that the ship was unseaworthy at the inception of the risk, but he is of opinion, and in that we agree with him, that there was evidence which made it not unreasonable in the jury to find for the plaintiff, and that he is, therefore, not authorised to act upon his own opinion as against their finding, and that we should not be justified in deciding that the verdict should be set aside as being against the weight of evidence. We are all of opinion that the verdict of the jury upon those issues must stand.

As to the question of insurable interest, it is this: whether, under the circumstances, the plaintiff at the time of the loss of the ship had a sufficient interest, including a sufficient risk of loss, in the rice which was on board the Sunbeam, to enable him to recover for the loss of it under an insurance of it as rice. The question is obviously confined to the rice which was on board the ship, that being the only rice which was lost or damaged.

Now, we agree that the granting of the bill of lading had no effect in passing the property, because it was granted after the loss of the ship and cargo. We agree that the acceptance and payment of the drafts for the price were of no effect to pass the property for the same reason, because done and made after the loss of the cargo. We agree that there was no binding appropriation to the contract of the rice on board the barge, because we think that any barge load might at any time before it was delivered into the control of the ship, have been withdrawn and replaced. It seems to us that the purchaser would not have been bound to accept the rice which was on board if the ship had arrived at her proposed destination with only so much of a full cargo as was on board, because we agree with the view of the defendants' counsel, that by the terms of the contract of purchase and sale, the plaintiff purchased, and therefore undertook to accept, "the cargo per Sunbeam," and was entitled to reject a part cargo if offered to him. We think that, inasmuch as the plaintiff would not, if the ship had sailed and arrived with what was on board of her when she sank, have been obliged to accept what was on board, the plaintiff was not bound to pay for the rice which was on board and lost when the ship sank. But from the fact of the ship being designated in the contract, and thereby agreed by both buyer and seller to be the recipient of the rice to be appropriated to the contract, we are of opinion that there was such an appropriation of the rice on board to the contract as to prevent the seller from withdrawing the rice without the consent of the buyer. We think that the executory contract as to any rice had become, as to the rice which was on board, a contract attaching to that specific rice. We agree that that does not determine the question whether the property in that rice had passed to the purchaser. Although the plaintiff could not have been forced, if the ship had sailed and arrived with only so much of a full cargo on board as was shipped and lost, to have accepted so much as was on board, yet we are of opinion that he would have had the legal option of requiring actual delivery of it. The sellers could not have withdrawn what was on board without breaking their contract with the plaintiff. They could not, if the ship had arrived, have defended an action for non-delivery on demand, by saying that they were not bound to deliver what had arrived on board the Sunbeam, because their agents had not shipped, or had been prevented from shipping, an entirely full cargo. The purchasers might have elected to treat what was on board as a cargo, and have insisted upon its actual delivery.

It seems to us, therefore, that the final question is, whether upon such a state of facts, rights, and liabilities, the defendants (the underwriters) can allege, by way of defence, that the plaintiff (the assured) had not, after the loss, the same option as he had before it; and whether that was not the option of saying that the delivery on board the designated and agreed ship was a delivery to him; that he elected to treat the quantity on board as a cargo; that consequently he elected to say that the cargo was at his risk; and that the property in it had passed to him directly it was on board. The solution of this question seems to us to depend upon a careful consideration of what it was which gave the option of rejection to the plaintiff. Was there anything to give him such an option, other than the fact of the cargo not being a full cargo? In other words, if there had been a full cargo on board would there have been any such option? We think not. By the contract the cargo purchased by the plaintiff was to be shipped by the vendors on board a particular designated ship. It is true that the ship was to he taken up, and the freight in the first place paid, by the vendors. But the freight was specifically included in the price to be paid by the purchaser. He was, in the end, to pay the estimated cost of the hire of the ship. He agreed that the cargo should be shipped on board that particular ship, and the payment, so far as an acceptance is payment, was to be made, perhaps, before the arrival of the ship at its destination. At all events the time of such payment was independent of the time of the arrival of the ship and the delivery of the cargo. Although the price to be paid for the cargo specifically includes the freight, it does not include the insurance. The safer proposition, under such circumstances, is to say that the question as to which of the two parties was to insure, depends upon the question of construction, whether the contract in its other stipulations discloses an intention that the cargo should, on the voyage be the cargo of or at the risk of the vendor or the purchaser. It may, however, not be wrong to observe that the plaintiff, the purchaser, before any dispute as to the interpretation of the contract arose, insured the rice per Sunbeam on the day after the making of the contract of purchase and sale, and that the seller never insured it. Considering that the cargo was to be put on board a ship so designated by the purchaser in the contract, that the cargo could not, in accordance with the contract, be put on board any other ship, and that the conditional payment by acceptance was to be made independently of the time of the ship's arrival, although the ultimate price was to be ascertained by weighing the cargo, we are of opinion that, in the case of a full cargo having been shipped, the property in such a cargo would, by the manifest intention of the parties, have at once, upon the loading, passed to the purchaser, subject to the vendor's right to stop in transitu in case of the purchaser's insolvency, and to his right to resume dominion in the case of non-acceptance of the draft on presentation, or to his right to withhold actual delivery of the cargo until such acceptance.

ANDERSON v. MORICE.

The stipulations of the contract which enabled the vendors to take the bill of lading in their own name, and send it forward with the draft, and the fact that the price was to be finally determined by ascertaining the weight of the cargo, are prima facie evidence of an interest remaining in them, but they are not conclusive (Seagrave v. The Union Marine Insurance Company, L. Rep. 1 C. P. 305, at p. 319), and the other stipulations to which we have referred seem to us to show that the property in the cargo was, nevertheless, intended to pass on the loading of it on board the designated ship, and that the stipulations as to time and mode of payment were only for the purpose of measuring the price, and securing its payment: (see per Cockburn, C.J., in Castle v. Playford, in error, L. Rep. 7 Ex. 99.) The option, therefore, which the plaintiff would have had of rejecting, if it had arrived, the present cargo, arose solely from the shipment not being a full cargo. He might, on that ground, have treated himself as not bound by the contract to accept or pay for the rice which was on board; but if he did not exercise such option, then all the terms of the contract were as applicable to the lesser as they could have been to the greater cargo; then the property in the lesser cargo would have passed to him from the loading, as much as would have the property in the larger cargo. This view may be thus tested. Suppose a lesser cargo shipped and despatched, and drafts representing it sent forward with notice that the cargo was not a full cargo, and suppose that, thereupon, the plaintiff had accepted the drafts, or otherwise notified his intention to consider the contract binding on the lesser cargo, and that after such notification the ship had been lost, is it not clear that the effect of the contract would have been the same as if a full cargo had been shipped and sent forward, and that if a full cargo would have been at the plaintiff's risk on the voyage, the lesser cargo at the time of the suggested loss would have equally been at his risk? Unless, therefore, the plaintiff chose to disclaim the contract on the ground of there being a short shipment, the contract would have had the same application to a short as to a complete shipment, or, in other words, the property and risk in the short shipment would have passed to the plaintiff in just the same manner and to the same extent as in a full shipment.

The question, then, is whether the existence of such an option as we hold the plaintiff to have had, and of such only, prevents the plaintiff, if he declines after the loss to exercise the option, from insisting successfully as against the defendants, his insurers, that he had an insurable interest in the rice to its full value. We are of opinion that it does not.

In Sparkes v. Marshall (2 Bing. N. C. 761), the plaintiff, the assured, had agreed to purchase oats to be shipped for Portsmouth. Oats were shipped for Southampton by the seller, and offered to the plaintiff. He might have refused, that is to say, he had the option of refusing the oats so shipped and so offered; but the vendor could not, it was held, after having appropriated the oats shipped for Portsmouth to the plaintiff's contract, withdraw such appropriation without the plaintiff's consent, on the ground that the oats were shipped for Southampton. The plaintiff insisted, until after the loss of the ship was suspected, and as it would seem had in fact occurred, on his right to a delivery at Southampton, but eventually waived that objection, and insisted as against the defendants, his underwriters, that the property in the cargo shipped for Portsmouth, and appropriated to him by the vendors, was at his option in him. This contention was held to be a valid one: "It was held," says Phillips, "that the underwriters could not object his want of interest because the oats had not been shipped to the place designated, for he had a right to accept them, and waive any objection on that account:" (Phillips on Insurance, vol. 1, § 180.)

We, therefore, hold that the plaintiff had, in the present case, an insurable interest, to its full value, in the rice on board the Sunbeam when she was lost, on the ground that the property in such rice had vested in him before the loss. We think that the plaintiff had an option, which existed at the time of the loss, of rejecting the rice, on the ground that a full cargo had not been shipped; but we are of opinion that the plaintiff was entitled, as against the defendants, to decline to exercise that option, and to insist that the contract of purchase and sale was fulfilled by the loading, on behalf of the vendors, on board the Sunbeam, of the rice which was on board when the ship foundered, and that, consequently, the property in such rice was in him, the plaintiff, at the time of the loss. We are further of opinion that, even if the property in the rice did not legally pass to the plaintiff, yet he had an insurable interest in it, because he had an existing contract with regard to it from the time of its being loaded on board, by virtue of which he had an expectancy of benefit and advantage arising out of or depending on the safe arrival of the rice.

As to the suggested reduction of damage, we are of opinion that the policy was a valued policy, the valuation being the amount of the proper invoice, according to the contract between the plaintiff and his vendors. That amount, according to the course of dealing between the plaintiff and his vendors, included the disputed 15 per cent.

On the whole, therefore we are of opinion that the plaintiff was entitled to succeed, that the verdict was rightly entered, and that the rule should be discharged.

ERROR FROM THE COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Reported by ETHERINGTON SMITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

June 18 and 19, and Nov. 30, 1874.

JACKSON v. THE UNION MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED).

Shipping — Marine insurance — Insurance on chartered freight — Right of charterer to abandon charter where vessel delayed on voyage to port of loading — Total loss of freight by perils insured against.

An insurance was effected on 9th Dec. 1871, by the plaintiff "on chartered freight at and from Liverpool to Newport in tow, while there and thence to San Francisco." He had previously on 22nd Nov. 1871, entered into a charter-party by which the ship was to proceed with all convenient speed from Liverpool to Newport and there load a cargo of iron rails for San Francisco, the usual perils excepted. The ship left Liverpool on 2nd Jan. but got on the rocks before reaching Newport. She was not got off till 12th April, when she was taken back to Liverpool and sold. On 15th Feb. the charterer threw up the charter and hired another ship to carry the rails, and notice of abandonment of the policy was duly given to the defendants. The plaintiff sued for the total loss of the chartered freight. The jury found that the delay in getting the ship off and in repairing her was necessarily so great as to make it unreasonable for the charterers to supply the agreed cargo at the end of that time, and was so great as to put an end, in a commercial sense, to the commercial speculation entered upon by the shipowner and the charterers.

Held by Bramwell, B., Blackburn, Mellor, and Lush, JJ., and Amphlett, B., diss. Cleasby, B., (affirming the majority of the Court of Common Pleas), that there was an implied condition precedent in the charter-party that the vessel should arrive at the port of loading within a reasonable time, and that on failure of this the contract was at an end, and the charterers were discharged.

Held, further, that the adventure having been frustrated by the perils of the seas, there was a total loss of chartered freight within the meaning of the policy, for which the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

In this case there were originally two actions upon two policies of insurances, one on the ship Spirit of the Dawn, the other on chartered freight, valued at 2900*l.*, to be earned by that vessel on a voyage from Newport to San Francisco. Both actions were tried together before Brett, J., at the Liverpool Summer Assizes 1872, when it appeared from the evidence that the plaintiff had, on 9th Dec. 1871, effected an insurance "on chartered freight valued at 2900*l.*, at and from Liverpool to Newport in tow, whilst there and thence to San Francisco," and by the charter-party it was stated that the ship shall with all convenient speed proceed direct to Newport, and there load a cargo of iron rails for San Francisco, "all and every the dangers and accidents of the seas excepted. On the 2nd Jan. 1872, the ship left Liverpool, but before reaching Newport got upon the rocks in Carnarvon Bay, and was so much damaged that the charterers on 15th Feb. gave notice of abandonment of the charter, and hired another ship in which to forward their goods. The Spirit of the Dawn was with difficulty got back to Liverpool on the 12th April, when, upon survey, the cost of necessary repairs was estimated at 3650*l.*

Notice of abandonment was duly given under both policies but not accepted.

The questions left to the jury were first, whether there was a constructive total loss of the ship; secondly, whether the time necessary for getting the ship off and repairing her so as to be a cargo-carrying ship was so long as to make it unreasonable for the charterers to supply the agreed cargo at the end of such time; thirdly, whether such time was so long as to put an end in a commercial sense to the speculation entered upon by the shipowners and the charterers. The jury answered all these questions in the affirmative, and the learned judge directed a verdict to be entered for the defendants, reserving leave to the plaintiff to move to enter the verdict for him on either or both of the policies. Upon the argument of the rule which was accordingly obtained, an agreement was come to in respect of the policy on the ship, but with regard to the policy on the chartered freight the court below was divided, Keating and Brett, JJ., holding that the charterers were absolved from loading the vessel, and that the shipowner therefore might recover for the loss of freight, Bovill, C.J., holding on the other hand, that the charterers, were not entitled to throw up the charter, and that consequently the plaintiff could not recover against the underwriters. (a)

(a) The judgments of Brett, J. (in which Keating, J., concurred), and of Bovill, C. J., were as follows:

BRETT, J.—Two actions were brought on two policies of insurance effected by the plaintiff with the defendants, the first being on the ship Spirit of the Dawn, of which the plaintiff was owner, and the second on chartered freight to be earned by the same ship.

At the trial before me at the summer assizes held at Liverpool in 1872, on which occasion both actions were tried together, it was proved the plaintiff, on the 22nd Nov. 1871, entered into a charter-party with Messrs. Rathbone and Co., by which the ship Spirit of the Dawn was to proceed with all convenient speed from Liverpool to Newport, and there ship a cargo of iron rails (railways iron) for San Francisco, ordinary perils excepted, and the freight payable on right delivery of the cargo, &c.

On the 9th Dec. 1871, the plaintiff, through his agents, effected with the defendants the freight policy sued on,

JACKSON v. THE UNION MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED).

[Ex. Ch.]

Upon the judgment of the majority of the court below the defendants brought error, which was now argued before Bramwell, B., Blackburn, Mellor, and Lush, JJ., Cleasby and Amplett, BB.

being "on chartered freight valued at £2900, at and from Liverpool to Newport in tow, while there, and thence to San Francisco, &c." On the 12th Dec. 1871, the policy on ship was effected for the same voyage on thirty-four 64ths of ship, valued at £8000. After some complaints from the charterers as to delay, the ship sailed in tow from Liverpool on 2nd Jan. 1872. On the 4th Jan. 1872, the ship, which was an iron ship, before arriving at Newport took the rocks in Carnarvon Bay. By authority of the plaintiff and the defendants, Captain Chisholm, of the Salvage Association, proceeded to endeavour to extricate and save the ship. She got into a place of comparative safety on the rocks on the 18th Feb. 1872, and was got off the rocks and into Holyhead between the 21st and 24th March, and was by consent of the plaintiff and defendants taken back to Liverpool, still in charge of the Salvage Association, on the 12th April 1872. The salvage charges for rescuing the ship and bringing her to Liverpool were £4208. Upon survey, the estimated cost of repairs was £3650. Due notice of abandonment was given on both policies, but not accepted. The ship was thereupon sold to a Mr. Wilson, who proceeded to repair her. The ship was still under repair at the time of the trial, which was on the 16th Aug. 1872.

On the 16th Feb. 1872, Messrs. Rathbone and Co., chartered, without the consent of the plaintiff, another ship, by which they forwarded the rails to San Francisco. The rails were wanted there for the construction of a railway.

Upon this evidence, and some other as to the value of the ship when repaired, I left it to the jury to say—first, whether there was a constructive total loss of the ship; secondly, whether the time necessary for getting the ship off and repairing her so as to be a cargo-carrying ship was so long as to make it unreasonable for the charterers to supply the agreed cargo at the end of such time; thirdly, whether such time was so long as to put an end, in a commercial sense, to the commercial speculation entered upon by the shipowner and the charterers. The jury answered all these questions in the affirmative. I, upon the view that there was no evidence, according to the figures, of a constructive total loss of ship, and no evidence of a loss of freight by the perils insured against, because the shipowner had a right to repair his ship, however long it might take, and insist after its repair on the delivery of the agreed imperishable cargo so as to enable him to earn the chartered freight, directed the verdict to be entered for the defendants, reserving leave for the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict on either or both of the policies.

Mr. Butt moved accordingly, and obtained a rule nisi in Michaelmas Term 1872; it being agreed that, upon showing cause against such rule, the defendants should be at liberty to argue, as against the application to enter the verdict for the plaintiff, that the findings of the jury on all or any of the questions left to them were against the weight of evidence. This rule was argued before us in Hilary Term of the present year.

It was determined in the course of the argument that the verdict as to the total loss of the ship was unsatisfactory; and, by the agreement of the counsel, that part of the case is to be referred as an average loss.

In the action on the policy on freight, it was argued for the defendants that, unless there was a total loss of ship, either actual or constructive, there could be no loss of freight by perils of the sea; that the plaintiff, the shipowner, in the case of damage to the ship, however great, where such damage was not caused by any default of his own, had a legal right under such a charter-party as the present, to repair his ship with reasonable diligence, and to tender her when repaired, however long a period of time such repairs might take, to the charterer, and to insist on the loading of the agreed cargo, if the cargo was of such a nature as to be able to be carried at the end of such period of the agreed voyage so as to earn freight. If the shipowner, it was argued, in such circumstances prevented from earning freight by the refusal of the charterer to supply cargo, his loss must be recovered by action against the charterer; it is a loss

Benjamin, Q.C., C. Russell, Q.C., and Aspland for the defendants below.—Can there be a total loss when both cargo and ship remain in specie, and the perils of the sea only interpose so as to cause caused by the illegal refusal of the charterer to supply cargo, and not by perils insured against. It was further argued that none of the findings of the jury displaced this position, and that the findings of the jury were against the weight of the evidence.

For the plaintiff it was urged that the findings of the jury were justifiable, and that on either or both of them the shipowner ceased to have the power to enforce his rights under the charter-party to earn freight; that, assuming either or both of the findings to be true, although the ship was not a total loss, the charterer, who had not as yet received any benefit from the charter-party, could not be obliged to supply any cargo; that the power of earning the chartered freight, which was the freight insured, was consequently lost to the plaintiff immediately on the happening of the damage to the ship, such damage being to the extent found by the jury; that such damage was caused by, and therefore the loss was the immediate result of, a peril insured against.

The first point raised by these arguments is, whether the findings are so far against the weight of the evidence as to call upon the Court to set them aside. If it had been within my province I would at the trial have given answers to both questions different from the answers returned by the jury. But the amount of freight on which shipowners will undertake charters depends very much upon the time at which such charters are negotiated and at the time then calculated for their fulfilment. Freight rises and falls according to the variations of the freight market; and so, on the other hand, the expediency or otherwise of the export of iron or iron rails depends upon the iron market and its fluctuations at different times. Taking these views into consideration, and paying considerable deference to the finding of a mercantile special jury with regard to them, I am not prepared to say that the findings are wrong. They must therefore be treated as correct and binding.

The question, then, is whether, assuming the findings to be correct, there was a loss of freight by perils of the sea. That question divides itself into two—first, did the injury to the ship, caused, as it undoubtedly was, by sea peril, make it impossible for the shipowner to earn the chartered freight? Secondly, if it did, did such impossibility, so caused, amount to a loss by perils of the sea within the meaning of a freight policy on chartered freight? The first question depends upon what were the rights, under the circumstances, of the plaintiff and the charterers under the charter-party, the second upon the rights of the plaintiffs and the defendants under the policy.

As to the first, the question is whether, upon an injury happening to a chartered ship in the voyage preliminary to that on which the chartered freight is to be earned, happening before the charterer has received any advantage from the contract, where an injury is caused by a peril excepted in the charter-party, where it is caused without default of the shipowner, where he has not been wanting in due diligence to arrive at the appointed place of loading, but where the injury is so great as to prevent the arrival of the ship or of her presentation to the charterer in a state fit to carry cargo within a reasonable time, having regard to the business of the charterer, or within any time which could have been at the time of making the contract in the contemplation of either the charterer or shipowner as a time in any way applicable to the commercial speculation of either of them—the question is, whether the contract is not at end, in the sense that neither party to it can enforce any obligation under it against the other. In other terms they may be stated to be, whether in such a contract there is not an implied stipulation that the shipowner cannot, upon the happening of such extensive injury to the ship, though without default of his, compel the charterer to supply at so remote a date, a cargo, and that the charterer, conversely, cannot compel the shipowner at so remote a date to tender his ship—the reason being that the contract is not applicable, and could not in the mind of either party have been considered as applicable, at the time of making it, to the earning of profit either by the ship-delay in carrying out the contract? The freight was not lost here, because the plaintiff might have enforced the earning of it. It is admitted that there was no condition precedent in this charter-

owner or the charterer by reason of the transport of goods at so remote a period under mercantile contingencies and on mercantile considerations which must be absolutely different from and unconnected with any consideration then between them. There being no stipulation that the ship should be at Newport at any fixed date, the stipulation being only that she should proceed there with all convenient speed, there is no condition precedent that she should be there at any given time: (Hadley v. Clarke, 8 T. R. 259.) The cases of Clipsham v. Vertue (5 Q. B. 265), Hurst v. Osborne (18 C. B. 144), and Jones v. Holme (L. Rep. 2 Ex. 335), seem to me authorities for saying that there is no condition precedent, though there is a contract that the ship shall arrive or be fit to be tendered within a reasonable time in regard to the charterer's business. If the finding of the jury, therefore, on the second question proposed to them, is immaterial, the question itself was immaterial. Even a delay caused by the default of the shipowner will not of itself release the charterer from his obligation to provide a cargo; (Havelock v. Geddes, 10 East, 555; Clipsham v. Vertue, sup.)

But in Havelock v. Geddes (sup.), Lord Ellenborough deals with the rights of the parties where the ship is so unfit as to take from the charterer all the advantages he can be supposed to have originally contemplated from the contract, and where he has in fact had no advantage whatever from it. "Had the plaintiff's neglect," he says, "here precluded the defendants from making any use of the vessel, it would have gone to the whole consideration, and might have been insisted upon as an entire bar. In Freeman v. Taylor (8 Bing. 124), Tindal, C.J., directed the jury, in an action for not loading, "that the freighter could not, for an ordinary deviation, put an end to the contract; but if the deviation was so long and unreasonable that in the ordinary course of mercantile concerns it might be said to have put an end to the whole object the freighter had in view in chartering the ship, in that case the contract might be considered as an end." He left it to the jury to decide. The jury found for the defendant, the freighter; and the court held that there was no misdirection. In Tarrabochia v. Hickie (1 H. & N. 183; 5 W. R., C. L. Dig. 233), Cresswell, J., in an action against the freighter for not loading, asked the jury whether the vessel sailed and proceeded to Cardiff with convenient speed, or in a reasonable time; and if not, whether the object of the voyage was thereby frustrated. The jury found that the vessel did not with all convenient speed, or in a reasonable time, sail and proceed to Cardiff, but that the object of the voyage was not thereby frustrated. A verdict was entered for the defendant, leave being reserved to the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict for him. The rule was refused. That case is a direct authority against the second question and answer in this case, but it seems to assume the propriety and materiality of the third question and answer.

In Blascoe v. Fletcher (14 C. B. N. S., 147; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 380), it was elaborately argued that the shipowner, in case of damage to the ship by an excepted peril in the charter-party, is entitled to any period of time, however long, to repair his ship, and is entitled to insist on carrying the agreed cargo and on earning freight at the end of such time. The decision is put on other grounds, but it is evident that the court did not accept the validity of the argument urged on behalf of the shipowner. In M'Andrew v. Chapple (L. Rep. 1 C. P. 643; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 339), Wiles, J., states the present position to be thus: "It seems to be now settled that delay by deviation is the same as a delay in starting; and it is also settled, at any rate in this court, that a delay or deviation which, as has been said, goes to the whole root of the matter, and deprived the charterer of the whole benefit of the contract, or entirely frustrates the object of the charterer in chartering the ship, is an answer to an action for not loading a cargo; but that loss, delay, or deviation short of that gives an action for damages, but does not defeat the charter." In Geipel v. Smith (L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 404; ante, Vol. I., p. 268), Blackburn, J., speaking of the contract of charter-party, and of the parties to it, says: "The object of each of them was the party, for no time was specified within which the ship was to arrive. [BLACKBURN, J.—Is it your proposition that so long as the delay is caused by the excepted perils the charterer must keep his goods, carrying out of a commercial speculation within a reasonable time; and if restraint of princes intervened and lasted so long as to make this impossible, each had a right to say 'our contract cannot be carried out,' and therefore the shipowner had a right to sail away, and the charterer to sell his cargo, or refrain from procuring one, and treat the contract as at an end."

In the opinions given by the judges in the House of Lords in Rankin v. Potter (L. Rep. 6 H. of L. 83 ante, vol. II., p. 65), Blackburn, J., says; "I should have added a further term, that the repairs could be done so promptly that she might arrive at Calcutta within a reasonable time as between the shipowner and De Mattos, were it not for the case of Hurst v. Osborne (sup.), which seems to me as authority against this position. And, though I should not hesitate to advise your Lordships to re-consider that case, if necessary, I think it is not necessary to do so in the present case." And Bramwell, B., says, "I may observe in passing that I could not, acting as a jurymen, find as a fact that they could have repaired the ship in time for it to be ready for the adventure for which De Mattos agreed to find the cargo; and indeed, as the case stands, I should think he might have refused, on the ground that the ship was a year overdue." And again, "No doubt, had the owner repaired the ship, the loss of freight would not have been total, supposing the repairs in time for the voyage for which De Mattos undertook to find a cargo; which, if it were in controversy, I could not find in the plaintiff's favour." And Brett, J., says, "Without, therefore, relying upon the other impediment and prevention obviously in the way of the plaintiff's earning the charter-party freight, viz., the certainty from the extent of damage that the ship could not be repaired so as to be seaworthy within any time during which the charterer would be bound to wait, it seems to me that the other facts which I have mentioned show conclusively that there was a loss of freight by reason of damage to the ship caused by sea peril happening during the voyage insured."

These authorities seem to support the proposition, which appears on principle to be very reasonable, that, where a contract is made with reference to certain anticipated circumstances, and where, without any default of either party, it becomes wholly inapplicable to or impossible of application to any such circumstances, it ceases to have any application; it cannot be applied to other circumstances which could not have been in the contemplation of the parties when the contract was made. Such a state of things arises where the third question left to the jury in this case can be properly answered, as the jury have answered it in this case.

In such a state of things arising under a charter-party, such as the charter-party under discussion, where no benefit of any kind has occurred to the charterers, the shipowner has lost his power of earning any part of the chartered freight. The immediate cause of such a loss is the extent of injury caused to the ship by the peril insured against under the policy during the voyage thereby insured. Such a loss is, therefore, a loss caused by a peril insured against, within the policy on freight.

For these reasons, I think that, in the action on the policy on freight, the rule must be made absolute to enter the verdict for the plaintiff for a total loss.

BOVILL, C.J.—The first question in these cases was, whether there was a total loss of the ship within the meaning of the policy. The jury found that there was such a constructive total loss; but my brother Brett was dissatisfied with the verdict upon that point, and during the argument it was agreed that the court should dispose of it, and that, if in our opinion the total loss could not be maintained, the amount of the average loss upon the ship should be referred to an average stater.

The evidence upon this point was, no doubt, contradictory: but it strongly preponderated in favour of the defendants (quite independently of any liability of the freight to contribute to the expenses of salvage); and, although the ship was upon the rocks, yet, from her position there, and the probability of her being got off, and looking to the evidence of the damage which she and be ready to load when the ship shall arrive, even if it be twenty years.] The cases in reference to the frustration of the object of the voyage seem to bear out that proposition, beginning with had sustained, and of the probable expense of repairing her, I am of opinion that the circumstances were not sufficient to establish a total loss of the ship, or to justify her abandonment.

An intimation to this effect was given by the court in the course of the argument; and I concur with my learned brothers in their judgment that the plaintiff cannot maintain his claim for a total loss of the ship. The amount of the partial loss will be ascertained by an average stater as arranged.

With respect to the insurance on the freight, I have the misfortune to differ from my learned brothers, and think that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover. As there was no total loss, either actual or constructive, of the ship, the only loss of freight was that which arose from the refusal of the charterers to load the vessel, and from the plaintiff not having insisted upon their performance of the contract. The plaintiff contends that, under the circumstances, and by reason of the perils insured against, the charterers were absolved from their engagement to load the vessel, and that he was therefore justified in adopting the charterers' refusal to load, and may maintain this action for a loss of the freight against the underwriters on freight.

The question then is, whether the charterers were justified in throwing up the charter. By the charter-party the vessel was to proceed with all convenient speed (dangers and accidents of navigation excepted) from Liverpool to Newport, and there load a cargo of iron rails for San Francisco. On the 2d Jan. 1872, the vessel having been properly equipped, proceeded on her voyage from Liverpool to Newport, and on the following day took the rocks in Carnarvon Bay. Whilst she remained there—viz., on the 15th Feb., the charterers threw up the charter, and the next day hired another ship, by which they forwarded the iron to San Francisco. The plaintiff on the same 15th Feb. gave notice of abandonment of ship and freight to the underwriters, which was not accepted. If there had been a total loss of the ship, both the charterers and the plaintiff would have been justified in the course which they took, and the underwriters would have been responsible for the loss of the freight; but, upon the facts as they appeared at the trial, we have already decided that there was no such total loss of the ship.

It was probably a very convenient course, as well for the charterers as for the shipowner, in the then position of the vessel, and looking to the delay which would necessarily be occasioned by repairing her, to abandon the charter; and the plaintiff may have been more willing to acquiesce in its abandonment, from the hope of being able to claim the freight from the underwriters; but if the charterers were not entitled to abandon their contract, the plaintiff clearly cannot recover for a loss of freight against the underwriters.

In considering whether the charterers were absolved from their contract, the position of the shipowner must also be borne in mind. When the accident occurred, we must assume that in the ordinary course of business the shipowner would have incurred expense in equipping his vessel and providing her with some portion at least of her stores and supplies, and had made engagements with the crew, and for having his vessel towed to Newport, as well as other engagements for the voyage; he would also in the ordinary course have probably insured her; and the voyage had actually been commenced. A shipowner also constantly makes engagements for the further employment of his vessel, dependent upon the completion of a previous voyage. It is important to all parties to know what their rights and obligations are with reference to the prosecution of the voyage on the one hand, and the loading of the vessel on the other, and it would, as it seems to me, lead to the greatest inconvenience to shipowners with reference to the engagements connected with their vessels if, under such circumstances, after they had incurred expense and partially performed their part of the contract, and made no default, a charterer was at liberty to throw up the contract.

The vessel having met with misfortune in the course of Havelock v. Geddes (70 East, 555) Freeman v. Taylor (8 Bingham, 124), Clipsham v. Virtue (5 Q. B. 265) and later Tarrabochia v. Hickie (1 H. & N. 183) Behn v. Burness (1 Mar. Law Cas.

navigation, and being upon the rocks, it was the duty of the plaintiff, both as regards the charterers and the underwriters, to use all reasonable and practicable means to get her off and repair her within a reasonable time, and then to prosecute the voyage and fulfil her engagements without any unreasonable delay. The reasonable time, however, would be that which was required for the purpose of putting the vessel in a fit state to continue her voyage; and if the shipowner had made default in that duty, his rights and liabilities might be very different from those which arise where there is no default on his part.

There was no engagement in this charter-party that the vessel should arrive at Newport by any particular day, or within any specified time; and, if it was of importance to the charterers that the ship should be there to receive the rails by any particular time, they might have introduced a stipulation into the charter to that effect. As they did not do so, the risk and consequences of any justifiable delay must, I think, rest with and fall upon them. If a charter-party were altogether silent as to the time of proceeding to the port of loading, the law would imply that it was to be done within a reasonable time; but in this case, as in most charter-parties, the obligation of the shipowner was not left to be implied, but was made the subject of express stipulation; and all that the shipowner agreed to do was to proceed to Newport with all convenient speed, with an express stipulation, in the usual form, whereby the dangers and accidents of the seas were excepted. The stipulation would, in my opinion, equally apply to any implied engagement to proceed within a reasonable time, and to the express agreement to proceed with all convenient speed, and must govern the rights of both parties. Where such an exception is contained in a charter-party, it seems to me that, upon a misfortune occurring to a vessel, not amounting to an actual or constructive total loss, and for which neither party is responsible, it is not competent either for the charterer or the shipowner, of his own will, and without the concurrence of the other party, to put an end to the contract, and on this simple ground, that by the terms of the contract the parties have expressly agreed that such an occurrence shall not affect its continuance. If this were not so, whenever a vessel was stranded or got upon rocks, or even when she met with serious damage requiring heavy repairs and a long time to complete them, it would be in the power of a charterer who found the delay inconvenient or injurious, and likely to frustrate his object in making the charter, to abandon the charter-party, which would be contrary to every principle of law as applicable to contracts generally or to charter-parties which contain the usual exceptions of the dangers and accidents of navigation.

In cases where the delay, inconvenience, or expense of repairing the vessel would materially affect and be injurious to both parties, they would generally agree to cancel the contract. But, where it is the interest of one party only to put an end to it, he must make out his right to do so before he can be justified in refusing to perform it. In order to excuse himself he must bring his case within some exception to the contract, or there must be a breach by the other party of some condition or warranty, or of some stipulation in it which goes to defeat the whole consideration; otherwise, and however great the inconvenience may be to both or either of the parties from some unforeseen occurrence which is not provided for, the engagements of the contract must still be performed.

Upon a charter-party where the charterer does not stipulate for the arrival of the vessel by any particular date, the risk of her non-arrival, by reason of the weather and the accidents of navigation, always rests with the charterer; and, where the stipulation is simply that the ship will proceed to the loading port with all convenient speed, the dangers of the sea excepted, the shipowner performs his part of the contract, and there is no breach of it by him, if without his default, the arrival of the vessel is delayed only by the accidents and dangers of the seas, even although that delay may prevent the loading of the vessel at the usual time, or so as to be profitable to the charterer.

The law has no power to make a contract different from that which a person has entered into; and where a shipowner does not agree that his vessel shall arrive at the loading port by any particular day, but only that she shall proceed there with all convenient speed, or, what the law would imply, that she shall proceed and arrive within a reasonable time, and expressly stipulates that this shall be subject to the dangers and accidents of the seas and navigation; I do not see how that exception is to be got rid of, or how a contract with such an exception can properly be construed as, or converted into, an absolute engagement on his part that his vessel shall proceed or arrive within a reasonable time, as if there were no exception. If the contract could be so treated, it must be equally open to the shipowner to put an end to it, which in some cases might be productive of the greatest inconvenience to the charterer.

I quite admit the great inconvenience and possible loss to both shipowner and charterer when any serious delay is caused by the necessity for heavy repairs arising from sea perils; but the answer to such an argument, as it seems to me, is, that if either party desires to protect himself from such risk or inconvenience, he should introduce stipulations into the contract with that object; and, if instead of doing so, both parties agree that the vessel is to proceed and load subject to the accidents of navigation, which they expressly except, I think it is not competent for either of them afterwards to claim to be absolved from his contract by reason of an accident of navigation which he has expressly agreed shall be excepted.

If a man chooses to enter into a contract to do a particular act, he is bound to answer for it, although the performance of the act may be prevented by the occurrence of unforeseen circumstances which it was beyond his power to control, and which have arisen from no act or default of his own, because he might and ought to have have provided for the contingency by his contract: (See Paradine v. Jane, Aleyn 26.)

Where such a contingency is provided for, effect must be given to such provision as affecting the rights and obligations of both parties; and there is no principle of law that I am aware of which would excuse either party from performance of a contract, because such performance would be highly inconvenient or injurious to himself, or lead to extraordinary expense. Where a lessee had engaged to pay a proportion of the value of coal to be raised, unless prevented by unavoidable accident from working the pit, and the pit became flooded with water from an unavoidable accident, which prevented the coal being raised except at a cost exceeding its value when raised, it was held that as all coalpits are liable to such accidents, and inasmuch as the water might have been removed, though at a ruinous cost, and after some months interruption of the working, the lessee was not excused from working the pit or paying the stipulated proportion of the coal which could have been so raised: (Morris v. Smith, 3 Doug. 279.) In all maritime contracts, the performance of them must necessarily be affected by the winds and waves, and also by the regulations of foreign ports, which may be wholly or partially inaccessible in consequence of sanitary or police regulations or restrictions in time of war, and they must equally be dependent in some parts of the world upon frost and ice and all the accidents of the weather, as well as upon fire, and all contingencies which are considered as the act of God; but, in the absence of express stipulation, the risks arising from such causes would not generally excuse the performance of the engagements of the contract on either side: (See, generally, Barker v. Hodgson, 3 M. & S. 279; Kearon v. Pearson, 7 H. & N. 36; 10 W. R. 12; and Jones v. Holme, L. Rep. 2 Ex. 335; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 551.) It is on this account that, in charter-parties, bills of lading, and other contracts of a similar description, the dangers of the seas and many other contingencies are usually provided against and excepted, and, in such cases, unless some precise time be stipulated for the arrival of a vessel, I apprehend there is no engagement by a shipowner that the ship shall arrive within a reasonable time, but only that she shall arrive within a reasonable time unless prevented by the excepted perils. Where such matters have not been provided for by the contract, they have constantly led to the greatest possible inconvenience and serious loss to one or both of the parties, and the occurrence of them has practically frustrated the purposes and objects of one or other, and sometimes of both the contracting parties; and yet it has, I believe, always been held that their occurrence, unless provided for, will not absolve either party, whilst, if they are provided for and excepted in the contract, the engagements of the parties must be construed accordingly, and the obligations of each party will be qualified by the exception.

(The learned judge then reviewed the cases of Hadley v. Clarke, 3 T. Rep. 259; Touting v. Hubbard, 3 B. & P. 291; Blight v. Page, 3 B. & P. 295 N.; Hurst v. Osborne, 18 C. B. 144; Allen v. The Mercantile Marine Insurance Company, 44 New York Reps. 437; Blasco v. Fletcher (ubi sup.), and Geipel v. Smith (ubi sup.), and then continued.

There are, no doubt, cases where delay which frustrated the object of a contract has been held to absolve a party from the further performance of it; but that is only where there has been some default or breach of contract by the other party as to a stipulation which was not in the nature of a condition precedent, and would not, but for such frustration of the adventure, have gone to the whole consideration or have afforded an excuse in law for the breach of contract complained of. The cases of Havelock v. Geddes (sup.), Freeman v. Taylor (sup.), Tarrabochia v. Hickie (sup.) were all cases where there had been a breach or default by one of the parties; and the question arose as to the effect of such breach if it frustrated the whole object of the contract; but I am not aware of any case in which the mere frustration of the voyage by an unforeseen circumstance, where there had been no breach or default, has been held to absolve either party from his engagement.

The observations of several of the learned judges in Rankin v. Potter (sup.), in the House of Lords, are certainly deserving of great consideration with reference to the obligation of a charterer to load a cargo where, upon a ship becoming disabled, the necessary repairs are likely to cause considerable delay and inconvenience to him. But, on the other hand, the consequences to the shipowner, if a charterer were at liberty to throw up the contract under such circumstances might, and in many instances would, be very serious with reference not only to the engagements into which the shipowner had entered with the crew, and other persons connected with the voyage, but also with reference to further charters and engagements of the vessel which might be dependent on the first charter.

It seems to me also impossible to determine the rights or obligations of the parties upon any principle or doctrine of convenience, which must vary in almost every case, and might affect the respective parties to the contract so very differently; and the only safe rule, as it seems to me, is to abide by the general principles of law and the cases that have been decided. These decisions have, as far as I know, been uniform—that a charterer is not discharged where the delay arises from an accepted cause, and where there had been no breach of contract or default by the shipowner. I am not aware of any decision to the contrary, although expressions may be found in some of the cases to that effect, nor have I been able to discover any authority for saying that a shipowner who makes a contract to proceed with convenient speed (sea perils excepted) comes under any obligation that his ship shall arrive within a reasonable time with reference to the business of the charterer; and I cannot find any clear ground of mutual convenience in such cases which would induce the courts to lay down such a rule. It also appears to me that, if any such doctrine were allowed to prevail, it would give rise to great confusion, and no one would know, when once a ship was disabled, what the effect would be on her engagements, or what course ought to be taken either by the owner or the charterer. Where parties desire to protect themselves against contingencies, they can always do so by went to the root of the whole contract, or whether it would merely give a ground for a cross action for damages. So here the question is, is the breach so grave as to entitle the charterer to sue the shipowners? But there is also a series of cases which show that where is no default, then no delay justifies the abandonment of the adventure. These are Hadley v. Clarke (8 T. R. 259), Blight v. Page (3 B. & P. 295), Touteng v. Hubbard (3 B. & P. 291), Barker v. Hodgson (3 M. & S.

express provisions; and if they omit to adopt this precaution, and especially when such contingencies are provided for by being excepted from the contract, they have no good ground for complaint if they suffer inconvenience or loss by being held to the terms of their contract.

Where, from the nature of the contract, circumstances occur which make its provisions altogether inapplicable, it may be admitted that the contract has no longer any effect; but that doctrine, as it seems to me, does not apply to a case like the present, where the vessel might and ought to have been repaired, and where the cargo of iron could have been loaded and carried to its destination, and where the contract might thus have been fully performed on both sides, and where the contingency which has occurred, of damage to the vessel by the sea perils was specially contemplated and provided for in the contract itself.

In answer to questions put by the learned judge, the jury found that the time necessary for getting the ship off and repairing her was so long as to make it unreasonable for the charterers to supply the agreed cargo at the end of such time, and so long as to put an end, in a commercial sense, to the commercial speculation entered upon by the shipowner and the charterers.

If the general views which I have stated with respect to the law applicable to this case be correct, then I apprehend these findings by the jury are wholly immaterial, and that the defendants, notwithstanding what the jury have so found, would be entitled to our judgment; but, as such findings of the jury seem to have proceeded mainly upon the intention and object of the charterers in agreeing to load the vessel, it appears to me that they cannot, consistently with the view of the law which I have ventured to express, be supported in point of fact.

The underwriters do not insure against mere delay or its consequences, nor against wrongful breaches of contract, or the voluntary surrender of a charter-party; and, assuming that the charterers were not justified in their refusal to load the vessel under the charter-party, then it is clear there is no loss of freight by any of the perils insured against. The vessel was not wholly lost but might and ought to have been repaired; and she would then have been capable of completing the voyage and earning the freight.

The probable delay in this case was provided for and excepted by the express terms of the charter-party; and there was consequently no breach of any condition or warranty—no default or breach of the charter-party by the plaintiff; and not even a breach of any stipulation in the contract for which an action for damages could have been maintained against him; and, therefore, in my opinion, nothing to justify the charterers on that ground, or under the provisions of the charter in refusing to carry it out.

If the charterers were not entitled—as I think they were not—to throw up the charter, then the remedy of the plaintiff for the freight is against them (unless he has precluded himself from that remedy by assenting to the abandonment of the charter), and not against the underwriters; and I think under the circumstances, that upon this point the view, which my brother Brett originally took at the trial, was correct, and that our judgment ought to be for the defendants.

My two learned brothers being of a different opinion, the judgment of the court will be entered for the plaintiff.

The will, therefore, be absolute to enter the verdict for the plaintiff in the first action for a partial loss on the ship, the amount of such loss is to be ascertained by an average stater, as arranged between the parties, and also to enter the verdict in the second action for the plaintiff as for a total loss of the freight.

267), Hurst v. Osborne (18 C. B. 144), Barker v. M'Andrew (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 205; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 459; 18 C. B., N. S., 759); Blasco v. Fleicher (1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 380; 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 169; 14 C. B., N. S., 147). The reason why in no case does the common object appear to have been frustrated, is that under such circumstances no dispute arises. The opinion of Lord Alvanley (in Touteng v. Hubbard, ubi sup.), though it must be admitted not to be the ratio decidendi of the judgment, is strongly in favour of the defendants' contention; and in all the cases cited the courts held that the excuse must have been anticipated in the contract, and is not to be implied. A condition is not to be imported into the contract, for the court will not put that in which the parties themselves have not inserted. So Hurst v. Osborne (ubi sup.) is directly in point. [BLACKBURN, J.—Yes, we cannot affirm this judgment without overruling that case and Lord Alvanley's dictum.] Then Barker v. M'Andrew (ubi sup.) shows that the exception of perils of the sea applies to a preliminary voyage. But where there is no breach, no default that is, by the party asking that the contract should be carried out, there is no case to be found in which the other party may say it does not suit his convenience. In Geipel v. Smith (ante, vol. 1, p. 268; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 361; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 404), which was decided on demurrer, the reference in the judgments to reasonable time will be seen to have been made in consequence of the allegations in the pleas to that effect. In Potter v. Rankin (ante, p. 65; 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 142; L. Rep. 6 H. L. 83) there had been a default by the shipowner, and it is on that ground clearly distinguishable from this case.

Then, secondly, I say that this was a contract which could have been carried out if it suited the charterer's purpose, and the underwriters do not insure against the purposes of the charterer. The proximate cause of the loss was the refusal of the charterer to wait; and therefore the underwriters are not liable as for a loss of freight by the perils insured against—see Manley v. Jones (4 B. & C. 394), Anderson v. Wallis (2 M. & S. 240), Everth v. Smith (2 M. & S. 278), M'Carthy v. Abel (5 East, 388), The Scottish Marine Insurance Co. v. Turner (1 Macq. H. L. 328). The loss here was not by perils of the sea, because, notwithstanding them, the ship could have earned the freight, but the perils of the sea influenced the charterer's judgment as to the success of his speculation. Taylor v. Dunbar (L. Rep. 4 C. P. 206) shows that delay is an unknown cause of loss in insurance law.

Butt, Q.C. and Gully for the plaintiff.—The contention on the part of the plaintiff is that you must imply a term of some sort which you do not find ordinarily expressed in a charter-party. Here no day is named for the arrival of the ship at Newport, so a time must be implied, and that is a reasonable time. Assuming that to be an implied condition, then comes the question, did she arrive within a reasonable time? But it was decided by Potter v. Rankin (ubi sup.) that in the case of a constructive total loss, there is a loss of the freight, and so a further term comes to be implied in the charter-party, viz., that it shall be carried out unless it becomes unreasonable. It was argued on the other side that there must have been a default, and also a frustration of the voyage, but we say that if by no fault of anyone the vessel cannot arrive at the port of loading within a reasonable time, both parties are absolved, and reasonable time is such time as that beyond it the object of the voyage would be frustrated. That this is a necessary implication appears from a consideration of the principle involved. Suppose the cargo to be ice which melts, oranges which rot, then the charterer is not obliged to wait, and his excuse can only be because the law implies a reasonable time, though none is specified in the charter-party. Such indeed is the general rule of law where no time is specified in a contract, and there is nothing here to take this contract out of the ordinary rule. Personal contracts are analogous, because their performance depends on the existence of the person, and that of this on the existence of the thing. See Caldwell v. Taylor (3 B. & S. 826) cited and followed in Appleby v. Myers (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 669; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 651), Boast v. Firth (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 669, L. Rep. 4 C. P. 1), Howell v. Coupland (30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 677; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 462). Then if Geipel v. Smith (ubi sup.) be rightly decided, the plaintiff's contention here is supported, because the only difference was that there the contract was wholly executory, and here the ship had gone part of the way on her voyage. Another class of cases where the charterer has been held absolved because there had been a frustration of the object of the voyage, shows that the principle is according to our contention, though it is true that in all there was a default made. Of the three authorities most pressed against us we say that first in Hadley v. Clarke (ubi sup.), a substantial part of the contract had been performed, there was no exception as to restraint of princes, and there was no finding that the object of the adventure was frustrated.

JACKSON v. THE UNION MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED).

[EX. CH.

Secondly, as to Touteng v. Hubbard (ubi sup.), Lord Alvanley's remark was merely obiter dictum; and thirdly, in Hurst v. Osborne (ubi sup.) there was no finding of the frustration of the adventure, and as the charter-party said "grain or other lawful merchandise," it would be impossible to have admitted evidence as to the season being past. Cresswell, J. says: "No time is expressed, but the reasonable time which the law implies," and the judgment of Willes, J., in McAndrew v. Chapple (ubi sup.) is contrary to the interpretation sought to be put on his words by the other side in the case now being cited. [They were stopped in support of the second contention, that if the charterer had a right to throw up the charter, it was a total loss of freight.]

Aspland in reply.—The only ground given for the assumption that a reasonable time is implied, is that in very extreme cases it would work hardship if it be not. But that argument is as valid the other way. Then the express stipulation in this charter-party as to proceeding with all possible dispatch, excludes any other stipulation on the same subject, viz., of time, being implied. The report of Cresswell, J.'s judgment in Hurst v. Osborne (in 25 L. J. 211, C.P.), is strongly in our favour upon the point. Blasco v. Fletcher (ubi sup.) where a question of reasonableness was left to the jury was a case where there had been an authority to the shipowner to do the best for all parties. Again, it is admitted that there is no authority for implying the particular stipulation here required, unless Geipel v. Smith (ubi sup.) be one; but there there was an express condition which actually happened.

Surely as this must have occurred repeatedly, the fact of there being no authority shows that the law has been accepted as in accordance with the cases in our favour which are direct. A decision for the plaintiff merely on the suggestion of extreme cases of hardship, may equally well produce as great hardships the other way, and such a decision would throw all contracts into confusion by importing an element of uncertainty into them by the addition of some term which the parties themselves have not expressed.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 30.—The court having differed in opinion, the following judgments were delivered. The judgment of Bramwell, B., Blackburn, Mellor, and Lush, J.J., and Amphlett, B., was delivered by BRAMWELL, B.—The first question in this case is whether the plaintiffs could have maintained an action against the charterers for not loading, for if they could there certainly has not been a loss of the chartered freight by any of the perils insured against.

In considering this question the finding of the jury, that "the time necessary to get the ship off and repairing her so as to be a cargo-carrying ship was so long as to put an end in a commercial sense to the commercial speculation entered into by the shipowner and charterers" is all important. I do not think the question could have been left in better terms, but it may be paraphrased or amplified. I understand that the jury have found that the voyage the parties had contemplated had become impossible, that a voyage undertaken after the ship was sufficiently repaired, would have been a different voyage; not indeed different as to the ports of loading and discharge, but different as a different adventure; a voyage for which at the time of the charter the plaintiff had not in intention engaged the ship, nor the charterer the cargo; a voyage as different as though it had been described as intended to be a spring voyage, while the one after the repair would be an autumn voyage. It is manifest that if a definite voyage had been contracted for, and became impossible by perils of the seas, that that voyage would have been prevented, and the freight to be carried thereby would have been lost by the perils of the seas. The power which undoubtedly would exist to perform, say an autumn voyage in lieu of a spring voyage, if both parties were willing, would be a power to enter into a new agreement, and would no more prevent the loss of the spring voyage and its freight, than would the power (which would exist if both parties were willing) to perform a voyage between different ports with a different cargo.

But the defendants say here the contract was not to perform a definite voyage, but was at some and any future time, however distant, provided it was by no default in the shipowners, and only postponed by perils of the seas, to carry a cargo of rails from Newport to San Francisco. That no matter at what distance of time, at what loss to the shipowner, whatever might be the ship's engagements, however freight might have risen or seamen's wages, though the voyage at the time when the ship was ready might be twice as dangerous, and possibly twice as long, from fogs, ice, and other perils, though war might have broken out meanwhile between the country to whose port she was to sail and some other, still she was bound to take and had the right to demand the cargo of the shipper, who in like way had a right to have carried and was bound to find the agreed cargo, or if that had been sent on already, a cargo of the same description no matter at what loss and however useless the transport of the goods might be to him. This is so inconvenient, that though fully impressed with the considerations so forcibly put by Mr. Aspland, and retaining the opinion I expressed in Tarrabochia v. Hickie, I think that unless the rules of law prohibit it we ought to hold the contrary.

The question turns on the construction and effect of the charter. By it the vessel is to sail to Newport with all possible dispatch, perils of the seas excepted. It is said this constitutes the only agreement as to time, and provided all possible dispatch is used, it matters not when she arrives at Newport. I am of a different opinion. If this charter-party be read as a charter for a definite voyage or adventure, then it follows that there is necessarily an implied condition the ship shall arrive at Newport in time for it. Thus if a ship was chartered to go from Newport to St. Michaels in terms in time for the fruit season, and take coals out and bring fruit home, notwithstanding the opinion expressed in Touteng v. Hubbard, on which I will remark afterwards, it would follow that if she did not get to Newport in time to get to St. Michaels for the fruit season, the charterer would not be bound to load at Newport, though she had used all possible dispatch to get there, and though there was an exception of perils of the seas. The two stipulations to use all possible dispatch and arrive in time for the voyage are not repugnant, nor is either superfluous or useless. The shipowner in the case put expressly agrees to use all possible dispatch; that is not a condition precedent; the sole remedy for and right consequent on the breach of it is an action. He also impliedly agrees that the ship shall arrive in time for the voyage; that is a condition precedent as well as an agreement, and its non-performance not only gives the charterer a cause of action, but also releases him. Of course, if these stipulations owing to excepted perils are not performed, there is no cause of action, but there is the same release of the charterer. The same reasoning would apply if the terms were to "use all possible dispatch, and further and as a condition precedent to be ready at the port of loading on June 1st." That reasoning also applies to the present case. If the charterer be ready as for a voyage or adventure not precisely defined by time or otherwise, but still for a particular voyage, arrival at Newport in time for it is necessarily a condition precedent. It seems to me it must be so read, I should say reason and good sense require it. The difficulty is supposed to be that there is some rule of law to the contrary. This I cannot see, and it seems to me that in this case the shipowner undertook to use all possible dispatch to arrive at the port of loading, and also agreed that the ship should arrive "there at such a time that in a commercial sense the commercial speculation entered into by the shipowner and charterer should not be at an end but in existence." That latter agreement is also a condition precedent. Not arriving at such a time puts an end to the contract; though, as it arises from an excepted peril, it gives no cause of action. And the same result is arrived at by what is the same argument differently put. Where no time is named for the doing of anything, the law attaches a reasonable time.

Now let us suppose this charter-party had said nothing about arriving with all possible dispatch. In that case, had the ship not arrived at Newport in a reasonable time, owing to the default of the shipowner, the charterer would have had a right of action against the owner, and would have had a right to withdraw from the contract. It is impossible to hold that in that case the owner would have a right to say, I came a year after the time I might have come, because meanwhile I have been profitably employing my ship, you must load me, and bring your action for damages. The charterer would be discharged, because the implied condition to arrive in a reasonable time was not performed. Now let us suppose the charter contains as here, that the ship shall arrive with all possible dispatch; I ask again is that so inconsistent with or repugnant to a further condition that at all events she shall arrive within a reasonable time, or is that so needless a condition, that it is not to be implied? I say certainly not; I must repeat the foregoing reasoning. Let us suppose them both expressed, and it will be seen they are not inconsistent nor needless. Thus, I will use all possible dispatch to get the ship to Newport, but at all events she shall arrive in a reasonable time for the adventure contemplated. I hold, therefore, that the implied condition of a reasonable time exists in this charter.

Now what is the effect of the exception of perils of the seas, and of delay being caused thereby? Suppose it was not there, and not implied; the shipowner would be subject to an action for not arriving in a reasonable time, and the charter would be discharged. Mr. Benjamin says the exception would be implied. How that is it is not necessary to discuss, as the words are there; but if it is so, it is remarkable as showing what may be implied from the necessity of the case. The words are there, what is their effect? I think this, they excuse the shipowner, but give him no right. The charterer has no cause of action, but is released from the charter. When I say he is, I think that both are. The condition precedent has not been performed, but by default of neither. It is as though the charter were conditional on peace being made between countries A. and B., and it was not; or as though the charter agreed to load a cargo of coals, strike of pitmen excepted. If a strike of probably long duration began, he would be excused from putting the coals on board, and would have no right to call on the shipowner to wait till the strike was over. The shipowner would be excused from keeping his ship waiting, and have no right to call on the charterer to load at a future time. This seems in accordance with general principles. The exception is an excuse for him who is to do the act; and operates to save him from an action, and make his non-performance not a breach of contract; but does not operate to take away the right the other party would have had, if the non-performance had been a breach of contract, to retire from the engagement; and if one party may, so may the other. Thus A. enters the service of B. and is ill, and cannot perform his work; no action will lie against him, but B. may hire a fresh servant, and not wait his recovery if his illness would put an end, in a business sense, to their business engagement, and would frustrate the object of that engagement. A short illness would not suffice, if consistent with the object they had in view. So if A. engages B. to make a drawing, say of some present event for an illustrated paper, and B. is attacked with blindness which will disable him for six months, it can't be doubted that though A. could maintain no action against B., he might procure some one else to make the drawing. So of an engagement to write a book, and insanity of the intended author. So of the case I have put of an exception of a strike of pitmen.

JACKSON v. THE UNION MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED).

[EX. CH.]

There is then a condition precedent that the vessel shall arrive in a reasonable time. On failure of this, the contract was at an end, and the charterer discharged, though he has no cause of action as the failure arose from an excepted peril. The same result follows then, whether the implied condition is treated as one that the vessel shall arrive in time for that adventure, or one that it shall arrive in reasonable time, that time being in time for the adventure contemplated; and in either case, as in the express cases supposed, and in the analogous cases put, non-arrival and incapacity by that time ends the contract; the principle being that though non-performance of a condition may be excused, it does not take away the right to rescind from him for whose benefit the condition was introduced. On these grounds I think that in reason, in principle, and for the convenience of both parties, it ought to be held in this case that the charterers were on the finding of the jury discharged.

It remains to examine the authorities. The first in date relied on by the defendants is Hadley v. Clarke (8 T. R. 259). Now it may safely be said that there the question was wholly different from the present. There was no question in that case as to the performance of a condition precedent to be ready at a certain or within a reasonable time, or such a time that the voyage in question, the adventure, should be accomplished and not frustrated. That condition had been performed; the ship had loaded and sailed in due time—the plaintiff had had a part of the benefit intended—the defendant had in justice earned part of his freight. Had the plaintiff demanded his goods at Falmouth, he ought to have paid something for their carriage there. He could not, therefore, very well have said that he would not go on with the adventure, but undo it. But if I am right, unless both could, neither could. Further, in that case there was no finding, or anything equivalent to a finding, that the objects of the parties were frustrated. This case is therefore in every way distinguishable.

Then there is the case of Touteng v. Hubbard (ubi sup.). The opinion there expressed was obiter; of weight, no doubt, but not of the same weight it would have been had it been the ratio decidendi. I cannot think that it would have been so held, had it been necessary to act on it. To hold that a charterer is bound to furnish a cargo of fruit at a time of year when there is no fruit, at a time of year different to what he and the shipowner must have contemplated, the change to that time being no fault of his, but the misfortune at best of the shipowner, is so extravagant when the consequences become apparent that it could not be. Suppose a charter to fetch a cargo of ice from Norway, entered into at such a time that the vessel would reach its destination with reasonable dispatch in February, when there was ice, and bring it back in June when ice was wanted, and by perils of the seas it could not get to Norway till the ice was melted, nor return till after ice was of no value. Can it be that the charterer would be bound to load, that he had agreed in those events to do so?

Another case is Hurst v. Osborne. That is a case of which, if I knew no more than I learn from the books, I should say it did not decide the question we have before us. It is true that the report in the Law Journal, as Mr. Aspland pointed out, says that Mr. Justice Cresswell said he knew of no time the shipowner was bound to, except to use reasonable dispatch. Still, I cannot see from the reports, that the point now before us was presented to the judges in that case. My brother Blackburn, who was counsel in the cause, says it was intended to raise this point by the evidence that was rejected at Nisi Prius. No doubt, therefore, that was so, but I cannot think it was so understood by the court; I see no adjudication on it. Mr. Butt pointed out that the charter was for barley or other lawful merchandise; even if for barley only, it does not appear that barley might not have been stored at Limerick, nor that barley from Limerick arriving in England at the time it would, had the defendant loaded, would not have been as valuable as arriving earlier. I cannot but think it was a hasty decision; a rule was refused, and certainly one would think, after the argument we have heard, that the matter was worth discussing; at the same time its tendency is favourable to the defendants. I think it unsatisfactory, and, if a decision on the question now before us, wrong. Mr. Justice Willes did not seem to be of opinion that the law was as he is supposed to have laid it down in that case; see his judgment in McAndrew v. Chapple (ubi sup.), where indeed there had been a breach of his contract by the shipowner, but the observations are general. I may also properly refer to the opinions, if not of myself, of my brothers Blackburn and Brett in Potter v. Rankin (ubi sup.). They undoubtedly assumed the law to be as the plaintiffs contend.

There is also Geipel v. Smith (ubi sup.), nearly, if not quite, in point. The shipowner there was excused, not merely for refusing to take a cargo to a port which became blockaded after the charter, but also in effect for refusing to do so after the blockade was removed. Restraint of princes not only excused, but discharged him. The same, no doubt, would have been held as to the charterers.

Then there are the cases which hold that where the shipowner has not merely broken his contract, but so broken it that the condition precedent is not performed, the charterer is discharged: (see Freeman v. Taylor, 8 Bing. 124.) Why? not merely because the contract was broken. If it is not a condition precedent, what matters it whether it is unperformed with or without excuse? Not arriving with due diligence or at a day named is subject to a cross action only—but not arriving in time for the voyage contemplated, but at such a time that it is frustrated, is not only a breach of contract but discharges the charterer; and so it should though he has such an excuse that no action lies.

[Ex. Ch.]

JACKSON v. THE UNION MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED).

[Ex. Ch.]

Taylor Caldwell (ubi sup.), is a strong authority in the same direction, I cannot but think then that the weight of authority, as might be expected, is on the side of reason and convenience. On the other question, viz., whether though the charterer by perils insured against had a right to refuse to load the cargo, there had been a loss of freight by perils of the seas, I am of opinion that there has been. It was argued that the doctrine of causa proxima spectetur non remota, applied: That the proximate cause of the loss of freight here was the refusal of the charterer to load. But if I am right the voyage, the adventure, was frustrated by the perils of the seas, both parties were discharged, and a loading of cargo in August would have been a new adventure, a new agreement; but even if not the maxim does not apply. The perils of the seas do not cause something which caused something else. The freight is lost unless the charterer chooses to go on. He does not. In the case of goods carried part of the voyage and the ship lost, but goods saved, the shipowner may carry them on if he chooses, but is not bound.

Suppose he does not his freight is lost, so if he does not choose to repair a vessel which remains in specie, but is a constructive total loss. For these reasons I think the judgment should be affirmed. My brothers Blackburn, Mellor, and Amphlett, agree in this judgment as does my brother Lush, who however only heard part of the arguments.

CLEASBY, B.—The question in this case was whether there was a total loss by perils of the sea of the freight to be earned under a charter-party. By the charter-party the vessel, Spirit of the Dawn, was to proceed from Liverpool to Newport, and there take on board and carry to San Francisco a cargo of iron rails. The vessel sailed from Liverpool on the 2nd Jan. 1872, got aground on the 3rd upon the rocks in Carnarvon Bay, was got off and taken to a place of safety on the 18th Feb., then taken to Holyhead, and afterwards to Liverpool, where she was sold by auction on the 13th June for 5300*l.* The purchasers repaired her, and it was proved that on the 15th Aug. it would take about a fortnight more to complete the repairs. But in the meantime, after the vessel got on the rocks, and as soon as it was plain some time would be required for her repairs, attempts had been made by the charterers to come to some arrangements with the plaintiffs for taking up another ship to forward the rails which were wanted for the construction of a railway. The plaintiffs refused so to release the charterers from their contract, and on the 16th Feb. the charterers chartered another ship by which they forwarded the rails. Under the circumstances the plaintiffs who had effected an insurance for 1500*l.* on chartered freight valued at 2900*l.* upon the voyage from Liverpool to Newport, and thence to San Francisco, claimed for a total loss, on the ground that they were prevented by the perils from carrying the freight.

The case was tried at Liverpool before Brett, J., and he may be considered for the purpose of the present case to have left two questions to the jury, viz., first, whether the time necessary for getting the ship off and repairing her was so long as to make it unreasonable for the charterers to supply the agreed cargo at the end of the time; and, secondly, whether such time was so long as to put an end, in a commercial sense, to the commercial speculation entered upon by the shipowner and the charterers. The jury found both questions in the affirmative, and the learned judge being of opinion, notwithstanding the finding of the jury, that there was no evidence of a loss of freight by the perils insured against, directed a verdict for the defendants, reserving leave to move to enter a verdict for the plaintiffs. A motion was made, and afterwards a rule made absolute to enter a verdict for the plaintiffs as for total loss of freight. The question upon the case on appeal is stated to be whether the plaintiffs are entitled to have the verdict entered for them, and if the court is of opinion that they are so entitled, the judgment is to be entered for 1500*l.*, or such sum as the court or an average adjuster appointed by them shall direct.

The principal question argued before us was whether the necessary delay caused by the getting the vessel off the rocks and repairing her, and which had the effect found by the jury, disentitled the plaintiffs to insist upon the performance of the charter-party, by reasons of its being an implied term and condition of the charter-party that the vessel should arrive at Newport within a reasonable time.

Another question was also raised by the learned counsel for the defendants, viz., that supposing there was such an implied term, and the plaintiffs were disabled by the delay from insisting upon the performance of the charter-party, still the loss of freight was not the immediate consequence of the sea damage, but of the right exercised by the charterer of throwing up the charter-party, which he might or might not have done, and in doing which he was influenced by the exigency of the particular case, and the necessity of getting the rails to San Francisco as soon as possible. And it was forcibly argued that if this necessity had not existed, and freights had risen, the charterers would have claimed the performance of the charter, and that the underwriters were only responsible for the necessary consequence of sea damage, and not for the manner in which any option or right is exercised. This view was rejected by the court upon the argument, and as I thought upon the ground, that at the time of the alleged loss the plaintiff's interest was the right, under the charter-party, to have the rails loaded, and so to earn the freight, and that as soon as that right was destroyed by sea damage, there was a total loss of his interest by the perils insured against. If the question had been a new one, I should have thought it followed, from the interest lost being the right under the charter-party to have the executory contract of the freighters performed, that the total loss could be measured by the value of that right, and that the proper course would not be to enter the verdict for 1500*l.*, but to resort to the second alternative above referred to, and have the verdict entered for such sum as an average-stater shall direct. But the authorities are decisive that where there is a charter-party under which the shipowner will be entitled to certain freight so soon as the voyage under the charter-party has commenced, the right to the whole freight attaches, and as I cannot presume to overrule these authorities, so far as the question now under consideration is concerned, the verdict is properly entered.

But this was not the principal question raised in the case argued before us. The principal question was one of great interest, because the decision upon it not only decides the case before us, but regulates the conduct of all who enter into charter-parties—a very numerous class of persons of many nations, and who ought to have some known rule to act upon. The question is, whether, under the circumstances of the present case, the plaintiffs were entitled to repair the vessel (using all proper despatch in doing so), and to call upon the charterers to fulfil their charter.

I agree with the opinion expressed by my brother Brett at the trial, and adopted by Bovill, C.J., in the court below, that the findings of the jury are immaterial, and that upon such facts as the present, which are free from questions, it was not for the jury to put a construction upon those facts, but for the law to determine the right of the parties upon them.

Indeed I think the law has already done so by settled principles and decided cases. The settled principle is that when in an agreement a provision is made applicable to a particular subject, that provision forms the agreement on that subject. The rule is expressum facit cessare tacitum. There is no further qualification or limitation to be implied. This is essential to all, certainly in the obligations which persons place themselves under; or the agreement would be the uncertain conclusion of a particular jury, as to what was reasonable or convenient.

In such a case as that under consideration, the charter relates to a voyage necessarily exposed to disasters causing delay, and the whole enterprise is made subject to the consequences of these disasters; the voyage from Liverpool to Newport, and from Newport to San Francisco equally so. It must not be read as an agreement the object of which is proceeding from Liverpool to Newport, the object of the agreement is carrying a cargo of rails from Newport to San Francisco. There is no limit to the time occupied in doing so unless it be caused by some breach of duty. If the rails had been taken on board at Newport, and the vessel had got upon a rock the day after leaving Newport, no matter how great the delay the shipowner would have been entitled to repair to earn the freight under the charter by completing the voyage. No one disputes this, and the same thing may happen over and over again in several parts of so long a voyage as from Newport to San Francisco, which in the result may not be completed within a year or even possibly two years. Still the charter would continue in force. If the goods were intended for a particular market or a particular purpose, it would not be a question whether an unreasonable time had been occupied, or whether the commercial speculation of the charter-party was at an end; so far as the charterer was concerned, his commercial speculation must have been ruined by the delay, and so far as the shipowner was concerned, also (except so far as he was indemnified by insurances or possibly by means of valued policies was making a profit of each disaster), but still the agreement would continue because nothing had happened except what was provided for. The agreement for conveying the rails from Newport to San Francisco is as much acted upon by setting sail from Liverpool with the ship equipped for the voyage, and prepared for the cargo of rails, as if the rails had been taken on board, and the same rule of course ought to apply.

It cannot properly depend upon the part of the voyage in which the damage is sustained. The preliminary voyage might be a long one to the other extremity of the globe, and the disaster happen towards the end of it, the rule must be the same whether it be to Newport to carry out rails, or to the Chincas to bring home guano.

The principal argument addressed to us was that convenience was so much in favour of the charter-party not continuing in force after a delay of unusual and unreasonable length in proceeding to the port of lading, that a term of condition ought to be implied making the charter no longer obligatory upon the freighter after such delay. I have already pointed out that it is one voyage under the charter-party, and the inconvenience of detention would apply to all parts. It would be extremely inconvenient that the rails which were wanted at San Francisco should be loaded and detained at Monte Video, or Valparaiso, for four or five months, when they might be forwarded at once at an easy freight to San Francisco, and yet this would not affect the charter-party.

But independent of this, it appears to me that when the matter is properly considered the argument of convenience is entirely against the implication contended for. The rule to be laid down not only settles the rights of parties to such an agreement, but regulates their conduct in a very important matter. The question is what are the masters of vessels under charter to do when they have sustained damages? They are in a position of trust and great responsibility, belonging to all nations, and ought to have a clear and definite rule of conduct to go by. The rule of conduct, which the law has hitherto prescribed is, repair your vessel and proceed with your charter. But the rule now laid down would place shipowners and freighters in a position of the greatest uncertainty and difficulty. Instead of having a clear course to pursue without delay and independent of collateral considerations, such as I have mentioned, the master of a damaged vessel is to form a conclusion upon a doubtful matter, viz. the time to be consumed in repairs, and then either by himself or with the assistance of others to get at the effect of this, and thus satisfy himself whether the delay is likely to make it unreasonable for the charterers to wait, or in the words of the case whether the delay would put an end in a commercial sense to the commercial speculation entered into between him and the charterer. It would be a puzzling question for him to answer if he understood it. The answer would depend upon a variety of circumstances. The captain might say, "The commercial speculation which I entered into was and continues an excellent one. I had a charter for San Francisco at a high freight, and have from my connections a good expectation of finding a return cargo at San Francisco, and freights have here now fallen." The charterer, if freights had fallen, would say; "This has been a bad commercial speculation for me, and the best thing I can do would be to get out of it," and hire a vessel at once at a lower rate of freight. If on the other hand freights had risen the captain would wish to get out of the charter and procure a high freight, and the freighter contrariwise.

Thus, while by upholding the charter in its terms you give a rule of conduct which is certain, clear, and not influenced by unfair collateral considerations of interest, by introducing the suggested implication, you make the course of conduct difficult, dependent upon doubtful intervals of time, and results which cannot be ascertained, and expose it to the influences which I have suggested. In short, one rule makes it the duty of both parties under all circumstances to uphold the charter; the other in every case of considerable damage and necessary delay in repairing, gives each party the chance of getting out of the charter according as it is his interest to do so.

As is usual in all arguments founded upon consequences, we were pressed by extreme cases, and it was asked how long a man was to keep a cargo, perhaps a perishable one. Was he to keep it for months, a year? The answer is, that if the cargo is of such a nature, or an early shipment of vital importance, the charterer should have a special clause in the contract; but if he does not, still the contract is not one upon which there can be a claim for a specific performance. As soon as it is plain that the delay will be really serious as regards the condition of the intended cargo or the purpose to which it was destined, the charterer should forward the cargo by another vessel, giving notice at the earliest period to the shipowner of his intention. He will be liable in damages no doubt, but not to the freight, and the amount will depend upon the state of freights. If freights had risen the shipowner would sustain but little damage and the charterer would himself be a loser by forwarding his cargo at a higher rate. If freights had fallen there might be a considerable liability, but the charterer would share the advantage by having his goods forwarded at an easier rate. In the present case, the damages would probably not be heavy, for all the loss of delay and detention would not be the fault of the charterer, but caused by perils for which he was not responsible, and the shipowner would be in the same state as he was before he started. The charter-party might perhaps be framed, so as to make the charterer liable for a specified amount of stipulated damages for a particular default. If this were so it would be his fault for entering into such a stipulation, when the delay by sea perils would be so serious. In the present case, as is usual, the penalty for non-performance would not make the liability greater than the damages sustained.

It appears to me, therefore, that too much stress was laid during the argument upon the apparent injustice which would be done in a particular case of extreme delay if the charter was upheld, and not sufficient regard had to the general inconvenience which would arise if the charter were defeated in such cases. So far as the argument from convenience is concerned, it preponderates in favour of a construction which gives a certain clear and honest rule of conduct to act by in all cases, upholding a contract over one which introduced uncertainty and difficulty as to conduct, and admitting of reasons for defeating a contract which are to be derived from considerations of interest at the time. Independent therefore of authority, I should think the general rule should prevail of construing the contract as to all matters within its provisions, and not introducing an additional implied term.

I have more fully considered the case upon principle, because although the authorities appear to me to preponderate, and indeed, but for some very recent dicta and decisions, to be conclusive in favour of this view, I do not propose to refer to them in detail, as that has been done by the late Lord Chief Justice Bovill in his judgment in the court below, with which I entirely agree.

The authorities apply to two distinct conditions of things, viz., one where delay has been caused by a breach of some stipulation by the shipowner, and the other where there has been no such breach.

In the former case, except in a few cases where the stipulation is held to be a condition precedent (Gladholm v. Hayes, 5 M. & G. 257; Olive v. Booker, 1 Ex. 416), the breach is held to give a claim for damages only, and not to defeat the charter-party—such stipulations, for instance, as to sail with the first fair wind, or by a particular day. In such a contract as a charter-party, where so many circumstances may arise at the port of departure to prevent an exact compliance, and which may still not be excused, it would be most unreasonable to enable the freighter, because the bargain turned out an unprofitable one, to throw up the charter for such a default. Accordingly, if the freighter relies upon the breach of some obligation of the shipowner as an answer to an action for not providing a cargo, he must allege that he has lost all benefits of the voyage by the plaintiff's delay. He may fairly say, you have broken the contract, and I have lost all the intended benefit by your breach, and I am thus discharged: (see Freeman v. Taylor, 8 Bing. 124; Cliphsham v. Vertue, 5 Q.B. 265; Tarrabochia v. Hickie, 1 H. & N. 183; Wheeler v. Davidge, 9 Ex. 668.) It should be observed that this loss of benefit to the charterer is a totally different thing from what is set up in the present case, viz., that the delay was unreasonable, and the commercial speculation of the charter-party itself at an end. If there had been any breach by the plaintiffs in not setting sail and proceeding with convenient speed from Liverpool, the charterer might have said his object was defeated, and he was discharged; not because the delay was of itself an answer to the charterer, but because the breach was made an answer by the delay.

In the present case, the second condition exists, and there is no breach of the terms of the charter-party; but the delay itself is made an answer, and the authorities are, I have said, against it. I will only refer to three in particular, but the language of the judges in them is so clear, and to the point, that I cannot help referring to it.

Hadley v. Clarke (ubi sup.) was the case of a charter-party, perils of the sea being the only exception. The vessel was detained on the voyage from Liverpool to Leghorn by an embargo laid at an intermediate port, to which the vessel was driven, for the period of two years. It was contended that the shipowner was excused by this delay, not caused by his default, and no one can doubt, I should think, that the commercial speculation entered into by the shipowner and charterer, so far as I understand the meaning of these terms, had long been defeated by such a misadventure. But the language of Laurence, J., has been always referred to as the authority on the subject: "The counsel for the defendants were driven to the necessity of introducing into the contract other terms than those which it contained. They contended that the defendants were only bound to fulfil their engagement within a reasonable time, and then argued that, as the embargo prevented the completion of the contract within a reasonable time, the defendants were absolved from the engagement altogether. It was incumbent on the defendants, when they entered into this contract, to specify the terms and conditions on which they would engage to carry the plaintiff's goods to Leghorn. They accordingly did express the terms, and absolutely engaged to carry the goods, the dangers of the seas only excepted. That, therefore is the only excuse which they can make for not performing the contract. If they had intended that they should be excused from any other cause they should have introduced such an exception into their contract." There is no doubt a distinction of fact between that case and the present one, viz., that in that case the cargo remained on board during the whole period of detention, and was, as it were, during all that time detained, subject to the charter-party; but this does not appear to make any difference in the principle since the contract had been acted on in the present case, and the vessel had been prepared and had on board all the necessary equipments, and had set sail for the voyage.

JACKSON v. THE UNION MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED).

In the case of Touteng v. Hubbard (ubi sup.) the cargo had not been taken on board, and the action was for not providing a cargo at the port of loading—St. Michaels. The charter had the exception of restraint of princes, and had proceeded on the voyage from London, but was detained at Ramsgate, by an embargo, for six months, and the charterer refused to load a cargo on the ground that the season for shipping fruit had long passed, and the voyage would be useless and nugatory, which may be construed as having the same meaning as that the commercial speculation was at an end. The case was ultimately decided upon a question of nationality. The judgment of Lord Alvanley is referred to at some length in the judgment of Lord Chief Justice Bovill in the court below. I refer to the following passage, because it bears also upon the authority of Hadley v. Clarke: "If, then, this had not been the case of a Swedish ship, hired by an English merchant, the merchant would have been under the necessity of furnishing the ship with a cargo if she had arrived at St. Michaels as soon as she conveniently might after the embargo was taken off, although, by arriving after the fruit season was over, the object of the voyage might be defeated. Such is the doctrine in Hadley v. Clarke, and Blight v. Page. I have no difficulty in subscribing to the doctrine laid down in Hadley v. Clarke, that a common embargo does not put an end to any contract between the parties, but is to be considered as a temporary suspension of the contract only, and that the parties must submit to whatever inconvenience may arise therefrom, unless they have provided against it by the terms of their contract. The object of the voyage might equally have been defeated by the act of God as by the act of the State, as, if the ship had been weather bound until the fruit season was over; and yet in that case the merchant would have been bound to fulfil his contract. The principle of Hadley v. Clarke is, that an embargo is a circumstance which it is equally competent to the parties to provide against as against the dangers of the seas, and, therefore, if they do not provide against it they must abide by the consequences of their contract."

I shall only refer to one other case for the purpose of quoting the opinion of the late Mr. Justice Willes upon the question raised in the present case; Hurst v. Osborne (ubi sup.). In that case there had been a detention for 152 days, being perils of the seas, and the charterers refused to load, partly on the ground that the vessel had arrived after the time when the export trade usually took place from the port of loading. The following is the judgment of Willes, J.: "As to the other question, whether the construction of the charter-party can be affected by the fact that the particular description of cargo could only be supplied at a certain season of the year, the answer to that I apprehend is, that the charter-party was probably entered into in the hope that the vessel would arrive at Limerick at that time of the year. But the question is, who takes the risk whether she will or not? Why the person who is to ship the goods takes the risk, unless he stipulates that the other party shall take it. Here it is not stipulated that the vessel shall arrive at Limerick by any particular day, but only that she shall proceed there with all convenient speed. The owner has performed his contract to proceed with all convenient speed when he has done all he could, but has been prevented by danger of the seas."

The case of Hadley v. Clarke was decided in the year 1799, and it and the cases following upon it have been regarded as authorities ever since, and quoted in all the text books. They are referred to as authorities by the American, as well as English writers. Lord Tenterden, in his work on Shipping, the first edition of which was published in 1802, devotes a paragraph to it, as giving the law on the subject (p. 429, 5th edit.). And for the American text books, see Parsons on Shipping, vol. 1, pp. 318, 330. In the latter passage the learned writer insists upon the authority of Hadley v. Clarke, and referring to it and other cases in conformity with it in the American courts he says: "It is very clear that an embargo, though of an indefinite duration, may suspend the performance of the contract." Kent also refers to Hadley v. Clarke as an authority not questioned: (vol. 3, pp. 312, 346, 10th edit.) In the latter reference, after referring to matters which put an end to the contract by breaking up the voyage, he adds: "But a temporary impediment of the voyage does not work a dissolution of the charter-party, and an embargo has been held to be such a temporary restraint, even though it be indifferent as to time. (He here refers to Hadley v. Clarke, and the American cases.) The same construction is given to the legal operation of a hostile blockade or investment of the port of departure, upon the contract. It merely suspends the performance of it, and the voyage must be broken up, or the completion of it become unlawful, before the contract will be dissolved. If the cargo be not of a perishable nature, and can endure the delay, the general principle applies, that nothing but occurrences which prevent absolutely the performance of the contract will dissolve it. The parties must wait until those which merely retard its execution are removed." But such occurrences would cause unreasonable delay, and destroy the commercial speculation of the contract; still it would subsist.

Against this weight of authority there are, no doubt, authorities entitled to great consideration.

In the case of Rankin v. Potter (ubi sup.), in which the judgment really was that a constructive total loss of the ship was of itself a loss of chartered freight, without notice of abandonment, there are dicta of several of the judges, in their opinions delivered to the House of Lords, to the effect that where a vessel under charter was delayed for an unreasonable time, the charterer was not bound to provide a cargo. Venturing, as I do, to differ from the judgment of the court below, I must, of course, venture to differ from those dicta. And it may properly be noticed that those dicta are upon a matter which did not necessarily arise upon the question on which the case was decided, and that they did not in the slightest degree enter into any of the judgments of any of the noble lords who decided the case, and were not noticed by them. Indeed, the judgments given exclude delay from sea damages, as an answer to the obligation of the charterer to load a cargo. The following are the words of Lord Chelmsford in relation to the right of the shipowner under the charter, where there has been damage requiring reparation: "If the sea damage which the ship sustained in New Zealand was such as to reduce her to a state which rendered her utterly incapable of performing the voyage to England without an expense which no prudent uninsured owner would incur, then the freight was totally lost from that moment, and how the owners chose to deal with the disabled ship afterwards was wholly immaterial. If the damage to the ship had been such that it might have been repaired at a reasonable expense and put into a condition to earn the freight, and the shipowners had declined to take this course, they would have lost the freight, not by the perils of the sea, but by their election." The rule given is a simple one: repair the damage, if it can be done at a reasonable expense, and tender your vessel to the charterer. Not a word about the time which it may require. The same remark applies to the judgment of Lord Colonsay and Lord Hatherley. It may also be noticed with reference to the dicta of the learned judges, that those dicta had reference in the particular case, not to the necessary delay during the time required for the repair of damage, but to the unusual and unnecessary delay arising from the shipowner, instead of repairing the vessel, making use of it and letting it out for months as a store depôt for coals, in consequence of the want of funds.

Much reliance was placed in the argument upon the case of Geipel v. Smith (ubi sup.), and if that case could be regarded as overruling the authorities referred to, I should have to consider whether I thought myself bound by the earlier authorities or the last one. But that is not the case at all. Not a word is said in that case about overruling any previous authority; on the contrary, my brother Blackburn says that very different considerations arose in Hadley v. Clarke. And this was undoubtedly so, for Geipel v. Smith was not a case of detention by embargo or delay from necessary repairs, but of the performance of the charter becoming impossible, that is, impossible without liability of forfeiture of ship and cargo by reason of a duly notified and effective blockade at port of delivery. It had been held in the case of Medeiros v. Hill (8 Bing. 231), that when after the known existence of a blockade a charter-party was made to convey a cargo to the blockaded port (the case being clear from the difficulty which might arise if the object was to run the blockaded port), the existence of the blockade was no answer to the engagement to proceed on the voyage. The object of the merchant in making such a charter was, as stated by the judgment, to be in readiness to enter the port as soon as the blockade was taken off, and so get the advantage of a good market. But in Geipel v. Smith, the blockade, after the making of the charter, interposed the impossibility of completing it. The charter contained the exception of restraints of princes.

Now, according to the law of England, if a person engages absolutely to do something, the fact of its becoming impossible, or attended with penalties, is in general no answer: (Paradine v. Jane, so often referred to, and many subsequent cases.) But it would, perhaps, be sufficient to say that such a rule could not apply to a contract between the shipowner and charterer, when the consequence of carrying the contract into effect would be to expose the cargo as well as the ship to seizure and forfeiture. I take it the shipowner not only is not bound to run the risk of seizure by attempting to enter the blockaded port, but would not be justified in doing so without the consent of the charterer; I mean as between them. But, independent of that consideration, the rule is founded upon the presumption, that where the engagement is absolute, the party takes upon himself the risk of being able to perform the contract. But that presumption is gone when by the contract itself it appears that the party contracting does not take upon himself that risk, and the exception of the restraint of princes in the charter-party negatives the shipowner having taken upon himself the risk of blockade. That being so, it would indeed have been most unreasonable to hold that the shipowner was bound by such a charter-party after the impossibility of completing the contract arose, to load the cargo and carry it to a distant part, and there wait, perhaps, until it was necessary to return home for stores and provisions, more especially under the particular circumstances appearing in the pleadings in that case. The cases upon the effect of blockade upon a contract of charter-party, are few in our courts; but the question has arisen in America, and the decision there has been, that the effect of a blockade of the port of delivery after the contract, is to justify the shipowner in throwing up the charter. Kent, vol. 3, p. 346, 10th edit., is very clear in the distinction that while embargo at the port of loading is only a temporary impediment, and leaves the contract continuing, a blockade of the port of delivery makes the performance of the contract impossible, and justifies the parties in throwing it up. And he refers to two cases, The Tutela (6 C. Rob. 181), and Scott v. Libby (2 Johnson's cases in the Supreme Court of New York, p. 336). In the first case, Sir W. Scott seems to think it clear that a blockade of the port of discharge puts an end to a charter previously made, and in the American case the judgment begins thus, p. 338: "It appears to be conceded by the counsel on both sides, that by the blockade of the port of discharge the charter-party was dissolved, and all right to freight under it gone." The great loss and inconvenience of equipping and starting upon an enterprise which is at the time impossible, seems a sufficient reason for the distinction. But without saying that our courts would at present go that length, I think I may say that the case of Geipel v. Smith is no authority that detention for necessary reparation justifies the throwing up the charter, or leaves it in force, according as a jury find, that the time taken was reasonable or the reverse.

Other cases were referred to in which implied terms had been introduced in express contracts, but I do not think that they throw any light upon the particular question before us. Indeed it would be impossible to examine all the imperfect analogies which may be put forward. Such, for example, as the implied condition that a person who has contracted to do some piece of work which no one else can do, such, for instance, as painting a picture, shall live long enough to be able to paint it; and other similar instances. No doubt when the existence of a particular person or thing, or state of things, can be regarded as the very foundation of a particular transaction, it may be implied that if the foundation fails, the transaction which is founded upon it ceases to be effectual. But upon this subject I would beg to refer to the clear and comprehensive judgment of my brother Blackburn in Taylor v. Caldwell (3 B. & S. 826).

For the reasons which I have now given, it appears to me that the charter-party in the present case continued binding upon the charterers, that consequently there was no loss of freight by the perils, and therefore the defendants are entitled to judgment, which would be a reversal of the judgment already given.

Judgment affirmed.

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Tuesday, Nov. 3, 1874.

H. M. S. BELLEROPHON.

Inspection of documents—Collision—Report by captain of H. M. Ship to Admiralty—Privilege—Public policy.

Where a collision occurs between one of H. M. ships and a ship belonging to a private owner, and the captain of H. M. ship makes (in accordance with the usual practice) a report to the Lords of the Admiralty, the High Court of Admiralty will not, in a cause against the captain of H. M. ship, in which an appearance has been entered by the Queen's Proctor by order of the Lords of the Admiralty, order it to be produced for inspection by the opposite parties if the Secretary to the Lords of the Admiralty makes an affidavit to the effect that such production would be prejudicial to the public service.

This was a cause of damage instituted on behalf of the Liverpool, Brazil, and River Plate Steam Navigation Company, the owners of the steamship Flamsteed, against the Hon. George G. Wellesley, C.B., Vice-Admiral in Her Majesty's Navy, commanding the fleet on the North American Station, and Richard Wells, Esq., captain of H. M. S. Bellerophon, to recover damages for the loss of the Flamsteed, which occurred in consequence of a collision with the Bellerophon. An appearance was entered on behalf of the defendants by the Admiralty Proctor, by the directions of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty.

VOL. II., N. S.

The case first came before the court on 8th July 1874, when a motion was made on behalf of the plaintiffs "for liberty to inspect and take copies of and extracts from the entries in the log books of H. M. S. Bellerophon relating to the collision, and of all reports made to the Admiralty prior to the institution of the cause by the defendants or either of them relating to the collision." The plaintiffs filed an affidavit by one of the managers of the plaintiff company in support of their motion, and it was there stated that it was believed that the plaintiffs would obtain material evidence in support of their case from an inspection of the log books of H. M. S. Bellerophon, and also from an inspection of certain despatches or reports, which had been received by the Admiralty from the defendants, one or both of them in consequence of or relating to the collision. The application was not opposed on behalf of the defendants, so far as it related to the log books, but in so far as it related to the reports or despatches it was objected by counsel for the defendants that the production of such reports might be prejudicial to the public service, and that they were in consequence privileged. The court, however, intimated that the mere statement of objection by counsel was not enough, but that if the defendants could show upon affidavits their grounds for objecting to produce the reports he would entertain the objection; the court accordingly made an order that the plaintiffs or their proctors be at liberty to inspect and take copies of or extracts from the log books of H. M. S. Bellerophon, relating to the collision in question in this cause, but made no order for the present upon the remainder of the plaintiffs' motion, but directed the defendants to file an affidavit as to their reasons for objecting to the inspection of any reports relating to the said collision made by them or either of them prior to the institution of the cause.

In obedience to this order the Admiralty Proctor filed an affidavit in which Mr. Vernon Lushington, the permanent secretary to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, stated as follows:

I, Vernon Lushington, of the Admiralty, Whitehall, in the county of Middlesex, one of Her Majesty's counsel, make oath, and say as follows:

1. I am secretary to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty of England.

2. When any collision of importance occurs between one of Her Majesty's ships and any other ship or vessel, it is the duty of the officer in command of Her Majesty's ship forthwith to report such collision to his senior officer or commander-in-chief, and of such senior officer or commander-in-chief to forward the same, with or without remarks, as he may think fit, to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty.

3. Such reports are designed solely for the information of the reporting officers, naval superiors, and the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and are in the nature of confidential communications. It will be prejudicial to the public service to allow such reports to become liable to inspection by litigants in any proceedings at law touching the matters therein reported.

4. On the above ground, I object on behalf of the Lords Commissioners to the reports of the Honourable Geo. G. Wellesley, C.B., and Richard Wells, Esq., touching the collision in question in this cause being inspected by, or copies thereof furnished to the plaintiffs in this cause, or any one on their behalf.

A renewed notice of motion having been filed and served for the present date, the motion again came on upon the question of the obligation to produce the reports.

Butt, Q.C., Cohen, Q.C. (Clarkson with them), for the plaintiffs, in support of the motion.—This action is nominally against the officers commanding H. M. ship, but in reality it is against the Admiralty, who have directed their proctor to enter an appearance; the Crown is consequently a party to this cause, and this application is to compel the production of documents relating to the question at issue which are in the possession of one of the parties. If this suit were against a private owner, reports by his master would not be privileged. Can it be said that they are privileged simply because they are made to the Crown? The allegation in the affidavit of the Secretary to the Admiralty is that the production of documents of this nature would be prejudicial to the public service. That we submit is not enough to exempt them from the ordinary rule; there ought at least to be an allegation that the production of these particular reports would be prejudicial, even if the Crown as parties to the suit are in a position to object at all. The Crown could have discovery against the plaintiff. Can it be right that the Crown should have discovery and not give it? The question whether the production of a class of documents is prejudicial is clearly not for the head of a Government department, but for the judge to decide. The head of a department may decide if a particular document ought to be produced, but here that is carefully avoided. If there is any part of this document which ought not to be made public let it be sealed up, and let the plaintiff have inspection of the rest. The true way in which the character of the document should be ascertained is by laying it before the court, which should decide on seeing it whether it ought or ought not to be produced.

R. E. Webster, as amicus curiæ.—In the case of Dixon v. The Small Arms Company, which was before the Court of Queen's Bench last term, the action was brought to recover royalties from the defendants in respect of certain rifles which they had manufactured for the Government, of a pattern which had been patented by the plaintiff. The defendants defended on the ground that, as they were acting for the Government, they were not bound to pay royalties. The plaintiff applied for inspection of the contract between themselves and the Government, which was in the possession of the War Office. The Attorney-General appeared in court and objected to produce the document on the ground that its production might be prejudicial to the public service. The Court of Queen's Bench said that this was a mode of taking the objection that was wholly without precedent, and that they could not allow the objection in that form, but that if the Attorney-General would bring in an affidavit by the proper officer, stating that the production of the particular document would be actually prejudicial that would be the proper course, and the case was adjourned to give the Attorney-General time to consider the course he would pursue. Subsequently, however, the Government produced the document without further action being taken.

The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C.) and H. G. Stokes for the defendants.—In Beatson v. Skene (29 L. J. 430 Ex.), an action was brought by the plaintiff, an officer in the English forces during the Turkish war against the defendant, his commanding officer, for libel. The libel was alleged to have been contained in a report sent by the defendant to the War Office, and at the trial the Secretary for War was called upon to produce the report, but declined, upon the ground that the production would be prejudicial to the public service, and Bramwell, B., who tried the case, declined to order its production. This ruling was upheld by the Court of Exchequer, and it was there laid down that the person who is to judge whether a document is to be produced or not is the official who has charge of it, and not the judge who tries the case. It is contended that if the production of part is objectionable, and the rest not, the document ought to be produced, subject to the sealing up of the former part, but this is not in accordance with the decisions. The document can only be treated as a whole, and if its official character is established, the person in whose custody it is may object to produce it.

Wadeer v. The East India Company, 8 De G. M. & G. 152;

Smith v. The East India Company, 1 Phillips 50.

In the latter case Lord Lyndhurst says, "Now it is quite obvious that public policy requires, and looking at the Act of Parliament, it is quite clear that the legislature intended that the most unreserved communication should take place between the East India Company and the Board of Control, and that it should be subject to no restraints or limitation; but it is also quite obvious, that if at the suit of a particular individual, those communications should be subject to be produced in a court of justice, the effect would be to restrain the freedom of the communications, and to render them more cautious, guarded, and reserved." Taylor on Evidence, paragraph 866, after speaking of the privileges of witnesses, says, "Upon similar grounds, the official transactions between the heads of departments of Government, and their subordinate officers are, in general, treated as secrets of State. . . . The President of the United States, the Governors of the several States, are not bound in America to produce papers or disclose information communicated to them, when, in their own judgment, the disclosure would, on public considerations, be expedient. And the same doctrine it would seem, prevails in England, whenever Ministers of State are called as witnesses for the purpose of producing public documents. The proceedings in this court differ entirely from petition of right, as they are not against the Crown, and even in a petition of right it is only by special Act of Parliament that the Crown is placed in anything like the same position as a private individual as to evidence, &c."

Butt, Q.C. in reply.—In Beatson v. Skene (ubi sup.) there was an express statement that the production of the particular document sought would be prejudicial, and that is not stated here. Moreover, in that case the Crown was not a party, and the Secretary of War was not a suitor, and was not deciding in a matter in which he might be prejudiced. If this objection is allowed the Secretary of the Lords of the Admiralty will be setting himself up as a judge in his own case. In Taylor on Evidence, paragraph 366, it is further said that, "If, however, the Minister, instead of attending personally at the trial, should send the required papers by the hands of a subordinate officer, the judge would probably examine them himself, and would compel their production, unless he were satisfied that they ought on public grounds to be withheld." It is nowhere held that the affidavit of the secretary of a Minister is enough to excuse production. The court ought to see the document itself.

Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—This is a cause of damage which is instituted on behalf of the Liverpool, Brazil, and River Plate Steam Navigation Company, the owners of the steamship Flamsteed, against the Vice-Admiral George G. Wellesley, C.B., commanding the fleet on the North American Station, and Richard Wells, Captain of H. M. S. Bellerophon. The action is entered in the sum of 40,000l.

The cause has not yet been tried upon the merits, but an application has been made to the court to order "that the plaintiffs may be at liberty to inspect and take copies of and extracts from entries in the log book of H. M. S. Bellerophon relating to the collision in question in this cause;" and, according to the best of my recollection, that part of the motion has already been granted. But the application goes on further, and prays "for liberty to inspect all reports made to the Admiralty, prior to the institution of the cause, by the Hon. Geo. G. Wellesley, C.B., and Richard Wells, or either of them, in consequence of and relating to the said collision."

It occurred to me when this matter was brought before me on a former occasion, that the second part of the application ought to stand over in order that the Lords of the Admiralty might take such course with respect to it, as they should be advised was proper; and I have before me now the affidavit of Mr. Vernon Lushington, the secretary to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, in which he states as follows: "When any collision of importance occurs between one of Her Majesty's ships and any other ship or vessel, it is the duty of the officer in command of Her Majesty's ship forthwith to report such collision to his senior officer or commander-in-chief, and of such senior officer or commander-in-chief to forward the same, with or without remarks as he may think fit, to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty. Such reports are designed solely for the information of the reporting officer's naval superior and the said Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and are in the nature of confidential communications. It will be prejudicial to the public service to allow such reports to become liable to inspection by litigants in any proceedings at law touching the matters therein reported."

It is obvious that if communications contained in reports of the nature mentioned in this affidavit should be held liable to inspection there would be great danger of producing a result which—to use the words of Lord Lyndhurst in Smith v. The East India Company (1 Phillips, 50)—would be "to restrain the freedom of the communications, and to render them more cautious, guarded, and reserved" than they otherwise would be between the officers of Her Majesty, and thereby do "injury to the public interest."

It is contended by the plaintiffs that the affidavit is faulty in various respects, the principal objection taken by them being that it is not for the Secretary of the Admiralty to judge whether the inspection would or would not be prejudicial to the public service, but that it is a matter upon which the court is to form and express its own opinion. And it is also contended that if it would be prejudicial to the public service to allow inspection of any particular portion of the document, that part of it ought to be sealed up, and the other part left open for inspection. It has moreover been argued that the affidavit is also deficient in this respect, that it does not state that in this particular case the production of these reports would be prejudicial to the public service, but places the present case in a category of cases, of which it may be predicated that in such cases the production of such reports would be prejudicial to the public service.

Now, it appears to me that the principle upon which this case ought to be decided has been laid down in the case of Beatson v. Skene (5 H. & N. 838; 29 L. J. 430, Ex.), which was referred to by the learned advocate for the Admiralty. That was a case in which a single judge, Baron Bramwell, had held at Nisi Prius, that a communication in answer to the Secretary of War was a privileged communication, and could not be produced in evidence without the consent of the Government. Upon motion for a new trial the matter came before the full court, and the opinion of Baron Bramwell was sustained by the Court of Exchequer. During the course of the judgment I find the following passage:—"We are of opinion that if the production of a State paper would be injurious to the public service, the general public interest must be considered paramount to the individual interests of a suitor in a court of justice." Then follow these important words:—"And the question then arises, how is this to be determined? It is manifest it must be determined, either by the presiding judge or by the responsible servant of the Crown, in whose custody the paper is. The judge would be unable to determine it without ascertaining what the document was, and why the publication of it would be injurious to the public service, an inquiry which cannot take place in private, and which, taking place in public, may do all the mischief which it is proposed to guard against. It appears to us, therefore, that the question, whether the production of the document would be injurious to the public service, must be determined, not by the judge, but by the head of the department having the custody of the paper, and if he is in attendance, and states that in his opinion, the production of that document would be injurious to the public service, we think the judge ought not to compel production of it."

It appears to me that nothing has been urged before me which is sufficient to take the present case out of the operation of the principle here laid down. It is true that in this case Mr. Vernon Lushington has made a statement in an affidavit instead of orally. I cannot see that that makes any difference as to the principle to be applied to the case; and in this case the heads of the department—for so I read the affidavit of Mr. Lushington—that is to say, the Lords of the Admiralty have distinctly stated that it will be prejudicial to the public service to allow such reports to become liable to inspection by litigants in any proceedings at law touching the matters therein reported.

I do not see on what evidence the court acted in the case referred to of Beatson v. Skene, when it came to the conclusion that the head of the department objected to produce the document asked for. It is not one, therefore, which, on the question of what evidence will justify me in refusing to order the production of the document forms a precedent for the case now before me; but agreeing as I do with the principles laid down in that case, and feeling it to be my duty to follow the opinion of the Court of Exchequer on such a question as the admissibility of evidence; upon these grounds I must reject the application now made to me—that is, that part which relates to the inspection of the reports made by the defendants or either of them, to the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty.

I have already granted the application as far as the inspection of the log is concerned, and, therefore, there is no necessity for repeating anything upon that point.

THE DANNEBROG.

Admiralty Court Act 1861, sect. 6—Jurisdiction—Breach of contract before goods loaded.

The High Court of Admiralty has no jurisdiction to entertain a suit for breach of contract under the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), sect. 6, where the breach occurs before the goods are laden on board the vessel which under the contract afterwards carries the goods into a port in England or Wales.

THIS was cause of damage to cargo arising out of breach of contract or duty instituted under the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, on behalf of Messrs. John S. De Wolff and Co., of London, merchants, against the foreign ship Dannebrog, and it now came before the court upon motion on behalf of the defendants "to reject the 2nd and 3rd, and to direct the amendment of the 6th and 9th articles of the petition, on the ground that the court has no jurisdiction to try the claim made by the said 2nd and 3rd articles." The petition was, so far as is material, as follows:

1. By charter-party, dated the 29th May 1874, between H. Jorgensen, the master of the above-named foreign vessel Dannebrog and the plaintiffs (charterers); it was mutually agreed that the said vessel being tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, should with all convenient dispatch proceed to Moses River, county of Halifax, Nova Scotia, or so near thereunto as she might safely get, and there load always afloat from the charterer's agents a full and complete cargo of birch timber, deals, boards, ^{and} _{or} other woods, goods, ^{and} _{or} lawful merchandise, deal ends, lath-wood palings, ^{and} _{or} laths for broken stowage, which the charterers bound themselves to ship, not exceeding what she could reasonably stow or carry over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions and furniture, and being so loaded should therewith proceed to Liverpool, Clyde, or Bristol Channel a direct port, orders on signing bills of lading and discharge at a dock as ordered on arrival by charterer's agent, or so near thereunto as she might safely get, and deliver the same on being paid freight as therein mentioned; and by indorsement on the said charter-party, dated the 27th June 1874, it was mutually agreed between the said master and the plaintiffs that the Dannebrog should if required call at Penarth Roads for orders, and also give option of discharging at Gloucester; and that should the vessel require to lighter part cargo to enable her to go up to Gloucester, the charterers should pay the expenses of said lighterage and other expenses as therein mentioned.

2. In accordance with the said charter-party the plaintiffs provided a full and complete cargo of birch timber, and other wood goods ready to be shipped on board the Dannebrog at the usual loading place in Moses River; and it became and was the duty of the master of the Dannebrog to proceed with the said vessel to Moses River and to the usual loading place there, and to load the said cargo; but although all conditions were fulfilled, and all times elapsed necessary to entitle the plaintiffs to have the said charter-party performed and to have the said vessel proceed to Moses River, and to the usual loading place there, and to load the said cargo and although she could have safely proceeded to Moses River, and to the said usual loading place, and could have there loaded the said cargo always afloat, the said master proceeded with the said vessel to Nécum Tanck Bay, which is a place not in but short of Moses River, and there anchored the said vessel, and neglected and refused to proceed with the said vessel to Moses River and to the said usual loading place.

3. The agents of the plaintiffs thereupon, under protest, loaded the said vessel in Nécum Tanck Bay, with a full and complete cargo of birch timber and other wood goods, as specified in the said charter-party; but by reason of the said refusal the plaintiffs were put to expenses in lightening the said cargo and other expenses which they would not have incurred if the said vessel had proceeded to Moses River and there loaded her cargo; and by reason of such refusal and of the said vessel having been driven ashore owing to Nécum Tanck Bay being an exposed anchorage, a much longer time was consumed in loading the said cargo than would have been consumed in loading the same had the said vessel proceeded to Moses River and there loaded her said cargo in accordance with the said charter-party; and the said vessel did not sail on and complete her voyage and deliver cargo so soon as she would have done had she proceeded to Moses River.

4. When the said cargo had been so loaded, as aforesaid, on board the Dannebrog, her said master signed and delivered to the plaintiffs four bills of lading of the same tenour and date which were and are in the words and figures following, that is to say:

"Shipped in good order and condition by J. and E. de Wolff and Co., Halifax, in and upon the good ship or vessel called the barque Dannebrog, whereof Jorgensen is master for this present voyage, or whoever else may go as master in the said ship, and now lying in the port of Moses River, N. S., and bound for Penarth for orders to discharge in port in the Bristol Channel, including Gloucester, 444 pieces of birch timber 227 $\frac{23}{32}$ tons, 2800 pailings, 613 deal ends, 216 boards, 5435 pieces of deals being marked and numbered as per margin, and are to be delivered in the like good order and condition at the aforesaid port in Bristol Channel (all and every the dangers and accidents of the seas and navigation of whatsoever nature or kind excepted) unto Messrs. John S. de Wolff and Co., or to their assigns, freight for the said goods to be paid at freight and all other terms as per charter-party with average accustomed. In witness whereof the master or agent of the said ship or vessel hath affirmed to four bills of lading all of this tenour and date, one of which bills being accomplished, the rest to stand void. Dated in Moses River, N. S., 23rd July, 1864.

"Signed under protest,
 "Measure and quality unknown.

H. JORGENSEN."

5. The said vessel subsequently sailed with the said cargo to and in pursuance of orders which were duly given by or on behalf of the plaintiff, arrived with the said cargo at Gloucester, but although one of the said bills of lading was duly presented to the said master, and the delivery of the said cargo was demanded on behalf of the plaintiffs and the freight for the carriage of the said cargo was duly paid to the said master, and all conditions were fulfilled, and all times elapsed and all things happened necessary to entitle the plaintiffs, and although the plaintiffs became entitled to have all the said cargo delivered in accordance with the terms of the said bill of lading, the master of the said ship refused and neglected to deliver a large portion of the said cargo in accordance with the said bills of lading.

6. The plaintiffs were at the time of the said refusal of the said master to go to Moses River, and thenceforth down to and at the time when they became entitled as aforesaid to have the said cargo delivered at Gloucester, the owners thereof within the meaning of sect. 6 of the Admiralty Court Act, 1861.

7. By reason of the several breaches of duty and breaches of contract hereinbefore stated, the plaintiffs have sustained damage by loss of market for their said cargo, have lost the said portion of cargo, and have otherwise incurred great losses and expenses.

Cohen, Q.C. and W. G. F. Phillimore for the defendants in objection to the petition.—The court has no jurisdiction over a claim of this nature. The breach of contract complained of is a breach of charter-party in not proceeding to the agreed place of loading before the goods were put on board, and before the bills of lading were signed. The bill of lading being a contract to perform something after the goods are put on board can have and has no reference to the terms of the charter-party relating to acts to be done before the loading, and consequently this breach cannot in any way be said to be a breach of the contract contained in the bill of lading. The jurisdiction is wholly conferred by the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), sect. 6, and the question is whether the breach comes within that section which enacts that this court "shall have jurisdiction over any claim by the owner or consignee or assignee of any bill of lading of any goods carried into any port in England or Wales in any ship for damage done to the goods or any part thereof by the negligence or misconduct of or for any breach of duty or breach of contract on the part of the owner, master, or crew of the ship." The claim made by the second and third acts of the petition is not for "damage done to the goods," but is for "breach of contract on the part of the owner, master, or crew." These words are wide, but they must have some limit. It has been laid that the court has no jurisdiction over a claim brought exclusively on charter-parties, although it has jurisdiction over actions upon bills of lading and for breaches of duty on the part of the shipowner in relation to the goods carried by him in England or Wales. In The Kasan (Br. & Lush. 1) the contract was by one charter-party to carry an outward cargo, deliver it abroad, and carry back to this country a homeward cargo; the outward cargo was not delivered according to contract; the homeward cargo was carried into an English port, but it was held that there was no jurisdiction over the breach of contract as to the outward cargo, as the breach to give jurisdiction must relate to the goods carried into the English port. In The St. Cloud (Bro. & Lush. 4, 15; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 54; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 309) Dr. Lushington says, "The statute is remedial. The short delivery of goods brought to this country in foreign ships or their delivery in a damaged state, was frequently a greivous injury for which there was no practical remedy; for the owners of such vessels being resident abroad, no action could be successfully brought against them in a British tribunal." This shows the object of the statute, and that it refers entirely to the goods brought into this country, and to the contract under which they are brought; and the jurisdiction must be taken to be limited by the subject-matter in relation to which the statute was intended to supply a remedy (Simpson v. Blues, ante vol. 1, p. 326; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 290, 294; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 697. In The Pieve Superiore (ante p. 319; 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 97), the Privy Council say, "The Legislature has used the words 'carried into any port in England or Wales,' and may have done so designedly to meet cases of the kind to which reference has just been made (refusal to carry on). It has said nothing of delivery, nor of the purpose for which the goods may be carried into port. The general words of the clause 'any claim for any breach of contract on the part of the owner &c., of the ship' must undoubtedly be construed to have relation to the contract in the bill of lading." The statute refers only to the bill of lading, and not in any way to the charter-party; the charterer therefore, as charterer, can have no locus standi in this court. The word "contract" does not include every contract, but only such as is in the bill of lading, and therefore one which is entered into after the goods are put on board. In no case can there be a claim under a charter-party unless the charterer is also holder of the bill of lading. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—In the cases arising out of the German War the claims were nearly all made by the consignees or assignees of the bills of lading, and arose under charter parties: See The Henrich ante vol. 1, p. 79; L. Rep. 3 Adm. & Ecc. 424; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 915; The Wilhelm Schmidt, ante vol. 1, p. 82; 25 L. Rep. N. S. 34; The Empress ante vol. 1, p. 355; L. Rep. 3 Adm. & Ecc. 597; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 956.] In those cases the damage arose after the goods were shipped, not before, as in this case. Moreover, the suits were really brought in these cases on the bills of lading, because the terms of the charter-parties which had been broken were by reference incorporated in the bills of lading; here no such incorporation could take place, as the bills of lading did not exist when the breach occurred. The breach of contract complained of does not relate to goods carried into England or Wales, but to a breach of an agreement by which the shipowner was to proceed to Moses River before the goods were put on board. If the vessel had not only broken her charter-party by not going to Moses River at all but had loaded no cargo, this court would have had no jurisdiction. It cannot be contended that because events have happened after the breach complained of, which give the court jurisdiction over other breaches, it can take jurisdiction over the earlier event. Simpson v. Blues (ubi sup.) and Cargo Ex Argos (ante vol. 1, p. 579; L. Rep. 5 P. C. 148; 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 745), although inflicting decisions as to the jurisdiction of the County Courts, agree as to the fact that the Admiralty Court has no jurisdiction over clauses arising out of charter-parties only. It is clear that the construction of the words "breach of contract" in the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, must be limited; and we submit that the true construction is that the contracts over which this court has jurisdiction are such as are contained in bills of lading, or such as might be contained in a bill of lading. In so far as a charter party contains stipulation to be performed prior to the loading of cargo, it is not cognisable here; but those terms of a charter-party or bill of lading, under which goods, after they have been loaded, are to be carried into an English port, may be enforced in this court.

cited are not in point, and the question must be decided upon the construction of the statute itself. If the plaintiffs can bring the case within the words of the Act he is entitled to his remedy at the hands of the court. The defendants undertook by their charter-party to load the cargo at a specified place, he does not load it at that place but at another place, and so breaks his contract; this contract so broken was a contract relating to goods which have been carried into a port in England or Wales. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—If the breach had occurred, and the contract had not been carried out further, should I have had jurisdiction?] We must admit that you would not. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Then this is in reality a claim in relation to the carriage of goods which at the time the claim arose had never been carried.] Such a claim is within the words of the statute. It may well be that the jurisdiction conferred by the statute is to be taken with certain limitations; but the conditions required by statute clearly express that the question for the court to consider is not the time when they were complied with, but whether they have in fact been complied with. At the time of the breach the court would have no jurisdiction, it is true, and could have acquired no jurisdiction if the goods had not been carried into a port in England or Wales; but they have been so carried, and hence within the express words of the statute there is jurisdiction. Sir R. PHILLIMORE. Only three persons can claim under this section, the owners, the consignees, or the assignees of the bill of lading. The claim of the two latter can only arise under a bill of lading, as nobody becomes either consignee or assignee until the bill of lading is signed.] The plaintiff claims as owner of the goods, and his contract is contained in the charter-party. Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—All reference to the charter-party is omitted in the section. Does not this appear to be intentional?] In The Danzig (Bro. & Lush, 102), Dr. Lushington said, "I think the intent of the statute is to give a remedy to the owner or consignee whenever the ship arrives in a British port, and the cargo is unduly delivered in consequence of a breach of contract or duty on the part of the owner, master or crew of the ship. The intention is sufficiently expressed; the term 'carried' means 'carried or to be carried.'" A charter-party is just as much a contract to carry goods as a bill of lading, and if a charterer were to put his own goods on board, the bill of lading would be nothing more than a receipt for the goods; in point of fact, there need be no bill of lading at all; still, in such a case, this court would have jurisdiction if the goods were damaged. Any contract relating to the carriage of goods must necessarily relate to the loading of the goods. A charter-party may contain stipulations as to ventilation, &c., and these are never contained in a bill of lading, and yet the owner of the goods could recover for damage done by breach of these stipulations in this court, and he must sue under the charter-party. In contemplation of law, the contract to carry is complete when the charter-party is entered into; and any breach of that contract, resulting in damage to the goods or loss in respect thereof, may be proceeded for in this court, provided that conditions of the statute are complied with.

Cohen, Q.C. in reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a question relating to pleading, but it raises a very difficult point in the construction of a statute, which the court, if it had the option, would be unwilling to decide.

The second and third articles of the petition state in substance a breach of contract, upon the ground that the cargo was not put on board at a place called Moses River, where it was contracted to be put on board, and it is said that under the Admiralty Court Act 1861 I have authority to entertain the claim. The words of sect. 6 of the statute are "by the negligence or misconduct of, or from any breach of duty or breach of contract on the part of the owner, master, or crew of the ship."

It is not denied that these words, "breach of contract," must be construed with some reasonable limitation. It cannot be a breach of "any contract." The question the court has to decide is whether these words will include a case in which the breach of contract took place before the goods were put on board. I do not deny that there is great difficulty in arriving at any satisfactory conclusion upon the construction of this statute, but I do not think that in the sense in which the statute ought to be interpreted for the purposes of this case, there is here a breach of contract arising out of the carriage of goods, but rather a breach arising out of an obligation to be performed before the goods were shipped; and my opinion is that the breach of such an obligation is not the breach of contract the statute refers to.

I must therefore order the petition to be performed by striking out the second and third articles.

Collision—Lights—Regulations for preventing collision—Effect of infringement of—Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), s. 17.

Where a collision occurs at night, and the lights of one of the ships are not burning at the time when the vessels come in sight, and the court is not satisfied that the want of those lights is occasioned by circumstances over which the crew of the ship had no control, she must, even if the want of the lights did not contribute to the collision, be held to blame under the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, sect. 17, which provides that "If in any case of collision it is proved to the court before which the case is tried that any of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions, contained in and made under the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1873, have been infringed, the ship by which such regulations shall be infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made a departure from the regulations necessary."

PRIV. CO.

THE HIBERNIA.

[PRIV. CO.]

The Merchant Shipping Act 1873, s. 17, renders it necessary for the court, in every cause of collision, to inquire whether there has been an infringement of a regulation, and, if so, whether the circumstances rendered a departure from the regulations necessary.

Although a ship must be deemed in fault for an infringement of the regulations preceding but not occasioning the collision under The Merchant Shipping Act 1873, s. 17, she is not necessarily wholly in fault; but if the other ship has been guilty of negligence, or a breach of the regulations, the latter will also be held to blame, and the damages divided between them.

THIS was an appeal from a decree of the High Court of Admiralty of England, in a cause of damage promoted by the owners of the cargo lately laden on board the British Banner, the respondents, against the steamship Hibernia and her owners, the appellants, in respect of the loss of the cargo belonging to the respondents by reason of a collision between the two vessels.

The case of the respondents, as set out in their petition, filed in the High Court of Admiralty was substantially as follows:

The barque British Banner left the Commercial Docks, in the Port of London, on the 22nd Oct. 1873, with a crew of ten hands and laden with a cargo of iron, bound for Newcastle-on-Tyne.

About 8 p.m. of the next day, the 23rd, she, in the course of her voyage, was in about midchannel between the Ship Wash Light and Orfordness. The wind was about west. The weather was very fine and clear, the tide was flood, of the force of between two and three knots an hour. The British Banner was under two topsails, foresail, mainsail, and mizen, and foretopmast staysails, sailing about north-east by north, making about seven knots an hour, with a good look-out. The respondents then proceeded to plead in these words:

3. The regulation lights of the British Banner had been duly exhibited on board her between 5 and 6 p.m. of the same day, and burnt brightly then and thenceforth until within a few minutes from the time of the collision hereinafter stated, and the plaintiffs believe and aver that they continued in their places burning brightly from the time when they were first exhibited as aforesaid till the time of the said collision. The plaintiffs further say that, even if they did not continue so burning, the weather was such that the British Banner could be clearly seen for a distance of upwards of a mile.

The case of the respondents was further that, in the circumstances above stated, those on board the British Banner observed a white and a green light (the lights of the Hibernia) about a mile off, and about two points on the starboard bow. That the British Banner kept her course, while the Hibernia came on, continuing to exhibit her green light for some time, and then suddenly showed her red light, and, though loudly hailed by those on board the British Banner, almost directly after came at a great rate of speed into and very violently struck her with the stem, near her starboard cat-head, doing her such damage that she sank at once, and her master and five others of her crew were drowned.

The respondents charged the Hibernia with not keeping a good look-out, with improperly porting, and with not complying with the 16th article of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

The case of the appellants, the owners of the Hibernia, as set forth in their answer, was that the Hibernia, a screw steamship of about 512 tons register, with her master and a crew of twenty-nine hands, a general cargo, and nineteen passengers, left Dundee on the 22nd Oct., bound for London.

Their answer then alleged as follows:

About 7.50 p.m. of the 23rd Oct. the said steamship was nearly abreast of the Ship Wash Light Ship. The wind was about north-west, blowing a fresh breeze, the night was dark but clear, and the tide was about one hour flood and of the force of from two to three knots an hour. The Hibernia was steaming about south-west, and making about eleven and a half knots an hour, and carried her proper regulation side and masthead lights, which were properly placed and fitted and burning brightly, and a good look-out was kept on board her. About this time the look-out forward reported a vessel ahead with no light. The chief officer, who was on the bridge at the time, saw the vessel so reported right ahead, but without any light visible on board of her. The said vessel afterwards proved to be the barque British Banner, the cargo of which the plaintiffs allege themselves to be the owners of. In consequence of the darkness, and the absence of any light on board of the said barque, those on board the Hibernia supposed that the barque was going in the same direction as the Hibernia, and the chief officer of the Hibernia had the steamer's helm put to port in order to pass clear of the barque. It was not known that the British Banner was approaching the steamer until the vessels were very near together, when the steamer's helm was put hard to port, and, seeing that there was then danger of collision, her engines were stopped. The British Banner starboarded her helm and the two vessels came into collision, the stem and port bow withal of the steamer striking the starboard bow of the British Banner.

The appellants charged the British Banner with not having proper regulation lights duly exhibited, with not keeping a proper look-out, and with starboarding, and further with being "in fault within the meaning of the 17th clause of 36 & 37 Vict. c. 85, for infringing the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea by neglecting to carry proper side lights."

On the 20th April 1874 the cause came on for hearing upon oral evidence before the learned judge of the Court of Admiralty, assisted by Trinity Masters. The evidence and facts proved are sufficiently shown in the judgment of the High Court and of the Judicial Committee.

The learned judge, with the concurrence of his nautical assessors, found the Hibernia alone to blame for the collision.

The judgment of the learned judge was as follows:

Sir R. PHILLMORE: In this case the collision happened about eight o'clock on the evening of the 23rd Oct. 1873, and somewhere about midway between the Ship Wash Lightship and Orfordness. The vessels that came into collision were the barque the British Banner, with a crew of ten hands, laden with a cargo of iron, and bound for Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and she was a very small vessel, 468 tons—the tonnage is not pleaded, but that is the evidence—and the Hibernia, a screw steamship of 512 tons register. The case of the British Banner is, that the weather was fine and clear, the tide flood, of the force of between two and three knots, and she was under two topsails, foresail, mainsail, and mizen, and foretopmast staysail, sailing about N.E. by N., making about seven knots an hour. The third article pleads, in rather a remarkable manner, the fact as to her regulation lights. It pleads as follows: (The learned judge then set out the third article of the respondents' petition, as given above.) They therefore take up these two positions: first, that their lights were certainly burning within a very short time of the collision, and the presumption must be that they were burning at the time of the collision; and, secondly, that if they were not so burning, still that the barque was visible at the distance of upwards of a mile. The defence is, that the Hibernia screw steamer was steaming about S.W., and going, according to the evidence, at not less than fifteen knots over the ground; that the look-out reported a vessel ahead with no light. The chief officer saw the vessel without any light visible; that in consequence of the darkness and absence of any light the Hibernia supposed that the barque was going in the same direction as herself, and it was not known she was approaching the steamer till the vessels were very close together, when the Hibernia's helm was put hard a port and the engines stopped; and she ascribes the collision to two causes, viz., that the British Banner had not her regulation lights duly exhibited, and she improperly starboarded her helm, and that under the 17th section of the 36 & 37 Vict. c. 85—the statute passed last year—she was in fault for neglecting to carry her proper side lights. Now upon this question as to whether the British Banner had not her side lights burning at the time of collision, the evidence is certainly to a great extent embarrassing and doubtful. These facts, indeed, are proved, that the British Banner had proper lights, properly placed, and certified by the Board of Trade. It is proved, too, that it was her habit to carry these lights, for she had put them out the night before the collision happened; it is proved that they were put up that very night, and were burning within ten minutes of the collision. The evidence mainly relied upon on behalf of the defendants is by one of the crew of the British Banner, stating that just before the collision he ascertained that the port and starboard lights had both simultaneously gone out, from what cause is not known; and it is further urged in support of this position that a vessel called the Thames was in the vicinity of this collision, so that, though the master and the second mate both say that they saw the barque a mile off quite distinctly upon the water, and a mile and a half through their glasses, yet they do not say anything with respect to her carrying lights, which is true. As I have already said, the evidence upon this point is embarrassing and conflicting; but I am of opinion that, assuming that these lights had become accidentally extinguished just before the collision, being of a proper character, and properly burning, and properly put up that night, the 17th section of the 36 & 37 Vict. would not apply, which enacts that, "If, in case of any collision, it is proved to the court before which the case is tried that any of the regulations for preventing collision contained in or made under the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1873, has been infringed, the ship by which such regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made departure from the regulation necessary." I am not disposed at present to hold that this clause of the statute would apply to a case where the lights had been properly put up, were of a proper character, and were properly burning, and accidentally extinguished. But I do not think it necessary, after a conference with the Elder Brethren, to come to any decided conclusion as to which side the court ought to believe with respect to the fact of these lights being burning and extinguished at the time of collision; and for this reason, the steamer in her case states the wind to have been N.W., and all her witnesses agree that the barque was seen right ahead, upon which the steamer alleges she immediately ported and hard-a-ported, and it must have been done, according to her own showing, at the least of from a quarter to half a mile off, and at a speed of fifteen knots, which she was going at that time. The Elder Brethren are of opinion that, upon this statement, it is physically impossible the collision could have taken place as here described, viz., by the stem of the steamer striking the British Banner upon her starboard cathead. Now if the wind was, as the Hibernia states it to have been, N.W., and the barque's course was N.E. by N., she had the wind only one point free, and, therefore, it was impossible she could have starboarded to the extent to have brought about the collision; and I must add to this, that I am satisfied by the evidence that the barque did not starboard at all; but taking the case as the steamer puts it, and, under the advice of the Elder Brethren, I find it impossible the collision could have taken place in the way she describes. In our judgment the British Banner, even if she had not lights, was seen at a sufficient distance, and in circumstances which ought to have led the Hibernia to execute the proper manœuvre for getting out of her way, instead of which she ported her helm, and brought about the collision. I therefore, find, upon the steamer's own showing, that her story is not to be maintained, and I am of opinion that she alone is to blame for this collision.

From this decree the owners of the Hibernia appealed, for the following amongst other reasons:

1. Because the judgment is contrary to the facts proved, and ought to be reversed, and is wrong in law.
2. Because it is clearly established by the evidence that the British Banner had not her regulation lights duly exhibited at the time of the collision, and because the absence of such lights contributed to and caused the collision.
3. Because the British Banner was in fault within the meaning of the 17th section of the 36 & 37 Vict. c. 85.
4. Because the fair inference to be drawn from the whole of the evidence is, that the Hibernia was navigated with all due care and skill, and that there was no neglect or default on the part of those in charge of her.
5. Because the British Banner had no proper look-out and improperly starboarded her helm.

Day, Q.C. and Gainsford Bruce, for the appellants.—The court below has omitted to find whether the British Banner had or had not her regulation lights burning at the time of the collision, and has said that the Hibernia could have avoided the collision even if the British Banner had no lights. We submit that the court was bound to find, as a question of fact, whether the British Banner had lights or not. The Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 55), s. 17, renders a ship absolutely to blame for a collision if proof is given of a neglect of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions, even if that neglect does not contribute to the collision, unless the circumstances of the case warrant a departure from the rule infringed. Consequently, the court below was bound to consider whether the regulations had been complied with by the barque, and, if not, whether there was any valid excuse. If the barque did not carry lights when she ought to have done so, she must be held to blame. [Sir M. SMITH.—To give effect to that section, ought there not to be an inquiry in every case of collision as to whether the regulations have been complied with? otherwise the section would be inoperative.] As we submit, the section was intended as an additional mode of enforcing the regulations, and to decide that a ship can escape condemnation in damages because, although she breaks the regulations, her infringement of them did not contribute to the collision, would destroy the effect of the Act. The Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), sect. 29 is sufficient to meet the case where the infringement of the regulations complained of occasions or contributes to the collision; such a case is there expressly provided for. But this Act was not found sufficiently stringent, and the Legislature, to enforce the observance, has made vessels responsible for infringement of the rules independently of these infringements having occasioned the damage. [Sir M. SMITH.—If a vessel for some time before she came into collision were in such a position that she could show, and did show nothing but her red light, and it should turn out that during that time her starboard light was not burning, would she be liable to condemnation, even if her starboard light (if lighted) could not have been seen, and therefore could not have affected the collision in any way.] Such, we submit, is the true construction of the statute. On the facts it is distinctly shown that the barque's lights were not burning for some time before the collision; nor is the Hibernia in any way to blame.

Butt, Q.C., and W. G. F. Phillimore (Stokes, with them), for the respondents.—If the statute is construed literally and strictly, as contended for by the appellants, it will work enormous hardship. Suppose a case where a vessel has her lights washed out in very bad weather; has she infringed the regulations, or is she within the last words of sect. 17 of the last Act, that is to say, "the circumstances of the case make a departure from the rule necessary." [Sir R. P. COLLIER.—It would rather be that the rules, in such a case, had never been infringed. The last words of that section must be taken to apply to the meeting and sailing rules, and not to lights. It can never be "necessary" to depart from the regulations as to carrying lights.] In another view, a ship ought in such a case to be exempt from the obligation; the mere absence of a light cannot be said to be necessarily an infringement of the regulations within the meaning of the statute, and if it is an infringement an excuse may be shown. [Sir BARNES PEACOCK.—The statute throws the onus of showing that excuse upon the person not complying with the regulations.] That we must admit. Then, assuming, that, if the lights of the barque had ceased to burn through no fault of the respondents shortly before the collision, they would not be to blame, can we show sufficient excuse for their not being alight? [Sir R. P. COLLIER.—That is a question of fact. Before going to that, I should like to know what your contention is on the construction of the statute, supposing it is found that the lights were extinguished through your neglect.] We must admit that the Legislature has enacted that we must be held to blame for an infringement of the regulations, although not causing the collision. Then, can we show good cause? [Sir M. SMITH.—Prima facie, the fact of your light being out is evidence of negligence. There is no evidence in this case that there was an accidental cause which would have put the lights out.] It is shown that they were properly trimmed and lighted, and were looked to shortly before the collision. There is a presumption that they were proper lights, and would burn the usual time. No negligence has been shown, and it ought to be presumed that they went out by accident, unless shown otherwise [Sir BARNES PEACOCK.—What are the circumstances shown to the satisfaction of the court which made a departure from the rule necessary?] The fact of their going out through no explainable cause is a circumstance showing that the not having them burning at the time of collision was an accident.

We submit, however, that in fact the lights were burning at the time of collision. The judgment of the court below must be taken to mean that the judge, without deciding the question whether the lights were or were not burning at the time of collision, assumes that they were not burning, and finds that if they were not they had gone out through some cause which was not an infringement of the statute. [Sir BARNES PEACOCK.—The learned judge expressly declines to find whether they were burning or not.] His judgment would seem to be that he considers it unnecessary to determine whether the lights were burning or not, because he says that if they were out at the time of collision, they went out accidentally. [Sir BARNES PEACOCK.—Then you say that his finding is, that there was no infringement. Sir R. P. COLLIER.—Is not the finding, that because the lights had been properly trimmed and lighted in the first instance, they must have gone out by accident; and is not the true inference that, because they went out they were not properly trimmed?] The finding in substance is, there was no negligence, and consequently no infringement of the regulations, and that is what the statute really refers to; the statute is intended to meet cases of negligence, not accident.

The Hibernia is to blame upon the facts, for not keeping a good look-out, and for not slackening speed in proper time.

Day, Q.C., in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 5, 1874.—The judgment of the court was delivered by

Sir BARNES PEACOCK.—This was a suit instituted in the High Court of Admiralty on behalf of the owners of certain cargo which had been shipped on board a barque called the British Banner, and which cargo was lost, together with the vessel, in consequence of a collision which took place on the 23rd Oct. 1873, between the barque and a steam vessel called the Hibernia.

It appears that the collision took place about eight o'clock in the evening. The British Banner states that her course was N.E. by N. The course of the steamer was S.W.; so that the vessels were in fact going in opposite directions. The allegation in the petition on the part of the plaintiff was "The regulation lights of the British Banner had been duly exhibited on board her between 5 and 6 p.m. of the same day, and burning brightly then and thenceforth until within a few minutes from the time of the collision hereinafter stated. And the plaintiffs believe and aver that they continued in their places burning brightly, from the time when they were first exhibited as aforesaid, till the time of the said collision." Then there follows a very remarkable statement: "The plaintiffs further say, that even if they did not continue so burning, the weather was such that the British Banner could be clearly seen for a distance of upwards of a mile." They do not state that if the lights did not continue burning, the cause of their not continuing to burn was a circumstance over which they had no control. One of the answers on behalf of the Hibernia was, "The British Banner was in fault within the meaning of the 17th clause of the 36 & 37 Vict. c. 85. for infringing the regulations for preventing collisions at sea by neglecting to carry proper side lights." There was conflicting evidence in the cause as to whether the lights were or were not burning at the time of the collision, or at the time when the vessels came within the distance of sight. The learned Judge of the Court of Admiralty who tried the case said that the evidence was embarrassing, but that he did not consider it necessary to come to any decided conclusion as to which side the court ought to believe with respect to the fact of the lights being burning and extinguished at the time of the collision. The meaning of that is, that he thought it unnecessary to decide whether the allegation of the one side who said that the lights were burning, or the allegation on the part of the other, that the lights were extinguished was true. It appears to their Lordships to be a subject of regret that the learned judge who heard the witnesses and saw their demeanour did not decide the question of fact, whether at the time of the collision, or when the vessels first came within sight, the lights were or were not burning. Their Lordships consider it very important in deciding whether the Hibernia was wholly in fault, and the judgment right in that respect to consider whether the lights were or were not burning at the time when the vessel came in sight.

The Merchant Shipping Act of 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63) enacted, "If in any case of collision it appears to the court before which the case is tried that such collision was occasioned by the non-observance of any regulation made by or in pursuance of this Act, the ship by which such regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made a departure from the regulation necessary." That section applies only to a case in which it appears to the court before which the case is tried that the collision was occasioned by the non-observance of any regulation. But by a subsequent statute, which was passed in the last session, to prevent the necessity of deciding upon conflicting evidence whether the collision was caused by the non-observance of the regulation, it was enacted that, "If in any case of collision it is proved to the court before which the case is tried that any of the regulations for preventing collision contained in or made under the Merchant Shipping Act have been infringed," not that the collision has been caused by the infringement, but simply if it shall appear to the court that the regulation has been infringed, "the ship by which such regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it be shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made a departure from the regulation necessary." (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85, s. 17.) If it turns out that these lights were not burning at the time when the vessels came in sight, and there was no excuse for the lights having been extinguished, it appears to their Lordships that the case falls within that section; that the regulation which enacts that the lights shall be carried was infringed, and that the barque must be deemed in fault, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made a departure from the regulation necessary. It is, therefore, necessary to inquire first, whether the regulation was infringed, and if so, whether the court is satisfied that the circumstances of the case made a departure necessary.

Now, with reference to the question as to whether the lights were burning, the evidence of the chief mate of the British Banner is important. At page 8, line 11, of the record, the question is put to him: "Q. Now had or had not your regulation lights been put out that evening? A. They had been put out. Q. By 'put out,' you do not mean 'blown out,' but put in their proper positions? A. Yes. Q. What time were they put out? A. A little before six. Q. Had you given instructions with regard to them? A. Yes, I superintended the lighting of them myself, and say that they were properly trimmed. Q. Who trimmed them? A. The steward. Q. I believe the steward was drowned in the collision? A. He is drowned. Q. Did you yourself do anything to them before they were put out? A. I lighted the lamps. Q. Did you manipulate them in any way? A. I screwed them down to the proper focus. I was with them before. I was afraid to trust him, and did it myself. Q. You know what trim they required? A. Yes. Q. What did you burn in them? A. Paraffin oil. Q. Were they old or new lights? A. New lights. Q. When you say 'new,' how long had they been in the ship? A. Six months. Q. Had they been passed by the Board of Trade Surveyor? A. In July, in the Hull Docks at Shields. Q. How long would these lights, in the ordinary course of things, burn without trimming? A. From six at night to four in the morning." So that, according to his account, without fresh trimming, the lights which were put up at six o'clock to have been burning till four o'clock in the morning. "Q. That is ten hours? A. Ten hours. Q. You say you saw them up a little before six; did you see them again at all before the collision? A. Between five and ten minutes before eight; I could not say exactly, but as near as possible five minutes before eight. Q. How long was that before the collision? A. About ten minutes, perhaps not so much. Q. Where did you see them from? A. I went forward to examine them. Q. How were they burning? A. Brightly. Q. I believe you did not see them again? A. I did not see them again. Q. Are you certain that ten minutes before the collision they were burning? A. Well, I am quite certain they were." Then he is asked, "Had you any other lights at all; I do not mean coloured? A. Yes, we had relieving lamps on board. Q. What were they for? A. They were for putting out if the others wanted to be taken in for trimming. Q. And were they always kept trimmed? A. Always ready. Q. Were they ready this night? A. They were ready that same night." Then at p. 11 he is cross-examined "Q. You say the steward was the man who trimmed the lamps on this occasion? A. He trimmed them." Now it is to be remarked that this steward was a man whom he could not trust, he had stated so in the previous part of his evidence. The man whom he could not trust is stated to have trimmed them. "Q. He had charge of the lamps? A. No. Q. Who had on board the ship? A. When we were going down I had charge of them. Q. You were going up? A. We were going down the river; the steward was a stranger on board. He was a black, and I took full charge of them by the captain's order. Q. You did not trim them? A. I did not trim them, but lighted them. Q. Who would have charge of the lamps? A. I had. Q. What was the steward's name? A. Joe; I think he was an old man." It appears, then, that these lamps were lighted at six o'clock, and this witness says in his evidence he saw them not later than ten minutes before the accident happened. If they had gone out during that space of ten minutes, and before the time when the vessel came in sight of the Hibernia, it became necessary to consider whether they were extinguished by unavoidable circumstances, or under circumstances over which the owners of the vessel had no control. Now, the evidence of the master, the mate, the second mate, and all the evidence on the part of the Hibernia was that when they first saw this vessel at a distance they saw no lights, that there were no lights burning at that time. The master and mate of the Thames were also called as witnesses in the cause. They were independent witnesses, and they were not asked with respect to the lights as to whether they saw them or not.

THE HIBERNIA.

John Littlefield, one of the crew of the barque, was also called as a witness, and he proved distinctly, if his evidence is to be believed, that the lights were not burning at the time when the vessels came in sight. He was asked, "Going on deck, did you observe anything yourself? A. I walked straight away forward on the starboard side, and when I got forward I heard a man, called 'Curly' by nickname, say, 'Why, this port-light's out!' When I heard him say that, as I was on the starboard side, I looked over the rail in this position, and looked aft, and I said, 'Why, the starboard light is out too!' Then I heard 'Curly' say, 'One of you take this lamp from me, and I will hand it down to you.' I said, 'I will take this here lamp down,' that was the starboard lamp. As I was going to take the starboard lamp down, I see the man who had been on the look-out from six to eight with it in his right hand. Q. By the Court, Who was that? A. The man that had been on the look-out from six to eight. Q. Took it down? A. Had it in his right hand, and his left hand hold of the lanyards of the rigging—starboard rigging. From there I slewed round and went across to the fore-hatch, and as I was stepping off the fore-hatch I looked forward and see the steamboat's three lights." So that at that time, when he saw the steamer's lights, he has proved as a fact that the lights were not burning on board the British Banner. It is said that this witness is not to be believed. Their Lordships see no reason to discredit his evidence. There seems to be no reason why he should have invented this story. Then it is said that he came for the purpose of proving the case of the Hibernia, and that he went on to say he saw the sails of the barque flapping, which is not the case, and that he is not to be believed. It should be remarked that the chief mate was asked whether he did not remember having a conversation with this man, John Littlefield, after he was picked up and taken on board the steamer. He was asked, "Q. Do you remember having a conversation with John Littlefield on board the steamer? A. I merely said to him, 'Say nothing here,' as they would be asking him questions, but to wait till he got to London." He said he told him this, because he was stiff when he got on board; but why his being stiff and cold should be a reason for his not answering any questions, or his being likely to answer them in the wrong way, or not according to truth, with reference to whether the lamps were lighted or not, their Lordships are unable to see. "Q. You mean when he was picked up out of the water? A. Yes. Q. That was after the collision? A. After the collision? Q. Do you remember asking John Littlefield whether he was stiff or not; whether he said anything about the lights on board the steamer? A. I said so to him because the captain of the boat asked me about them, and I thought he might say something to him, and I warned him and said, 'Be careful what you say until you get to London,' and I said no more to him." It seems certainly reasonable to suppose that he was speaking to John Littlefield, and cautioning him against giving any answer with reference to the lights, because he himself was aware that the lights were not burning at the time of the collision. He was asked, "Did he tell you that he had relieved the lookout, and unshipped the port light to have it retrimmed? to which he answered, "That I do not know."

Their Lordships have come to the conclusion upon the whole of this evidence that the lights were not burning at the time when the vessel first came in sight of the Hibernia.

Then comes the question, what was the cause of the lights not burning? It is unnecessary for their Lordships to come to any definite conclusion as to what was the cause of their not burning, because the Act of Parliament requires it to be proved to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made departure from the regulation necessary. The onus lies upon those who aver that the British Banner was not in fault, to satisfy the court that the circumstances under which the lights went out rendered a departure from the regulation necessary. No evidence upon that point was given, and, if one may conjecture upon the subject, there seems to be very little doubt but that the lights went out because there was not sufficient oil to supply them. It appears that they had been burning the night before, that they ought to have been trimmed by the steward, Joe, a black man, new on board, in whom they had no confidence. All that the mate can say as to their having sufficient oil, is from turning them down, as he says, to the proper focus. He did not examine the reservoir of the lamps to see whether there was sufficient oil in them.

Their Lordships, on the whole of the evidence, are of opinion that the British Banner was not carrying her regulation lights at the time when the vessels first came in sight, and they are not satisfied that the want of those lights was occasioned by circumstances over which the crew of the British Banner had no control; and that it was not from an unavoidable accident. The case

THE AMÉRIQUE.

[PRIV. CO.]

therefore falls within the statute, and their Lordships consider that they are bound to pronounce that the British Banner was in fault.

But the statute does not say, that under those circumstances the defaulting ship shall be considered the vessel wholly in fault, and it becomes necessary to consider whether the Hibernia in any way contributed to the collision. Now the learned judge, who heard the witnesses, arrived at the conclusion, with the assistance of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, that the Hibernia was wholly in fault. He says, "In our judgment the British Banner, even if she had not lights, was seen at a sufficient distance, and in circumstances which ought to have led the Hibernia to execute the proper manœuvre for getting out of her way, instead of which she ported her helm and brought about the collision." It is important, then, to consider whether the learned judge was wrong in arriving at the conclusion that the Hibernia was in fault. Now, so far from thinking that he was wrong, their Lordships are entirely of that opinion. According to the evidence of independent witnesses, the master and the chief mate of the Thames, the Hibernia passed them, and after they got clear from the smoke of the Hibernia they saw the British Banner, and they could make out through their glasses that she was approaching them, that she was coming in an opposite direction. Now if they, notwithstanding the darkness of the night, could see that the British Banner was coming in that direction, their Lordships think that if the Hibernia, which at that time had approached nearer to the barque, had kept a proper look-out she must have seen that the other vessel was coming in an opposite direction in sufficient time to enable them to keep out of her way. They say they had a right to assume, not seeing the vessel's lights, that she was going in the same direction as themselves, in which case they would not have seen the lights, even if they had been burning. But their Lordships are of opinion that, by the use of their glasses, they might have made out in sufficient time that the vessel was an approaching vessel, and not one going in the same direction as themselves. According to their evidence, they did not discover, until the vessel came within 150 feet, that it is within 50 yards of them, whether she was an approaching vessel or not. If such were the case their Lordships are of opinion that there could not have been a proper look-out on board. The evidence of the master, James Finlay, is this: He says he took charge of the ship at the Ship Wash Light at 10 minutes to 8 o'clock. He was asked, "How long was it before the collision you went on deck?" A. About 15 seconds before the collision happened. Q. Were you about going on deck before you heard any orders given? A. I was about going on deck, I was opening my room door and I heard 'port!' My house is in front of the poop, and I heard 'port;' and 'hard a port!' as I went forward, and the collision just happened as I went on the bridge. Q. When you opened your room door you heard 'port!?' A. Yes, heard 'port!' when I got on the top of the poop, on the top of the ladder I heard 'hard a port!' Then he was asked "you heard 'port,' and by the time you got to the ladder, you heard hard a port?" A. Yes. Q. You did not see anything of the barque just before the collision? A. No. Q. Who had charge of the deck? A. The chief officer. Q. Did you stop your engines? A. When I went on the bridge, I see the vessel, and I said 'God help, that vessel sinks,' and she (meaning the Hibernia) was stopped." The engineer says the vessel was stopped about two seconds only before the collision took place. It appears that the blow was such that the British Banner was sunk almost immediately.

It appears to their Lordships, upon the whole of the evidence, that the learned judge came to a right conclusion upon the evidence, that the Hibernia was in fault. Their Lordships are of opinion that the want of the regulation lights on board the British Banner contributed to the accident, and that at all events the British Banner must, under the provisions of the 36 & 37 Vict. c 85, s. 17 be deemed to be in fault.

Under these circumstances their Lordships will feel it their duty to recommend to Her Majesty that the judgment of the court below be reversed, and that it be pronounced that both vessels were in fault, and that each party do pay his own costs in the court below, and the costs of this appeal.

Appeal allowed. Judgment below reversed.

THE AMÉRIQUE.

Salvage—Quantum of reward—How arrived at—Appeal.

The Judicial Committee will not reduce an award of the High Court of Admiralty in a cause of salvage, unless the amount awarded is so exorbitant, and so manifestly excessive that it would be unjust to confirm it.

The value of property salvaged is to some extent to be treated as an ingredient in the calculation of the quantum of salvage remuneration, but that value must not be allowed to raise the quantum to an amount altogether out of proportion to the services actually rendered.

An award of 30,000l. on a value of 190,000l. in the case of a derelict ship reduced to 18,000l. on the ground that the reward was out of proportion to the services rendered.

THESE were appeals from decrees of the High Court of Admiralty in two causes of salvage instituted by the respondents against the French steamship Amérique. The one cause was a consolidated cause instituted on behalf of the owners, masters, and crews of the steamship F. T. Barry and the barque Auburn; the other, a cause instituted on behalf of the owners, master, and crew of the steamship Spray.

The Amérique, a very large iron screw steamer of 4600 tons register, employed in conveying goods and passengers between Havre and New York and back, was, when on a voyage from New York to Havre, abandoned by her master, crew, and passengers, about 4.30 p.m. of the 14th April 1874, when about seventy or eighty miles west of Ushant.

At the time the Amérique was abandoned she had encountered heavy weather for about two days, and through some unexplained carelessness a great deal of water had been allowed to get into her, which had risen high enough to put out the engine-room fires, and some of her pumps were choked. She was, however, perfectly sound in hull, having no leak which could be afterwards discovered in her.

About 4.30 a.m. of the 15th April the barque Auburn, which was the first vessel to come up with the Amerique, came up, and about 10.45 a.m. a boat's crew from her boarded the Amerique.

About 10.30 a.m. the Spray came up, and about 11 a.m. a boat's crew from her boarded the Amerique.

The Spray is a steamship of 393 tons net register, with engines 80 horse-power nominal, working up to 390, and having a crew of sixteen hands. She was outward bound for Gibraltar.

The mate of the Spray who commanded the boat's crew went all over the Amerique. She had then a list to port, and about a foot of water in the lower saloon, which apparently came from one of the glass side ports being out, into which the water came as the vessel rolled. He stopped this side port with bedding. He found no other damage down to the fourth deck or in the fore or main holds except two other side ports broken on the starboard side, a considerable height above water. In the stoke-hole he found six feet of water from the bottom of the ship, and the pumps choked.

Some further hands were sent from the Spray, and it was arranged that two of the crew of the Auburn should remain on board the Amerique, and the Spray began towing the Amerique. During the course of the towing the chain to which the hawser was attached on board the Amerique ran out and could not be unshackled or got rid of.

The Spray began to tow, and towed during the rest of that day and the night. Those on board the Amerique, however, in the uncertainty of the weather and their position, thought it safe to go on board the Spray for the night.

In the morning they returned, and began to cut the cable, which they succeeded in doing after some work. About this time the F. T. Barry, another steamship, came up.

The F. T. Barry, a steamship of 545 tons net register, with engines of 99 horse-power, working up to 400, having a crew of twenty-three hands all told, and being homeward bound, did not come up with the Amerique till about 6 a.m. of the 16th April. The Amerique was then lying with the Spray alongside of her, and the crew of the Spray were cutting with cold chisels a large chain hanging out of the hawspipe which had run out in the process of towing the Amerique the day before. After some conversation between the mate of the Spray who was in charge of the Amerique, in the course of which the mate of the Spray offered the F. T. Barry 1000*l.* to assist in the towage, which was refused, an arrangement was made between the two masters. After the chain had been severed both vessels began to tow the Amerique, and continued to tow towards Plymouth with some not unusual casualties, such as the tow ropes occasionally breaking and the towing vessels occasionally getting out of position, till the 18th April.

On one occasion the F. T. Barry, during the course of the towage, got in such a position that she came into collision with the Amerique in two places, and sustained damage.

About 2 p.m. of the 18th April the Amerique arrived off the Eddystone Lighthouse. About 3.30 p.m. the Spray let go of her. The F. T. Barry continued towing her, and after a short time a tug came out and assisted. About 5 p.m. the Amerique was brought to a safe anchorage in Plymouth.

No further services were done by the F. T. Barry.

There was some difficulty in the towing on account of the great size of the Amerique, and she settled down in the water to some extent during the towage; but she steered very well, the weather was fine, and there was no danger of her sinking when she got into Plymouth.

A claim was preferred on behalf of the F. T. Barry for the damages occasioned to her by the collision with the Amerique, and evidence was given that it cost 600*l.* to make this damage good. A claim was also made in respect of anticipated liability to the owners of the cargo on board the F. T. Barry by reason of delay.

50*l.* was paid for the tug by the owners of the Spray. After the Amerique came to anchor about twenty men and some force pumps were sent on board by the agents of the Spray to pump her out. On the morning of the 19th it was found that there had occurred during the night some derangement of the machinery of one of the water closets, and that a good deal of water was coming into the ship thereby. Some more men and a fire-engine were sent on board her, and in the afternoon she was towed by the tug which had first taken her in tow and two Government tugs to the Catwater, where she was given up to the collector of customs, and the services of the Spray ceased.

A claim was preferred on behalf of the Spray for 60*l.* for loss and damage to ropes and hawsers, and 130*l.* expenses or loss occasioned by her going into Plymouth, but no evidence was given that her owners had been put to expenses at all equal to this amount. A claim was further made for 379*l.* 6*s.* 10*d.*, expenses incurred by the agent of the Spray at Plymouth. A claim in respect of loss in consequence of inability to fulfil the charter-party under which the Spray then was also was pleaded.

The value of the Amerique was agreed at 155,000*l.* and her cargo and freight at 35,000*l.* Charges of misconduct were made against the salvors by the appellants, who accused them of pillaging the Amerique.

On the 16th July 1874, the two causes came on for hearing before the learned judge assisted by Trinity Masters; and the learned judge decreed to the whole of the plaintiffs the sum of 30,000*l.* with costs, and out of this sum he awarded 15,500*l.* to the owner, master, and crew of the Spray, to the owner, master, and crew of the F. T. Barry 14,000*l.* and to the owner, master, and crew of the Auburn 500*l.*

The judgment of the High Court of Admiralty after setting out the facts was as follows:

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—And now I must deal with the charge against the salvors, which I regret was not fully withdrawn, but I think substantially, as far as the present parties before the court are concerned, it may be said to be retracted, and it was in my judgment hastily, unduly, and unjustly made. The deck of this vessel appears to have been strewn with property of all descriptions, as one might expect in a vessel of this enormous size, carrying passengers and being suddenly deserted, and some few of those articles appear to have been taken possession of—as it would seem to me—for the purpose of custody and not for the purpose of improper appropriation by those on board the Spray and those on board the F. T. Barry; and there was an averment, which showed an extravagant piece of recklessness in this case, that by taking possession of these articles and not immediately returning them, the salvors were deprived of their right of salvage, which of course could not be entertained by the court. Looking to the whole of the circumstances of the case, I am satisfied that no blame attaches on this score to the salvors in this case. Well, then, this enormous vessel was saved by the exertions of these salvors. The cargo and the vessel arrived comparatively uninjured. One of the questions I have had to put to the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House is—What would have happened if the vessel had not met with the salvors at the time when she did? In their judgment she might have floated some time longer, which is, of course, an uncertain conjecture, or would probably have gone ashore or on the rocks. There is one circumstance to which Sir John Karlake (for the Spray) adverted most properly, namely, that nothing could be more dangerous to the general interests of navigation in this part of the world than that a vessel of 4600 tons without lights and without anything to indicate which course she was pursuing should be floating about in the water. We all know that the Peninsular and Oriental Steamers come in that track, but without alluding to their particular case, every vessel would have been subject to the possibility of very great danger if the vessel had not been taken in tow at the time when she was. I have already said that there was considerable danger to the salvors, and on consultation with the Elder Brethren they are perfectly satisfied that nothing more could have been done than was done with regard to the navigation of the Amerique, and that she had not strength of hands enough to reduce the water to enable the fires to be lighted, which it appeared might have been effected by a sufficient crew, but that was not done. Now, seeing that this was a French vessel, and that Brest was not very far distant from the place where the desertion took place, I was anxious to know what the French law would have awarded by way of compensation in a case of this description, not that that information could lead the court to follow precisely the French law, but that it might afford to it some guide in regard to a property of this enormous value, towards making up its mind as to what the English law ought to award, because there being no fixed sum, according to our jurisprudence, it must always remain in the breast of the court, exercising the best judgment it can, after receiving nautical advice, to fix an equitable remuneration. And I do not think it wholly irrelevant to say that the French law, as I am able to ascertain it, is to be found in the well-known work, the Ordonnance de la Marine de Louis XIV. Although I have no evidence as to the immediate modern practice, still I am justified in saying that the French law, as a rule, gives always one third of the property saved of a derelict to the salvors. I am to award that remuneration according to the lex fori, but after weighing carefully all the circumstances of the case, to the principal of which I think I have adverted—and there are others, no doubt, which if the court were to take a longer time before delivering its judgment it might advert to—I think that I shall act in accordance with the principles and the decisions of the English cases and the proper equitable and legal considerations which present themselves to the mind of the court on the facts which are proved before it, if I award out of this 190,000*l.* saved entirely from utter destruction by the salvors, after the crew and the master had abandoned her as hopelessly lost, the sum of 30,000*l.* I shall give the Auburn 500*l.* I shall give the Spray 15,500*l.*, because she had, it appears to me, the greatest labour, and is entitled to that sum, notwithstanding she was not the first in possession; and the F. T. Barry 14,000*l.*, making in the whole 30,000*l.* I intend that sum to include all charges whatever—the injury done to the F. T. Barry, the injuries done to the hawsers, and all the different items that were mentioned in the course of this inquiry. I would rather not proceed to a distribution of this, unless I am especially asked to do so. I would rather think that the owners would be of opinion that it is a case in which the men ought to be most liberally rewarded, and certainly I wish to say now that the mate of the Spray, who was put on board first, ought at least to receive a double portion. I direct the amount awarded to be paid by the ship and cargo in proportion to their value. The plaintiffs are, of course, entitled to their costs.

From these decrees the owners of the Amerique appealed upon the ground that the amount awarded was excessive.

Butt, Q.C. and W. G. Phillimore (Stubbs with them, for the appellants)—The amount awarded in the court below is excessive. The learned judge has taken into consideration two elements which he ought not to have considered at all; first, the French law as to derelict property; secondly, the value of the property saved. Whatever the French law may be, an English tribunal ought not to consider it in awarding an amount of compensation; such amounts are clearly to be measured by the rules in force in the tribunal in which the case is tried. Moreover, there was no mention in the pleadings of French law. Then as to the value of the property. Not many years back there were no such large steamers and no vessels of such enormous value. In those days it occasionally happened that half the value of a derelict was awarded, but that practice has long been abandoned, and the amount of award depends upon the circumstances of each case. We submit that the value of the property saved ought not to be considered on assessing the reward. The true elements of salvage reward are a sum to compensate the salvors for the risk and trouble they have undergone, and a further sum to render similar salvage services on another occasion if required. In The Syrian (2 Mar. Law Cas. O.S. p. 387) the vessel saved was not a derelict, but the principles there laid down apply equally to the case of a derelict; it is there said: "In dealing with the present case, the court also bears in mind that there is a large amount of property saved, but for the single purpose of remembering that it is enabled out of an ample fund fitly to remunerate meritorious services well performed; and the court does not hold the large value of the property saved as a ground for attempting to extort from the owners of that property, or from the underwriters, as the case may be, more than a full recompense for such services." In that case the salvage was the more meritorious because there was salvage of life. The true interpretation of that decision is that if the court has not enough to reward salvors adequately for their services, let them have a large proportion, even up to one-half; but if the property saved is so large that salvors can be adequately rewarded, reward them liberally, but without reference to the value of the property salvaged. The rate of salvage reward ought not to bear any proportion to the value of the property salvaged so long as there is enough to reward the salvors. The main considerations are the services rendered and the danger run, and the reward should bear a proportion to these and not to the value. In The Blendhall (1 Dods. 414, 421), it is said, "In fixing a proportion of the value, the court is in the habit of giving a smaller proportion where the property is large and a higher proportion where the value is small: and for this obvious reason, that in property of small value, a small proportion would not hold out a sufficient encouragement; whereas in cases of considerable value, a smaller proportion would afford no inadequate compensation;" and an award was made of one-tenth of 72,000*l.* in the case of a derelict ship. Some such proportion, if the reward is so calculated, would be ample here. In the judgment of the court below it is found that the salvors did not improperly appropriate certain things on board the Amerique, and so, finding on what he considered was an improper charge, he has awarded a larger sum than he would otherwise have done.

[PRIV. CO.]

THE AMERIQUE.

Milward, Q. C. and R. E. Webster, for the respondents, the owners, masters, and crews of the Auburn and the F. T. Barry.—The amount awarded is not excessive, considering the danger to the salvors and the property salvaged and is not out of proportion to the awards shown to have been made in

Pritchard's Admiralty Digest, p. 841;

The Thetis, 8 Hagg. 14; 2 Knapp P. C. 390.

Sir H. James and Pritchard (E. C. Clarkson with them), for the respondents, the owners, master, and crew of the Spray.—Since the decision in The Chetah (19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 621; L. Rep. 2 P. C. 205; 3 Mar. Law. Cas. O. S. 177) there can be no doubt that this court can reduce the amount of salvage awarded by the High Court of Admiralty, but they will not interfere with the amount awarded if, as was said in the Carrier Dove (2 Moore P. C. C. 243, 254), "there has been nothing, to use a similar expression, to shock the conscience—nothing gross, nothing extravagant." If it should appear upon the face of the judgment of the court below that the ingredients going to make up the amount are improperly used, this court will no doubt remove those ingredients and reduce the amount accordingly, but not otherwise. Are there, then, any improper ingredients? The only two suggested are, first that the judge was influenced by improper charges made against the salvors; secondly, that he took into consideration the French Law. As to the first, there is no trace of it in his judgment. As to the second, the judgment expressly proceeds upon the lex fori and not upon French law. But even if the judge did consider the French law, why should he not do so? The amount to be awarded is a matter of discretion, and in such a matter it is not improper to consider the amount that would have been awarded in the country to which the ship belongs. There can be no doubt that the rule laid down by the Ordonnance de la Marine, Liv. IV., Tit. IX., Art. 27, is still in force and that salvors of the derelict are entitled to one-third: (Dalloz, Jurisprudence Générale, Tit. Propriété No. 223, et seq.) This court will not interfere with a discretion founded upon such a consideration.

Salvors are to be rewarded not merely for the actual services rendered, but the general interests of navigation and commerce, the fatigue and anxiety, the spirit of adventure, and the skill and dexterity, which are required by the exercise of that spirit, are all to be taken into consideration: (The William Beckford, 3 C. Rob. 355.) And again not only the risk of salvors, their labour and the state of the weather are to be considered, but also the value of the property salvaged:

The Industry, 3 Hagg. 204;

The Raikes, 1 Hagg. 246;

The Hector, 3 Hagg. 93.

The interests of commerce require the highest possible reward, and salvage services can only be secured in the expectation of receiving a high reward. The Syrian (ubi sup.) does not overrule any of the former cases as to the ingredients of salvage reward, and the judgment there must be taken as applicable only to that particular case. A derelict at sea is certain to become a total loss unless salvors interfere.

W. G. F. Phillimore in reply.—In the present case there was no danger to life or property of the salvors which was the case in the Blendenhall (ubi sup.). It has been expressly laid down that the amount of salvage does not depend on the value of the property salvaged when the property is large; when the property is large, the reward ought to be adequate, not measured according to the value of the property, but chiefly according to the service, and especially with reference to the risk of life.

The James Dixon, 2 L. T. Rep. N. S. 696;

The Salacia, 2 Hagg. 263, 264.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 10, 1874.—The judgment of the court was delivered by

Sir JAMES W. COLVILLE.—These appeals are upon a question of salvage. The vessel salvaged, the Amérique, was a very large iron screw steamer of 4600 tons register, running habitually as a passenger vessel between Havre and New York. In the afternoon of the 14th April 1874, being on her return voyage from New York, with eighty-three passengers and a very valuable cargo of merchandise, she was abandoned by her master, crew, and passengers, under the apprehension that she was sinking, and left to the mercy of the wind and waves, when about seventy or eighty miles west of Usant.

In that condition she was first seen early in the morning of the 15th by the barque Auburn, which having made for her, succeeded in putting four men on board of her about 10.30 a.m. Very shortly afterwards she was also boarded by a boat's crew from the screw steamship Spray, consisting of the mate of that vessel and two other men, who were afterwards joined by the engineer and a fireman from the Spray. The Amérique, when first boarded was found to be on the starboard tack, with two close-reef top-sails; the foot of her mizen was out, and she had a strong list to port. On examination it was found that she had a good deal of water in her, coming partly through a port of which the glass was out; that the pumps were choked; and that the water was too high to allow the mate and engineer to get at the machinery. From what they observed, and from the fact that her own master and crew had abandoned her, those who made the examination might fairly conclude that the condition of this derelict vessel was far worse than it afterwards proved to be. The master and crew of the Spray, with the aid of two men whom the master of the Auburn agreed to leave for that purpose, nevertheless undertook the task of taking the Amerique to a port of safety. It is unnecessary to state in detail the measures which they adopted for this purpose. It is sufficient to say that the Spray, having towed the Amerique during the whole of the night of the 15th, at the rate of about two knots an hour, sighted the F. T. Barry early in the morning of the 16th, made signals to her, and ultimately agreed with her that she should assist in towing the Amerique to a safe port. The two steamers, with more or less misadventure, succeeded in getting the Amerique safely into Plymouth on the evening of the 18th April; but she continued to be under charge of the master and crew of the Spray until 7 p.m. of the following day, when she was taken in charge by the collector of customs.

The Spray was a screw steamship of 393 tons net register, manned by a crew of sixteen hands, all told, with engines of 80 horse-power nominal, but working up to 390 horse-power. She had left Newport on the 12th April laden with coals and bound for Gibraltar. And it is pleaded that at the time of the services she was of the value of about 15,000*l.*; her cargo being of the value of 650*l.*; and her freight out and home being of the value of 1270*l.* She does not appear to have sustained any serious damage during the service, beyond breaking her hawser, and having two butts on the port side torn out. In fact, by her pleading she assesses this damage at only 60*l.*; the loss incurred by the owners by reason of the deviation from her voyage at 130*l.*; and the extraordinary expenses incurred by them at 379*l.* 7*s.* 9*d.*

The F. T. Barry is an iron screw steamship of the burthen of 545 tons net register, valued at about 20,000*l.*, and propelled by two compound direct acting engines of 99 horse-power, working up to 400. Her crew at the time of the salvage service consisted of her master and twenty-two hands. She was homeward bound, having left Villa Real in Portugal, with a cargo of mineral ore and fruit of the value of 4,000*l.* for Newcastle on the 9th April 1874. She seems to have sustained damage to the amount of 600*l.*; and to have been delayed on her voyage for repairs for about twenty-one days. There were two distinct suits for salvage. The one by the owners, master, and crew of the Spray; the other by the owners, masters, and crews of both the F. T. Barry and of the Auburn. These suits were heard together before the Judge of the Admiralty Court, who awarded by way of salvage the gross sum of 30,000*l.* which he divided in the following proportion, viz.:—15,500*l.* to the Spray; 14,000*l.* to the F. T. Barry; and 500*l.* to the Auburn—these sums to be taken in full satisfaction of all damages and expenses, as well as in compensation for the salvage services.

The present appeal is against that decision.

That the vessel salvaged was a derelict, and that she and her cargo were saved by the exertions of the respondents, that their services were in a high degree meritorious, and deserved a large measure of remuneration, are propositions which are not disputed by the appellants. But they contend that the sum awarded by the learned judge is out of all proportion to those services, and, on the ground of its exorbitancy, ought to be reduced by this tribunal sitting as a court of appeal.

The jurisdiction thus invoked is one which this committee, and also, as would appear from The Cuba (Lushington, p. 14), the Court of Admiralty, when sitting as an appellate court, has always been slow to exercise. The general rule of non-interference has been within the last few years stated and enforced at this board in The Clarisse and The Neptune (both reported in 12 Moo. P. C. Reps. 340, 346); The Carrier Dove (2 Moo. P. C., N. S., p. 243); The Fusilier (3 Moor. N. S., 269); and The England (5 Moor. P. C. 344). The object of the appeal was in The Clarisse and The England to increase, in the other case to reduce, the amount awarded. The general rule is nowhere better stated than in The Clarisse, in which Lord Justice Knight Bruce said:—"It is a settled rule, and one of great utility with reference to cases of this description, that the difference (that is the difference between the sum awarded, and which the appellate court may thing ought to have been awarded) must be very considerable to induce a court of appeal to interfere upon a question of mere discretion." And in The Neptune Lord Kingsdown, after citing this passage from the judgment in The Clarisse, observed that the same rule must apply in diminishing the amount of compensation which is applied in increasing it.

The cases which establish and illustrate the exception to the general rule are The Thetis (2 Knapp, 390); The Scindia and True Blue (4 Moo. N. S. 101), and The Glenduror (8 Moo. N. S. 22) in which the amount awarded was increased; and The Inca, (12 Moor. P. C. 189) and The Chetah (5 Moo. N. S. 178), in which it was reduced. It may be observed that in delivering judgment in The Chetah, Lord Chelmsford stated that "it had been agreed by the counsel on both sides that no case was to be found where, upon an appeal from a decree for salvage services, the amount awarded had ever been reduced." But this statement of the authorities was obviously inaccurate, since the case of The Inca, in which the amount awarded was largely reduced, and in which the judgment of this board was delivered by Dr. Lushington, was decided in 1858. Upon the authorities it cannot be doubted, nor, indeed, was it denied at the bar, that the amount awarded may be reduced if the appellate court is satisfied (to use the words of Dr. Lushington in The Cuba), that it "is so exorbitant, so manifestly excessive, that it would not be just to confirm it."

To establish a case for the exercise of this exceptional and delicate jurisdiction it would obviously be material to show that the judge of first instance, in estimating the amount of remuneration to be awarded, had miscarried, by allowing his judgment to be influenced by something which ought not to have influenced it at all; or else either by giving undue consideration, or by failing to give due consideration, to some circumstances fairly within his consideration. And accordingly the learned counsel for the appellants have laboured to show some such miscarriage in the judgment under appeal.

Their arguments were founded first, on the observations made by the learned judge in pronouncing against the defence, founded on alleged acts of pillage on the part of the salvors, which was originally set up by the appellants. Their Lordships, however, cannot see the slightest ground for supposing that, whatever the learned judge may have felt touching this plea, he allowed that feeling

THE AMERIQUE.

in any degree to affect his judgment in estimating the amount of remuneration which awarded. Another argument was more plausibly founded on the reference made by the learned judge to the French law, and to the compensation which a French court would have awarded to the salvors had they carried this derelict vessel into Brest. It must, in their Lordships' opinion, be admitted that, if the judgment of the learned judge was influenced by that consideration, it was not properly so influenced. The consideration how the courts of another country, and that the country of the owners of the vessels saved, would deal with a subject communis juris, like salvage, might be legitimate, and even useful, if the courts of that country proceeded upon the same principles as those which govern our courts. But where it appears that the French courts are governed by a positive rule of law which prescribes that a fixed proportion of the value of a derelict is to be awarded to the salvors, and that our courts have for nearly two centuries repudiated that hard and fast rule of proportion, it is obvious that nothing can be deduced from the French law except an inference that the appellants might have been in a worse case if their ship had been carried into a French port. It affords no ingredient which can legitimately be imported in the calculation of the sum to be decreed against them in an English court.

Their Lordships, however, though unable to account altogether for this reference to the law of France, find that in the paragraph in the judgment which immediately follows it, the learned judge expressly stated that the case was to be decided by the lex fori; and their Lordships are, therefore, not satisfied that he did not intend to decide it upon the principles by which his own court is habitually governed without reference to the French law. They will, therefore, deal with the question before them as simply one of alleged excess or exorbitancy.

It seems to be indisputable that the amount awarded in this case is larger than any that was ever awarded by an English court of admiralty, except that given in the case of the Thetis. The services in that case, however, were of the highest merit. They lasted during many months; they involved the use of ingenious and complicated machinery; actual loss of life in at least one case; actual loss of health in many cases; great hardships, exposure, and privations to all actively concerned in them. In the present cases their Lordships, without wishing in the slightest degree to detract from the courage with which the salvors undertook, and the ability with which they performed, the services in question, cannot but observe that those services, considered with reference to their duration, to the danger to life incurred by the men, to the damage or risk of damage incurred by the vessels employed, and to the consequences or probable consequences of their deviations from the voyages on which they were employed, fall far short of services which in other cases and even in cases of derelict, have been remunerated by much smaller sums. It follows then, that the value of the property is the consideration on which, if at all, this exceptional award of remuneration is to be justified. And this raises the question to what extent, if any, undue effect has been given to that consideration.

It was argued on the authority of a case decided by Dr. Lushington in 1866 (The Syrian), reported in 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 387) that the value of the property saved is material only in so far as it supplies a fund adequate to the payment of a liberal remuneration for the services rendered; and it ought not further to affect the measure of that remuneration. The passage in Dr. Lushington's judgment which is relied upon is as follows: "In dealing with the present case, the court also bears in mind that there is a large amount of property saved; but for the single purpose of remembering that it is enabled out of an ample fund fitly to remunerate meritorious services well performed; and the court does not hold the large value of the property saved as a fund for attempting to extort from the owners of that property or from the underwriters, as the case may be, more than full recompense for such services." Their Lordships do not think that this passage can fairly be taken to import a ruling that the quantum of remuneration is not in any degree to be affected by the value of the property saved. Such a ruling would be hardly consistent with what the same learned judge has laid down in his judgment delivered by him at this board in the case of The True Blue (4 Moo. N. S. 104) in 1866. He then cited what Lord Stowell had laid down in The Aquila (1 C. Rob. p. 37) to the effect that "the proper mode of considering the question is, what is the fit and proper amount, with reference to all the circumstances, including the value of the property saved, and the risk to the property of the salvors?" And at p. 106 he assigns the value of the vessel saved as a ground on which their Lordships ought to increase the sum awarded by way of salvage remuneration by the court below. That the value of the property saved is, to some extent, to be treated as an ingredient in the calculation of the quantum of salvage remuneration is a proposition which might be supported by a long series of decisions beginning with those of Lord Stowell in The William Beckford (3 C. Rob., 356) and Sir John Nicoll in The Industry (3 Hagg. 208), and coming down to the present time. And their Lordships do not conceive that it was the intention of the learned judge who decided the case of The Syrian to run counter to, or even to qualify the decisions of, his predecessors on this point. The rule seems to be that though the value of the property saved is to be considered in the estimate of the remuneration, it must not be allowed to raise the quantum to an amount altogether out of proportion to the services actually rendered. And this is consistent with what is said by Lord Stowell in The Blendon Hall (1 Dodson, p. 421). "In fixing a proportion of the value the court is in the habit of giving a smaller proportion where the property is large, and a higher proportion where the value is small, and for this obvious reason, that in property of small value a small proportion would not hold out a sufficient consideration; whereas in cases of considerable value a smaller proportion would afford no inadequate compensation."

Applying these principles, their Lordships, with the most anxious desire not to infringe the wholesome rule which allows great latitude to the discretion of the court of first instance in cases of this description, have been unable to resist the conclusion that the learned judge has given undue weight in this case to the value of the property saved, and has consequently awarded a sum which, having regard to the services rendered, their Lordships must pronounce to be excessive, Taking into consideration all the circumstances of the case, the nature and duration of the services, and also the fact, dwelt upon by the learned judge, that the merit of the salvors was enhanced by their removing what might have proved a dangerous obstacle to navigation, and giving the utmost weight due to the value of the property saved, their Lordships are of opinion that 18,000*l.* is the utmost amount that can be given consistently with justice to the owners of the Amérique, and the rules which govern the ordinary practice of courts of admiralty in England. And they will humbly advise Her Majesty that the sum awarded be reduced to that amount. Following the precedents of the Inca and the Chetah, they think that each party should bear their own costs of this appeal. They do not propose to alter the proportions in which the judgment under appeal has apportioned the sum awarded amongst the different classes of salvors, and the result of their Lordships' judgment will be that the sum awarded to each class will be diminished by two-fifths.

Appeal allowed; amount reduced.

THE HENRY MORTON.

Collision—Tyne bye-laws—Vessels crossing river—Vessel overtaking another.

By the bye-laws in force regulating the navigation of the river Tyne (clause 17) all vessels proceeding to sea must keep to the south side of mid Channel and (clause 20) "vessels crossing the river, and vessels turning take upon themselves the responsibility of doing so safely with reference to the passing traffic;" under these bye-laws a vessel outward bound coming at full speed out of the Tyne dock (on the south side of the river Tyne), and crossing the river to the north side whether intentionally, in violation of clause 17, or unintentionally by reason of the force of the tide, is bound to use the utmost caution to avoid the passing traffic, and to contemplate before attempting to come out any contingencies, such as tide, stoppage of the traffic, &c., which may arise, and she should only cross if it can be done without risk to that traffic; if a collision occurs by want of such caution the ship will be responsible.

Seemle, that the 21st clause of the above bye-laws, providing that "when steam vessels are proceeding in the same direction but with unequal speed, the vessel" which steams slowest shall when overtaken take certain measures to allow the overtaking steamship to pass her, applies only to a vessel overtaking and passing another actually upon the same course with itself.

THESE were appeals from decrees of the High Court of Admiralty of England in cross causes of damage brought respectively by the respondents as owners of a screw steam ship called the Harefield, against a screw steam ship called the Henry Morton, owned by the appellants, for the recovery of damages in respect of a collision between the two ships, and by the appellants against the Harefield in respect of the damages sustained by the Henry Morton.

The collision happened at about a quarter-past four p.m. on the afternoon of the 21st Jan. 1874, a little below the entrance of the Tyne dock, in the river Tyne. The tide was flood, and the weather was fine. The Henry Morton was proceeding slowly down the Tyne in about mid-river and was following another steamer called the Elemore, which was also going down at the distance of about three times the length of the Henry Morton ahead of her. When the Henry Morton was nearly off the entrance of the Tyne dock, which is on the south or Durham side of the river, the Elemore stopped on account of a sailing vessel which was in her way, and the engines of the Henry Morton were also stopped.

The Harefield, which was proceeding to sea, came out of the Tyne dock and crossed over from the south to the north side of the river, and although the engines of the Henry Morton were reversed and her helm put hard a-starboard, the Harefield, with her port side, between her bridge and fore-rigging, came into collision with the starboard side of the stem of the Henry Morton. The Harefield then went on, and with her stem struck the Elemore in the centre of her stern.

The following clauses of the bye-laws for the regulation of the navigation of the river Tyne were admitted to be in force at the time and place of the collision in question in this cause:—

Clause 17.—All vessels navigating the river when proceeding towards sea shall keep to the south of mid-channel; and when coming from seaward, shall keep to the north of mid channel, so that the port-helm may always be applied to clear vessels proceeding in the opposite direction.

Clause 19.—All vessels when under weigh, requiring to pass over a part of the channel which is not within that half reserved for their navigation, for the purpose of proceeding to or from landings, moorings, or other places, must take upon themselves the responsibility of doing so in safety with reference to the passing traffic; and, any vessel, continuing its navigation after reaching such landing, mooring, or other place, must again proceed to the side of the river specified as the proper side for its navigation, so soon as practicable, and take upon itself the responsibility of doing so in safety, with respect to the passing traffic.

Clause 20.—Vessels crossing the river, and vessels turning, must take upon themselves the responsibility of doing so safely with reference to the passing traffic.

Clause 21.—When steam vessels are proceeding in the same direction, but with unequal speed, the vessel which steams slowest shall, when overtaken, keep sufficiently to the left, or port side, and shall offer no obstruction whatever, by crossing the channel or otherwise, to the free passage of the faster vessel; and shall ease, and, if necessary, stop the engine as soon as a faster vessel comes within thirty yards; and in like manner the faster vessel shall ease its engine when it comes within thirty yards of the slower vessel, until it has passed the vessel so overtaken; and, that ignorance of the approach of the faster vessel may not be pleaded by the master of the slower vessel, it shall be sufficient intimation of such approach if the steam whistle of the faster vessel be three times sounded, but no vessel overtaking any other vessel will be justified in passing such vessel at any of the points, or other dangerous turnings of the river, or at the dock entrances.

On the part of the appellants, it was contended that the Harefield was to blame for coming out of the Tyne dock when she did, regard being had to the positions of the Henry Morton and Elemore, and other vessels, and that the Harefield could and should, in accordance with the said bye-laws, and with careful navigation, have been kept on the south side of the river, and that her engines ought to have been stopped and reversed before the collision, in time to have prevented the collision. For the respondents it was contended that the Henry Morton neglected to stop and reverse and improperly attempted to pass the Harefield contrary to the bye-laws of the river Tyne.

The cause was heard in the court below on oral evidence before the learned judge, assisted by Trinity Masters.

The learned judge of the court below, however, pronounced the collision to have been solely occasioned by the improper navigation of the Henry Morton, and made decrees condemning the appellants, and their bail, in the damages proceeded for and in costs, and dismissing the cross suit of the appellants. The reasons for the judgment and the evidence sufficiently appear in the judgment of the Judicial Committee.

From this decree the appellants appealed for the following, amongst other reasons.

1. Because those in charge of the Harefield did not keep a proper look-out, and the collision was thereby occasioned.

2. Because the Harefield proceeded to leave the Tyne dock at an improper time and in an improper manner, without due regard to the position of the Henry Morton and the Elemore, and the collision was thereby occasioned.

3. Because the Harefield did not take proper measures to keep on the south side of the river in accordance with the bye-laws as to navigation of the Tyne and with careful navigation, and improperly neglected to keep on the south side of the river, and the collision was thereby occasioned.

4. Because the Harefield did not duly stop and reverse her engines, and the collision was thereby occasioned.

5. Because the said collision, if not wholly occasioned by the several acts and defaults hereinbefore stated, was contributed to thereby or by some of them.

6. Because the judgment and decree of the court below were in favour of the respondents, whereas they ought to have been in favour of the appellants, Butt, Q.C. and E. C. Clarkson, for the appellants, Milward, Q.C. and Gainsford Bruce, for the respondents.

Dec. 12, 1874.—The judgment of the court was delivered by Sir BARNES PEACOCK.—This is a case of collision between two screw steamers which took place in the river Tyne at about 4.15 on the 21st Jan. last, a little above what is known as Whitehill point on the northern bank of the river. The weather was clear and fine; the wind wintry; and the tide about two-thirds flood, and running pretty strongly. The Henry Morton had come from a place called Jarrow, higher up the river. As she approached the entrance of the Northumberland dock, which is on the northern bank of the river, she had to give way to a third steamer, the Elemore, also outward bound, which came out of that dock; and afterwards continued her course down the river in the wake of that vessel somewhat to the north of mid-channel. Shortly before the collision the Elemore stopped her engines in order to avoid a brig running up the river in tow of a tug.

About the same time the Harefield came out of the Tyne dock, which is on the southern bank, crossed the river at full speed in a transverse direction intending to straighten her course for her passage down the river; and in so doing came in contact first with the Henry Morton, and afterwards with the Elemore.

So far the facts are undisputed. Upon the other parts of the case the evidence is very conflicting.

The case of the Harefield is, that she was hauling out of the Tyne dock, and was in the act of straightening down the river, her engines going a-head, and her helm being hard a-port, when the Henry Morton came down the river at a rapid speed, and with her stem struck the Harefield a violent blow on her port side, nearly amidships; and that having got clear she came on again, striking the Harefield a second blow on the port side further aft; and by means of this second blow forced the Harefield into collision with the Elemore.

The case of the Henry Morton is, that shortly before the collision she was about or nearly off the entrance of the Tyne dock, and nearly in mid-stream; that having previously stopped in order to allow the Elemore to come out of the Northumberland dock, she was following the vessel at the rate of about two knots an hour, when the Elemore, having to stop on account of a sailing vessel in her way, she also stopped her engines. That in these circumstances, the Harefield, having come out of the Tyne dock, was seen coming athwart the river towards the Henry Morton, causing danger of collision; that the Henry Morton thereupon reversed her engines and took other means to avoid the collision or break its force; but that the Harefield with her port side, between the bridge and the fore-rigging, came into collision with the starboard side of the stem of the Henry Morton, passed on and struck the Elemore on her stern, and coming astern again came into collision with the Henry Morton. And the chief fault which the pleading of the Henry Morton imputes to those on board the Harefield is, that they improperly neglected so to navigate her as to enable her to keep to the south of mid-channel.

The learned judge of the Admiralty Court came to the conclusion that the Harefield was not to blame for coming out of dock at the time when she did come out; that it was the duty of the Henry Morton, not only by the law of the river, but also by the common rules of navigation, having the tide assisting her for this purpose, to stop to let the Harefield come out, in the same manner as the Henry Morton had stopped just before to allow the Elemore to come out of the Northumberland dock; that the collision was due to the want of a proper and careful look-out, and to the Harefield not having been seen until it was too late on the part of the Henry Morton to avoid the collision; and that the Henry Morton was alone to blame for that collision.

Their Lordships, in dealing with the appeal from this decision, propose to consider first, how far the evidence justifies the finding that the Henry Morton was at all to blame for this collision.

In order to arrive at a just conclusion upon this point it is necessary to determine with more or less precision two questions which were much debated at the bar, viz., what was the position of the Henry Morton when the Harefield was coming out of dock? and, at what speed she was then proceeding down the river?

The witnesses for the Harefield place the Henry Morton considerably above the entrance of the Tyne dock at the time when their own vessel came out of the dock. Some, as e.g., John Wood, the second mate, p. 22, and William Bird, p. 37, place her as high up the river as the Northumberland dock. In this their Lordships consider there is some exaggeration. It is admitted that the Elemore was then below the entrance of the Tyne dock. It is sworn on the part of the Henry Morton that she had stopped in order to allow the Elemore to come out of the Northumberland dock; and the fact that she had so stopped seems to have been found by the Judge of the Admiralty Court. The witnesses on her side also depose that she afterwards followed the Elemore at a distance of about three ships' length; she would naturally keep as near the Elemore as she could with safety; and the distance between them can hardly have exceeded that at which the pilot of the Elemore puts it, viz., six ships' length. On the other hand, it is to be observed that in their preliminary act the owners of the Henry Morton have stated that "the Harefield was first seen coming out of the Tyne dock board on the starboard bow of the Henry Morton, which was a little above the Tyne dock entrance, and about or near mid-channel." And upon the whole evidence on this point their Lordships have come to the conclusion that, when the Harefield came out of dock, or was seen by the pilot of the Henry Morton as about to come out of dock, the latter vessel was still above the entrance of the Tyne dock.

As to the speed at which the Henry Morton was going down the river when the Harefield was first seen, their Lordships see no reason to doubt that it was that stated in the preliminary act, viz., about two knots an hour. It is part of her case that when the Elemore stopped in order to avoid the steam tug and the brig Isabel in tow of her, the Henry Morton did the same. The time at which this manœuvre was executed is material. Her captain's evidence as to the different orders given to the engineer is confused, and almost inexplicable. That, however, of Robert Brown, the pilot in charge of the Henry Morton, makes it clear that it was not until after he had seen the masts of the Harefield coming through the piers that this second stoppage of the Henry Morton's engines took place; and that between that and the previous stoppage, in order to let the Elemore out of the Northumberland dock, they had gone slowly a-head. The engines were not reversed and put full speed astern until the collision was imminent. And upon the whole evidence their Lordships have come to the conclusion that the Henry Morton, after passing the Northumberland docks, and when the Harefield came through the piers, was going at the rate of two knots an hour; that she afterwards stopped her engines, and immediately before the collision reversed them; but that up to and at the time of the collision she continued to have some way upon her.

Another question which was debated at the bar was whether the collision between the Elemore and the Harefield took place before or after the second collision between the latter vessel and the Henry Morton. There is a direct conflict of evidence on this point; but their Lordships are of opinion that the account given by those on board the Harefield, confirmed as it is by those on board the Elemore, and other independent testimony, is more credible than that of the witnesses for the Henry Morton; and that the Henry Morton and the Harefield were in collision twice before the latter struck the Elemore. They are also disposed to think that, before striking the second below, the Henry Morton must have begun to go a-head again, probably in the hope of getting clear, and so proceeding to sea.

And this is consistent with what one of the witnesses has sworn as to the cry from the Henry Morton to the Harefield to put out the cork fender.

The bye-laws which govern the navigation of the river Tyne have been invoked by both parties. The particular clauses insisted upon are the 3rd, which requires all vessels proceeding to sea to keep to the south, and those coming from seaward to the north of mid-channel; the 19th and 20th, which throw upon vessels requiring to pass over a part of the channel which is not within the half reserved for their navigation, and upon vessels crossing the river, or turning, the responsibility of doing so safely, with reference to the passing traffic; and the 21st, which contains the following passage, viz., "but no vessel overtaking any other vessel will be justified in passing such vessel at any of the points, or other dangerous part of the river, or at the dock entrances."

Upon the facts as proved above, their Lordships are of opinion that the judgment under appeal, in so far as it finds that the Henry Morton was guilty of culpable negligence, is correct. Looking to the position of the Henry Morton when her pilot first saw the Harefield, they think that the collision might have been avoided if the Henry Morton had either ported so as to pass astern of the Harefield to the southern, which it is to be observed was the proper, side of the river; or had stopped and reversed her engines. Their Lordships think that either measure was within the power of those on board that vessel, and that it was their duty to adopt one of them. Instead of doing this they appear to have assumed that the Harefield would not come so far across the river, and to have paid no attention to her movements until the collision was imminent. In this their Lordships think they were not justified, whether the Harefield was or was not to blame for coming so far across the river a point to be considered presently. The evidence of the different pilots examined in the cause satisfies their Lordships that the practice of so crossing the river, whether right or wrong, is so frequent, that the contingency of the Harefield doing so was one which those on board the Henry Morton ought to have contemplated, and therefore that they were not justified in neglecting to take the means in their power of avoiding its probable consequences. It is further to be observed that her master himself, and her chief mate, admit that the collision might have been avoided if the course of the Harefield had been observed in time. Their Lordships think it right to say that they have come to the conclusion that the Henry Morton was in fault independently of the 21st clause of the bye-laws, which they are disposed to think applies only to a vessel overtaking and passing another actually upon the same course with itself.

Their Lordships have now to consider whether there was not also contributory negligence on the part of the Harefield.

It is admitted that the proper course for an outward bound steamer leaving the Tyne dock is to straighten her course as soon as possible, so as to proceed down the river on the southern side of mid-channel. There is a strong body of evidence corroborated by proof of what the Anne Webster did to show that this may be done without running, like the Harefield, across the mid-channel.

The judgment under appeal assumes that it was the duty of the Harefield to get to the south side as soon as possible, but finds that she was delayed in doing so by accidental circumstances, of which one was the presence of the raft of which much was said in the argument. This raft, notwithstanding what was argued to the contrary by Mr. Bruce, their Lordships must take upon the evidence to have ultimately gone up the river. It is not likely that it should have been towed against the tide down the river. Their Lordships, however, conceive it to be possible that, in order to allow the Harefield to pass it, it may in the first instance have been towed towards the eastern pier of the basin into the slack-water there. If this be so it would not very materially affect the subsequent movements of the Harefield, which is pretty well proved to have come out from between the piers with her head N.E. by E. Had the raft really altered the course of the Harefield it would, their Lordships apprehend, have been a grave question whether she ought not to have waited until that obstacle was out of the way. But on the whole their Lordships are disposed to think that the raft had little or nothing to do with what subsequently happened.

Then it is said she came out with her head in the right direction, but the action of the tide on her starboard bow gave a fling, which canted her more to the northward, and impeded the action of her port helm. There does not, however, seem to have been anything exceptional in the strength of the tide on that day.

Either she intended, or she did not intend, to go as far across the river as she went. In either case the bye-laws seem to cast upon her the responsibility of crossing the river, or of going out of her prescribed ground without danger to the passing traffic. If she did this intentionally (and the fact that all three steamers are found on the northern instead of the southern side of mid-channel begets a suspicion that vessels may intentionally violate the 17th clause in this part of the river in order to escape the strength of tide) she was doubly bound to caution. If she were forced into that position by the tide, she ought to have contemplated that contingency. But in either case it seems to their Lordships that those in charge of her ought to have watched their opportunity for crossing the river at full speed, and to have observed carefully what passing traffic was likely to come in her way. Had they done this they would have seen that the Elemore was but a little below, and the Henry Morton but a little above the opening of the dock; and they ought further to have contemplated the contingency, which actually happened, of the downward course of these vessels being arrested by vessels ascending the river, as they ought to ascend it, on the northern side. Upon the evidence, those on board the Harefield seem to have paid very little attention to the movements of the other two vessels. And their Lordships cannot acquit them of having recklessly crossed the river at the risk of collision with one or both. Nor are they satisfied that if the Harefield had carefully observed the movements of the two other steamers, and seen that they had been stopped by the brig, she might not have extricated herself from the position in which she had placed herself without further danger by reversing her engines. Upon the whole, therefore, their Lordships cannot acquit the Harefield of blame, and they have come to the conclusion that it will be their duty to advise Her Majesty to reverse both the judgments under appeal, and in each suit to pronounce both vessels to blame, and to direct that each party shall bear their costs, both in the Court of Admiralty and on this appeal.

Judgments reversed and appeals allowed.

EDWARDS v. ABERAYRON MUTUAL SHIP INSURANCE SOCIETY (LIMITED).

Policy of marine insurance—Risk or adventure—Time policy—Member by estoppel—Agreement to decide disputes—Condition precedent—30 & 31 Vict. c. 23.

Plaintiff had an equitable interest in a ship, and afterwards received a transfer of the legal interest from the registered owner, who was a member of the defendants' society. The owner insured the ship with the defendants in the plaintiff's name by a policy incorporating the rules of the society, and providing among other things that every insurance effected should be valid and binding from noon on that day until noon of the 1st Jan. then next following; by the rules, persons became members only by signing the articles, and none but members could insure their ships. The rules also required certain notice upon sale of a ship or shares thereof. The plaintiff had never signed the articles, nor given notice of the transfer to him of the legal interest, but had paid contributions claimed from him as owner by the society. It was also provided by the rules that the directors should decide claims and disputes of members, and that aggrieved members might appeal for reconsideration of decisions, first to the directors themselves, and then to the whole society; and also that no member should be allowed to bring or have any action, suit, or proceeding, or other remedy against the society for any claims or demands upon or in respect of the society or the members thereof, except as therein provided.

Upon loss of the ship plaintiff was refused his claim upon this policy by the directors twice, but made no appeal to the whole society.

Held: That the above clause in the policy was a sufficient compliance with sect. 7 of the Stamp Act 1867; that the defendants were estopped from disputing the plaintiff's interest in the policy, and his right as member to sue upon it; but that the clause for settlement of disputes rendered a resort to all the appeals provided therein a condition precedent to an action against the society by a member.

THIS was an action brought to recover the sum of 1000*l.* in respect of a total loss of a vessel called the Hermione, alleged to have been insured for that amount by the defendants. The cause came on for trial at the sittings after Hilary Term 1873, before the Lord Chief Justice Cockburn and a special jury, when by the consent of the parties, and by order, the following case was stated for the opinion of the court.

The plaintiff is a farmer residing at Troedyrhiw, between Aberayron and Aberystwith, in

EDWARDS v. ABERAYRON MUTUAL SHIP INSURANCE SOCIETY (LIMITED).

[Q. B.]

Cardiganshire, and the defendants are a mutual society, incorporated under the Joint Stock Companies' Acts, and established at Aberayron in the same county. A copy of the memorandum and articles of association accompanied the case, and was to be taken as part thereof. In the month of December 1868, the plaintiff's brother-in-law Daniel Davis, was about to purchase the vessel Hermione, and the plaintiff agreed to make him advances to enable him to purchase and repair the vessel. The terms upon which the advances were agreed to be and were afterwards made were embodied in a written agreement, dated 22nd Dec. 1868: a copy of this agreement accompanied the case, and was to be taken as part thereof, but it is not material to the questions raised. The vessel was insured for the first time with the defendants' society in January 1869. The insurance was effected by Daniel Davies, who gave directions to the defendants' secretary that the policy should be made out in the plaintiff's name and be handed to him. Davies did not inform the defendants of the arrangement made with the plaintiff. The document, a copy of which accompanies this case, marked "C.," was afterwards forwarded by post by the defendants to the plaintiff. It is the usual form of policy issued by the defendants to their members.

In Jan. 1870 the vessel was on a foreign voyage under the command of Daniel Davies, and the plaintiff in his absence applied for a renewal of the insurance with the defendants. The premium of 17l. 10s. was paid by the plaintiff, and in March 1870 the defendants forwarded by post to the plaintiff the document a copy of which marked "D.," accompanied this case, and was to be taken as part thereof. No copy of the rules or articles of the association was furnished to the plaintiff, and it is to be taken for the purposes of this case that he had not read, and did not know of the provisions contained in them until after the loss of the vessel. In March 1870 an application was made to the plaintiff for a sum of 17l. 10s., being the contribution to the losses of the year 1869, payable in respect of the vessel Hermione. This amount was paid by the plaintiff on the 31st March 1870. Copies of the notice of call, and of the receipt, marked E and F, respectively, accompanied this case, and were to be taken as part thereof, but need not be further referred to. In Oct. 1870 a further call was made on the plaintiff for the losses in 1870, and the plaintiff paid the amount and obtained a receipt. The notice of call had been mislaid, and a copy of the receipt, marked "H," accompanied the case, and was to be taken as part thereof, but need not be further referred to. On 14th May 1870 Daniel Davies, by bill of sale, which was soon afterwards registered, transferred the Hermione to the plaintiff. No notice of this transfer was given to the defendants. In June 1870 Daniel Davies made a claim upon the society for the amount of the loss of an anchor and chain of the Hermione. The claim was for 200l., and was resisted by the society on the ground that the loss was one which should be contributed for in general average, and that the ship's proportion was only 7l. A copy of the rules was then furnished to Daniel Davies by the defendants' secretary, and the sum of 7l. was ultimately received by the plaintiff in payment of the claim.

The Hermione was wrecked and became a total loss off Pernambuco in Nov. 1870. On the 2nd Dec. 1870 the plaintiff sent in to the defendants a claim for the amount of the insurance of the Hermione, viz., 1000l., and soon after Daniel Davies was requested to attend a meeting of the board of directors on the 6th Jan. 1871. He attended accordingly, and was questioned as to the circumstances of the loss of the vessel. The directors expressed to Davies their opinion that his account of the wreck was not satisfactory, and that the loss was not shown to have been caused by perils of the seas. When he had withdrawn from the room they came to the resolution "That the owners of the Hermione had no claim upon the society." The plaintiff had no notice of the meeting, and neither Davies nor the plaintiff had notice of this resolution, or was required to attend the directors on any subsequent occasion. On the 6th April 1871 a notice, signed by ten members of the association, but not signed by the plaintiff or Davies, was sent to the defendants' office. This notice was submitted to the next quarterly meeting of the directors. No notice to attend was given either to the plaintiff or Davies, and in their absence the directors, without further inquiry, came to the same resolution as before, viz., that the owners of the Hermione had no claim upon the society. The defendants now admit the total loss of the vessel by perils of the seas, but contend that they are not liable in this action on several grounds—amongst others, upon the ground that the document upon which the plaintiff brings this action does not specify the risk, and is therefore void as a policy of insurance under 30 & 31 Vict. c. 23, ss. 7 & 9. They also contend that the rules and articles of association are to be treated as incorporated with the policy, and that under the rules the plaintiff is not a member of the defendants' society, and is not entitled to recover in respect of any loss. There was no evidence to show that persons insuring with the society were always required to sign the articles of association, and neither Davies nor the plaintiff had been requested to do so, either before or after the registration of the society. The defendants also contend that the resolution came to by the directors was a decision upon the plaintiff's claim, and that, not having been appealed from in the manner pointed out by rule 84, the decision has become final and binding.

It was agreed that the court should have power to draw all such inferences of fact as might have been drawn by a jury. It was also agreed that the court should have power to make all such amendments as may be made under the Common Law Procedure Acts, and to amend the particulars if the court should think fit, so as to enable the plaintiff to recover all or any of the moneys paid by him to the defendants.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether or not the plaintiff has any cause of action against the defendants. If the court should be of opinion in the affirmative, the judgment was to be entered for the plaintiff for such amount as the court should direct, with costs of suit. If the court should be of opinion in the negative, then judgment of nonsuit was to be entered with costs.

The memorandum and articles of association were printed together, and it appeared from the third paragraph of the former that

The objects for which the company is established are the mutual insurance of ships belonging to members of the company, and the doing of all such other things as are incidental or conducive to the attainments of the above objects.

By Article 3,

Every person shall be deemed to have agreed to become a member of the company who insures any ship or share in a ship in pursuance of the regulations herein-after contained.

By Article 4,

That no person, except the persons who have signed the copy of these articles kept for that purpose at the office of the company, previously to the complete registration of the society, shall become a member of the society, until his admittance shall have been consented to by a board of directors, and he shall have signed the copy of these articles kept for that purpose at the office of the company.

By Article 39,

That the directors shall have full power to enter into and execute, and also to modify, alter, or release any contract or agreement respecting any matter in which the society may be interested; and to adjust, settle, and decide all claims and demands upon the society by the members thereof; or to decide and determine all disputes, controversies, and matters arising between the society and members of the society concerning insurances or claims upon, or liabilities by and to the society, and concerning the laws, rules, regulations and bye-laws of the society; and the decision of the directors shall be final and conclusive, as well upon the society as the members thereof; and no member of the society shall be allowed to bring or have an action, suit, or proceeding or other remedy against the society or the members thereof, for any claims or demands upon or in respect of the society or the members thereof, except as is provided by these presents; but no director who shall be interested in the particular matter which shall be referred to the directors, further or otherwise than a general member of the society, or whose claims upon the society shall be submitted to the decision of the directors, shall be allowed to vote or interfere in such matter or claims; and in case any question shall arise as to any director being allowed to vote in such matter or claim, such question shall be finally decided by the directors present at any board, exclusive of the director whose vote shall be questioned; and the directors may, if they shall think fit, cause any of such claims and demands, and the amount to be paid to any member of the society, to be submitted and referred to the decision of any person practising as an average adjuster of marine insurances, who shall be attended by, and have the same powers of calling for, and enforcing the attendance of claimants and other evidence, as the directors would; and the directors or any person on the part of the society, and the claimant, or any person on his behalf, shall be at liberty to attend and produce any evidence before such average adjuster; and in every such case the decision or award of such average adjuster shall be final and conclusive on the society and claimant, and every person interested in such claim, and no appeal shall be allowed therefrom.

By Article 63,

That if any member of the society shall sell any vessel, or shares of any vessel insured by the society, his claims upon the society, and liability to contribute to the losses or damages of other members of the society in respect of such vessel or shares shall cease as soon as the possession of such vessel or shares shall be delivered to the purchaser thereof, or the sale shall be otherwise completed, and notice in writing of the sale shall have been given by the member so selling to the secretary, but not before; and the purchaser of such vessel or shares, if not a member of the society, shall have no claim upon the society in respect thereof; and if the purchaser be a member of the society, such member shall have no claim upon the society in respect thereof, until he shall have entered such vessel or share in his own name in the books of the society, and in all respects have conformed to the laws, rules, and regulations of the society in respect of such vessel or shares.

By Article 74,

That every vessel insured in the society shall have an agent or ship's husband, whose name and address shall be delivered by the owner or owners thereof to the secretary, and be entered by him in the books of the society;

and every such agent or ship's husband shall have full power to transact and settle all matters of business with the society relating to such vessel, and to pay and receive and give discharges for all moneys which shall be payable from, or receivable by, the owner or owners of such vessel to or from the society; and to whom all notices and demands affecting the owner or owners of such vessel may be delivered, and when delivered shall be binding on such owner or owners.

By Article 83,

That in all cases of any vessel or shares thereof insured by the society being lost, wrecked, stranded, burnt, abandoned, captured, damaged, or injured, by being run down, or otherwise injured by any other vessel, the owner, master, or mate, or some of the crew, shall as soon as circumstances will permit, give notice thereof to the secretary of the society, who shall thereupon, by letter to the several directors, summon a board of directors on the first convenient day, not exceeding seven days from the receipt of such notice; and the directors shall proceed to examine the owner, master, and mate, and such of the crew as they shall think necessary, as to the cause of such loss or damage, and shall make such further inquiries, and take such measures and make such decisions and regulations thereon, as in their judgment the case shall require; and the owner or master of any vessel so lost, wrecked, stranded, burnt, abandoned, captured damaged or injured, shall not commence any repairs except such as shall be deemed necessary for the immediate safety of such vessel, or settle or compromise any claims or disputes, or prosecute or defend any action or suit in relation thereto, without the previous consent of the directors.

By Article 84,

That if any member of the society shall be dissatisfied with the decision of the directors as to the settlement of any loss or damage sustained by such member, or as to any claim or other matter settled or adjusted, or decided by the directors; and such member so dissatisfied shall procure ten other members of the society, not being directors, to join with him in a written requisition to the directors to reconsider and revise their decision. The directors shall thereupon call a Board of Directors of not less than ten, and consider and revise such decision; and in case such member shall be dissatisfied with the further decision of such Board of Directors, such member so dissatisfied, together with twenty other members of the society, may, by writing under their hands, require the secretary to summon a Special General Meeting of the Society, to be held at any time not exceeding fourteen days from the receipt of such writing by the secretary, and such Special General Meeting shall have full power to confirm or vary the decision of the directors, and whatever shall be decided by the Special General Meeting shall be final and binding, as well upon the society as upon all the parties interested in the decision.

The policy marked C., referred to the articles of association, but contained no specification of the particular risk or adventure other than,—“That every insurance effected shall be valid and binding from twelve o'clock of the noon on that day on which the insurance shall be effected until twelve o'clock of the noon of the first day of January then next following.”

The document marked D. was the same printed policy as C. The part following the printed sentences was, when filled up, as follows:—

Q. B.]

EDWARDS v. ABERAYRON MUTUAL SHIP INSURANCE SOCIETY (LIMITED).

[Q. B.]

The following were the plaintiff's points of argument: First, that the vessel Hermione was in fact insured by the defendants; secondly, that the plaintiff had a sufficient interest in the vessel to sue on the contract of insurance; thirdly, that the plaintiff is entitled to sue on the contract of insurance on behalf of Daniel Davies; fourthly, that the defendants are estopped from denying that they had insured the ship, or that the plaintiff or Daniel Davies had an insurable interest; fifthly, that the plaintiff is a member of the defendants' association, and is entitled to recover; sixthly, that there is nothing in the rules or articles of the defendants' association disentitling the plaintiff to recover; seventhly, that there has been no such proper and final decision of the directors as disentitles the plaintiff to recover.

The following were the defendants' points of argument: First, that the document upon which the plaintiff sues in this action is void as a policy of insurance, because it does not specify the risk insured against (30 & 31 Vict. c. 23, ss. 7 and 9); secondly, that the alleged policy was issued subject to the rules and articles of defendants' society, and that the plaintiff, not having been a member of the said society, is not entitled to recover in this action (see Article 3 of Memorandum of Association, and Rules 3, 4, and 63); thirdly, that the defendants never received notice of any assignment of Daniel Davies' interest in the vessel to the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff, after such assignment, never having become a member of the society, is not entitled to recover, (see Rule 63); fourthly that the defendants dealt with the plaintiff as ship's husband, and never as the owner of the vessel, or as a member of the said society. (see form of alleged policy, and rule 74); fifthly that the decision of the directors given in this matter against the claim for the loss of the Hermione made upon the society, not being appealed against in the way provided by the rules, is conclusive, (see Rules 39, 83, and 84.)

Kenelm Digby argued for the plaintiff.—The words of the 7th section of the Stamp Act 1867, upon which the defendants' first objection is based are:—"No contract or agreement for sea insurance shall be valid unless the same is expressed in a policy; and every policy shall specify the particular risk or adventure, the names of the subscribers or underwriters, and the sum or sums insured, and in case any of the above mentioned particulars shall be omitted in any policy, such policy shall be null and void to all intents and purposes. This, however, is a time policy, and it cannot be maintained that more than the description of the exact time covered by the insurance is required by this section. If the particular voyage were required, it would be impossible generally to enter into time policies, and the following section shows that it was not intended to abolish them. [BLACKBURN, J.—This policy seems clearly to satisfy that enactment. At all events, you need say no more on that point until we have heard the other side.] As to the defendants' second point of argument, I do not dispute the assertion that the policy was issued subject to the rules and articles of the defendants' company, but I contend there is nothing in them to prevent the plaintiff recovering in this action. The defendants are estopped from denying his being a member of their company. By the 3rd rule, "Every person shall be deemed to have agreed to become a member of the company who insures any ship or share in a ship, in pursuance of the regulations hereinafter contained." Although the plaintiff had not signed the articles as required by Rule 4, yet the defendants twice called upon him to pay contributions, and he was accepted by them as the insurer of the ship. Lindley, in summing up the cases on estoppel, says (p. 139 of The Law of Partnership, Vol. 1):—"These cases show conclusively that companies cannot, any more than individuals, take advantage of the non-observance of formalities which they have not insisted upon, and have tacitly at least dispensed with; and they show further, that if the directors of a company, in transacting such business of the company as they are authorised to transact, neglect to observe the formalities prescribed by the regulations of the company, and treat an informal act as a formal one, and thereby induce others to do the same, the company is estopped from afterwards disputing the validity of what has been treated as valid by all parties." [LUSH, J.—Besides, if the defendants enter into a policy of insurance with a non-member, why should they not pay?] Another defence is based on Rule 63 of the articles, which requires certain formalities upon the sale of a ship. What was done in this case was a mere transfer of the legal interest, the equitable interest being in the plaintiff before. [BLACKBURN, J.—That rule does not seem to touch this transaction.] Another defence is raised upon Rules 39, 83, and 84, and it is contended that, however right the plaintiff may be, he cannot enforce his claim by action, but in the first place the case finds that the plaintiff had no notice of the directors' meetings. [BLACKBURN, J.—Notice to Davies was notice to plaintiff, and Davies was present.] In the next place, no contract is valid which ousts the jurisdiction of the Superior Courts. [BLACKBURN, J.—Is not the adoption of the course provided merely a condition precedent to an action?] The words of Rule 39 are absolute; "the decision of the directors shall be final and conclusive as well upon the society as the members thereof; and no member of the society shall be allowed to bring or have any action, suit, or proceeding, or other remedy against the society or the members thereof, for any claims or demands upon or in respect of the society or the members thereof, except as is provided by these presents." The principle of law was laid down in Scott v. Avery (5 H. L. Cas. 811), that parties cannot by contract oust the courts of their jurisdiction; but any person may contract that no right of action shall accrue till a third person has decided on any difference that may arise between himself and the other party to the covenant. In that case the decision of arbitrators, who were to ascertain the sum to be paid to an insurer for loss, was declared a condition precedent to the maintaining of an action; and it was held that was a lawful condition. Subsequent cases have also gone to increase the exceptions to the principle, but none of them have been decided on words so clearly ousting the jurisdiction as these do. The strongest case of exception is Elliott v. The Royal Exchange Assurance Company (L. Rep. 2 Ex. 237), where a covenant in a policy of fire insurance provided that "in case any difference shall arise touching any loss or damage, such difference shall be submitted to arbitrators,

EDWARDS v. ABERAYRON MUTUAL SHIP INSURANCE SOCIETY (LIMITED).

whose award in writing shall be conclusive and binding on all parties; but if there shall appear any fraud or false swearing, the claimant shall forfeit all benefit of his claim." Bramwell, B., dissented from the conclusion of the majority, that this was only a covenant to pay the adjusted loss, and that the plaintiff had no cause of action. The article in this case goes further than that; and if it prevents this action, it will render the decision of the directors final on the question of whether the ship was lost. Before Scott v. Avery, the cases are still more opposed to any effect being given to such an answer to an action as this. In Thompson v. Charnock (8 T. Rep. 139), it was held that to a covenant in a deed, made for the performance of several matters, the defendant cannot plead that in the deed there is a covenant that in case any difference should arise between the parties respecting any part of the agreement, it should be settled by three arbitrators, and that he offered to refer the matter in dispute, but that the plaintiff refused. The previous cases were all discussed, and Lord Kenyon afterwards said: "It is not necessary now to say how this point ought to be determined if it were res integra, it having been decided again and again that an agreement to refer all matters in difference to arbitration is not sufficient to oust the courts of law or equity of their jurisdiction." The covenant in Horton v. Sayer, (4 H. & N. 643), was held to be an absolute agreement to oust the Superior Courts of their jurisdiction, and therefore void; the form of it was very similar to this, except that it did not constitute so absolute an agreement to oust the jurisdiction; it was that if any difference, variance, controversy, doubt, or question should arise between the parties touching or concerning any covenant, clause, proviso, matter, or thing in the said indenture of lease contained, then all and every such matter in difference should be discussed, resolved, and finally ended by arbitrators chosen as therein provided, and that the parties should not prosecute any suit or seek any remedy either in law or equity for relief in the premises without first submitting to such arbitration and reference. In Roper v. Lendon (1 E. & E. 825), an agreement to resort to arbitration was held to be merely collateral to the agreement to pay. Lord Campbell said: "The court will not, therefore, treat the agreement to refer as ousting their jurisdiction until there has been a reference. The distinction between the present case, and cases like Scott v. Avery is plainly pointed out in the judgment there delivered in the House of Lords. The present case does not fall within that decision, and the defendant could have enforced the agreement to refer only by an application under the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, s. 11." Here the words of the 39th article neither express a collateral agreement nor make a reference a condition precedent to an action; they absolutely oust the jurisdiction of the courts. [BLACKBURN, J.—Tredwen v. Holman (1 H. & C. 72), seems to be very like this case. That was an action for a total loss against a Mutual Marine Insurance Association, one of the rules of which was that all average claims and claims of abandonment should be adjusted and settled by arbitration, the award to be final, and that no action at law should be brought until the arbitrators had given their decision. It was held that no action could be maintained on the policy for a total loss until the claim had been adjusted and settled by arbitration in pursuance of the rule.] That clause made arbitration a condition precedent to an action, but here all action is excluded entirely. If this article is held to be a bar to legal proceedings, the court will be going beyond any case hitherto decided. At all events the resolution of the directors to be a binding decision must have been upon notice to the plaintiff. [BLACKBURN J.—If resort to the directors and the general company is a condition precedent, it cannot matter to you whether there was an improper decision or none at all. At all events there has been no appeal to a general meeting.]

B. T. Williams (with Lush) for defendants.—No interpretation has been put upon these words, "risk or adventure," in the Stamp Act 1867; but if the court consider this form of policy sufficient I will not press the objection. [BLACKBURN, J.—It is manifestly a dishonourable point to take, and the proceeding is aggravated by the point being untenable.] With regard to the plaintiff being entitled to recover, the case finds that his name appears on all the documents issuing from the company only as ship's husband: until after the loss the defendants had no information of any other interest he had in the ship. The insurance was effected by Davies. [BLACKBURN, J.—But two contributions were claimed upon and made by the plaintiff; the defendants are therefore estopped from denying his interest, and from taking advantage of any informality.] The important point, no doubt, is as to the decision of the directors. This 39th article contains an important condition of the formation of the society; it would be impossible to transact their business without an arrangement for settling the claims and disputes of the members. [BLACKBURN, J.—You may take it that the policy and the rules are to be read together, and also that it was in the defendants' power to make their mode of reference a condition precedent to this action; the question is whether it is so made by this rule.] By section 84 two appeals are given to a member dissatisfied with the first decision of the directors, and for this reason the cases relied on by the plaintiff have no application. Further, Tredwen v. Holman is exactly in point.

Digby in reply.—In all the cases where arbitration has been held to be a condition precedent to an action, it has been so stated in the agreement e. g., Braunstein v. Accidental Death Assurance Company (1 B. & S. 782). Here, on the contrary, the 39th rule distinctly provides that there shall be no appeal to any other tribunal than the directors.

BLACKBURN, J.—I think in this case, on the whole our judgment must be in favour of the defendants, and a nonsuit must be entered. There are four points which have been raised.

As to the first, we think this is a time policy, which is not affected by this provision of the Stamp Act. The point ought not to have been raised by the defendants, and is, moreover, a bad one.

The second point is raised upon the articles of association, which are incorporated into the contract, by the references to them on the policy. The memorandum of association states the objects for which the company was established to be the mutual insurance of ships belonging to members of the company; and the fourth article requires persons, before they become members, to sign the articles. Now, it appears that the plaintiff had an equitable interest in the ship, but his name was not entered on the register; Davies, the registered owner, acting for the plaintiff, effected this insurance with the defendants in his own name. The company made calls yearly upon the members, and twice the plaintiff was asked for and made payments for calls. The second point was that the plaintiff never having signed the articles of association was not a member, and therefore had no contract with the defendants; but the answer is, the defendants by their claiming calls upon the plaintiff, and receiving payment from him as owner of the ship, are estopped from saying that he is not a member.

EDWARDS v. ABERAYRON MUTUAL SHIP INSURANCE SOCIETY (LIMITED).

The third point is that, by the 63rd article, even if the plaintiff were at any time a member of the society, he forfeited his rights by the transfer of the legal interest in the ship to him by Davies, and his neglect afterwards to take the steps required. That article, however, only relates to when any member of the society shall sell any vessel, or shares of any vessel, insured by the society; and, to my mind, this transfer of the legal interest was no such sale of the ship.

These three points we determine in favour of the plaintiff, but the fourth must go the other way.

Amongst the rules of the society incorporated in the contract are the 39th, 83rd, and 84th; by the first of these the directors are empowered to execute contracts, "and to adjust, settle and decide all claims or demands upon the society by the members thereof; or to decide and determine all disputes, controversies and matters arising between the society and members of the society concerning insurances or claims upon, or liabilities by or to the society, and concerning the laws, rules, regulations, and bye-laws of the society; and the decision of the directors shall be final and conclusive, as well upon the society as the members thereof;" then comes the clause, the effect of which we must decide as bearing upon this fourth objection—"and no member of the society shall be allowed to bring or have an action, suit, or proceeding, or other remedy against the society or the members thereof for any claims or demands upon or in respect of the society or the members thereof, except as is provided by these presents." Further on the article provides that "the directors may, if they shall think fit, cause any of such claims and demands, and the amount to be paid to any member of the society to be submitted and referred to the decision of any person practising as an average adjuster of marine assurances," who shall hear evidence;" and in every such case the decision or award of such average adjuster, shall be final and conclusive on the society and claimant, and every person interested in such claim, and no appeal shall be allowed therefrom." Article 83 provides for the investigation of any loss by the directors, and their decision thereon. And by the following Article 84, if any member be dissatisfied with a decision of the directors, he may procure ten members of the society to join in a written requisition to the directors to reconsider and revise such decision, and if dissatisfied with the directors' further decision, he may, if twenty members will join him in a requisition, obtain the decision of a special general meeting of the society, which shall be final and binding as well upon the society as upon all parties interested in the decision.

Taking these provisions together, what did the parties who formed the society really mean by them? Scott v. Avery decided that an agreement to refer a disputed amount of claim did not necessarily mean to oust the courts' jurisdiction, and was not, therefore void; but if it was intended that no action should lie except for the amount which must be previously fixed by an arbitrator, a reference was made a condition precedent only, and the agreement was valid; in which case the action must fail unless the amount of claim has been fixed by arbitration. Here the articles say an aggrieved member may, with the help of ten others, go to the directors a second time, and if he likes he may, with the help of twenty others, take the opinion of a general meeting. It seems to me that the members of this Mutual Insurance Society have agreed that all these steps shall be taken before a member shall resort to law or equity. I think the case of Tredwen v. Holman is very near this, and the decision is applicable here. The special case finds that the plaintiff has not exhausted all the power to appeal provided by the 84th article, and therefore the present action will not lie. I see nothing to prevent the plaintiff from now going to a general meeting of the society, nor from obtaining a reconsideration of what is now admitted to have been a wrong decision of the directors.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. Mr. Digby has disposed successfully of all points except the last. Tredwen v. Holman is, I think, applicable to that point, and rightly decided. It is quite competent to a society for mutual insurance to agree to do their utmost to settle their own differences. The language of these rules is somewhat obscure, and there is some difficulty in collecting its meaning; but I think the members must have intended to require a reference, first to the directors again, and then to a general meeting, as a condition precedent to action. The plaintiff was bound to abide by those rules, and therefore a nonsuit must be entered. I agree with my brother Blackburn. that now it has been discovered there really was a loss of the ship, the decision of the directors ought to be reconsidered.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with what has been said on the first three points, and I have, especially, no doubt that after what has occurred, the defendants are estopped from disputing the plaintiff's being a member of the company. The real question in the case is what was the nature of the contract concerning the settlement of differences. I think that the articles do not form an absolute agreement to oust the jurisdiction of the courts, but merely impose the condition of appealing first to the two tribunals of their own, before a member can resort to litigation against the society. I agree that there seems to be nothing to prevent now the appeal to a general meeting which the plaintiff has omitted.

THE LEMINGTON.

[ADM.]

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Monday, Nov. 30, 1874.

THE LEMINGTON.

Collision—Ship wholly under control of charterers—Proceeding in rem—Liability of the res.

A ship chartered by her owners so that the whole control and management of ship and crew are vested in the charterers, is liable in a proceeding in rem for damage done to another ship by the negligence of her crew, although they are the charterer's servants. (a)

This was a cause of collision instituted on behalf of the owners of the steamship Conservator against the steam wherry Lemington, and her owner intervening. The petition, so far as is material, was as follows:—

1. At a little after 4 a.m., on the 23rd July 1874, the screw steamship Conservator, of 580 tons' register, was lying in the locks of the Tyne Dock, moored fore and aft to the quay.

2. At such time the above-named vessel Lemington drove against, and with her stern struck the Conservator on her starboard side, between the bridge and the fore rigging, and did her considerable damage.

3. The said collision was occasioned by the Lemington having been insufficiently and insecurely moored or fastened, and otherwise by the neglect of those in charge of her, to take proper measures for keeping her clear of the Conservator.

The answer filed by the defendants alleged that the Lemington was a screw wherry of about forty tons, and was manned by a crew of two hands, one Joseph Forster being master, and one Edward Forster engineer; and the collision was occasioned by neglect of the dock master of the Tyne Dock in casting of the Lemington's mooring ropes and opening the sluices of the dock, and that the dock master was in charge under the Harbour, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847, and so far as the Lemington was concerned, the collision was an inevitable accident; the second and sixth articles of the answer were as follows:

2. At the time of the said collision, and for some time previously, the Lemington was and had been let by the defendants to, and hired from the defendants, by the said Joseph Forster, for the purpose of carrying cargo on the river Tyne, under an agreement by which the said Joseph Forster agreed to and did pay to the defendants one-fifth part of the gross earnings of the said wherry, and all disbursements and expenses incurred and connected with the management, working, employment, and navigation of the said wherry were agreed to be and were paid by the said Joseph Forster, and the said Joseph Forster had absolute control over the management, working, employment, and voyages of the said wherry, and over the navigation of the said wherry during the said voyages; and the wherry was not in any way under the control of the defendants during the said letting and hiring, and the said Joseph Forster, in the said management, working, employment, and navigation acted on his own behalf as principal, and not in any way as agent or servant of the defendants in that behalf.

(a) It being a fact in the case that the Lemington was not a seagoing vessel, it was contended on behalf of the defendants that no maritime lien attached for damage done by her, because, previous to 3 and 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, the High Court had no jurisdiction within the body of a county, and that consequently there was no maritime lien enforceable by the law of England for damage done within the body of a county, and that the above Act gave no maritime lien for such damage, and if there were no such lien there was only a personal liability, and the owners were not personally responsible for the negligent acts of other persons' servants. The learned judge, however, held that the point was not sufficiently raised upon the pleadings, and refused to entertain it. He at the same time declined to express any opinion upon it either one way or the other.—Ed.

6. The Lemington was not under the management or control of the defendants, so as to render them liable for any loss or damage sustained by the plaintiffs in the said collision.

The plaintiffs now moved the court to reject the second and sixth articles of the answer, upon the ground that they disclosed no ground of defence to the action, and were irrelevant.

E. C. Clarkson, in support of the motion.—Assuming the facts stated in the second article of the answer to be true, the Lemington was in effect chartered to Joseph Forster so as to be actually demised to him for the time being. The question then arises, does a ship so chartered continue to be responsible for damage done negligently whilst she is in the possession of the charterer. I admit that the owners would not be personally responsible, but I submit that the demise of the ship does not take away the responsibility of the res. A maritime lien attaches to a ship for damage done through the negligence of those who are in charge of the ship, unless they are acting unlawfully or out of the scope of their authority. This lien cannot be displaced by means of chartering the ship, otherwise every owner would entirely avoid liability by demising his vessel to another person. Although this question has never been decided formally, Dr. Lushington has clearly intimated his opinion on it in The Ticonderoga (Swab. 215); that case was a cause of damage instituted against a vessel which was chartered to the French Government during the Crimean war, and by the terms of the charter-party she was bound to employ a particular tug for towage purposes, and the tug whilst towing her, negligently brought her into collision with the plaintiff's vessel, and the owners of the Ticonderoga sought to contest the liability of their ship upon the ground that the negligence was not that of those on board the Ticonderoga, but of the steamer attached to her, which was not in any sense her servant; Dr. Lushington there said: "Supposing a vessel is chartered so that the owners have divested themselves, for a pecuniary consideration, of all power, right, and authority over the vessel for a given time, and have left to the charterers the appointment of the master and crew, and suppose in that case the vessel had done damage and was proceeded against in this court—I will admit, for the purpose of argument, that the charterers and not the owners would be responsible elsewhere, although I give no opinion upon that point—but still I should say here to the parties who had received the damage, that they had by the maritime law of nations, a remedy against the ship itself;" and it was held that the Ticonderoga was liable for the acts of the tug. Again, in The Ruby Queen (Lush. 266), a yacht, doing damage through the negligence of the servants of a yachting agent in whose hands she had been placed for sale, was held liable in rem. Owners cannot divest their ships of liability by any voluntary acts of their own, and the possession of charterers is the possession of the owners where a question of liability for acts of negligence occurring in the ordinary course of the ship's employment arises. When a maritime line once attaches to a ship, it cannot be got rid of by change of ownership; consequently, when the owners resume possession of their ship out of the hands of the charterers—as they have done for the purposes of this case by appearing as owners absolutely—they take it back subject to the lien which attaches to it. The charterers are nothing else but pro hac vice owners, and their acts as owners bind the ship. The charterers must be in the position either of agents for the owners or of absolute owners for the time being, and in either case their acts will render the ship responsible.

James P. Aspinall, for the defendants, in support of the answer.—It being admitted that the defendants would not be liable in an action in personam for the damage sustained by the plaintiffs, the only question is, whether their ship is liable in a proceeding in rem in respect of that damage. To give a right of proceeding in rem against the ship, as apart from the right of proceeding in personam against the owners, the plaintiffs must have a maritime lien upon the ship for the damage done; otherwise the proceedings in rem would be a mere process of the court to enforce a personal liability which does not exist. It was decided in The Bold Buccleugh (7 Moore P. C. C. 267), that a ship damaging another in collision is subject in respect of that damage to a maritime lien, which travels with the thing into whosoever possession it may come, but that decision only applies to cases where the lien has attached. In this case, I submit, that no lien has attached upon this ship. No lien attaches upon a vessel for damage done, unless that damage is done by the default of persons who are at the time of the damage the owners or their servants, and so done that the owners would be personally responsible for what is done. A lien which has attached to a vessel before it comes into the possession of owners, no doubt continues whilst in their possession; but if damage be done whilst they are owners, their ship is only responsible if they themselves would be responsible in an action in personam. In The Druid (1 W. Rob. 392, 398), Dr. Lushington says: "Now in some cases it is obvious that a ship may be liable where the owners would not be personally responsible, as, for instance, in cases of lien upon a ship for seamen's wages or bottomry bonds, when the lien has been acquired before the existing owners made their purchase. Against such liabilities the purchasers must protect themselves by caution or by contract at the time of sale, as against the enforcement of the outstanding lien in a proceeding against the ship, in this court they would have no legal defence upon the plea that the existence of the lien was unknown to them at the time the purchase was effected. Again, it might possibly be that an innocent purchaser may be liable to have his ship arrested and sold for the payment of damages in a case where the former owners would have been responsible, and the damage was occasioned before the purchase was made; but upon this point I give no opinion whatever. In the case above mentioned, it is to be remembered that the liability must be assumed to have attached upon the ship prior to the time when the ownership rested in the existing owners. In all the causes of action which may arise from circumstances occurring during the ownership of the persons whose ship is proceeded against, I apprehend that no suit could ever be maintained against a ship where the owners were not themselves personally liable, or where their personal liability had not being given up, as in bottomry bonds, by taking a lien on the vessel. The liability of the ship, and the responsibility of the owners in such cases, are convertible terms. The ship is not liable if the owners are not responsible; and vice versa, no responsibility can attach upon the owners if the ship is exempt, and not liable to be proceeded against." The collision here complained of occurred during the ownership of the defendants, and it is conceded that they are not personally liable; hence it follows from The Druid that their ship is not liable. It is true that in the case of The Druid the master was acting illegally, as well as out of the scope of his authority; but in The Orient (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 321) it was held that an agent for the completion and sale of a ship, who, acting out of the scope of his authority, had placed the ship into a certain position to assert his own right to foreshore, and had so damaged another vessel, was not the agent of the owners for that purpose, and did not by his act render the vessel liable; in that case there was no illegality; simply an unauthorised act of an agent, and yet the ship was not responsible, and clearly upon the ground that there was no personal responsibility on the part of the owners. The cases cited by the plaintiff cannot be taken as overruling the considered judgment in The Druid and the judgment in The Orient. Moreover, they are distinguishable upon two grounds: First, that they are really not decisions upon the point now under discussion; secondly, because they relate to cases in which the person doing the damage was an agent of the shipowner, whilst in the present case there was no such agency. The Ticonderoga (Swabey, 217) is not a decision in point; what was said in that case, as to ships in the hands of charterers, was entirely an obiter dictum, and had nothing to do with the decision which proceeded upon the ground that the shipowner, by entering into the charter-party, had undertaken voluntarily to employ as his servant, and to assist him in performing his contract, a tug named by the French Government, and that the ship was responsible for the negligence of that tug. But I submit that even that ground of decision is erroneous; the mere voluntary entering into an agreement, which obliges a shipowner to obey the orders of another person, will not render him responsible for the acts of that other person: an owner whose ship is chartered to the British Government as a transport, and is bound to obey the orders of the officer in command of a transport fleet, is not responsible for damage done through obeying the orders of that officer; (Hodgkinson v. Fernie, 2 C. B., N. S. 415.) The Ticonderoga does not apply in any way to the present case, save in so far as it expresses an unnecessary opinion, and that opinion is in direct contradiction to the considered judgment in The Druid (ubi sup.) The Ruby Queen (Lush. 266) is wrong upon the same grounds, and, moreover, the question of liability in rem was not raised upon the pleadings, and only arose incidentally, and the court declined to entertain it at the hearing upon that ground.

The charterers, in such a case as the present, are not in any sense the agents of the shipowners, but they rather hold the position of independent contractors who undertake the whole management and working of the ship, free from the control of the owners; for such contractors the shipowners cannot be held responsible, even through their ship. In the case of towage contracts the general rule in this country is that the tow is responsible for the negligence of the tug, but that proceeds upon the ground that the tug remains during the performance of the service under the control of the master or pilot of the tug, and is obliged to obey his orders. But in a case where a tug is voluntarily employed by shipowners to tow their vessel under such circumstances that the tug has the absolute control over the navigation of both tug and tow, and in fact acted as both tug and pilot, I submit that the tow would not be liable for the negligence of the tug. In The American and the Syria (31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 42; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 350) it was held that a disabled steamship, towed by another in such a manner that the "governing power" was wholly in the towing ship, was not liable for the negligence of the towing ship, and several American cases holding this doctrine were approved. In The Owners of the brig James Gray v. The Owners of the ship John Fraser and the steamer General Clinch (21 Howard U. S. Sup. Ct. Rep. 184) it appeared that the brig was at anchor in harbour, and the ship coming into harbour in tow of the steam tug ran into her, and it was found that the collision was occasioned by the sole default of the steamer, and that the steamer was not under the control of the ship; the proceedings were in rem against the ship and steam tug. It is there said by the court: "It is true that the John Fraser was the res, or thing which struck the James Gray, and did the damage. But the mere fact that one vessel strikes and damages another does not of itself make her liable for the injury; the collision must in some degree be occasioned by her fault. . . . And as this collision was forced upon the James Fraser by the controlling power and mismanagement of the steam tug, and not by any fault or negligence on her part, she ought not to be answerable for the consequences." In Sturgis v. Boyer (24 Howard, 110, 121), which was also a proceeding in rem, it appeared that a ship was negligently towed into a lighter by a tug, which had the sole control over her for the purpose of removing her from one part of a harbour to another, the crew of the ship not being on board; it is there said: "Cases arise, undoubtedly, where both the tow and tug are jointly liable for the consequences of a collision; as when those in charge of the respective vessels jointly participate in their control and management, and the master or crew of both vessels are either deficient in skill, omit to take due care, or are guilty of negligence in their navigation. Other cases may well be imagined when the tow alone would be responsible, as where the tug is employed by the master or owners of the tow as the mere motive power to propel their vessels from one point to another, and both vessels are exclusively under the control, direction, and management of the master and crew of the tow. Fault in that case cannot be imputed to the tug, provided she was properly equipped and seaworthy for the business in which she was engaged; and if she was the property of third persons, her owners cannot be held responsible for the want of skill, negligence, or mismanagement of the master and crew of the other vessel, for the reason that they are not the agents of the owners of the tug, and her owners in the case supposed do not sustain towards those intrusted with the navigation of the vessel the relation of principal. But whenever the tug, under the charge of her own master and crew, and in the ordinary course of such employment, undertakes to transport another vessel, which, for the time being, has neither her master nor crew on board, from one point to another over waters where such accessory motive power is necessary or usually employed, she must be held responsible for the proper navigation of both vessels; and third persons suffering damage through the fault of those in charge of the vessels must, under such circumstances, look to the tug, her masters or owners, for the recompense which they are entitled to claim for any injuries that vessels or cargo may receive by such means. . . . Vessels engaged in commerce are held liable for damage occasioned by collision, on account of the complicity, direct or indirect, of their owners, or the negligence, want of care or skill on the part of those employed in their navigation. Owners appoint the master and employ the crew, and, consequently, are held responsible for their conduct in the management of the vessel. Whenever, therefore, a culpable fault is committed, whereby a collision ensues, that fault is imputed to the owners, and the vessel is just as liable for the consequences as if it had been committed by the owner himself. No such consequences follow, however, when the person committing the fault does not, in fact or by implication of law, stand in relation of agent to the owners. Unless the owner and the person or persons in charge of the vessel in some way sustain towards each other the relation of principal and agent, the injured party cannot have his remedy against the colliding vessel. By employing a tug to transport their vessel from one point to another, the owners of the tow do not necessarily constitute the master and crew of the tug their agents in performing the service. They neither appoint the master of the tug or ship the crew; nor can they displace either the one or the other. Their contract for the service, even though it was negotiated with the master, is, in legal contemplation, made with the owners of the vessel, and the master of the tug, notwithstanding the contract was negotiated with him, continues to be the agent of the owners of his own vessel, and they are responsible for his acts in her navigation: (Sproul v. Hemmingway, 14 Pickering, 1; 1 Parsons on Maritime Law, 208; The brig James Gray v. The John Fraser, et al., 21 How. 184). . . . Without repeating the testimony, it will be sufficient to say that it clearly appears in this case that those in charge of the steam tug had the exclusive control, direction, and management of both vessels, and there is not a word of proof in the record either that the tug was not a suitable vessel to perform the service for which she was employed, or that anyone belonging to the ship either participated in the navigation or was guilty of any degree of negligence whatever in the premises." If, then, a tug having the sole control of a ship she is towing is not the agent of the ship-owners so as to render their ship liable for damage done by the ship through the negligence of the tug, charterers having the sole control of the ship they hire are equally not the agents of the owners of the ship, and cannot by their negligent acts render the ship responsible. There can be no distinction between persons controlling a ship by a motive power outside of her, and persons controlling her by means of her own motive force; if owners by their ship are not responsible for the acts of persons they employ to render towage services they cannot be responsible for the acts of persons who are in no way employed by them, but who are wholly independent of their control,

THE LEMINGTON.

I submit that the second paragraph of the answer shows a good defence to the action.

E. C. Clarkson in reply.—The Druid (ubi sup.) was a decision proceeding upon the peculiar circumstances of the case; besides when Dr. Lushington spoke of "owners" he must be taken to have meant not merely the actual owners, but pro hac vice owners, that is to say, persons whom the owners allow to be in position of owners for a reward to themselves. If the owners are damned by this suit they will have their remedy over against the charterers. The American tug cases are distinguishable because there either tug or tow was responsible, and there was therefore a res to satisfy the damage done; here, however, if the ship is not liable for the act of the charterers there will be no res as security for the plaintiffs and the defendant cannot deprive the plaintiffs of their security by chartering their vessel.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I think the law was correctly laid down by Dr. Lushington, and the elaborate and ingenious argument of Mr. Aspinall has not availed to convince me that I ought to come to a decision at variance with that given in the case of The Ticonderoga (ubi sup.).

The words of Dr. Lushington in that case are these:—"We must recollect that this is a proceeding in rem. I am not aware, where there has been any proceeding in rem, and the vessel so proceeded against has been clearly guilty of damage, that any attempt has been made in this court to deprive the party complaining of the right he has by the maritime law of the world of proceeding against the property itself?" This is the language in the year 1857 of that learned and experienced judge, and must be taken to be his deliberate opinion upon the law applicable to the subject. He goes on to say as if anticipating this very case: "Supposing a vessel is chartered so that the owners have divested themselves, for a pecuniary consideration, of all power, right, and authority over the vessel for a given time, and have left to the charterers the appointment of the master and crew, and suppose in that case the vessel had done damage, and was proceeded against in this court—I will admit, for the sake of argument, that the charterers, and not the owners, would be responsible elsewhere, although I give no opinion upon that point;—but still I should say to the parties who had received the damage, that they had, by the maritime law of nations, a remedy against the ship itself." Then Dr. Lushington refers to the case of compulsory pilotage as being the only case in which a vessel is exempt from the damage he has inflicted, on the ground that the pilot, being forced on the owners by compulsion, is by implication of law not the latter's servant; and then he says: "It is impossible to contend that because a person has entered into a voluntary contract, by which he is finally led into mischief, that that can relieve him from making good the damage he has done.

It is true that in The Druid (ubi sup.), Dr. Lushington said, "the liability of the ship and the responsibility of the owners are convertible terms. The ship is not liable if the owners are not responsible. And vice versa no responsibility can attach upon the owners if the ship is exempt and not liable to be proceeded against." In that case however it should be remembered that the learned judge was dealing with damage done by the ship through the act of a mere servant or agent acting not only without authority but unlawfully. And moreover the true interpretation of the general proposition of law, there laid down, depends very much upon the sense in which the word "owners" is used. A vessel placed by its real owners wholly in the control of charterers or hirers, and employed by the latter for the lawful purposes of the hiring, is held by the charterers as pro hac vice owners. Damage wrongfully done by the res whilst in possession of the charterers is, therefore, damage done by "owners" or their servants, although those owners may be only temporary. Vessels suffering damage from a chartered ship are entitled prima facie to a maritime lien upon that ship, and look to the res as security for restitution. I cannot see how the owners of the res can take away that security by having temporarily transferred the possession to third parties. A maritime lien attaches to a ship for damage done, through the negligence of those in charge of her in whosoever possession she may be, if that damage is inflicted by her whilst in the course of her ordinary and lawful employment, authorised by her owners. Whether the damage is done through the default of the servants of the actual owners, or of the servants of the chartering owners, the res is equally responsible, provided that the servant making default is not acting unlawfully, or out of the scope of his authority. I am of opinion that the second and sixth articles of the answer must be struck out.

THE MAGNET.

THE DUKE OF SUTHERLAND.

THE FANNY M. CARVILL.

Collision—Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85) s. 17—Infringement of regulation for preventing collisions at sea—Materiality to case—Lights—Visibility of—Obstruction of—Screens.

A ship, to be deemed in fault under the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85) sect. 17, for having infringed any of the regulations for preventing collisions, must have infringed those regulations in such a manner that the infringement is material to the case before the court, and is such as might by possibility have caused or contributed to the particular collision; a mere infringement which by no possibility could have anything to do with the collision, will not render the ship liable.

A ship carrying side lights which are visible only at the distance of about a mile, instead of at a distance of two miles, as required by the regulations, infringes those regulations so as to make her liable to be deemed in fault under the statute.

Semble, that a ship carrying such lights must be deemed in fault, whether the deficiency of the light did or did not contribute to the collision.

Semble, that where lights are so fixed that they are partly obscured from a particular point right ahead by the catheads of a ship carrying them, but are visible both above and below the catheads, there is no such infringement within the statute as will render the ship liable in a collision with another ship approaching broad on the starboard bow of the former.

THE MAGNET; THE DUKE OF SUTHERLAND; THE FANNY M. CARVILL.

The regulation as to the length of the screens of the ship's side lights, being for the purpose of preventing those lights from being seen across the bows of the ship carrying them, and being merely subsidiary for the purpose of securing the visibility of each distinct light, a ship carrying screens shorter than these required by the regulations, is not guilty of any infringement within the meaning of the Act, if the lights are not, in fact, seen across her bows, and it is shown that by reason of the construction of the ship, she could not have carried large screens with safety.

A steamer seeing lights close ahead of her, carried by some ship, and being unable to make out those lights, or the course of the ship carrying them, should slacken speed until she is able to ascertain the meaning of the lights, and to avoid the vessel carrying them.

THESE were three causes of collision, in which the main question was the construction of the 17th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85). By that Act (sect. 33), the 29th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. 3. 63), the section which enforces the observance of the regulation for preventing collisions at sea, is repealed, and the following enactment is substituted therefor:—

Sect. 17.—If in any case of collision it was proved to the court before which the case is tried, that any of the regulations for preventing collision, contained or made under the Merchant Shipping Acts, 1854 to 1873, has been infringed, the ship by which such regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made a departure from the regulation necessary.

THE MAGNET.

This was a cause of damage instituted on behalf of the owners of the Swedish bark Eugenie, against the British steamship Magnet and her owner intervening.

The case on behalf of the barque was, as appeared by their petition, as follows:—At about 12.30 a.m. on the 15th Nov. 1874, the Eugenie, a barque of 398 tons English measurement, bound upon a voyage from Liverpool to Buenos Ayres with cargo, was about four or five miles to the eastward of the north-west lightship, off the entrance of the river Mersey. The wind was about N.W. by W., a strong breeze, the tide was flood, the weather was dark and rainy, and the Eugenie was close hauled on the port tack, heading N by E, and going about eight knots an hour. Her proper regulation lights were duly exhibited and burning brightly, and a good look out was kept. At such time the mast head and green lights of two steamships, about a quarter of a mile apart, were seen at the distance of about two miles from the Eugenie, and bearing broad on her port bow. The Eugenie was kept close hauled on the port tack, and the headmost of the two steamers passed clear ahead of her, but the sternmost one, which proved to be the Magnet, instead of taking proper measures for keeping out of the way of the Eugenie, improperly attempted to pass ahead of her, and rendered a collision inevitable, and, although the helm of the Eugenie was put up to ease the blow, the Magnet with her starboard side came into violent collision with the port bow of the Eugenie. The Magnet subsequently towed the Eugenie into the Mersey. The allegations of negligence against the Magnet were that she improperly neglected to keep out of the way of the Eugenie; that she improperly attempted to go ahead of the Eugenie; and that the Magnet did not duly observe and comply with the provisions of Article 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

The case on behalf of the Magnet appeared in the defendant's answer, which, so far as is material, was as follows:—

1. The Magnet is a screw steamer belonging to the port of Dublin, of the registered tonnage of 378 tons. A little before 0.40 a.m. on the 15th day of November, 1874, the Magnet, navigated by a crew of 20 hands, all told, was proceeding in the prosecution of a voyage from Dublin to Liverpool between the North-West Lightship and the Bar Lightship.

2. There was fresh breeze from the North-West, with thick cloudy weather and showers of rain, and a heavy sea was running. The Magnet was proceeding at full speed, heading about East South East, having her regulation lights duly exhibited and burning brightly, and a look-out being kept on board her.

3. At the time and under the circumstances aforesaid, those on board the Magnet observed a faint glimmer or reflection of a ship's light a little on the starboard bow of the Magnet, but it immediately disappeared. The master of the Magnet supposed the light to be the light of a vessel proceeding in the same direction as the Magnet, and yawing in the heavy sea, and he ordered the helm of the Magnet to be starboarded, and the course of the Magnet was altered about a point under the starboard helm.

4. When this had been done, the port light of a vessel, which proved to be the Eugenie, suddenly opened out close to the Magnet on her starboard bow. The helm of the Magnet was immediately put hard-a-starboard, but it was too late to avoid a collision, and the two vessels came into contact, the bowsprit of the Eugenie striking the Magnet on her starboard side of the fore part of the bridge. The Eugenie dragged along the starboard side of the Magnet, tearing away the rails, bulwarks, and davits of the Magnet, and causing other damage to her.

5. The Eugenie neglected to have her side lights properly exhibited, according to the regulations in force for preventing collisions at sea, and was in fault for such neglect.

6. The said collision was occasioned by the negligence of those on board the Eugenie.

7. The said collision was not occasioned or contributed to by any negligence of those on board the Magnet.

8. The allegations contained in the petition save as admitted by this answer are denied.

Dec. 19, 1874.—The cause came on for hearing before the judge, assisted by Trinity masters. The case stated by the plaintiffs in their petition was substantiated by their evidence. The plaintiffs' witnesses were chiefly cross-examined with a view to show that their lights were defective.

The defendants' witnesses proved the facts stated in their answer. In cross-examination the master and mate of the Magnet admitted that the glimmer of the lights of the Eugenie, mentioned in the pleadings, was seen from half to three quarters of a mile away on the Magnet's starboard bow, and that no step, except starboarding a point, was then taken to get out of the way of the Eugenie, the master of the Magnet believing the Eugenie to be going in the same direction as himself, and yawing about. As the Magnet was going ten knots and the Eugenie eight knots, and the vessels going nearly at right angles to each other, the time between the sighting of the Eugenie's light and the collision, was not more than three minutes. The defendants called two Board of Trade surveyors who had inspected the Eugenie's lights after the collision; they gave evidence as to the position and as to the visibility of the lights. As to the visibility, they said that the lights were deficient;

THE MAGNET; THE DUKE OF SUTHERLAND; THE FANNY M. CARVILL.

the lamps themselves were of a proper size, but by reason of the smallness of the wicks and the want of proper reflectors, the lights would not show at a greater distance than one mile from the ship; as to the position of the lights they said that the lights were fixed abaft the broadest part of the ship, and were, in consequence thereof, obscured partly by the dead eyes of the foremast backstays, and partly by the body of the ship, and could not be seen right ahead of the barque; when lights are so fixed, the Board of Trade regulations always require them to be removed; they also said that the screens were too short by six inches. The effect of this evidence is sufficiently stated in the judgment hereafter.

It was objected on behalf of the plaintiffs that the fifth article of the defendant's answer did not sufficiently apprise them that any question as to the smallness or non-visibility of the Eugenie's light would be raised, and that the Eugenie being a foreign vessel, was not subject to the new enactment. The court desired the question of the liability of the two vessels, apart from the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, to be argued before going into the construction of that statute.

Dec. 18 and 19, 1873.—Butt, Q.C. (E. C. Clarkson with him) for the plaintiffs, contended that the lights of the Eugenie were visible to the Magnet at a sufficient distance to have enabled that vessel to keep out of the way of the Eugenie, and that she was solely to blame for having neglected to keep out of the way.

Milward, Q.C. (Gainsford Bruce with him) for the defendants contended that the Eugenie was solely to blame, apart from the statute, because those on board the Magnet were entitled to have the lights of the Eugenie visible for at least two miles, and the collision was occasioned by the default of the Eugenie in not giving the Magnet the opportunity of seeing the light distinctly at a greater distance than three quarters of a mile, when owing to faintness of the light and the speed of the two vessels, sufficient time did not elapse before the collision to enable the Magnet to take the necessary steps to keep out of the way of the Eugenie.

Butt, Q.C., in reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE, after shortly stating the facts:—The steamer was clearly bound to keep out of the way of the sailing vessel. The steamer has admitted that she saw the glimmer of a light about two points on her starboard bow, about half a mile or three-quarters distant, and she seems to have continued her course and to have gone at the same speed without taking any precaution to ascertain what the glimmer was by easing or stopping, or taking any precautions at all to get out of the way on seeing the glimmer, as she says, about half a mile off on her starboard bow. But upon the evidence I am satisfied, first of all, that the barque carried a perfectly good port light—that is to say so far as concerns this part of the case—and that it was visible at least a mile off. Upon that point I think that there can be no doubt at all, because the master of the steamer has himself very properly admitted that when he saw the light it was a very good light: and the master also said, "The light looked very well. I saw no difference between that and any other light." Whether the light came within the prescription of the regulations in the sailing rules is another question which will have to be hereafter discussed. At present I am satisfied upon the evidence, and the Elder Brethren agree with me, that the red light of the vessel ought to have been visible at least a mile off on the starboard bow of the steamer, and that she ought to have ported and got out of the way. I must therefore pronounce, so far as this part of the case is concerned, that the steamer is to blame for this collision. Whether the subsequent argument may convince me in regard to the statute and the sailing rules, that the other vessel is also to blame, I say nothing. At present I pronounce under the advice of the Trinity Masters, that the steamer is to blame for not getting out of the way of the barque.

The question of the liability of the Eugenie under the statute then came on for argument.

Milward, Q.C. and Gainsford Bruce for the defendants.—The question of fact to be considered here is not whether these lights were in accordance with the Board of Trade instructions, but whether they were in accordance with the regulations for preventing collisions which alone are of binding authority. By Arts. 3 & 5 of the regulations, sailing ships under weigh must carry side lights "so constructed as to show an uniform and unbroken light over an arc of the horizon of ten points of the compass; so fixed as to throw the light from right ahead to two points abaft the beam; and of such a character as to be visible on a dark night, with a clear atmosphere, at a distance of at least two miles;" and that the side lights "shall be fitted with inboard screens, projecting at least three feet forward from the light, so as to prevent these lights from being seen across the bow." The Merchant Shipping Act, 1862) 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), sect. 29, enacted that if it should appear that a collision "was occasioned by the non-observance of any regulation," the ship by which such regulation has been infringed should be deemed to be in fault. This enactment is repealed, and the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 has substituted for it sect. 17, by which the mere infringement of the regulation, although not occasioning the collision, renders a ship to blame. The Legislature has imposed a penalty on vessels infringing the sailing rules, the effect of which is that although their infringement does not contribute to the collision, they cannot recover anything at common law, and in this court can only recover half the damage done, if the other vessel is also to blame. An infringement, however small or minute, entails the penalty. According to the evidence, these lights were not visible from right ahead in consequence of their position in the ship; although the Magnet was broad on the port bow of the Eugenie, and this infringement could not in any way have occasioned the collision, we submit that, it being an infringement, the Eugenie must be held to blame therefor. But in addition to this the lights were not so constructed as to show a light for a distance of two miles; a mile was the longest distance they would show. This is an infringement of the regulations bearing upon this very case. In The Hibernia (ante p. 454; 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 805) the Privy Council found as a fact that the sailing vessel's lights were not burning, but that the steamer ought to and could have avoided her, and consequently that the want of lights did not contribute to the collision; it was nevertheless held that the sailing vessel was liable to be condemned, because she had no lights, and the tendency of the decision is to show that any infringement is enough to cause a vessel to be found in fault. It is admitted here that the screens are not too short. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Suppose this rule is not complied with, and yet the lights are not seen across the bow, what follows?] Even if they were an inch too short, that would be an infringement making the ship in fault. It is absurd, however, to suppose that these screens must be parallel; if they were, there would be some point between the lights from which, however far off a person might stand, he could not see the lights; the screens must incline inwards so as to allow the rays of light to meet at some point well ahead of the bow. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—But even granting that there is an infringement of the regulations which would be enough to condemn an English ship, can this affect a foreign ship?] The plaintiffs have come to this court; they have chosen their own forum, and must therefore be bound by the lex fori. The court is not asked to condemn the plaintiffs for the breach of a rule which the Legislature has made and can make binding only on British ships when outside British waters, but it is asked to condemn the ship for the breach of a rule which is of international obligation. The breach of the rule is not contested, but it is said that the consequences of that breach ought not to be visited on a foreign ship; the consequences of a breach of the law are essentially such as we prescribed by the lex fori, and this law the court must administer.

Butt, Q.C. and E. C. Clarkson for the plaintiff.—First, the section does not apply to foreign vessels. Sect. 17 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 was substituted for the 29th sect. of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, which was incorporated with the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and became part of the fourth part of that Act; by sect. 291 of the latter Act, the fourth part of the Act applies to all British ships; no mention is made of foreign ships. In the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, wherever it is intended that a section shall apply to foreign ships, the words, "any vessel British or foreign" are used. Moreover, this is a statutory penal clause, and it is out of the power of the British Legislature to impose a penalty upon a foreign ship for an act committed out of British jurisdiction. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The clause imposes a penalty, no doubt, but it is a penalty for the breach of a rule binding by international arrangement. The plaintiff has chosen to come to a court which enforces that international rule in a manner peculiar to itself. Must not the plaintiff submit to the lex fori? In The Halley (ubi sup.) it was held that although the obligation to employ a pilot in foreign waters was coupled by the foreign law with liability for his acts, the foreign law did not apply, but that the lex fori, which exempted owners from the consequences of his act, did apply. If the consequence of the act or omission in the case of pilotage is to be governed, not by the law applicable to the particular ship by the universal law, but by the lex fori, the consequence of the breach of the sailing rule must be governed by the lex fori.]

VOL. II., N.S.

The Halley was a mere question of agency; a question of responsibility for the acts of a third person; this case, however, turns upon the question whether a foreign ship can be, under a British statute, held liable for an act for which she would not be responsible, either by the common law of England, or by the maritime law of nations.

Secondly, there has been no such infringement of the rules as will render the plaintiff's ship in fault within the meaning of the statute. It is impossible to comply absolutely with the regulations as to lights; by the rules the lights must be seen from right ahead to two points abaft the beam, and at the same time they must be so screened as not to show across the bows; if this latter regulation as to screens is strictly complied with the screens ought to be parallel, so as to prevent the lights showing across the bows, but if the screens are parallel there will be some point right ahead of the vessel at which neither light can be seen, and however far off you go from the vessel, keeping that point and the vessel's bows in a line, the lights will be invisible; hence it is clear that the screens must converge on some point ahead of the vessel in order that the lights may be seen from right ahead, but this is not a strict compliance with the regulations, hence we contend that the act requires only a substantial compliance with the regulations. An infringement to bring a vessel within sect. 17 of the last Act must be a breach of the regulations which is immaterial to the cause being tried, and is material in fact or substantial; an infringement which might possibly have contributed to the collision. The section ought to be read with the former enactments. By the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), sect. 298, it was provided that if it should be proved to the court that the collision was occasioned by a non-observance of a rule, the owner of the ship by which such rule was infringed should not be entitled to recover any recompence for the damage sustained unless it was shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case rendered a departure from the rule necessary. This was repealed, and the 29th section of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, substituted therefor, and it was enacted that if the collision was occasioned by the non-observance of any regulation, the ship by which such regulation was infringed should be deemed in fault, unless, &c. The last enactment was unnecessary, as it was only expressive of the common law, and the 17th section of the Act of 1873 was no doubt intended to more strongly enforce the regulations, but it was not intended to render a ship to blame for a breach of the regulations which could by no possibility have occasioned the collision. For instance, a vessel approaching another in such a way that she could only show her port light, could not be to blame for not carrying a proper starboard light. If there has been a material infringement which might have contributed to the particular collision in question, then the ship would be within the terms of the Act, but not otherwise. In this case the light itself could not have contributed to the collision as it was visible a mile away, nor could its position as the defendant's ship approached the plaintiff's ship broad on her port bow, nor could the screens for the same reason. In the Hibernia (ubi sup.), the want of lights did contribute to the collision, and the case did not rule that where there was an infringement not contributing a vessel is to blame. The pleadings do not raise the question of inefficiency of the Eugenie's lights as to give us due notice.

Milward, Q.C., in reply.—There are no words in the Act which say that the infringement must be material or contributing to the collision. I submit that it was intended to lay down a hard and fast rule, that if a ship did not comply with the regulations she must take the consequence.

Cur. adv. vult.

THE DUKE OF SUTHERLAND.

This was a cause of collision instituted on behalf of the owners of the sailing ship Maggie Trimble against the steamship Duke of Sutherland and the London and North-Western Railway Company, her owners intervening.

According to the plaintiff's petition, the Maggie Trimble was an iron ship of 786 tons register. She left Liverpool on the 23rd Aug., 1873, bound for Valparaiso with a cargo of coal, and at about 12.30 a.m. on the 24th Aug. she was off Holyhead, proceeding on her voyage, her regulation lights being duly exhibited and burning brightly, and a good look out on board her. The wind was a moderate breeze from the south-east, and the night was fine, but dark, with a slight haze. At such time, those on board the Maggie Trimble observed, about four points on her starboard bow, at a distance of about three miles, a bright light, which proved to be the masthead light of the Duke of Sutherland, and soon afterwards the red side light of the Duke of Sutherland came into view. The Maggie Trimble was kept on her course, but the Duke of Sutherland approached her under a port helm, so as to render a collision inevitable. The helm of the Maggie Trimble was thereupon put hard down in order to ease the blow, but the Duke of Sutherland with her port paddle box struck with great violence the starboard side of the stem and starboard bow of the Maggie Trimble, and did considerable damage. The Duke of Sutherland was charged with neglect in not keeping a proper look-out, and, as a steamer, in not keeping out of the way of the Maggie Trimble.

According to the answer of the defendants, the Duke of Sutherland was a paddle-wheel steamer, of 409 tons register, and 270 horse-power nominal; she carried goods and passengers between Dublin and Holyhead, and left Dublin on Aug. 23rd, 1873, bound for Holyhead. At about 12.50 a.m. on Aug. 24th the Duke of Sutherland was in St. George's Channel, the South Slack bearing about S.E. by E., five or six miles distant. The wind was then blowing a fresh breeze from the E. by S. The Duke of Sutherland was then steering her course for Holyhead, S.E. by E. $\frac{1}{2}$ E., her speed being about twelve knots; her regulation lights were burning brightly. In those circumstances, those on board the Duke of Sutherland observed three bright lights about four points on the port bow of the Duke of Sutherland, and took them to indicate a vessel in tow of a steamer going the other way, and while examining them, made out that they were being carried by a ship under sail, which turned out to be the Maggie Trimble. The Maggie Trimble was then close under the port bow of the Duke of Sutherland, but no other lights were sighted on board the Maggie Trimble, which was heading S.S.W., or thereabouts. The helm of the Duke of Sutherland was put hard-a-port as soon as the Maggie Trimble was seen to be a sailing vessel, but immediately afterwards the Maggie Trimble ran into the Duke of Sutherland, the cut-water of the Maggie Trimble striking the spring beam of the after port sponson of the Duke of Sutherland, and doing considerable damage to the latter vessel. The engines of the Duke of Sutherland were thereupon stopped, and an order was given to reverse, but the master of the Duke of Sutherland finding that the Maggie Trimble was doing still further damage, ordered his engines to go ahead to get clear, and this was immediately done. The defendants charged the Maggie Trimble with not carrying the lights required by law, with carrying lights other than those allowed and required by law, and with neglecting to take the proper measures in due time to warn those on board the Duke of Sutherland of the proximity of the Maggie Trimble.

Jan. 15, 1875.—The cause came on for hearing before the Judge, assisted by Trinity Masters. The facts alleged in both the petition and answer were substantially proved and there was little dispute about the facts save as to the Maggie Trimble's lights. All the plaintiffs' witnesses positively swore that the Maggie Trimble's regulation lights were burning and that they had no other lights on deck or in use before and at the time of the collision. The defendants proved that they had a good look out, but none of the crew on board of the Duke of Sutherland ever saw any lights, except the three white lights mentioned, on board the Maggie Trimble. A passenger on board the Duke of Sutherland spoke of seeing the green light of the Maggie Trimble as the Duke of Sutherland approached her. A ship's surveyor in the employ of the ship's husband of the Maggie Trimble, was called by the plaintiffs, and asserted that, although the Board of Trade surveyor had ordered the position of the lights to be altered, he considered they were in a proper position before the alteration, but he could not say positively that they would show an unbroken light from right ahead to two points abaft the beam on either side. The defendants called the Board of Trade surveyor, who ordered the position of the lights to be altered after the accident; he said that he had surveyed the ship and that he had found that the lamps were right, but that they were so fitted on the break of the fore-castle that they were obscured from right ahead to about a point and a half on either bow by the catheads, which stood in front of them; the lights would only be observed by any person right ahead of the ship and in a line with the catheads; they could be seen above and below the catheads. The Duke of Sutherland was approaching the Maggie Trimble four points on the latter's starboard bow, and therefore there was no obstruction to prevent those on board the Duke of Sutherland from seeing the barque's lights.

The defendants contended that the Maggie Trimble had no regulation lights burning at the time of the collision, but that she was carrying some white lights on deck to enable the ship's decks to be put in order and that these lights deceived those on board the Duke of Sutherland; but that even if the Maggie Trimble did carry her regulation lights, they were so placed that the Maggie Trimble was a ship infringing the regulations for preventing collisions at sea within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873

Milward, Q. C. and Gainsford Bruce for the plaintiffs.

Bull, Q. C. and James P. Aspinall for the defendants.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE (after setting out the facts as given above).—There is no disputing that it was the duty of the steamer to get out of the way of the Maggie Trimble. The collision took place, however by the port paddle box of the steamer coming in contact with the starboard side and port bow of the Maggie Trimble. The defence which the Duke of Sutherland sets up, is that the Maggie Trimble carried no side lights, and that she ought to have shown a green light in the position in which she then was. I am of opinion that this defence entirely fails, as it is proved upon the evidence to the satisfaction of myself, and, I believe, of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, that the light was there. I should observe besides, that, taking the defence shown in the evidence of the master of the Duke of Sutherland, namely, that he saw some bright lights on his port bow, and did not understand what they were, it became his duty whilst he was in that state of indecision, to have taken steps to get out of the way of the vessel carrying those lights, and to give her a wider berth; if he was uncertain whether he ought to have ported or starboarded, he should have slowed his engines until he had ascertained what course the vessel carrying the ambiguous lights was upon; the evidence shows, beyond possibility of contradiction, that he took no steps whatever, that he did not port—the mode he adopted of getting out of her way—until he was close upon her. Upon this evidence, there is no question that he did not execute the manœuvre which the law required him to do, and that the Duke of Sutherland is therefore alone to blame for this collision, unless, indeed, the construction of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), sect. 17, should render the Maggie Trimble liable to be also condemned. That is a question which depends upon the construction the court may put the statute in the case of The Magnet, heard last sittings, and in which judgment will be given on Tuesday next. If I should be of opinion that there has been no infringement on the part of the sailing vessel in respect of the position of her lights, such as under the statute properly construed will prevent the Duke of Sutherland from being held alone to blame, it will not be necessary to go into this part of the case. Therefore, for the present, I pronounce that the Duke of Sutherland is to blame for the collision, reserving the question of law as to the liability of the other ship.

Cur. adv. vult.

THE FANNY M. CARVILL.

This was a cause of damage instituted on behalf of the owners of the Swedish barque Peru, against the British barque Fanny M. Carvill and her owners intervening.

According to the case set up in the plaintiffs' petition, the Peru, a barque of 589 tons register, was, shortly before 9.30 p.m., on the 18th Nov. 1874, about fifteen miles from Beachy Head, which bore about N.N.W., and was proceeding on a voyage from the Tyne to Monte Video with a cargo of coals. The wind was about W.N.W., the weather was fine and clear, and the Peru under easy sail, was sailing close hauled on the starboard tack, heading S.W., and making about three knots an hour, with her proper regulation lights duly exhibited and burning brightly. At the time and under these circumstances the green light of a vessel, which afterwards proved to be the Fanny M. Carvill, was seen at the distance of about a mile and a half, and bearing about two points on the port bow. The Fanny M. Carvill was on the port tack, and the Peru was kept close hauled on the starboard tack in the expectation that the Fanny M. Carvill would keep out of her way as she ought to have done; but the Fanny M. Carvill approached, and although loudly hailed from the Peru, ran into and struck the Peru upon the port side, about amidships, and did her so much damage that she was compelled to proceed to the Downs, and afterwards to be towed to London for repairs. The plaintiffs charged those on board the Fanny M. Carvill with neglecting to keep a good look out, and with improperly neglecting to take in due time proper measures for getting out of the way of the Peru.

According to the defendants' answer the Fanny M. Carvill was a barque of about 592 tons register; and at about 9.30 p.m., on the 18th Nov. 1874, whilst on a voyage from London to Barcelona with a cargo of deals was about fourteen miles off Beachy Head. At such time there was a strong breeze from W. to W. by N., the weather was clear, the Fanny M. Carvill was close hauled on the port tack under easy sail, heading about N.N.W., and sailing at the rate of two and a half knots per hour, her regulation lights were duly exhibited and burning brightly, and a good look-out was being kept. Under these circumstances the red light of a vessel, which afterwards proved to be the barque Peru, was seen about four points on the starboard bow of the Fanny M. Carvill, and distant about two miles. Almost immediately afterwards the green light came into view. Those on board the Fanny M. Carvill continued to watch the Peru which approached, showing both lights, broad on the starboard bow of the Fanny M. Carvill. About ten minutes after the lights had been first seen, and while the two vessels were a considerable way apart, those on board the Fanny M. Carvill showed a flash light, and shortly afterwards the red light of the Peru was shut in, and the two vessels would have passed clear of each other, starboard side to starboard side; but, when within a short distance of the Fanny M. Carvill, the Peru shut in the green and again opened the red light, causing immediate danger of collision. Thereupon the helm of the Fanny M. Carvill was put hard aport, and her main-yard squared, but she was unable to clear the Peru, and the two vessels came into collision, the bluff of the port bow of the Fanny M. Carvill striking the Peru amidships on the port side, doing considerable damage to both vessels. The defendants charged those on board the Peru with neglecting to keep a good look-out, and with improperly neglecting to keep their course; that the lights of the Peru were improperly fixed and screened; that the collision was occasioned by the improper and negligent navigation of those on board the Peru, and by the defective condition of the side lights of the Peru; and that the Peru was in fault within the true intent and meaning of the 17th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, for infringing the regulations for preventing collisions, by neglecting to carry proper side lights.

Jan. 16, 1875.—The cause came on for hearing before the judge assisted by Trinity Masters. There were only three points in dispute in this case; first, whether the Peru continued her course on approaching the Fanny M. Carvill; secondly, whether the green light of the Peru was seen by those on board the Fanny M. Carvill, and led to the collision; thirdly, whether the lights of the Peru were fixed and screened in accordance with the regulations. Evidence was given upon all these points; upon the first two there is an express finding on the part of the court appearing in the judgment below; in the third point there were witnesses called on both sides. For the plaintiffs it was proved that the lamps of the Peru were fixed 8ft. forward of the foremast, on the top of the covering board at the break of the forecastle on each side, and just on the bluff of the bows; they were on a level with the rail; the screens were 2ft. 5in. long and 17in. high, and ran as nearly as possible parallel to the middle line of the ship; the length of the lamps from aft to forward was 5in.; the lights could not have been put further aft than where they were unless they had been put abaft the foremast, and they would then have been obscured by the foresail and the fore-rigging; and the screens could not have been made longer without either placing the lamps further inboard, or allowing the fore end of the screen to project over the side of the ship; and in the first case the lamps would have been obscured by the cat-head, and in the second case there would have been risk of the screens being washed away in bad weather. After the arrival of the ship in the Thames the lights were tested at night on behalf of the plaintiffs, and it was then proved that at the distance of a mile and a half away the green light of the Peru showed at half a point across the port bow of that vessel, but that neither light would show at a greater bearing than half a point across the opposite bow. The defendants called some Board of Trade Surveyors, who stated that they had inspected the Peru after the collision, and that they were able to see the Peru's starboard light from the port side of her bowsprit, which would make the light visible about a point and a half to two points across the bows of the Peru at a distance of a mile and a half.

Butt, Q.C. (R. E. Webster with him) for the defendants, applied to the court to order an inspection by the Elder Brethren in order that it might be ascertained whether it was or was not true that the lights of the Peru could be seen across her bow and whether the light could be seen, as stated by the Board of Trade surveyor, cutting the bowsprit; that was the whole point in the case, and the vessel was still in the port of London; the court had before it the sworn evidence of the surveyor who stated that he had inspected the ship, and had found the light showing across her bows, and if so the light would be visible to the other vessel considerably across her bows; that was the main question in the cause and it was important to have it settled.

Milward, Q.C. (E. C. Clarkson with him), for the plaintiffs, opposed the application on the ground that the defendants had had ample opportunity of inspecting the ship before the hearing.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I think it is a very inconvenient practice for the Board of Trade surveyors to be sent down to inspect vessels, and afterwards to be examined as witnesses in this court; it seems to me very questionable, and worthy of the consideration of the Board of Trade, whether they should be allowed to inspect a ship on the application of a party to the cause, and afterwards be called by him as witnesses. I don't think any injustice has been done in this case, but it is an inconvenient practice that the functions of the Board of Trade should be put in action by a party to a cause. But, however, I think this is a case in which I ought not to accede to the present application. It appears upon the evidence already given by the look-out-man of the Fanny M. Carvill that these vessels were allowed to come within five ships' lengths of each other before the Fanny M. Carvill made any attempt to bear away. He says he saw the green light for the first time within five ships' lengths; even if he is speaking the truth on that point, in my opinion that was an improper navigation of the ship; but if I am called upon also to pronounce at this stage as to whether the green light was visible or not, I am ready to do so, but I would rather hear Mr. Butt upon that point first. There remains also the question of the liability of the Peru under the statute, if she has infringed any regulation. That is a question of law that must be reserved till next Tuesday, when I shall give judgment in the other cases. I refuse the present application. I don't think it is a proper case for doing what is very rarely done by the court. I must call upon Mr. Butt upon the two questions I have indicated.

Butt, Q.C., for the defendants.—I submit that, upon the facts, the Peru improperly altered her course; that she showed her green light in such a way as to deceive the Fanny M. Carvill as to her course, and that she so contributed to the collision. Upon the question of law I submit that, even if the light was not in this case visible, the Peru was to blame upon the facts proved, because she had screens too short by nearly a foot, and her side lights showed to some extent at any rate across her bows. This is a breach of the regulations which will bring her within the Merchant Shipping Act 1873. By the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, Arts. 3 and 5, certain side lights are provided for sailing vessels; and by Art. 3 (d), these side lights must be fitted "with inboard screens, projecting at least three feet forward from the light, so as to prevent these lights from being seen across the bow." This is a positive regulation as to the length of the screens, they must be 3ft. in front of the light; the screens of the Peru were only 2ft. 5in. long altogether, and only about 2ft. in front of the lights. Moreover it was proved by the defendants' witnesses, and in effect admitted by the plaintiff, that the lights would show across the bows of the Peru, and this again is expressly contrary to the regulation. On this ground I submit that the Peru must be held to blame, even though she did not contribute to the collision.

Milward, Q.C., for the plaintiff.—I submit that the Peru did not in any way contribute to this collision by reason of her course or her lights. On the question of law, I submit that the object of Art. 3 (d) is simply to prevent a ship's lights from being visible across the bow, and if this object is substantially attained, there is no infringement that will bring the ship within the statute. The evidence sufficiently shows that the lights would only be slightly visible across the bows, and this must always be the case in every ship at some point ahead of her, otherwise there would be some space right ahead where no lights could be seen at all. If the screens were exactly parallel, there would be a certain space between them in which, however far ahead of the ship a person might be, the rays of light could not be seen. The screens must be slightly inclined inwards, so that at some point both lights may be seen at the same time. If the screens are so fitted that the lights cannot be seen across the bows in such a way as to deceive an approaching vessel, there is a substantial compliance with the regulations. The mere length of the screens is immaterial; the only question to be considered is whether they prevented the light from being improperly seen across the bows, and I submit that in this case they did so.

THE MAGNET; THE DUKE OF SUTHERLAND; THE FANNY M. CARVILL.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I am of opinion that the Peru, the starboard tack vessel, continued her course without alteration up to the time of the collision, and it is untrue as stated by the witnesses for the defendants, that the Peru came up into the wind two and a half points, with her sails aback. I am of opinion that the green light of the Peru was not seen by those on board the Fanny M. Carvill, and did not lead to the collision. The Fanny M. Carvill was aware that the Peru was a starboard tack vessel, and the Fanny M. Carvill waited too long before she got out of the way of the Peru. Whether on account of the deficiency in the length of the screens of the Peru she is also to blame, although she never altered her bearings, is a question I reserve until I give judgment in the other cases on Tuesday.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 19.—SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—The first question which I have to decide as affecting all these cases is the true construction of a clause in the last Merchant Shipping Act, and to do so it is necessary to consider the previous enactments on the subject.

By the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), sect. 298, it is enacted: "If in any case of collision it appears to the court before which the case is tried that such collision was occasioned by the non-observance of any rule for the exhibition of lights, or the use of fog signals issued in pursuance of the power hereinbefore contained, or of the foregoing rule as to the passing of steam and sailing ships, or of the foregoing rule as to a steamship keeping to that side of a narrow channel which lies on the starboard side, the owner of the ship by which such rule has been infringed, shall not be entitled to recover any recompense whatever for any damage sustained by such ship in such collision, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made a departure from the rule necessary." This was repealed.

The next enactment on the subject was the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63) sect. 29, which provided that "if in any case of collision it appears to the court before which the case is tried that such collision was occasioned by the non-observance of any regulation made by or in pursuance of this Act, the ship by which such regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made a departure from the regulation necessary."

The next enactment on the subject was The Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 and 37 Vict. c. 85), which repealed the last-mentioned enactment, and (sect. 17) provided as follows: "If in any case of collision it is proved to the court before which the case is tried that any of the regulations for preventing collision contained in or made under The Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1873 has been infringed, the ship by which such regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made departure from the regulation necessary."

It has been contended that any infringement of any regulation made under the authority of the statute compels the court to pronounce the vessel which is guilty of such infringement to be in fault unless the infringement was in the circumstances necessary; that is to say, to give an instance, that a vessel carrying a perfect starboard light, and run into on the starboard side by a vessel which ought to have avoided her, is nevertheless in fault, if she have no port light, or a deficient one; or that a vessel directly ahead of another, which overtakes her and runs into her stern, is nevertheless in fault if she has deficient or no side lights, which lights could not possibly have been seen by, or have in any way affected the overtaking vessel. I say nothing as to the injustice of applying such a construction of an English statute to foreign vessels; but, irrespective of any such consideration I decline as at present advised to put a construction which appears to me fraught with absurdity and injustice upon the statute, even with respect to British vessels. I think the infringement spoken of must mean an infringement not indeed necessarily causing the collision, but connected with it—an infringement material to the case, and by possibility causing or contributing to the collision; not an infringement wholly immaterial to the case, and which by no possibility could have anything to do with the collision. I do not think that this construction of the statute is at variance with the decision of the Privy Council in The Hibernia (ante, p. 454; 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 805), which I have carefully perused.

And here it may be convenient to say a word on the legal effect of instructions given by the Board of Trade to their surveyors, a matter much discussed before me in cases of this description. Such instructions may be prudent and proper, though it appears that they are frequently changed, but, except in so far as they are authorised by statute, they can have no binding effect upon English, much less upon foreign vessels. The regulations for preventing collisions are of a different character, and, being adopted by foreign states, have by virtue of treaties or conventions, an international obligation.

There are three cases now before the court in which I have reserved for consideration the construction of this statute, and I now proceed to apply to them the provisions of the statute construed upon the principles which I have stated. The first is The Magnet; the second The Duke of Sutherland; the third The Fanny M. Carvill.

In each of these cases I have condemned one vessel; the question as to the culpability of the other being reserved.

The Magnet was a case of collision between the Swedish barque the Eugenie and the Magnet, an Irish screw steamer, which happened off the entrance to the Port of Liverpool somewhere between the north-west and the Bar Lightship, between twelve and one on the night of the 15th Nov. last. The Eugenie was heading N. by E., close hauled on the port tack, going at a speed of about eight knots an hour. The Magnet was proceeding at full speed, about ten knots an hour, heading E.S.E. They were crossing ships. The pilot of the Eugenie saw the white light of the Magnet four or five miles off five points on her port bow, and then he saw the masthead and green light of two vessels both on the port bow a quarter of a mile apart. He kept on his course. The foremost of the steamers passed clear ahead of him, but the sternmost, which was the Magnet, starboarded shortly before the collision, and came with her starboard side into the port bow of the Eugenie.

The defence of the Magnet is that she only saw the faint glimmer of a ship's light two points on her starboard bow. It did not continue in sight, and a red light opened almost alongside of her. The master of the Magnet supposed, he says, the vessel to be going in the same direction as he was, ahead of him, and by yawing to have shown her light. He ordered first starboard a little, and then hard a starboard. The answer on behalf of the Magnet states that the Eugenie neglected to have her side lights properly exhibited according to the regulations.

At the hearing two points were discussed. First, whether the red light of the barque was visible at a sufficient distance to apprise the steamer that she ought to get out of the way. This point I decided in the affirmative, and adversely to the Magnet, which I, therefore, held to be in fault for the collision. The second point was, whether the Eugenie was not also in fault under the provisions of the 36 & 37 Vict. c. 85, s. 17, for having violated the regulations in not carrying proper lights properly placed. It was not denied by the counsel for the Magnet that the lamps were of the proper size, but it was contended that they were not fitted with proper magnifying and reflecting power, and that they were not of proper capacity. Scientific evidence was produced on this point, but the captain of the Magnet admitted that when he saw the red light it was a very good light, and that both lights burnt well. The second mate said he saw no difference between them and any other lights, and the captain of the Eugenie swore that when on board the Magnet after the collision he saw them more than two miles; while none of the witnesses produced on behalf of the Magnet were interrogated as to whether the lights of the Eugenie were not burning brightly after the collision.

It was further contended that the lights which were in the fore part of the mizen rigging on the channel boards and level with the rail were not so placed so as to be visible according to the regulations, because they were abaft the broadest parts of the ship, because they were obscured by the foretopmast backstay, and a dead eye came before the lens of the lamp. There was some argument respecting the length of the screens, which I think was not insisted upon.

With regard to the obscuring of the lights there was a conflict of scientific and positive testimony, and after some consideration and conference with the Trinity Masters, I determined on putting into execution the authority which the statute (24 Vict.

c. 10), s. 18, gives me of requesting them to inspect the ship, and make the proper experiments for ascertaining whether the lamps were of a proper character to be visible at a proper distance, and whether they were not obscured by any part of the rigging. In taking this course, I may have given too favourable a construction to the pleading of the Magnet, in which the question as to the position of the lamps was perhaps not raised with sufficient distinctness.

The Elder Brethren have reported that having been requested by me to report on the sufficiency of the side lights of the Eugenie, and to examine the said vessel for the purpose of ascertaining whether there is anything in her construction or in the position of her tackle or furniture which would prevent the said lights from being seen when placed in their respective positions:

"We proceeded to Long Reach on the afternoon of the 30th ult. (Dec. 1874), and, anchoring a vessel abreast the lower mile mark, made arrangements whereby we could accurately fix the range of the lights. The evening was starlight, clear overhead, and perfectly calm, but hazy over the water. At 6 p.m., it being quite dark, the Eugenie's lights were placed on each quarter of the vessel so stationed. We proceeded in a boat up the Reach, with the reflectors of the lights turned directly upon us, thereby giving every advantage to the Eugenie, when the green light disappeared to the naked eye at half-a-mile, and the red light at a cable's length short of the mile. Upon a perfectly clear night we are of opinion that the green light might have been seen a quarter, and the red light half-a-mile further. "The lights of the Eugenie have been tested as to their photometric power with the following results:—

Naked flame.....	3.1	Candles.
Ditto, aided by the reflector.....	9.0	"
Power of light with red shade.....	1.1	"
Ditto, with green ditto.....	0.2	"

which, in our opinion, is considerably less than the lanterns now in use, and perfectly insufficient. "Having received information from the Registrar that the Eugenie would be ready for our inspection on the 12th instant, we proceeded to Liverpool on the 11th, and visited that vessel on the following morning; when the screens were placed in their regular positions, and the distance across the ship from light to light was found to be exactly 24ft.; at a corresponding height above the water, abreast the foretopmast backstays, the width across the ship from backstay to backstay was found to be 24ft. 6in., showing that an obstruction of 3in. intervenes on each side directly in front of the lights."

Adding to the evidence already before me, this report of the Trinity Masters, and considering the whole evidence together, I must pronounce the Eugenie to be also, in the language of the statute, in fault for non-observance of the regulations respecting the sufficiency of lights.

With respect to the case of the Duke of Sutherland, it was not, I think, contended that the lamps were not "so constructed," and of such a character as to comply with the regulations. The dispute was as to their position. The Board of Trade Surveyor required their position to be altered; this may have been prudent, but I am not satisfied upon the evidence that the lights were previously "so fixed" as to infringe the regulation with respect to their visibility. I pronounce, therefore, the Duke of Sutherland alone "in fault."

With respect to the case of The Fanny M. Carvill, the evidence was that the screens projected 2ft. 5in. instead of 3ft. The object of the regulations with respect to screens is to prevent the side lights from being seen across the bow; for this purpose it directs the screen to project at least 3ft. It is, so to speak, a subsidiary regulation for the purpose of securing the visibility of the distinct light, the general visibility of the light being already provided for in the former regulations.

I have stated in my former judgment, at the hearing of the last case, that I am satisfied the green light was not seen across the bow by those on board the Fanny M. Carvill, and, according to the evidence, if the length of the screens in this ship had extended further outside of the bow, a sea might have washed them away. Upon the whole I think that I am not compelled to say that the deficiency in the length of the screens was an infringement of the regulations according to my construction of the statute, and that therefore the Peru is legally in fault for a collision which her non-observance of the regulation certainly did in no way occasion. I pronounce the Fanny M. Carvill alone in fault.

SMITH v. STEELE.

Negligence by servants—Pilot compulsorily employed—Liability of owners for injury to pilot—17 & 18 Vict. c. 104.

A pilot was engaged by the defendants under the compulsory clauses of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, for a voyage in a vessel of which they were owners. Whilst giving directions on board for coming out of dock, before the voyage commenced, the pilot was killed by the fall of a boat, in consequence of the negligence of defendant's servants.

Held, in an action by the personal representatives, that there is no implied contract that a pilot under such circumstances shall take upon himself the risk of injury by the shipowners' servants; and that, therefore, the action lay against the defendants.

THIS was an action tried before Lush, J., at the Sussex Spring Assizes 1874. The verdict was found for the plaintiffs, leave to the defendants being reserved to enter a verdict or nonsuit.

The plaintiff sued as executrix of one J. G. Smith, deceased, formerly a Thames pilot. The declaration stated that the defendants were possessed of a certain sailing vessel, and of a certain boat slung upon the same, which sailing vessel and boat were then under the care and management of certain servants of the defendants, and that J. G. Smith then was, by the consent and invitation of the defendants, and by virtue of their retainer, upon the sailing vessel for the purpose of piloting the same down the River Thames. Nevertheless the defendants, by their servants, so carelessly, negligently, and improperly slung, suspended, and managed the boat, that through their carelessness, negligence, and unskilful conduct whilst J. G. Smith was upon the vessel under the circumstances and for the purpose aforesaid, the boat fell upon J. G. Smith and injured him, inasmuch that he in a few days afterwards died.

The defendants pleaded: First, not guilty; and, secondly, that J. G. Smith was on board the vessel in the defendants' employment as pilot, for the purpose of piloting the vessel down the River Thames, for which he was so retained for reward payable to him, and the injury to J. G. Smith was not in any way occasioned by any act, neglect, or default of the defendants personally, but was solely occasioned by the negligence of the servants of the defendants; and the servants of the defendants were persons of reasonable skill and care, and reasonably competent to sling, suspend, and manage the boat, and the servants of the defendants and J. G. Smith were engaged in one common employment with a common object, to wit, in the navigation and management of the vessel; and the injury to J. G. Smith was one of the risks incident to the employment of J. G. Smith as such pilot; and the alleged carelessness, negligence, unskilful, and improper conduct of the servants of the defendants were wholly unauthorised by the defendants.

At the trial it appeared that a vessel belonging to the defendants was lying in a dock in the River Thames ready to proceed to sea, and that she was within a district within which pilotage is compulsory upon her under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 376, viz., the London district of the Trinity House. It was also shown that it was customary for a pilot to go on board the vessel, which he is engaged to pilot outwards, whilst she is in dock in order that he may give instructions to the crew whilst getting the vessel out of dock, and that, whilst the deceased was so giving orders, one of the ship's boats, which had been negligently slung by the crew, fell upon him and killed him.

A rule nisi was obtained by the defendants in pursuance of the leave reserved, on the ground that they were not responsible for the negligence of their servants under the circumstances proved.

Willis showed cause.

Thesiger, Q.C. and Wood Hill supported the rule.

The several clauses of the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 and 1872, relating to pilots, and the following cases were cited and fully discussed:

SMITH v. STEELE.

[Q. B.]

Jan. 25.—The judgment of the court (Cockburn, C.J., Blackburn, Mellor, and Lush, JJ.), was delivered by BLACKBURN, J.—This was an action under Lord Campbell's Act, to recover damages in respect of the death of the plaintiff's testator, who was her husband.

At the trial before my brother Lush, the following facts were proved: The defendants were the owners of a vessel lying in dock about to proceed on a voyage in which the employment of a pilot was compulsory. The testator was a pilot who was engaged for that voyage. He (in compliance with what it was proved was always the practice of pilots) went on board the vessel in dock to give directions to the crew when getting the vessel out of dock. Whilst doing so, a boat which had been negligently slung fell on him and killed him. The defendants did not personally interfere in the matter. From the way the case comes before us on a point reserved, we must take it as a fact that the accident was occasioned by the negligence of the servants of the defendants in slinging the boat, without contributory negligence on the part of the deceased.

Leave was reserved to enter the verdict for the defendants, or a nonsuit, on the ground that the defendants were not responsible for the negligence of their servants under the circumstances proved in evidence. A rule nisi was obtained accordingly, against which cause was shown in this Term before my Lord Chief Justice, my brothers Mellor, Lush, and myself, when the case was very ably argued by Mr. Willis for the plaintiff, and by Mr. Thesiger and Mr. Wood Hill in support of the rule, and the court took time to consider its judgment.

The law is to a certain extent determined by the case of Indermaur v. Dames (ubi sup.) There is an obligation on the part of the occupier of property, whether fixed or movable, to those who at his invitation, express or implied, come on that property to take by himself and servants reasonable care that the person so coming shall not be exposed to unusual danger; and that obligation extends to the workmen sent by a tradesman to repair part of the machinery. Mr. Justice Willes, in delivering judgment in that case, after referring to the undisputed law that there was such an obligation on the part of a shopkeeper to his customer, and that there was no such obligation to a servant, proceeds to give the reason of the judgment in these terms: "The class to which the customer belongs includes persons who go not as mere volunteers, or licensees, or guests, or servants, or persons whose employment is such that danger may be considered as bargained for, but who go upon business which concerns the occupier, and upon his invitation express or implied." In Morgan v. Vale of Neath Railway Company, (ubi sup.) which was earlier in date than Indermaur v. Dames, the reason why a servant cannot sue his master for negligence of a fellow servant was put on the ground that it was an implied part of the contract between master and servant that the servant should, as between them, take upon himself such risks. In the more recent case of Wilson v. Merry (ubi sup.), the House of Lords in a Scotch case decided that the owners of a colliery were not responsible to their servants for an injury occasioned by the negligence of the general superintendent of the mine to whom the defendants had delegated their whole power and authority. It does not appear from the report that the case of Morgan v. Vale of Neath Railway Company (ubi sup.), and Indermaur v. Dames (ubi sup.), were brought to their Lordships' notice; but the Lord Chancellor (Lord Cairns) seems to us to have arrived, by independent reasoning, at the principle that the exemption from liability was derived from the contract between the master and his servant, and to base his judgment upon it. He says (p. 332), "The master is not and cannot be liable to his servant unless there be negligence on the part of the master in that which he (the master) has contracted or undertaken with his servant to do. The master has not contracted or undertaken to execute in person the work connected with the business. . . . At all events, a servant may choose for himself between serving a master who does and a master who does not attend in person to his business."

In the present case, the accident happened before the actual commencement of the voyage; but it is clear that the deceased was on board only because he was going on that voyage as a pilot, and under the same terms as to risk as if the voyage had begun. We think, therefore, that the question in the present case is reduced to this, whether there is between the owners of a ship and the pilot whom they are compelled to employ, an implied contract that the pilot shall take upon himself the risk of injury from the negligence of the shipowners' servants. Indermaur v. Dames decides that there is no such implied contract between the owner of machinery and those who are sent by their masters to repair it. And we think that there is no such implied contract in the case of a pilot. The law as to pilots is now regulated by the Merchant Shipping Acts. The pilot is, by 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 365, subject to a penalty if he refuses to take charge of the ship. The master is, by sect. 353, bound under a penalty to employ the pilot. The rate of remuneration is, by sect. 358, neither to be more nor less than the fixed rate, though both parties should agree. And by sect. 388, the owner is not to be liable for the pilot as his servant. By a subsequent enactment (35 & 36 Vict. c. 73, s. 9), power is given by bye-laws to modify sect. 358, so far as to allow any pilot or class of pilots any rate less than the rate for the time being demandable by law, but no power is given to enable a pilot to demand more. He cannot, therefore, make any special bargain to receive larger pay in consideration of his taking this risk upon him. An ordinary servant has, as Lord Cairns points out (at least theoretically), the power of choosing whether he will enter into the employment of a master who does not agree to act personally in the management of his business, or as an alternative, to be responsible for the negligence of those he employs. The pilot has no such choice, he must conduct the ship on the terms fixed by the statutes which regulate pilotage, and we can find nothing in these statutes to justify the conclusion that the pilot is to take upon himself the risk.

We therefore think that the rule should be discharged.

FLOWER v. BRADLEY.

Negligent navigation by a pilot—Action for—County Court Jurisdiction—Admiralty cause—31 & 32 Vict. c. 71; 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51.

An action against a pilot for negligence in navigating a vessel whereby it came in collision with another vessel which it damaged, is not an admiralty cause within the meaning of "The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868" (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71) sect. 3, sub-sect. 3, and may therefore be brought in any County Court, though such court be not appointed under the Act for the trial of admiralty causes.

THIS was a rule calling upon the County Court Judge of Kent, sitting at Gravesend, and upon the defendant, to show cause why a mandamus should not issue to the former commanding him to hear and determine this case on the ground that it was properly brought in the said County Court. The plaint was a common law plaint in the before mentioned court, and the particulars were as follows:

"The plaintiff claims the sum of 14*l.*, being damages and loss sustained by him to his sailing barge Janus, which said barge was run foul of and damaged by the ship or vessel Sunny-side, on the 7th Aug. last off Deptford Creek, in the river Thames, such damage having been caused by the negligence of the defendant, who was then in charge of the said ship or vessel by law, as a licensed Trinity House pilot."

Upon the plaint coming on for hearing at the Gravesend County Court, and the plaintiffs' attorney having opened his facts, the County Court judge interposed, saying, that upon the particulars and facts stated, the cause was an admiralty cause, and that he had no jurisdiction sitting at Gravesend to hear it, although he had jurisdiction at Rochester in admiralty, and the place where the damage occurred was for admiralty purposes within the district of the Rochester County Court. The attorney contended that the cause was a common law and not an admiralty cause, but the judge held to his opinion, and therefore nonsuited the plaintiff (a).

(a) By the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71) power is given to the Crown, by sect. 2, to appoint certain County Courts courts for admiralty purposes; and under this enactment the Rochester County Court was appointed for the district within which the collision in question took place.

Sect. 2 enacts that "Any County Court having admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction and all powers and authorities relating thereto, to try and determine, subject and according to the provisions of this Act, the following causes, in this Act referred to as admiralty causes."

"(3) As to any claim for damages to cargo, or damage by collision—any cause in which the amount claimed does not exceed £300."

Sect. 5 enacts that no County Court other than that appointed is to have jurisdiction.

By the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51) it is enacted by sect. 4 that "the third section of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 shall extend and apply to all claims for damage to ships, whether by collision or otherwise, when the amount claimed does not exceed £300."

Rolland showed cause.—The County Court judge was right in refusing to try the cause, and in nonsuiting the plaintiff, for the Gravesend County Court had no admiralty jurisdiction, and the suit being an admiralty one it should have been brought in the Rochester County Court. The nature of the causes over which certain County Courts have acquired admiralty jurisdiction, and the extent of that jurisdiction, appears from the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, and 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51). The Queen in council is empowered (sect. 2 of the former Act) to appoint any County Court to have admiralty jurisdiction, and to define the area of its jurisdiction, and to include in that area the district of any other County Court. The Rochester County Court for admiralty purposes has jurisdiction over the district of the Gravesend County Court—the latter having no admiralty jurisdiction. The County Courts having admiralty jurisdiction have power to try (inter alia) "as to any claim for damage by collision—any cause in which the amount claimed does not exceed 300*l.*" (sect. 3, sub-sect. 3); and it is further enacted (sect. 5) that "no County Court other than the County Court so appointed shall have jurisdiction within that district in any admiralty cause." The jurisdiction so conferred may be exercised either in rem or in personam (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51, s. 3), and by the 4th section of that Act the jurisdiction conferred by the former Act is extended to "all claims for damage to ships whether by collision or otherwise." This is a cause of damage by collision occurring by the negligence of the defendant, and is therefore an admiralty cause within the very words of these Acts. Over such a cause the common law jurisdiction of the County Courts has been taken away. [KELLY, C.B.—Is this an admiralty cause? If it is a cause over which the Admiralty Court would have no jurisdiction, has the County Court sitting in admiralty jurisdiction? R. E. Webster, for the plaintiff.—It has been expressly decided in the Alexandria (ante, vol. 1, p. 464; L. Rep. 3 Adm. & Ecc. 575), that there is no admiralty jurisdiction in a cause against a pilot in personam. CLEASBY, B.—In that case it was held that the Court of Passage had not jurisdiction to entertain a suit against a pilot in admiralty, and hence it follows that the Admiralty Court has no such jurisdiction.] But the judge of the Admiralty Court said that if the matter were res integra he should be disposed to hold the contrary, but that he was bound by the decision in The Urania (1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 156; 10 W. R. 97), supported as it was by Everard v. Kendall (3 Mar. Law Cas. 391; L. Rep. 5 C. P. 428), and Simpson v. Blues (ante, vol. 1, p. 326; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 290). But these cases are practically overruled by Cargo ex Argos (ante, vol. 1, p. 519; L. Rep. 5 Priv. Co. 134), in which the Privy Council holds that the County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction is not confined to the jurisdiction possessed by the High Court of Admiralty. Whatever is fairly within the words of the above Acts must be held to be within the admiralty jurisdiction of the County Courts; and it is only reasonable to presume that the Legislature intended to enlarge the jurisdiction of certain County Courts in admiralty or nautical matters, so that all small causes of that nature might be tried before a tribunal competent to try them; and the provision for nautical assessors makes these County Courts fully competent, which they would scarcely be if the judge sat alone at common law.

MACKENZIE v. WHITWORTH.

[Ex.]

Webster, in support of the rule, was not called upon.

KELLY, C.B.—I am of opinion that we ought to make this rule absolute. Were it not for the cases cited, which are directly in point, I should have difficulty in thus deciding upon a mere rule to set aside a nonsuit in the County Court, there being no appeal from our judgment; especially as it cannot be denied that to a great extent our decision may appear to conflict with that of a court of high authority, although its decisions are not strictly binding on us. In Everard v. Kendall, Simpson v. Blues, and Smith v. Brown (ubi sup.), the struggle was to extend the admiralty jurisdiction, and not to give the County Courts an entirely new jurisdiction. These cases were all discussed in The Alexandria (ubi sup.), which was an admiralty suit instituted in the Court of Passage in Liverpool against a pilot for collision, and Sir R. Phillimore, upon the high authority of the decision of Dr. Lushington in the Urania (ubi sup.), held that the court had no jurisdiction as a court of admiralty to entertain such a suit. We have, therefore, a direct decision upon the point—The Alexandria in the Admiralty Court; and against this decision we have only a suggestion of a different opinion expressed by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, in the case of Cargo ex Argos (ubi sup.), which is certainly not upon all fours with the present case; and, moreover, whilst we show great respect for the Privy Council decisions, they are not binding upon us even when in point, and, under these circumstances, we must give effect to the weight of authority, showing that the cause in question was not an admiralty cause, and was, therefore, maintainable in the court and in the manner in which it was instituted. If we make this rule absolute, it will be competent to the defendant to move for a prohibition to the County Court if it proceeds, and then another court may review the decisions; whilst, if we discharge it, there will be no means of doing so.

CLEASBY, B.—I am of the same opinion. And although I think that the County Court judge ought to have heard the evidence, I am not surprised that he refused to do so, for the case in the Privy Council is strongly in favour of his view. The question is, what is the proper course for us to pursue? In some cases good reasons may be shown on both sides, but in such case as the present, where the question might be perpetually raised, there is no other solution but that which is derived from authority. Now we have two decisions in support of the plaintiff's contention—The Alexandria in the Admiralty Court, and that in the Common Pleas (Everard v. Kendall) both precisely in point. We cannot in the face of those decisions do otherwise than make this rule absolute.

MACKENZIE v. WHITWORTH.

Marine insurance—Re-insurance—Insurable interest—What necessary to be stated in policy—Interest in subject-matter—Fact of re-insurance—Concealment—Material fact—19 Geo. 2, c. 37, s. 4—27 & 28 Vict. c. 56 s. 1—30 & 31 Vict. c. 59.

An assured may effect reinsurance directly on the subject-matter of insurance against the risks or any part thereof insured against in the original policy, without being bound to disclose in the policy or otherwise that it is a reinsurance.

The plaintiff, an underwriter, in effecting with another underwriter an ordinary policy on certain goods, on board a named vessel, for a specified voyage, omitted to state, as the fact was, that it was a re-insurance of a risk already taken by the plaintiff as an assurer; and the jury, in an action by him on the policy, having found that the fact of its being a re-insurance was immaterial, and that there had been no concealment, the verdict was entered for the plaintiff, with leave to the defendant to move to enter the verdict for him, on the ground that the plaintiff being only interested as a re-insurer, was not entitled to recover on the policy sued on; and it was Held, that an underwriter, when he effects a policy of assurance on a risk already assured against by him, is not, in law, bound, unless challenged so to do, to disclose the fact of its being a re-insurance, and that the plaintiff, therefore, was entitled to recover.

The case of Glover v. Black (3 Burr, 1394) discussed, explained, and distinguished.

THIS was an action upon a policy of marine insurance for 5000*l.* upon a cargo of cotton on board a vessel called the Southampton, on a voyage from New Orleans to Revel, and it was brought by the plaintiff, the assured, against the defendant, the assurer, to recover the sum of 200*l.*, being the amount for which the defendant had underwritten the said policy. The first count in the declaration set out the policy (dated 24th April 1873) in extenso, and proceeded to aver that the defendant in consideration of a certain premium paid to him, became an insurer to the plaintiff, and duly subscribed the said policy as such insurer to the plaintiff, in the sum of 200*l.* upon the said goods in the said policy mentioned; and the said goods were shipped on board the said ship at New Orleans aforesaid, to be carried therein on the said voyage. And the United States Lloyd's and individual underwriters in New York, were then, and until and at the time of the loss, thereafter mentioned, interested in the said goods to a large value and amount, to wit, to the value and amount of all the moneys insured therein; and the said insurance was made for the use and benefit, and on account of the persons or companies so interested; and the said ship with the said goods on board thereof sailed on the said voyage, and afterwards, whilst the said ship with the said goods on board thereof, was proceeding on the said voyage, and during the continuance of the said risk, the said goods were, by the perils so insured against as aforesaid, and not by any of the excepted perils, wholly lost; and all conditions, &c. Yet the defendant has not paid the said sum of 200*l.* The second count was the ordinary money count.

The defendant pleaded various pleas in answer to the action, on all of which issues was taken and joined; but the only pleas which, at the trial, became material were—

Plea 1. Denying that the defendant became an insurer or subscribed the said policy.

Plea 8. Which alleged that at the time of the defendant's alleged subscribing the said policy, and becoming such insurer as alleged, that is to say, on the 20th April 1873, the plaintiff and his agents and the said United States Lloyd's, and underwriters of New York respectively, wrongfully and improperly concealed from the defendant certain material facts and information which the defendant did not know, and had not received, and could not be presumed to know or have received, and had not the means of knowing or receiving, and which the plaintiff and his agents, and the said Lloyd's and underwriters respectively, before then and there knew, and had received, that is to say, that the said insurance in the said first count mentioned, was and is only a re-assurance; that is to say, a re-assurance made by the plaintiff and his agents, and the said Lloyd's and underwriters respectively, and that the plaintiff and the said Lloyd's and underwriters respectively before and at the time of the defendant becoming such insurer and subscribing the said policy, had become and were insurers for the said sum of 200*l.* upon the said goods and against the identical perils and risks in the said policy mentioned, to other persons; which said matters, and the circumstances and facts which induced the plaintiff and the said Lloyd's and underwriters to make such re-assurance were material to the said perils and risks in the said policy mentioned, and were concealed by the plaintiff and his said agents, and the said Lloyd's and underwriters from the defendant, and would have otherwise raised the rate of premium at which the said policy could and would have been effected by the defendant, or which would have otherwise deterred the defendant from entering into or making the said policy, and accepting the said risks, and which ought to have been communicated by the plaintiff his agents, and Lloyd's and underwriters, to the defendant.

The facts of the case as they appeared at the trial, before Pollock, B. and a special jury, at the last summer assizes, 1874, at Liverpool, were shortly as follows:

The plaintiff is a merchant at Liverpool, who also acts as agent for certain New York underwriters. The defendant is one of the firm of Messrs. B. Whitworth and Brothers, who carry on business at Manchester as merchants, and who have a department there called the Insurance Department, in which the business of an underwriter is carried on. Messrs. Pickford Brothers, who are insurance brokers at Liverpool, having an agent in Manchester of the name of Forrester, have been in the habit of introducing insurances on ships and cargoes to the defendants, from whom they received, on effecting such introduction, a commission beyond the usual broker's commission, which they retained to themselves, handing over to the broker who introduced the insurance to them his usual fee. Messrs. Tyson and Co. are also insurance brokers at Liverpool.

It appeared from the admissions signed between the parties before the trial: First, that Messrs. Pickford, in whose name the policy was made out, as the brokers or agents of the defendant, by letter of the 14th Jan. 1873, effected with Messrs. Tyson and Co., an insurance policy for 5000*l.*, on cotton, per ship Southampton, from New Orleans to Revel, particulars to be afterwards declared; secondly, that Tyson and Co., who acted on behalf of the plaintiff, who was acting in the matter for and on behalf of the United States Lloyd's and the individual underwriters of New York, subsequently (to wit) on a day and time to be proved, declared the particulars; thirdly, that on 24th April 1873, the defendant subscribed the policy in the declaration set out for 200*l.*; fourthly, that the name of Pickford Brothers was inserted in the policy as representing the plaintiff who was the agent of the said Lloyd's and underwriters, the persons interested in causing the said policy in the declaration set out to be made; fifthly, that the insurance referred to by the above-mentioned letter of the 14th Jan. 1873, was intended by the plaintiff to be a re-insurance for and on behalf of the United States Lloyd's and the individual underwriters of New York, being part of an insurance or insurances by them on cotton to the value of 80,000*l.*, to be shipped by Messrs. Fatman and Co., of New Orleans, on board the ship Southampton, on the said voyage in the declaration mentioned; and the said Lloyd's and underwriters, at the time of the said insurance, and of the said loss in the said declaration mentioned, had a very large interest as insurers in respect of the said original insurance or insurances over and above all the re-insurances (including that made or intended to be made by the policy in the declaration set out), made or caused to be made on their behalf; sixthly, that the total amount of re-insurances on the said cotton for the said voyage made or caused to be made by or on behalf of the said Lloyd's and underwriters, including the re-insurance made or intended to be made by the policy in the declaration mentioned, was 24,000*l.*; seventhly, that the said cotton of the said value so insured by the said Lloyd's and underwriters as aforesaid, was shipped on board the said ship Southampton at New Orleans, and the said ship, with the said cotton on board, sailed from New Orleans on the said voyage on the 28th Feb. 1873, and the said ship was, together with the said cotton, afterwards (to wit) on the 19th March 1873, burnt and destroyed, and the said companies, by reason thereof, sustained a total loss in respect of their original insurances, amounting to 4000*l.*, which they have paid, and part of which was re-insured, as aforesaid; eighthly, that it was not disclosed that the said re-insurance was a re-insurance, except by the receipt by Messrs. Pickford of the memorandum (B) hereunto annexed.

The following is the letter of Messrs. Pickford, of the 14th Jan. 1873, referred to in the above admission (No. 1):—

Liverpool, 14th Jan. 1873.

Messrs. J. D. Tyson and Co.,

Dear Sirs,—We have opened on your account a provisional policy for 5000*l.* on cotton, average ten bales "F. G. A.," per Southampton, from New Orleans to Revel, at 5 per cent. (Particulars to be declared hereafter.) Yours truly, PICKFORD BROTHERS.

The following letter was from Pickfords' agent, Forrester, at Manchester, to the defendant:—

Messrs. B. Whitworth and Brothers,

5 per cent. average ten bales "F. G. A.," name of vessel Southampton, at and from New Orleans to Revel. When to sail. Yours truly, S. P. M. FORRESTER.

On the 25th April, 1873, Pickfords wrote to Forrester, returning the stamp, and requesting the policy to be altered in accordance with a "press copy," which they inclosed in their letter, and which copy was the memorandum (B) referred to in the above-mentioned admission (No. 8), and was as follows:—

(B)
Copy of policy asked for. For full particulars see usual printed copy.
Colin Mackenzie, agent.
5000*l.* Pickford.

New Orleans to Revel.—Southampton.

Being a re-insurance, subject to the same clauses and conditions as the original policy or policies, and to pay as may be paid therein. On cotton valued as per original policy or policies. Average payable on each ten bales, running landing numbers, general average as per foreign statement if claimed.

On the 20th April 1873, the defendant wrote or telegraphed to Pickfords, saying: "The Southampton looks queer, sailed Feb. 24th, declaring now, object to make our interest a re-insurance, and shall wait proof of interest before we admit any claim." It was not until after the loss that the defendant became aware that it was a re-insurance which the plaintiff had meant to effect, and he then objected to being held liable, and wrote as above-mentioned to Pickfords. Subsequently, in March 1874, the defendant delivered a policy in the terms of the original slip (see the before-mentioned letters of 14th Jan. and 24th April 1873), with, at the same time, a distinct intimation that he did so under protest, and that the policy was not delivered as a binding and valid instrument, but only in order to enable the plaintiff to assert any right he might have without any difficulty being raised under the Stamp Acts.

Merchants and underwriters were called as witnesses on both sides. Those for the plaintiff said that the fact of its being a re-insurance was immaterial to be known, and more particularly when, as in the present case, the ship had not sailed, and that it would make no difference in the rate of premium. The defendant's witnesses on the other hand, declared it to be a material fact; and some of them said that they would not themselves have accepted the risk had they known it to be a re-insurance. The witnesses, however on both sides, and the plaintiff himself, admitted that it was usual in practice to state the fact of its being a re-insurance in the slip and in the policy.

The learned Baron in his summing up to the jury, after stating the issue to be determined, and the evidence on both sides, said, "It is a matter entirely for you whether you think there has been a withholding by the plaintiff and those who effected the insurance for him, of that which was substantially a material fact, which he was bound to disclose to the underwriter or his agent. If it was material, he was bound to tell it in point of law. The laws of insurance are exceptional. A person is not only bound to answer questions, but to come forward and tell all that he himself knows, or that his agents, who are putting forward the insurance, know; to tell all that is material to the risk, or calculated to affect the mind of the person to whom it is offered in the sense which I have stated. If you think that the plaintiff has told all that is material, and that this fact is immaterial, the plaintiff is entitled to recover. If on the other hand you think it was material to the risk, or would have altered the amount of the premiums, and was withheld, then this policy would be defeated and the plaintiff would not be entitled to recover."

The jury found that the fact, that it was a re-insurance, was not material, and that there was no concealment; and thereupon the verdict was entered for the plaintiff, for 21*l.* 5*s.*, with interest; and leave was reserved to the defendant's counsel to move.

Herschell, Q.C., accordingly, in Michaelmas Term last, moved for and obtained a rule nisi on behalf of the defendant, to set aside the above-mentioned verdict for the plaintiff, and to enter a verdict for the defendant, on the ground that the plaintiff being only interested as a reinsurer, was not entitled to recover on the policy sued on, and against that rule.

Benjamin, Q.C., and Myburgh, for the plaintiff, now showed cause.—The question for the decision of the court was whether, upon a re-insurance being effected by an underwriter or insurer, it is requisite or necessary, as a matter of law, that the fact of its being a re-insurance should be stated or declared by him to the insurer at the time when the policy of re-insurance is executed by him? It is contended on behalf of the plaintiff, in opposition to that which will be argued on the other side, that it is not necessary or requisite so to do, and more especially is it not so in the present case, where the jury have expressly found that the fact was not a material one to be known by the insurer, thus negating the fact that there was any concealment, so that the question now is purely one of law. Undoubtedly, the fact of its being a re-insurance of the risk already insured was not mentioned by the plaintiff; and though it may be admitted that it is usual to mention the fact on such an occasion, it is not such a necessary legal obligation as that the omission to mention it would render the policy void. It is immaterial to the risk, because the risk means the arrival in safety of the ship with the goods, which would not and could not in any way be affected by the fact that it was a re-insurance. The 19 Geo. 2, c. 37, s. 4, prohibited all re-assurances with a certain exception, namely, "unless the insurer shall be insolvent, become a bankrupt, or die; in either of which cases such assurer, his executors, administrators, or assigns, may make re-assurance to the amount of the sum before by him assured, provided it shall be expressed in the policy to be a re-assurance." But of recent years the old restrictions on re-assurance have been removed; thus the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 56, s. 1, after reciting that it was expedient to remove the restriction imposed by the Act of Geo. 2, enacted that notwithstanding anything contained in the said Act of Geo. 2, it should be lawful "to make re-assurance upon any ship or vessel, or upon any goods, merchandise, or other property, on board of any ship or vessel, or upon the freight of any ship or vessel, or upon any other interest in or relating to any ship or vessel, which may lawfully be insured; and such re-assurance shall be deemed to be the insurance of interests which may be lawfully insured within the meaning of the Acts imposing stamp duties on policies of sea insurance." It is true that the proviso in sect. 4 of 19 Geo. 2, requiring the fact of its being a re-insurance to be expressed in the policy, was left untouched by the 27 & 28 Vict., and but for the Act next mentioned would still be now in force; but by "The Statute Law Revision Act 1867" (30 & 31 Vict. c. 59) sect 4 of 19 Geo. 2, c. 37, is wholly repealed, and therefore re-assurance is now lawful under the 27 & 28 Vict., whilst the necessity for stating it to be so on the policy no longer exists. As a matter of course, the fact always was stated during the period that the proviso in sect. 4 of the Act of Geo. 2 was in force; but the stating it was not the result of a custom, but simply a compliance with the statutory injunction. The case of Glover v. Black (3 Burr, 1394), on which the defendant relies strongly, is distinguishable from the present one. That was a case of interest on respondentia and bottomry, and although it was held that such an interest must be expressly mentioned in the policy, Lord Mansfield, at p. 1402 of the report, declared the ground of that decision to be that "the law and practice of merchants had established that respondentia and bottomry must be mentioned in the policy;" but he declared at the same time that the court did not mean to determine generally that no special interest in goods might be given in evidence in other cases if the circumstances admitted of it. [BRAMWELL, B.—Has a person who guarantees the payment for goods to the vendor an insurable interest?] There is no doubt that he has. It was found by the jury that it was not material to state the fact here, and, therefore, since the not stating it was found to be no undue concealment of a material fact, its statement was clearly not necessary. The motive of the party insured in effecting an insurance is not material to the underwriter, who look only to the goods and the vessel containing them, and the voyage on which the insurance is proposed to be effected. The law on the subject is well and correctly stated by Mr. Arnould in his Law of Marine Insurance, 4th edit., by MacLachlan, vol. 1, p. 46, where he says, "although a policy must in all cases state correctly, and in some specifically, what is insured, there is no authority for saying that the reason why the party insures should also be expressed in the policy. The true proposition is, that although the subject matter of the insurance must be properly described, the nature of the interest may in general be left at large," and he cites as authority for that, per Lord Tenterden in Crawley and others v. Cohen (3 B. & Ad. 478; 1 L. J., N. S., 158, K.B.). That was the case of carriers on a canal, and it was held by the Court of King's Bench that an insurance on goods was sufficient to cover the interest of carriers in the property under their charge belonging to other persons. So Mr. Phillips (American), in his treatise on the same subject, says (vol. 1, par. 424, p. 220, 5th edit.) "The interest of carriers in consequence of their liability to the owners of the goods carried, may be insured under a general description of the goods, without specifying the particular interest intended to be covered." And further on, in the same vol., at p. 254, par. 498, he discusses the subject of re-insurance, and the question "whether an insurer may effect reinsurance on the insured subject generally, without specifying his interest in the policy;" and after stating various cases, and the opinions of text writers on both sides of the question, he says that he "considers the better doctrine to be that an assured may effect reinsurance directly in the insured subject against the risks insured against in the original policy, without any disclosure in the policy or otherwise that it is a reinsurance." There is another case also in 3 Burr. (Reed v. Cole, at p. 1512), which is an authority in favour of the present plaintiff. [BRAMWELL, B.—In that case the plea was that the plaintiff had parted with all his interest in the ship before the loss, and so had none at all; but in the case now before us the plea substantially is this, that the plaintiff had no interest in the goods or in their arrival, but solely the risk which he had previously insured, and that he ought to have insured that previous risk in so many words expressly.] No doubt the defendant will so contend, but the authorities are, it is submitted, not in his favour. The "nature of his interest may be left at large," as was expressly said by Lord Tenterden in Crawley v. Cohen (ubi sup.). [AMPLETT, B.—That was not a case of reinsurance, which was not then permitted, but a mere question of interest.] An insurance by a carrier is equivalent in point of fact to a reinsurance. There are various cases in which persons having special or qualified interests may insure. A creditor with a lien on property for his claim has an insurable interest to the extent of his claim; and therefore the mortgagee of a ship or goods may insure the mortgaged subject generally without specifying his interest to consist in a mortgage; and he may recover on a policy effected for his benefit, averring the interest to be in himself; whilst the equitable title of the mortgagor is at the same time an insurable interest in him, which he may protect by a separate policy, and to the full value of the mortgaged property; for, notwithstanding its loss, he is still liable for the mortgage debt: (see 1 Arnould, pp. 75, 76; 1 Phillips, ch. 5.) Very little will serve to create an insurable interest, as is shown by the case of Anderson v. Morice, in the Common Pleas (ante, p. 424; 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 605; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 58; 44 L. J. 10, C. P.). On all these grounds the plaintiff is entitled to recover, and the defendant's rule should be discharged.

Herschell, Q.C. and Baylis for the defendant, contra, contended that their rule should be made absolute.—In the first place, the policy did not contain a proper description of the subject matter, or indeed any description of it at all; for it cannot be contended that, under the words "on goods" in a policy, a contract of indemnity would be understood, or could be held to have been effected. Re-insurance is altogether a separate and distinct matter from the original insurance, and has always been so treated by merchants and others desiring to be insured, and also by the underwriters who insure them; and indeed some underwriters, as was proved in evidence here, will have nothing to say to a re-insurance. Again, the intention of the parties must be taken into consideration in constraining the contract between them, and it is clear that the defendant never contemplated re-insuring a previously insured risk. It is no mere formal or fanciful objection, for there are substantial difficulties in practice involved in the question; as, for instance, the fact that others than the defendant will have the settling and adjusting of the loss in their hands. [BRAMWELL, B.—Why did not the defendant protect himself, as he might easily have done, by inserting in the policy the words "warranted not a re-insurance?"] The fact of its being a re-insurance may not be material to the risk in one sense, but it is material to the under-writer to know it. It may reasonably be very important to him to be acquainted with the character of the party originally insured, and with all the circumstances connected with the insurance, and it being the usual practice, both in England and in foreign countries, to mention the fact, he might be well misled by the statement of the fact being withheld from him; and moreover the knowledge might have increased the rate of premium. The authorities are not so entirely in favour of the plaintiff as has been contended on the other side. For instance, in 1 Arnould, p. 225, chap. 5, part 1, sect. 3, it is said, "It is a rule, founded on very sound principles, that every contract of insurance ought distinctly to specify the subject intended to be insured, whether it be ship, goods, freight, profit, money advanced on bottomry and respondentia, or other interest," thus showing that the fact of its being a re-insurance ought to be mentioned. The conclusion drawn by Mr. Phillips, in par. 498, that "the better doctrine is that the fact need not be mentioned," is relied on by the plaintiff; but it is submitted that the cases cited by the writer do not fully bear out or support his conclusion. In a former part, too, of that same section (498) he quotes Mr. Christian as saying (2 Blackst. Com. 460 n.), "a re-assurance must be expressly mentioned to be a re-assurance in the policy": (Andree and others v. Fletcher, 2 T. Rep. 161). [BRAMWELL, B.—Supposing goods in charge of a carrier are destroyed by means which relieve him from all liability, would he be able to recover their value on an insurance effected by him? Certainly he would. He could, without setting up the special defence, recover the value and pay it over to the owners. Carriers have a special property and possession as bailees in goods intrusted to them for carriage, and as such bailees may maintain trover, and it is as such bailees that they may insure the goods: (The London and North Western Railway Company v. Glyn, 1 El. & El. 652; 28 L. J. 188, Q. B.) The case of Anderson v. Morice, cited on the other side, is merely a decision that there was an insurable interest in the plaintiff in that particular case. [POLLOCK, B.—Here the plaintiff contends that if the subject matter of the insurance is fairly stated to the underwriter, it is immaterial to him who the owner is, or whether he knows who he is or not.] There is a plain, broad, and well recognised distinction between a first insurance on goods, and a re-insurance of the previous risks, and the latter amounts to an indemnity on an indemnity. The case of Glover v. Black in 3 Burr., is strongly in favour of the principle contended for by the defendant, as is also the American case of New York Bowery Insurance Company v. New York Fire Insurance Company (47 Wendell Rep. 359). It would be monstrous to hold a man bound when he never meant to be, and would not have entered into the contract at all had he known the real fact. The plaintiff is not the owner of and has no interest in the goods themselves; but the language of the policy means, and all merchants and underwriters would understand it to mean, by usage and custom, an interest in the goods themselves, and not a mere interest in the safe arrival of the ship. The learned judge, in construing the words "material to the risk," said that "the risk" meant anything affected by the question of the completion of the adventure in safety; but the defendant contends it was material to the risk in this way, that, without affecting the defendant's mind with respect to the risk whether the goods arrived in safety or not, yet it might be material in this sense, that persons are unwilling to take re-insurances owing to the practical difficulties which arise in settling the claim.

Cur. adv. vult.

Subsequently in the course of the day, the following oral judgments were delivered:

BRAMWELL, B.—We think that the defendant's rule should be discharged. It is undoubtedly a case in which, if we took a longer time to consider our judgment, a considerable amount of research and learning might be expended upon it; but we think it better, having made up our minds upon the question, and believing that further inquiry and research would not alter the conclusion at which we have arrived, to express our opinion at once, which is, as I have already said, that this rule should be discharged.

It must be admitted, as a general rule, that what should be contained in a policy of marine insurance is, the subject matter insured, the risk, the voyage, and the perils insured against, and then the assured, if challenged, must show what his interest is. Now a policy of insurance is a document which is said to have a meaning attached to it only by custom; but if one were to prepare a new document of the kind, one would say that on consideration of so much paid by the assured to the underwriter, the latter undertakes that if certain goods do not arrive in safety he will pay 100*l.*, or that to the extent of 100*l.* he will be an assurer to the assured for the amount of his loss against certain perils. That means, as I said before, that there should be stated in the policy the subject matter insured, the risk, the voyage, and the perils, insured against. Now that has been done in this case, because the plaintiff says "What I want to be guaranteed against is the non-arrival of, or danger to, certain goods upon a certain voyage, in respect of certain perils."

It is, therefore, rather for the defendant to make out that in this case there is some cause for an exception to that general rule, than for the plaintiff to make out that he has done all that is necessary. It is a presumption that the plaintiff has in his favour, and it is for the defendant to make out the exception. The defendant seeks to make it out upon the ground which, if it exists, is, to my mind, rather a ground which goes to the proof of interest than anything else. He seeks to make the exception out in this case by saying that the plaintiff ought to have stated what the assurance was on, and that goes to the question of concealment. He says "It is true that you, the plaintiff, were interested in the safe arrival of these goods, and that you would be damaged by their non-arrival, or their arrival in a damaged condition; but you have concealed from me a material fact, namely, that your interest was not what I supposed it to be—namely, that you were the owner of the goods; but that your interest was that of a re-insurer of them."

Now, I cannot help thinking that the case is in this sort of dilemma: If that is a good reason for the underwriter to advance, then the jury ought to have found for the defendant upon the ground of concealment, and I can certainly imagine that there may be some very good reasons why a jury should so find, and find that it was material for an under-writer to know that he was insuring not the value of the goods in which the assured was solely interested, but that the plaintiff was the underwriter himself and already the assurer of the goods. If it is immaterial, then clearly one cannot very well see why it should be stated in any shape, and we ought not to be ready to introduce another anomaly into the law of assurance, when the withheld fact is an immaterial one; and more especially that ought not to be done when it is borne in mind that the underwriter, if he thinks fit, for what may be called a whim, or for a consideration which a jury may think to be immaterial or unimportant, may insert in the policy the words "Warranted not a re-insurance." The case then stands thus:—If it is material the jury ought to have found against the assured, on the ground of concealment; and if it is immaterial an anomaly ought certainly not to be introduced, as confessedly this would be one, into the law of insurance, especially when the underwriter, if he saw fit to do so, might have guarded against what he chooses to take either a real or fanciful objection to.

MACKENZIE v. WHITWORTH.

But now, what is the state of the authorities on this subject? It appears to me that they are strongly in favour of the plaintiff. We have the case of a carrier, who is at liberty to insure goods without stating the nature of his interest in the things insured, in the same way that the owner of them would do, and without stating his insurance to be in respect of his liability over to the owner of goods. I say that the insurance is in respect of that, because I have not forgotten the ingenious argument addressed to us first by Mr. Baylis, and then by Mr. Herschell, that he is a bailee of the goods, and has property in them, and may maintain trover, and all that sort of thing. I think the answer to that is this, that if he insured nothing but what might be called his proprietary or possessory interest in the goods, and if he did sustain damage, he could recover a nominal amount only; but the fact that he is entitled to recover a substantial amount shows that he is insuring in respect of his interest as insurer himself, and as a person liable over to the owner of the goods. Then there are the other authorities that have been cited. There are the cases of mortgagor and mortgagee of a ship. They are not both owners. In truth the mortgagee of a ship is only interested in having lent money on the ship, and having a sufficient title in him to enable him to insure. It is not necessary to multiply cases. It must be admitted that the general rule is that which I have stated, namely, to specify the subject-matter in the safety of which you are interested, and not your interest in it. Then there are the authorities which Mr. Benjamin referred to, and particularly the authority of Phillips; where it is said that this is the general law, as undeniably it is the law in America. Now the only authority relied upon by the defendant to the contrary of that proposition is a case that we must treat with great respect; but the principle of the decision in which, I declare I do not quite see or rightly understand. I can see the convenience of it, as I can see the convenience of the statement here; but I do not see or rightly understand its principles. I mean the case of Glover v. Black (3 Burr. 1394), where it was held that respondentia must be insured eo nomine, and that it is not sufficient to insure the goods. That was so held under very peculiar circumstances, namely, in consequence of there being an understanding amongst merchants that when one insured respondentia, it was done eo nomine, and it was not said that it was the safe arrival of the goods that was insured. The court there held, and Lord Mansfield said (I believe my brother Pollock has looked into that case more minutely than I have done) that after consulting with many merchants it was so understood; and I dare say that, at that time of day, if it was thought that a wrong had been done, they were not so particular in looking at the issues raised. But, however, I do not see how the practice of merchants made the statement in the policy an erroneous one. However, there it is. If this were a case of respondentia, we should be bound by that decision, and we should act upon it, and leave a court of error to deal with it; but this is not a question of respondentia, and Lord Mansfield himself, in that case, expressly stated that it was not to be supposed that they were laying down any general rule; and that case certainly has not been acted upon as laying down any general rule; for, if it had been, the case of a carrier insuring must have been cited.

It seems to me that we are now invited to introduce what Lord Mansfield in that case called a second anomaly, and I do not see any sufficient reason for our so doing; and, therefore, in my judgment, the defendant's rule ought to be discharged.

POLLOCK, B.—I also am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to our judgment in this case.

The finding of the jury was that there was no concealment on the part of the plaintiff, whose clerk put forward the insurance, by reason of his not stating that it was a re-insurance; and this carries with it considerable weight, because it excludes any argument that might arise, in fact or in substance, on the part of the plaintiff, which would tend to show that there was any substantial increase of the risk or anything to increase the rate of insurance in consequence of that fact being withheld. That, therefore, is a starting point. Then comes the real question, which has been argued very fully in this case, whether, by the known practice of underwriters, or by the law of England, a person who is going to re-insure goods that he himself has already insured, is bound to state that it is a re-insurance. It is said that he ought to state that fact. Now, is there any authority for so saying? So far as I have been able to find there is none.

Re-insurance certainly is a thing which must have been known from the time that insurance itself was first known, and, with the exception of our municipal law, which, for some reason, for a certain period of time, prohibited re-insurance, re-insurances have taken place all over the mercantile world. Now, so far as I know, the necessary parts of a contract of insurance on the part of the assured are, that he shall state the subject matter, or, as it is called by the old French writers, the "aliment" of the insurance, which, I suppose, means the subject matter; and, before he can proceed to recover the fruits of his insurance, he is bound to go further and show what the interest is. Now I find it laid down in vol. 1 of Emerigon's Traité des Assurances, chap. 8, sect. 14, tit. "Re-assurance," that it shall be lawful for the assurers to re-assure with others the effects which they shall already have assured.

MACKENZIE v. WHITWORTH.

[Ex.]

The learned author does not say to assure their interest, but to assure "the effects" already insured; and he cites for that proposition old French and Spanish "ordinances," and several old French authorities, as Guidon de la Mer (ch. 2, art. 19), Valin, and Pothier's Traité du Contrat d'Assurance. The same law is laid down also in the Code de Commerce, art. 342, "Des Assurances"; and the same authorities and others are there referred to. In the English law we have many illustrations of this. We have, as my brother Bramwell has mentioned, the case of carriers, who have a special interest; the cases of vendor and vendee, of whom it might be predicated that only one could be the real possessor of the goods, but as to whom, substantially, there might be a very great question who was in possession of the real property of the goods at the time. No such point has been taken as that the vendor or the vendee ought to have insured according as the property was in the one or the other. Then there is the case of mortgagor and mortgagee. These are not conflicting but independent interests. And further than this, we have the case of Glover v. Black (ubi sup.), and the case cited by Mr. Benjamin of Reed v. Cole (3 Burr. 1512), in which a person who was a member of an insurance club, had actually parted with his vessel. It was held that he was entitled upon the re-insurance to recover because he was still a member of the club, and, therefore, was an insurer; but his interest was that he himself had undertaken and agreed to pay 500*l.* if a loss happened within three months. Now, in that sense, he was no more the owner of the vessel than any other person; he was a perfect stranger. He had, at the time of the sale, undertaken to pay 500*l.* if the vessel was lost. Lord Mansfield, who was then a member of the court, and it was a very short time after the earlier decision in Glover v. Black, came to the conclusion that he was entitled to recover, although there was no mention in the policy of anything except the ship. That satisfies me that in the present case there was properly set forth the subject-matter of the insurance, and that that was all that was required.

Our attention was called to the earlier decision of Lord Mansfield in the case of Glover v. Black, and in that case, no doubt, it was held that persons who advanced money on respondentia could not insure without stating who was the lender of the money upon respondentia, nor by merely stating the fact that it was upon goods. It is worth while, perhaps, to observe, with all respect to a decision like this, that long before that there had been great jealousy, apparently not unnatural, with regard to insurance, both by those who borrowed and those who lent money on bottomry and respondentia, because it was a very common thing, not merely to borrow money for the exigencies of the voyage, but a merchant would very often ship goods as a mere adventurer, and borrow money which he was able to take advantage of, and would then insure himself, having all the while no interest in the voyage. And then very often, too, the lender of the money insured, not only the money which he had lent, but also the maritime interest that would be added to it if the voyage were successfully accomplished. All the writers seem to have set their faces against this. It is discussed in the works of both Emerigon and Pothier, and forms the subject of Article 347 in the Code de Commerce. That being so the case came before one of our courts, and it was very fully discussed, and undoubtedly it was found then to be the custom and general usage of merchants. All that Lord Mansfield said was, that he was very much inclined at first to support the policy; and in conclusion he said that the ground of the present resolution of the court was, that it was established now, as the law and practice of merchants, that respondentia and bottomry must be mentioned and specified in the policy of insurance; but at the same time declared that the court did not mean to determine generally that no special interest in goods might be given in evidence in other cases than those of respondentia and bottomry, if the circumstances of the case should admit of it. It seems to me that Lord Mansfield intended to make that exception; and it is somewhat remarkable that some years after a case occurred of insurance on respondentia interest, in which the words were merely on "goods, specie, and effects." I allude to the case of Gregory v. Christie (3 Doug. 749; cited also in 1 Park on Marine Insurance, 7th edit. pp. 14 and 33). In that case it was held that the assured, having insured in general words, "goods, specie, and effects," was entitled to recover. There is no doubt, therefore, that those cases depended upon what was the practical interpretation of respondentia and bottomry; and they mean, as it seems to me, that respondentia and bottomry rested on some peculiar ground. To my mind, no special or peculiar ground attaches to the present case.

We come, then, to the consideration of the more open question here, whether it was or not material to be known, and then directly that is so, cadit quaestio, because that fact is found by the jury, and found in favour of the plaintiff.

Upon these grounds I think the plaintiff is entitled to our judgment, and that the defendant's rule must be discharged.

AMPLETT, B.—I am of the same opinion, although I admit that in the course of the argument my mind has varied considerably, and that I have had much doubt upon the question; but from all that has appeared during the course of the case, and from the opinions of my learned brothers, I am now satisfied that my doubts were not well founded, and I therefore agree that this rule should be discharged.

But the difficulty which I felt was really upon the only question before us, namely, whether the subject matter of the insurance was sufficiently described in this policy. It appeared to me at first, and it is a common apprehension, that there is a great difference between an insurance on goods and an insurance against the risk which the first insurer has to run. Cases might be put in which the two things are not by any means identical; as, for instance, if the first policy had been for any reason void, for fraud, or anything of that sort, undoubtedly the second policy could not be recovered upon, because the matter insured was the risk which the first insurer ran. However, I think that the proper answer to that is that it is merely a limitation of the liability to the second insurer, and does not make his insurance less upon the goods themselves.

Then comes the question, and the more serious one, whether or not the custom that is said to prevail that it should always be mentioned in the policy that it is a re-insurance would affect the case; and I agree with what my learned brothers have said, that a very great deal may be said in favour of that view, not upon the question whether as a matter of law the policy would be void, but whether there had been a concealment on the part of the insurer in not mentioning the fact. I say that there is a good deal to be said, because it is impossible not to see that there would be great convenience in mentioning it; and although, with reference to the second insurer the risk may be the same, the convenience of the second insurer, with regard to various things that may occur, such as adjusting and other circumstances, would be very much more consulted if he knew that he was insuring against the risk of the first insurer, and not upon the goods themselves.

It was also attempted to be argued, and with great force before the jury, that there is a notion very generally prevailing, that it would be right and proper that the fact of a second insurance should be mentioned. We have the Act of Geo. 2, by which re-insurance was prohibited generally, though certain instances in which it may be done are there specified; but it is said that where it so arises it should be mentioned in the policy. Then we find from the text books that such a law (and I think I may put it as far as that) prevails in the civilised world; and I do not except New York from the expression "civilised world;" but then we find that in America there are decisions both ways; at least in New York one way, and another way in Massachusetts. No doubt, therefore, there is a very general notion prevailing that it is right and proper that, where there is a re-insurance it should be mentioned in the policy.

But then we have that which is equivalent to the finding of the jury, because it is admitted by Mr. Benjamin, and it was not pressed to its ultimate result at the trial and the opinion of the jury taken upon it, that there is a usage and general custom in England to mention the fact of its being a re-insurance. All these were topics for the jury, and no doubt operated on their minds, and they found that there was no undue concealment. No rule was obtained upon that part of the case, and we must, therefore, I think, assume the finding of the jury to be correct.

Upon the whole, however, notwithstanding the doubts which I have entertained during the greater part of the argument, I agree with my learned brothers that this rule ought to be discharged.

Rule discharged.

STUART AND ANOTHER v. THE BRITISH AND AFRICAN STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY.

Carriers by sea—Vessel with goods on board lost while assisting another vessel in distress—Liability of shipowner to owner of goods—Bill of lading—Clause in bill of lading giving "liberty to tow and assist vessels in all situations"—Transshipment of goods on voyage from one vessel to another—"Goods to be transhipped and forwarded at ship's expense but shipper's risk"—Meaning of the clause—Deviation.

The plaintiffs shipped goods at Liverpool on board the Liberia, a steam vessel, belonging to the defendant company, to be carried, for freight, payable by the plaintiffs to the defendants, to Benin, on the coast of Africa, which goods, on the arrival of the Liberia at Bonny, were, in the usual course of the defendants' business and according to the terms of the bills of lading, transhipped on board the Kwara, a small branch steamer belonging to the defendants, to be forwarded thereby to their destination at Benin. The Kwara, with the plaintiff's goods on board, left Bonny, and proceeded on her voyage to Benin, calling on her way at Brass, where she had both to discharge and to take in cargo. Whilst lying in the harbour at Brass, and after having discharged and taken in cargo, and within two or three hours of being ready to proceed on her onward voyage to Benin, the Kwara was taken by her captain, at the request of the captain and owners of another vessel, to the mouth of the Brass river, some three miles from the harbour, for the purpose of towing off such other vessel which had got stranded on the breakers in attempting to cross the bar at the entrance of the river, and in her efforts to tow that vessel off, the Kwara herself, in consequence of her screw getting fouled with a rope, was wrecked, and the plaintiff's goods were lost. It did not appear that human life was in any imminent danger, or that the assistance of the Kwara was sought for, except to save property.

The bill of lading, given by the defendants on receiving the goods at Liverpool, contained a clause giving to their vessels "liberty to tow and assist vessels in all situations;" and also a memorandum, in the margin as follows: "The within goods to be transhipped at Bonny, and forwarded to destination by branch steamer at ship's expense but shipper's risk."

In an action by the plaintiffs to recover the value of their goods they obtained a verdict, with leave to the defendants to move to enter it for themselves, and on argument it was Held, by the Court of Exchequer (Bramwell, Pollock, and Amphlett, B.B.), making absolute the rule to enter the verdict for the defendants: First, that, under the express words of the clause in the bill of lading giving liberty "to tow and assist vessels," &c., the Kwara was justified and protected in going to the assistance of the other vessel in the manner and under the circumstances stated; and,

Secondly, that the words in the margin of the bill of lading "at shipper's risk," applied, as did also the words "at ship's expense," to the transshipment only of the goods from the one vessel to the other at Bonny, and not to the "forwarding of them from Bonny to Benin."

This was an action brought by the plaintiffs against the defendants, to recover the value of certain goods shipped by the plaintiffs for Benin, by the steamships Liberia, Congo, Senegal, and Kwara, respectively, belonging to the defendants, and which goods were lost or damaged in the steamship Kwara, under the circumstances hereinafter stated.

The declaration contained four counts. The first count charged that the plaintiffs delivered to the defendants certain goods of the plaintiffs, to be by the defendants safely and securely shipped and carried from Liverpool to Benin, certain perils and casualties only excepted, for freight therefor payable by the plaintiffs to the defendants, the said goods to be shipped at Liverpool as aforesaid on board a certain ship called the Liberia, to be carried thereon to Bonny and to be forwarded and sent from Bonny aforesaid to Benin aforesaid by branch steamer; and that the defendants were not prevented from so shipping, carrying, transshipping, and delivering the said goods by any of the perils or casualties aforesaid; and that all conditions, &c., to entitle the plaintiffs to have the said goods safely and securely carried and delivered by the defendants as aforesaid; yet the defendants did not safely and securely carry and deliver the said goods as aforesaid, but so negligently and improperly conducted themselves in the premises that thereby divers of the said goods became and were, during the said voyage, wholly lost to the plaintiffs; and the plaintiffs were obliged to pay salvage in respect of the remainder of the said goods, and such remainder were greatly damaged and rendered of little or no use or value to the plaintiffs. The second and third counts were similar with respect to goods shipped on board the steamships Congo and Senegal respectively.

The fourth count charged that in consideration of the plaintiffs causing to be shipped on board the ship Kwara, in parts beyond the seas, to wit in the port of Bonny, certain goods of the plaintiffs in good order and well conditioned for the purpose, and on the terms thereafter mentioned, the defendants, by a bill of lading made on the 16th June 1873, by the defendants, by their agent in that behalf and delivered to the plaintiffs, promised the plaintiffs that the goods of the plaintiffs in the said bill of lading mentioned, and then so shipped as aforesaid, should be delivered in like good order and condition at Benin, certain perils and casualties only excepted, to the plaintiffs, they paying freight for the same as in the said bill of lading mentioned. Averments that the delivery of the said goods was not prevented by any of the perils or casualties aforesaid, and that all conditions, &c. Breach assigned, the non-delivery of the said goods, &c., to the plaintiffs at Benin, in such good order, &c., and loss and damage to the plaintiffs, &c., as in the first count.

Pleas to all the said counts.—First, denying the delivery of the goods by the plaintiffs to the defendants upon the terms, or for the purposes in the said counts respectively alleged; secondly, denying the breaches in the same counts respectively alleged; thirdly, that the defendants were precluded from carrying and delivering the goods by the excepted perils and casualties; fourthly, that the goods were delivered to the defendants, as in the said counts respectively mentioned, upon the terms of a bill of lading whereby it was provided amongst other things, that the goods should be transshipped at Bonny and forwarded to their destination by branch steamer at ship's expense, but at shipper's risk. And the defendants say that the loss and damage to the said goods, in the said counts respectively mentioned, were occasioned without the neglect or default of the defendants after the transshipment of the same at Bonny, and while the same were being forwarded to Benin at the shipper's risk, within the true intent and meaning of the said bill of lading in that behalf.

Upon all the above pleas respectively issue was taken and joined.

At the trial before Pollock, B., and a special jury, at the Liverpool Summer Assizes, 1874, a verdict was found for the plaintiffs for the damages in the declaration; leave being given to the defendants to move to enter a verdict for them, if the court should be of opinion that the defendants are liable, the question of damages to be referred to a legal arbitrator (named), who in his discretion might state a special case as to the proper measure of damages and the principle of assessing them, at the request of either party.

The following appeared to be the admitted facts of the case as agreed between the parties to be taken as on the learned judge's notes.

The plaintiffs are African merchants carrying on their business at Liverpool and on the West Coast of Africa, at Bonny, Brass, Benin, and elsewhere on that coast, under the firm of Stuart and Douglas. The defendant company are the owners of a line of steamers trading between Liverpool ^{and} Glasgow and the West Coast of Africa, and they conduct their trade in the following manner:

All goods shipped in England are sent by the large mail steamer as far as Bonny, and there the company have floating warehouses and hulks, into which all goods for towns and ports up the shallow rivers are stored. A branch steamer belonging to the defendants plies between Bonny and the smaller ports, and by it the goods are forwarded to their ultimate port of destination. In June 1873, this branch steamer was the steam ship Kwara.

The goods mentioned in the first three counts of the declaration, were shipped by the plaintiffs, by the defendants' steamers from Liverpool for Benin direct, and for such shipments the plaintiffs received from the defendants bills of lading dated as follows: 5th April 1873, per Liberia; 17th April 1873, per Congo; and 6th May 1873, per Senegal. The plaintiffs on the 24th April 1873, made a fourth shipment of goods to Bonny by the African Steamship Company's steamer Calabar, and such fourth shipment was transshipped at Bonny on board the defendant's steamer Kwara, to be carried from Bonny to Benin, for which shipment the plaintiffs received from the defendants a bill of lading dated the 16th June 1873. The fourth count is in respect of these last mentioned goods. The goods per Liberia, Congo, and Senegal, arrived safely at Bonny, and were there transshipped on board the Kwara on or about the 16th of June 1873, as appears from the Kwara's manifest, and log. No bills of lading were given by the Kwara for the goods so transshipped, no new bills of lading being ever given on the transshipment at Bonny on board the branch steamer of goods shipped in England on through bills of lading for Benin.

The Kwara left Bonny on or about the 18th June 1873, and about seven p.m. of the same day she brought up outside the bar of the Brass River. On the following morning, the 19th June, the Kwara crossed the bar and proceeded to discharge what cargo she had for Brass at the factories there. The cargo is discharged there with lighters belonging to the consignees of cargo. On the next day, the 20th June, the Kwara, which had discharged her Brass cargo, and would have proceeded on her voyage to Benin in an hour or two, went to assist a steamer called the Monrovia belonging to the African Steamship Company, which had got aground on the previous day in attempting to cross the bar of the Brass River, and in so doing the Kwara was wrecked with the plaintiffs' goods on board. The circumstances under which such assistance was rendered, and the wreck of the Kwara took place, are described in the following documents which form part of this case, namely, the bills of lading per Liberia, Congo, Senegal, and Kwara, and the log, protest, manifest, and letters of Capt. Tate of the Kwara, of the 27th June 1873, to the owners, the protest of the Monrovia and the examination of the captain of the Monrovia, are to be taken as forming part of the case, and the court are to draw all inferences of fact.

Each of the four bills of lading in this case contained the following clause: "With liberty in the event of the said steamer putting back into any port, or otherwise being prevented from any cause from proceeding in the ordinary course of her voyage, to tranship the goods by any other steamer, and with liberty to sail with or without pilots, and to tow and assist vessels in all situations." And in each of the three bills of lading by the Liberia, the Congo, and the Senegal, mentioned in the first three counts respectively, there was contained the following memorandum: "The within named goods to be transhipped at Bonny, and forwarded to destination by branch steamer at ship's expense but shipper's risk."

The following is a copy of so much of the letter of Capt. Tate, the master of the Kwara, of the 27th June 1873, from Benin to Messrs. Elder and Co., of Liverpool, detailing the circumstances under which the loss of the Kwara occurred, as is material to the report:—

On the morning of the 19th June, having been informed that the steamship Monrovia was on the western breakers, entrance to Brass River the Kwara being in Brass at the time, I was requested by H. O. Carey, Esq., agent for company of African merchants, to take steamship King Massala out the following morning to render assistance to the steamship Monrovia, if possible, which I complied with, and took the King Massala out, and anchored in two and a quarter fathoms water. Went on board the Monrovia in company with Messrs. Carey, Minns, and Brodie, also the recognized Brass pilot Cameroons, saw Capt. Mansel, master of the Monrovia, and made an agreement with him, before Carey and Minns, to take the King Massala back into the harbour, as that vessel had not power enough to tow him off, and to bring the steamship Kwara out to try and tow the Monrovia off the breakers, all claim for such service to be settled between the two companies at home. I, accordingly, took the King Massala into the harbour, and went out with the steamship Kwara, anchored in two fathoms water, astern of the Monrovia, and got that vessel's rope on board the Kwara, hove up the anchor, and turned the engine astern. The Monrovia having a rope out astern, our propeller picked it up, and the chief engineer reported to me that the engines were immovable. I immediately lowered the quarter-boat, and went, with five Kroomen, to try and see the fan, having first let go the anchor again. The swell being too strong, I could not get near the ship's stern; the boat got a broadside to the swell, and turned over, throwing us all into the water, when the Monrovia's lifeboat came and picked us up, and put us on board the Kwara. I then took the chain to the capstan to heave the anchor up and make sail into the harbour, but was unable to heave the chain in, the capstan gear carrying away at this time; the ship bumping on the breakers, I slipped the chain at forty-five fathoms, and made all sail for the river. The ebb tide then coming out, I let go the anchor in two fathoms water, port anchor veered out to fifty fathoms, when the chain parted; bent the gedge on to the 6in. hawser and let it go, but the hawser parted as soon as a strain came on it. Made all sail again, but found the ship driving on the west point of Brass River, and after striking heavily for some time, she stuck fast.

At low water, endeavoured to clear the fan, but only partially succeeded, as a heavy surf was then running in; I then ran the cargo anchor out with the remainder of the hawser bent on to it. At high water again tried with the engines, but fan still foul, was unable to do anything, although heaving on the hawser at the same time; we then hove all cargo overboard. At low water again tried, and succeeded in clearing the fan. At the rising tide tried again with the engines, and heaving on the hawser, but the anchor came home and the engines stopped, all the sea connections being choked with sand. At dark we abandoned the ship, she being, from the first moment of going on the beach, surrounded with armed natives, who, as soon as we were out of the ship, rushed on board, and commenced plundering and breaking up the fittings. Messrs. Curphy and Whitehouse, the agents for Stuart and Douglas, were down on the beach with their Kroomen, and rescued a large quantity of the cargo, and kept the natives at bay until dark, but they now refuse to give up the cargo.

The account of the transaction, as it appeared from the log of the Kwara, the protest of Captain J. O. Tate, the master, and J. F. Brown, the chief officer of the Kwara, concerning the loss of that vessel, and the declaration of Francis Wilkinson, the chief engineer of the Kwara, as well as from the protest of John Coward, the master, and T. W. Norman, the chief officer of the Monrovia, and the examination of the said J. Cavard, taken in pursuance of a judge's order, respecting the stranding of the Monrovia, was substantially the same as that detailed in the before mentioned letter of Captain Tate. From all of these documents it appeared clear that the Monrovia was in a very dangerous position, though not in such an one that there was any immediate danger to the life of anyone on board; and that, had not the accident of the Kwara's screw becoming fouled in the Monrovia's ropes occurred, the Kwara would undoubtedly have succeeded in towing the Monrovia off the breakers, and would then have returned into harbour, completed the getting her cargo on board, and have proceeded on her voyage to Benin. The Monrovia, it appeared, was afterwards gotten off the breakers, and, her damages being repaired, she returned to England.

In Michaelmas Term last, Benjamin, Q.C., on the part of the defendants, in pursuance of leave reserved, moved for and obtained a rule nisi to set aside the plaintiffs' verdict, and to enter the verdict for the defendants, on the ground that the admitted facts showed that the plaintiffs had no legal claim to recover any damages against the defendants, and against that rule

Herschell, Q.C. and R. Thompson, for the plaintiffs, now showed cause.—Three questions were raised on this rule. The first was whether, apart from the terms of the bill of lading, the defendants were justified at common law, as against the plaintiffs the owners of the goods, in deviating as they did for the purpose of assisting the ship Monrovia. Secondly, whether, if they were not justified at common law in so doing, they were justified under the following words of the clause in the bill of lading, "with liberty to tow and assist vessels in all situations;" and, thirdly, whether those words would apply in a case like the present where, at the time of the deviation, the goods were, in accordance with the memorandum in the margin of the bill of lading being carried "at shipper's risk." It is contended on the part of the plaintiffs that the defendants were not authorised in what they did, either by the terms of the bill of lading, or at common law; and further, that the words, "at shippers' risk," apply only to the ordinary course of the voyage. This was not done in the course of the voyage nor was it a deviation for the purpose of saving life. What the defendants did does not come within the terms of the contract. They were not to be at liberty to assist other ships in all possible situations, and under all possible circumstances; they would not be justified, under the terms of the bill of lading, in going out of their course to help a vessel in distress. If they met with one in the course of their voyage the case would be different. [AMPHLETT, B.—It must be a reasonable deviation. BRAMWELL, B. Suppose the Monrovia had been lying only a hundred yards off, do you say the Kwara could not have gone to her assistance?] It is a matter admitting of very much doubt whether she could have done it. It is an exception which must be construed most strictly against the shipowner as it is one in his favour. There must be some limitation put upon it, otherwise it would be competent to the shipowner to take the cargo owner's goods into extreme peril, to the latter's loss, the shipowner himself being benefited by receiving a large sum of money for salvage, and it is obviously unfair that goods should be exposed to peril without any prospect of sharing in the salvage. There is a plain distinction between the case of a vessel on her voyage seeing another ship in distress and going to her aid, and the way in which the present act of assistance was rendered. Then, with regard to the clause as to the goods being "transshipped at Bonny and forwarded to destination by branch steamer at ship's expense, but shipper's risk." These latter words import a new bargain as to the transshipped goods, it is an entirely new and independent contract. The words mean all risk quoad the general voyage, and not any risk which the shipowner would choose to put upon the shipper. Where goods are carried at the shipper's risk the shipowner has no right to put any extra risk on him. [BRAMWELL, B.—The words "at ship's expense," cannot, I think, apply to the forwarding, for that the defendant had already undertaken, but to the transshipment, and if so, do not the words "at shipper's risk" also apply only to that and not to the forwarding.] It is submitted that the words would be needless if they do not apply in the way in which it is contended on the plaintiff's behalf that they do apply. The case of Lawrence and others v. Sydebotham (6 East, 45), and particularly the judgment of Lawrence, J., at p. 53, shows how strictly the courts will construe a power of deviation of this kind. See also the case of The True Blue, and the judgment of the judicial committee of the Privy Council, delivered by Dr. Lushington, (L. Rep. 1 P. C. C. 254), where it is stated that the American courts draw a distinction between a deviation to save life and one for the ordinary salvage of goods only. [POLLOCK, B.—Human life is beyond all price; but the salvage of goods is a different matter, and the saving of property is the earning a profit to the salvors.] In the face of the American cases and in the absence of any express English authorities, we will not ask the court to hold that there is no distinction, but then the defendants are bound to make out expressly that there was in the present case imminent danger to human life at the moment. Now here it is plain that the object of the Kwara's going out was not to save life, but to earn money by getting the ship and cargo off the bar, and it is submitted that as against the plaintiffs, the defendants had no right, under the bill of lading, to do what was done on that occasion.

Benjamin, Q.C., and Crompton, for the defendants, contra, supported their rule.—[BRAMWELL, B.—We should like to hear you, Mr. Benjamin, on the point relating to this clause in the bill of lading giving liberty to the vessel "to tow and assist" vessels in distress, and, if you can give it to us, we should like to have a definition of the power, showing when and how far a vessel may go to the assistance of another?] These words "with liberty to tow and assist vessels in all situations" were put in here on purpose to render a deviation, in order to save property lawful, and to render untenable any objection such as that which has been taken by the cargo owners in the present case. The clause expressly enables the ship to do what the Kwara has here done, and for doing what she would, but for this clause, have been answerable. (He was here stopped.)

BRAMWELL, B.—We will not trouble you any further, Mr. Benjamin, although we should have been glad if you would have given us a rule for the application of this clause in the bills of lading, "with liberty to tow and assist vessels in all situations," telling us to what cases it would and would not extend; but you have declined to do so, and probably with good reason, thinking, no doubt, that it would not be an easy thing to do.

As to one question which has been raised here, namely, whether the ship would have been justified, supposing there had been no such clause in the bill of lading, on the ground of its being an effort to save human life, I do not propose to express any opinion, because I think the bill of lading protects the defendants. I am satisfied, upon the evidence, that this service was not performed with any view or intent to save human life, and that human life was not in danger. One need only read the captain's letter of the 27th Jan. to be satisfied of this. [His Lordship here read the letter, which is set out above in extenso, and then proceeded as follows:] Now, there is not a word in that letter about rescuing the passengers or crew or as to its being an effort made for the purpose of saving human life, or anything to lead us to suppose that human life was in any danger, that is to say in any immediate danger. No doubt, if the Monrovia had remained where she was long enough she would have been knocked to pieces by the action of the surf and the breakers, but there is no ground for supposing that any such catastrophe was immediately imminent, or that what was done was done with the view of saving life.

But it is not necessary to determine that question, because, as I said before, I think that this clause in the bill of lading must be held to protect the defendants under the circumstances. These words were mainly relied upon by Mr. Benjamin, namely, "with liberty to sail with or without pilots, and to tow and assist vessels in all situations." But it was said on the other side, that the defendants' vessel was not at liberty to assist the Monrovia. It certainly is within the words; but then, as was admitted by Mr. Benjamin, and as Mr. Herschel contended, these words must have some limitation put upon them. It would, I imagine, be absurd to contend that, if a vessel were on a whaling expedition to the North Sea, she would be at liberty under this clause to go off to the Cape of Good Hope to assist a vessel which she heard was ashore in that part of the world. There would then no doubt be some limitation and qualification put upon the words. But Mr. Herschell endeavoured to put this qualification upon them, that it must be exclusively something which the vessel meets with in the course of her voyage. That cannot possibly be literally true, because, supposing her on her voyage to have passed another ship and to have gone some three or four miles onward from the spot where the two vessels passed each other, and then that a signal had been given that the ship which she had so passed was on fire, is it conceivable that, under such circumstances as those, she would not have been at liberty to turn back to the assistance of the burning vessel? It is not possible that such can be the proper meaning and construction of this clause.

Now the present case is really almost as strong as the case which I have put. The defendants' ship, as I understand it, is at anchor close to the wharf or landing place at Brass, she has got her steam up, though she is not quite ready to start in continuation of her voyage. This is manifest, because she was taking her cargo on board, but the whole tenor of the argument is that she had not gone out of the harbour, and if she had succeeded in getting the Monrovia off the bar, she would have gone back to her position alongside the wharf again. But nevertheless she was in truth on her voyage. She was at anchor no doubt, but she was on her outward voyage from the port of Bonny to Benin, though at the moment she was at anchor at Brass. She went a distance of some three miles to assist the other vessel, and might have successfully assisted her in the easiest way in the world, but for the unfortunate fouling of the rope in her screw. If she could have given one good tug at the Monrovia, the latter would in all probability have come off.

Then it is said that this proceeding on the part of the Kwara is not protected by this clause in the bill of lading. It seems to me, however, to be impossible to say that it is not. I think Mr. Benjamin might have said for himself that, though it is difficult to draw the precise line, yet that he is a long way on the right side of it.

Then the only remaining question to which we are called upon to address our attention is this: What is the meaning of this clause in the bill of lading—"The within named goods to be transhipped at Bonny and forwarded to destination by branch steamer, at ship's expense but shipper's risk?" Mr. Herschell very ingeniously suggested that these words, "but shipper's risk," would in some way or the other make the defendants better off than if they had not been there. Mr. Benjamin pointed out that the original bill of lading was a through one from Liverpool to Benin, and that no new bill of lading was given when the goods were put on board the Kwara at Bonny at all, but that the original bill was still the governing one. Then it is said, What meaning can be given to these words? The meaning which I give to them is this,—that the goods were to be transhipped at Bonny at the shipper's risk, but they were to be so transhipped at the expense of the ship; and I think that the mentioning of the goods being forwarded to their destination by the branch steamer is only for the purpose of explaining why they are going to be transhipped at all. It seems to me manifest that that is so, not only from the good sense of the thing, but also from this, that it is impossible to say that they would be forwarded to their destination by the branch steamer "at the ship's expense," because they had already undertaken to carry them to that place, and therefore they could not be stipulating that the forwarding was to be "at the ship's expense;" but, inasmuch as the bill of lading mentions that they are to be transhipped, it goes on to say that the transshipment is to be at our (the ship's) expense indeed, but, in the same way as the landing them in the boats or lighters, it is to be at your (the shipper's) risk. I think that that is the meaning of those words.

In the result, it appears to me that the case is governed by the original bill of lading, that that justified the shipowner in what he did on this occasion, and that the memorandum in the margin does not in any way qualify that bill of lading. Consequently the defendants are entitled to our judgment that this rule to enter the verdict for the defendants should be made absolute.

POLLOCK, B.—I quite agree.

The first conclusion which we have to arrive at is, what is the character of the services rendered by this vessel, and those who had the management of her, to the vessel in distress? Now, we have here, by the case, power to draw inferences of fact; and the inference which I draw is that this was, although of a very important character, still but an ordinary salvage service, and not a service specially for the saving of life.

That being so, the next question that we have to determine, the case being removed from any common law right, and brought within, as it can be brought within, the terms into which the parties had entered, is, what is the fair construction to be put upon the words that the vessel is to be at liberty to tow and to assist vessels in all situations." Now, it is no doubt, as it often is in many of these cases, extremely difficult to lay down any general definition which shall answer all circumstances that may arise. The first rule I think in these cases is this: to say that that condition must be one that comes reasonably within the first and great object of the contract. In the words sometimes used by the older writers on the subject, "you must not so construe a condition as to make it eat up the contract." Was then the going to the assistance of the Monrovia in this case, under the circumstances, more than one would expect to have been in the contemplation of the parties when they used these words, "to tow and assist vessels in all situations." In considering that question there are a great many points, no doubt, to be looked at. We must look at the situation, the peril of the vessel which is assisted, and also, at what other means of assistance were available; the sort of place where she may happen to be, and at the position also of the vessel which performs the salvage service. Now, with regard to the latter point, I think it would be safe to say that, if the voyage were actually ended, then this contract between the two parties would be exhausted; and the contract being at an end, the condition which was only a part of the contract, could not be prayed in aid by the salving vessel. But in the present case the Kwara's voyage was not at an end. That the vessel assisted was in great distress there can be no manner of doubt; that there were no other boats or vessels at hand, except the one the King Massala, which did go out to the assistance of the Monrovia, and in doing so got into trouble and ultimately upon the rocks herself, I think also there can be no doubt about. It seems to me, therefore, that in doing what she did, the Kwara did what was reasonably within the contemplation of the parties to this contract, and that it comes within the terms into which they had entered.

THE LORD ADVOCATE v. THE CLYDE STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY.

[H. OF L.]

With regard to the other question, viz., whether, when this took place at that portion of the voyage, the parties were acting under the bill of lading, I have nothing to add to that which has been said by my brother Bramwell. It is a very well known clause that the transshipment of goods is to be "at shipper's risk," and it appears to me only to extend the rights and liabilities of the parties under the bill of lading to the rest of the voyage with this, that any expense that is incurred must be paid by the ship, the risks remaining the same.

On these grounds I agree with my brother Bramwell, in making the defendants' rule absolute.

AMPHLETT, B.—I entirely agree with the judgment of my learned brothers; and really I should have nothing to add but for one argument, which was pressed upon us by the learned counsel for the plaintiffs, namely, that a provision of this sort was entirely for the benefit of the ship which would have made all she could get for salvage. It was said that the owner of the goods would receive none of that consideration, and that it was hardly right for the goods to be put in peril without sharing in the salvage earnings. But I really must take a rather different view of the matter. I consider that a clause of this sort is for the general benefit of the whole body of merchants and others who are having their goods carried upon that dangerous coast. It is not because in the present case the goods have been lost that therefore they can be considered to receive no benefit from a clause like this. It might have been their fate to have been stranded upon this bar, and to have been assisted by the other vessel in the same way as this vessel the Monrovia was assisted, and subsequently saved. I think, therefore, entirely agreeing with all that my learned brothers Bramwell and Pollock have said, that the justice of the case, as well as the law, requires that we should give our judgment in favour of the defendant steamship company.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

March 9 and 11, 1875.

Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Cairns), Lords HATHERLEY and O'HAGAN.)

THE LORD ADVOCATE v. THE CLYDE STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY.

ON APPEAL FROM THE SECOND DIVISION OF THE COURT OF SESSION IN SCOTLAND.

Merchant Shipping Act 1854—Measurement of ship—Tonnage—"Spar deck."

A vessel of the respondents had an upper deck above her main deck, but such upper deck was not continuous from stem to stern of the vessel, and the hatches and other fittings in it were not water-tight.

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that such upper deck was not a third deck or "spar deck" within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 21, sub-sect. 5; and that the space between it and the main deck was not space available for cargo, or for accommodation of passengers or crew, within sub-sect. 4 of the same section of the Act, and consequently should not be reckoned in estimating her tonnage.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Second Division of the Court of Session, affirming a judgment of the Lord Ordinary (Lord Gifford), in favour of the respondents.

The steamship Bear, which gave rise to the action, was built by the respondents in 1870 for the coasting trade, and was then described by the Board of Trade and Customs authorities as a two-decked vessel. She was afterwards altered, and the appellant contended that the effect of the alterations had been to convert her into a three-decked vessel, and that she was chargeable for additional tonnage as such.

The facts appear fully in the judgment of the Lord Chancellor.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Baggallay, Q.C.), The Lord Advocate (Gordon, Q.C.), The Solicitor-General (Sir J. Holker, Q.C.), and Beasley appeared for the appellant.

Southgate, Q.C., and E. Kay, Q.C., for the respondents.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Cairns).—My Lords, the action out of which this appeal arises was instituted by the Lord Advocate of Scotland, on behalf of the Board of Trade and the Board of Customs, against the Clyde Steam Navigation Company, in order to have it declared that the register tonnage of the respondent's steamship Bear should be increased to 634 tons, her present register tonnage being very much less.

The ground upon which this rectification is asked for is that the Bear has an upper or spar deck above the tonnage or main deck, and that the space between the tonnage deck and this upper or spar deck ought to be measured in, in accordance with the rules contained in the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and it is not denied that, if this space ought to be reckoned in the register would require to be rectified as desired.

The 5th sub-division of sect. 21 of that Act provides that "if the ship has a third deck, commonly called a spar deck, the tonnage of the space between it and the tonnage deck shall be ascertained as follows." Then follow rules for measurement. The question then is, has the Bear a third deck, commonly called a spar deck? The condescendence of the appellant affirms that she has.

H. OF L.]

THE LORD ADVOCATE v. THE CLYDE STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY.

No proof was allowed to the respondents in this case, although they desired to have a proof, but the case was by an interlocutor of 18th May 1872, remitted to Mr. Mumford, Lloyd's surveyor at Glasgow, to examine the Bear and to report as to the present state and position of her main deck and of the erections, structures, and coverings thereon, as far as the same relate to that question as to the measurement for registered tonnage. Mr. Mumford made his report, dated 2nd July 1872, and that report and the model referred to in it are the only materials before your Lordships, as regards the facts of the case. It appears that the deck in question "being separated by openings completely across the vessel, and these openings being provided with planks and hatches unsuitable to any weather deck, which are not fastened down or rendered water tight," is not considered by Mr. Mumford to be a continuous deck. Further, that "the doors are not fitted so as to be water tight against any pressure;" and that "the planks, top sills of the doors, &c., covering the cuttings in the deck are not made to fit so as to be efficacious in sheltering the cargo beneath them." It is further stated that "a three-decked ship is usually loaded down, so that her main or middle deck amidships is at, or below, her water line, the usual custom being that her submerged side amidships, measured from the top of the upper deck at the side to the water line, should be 3in. to every foot of her depth of hold. This also applies in a measure to the ventilating side ports in the steerage, and their protection in case of accident. The want of strength and efficiency of the gangway doors, and the position of the steerage side scuttles in the Bear would therefore prevent her from being loaded down, as a three-decked ship, with well-secured ports, may with safety be laden and sent to sea. If loaded regardless of these points, the vessel would be unseaworthy."

I think it clear that the kind of upper or spar deck mentioned in the Act is a continuous deck from stem to stern, fastened down and water tight, sealing up the cylinder formed between the two decks and making it a fit place for the stowage of cargo, like a hold. In the case of the Bear, judging by the evidence and the model, the upper deck plays rather the part of a covering platform for the main or tonnage deck. This covering is fixed for a certain distance from the stem towards the funnel, and from the stern towards the funnel; but there are two gaps in it made quite across the vessel, one before and one behind the funnel, of the respective widths of 13ft. 6in. and 8ft. 6in.; and, as Mr. Mumford observes, the deck is not practically a complete deck for all purposes of safety to the ship and cargo. It is in fact obvious that the Bear being a steamer used for coasting purposes, and chiefly for the conveyance of cattle, this which is called a deck is in reality a covering run along the ship, above, and parallel to the main deck, for the purpose of affording shelter against weather, and at the same time affording a platform, along which the crew can pass in navigating the ship. The cargo between this covering and the main deck is not cargo stowed and sealed up in a hold, but is deck cargo protected against the weather. I am, therefore, of opinion that the Bear has not a third deck, commonly called a spar deck within the meaning of sub-division 5 of sect. 21, so that the tonnage of the space between it and the tonnage deck should be ascertained under that sub-division.

It was then contended that the register tonnage should be increased, under sub-division 4 of the same section. It appears to me that the condescendence of the appellant and his pleas in law are confined to the case advanced under the 5th sub-division to which I have already referred; but even if this were not so, the argument under the 4th sub-division does not appear to me to be capable of being supported. The part of the deck underneath the covering which I have described cannot in any sense be called a "permanent closed-in space on the upper deck available for cargo." It is the whole of the deck underneath the covering, and there is no inclosure or separation of one part of the deck cutting it off from the rest of the deck, nor is it a "space available for cargo" in the sense in which cargo is used, for the purpose of measurement. The cargo underneath this covering would be deck cargo merely. Neither is it "space available for the berthing or accommodation of passengers or crew," nor is it suggested that it has ever been used for that purpose.

On the whole, I am of opinion that this appeal fails, and I submit that it ought to be dismissed with costs.

Lord HATHERLEY.—My Lords, I entirely concur.

The onus of proof, which in all ordinary cases rests upon the pursuer, rests upon him in a very peculiar manner in this particular instance, because he seeks to alter a survey made upon a previous occasion by an official surveyor, which only requires to be revised in respect of certain alterations which had been made in the ship of which the particular matter in question does not form part. Therefore, to decide upon the present occasion against the respondents would be in effect not only to disregard Mr. Mumford's report, but to disregard the view entertained by the surveyor who originally surveyed the ship, and who certainly did not then think of including these erections as coming within either the 4th or 5th sub-sections of the 21st clause of the Merchant Shipping Act.

Lord O'HAGAN.—My Lords, I am of the same opinion.

I have not been at all affected by the considerations of public policy, and the possible results of our decision one way or the other, which have been pressed upon us by the Attorney-General. Such considerations may sometimes be regarded as throwing light on the terms of a statute when they are obscure, and assisting towards an understanding of the intention of its framers. But here we have no difficult question of construction: there is no controversy as to facts, and we have nothing to do but to apply to those facts the plain words of the statute, and carry them into effect, whatever may be the consequences.

The report of Mr. Mumford seems to me to conclude the case in both its branches. He is the sole witness; an expert named by the court, and appealed to for his judgment by both parties. The Crown at least cannot object to his competency and correctness, for they have insisted that by his evidence alone the matter should be determined; and, if it is to be relied on, the Bear is not a three-decked ship according to the contention of the appellant. In her original certificate of registry she was described as a two-decked ship, and rightly so, if Mr. Mumford is warranted in saying that her awning deck is not a continuous deck—is not that which is commonly called a spar deck—and does not, therefore, constitute a third deck within the meaning of the statute. And he makes this still more clear when he states that the Bear cannot, without becoming unseaworthy, be loaded as a three-decked ship can and ought to be loaded; and, if she cannot, it would seem that the measurement of her tonnage should in fairness, as well as in accordance with the terms of the statute, be proportioned to her carrying capacity, and that she should be dealt with as a two-decked vessel.

On the second point, I should have been disposed to hold the Crown precluded from making it at all by the state of the pleadings; but it was considered by the learned judges of the court below and declared to be untenable. I concur in that opinion.

I was struck by an observation of the Attorney-General with reference to the danger of allowing shipowners to escape their proper liabilities by leaving portons of their vessels in an imperfect state so as to keep them unreachably by the exact description of the statute, and yet to make them available for profit on occasion. I am not prepared to say that such a danger may not arise, and that such an evasion ought not, if possible, to be prevented. But in this case I do not find any proof of a purpose of the kind. The respondents deny it, and the sole witness, Mr. Mumford, does not allege it. Upon his testimony it seems impossible to hold that there is, in the place to which the question has reference, a space "permanently closed in" and suitable for the reception of "cargo or stores," or "the berthing or accommodation" of human beings. This is made clear by the report, which describes the place as in a condition wholly unfitting it for the reception of perishable goods, or the safe and reasonably comfortable lodging of passengers or sailors. By that report the Crown has elected to stand, excluding all access to other evidence and means of information, and according to its findings I think that the judgment of the Court of Session was perfectly correct, and ought to be affirmed.

LISHMAN AND OTHERS v. THE NORTHERN MARITIME INSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED).

APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Marineinsurance—"Slip"—Non-disclosure of material fact known to assured after risk accepted, but before policy issued.

A slip being in practice the complete and final contract between the parties to a contract of marine insurance, although not enforceable at law or in equity, there is no obligation on the assured to communicate a material fact which comes to his knowledge after the initialing of the slip and before the issuing of the policy.

The introduction into a policy on freight of a warranty (not in the original slip) for the benefit of underwriters, to the effect that the hull of the ship is not insured beyond a certain amount, does not create a new contract or new risk different from the slip, and therefore does not affect the duty of communication of material facts.

On 11th March, the plaintiffs being shipowners, agreed with the defendants, being underwriters, for the insurance of freight, and a slip or proposal containing all the necessary terms for a complete insurance was drawn up without any question being asked as to the amount of insurance upon the hull of the vessel, and was accepted by the defendants on the same day. On 16th March the ship was lost, and on 17th March the plaintiffs became aware of that loss, and sent to the defendants for a stamped policy in pursuance of the terms of the slip, and then for the first time the defendants inquired to what amount the hull of the ship had been insured. The plaintiffs' clerk gave the required information, viz., that the ship was not insured for more than a named amount after 20th March, and a stamped policy, with the amount insured on the slip inserted in it as a warranty, was delivered to the plaintiffs. No communication was made by the plaintiffs to the defendants of the loss of the ship before or at the time of the delivery of the policy. The plaintiffs having sued upon the policy, the jury found that the risk was accepted by the defendants on 11th March, and that it was not material to make known the loss to the defendants upon 17th March, whereupon a verdict was entered for the plaintiffs.

The Court of Common Pleas discharged a rule to enter a verdict for the defendants, obtained on the ground that the judge ought to have directed the jury as matter of law that the omission to communicate the loss on 17th March was a concealment of a material fact which avoided the policy:

Held (affirming the judgment of the court below), that the judge had not misdirected the jury, and that the addition in the policy on 17th March of a term for the benefit of the underwriter, and not affecting the risk insured, did not prevent the policy from being one drawn up in respect of the risk accepted on the 11th March.

a rule to set aside a verdict entered for the plaintiffs and enter a verdict for the defendants instead thereof. The facts are fully set out in the judgment of Keating, J., in the court below (ante, vol. 1, p. 554; 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 165).

Herschel, Q.C. with him Crompton, for the appellants, the defendants below, again sought to distinguish

The Solicitor-General (Sir John Holker, Q.C.) with him Bruce for the respondents, the plaintiffs below, was not called upon to argue.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the court below ought to be affirmed.

As to the warranty, I think that there was no insurance contrary to the terms of it after 20th March. The utmost for which Mr Herschel can contend is that there was only a right to an insurance optional on the part of the plaintiffs; and as the vessel was lost on 17th March, it is impossible to say that there could be any insurance then to commence at the future date of 20th March.

As to the second question, it is admitted that if there be a complete agreement for insurance in a "slip," and afterwards a policy (good but for the Stamp Acts) be executed in conformity with that slip, if everything material be communicated up to the time of giving the slip, but something material arising between the giving of the slip and the making of the policy is not communicated, in that case the non-disclosure is not fatal to the policy. Thus much being admitted, what the defendants contend for here is this: that if the underwriter when called upon to execute the policy in conformity with the slip, asks for the insertion in the policy of some additional term to which he is not entitled, and the insured thinks fit to consent, the underwriter, by virtue of such consent, gets a title to have communicated to him that which otherwise he would have no title whatever to have communicated to him. Such a contention is contrary to common sense.

It is said that the binding agreement between the parties was made, not at the time of executing the slip, but at the time of inserting the additional term into the policy. But I think that the principle of Cory v. Paton (ubi sup.) and Ionides v. Pacific Insurance Company (ubi sup.) is really applicable to this case, and that the insurance must relate back to the real agreement, notwithstanding the subsequent modification of it, which was purely for the benefit of the defendants.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion.

First, I think it quite clear that the warranty was complied with.

Secondly, as to the concealment. It is a well established rule that the non-disclosure of material facts known to the assured before effecting the insurance, will avoid the policy, on the ground that the utmost good faith must be observed with regard to insurance. Now suppose that a policy were actually executed, and the parties afterwards agreed to alter the terms of it; if the alterations were such as to impose a more burdensome obligation upon the underwriter, and a fact material to the alteration were concealed by the assured, I think that the policy would be avoided by such concealment. On the other hand, if the fact were immaterial to the alteration, and only material to the underwriter as showing him that his bargain had been a bad one in the first instance, I do not see how there could be any obligation upon the assured to disclose such a fact to the underwriter.

Now the stamp law puts it in the power of an underwriter to get out of an engagement which he is bound in conscience to fulfil, and to refuse to execute a policy in conformity with a slip. But it was held in Cory v. Paton (ubi sup.), a decision which has been followed in other cases, and which we now adhere to, that the obligation which the law attaches to the relation of insurer and insured, viz., that up to the time of the insurance material facts must be communicated, must be taken with the qualification, that where there is a previous agreement out of which the policy arises, there the obligation to communicate material facts subsists up to the time of making the agreement, and not up to the time of making the policy. Now, applying the principle of Cory v. Paton (ubi sup.), the facts of the present case make it exactly as if a stamped policy had been executed on 11th March.

I think, therefore, that there was no misdirection on the part of my brother Brett in leaving it to the jury to say whether or not the fact of the loss of the ship was a fact material to the proposed alteration.

MELLOR, J.—I was a party to the decision in Cory v. Paton (ubi sup.), and I think that the reasoning upon which that decision is founded is not only correct, but derives additional strength from the present case. For a short time I thought that the present case was distinguishable, but I am now convinced that it is not.

CLEASBY, B.—The only argument in favour of the defendants that appears to me at all tenable is that when the alteration was made, the parties were not on equal terms. But this difficulty is removed by the finding of the jury, who, being expressly asked whether the loss of the ship was a fact which ought to have been communicated, answered that it was not. Unless we can say that there was no evidence to support that finding, I do not see how we can set it aside.

JEBSEN v. THE EAST AND WEST INDIA DOCK COMPANY.

Action by partners for breach of contract—Gain of individual partners arising from the breach—What may be taken into account in assessing damages—Part owners of ships.

In order to entitle a defendant in an action brought against him by partners for a breach of contract causing damage to the partnership, to take into account a benefit accruing to any of the plaintiffs from such breach, for the purpose of reducing the damages, such benefit must be a joint benefit accruing to the partnership, and it is immaterial for the assessment of damages whether or no individual plaintiffs have actually benefited in other ways from the very default of the defendants for which as a partnership they are suing. Where partnerships sue for breach of contract, the damages must be confined to those sustained by the partnership; and part owners of ships are for the purposes of such an action in the same position as partners.

The plaintiffs, as owners of an emigrant ship, were unable to carry their destined passengers through the defendants' default. Many of the emigrants so lost to the plaintiffs' ship went consequently by another ship, of which also some of the plaintiffs were part owners.

Held, that the true mode of assessing the damages to which the plaintiffs were entitled was to estimate the actual loss to them as owners of the ship delayed by the defendants' breach of contract, and wholly to disregard any gain which those of them who were part owners of the second ship had in consequence made.

DECLARATION: First count, That the plaintiffs are the owners of the steamship Peter Jebesen, and at the time of the making of the promise hereinafter mentioned the said ship was engaged to take in emigrants at Bergen, in the kingdom of Norway, and was about to be unloaded at the port of London, and the plaintiffs were desirous that the said steamship should be unloaded with all possible dispatch, and thereupon, in consideration that the plaintiffs would send the Peter Jebesen in to discharge at the defendants' dock, for reward to the defendants in that behalf, the defendants promised the plaintiffs that they would discharge her fast, that is to say, in two or three days, and the plaintiffs say that they did send the said steamship in to discharge in the defendants' dock, and all conditions were fulfilled and all things happened and existed, and all times elapsed necessary to entitle the plaintiffs to have the defendants perform their said promise, and to have the said vessel discharged fast in accordance with the said promise, and to sue for the breach hereinafter mentioned. Yet the said vessel was not discharged fast, that is to say, in two or three days, but great delay occurred in discharging the same, whereby the plaintiffs were put to great expense, and lost the use of the vessel for a long time, and were called upon to pay large sums in respect of the wages of the captain and crew, and in providing provisions for them, and lost the passage money due and payable by the said emigrants, and were also called upon to pay and paid several large sums in respect of the support of the emigrants, of which the defendants had notice at the time of the making of their said promise.

There were three other counts varying the form of the alleged promise by the defendants respecting the discharge of the vessel all founded on the consideration stated in the first count, and there were also two counts which recited that a considerable delay had arisen after the ship had gone into dock, and stated that thereupon in consideration that the plaintiffs would pay all charges (or 2s. per ton) on the output from the said ship beyond the discharging rate, and would take all risk and responsibility on themselves, the defendants promised to place the steamship alongside the quay in a proper discharging berth, and to land the whole of the cargo forthwith and without further delay; averments of fulfilment of conditions precedent, breach and special damage as in the first count.

Pleas: First, non assumpsit; secondly, denial of the breaches; thirdly, that the defendants were prevented performing their promise by the acts and defaults of the plaintiffs; fourthly, to the fifth and sixth counts that the plaintiffs were not ready and willing to pay the charges on the output of the ship therein mentioned.

Issue thereon.

The plaintiffs, in this action, twelve in number, were the owners of the ship Peter Jebesen, 1450 tons burden, which was built for an emigrant ship to ply between Bergen and New York.

It appeared that the Peter Jebesen and other vessels of the same character and class were built by various bodies of subscribers, and the constitution of ownership was such as to form as it were a company in respect of each ship. Then there were two lines called respectively the Nordske Lloyds and Nordske American lines, and these lines are in the nature of federations of companies, each line adopting the same laws for the companies within it. The lines are thus an association of ships but not of owners; because an owner of a share in a ship of one line, might also be the owner of a share in a ship of the other line. The ship which, on 10th July, as afterwards stated, carried 202 of the emigrants who ought to have sailed in the Peter Jebesen, was called the Harold Harfager, and belonged to the Nordske American line, while the Peter Jebesen belonged to the Nordske Lloyds, as did also the St. Olaf, which took twenty-five of the emigrants, thirteen of the intended number not going at all. The ship Peter Jebesen was divided into thirty-two parts or 192 shares owned by the twelve plaintiffs; the Harold Harfager into 120 parts or 360 shares owned by thirty-three persons; the St. Olaf into 120 parts or 300 shares owned by twenty-six persons.

Five of the twelve plaintiffs were five of the thirty-three owners of the Harold Harfager, and the same five had some shares in the St. Olaf.

In 1872 the Peter Jebesen had carried emigrants out and was to have a return cargo to London, and in June a shipbroker called Lawson was informed that the ship was coming to the port of London, and that he would have to do what was necessary for the vessel, in getting her cargo discharged and clearing her for Bergen. He had previously had to do the same for the St. Olaf, a ship of the same size, and engaged in the same trade, the only difference being that the St. Olaf had brought a full cargo to London, and the Peter Jebesen on this occasion had only an incomplete cargo. The St. Olaf had gone into the East India Docks, and was unloaded in four days. Upon notification of the expected arrival of the Peter Jebesen, Lawson, on the 18th June, applied to the defendants, who were the Dock Company, for the same berth, and for the same dispatch as the St. Olaf had had. He received an answer that she could not have the same berth, but should have equal dispatch. On 21st June, the ship arrived, and went into dock. On the 24th June, Lawson heard that the dispatch was not going on satisfactorily, and went to the docks where he found the ship in an improper position, where rapid discharge was impossible. Thereupon he went to the dock superintendent and complained, he told him of the importance of dispatch in the case of this ship for she had to get to Bergen so as to take the next detachment of emigrants who were to be ready there on July 1st. A discussion ensued, and Lawson was asked if he would pay extra for immediate dispatch and he replied that price was immaterial, and so an agreement was come to that 2s. a ton extra should be paid, and a note was made to the effect that the 2s. should include all charges.

At that time occurred a strike among the dock labourers, and the contract for dispatch was broken, and the ship was not discharged till 4th July. She sailed at once for Bergen, and arrived there on 10th July, and found that another ship had taken on board the emigrants that had been destined for her. She eventually sailed on the 15th July for New York with eleven emigrants only, having lost 248 emigrants. It was to recover for the loss of the profit to be made by carrying these that the action was brought against the dock company.

Five questions were left to the jury.

1. Was there in your judgment such a special contract as that alleged made with the defendants before the Peter Jebesen came into dock? If so, was it broken? Answer: Yes, in both cases.

2. Was there in your judgment such a second special contract as the plaintiffs have endeavoured to make out entered into with the defendants on the 24th June? If so, was it broken? Answer: Yes, in both cases.

3. Was there a want of reasonable dispatch in the unloading of the Peter Jebesen, apart from any special contract? Answer: Yes.

4. Had the defendants notice of the special purposes for which the Peter Jebesen was to be employed, at any time? Yes.

5. If so, when had they such notice? Answer: On 24th June.

Upon this a calculation of the damages claimed was made upon the following basis.

Passage money of 240 emigrants 9627 dols. 24 sch., from which was to be deducted the freight by rail in America, amounting to 2089 dols. 92 sch., the costs of the steamer in Norway conveying the people to Bergen 540 dols.; cost of food on the voyage 884 dols., and the money received from the eleven emigrants who afterwards went in the ship, 309 dols. 22sch., and to which was to be added the cost of board and lodgings of the emigrants while waiting at Bergen, 801 dols. 72 sch. The total loss claimed being, therefore, 6605 dols. 102 sch., or in English money 1444l. 15s. 6d. The verdict was accordingly entered for that sum, and leave was reserved to the defendants to move to reduce the damages.

A rule nisi was obtained, calling upon the plaintiffs to show cause why the amount of damages should not be reduced pursuant to leave reserved, or why it should not be referred to an arbitrator to determine the amount, on the principle to be laid down by the court, on the ground that the plaintiffs cannot recover more damages than the least amount which any one of the plaintiffs would be entitled to recover, and that some of the plaintiffs have suffered no loss which they would be entitled to recover.

The rule to reduce the damages by the full amount of the verdict on the ground that the damage was too remote was refused.

Thesiger, Q.C. and R. E. Webster showed cause.—The plaintiffs are entitled to retain the verdict. It would be impossible to enter into the consideration of the interests of the various owners in the ships of these two lines, and quite impossible even to determine how far the profitable employment of any one ship was affected by the delay of another. It is like the case of a man having shares in two companies, and one company happening to benefit by some accident to the other. The possible compensation to an individual shareholder by reason of his having also shares in the company which gains a benefit, cannot be taken into account in considering the right of the other company to recover against a third party for breach of contract, or even in assessing the damages recoverable. Where are we to stop, if considerations of this kind are let in? The defendants claim to set-off several diminutions of damage in the case of some individual plaintiffs against a joint loss. The defendants suggested that the damage suffered by the plaintiffs was too remote from their breach of contract to make them liable. Surely the compensation which it is suggested that some of the plaintiffs obtained is far too remote. How does this differ in principle from a case where a plaintiff is insured, and that fact does not deprive him of his right to damages for the defendant's negligence in causing the occurrence of that which he has insured against Bradburn v. Great Western Railway (31 L. T. Rep. N.S. 464; L. T. Rep. 10 Ex. 1), is undistinguishable on principle.

W. Williams, Q.C. and C. S. C. Bowen in support of the rule.—There has been an assumption on the other side which is not justified in fact, and that is, that the plaintiffs are a corporation for the purpose of recovering damages. But there are only two classes of persons known to the law, the individual, and the corporate body, and the plaintiffs here are neither. A partnership is, in the eye of the law, simply a number of individuals, and, therefore, the plaintiffs must here be so treated, and their individual position as damaged by the breach of this contract, not their corporate position must be regarded. The principle is that compensation for actual loss may be given, but no more; and the defendants are entitled to put each plaintiff to the proof of this. [DENMAN, J.—Is there any authority that a member of a firm, having gained some advantage by the very breach of contract for which his firm sues, a jury may take the fact into consideration?] The case of Agacio v. Forbes (14 Moore 160), is rather the converse of that, and shows that a partner may sue alone upon an agreement in which the firm was beneficially interested. The notes to Bauerman v. Radenius (2 Sm. L. Ca. p. 370), uphold the right of the defendant to look into the real title of the plaintiffs. [DENMAN, J.—Is not Yates v. Whyte (4 Bing, N.C. 272) against you?] That said that the defendants in an action for damage to a ship by collision, were not entitled to deduct from the damages they had to pay, a sum paid to the plaintiff by his insurers; but that is very different, for it proceeded upon the principle that the underwriters can recover from the assured after he has been satisfied; and there can be nothing of that kind here. So also Bradburn v. Great Western Railway Company (ubi sup.) is inapplicable, for it goes too far if a principle is to be deduced from it to suit this case. It is rather from Franklin v. South-Eastern Railway Company (3 H. & N. 211) if actions against railway companies are at all analogous, that the true principle is to be found. That is that damages are to be given in reference to a pecuniary loss, and as Bramwell, B., says in Bradburn v. Great Western Railway Company (ubi sup.), "if, therefore, the person claiming damages was put by the death of his relative into possession of a large estate, there was no loss—he was a gainer by the event." Similarly here we say if some of the plaintiffs by the delay of the one ship gained profits which they otherwise would not have gained by the consequential employment of another ship belonging to them, this fact must be taken into account, for they cannot be entitled to be paid by the defendants for their loss of profits and make them besides.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 25.—The judgment of the court was read by DENMAN, J., on behalf of Lord Clesridge, as follows:—This was an action tried before me at the sittings at Guildhall after Hilary Term, 1874, to recover damages for the detention of a steamer of the plaintiffs, called the Peter Jebsen, by the default of the defendants. The verdict was for the plaintiffs, and it is not disputed that for some amount the verdict must stand.

By the limitation placed by the court upon the rule on which we are now to give judgment, the questions became reduced to the single one whether the plaintiffs were entitled to retain a sum of 144*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.* which was assessed by the jury, or such portion of that sum as an arbitrator might award if the court should be of opinion that they were entitled in point of law to retain any of it. This point was elaborately argued before us last term; and we are now to give judgment upon it.

The question arose thus:—There were two lines of steamers from Norway to America called respectively the Nordske Lloyds and the Nordske American lines. The Peter Jebsen belonged to the Nordske Lloyds. She was under contract to carry a cargo of emigrants and merchandise from Bergen to New York at the time when she was detained in the defendant's dock, and in order to fulfil her contract she ought to have been at Bergen at the end of June or the beginning of July 1872, so as to start from Bergen, as she had been advertised to do, on the 4th July. Sufficient notice of this contract had been given to the defendants to make them liable for the loss occasioned to the plaintiffs by the breach of it, if, as was the fact, the defendant's conduct caused that breach; and this loss is to be taken, for the purpose of our judgment, at 144*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.* It is said, however, that the plaintiffs have not sustained these damages in fact, and that therefore in law they are not entitled to retain them. The Peter Jebsen, as has been said, belonged to the Nordske Lloyd's line. There were two other steamers, the Harold Harfager and the St. Olaf, which belonged to the Nordske American line. The 240 emigrants who were booked for America by the Peter Jebsen, were indeed lost to her. But 202 of them went to America on the 10th July by the Harold Harfager; and twenty-five more of them went to America on the 16th Aug. by the St. Olaf. It is as to these that the substantial question arises.

The two lines of ships which have been mentioned are associations of ships and not of owners. There is one body of directors and one set of laws for each of the lines respectively. But the owners of each ship in each line are not the same. Each ship has its own set of owners; and the same man may be and in fact is part owner in various proportions of different ships in different lines. In the instances of these particular ships, the facts were thus:—The Peter Jebsen was divided into 192 shares, and the twelve plaintiffs owned them. The Harold Harfager was divided into 360 shares, which were owned by thirty-three owners; and five of these thirty-three were five of the plaintiffs. The St. Olaf was divided into 300 shares, which were owned by twenty-six owners, and five of these twenty-six were five of the plaintiffs, but not all the same five as were part-owners in the Harold Harfager.

Now, it is said, the Harold Harfager and the St. Olaf profited by the loss of the Peter Jebsen; they carried emigrants whom they would not have carried but for the detention of the Peter Jebsen; some of the plaintiffs, therefore, gained by the default of the defendants; and such gain to individual plaintiffs, which, though with difficulty, is yet capable of being ascertained, must therefore be taken in reduction of the damages which the whole body of plaintiffs is entitled to.

The statement of such a proposition in its bare simplicity is perhaps a sufficient answer to it. We need not insist upon the difficult and complicated inquiries which in a multitude of easily suggested cases (some were suggested in the ingenious argument before us) would render any result being arrived at by a jury practically impossible. The absence of authority for a claim by defendants like this, which yet if well founded must have arisen in many cases, affords a strong presumption against its having any legal foundation. It is true that there must be a first instance in every claim, and that ingenuity often for the first time suggests a point which has escaped observation, and which yet, when brought to the test of argument, is found to be a sound one. But this is a point which must have arisen so frequently that it is to us incredible that, if sound, it never should have been taken.

The contention of the defendants, however, is not only without authority; it is against the principle of cases decided under analogous circumstances. It should seem that, if there had been but one owner of the Peter Jebsen, and the same person had been sole owner of the Harold Harfager and of the St. Olaf, the profits made by him as owner of the latter two could not be deducted from the damages sustained by him as owner of the former.

Yates v. Whyte (4 Bing. N.C. 272), decided that a defendant in a collision case could not deduct from the amount of damages to be paid by him a sum of money paid to the plaintiff by insurers in respect of such damage. It may be said that the authority of this case is not direct, because the insurance was a contract of indemnity, and the insurers might have recovered over from the plaintiff. The decision in the case, however, and in that of Mason v. Sainsbury (3 Doug. 61), itself cited with approbation in Yates v. Whyte (ubi sup.) both stand on grounds independent of this consideration.

But, whatever weight may be due to this consideration, the case of Bradburn v. Great Western Railway Company (ubi sup.), cannot be so qualified. That was an action for injuries in a railway accident: It was held that, in estimating the damages, the defendants could not take into account the amount which the plaintiff received from an accidental insurance policy. There, the contract was not one of indemnity. The judges held that the contract into which the plaintiff had entered was that, in consideration of the payment of premiums, he (the plaintiff) should, on the happening of a certain event, receive a sum of money. The event happened, and the benefit of the contract accrued to the plaintiff through the defendants' default. But the benefit could not be deducted from the damages for which the defendants were liable. This case appears to us to be perfectly well decided, and to be in point against the defendants in the case before us. Furthermore, although not in form, it is in substance an attempt to set-off against joint damage a several benefit.

We were told by Mr. Bowen, in a very able argument, that he relied upon a distinction, which no doubt exists, but which we think will not avail the defendants, between partnerships and corporations. For the purposes of actions for breach of contract, part-owners of ships who are working the ship together for profit, are in the same position as partners; and, where partnerships sue for breach of contract, the damages must be confined to those sustained by the partnership; the joint damage only can be considered. It seems to follow that any benefit arising out of the breach of contract, assuming that it can be taken at all into account in reduction of damages, must be a joint benefit, or one accruing to the partnership. In such a case as that put in argument, of a gang with whom a joint contract had been made being dismissed in breach of it, it is clear enough that the gang can sue. It was held in the case of the Tunbridge Wells dippers (Weller v. Baker, 2 Wils. 414), by Lord Chief Justice Wilmot and the Court of Common Pleas (see p. 423) that, if a stranger disturbed them in their employment, they were all jointly concerned in point of interest, and could all jointly sue in an action on the case. It follows that only something in which the benefit was joint could, if anything could, be considered in reduction of damage. If the matter now attempted to be set-off in substance were a set-off in form, there would be no room for the defendants' contention; for a joint debt cannot be set-off against a separate demand, nor a separate debt against a joint one. The benefit here, as it is a gain from third parties, is not a set-off; but the same rules of sense and convenience apply as if it were.

On no ground, therefore, do we think the defendants entitled to succeed; and the rule must be discharged.

Rule discharged.

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Thursday, Feb. 4, 1875.

THE DUNMORE.

Master's wages — Disobedience to instructions — Error of judgment — Forfeiture — Deduction.

Where a master receives instructions to take the balance of freight due at the end of a voyage in cash, or by bank bill upon London, and, without sufficient inquiry, but without mala fides and rather through error of judgment, he takes a bill which he believes to be (but which is not) a bank bill, and which is afterwards dishonoured, causing loss to his owners, this negligence or disobedience, not being wilful, does not work a forfeiture of his wages, nor can the owners claim to deduct the amount of their loss from his wages.

THIS was an appeal from a decree of the City of London Court (Admiralty Jurisdiction) in a cause of wages instituted by John Harwood, master mariner, against Messrs. Adamson and Ronaldson, shipowners in the City of London, the owners of the ship Dunmore.

The plaintiff was engaged on the 19th March 1872 by the defendants to act, at "fifteen pounds per month," as master of the Dunmore, then lying in the river Tyne, under charter to carry coals from the Tyne to Buenos Ayres. By this charter-party, dated the 18th March 1872, the ship was to load a full cargo, and to proceed therewith to Buenos Ayres and "deliver the same, always afloat into craft alongside steamer or depôt ship there, as may be directed by the consignee, being paid freight at the rate of 35s. per ton of 20 cwt.; . . . the freight to be paid, one third on sailing, less 5 per cent. for all charges, and balance on delivery of the cargo in cash at current exchange, or by good and approved bill on London at sixty days' sight, at captain's option. The captain has to receive 5l. gratuity. . . . The ship to be addressed at the port of discharge inwards only, to the freighters' agent free of commission. . . . The owners of the ship to have an absolute lien on the cargo for all freight, dead freight, and demurrage." This charter-party was entered into between the defendants and Gustav Hermanni, of Hamburg.

The ship duly loaded her cargo in the Tyne, the charterer being the shipper; and the master, on the 4th May 1872, signed a bill of lading for 654 tons 11cwt. of coal, "shipped in good order and condition by Gustav Hermanni, Hamburg," and "to be delivered in the like good order and condition, at the port of Buenos Ayres, unto Messrs. Lamb Brothers, or to their assigns, they paying freight for the said coals, and all other conditions, as per charter-party." The bill of lading was indorsed with a receipt by the master for the sum of 581l. 16s. 5d., the amount of freight agreed by the charter-party to be prepaid at Newcastle.

On the 2nd May 1872 the defendants wrote to the plaintiff at Newcastle, as follows:

Dear Sir,—We have no letter from you this morning, but we hope you will get away to-morrow. The ship is consigned, as you will see by the charter, to charterer's agent at Buenos Ayres, inwards only. We do not know their names yet, but shall have them in a day or two and we will have letters awaiting you at their office. As there is no chance of your loading out again at Buenos Ayres, we do not appoint any agents for the vessel there. All that will have to be done is to collect the balance of inward freight and disburse the ship, remitting us what money then remains. The ship is free of commission to charterer's agents, and you will see it is at your option to take the balance of freight in cash at current exchange, or by approved bill on London. You must do which you deem best; but if you take a bill, it must be a bank bill, it being a rule with us that all remittances are to be made by such drafts. Always send remittances yourself; first of the draft by one mail, and second by mail following. Our idea of further employment, &c. (The rest of the letter is immaterial to the present case.)

The ship duly sailed with her cargo, and arrived in Buenos Ayres all safe on or about the 15th July 1872. The master at once applied to Messrs. Lamb Brothers, the consignees named in the bill of lading, for instructions as to delivery of the cargo; and he was referred by them to a Mr. Haase, the manager of the River Plate General Trading Company in Buenos Ayres, to whom Messrs. Lamb said the cargo belonged. The master applied to Mr. Haase, and was by him informed that his papers relating to the cargo (including the bill of lading) had not arrived from England, but that he would clear the ship at the Custom House. Mr. Haase accordingly cleared the ship, and the master commenced discharging cargo. Mr. Haase advanced money to the master to the amount of 140*l* for disbursements, but would not pay the whole amount of freight until the cargo was wholly discharged. When it had all been delivered, the balance due for freight was 550*l.*, including 5*l.* gratuity due to the master. The master applied to Mr. Haase for the money in cash, but Haase offered bills drawn by himself upon The River Plate Trading Company (Limited), No. 1, Leadenhall-street, London. The master told Haase that he wanted a bank bill, and Haase said that "The bill is on my bank in London." The master went to the British consul to inquire about the credit of the River Plate Trading Company, and was informed by the consul that "they were a new firm, and he knew nothing against them, but they were honourable people." The master thereupon took the bill offered for the balance of freight, and remitted it to his owners, believing it to be a bank bill, and calling it "a bank draft" in his letter to them. He then, in accordance with his instructions, sailed for the Mauritius, where he arrived on the 12th Nov. 1872. Whilst there he received letters from his owners, inclosing a printed form of instructions, which they were in the habit of issuing to all their masters, and in which it was said, "Make all remittances by bank bills, and where practicable send remittances yourself, rather than leave agents to do so. The only exception to our request always to remit by bank bills is in the case of the port of New York. From there we take the drafts of first-class houses on their branches here." He left the Mauritius with his ship, and arrived in Calcutta on the 12th Jan. 1873.

The bill was received by the defendants on the 30th Sept. 1872, and was immediately presented to the River Plate Trading Company for acceptance, but they refused to accept, saying that Haase had no authority to draw. Proceedings were taken against them, but without effect, and the bill was then sent out again to Buenos Ayres for presentation to Haase, but at the time of the commencement of this cause nothing had been recovered on it.

On the 25th Oct. the defendants wrote to the plaintiff at Calcutta, acknowledging the receipt of his letter inclosing the draft, and saying:

In your letter you call it a bank draft, but it is no such thing. It is on a trading company, who refuse to honour it, and, as far as we can see at present, we will lose the whole of the money. By your charter-party you were to get balance of freight in cash, or by an approved bill, at your option. Your duty then was clearly to have got the hard cash, gone to the best bank in Buenos Ayres, and have bought a bill there. That would really have been a bank bill, in accordance with our printed instructions, so plainly set forth; and how in the face of the same you send us such a draft, we are quite at a loss to conceive.

On the 18th Dec. the defendants again wrote to the plaintiff a letter, which was sent by a Captain Mitchell. The plaintiff was therein informed that he must hand over his command to Capt. Mitchell, and proceed at once to London in order that the plaintiff might see the defendants' solicitor, and give the latter a "detailed account of the whole of the circumstances connected with the 550*l* draft" which the plaintiff took and advised to the defendants "as a bank bill." The plaintiff was asked to keep down his travelling expenses, as all the extra expense of bringing him home was "clearly traceable to his not having attended to the defendants' instructions." The master received this letter two or three days after his arrival at Calcutta, the former letter having been there on his arrival. The plaintiff at once left for London, where he arrived in the first week in March, and at once put himself in communication with the defendants for the purpose of making up his accounts and assisting them in recovering on the 550*l* draft. The plaintiff applied for his wages, and the defendants gave him 10*l*. on account.

On the 27th March 1875, he delivered them an account showing wages to be due to him amounting to 110*l*. 15*s*. 3*d*. The defendants refused to pay this amount, because they said that the plaintiff was indebted to them for the 550*l*. in consequence of his negligence in the matter.

On the 7th April the plaintiff had an interview with the defendants' manager, when he again applied for a settlement of his account, and for a testimonial they had promised him, and for his discharge. The defendants' manager said that the plaintiff could not have a settlement of his account unless he signed a letter then submitted to him, and that he would not get his money until the money on the bill had been paid. The letter submitted to the plaintiff was as follows:

London, 34, Leadenhall-street, E.C., 7th April, 1873.

Messrs. Adamson and Ronaldson.

Gentlemen,—With reference to the balance of my account as master of the ship Dunmore, which I have rendered to you; as also to the supplemental statement made out by you, and showing 72*l*. 6*s*. 9*d*., as due to me, I hereby agree to the correctness of the same, and furthermore I abide unconditionally by your requirement, that I shall await your paying me the same until you receive 20*s*. in the pound on the 550*l*. draft drawn by Mr. Haase, which has been dishonoured, and which I sent to you, believing the same to be a bank bill; and if you do not get 20*s*. in the pound, then I shall have no claim whatever upon you in respect of the said balance of 72*l*. 6*s*. 9*d*.

This letter the master took till the next day to consider about, and then went to the defendants' office, and the defendant Donaldson signed the testimonial in the plaintiff's presence, and offered it to him if he would sign the letter. The plaintiff declined to sign the letter, and was consequently unable to obtain either the testimonial, his wages, or his discharge. The testimonial, was as follows

We hereby certify that Capt. John Harwood has had the command of our ship Dunmore for twelve months, ending March last. We have found him strictly honest and sober, and fully believe he would do his utmost to give satisfaction to his employers. Capt. Harwood was relieved of the command of our ship in consequence of his having made us a remittance quite contrary to our instructions, but we fully believe he did so from want of knowledge and good judgment, and that the like would not happen again; and we sincerely trust his future prospects may not be prejudiced by his having lost command of the Dunmore.

ADAMSON AND RONALDSON.

The plaintiff then went for another voyage in other employ, and on his return in Sept. 1874 instituted the present suit.

The cause came on for hearing in the City of London Court (before R. A. Fisher, Esq.), on the 29th Sept. 1874, and on the following day a decree was given for the plaintiff, the court holding that "It appeared from the charter-party and bill of lading that the captain had an option in collecting the freight. Although the subsequent letter of the defendants limited the consideration, yet it was so large that, unless mala fides was shown on the part of the captain—and this the defendants had not shown—the captain was justified in the course he adopted. In the case of The Atlantic (Lush. 566; 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 647; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 274), Dr. Lushington held that dilatory conduct did not forfeit wages, unless mala fides was proved. The printed instruction showed that the defendants meant that when the captain received cash for freight he should remit it by bank bill, and not by buying a bill. An approved bill was a bill to which no reasonable objection could be taken: (Smith's Mercantile Law, 511.) No error of judgment works a forfeiture of a master's wages so long as he remains in command of the ship: (The Camilla, Swabey, 312.) The question of wages would be referred to the registrar to ascertain the amount due up to the 7th April; the amount claimed in the plaint not to be increased, and the master not to be allowed the 5*l.* gratuity included in the 55*l.* bill. The proposed testimonial of the defendants showed that they at the time viewed the conduct of the plaintiff as an error in judgment."

From this decree the present appeal was brought by the defendants.

Butt, Q.C. and Webster (A. Cohen, Q.C., with them), for the appellants (defendants below).—The plaintiff has been guilty of a wilful disobedience to the orders of the owners, which has caused loss to his owners, and has in consequence forfeited his wages. The amount of damage caused to owners by an officer's or seaman's negligence may always be deducted from his wages:

The New Phoenix, 2 Hagg. 420;

[Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Does such conduct as this master is accused of work a total forfeiture of wages? In The Thomas Worthington (3 W. Rob. 128, 132), speaking of the forfeiture of wages for misconduct, Dr. Lushington says: "The principle applies not merely to contracts between masters and owners, and between owners and mariners, but it pervades all other contracts of service and hiring; and the only difference between this court and other courts of law in adjudicating upon such contracts is, that in this court, under ordinary circumstances, where any loss has been sustained through the negligence or misconduct of the mariner, the amount of the loss is alone deducted from the wages of such mariner, whereas in other courts no wages would be recoverable at all.

Cases, indeed, may occur, even in this court, where the misconduct may be of so gross a description that, independent of any actual loss sustained by the owners, the entire forfeiture of wages would ensue; as, for instance, if a master had attempted to commit barratry; or if, throughout a voyage, he had shown gross incapacity, or had been constantly drunk. In either of these cases would this court be justified in pronouncing for any part of his wages under the contract? Unquestionably not, and if any such case came before me I should not hesitate for a single moment in rejecting his claim in toto." We do not put the case as one of gross misconduct, but as one of disobedience to orders leading to loss. By the old law, freight was the mother of wages, and, although the law is now altered, still how can a master recover his wages when he by his own negligence destroys the very fund out of which his wages would most naturally be drawn? But, even if the court should hold that there was no wilful disobedience, the defendants are still entitled to set-off or make a counter claim in respect of their loss, under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), sect. 191. At common law a set-off must be a liquidated sum, but it has always been the practice of this court and in the Admiralty Registry to allow deductions from wages in respect of negligence resulting in loss; a fortiori, we are entitled to deduct losses arising from direct disobedience to orders. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—You must carry your argument to the extent that an honest mistake enures to a forfeiture of wages.] It is not necessary to contend that, because there is here a disobedience, whether wilful or not. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Disobedience to orders must be either wilful, or done through ignorance and hence a mistake. If it is wilful, it works a total forfeiture of wages; there can be no partial forfeiture in such a case. But if, on the other hand, the disobedience was a mere mistake, made without mala fides and through ignorance, can that be said to work even a partial forfeiture?] There was negligence in not obeying the written instructions, in not ascertaining the solvency of the consignees, and in taking the bill when he could easily have ascertained that it was not a bank bill. This entitles the defendants to claim to set off their loss against his wages. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—If I were satisfied that the master believed that this bill was a bank bill, could you contend that his wages were forfeited?] Certainly. If a master neglected to reef his sails in a gale of wind, he would forfeit his wages pro tanto. He contracts to have not only knowledge as a sailor but also as a competent manager of his owners' affairs abroad, and he ought to have competent knowledge as to the safest mode of making remittances. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—There is a wide difference between a knowledge of seamanship and of mercantile affairs.] In the case of a mate or a seaman that might be so contended, but a master's usual business is to look after freight, disbursements, and remittances, and he contracts to have the knowledge requisite to conduct the ship's business for the benefit of his owners.

Francis Turner, for the respondent (plaintiff below)—By the charter-party the balance of freight is to be paid by approved bill; in the instructions the master is only to take a bank bill; considering this variance, could the master have reasonably refused an approved bill and demanded a bank bill or cash? An "approved bill" means a bill to which no reasonable objection can be taken (Hodgson v. Davies, 2 Camp. 530), and the master in the present case made inquiries before taking the bill whether any reasonable objection could be taken to it; and, moreover, he bonâ fide believed that the bill was a "bank bill" drawn upon the drawer's bank in London. The person to whom the goods were delivered was named to the master by the consignees named in the bill of lading, and he had every reason to believe in the bonâ fides of the transaction. There was no wilful disobedience or misconduct; at most there was an error of judgment. But error of judgment, occasional misconduct, or even drunkenness, will not work a forfeiture of wages:

THE THAMES.

[ADM.]

The Camilla, Swabey, 312;

The Atlantic, Lush, 566.

But even supposing there was wilful disobedience, as contended, there was a clear condonation of it by the conduct of the defendants after they received the draft; they never discharged the plaintiff until the following April. Moreover, they are actually proceeding upon this bill at the present time; if they should recover either upon the bill or upon the charter-party, upon which they can sue if they like, the plaintiff would be clearly entitled to his wages, as there would then be no loss to the defendants. Can he be said to have forfeited his wages in respect of a loss which is not yet clearly established? If they recovered, would his right of action revive? He is at any rate entitled to his wages so long as he remained in command of the ship, because his service was an actual service rendered, and the wages accrued due at the end of each month of his service:

Button v. Thomson, L. Rep. 4 C. P. 350; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 231.

Butt, Q.C., in reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I think I should do very wrong if I were to disturb the sentence of the court below in this case, I should be running counter to the principles which underlie the various precedents cited.

I am of opinion, moreover, that this is not a case of wilful disobedience on the part of the master to the orders of his owners. He received instructions, according to the charter-party, that the cargo was to be delivered for cash, "freight to be paid one-third on sailing, &c., and balance on delivery of the cargo in cash at current exchange, or by approved bill on London." Then, after that, he received a letter of instructions, in which it is stated: "The ship is free of commission to charterers' account. It is at your option to take the balance of freight in cash at current exchange, or by approved bill on London. You must do what you deem best; but if you take a bill it must be a bank bill, it being a rule with us that all remittances are to be made by draft." Now in this case the master was admitted to be an honest, respectable, and reputable officer in every respect; and we have it admitted by counsel for the appellants that the master acted as he did without any mala fides. He goes to a person named to him by the consignee at Buenos Ayres. He first obtains a certain sum of money, and then he takes a bill drawn on the River Plate General Trading Company (Limited), No. 1, Leadenhall-street, London; and the mistake he has made is in considering that the company which was at No. 1, Leadenhall-street was a bank. That is one mistake that he made; he also made another mistake in not making sufficient inquiries before he took the bill from Haase. It appears that he went to the British Consul, who advised him that from such information as he (the British Consul) possessed, the company were respectable people, and that he knew nothing against them, from which the master inferred that the bill would probably be honoured in due time. He was no doubt incautious, but under these circumstances the master took the bill, which was subsequently dishonoured.

Now I do not understand by the evidence in the case that the proceedings are abandoned in respect of the bill, and it may be that some one may after all be made responsible upon it. But be that as it may, I am clearly of opinion that I ought to act within the principles uniformly applied in such cases where it is sought to establish a forfeiture of wages by means of a set-off against the master. I am clearly of opinion that I should be running counter to all these cases if I were to hold that this man, who was acting bonâ fide, was not entitled to his wages, the utmost charge against him being that he was not so intelligent as he might have been. If I were to do that I should be running counter to the principle on which all such cases in this court are decided, and, therefore, I dismiss this appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

THE THAMES.

Collision—Ship forced into collision by wrongful act of third party—Liability.

Where a steamship, in order to avoid collision with another ship, is obliged by the wrongful act of that other ship to take measures which bring her into collision with a third ship, without any negligence on her own part, the Court of Admiralty will not hold her responsible for the damage to the injured vessel.

Semble, that the owners of the injured vessel should proceed against the original wrongdoer.

This was a consolidated cause of damage, instituted on behalf of Messrs. John and Edward Aylesford, in the county of Kent, shipowners, the owners of the sailing barge Volunteer, and on behalf of the master and crew thereof, and also on behalf of the cargo lately laden on board the said vessel, against the screw steamship or vessel Thames, and against the owners of the said screw steamship or vessel Thames, the defendants in this cause, intervening.

The plaintiffs' petition was as follows:

1. Shortly after noon on the 15th Oct. 1874, the sailing barge Volunteer, of 37 tons register, manned by two hands, and bound from the Medway to Vauxhall with a cargo of bricks, was at the entrance of Halfway Reach, in the River Thames.
2. The wind at such a time was about south, and blowing a fresh breeze; the weather was fine, but cloudy, and the tide was nearly half-flood, and of the force of about four knots per hour. The Volunteer was under mainsail, topsail, foresail, small jib, and mizen, and was sailing at the rate of about six knots an hour, heading about north. Another sailing barge, called the Alfrado, was also sailing up, and was on the port side of the Volunteer, and distant about one length from her; and another sailing barge, called the Two Sisters, was also sailing up and was ahead of the Volunteer, and distant about four or five lengths from her.

THE THAMES.

3. At such time the above named screw steamer Thames which was coming down the said river under steam, ran against the Two Sisters, and caused immediate danger of collision with the Alfreda. The helm of the Alfreda was thereupon put astern, and the helm of the Volunteer was thereupon ported, but the Thames struck the Alfreda, causing her to sink, and came on and with her stem struck the Volunteer on her port quarter, and caused her to sink with her cargo.

4. The said collision with the Volunteer was occasioned by the negligent and improper navigation of the Thames.

5. The said collision was not in any way occasioned by any neglect on the part of those on board the Volunteer.

The defendants' answer was as follows:

1. In the morning of the 15th Oct. 1874, the screw steamship Thames, of tons register, and having a crew of hands, left Battlebridge Pier, in the River Thames, bound for Swansea.

2. About noon of the same day the Thames, in the course of her said voyage, was approaching Jenningsree Point, in the River Thames, and proceeding along the south or starboard shore. The weather was fine with a moderate breeze from about south-west by south. The tide was early flood. The Thames was proceeding under easy steam only, and making about four knots an hour. A vigilant look-out was being kept on board her.

3. In these circumstances those on board the Thames observed several barges at anchor on the south or starboard side of the river; three sailing barges, to wit, the Two Sisters, the Alfreda, and the Volunteer, coming up the river, with the wind free bearing about three points on the port bow of the Thames. Those on board the Thames were prepared to pass the said sailing barges on their port hand, but the headmost of the said sailing barges, the Two Sisters, suddenly starboarded her helm and threw herself across the course of the Thames. The helm of the Thames was thereupon, and in order to avoid a collision with the Two Sisters, starboarded, and her engines were stopped and reversed full speed, and those on board the other sailing barges, the Alfreda and the Volunteer, were hailed to starboard their helms. The Two Sisters struck the Emma, the headmost of the barges at anchor, was taken aback, made sternboard, and came into slight collision with the Thames on her starboard side forward. The Alfreda and the Volunteer ported their helms instead of starboarding them, and though the helm of the Thames was thereupon put hard astern to ease the blow, she came into collision, first with the Alfreda and then with the Volunteer, striking the latter on her port quarter with the stem, and the Volunteer shortly afterwards sank.

4. Save as hereinbefore appears, the several allegations contained in the petition are untrue.

5. The collision aforesaid, and the damage consequent thereon, are primarily attributable to the improper navigation of the Two Sisters.

6. If and so far as the collision and damage aforesaid are not attributable to the improper navigation of the Two Sisters, they are attributable to the improper navigation of the Alfreda or the Volunteer, or both of them.

7. No blame, in respect of the collision and damage aforesaid, is attributable to the Thames, or to any of those on board her, who did their utmost to prevent the said collision and damage.

The plaintiffs replied, traversing the allegations of the answer, and alleging that "the alteration, if any, in the course of the Two Sisters was made in order to avoid immediate danger of collision caused by the negligent navigation of the Thames."

Evidence was called on both sides, the effect of which is sufficiently stated in the judgment.

Milward, Q.C. (E. C. Clarkson with him), for the plaintiffs.—Even admitting that the Two Sisters did wrong, what justification is that for the Thames running into the Volunteer? [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.

—Is that the question? Did not the Two Sisters do an act which forced the Thames to take the course she did?] Even if the Thames was so forced, that would afford no justification for the injuries inflicted upon the barge. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.

—The Two Sisters would be considered as a wrongdoer, and as having, by her wrongful act, brought about the collision. If she was to blame, ought not the proceedings to have been taken against her?] I submit not, so far as the plaintiff was concerned, because they would have no remedy against the Two Sisters; her wrong was done to the Thames. The plaintiffs are entitled to recover against the res doing the injury, leaving the defendants to their remedy over against the Two Sisters. So far as the plaintiffs are concerned, they are not in any way to blame, and they have suffered injury at the hands of the defendants' ship; the plaintiffs ought not to be forced to inquire into the cause of the defendants' ship going out of her course and violating the rules of navigation. But I further submit that the Two Sisters was not to blame, and that the Thames was negligent in not straightening down the river after she starboarded for the Two Sisters.

The Admirally Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C., W. G. F. Phillimore with him), for the defendants.—The defendants are not bound to justify their act: the onus lies upon the plaintiffs to show that the defendants are wrong doers. They have only succeeded in establishing that the Two Sisters was a wrongdoer. The Thames must have starboarded, or have run over the Two Sisters. The Thames was bound to avoid collision with the Two Sisters, if possible, and if, in so doing, she unavoidably ran into other vessels, she is not responsible. A vessel having got into danger through no fault of her own, and endeavouring to extricate herself from it, is not to blame if she comes into collision with another vessel in her endeavours to avoid the danger.

The Thorneley, 7 Jur. 659;

The Venus, Pritchard's Digest, vol. 1, p. 129.

The action ought to have been brought against the primary wrongdoer.

Milward, Q.C., in reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a case of collision between a sailing barge called the Volunteer and a screw steamer called the Thames. It happened about noon upon the 15th Oct. of last year, therefore in broad daylight. The place of collision appears to be, as far as can be accurately described, a little off what is called the Jenningsree Point, Halfway Reach. The direction of the wind was to the south. The flood was running about four knots, which, with reference to the argument made as to the speed of the steamer, is not unimportant. The steamer was going down the Thames, the Volunteer was going up the river under full sail.

The first question I have put to the Brethren of the Trinity House, which appeared to me very important to determine in this case, was, whether in their judgment the steamer was to blame for the manner in which she was going down the Thames, in reference to the distance from the shore and the course she was pursuing. They are clearly of opinion, and I agree with them, that she was right in coming down the Thames in that way, without meaning to go inside the barges that were at anchor.

The next point in the case to consider is this: She being in her right course which she was pursuing, saw before her, soon after rounding the point, or about rounding the point, three barges, the Two Sisters, the Alfreda, and the Volunteer. The Two Sisters was the foremost barge, and the Alfreda and Volunteer were, in my judgment

THE EMILIE MARIE.

practically to be considered for the purpose of this judgment as almost one barge. The distance between the two was not above half a cable, though it is not very accurately stated, and it is rather difficult to be precise on a question of distance or time in a case of this description. Now, the statement upon the part of the steamer is, that she was steadily pursuing her course when the foremost of these barges, namely, the Two Sisters, starboarded her helm, crossed her bows, and ran into another barge that was at anchor called the Emma; the steamer was therefore, she says, compelled by this improper conduct on the part of the Two Sisters to starboard, in order to avoid running over her. The effect of this was that she struck her lightly, but ran on the next barge, the Alfreda, and did her serious mischief, cutting her stern off, and then into the Volunteer, which she sank.

Now the question, in my judgment of the gravest importance to a right decision of this case is, whether the Two Sisters was to blame for the first collision, or whether the Thames was to blame. We have no evidence from the Two Sisters at all. We have evidence as to what she did from other vessels, but no evidence from the barge, the Two Sisters, herself; and if I had any doubt upon the matter, after the evidence proved, I should consider that it was my duty, looking to the pleadings in the case, and the facts of the case generally, to hold that it was incumbent upon the plaintiffs in this case to have produced evidence from on board the Two Sisters if they seriously thought they could contend with success that the Thames was to blame, and not the Two Sisters for the first collision. They have not done so. But I am satisfied upon the evidence, and so are the Elder Brethren, that the Two Sisters was alone to blame for this first collision.

The next question to be considered is what was the state and condition in which the Two Sisters placed the steamer by her own improper manœuvre? And it has been argued, as a very important part of the case, that even admitting the Two Sisters to be to blame, it was still the duty of the Thames to have straightened and gone under her helm, and that then the course pursued by the Alfreda and the Volunteer of porting their helms would have been perfectly right. There is no doubt that the Alfreda and the Volunteer, apart from the consideration of the previous collision with the Two Sisters, did right in porting their helms; but that is not the question; it is whether the Thames did wrong, or whether the plaintiffs have made out the case that the Thames was the wrongdoer, as they are bound to do. This is a matter very much for the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House to decide, taking into consideration the short distance between the barges, the time and space, the state of the tide, that the Volunteer was on the starboard bow of the Thames, and the state of the wind. They are clearly of opinion that there was no possibility for the Thames to have recovered herself in the short period of time that intervened after the collision with the Two Sisters.

Therefore I am brought to the conclusion that the collision which afterwards happened with the Volunteer, namely, by the bow of the Thames going into the port quarter of the Volunteer was not a consequence of bad navigation on the part of the Thames, or of any misconduct on her part; it was the necessary consequence produced by the wrong manœuvre of the Two Sisters in the manner I have described.

I therefore pronounce that the plaintiffs have not made out that the Thames was the wrongdoer in this case, and I dismiss her from all further observance of justice, and condemn the parties proceeding in costs.

Breach of contract of carriage—Short delivery of cargo—The Mersey Docks Acts Consolidation Act 1858, sects. 35 and 36—Master porters—Liability.

The Mersey Docks Acts Consolidation Act 1858, sect. 36, making the master porters, appointed under that Act to discharge cargoes in the Mersey Docks, responsible for any loss, damage, or injury sustained by the cargoes discharged by them during the receiving, weighing, and loading off by the master porters or their servants, does not in any way discharge the shipowner from his liability existing before he delivers to the master porter, and his responsibility for short delivery remains unaffected by the Act.

An assignee of a bill of lading may have a better right against the shipowner to recover for breach of the contract of carriage than the assignor.

An assignee of a bill of lading, who has given valuable consideration without notice of any arrangement between the shipper and the various consignees giving priority to the holders of the other bills of lading in the case of short shipment of cargo shipped in bulk, may claim from the shipowner full delivery of the cargo specified in his bill of lading, even though the arrangement has been made without the privity of the shipowner, and the master has indorsed the bill of lading with the words "weight unknown."

A letter written by an assignor of a bill of lading to his assignee, informing the latter that the bankruptcy of the shipper, and consignee (who had indorsed to the assignor) may possibly interfere with the proceeds of the shipment, so far as the assignor is concerned, and that he thinks it best to prevent the possibility of a hitch to send the bill of lading for the assignee to deal with, the latter having advanced money thereon, is not such a notice as will oblige the assignee to make inquiries as to the quantity of and the various rights to the cargo so as to bind the assignee with constructive notice of any arrangement between the shipper and various consignees, giving priority to the holders of other bills of lading in the case of short shipment.

The rights of an innocent holder of a bill of lading are not affected by the fact that the master signed as agent for the charterers, unless the holder has notice of the charter-party, or that the master signed in that capacity.

A bill of lading assigned in part payment of a debt already due from the assignor to the assignee, is assigned for valuable consideration.

Semble, the High Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction to proceed in rem against a ship for breach of contract, within the meaning of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), sect. 6, although that breach is committed by one of the part owners of the ship only (the master), and for which the other part owners would not be responsible.

THE EMILIEEN MARIE.

This was a cause of breach of contract for short delivery of cargo, instituted under the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, by James Hall, Robert Hartley Bower, James Robinson Pease, and George Augustus Duncombe, bankers, of Beverley, Yorkshire (Hall, Bower and Co.), against the above-named vessel, and Emilien Aubin and others, her owners intervening.

The plaintiff's petition, so far as material, was as follows :

1. On or about the 27th Aug, 1874, forty tons of palm kernels were shipped on board the Emilien Marie at Lagos, on the coast of Africa, to be carried to Liverpool.
2. The master of the Emilien Marie signed a bill of lading for the said palm kernels, whereby he undertook to deliver the same at Liverpool to the order of D. Chinery.
3. The plaintiffs, at the time of the short delivery hereinafter mentioned, and thenceforward to the commencement of this suit, were the owners of the said palm kernels, and the holders for value of the said bill of lading.
4. The Emilien Marie having arrived at Liverpool, the plaintiffs caused the said bill of lading to be presented to the master, but the only cargo delivered out to the plaintiffs was about three tons of palm kernels and sweepings; and, except as aforesaid, the plaintiffs have been unable to obtain delivery of the palm kernels to which they are entitled under the said bill of lading.
5. The said deficiency was caused by the negligence, and misconduct, and breach of contract, and breach of duty on the part of the owners or of their servants or agents.
6. The value of the portion of the said cargo which is deficient is 600*l.*, or thereabouts.
7. No owner or part owner of the said vessel is domiciled in England or Wales.

The defendants' answer, so far as is material, was as follows :

1. In or about the month of Aug. 1874, a quantity of palm kernels, in bulk, was shipped on board the above-named vessel, Emilien Marie, at Lagos, by or on behalf of the African Barter Company (Limited.) Three bills of lading respectively in quadruplicate, copies whereof are hereto annexed, marked respectively A, B, and C, were presented by the said shippers to the master of the said vessel, in respect of such shipment for his signature, the copy marked C. being a copy of the bill of lading mentioned in the petition. The said master, not knowing the weight of the said shipment, wrote on each of the said bills of lading, before signing the same, the words "weight unknown," and signed and delivered the same at the dates respectively appearing thereon. The quantity of palm kernels so shipped was much less than 140 tons, the aggregate quantity represented by the said bills of lading to have been shipped on board the said vessel.
2. The master of the said vessels signed the said bill of lading, mentioned in the petition, without there being any palm kernels on board the said vessel, save a very small quantity, namely, about three tons to meet the same, and the said master had not any authority to sign or deliver the said bill of lading.
3. Save as herein appears, the defendants deny the truth of the allegations contained in articles 1 and 2 of the said petition.
4. The said vessel subsequently left Lagos with the said palm kernels, and with other palm kernels and other goods on board her, and arrived therewith at Liverpool, and entered and used for the discharge of her cargo the George's Dock, being a usual and proper place of discharge, and being a dock belonging to or under the management of "The Board," as defined by sect. 3 of The Mersey Docks Acts Consolidation Act 1858, and being an open dock, as defined by the said section.
5. The said vessel having on board her goods belonging to more than one owner or consignee, all the goods on board her had, under and by virtue of the provisions of the said Act, and of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board Act 1860, and The Mersey Docks (Corporation Purchase) Act 1861, and the bye-laws made under the said

Acts to be received, weighed, and loaded off by one set of porters only, in the employment and under the directions and orders of a duly qualified master porter, appointed to that office by "The Board," defined as aforesaid; and all the said goods, including all the said kernels shipped by or on behalf of the African Barter Company, were accordingly, under and in compliance with the provisions of the said Acts and bye-laws, discharged and delivered from the said vessel by the said master to, and received by, a master porter, duly qualified and appointed, and entitled to act in receiving, weighing and loading off the said goods, including as aforesaid, and whose duty it was, under and by virtue of the said Acts and bye-laws, to receive, discharge, and weigh off the said goods, and to deliver the same to the respective consignees and owners thereof; and the masters and owners of the said vessel duly did all things which they were bound to do, in order to enable the plaintiffs to have delivered to them, by the said master porter, all the palm kernels which they were entitled to receive under and by virtue of the said bills of lading, mentioned in the said petition, and by reason of the premises the defendants are not liable in respect of the non-delivery and deficiency complained of by the plaintiffs.

6. The defendants admit that only about three tons of palm kernels were delivered to the plaintiffs.

7. Save as herein appears, the defendants deny the truth of articles 3 and 4 of the said petition.

8. At the time of the said shipment by the African Barter Company, and before the signing of the said bills of lading, it was, for valuable consideration, agreed by and between the said company and Messrs. Charles Leigh Clare and Company and Samuel Rigby Stainforth respectively, who are the consignees respectively named in the said bills of lading—copies whereof are annexed, marked respectively A and B—that the said Messrs. Charles Leigh Clare and Company and Samuel Rigby Stainforth were respectively to have delivered to them, out of the said shipment, made by or on behalf of the said company, the full quantity of kernels, mentioned in their said bills of lading, before any portion of the said kernels should be delivered to the said D. Chinery, managing director of the said company, or to his assigns, on the said bills of lading mentioned in the petition.

9. The quantity of palm kernels shipped by or on behalf of the said company as aforesaid, was sufficient only to meet the quantities respectively mentioned in the said bills of lading, of which the copies are annexed, marked A and B respectively, and to leave about three tons of kernels and sweepings. The said master porter accordingly delivered, to the holders of the lastly-mentioned bills of lading, the full quantities of kernels therein respectively mentioned, and the said three tons of kernels and sweepings, being those mentioned in article 4 of the said petition, were by the said master porter, delivered to the plaintiffs.

10. The plaintiffs had notice of the agreement, mentioned in article 8 of this answer, before any assignment was made to them of the said bill of lading referred to in the said petition. No consideration was paid by the plaintiffs for the assignment of the said bill of lading.

11. The defendants further say that at the time of the shipment of the said palm kernels, comprised in the said bills of lading the said vessel had been chartered by her master to Messrs. John Longton and Company by a charter-party, bearing date the 10th Oct. 1873, and had, by the said John Longton and Company, been sub-chartered to Samuel Rigby Stainforth, of Lagos, merchant. The shippers of the said palm kernels, comprised in the said bills of lading, had, before and at the time of the said shipment, notice of the said charter-party and sub-charter-party. The master of the said vessel, on signing the said bills of lading, was acting as agent for the said charterers or sub-charterer, and not as agent for the owners of the said vessel. The defendants crave leave to refer to the said charter-party and sub-charter-party.

12. The defendants deny the truth of the allegations contained in the fifth and sixth articles of the said petition.

The plaintiffs replied, denying the allegations of the answer, and concluded.

Jan. 22, 28, 30, and Feb. 4.—The cause came on for hearing before the judge.

On behalf of the plaintiffs, the original bills of lading were put in; the bills of lading set out in the pleadings were exact copies of the original bills, except that there were indorsed upon the bill of lading C the words, "Deliver the within to Parry, Lovell, and Co., or order, D. Chinery," and also an indorsement by Parry, Lovell, and Co. to the plaintiffs. These bills of lading, with the admissions in the defendants' answer formed the plaintiff's case.

Butt, Q.C., on the part of the defendants, submitted that as the bill of lading contained the words, "weight unknown," the plaintiffs made out no case without proof of the actual amount shipped. There was nothing to show that forty tons were shipped at Lagos to the consignee named in bill of lading C, without positive proof that that amount was put on board. The bill of lading in itself is not sufficient evidence of the quantity shipped, where it contains a qualification, as in the present case: (Jessel v. Bath, L. Rep. 2 Ex. 275.)

Milward, Q.C., for the plaintiffs. The bill of lading is prima facie proof of the quantity shipped as against the shipowners.

McLean v. Fleming, 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 317; L. Rep. 2 Sc. App. 128; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 160.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I cannot stop the case at the present stage. There is evidence to show that the master accepted what purported to be forty tons, and it lies upon the defendants to show that such an amount was not received by the master. If any question arises upon this point, I will reserve it till after the defendants' case has been heard.

Witnesses were thereupon called for the defendants; who established the following facts: The master of the Emilien Marie, whose name was Emilien Aubin, was also a part owner. The master had at Liverpool, on the 10th Oct. 1873, entered into a charter-party with Messrs. J. Longton and Co., merchants, by which the ship was to take a cargo on board at Liverpool, then proceed to a port between Cameroon and Lagos, both places included, and there take on board from the charterers' agents a full and complete cargo of palm kernels or other produce of the country, and being so loaded, to proceed therewith to a port in the United Kingdom, and there deliver the cargo agreeably to bills of lading (the usual perils excepted), on being paid freight at the lump sum of 34,000 francs; the master to be at liberty to sign bills of lading as tendered, without prejudice to the charter-party, and having a lien on the cargo for all freight, dead weight, and demurrage, due under the charter-party.

The ship duly took on board a cargo at Liverpool, and carried the same to Brais River, and there delivered it, and then proceeded to Lagos to obtain cargo. Previous to the arrival of the ship at Lagos, one John Finlay had been agent for the African Barter Company, named in bill of lading C, but when the ship got out there Finlay had left for England, and one Lewis was then agent for the company. The African Barter Company was at this time indebted to a Mr. Stainforth and to Messrs. Leigh Clare and Co., merchants at Lagos in separate sums of money, and these creditors held bills of the company, and were pressing Lewis for payment, and in fact had obtained judgments in the court at Lagos against the African Barter Company for the amounts of the bills. In order to satisfy these judgments it was arranged between Lewis and Stainforth and the agent of Leigh Clare and Co., that produce should be shipped to England by Lewis, and that Stainforth and Leigh Clare and Co. should each receive a bill of lading representing a sufficient quantity of the produce shipped to satisfy their respective claims, by sale thereof in England. Thereupon Stainforth obtained from the charterers' agent at Lagos a sub-charter of the Emilien Marie, which was made at Lagos at the end of July 1874, and by which John Longton and Co., as chartered owners of the ship, agreed with Stainforth that the ship should load from Stainforth's factors a full and complete cargo of palm oil or other produce, and being loaded should proceed to Liverpool and deliver the same, on being paid freight at the rate of 30s. per ton of 20 cwt. delivered for palm kernels, and 35s. for like quantity of palm oil (the usual perils excepted), the freight to be paid on the correct delivery of the cargo in cash, on unloading, and true delivery of the cargo at Liverpool; the captain to sign bills of lading at any rate of freight, without prejudice to this charter. The master was no party to this sub-charter, and, although he had heard of its existence, had never seen it. The master had no experience of palm kernels as cargo.

In pursuance of this agreement, Lewis began to load the after hold of the ship with palm kernels, in bulk, about the beginning of August.

On the 19th Aug. 1874, Lewis presented to the master for signature the two bills of lading, A and B, for sixty tons and forty tons respectively. The master objected, that he did not know the quantity that had been shipped, and the words "weight unknown." were thereupon written across the bills of lading by Lewis, and the bills of lading were then signed by the master. Lewis at the same time, in the presence of Stainforth and Leigh Clare and Co.'s agent, informed the master that the sixty and forty tons would have to be delivered first, free from depreciation, before the rest of the cargo to be put in the after hold, and that, only if any was left, was delivery to be made to other consignees. At this time there was only about sixty or seventy tons of palm kernels in the after hold, but Lewis continued to load palm kernels until the after hold was full. As it had been estimated that the after hold would contain about 140 tons, Lewis, on the 27th Aug., when the hold was full, presented (in addition to the bills of lading already signed) a bill of lading (C) for forty tons more, to the master for signature. By this bill of lading J. Finlay was the consignor, and "D. Chinery, Managing Director African Barter Company (Limited)," was the consignee, and there was also an indorsement, "Weight unknown." The ship sailed from Lagos, duly arrived in Liverpool, and discharged her cargo; the quantity discharged from the after hold was 103 tons and no more, and of this sixty tons was delivered to Messrs. Leigh Clare and Co., under bill of lading A, and forty tons to Stainforth, under bill of lading B. The remaining three tons consisted of sweepings, and these were delivered to the plaintiffs. It was distinctly shown that the master delivered at Liverpool all that he had shipped at Lagos in the after hold.

On the ship's arrival in Liverpool, Mr. Maddril, a master porter duly appointed under the Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act, received the cargo on the quay, and his servants weighed it and loaded it off, and delivered it to the consignees or indorsees named in the bills of lading. It was stated that Mr. Maddril was instructed by the ship's brokers to deliver the sixty and forty tons, under bills of lading A and B, to Stainforth and Leigh Clare and Co., in priority to other persons claiming cargo out of the afterhold under other bills of lading. No such order was given to the master, nor was there any notice of any right to priority on any of the ship's papers, but these two bills being presented first the master porter delivered accordingly. The afterhold was full on arrival at Liverpool, and no more could have been put into it.

Under the Mersey Docks Acts Consolidation Act

1848, the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board have power (sect. 32) to appoint masters, porters, and

Sect. 35 :

The cargo of every vessel from any foreign or colonial port, entering and using any open dock, shall be received, weighed, and loaded off by one set of porters only who shall be in the employ and under the directions and orders of one of the master porters appointed by the board.

Sect. 36 :

Every master porter, immediately after his appointment and before he shall be capable of acting as such, shall execute to the board a bond, with two sufficient sureties, to be approved of by the board, in the penal sum of 200*l.*, to be conditioned for paying or satisfying the owners of goods received, weighed, or loaded off by such master porter, or by the porters in his employ or under his direction, the amount of any loss, damage, or injury which such goods may sustain during such receiving, weighing, or loading off; and the owner of any goods sustaining any such loss, damage, or injury as aforesaid, may sue in his own name such master porter and his sureties, or any or either of them, upon such bond, and shall recover in such action damages in the same manner as he might have done in case the said bond had been executed to him and not to the board.

By the bye-laws made under the above Act (Bye-laws 120, 121), further provision is made as to the responsibility of the master porters in receiving, weighing, and loading off the discharged cargoes.

Parry, Lovell, and Co. had for some time before this transaction been connected with the African Barter Company in business. About the time of the arrival of the Emilien Marie at Liverpool, the African Barter Company went into liquidation. Parry, Lovell, and Co. were then indebted to the plaintiffs in a sum of money considerably exceeding the value of the goods purporting to be covered by the bill of lading. The plaintiffs' bank was in the habit of making advances to Parry, Lovell, and Co., upon security, and it was in respect of these advances that Parry, Lovell, and Co. were indebted to the plaintiffs. No specific advances had been made against the cargo of the Emilien Marie. Parry, Lovell, and Co. wrote to the plaintiffs as follows :

122, Cannon-street, London, E.C., 31st Oct. 1874.

Messrs. Bower, Hall and Company,
East Riding Bank, Beverley.

Re African Barter Company.

Having in view the appointment of a liquidator next week, which might possibly interfere with the proceeds of the shipment by the Emilien Marie as far as we are concerned, we thought best, to prevent the possibility of a hitch, to send you the inclosed bills of lading for you to deal with, you having advanced us money on account thereof. There can be no possibility of a question being raised as to your right to receive proceeds; please, therefore, send the inclosed bills of lading to the brokers in Liverpool by Monday's post, and we send you herewith a copy of our usual note of instruction for your guidance in writing them. The value of this parcel will be about 500*l.*, after paying freight and charges.

The bills of lading of the other portion of the cargo are in the hands of the brokers who are discharging the vessel, there having been some advances made thereon, and we are now negotiating, with a view of paying off these advances, in order to secure the balance of proceeds.

We saw Mr. Silvester yesterday, to whom we gave some telegrams which will explain the delay in our promised remittance.

We are, dear sirs, yours faithfully,
PARRY, LOVELL, AND CO.

Milward, Q.C. (W. C. Gully with him), for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs derive their title as indorsees from Parry, Lovell, and Co., who are in-dorsees of Chinery, described in the bill of lading as "Managing Director of the African Barter Company Limited)." The plaintiffs are indorsees for value, without notice of any special arrangement which could defeat their claim, and are prima facie entitled to recover, if the defendants show no good defence. One defence is, that the plaintiffs had notice of the arrangement, that they gave no consideration for the bill of lading. This lies upon the defendants to show, and they have not shown it; moreover, they are bound to show that Parry, Lovell, and Co. had notice of the arrangement, and gave no consideration, otherwise the plaintiffs take from innocent holders and have a good title. A second defence is, that the plaintiffs must look to the master porter, and that he is liable for any deficiency under the Mersey Docks Acts Consolidation Act. A third defence is, that the shippers from whom the plaintiffs derive their title had notice of the charter-party and sub-charter-party, and that as the sub-charter was not entered into by the shipowners or the master, but by the charterers by the shipowners' backs, any liability arising under the sub-charter-party falls upon the charterers and not upon the shipowners, and that the master signed the bills of lading as agent of the charterers, and not of the shipowners. But by both charter-parties the master is to sign bills of lading without prejudice to the charter-party, and therefore as agent for the shipowner.

First, as to the notice of any arrangement for priority: There is nothing on the face of any of the documents to show that any such arrangement had been made, and there is no proof that knowledge of it had come either to the plaintiffs or Parry, Lovell, and Co. The bill of lading is in the ordinary form, and even if any ordinary words, such as "or to his assigns," had been omitted, there would have been not even constructive notice: (Henderson and another v. The Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris, ante, p. 98; 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 192); and I submit that nothing short of actual notice of such an arrangement could affect the plaintiffs in such a case as the present. There was ample consideration for this bill of lading in the fact that Parry, Lovell, and Co. were indebted to the plaintiffs and gave them the bill of lading as security for their overdrawn account. Such a deposit gives the plaintiffs a lien upon the bill of lading: (Brandrao v. Barnett, 1 M. & G. 908; 12 Cl. & Fin. 787) and, consequently, a right to sue.

Secondly, as to the master's power to bind the owners by signing bills of lading. The master was part owner, and, consequently, so far as his own share in the ship is concerned, he bound the ship, and the plaintiffs are entitled to recover to that extent; but I submit that they are entitled against all the owners. Under the charter-party of the 10th Oct. 1873, the master was to sign bills of lading as tendered, without prejudice to the charter-party. Hence the master had not only the general authority of a master to sign bills of lading, but also a special authority under the charter-party. He was empowered to sign and to bind the ship. Even if the master was made acquainted with the fact that Lewis had promised that bills of lading A and B should have priority, he was no party to the bargain, and he cannot set up that bargain in derogation of his own contract in writing in bill of lading C, by which he undertakes to deliver forty tons of palm kernels to the plaintiffs. Much less can he set up the bargain against the plaintiffs, who had no knowledge of it and cannot therefore be effected by it.

Then as to the defence set up in paragraph 5 of the answer. The plaintiffs seek to throw off their obligation by recourse to the Act, although they never delivered more than 103 tons out of the after hold to the master porter. There was no notice upon the ship's manifest that there was to be priority of delivery. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—If goods are to be delivered to several consignees, they are delivered under the provisions of the Mersey Docks Act; but I do not see how that makes any difference in the obligation upon the shipowner to perform his contract. The master porter is only part of the machinery for delivery. This part of the question had better be argued by the defendants, as I do not at present see how it affects the plaintiffs.]

Butt, Q. C. and E. C. Clarkson, for the defendants.—The African Barter Company were the actual shippers of the whole 103 tons. In bills of lading A and B they are named as the shippers; in bill of lading C, John Finlay is named, but it has been shown that Finlay was agent of the African Barter Company, and was succeeded by Lewis. Finlay had gone to England before the shipment, and Lewis made the arrangement with the creditors of the African Barter Company. In effect the African Barter Company, Lewis, Finlay, and Chinery, are all one for the purpose of this case, and the consignment by Finlay to Chinery in bill of lading C was a consignment from the African Barter Company to the African Barter Company. The plaintiffs derive their title through Chinery, who indorses the bill of lading as managing director of the African Barter Company, to Parry, Lovell, and Co. The African Barter Company could not set up anything against the arrangement with Stainforth and Leigh Clare and Co. The plaintiffs can only sue as assignees, and therefore the question arises whether they are bona fide assignees for value. There is no evidence that Parry, Lovell, and Co. gave anything for the bill of lading, and the onus of proof is on this point upon the plaintiffs. Parry, Lovell, and Co., having been connected in business with the African Barter Company, the presumption is that they were fully acquainted with the whole transaction, and if so, all parties concerned were affected with knowledge of the arrangement up to the time the bill of lading C got into the hands of the plaintiffs. Then as showing whether the plaintiffs are bona fide holders for value, it becomes important to inquire whether they had notice, actual or constructive, of the agreement between the shippers and Stainforth and Leigh Clare and Co. As to actual notice, there is no evidence; but we submit that they had constructive notice, that is to say, such facts came to their knowledge as ought to have put them on inquiry. The letter of the 31st Oct. 1874, from Parry, Lovell, and Co. to the plaintiffs, shows that the bill of lading was sent to the plaintiffs in order to get it into the hands of persons who would appear bona fide holders; because Parry, Lovell, and Co. feared that they themselves could not enforce the bill of lading against the African Barter Company or the shipowners. Parry, Lovell, and Co. were rather interested in the African Barter Company themselves, or they were afraid they could not get the goods from the liquidators. If Parry, Lovell, and Co. were indorsees for value, and without notice of the arrangement, why should they not have claimed? The word "hitch" in the letter shows something wrong, so far as Parry, Lovell, and Co. are concerned. Moreover, although it has been proved that nothing was advanced against the Emilien Marie consignment, the letter expressly says that the bill of lading is sent to cover such an advance already made. That letter ought to have shown to the plaintiffs that Parry, Lovell, and Co. were not bonâ fide holders, and that it was desired to make the plaintiffs appear so; such conduct should have put the plaintiffs upon inquiry. A bonâ fide holder must come into court with his hands clean. He must not only have no actual notice, but no constructive notice, that is to say, nothing which puts him on inquiry. The duty as to inquiry is clearly laid down in the equity cases relating to the purchase of real property, but it is equally applicable here. In White and Tudor's Leading Cases in Equity, 2nd edit., vol. 2, p. 38, it is said, "No equitable doctrine is better established than that so clearly and forcibly laid down by Lord Hardwicke in the principal case (Le Neve v. Le Neve), viz., that the person who purchases an estate (although for valuable consideration) after notice of a prior equitable right, makes himself a malâ fide purchaser, and will not be enabled, by getting in the legal estate, to defeat such prior equitable interest, but will be held a trustee for the benefit of the person whose right he sought to defeat." Again, at p. 38, "Constructive notice is defined to be in its nature no more than evidence of notice, the presumption of which is so violent that the court will not allow of its being controverted." The authors proceed to quote a passage from a judgment of Wigram, V.C., in Jones v. Smith (1 Hare, 55), in which it is said that there are two classes of constructive notice—the one where the party has had actual notice that the property he purchases is in some way incumbered or affected, the other cases in which the court has been satisfied that the party charged had designedly abstained from inquiry for the purpose of avoiding notice. Here the plaintiffs both had actual notice that the property was affected, and they abstained from inquiry after their suspicions were, or ought to have been, aroused. When bankers have the offer of a security such as this, they ought to make some inquiry. The defendants had no means of knowing of this letter, and could not, therefore, set up fraud specifically in their answer; but still, if the plaintiffs had notice of the real state of things, their acts amount to legal fraud, and this is sufficiently raised by paragraph 10 of the answer.

ADM.]

THE EMILIE MARIE.

Even if the plaintiffs hold this bill of lading as security for advances, they have only a lien upon it, and that does not give them a right of action against the shipowners. They derive their right, if any, from the indorsement of the bill of lading by Parry, Lovell, and Co. The consideration for this indorsement is alleged to be the lien upon the bill of lading for advances made; but at the time the advances were made the bill of lading was not in their possession, or indorsed to them, and consequently the consideration was a thing they had no right to and did not possess, and was valueless.

This action is brought under the Admiralty Court Act 1861, s. 6, by which this court has "jurisdiction over any claim by the owner or consignee, or assignee, of any bill of lading of any goods, &c., or his right to sue at all in any breach of duty or breach of contract," &c. An assignee of a bill of lading has no right to sue for breach of contract, except such right as he derives from the Bills of Lading Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111). Such right as he acquires by that Act is a bare right to sue, and he can acquire no greater rights than those possessed by the original shipper or owner of the goods. This is clearly shown by the preamble of the Act, which says: "Whereas, by the custom of merchants, a bill of lading of goods, being transferable by indorsement, the property in the goods may thereby pass to the indorsee; but nevertheless all rights in respect of the contract contained in the bill of lading continue in the original shipper or owner, and it is expedient that such rights should pass with the property: And whereas it frequently happens that the goods in respect of which bills of lading purport to be signed have not been laden on board, and it is proper that such bills of lading in the hands of a bonâ fide holder for value should not be questioned by the master or other person signing the same, on the ground of the goods not having been laden as aforesaid: Be it therefore enacted," &c. The wording of that preamble shows that it was not intended to pass to an indorsee any greater right than those possessed by the original shipper or owner. In Smith's Leading Cases, 4th edit., vol. 1, p. 651 (Notes to Lickbarrow v. Mason), it is said, speaking of the bills of Lading Act: "That statute, however, has altered the law in this respect (the right to sue). By the first section, rights of action and liabilities upon the bill of lading are to vest in and bind the consignee or indorsee to whom the property in the goods shall pass. By the second section it is provided that the Act is not to affect the right of stoppage in transitu or claims for freight against the shipper or owner of the goods, or the consignee or indorsee as owner, or by reason of his receipt of the goods. It should seem that the statute has not altered the rule that the indorsement of a bill of lading gives no better right to the indorsee than the indorser himself had, and that in this respect a bill of lading still differs from a bill of exchange in the same way as it did before the statute: (see Gurney v. Behrend, 3 E. & B. 622.)" Independently of the statute, the plaintiff, even if owner of the goods, could only have brought trover, and could then only have recovered what the shippers transferred to them, viz., three tons. The statute gives no greater right than that of the shipper, who was himself a party to the arrangement which gave priority to the other consignees.

Henderson v. The Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris (ubi sup.) does not affect this case, as it only decided that the omission of the words "order or assigns" from a bill of lading was not enough to put the transferee upon inquiry. In Rodger v. The Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris (L. Rep. 2 P.C. 393, 405), a bonâ fide holder is described as a person who can show that he got the bill of lading without notice of anything unfair or dishonest in the transaction.

Then, as to the master being part owner. Even if he is personally liable, the other owners are not liable. This is a proceeding in rem. The plaintiffs have no right to arrest the property of a number of owners for the breach of contract on the part of one of them. There is no maritime lien, and, consequently, no right to detain the ship. The only case in which the ship ought to be detained is where all its owners are liable.

THE EMILIE MARIE.

[ADM.]

Again, the owners are not liable because the master signed the bill of lading as agent of the charterers. By the original charter-party the ship is chartered at a lump freight. Stainforth sub-chartered the ship to carry out the proposed arrangement, and Lewis had notice of the sub-charter-party which was entered into between the charterers and sub-charterers. The rule of law is, that if the charterer of a ship put her up for cargo, and persons ship goods on board without notice that the charterer is not owner, then the shipowner is bound to the shipper; but if the shipper has notice, the master signs as agent for the charterer, and does not bind the owners of the ship:

Marquand v. Banner, 25 L. J. 313, Q. B.; Schuster v. McKellar, 26 L. J. 281, 288, Q. B.;
The St. Cloud, 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 54; Bro. & Lush.
 4; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 309;
Sandemann v. Scurr, L. Rep. 2 Q. B. 86; 2 Mar. Law
 Cas. O. S. 446.

If the master had not happened to be owner, no action could lie. The master himself may be estopped from denying that the quantity stated in the bill of lading was shipped; but that does not prevent his owners from denying it and saying that he improperly signed bills of lading for more than was shipped. A master signing for more than is actually shipped does not bind his ship-owners: (Grant v. Norway, 10 C. B. 665.) It must be admitted that the Bills of Lading Act, sect. 3, renders the master personally liable for goods not laden, if he signs bills of lading for them. He is estopped from denying the shipment, but can the plaintiffs in this action, which is a proceeding against the ship, recover against one defendant when the others are not liable, more especially when no distinction is shown as to the defendants in the petition? There has been a delivery of something under the bill of lading, and, therefore, it is an important question whether the master is or is not liable under the Bills of Lading Act, sect. 3. His liability does not make the liability of his co-owners, and this is not a proceeding in personam against the master. The third section of the Act only applies to the person actually signing the bill of lading:

Meyer v. Dresser, 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 612; 16 C. B., N. S., 646; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 27;
Jessel v. Bath, L. Rep. 2 Ex. 267.

On the question of whether a shipowner's liability is discharged by delivery to a master porter at Liverpool—the shipowner has admittedly delivered all the cargo he had on board into the hands of the master porter, and this constitutes, under the Mersey Docks Acts Consolidation Act, a complete delivery in law. Once in the hands of the master porter, any duty to deliver a particular quantity, or to decide the quantity discharged, rateably falls upon the master porter by that Act, and under sect. 26, the master porter is responsible for “the amount of any loss, damage, or injury which such goods may sustain at the hands of the master porter. The shipowner has nothing to do with the delivery in open dock, and if he is to be made responsible after his cargo have passed into the hands of the master porter and delivery on his part is complete, the Act would be meaningless.

Milward, Q.C. in reply.—The Mersey Docks Acts Consolidation Act, sect. 35, only applies to cases where the consignees suffer loss in the “receiving, weighing, and loading off” of the cargo. The master porter is only responsible for damage done by himself or his servants, not for loss of or injury to goods which he never received. He has nothing to do with the delivery, only with distribution. [Sir R. PHILLMORE.—The defendants' argument would imply that a master porter would be responsible for all damage, whether caused before or after the ship came into port. You need not trouble yourself upon that point.]

If the private arrangement was to be binding against all consignees or assignees, it ought to have appeared on the face of the bills of lading. The defendants state that Parry, Lovell, and Co. gave no consideration for the bill of lading, but this point is not raised upon the pleadings, and, consequently, the plaintiffs were not challenged to show this consideration, and the point cannot be raised, and it must be assumed that Parry, Lovell, and Co. were innocent holders for good consideration. If that be so, the bill of lading, in whosever hands it afterwards gets, is binding upon the shipowner. This will be seen by analogy drawn from cases decided on bills of exchange:

Byles on Bills, 11th edit., p. 117.

In Rodger v. The Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris (ubi sup.), Sir Joseph Napier, in giving judgment, says: “In order to decide between the rival claimants, two questions have to be answered. . . . Secondly, was the transfer of the bills of lading made to the respondents for valuable consideration, and without notice of such circumstances as rendered them not fairly and honestly assignable, and so as to transfer to the respondents a property in the goods freed and discharged from the proprietary lien of the unpaid vendors. . . . The second is the real question in the case. The respondents contend that they gave value for the bills of lading; that they had no notice of any special terms of agreement between the vendors and vendees, of which they say they were not informed, and as to which they say they were not bound to make inquiry. . . . The general rule, so clearly stated and explained by Lord St. Leonards in the case of Mangles v. Dixon (3 H. of L. Cas. 702), is, that the assignee of any security stands in the same position as the assignor as to the equities arising upon it. This, as a general rule, was not disputed, but it was contended that the case of a bill of lading is exceptional, and must be dealt with on special grounds. Doubtless, the holder of an indorsed bill of lading may in the course of commercial dealing transfer a greater right than he himself has; the exception is founded upon the negotiable quality of the document. It is confined to the case where the person who transfers the right is himself in actual and authorised possession of the document, and the transferee gives value on the faith of it, without having notice of any circumstance which would render the transaction neither fair nor honest. In such a case, if the vendor is unpaid, one of two innocent parties must suffer by the act of a third; and it is reasonable that he who, by misplaced confidence has enabled such third person to occasion the loss should sustain it: (Lickbarrow v. Mason, 2 T. R. 70.)” Then the letter from Parry, Lovell, and Co. to the plaintiffs shows that they were under advances from the plaintiffs at the time, and that there was valuable consideration for the bill, but it is no notice of any private arrangement; it simply shows that Parry, Lovell, and Co. are afraid that there might be a difficulty in their enforcing the bill of Lading on their own behalf, but that the plaintiffs would have no such difficulty. There is nothing to show that the "hitch" mentioned was anything more than a dispute and was of such a nature as to render defective Parry, Lovell, and Co.'s title to the goods represented by the bill of lading.

The default in delivery was the default of the shipowner, who was bound to have so loaded his goods that he could deliver to each consignee the amount shipped under each bill of lading; if shipping in bulk prevented the different portions from being duly allotted, that was the negligence of the shipowner. At the worst, the plaintiffs were entitled, the quantity shipped in the afterhold should be apportioned among the three holders of the bills of lading A, B, and C. Nothing appeared on the ship's papers to show priority, and all were equally entitled to delivery. Bill of lading C transferred forty tons to the plaintiffs as much as A and B transferred sixty and forty respectively to the other consignees. Even if bills of lading only transfer what was actually shipped, all the consignees were equally entitled to their proportion of the 103 tons. But it is said that on the presentation of bill of lading C, there were only three tons left on board to satisfy it after the others had been discharged, and that these three tons are all that the plaintiffs are entitled to. But the Bills of Lading Act assumes that the property named in the bill of lading passes to the ultimate holder, and he becomes clothed with the rights of the original owner as if the contract had been made with him: and, further, it is well established that a transferee for value without notice has a better title than even the original owner: (Lickbarrow v. Mason, 1 Sm. L. C., 699); and, consequently, the plaintiffs have acquired an absolute right to have delivered to them the amount of the goods named in the bill of lading, which amount the defendants cannot deny as against the plaintiffs, however much they might dispute it against former holders.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 18, 1875.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE: This is a suit by Hall, Bower, and Co., against the ship Emilie Marie and the foreign owners, for short delivery of a cargo of certain palm kernels, valued at 500*l.* Hall, Bower, and Co. are the indorsees of a bill of lading from Parry, Lovell, and Co., who are indorsers of D. Chinery, the managing director of the African Barter Company (Limited).

It appears that the master of the vessel gave three bills of lading to three different parties for portions of the same cargo of palm kernels. These bills are marked A, B, and C in the pleadings. The bill upon which the plaintiffs rest their claim is as follows: [His Lordship then read bill of lading C, set out in the pleadings.] Then there is the indorsement: "Deliver the within to Messrs. Parry, Lovell, and Co., or order—D. Chinery;" indorsed also "Parry, Lovell, and Co." Prima facie the plaintiffs are entitled to their forty tons of palm kernels. The other bills of lading, A and B, are as follows: [His Lordship read these bills of lading, as set forth in the pleadings.] The whole shipment, therefore, it appears, ought to have amounted to 140 tons of kernels, whereas, when the cargo came to be delivered there were only 103 tons. The holders of the bill of lading A received their sixty tons, the holders of the bill of lading B received their forty tons, and the holders of the bill of lading C were tendered about three tons of kernels and sweepings, which they refused to accept, and hence the institution of this suit.

Various answers have been pleaded in defence. Some are of what may be called a technical, and some of a substantial character. I will first deal with those of the former category.

First, it is contended as follows in the 5th article of the answer: "The said vessel," &c. [His Lordship here read the 5th paragraph of the answer, as above set out.] Upon examination of the statutes referred to and the bye-laws passed by virtue of them, I am clearly of opinion that these statutes in no way alter the legal liability existing previously to the delivery at Liverpool, to the master porter, of the cargo. Those statutes and bye-laws relate to the possibility of injury in the "receiving, weighing, and loading of the goods," for damage to which, while in his possession, the master porter may be liable. And I may observe here, that the order of the shipbroker to the master was to deliver 140 tons, without any difference to priority or to any supposed bargain.

Secondly, the question was raised as to the effect of the Bills of Lading Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111). It was contended that this statute gives no greater right to the assignees than the assignors possessed, and, therefore, assuming that the assignors, for reasons presently to be stated, could not have put in force the bill of lading, the incapacity attaches to the assignee. This argument has some plausibility, but I think no soundness. The question arises in sect. 1 as to who is meant by the term "himself." I think the ultimate and not the intervening owner, and that in this case it is as if the kernels had been consigned to Hall, Bower, and Co. direct, and not to Chinery.

Thirdly, it is contended that the vessel had been sub-chartered in this case to Stainforth, that the master signed the bill of lading as agent for the sub-charterers, and not of the owner. If this were so, it would be enough to say that at least notice of the sub-charter, or that the master was signing as agent for the sub-charterers, ought to appear on the bill of lading. It does not appear, and I am further of opinion that the master did not sign in that capacity.

Fourthly, it is contended that though the captain, being a part owner in this vessel, may be liable, there are other owners, and that no liability attaches to the whole ship, which it is said the court has no right to arrest. I am of a different opinion. I think the court has jurisdiction over this ship, though the part owners may be subject to an action in another court.

Now I come to the argument, of a less technical and more substantial character, addressed to the court on behalf of the defendants. It is, in fact, contended that the plaintiffs are guilty of a fraud in the matter of the bill of lading C, an allegation which I think should have been distinctly pleaded if intended to be relied upon. It is said, however, that the charge necessarily results from what is pleaded. The 10th article is as follows: "The plaintiffs had notice of the agreement mentioned in article 8 of this answer before any assignment was made to them of the said bill of lading referred to in the said petition. No consideration was paid by the plaintiffs for the assignment of the said bill of lading." If these two averments are substantiated by evidence, the plaintiffs, it is contended, are putting forward a claim bottomed on fraud. I will consider them in their order.

THE EMILIE MARIE.

But, first, it will be convenient to state concisely the law applicable to both these allegations. It is perspicuously stated, in the case of Rodger v. The Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris (L. Rep. 2 P. C. 405), before the Privy Council: "Doubtless," their Lordships say, "the holder of an indorsed bill of lading may, in the course of commercial dealing, transfer a right greater than he himself has; the exception is founded on the negotiable quality of the document. It is confined to the case where the person who transfers the right is himself in actual and authorised possession of the document, and the transferee gives value on the faith of it, without having notice of any circumstances which would render the transaction neither fair nor honest."

Now, it is said that the plaintiffs had notice sufficient to invalidate their claim; what it was is set out in the 8th article (to which the 10th refers) of the answer: "At the time of the said shipment by the African Barter Company, and before the signing of the said bills of lading, it was for valuable consideration, agreed by and between the said company and Messrs. Charles Leigh Clare and Co. and Samuel Rigby Stainforth respectively, who are the consignees respectively named in the said bills of lading, copies whereof are annexed, marked respectively A and B, that the said Charles Leigh Clare and Co. and Samuel Rigby Stainforth were respectively to have delivered to them out of the said shipment, made by or on behalf of the said company, the full quantity of kernels mentioned in their said bills of lading before any portion of the said kernels should be delivered to the said D. Chinery, managing director of the said company, or to his assigns, on the said bills of lading mentioned in the petition." The two bills of lading A and B, referred to in this article, have been already recited. The shippers in these are the African Barter Company, Leigh Clare and Co., consignees of A, and Stainforth, consignee of B, had claims secured by judgments upon their allotments of the cargo. The shipper in bill of lading C is Finlay, the consignee being Chinery, described as managing director of the African Barter Company. It is said that Finlay and Chinery are practically the same, and that the African Barter Company was known to be on the verge of bankruptcy. But, if this be so, it would not affect Parry, Lovell, and Co., to whom Chinery indorsed the bill of lading C.

Then it is said that they had notice of a private arrangement, whereby it was settled that A and B should be satisfied before C, because Chinery must be taken to have been cognizant of this agreement. I am not satisfied that Parry, Lovell, and Co. were not innocent holders of the bill C; and I must observe that it is not pleaded that they took bill C with notice or without consideration; but, even if they were not innocent holders, what is alleged against Hall, Bower, and Co.? Why, that a letter from Parry, Lovell, and Co. to them gave them notice which, as honest assignees of bill C, ought to have awakened their suspicion, and have admonished them to make inquiries, the result of which would have apprised them that bill C was to be postponed to A and B, and that there were not kernels enough to satisfy the three. The letter, so far as it was relied on to prove this charge, is as follows: [His Lordship then read the letter of the 31st Oct. 1874, from Parry, Lovell, and Co. to the plaintiffs, before set out.] After a careful consideration of this letter, I cannot come to the conclusion that it warrants the argument that Hall, Bower, and Co. were bound to have made further inquiries before they took the bill of lading.

The general principle of the law as to constructive notice to allot in the case about to be cited seems to be well laid down in the judgment of Wigram, V.C., in Jones v. Smith (11 Hare, 55): "It is scarcely possible," observes his Honour, "to declare à priori what shall be deemed constructive notice; because, unquestionably, that which would not affect one man may be abundantly sufficient to affect another. But I believe I may, with sufficient accuracy for my present purpose, and without danger, assert that the cases in which constructive notice has been established resolve themselves into two classes; first, cases in which the party charged has had actual notice that the property in dispute was in fact charged, encumbered, or in some way affected, and the court has thereupon bound him with constructive notice of facts and instruments to a knowledge of which he would have been led by an inquiry after the charges, incumbrance, or other circumstance affecting the property of which he had actual notice; and, secondly, cases in which the court has been satisfied, from the evidence before it, that the party charged has designedly abstained from inquiry for the very purpose of avoiding notice. The proposition of law upon which the former class of cases rests is, not that the party charged had notice of an instrument, which in truth related to the subject in dispute, without knowing that such was the case, but that he had actual notice that it did so relate. The proposition of law upon which the second class of cases proceed is, not that the party charged had incautiously neglected to make inquiries, but that he had designedly abstained from such inquiries for the purpose of avoiding knowledge—a purpose which, if proved, would clearly show he had a suspicion of the truth, and a fraudulent determination not to learn it. If, in short, there is not actual notice that the property is in some way affected, and no fraudulent turning away from that knowledge of facts which the res gestæ would suggest to a prudent mind—if mere want of caution, as distinguished from fraudulent and wilful blindness, is all that can be imputed to the purchaser—there the doctrine of constructive notice will not apply; there the purchaser will in equity be considered, as in fact he is, a bonâ fide purchaser without notice." These remarks in favour of the innocence of the purchaser are certainly not weakened when applied to the holder of a bill of lading. It may be that the letter conveys an intimation that the African Barter Company is on the eve of bankruptcy, and that the writer desires to prevent the bill of lading from forming part of the bankruptcy estate. It may be before another tribunal, and for a different purpose, the writer may be liable for this statement. I offer no opinion on these points. The question before me is, whether the letter ought to have suggested to Hall, Bower and Co. that which is now relied upon, namely, that the bill of lading C was only to be satisfied if the satisfaction of bills A and B left a sufficient quantity of kernels for the purpose. I think it contained no such suggestion.

With respect to the objection as to want of consideration given by Hall, Bower, and Co., I am of opinion that the bill of lading was assigned to and taken by them in part payment of a debt due to them from the assignee, which is a sufficient valuable consideration.

Upon the whole, I am of opinion that the prayer of the plaintiffs ought to be granted. I pronounce for the damage, which must be referred in the usual manner to the registrar and merchants, and I condemn the defendant in costs.

Feb. 11 and 18, 1875.

THE EARL SPENCER.

Collision—Speed—Ship overtaken—No duty to show light or signal.

A steamship entering a harbour at full speed on a night when ships not showing lights can be seen only at a distance of one or two cables' length will be held to blame if she injures another ship.

There is no duty imposed upon any ship to exhibit a light or signal astern to another ship approaching the former from such a direction that the regulation lights of the leading ship are not visible to those on board the following ship, even when the leading ship is in the fair way of a harbour on a night when vessels not showing lights cannot be seen at a greater distance than one or two cables' length.

THIS was a cause of collision instituted on behalf of the owners, master, and crew of the schooner Merlin, and on behalf of the owners of the cargo lately laden on board thereof, against the steamship Earl Spencer, and against the London and North-Western Railway Company, the owners of the said steamship, intervening. The petition, so far as is material, was as follows:

1. At about or shortly before 5 a.m. on the 17th Oct. 1874, the schooner Merlin, of 65 tons register, manned by a crew of four hands all told, whilst in prosecution of a voyage from Carmarthen to Liverpool with a cargo of tin plate, was in Holyhead Bay inside of the Breakwater.

2. The wind at such time was about south-south-west, a moderate gale; the weather was rainy, and the tide about one hour and a half ebb, and the Merlin had her proper regulation lights duly exhibited, and burning brightly. She was on the starboard tack, heading about south-east by south; her speed was about one and a half knots or two knots per hour, and she was under double-reefed mainsail, reefed topsail, standing jib and forestaysail, and her crew were engaged in setting her double-reefed foresail.

3. At such times the above-named steamship Earl Spencer, with her three lights open, was seen at the distance of about a cable's length astern of the Merlin, and coming towards her under steam. The Earl Spencer, although loudly hailed from the Merlin, ran against and with her stem struck the Merlin a violent blow on her port quarter, doing her a great deal of damage. The crew of the Merlin got on board the Earl Spencer in order to save their lives, and the Earl Spencer, after an unsuccessful attempt to take the Merlin in tow, proceeded into Holyhead harbour, and the Merlin and her cargo and everything on board her were totally lost.

4. Those on board the Earl Spencer neglected to keep a proper look-out.

5. The Earl Spencer improperly neglected to keep out of the way of the Merlin.

6. The Earl Spencer was going too fast considering the state of the weather, and did not duly observe and comply with the provisions of Article 16 of the Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea.

7. The said collision and the consequent loss of the Merlin and her cargo, and everything on board her, were occasioned by the negligent and improper navigation of the Earl Spencer.

8. The said collision was not occasioned by any negligence on the part of the master or crew of the Merlin.

The defendants filed an answer, which, so far as material was as follows:

1. The Earl Spencer is a paddle steamship of 350 horse-power, and of 431 tons register, belonging to the port of London, is manned by a crew of twenty-eight hands all told, and is employed in carrying cargo and passengers between Holyhead and Greenore in Ireland.

2. The Earl Spencer left Greenore bound for Holyhead on the evening of the 16th Oct. 1874, having on board a cargo of general goods, cattle, and thirty-eight passengers.

3. The Earl Spencer proceeded on her said voyage in safety until about 4.25 a.m. on the 17th Oct. 1874, when the tide being ebb, the weather dark and rainy, and a gale blowing from the south-south-west, the Earl Spencer was rounding the breakwater of and entering Holyhead outer harbour, heading about south-half-east, with her regulation lights burning brightly, and a good look-out being kept on board of her. At such time, and after rounding the breakwater, those on board the Earl Spencer suddenly sighted a vessel, which turned out to be the Merlin, with no lights visible, bearing about half a point on the starboard bow of the Earl Spencer and close ahead of the latter vessel, and inside the breakwater.

The master of the Earl Spencer, thinking that the Merlin was a vessel at anchor, starboarded the helm of the Earl Spencer to go to the eastward and outside of her and of the other shipping, there being several vessels at anchor to the westward of the Merlin, but discovering immediately afterwards that the Merlin was under weigh, the master of the Earl Spencer ordered the engines of that vessel to be stopped and reversed full speed, which order was immediately obeyed, but as the time which had elapsed from the sighting of the Merlin was so short, and as the Merlin was steering a course which crossed the course of the Earl Spencer, that latter vessel was unable to avoid the Merlin, but her bow came in contact with the stern and port quarter of the Merlin. The master of the Earl Spencer attempted to tow the Merlin in safety, but after an unsuccessful attempt to do so was compelled, through fear of risking the lives and property under his care, to abandon her after taking on board her crew.

4. Save as herein appears the defendants deny the several allegations of the plaintiffs' petition.

5. Those on board the Merlin improperly omitted under the circumstances of the case to hail the Earl Spencer, or to show a light, or to take any proper measures in due time to warn those on board the Earl Spencer of the proximity and position of the Merlin, although from the relative position of the two ships the regulation lights of the Merlin were not visible to those on board the Earl Spencer.

6. Those on board the Merlin neglected to observe and comply with the provisions of Articles 19 and 20 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.

7. The said collision was occasioned or contributed to by some or one of the acts or defaults set forth in the 5th and 6th Articles of this answer, or otherwise by the negligence of those on board the Merlin.

8. The said collision was not occasioned by any negligence of those on board the Earl Spencer, but was, so far as they were concerned, an inevitable accident.

The pleadings were thereupon concluded.

Feb. 11.—The cause came on for hearing before the Judge, assisted by Trinity Masters. The facts of the case were not in dispute. The plaintiffs called only one witness, the master of the Merlin, who stated that the Merlin was beating into Holyhead harbour for refuge, as it was blowing a gale of wind, and the weather was dark and rainy. He was at the helm, and the rest of the crew were engaged in hoisting the foresail. As he was coming in he made out the hulls of two vessels at the distance of about a cable's length and a half off; They had their riding lights up. No one on board the Merlin sighted the Earl Spencer till she was about a cable's length off astern of them, and then the master of the Merlin saw the Earl Spencer's three lights, and made out that vessel coming up right astern of them, and the Earl Spencer was loudly hailed, but came on and struck the Merlin on the stern a little on the port side. The Merlin was heading S.E. by S., and the Earl Spencer S. $\frac{1}{2}$ E. In cross-examination the master of the Merlin admitted that he could have seen the lights of the Earl Spencer three or four miles off if he had looked for them, and that if he had seen them sooner he should have shown the Earl Spencer a light over the stern of the Merlin; that it was his practice to show a light over his vessel's stern on such occasions; and that the Earl Spencer was coming up in such a direction that those on board of her could not see the Merlin's regulation lights.

THE EARL SPENCER.

The defendants' witnesses stated that the Earl Spencer was going into Holyhead harbour at a speed of eleven knots, and that such a speed is necessary to keep enough steerage way on to enable the steamer to get into the place where she lands her passengers and cargo. If she slackened speed she would be thrown off her course by the tide and wind. The night was so dark, that although a good look out (the first mate and three men) was kept on the fore-castle the Merlin was not sighted until within a cable's length. The Merlin was in the usual track of steamers going into the harbour, and had no lights visible, but the master of the Earl Spencer thought she was a vessel at anchor, it being a common thing for small vessels to lie at anchor without lights inside the breakwater. As there were other vessels at anchor to starboard of the Merlin, the master of the Earl Spencer starboarded his helm to go outside of her, but immediately afterwards discovered she was under weigh, and stopped and reversed his engines, but was unable to avoid the collision.

The court called upon (on the question of speed)

Butt, Q.C. and James P. Aspinall for the defendants.—The speed of the Earl Spencer was justifiable. If such speed was necessary to reach her discharging berth, she cannot be held wrong in keeping up that speed even when entering harbour. Having only just entered the harbour, it would not have been safe to slacken speed. There is no rule or regulation requiring a vessel to go at less than full speed except in foggy weather, and whether a steam ship be entering harbour or in the open sea, she is equally entitled to keep up her speed if she can see nothing in her way. Even if she had slackened speed on entering the harbour, she could not have avoided the collision: she made out the Merlin too late to be able to avoid that vessel even if she had been going at half speed.

When the night is so dark that the look out on board a steamship cannot make out a vessel ahead till within the length of a cable or two, and until it is too late to avoid a collision, it is the duty of those on board the vessel ahead, if she is in such a position that her regulation lights are not visible to the overtaking vessel, to exhibit a light to that vessel or to give her some signal by which she may recognise that she is likely to run into risk of collision. The master of the Merlin should have shown a light or signal over the stern of the Merlin in time to have enabled the Earl Spencer to keep out of the way of the Merlin. This duty on the part of the leading vessel arises under the general maritime law enforced by Article 20 of the regulations for preventing collisions, which says "Nothing in these rules shall exonerate any ship, or the owner, or master, or crew thereof, from the consequences of any neglect to carry lights or signal, or of any neglect to keep a proper look-out or of the neglect of any precaution which may be required by the ordinary practice of seamen, or by the special circumstances of the case." Under the general maritime law before the passing of these regulations, although there was no rule requiring fixed lights to be carried, there was an obligation upon every vessel at night to show a light to another vessel approaching from any direction if the vessels were navigating in frequented water; and consequently a vessel would be bound to show a light over her stern to another approaching. The regulations only provide for certain fixed lights to be carried from sunset to sunrise (Arts. 3 & 5), which are visible only from ahead and not from astern. Art. 20 expressly reserves the obligation to carry such lights or signals, in addition to those fixed lights, as may be required by the ordinary practice of seamen, and that the exhibition of a light or signal over the stern of the Merlin would have been an ordinary seamanlike precaution is admitted by the master of the Merlin. The regulations leave untouched the obligation of the maritime law as to showing lights or signals in the directions in which the fixed lights are not visible. Such occasional lights or signals should be ready for occasional exhibition whenever there appears to be danger of collision. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I shall ask the Elder Brethren whether in this case it would have been in accordance with the ordinary practice of seamen to have exhibited a light.] The practice of seamen is no doubt a question for the Elder Brethren but the obligation under the maritime law, is a question for the court. In The Chanonry (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 569; 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 284), this court intimated that under special circumstances the exhibition of a light astern to an overtaking vessel would be obligatory, and in this case there were clearly special circumstances; because the Merlin was beating into a harbour into which these steamers went regularly and was in the usual track of these steamers. She was an obstruction to the fairway, and as such was bound to give notice of her position; failure to give such notice disentitles her from recovering in this action, as but for that failure no collision could have occurred.

Milward, Q.C. and Clarkson, for the plaintiffs:—The Chanonry (ubi sup.) is in our favour, because it was there decided that the leading vessel was under no obligation to show lights, although she was navigating one of the passages of the Bristol Channel, and a strong opinion was expressed that such unusual lights would be misleading. The regulations clearly contemplated the case of overtaking ships. They specially provide for the arc of the horizon over which the lights are to be seen, and that the side lights shall not be seen abaft the beam, and this provision indicates that vessels are not to show lights astern. Moreover, article 2 of the regulations provides that "the lights mentioned in the following articles, numbered 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9, and no others, shall be carried in all weathers from sunset to sunrise," and it will be noticed that in those articles no mention is made of showing a light astern, and that article 20 is not included among the articles named therein. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—But articles 3 and 5 which govern the ship apply to the permanent carrying of lights according to Mr. Butt's contention.] The only provision in the rules for the occasional exhibition of lights relates to the case of small vessels (articles 6 and 9), and this only in case it is impossible to fix the lights; when the lights can be fixed no others should be exhibited. What light or signal is a vessel to show to one overtaking her? In The C. S. Butler (L. Rep. 4 Adm. & Ecc. 238; 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 549; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 408), a steamer was held to blame for damaging a dumb barge navigating the Thames at night, and it was held that there was no obligation on the barge to show a light, because the rules provided no special light for a dumb barge. If we are bound to show a white light, how is it to be distinguished from an anchor light. We submit that the Legislature expressly omitted any mention of lights astern in order to prevent confusion. The only question is whether the steamer was prudently navigated.

Butt, Q.C., in reply.—Both in The Chanonry (ubi sup.), and The C. S. Butler (ubi sup.), the nights were such that vessels could be seen without lights at a considerable distance, whereas here they were only visible when close to. The exhibition of a light under such circumstances was a matter of ordinary precaution.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The court entertains no doubt whatever with respect to a portion of this case, namely, that the steamer is to blame for the very reprehensible speed at which, in the circumstances of this case, she thought proper to enter Holyhead Harbour. But on the other point the court will take a little time to consider, and will deliver a reasoned judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 18.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The question reserved in this case is whether the Merlin be not to blame as well as the Earl Spencer—already pronounced to be to blame—because she, the Merlin, did not exhibit a light over her stern. I must consider this question with reference to the particular case and the general law.

First, as to the particular case. The Elder Brethren were careful to draw my attention to the fact that the crew of this little schooner were only four in number. That the master was engaged in steering and the three others in making sail, and in their opinion there was not time or opportunity to have exhibited a light over the stern. In this opinion I agree, but I am afraid I must consider, secondly, what the general law is.

That law is to be found now exclusively in the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea. The regulations carefully prescribe the occasions upon which lights are to be carried, and the character and position of those lights.

It is not denied that no express provision is to be found for the exhibition of a light to an overtaking vessel. The second article of the regulations rules that lights mentioned in certain following articles, and no others, shall be carried in all weathers, from sunset to sunrise; and it is clear that the case of an overtaking vessel was in the contemplation of the framers of the regulations, for Article 17 says, "Every vessel overtaking any other vessel shall keep out of the way of the said last-mentioned vessel;" and if it be ever the duty of the vessel overtaken to exhibit a stern light here was surely the place where it would have been mentioned.

It is no secret that great nautical authorities are divided in their opinion on the subject of the advantage or disadvantage of exhibiting a stern light. It may be proper that a regulation to the effect should be made. I do not offer an opinion upon the point.

The regulations, having an international character, would of course require great consideration, caution, and communication with other states who are parties to the existing regulations, but until a new regulation be made it seems to me that to require a vessel about to be overtaken to exhibit a stern light would lead to confusion and danger. The necessity for exhibiting such a light would vary with the circumstances of each case; at least, I presume it would not be contended that the overtaking vessel would always be entitled to expect the exhibition of a light from the vessel ahead. The consequence would probably be that uncertainty would be introduced to the general matter of lights, and certainty in this respect has been the great object of the regulations.

I am of opinion that the exhibition of a stern light is not obligatory on the vessel ahead. This opinion must be taken as corrective of any dicta uttered by me in the case of The Chanonry (ubi sup.).

I pronounce the Earl Spencer alone to blame. Solicitors for the plaintiff, Ingledew, Ince, and Greening.

Bill of exchange—Doctrines of Ex parte Waring—Ship-building contract—Bills drawn against work done—Vendor's lien for unpaid purchase-money—Double insolvency—Rights of bill holders.
A. contracted to build an iron steamship for B. for 7600l. The money was to be paid by instalments at specified periods, as the building of the ship progressed, partly in cash and partly in bills, and from the time of paying the first instalment the ship was to be the property of B., to the extent of his payments, subject to A.'s lien for any unpaid instalments. B. gave his acceptances from time to time to the amount of 2700l. to A., who discounted them with his bankers in the ordinary course.

Before the ship was completed, A. and B. both became insolvent, and the bills were consequently dishonoured at maturity. B.'s creditors resolved to accept a composition, and their resolution was duly registered. B. subsequently abandoned the contract, and the trustee under A.'s bankruptcy finished the ship. The bankers, the holders of the bills, which were expressed to be drawn "for value received in iron screw steamer now building," claimed to stand in B.'s place, and to be entitled to a lien upon the ship for the moneys they had advanced on the bills:

Held (affirming the decision of the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy), that the doctrines of Ex parte Waring (19 Ves. 345) did not apply, and that the bill holders were not entitled to the lien claimed by them.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, reversing a decision of the judge of the County Court of Newcastle-upon-Tyne.

Edward Lindsay, the bankrupt, was an iron shipbuilder at St. Lawrence, near Newcastle-upon-Tyne. On the 20th Oct. 1873, he entered into a contract with Messrs. Marshall, Osborne, and Co., engineers and boiler builders, at South Shields, to build them an iron screw steamer, the material clauses of which were the following:—

The facts were as follows;—

That if at any time the said Edward Lindsay shall neglect or make default in any of the conditions of this contract, or in the event of the death, bankruptcy, or insolvency of the said Edward Lindsay, or if not completed by the time specified, it shall be lawful then and thenceforth for Marshall, Osborne, and Co. to cause any person or persons, nominated for that purpose by them, to enter upon and take possession of the vessel, and of all materials, matters or things prepared or provided, or in the course of preparation for the vessel, and to cause the vessel to be completed by any person whom Marshall, Osborne, and Co. may see fit to employ in such completion, and at such place or places as Marshall, Osborne, and Co. shall choose to take the vessel to for that purpose; or in like manner to contract with some such person or persons for the completion of the work agreed to be done by the said Edward Lindsay, and to employ such materials of and belonging to the said Edward Lindsay as shall then be upon his premises, and which shall be considered fit and applicable for the purpose. And it shall be lawful for the said Marshall, Osborne, and Co. to pay to such person or persons such sum or sums as they shall think fit or agree upon in that behalf, and to deduct such sum or sums of money as they may so pay from and out of the payments agreed by them to be paid to the said Edward Lindsay.

That the said vessel, and the materials prepared and provided, or in course of preparation, shall, from the time of giving or paying the first instalment by the said Marshall, Osborne, and Co. to the said Edward Lindsay, belong and be deemed in every respect, for every and all purposes, to be the property of the said Marshall, Osborne and Co. to the extent of their advances (whether in the builder's yard, or in the river, or in the graving dock after launching), and that for the better identification of the vessel, and for the protection of the said Marshall, Osborne, and Co., the said Edward Lindsay shall, immediately the keel of the vessel is laid, mark thereon the initials of the said Marshall, Osborne, and Co., as owners, and the name of the said vessel, and as soon as practicable mark the name of the said vessel, and the initials of the said Marshall, Osborne, and Co. as owners thereof, in legible characters, subject, nevertheless, to the builder's lien for any unpaid instalments.

That the price of the said vessel shall be 6700*l.* sterling.

That the said vessel shall be launched on or before the 1st Aug. 1874, and delivered to the purchasers complete in hull, with everything named in the specification, by the 1st Sept. 1874.

That the said Edward Lindsay shall be paid for the said vessel as follows:—

When keel is laid 100*l.* cash, and 500*l.* by 6 months' bill.

When framed, 1000*l.* by 6 months' bill.

When plated, 200*l.* cash, and 2000*l.* by 4 months' bill.

When launched, 200*l.* cash, and 2000*l.* by 4 months' bill.

When finished, the balance by 6 months' bill.

All bills given during construction to be retired by Marshall, Osborne, and Co., at completion and transfer.

Edward Lindsay immediately proceeded to build the ship. The mode of payment stipulated for by the contract was not strictly adhered to, but prior to the 9th July 1874, Marshall, Osborne, and Co., had paid to Lindsey about 100*l.* in cash, and had accepted to his drafts five bills of exchange to the aggregate amount of 2700*l.* The first bill was stated to be given "for value received at keel being laid for steamer," and the remainder purported to be "for value received in iron screw steamer now building." Edward Lindsay discounted all these bills with his bankers, Messrs. Lambton and Co., of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, without any suspicion on their part that the bills would not be met at maturity, or that either Lindsay, or Marshall, Osborne, and Co. were in difficulties.

On the 28th July 1874, Daniel Thomas Osborne died before any of the acceptances given by his firm had become payable, and on the 31st, the surviving partner, Robert John Osborne, finding the affairs of the firm greatly involved, filed his petition for liquidation, and at the first meeting the creditors passed resolutions accepting a composition of five shillings in the pound. These resolutions were subsequently confirmed, and registered on the 18th Sept.

On the 10th Oct., Robert John Marshall gave notice in writing of his intention to abandon the contract with Lindsay for the building of the steamer.

On the 18th Aug. 1874, E. Lindsay filed a petition for liquidation, but the proceedings fell through.

On the 7th Sept. E. Lindsay was adjudicated bankrupt, upon the petition of R. S. Proctor, a creditor for 500*l.*, filed on the 20th Aug., and Joseph Greener was appointed receiver and manager of his estate. This adjudication was annulled on appeal, and the matter remitted to the County Court to inquire into the alleged act of bankruptcy: (see Ex parte Lindsay, 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 415; L. Rep. 19 Eq. 52.) The petition for adjudication was subsequently dismissed by consent.

On the 11th Dec. E. Lindsay was again adjudicated bankrupt, and Mr. Greener was appointed the trustee thereunder. At this time the ship was still in the building yard of E. Lindsay, in an unfinished state, and the trustee proceeded to complete it, and advanced the necessary funds for that purpose.

All the bills were dishonoured at maturity, and Messrs. Lambton and Co. claimed, under the bankruptcy of Lindsay, to stand in the place of Marshall, Osborne, and Co., and to have a lien upon the ship for the amount which they had advanced to Lindsay upon the acceptance in their hands.

On the 23rd Jan. 1875, the County Court Judge, upon the application of Messrs. Lambton and Co., made an order, declaring that the steamer was, at the date of the bankruptcy of Edward Lindsay, a security to the firm of Marshall, Osborne, and Co., for indemnifying them against the payment of the bills of exchange given by them to E. Lindsay, and then in the possession of Messrs. Lambton and Co., as the holders thereof for value, and that Messrs. Lambton and Co., were entitled to the benefit of such security in respect of the said bills.

Against this order Joseph Green appealed. Little, Q.C., Winslow, Q.C., and F. H. Colt, appeared for the appellant.—The question was, whether the rule in Ex parte Waring (19 Ves. 345) applied to the present case. They submitted that it did not, because in the present case there never were two insolvencies existing at one and the same time. Under the contract the ship could not be a security to anyone who was not willing to pay the 7600*l.*, the amount of the purchase money, and thus gain possession of the ship. Possession was to be given, but only concurrently with the obligation to retire the outstanding bills of exchange. Everything was conditional upon the payment and retiring of the bills at maturity. They cited

De Gex, Q.C. and Doria, appeared for the bank, who claimed to be entitled to whatever lien E. Lindsay possessed. He had a right to retain the ship until all the bills were paid, and the bank was also entitled to have the ship as security for the outstanding bills in their hands, without being compelled to complete the purchase. That was the common case of Ex parte Waring, and there was no necessity that there should be a double insolvency. The bank was entitled to the equities both of E. Lindsay and Marshall, Osborne, and Co., and to prove against both estates, and to take the composition under the one and the instalments under the other. They cited

The Chief Judge.—After the very long argument that I have heard, it is satisfactory that one can bring the case back to a very simple shape. It appears that Lindsay agreed to build a ship for Messrs. Marshall, Osborne, and Co., for 7600*l.* If he build the ship they are to pay him 7600*l.*, and if they do not pay him 7600*l.* the ship must remain his. That 7600*l.* has not been paid. Then, upon what ground could anyone claim to have any interest in the ship? It is one entire contract, and the substance of it is that which I have stated. The ship is, of course, proceeded with progressively; there is a stipulation for payment by way of advances as the ship proceeds. There is a stipulation that, to the extent of these advances, the purchasers shall have a lien on the ship. But all that is overridden by the general universal stipulation that, until you pay Lindsay 7600*l.* that ship is not Messrs. Marshall, Osborne, and Co.'s, nor any interest in the ship. They can claim nothing. Now, it seems to me that that disposes of the question altogether, because, unless that state of facts can be shaken, the case of Ex parte Waring cannot be resorted to, and no other principle of law need be resorted to. Lindsay is to build the ship, and, as in the course of building, expenses are incurred from day to day, as the ship proceeds advances are to be made. The agreement is so plain and so clear that it is impossible to have any doubt whatever on the subject. The 4th clause, namely, that upon which the learned judge of the court below relies most, is that which has furnished, to a great degree, the arguments I have listened to on the part of the respondent. It is this, that the vessel shall, from the time of giving or paying the first instalment by Messrs. Marshall, Osborne, and Co. to Lindsay, belong and be deemed in every respect, and for every and all purposes, to be the property of the said Messrs. Marshall, Osborne, and Co., to the extent of their advances. The meaning of that one knows well enough is to prevent any outside claim from being made upon the ship. Then, for the better identification of the said vessel, it is agreed that certain marks shall be put upon this vessel as soon as the keel is laid; but all this shall be subject nevertheless to the builder's lien for any unpaid instalment. There is a stipulation for the period within which the ship shall be completed, and there is expressed in the agreement the periods at which bills are to be given as the ship proceeds; and there is, moreover, this express agreement, that all the bills given during the construction of the vessel are to be returned by Messrs. Marshall, Osborne, and Co. at the completion of the transfer, so that, although bills for 6000*l.*, or any other sums, were to be given before the completion, yet when the vessel was completed, and when its delivery was asked for by the purchasers, the whole sum must have been paid to Lindsay. That is the very essence of the contract. And then what takes place is this: 100*l.* are paid, and at certain periods bills of exchange are given for other sums. These bills of exchange are discounted by the bankers in the most ordinary course of trade; there was no suggestion, no stipulation that these bills were given on the security of the ship, although the bills do, on the face of them, mention the ship then building, but without the remotest intention on the part of anybody, discounter, drawer, acceptor, or anybody, that there should be any connection between the moneys advanced on the security of the bills and the ship in course of building. It has been suggested, on the authority of Ex parte Waring, that the holders of these bills were entitled to a lien on the ship. What part of the ship, I ask? Because it goes only to the extent of the advances. That is clear in the stipulation. What part of the ship, then, are they entitled to? The ship is to be one entire substantive thing, and to be the builder's, notwithstanding what I have read that it should belong to the purchaser to the extent of the advances. It is the property of the builder until he is paid. The bankers say, that inasmuch as there has been a double insolvency and a double right of proof, they are entitled to apply the principle of Ex parte Waring to this case. In my opinion nothing can be more foreign to the principle of Ex parte Waring than the case now before me. The case of Ex parte Waring proceeds, not upon any favour to the bill-holders, but upon the equitable rights subsisting between the parties to the bills. The holders are disregarded for all purposes of legal claims, but in order, as Lord Eldon said—and that is the very marrow and point of his decision—to work out the equity between the persons liable in a matter in which they are both interested, but in which neither of them can claim the property, it must be realised for the benefit of the holders, to whom both are under an obligation to pay a share. There the equity is clear, and if there be any balance it is to be proved for in the ordinary way by the bill-holders. What has that to do with this case? What equity subsists here? There are no equities, no legal rights that the purchaser of the ship can claim until he has paid 7600*l.* What can he do, although there is this stipulation in the 4th clause of the agreement? Can he sell any part of the ship thus said to belong to him? Could he interfere with what any assignee or contractor might do for the completion of the ship? The object and intention of that clause is perfectly obvious. Everybody knows it is to prevent the operation of the order and disposition clause, and consequently it is not infrequent that such a stipulation is made. It can, however, have no force with respect to the completion of the ship. With respect to the double insolvency, I quite agree that it is possible, as has been suggested to me, that assignees or other persons might lay their heads together and practice a fraud on persons holding bills. I have not the least reason to say that any such thing has been done here, and I find nothing whatever resembling it. What is the state of circumstances? Mr. Marshall became insolvent. He is unable to pay his debts, and summons his creditors together, and they agree to take 5s. in the pound; the billholders are bound by that agreement to the extent of Marshall's debts and his liability upon the bills. What is Mr. Marshall's position? Here is a ship in course of building, of which a small part, less than one half of the agreement price, has been paid off and the bills which had been given have been discounted. All that he could by any possibility do was to pay the difference and insist upon the ship being completed for him, Marshall had not the means of completing the ship by paying the difference between the sums advanced by him, which certain right belonged to him, and the value of the ship. To relieve himself of the burden of this contract, he gives notice to the builders that he abandons the contract. He was free by means of the composition resolution, and he declines to have any responsibility whatever. Suppose it had been otherwise, and that his right and his interest in the contract, which vested in him by the composition, had been sold in any way, and he had bargained with anybody to sell his interest, would anybody say that the bankers, who had stipulated for nothing, and who knew of nothing, for so I must take it, had a lien? Marshall might have entered into such a contract. Nobody can dispute that he did enter into an arrangement or engagement, whatever it might be called. That is perfectly clear on the facts. In my opinion, the case of Ex parte Waring contains law which has been very often misunderstood, but the principle of which has never been questioned. It has no sort of application to this case. If it had it would be directly in favour of the respondent, because the equitable and legal right arising out of the contract could not be arranged upon any other terms than the parties resolve. I decline to bind myself by any opinion now as to what device may be resorted to and with what success on the subject of Ex parte Waring; but in this case I find it clear and distinct that after Marshall's insolvency, and when he abandons the contract, the trustee of the bankruptcy of Lindsay, acting in discharge of the simple duty which was incumbent upon him, and, perhaps, more than his duty, has furnished money to complete the ship, and the ship being completed, it is a part of Lindsay's estate not to be affected by any transaction arising out of the bills, and not to be affected by the principle of Ex parte Waring in the slightest degree; but that by reason of the original contract, if it had stood alone, and by reason further of the conduct of Marshall, who was able to deal with and dispose of his own property, and in that view of the bankrupt's estate and that alone, the trustee is entitled to the proceeds of this ship, and that there is no ground whatever for the claim, which the banker's make, because they are the holders of the bills. The order of the court below must be discharged.

Ex parte LAMBTON; Re LINDSAY.

[CHAN.]

Lambton and Co., the bill holders, now appealed from this decision.

De Gea, Q.C. and Doria, for the appellants.—The Chief Judge's decision proceeded upon the ground that Marshall, Osborne and Co. had no property in the ship till they paid the whole of the purchase money. But the contract expressly provides that "the said vessel, &c., shall from the time of giving or paying the first instalment by the said Marshall, Osborne, and Co. to the said Edward Lindsay, belong and be deemed in every respect, for every and all purposes, to be the property of the said Marshall, Osborne, and Co., to the extent of their advance." Therefore it is impossible to say that the property in the ship did not pass. In the old case of Woods v. Russell (5 B. & Ald. 942-6), where there was a very similar shipbuilding contract to that in the present case, Abbott, C.J. (Lord Tenterden) said: "This ship is built upon a special contract, and it is part of the terms of the contract that given portions of the price shall be paid according to the progress of the work; part when the keel is laid, part when they are at the light plank. The payment of those instalments appears to us to appropriate specifically to the defendant the very ship so in progress, and to vest in the defendant a property in that ship." But the present case is stronger than that by reason of the express provision contained in the contract that from the time of paying the first instalment the ship shall be the property of Marshall, Osborne, and Co. In Wood v. Bell (5 E. & B. 772), it was held that a provision in a ship-building contract making the payment of the instalments partially dependent upon the progress of the ship, was an indication of intention to vest the property as it was building. The bills which we hold having been expressly given "for value received in iron screw steamer now building," we are entitled to whatever lien Lindsay possessed. He had a right to retain the ship until all the bills were paid, and we are also entitled to have the ship as security for the outstanding bills in our hands, without being compelled to complete the purchase. As we are entitled to the equities of both Lindsay and Marshall, Osborne, and Co., and to prove against both estates; the doctrine of Ex parte Waring (19 Ves. 345) applies to this case, and gives us a right to a lien on the ship. They cited—

Little, Q.C., Winslow, Q.C. and F. H. Colt, for the respondent, the trustee in the bankruptcy of Lindsay.—Marshall, Osborne, and Co. acquired no property in the ship. In Mucklow v. Mangles (1 Taunt. 318) it was held that if a person contracts with another for a chattel which is not in existence at the time of the contract, though he pays him the whole value in advance, and the other proceeds to execute the order, the buyer acquires no property in the chattel till it is finished and delivered to him. [De Gex, Q.C.—That case is distinguishable from the present, on the grounds stated by Lord Tenterden in Woods v. Russell (5 B. & Ald. 947), "because the bargain there for building the barge does not appear to have stipulated for the advances which were made and those advances do not appear to have been regulated by the progress of the work."] Even if any property passed in the ship, it was subject to the vendor's lien, and no one can claim a ship under the purchasers' till the whole of the purchase money has been paid. Possession of the ship was to be given to the purchasers, but only concurrently with the obligation to retire the out standing bills. Everything was conditional upon the payment and retiring of the bills at maturity. The doctrine of Ex parte Waring has no application to this case, and the appellants have no lien upon this ship. Lord Justice JAMES said.—I am of opinion that this case is really a reductio ad absurdum of the case of Ex parte Waring.

The bill holders in this case never, either by contract or by the conduct of anybody, acquired or had any charge whatever, direct or indirect, upon this thing, which was to have been a ship, and which has now become a ship. They were bill holders, having a right against the acceptor, and having a right against the drawer. Those bills came into existence, no doubt, with a contract for building the ship, and in a certain state of circumstances, if there had been two insolvent estates under the administration of the Court of Chancery, or the Court of Bankruptcy, or one estate being administered under the Court of Bankruptcy and one estate under the Court of Chancery, under some circumstances like those it might have been the duty of the trustees of the one estate as against the trustees of the other estate, or it might have been the duty of both sets of trustees to have insisted upon the ship being sold, or that which was to be a ship being sold for the purpose of taking up the bills. I say there might have been circumstances which one might well conceive in which such a right would have been acquired, but I cannot conceive that, in such a state of circumstances as that, merely in order to get rid of what is said to be a dead lock, accidentally and casually a benefit should arise collaterally to the persons who were holding the bills because some one had a right to take them, and that because of that the bill holders, who never had a right by contract or otherwise with regard to the ship, could interfere with the right of the two parties, the vendor and the purchaser, or the assignees of the vendor or the assignees of the purchaser, to make such arrangements as they otherwise could not honestly and properly make with regard to that thing which is the subject of an executory contract. I cannot conceive that the holders of the bills would have a right to interfere in such a case as that.

Mr. Marshall had a full right, if he thought that that was for the benefit of himself or his creditors, to rescind or abandon the contract, and to say I cannot complete, and the other party had a right to say, "That being the state of things, we will accept your abandonment of the contract, and we will complete it for ourselves and take whatever remedies we may have." It seems to be an absolute right on the part of Messrs. Marshall, Osborne and Co., as well as upon the part of the other side, which they might have exercised at that time, on the one side to make the abandonment, and on the other to accept it. I say there never was a moment of time at which Messrs. Marshall, Osborne and Co., or their assignees, had a right to say, "Sell that unfinished chattel and apply the proceeds to the payment of the bills, because they happen to be in your hands, or in the hands of bankers to whom both you and myself are liable. You and I are liable to the same bankers, and therefore sell that ship." There was no such right, and therefore Messrs. Marshall, Osborne, and Co., by becoming insolvent, would not alter the rights of the other parties. The right of the other parties was to say: We will keep that ship until you have paid the purchase money, and the bankers had no right to interfere with the contract which existed between Messrs. Marshall, Osborne, and Co., and the vendor, or to enlarge the rights of Messrs. Marshall, Osborne, and Co., and to diminish the rights of the vendor.

The Chief Judge was of opinion that the right was to have the ship upon payment. It appears to me that it is altogether unnecessary to decide any point as to the exact nature of the property which was transferred from time to time, or the exact nature of the charge or lien which from that time existed with regard to it. The substance of it was that the makers or the builders of the ship were not to part with their whole interest, legal and equitable, except in exchange for full payment of the purchase money, less the last instalment, and therefore everyone had a right to say: "You shall not take that ship unless you pay the full purchase money."

I am of opinion, therefore, that the Chief Judge was perfectly right in the opinion at which he arrived.

Lord Justice MELLISH.—I am of the same opinion.

I confess that when this appeal was first opened I was a little alarmed at what appeared to be an expression of opinion on the part of the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy that no property had passed in this ship, because for years, since what was said by Lord Tenterden, in the case of Woods v. Russell (5 B. & Ald. 942), I have always understood the law to be that where a contract is made for the building of a ship, and the price is to be paid by instalments in proportion to the amount of work done upon the ship, that there is an inference that the property passes; because, if any doubt were thrown upon that rule, it would, in my opinion, very seriously affect the rights of purchasers of ships in the event of the insolvency of the vendor who orders ships to be built. But now that this case comes to be understood, it really seems to me that it signifies very little whether the property had actually passed or not.

It appears to me that it is perfectly plain, upon the construction of the contract, that either the property had passed to the purchaser subject to the vendor's lien for all the sums due and owing except the last bill, or else the property remained in the vendor subject to a charge in favour of the purchaser for any sums that he might pay, and as an indemnity for him as against the acceptance of bills, although I rather think myself, having regard to the express mention of the vendor's lien in the contract, that the true construction of the contract is that the property passed subject to the vendor's lien, not only for the giving of the bills, but until the bills were paid.

I apprehend, however, that notwithstanding that the property may have passed, the purchaser of a ship is not entitled to the possession of the ship except upon his being willing to pay the full amount, and if the purchaser becomes insolvent during the time that the ship is building, his merely becoming insolvent will not of itself dissolve the contract. But in the case of a composition, which this is, where the property of the purchaser never becomes vested in any trustee, it is still for him to determine, or if he becomes a bankrupt, it is for his trustee to determine, whether it is for the benefit of his estate to have the contract completed, for it does not follow that because he is insolvent it may not possibly be for the benefit of the estate to complete the contract. The ship might be very nearly completed, ships might have risen in value, and a ship, for which the purchaser might have to pay £10,000, might be worth when completed £15,000. In that state of things, notwithstanding that the purchaser was insolvent he would have no difficulty in borrowing money upon the ship with which to pay the full price, and in that case I apprehend that the vendor would be obliged to complete the contract notwithstanding the insolvency of the purchaser. On the other hand, when the purchaser becomes insolvent, the contract might be a very onerous one, and if the building of the ship were to go on and it was to be completed, the costs to the estate would only be increased, and therefore it is that he may give notice at once if he pleases to the vendor that he abandons the contract, and in that case the vendor might take the property back to himself and prove for his damages.

The effect of giving notice is that it fixes the damages as those caused at the time when the notice is given.

It appears to me that it is unnecessary to determine whether a trustee might do that if the purchaser had become bankrupt. Here in point of fact, as to Messrs. Marshall, Osborne, and Co., there was a composition which left the property in the ship in them, and I do not understand what possible right the billholders had to say that Messrs. Marshall, Osborne, and Co. were not entitled to abandon their contract with the vendors if that was most beneficial to them.

Then it is said that if here they gave notice to abandon it there was a bankruptcy, and there is no evidence that Lindsay's trustees accepted it. I should think I may assume that a person would accept an offer which was for his benefit. There is, however, abundant evidence to my mind that these parties had accepted the offer after Lindsay's bankruptcy was annulled, for Lindsay went on completing the ship, and when he was made bankrupt upon a subsequent occasion, then his trustee went on and completed the ship. For what purpose did the trustee go on and complete the ship? Was it for the benefit of Messrs. Marshall, Osborne, & Co., who had become insolvent, and who had given notice that they did not claim the ship, but had abandoned it? An unfinished ship is worth nothing, and it was necessary to complete it in order to get something for it. I cannot conceive what possible right the bill holders had to prevent their pursuing their contract for their benefit.

There are various ways in which it may be said that the case of Ex parte Waring cannot apply to this case. One conclusive reason is that at the time when this application was made, Messrs. Marshall, Osborne, and Co., had ceased to have any interest whatever in this ship, and the ship was exclusively the property of Lindsay's estate. Ex parte Waring could not apply because that case only applies either where the property of the acceptor has been pledged with the drawer or the property of the drawer has been pledged with the acceptor, or where the property is exclusively the property of one of the parties.

I think, therefore, that the decision of the Chief Judge was perfectly right, and that this appeal must be dismissed, and dismissed with costs.

Appeal accordingly dismissed with costs.

Re ARTHUR AVERAGE ASSOCIATION; Ex parte CORY AND HAWKESLEY.

Mutual marine insurance association—Unincorporated and unregistered body—Winding-up—Association for acquisition of gain—Names of underwriters specified in policy—30 Vict. c. 23, s. 7—Companies Act 1862, ss. 4, 199.

By the rules of a mutual insurance association it was provided that the members should severally, and respectively, and not jointly or in partnership nor the one for the other, but each only in his own name, insure each other's ships for one year from noon of any day named as the commencement of risk, subject to the conditions endorsed on the form of policy and to the rules and regulations which should be binding on all the members of the association. The managers of the association were to be James Jackson and William Sheppard, and either of them might sign their firm name of Jackson and Sheppard to all policies of insurance in the name of the association as managers thereof, and the signature thus given by either of them should be binding and conclusive on all the members of the association, and should have on each and all of the members the same effect as if each and every member had personally signed such policy. The annual rates on the sums insured were payable in advance by quarterly proportions by members' acceptance of the managers' draft at three months' date; or if paid in cash discount of 5l. per cent. per annum was to be allowed, which was to be placed to the credit of each respective member; and if such amount exceeded the claims for losses or damage sustained by the members, such excess was to stand to the credit of each mutual member proportionately as he might have contributed, and if such contributions were not sufficient to meet the claims of members for loss or damage sustained within any respective year, then such credited amounts should be applied to meet such deficiency, and if there should still be a deficiency, such sum as might be required to meet the same should be drawn for on each respective member in such proportion as they bore to each other. The rules also provided that the managers should have authority to issue policies to members for periods less than a year or for special risks either in time or voyage policies, in consideration of special rates of premium, to which the reserve fund should in no way apply, and that the rules might be repealed, altered, or amended by a majority of the members at a general meeting.

Special rate policies were issued to non-members both before and after an invalid alteration of the rules, by which it was attempted to give the managers authority to issue special rate policies to non-members.

The policies issued by the association were signed "Jackson and Sheppard, joint managers per procuracy of the several members of the Arthur Average Association for insuring each other's ships, every member bearing his equal proportion according to the sums mutually insured therein, excepting members paying special rates."

In Feb. 1870 the association was ordered to be wound-up, and on the 25th May 1871 Cory and Hawkesley were settled on the list of contributories. By the chief clerk's certificate, dated 20th Dec. 1873, certain sums were found to be due to holders of special policies who were non-members. On a call being made on Cory and Hawkesley, they took out a summons to have the debts admitted by the certificate of certain non-members expunged.

Held that the signature to the policies was not a specification of the names of the insurers as required by the 7th section of 30 Vict. c. 23, and that the policies were therefore invalid.

Held also that the issuing of special rate policies to non-members was ultra vires, and that, notwithstanding the delay in applying to vary the chief clerk's certificate, the amounts found due to non-members must be expunged.

Semble, that an unincorporated and unregistered mutual insurance association, formed since the passing of the Companies Act 1862, being an association for the acquisition of gain, cannot be wound-up under the 199th section of the Companies Act 1862.

THE Arthur Average Association for British, Foreign, and Colonial built ships was a mutual shipping insurance association formed in 1867, and was not incorporated under any Act of Parliament, and was not registered under the Companies Act 1862.

The rules of the association, which were annexed to the policies issued by the association to members, were, so far as is material, as follows:

1. The members of this association severally and respectively, and not jointly nor in partnership, nor the one for the other, but each only in his own name, do hereby agree to insure each other's ships for one year from noon of any day named as the commencement of risk against all losses, perils, and damages described in the form of policy hereto annexed, and subject to the conditions endorsed on said form of policy, and to those rules and regulations which shall be binding and conclusive on all the members of the association. The managers of this association shall be James Jackson and William Sheppard, and either of them may sign their firm name of Jackson and Sheppard to all policies of insurance in the name of this association as managers thereof, and the signature thus given by either of the said managers shall be binding and conclusive on all the members of this association, and shall have on each and all of the said members the same legal effect as if each and every member had personally signed such policy. The said managers shall decide in what section any ship shall be included, the premium to be paid for the same, the allowance for paid-up premium, and the value of the ship shall be entered on the policy.

2. Ships classed in French Veritas, American Lloyd's, or any other authorised society's books for the classification of ships, may be admitted by computation according to corresponding class in British Lloyd's, and shall be divided into sections marked A., B., C., and so on successively, and paying different annual rates as agreed on at the time of entering the association or at the commencement of any subsequent year on the sum insured, to be payable in advance by quarterly proportions by members' acceptance of managers' draft at three months' date; if paid in cash, discount of five per cent. per annum will be allowed which shall be placed to the credit of each respective member, and should such amount exceed the amount of claims for losses or damage sustained by the members during each year respectively, such excess shall stand to the credit of each mutual member proportionately as he may have contributed, and should it be that such contributions are not sufficient to meet the claims of members for loss or damage sustained within any respective year, then such credited amounts shall be applied to meet such deficiency, and should there still be a deficiency such sum as may be required to meet the same shall be drawn for on each respective mutual member in such proportions as they bear to each other.

3. The said managers shall also have authority to issue policies to members, for periods less than a year, or for special risks either in time or voyage policies in consideration of special rates of premium, to be fixed by said managers as in last clause of the first rule, to which the reserve fund should, in no way apply, also to allow brokerage and discount to insurance brokers.

The rules further provided that the affairs of the association should be managed by a committee, which should have power of calling general and special general meetings of the members, which should have authority to make, repeal, alter, or amend the rules or regulations for the government of the association, and the decision of the majority of such meeting should be binding and conclusive on all the members.

Special rate policies were issued to non-members both before and after an alteration of the rules made on the 29th March 1869, by which it was attempted to authorise the managers to issue policies to non-members for special risks or on voyage policies; but such alteration was made without the sanction of the members at a general meeting as provided for by the rules.

The policies issued were signed "Jackson and Sheppard, joint managers per procuracy of the several members of the Arthur Average Association for insuring each other's ships, every member bearing his equal proportion according to the sums mutually insured therein, excepting members paying special rates."

On the 12th Feb. 1870, an order was made for winding-up the association. Messrs. Cory and Hawkesley were settled on the list of contributories on the 25th May 1871. By the chief clerk's certificate, dated the 20th Dec. 1873, the sum of 17,532l. 11s. 8d. was found to be due to holders of special policies, many of whom were non-members. Amongst such non-members holding special policies were Messrs. Hargrave, Ferguson, and Jackson to whom policies had been issued both before and after the alteration of the rules.

In June 1874 a summons was taken out by the official liquidator for a call upon Messrs. Cory and Hawkesley, and thereupon they took out a summons asking that, notwithstanding the time limited by General Order XXXV, R. 52, had expired, the certificate might be varied by expunging the debt of Messrs. Hargrave, Ferguson, and Jackson.

Fry, Q.C., North, and Hilbery, for the applicants.—The association, not having been registered under the Companies Act 1862, was an illegal association, and could not authorise Messrs. Jackson and Sheppard to act on its behalf, nor ought it to have been wound-up under the 199th section of the Companies' Act 1862. The association had no power to issue policies to Messrs. Hargrave and Co., who were not members, and did not become so by having special rate policies granted to them. Again, this being a marine policy, the 7th section of 30 Vict. c. 23 requires that the names of the assurers should be specified in the policy. They referred to Chilly, Q.C. and Robinson, for Messrs. Hargrave and Co., contended that the courts had always construed the Act of Parliament liberally in favour of insurers, and that Jackson and Sheppard signed for the members of the association as they were authorised to do by the rules. They referred to Southgate, Q.C., Waller, Q.C., and E. C. Willis, for the official liquidator.

SIR GEORGE JESSEL.—The question which I have to decide is complicated with another: that is whether this association, as it is called, should have been wound up at all, or if wound-up at all, whether it should not have been wound-up in a different way. As I understand the decision in Re London Marine Assurance Association (which followed other cases), where the objection is simply to strike out a debt or to oppose a call order, what I may call a subsidiary application in the winding-up, it is not open to the applicant to say that the winding-up order ought not to have been made. Therefore, an objection which amounts to this, that there was no jurisdiction to make a winding-up order, or that the winding-up order ought not to have been made on any other ground, it is not admissible.

Now the first objection which has been taken to the debt which has been proved (debts they are, but for this purpose we may treat one alone), which is a claim under a policy for insuring a ship entered into with the managers of the Arthur Average Association, the first objection was that the Arthur Average Association was an illegal body by reason of its not having been registered under the Companies Act of 1862, although formed after the passing of that Act, and it was said that, being an illegal body, it could not authorise an agent to contract on its behalf. In other words, an illegal body could not enter into a valid contract of agency, and any person dealing with the alleged agent, and having notice of the nature of the body, which of course all these applicants had, could not avail himself of such a contract of agency with the view of charging the alleged principals.

Now that involved another proposition, that this was an association coming within the 4th clause of the Companies' Act 1862, and, although for a reason which I have already alluded to, and which I think applied to this case, I do not think I am absolutely compelled to decide this question, yet, it being a question of very considerable importance, on which I have heard a great deal of argument, and as to which I have formed an opinion, I think it right to express that opinion with a view, if this case goes further, to its being before the Court of Appeal, or if it does not go further, that it may be before other judges when similar questions came to be discussed.

The 4th section of the Act is this: "No company, association, or partnership consisting of more than ten persons shall be formed after the commencement of this Act for the purpose of carrying on the business of banking unless it is registered as a company under this Act, or is formed in pursuance of some other Act of Parliament or of Letters Patent; and no company, association, or partnership, consisting of more than twenty persons shall be formed after the commencement of this Act for the purpose of carrying on any other business that has for its object the acquisition of gain by the company, association, or partnership, or by the individual members thereof, unless it is registered as a company under this Act." The only other section which I am aware of which throws any light on the meaning of that section is the 21st section, which is in these terms: "No company formed for the purpose of promoting art, science, religion, charity, or any other like object, and not involving the requisition of gain by the company, or by the individual members thereof, shall, without the sanction of the Board of Trade, hold more than two acres of land; but the Board of Trade may by licence under the hand of one of their principal secretaries or assistant secretaries empower any such company to hold lands in such a quantity and subject to such conditions as they think fit."

It is to be observed that the objects there mentioned are all objects which, according to the definition which the Court of Chancery gives to the words 'charitable objects,' are charitable objects. They are all objects which, if described in a testator's will as the objects of bounty, could be well supported as a charity, and therefore, "the like objects" are obviously objects of the same kind. It was quite right to put in the words "not involving the acquisition of gain by the company," because no doubt under the cloak of religion or charity you might establish a company which really had the private gain of the individuals in view; therefore, that restriction was very properly inserted. But the words, I think, throw some light upon what was meant by "gain;" all those words denote objects which prima facie would lead to expenditure as distinguished from profit. In other words, a company or an association formed for any of those objects would rather be a company or association formed to regulate the spending of the members' money than the acquisition of money by any of the members. The position of a company for giving away or spending, is distinguished from a company for getting or acquiring anything. Therefore, we see that the Legislature contemplated, as we all know that there are, both companies and associations formed for charitable objects or similar objects which include the spending or giving away money by the members of those companies or associations.

ROLLS.]

Re ARTHUR AVERAGE ASSOCIATION; Ex parte CORY AND HAWKESLEY.

[ROLLS.]

The words used are "acquisition of gain." If you inquire the meaning of the word "gain" it means acquisition; it has no other meaning that I am aware of—gain is something obtained or acquired. It is not limited to pecuniary gain, in fact, we should have to put the word "pecuniary" to show it, and in no sense, of the word that I know of does it mean commercial profits, except that of course in one sense commercial profits are gain. It is not "gains," but "gain" in the singular. Commercial profits no doubt if acquired are gain, but I cannot find any word limiting it simply to a commercial profit. I take the words as referring to a company which is formed to acquire something, or in which the individual members are to acquire something, as distinguished from a company formed for spending something and in which the individual members are simply to give something away, or to spend something, and not to gain anything.

If that then is the fair meaning of the word, what is the constitution of the association which I have to deal with? It is said that a contract for mutual indemnity is not within the meaning of that clause. What is meant by a contract for mutual indemnity? I can understand this (we can take it between two people as well as between two hundred):—A. and B. enter into a mutual contract that if either of them incurs a loss of a certain kind the other shall make it good. That is a contract, I suppose, of mutual indemnity; but these contracts are very different things—they are that which I have mentioned. This is simply an association of people, by the rules of which it is agreed that everybody who wants to insure a ship against loss shall pay a certain sum of money by way of premium, which sum of money is not equal. It depends on the nature of the ship insured; that is, on the nature of the loss to be guarded against. The sums of money are to go into a common fund, and the common fund so raised is to be applied in payment of the losses as far as it will go, and if deficient, the losses are to be made good by the members, not in proportion to the sums subscribed, as I understand it, but in proportion to the sums assured, which of course is a very different thing. The premiums vary in amount according to the nature of the risk, and are very different proportions. It is quite clear that, in addition to these policies, there may be policies for periods less than a year and policies for special risk in respect of which, as I read the rules, the members are not liable to contribute anything beyond their premiums.

The result then is this: the association insures the ships with a view certainly of getting enough money in the shape of premiums, at least to pay the losses, to pay the expenses, and to have something over in the shape of a reserve fund. Why is not that an association formed for the purpose of profit, even using the word "profit" instead of "gain"? Between the association and its members it carries on business with a view of getting more than it will have to pay; it must acquire the difference; it contemplates the acquiring it. It is formed for the purpose of acquiring first of all the sums required for the expense of carrying it on, and secondly the sums to form a reserve fund at the end of the year. It is quite true that the reserve fund may be ultimately divided, but it is not divided and given back to the people who have paid too much, but to another class, because, as I understand, it is a limited reserve fund, although it stands to the credit of each member proportionately as he may have contributed; it is a reserve fund, which does not arise from the policies of less than a year or from special risk policies; to them the reserve fund shall in no way apply. So that I understand that members, or those who pay premiums for time voyages or special risks, do not get any share of the reserve fund. That is how I read Rule No. 3. The result, therefore, is that there is, as between the association and its members, a gain—the association acquires something.

But then I think that individual members obtain gain. If an individual member loses his ship he gets his ship paid for, and he gets a proportion of the reserve fund, not merely the share that he has contributed to it, but also the share of the other members, who have got time policies or policies on special risks, because of course the theory on which the rules of the association are formed is that everyone pays more than is absolutely necessary, otherwise you could not pay the expenses or carry on the assurances. The whole theory of insurance is that every premium meets something more than the risk; that is the whole theory of successful insurance. That being so, it appears to me that the members acquire something. But I am not prepared to say that, even independently of that consideration, an association by which people are indemnified from losses in carrying on any trade is not an association for gain. Some of these associations are for insuring freight. The freight is composed partly of the expenditure of the ship owner, and partly of the profit of carrying on his trade. If he insures his freight, he insures his actual profit of carrying on his trade; that is, he secures himself his profit. Is not that a gain?

It seems to me that this Act broadly means this: all commercial undertakings shall be registered. That is the meaning of it as I understand it. It distinguishes in so many words, and intends to distinguish, between commercial undertakings on the one hand, in which insurance companies certainly are included, for there are special provisions relating to them, and what one may call literary or charitable associations on the other hand, in which persons associate, not with a view of obtaining a personal advantage, but for the purpose of promoting literature, science, art, charity, or something of that kind; that I think is the broad distinction, and if that broad distinction is kept in view, I think there will be no difficulty in putting a fair and reasonable and also a literal and grammatical construction on the passage. In my opinion, whether the persons who were entitled to take out time policies and special risk policies were or were not to be members of the association, the association in question was one formed for the purpose of gain within the meaning of the 4th section, and would have required registration.

But it is then asserted that it ought not to have been wound-up at all under the 199th section. That is my present impression. There are provisions for registering an association for the purpose of its being wound-up, but it does not appear to me that the unregistered association pointed out in the 199th section was intended to be an illegal association formed after the passing of the Act. I think it must have meant that the unregistered association contemplated was a legal association, which might have been unregistered because it was formed before the passing of the Act, or because it was excepted, for it is not every association which requires registration. It was within the exception if it were an association formed after the passing of this Act, which did not require registration. The Act of Parliament is clear that there are exceptions. I think, therefore, the plain meaning of it is that the court ought not to wind-up an illegal association. But that argument proves too much, for it is an argument which makes the association illegal in any event, and therefore, if well founded, would destroy the validity of the winding-up order, and consequently is not admissible for the benefit of the applicants on the present occasion.

ROLLS.]

Re ARTHUR AVERAGE ASSOCIATION; Ex parte CORY AND HAWKESLEY.

[ROLLS.]

The next objection is that this is a marine policy, and that, being a marine policy, the Act of Parliament avoids it unless the names of the assurers are specified. Now this association was one of very peculiar character. The members of the association, not jointly, or in partnership, or the one for the other, but "each only in his own name, do hereby agree to insure each other's ships for one year from noon of any day named as the commencement of the risk." The members of the association insure each in his own name, neither in partnership, nor one for the other, and only for one year from noon of any day named as the commencement of the risk, and they insure each other's ships.

Then the third rule says: "The sub-manager shall also have authority to issue policies to members for periods less than a year or for special risks either in time or voyage policies, in consideration of special rates of premiums, to be fixed by the said manager to which the reserve fund shall in no way apply." I take that to mean that when you have got a person already a member of the association, you may give him a policy in respect of which he would have no right whatever to the reserve fund, and no liability, therefore, to contribute to the reserve fund for this purpose; that is, he pays his premium and there is an end of the matter as far as he is concerned; but if a loss occurs he is entitled to call upon the other members of the association, including also himself to the extent to which he is liable under a current policy, current when the loss occurs, to contribute to that loss; but, as I understand it, his liability would be measured without any regard whatever to the amount for which he has insured by a special policy; as to that, he is under no liability. Everybody is under liability with reference to the amounts insured by what has been called the mutual policy. Assuming that to be so, in a sense no doubt he is a member of the association, and he would be liable in respect of his current mutual policy possibly to make some contribution to the loss, assuming always that the loss occurred within the period of one year from the time of his mutual policy issuing. But if a mutual policy were near expiring, I do not see how he could be made liable for anything if the mutual policy expired before the loss on the special rate policy; I do not see that he is under any liability. He is only liable from the noon of any day to the noon of the same day in the following year, so that it may well be that, though he was a member at the time when the policy was issued to him, he would, so to say, have ceased to be a member before the loss occurred, and consequently he would be entitled to call upon the other members who had still current policies to contribute to the fund to indemnify him, but would not be entitled to call upon the members whose policies had expired. This shows the difficulty of finding out who assured, because the persons who assured are not ascertained persons at the time of the insurance being effected, but in the case of a special rate policy it can only be ascertained when the loss has actually occurred, inasmuch as the years of the mutual policies might have run off before loss occurred.

Now the only signature to the policy is that of Messrs. "Jackson and Sheppard per procurator of the several members of the Arthur Average Association for insuring each other's ships, every member bearing his equal proportion according to the sums mutually assured therein, excepting members paying special rates." I think that does not quite express what was meant, that is, that every member, not being a special rate insured member should pay his equal proportion, and that members who have paid special rates are not to pay any more, and the result of that is that you actually do not know who insures. The members are only liable for a year from the date of their own policies, and if the loss occurred after any member's policy expired, he is not an insurer. To suppose that that is a specification of the names as required by the Act of Parliament seems to me a most remarkable conclusion for any person possessed of ordinary powers of reason to arrive at. I was told that it was concluded by authority. I do not always bow to the authority of a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction, but I endeavour to do so if it is possible, and if an unanimous decision of a Court of Common Law had been brought to my notice saying that that was a specification of the names of the insurers, I am not prepared to say that I should have followed it, if it were the decision of a court of co-ordinate jurisdiction and a recent decision. But I am relieved from considering that point, because the decisions brought to my notice by no means go to any such extent. The only decision bearing on the point was this, that when the insurers consisted of a firm, an ordinary common partnership carrying on business, the statute was complied with by stating the name of the insurers, and that was the name of the firm. That is all the decision was. It does not appear to me to have any direct bearing on the argument before me, and the only indirect bearing it has is that which was put forward so frequently by Mr. Chitty, that it was evidence of the liberality of Courts of Law in construing this statute in favour of insurers. Beyond that it certainly appears to me it did not go. All I can say is that the only names I find on this policy are Jackson and Sheppard; I find the names of no one else. As I said before, if it is "members of the Arthur Average Association," that is not right; it did not mean the then present members of the Arthur Average Association, they were not the people who were to insure, and you could not tell till a future period who were the insurers. There is no description. The rules themselves even are not on the policy, that is not to be forgotten. You could not find out from the policy who were to be liable under the rules. Therefore, the argument of the case in Campbell's Reports does not apply. There were no means of ascertaining from the policy itself who the insurers were to be; and I am of opinion that that objection is fatal to the policy, and that it is not really necessary to consider the next objection.

But the next objection appears to me to be a very serious one, and I cannot see that there is any satisfactory answer to it. First of all it appears that the rules were altered on the 29th March 1869, by which "members" were struck out so that you might insure any one by special risks or on voyage policies. This appears to have been done, not according to the rules, at a general meeting, but at a meeting of the committee. But Mr. Cory, one of the applicants before me, was insured by policies, the last of which was dated on the 8th Sept. 1868, which is of course long before the 29th March 1869; he is, therefore, not bound by these alterations, and he never authorised his credit to be pledged. I decline to enter into the position of the other applicant, Mr. Hawkesley. But, as I said, according to the well-established rule now in suits, as regards misjoinder, you could always amend by striking out the applicant. It is not necessary to go into the question whether or not Mr. Hawkesley has sanctioned these alterations because Mr. Cory alone could support the application.

Then there being no valid alteration, the rule appears to me to authorise the managers to insure members only on these terms.

Then it is argued that the mere issuing of a policy to a person on these terms makes him a member; now I am unable to accede to that. Members are defined, and they are defined to be people who insure for a year, and insure each other's ships for that year, and the way they insure is by making contributions. But these people never insured anybody for a year; they did not insure anybody for any time whatever. They simply paid a premium as every insurer does, and it seems to me to be an abuse of terms to say that a man who pays a premium thereby pays a contribution to the insurance of his own ship. That is not the meaning of the rule. The plain and literal and common-sense meaning coincide in this case, as they generally do, and in my opinion the issuing of a policy to any person not already a member was not authorised by this rule, and consequently the act of the agents was wholly unauthorised; the power of attorney under which they acted or assumed to act did not confer upon them the authority to enter into this contract, and consequently the contract itself does not bind the association. It appears to me that persons who enter into these contracts have no right to complain. They must have had notice of the nature of the body which was contracting with them, and of course notice of the rules and regulations which form the constitution of the company. As I said before, considering the enormous importance of the question to the parties, and the nature of the objections, I thought it right to give my opinion on this objection also.

On these grounds the only conclusion I can come to is that if the question of delay is not decided adversely to the applicants, the alleged creditors are not creditors of the association, and their debts ought not to be allowed.

Now the question of delay is to a certain extent no doubt to be dealt with as a matter of discretion. The law seems to me to stand in this way. By a general order, which was authorised by Act of Parliament, the ordinary practice of the Court of Chancery has been extended to winding-up cases, and according to the ordinary practice of the Court of Chancery, after a chief clerk has made a certificate and eight days have expired, you cannot get rid of that certificate except on special grounds. The nature of those special grounds has nowhere been strictly defined, but it must be something substantial, and it also must be at a time when you do not very much vary the position of the parties. Now in the present case it must be remembered that the certificate is obtained by the official liquidator, who in a sense represents everybody. The persons who now apply had no direct intervention in the matter. They are not in quite as bad a position, if I may say so, as parties to a suit, who are present when the decision is given; their direct intervention is caused by an attempt to make them pay something, and then their attention is first aroused. In the next place the creditors have done nothing more than prove they did not obtain a dividend, and they have not obtained a call; therefore, their position is not affected except to the extent of any costs they may have incurred subsequently, and which the court may give them. And thirdly it must be and no doubt will be considered that the questions upon which the official liquidator at first had to decide, and the questions which the court has now to decide, are not matters which every one can decide for himself: they are not matters, so to say, so plain, and so clear, and so easy that every policy holder must be considered to have known them from the beginning and to have stood by and acquiesced in what has taken place. The mere length to which this argument has gone, and the nature of the discussions which has taken place, I think will be sufficient to show that. Looking, therefore, to the fact that in the other cases as great an amount of delay has not been considered sufficient to induce the court to say that the rights of the parties are finally established, and considering that the special reasons I have mentioned are to my mind very strong indeed, I think there is no such delay as should preclude the applicants from the relief, which they would, otherwise, be entitled to.

That being so, I think the proper order to make is to expunge the debts, and, considering that the creditors have been brought here after this lapse of time, I think it would be only right to provide for their costs, as well as for the costs of the appellants and the official liquidator, out of the estate subject to the winding-up. I think inasmuch as there may be a question as to whether the creditors or alleged creditors are not entitled to obtain a return of their premiums from somebody, it would be right to add to the order that it is made without prejudice to any application which they may be advised to make to obtain the return of the premiums so paid.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF HALIFAX, NOVA SCOTIA.

Reported by JAMES P. ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

THE COBEQUID MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY v.
BARTEAUX.

Marine insurance—Master's power of sale—Stringent necessity—Total loss—Notice of abandonment.

The master of a ship may, under certain circumstances, effect the sale of his ship so as to thereby render the underwriters liable for a total loss without notice of abandonment, but he can only do so in cases of stringent necessity—that is to say, a necessity that leaves the master no alternative, as a prudent and skilful man acting bonâ fide for the best interests of all concerned and with the best and soundest judgment that can be formed under the circumstances, but to sell the ship as she lies. If he comes to this conclusion hastily, either without sufficient examination into the actual state of the ship, or without having previously made every exertion in his power, with the means then at his disposal, to extricate her from the peril or to raise funds for her repair, he will not be justified in selling, even though the danger at the time appear exceedingly imminent.

THIS was an appeal from the judgment of the Supreme Court of Halifax, Nova Scotia, of the 8th Feb. 1873, discharging a rule nisi obtained by the appellants for a new trial in an action brought by the respondent against the appellants.

The action was brought by the respondent to recover 4000 dollars and interest upon a policy of insurance effected with the appellants in the sum of 4000 dollars upon the brigantine Foyle, valued at 8000 dollars, for twelve months, that is to say, from the 23rd June 1868, at noon, until the 23rd June 1869. The policy was a time policy in the usual form.

The writ and declaration were issued on the 10th Aug. 1870, and contained two counts on the policy for a total loss, and a common money count for interest. To the counts upon the policy the appellants pleaded five pleas, and to the money count never indebted. The third plea, which denied that the vessel was lost by the perils insured against, and the fourth plea, which averred that the alleged loss was caused by the fraud and negligence of the respondent and his servants, and not by the perils of the sea, are the only pleas material to this appeal.

The cause came on for trial before the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Halifax and a jury, on the 11th Oct. 1871. At the trial, the appellants admitted the making of the policy, and also that the respondent was interested in the vessel, and evidence was adduced of (amongst other things) the following facts:

The respondent was part owner of the Foyle, the vessel insured, of which he owned 44/64ths, James Roy her master 16/64ths, and one Downie 4/64ths.

On the 15th June 1869, the Foyle, a brigantine of 243 tons register, then a good vessel, about three years old, and worth about 10,000 dollars, left the harbour of Lingan, in Nova Scotia, with a cargo of coals, bound for Boston, and anchored outside the bar of the harbour. At 11 a.m. on the following day, the 16th June, the Foyle proceeded on her voyage, with a whole sail breeze from the south-west. About thirty minutes after getting under way the vessel ran upon a sunken reef off the southern head of Lingan Bay, distant about three miles from Lingan, about one mile from Bridgport, and at the utmost half a mile from the shore. The vessel struck about an hour before high water on a shelving ledge—not a sharp rock—on the western side of the reef, almost broadside on.

The master of the Foyle, upon the vessel striking the reef, threw the sails aback, but she would not back off. He then signalled for the tugboat at Lingan, and a kedge anchor with sixty or seventy fathoms of line was run out, and all the strain it would bear put upon it. The tugboat soon arrived, and at high water took a hawser from the Foyle. An attempt was then made to get the vessel off by jerking at the hawser, but without success, the hawser having twice parted. The master of the Foyle and the master of the Lingan tugboat then consulted, and the master of the tugboat having told the master of the Foyle that he thought it was of no use trying any more with the boat, and that the master of the Foyle had better get the coals out of the vessel, for if the wind came from the north he would lose her, left the Foyle and returned with his tug to Lingan. After dinner the crew of the Foyle commenced to throw the cargo overboard, but they did not discharge more than about ten tons of coal. At the next high water, between 12 and 1 a.m. of the 17th June, another attempt was made to get the vessel off by heaving on the kedge anchor, but failed.

On the morning of the 17th June the wind began to change to the north, and about 5 a.m. the master of the Foyle, being very uneasy, went ashore, noted his protest, and procured three persons, namely, James McDonald a shipwright, and Richard Laffin formerly a shipmaster, both of Lingan, and John Diggins master of a schooner belonging to Eastport, in the United States, to go on board the vessel to survey her. The surveyors got on board the vessel between 10 and 11 a.m. the same day, the 17th June, and at the time they went ashore, which was between 11 a.m. and noon, the wind was about W.N.W., hauling northwardly. They agreed that the vessel should be condemned, but, to give every chance of getting her off, to wait until two o'clock of the 18th June before selling her, and advertisements were written out to the effect that the vessel would be sold at that time. They, however, about an hour afterwards, determined to sell the vessel on the same day, the 17th June at four o'clock. The reason given by Richard Laffin, the only one of the surveyors who was called at the trial, for the change of determination was, that the wind actually went round to the north-east before the survey was written out.

Upon coming to this conclusion, the surveyors made a report in writing of their survey, in which they stated as follows:—

"We find that the said vessel has stranded off the southern head of Lingan Bay, exposed to the storms of the Atlantic, making water, lying on a reef, and in a very dangerous position, considerably hogged on the port side, badly strained, rolling heavily on her bilge. We also find that the said vessel lies in such a dangerous position that, should the wind happen to change and blow from the north-east, south-east, or east, she would probably go to pieces immediately. We therefore recommend that the said vessel be advertised and sold this day, without running the risk of leaving her overnight, that she may be stripped of her sails and rigging, and sold as soon as possible for the benefit of all concerned."

Richard Laffin, who was examined for the plaintiff (resp.) at the trial, admitted in cross-examination that he could not say that the vessel was making water, that she had a list to port of only two or three strikes, or from 18in. to 2ft., and that, if she was either hogged or strained as stated by the surveyors, she would have been leaking. Evidence was given by the defendants (apps.) to show that upon these points the survey was incorrect.

About 1 p.m. of the same day, the 17th June, the Glace Bay tug went up to the Foyle and backed close to her. John Dunlap, the mate of the Glace Bay tug, then threw a line to the Foyle, but it was refused, and a man on board prevented another from catching it. On the 17th June, between four and five in the afternoon, the master of the Foyle sold the vessel and cargo by public auction in Lingan, two or three advertisements having been put up in Lingan about two hours before the sale. The vessel was sold for about 1000 dollars, and was bought by Richard Laffin, one of the surveyors, for his two nephews.

Immediately after the sale, preparations were made by the purchasers to get the vessel off. Between seven and eight in the evening of the same day, thirty men were taken down to the vessel with the Lingan tugboat and a schooner. Fifty to sixty tons of coal were discharged out of the vessel into the schooner, and ten tons were thrown overboard. They worked steadily until 3 a.m. on the morning of the 18th June, and the Foyle's bower anchor was then ran out and let go, and by hauling on the anchor and kedge, and jerking at a new 7-in. hawser which had been hired for the purpose, the vessel was got off about half-past three in the morning of the 18th June, without having sustained any damage whatever, except the loss of a small piece of her shoe.

During the whole of the time the vessel was on the reef the weather was fine, and although the wind got round to the north on the 17th June, and there was a breeze in the afternoon, the weather was not severe at all on that day; but it was alleged that if the wind had continued in the north, it would have been impossible to have got the ship off.

There were four tugs and abundance of men from Lingan to Cow Bay; and 80 to 100 men at Bridport, whose services could have been obtained by the master of the Foyle, and he had the same means of extricating his vessel as were actually used by the purchasers to get her off within his reach and in his power.

There was conflicting evidence as to the wind to be expected on the 17th June. The statement of the master was, that on the 17th he "expected a strong breeze," and that at the time of the sale "there were indications of a heavy blow," and Richard Laffin stated that at the time of the sale it "had the appearance of being rough," but they were contradicted upon this point by the master of the Lingan tugboat; a witness for the respondent, who stated that the wind "was going down at the time of the sale," and also by the witnesses who were called for the appellants, whose evidence was to the effect that it was usually fine in June, July, and August, and that the middle of June was the finest season at Lingan, and that gales, to injure a vessel lying where the Foyle was, were unusual in June, and that there were no indications of a heavy blow.

There was also a conflict of opinion between the witnesses for the respondent and those for the appellants as to the course a prudent uninsured owner would have pursued under the circumstances.

At the close of the respondents' case, the counsel for the appellants moved for a nonsuit, on the grounds, amongst others, that there was no notice of abandonment, and that the sale was not justifiable, but the Chief Justice refused to nonsuit the respondent.

The Chief Justice directed the jury as follows: "The want of a notice of abandonment could only be excused by the necessity of the sale, if that necessity existed. This was a point of a good deal of nicety, which he would reserve, if the appellants' counsel desired it, for the consideration of the court. The main question was the alleged necessity for the sale, and the jury must look with a sharp and jealous eye at the transaction, marked by many unusual and suspicious circumstances. There was no evidence of a fraudulent stranding. A resident would have avoided the shoal, but it was not on the chart, and it was unknown to the master. Being competent to command the ship, his ignorance or want of caution in this matter afforded no defence to the underwriters; but, being on shore, had he exerted himself with sufficient promptitude and energy? The Chief Justice here cited the rules of law, as laid down in Arnould, and in our own decisions, and put it to the jury whether the master ought to have been content with the discharge of only ten tons of coal on the 16th, and should not have called in on that and the succeeding day a body of miners or other men in the neighbourhood, and attempted by their aid what the purchasers actually effected. The jury should consider, too, whether the holding of the sale on a day sooner than was at first intended was a bonâ fide and honest act, or was the result of any contrivance or collusion. The survey also had been hurriedly and incautiously drawn; all these facts, on which I forbore to give any opinion, were to be taken into account. There was no proof of the vessel having been overvalued or overinsured, and the master disclaimed any interest in the purchase. Still, if he had precipitated the sale for want of firmness or of judgment, this was one of the cases where the owners must suffer from it. He could sell his own quarter, but not the other three-quarters, so as to bind the insurers, unless an extreme over-mastering necessity, a moral necessity for the sale, had been shown to the satisfaction of the jury. I lastly told them, that if they found for the respondent this was not one of the cases in which, as I thought, they should give interest, and that the defendants were entitled to credit for one-half of the net proceeds, being 474 dollars for 3526 dollars."

The jury found a verdict for the respondent for 3526 dollars.

On the 14th Oct 1871 the appellants obtained a rule nisi for a new trial, on the grounds of misdirection, the verdict being against law and evidence.

PRIV. CO.]

THE COBEQUID MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY v. BARTEAUX.

[PRIV. CO.]

On the argument of the rule, on the 8th Feb. 1873, the Supreme Court gave judgment discharging the rule unanimously on the question of misdirection, but Mr. Justice Wilkins dissenting on the question whether the verdict was against evidence.

The judgment of the majority of the court, delivered by Mr. Justice Ritchie, was founded upon the argument that, although the master of the Foyle did not appear to have exercised all the means in his power to get his ship off, and had not exerted himself with sufficient promptitude and energy as to justify the sale of the ship, yet this was a question for the jury and not for the court, and the Chief Justice having left the question to them, and they having found for the plaintiffs, their finding ought not to be disturbed. Mr. Justice Wilkins differed from the rest of the court upon the ground that there was no necessity for a sale shown upon the facts proved, and that the finding of the jury, being in opposition to those facts, ought to be set aside.

From this judgment the appellants, on the 28th Feb. 1873, applied for and obtained from the Supreme Court of Halifax leave to appeal to Her Majesty in Council, and they appealed accordingly upon the following, amongst other grounds:

1. Because there was no evidence upon which a jury could properly proceed to find that there was a total loss of the vessel by the perils insured against.

2. Because the verdict was against the evidence.

3. Because notice of abandonment was necessary.

4. Because the learned judge misdirected the jury, and led them to suppose that even if the vessel could have been extricated from her position by means within the reach of the master, and that if he sold the vessel without first exhausting those means, the sale might still be justified by necessity.

5. Because the question whether the master could, by means within his reach, and which he could reasonably use, have extricated the vessel, was not clearly put to the jury.

6. Because the learned judge ought to have explained to the jury that the true question in the case was, whether the vessel under the circumstances, was in such a condition, take all things together, that it was not worth while to pursue her any further, or to make any further attempt to save her, with a view to recovering her and restoring her as a seagoing ship, or that the assured would have been justified as a prudent man in abandoning her, and giving up all further intention of extricating her from her position.

7. Because owing to the want of a proper understanding of the law, and of the effect of the sale, the jury found a verdict wholly unwarranted by the evidence.

8. Because there was a miscarriage of justice, and the verdict for the respondent ought to be set aside and a new trial granted.

Watkin Williams, Q.C., and Wood Hill, for the appellants.—There are two questions in the present case; first, whether the case is one of total loss or average loss; secondly, whether, assuming a constructive total loss, the master did right in selling, or should have given notice of abandonment, and have kept the ship and done his best with her.

First, we submit that there was no total loss upon the facts proved. Where a ship is stranded or damaged, if it is absolutely and physically impossible to restore her, she is an absolute total loss; but, assuming the physical possibility of restoring her to her former condition, then the test of her being a total loss is not whether it is best and most expedient under the circumstances, in the interests of her owner, to sell or to try and restore her at great risk and expense, but whether the outlay in trouble and expense will exceed the value of the ship when rescued and repaired. A partial loss cannot be turned into a total loss, even by a prudent sale by a master; the test is not whether a prudent owner, uninsured, would have sold, but whether the cost of repairing (or forwarding of goods) would exceed the value of the thing insured when restored.

Reimer v Ringrove, 6 Ex. 263;

Navone v. Haddon, 9 C. B. 30;

Parsons on Marine Insurance, vol. 1, pp. 148, 149, 150.

The power of a master to sell, so as to bind his owners and their underwriters, is entirely limited by the necessities of the case. In Arnould on Marine Insurance (4th edit., vol. 1, p. 333), it is said, "The exercise, however, of this power (to sell) is most jealously watched by the English courts, and rigorously confined to cases of extreme necessity, a necessity that leaves the master no alternative as a prudent and a skilful man, acting bonâ fide for the best interests of all concerned, and with the best and soundest judgment that can be formed under the circumstances, but to sell the ship as she lies. If he came to this conclusion hastily, either without sufficient examination into the actual state of the ship, or without having previously made every exertion in his power, with the means then at his disposal, to extricate her from the peril or to raise funds for her repair, he will not be justified in selling, even though the danger at the time appear exceedingly imminent."

Cambridge v. Arderton, 2 B. & C. 691;

Idle v. The Royal Exchange Assurance Company, 3

Brod. & B. 151; 8 Taunt. 755.

There is no loss by sale in marine insurance law; an assured can only recover for a total loss after a sale where the facts of the case show a total loss, independently of the sale. [Sir H. S. KEATING.—That is to say if the facts were such as to occasion a necessity for an immediate sale, a total loss accrues as soon as the sale takes place. The sale does not make the total loss, but is justified by a proper apprehension of it; but if the ship is not actually lost there would be no total loss if the sale did not take place, so that in one sense there is a loss by sale.] But in this case there were no facts justifying the sale. It appears from the evidence that the ship could have been extricated from her position by means within the reach of the master and this being so, the master assuming that he acted bonâ fide in the sale, was not under such a necessity to sell as to constitute the sale a total loss, either constructive or actual. The ship was not in imminent danger of destruction at the time of the sale, and it is only such danger as would have justified sale and constituted a total loss.

Secondly, but even supposing the ship had been so damaged that she would have been a constructive total loss, we submit that the facts show that it would have been a more prudent thing on the part of the master to have kept her and given notice of abandonment. Her rescue was so easy, and the means at his disposal so abundant, that there was no reasonable excuse for the sale under such disadvantageous circumstances.

Thirdly, the necessity for notice of abandonment was not superseded by the sale. [Sir H. S. KEATING.—If there was an immediate necessity for a sale, notice of abandonment was practically impossible, and as soon as the sale had taken place there was nothing to abandon. The underwriters can claim to deduct the proceeds of the sale from the total loss as salvage, but how can they claim notice of abandonment?] The res still existed in specie.

Cohen, Q. C. and Grantham, for the respondent. —The appellants assume that the apprehension of danger to the ship is no material element in a case such as this. We submit, first, that if a vessel is placed by the perils of the seas in such a position that the master has by the necessity of the case an implied authority to sell her so as to convey a good title to the purchaser without the assent of the owner, and if, acting in good faith and for the interest of all concerned, he does sell her, then the assured can recover as for a total loss from the underwriter. Secondly, that the question whether there was a reasonable necessity for a sale does not depend upon the ultimate event, but upon the consideration whether there was reasonable apprehension that the ship would not be saved, and whether the master in selling acted in good faith and with a view to the interests of all concerned, and that this question is one entirely for the jury. Thirdly, that in the present case there was evidence on which the jury might reasonably find that the sale was justifiable, and that there was no misdirection, and that the verdict ought not to be disturbed. Fourthly, that no notice of abandonment was necessary.

First. In the case supposed the ship has become irrevocably the property of the purchaser, and the owner has been as much deprived of her as if she had been captured, condemned, and sold. Now it is clear that the underwriters undertake to indemnify the assured as much against deprivation of a damage to property. In Arnould on Marine Insurance (4th edit., vol. 2, p. 882), it is said: "Every effective privation of the spes recuperandi amounts to an absolute total loss." In fact, the contract of insurance is a contract of indemnity against loss, and undoubtedly the assured has in the supposed case entirely lost his property. The only question is, whether the loss can be properly said to have been occasioned by the perils of the seas. It is argued by the appellants that the loss is occasioned by the sale, and not by perils of the seas. This argument is fallacious; it is a general principle of law that if a cause has for its necessary consequence an effect which occasions a loss, then that loss is in law occasioned by the primary cause:

Phillips on Insurance, § 1132.

Ionides v. The Universal Marine Insurance Company, 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 705; 32 L. J. 170, C. P.; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 353.

If a ship is insured against loss by fire at sea, and a fire breaks out and burns a hole in the ship's side, into which the water rushes and causes the loss of the vessel in fine weather, this would be a loss by fire. The same principle is equally true if the cause naturally and necessarily produces an act which occasions the loss; e.g., if goods are insured against fire, and damage is done by water poured in to extinguish the fire, the underwriters are liable for this damage. Again, in Barker v. Janson

(17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 473; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 303, 305; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 28), Willes, J., says: "If a ship is so injured that it cannot sail without repairs, and cannot be taken to a port at which the necessary repairs can be executed, there is an actual total loss, for that has ceased to be a ship which can never be used for the purposes of a ship." In the case, then, of a ship not being worth repairing, there is a total loss, but it does not become a total loss until the owner elects not to repair; and as it is his election which fixes and establishes the total loss, it would be an equally good argument to say that there was no total loss in such a case by perils of the seas. But the true answer is, that since the election not to repair is the natural and reasonably necessary consequence of the perils of the seas, the law considers that the loss occasioned by such election is a loss by perils of the seas. Where, then any peril insured against, necessarily brings about a state of things which results in a loss, that loss falls upon the underwriters:

Dent v. Smith, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 868; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 414; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 251;

Stringer v. English and Scotch Marine Insurance Co. (Limited), 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 802; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 676; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 440.

If, then, the sale by the master was in this case rendered necessary by the danger to which the ship was exposed, and the sale deprived the shipowner of his ship, it follows that the loss sustained by the shipowner was occasioned in law by the perils of the sea. The correctness of this view is confirmed by the fact that, in all insurance cases similar to the present, the only question submitted to the jury has been, whether the sale was effected with a view to the interests of all concerned, and was reasonably necessary. A contrary doctrine would be most prejudicial to underwriters, because if a master is not to be encouraged in doing what is best in his judgment for all concerned, acting on reasonable probabilities, he would be at liberty to let a damaged ship go to pieces and yet recover against the underwriters. In the present case the master acted upon the probabilities laid before him by the report of the surveyors and his own judgment, and if he acted reasonably in selling the ship, he acted for the benefit of all concerned, and his acts should be binding upon the underwriters.

In all cases in which a sale is found to have been reasonably necessary, the underwriters are liable for a total loss:

Phillips on Insurance, §§ 1524, 1569, 1570, 1571.

All these cases show that if there was a reasonable necessity for the sale on account of the dangers threatening the ship, the owner can recover for a total loss, and there are two grounds on which these cases are decided; first, because the property has thereby passed out of the hands of the shipowner; secondly, because if the underwriters were upon the spot at the time, the owner might abandon to them, and that the sale marks the owner's election to abandon. Bayley, J., in Gardner v. Salvador (1 M. & R. 116), says that there is "no such head in insurance law as loss by sale," and this is true in a certain sense, as where a ship is not worth repairing, and the owner can be communicated with and is not, or does not give notice of abandonment after receiving a communication; or where a ship is damaged but is not in any danger. In the latter case the master has no authority to sell. But when a ship is in imminent danger, there is no authority to show that the above dictum applies. It cannot be contended that if a ship is in imminent danger, and is sold, but is afterwards got off by the purchaser and repaired, there is by reason of her rescue no total loss.

Secondly, under what circumstances is there such a reasonable necessity for a sale as to justify the master in selling the ship and to enable him to give a good title to the purchaser? On this question the law has changed during the last 200 years. It has always been held that if there is no valid reason for the master not communicating with the owner before selling, a sale without previous communication is invalid. But in former times it was generally impossible to communicate within a reasonable time, and it was considered dangerous to allow a master a discretionary power of sale, the necessity for which might arise frequently, and as to which it was so difficult to procure information and evidence as to the proper or improper manner in which the master had exercised his power. But now, as there are comparatively few cases in which the master cannot in reasonable time communicate with his owners, and as the means of obtaining information from distant parts are greater than formerly, the danger of giving the master such a power in cases of emergency is very much less than it was, and the evils of depriving him of such a power in the few cases where the owner cannot be consulted, are so manifest, that where, as formerly, it seems to have been considered that the master never had any authority to sell, the law now is, that a sale is considered necessary and valid if the master, being in reasonable apprehension of not being able to avert the destruction of the vessel, and acting bonâ fide for the benefit of all concerned, both owner and underwriters, effects a sale:

The rule is laid down by Story J., as follows: "If the circumstances were such that an owner, of reasonable prudence and discretion, acting upon the pressure of the occasion, would have directed the sale, from a firm opinion that the vessel could not be delivered from the peril at all, or not without hazard of an expense utterly disproportionate to her real value, then the sale by the master is justifiable:" (The Sarah Ann, 2 Sumner, 215; and see Arnould on Marine Insurance, 2nd edit., vol. 2, p. 1095.) There must be a necessity for a sale, and the master is to judge of this necessity by the probabilities of the case and by the assistance of the best advice he can procure at the time. [Sir H. KEATING.—There can be no degrees of necessity. A sale must be either necessary or not, and that is the question which the court has to consider.] We submit that the true question is, whether at the time of the sale it appeared a necessity to the master, acting as a prudent man. Subsequent events cannot affect the question of the apparent necessity at that time. We submit that in the present case the master took all the precautions and adopted all measures which he should have taken and adopted before proceeding to a sale. The danger was imminent, and it was shown that if there had been a change of wind the ship must have been destroyed. Attempts were made to get the ship off, and they failed. It was reasonable for the master to suppose that, as he could not get the ship off, and there was imminent danger of her destruction, a sale was the best for all concerned; and if the master and the surveyors came to this conclusion, it lies upon the defendants to show that the ship could have been saved by reasonable endeavours. The respondents are not bound to contend that at the time the ship ran on the reef there was a constructive total loss or the sale was then justifiable. The question is, whether at the time of the sale there was a constructive total loss, i.e., no real hope of recovering the ship at any expense less than her actual value when recovered and repaired. It was thought, and with reasonable probability, that the ship was hogged, and on this supposition the master and surveyors acted.

Thirdly. It was admitted that there was no misdirection or improper rejection of evidence, and therefore the question is mainly whether the verdict was against the weight of evidence. In considering this question the respondents are entitled to assume that the jury entirely disbelieved the appellants' witnesses, and gave credence to the respondent's witnesses, and to contend that their finding thereon ought not to be disturbed. There was evidence on which a jury was justified in finding that a sale was a necessity under the circumstances, and the jury saw and heard the witnesses, and this court has not seen them, and must be taken as the true judges of this question of fact. It does not appear that the Chief Justice was dissatisfied with the verdict, and the court below, in the exercise of its discretion, refused a new trial. In such a case, especially an insurance case, the Court of Appeal will not interfere, nor will the court in insurance cases, as a rule, interfere even when the judge does not agree with the jury on questions of fact.

Fourthly. No notice of abandonment is necessary where the circumstances are such as to necessitate an immediate sale by the master, and such a sale takes place under such circumstances, there would be nothing substantial which the underwriters could take possession of, and abandonment would be wholly superfluous.

[Sir H. S. KEATING.—If there was a necessity for a sale, notice of abandonment could scarcely be necessary, but the real question is, whether there was such a necessity.]

the report of the surveyors, he was justified in the sale, and made it binding upon the underwriters. The authorities, however, show that such a ground of action is not sufficient. In Parsons on Marine Insurance (Vol. II., p. 147), the following passage, supported by weighty authorities, appears: "It is frequently said that, in determining whether the master should have repaired the vessel, instead of selling her, or should have forwarded the cargo, instead of breaking up the adventure at the intermediate port, regard should be had to the question whether a prudent owner, had he been present and uninsured, would have acted as the master did. We have already said that this language is to be regretted. Nothing is more certain or more obvious than that the rule that a sale by the master is justified only by 'a stringent necessity,' and the rule that 'a sale by the master is justified if a prudent owner, under the same circumstances, would have made it,' are not only two rules, but two very different rules. If a prudent selection from alternatives be not the same thing as an adoption of a course which is forced upon one, or if choice be not the same thing as compulsion, then both these rules cannot be held applicable. One must be selected and enforced, and that should be the rule of necessity. The most that can be done with the other is to use it by way of illustration, and to use it so carefully that it shall not itself seem to be the rule. Indeed, it seems to be used with this caution in cases of the highest authority, and, as the sale by the master is not valid unless it is not only the result of necessity but is also made in entire good faith, the inquiry whether a prudent owner, then and there present, would have done as the master did, may aid the jury in determining whether this good faith had been perfectly preserved." If the respondent's evidence only is looked at in this case, then that evidence alone shows that, however prudent it might have been for the master, as part owner, to sell the ship, there was "no stringent necessity" for the sale; the master had not nearly exhausted all means of saving the ship.

March 18, 1875.—The judgment of the court was delivered by Sir H. S. KEATING.—This was an action brought in Nova Scotia upon a policy of insurance effected with the present appellants in favour of the respondent. It was a time policy for twelve months, upon a vessel called the Foyle, which was a comparatively new vessel, being only three years old, and carrying somewhere about 400 tons. The plaintiffs in the action below sought to make the insurers liable upon the ground of a total loss, and the total loss relied upon was the sale of the vessel under circumstances which, it was said, justified that sale, and so occasioned to the owners a total loss of the ship.

The cause was tried before the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Halifax, and he directed the jury that in order to justify the sale it was necessary that an urgent necessity for such sale should be shown; and he left the question, accompanied by some strong remarks on the facts, to the jury as to whether that necessity existed. A verdict was found for the plaintiff. Their Lordships do not think it necessary to inquire into the way in which the verdict was afterwards settled upon the figures, because the verdict was only questioned in the Supreme Court upon the ground, first, that the Chief Justice had misdirected the jury, and next, that the verdict as found for the plaintiff was against the weight of the evidence in the case. The whole court were of opinion that there was no ground for imputing misdirection in the charge of the Chief Justice to the jury, and in that opinion their Lordships concur. But the majority of the court were of opinion that the verdict of the jury was so far justified by the evidence that they refused to grant a new trial upon the ground that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence, and discharged a rule obtained for such new trial. One member of the court took an opposite view, and the appeal comes up here as to how far the majority of the court was right in refusing a new trial upon the ground that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence in the case.

With reference to the law upon the subject, there seems now to be no doubt whatever; and it cannot be questioned that the master, under circumstances of stringent necessity, may effect a sale of the vessel so as thereby to affect the insurers. That he can only do in cases of such stringent necessity has been laid down in a great variety of cases unnecessary more particularly to be referred to, as they are well summarised in the work of Mr. Parsons on Marine Insurance (vol. 2, p. 147), where he also takes the distinction between the rule that a sale is justified by stringent necessity only, and what was sometimes supposed to be a rule, that the sale would be justified if made under circumstances that a prudent owner uninsured would have made it. He distinguishes between the two, and establishes, upon satisfactory authority, that whilst what a prudent owner would have done under the circumstances if uninsured, may illustrate the question as to how far there was a stringent necessity for selling, yet that the rule is that there must be a stringent necessity. In Arnould on Insurance (4th edit., vol. 1, p. 333), the circumstances that will justify the master in selling seem to be well and clearly put, and to be quite borne out by the authorities that are cited in support. Mr. Arnould says: "The exercise, however, of this power," that is, the power of the master to sell, "is most jealously watched by the English Courts, and rigorously confined to cases of extreme necessity. Such a necessity, that is, as leaves the master no alternative as a prudent and skilful man, acting bonâ fide for the best interests of all concerned, and with the best and soundest judgment that can be formed under the circumstances, except to sell the ship as she lies; if he come to this conclusion hastily, either without sufficient examination into the actual state of the ship, or without having previously made every exertion in his power with the means then at his disposal to extricate her from the peril, or to raise funds for the repair, he will not be justified in selling, even although the danger at the time appear exceedingly imminent." That seems to be the true rule to apply in these cases, where it is most important to confine within strict limits the powers of a master to sell the ship.

Now, applying that rule to the circumstances of the present case, their Lordships come to the conclusion that this case ought to undergo a further inquiry.

It seems that this vessel, the Foyle, being at a place called Ligan, in Nova Scotia, shipped a cargo of coals to the amount of 420 tons but that quantity being too great to admit of her passing over the bar of the port, she was lightered, and having passed the bar, again reshipped the coals which had been taken out of her. On the 16th June 1869, at 11 a.m., she weighed her anchor, and in about thirty minutes afterwards ran upon a reef or ledge off the southern head of Lingan Bay, at a distance of about 300 yards from the shore, about three miles from Lingan, and about a mile from a place called Bridgport. It is material to consider the neighbourhood of that place, because that was a place from which it appears clearly on the evidence assistance could have been obtained. Having run upon this reef, the captain at first signalled for the tugboat at Lingan; the tug came out and attempted to haul the vessel from the reef, but the hawser parted. Having repaired that hawser, it parted a second time. The hawser having parted a second time, the master of the tug, who was called as a witness, seems to have given very good advice, namely, that the ship should be lightened in order that further efforts should be made. The captain of the Foyle appears to have acted upon that advice to a certain extent, for about ten tons were taken out of the vessel by the crew, and they worked at it up to about nine o'clock that night. Whether that was a sufficient quantity or an insufficient quantity does not become, perhaps, in the result, very material. That was the only quantity that was got out up to that period. The master afterwards became anxious, because he was told that if the wind shifted to the north he would be in great peril. At 5 a.m. on the 17th he went on shore, and between 10 and 11 a.m. brought off three persons to make a survey of the vessel, and what is called a survey was thereupon made. The surveyors agreed that the vessel should be condemned, and at first were of opinion that the sale might be delayed until the 18th, but they seem suddenly to have changed that opinion and to have thought that the sale ought to take place on the 17th, and with a view to that sale they drew up the form of their survey. They stated that, having "carefully and particularly inspected, examined, and surveyed the said vessel, we find that the said vessel lies stranded off the southern head of Lingan Bay, exposed to the storms of the Atlantic, making water, lying on a reef, and in a very dangerous position, considerably hogged on the portside, badly strained, rolling heavily on her bilge. We also find that the said vessel lies in such a dangerous position that should the wind happen to change and blow from the north-east, south-east, or east, she would probably go to pieces immediately." And they recommend a sale to take place the same day.

Now, in deciding the question how far the verdict was or was not against the weight of the evidence, Mr. Cohen would seem to be justified in saying that the case as made upon the part of the plaintiff should alone be looked at, as he was entitled to assume that the jury might possibly have believed the case on the part of the plaintiff and utterly disbelieved all the witnesses on the part of the defendant, even though no proof is furnished that would justify a conclusion that such was the case. But even looking only to the case of the plaintiff, and the evidence given upon his part, it appears to their Lordships that this report of the surveyors was manifestly incorrect, and indeed wholly unfounded. There is no evidence that the ship was "making water;" or that she was "considerably hogged on the port side," or hogged at all; or that she was "badly strained;" indeed, the reverse was the case; and it is of great importance to observe that these statements as to the vessel were statements of facts which ought to have been apparent to the eye of the master himself how far they were correct or the reverse, as he states that he was present when the vessel was surveyed by the surveyors, and he says, "I saw no pumping, I did not know that she had suffered any injury." In that he was quite right, because, in fact, the vessel had not suffered any injury, and there was no necessity for pumping, because the ship had made no water.

Now, in judging of the question, how far the sale was justified by stringent necessity, of course the state of the vessel—that is, not the reported state but the true state of the vessel—becomes an important element for consideration. Here the vessel was, in fact, uninjured, as the master must or ought to have known, and yet with the exception of taking a very small quantity of her cargo out and hauling upon the kedge, which he could not have supposed would be of any effect, he seems to have done nothing between the 16th and the sale, although it does not appear that all the means subsequently used by the purchasers, which floated her within a few hours, might not have been equally made available by himself for the same purpose had he endeavoured to obtain them. As to the state of weather, there is a conflict of evidence as between a calm and a breeze, but there is no evidence of anything like rough weather, and whilst the sale was going on any wind that existed is admitted to have gone down.

The sale took place. It is not necessary to go into the particulars of the sale. The ship was sold of course very much below her value, and purchased by one of the surveyors, for his two nephews, who quickly took the means neglected by the master and floated her substantially uninjured in a few hours.

The judges who formed the majority of the court upon this occasion, professed themselves unable to understand or to collect from the evidence why further efforts had not been made.

"In the light of these facts, I confess," says the learned judge who delivers the judgment, which must be taken to be the judgment of the whole of the majority of the court, "I cannot quite understand the conduct of the master, nor why he did not pursue the course subsequently adopted by the purchasers after his first attempt had failed. The lightening of the vessel by the discharge of her cargo would seem the obvious course to be pursued, and this, on consultation with the master of the tug, was determined upon. He did indeed employ his crew for a time in doing this; but, if he really considered his vessel in jeopardy, and had the master of the tug, had told him to get the coals out of her, for if the wind came from the north he would lose her, ought he not to have sought assistance from the shore, which he could have obtained as easily as the purchasers did? If I were asked whether in my opinion the master had done what was required of him, I should be slow in arriving at the conclusion that he had resorted to all the measures within his reach, and had exerted himself with sufficient promptitude and energy so as to justify the sale of the vessel." But the learned judge added that it was a practical matter for the consideration of the jury.

Now their Lordships entirely agree with the learned judge in their inability to discover on the evidence for the plaintiff himself why those efforts were not made; and inasmuch as to justify the sale those efforts ought to have been made, there seems to be strong reason for ascertaining how far another jury would agree in the very sound and sensible opinions expressed by the majority of the court themselves, or whether they would coincide in the view taken by the former jury.

Of course their Lordships would be slow to advise a new trial where there was a substantial conflict of evidence. In the present case the record does not disclose the fact whether the Lord Chief Justice expressed himself dissatisfied with the verdict. It does not state the fact either way, that he expressed himself to be satisfied or dissatisfied. That he was not perfectly satisfied with the verdict, their Lordships can perhaps collect from the passage just read, and which must be taken to be the expression of the opinion of the Chief Justice himself. But in an ordinary case, although the non-expression of the dissatisfaction upon the part of the judge is generally looked upon as forming a serious obstacle to ordering a new trial, yet at the same time, if it is plain that the evidence was such that there is ground for the belief that the jury really did act without giving that weight which they ought to do to the evidence that was laid before them, there is no reason whatever why a new trial in the interests of justice should not be directed.

In this case it would be too much to say that there was no evidence of the stringent necessity that would have justified a sale. Had there been no evidence there would have been a misdirection; but their Lordships are of opinion, having regard to the evidence given of the absence of those efforts upon the part of the master, which efforts would alone justify a valid sale—that is, a sale which should be valid as against the insurers—that the verdict of the jury as given was undoubtedly against the weight of the evidence. The learned judge who dissented, Mr. Justice Wilkins, states "That he gathered from the opinion expressed by a majority of the court, that had the respective judges who composed it been on the jury that tried the cause, they would not have found as the jury found. I should certainly, had I been in the jury box, not have concurred in such a finding. My opinion is, moreover, that wherever such a sentiment pervades the bench in relation to such a case as this, the result of investigation and deliberation that induces it ought to constitute a sufficient ground for setting the verdict aside."

It is not necessary to pronounce an opinion as to how far that does or does not lay down the rule too broadly. It is sufficient to say that the verdict is against the weight of the evidence. The rule which is correctly laid down in Arnould (4th edit., vol. 1, p. 383) seems to fit this case so completely as to render a new trial inevitable upon this evidence: "If the master come to the conclusion to sell hastily, either without sufficient examination into the state of the ship or without having previously made every exertion in his power with the means then at his disposal to extricate her from the peril, he will not be justified in selling even though the danger at the time appear exceedingly imminent."

Not only in the opinion of the judges forming the majority of the court were not such efforts made, but they were unable to perceive, even upon the evidence of the plaintiff himself, any reason why those efforts were not made. Their Lordships agree with that view; and therefore they will humbly advise her Majesty that the judgment of the court below, refusing to make the rule absolute for a new trial, be reversed, that the rule be made absolute for a new trial, and that the costs of the first trial and of this appeal do abide the event.

GUNESTEAD v. PRICE AND OTHERS.

FULLMORE v. WAIT.

County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, s. 9; 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51, s. 2)—Action for demurrage in Superior Court—Claim under 300l.—Jurisdiction—Plaintiff's right to costs—Certificate for—Construction of statutes.

The jurisdiction given to the County Courts by the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71) sect. 3, and the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51) sect. 2, is confined to causes within the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty; and, therefore, in an action in a Superior Court on a charter-party for freight or demurrage, which is a cause not within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court, a plaintiff, claiming and recovering a sum between 20l. and 300l., is entitled to his costs, and cannot be deprived of them by the operation of sect. 9 of the Act of 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), which is not applicable to such a case.

Simpson v. Blues (ante, vol. 1, p. 326; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 290; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 679) approved, and Cargo ex Argos (ante vol. 1, p. 519; L. Rep. 5 P. C. 134; 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 77) dissented from.

The first-mentioned of these cases, Gunestead v. Price and others, was an action brought by the plaintiff, a shipowner, against the defendants, as charterers, to recover the balance of an account for freight and demurrage, amounting to the sum of 95l. 6s. 3d. Two counts of the plaintiff's declaration were upon a charter-party for the freight and demurrage, and there were also the usual money counts. In answer to the action the defendants paid into court the sum of 36l. 16s. 6d., and with respect to the residue of the plaintiff's claim they pleaded several pleas. The cause came on for trial on the 26th Feb. 1874, at the sittings for London after Hilary Term 1874, before Kelly, C.B., and a special jury, when a verdict was found in favour of the plaintiff for the sum of 19l. 1s. 9d., beyond the amount paid into court as above-mentioned.

Subsequently thereto the plaintiff delivered his bill of costs, and upon its coming in the usual course before the master for taxation, it was objected on the part of the defendants that inasmuch as under the second section of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), the action should have been brought and tried in the County Court, the plaintiff came under sect. 9 of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict.

GUNESTAD v. PRICE AND OTHERS; FULLMORE v. WAIT.

c. 71), and was thereby disentitled to recover his costs, and was also liable to pay the defendant's costs. The master, however, was of opinion that the case did not come within the jurisdiction of the County Court, and could not have been tried there, and he accordingly decided that the plaintiff was entitled to his costs; and for the purpose of having the question brought before the court for its decision, he, at the request of the defendants, and with the plaintiff's consent, gave his allocatur for the sum of 120*l.*, a nominal amount agreed to by both parties.

The defendants afterwards moved for and obtained a rule nisi calling on the plaintiff to show cause why the master should not review his taxation, and the allocatur be set aside, on the ground that the cause was an Admiralty cause within the meaning of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, and the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869; and subsequently to that rule having been obtained by the defendants, an application was made on the part of the plaintiff to the learned Chief Baron for a certificate that the cause was one that was proper to be tried in the Superior Court, and the certificate was accordingly given by the learned judge.

The other case of Fullmore v. Wait was also an action by a shipowner against the charterer to recover the sum of 100*l.* for freight and demurrage. The declaration, in addition to the common money counts, contained a count which charged that a cargo was shipped on board the plaintiff's vessel to be delivered at Bristol under a bill of lading, incorporating the terms of the charter-party, and that the defendant as indorsee of the bill of lading, promised the plaintiff to discharge the cargo within the time prescribed for so doing by the charter party, and to pay a demurrage of 13*l.* a day for every day's detention beyond that limited time according to the terms of the charter-party; and it charged a detention by the defendant of the plaintiff's vessel for seven days on demurrage. In answer to this claim, the defendant paid 78*l.* into court, and pleaded never indebted except as to the said 78*l.* The defendant took this 78*l.* out of court in full satisfaction of his claim, and entered a nolle prosequi as to the residue.

In this case also the master taxed the plaintiff's costs, although an objection was taken by the defendant similar to that which was taken in the previous case, and having given his allocatur for the amount, a rule nisi was obtained by the defendant for the master to review his taxation, upon the ground that the action should have been brought in the County Court and not in a Superior Court, but no certificate for costs was obtained in this case.

The following sections of the various Acts of Parliament relating to the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty, and to the Admiralty Jurisdiction of the County Courts, were cited and referred to in the arguments of counsel and the judgments of the court, and are material to the case.

The Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10).

Sec. 6. The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim by the owner, or consignee, or assignee of any bill of lading of any goods carried into any port in England or Wales in any ship, for damage done to the goods, or any part thereof, by the negligence or misconduct of, or for any breach of duty or breach of contract on the part of the owners, master, or crew of the ship, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court, that, at the time of the institution of the cause, any owner or part owner of the ship is domiciled in England or Wales: Provided always, that if in such cause the plaintiff do not recover 20*l.* he shall not be entitled to any costs, charges, or expenses incurred by him therein, unless the judge shall certify that the cause was a fit one to be tried in the said court.

The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71).

Sec. 2. If at any time after the passing of this Act it appears to Her Majesty in council expedient that any County Court should have admiralty jurisdiction, it shall be lawful for Her Majesty by order in council to appoint that County Court to have admiralty jurisdiction . . . and such County Court so appointed to have such admiralty jurisdiction shall for the purposes of this Act be deemed a County Court having admiralty jurisdiction.

Sec. 3. Any County Court having admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction and all powers and authorities relating thereto, to try and determine the following causes (in this Act referred to as admiralty causes):

- (1) As to any claim for salvage, any cause in which the value of the property saved does not exceed 1000*l.*, or the amount claimed exceed 300*l.*
- (2) As to any claim for towage, necessaries, wages, &c.; any cause in which the claim does not exceed 150*l.*
- (3) As to any claim for damage to cargo, or by collision; any cause in which the amount claimed does not exceed 300*l.*
- (4) Any cause in respect of any such claim aforesaid where the amount of claim exceeds the amount limited as above, when the parties agree that any County Court having admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction.

Sec. 6. The High Court of Admiralty, on motion by any party to an admiralty cause pending in a County Court, may, if it shall think fit, with previous notice to the other party, transfer the cause to the High Court of Admiralty, and may order security for costs, or impose such other terms as to the court may seem fit.

Sec. 9. If any person shall take in the High Court of Admiralty of England, or in any Superior Court, proceedings which he might, without agreement, have taken in a County Court, except by order of the judge of the High Court of Admiralty, or of such Superior Court, or of a County Court having admiralty jurisdiction, and shall not recover a sum exceeding the amount to which the jurisdiction of the County Court in that admiralty cause is limited by this Act, and also if any person without agreement shall, except by order as aforesaid, take proceedings as to salvage in the High Court of Admiralty or in any Superior Court in respect of property saved, the value of which when saved does not exceed 1000*l.*, he shall not be entitled to costs, and shall be liable to be condemned in costs, unless the judge of the High Court of Admiralty, or of a Superior Court before whom the cause is tried or heard, shall certify that it was a proper cause to be tried in the High Court of Admiralty of England, or in a Superior Court.

The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51).

Sec. 1. Enacts that the Act shall be read and interpreted as one Act with the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868.

Sec. 2. Any County Court appointed or to be appointed to have admiralty jurisdiction, shall have jurisdiction, and all provisions and authorities relating thereto, to try and determine the following causes:

- (1) As to any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship, or in relation to the carriage of goods in any ship, and also as to any claim in tort in respect of goods carried in any ship, provided the amount claimed does not exceed 300*l.*
- (2) As to any cause in respect to any such claim as aforesaid, but in which the amount claimed is beyond the amount limited as above-mentioned, when the parties agree, by a memorandum signed by them or their attorneys, or agents, that any County Court having admiralty jurisdiction and specified in the memorandum, shall have jurisdiction.

GUNESTEAD v. PRICE AND OTHERS; FULLMORE v. WAIT.

[Ex.]

Both rules now came on for argument, and against the first-mentioned rule in Gunestead v. Price and others:

Benjamin, Q.C., and Bigham for the plaintiff, showed cause, relying on the decision of the Court of Common Pleas in the case of Simpson v. Blues (ante, vol. 1, p. 326; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 679; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 290), and contending that the court should follow that case rather than the decision of the case in the Privy Council of Cargo Ex Argos (ante, vol. 1, p. 519; 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 77; L. Rep. 5 P. C. App. Cas. 134), which they urged was not binding on this court: (The Merchant Shipping Company v. Armitage and others in the Exchequer Chamber in error from the Queen's Bench, ante, p. 185; 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 809; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 99; Smith and others v. Brown and others, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 56; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 808; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 729, and various dicta of the learned judges in those cases). With regard to the certificate of the learned Chief Baron being given in time they cited Swift v. Jeusbury (30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 31; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 560); Lyons v. Hyman (20 L. J. 1, Ex.; 5 Ex. 749), and contended that if the judgment here was to be taken as a final judgment, then before the present application on the part of the defendants could be entertained, they should have applied to set the judgment aside; but if a final judgment had not been signed, then the certificate was in good time, as it could be given at any time before the signing of final judgment.

Field, Q.C. and Foard for the defendants supported their rule.—The certificate of the learned Chief Baron was given too late, first, because it was after final judgment had been signed; and, secondly, because it was not given until after the master's allocatur; and thirdly, because it was not granted until after the present rule nisi had been granted to the defendants, and it was not within the competency of the learned judge to give it. The action was for demurrage, and the claim which arose out of an agreement for the use of the plaintiffs' ship, presented a question, which was a simple one of fact for a jury, and the case was one which should have been brought and tried in the County Court.

In the other case of Fullmore v. Wait, Cohen Q.C. (with whom was F. Meadows White) showed cause for the plaintiff.—This was not a case within sect. 9 of the Act of 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), which applied to cases over which the Court of Admiralty had exclusive jurisdiction, and there would be a great and manifest hardship in holding that that section applied to a case where judgment was suffered by default, and where consequently the cause was not either "tried or heard" before a judge within the section. In such a case there is no judge who could give a certificate. That was the true construction of the statute according to its literal interpretation, and that was the construction which it should receive, for otherwise anyone with a clear irresistible claim would have to apply for leave to bring his action in the Superior Court, since otherwise the claim might be satisfied by the payment into court of less than 300*l.*, and no certificate could be obtained. The words of the section also, "the judge of a Superior Court" go to show that it did not apply to an action in a common law court, in which there are a plurality of judges. In Hewitt

v. Cory (22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 666; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 418; 3 Mar. Law. Cas. O. S. 425), this point was not brought to the attention of the court. It is contended that Simpson v. Blues (ubi sup.)—to their decision in which case the Court of Common Pleas had adhered since the case of Cargo ex Argos in the Privy Council—should be followed by this court on the present occasion rather than the case of Cargo ex Argos. He referred also to a decision in the High Court of Admiralty a few days ago to the effect that the Court of Admiralty may have jurisdiction over charter-parties so far as they relate to obligations which have to be fulfilled after the goods have been shipped on board the vessel, but not before. (See this case since reported, The Dannebrog, ante, p. 452; 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 759.)

R. E. Webster for the defendant, in support of his rule.—The argument arising from the hardship, which it is said by the plaintiff would occur in these cases if the defendants' construction of the statute is to prevail, is answered by the fact that a plaintiff can always, before commencing an action, apply for and obtain leave to bring his action in the superior courts, and then he would not be deprived of his costs by a payment into court. The scope of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 is larger than that of the Act of 1868, and the latter Act not only amends the former Act, but gives an extended jurisdiction. The present case comes clearly within the definition of Admiralty causes which is contained in sect. 3 of the Act of 1868. The decision of the Privy Council in Cargo ex Argos was, he contended, preferable to that of the Court of Common Pleas in Simpson v. Blues, and should be followed on the present occasion. He cited also Purkis v. Flower, in the Bail Court, before Lush and Archibald, J.J. (ante, p. 226; 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 45; L. Rep. 9 Q. 114.)

Cour. adv. vult.

Feb. 12. 1875.—CLEASBY, B. (reading his own written judgment, in which the learned judge said that Kelly, C.B. and Amphlett, B., concurred). It is unnecessary to state the facts of this case. The claim in each case is one by the owner of a ship against the charterer for demurrage, and the question raised and argued before us was, whether such a claim being under 300*l.*, could be entertained by the County Court by a jurisdiction conferred upon it by the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51). The County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 had first given admiralty jurisdiction to the County Courts, and by the Act of the next year the jurisdiction was extended. The question is to what extent? The first Act had only given the County Courts jurisdiction to a limited amount in certain matters in which the Court of Admiralty had jurisdiction, and the question is whether the late Act only increased the jurisdiction of the County Courts over matters then subject to admiralty jurisdiction, or created a new admiralty jurisdiction. The enactment by section 2 is that any County Court appointed to have admiralty jurisdiction, shall have jurisdiction to try the following causes:

"As to any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship, or in relation to the carriage of goods in any ship, and also as to any claim in tort in respect of goods carried in any ship, provided the amount claimed does not exceed 300*l.*"

GUNESTAD v. PRICE AND OTHERS; FULLMORE v. WAIT.

[Ex.]

Those words, in their natural sense, are, no doubt, large enough to comprise a claim by shipowners for demurrage, which was not at the time the subject of admiralty jurisdiction at all, and we have to consider whether there is any reason why they should receive a more limited construction, so as to exclude such a claim. If the words were so definite and specific as to apply themselves to an understood subject, they would speak for themselves, and there would be no ground for getting at their proper effect by construction. But if the language is general, and so general that it appears inapplicable without some limitation, then we are entitled to see by the immediate context, or the subject matter to which they are intended to apply, what, if any, limitation ought to be put upon them. Now the words, in their terms, include causes (that is all causes) as to any claim whatever (whether made by shipowner, charterer, passenger, shipper of goods, consignee or assignee of bill of lading, or any other person) arising out of any agreement relating to the use or hire of any ship. The words are not "any agreement for the hire of any ship," but "in relation" thereto, and would, therefore, include an agreement for commission upon obtaining charter, or an agreement to repair, if coupled with agreement to charter, and a variety of collateral agreements of that nature. The limitation of amount does not in any way limit the character of the claims, and the words may, I think, be regarded as general words properly limited in their meaning, if there is anything in the context or the nature of the subject to limit them.

The maxim that general words are limited in their application is constantly acted upon. The maxim itself is thus expressed by Bacon (Maxims, Reg. 10), "For all words, whether they be in deeds or statutes or otherwise, if they be general and not express and precise, shall be restrained unto the fitness of the matter or person."

Where they follow an enumeration of particular things, they do not introduce things of a higher and different character (see The Archbishop of Canterbury's case, 1 Co. Rep., part 2, 46a; Casher v. Holmes, 2 B. & Ad. 592; 9 L. J. 280, K.B.) In the judgment in Reg. v. Edmondson (28 L. J. 213, at p. 215 M. C.; 2 Ell. & Ell. 77, at p. 83), Lord Campbell, C.J. thus lays down the rule: "The general principle laid down in all the cases which have been cited is, that where particular words are followed by general words, the latter must be construed as ejusdem generis with the former." And in the judgment in Reg. v. Cleworth (9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 682; 4 B. & S. 927), the present Lord Chief Justice (4 B. & S. 932) uses the following language: "Then there is a general expression, 'other persons whatsoever,' but, according to a well established rule in the construction of statutes, general terms following particular ones apply only to such persons and things as are ejusdem generis."

If in the present case, instead of the general words in the section standing alone, we had had an enumeration of the causes subject to admiralty jurisdiction, similar to what is contained in the 3rd section of the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, and had then had the general words found in the section in question, I should certainly have thought that these general words would have been limited to causes of the same character as those enumerated—namely, causes over which the Court of Admiralty itself had jurisdiction. As the two Acts are to be read together, and the first Act gives Admiralty jurisdiction, and the second extends it, the particular words in the first may perhaps be regarded as followed by the general words in the second, and so the rule would apply. But, independent of this, general words are to be limited to the subject matter, as in the ordinary case of a recital in a deed qualifying general words of release following (not to mention other instances), as in Payler v. Homersham (4 M. & S. 423); Simons v. Johnson (3 B. & Ad. 175; 1 L. J. N. S. 98 K.B.). See the note to Roe v. Tramarr (2 Smith's Lead, Cas., 6th edit. p. 476; 5th edit. p. 451). For example, if in this case, taking the two Acts to be one, there had been a recital that it was "expedient to enlarge the jurisdiction of the County Courts," and no more, than the general words of the enactment would be read by giving the fullest effect to them, so as to enlarge that jurisdiction. In that case the subject matter of legislation would have been simply the enlargement of the jurisdiction of the County Courts. But, if the recital in the Act had been "whereas it is expedient to transfer to the County Courts a portion of the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court to a limited amount;" then I feel satisfied that the words, however general, should be read as only including causes within admiralty jurisdiction. In that case the subject matter of legislation would have been admiralty jurisdiction, and the object would have been to make the County Courts available for the exercise of it to a limited amount.

In arriving at a proper conclusion upon the present question, which is no doubt one of much difficulty, from loose legislation, we could not take a safer guide than the recital of the first statute, the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71 (which is to be read as one statute with the second Act, the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), if there were one. But though there is no formal recital, the first enacting clause may, I think, be regarded as having the same effect in showing what the subject-matter of legislation was. That clause (sect. 2) enacts that if Her Majesty thinks it expedient she may give the County Courts "Admiralty jurisdiction." What does that mean? The natural meaning of it is to give to the County Courts jurisdiction possessed by the Court of Admiralty; I can give it no other meaning. There is nothing in that Act to give it any other meaning. The use of the words "Admiralty causes" in that Act afterwards does not do so. Indeed, the difficulty does not arise under that Act of Parliament, but under the second Act, as to which it may no doubt be urged that the language of the second section of the former Act is inapplicable. And, if it was clear that the whole of the Admiralty jurisdiction was exhausted by the former Act, and that the second Act, to have any operation at all, must be applied to new and additional subjects of jurisdiction, I should think the argument conclusive. But that is undoubtedly not the case. There are subjects included in the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10) which are not included in the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), and upon which the subsequent statute may take effect.

The question before us has formed the subject of two most able judgments in the Court of Common Pleas in Simpson v. Blues (ubi sup.) and in the Privy Council in Cargo ex Argos (ubi sup.).

GUNESTEAD v. PRICE AND OTHERS; FULLMORE v. WAIT.

[Ex.]

It would be impossible to weigh and then correctly balance the strong reasons brought forward in favour of each view. And I have found myself compelled, in a case of great difficulty, to resort to the simple and well-grounded means of ascertaining what ought to be regarded as the real subject-matter of legislation; and in this way I have come to the conclusion that nothing but admiralty jurisdiction was operated upon. But I must notice one argument founded upon the 6th section of the first Act (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), by which the Court of Admiralty may transfer from the County Court any admiralty cause then pending to the Court of Admiralty. This section is no doubt incorporated in the subsequent statute (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51) as was held in The Swan (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 633; L. Rep. 3 Adm. & Ecc. 314; 40 L. J. 8, Adm). The alternative then arises of holding, either that the County Court only entertains admiralty causes within the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty, or that the Court of Admiralty has indirectly acquired jurisdiction over a new subject matter. It certainly seems to me that the latter alternative involves a more violent breach of the first principles of construction than the former.

I only wish further to notice the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 10), for the purpose of guarding against an argument that the County Court has acquired a jurisdiction not possessed by the Court of Admiralty. That section, after giving to the High Court of Admiralty a large jurisdiction in claims by owners of any goods carried into any port, adds: "Unless it be shown to the satisfaction of the court that, at the time of the institution of the cause, any owner or part owner of the ship is domiciled in England or Wales." These latter words do not, properly speaking, limit the subject-matter of jurisdiction, but they assume the jurisdiction in the cases provided for, and provide that, upon proof to the satisfaction of the court, that the owner is so domiciled, the jurisdiction shall not be exercised. But the court could only be satisfied by proof given in some cause over which, but for the application of the proviso, it would have jurisdiction. There is nothing, therefore, inconsistent in the County Court, by means of its process under the 3rd section of the Act of 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), exercising its jurisdiction when the owner is domiciled in England or Wales, though the Court of Admiralty would not do so.

The conclusion is that the plaintiffs in both these cases proceeded properly in the Superior Court, and are, therefore, entitled to their costs.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of opinion in these cases that, whether we thought the Court of Common Pleas or the Privy Council right, we ought to give judgment for the plaintiffs that they should respectively recover their costs. We are invited to say that they are not entitled to them because they should have sued in the County Court, in which (if they had sued therein) the Court of Common Pleas have said that they would have prohibited them from proceeding. If we were so to hold, it would be ludicrous and a scandal. It is no answer to this to say that the plaintiffs might have got leave to sue in the superior courts. They might or they might not have gotten such leave. But what they are now claiming they claim as of right and not as a matter dependent on the opinion of any superior court as to where the action should have been brought.

This being my view, and it being always a matter in which the difficulty might be obviated by leave being granted to sue in the Superior Courts (which I should think no judge would ever refuse), and it being in the power of the Legislature to state what was or is its intention, the subject is, perhaps not worth much discussion, with all respect be it said to the two great authorities who have differed.

But, if we are to choose between them it seems to me that the Court of Common Pleas, in their decision in Simpson v. Blues (ubi sup.), was right. The difficulties in the way of the decision of the Privy Council in Cargo ex Argos (ubi sup.) are most forcibly put in their judgment, and to those are added most cogent arguments in the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in Simpson v. Blues against the expediency of giving admiralty jurisdiction in such cases as those in question either to the High Court of Admiralty or to the County Court. Shortly stated, the objections are that, on the construction contended for by the defendants, the County Court would have an admiralty jurisdiction in cases in which the Admiralty Court had no original jurisdiction; that the High Court of Admiralty would have an appellate jurisdiction where it had not an original jurisdiction; that there would be transferred to it from the County Court causes which it could not originally entertain, and so that it could hear and decide cases not properly within its own jurisdiction, or that of the County Court. To these objections are to be added, not as aiding the construction of the statute, but as helping to the probable intention of the Legislature, the objections, so forcibly stated in the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, to admiralty procedure being applied to such cases as those in question.

These different considerations were felt so strongly by the Privy Council, that they would perhaps have decided as the Common Pleas did, but for the necessity of finding an application for words for which they saw none if the decision of the Common Pleas were right. With great respect, it seems to me that a meaning may be given to the words without the admittedly preposterous consequences which the defendants contend for. The words are, "any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship." I cannot think that the enactment is in plain and intelligible language, free from any ambiguity. If I found the words without anything to control them or to guide me in their interpretation, I should say that they included the cases before us, and much more. But, as it is, I declare I do not know what they mean or were intended to mean. A charter-party is not an "agreement for the use or hire of a ship," but it is said to be included in the words "any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship." Would that include the shipbroker's claim for finding a charter? See the case of The Nuova Raffaella (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 16; L. Rep. 3 Adm. & Ecc. 483.) Take the next words, "any claim arising out of any agreement in relation to the carriage of goods in any ship." Does that include a claim on a policy of insurance? The policy is an agreement not for but "in relation to the carriage of goods in a ship." Some restriction must be put upon the words. If the ship were in dock, and hired for a dance to be given on board in the dock, it surely would not be an admiralty cause. Nor, one would think, would an agreement by the owner of a river steamer to take a party to Richmond. Would a ship on Lake Windermere be within the enactment, or a trading barge on a canal? Let us read the words thus, "Shall have jurisdiction to try and determine the following causes: Where the High Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction as to any claim arising out of any agreement made in relation to the use or hire of any ship or in relation to the carriage of goods in any ship." Are there such cases? I think there are. The High Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction over any "claim" (the same word) "by the owner, or consignee, or assignee of any bill of lading of any goods carried into any port in England or Wales, in any ship, for damage done to the goods, or any part thereof, by the negligence or misconduct of, or from any breach of duty on the part of, the owner, master, or crew of the ship" (24 Vict. c. 10, s. 6, and vide The Pieve Superiore, ante, pp. 162, 319; 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 702; L. Rep. 5 P. C. App. Cas. 482.) So that the owner of goods carried into any port in England, having a claim for damage to them, arising out of a breach of contract by the owner of the ship, may sue in the High Court of Admiralty. But the contract broken may be a charter-party, which is a contract in a sense, although not strictly so, for "the use or hire of a ship." So as to the latter part of the clause, "agreement made in relation to the carriage of any goods in any ship." This would apply to claims by the charterer or shipper under a bill of lading, or other owner of goods carried under charters or otherwise. This construction, as it seems to me, gives a meaning to the words without the absurd consequences which would follow on the defendant's construction. Therefore, I think that both these rules should be discharged.

As to the other point arising in one of the present cases, that of Fullmore v. Wait, namely, that the section as to costs, does not apply where there is judgment by default, and that it does not apply to actions in common law courts, we need express no opinion with regard to them. The arguments presented to us were not presented to the Court of Queen's Bench in the case of Hewitt v. Cory (ubi sup.). We do not, therefore, recognise that case as an authority against the plaintiffs here.

It seems preposterous to suppose that the Legislature has intended that cases over 300*l.* may be tried either on common law or admiralty principles; cases under 20*l.* on the same; but cases between those amounts on admiralty principles only, except at the peril of the plaintiff losing his costs. The difficulty arises from the use of the words "any Superior Court." Perhaps they should be read as "Superior Court of Admiralty, if any." (See Mr. Day's argument on this point in his Common Law Procedure Acts, 4th edit. p. 377.) The section supposes that "the judge" always hears or decides the case, apparently pointing to a court where there is one judge, and where the case is always adjudged. Rule discharged.

AMERICAN REPORTS.

Reported by R. D. BENEDICT, Proctor and Advocate.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT, EASTERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

THE PURITAN.

Salvage by steamtugs near a port—Derelict—Apportionment.

Where an abandoned ship is found ashore on a shoal by two tugs which, while she is ashore are unable to render assistance, but on her floating off with wind and tide make fast and prevent her from going ashore again and take her to a place of safety, their service is salvage and not mere towage, nor is their service diminished in value by the proximity of a third tug, which could, but did not, render any assistance.

Where the master and crew of a ship in distress are taken off by a steam tug (there being no immediate danger to life), and are taken ashore by the tug, which afterwards returns to the ship with her master and finds her placed in safety by other salvors, that tug has no claim for salvage reward. The ship P., in endeavouring to enter the harbour of New York, struck on the False Hook, a bar running parallel to Sandy Hook. The channel to the west, between it and Sandy Hook, is about 300 yards wide, and to the east of it is the open sea. The wind was blowing a gale directly on shore, and the ship grounded so hard on the shoal that in fifteen minutes she had 8ft. of water in her, and soon after portions of her keel came up alongside.

A powerful tug, the C., came near her, and the captain and crew of the ship, thinking that the ship would not come off from the shoal, left her and went up to New York in the C. Another tug, the W., had also in the meantime approached, but her captain, seeing the condition of the ship, also thought she would never come off, and she went away looking for other business.

About an hour afterwards two other tugs, the J. G. N. and the J. M., seeing the flag of distress which had been left flying, went to the ship and found her abandoned. They lay by her, and after a while found that she was moving, and was about to come off the shoal on the inshore side. Having agreed to share in the salvage, they ran in close to her, and put on board four men, and got a hawser to her, when she came off the shoal, and they succeeded in towing her round the point of Sandy Hook into the Bay, where they put her on the mud, pumped her all night, and the next day at noon brought her to a dock in safety.

When the captain of the W. saw the ship moving he came up also and offered his assistance to the two tugs, which then were towing the ship, but it was refused. The captain of the ship, on the tug C., on his way up to New York, left word with a wrecking company to be ready to go to the ship.

AMERICAN REFS.]

THE PURITAN.

[AMERICAN REFS.]

He left his crew in New York, and the next morning early he went himself on board the C. to look for the ship, and found her on the mud in charge of the salvors.

The owners of the two tugs filed a libel for salvage. The owners of the C. also filed a petition claiming salvage. The ship and her cargo and freight were worth from 225,000 to 237,000 dols. The tugs were worth, one of them 9000 dols., and the other 17,000 dols. Each of them had a crew of six, all told, and on one of them was a boy who had gone with the tug for a pleasure trip.

Held, that in view of the peril to the property, the value of the property saved, the risk of loss of the tugs, and the danger to the lives of their crews (although such danger and risk was not excessive, and the services did not extend over about twenty hours), the sum of 30,000 dols. was a proper amount of salvage to be paid to the two tugs.

That the C. was not entitled to recover salvage.

That the amount of salvage be divided equally between the two tugs; that the masters of them receive 3000 dols. each; that the men who went on board the ship, and especially one who took charge on board of her, receive a higher rate than their fellows, and that the rate of wages afforded a proper criterion by which to fix the shares of the men.

BENEDICT, J.—This action is brought by the owners and crews of two steam tugs, called respectively the Jacob G. Neafie and the Jacob Myers, to recover for salvage services rendered to the ship Puritan.

On the 17th April 1874, the ship Puritan, laden with a valuable cargo, when attempting to enter the harbour of New York during an easterly gale, grounded upon what is called by some the Outer Middle, but on the charts is named the False Hook, a shoal lying outside of Sandy Hook, between which and Sandy Hook there runs a narrow channel 300 or 400 yards wide, and outside of which to eastward is the open sea. At the time the ship grounded on this shoal the waves broke heavily about her, and she grounded so that in a very short time portions of her keel appeared on the surface of the water, and she was found to have made 8ft. of water in her hold within ten or fifteen minutes after striking. While in this condition she was approached by the steamtug Cyclops, a powerful tug, when all on board left the ship in a boat, and went on board the Cyclops and proceeded to New York, leaving the ship abandoned, and, as was supposed, permanently fast upon the shoal. Afterwards, on the same day, the tugs Neafie and Myers, while proceeding down the Bay inside, observed the ship with her signal of distress flying. They at once proceeded to her assistance. Upon reaching her they found no one on board, and that it was impossible to assist her as she then lay. They did not, however, depart, but remained by her with the intent to afford her aid if the opportunity should arise, as it was observed by them that the action of the heavy seas upon the ship seemed likely to drive her over the shoal. This actually occurred, and after the lapse of an hour or so it was seen that the ship was about to come off the shoal on the inside. Thereupon the two tugs, having first come to an understanding to share in the harbour and the reward, placed four men on board of her, and having got out hawsers, took her in tow as soon as she cleared the shoal, and succeeded in towing her past the Hook in safety, and in placing her upon the mud at the Horse Shoe in the Lower Bay. She was there pumped all night, and the next morning was brought by the salvors to a wharf in Brooklyn.

A dispute thereupon arose between the salvors and the owners of the ship and cargo as to the amount of compensation to be paid for the services rendered by these two tugs, to determine which the present action has been brought. The parties differ widely—the libellants asking for a large reward as for a salvage service of unusual merit, while the claimants earnestly contend that 1000 dols. would be a liberal compensation.

This difference arises mainly from a dispute as to the proper effect of the evidence in regard to two controlling features of the case. The libellants insist that the ship was rescued from a position of great danger, inasmuch as, without the aid of these tugs, she would have been driven by the storm upon the exposed beach of Sandy Hook outside; while the claimants contend that without any aid from the tugs, the ships would have drifted past the Hook and into safe water in the Lower Bay.

Upon this question of fact, I am of opinion that the evidence fails to sustain the position taken by the claimants. The weight of evidence shows that the ship when she came off the shoal would, if unaided, have been driven upon the beach, which was some 300 or 400 yards to leeward, and would there have sustained very great damage, if not put in peril of total loss of the ship and her cargo. This appears not only from the testimony of the salvors, but from that of the captain of the Walcott, a disinterested person, who returned to the ship after the libellants had taken hold, and who states that with two tugs towing the ship it was all they could do to keep her off the beach.

A second great point of controversy is this: the claimants contend that the ship was not rescued from danger, because she came off the shoal without aid, and then not only were the two tugs of the libellants there, but the Walcott, also a powerful tug, was at hand. It is said, therefore, that these tugs should be deemed to be competitors for a towage service there to be performed, and that, whatever either of them would have been willing to have been employed for to perform the service is a fair price for the Puritan to pay.

The evidence in respect to the Walcott is, that in the afternoon, having been informed by a Sandy Hook pilot that the Puritan was ashore, she steered towards her by compass, the weather being then too thick to enable the ship to be seen, and found the Cyclops at the ship. As the Walcott was expecting a Calcutta ship she remained outside, and for a time in the neighbourhood of the Puritan. After the Cyclops departed for New York with the Puritan's crew on board, the Walcott departed, because the captain judged it to be useless to stay. He says he did not think the ship would come off. She looked bad. He did not calculate she would ever get off, except in pieces. Afterwards, when he saw the Neafie and the Myers at the ship, he ran again near to her, and was ready to afford additional aid, if such aid had been required. I am unable to see how the presence of the Walcott under such circumstances can affect the claim of the libellants. The Walcott certainly had no idea of being able to rescue the ship. She had departed on her own business, and it cannot be known that she would have returned to the ship at all if she had not observed the Neafie and the Myers there. When she did return her presence was of no value, for the other tugs already had hold of the ship, and were safely conducting her towards the harbour. Moreover, it is not certain that when the Walcott arrived she could have saved the ship. She was no doubt powerful enough to tow the ship, but she was not on the spot when the ship began to move, and, situated as this ship then was, time was everything—a little delay would have carried the ship so near to the beach that no tug could have then rescued her. One of the witnesses says that the ship would have been ashore in ten minutes after she began to move if it had not been for the exertions of the libellants. Furthermore, the service of the Neafie and the Myers to this ship commenced when, in answer to her signal of distress, they put out from the harbour into the open sea; the service continued while they lay by her in order to be able to render the instant assistance demanded by the position of the ship when she came off the shoal; and it did not terminate until the vessel was moored at the Brooklyn Wharf. It is difficult to see why the promptness and zeal displayed by these two tugs should be held less meritorious because another tug, which had entertained no idea of being able to aid the ship, presented herself while they were in the act of affording aid.

Nor does it strike me as reasonable to say that the position of this ship was that of a vessel free from danger having three tugs by her competing for the employment of towing her to the harbour. The ship was abandoned. There was no one there to employ the tugs, and the tugs were under no obligation to tow her without being employed. Although under no obligation to do it, these two tugs did voluntarily aid this ship, and by combining their efforts they were enabled to do what neither of them could have done alone, namely, to save the ship from going ashore.

To bring about precisely such results is the sole object of the law of salvage; and in my opinion it would be a violation of that law to refuse to these salvors the liberal reward which the maritime law holds out as an inducement to exertion on the part of those who may be so situated as to be able to render service to a ship in distress. The luck of being in a position to render assistance to a ship in distress, the maritime law makes good luck, to the end that distressed ships may receive all possible aid.

My conclusion, therefore, is that the grounds upon which the claimants have based their refusal to pay the libellants a salvage reward are untenable in view of the evidence, and that the libellants are entitled to a liberal salvage reward.

There remains, then, but to notice some features of the case in addition to those already alluded to, which, in accordance with established rules, are to be taken into account in determining the amount to be awarded.

It is said these tugs incurred no danger, inasmuch as they kept at a respectful distance from the labouring ship, so long as she was grounding on the shoal. But it was useless then to approach near her. The evidence is, that nothing could be done until the ship freed herself from the shoal. To keep out of danger until the time when exposure to danger would avail something is no fault to be blamed, but a prudence to be commended. When the ship moved the tugs did not shrink from exposure to danger; for it cannot be said that no danger was incurred when one of the tugs, in order to put men on board the ship, approached her near enough to enable the men to jump on board. Such an approach to such a large ship in such a sea required great care and skill, and could not be accomplished without danger, not only of the destruction of the tug, but also of loss of the lives of the men themselves. Nor can it be said upon the evidence that danger was not present from the time the tugs passed out of the harbour. The precautions taken on board the tugs show that the idea of peril was present.

The exertions of the salvors after the ship was safely located upon the mud in the Horse Shoe are also worthy to be considered. Their efforts did not slacken when the safety of the ship herself had been secured, but were continued and were incessant during the night, in the hope of saving the cargo from further damage, by which means the cargo was delivered much less damaged than was to have been expected.

When vessel and cargo both are saved the reward is to be increased: (Marvin on Wrecks, p. 119.) The persons, twenty-nine in all, who are entitled to share in the reward, should also be considered. The value of the tugs themselves—one being worth 9000 dol. and the other 17,000 dol.—must be taken into the account; for at more than one period of the service a breakage of the engine or of the steering gear of either tug would at once have brought her in danger of destruction. The value of the property saved is very large. The cargo, as saved, is conceded to be worth 168,700 dol.; the freight earned was 28,531 dol.; the ship herself in her damaged condition is valued by the claimants at 25,000 dol., and by the libellants at 37,000 dol. The total value saved was from 222,000 dol. to 234,000 dol.

When the amount saved is large, the reward is for that reason increased. On the other hand, it is not to be forgotten that no excessive danger to life or property was incurred by these salvors; that the services did not extend over a long period of time, being about twenty hours in duration; that all the expenses to which the salvors were put in hiring men to enable the pumping of the ship to continue without cessation have been paid by claimants; and it should also be recollected that the amount of the probable loss, if the ship had gone ashore on the beach is lessened by the fact that she was at the mouth of a great harbour, and that all appliances available to remove the cargo, and if possible get off the ship, would have been at the service of the ship early the next morning. The state of the weather made it impossible that any assistance could have reached her during the night.

In view of all the circumstances, and in accordance with the established rules applicable in such cases. I am of the opinion that the sum of 30,000 dol. is the proper reward to be given in this case.

There is one additional question of this case to be disposed of which has been raised by a petition, to be allowed salvage filed in the cause on behalf of the steamtug Cyclops, which it will be remembered was the first tug to approach the Puritan and which at the request of the master of the ship took all her crew on board and carried them to New York. It appears that on the way up the Cyclops stopped at the Coast Wrecking Company's docks, where notice of the disaster to the ship was left, and next morning took the master on board again in New York to carry him to the wreck. But on reaching Sandy Hook the ship was found on the Horse Shoe in custody of the salvors, and they accordingly returned. I see nothing in these facts to entitle the Cyclops to salvage reward, and the petition filed in her behalf must be dismissed.

I have been requested to apportion the salvage award between the respective salvors upon the evidence as it stands. and I accordingly do so. In view of the understanding come to at the time of the performance of the service, I am of the opinion that the tugs should share alike equally in the reward, and in accordance with precedent I give them one half. I am also of opinion that the two masters should share alike; that the men who went from the tugs on board the wreck should receive more than the other seamen, and that of these Hobart should receive the greatest sum, as he in some sort took the responsibility of what was done on board the wreck after he boarded it, and that the rate of wages affords a proper criterion by which to determine the relative proportions of the men. Damage to cargo—Bill of lading, "quality and quantity unknown"—Burden of proof.
A bill of lading, stating goods to have been shipped in good order and condition, but indorsed by the master with the words "quality and quantity unknown," does not admit as against the shipowner that the goods were shipped in good order and condition.

There is no rule of law by which the consignees of goods under a bill of lading, stating goods to have been shipped in good order and condition, but containing the words, "quantity and quality unknown," is bound to show that the goods were shipped in good order and condition, or fail in his suit against the shipowner for damage done to the cargo; but failing proof of the condition of the cargo when shipped, the consignee is bound to show that the damage which it sustained is traceable to causes for which the shipowner is responsible.

The Prosperino Palasso (ante, p. 158) disapproved of.

THIS was an appeal from a decree of Sir R. J. Phillimore, the learned judge of the High Court of Admiralty of England, in a cause instituted under the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, on behalf of Messrs. G. Koenig and Company, merchants, the respondents, against the vessel Ida, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and against the appellant, Giacomo Gazzolo, of Genoa, in Italy, shipowner, the owner of the Ida.

In their petition filed in the court below, the respondents alleged as follows:

1. The Ida is a vessel of which no owner or part owner was, at the time of the institution of this cause, domiciled in England and Wales.

2. In the month of Feb. 1873, Messrs. E. B. Liddell and Company, of Alexandria, caused to be shipped 6110 ardebs of cotton seed on board the said vessel, then lying in Port Said, Egypt; and the then master of the said vessel received and accepted the same, to be carried on board the said vessel from Port Said aforesaid to Hull, upon the terms of three bills of lading, by the said master, duly signed and delivered to the said Messrs. E. Liddell and Company for the said cotton seed.

3. The said three bills of lading, being in form exactly similar to one another, were and are, so far as is material to the present case, in the words, letters, and figures following, that is to say:—

"Shipped in good order and well conditioned by E. B. Liddell and Company, Alexandria, Egypt, in and upon the good ship called the Ida, whereof is master for the present voyage Ambrozio Chiappella, and now riding at anchor in the port of Port Said, Egypt, and bound for Hull, 6110 ardebs cotton seed, being marked and numbered as in the margin, and are to be delivered in the like good order and well conditioned at the aforesaid port of Hull (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature and kind soever save risk of boats so far as ships are liable thereto excepted), unto order, or to assigns, paying freight for the said goods at the rate of 19s. (say nineteen shillings) sterling in full per ton of 20 cwt. delivered, with 10*l.* gratuity. Other conditions as per charter-party, dated London, 4th Oct. 1872, with primage and average accustomed.

"In witness whereof the master or purser of the said ship hath affirmed to three bills of lading, all of this tenor and date, the one of which three bills being accomplished, the other two to stand void.

"Dated in Port Said, Egypt, 6th Feb. 1873. 100 dunnage mats. Fifteen working days remain for discharging."

4. The persons constituting the firm of Messrs. E. B. Liddell and Company are identical with the members of the plaintiffs' firm.

5. The said vessel sailed on her voyage to Hull, and duly arrived there on or about the 7th May, 1873.

6. The said cotton seed was not delivered to the plaintiffs according to the terms of the said bill of lading in as good order and condition as it was when shipped on board the said vessel at Port Said aforesaid; but, on the contrary, the same was delivered to the plaintiffs in much worse order and condition, and greatly damaged.

7. Such non-delivery as aforesaid to the plaintiffs of the said cotton seed in as good order and condition as when it was shipped, was not occasioned by any of the perils or causes in the said bills of lading excepted.

8. The plaintiffs paid to the master of the said vessel the freight and gratuity due, according to the terms of the said bills of lading, and did and were ready to do all things necessary to entitle the plaintiffs to have the said cotton seed delivered to them in as good order and condition as it was in when shipped at Port Said as aforesaid.

9. By reason of the premises the plaintiffs lost a great part of the value of the said cotton seed, and were put to great expense in and about keeping, warehousing, and improving the condition of the said cotton seed and in and about having the same surveyed.

The appellant by his answer denied that the bill of lading was so far as material in the words and figures set forth in the petition, and craved leave to refer to the said bill of lading when produced.

He further denied the truth of the 4th, 6th, 7th, and 9th articles of the petition, and alleged that the deterioration and damage, if any, to the cotton seed in the petition mentioned were occasioned by the character and quality of the cotton seed when shipped on board the Ida and by the inherent qualities of the said cotton seed, and by the dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, or by some or one of such causes, and not by any breach of contract on the part of the defendant.

The respondents filed a reply and conclusion, by which they denied generally the truth of the allegations contained in the answer, and prayed that the pleadings might be concluded.

The bill of lading, when produced, was found to contain the words, ignoro qualita è quantita.

It will be observed that the respondents did not in their petition or reply make any charge of negligence against the appellant, but at the hearing they endeavoured to make out that the damage to the cargo had been occasioned by the Ida having been improperly ballasted with sand ballast, and to her not having been properly dunnaged. Their contention was that the sand had been put on board wet, or that it had got wet in the course of the voyage, and that the natural heat of the cargo had drawn up the moisture into the cargo, and so occasioned the damage. The effect of their evidence on this point will be found fully stated in the judgment.

The only evidence attempted to be given as to the condition of the cargo when shipped was, that of one of the respondents, Mr. E. B. Liddell, who said he saw samples of the cargo.

It appeared, however, that Mr. Liddell, at the time of shipment, was at Alexandria, which is 120 miles from Port Said, where the cargo was shipped, and no evidence whatever was given to verify the alleged samples.

On the part of the appellant it was contended that the ship was properly dunnaged, and it was proved that the said ballast was dry desert sand, put on board in a perfectly dry state, and that it never had before, or whilst on board the Ida, been wetted, and they proved that of the cargoes of cotton seed arriving in this country from Port Said in the spring of 1873, a very large and unusual number arrived heated to a very extraordinary extent, and they gave evidence to prove that the Ida's cargo had been shipped imperfectly dried, or matured, or, as it is technically termed, "green."

They further proved that cotton seed, however well dried, is an article very liable to become heated even in a warehouse, and especially in the hold of a ship; and that whereas the ordinary length of voyage for a sailing ship from Port Said to England is about forty days, the Ida, owing to tempestuous weather and foul winds, was about ninety days on her voyage. The few tons of seed which were sea damaged were in the sides of the ship where she had strained in heavy weather, and not from the bottom of the hold, where it was alleged that she was insufficiently dunnaged, and where the sand ballast had been placed.

The appellants gave evidence to show that the ship was permanently dunnaged from the keelson to each of her bilges, but there was a conflict as to whether the planking called by the appellant permanent dunnage, was so or not. The learned judge made a decree by which he pronounced for the damage proceeded for, and condemned the defendant and his bail therein and in costs, and referred the question as to the amount of damage to the registrar: (see ante, p. 518.)

It is from such decree that this appeal was brought, and it was submitted that the decree appealed from ought to be reversed, for the following amongst other reasons:

1. Because upon the bill of lading, signed by the master of the Ida, the burthen of proving that the cotton seed was in good order and condition when shipped, lay upon the respondents, and they did not discharge such burthen of proof.

2. Because the appellant proved that the ship was properly dunnaged and ballasted.

3. Because the evidence negatived every cause of damage other than those suggested by the appellant, viz., the character and quality of the cotton seed when shipped, the inherent qualities of the said seed, and the dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation.

4. Because the respondents fail to prove any negligence on the part of the appellant, either by ballasting the ship with sand, or in not properly dunnaging her.

5. Because the respondents failed to prove that the heated and damaged condition of the cargo was in any way caused by, or connected with, the sand ballast, or any insufficiency in the dunnage.

6. Because the appellant proved that the heating of the cotton seed was occasioned by its not having been matured when shipped.

March 19 and 20.—Milward, Q.C. and E.O. Clarkson, for the appellants.—As the bill of lading in this case contains words meaning "quantity and quality unknown," and indorsed thereon by the master, there is no admission by the master that the cargo was shipped in good condition. The duty of showing that it was so shipped lies upon the plaintiffs, and before they can recover they must give affirmative evidence that the cargo was sound when shipped. In The Prospero Palasso (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 622; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 158), it was ruled that a plaintiff in a cause of damage to cargo must give evidence of the sound condition of the cargo when shipped before he can call upon the defendants to show that the damage was caused by any excepted peril and not by their negligence. In the present case there was no evidence whatever as to the condition of the cargo when shipped, save that of a person who was not at the place of shipment, and only saw samples afterwards. [Sir

THE IDA.

[PRIV. Co.]

R. P. COLLIER.—Would it not be sufficient for the plaintiffs to show that the damage was occasioned by some default on the part of the shipowner for which he was reasonable? We submit not; but even if it were so, the respondents have wholly failed to prove any default on the appellants' part. They omit to call the persons who actually shipped the goods, and have given no proof of damage except of such as might be fairly attributable to perils of the sea: their theory that the stowage was defective has wholly failed. The appellants' case is, that the cargo was shipped in bad condition, and became heated and damaged in consequence, and that the ship was properly dunnaged and ballasted, and that such sea damage as the cargo received resulted from the extraordinarily bad weather the ship encountered, and, consequently, from an excepted peril.

Butt, Q.C. and Cohen, Q.C., for the respondents, —There is no such duty upon plaintiffs in a cause of this description as is laid down in The Prosperino Palasso (ubi sup.). No doubt there is no admission on the face of the bill of lading of the condition of the cargo when shipped. But the plaintiffs must show some negligence on the part of the shipowner before they are entitled to recover, but there is no necessity to show the condition of the cargo at the time of shipment. We submit that the respondents have satisfied the onus upon them by showing the defective nature of the ship's dunnage, and if the damage done to the cargo can be attributed to this cause, the court should presume that the cargo has been shipped in good condition, and then the shipowner will be responsible for the injury done. The appellants' witnesses alleged that the ship was permanently dunnaged; this turns out to be wholly untrue, and, consequently we ask the court to discredit the other part of their case, which sets up that the sand ballast was in good condition and was properly laid for the cargo. It was positively shown that there was no damage by sea water, and as this damage was done to the cargo in the bottom of the hold, this in itself is enough to show the defective dunnage. The damp produced by the sea water would be absorbed by the cargo, and this was the occasion of the damage.

Milward, Q.C., in reply.

March 23.—The judgment of the court was delivered by Sir H. S. KEATING.—This was a suit brought by the shipper of the cargo against the shipowner to recover damages sustained by the cargo in consequence, as it was alleged, of improper stowage. The cargo consisted of some 700 tons of cotton seed, loaded in bulk on board the ship Ida at Port Said, in Egypt, to be delivered at Hull. The Ida left Port Said on the 7th Feb. 1873, and arrived at Hull in May, after a passage of nearly twice the usual length, in consequence of adverse winds and stormy weather. On the unloading of the cargo it was unquestionably in a very damaged condition; a great part of it had heated so much that it had become almost charred, while a comparatively small portion, some forty or fifty tons, was found in a tolerably sound condition. The case of the plaintiffs was, that this cargo was shipped in a dry and good condition at Port Said, and that it had become damaged through improper stowage. The case of the defendants was, that the cargo had been shipped in a green state, and had become heated in consequence, and that the heat had been increased by the unusual length of the voyage.

The case was heard before the learned judge of the Admiralty Court, who found generally for the plaintiffs, directing the usual inquiry as to damages. From this judgment the defendants have appealed. Undoubtedly, the question is one of fact, and their Lordships are always slow to reverse the judgment of the court below upon a pure question of fact, when that court has had the advantage, which they have not, of hearing and seeing the witnesses, unless they come to a very clear conclusion that the judgment was wrong.

It has been contended, firstly, on the part of the appellants, that the learned judge was wrong in holding, as he did, that the plaintiffs had given prima facie evidence that the cargo was in good condition at the time of its being shipped—evidence calling upon the defendants to rebut it. This was obviously a cardinal question in the cause, and this finding may be considered as, in a great degree, the foundation of the judgment. The bill of lading throws no light upon the question, the master having written across it, "ignoro qualita è quantita," thereby preventing its constituting any admission by him of the state of the cargo, as was rightly held by the learned judge. It appears that the cargo was shipped by a Mr. Miami and his clerk at Port Said, who acted there as the factors of the plaintiffs, who have two houses, one in London, the other at Alexandria. Mr. Miami and his clerk are described by the captain as having superintended the lading of the cargo, and having been constantly on board the vessel, and they must, of course, have been perfectly well acquainted with the quality of the cargo. Neither Mr. Miami nor his clerk, nor any witness from Port Said, was called by the plaintiffs, or examined by them on interrogatories; but for the purpose of proving the condition of the cargo they call Mr. Liddell, who is partner in the plaintiffs' firm, and at the time of the shipment of the cargo was residing in Alexandria, a distance of 125 miles from Port Said, and who had never seen the ship or the cargo. This gentleman, in answer to a leading question put to him by the counsel for the plaintiffs, says that, as far as he knows, the cargo when shipped was in good condition. It appears, however, that his means of knowledge consisted simply in his having been supplied, as he says, with samples of the cargo from Port Said, which samples he does not produce, saying that they had been destroyed; but he does not show, as indeed he could not, that he had examined these samples with the bulk, nor is any person called who did examine them with the bulk, nor is any evidence whatever given that the samples which this gentleman alleges that he saw, and on which he founded his opinion, whatever it may be worth, did fairly represent the cargo which was shipped. The learned judge seems to have been under some little misapprehension with respect to the evidence of this witness, for the learned judge observed: "He said, in answer to a question whether the cargo was shipped in good condition, it was; and he gave as his reason for it, that he knew it was from the samples which he had seen of it at Port Said." The learned judge would appear to be under the impression that the witness was at Port Said for some time during the loading of the vessel. That, undoubtedly, was an erroneous impression, the witness not having been nearer, as far as we know, than Alexandria. The learned judge held upon this that prima facie evidence was given that the seed was shipped in proper condition, subject, of course, to be rebutted by the evidence of the other side.

Their Lordships have come to the conclusion that the learned judge was wrong in holding that this was prima facie evidence of the seed being shipped in good condition. They are of opinion that no evidence whatever was given upon this subject.

Their Lordships collect from the report of a case which has been laid before them, The Prosperino Palasso (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 622; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 158), that, if the learned judge had come to the conclusion which their Lordships have that no evidence had been given by the plaintiffs of the condition of the cargo when shipped, he would have found for the defendants. Their Lordships cannot, indeed, suppose that the learned judge intended to lay down, as the marginal note to that case represents him, that there is a rule of law which requires that a plaintiff in such a case as this must show, in the first instance, that the goods were shipped in good order and condition, or fail in his suit. Undoubtedly there is no such rule of law. But their Lordships think that in this case, considering that the plaintiffs must have known how material it was to prove the condition of the cargo, that they abstained from calling witnesses who knew its condition and called a witness who was ignorant of it, when further it appears, from evidence uncontradicted, that a great number of cargoes arrived at this time in a heated and damaged condition from Port Said, and that this would seem to have been a bad season for seed, their Lordships think it not too much to say that there appears a good deal of reason to suspect that this seed was in a condition at the time of its being shipped which would account for its appearance when unloaded; and that the plaintiffs, having failed to show its condition on loading, were bound to give very clear and cogent evidence that the damage which it sustained was traceable to causes for which the shipowner was responsible.

The plaintiffs have endeavoured to prove this in the following manner: They put forward a theory by their witnesses which seems to have been adopted by the learned judge to this effect, viz., that sand ballast was used in this vessel, which is improper, inasmuch as it is liable to get wet and to communicate wet to the cargo; that there was no sufficient dunnage between the sand and the cargo; that the sand wetted the lower portion of the cargo; that that wet spread to other portions of it, whereby the bulk became wet and heated, and all the damage ensued. This appeared to be, as far as their Lordships are able to understand it, the original view of the case put forward by the plaintiffs. It is now, indeed, suggested by their learned counsel that this may not be quite the accurate view; that it may be that the cargo did of itself heat to some extent, being somewhat damp; that the sand below may not have been completely wet, and may not have communicated its wetness to the cargo to any great extent by contact; but that, the cargo having heated, the heat of the cargo would dry up the moisture from the sand and, thereby the damage which the cargo would otherwise sustain by its heating would be increased. Their Lordships have to observe upon this, that this view would appear to open a new subject of inquiry which has not been considered by the learned judge, namely, assuming some damage to have resulted from the defective state of the cargo when shipped, and some additional damage from the wetness of the sand, how much of the damage was due to the one cause and how much to the other. Their Lordships have no materials whatever for deciding such a question; and if there are no such materials it is entirely the fault of the plaintiffs, inasmuch as they have given no evidence of the state of the cargo when it was shipped.

But both these hypothesis assume that the sand was more or less wet, and whether it was so or not becomes a very important question, which it is necessary to determine. It seems that at the bottom of the ship on each side of the keelson, which is in itself some 17in. wide, a planking extends to about 2ft. 6in., making a kind of deck of rather more than 6ft. wide, and this deck is about 2ft. 6in. from the very bottom or lowest skin of the vessel, and that under it there is what is called a watercourse; that is to say, the water courses freely backwards and forwards from stem to stern under this deck. Some of the witnesses for the defendant called this permanent dunnage; the witnesses for the plaintiff denied that it was permanent dunnage, alleging that in order to constitute permanent dunnage it ought to have extended further towards the bilges of the vessel. It would appear that permanent dunnage is often found in steamers, but rarely, if ever, in merchant vessels, and that in English merchant vessels no approach to permanent dunnage is usually to be found. The Ida is an Italian vessel, and undoubtedly this planking of 6ft. and upwards is in the nature of permanent dunnage, and, as far as it goes, is an advantage. Above this planking, by the account of both sides, there was a layer of sand some 10in. or 15in. thick; above that sand there was, according to the evidence of the plaintiffs, only one layer of matting between it and the cargo; according to the evidence of the defendants, there was between the sand and the cargo dunnage in the shape of timber throughout the vessel, and in the middle besides. On this question there is undoubtedly a conflict of evidence; but it does not appear to their Lordships, in the view which they take of the case, to be necessary to decide on which side the evidence on this question preponderates. It may be taken that there was between the sand and the cargo at least one layer of matting.

[Their Lordships here minutely examined the evidence as to the sand put on board being sea sand or dry desert sand, and as to its having got wet during the voyage and having communicated the wetness to the cargo, and concluded that it was dry desert sand, and that it had not been wetted in the course of the voyage.]

Their Lordships have, therefore, come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs have not made out their case that the cargo suffered any damage in consequence of the wetness of the sand, or in consequence of improper stowage.

Upon the hypothesis that the cargo was originally stored in a green condition, its state on arrival is accounted for simply and naturally without having recourse to ingenious and far fetched theories. If the cargo was in a green state, as several other cargoes appear to have been which were shipped about the same time from the same port, it would naturally heat. The heating would be where it is represented to be, principally in the middle where the greatest bulk was collected, especially after a long voyage. The very top of the cargo is represented as being to some extent wet and mildewy. That would naturally result from the steam rising and becoming precipitated into water by the coldness of the deck. Some portions of the cargo, comparatively small, about the extent of which the witnesses did not quite agree, but which portions are put at the highest as between six and seven tons lying immediately on the sides of the vessel, appear to have been wetted by salt water. They stuck to the sides, they presented all the appearance of having been wetted by salt water, and they are what the witnesses called sea damaged. But these portions of the cargo were not immediately above the sand where the wettest part of the cargo might be expected to be found if the wet had been originally derived from the sand, but upon the sides of the vessel, and with respect to this there is no serious conflict of evidence. It may be here observed that the learned judge appears to have fallen into some misapprehension upon this subject, for he treats the portion of the cargo actually sea damaged as that which was at the bottom of the cargo and in contact with the sand. If that had been so, the case might have presented a somewhat different aspect; but from the evidence of several of the witnesses, more especially of Mr. Bee, the witness for the plaintiff, it is manifest that that is not so. Bee gives very distinct evidence upon this subject. He says some of the seed was wet and it was wet at the sides, and he subsequently represents the wet part as going all up the sides and to a certain extent adhering to the sides; and he says they cleared that away and took it out into baskets. The learned judge appears to have been misled by an expression which fell from one of the witnesses, Watson, who looked down into the hold of the vessel when the unloading was nearly completed, and speaks of seeing some six or seven tons lying at the bottom of the vessel which he supposes to have been there originally; but this was clearly a mistake, as appears from the evidence of Bee and of several other witnesses, and in fact from all the evidence on both sides. The damage to this small portion of the cargo is ascribed by the witnesses on both sides to small leaks which the ship had sprung when straining in heavy weather, and is not a description of damage for which the shipowner would be liable.

Under these circumstances, their Lordships have come clearly to the conclusion that the plaintiffs have failed to make out their case. They have failed to launch their case by prima facie evidence of the condition of the cargo, and they have certainly not adduced any evidence at all conclusive, or even cogent, for the purpose of showing that the damage which the cargo sustained on the voyage was due to the fault of the shipowner.

Under these circumstances, their Lordships will humbly advise her Majesty that the judgment of the court below be reversed, and the appellants must have the costs in the court below and in this appeal.

MIEBRODT v. FITZSIMON.

THE ENERGIE.

Breach of contract of carriage of goods—Charter-party—Bill of lading—Detention of cargo by master—Lien—Freight and general average, when due—Demurrage—Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), ss. 67, et seq.—Landing and warehousing goods—Stop order for excessive amount—Duty and liability of master.

Where, by a charter-party and bill of lading, freight is "to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo," the master having a lien by common law for freight and general average, and a lien by contract for demurrage, the payment of the freight and the delivery of the goods are concurrent acts in which all that is required from the owner of the cargo is readiness and willingness to pay at the time of delivery; and before paying any sum for general average, the owner of cargo is entitled to be satisfied that the amount claimed is the result of a proper adjustment; and if the owner of cargo on arrival of the ship in port, and before discharge, refuses to pay the amount claimed for freight and general average before the amount due is finally ascertained, but offers to pay a large proportion of the freight, and, there being no doubt as to his solvency, to sign an average bond for the payment of the general when ascertained, but the master, nevertheless, insists upon retaining the cargo on board ship until his lien for freight and general average is satisfied, detention by the master is not wrongful, but quære, can he impute the delay in the discharge to the owner of cargo or claim for demurrage on that ground? To justify the master of a ship in landing or warehousing a cargo under the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 67, by which it is enacted that where the owner of goods imported "fails to land and take delivery thereof, and to proceed therewith with all convenient speed" by the time named in the charter-party, &c., "the shipowner may land and unship the said goods" and warehouse them, it is not necessary that the failure of the owner of cargo should be a "wilful default" in landing, &c., but the master is at liberty to land the goods whenever the delivery of them to the owner within the proper time has been prevented by circumstances, whether the latter is or is not to blame.

The provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (ss. 67 and 68), giving power to a master to land and warehouse a cargo, and give notice of his lien to the warehouseman, enable the master to retain his lien, but do not extend it to charges not due at the time of landing, and if the master wilfully, and for the purpose of exacting from the cargo owner charges for which he has no lien, places upon the goods a stop order for an excessive amount, which the cargo owner is compelled to pay before he can obtain his goods, the landing and detention of the goods for that amount is a wrongful act, for which the owner of cargo may recover.

and, to preserve his lien for freight and general average, places on them a stop order for the amounts claimed, and one of those amounts is paid by the cargo owner, it becomes the duty of the master to reduce the stop order to the amount for which he can after such payment reasonably claim a lien, and his refusal to do so amounts to a wrongful detention of the cargo.

Semble, that a master is not liable merely because he lands and warehouses goods under a stop order for a sum in excess of the amount due to him if he bonâ fide claims a lien for that sum.

THIS was an appeal from a decree of the Court of Appeal in Chancery in Ireland, reversing a decree of the High Court of Admiralty of Ireland.

The cause was instituted in the High Court of Admiralty in Ireland, under the 37th section of the Admiralty Court (Ireland) Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 114), by James Charles Fitzsimon, merchant, of Dublin, in rem, against the ship Energie, to recover damages for breach of contract in respect of the non-delivery of certain goods belonging to the respondent (plaintiff), and carried into the port of Dublin in the Energie. An appearance was entered in the cause by Wilhelm Gustav Miedbrodt, the master of the Energie.

The respondent's (plaintiff's) petition in the High Court, alleged that on the 8th Oct. 1872, a charter-party was entered into between the owner of the Energie and one H. W. Plaw, as agent for Joseph Dowson and Co., of London, by which charter-party it was agreed that the said ship should load at Memel a full and complete cargo of fir timber, and should carry the same to Dublin and there deliver on being paid freight at the rate of 1l. per load of fifty cubic feet, calliper measure, the usual perils excepted, the freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo, the cargo to be received at the port of discharge in fourteen running days, and if she were longer detained through any act of the receivers, the captain to be paid 6l. a day demurrage for each and every day the vessel was detained over and above the stipulated laying days, the captain to have an absolute lien on cargo for all freight and demurrage. That the cargo was duly shipped by the said H. W. Plaw at Memel, and the master signed a bill of lading for the same, whereby he undertook to deliver the same at the port of Dublin (the usual perils excepted), unto order or assigns, the freight to be paid for the said goods and other conditions as per charter-party. That the said H. W. Plaw duly indorsed the said bill of lading to the plaintiff, to whom the property in the said cargo thereby passed; and that the plaintiff then was and continued to be the owner of the said cargo. That the Energie having sustained some damage during her voyage with the said cargo from Memel to Dublin, the master was obliged to cut away her masts, and the said vessel was brought into Copenhagen in a disabled condition, to be refitted, and that, to secure the expenses of the repairs effected, a bottomry bond was executed for a large amount by the said master. That after the repairs were completed, the said vessel again proceeded on her voyage, and arrived in Dublin on the 15th April 1875. That on that date the master called upon the plaintiff and informed him that there was a claim on foot of the said bottomry bond, and that until it was settled he could not deliver the cargo. That the plaintiff thereupon required the said master then to deliver the said cargo to him, and the plaintiff offered to pay the freight due for the transportation thereof, and to sign an average statement according to the usual and accustomed course of business; but the master stated that he had no such statement, and refused to deliver the cargo to the plaintiff. That subsequently to the last-mentioned interview, the said master demanded an excessive and improper amount from the plaintiff as his average contribution, and refused to deliver the cargo, though frequently required to do so by the plaintiff, until the same and freight and other charges were paid by the plaintiff. That the plaintiff tendered the amount of freight and charges properly payable by him in respect of the said cargo to the said master who declined to receive the same or to deliver the said cargo. That the plaintiff repeatedly demanded the delivery of the said cargo, and was always ready and willing to pay all sums properly payable by him, and offered and tendered the same to the master, but, notwithstanding, the master improperly and unlawfully refused to deliver the said cargo to the plaintiff, and landed and warehoused the same, and gave a notice in writing to the warehouse owners that the said cargo should remain in their hands, subject to a claim by the said master of 2200l. for charges alleged to be payable thereon, and the said notice was not thereafter withdrawn by the said master. That the plaintiff alleged the said landing and warehousing of the said cargo was wholly illegal, and that even if the same were legal, the amount claimed by the said notice was grossly in excess of all charges to which the said master was then entitled. That various offers and tenders were made by and on behalf of the plaintiff to the master in order to enable the plaintiff to obtain the said cargo, but notwithstanding the same the master refused to release the said cargo, except on terms of the plaintiff paying the said sum of 2200l., and the plaintiff had been obliged to pay and had paid the said sum to the warehouse owners to obtain the said cargo. That by reason of the aforesaid breaches of duty and breaches of contract on the part of the master of the Energie the plaintiff sustained heavy losses. And the petition concluded by praying the judge to pronounce for the damage proceeded for, and to condemn the Energie and her bail therein, and in costs, and if necessary to refer the amount of the damage to the registrar assisted by merchants.

The answer of the appellant (defendant) set out the facts at length, averred that the sum demanded for average was 1221l. 2s. 11d., and that the average statement adjusting such sum as payable by the respondent had been made up by competent average adjusters at Lloyds upon a valuation of the ship, freight, and cargo, estimated by competent parties at Copenhagen, the port of average, and that the said sum was properly due to the plaintiff in respect of the said average; that the plaintiff did not at any time tender the amount of charges and freight properly due by him in respect of the said cargo, and the defendant never at any time demanded an excessive or improper amount; that in consequence of being unable to obtain a settlement from the plaintiff, the defendant, on the 3rd May, and after the expiration of the running days named in the charter-party for the discharge of the cargo, commenced to discharge the cargo and landed the same in the Custom House Docks, being the cheapest and best place for the purpose, and a notice was given to the warehouse owners that the said goods were to remain, subject to a lien for 2200*l.* for freight and other charges, payable by the owner of the Energie, which sum of 2200*l.*, was an estimate, as near as possible, of the amount that would be due by the plaintiff when the cargo was discharged, and was not grossly in excess of all the charges to which the defendant was entitled. The answer in substance set up that the appellant had a lien for freight, general average, demurrage, and other charges which the respondent did not satisfy, and that he warehoused the cargo under a stop order for a sum sufficient to discharge this lien.

The pleadings were thereupon concluded. The cause came on for hearing before the High Court in Dec. 1873, and evidence was given on both sides. The facts proved (as given in the judgment of the Judicial Committee) were as follows:

"As to the principal facts in the cause, there is little or no dispute. The vessel was chartered at Memel on the 8th Oct. 1872 by the agent of Joseph Dawson and Co., of London, who shipped thereon a full cargo of fir timber, to be delivered at the port of Dublin under a bill of lading, dated the 6th Nov., and duly indorsed to the plaintiff, the owner of the cargo. This bill of lading describes the timber by running feet, but makes the freight payable 'as per charter-party;' and under the latter instrument freight is to be calculated 'per load of fifty cubic feet, calliper measure.' The vessel encountered severe weather in the Baltic, and had to be put into Copenhagen for repairs, for the expenses of which the master passed a bottomry bond for 2975*l.*, payable at or before the expiration of three days after the safe arrival of the ship in Dublin, and hypothecating ship, cargo, and freight. The validity of this bottomry bond is not disputed. A general average statement was adjusted, by which the sum of 1221*l.* 2*s.* 11*d.* was charged against the cargo. The ship arrived in Dublin on the 15th April 1873.

"There is some dispute as to what then took place. The plaintiff by his petition (paragraph 5) alleges that on that day the master called upon him and informed him of the claim on the foot of the bottomry bond, and that until it was settled he could not deliver the cargo. But in his evidence he says this statement in his pleading is incorrect; that the master called upon him on the 16th, and promised to commence delivery on the following day, but on the 17th refused to do so, on the ground that he had received orders from the ship's agents in London (Messrs. Hoffman and Co.) not to deliver until he should receive further directions from them, there being a charge on the cargo. The master's evidence supports the statement in the petition. Certain however it is, that on the 18th the master called on the plaintiff with a telegram of that date, received from Messrs. Hoffman and Co., which is in these words:—

"Average statement ready. Net amount due from cargo 1221*l.* 2*s.* 11*d.* Ask receivers whether they wish statement sent to Dublin or delivered here. We must have this money to pay bottomry before discharging commences." And then at least, if not before, the master seems distinctly to have claimed a right of lien on the cargo for the amount due for general average.

"The plaintiff appears to have referred this question of general average to his London agents, Messrs. Tagart, Boyson, and Slee, who submitted it to the underwriters.

"Between the 18th April and the 1st May some correspondence went on between the plaintiff and the master in Dublin and their respective agents in London. In Dublin the plaintiff writes on the 28th April to the master: 'We have got a telegram from London stating that your claim will be paid, and there is nothing to prevent your discharging our cargo, and we are ready to sign average bond, as you were told on Saturday, so we now hold you accountable for any loss sustained by us by non-delivery of the cargo.' In London, on the 29th April, Messrs. Hoffman and Co., in answer apparently to a similar application from Messrs. Tagart, Boyson, and Slee, write as follows: 'It is quite correct that Capt. Meidbrodt will not discharge until he receives our instructions, and those instructions we cannot give him until the amount due from the cargo is paid to enable us to discharge the bottomry bond, because by that document all the interests are hypothecated to the bottomry holder.'

"And on the 30th April the master writes to the plaintiff, reminding him that the days allowed by the charter-party for taking delivery of the cargo have expired, giving notice that if the conditions precedent necessary to delivery are not complied with within twenty-four hours, he will land the cargo at the risk and expense of the plaintiff, retaining his lien thereon, and claiming demurrage 'at 6*l.* per day, as per charter-party, for every day that may now elapse before cargo is out of the ship.'

"Thus matters stood on the 1st May, when Mr. Harper, a member of the firm of Hoffman and Co., arrived in Dublin. He saw the plaintiff on that day, and endeavoured to come to a settlement with him. He began by claiming, as sums for which there was a lien on the cargo, 1221*l.* 2*s.* 11*d.* for general average, and about 700*l.* for freight. The plaintiff disputed both items. Calculating the freight according to the running feet mentioned in the bill of lading, he made it only 671*l.*; and he complained that in the average statement the cargo had been valued at 2886*l.*, whereas its invoice price was but a little above 2000*l.*, and the sum for which it was insured only 2300*l.* Thereupon Mr. Harper agreed to calculate the average payable by cargo upon the last-mentioned sum, reducing its amount to 1136*l.* 2*s.* 4*d.*; and, after some further discussion, offered to release the cargo on the payment of 1800*l.* and the execution of an agreement that if he should have received too much or too little, the error should be made good to the sufferer. The plaintiff not assenting to these terms, offered to write a cheque for 1700*l.*, and afterwards increased his offer to 1750*l.*; but Mr. Harper declined to take less than the 1800*l.*, and thus, unfortunately for both parties, the negotiation went off on this question of 50*l.* more or less. If the plaintiff had paid the 1800*l.* he would have got delivery of his cargo on the payment of less than in the event proved to be actually due from him; and if the other party had taken the 1750*l.* they would have succeeded to that extent in their object of being put in funds to meet the bottomry bond, although their right to call upon the plaintiff for present payment of so large a sum, whilst the bond was outstanding and unproduced, and the precise amount of freight had not been ascertained by measurement, was questionable. Neither party, therefore, evinced much prudence in rendering this attempt to compromise abortive. It is not, however, necessary for their Lordships to say which was on this occasion the less reasonable. They have only to determine whether the master, by his subsequent acts, incurred a legal liability enforceable in this action.

"On the third May the master, notwithstanding a letter from the plaintiff of that date, offering to pay the proportion of the average falling on the cargo in full, and to give security for the freight, proceeded to discharge the cargo, and place it in the custody of the Port and Docks Board, under the 67th and 68th sections of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), putting upon it a stop order for the sum of 2200*l.* The delivery, though begun on the 3rd, was not completed until the 16th May.

"In the meantime the following correspondence took place between Messrs. Waltons, Bubb, and Walton, acting as the solicitors of the plaintiff in London, and Messrs. Hoffman and Co. The former wrote on the 5th May: 'We cannot understand that you represent both the shipowner and the bottomry bondholder, and if this is so there will be no difficulty. Please let us know how this is, and what amount you claim from the cargo on behalf of your respective clients. Our clients are quite prepared to pay the freight on delivery of the cargo, but we understand that the master, professing to act under your instructions, is refusing to deliver unless the whole freight is paid before delivery. Please see to this.' And in answer to this Messrs. Hoffman and Co., in a letter of the 6th May, after expressing their satisfaction that the matter had got into the hands of those who were capable of understanding the position of the proprietors of the cargo, and stating that the lay days having expired, and every means having been tried whilst they were running to induce the proprietors of the cargo to pay the amount due from them, the cargo was then being landed by the captain in the Custom House Docks, say, 'The claims we make upon the cargo are: First, 122*l.* 2*s.* 11*d.*, contribution to average charges, as per Messrs. Hopkin's statement' (thereby reverting to their original claim); 'secondly, 770*l.* for freight, demurrage, and landing charges; and on payment to us of these two sums we are willing to give a guarantee that shall be made satisfactory to you for the subsequent adjustment of either of the amounts by the repayment by us of any surplus if it should afterwards appear that such has been paid us.'

"Nothing appears to have come of this correspondence until the 12th May, when the claim for general average contribution was settled by a payment to Messrs. Hoffman and Co. in London of 1136*l.* 2*s.* 4*d.*, upon the terms expressed in the following receipt, which was signed by Hoffman and Co., as agents for the master and shipowners, and also as holders, or agents for holders, of the bottomry bond:

Received from Messrs. Fitzsimon and Son the sum of 1136*l.* 2*s.* 4*d.*, in full satisfaction and discharge of all claims against the cargo per Energie, for general average or special charges, as per statement of Mr. Manley Hopkins, the contributory value of the said cargo being taken at 2300*l.* instead of 2600*l.*, and also in full satisfaction and discharge of all claims against the cargo under the bottomry bond, which is to be liquidated by the shipowner.

"The plaintiff, having been advised of this payment in London through his solicitors in Dublin, on the 13th May, offered to lodge with the Port and Docks Board the full sum of 770*l.* being the amount of the claim made by the letter of the 6th May, exclusive of that for general average contribution; but this offer was expressly made under protest, for the purpose of obtaining the cargo, and with notice to the board not to part with the money lodged until the plaintiff should take necessary steps to compel the refunding of the same. The board declined to deliver the cargo until the stop order or 2200*l.* had been withdrawn, or that sum lodged.

"Upon this the plaintiff appears to have taken simultaneous action in London and in Dublin. In London, on the 14th May, Messrs. Waltons, Bubb, and Walton wrote to Messrs. Hoffman and Co. as follows: 'We have a letter from Dublin complaining that, although our clients have offered to deposit with the Port and Docks Board, or to tender under protest 770*l.* being the amount claimed by you for freight charges, &c., the board refused to deliver the cargo, on the ground that it is stopped by you for 2200*l.*, and that they can accept nothing short of that sum. For this we assume that you have not advised the payment of the general average, and we shall, therefore, be glad if you will instruct the board by wire to deliver on the 770*l.* being deposited.' Messrs. Hoffman and Co.'s answer to this communication was written on the 15th, and was in the following terms: 'In reply to your note of yesterday, we can only say that this matter must now take its course, as we fear that we are not justified in interfering now with the original stop.'

"In the meantime the plaintiff's solicitors in Dublin had served the master of the vessel, on the 14th May, with a notice in these terms:

On behalf of Messrs. James Fitzsimon and Sons, timber merchants, Dublin, we hereby require you to attend at the office of Mr. Thurgood, superintendent of the Custom House Dock, Dublin, to-morrow at twelve o'clock noon, at which time and place we shall pay you the sum of 671*l.* 10*s.* 4*d.*, being the amount due by Messrs. Fitzsimons for freight of goods brought to Dublin by the ship Energie, or such further sum as you shall show us to be due for freight only, and we shall pay such sum on your releasing the cargo of the ship Energie, so that Messrs. Fitzsimons may remove the same.

The master and Mr. George Fottrell, one of the plaintiff's solicitors, did meet at the place and time appointed. There is some discrepancy in their evidence as to what then took place. The master's statement is, 'That Mr. Fottrell had a bundle of notes in his hand. He offered me some money, but I cannot say how much. They asked me what more I wanted? I said, demurrage and expenses, and showed them the telegram from Hoffman, which I received on the 15th, telling me to take any money I could get, but not to release the cargo until the charges should be paid.' Mr. Fottrell says: 'The master said that he would be glad to receive the money, but that he would not release the cargo. He would not take the money on the terms I offered it; but he showed a telegram which he had from Hoffman in these words: Receive any money you can get, but don't release the ship.' This telegram is not produced. Looking at the evidence by the light thrown upon it by the correspondence, their Lordships have come to the conclusion that the plaintiff was willing to pay what was demanded for freight, though possibly under protest as to anything in excess of 671*l.* 10*s.* 4*d.*; and that, on the other hand the master, acting under instructions from Messrs.

PRIV. CO.]

MEIDBRODT v. FITZSIMON; THE ENERGIE.

[PRIV. CO.]

Hoffman and Co., would not release the cargo except upon payment not only of freight but of the sums claimed for demurrage and other charges; the whole probably amounting to the sum of 880*l.* 5*s.* 7*d.*, as shown by the subsequent letter of the 26th May, and the account therein referred to.

"The result was, that the interview having proved infructuous, the present action was commenced on the same day, viz., the 15th May.

"The only other facts which require mention are, that on the 21st May the plaintiff paid the 2200*l.* to the Port and Docks Board, and obtained delivery of his cargo; that at the same time he served the board with a letter, in which he admitted the sum of 701*l.* 3*s.* 3½*d.* (the then ascertained amount of freight) to be payable to the shipowners, but required them to retain the balance, pursuant to the provisions of the 72nd section of the Merchant Shipping Act; that on the 26th May the Master expressed his willingness to receive (as he afterwards received) the amount thus admitted to be due for freight, intimating, however, his intention to take proceedings against the plaintiff for the recovery of the difference between that sum and the 880*l.* 5*s.* 7*d.*, and to give the Port and Docks Board the statutory notice of the institution of such proceedings; but that ultimately, and about the 8th July, the plaintiff did receive the whole balance of the 2200*l.*, being 1498*l.* 16*s.* 8½*d.*, the shipowners having apparently determined to waive their alleged lien on the fund, and to present their remedy against the plaintiff for the additional amount claimed in an independent action."

Upon these facts the learned judge of the High Court, in a considered judgment, dismissed the suit with costs, holding that up to the 3rd May the plaintiff had a right to hold the cargo as security for the discharge of his lien for freight, general average, and demurrage, and that up to that date no payment or tender of the sums due to him on these accounts from the plaintiff had been made to the defendant, and that, considering the amounts due to the defendant, the amount with which the cargo was charged by the stop order in the hands of the Port and Docks Board, was not unreasonably excessive, and, consequently, there was no improper detention after the 3rd May; and that, under the Merchant Shipping Act 1862, the shipowner has a reasonable latitude allowed him in fixing the amount for which he stops the cargo.

From this decree the plaintiff (respondent) appealed to the Court of Appeal in Chancery in Ireland, on the following grounds:

1. Because the master of the Energie refused to deliver the said cargo to appellant unless and until he would pay moneys to which he was not liable at the time the same were so demanded.

2. Because the said master refused to deliver said cargo to appellant, and claimed to retain same under a lien for general average when no such lien existed.

3. Because the said master, when he demanded payment of the moneys demanded by him as a condition precedent to the delivery of said cargo to appellant, was not the holder of the said bottomry bond, and was not in a position to release appellant's said cargo therefrom.

4. Because the said master improperly demanded the prepayment of the freight, when same was only payable concurrently with the delivery of the said cargo.

5. Because the said master improperly and illegally landed and warehoused the said cargo.

6. Because the said master, when he landed and warehoused said cargo, placed an excessive and improper stop on the delivery of said cargo to appellant.

7. Because the stop placed upon the said cargo was retained thereon after the greater portion of the moneys, in respect of which said stop was placed thereon, had been paid.

8. Because the said master was guilty of breaches of duty and breaches of the contract contained in said charter-party and bill of lading.

May 1 and 4, 1874.—The appeal came on for hearing before the Court of Appeal in Ireland, then composed of Sir Joseph Napier, Mr. Justice Lawson, and Lord Justice Christian (the Great Seal being then in commission), and the Court having taken time to consider, the following judgments were delivered on May 13, 1874.—Sir J. Napier.—In this case the appellants are the consignees of a cargo of Memel timber under a bill of lading, duly indorsed, and a charter-party in the usual terms. The cargo was to be delivered in the port of Dublin. The charter-party bears date the 8th Oct. 1872, and the bill of lading the 6th Nov. 1872. On her voyage from Memel the ship encountered very severe weather. The masts had to be cut away; other damage was suffered, and the master put into Copenhagen for repairs. In the usual way the master passed a bottomry bond for 2975*l.*, for the purpose of obtaining the repairs. The condition of the bond was, payment of the principal sum, with the premiums due thereon, at or before the expiration of three days after the safe arrival of the ship in Dublin. By that the ship, freight, and cargo, were hypothecated to the lender to secure payment of the bond. The vessel arrived in Dublin on the 15th April 1873, and as the adjustment of general average, the master demanded a sum of 1221*l.* 2*s.* 11*d.*, and for freight a sum of 700*l.* A good deal of negotiation as to the proper amount of claim took place amongst the parties interested, and during April a gentleman named Harper came over from London, on the part of the shipowner, to settle the matter in dispute. He reduced the claim to 1136*l.*, and estimated the freight at 700*l.*, and offered to the appellant that if he would pay a sum of 1800*l.*, the cargo would be delivered to him. Mr. Harper further offered to draw up an agreement between the parties, that if the respondent had received too much or too little, the excess on the one side or the deficiency on the other should be made good. This seems to me to have been a very fair arrangement and proposal, but it was rejected by the appellant, who offered to draw a cheque for 1750*l.*, which Mr. Harper refused. On the 2nd May there was a further attempt to settle, but the appellant stood off, and refused any further negotiation. The refusal of the appellant was, in my opinion, unreasonable and profitless. Some mutual confidence is required in commercial dealings, and a selfish course usually brings on those practising it a proper penalty. Up to this point, however, I saw no reason to differ from the learned judge of the Admiralty Court, who has given a very able and carefully prepared judgment. The way in which the bottomry bond has been referred to and introduced into the case by both parties has tended to obscure and complicate the material issue. A bottomry bond is an instrument by which the master of a vessel, acting within the scope of his authority, under circumstances such as in the case of The Karnak (6 Moore P. C. C., N. S., 136), is at liberty to hypothecate the ship, freight, and cargo to the man who advances the money to the master in a foreign port for the purpose of carrying out the repairs of the ship; the bondholder under the bond acquires the right to be paid at the end of the voyage, and may attach the ship, but the owner of the ship was not made personally liable, nor has the shipowner any lien on the cargo for moneys paid under the bond. In Stainback v. Sheppard (13 C. B. 418) this subject was fully discussed and an authoritative decision given, Pollock, C.B., in his judgment, pointing out the distinction between the transfer of the property subject to the debt and lien and the hypothecation that only gave a right to be enforced in a particular way against it. The bond is not payable until the vessel arrives at the port of destination—the end of the voyage. No particular form is necessary, but the bond is valid so far as it is within the scope of the master's authority, and no further. The process is in Admiralty, where the proceeding is in rem. The usual course is to attach under process at the suit of the bondholder for whatever is due on the bond, and after the value of the ship and freight is exhausted, but not before, the cargo would be available to the bondholder for what may remain due. The course of the proceeding under the attachment process, and the amount for which the cargo is to be liable, are under the control of the court, and it is the Judge of the Admiralty who decides or not on allowing the cargo to secure the payment of the liability imposed. It is only in that way the cargo can be made liable to contribute, and there is no right of detention of the cargo to enforce contribution except that which is incident to the process of Admiralty in the proceeding of attachment, and for whatever amount the owner of the cargo may be liable to contribute he has a remedy over against the owner of the ship by way of indemnity. The latter is the person ultimately liable for the money borrowed. That was recently settled by the case of Duncan v. Benson (1 Ex. 537), and affirmed by Exchequer Chamber (3 Ex. 644). In that case it was authoritatively decided that that judgment of Lord Stowell was only an authority with respect to the power of the master to bottomry the cargo, but that it determined nothing of the relative rights of the owners of the ship and of the cargo inter se. If the cargo is hypothecated to secure the debt of the owner of the ship, the owner of the cargo has a right to be reimbursed by the owner of the ship for what he may be compelled to pay under the bond, inasmuch as that sum is considered by the law to be really the debt of the owner of the ship, but the master cannot detain the goods for the bottomry debt for the debt to the bottomry creditor. He is not authorised to do that, but he may detain for freight if not attached under Admiralty process and for general average. But that is wholly different from a bottomry debt: it is a claim which the shipowner has against the owner of the cargo, whereas there is no such claim on the bond. The Chief Baron (Pollock), in Duncan v. Benson, delivering the judgment of the Exchequer, said: "The owner of the goods is under no obligation to contribute to any expense except such as constitute a general average, and that of the repairs in this particular case does not fall under that description." What is "general average" for which there is a debt upon the owner of the goods is stated in Simmonds v. White (2 B. & C. 311), where the Chief Justice says: "The principle of general average, namely, that all whose property has been saved by the sacrifice of the property of another shall contribute to make good his loss, is of very ancient date, and of universal reception among commercial nations. The obligation to contribute, therefore, depends not so much upon the terms of any particular instrument, as upon a general rule of maritime law. There are, however, many variations in the laws and usages of different nations as to the losses that are considered to fall within this principle. But in one point all agree, namely, the place at which the average shall be adjusted, which is the place of the ship's destination or delivery of her cargo." As to the lien for general average, it was decided in Cargo ex Galam (9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 550; 2 Moore P. C., N. S., 32; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 408), that the Court of Admiralty was bound to recognise it as a clear legal right; and it was not allowed to impair or prejudice in any way the security of the bondholder, but as between the shipowner and the owner of the cargo, the case is entirely different, and no better or more instructive illustration can be given of the importance in dealing with a case of looking at what is the precise issue between the parties than the case of Duncan v. Benson (ubi sup.), which decides that the shipowner is the man really responsible for the money raised for the repairs, and that only a portion of that can properly be called general average is what goes to save the ship and all the cargo, and this rests on the universal principle that all whose property is saved by the expenditure must be held to contribute to the expenditure. But the shipowner is the man really responsible, and can only recoup himself from the owner of the cargo. Therefore the parties treat the case as one for the amount of freight and general average. It may be that the average included expenditure for repairs that ought not to be called for as contribution for general average; however that may be, I have no means of correcting it. We must treat the case as if no distinction arose, and as if the adjustment made was for general average properly so called, and that there was some little difference as to the proper amount which was tried to be settled by Mr. Harper up to the 3rd May. Now, up to this point, I see no reason whatever to differ from the views taken by the learned Judge of Admiralty; but with the greatest possible respect to him, from the 3rd May—after the refusal of the appellant to settle—we must part company. The master of the ship began to discharge the cargo and place it in the custody of the Port and Docks Board, under the 6th and 7th sections of the Merchant Shipping Act, for the sum due. The appellant wrote a letter to the master, in which he stated that he was prepared to pay the full proportion of average, and lodge security for the freight. No tender, however, was made to the master, who proceeded to discharge the cargo and lodge it with the Port and Docks Board, upon whom a notice was served that they should detain the cargo until appellants paid a sum of 2200*l.* for freight and average. On the 12th May appellant paid to the shipowner a sum of 1136*l.* in settlement of the average contribution, but the board refused to take it into account with respect to the stop order, for they don't involve themselves, and very properly, in any matter of dispute between parties, leaving them to settle as they may, and only requiring to be paid the amount of the order lodged with them. On the 21st May the sum of 2200*l.* was lodged with the Port and Docks Board by the solicitor of the appellant, and the latter gave notice, admitting that the sum due for freight was 701*l.* Now that was a complete admission of the propriety of Mr. Harper's proposal, and of its fairness, that 1100*l.* should be paid for average, and 700*l.* for freight; and I must say, that but for the perverse refusal to agree to that fair proposition, the whole of this trouble and expense would have been saved. It only showed how unwise it is to stand out on selfish views, and not at once fairly and frankly to meet a proposition that left no difficulty, to pay a certain sum, leaving the deficiency or the excess to be adjusted subsequently. That was refused, and I must say I think the refusal was very perverse. But the appellant could not get his cargo without paying the sum of 2200*l.* After paying that amount to the Port and Docks Board he got possession of the cargo. He could not get it without that full payment after the lodgment of the cargo with the stop order upon it. In my opinion this was undoubtedly wrong, unless that sum of 2200*l.* was due and payable on the 3rd May, for general average and for freight, and for such demurrage as there was a right under the charter-party to demand. Now no explanation has been given that does not leave some excess beyond the legal limit that could be demanded, be it more or less. It appears to me that there was a sum of between 300*l.* and 400*l.* too much in that stop order, a sum which had no right to be added in, and for which there was no lien. 1800*l.* was the sum demanded, and then there might be some two or three days' demurrage, which the party might be compelled to pay to get his goods delivered. But nothing could take them out of the custody of the Port and Docks Board except a payment of 2200*l.* After the 3rd May the owner of the cargo could not send in any claim for delivery, except on payment of that sum, that was the effect of the stop order. In that respect the detention of the cargo must be treated as the act or rather the default of the master, in placing the cargo in such custody and subject to such a charge, and consequently he must be held responsible for the unlawful detention—unlawful because the stop order included more than he had a right to get from the owner of the cargo, the unlawful detention being a breach of duty on the part of the master. I may add that common law would give an action in the case. There was a case bearing on the point in the reports of the tribunal where after all was to be found the best principles and authorities, and the best instruction—the House of Lords: (Somes v. The British Imperial Shipping Company, 8 H. of L. Cas. 338.) There the vessel was repaired, and there was a lien on the vessel for the charge. A dispute arose about the amount, and the vessel was detained. Then came the question whether any charge was to be made for the possession under the detention, whether that was to be added to the lien. In the Queen's Bench, Mr. Justice Blackburn laid down the principle that where possession is retained for the purpose of preserving the lien the expense cannot be charged unless there is a special contract, because the lien is for the benefit, not of the owner of the goods but of the party who says he has the lien on them, and he detains them at his own expense; (see Ell. Bl. & Ell. 353.) Lord Cranworth, in the House of Lords judgment, says a wrong was done when the ship was seized, and it was said it would not be given up until the party paid something ultra that which he was bound to pay. And Lord Wensleydale said: "They became wrongdoers by that act. I am clearly of opinion that they made a demand in this case which they had no right to make for keeping possession of the ship till this charge for dock hire was paid. They have by that means obtained money which they had no right to obtain, and consequently an action for money had and received will lie, and the shipowners are entitled to a verdict." Now, in this case there was a wrongful act from the time the improper sum was sought to be levied, and we think it is clear that that dates from the 3rd May. Before that no distinction was made by separating the portion due for general average, under the bond and for freight. Before this 1800*l.* was demanded from the appellant, and he refused to give so much. Then the stop order is put on for 2200*l.*, which sum the owner of the cargo had to pay before he could get out the goods. If the appellant tendered the 1800*l.* after the stop order was put on he could not get the cargo. If he tendered something more than that he could not get it. The amount added on was between 300*l.* and 400*l.* The owner had the option of abandoning his right to the cargo or paying the excessive sum, and to put him into that position was a breach of duty for which the master is responsible to the owner. The judgment of the court below must therefore be set aside, and judgment given here for the appellant. In the case of The Freedom (24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 452; L. Rep. 3 P. C. 594; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 28), the court held that the proper practice was to refer the case back to the officer of the Court of Admiralty, who would be assisted by mercantile assessors to estimate the damages incurred by the detention, taking all proper circumstances into account. In this case the detention will date from the 3rd May till the 21st May, and for that time the damages will be fixed; the appellant to get costs of the proceedings under the petition, but no costs of this appeal. He is entitled to costs below up to judgment. The case is of some importance, and I think that these mercantile people, by the exercise of good sense, could have avoided all this. The case has been complicated by the confusion of mixing up the claims for general average, and upon the bottomry bond, as to which the rights are different. Under the latter the ship may be attached; then the freight and then the cargo, but the latter only in case it becomes necessary to complete the payment of the bondholder, and then the owner of the cargo has his remedy over against the owner of the ship for his share of it. The case must go back to the Admiralty Court to assess the damages.

Mr. Justice Lawson.—In agreeing in the conclusion at which Sir Joseph Napier has arrived, I wish to say that I give no opinion on the several questions that have been raised with respect to the original rights of these parties. I rest my judgment on the transaction of the 3rd May. On the 1st May there was an interview between Mr. Harper and Mr. Fitzsimon, and the parties were nearly coming to an arrangement, on the one side 1750*l.*

The refusal of a master to deliver dispenses with the necessity for a tender :

Kerford v. Mandel, 28 L. J. 303, Ex. ;
Scarff v. Morgan, 4. M. & W. 270.

A master has no lien for demurrage occasioned by his own refusal to deliver, even when such refusal is for the purpose of preserving his lien for other charges.

Oohen, Q.C., in reply, cited
Cargo ex Galam, 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 550; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 408.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 24, 1875.—The judgment of the court was delivered by

Sir MONTAGUE E. SMITH.—The question on this appeal is, whether the respondent (the plaintiff in the cause and the owner of the cargo) has established a good cause of action against the appellant (the master of the ship Energie) for breach of duty or of contract in relation to the delivery of the cargo. The Judge of the High Court of Admiralty in Ireland held that he had failed to do so, and dismissed his suit. The Court of Appeal in Chancery in Ireland, to which, subject to a final appeal to Her Majesty in Council, an appeal from the Court of Admiralty lies, reversed that decision, maintained the action, and remitted the case to the court below for the purpose of ascertaining the damages. The present appeal is against that judgment. As to the principal facts in the cause, there is little or no dispute. [His Lordship then stated the facts as given above.]

It is now to be considered upon what ground, if any, the present action is maintainable.

The judgment of the Court of Admiralty has found, and that of the Appellate Court assumes, that up to the 3rd May the master was acting within his strict legal rights. Their Lordships do not dissent from that conclusion.

The argument, however, that was addressed to them on behalf of the respondent makes it desirable to consider briefly what those rights were. That the master had, by Common Law, a lien for freight and general average contribution, and, by contract, a lien for demurrage upon the cargo, was not and could not have been successfully disputed. The freight, however, was not payable before delivery, and could only be ascertained by measurement upon delivery. The case, therefore, was one of those in which the payment of the freight and the delivery of the goods are concurrent acts, in which, as is shown by the case of Paynter v. James (L. Rep. 2 C. P. 348; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 76), all that is required from the owner of the cargo is readiness and willingness to pay at the time of delivery, and in which a settlement can hardly be practically effected without some mutual trust and accommodation. In such circumstances the offer to pay so large a proportion of the freight as 650*l.*, before breaking bulk, was not unreasonable.

Again, before paying the sum demanded for average, the plaintiff had a right to be satisfied that it was the result of a proper adjustment. He did not himself see the average statement before the 1st May, though it had been in the hands of his London agents on the 18th April, when it was forwarded by them to the underwriters. There seems to have been a bona fide dispute as to the principle of the adjustment, which the subsequent conduct of the shipowners shows to have been at least questionable. He had, moreover, fair grounds for declining to pay the average contribution, until he was satisfied that no claim would be made by the bottomry bondholder against the cargo. And of this he had no assurance before the 3rd, if before the 6th of May. He offered at least, as early as the 28th April, to sign an average bond, which, there being no doubt of his solvency, it would have been but reasonable in the shipowners to accept. It is true that their object was to get cash in order to pay the bondholder. But the owner of cargo is under no obligation to put the shipowners in funds to meet a debt for which they are primarily liable.

Hence it appears to their Lordships that the detention of the cargo by the master up to the 3rd May, though not wrongful, was an act done in the rigid exercise of his rights; and that it is fairly open to argument whether, if he chose to detain the cargo under the circumstances above stated, he could impute the delay in its discharge thereby caused to the plaintiff, or make that a ground for a claim for demurrage. It does not, however, seem to them to be necessary for the determination of this case, to consider whether the lien for demurrage, which was once claimed, but finally waived, ever existed; and they abstain the more willingly from expressing an opinion upon this point, because the claim for demurrage is said to be now sub judice in another forum.

The judgment under appeal has found that there was a wrongful detention of the cargo on and after the 3rd May, and that a right of action then accrued to the plaintiff by reason of the delivery to the Port and Docks Board, begun on that day, under a stop order for the excessive sum of 2200*l.*

In support of this judgment it has been argued that the delivery to the Port and Docks Board, of itself and irrespectively of the sum specified in the stop order was wrongful, inasmuch as the plaintiff had not "failed to land and take delivery" of his goods within the meaning of the 67th section of The Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act. Their Lordships, however, cannot assent to this proposition. They conceive that the word "failed" need not be taken to imply wilful default in the cargo owner; but that, upon the true construction of the section, the shipowner is at liberty to land the goods under it, whenever the delivery of them to the owner within the proper time has been prevented by the force of circumstances, whether the latter is or is not to blame. They think that this construction is fortified by some of the provisions of the section which, in certain cases, throw the risk and expense of the landing upon the shipowner.

On the other hand it was argued against the judgment that it implies, if it does not expressly, that the master is liable to an action for damages whenever he lands under a stop order for a sum in excess, no matter how slightly in excess, of the amount due to him. Their Lordships do not so read the judgment. The proposition said to be involved in it is not necessary to support it, and seems to be inconsistent with the 72nd section of the statute, which assumes that the master in some cases may bona fide have claimed a lien for more than was really due to him.

The provisions of the statute which relate to this question are obviously designed both to give the master the means of discharging the cargo,

Priv. Co.]

THE FANNY M. CARVILL.

retaining his lien, and to give the cargo owner the means of obtaining his goods by the deposit of a sum sufficient to cover the master's claim. But they do not extend the lien. The lien for the warehouse rent and charges occasioned by a landing, under the 67th section, is another and distinct lien created by the 76th section. The words of the 68th clause are: "If the shipowner gives to the warehouse owner notice in writing that the goods are to remain, subject to a lien for freight or other charges payable to the shipowner, to an amount to be mentioned in such notice, the goods so landed shall, in the hands of the warehouse owner, continue liable to the same lien, if any, for such charges as they were subject to before the landing thereof." If, then, the master wilfully inserts in his notice a sum which he knows to be in excess of that for which he had a lien before delivery, he not only injuriously affects the cargo owner by compelling him to deposit more than the statute requires in order to release his goods, but intends to produce that result by duress of the goods; and thus the delivery to the warehouse keeper is tantamount to a wrongful detention of the goods, and, as such, an actionable breach of duty. In the present case, the sum inserted in the notice was manifestly and grossly in excess of that for which the master could bonâ fide claim a lien. The outside sum claimed so late as the 6th May was 1991*l.* 2*s.* 11*d.*, being 1221*l.* 2*s.* 11*d.* for general average, and 770*l.* for freight, demurrage, and landing charges. On the 21st May the latter item had been swollen to 830*l.* 5*s.* 7*d.*, but the average claim had then been settled by the payment of 1136*l.* 2*s.* 4*d.*; and even if the sum of 830*l.* had been present to the mind of the master on the 3rd May as the amount claimable, in addition to the larger sum claimed for average, the aggregate of the two would have fallen short of 2200*l.* by 150*l.*

It was, however, argued that the mere insertion of an excessive sum in the notice is not actionable, because the statute gives to the cargo owner, by the 69th section, the means of releasing his goods otherwise than by a deposit of the sum specified in the notice; viz., by obtaining from the shipowner either a receipt for the amount claimed as due, or a release of freight. But upon the hypothesis that the goods are wrongfully detained by the shipowner for an excessive demand, it is not to be assumed in his favour that he would give such a receipt or release upon the offer of a less sum than that demanded; and a payment to the shipowner under protest would put the cargo owner in a worse position than he would be in by the deposit of the sum claimed by the shipowner; since, in the latter case, the shipowner would have to establish his claim ultra the amount admitted by proceedings under the 72nd section; whereas, in an action for money had and received, the burthen of proof would be on the plaintiff, the cargo owner.

The evidence, moreover, in this case shows that the plaintiff did his best to obtain his timber under the 69th section. He actually paid the average; he was ready and willing to pay, though under protest the whole amount demanded for freight; but the master, under the instructions of Hoffmann and Co., refused to release the cargo upon any terms, or at all events upon any terms short of the payment of the 830*l.*; which, besides the amount claimed for demurrage, included items for which it is clear that the master when he landed the cargo had no lien. The plaintiff, therefore, was driven to make the deposit of 2200*l.* by the determination of the shipowners to use the stop order as the means of exacting the payment of charges for which they had no lien.

Their Lordships are of opinion that, from the evidence in the cause, the Appellate Court might fairly infer that it was with this object and intention that the excessive amount was originally inserted in the stop order, and, consequently, that the landing and detention of the cargo under that stop order was a wrongful act, which gave the plaintiff a right of action as from the 3rd May.

Had their Lordships been of a different opinion, the result would only have affected the date from which the wrongful detention is to be reckoned; for they entertain no doubt that the plaintiff had a good cause of action on the 15th May, the date of action brought. After the settlement of the claim for average by actual payment, it was clearly the duty of the master, and of the London agents for the ship, to reduce the stop order to the amount for which they then had, or could reasonably claim, a lien.

This they refused to do; they refused either to release the goods or to reduce the stop order upon the receipt of the freight, which the plaintiff, on the 15th May, was ready and willing to pay.

That this would have given to the plaintiff a right of action, if he had not one before, their Lordships have felt no doubt, but for the reason above stated they are of opinion that the judgment of the Appellate Court in Ireland was correct in finding that the right of action was complete on the 3rd May.

Upon the point taken, to the effect that the plaintiff being entitled at most to nominal damages, the remand to the Admiralty Court is improper, it is sufficient to say that it is premature to say that the damages, though they may be small, will not be substantial. Their Lordships, will, therefore, humbly advise Her Majesty to affirm the judgment under appeal, and to dismiss this appeal with costs.

Collision—Breach of regulations for preventing collision—Light—Screens—Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 85), s. 17—Construction.

To render a ship liable to be deemed in fault under the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, sect. 17, for an infringement of the regulations for preventing collisions, the infringement must be one having some possible connection with the collision in question; a mere infringement, which by no possibility could have anything to do with the collision, will not render the ship liable.

A ship carrying her side lights, with screens shorter than required by the regulations, is not to be deemed in fault if the shortness of the screens could not by any possibility have contributed to the collision.

[Priv. Co.]

THE FANNY M. CARVILL.

[Priv. Co.]

Semble, that the peculiar build of a ship requiring her side light screens to be shorter than provided in the regulations, is not a "circumstance of the case making a departure from the regulation necessary," within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, sect. 17.

THIS is an appeal from a decree of the Right Hon. Sir R. J. Phillimore, Judge of the High Court of Admiralty of England, in a cause of damage lately pending in that court, brought by the respondents as the owners of a barque called the Peru, and the owners of the cargo lately laden on board her, against the barque Fanny M. Carvill, of which the appellants were owners, for the recovery of damages in respect of losses occasioned to the respondents by reason of a collision between the said vessels.

The collision happened between 9 p.m. and 10 p.m. on the 18th Nov. 1874, in the English Channel, about fifteen miles off Beachy Head.

The Peru, which is a Swedish barque of 589 tons register, was prosecuting a voyage from the Tyne to Monte Video with a cargo of coals. The Fanny M. Carvill, which is a British barque of 592 tons register, was on a voyage from London to Barcelona with a cargo of deals.

The case on behalf of the Peru was that she was sailing close hauled by the wind on the starboard tack, heading about S.W., making about three knots an hour, with the wind about W.N.W., and the weather fine, clear, and moonlight, and that she had a red light on her port side and a green light on her starboard side, both burning brightly, and that whilst so proceeding the green light of the Fanny M. Carvill, which vessel was on the port tack, was seen at the distance of about one mile and a half from the Peru, bearing about two points on the port or lee bow, that the Peru was kept close hauled by the wind on the starboard tack, but that the Fanny M. Carvill approached, and though loudly hailed, ran into and struck the Peru on her port side. The respondents attributed blame to the Fanny M. Carvill, which was the port tacked vessel, for not keeping out of the way of the Peru, the close-hauled starboard-tacked vessel.

The case set up by the appellants was that the red light of the Peru was seen bearing four points on the starboard bow of the Fanny M. Carvill, distance about two miles, and that almost immediately afterwards the green light of the Peru came into view, and that the Peru continued to approach showing both lights broad on the starboard bow of the Fanny M. Carvill, that in about ten minutes the Fanny M. Carvill showed a flash light, and shortly afterwards the red light of the Peru was shut in and the two vessels would have passed clear, starboard side to starboard side, but that the Peru shut in her green light and again opened her red light, causing immediate danger of collision, that thereupon the helm of the Fanny M. Carvill was put hard aport and her mainyard squared, but that she was unable to clear the Peru, and with the bluff of her port bow struck the Peru on her port side amidships. The appellants charged the Peru first with having neglected to keep a good look-out; secondly, with having neglected to keep her course; thirdly, with having her lights improperly fixed and screened, and they attributed the collision to such alleged acts of neglect, and they further alleged that the Peru was in fault within the true intent and meaning of the 17th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, for infringing the regulations for preventing collisions at sea by neglecting to carry proper side lights.

The cause was heard on oral evidence before the learned Judge of the court below, assisted by two of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity Corporation. It then appeared that the screens of the lights of the Peru fell short of the regulation length by nearly one foot, but no other complaint was made against the lights. The appellants alleged that, in consequence of the shortness of the screens, the green light of the Peru was seen across her port bow. The evidence as to the position of the lights and the other facts will be found in the report of the case below (32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 129, 134; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 478, 483).

The learned judge of the court below, after hearing the evidence and consulting with the Elder Brethren, came to the conclusion that the story told by the witnesses from the Peru was true, and that that told by the witnesses from the Fanny M. Carvill was untrue, and that the deficiency in the length of the screens of the lights of the Peru did not, in fact, in any way contribute to the collision; but he reserved his judgment as to whether, owing to such deficiency, the Peru must also be held to blame under the said statute. The learned judge subsequently gave judgment upon this point in favour of the Peru, and made the usual decree, pronouncing for the damage proceeded for with costs. The judgments of the court below will be found: (32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 135; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 485). From the decree so made the owners of the Fanny M. Carvill appealed for the following, amongst other, reasons:

1. That on the evidence taken in the court below, the collision was solely attributable to the negligence and improper navigation of those on board the Peru.
 2. That the collision was in no way occasioned by any negligence or improper conduct of those on board the Fanny M. Carvill.
 3. That on the evidence the side lights of the Peru were improperly screened, allowing the green light to show across her bow.
 4. That on the evidence those on board the Fanny M. Carvill were misled by the improper exhibition of the lights on board the Peru.
 5. That on the evidence it is clear that the collision was occasioned by the improper exhibition of the green light of the Peru.
 6. That the finding of the learned judge that the green light of the Peru was not seen across the bow of the Peru by those on board the Fanny M. Carvill is not warranted by the evidence in the cause.
 7. That the evidence established that the green light must have been and was seen across the bows of the Peru by those on board the Fanny M. Carvill.
 8. That the learned judge should have found the Peru in fault within the meaning of 17th section of the 36 & 37 Vict. c. 85, on the ground of the improper condition of her side lights.
 9. That upon the evidence given at the hearing of the cause, the circumstances of the case were not such as to make a departure from the regulation as to side lights necessary.
- April 29. — Butt, Q.C. and R. Webster for the appellants.—We submit, first, that the facts show that the Peru altered her course; secondly, she showed her green light, and so brought about the collision; thirdly, that even if she did not show her green light, the lights were not screened in accordance with the regulations, and that under 36 and 37 Vict. c. 85, s. 17, she must be held to blame; fourthly, that even if the judgment in the court below is right, the lights were so screened that they could by possibility have contributed to the collision, and that consequently upon that construction of the statute the Peru must be held to blame. As to the construction of the statute we submit that it is so worded that an infringement of the regulations, even if it does not, and cannot, in any way contribute to a collision, renders the ship infringing liable for the collision. In the present case it is clearly established that the screens were too short, which is an infringement of Art. 3 (d) and Art. 5 of the regulations for preventing collisions, and is consequently an infringement within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, sect. 17; that section expressly enacts, if such a regulation "has been infringed, the ship by which such regulation has been infringed, shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made departure from the regulation necessary." Before the passing of this Act a departure from the rules must have contributed to the collision before the ship infringing could be deemed in fault. Hence it is to be presumed that the Legislature intended some change. The judgment of the court below says that the infringement meant by the last Act must be "an infringement material to the case, and by possibility causing or contributing to" the collision. But with submission, that is not the plain meaning of the words which clearly include every infringement, whether causing, or contributing, or not, and this construction has already been put upon the statute in the Hibernia (31 L. T. Rep., N. S., 805; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 454), where it was held that in every case of collision the questions for the court to inquire into were, first, if the regulations had been infringed, and, secondly, if the circumstances had rendered a departure from those regulations necessary.

Milward, Q.C., and E. C. Clarkson, for the respondent.—We submit that, as the facts were found in our favour in the court below, which proceeded entirely on the credibility of evidence, the finding ought not to be disturbed. On the question of law, we submit, first, that there was a substantial compliance with the regulations. The Regulations Art. 3 (b and c) require the lights to be so placed that they cannot be seen across the bows, and so long as this is complied with there is no infringement; Art. 3 (d) is merely subsidiary to Arts. 3 (b and c), and only points out the mode of carrying them out, and so long as the object is effected the mere length of the screens is unimportant. Secondly, the circumstances rendered a departure from the rule necessary. The lights were placed on the round of the ship's bows, the only available place; if the screen had been longer the lights would have been washed out by the sea; if the position had been altered the lights would have been obscured. [Sir R. P. COLLIER.—You can't support that proposition. If your ship is of such a construction that she cannot comply with the regulation, she ought to be altered so as to make compliance possible. Sir MONTAGUE SMITH.—A departure from the regulations is not necessary if occasioned by something under the shipowner's own control.] Thirdly, the defect in the screens could not by any possibility have contributed to the collision, and hence under the true meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 the Peru cannot be deemed in fault; the lights of the Peru could not possibly have been seen across her bows. Fourthly, the Peru is a foreign ship, and if the statute is to be construed, as contended for by the appellant, it cannot be applied to a foreign ship. A British Act of Parliament cannot be binding upon a foreign vessel upon the high seas.

Butt, Q.C., in reply.—The Peru is seeking to recover against the *Fanny M. Cur. adv. vult.

June 9.—The judgment of the court was delivered by Sir JAMES W. COLVILLE.—This is a case of collision between the American barque the Fanny M. Carvill, and the Swedish barque Peru. The undisputed facts of the case are that the collision took place about half-past nine of the evening of the 18th Nov. 1874, some fourteen or fifteen miles off Beachy Head; that both vessels were beating down Channel close hauled against a westerly wind, and were crossing so as to involve risk of collision; that the Fanny M. Carvill was on the port, and the Peru on the starboard tack, and accordingly that it was the duty of the former to get out of the way of the latter, and the duty of the latter to keep her course.

Of the case made by the appellants in order to excuse the failure of the Fanny M. Carvill to keep out of the way of the Peru, and to cast the responsibility of having caused the collision wholly or partially on the latter, the material allegations are that those on board the Peru improperly neglected to keep their course, and that the lights of the Peru were improperly fixed and screened.

The principal witness in support of this defence was Martin Scheringer, the mate of the Fanny M. Carvill, and the officer of the watch at the time of the collision. His testimony is, that when the Peru was first sighted he saw her red light; that he knew she must be beating down Channel, close hauled on the starboard tack, and that it was his duty to keep out of her way; but that before he took, or could take any means towards that end, she opened her green light, and continued to show both her lights for ten minutes; that, inferring from this that she was bearing away, he kept his own course, after showing a flash light in order to make the other vessel give him a free berth; but that she, after having apparently kept away at least two points, ultimately luffed four points, with her sails aback and shivering, shutting out by the last manœuvre the green light; and this caused the collision.

[Priv. Co.]

THE FANNY M. CARVILL.

[Priv. Co.]

Their lordships must remark on this evidence that it is inconsistent with any theory except an actual deviation from her course on the part of the Peru. If, as is now suggested, the improper length of the screen would account for the fact that the green light was seen by those on board the Fanny M. Carvill, although the Peru may have kept her course, it would not account for what the mate has sworn touching her luffing and the appearances of her sails.

It is therefore material to come to a clear conclusion upon the question whether the Peru did, in fact, keep her course. That she did so their lordships have no doubt. The learned judge of the Court of Admiralty, upon the conflicting evidence before him, has found in terms:—"That the Peru, a starboard tacked vessel, continued on her course without alteration up to the time of the collision; that it is untrue, as stated by the witnesses on the part of the Fanny M. Carvill, that the Peru ever came right up into the wind two and a half points with her sails flat aback." There is nothing in the case to induce their lordships to doubt the correctness of this finding, which is materially confirmed by the fact that, in the first instance, the master of the Fanny M. Carvill has so little faith in the account given by his own officer, that he openly threw the blame of the collision upon him, and would, under legal advice, have admitted his liability had it not been ascertained that the screens of the Peru's lights were of less than the prescribed length. And accordingly, the learned counsel who argued the appeal have faintly, if at all, contended that the Peru did, in fact, alter her course, and have chiefly directed their arguments to show that the green light was, by means of the defect in the screen, visible to those on board the Fanny M. Carvill; was, in fact, seen by them; and, therefore, naturally gave rise to the inference that the Peru was bearing away.

To this defence, as to that founded on an actual deviation by the Peru from her course, it is essential to establish that the green light was, in fact, seen by those on board the Fanny M. Carvill across the bows of the Peru. Upon this point there is the direct evidence of the mate and look-out man, who, having been disbelieved upon other points, cannot be treated as trustworthy witnesses. Their evidence on this point, however, is in some degree corroborated by that of the captain, the surveyors for the Board of Trade, and the other witnesses who were called to prove that the green light might be seen across the bows of the Peru.

On the other hand, there was a considerable body of testimony to the contrary, and the learned judge of the Admiralty Court, upon this conflict of evidence, has found as a fact that the green light of the Peru was not seen across the bows of the Peru by those on board the Fanny M. Carvill; and, therefore, could not have contributed to the collision.

Their lordships are so far from dissenting from this finding, that they are prepared to go beyond what is directly expressed by it, and to hold upon the evidence before them, and for the reasons next to be stated, that in the circumstances in which these vessels were placed, the green light of the Peru could not by any possibility have been seen by those on board the Fanny M. Carvill. The vessels, though on opposite tacks, were both close hauled, and may be assumed to have been sailing within six points of the wind, whether the direction of that was west, or two points to the north of west.

This being so, their lordships are of opinion that each must first have seen the other as stated by those on board the Peru about two points on her own lee bow. For if the bearing of the Peru, when first sighted by the Fanny M. Carvill, was four or even three points on the lee bow of the latter, as stated by her mate, it is difficult to see how the two vessels, sailing as they were sailing, and each keeping her course, could ever have come in collision. Now their lordships are satisfied that the green light of the Peru could not have been visible two points over her port bow, if the screen projected, as it is proved to have projected, considerably more than one foot from the position of the light in a direction parallel to the keel. For these reasons, as well as upon the direct evidence in the cause, they have come to the conclusion, in which they are confirmed by their assessors, that the green light of the Peru not only was not, but could not by possibility have been seen by those on board the other vessel; and, accordingly, that the defect in her screens neither did, nor could have contributed to the collision. This conclusion was probably intended to be implied, though it is not in terms expressed, in the finding of the Court of Admiralty.

These being the facts of the case, it follows that the Fanny M. Carvill, which failed to keep out of the way of the Peru, must be pronounced solely to blame for the collision, unless by force of the 17th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1873 (36 and 37 Vict. c. 85), as construed in the recent case of The Eibernia (ante, p. 454), the Peru is to be deemed to be also in fault; although the particular infringement of the sailing rules imputed to her neither did, nor could by possibility, have contributed to the accident.

The words of the statute are, "If, in any case of collision, it is proved to the court before which the case is tried, that any of the regulations for preventing collisions contained in, or made under the Merchant Shipping Acts 1854 to 1873, have been infringed, the ship by which such regulation has been infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case make a departure from the regulations necessary."

The alleged infringement is of that part of Article 3 of the sailing Rules which prescribes that "the green and red side lights shall be fitted with in-board screens, projecting at least three feet forward from the light, so as to prevent these lights from being seen across the bow." The screen of the Peru is shown to have been nearly a foot (about 11 inches) short of the prescribed length. It must be assumed that those under whose advice the rule was framed considered that a length of 3ft. was necessary in order to prevent the light from being seen, under any circumstances whatever, across the bow. And there is evidence in the cause, independent of that of the discredited witnesses, to show that, under some circumstances, the green light might be perceptible across the bow. Their Lordships, therefore, notwithstanding their conviction that the green light could not have been seen more than a very few degrees (if at all) across the bow of the Peru, will assume that there was an infringement of the regulation within the meaning of the statute. And it has certainly not been shown that the circumstances of the case made a departure from the regulation necessary.

THE FANNY M. CARVILL.

[Priv. Co.]

In construing the clause in question, it is to be observed that the Act of 1873 did not repeal, nor was it a substitute for, the Merchant Shipping Acts of 1854 and 1862. On the contrary, its 2nd section declares that it is to be construed as one with them. Now, the 298th section of the Act of 1854, and the 29th section of the Act of 1862, provides each that in certain cases of infringement of the sailing regulations those guilty of the infringement shall incur certain consequences. But each contains the qualification that the collision shall appear to the court to have been occasioned by the non-observance of the regulation infringed. When, therefore, in the 17th section of the Act of 1873, the Legislature omitted this qualification, it must be presumed to have done so designedly, and at all events, to have intended that it should no longer be incumbent on the opposite party to prove that the non-observance of the regulations in fact contributed to the collision.

Nor does it appear to their Lordships that the 17th section of the Act of 1873 can be taken merely to shift the burthen of proof by raising a presumption of culpability, to be rebutted by proof that the non-observance of the rule did not in fact contribute to the collision, because the preceding (the 16th) section clearly shows that where the Legislature intended only to raise a presumption capable of being rebutted by such proof it used apt words to express that intention.

Their Lordships therefore conceive that, whatever be the true construction of the enactment in question that which would take the case out of its operation by mere proof that the infringement of the regulation did not, in point of fact, contribute to the collision, is admissible. They conceive that the Legislature intended at least to obviate the necessity for the determination of this question of fact (often a very nice one) upon conflicting evidence.

There remain, however, two other possible constructions. The first is that, on proof of an infringement of any of the regulations for preventing collisions, there arises, subject only to the qualification contained in the final clause of the section, an absolute presumption of culpability against the vessel guilty of such infringement, to which the court is bound to give effect, whatever the nature of the infringement may be. The other is that the infringement must be one having some possible connection with the collision; or in other words that the presumption of culpability may be met by proof that the infringement could not by any possibility have contributed to the collision. The former of these constructions, though possibly the more consistent with the literal meaning of the words of the section, seems to their Lordships to be the less reasonable of the two. It not only leads to the extravagant consequences pointed out by the learned judge of the Admiralty Court; it implies an intention which, without the plainest language, can hardly be imputed to the Legislature. For it is one thing to say that when the circumstances show that the infringement of the regulations might have contributed to the collision, the court shall conclusively infer that it did so. It is another, and very different thing to say, that the court shall draw the same inference, when the circumstances show that the infringement, from its nature, could not possibly have contributed to the collision. In the latter case the Legislature would entirely alter the nature of the shipowner's liability. As the law stood, he was civilly liable in damages for the consequences of his act or omission. The new law so far as it enacts that the consequences which might have flowed from that act or omission, shall be presumed to have flowed from it, does not affect the nature of that civil liability. But on the supposed construction it would virtually substitute for a civil liability which the shipowner could not have incurred, a penalty for the infringement of the regulations irrespective of the nature or possible consequences of that infringement—a penalty, moreover, of uncertain application, since it is dependent on a collision, and varying in severity with the injury done by the collision. It would, in effect, make the vessel guilty of the infringement, a sort of outlaw of the seas, be depriving her of the right to recover, under any circumstances, more than half the damages to which, by the general law maritime, she might become entitled.

Again, it can hardly be denied, though the words perhaps admit of such a contention, that the infringement proved must be one existing at the time of the collision. And if this be so, it seems but reasonable to infer that it must also be one that has some possible connection with the accident.

Their Lordships are of opinion that the second construction, which is not absolutely inconsistent with the phraseology of the enactment, and is by far the more reasonable of the two, ought to be adopted. It gives effect to the statute by excluding proof that an infringement, which might have contributed to a collision, did not in fact do so; and by throwing on the party guilty of the infringement the burden of showing that it could not possibly have done so.

Applying this construction of the statute to the fact found, their Lordships are of opinion that if, in this case, both vessels had been British ships, the Peru could not have been pronounced in fault.

This conclusion renders it unnecessary to consider whether this particular clause in the statute is applicable to foreign vessels; whether, in other words, it falls within the principle enforced in the Amalia (B. & Lush, 150) or that enforced in the Saxonia (Lush, 419). That this question, which is not free from difficulty, will have to be determined at no distant date is highly probable. But their Lordships abstain the more willingly from considering it at present because it was not very fully argued before them.

Their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty to affirm the judgment of the Court of Admiralty, and to dismiss this appeal with costs.

Re ARTHUR AVERAGE ASSOCIATION; Ex parte CORY AND HAWKSLEY.

[CHAN.]

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.Reported by E. STEWART ROCHE and H. FEAT, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Monday, June 28, 1875.

(Before the LORDS JUSTICES.)

Re ARTHUR AVERAGE ASSOCIATION; Ex parte CORY AND HAWKSLEY.

Mutual marine insurance association—Unincorporated and unregistered body—Winding-up—Association for acquisition of gain—Names of underwriters specified in policy—30 Vict. c. 23, s. 7—Companies Act 1862, ss. 4, 199.

By the rules of a mutual insurance association it was provided that the members should severally and respectively and not jointly or in partnership, nor the one for the other, but each only in his own name, insure each other's ships for one year, from noon of any day named as the commencement of risk, subject to the conditions indorsed on the form of policy, and to the rules and regulations, which should be binding on all the members of the association. The managers of the association were James Jackson and William Sheppard, and either of them might sign their firm name of Jackson and Sheppard to all policies of insurance in the name of the association, as managers thereof, and the signature thus given by either of them should be binding and conclusive on all the members of that association, and should have on all and each of the members the same effect as if each and every member had personally signed such policy. The annual rates on the sums insured were payable in advance by quarterly proportions by members' acceptance of the manager's draft at three months' date; or if paid in cash, discount of 5l. per cent. per annum was to be allowed, which was to be placed to the credit of each respective member, and if such amount exceeded the claims for losses or damage sustained by the members, such excess was to stand to the credit of each mutual member proportionately as he might have contributed, and if such contributions were not sufficient to meet the claims of the members for loss or damage sustained within any respective year, then such credited amounts should be applied to meet such deficiency, and if there should still be a deficiency, such sum as might be required to meet the same should be drawn for on each respective member in such proportion as they bore to each other. The rules also provided that the managers should have authority to issue policies to members for periods less than a year, or for special risks, either on time or voyage policies in consideration of special rates of premium, to which the reserve fund should in no way apply, and that the rules might be repealed, altered, or amended by a majority of the members at a general meeting.

Special rate policies were issued to non-members both before and after an invalid alteration of the rules, by which it was attempted to give the managers authority to issue special rate policies to non-members. The policies issued by the association were signed, "Jackson and Sheppard, joint managers of the Arthur Average Association for insuring each other's ships, every member bearing his equal proportion according to the sums mutually insured therein, excepting members paying special rates." In Feb. 1870, the association was ordered to be wound up, and on the 25th May 1871, Cory and Hawksley were settled on the list of contributories. By the chief clerks' certificate, dated 20th Dec. 1873, certain sums were found to be due to holders of special policies who were non-members. On a call being made on Cory and Hawksley, they took out a summons to have the debts admitted by the certificate of certain members expunged.

Held (affirming the decision of the Master of the Rolls), that the signature to the policies was not a specification of the names of the insurers as required by the 7th sect. of 30 Vict. c. 23; and that the policies were, therefore, invalid.

Held, also, that the issuing of special rate policies to non-members was ultra vires, and that notwithstanding the delay in applying to vary the chief clerk's certificate, the amounts found due to non-members must be expunged.

THIS was an appeal from an order of the Master of the Rolls (reported ante p. 530). The facts were shortly as follows:—The Arthur Average Association for British, Foreign and Colonial-built Ships, was a mutual shipping insurance association, formed in 1867, not incorporated under any Act of Parliament, and not registered under the Companies Act 1862. By the Rules of the association it was provided that the members of the association should severally and respectively, and not jointly or in partnership, nor the one for the other, but each only in his own name, insure each other's ships for one year from noon of any day named, at the commencement of the risk, subject to the conditions indorsed on the form of policy, and to the rules and regulations which should be binding on all the members of the association. The managers of the association were to be James Jackson and William Sheppard, and either of them might sign their firm name of Jackson and Sheppard to all policies of insurance in the name of the association as managers thereof, and the signature thus given by either of the managers should be binding and conclusive on all the members of the association, and should have on each and all of the said members the same legal effect as if each and every member had personally signed such policy. Special rate policies were issued to non-members, both before and after an attempted, but invalid, alteration of the rules, by which it was proposed to authorise the managers to issue policies to non-members for special risks as on voyage policies. The policies issued by the association were signed "Jackson and Sheppard, joint managers, per procuracy of the several members of the Arthur Average Association for insuring each other's ships, every member bearing his equal proportion according to the sums mutually insured therein, excepting members paying special rates." In Feb. 1870 the association was ordered to be wound up, and a sum of 17,532l. 11s. 8d. having been found by the chief clerks' certificate to be due to holders of special policies, many of whom were non-members, the question was raised whether the sums due in respect of special policies to non-members were valid debts as against the association. The case was argued at great length before the Master of the Rolls, it being contended on behalf of the members of the association, upon whom a call had been made, that the association had no power to issue policies to persons who were not members, and did not become so by having special rate policies granted to them; and further, that, being policies for marine insurance, they were invalid from non-compliance with the provisions of the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 23, s. 7, according to which every marine policy should specify the particular risk or adventure, the names of the subscribers or underwriters, and the sum or sums insured, and in case any of such particulars should be omitted in any policy, such policy should be null and void. In the court below it was held that the signature to the policies of "Jackson and Sheppard," &c., was not a specification of the names of the insurers as required by sect. 7 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 23, and that the policies were accordingly invalid. The holders of special policies who were not members of the association appealed from that decision. Other questions as to the validity of the winding-up under the Companies' Act 1862, of this unincorporated and unregistered association arose in the court below, but were not discussed on the appeal.

Chitty, Q.C. and W. F. Robinson in support of the appeal.

Fry, Q.C., North and Hilbery for the respondents, and Waller Q.C., for the official liquidator, were not called on.

The following cases were referred to:

- Dowell v. Moon*, 4 Camp. 169 ;
Reid v. Allan, 4 Ex. Rep. 326 ;
Re London Marine Insurance Association, 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 97 ; L. Rep. 4 Ch. 611 ;

Turnbull v. Woolfe, 9 Jur. N. S. 57 ;
Bromley v. William, 32 Beav. 177 ;
Watson v. Swann, 11 C. B., N. S., 756.

Lord Justice MELLISH was clearly of opinion that the view taken by the Master of the Rolls was correct, and that these policies were invalid, inasmuch as they did not specify the names of the subscribers or underwriters in the manner required by the Act of Parliament, and it was impossible to ascertain from the policy itself who were to be liable upon it, and who were to be the insurers. The appeal must be dismissed, but, although no costs would be given to the unsuccessful appellants, they would not, having regard to the nature and importance of the case, be ordered to pay any. The costs of the respondents and of the official liquidator would come out of the estate.

Lord Justice JAMES concurred.

THE NORTH OF ENGLAND PURE OILCAKE COMPANY (LIMITED) v. THE ARCHANGEL MARITIME BANK AND INSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED).

Marine insurance — Sale of cargo — "Shipping documents" — Assignment of policy after interest of assignor had ceased.

Where the interest of the insured has ceased before loss, a subsequent assignment of the policy is ineffectual.

V. insured a cargo of linseed for a voyage, including risk of lighters; during the voyage V. sold the cargo to the plaintiffs, to be paid for in fourteen days from being ready for delivery' or at sellers' option on handing shipping documents (which option was not exercised). The cargo was landed in public lighters employed by the plaintiffs, one of which sank. After the loss V. assigned the policy to the plaintiffs.

Held that the policy had not passed to the plaintiffs by the contract of sale, that V.'s interest ceased on delivery into the lighter, and, therefore that the subsequent assignment was void, and the plaintiffs could not recover on the policy.

THIS was a special case stated after issue had been joined. The parts of the case which are material are as follows:—

3. The plaintiffs carry on the business of seed crushers and oilcake and cattle-food manufacturers at Stockton-on-Tees, one of the ports of the United Kingdom, and having a landing-wharf therein, and the defendants carry on the business, at Athens in the Kingdom of Greece, of marine insurance on ships and cargoes, and have also offices and a local board of direction situate in London for conducting and carrying on such business.

4. On the 24th Nov. 1871, Vagliano Brothers insured with the defendants a cargo of 2950 chetwerts of linseed belonging to them of the value 6200*l.* for the sum of 1500*l.* at a premium of 52*l.* 10*s.* 0*d.*, which Vagliano Brothers then paid to the defendants, the linseed then being on board the brig Fanny at Constantinople, for a voyage from Constantinople to a port of call and discharge in the United Kingdom to be named, including all risk of craft or lighters to and from the brig, each lighter and craft being considered as if separately insured, the policy of insurance being with Vagliano Brothers or their assigns.

5. The linseed had been duly shipped by Vagliano Brothers on board the brig, which then commenced the voyage therewith in conformity with the terms of the policy, under a bill of lading dated the 29th (10th) Nov. 1871, whereby the linseed was to be delivered at a safe port in the United Kingdom unto Vagliano Brothers or their assigns.

6. Whilst the brig was still on her voyage, Edwards and Company who then acted as the agents of Vagliano Brothers in England, on the 17th Feb. 1872 sold to the plaintiffs the cargo of linseed, it being a term of the contract that the vessel should go to any safe floating port in the United Kingdom, and there deliver her cargo to the plaintiffs.

7. The plaintiffs paid Vagliano Brothers through Edwards and Co., the price of the linseed in cash as hereinafter mentioned, less two and a half per cent. discount, in conformity with the sold note, and on the 21st Feb. 1872 Vagliano Brothers accordingly endorsed the bill of lading to the order of the agents, Messrs. Edwards and Co., who thereupon duly endorsed the same to the plaintiffs, both which endorsements appear on the said document. The sellers of the cargo did not exercise their option mentioned in the contract note.

8. The plaintiffs duly notified Stockton-on-Tees (the same being a safe floating port within the terms of the above-named policy), as the destined port of discharge of the cargo, and on the 26th Feb. 1872 the brig duly arrived at the said port with her cargo, the same being then intact.

9. The cargo was landed by means of public lighters employed by the plaintiffs to unload the said cargo from the brig, and to land the same at the plaintiffs' wharf. The employment of the lighters was within the terms of the policy, and was necessary for unloading and right delivery ashore of the cargo.

10. On the 23th Feb. 1872, one of the lighters filled with part of the cargo arrived safely alongside of the plaintiffs' wharf, and was there sunk by perils within the terms of the policy, and thereby the same was partly lost and partly damaged.

11. The above-named loss occurred when a part only of the cargo had been discharged, and before the plaintiffs had paid the price of the cargo, and upon payment being asked for a correspondence ensued between the plaintiffs and Messrs. Edwards and Co., which was to be taken as part of the case.

12. On the 4th March 1872, Vagliano Brothers made a claim on the defendants for the loss of the linseed in the lighter, and on the 5th March 1872, claimed and received from them a sum of money as return of premium on the ground that the brig had arrived at Stockton-on-Tees. They retained the same and no demand for the same has ever been made by the plaintiffs. This return of premium is endorsed on the policy. Such return of premium does not by the usage at Lloyd's, preclude the assured from afterwards claiming a loss upon the policy if any loss has in fact occurred.

13. On the 11th May 1872, a claim for 77*l.* 4*s.* 0*d.* in respect of the loss, was made by Vagliano Brothers and was endorsed on the policy.

14. The policy was in June 1872 handed over to the plaintiffs by Vagliano Brothers, and on the 17th Oct. 1872, Vagliano Brothers endorsed on the policy what purported to be an assignment of it by them to the plaintiffs.

15. The court was to have power to draw inferences.

16. The question for the opinion of the court was whether upon the above facts the plaintiffs were entitled to recover from the defendants the loss.

17. If the court should be of opinion in the affirmative then judgment was to be entered up for the plaintiffs for 77*l.* 4*s.* 0*d.* with five per cent. interest thereon from the 18th Nov. 1872 to judgment, together with their costs of suit.

18. If the court should be of opinion in the negative then judgment with costs of defence was to be entered up for the defendants.

The pleadings, policy of insurance, bill of lading, sold note, correspondence, and assignment of the policy from Vagliano Brothers to the plaintiffs were to be taken as part of the case. The sold note dated 17th Feb. 1872, contained the following terms.

Sold this day to the North of England Pure Oilcake Company the following Taganrog linseed, viz.: the cargo per Fanny consisting of about 2448 quarters, and now at Scilly at 62*s.* 3*d.* per 424*lb.* The seed is to be delivered at destined port in sound merchantable condition, and to be worked in thirteen days, and paid for in fourteen days from being ready for delivery by cash less 2½ per cent. discount, or at sellers' option on handing shipping documents less interest at five per cent. per annum. If any cargo amount to or exceed 650 tons seven extra days to be allowed for payment, and receivers to have the privilege of using any unexpired lay days. . . . The vessel to go to any safe floating port in the United Kingdom.

Bull, Q.C. (Bohn with him) for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs are entitled to sue on the policy by 31 & 32 Vict. c. 86, s. 1, notwithstanding it was assigned after loss: (Lloyd v. Fleming and Lloyd v. Spence, ante, vol. 1, p. 192; 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 824; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 299.) The policy is to insure arrival on shore, and covers risk of lighters: (see Hurry v. Royal Exchange Assurance Company, 2 B. & P. 430.) There are two periods at which it may be said that Vagliano Brothers' interest in the policy ceased; first on the making of the contract of sale, or secondly on delivery at the home port. If the former view is correct the policy passed to the plaintiffs under the words "shipping documents." In Arnould on Marine Insurance p. 106 (3rd and 4th edit.) the law on the subject is thus stated: "Where a policy is assigned to the purchaser of the insured property, it is usual to indorse on it a memorandum to the effect that the interest in this policy is transferred to the purchaser. When a floating cargo (i.e. a cargo at sea) is sold in London, it is generally on what are called 'The London Floating Conditions,' which comprise the delivery over to the purchaser for his benefit of the policies which have been effected on the cargo, the understanding being that it is insured to the full value, the price paid being all tac higher, to include the amount paid by the vendor for insurance. If upon such a transaction it be objected by the buyer that the vendor has not performed the conditions of the contract in consequence of delivering over policies apparently short of the full value of the cargo, the question is one depending so much upon fact that it ought to go to the jury:" (see Tamvaco v. Lucas, 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 66, 231; 1 B. & S. 185; 30 L. J. 234, Q. B.; affirmed 3 B. & S. 89; 33 L. J. 296, Q. B.; Ralli v. The Universal Marine Insurance Company, 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 160, 194; 31 L. J. 207, Ch. reversed ib. 313.) The present case is within the above rule, being a sale in London of a floating cargo. It is prima facie unreasonable to suppose that it was intended to allow the policy to drop before the arrival of the cargo: but this result would ensue if the interest of the vendors ceased on the contract of sale, and the policy did not pass: (Powles v. Innes, 11, M. & W. 10.) But secondly it is submitted that on the true construction of the contract of sale, looking to the terms of payment contained in the sold note, the property in the cargo did not pass until delivery at the home port. The interest would then remain in Vagliano Brothers up to the time of the loss. Even if it was intended to pass the property, it was not intended to let the policy drop, for, even if the legal property had passed, if the vendors had any interest in the safe arrival of the cargo they could have sued on the policy:

Ebsworth v. The Alliance Marine Insurance Company, ante, p. 125; 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 479; L. Rep. 8 C. P. 596;

Anderson v. Morice, ante, p. 425; 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 605; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 58; 44 L. J. 10, C. P.

Watkin Williams, Q.C. (C. Crompton with him) for the defendants.—If Vagliano Brothers could have recovered on this policy it must be admitted that the plaintiffs can recover, but the defendants are not liable at all. It was no part of the contract that the policy of insurance should form part of the subject matter of the sale. The passage cited from Arnould on Marine Insurance (ubi sup.) is an authority in the defendants' favour, for the London Floating Conditions apply only where the cargo is sold at sea and sold out and out; here, according to the terms of the contract, the whole interest remained in the vendors, and the goods were at their risk. If the ship had come alongside a quay the vendors' risk would have ended with the delivery, and the same is the case here, for "floating port" only means a port where the cargo does not take the ground. The vendors' interest in the cargo ceased before the policy was transferred, and no one can sue, because there is no stipulation that the policy is to cover the vendees' interest. Suppose a case where there is an inland clause in the policy; would the policy revive after the interest had ceased, so as to give effect to it? Such a clause is common in wool policies.

Butt, Q.C. replied.

COCKBURN, C.J.—We are all agreed on one point in this case, which renders it unnecessary to decide the other. The policy here not having been assigned until after the interest of the assignors had ceased, the assignment could pass no interest, and, therefore the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover. Here the assignors had the policy at the time of the sale of the cargo, and if by the terms of the contract it had been agreed to sell the policy, then no doubt the policy would have been assigned so far as it was co-extensive with the interest transferred to the vendees. But there are no terms to that effect in the contract of sale, and the facts are such as to lead to the opposite conclusion. This is not like the case of a floating cargo sold subject to all risks, where it is a part of the contract that the policy shall be assigned over to the purchaser; in such a case there is no hardship on the insurers, and it is a great convenience to the buyer, for there is no necessity for him to take out a fresh policy where it is expressly stipulated, or must be taken to be part of the contract of sale that the conditions of the existing policy are to enure for the benefit of the vendee. But here there was not an absolute sale of the cargo to the plaintiffs in the same sense as in the case I have just referred to; it is true that there was a sale to them, and, I think, a transfer of the property, but it is an essential part of the contract that payment was to be made fourteen days after the cargo was ready for delivery, and until the cargo was delivered the real substantial interest would remain in the sellers, who, therefore, would not be likely to wish to part with the policy. The policy then ceases to be operative as soon as the sellers cease to have any interest. After the loss they assign the policy to the plaintiffs, but, inasmuch as before the loss their interest had entirely ceased, it is clear that before the assignment the policy had dropped. It follows that the assignment was ineffectual, and the policy is of no avail in the hands of the plaintiffs. Our judgment must, therefore, be for the defendants.

LUSH, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is clear to my mind that the contract of sale did not transfer the interest in the policy to the plaintiffs. It is perfectly clear that there are no words to which that effect could possibly be ascribed except the words "shipping documents," and I am of opinion that the words "shipping documents" in this contract could not be taken to include the policy of insurance. When the insured was delivered to the plaintiffs on board the lighter the policy expired, and the assignment could not afterwards create an interest.

QUAIN, J.—I am of the same opinion. I have always understood it to be settled since the decision in Powles v. Innes (11 M. & W. 10) that where the property insured was transferred the policy would lapse unless it were kept alive for the benefit of the transferee. I cannot here find any words showing that the policy was expressly assigned by the contract of sale, nor does it appear from the terms of the contract that any such assignment was contemplated. There was no agreement to that effect express or implied, and the law is clear that after the interest of the holder of the policy has come to an end a subsequent assignment cannot give an interest to the assignee.

Compulsory pilotage—Exemptions—Trinity House outport district—Particular provision—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), ss. 353, 370, and 379.

By the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 353, the employment of pilots shall continue to be compulsory in all districts in which the same was by law compulsory before. By sect. 379 ships, not carrying passengers, employed in the coasting trade, shall be exempted from compulsory pilotage in the Trinity House outport districts, which, by sect. 370, comprise any pilotage district for the appointment of pilots, within which no particular provision is made by any Act of Parliament or charter.

By 6 Geo. c. 125, s. 5, the Corporation of Trinity House were required to appoint sub-commissioners at such ports or places as they might think requisite, to examine and certify pilots.

By 15 Vict. c. cxvi. (The Ipswich Dock Act 1852), s. 91, the Corporation of Trinity House were required to appoint sub-commissioners, resident within the port of Ipswich, to examine and certify pilots; the sub-commissioners to take the oath prescribed, and the corporation to give the notice directed in 6 Geo. 4, c. 125.

The respondent, the master of a ship not carrying passengers, employed in the coasting trade, refused a pilot within the Ipswich district, for which, before the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, he would have been liable to summary conviction.

Held, upon a case stated, that previous compulsory pilotage did not overrule the exemptions in sect. 379; that the Ipswich Dock Act 1852 did not make a particular provision for the appointment of pilots; and that the justices were right in refusing to convict the respondent(a).

THIS was a case stated by two of her Majesty's justices of the peace for the borough of Ipswich, under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, for the purpose of obtaining the opinion of this court on questions of law which arose before them, as hereinafter stated.

At a petty sessions holden at the Town Hall, in and for the said borough, on the 22nd June 1874, an information or complaint preferred by Charles Hadgraft (hereinafter called the appellant) against Robert Hewith (hereinafter called the respondent), under sect. 353 of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104 (Merchant Shipping Act 1854), charging that he the said respondent, on the 6th June then instant, at the parish of St. Peter, in the said borough, being the master of the steamship Eider, unexempted from pilotage and navigating within the pilotage district between the Ipswich Quays and Downham Reach, to wit, at the lock gates of the Ipswich Wet Dock, unlawfully, after a qualified pilot had offered to take charge of such ship, did himself pilot such ship without possessing a pilotage certificate enabling him so to do, contrary to the form of the statute in that case made and provided, was heard by the said justices (the said parties and their attorneys respectively being then present), and their determination of the said case having been duly adjourned by them until the 9th July 1874, they on the last-mentioned day dismissed the said information or complaint.

(a) It would appear to follow from this decision that wherever the appointment of pilots is by the Trinity House all exemptions and compulsion existing before the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 are continued, and that the existence of an Act of Parliament or charter under which the Trinity House appoint is not a "particular provision" within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, or the 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, s. 59, so as to continue the exemption or compulsion.—Ed.]

The said justices, in compliance with the application of the appellant and the provisions of the said Act, and by consent of the said parties, stated and signed the following case.

The following facts were either proved before them upon the hearing of the said information or complaint or were admitted by both parties for the purposes of this case :

The respondent was on the 6th June 1874 master of the said steamship Eider, the said ship having a British register, and being of the burthen of upwards of sixty tons by her certificate of registry, and employed in the regular coasting trade of the kingdom, and laden with divers iron ware and other articles, and belonging to the port or place within the limits whereof the said ship was at the time of the commission of the alleged offence, that is to say, to the port of Ipswich, which is a pilotage district, and not then carrying passengers, and then navigating within the district for which the appellant was then licensed to act as a pilot, as hereinafter mentioned.

The respondent did not at the time of the commission of the alleged offence possess a pilotage certificate enabling him to pilot his said ship.

The appellant was at the date of the commission of the alleged offence duly licensed to act as a pilot within certain limits, which comprised the place where the said alleged offence was committed, under the provisions of the Ipswich Dock Act 1852 (hereinafter referred to), and notice of such licence had been duly published, pursuant to the said Act, and the period prescribed by such Act had expired before the date of the commission of the said alleged offence.

The appellant produced before the justices his said licence, which was in the words and figures following :

Ipswich. No. 107. 1st class.
Stamp 20th June 1853. Fr. Freshfield, Thos. R. Leath, 35/ } H. G. Bristo.

To all to whom these presents shall come :

We, the master, wardens, and assistants of the guild, fraternity, or brotherhood of the Most Glorious and Undivided Trinity, and of St. Clement, in the parish of Deptford Stroud, in the county of Kent, commonly called the Corporation of Trinity House of Deptford Stroud, send greeting; know ye, that in pursuance of an Act of Parliament, made and passed in the 6th year of Geo. 4, intitled "An Act for the amendment of the law respecting pilots and pilotage, and also for the better preservation of floating lights, buoys, and beacons," we, the said master, wardens, and assistants, having received a satisfactory certificate under the hands of Fredk. Freshfield, John Cobbold, Chas. Bolton, Thos. R. Leath, and H. G.

Bristo, esquires, the sub-commissioners of pilotage by us appointed for the port of Ipswich, that they have examined into the qualifications of Charles Hadgraft, mariner, the bearer hereof, and whose description is indorsed on the back of these presents, to act as a pilot for the said port and the adjoining coasts thereof, and that he is duly qualified to act for such port and coasts. Do hereby appoint and license the said Charles Hadgraft to act as a pilot within the limits hereinafter mentioned, that is to say, from Ipswich Quays to Harwich Harbour, and vice versa, and this licence is to continue in force from henceforth up to and until the 31st Jan. next ensuing the date hereof, but no longer, unless the same shall be renewed by indorsement, to be from time to time made thereon, according to the provisions of the said Act of Parliament in that behalf.

In testimony whereof we have caused our common seal to be hereunto affixed this 26th Nov. 1850.

(Signed) J. H. PELLY, Dep.-Master.

[The common seal of the said Corporation of Trinity House.]

Endorsed upon the said licence were a description of the appellant, and a memorandum of the said licence having been duly registered at the Custom House, Ipswich, "pursuant to the 66th section of the said statute 6 Geo. 4, c. 125," and also memoranda of renewal of the said licence, from time to time, the last of such renewals (which is identical in form with those of former years), being as follows :

Renewed and confirmed, pursuant to the Act 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, this 16th Feb. 1874.

(Signed) G. M. DOUGLAS, } Sub-Commissioners
ALFRED COBBOLD, } of Pilotage.

One of the said sub-commissioners by whom such last renewal is signed (viz., Geo. M. Douglas), who was called a witness in support of the respondent's contention (hereinafter mentioned), that Ipswich is a Trinity House outport district, produced his appointment, which was as follows :
Stamp } To all whom these presents shall come, We, the 10/ } Trinity House send greeting :

Whereas, by an Act of Parliament made and passed in 17 & 18 Vict., called The Merchant Shipping Act 1854, it is amongst other things enacted, that the Trinity House shall appoint sub-commissioners, not being more than five nor less than three in number, for the purpose of examining pilots in all districts in which they have been used to make such appointments. And it is by the said Act further enacted that, subject to any alteration to be made by the Trinity House, no licence granted by them shall continue in force beyond the 31st Jan. then next ensuing the date of such licence, but that the same may, upon the application of the pilot holding such licence, be renewed on such 31st Jan. in every year, or any subsequent day by indorsement under the hand of the Secretary of Trinity House, or such other person as may be appointed for that purpose. And whereas the Trinity House has been used to appoint sub-commissioners in the Ipswich district, now know ye that we, the Trinity House, do hereby, in pursuance of the said Act of Parliament, appoint Geo. M. Douglas, Henry Gallant Bristo, and Alfred Cobbold, esquires, being proper and competent persons in that behalf, to be sub-commissioners for the purpose of examining pilots at and for the port of Ipswich, which is comprised within the Ipswich district; and they, the said Geo. M. Douglas, Henry Gallant Bristo, and Alfred Cobbold are respectfully authorised, so long as this appointment shall not be revoked or superseded by the appointment of other persons in their places, to examine into the qualifications of persons to act as pilots for the said port of Ipswich and the adjoining coasts, that is to say, from Ipswich Quays to Harwich Harbour and vice versa, and upon such examination to certify the same to us under the hands of the said G. M. Douglas, Henry Gallant Bristo, and Alfred Cobbold; and further to renew from year to year, up to and until the 31st Jan. in every year at our discretion, all and every the licences to be granted under the authority of the said Act; such renewal to be by indorsement on such licences respectively, signed by any one of them, the said Geo. M. Douglas, H. G. Bristo, and A. Cobbold.

[Q. B.]

In testimony whereof, we have caused our common seal to be hereunto affixed the 18th Oct 1872.

[The common seal

The appellant did, on the said 6th June 1874, within the district for which he was so licensed as aforesaid, offer to take charge of the said ship then navigating within such district as above stated, and the respondent after such offer did himself pilot the said ship as in the said information or complaint is charged.

By sect. 91 of a local Act of Parliament, viz., The Ipswich Dock Act 1852 (15 Vict. c. cxvi.), "It shall be lawful for the corporation of Trinity House of Deptford Stroud, and they are hereby required to appoint" . . . "sub-commissioners of pilotage for the said port" (of Ipswich), and who "shall take the oath prescribed by the Act of Parliament passed in" 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, and to examine into the qualification of persons to act as pilots for the said port; and the said Corporation of Trinity House were empowered upon the certificate of such sub-commissioners to license such persons to act as pilots accordingly, and to publish such notice thereof, as is prescribed by the said Act of Parliament of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125. And by the same section it is enacted that, after the time limited in such notice, "All vessels, sailing, navigating, or passing into or out of the said port, or upon the coasts thereof, save and except under such circumstances as are saved and excepted in and by the said Act of Parliament, shall be conducted and piloted by such pilots only as shall be so licensed as aforesaid, and by no other pilots or persons whomsoever."

Sect. 92 of the said local Act enacted that the licences to be granted as aforesaid should be granted in such form, and for such period, and subject to such power of renewal and suspension, amendment or revocation, as licences granted under the said Act of Parliament so passed in 6 Geo. 4, and such pilots when so licensed should for all purposes and to all intents be deemed and taken to be pilots licensed under the said Act so passed as last aforesaid; and all enactments, protections, provisions, forfeitures, penalties, matters, and things contained in such last-named Act, or conferred or imposed thereby, except as therein after provided, and all bye-laws made by the said corporation, in pursuance thereof, should be deemed and taken to apply to pilots so to be licensed as aforesaid under the authority of that (the said Ipswich Dock) Act, and to all masters, owners, and others, in the same manner and to the same extent; and the forfeitures and penalties should be recovered and applied as if such pilots had been licensed under the said Act of Geo. 4.

Sect. 93 of the same local Act provides that the master of any vessel, inward or outward bound, refusing to employ a pilot licensed as aforesaid and offering his services (except such vessel be under the burden of fifty tons registered tonnage), shall pay full pilotage to such pilot as if such pilot had been employed.

Sect. 94 of the same local Act provides that such Act shall not extend to prevent the master of any vessel under the burthen of fifty tons by the certificate of registry, in the coasting trade, from conducting or piloting his vessel into or out of the said port, nor hinder any person from assisting any vessel in distress, nor subject such person to the penalties of the said Act.

The said Ipswich Dock Act prescribes the rates of pilotage to be charged, and makes provision for altering same with the consent of the Corporation of Trinity House.

Sect. 111 of the same last-mentioned Act saves all rights, estates, powers, jurisdictions, immunities, exceptions, advantages, and privileges belonging or appertaining to the mayor, aldermen, burgesses, and freemen of the borough of Ipswich, or any other person whomsoever, except as thereby expressly taken away or altered.

It was contended on the part of the appellant that the effect of the 93rd section of the said Ipswich Dock Act was to render pilotage compulsory in respect of all vessels navigating within the said Ipswich district, except in the excepted cases specified in that and the following section (sect. 94), and that the Eider not being within those exceptions, was subject to compulsory pilotage, and that the respondent was therefore liable to conviction under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, which came into operation after the said local Act (viz., on the 1st May 1855); and the 353rd section of which said Merchant Shipping Act enacts that subject to alteration to be made by any pilotage authority, the employment of pilots shall continue compulsory in all districts in which the same was by law compulsory immediately before the said Merchant Shipping Act came into operation; and that every master of any unexempted vessel navigating within any such district who after a qualified pilot has offered to take charge of such ship, shall himself pilot such ship without possessing a pilotage certificate enabling him so to do, shall incur a penalty of double the amount of pilotage demandable for the conduct of such ship.

It was further contended on the part of the appellant, that although the appointment and control of pilots at Ipswich were vested in the Trinity House by the said local Act, Ipswich is not a Trinity House outpost district within the meaning of sect. 370 (sub-sect. 3) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, inasmuch as Trinity House outpost districts are therein described as "comprising any pilotage district for the appointment of pilots within which no particular provision is made by any Act of Parliament or charter;" and inasmuch as in the Ipswich district particular provision has been made by Act of Parliament, viz., by the said Ipswich Dock Act 1852, and that, therefore, the exemptions relating to Trinity House outpost districts, under sect. 379 of the said Merchant Shipping Act (which exemptions extend, inter alia, to all ships employed in the coasting trade of the United Kingdom, when not carrying passengers), do not extend to the present case.

It was contended on the part of the respondent, that the Eider was exempted from compulsory pilotage by virtue of sect. 111 and the latter part of sect. 91 of the said Ipswich Dock Act, which last-mentioned section, as above mentioned, exempts vessels navigating under such circumstances as are excepted by the said Act of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, from the obligation to employ a pilot, and which said Act of Geo. 4, exempts, by its 59th section, the master of any ship employed in the regular coasting trade of the United Kingdom from any penalty for piloting his own ship, and that the words, "save and except under such circumstances as are saved and excepted in and by the said Act of Parliament," could mean no other than the exceptions contained in the said 59th section of 6

The appellant did, on the said 6th June 1874, within the district for which he was so licensed as aforesaid, offer to take charge of the said ship then navigating within such district as above stated, and the respondent after such offer did himself pilot the said ship as in the said information or complaint is charged.

By sect. 91 of a local Act of Parliament, viz., The Ipswich Dock Act 1852 (15 Vict. c. cxvi.), "It shall be lawful for the corporation of Trinity House of Deptford Stroud, and they are hereby required to appoint" . . . "sub-commissioners of pilotage for the said port" (of Ipswich), and who "shall take the oath prescribed by the Act of Parliament passed in" 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, and to examine into the qualification of persons to act as pilots for the said port; and the said Corporation of Trinity House were empowered upon the certificate of such sub-commissioners to license such persons to act as pilots accordingly, and to publish such notice thereof, as is prescribed by the said Act of Parliament of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125. And by the same section it is enacted that, after the time limited in such notice, "All vessels, sailing, navigating, or passing into or out of the said port, or upon the coasts thereof, save and except under such circumstances as are saved and excepted in and by the said Act of Parliament, shall be conducted and piloted by such pilots only as shall be so licensed as aforesaid, and by no other pilots or persons whomsoever."

Sect. 92 of the said local Act enacted that the licences to be granted as aforesaid should be granted in such form, and for such period, and subject to such power of renewal and suspension, amendment or revocation, as licences granted under the said Act of Parliament so passed in 6 Geo. 4, and such pilots when so licensed should for all purposes and to all intents be deemed and taken to be pilots licensed under the said Act so passed as last aforesaid; and all enactments, protections, provisions, forfeitures, penalties, matters, and things contained in such last-named Act, or conferred or imposed thereby, except as therein-after provided, and all bye-laws made by the said corporation, in pursuance thereof, should be deemed and taken to apply to pilots so to be licensed as aforesaid under the authority of that (the said Ipswich Dock) Act, and to all masters, owners, and others, in the same manner and to the same extent; and the forfeitures and penalties should be recovered and applied as if such pilots had been licensed under the said Act of Geo. 4.

Sect. 93 of the same local Act provides that the master of any vessel, inward or outward bound, refusing to employ a pilot licensed as aforesaid and offering his services (except such vessel be under the burden of fifty tons registered tonnage), shall pay full pilotage to such pilot as if such pilot had been employed.

Sect. 94 of the same local Act provides that such Act shall not extend to prevent the master of any vessel under the burthen of fifty tons by the certificate of registry, in the coasting trade, from conducting or piloting his vessel into or out of the said port, nor hinder any person from assisting any vessel in distress, nor subject such person to the penalties of the said Act.

The said Ipswich Dock Act prescribes the rates of pilotage to be charged, and makes provision for altering same with the consent of the Corporation of Trinity House.

Sect. 111 of the same last-mentioned Act saves all rights, estates, powers, jurisdictions, immunities, exceptions, advantages, and privileges belonging or appertaining to the mayor, aldermen, burgesses, and freemen of the borough of Ipswich, or any other person whomsoever, except as thereby expressly taken away or altered.

It was contended on the part of the appellant that the effect of the 93rd section of the said Ipswich Dock Act was to render pilotage compulsory in respect of all vessels navigating within the said Ipswich district, except in the excepted cases specified in that and the following section (sect. 94), and that the Eider not being within those exceptions, was subject to compulsory pilotage, and that the respondent was therefore liable to conviction under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, which came into operation after the said local Act (viz., on the 1st May 1855); and the 353rd section of which said Merchant Shipping Act enacts that subject to alteration to be made by any pilotage authority, the employment of pilots shall continue compulsory in all districts in which the same was by law compulsory immediately before the said Merchant Shipping Act came into operation; and that every master of any unexempted vessel navigating within any such district who after a qualified pilot has offered to take charge of such ship, shall himself pilot such ship without possessing a pilotage certificate enabling him so to do, shall incur a penalty of double the amount of pilotage demandable for the conduct of such ship.

It was further contended on the part of the appellant, that although the appointment and control of pilots at Ipswich were vested in the Trinity House by the said local Act, Ipswich is not a Trinity House outpost district within the meaning of sect. 370 (sub-sect. 3) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, inasmuch as Trinity House outpost districts are therein described as "comprising any pilotage district for the appointment of pilots within which no particular provision is made by any Act of Parliament or charter;" and inasmuch as in the Ipswich district particular provision has been made by Act of Parliament, viz., by the said Ipswich Dock Act 1852, and that, therefore, the exemptions relating to Trinity House outpost districts, under sect. 379 of the said Merchant Shipping Act (which exemptions extend, inter alia, to all ships employed in the coasting trade of the United Kingdom, when not carrying passengers), do not extend to the present case.

It was contended on the part of the respondent, that the Eider was exempted from compulsory pilotage by virtue of sect. 111 and the latter part of sect. 91 of the said Ipswich Dock Act, which last-mentioned section, as above mentioned, exempts vessels navigating under such circumstances as are excepted by the said Act of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, from the obligation to employ a pilot, and which said Act of Geo. 4, exempts, by its 59th section, the master of any ship employed in the regular coasting trade of the United Kingdom from any penalty for piloting his own ship, and that the words, "save and except under such circumstances as are saved and excepted in and by the said Act of Parliament," could mean no other than the exceptions contained in the said 59th section of 6

HADGRAFT (app.) v. HEWITH (resp.).

[Q. B.]

Geo. 4; and that, notwithstanding the repeal of the said Act of 6 Geo. 4, by 17 & 18 Vict. c. 120 (which came into operation at the same time as the Merchant Shipping Act 1854), all the exemptions of the said Act of Geo. 4 are preserved by virtue of the 353rd section of the said Merchant Shipping Act; in support of which view the cases of The Earl of Auckland (1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 27, 177; 30 L. J., 21, Adm.), affirmed by the Privy Council (ib. 387); Reg. v. Stanton (8 E. & B. 445); and The Stettin (1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 229; 31 L. J., 209, Adm.), were cited by the respondent's attorney.

It was further contended on the part of the respondent that Ipswich is a Trinity House outport district, within the meaning of the said sect. 370 (sub-sect. 3), of the said Merchant Shipping Act, inasmuch as the provision for appointing pilots contained in the said Ipswich Dock Act places the appointment of such pilots upon the same footing as in Trinity House outport districts, and it is not, therefore, such a "particular provision" as was contemplated by or is within the true meaning of the said sub-section, and that, therefore, the Eider was further exempted from compulsory pilotage by virtue of the exemptions relating to Trinity House outport districts contained in the said 379th section of the said Merchant Shipping Act, of all ships (not carrying passengers) employed in the coasting trade of the United Kingdom, or navigating within the limits of the port to which they belong.

It was further contended on behalf of the respondent that the expression "any vessel," in clause 93 of the Ipswich Dock Act, must be qualified by the expressions contained in the concluding part of sect. 91 of the same Act, and must be construed to mean "any vessel sailing navigating, or passing into or out of the said port or upon the coasts thereof, save and except under such circumstances as are saved and excepted in and by the said Act of Parliament," and that in the same manner sect. 94 must be qualified by the exception contained in sect. 93; otherwise only vessels under the burthen of fifty tons, by the certificate of registry, in the coasting trade, would be exempted from compulsory pilotage, whereas, by sect. 93, all vessels under the burthen of fifty tons register tonnage are exempted.

The justices were of opinion that the Eider was, under the circumstances above detailed, exempted from compulsory pilotage, by virtue of the above-mentioned provisions, both of the Ipswich Dock Act and the Merchant Shipping Act; but feeling there was room for reasonable doubt, both as to the true construction of the said Dock Act (the terms of the 93rd section thereof appearing to them contradictory to the exceptions contained in the latter part of the 91st section), and as to the true construction of the expression "particular provision" in the said 370th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, the justices, in dismissing the said information or complaint, consented, as before stated, to submit the above case for the opinion of this honourable court.

If the court shall be of opinion that the Eider was exempted from compulsory pilotage, by virtue of the provisions either of the said Ipswich Dock Act, or of the said Merchant Shipping Act, their decision will stand.

If the court should be of opinion that the Eider was not exempted from compulsory pilotage by virtue of the provisions of either of the said Ipswich Dock Act or of the said Merchant Shipping Act, the justices begged that this case might be remitted to them with an expression of such opinion that they might thereupon make such order in the premises as should be lawful and just.

Sutton argued for appellant, the complainant.

Graham appeared for the respondent.

BLACKBURN, J.—We need not trouble the counsel for the respondent. When we understand the point, we see the magistrates were quite right. Sect. 379 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, exempts from compulsory pilotage ships not carrying passengers employed in the coasting trade of the United Kingdom, in the Trinity House outport districts. This ship was employed in the coasting trade, and was not carrying passengers; the only question left, therefore, on that section is, whether there was a Trinity House outport district?

Sect. 353 had continued the compulsory employment of pilots in all districts in which the same was by law compulsory; and all exemptions for compulsory pilotage then existing within such districts were also thereby continued in force. Mr. Sutton argues upon these two provisions, that the exemptions of sect. 379 cannot go beyond those which existed at the passing of the Act in the districts where compulsory pilotage was the law before. It has been held in Reg. v. Stanton (8 E. & B. 445), that a previously existing exemption is not limited by the express words of sect. 379, but it does not follow that sect. 353, although it continues an exemption beyond sect. 379, should continue a liability in opposition to the later section. Probably the words of the former of these two sections were forgotten by the Legislature when the latter was passed, but it is clear that the effect of sect. 353 cannot take away any of the express exemptions in sect. 379. The question, therefore, already mentioned, comes to be considered, viz., whether this is one of the Trinity House outport districts?

The expression is defined in sect. 370 as "comprising any pilotage district for the appointment of pilots within which no particular provision is made by any Act of Parliament or charter." The general provision of law with respect to the appointment of pilots, which was in existence at the passing of the Act of 1854, was that contained in sect. 5 of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125. By that section the Corporation of Trinity House were "required to appoint proper and competent persons at such places or ports in England as they may think requisite (except within the liberty of the Cinque Ports, and all such other ports and places within or for which particular provision shall have been made by any Act or Acts of Parliament, or by any charter or charters for the appointment of pilots)," as sub-commissioners to examine and certify pilots. At that time, no doubt, a particular provision for appointing pilots at this port of Ipswich had been made by 45 Geo. 3, c. ci. That statute, however, was subsequently repealed, and the enactment concerning the appointment of pilots at this port in force at the time of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, was sect. 91 of the Ipswich Dock Act of 1852. That section adopts the very words of the general provision of law with respect to the appointment of pilots contained in 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, s. 5, and applies them to the particular port of Ipswich, with the exception only that the local Act requires the persons appointed sub-commissioners to be "resident within the port of Ipswich," instead of the words used in the public Act, "at each port or place for which any such appointment shall be made." That is the only difference between the general provision and the particular provision for Ipswich at the time of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and I do not think the definition in sect. 370 of that Act could have been intended to refer to such an adoption of the general law by the words "particular provision," . . . "by any Act of Parliament." The essence of the provision is the mode of appointment of sub-commissioners and pilots, and that is exactly the same in the local as the public Acts. The provision for the appointment of pilots in Ipswich district was, therefore, the general law, and that district is, according to the 370th section, a Trinity House out-port district.

I think the justices were right in holding this to be a case of exemption from compulsory pilotage.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the words "particular provision," must relate to something which has a greater distinction from the general law than this has.

QUAIN, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the description, "particular provision," applies only to some mode of appointment of pilots different from any by the Trinity House and their sub-commissioners.

PREVITE AND ANOTHER v. THE ADELAIDE FIRE AND MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Reg. Gen. H. T. 1853, R. 12—Cost of witnesses examined before the master.

In an action on a marine insurance policy, owing to plaintiffs' delay in complying with an order for production of papers, defendants did not plead until a year after declaration. Meanwhile, to save expense, defendants examined witnesses before the master, under 1 Will. 4, c. 22, s. 4. Defendants pleaded unseaworthiness, &c., and paid 25l. into court on the money counts for the premium. Plaintiffs took the money out of court, and joined issue on the other pleas, but afterwards discontinued:

Held, that defendants were entitled to the costs of the witnesses examined before the master, such costs not being costs incurred before instructions for plea, within the meaning of Reg. Gen. H. T. 1853, R. 12, and a rule to review taxation was made absolute.

THIS was an action on a policy of insurance on the ship Balaclava, claiming for a total loss; there was also a count for money received.

The action was commenced on the 1st Dec. 1871; the declaration was delivered on the 17th Jan. 1872, and on the same day the defendants obtained an order for the production of the ship's papers, which was not complied with until Jan. 1873.

On the 13th Feb. 1873 the defendants delivered pleas, including pleas of unseaworthiness, concealment, and deviation to the first count, and payment of 25l., the amount of the premium into court, on the count for money received.

Plaintiffs replied the same day, taking the money out of court, and taking issue on the other pleas, and gave notice of trial for the next London Sitting. The cause was not reached, and, ultimately, on the 2nd Dec. 1874, the plaintiffs served a rule to discontinue.

Some of the crew of the Balaclava, who were material and necessary witnesses for the defendants, were detained in this country for the purpose of being examined in the cause, and in consequence of the plaintiffs' delay in complying with the order for the production of the ship's papers, and to avoid further expense, they were examined before the master, under 1 Will. 4, c. 22, s. 4, in Aug. and Sept. 1872.

On taxing the defendants' costs on the rule to discontinue, the master refused to allow the costs of these witnesses, on the ground that they were costs incurred before instructions for plea.

By 1 Will. 4, c. 22, s. 4: "It shall be lawful to and for each of the said courts at Westminster . . . and the several judges thereof, in every action depending in such court, upon the application of any of the parties to such suit, to order the examination on oath . . . before the master . . . of the said court . . . of any witnesses within the jurisdiction of the court where the action shall be depending." . . .

By sect. 9: "The costs of every rule or order to be made for the examination of witnesses . . . by virtue of this Act, and of the proceedings thereupon, shall . . . be costs in the cause, unless otherwise directed." . . .

Rule 12. Regulæ Generales of Hilary Term 1853, is as follows:

When money is paid into court in respect of any particular sum or cause of action in the declaration, and the plaintiff accepts the same in satisfaction, the plaintiff, when the costs of the cause are taxed, shall be entitled to the costs of the cause in respect of that part of his claim so satisfied, up to the time the money is so paid in and taken out, whatever may be the result of and issue or issues in respect of other causes of action; and if the defendant succeeds in defeating the residue of the claim, he will be entitled to the costs of the cause in respect of such defence, commencing at "instructions for plea," but not before.

J. C. Mathew moved for a rule calling on the plaintiffs to show cause why the costs of the witnesses examined before the master, as above mentioned, should not be allowed to the defendants, or why the master's taxation should not be reviewed. The court granted a rule nisi to review the taxation.

Lanyon showed cause in the first instance.—The case depends entirely on the construction of Rule 12, and according to the plain meaning of the words of that rule, the defendants are not entitled to be allowed the costs of these witnesses, for the examination having taken place before instructions for plea, the costs were incurred before instructions for plea. [COCKBURN, C.J.—The witnesses were examined for the purpose of their depositions being made use of by being read in court on the trial.] The plaintiffs, having had a cause of action, are entitled to their costs until their claim was satisfied. The taxation is in accordance with the usual practice in Rule 12.

J. C. Mathew was not called on to support the rule.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I quite agree that the question turns entirely on the construction of Rule 12. When that rule is looked at it is plain that it contemplates different stages of procedure. When money is paid into court, and the plaintiff accepts the same in satisfaction, he is entitled to the costs of the cause in respect to the part of his claim satisfied up to the time when the money is paid in and taken out, whatever may be the result of the other issues. That contemplates the case where money is paid in in the ordinary course. Then the rule goes on, "and if the defendant succeeds in defeating the residue of the claim, he will be entitled to the costs of the cause in respect of such defence, commencing at 'instructions for plea,' but not before." Mr. Lanyon contends that, taking the latter part of the rule, inasmuch as these costs were incurred before instructions for plea, they cannot be recovered as costs in the cause by the defendants. But the rule is framed with regard to the different stages of procedure, and the examination took place in anticipation of the trial, and if these witnesses had been examined on the trial they would have been the defendants' witnesses. Assuming that no money had been paid in, if the plaintiffs' case had been made out on the money counts, yet they would have been the defendants' witnesses, and the master would have taxed their costs for the benefit of the defendants, as these costs would have been incurred in establishing the defendants' case; a fortiori, this would have been so if they had been called on the trial after money had been paid in. Does it then make any substantial difference that the witnesses were examined before the trial, and before instructions for plea? The rule is intended to meet the case of what is done for the purpose of preliminary proceedings, but these witnesses were examined for the purpose of the trial, and the costs, therefore, were costs in the cause, and were not incurred at such a stage of the proceedings as to bring them within this rule.

QUAIN, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. The costs here were incurred by the plaintiffs' act and default in not complying with the order for production of the ship's papers, in consequence of which the witnesses were kept in this country when it was doubtful if the plaintiffs would go on. The plaintiffs cannot take advantage of their own default. I also agree with my Lord that these costs were not costs incurred before instructions for plea, within the meaning of Rule 12. The witnesses were examined de bene esse, and the costs must be considered as having been incurred as if they had been examined at the trial in the ordinary course. The mere fact of the examination having taken place at an earlier date does not make any difference. The costs should be considered as incurred at the proper stage at which they would come in, and therefore should be allowed among the general costs in the cause. I think the rule ought to be made absolute.

FIELD, J.—I am of opinion that the rule should be made absolute, on the ground stated by my Lord. The declaration contains two counts, one on the policy and one for money received. As to the special count, there were pleas of unseaworthiness, concealment, and deviation, and as to the indebitatus count, 25*l.* was paid into court. In point of fact, the defendants succeeded, and the costs of these witnesses were a part of the costs of their defence. But it has been objected that they were incurred before instructions for plea, according to the construction of the last words of Rule 12, and the master held himself bound by the last words of the rule, if the costs came into existence before instructions for plea. I think that construction is too narrow. Here the costs were incurred in respect of a defence on which the defendants succeeded; if the cause had been tried, and no money paid into court, they would have been taxed as the defendants' costs. In point of time they were before instructions for plea; in fact, they were incurred for a defence after.

Rule absolute to review the master's taxation.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Reported by ETHERINGTON SMITH and J. M. LELY, Esqrs.,
Barristers-at-Law.

BROWN AND OTHERS v. POWELL DUFFRYN STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

Charter-party—Contract for master's signature to bill of lading—Signature by master for more tons than delivered—Payment by shipowner to consignees of sum of money in respect of difference—Whether sum so paid recoverable by shipowner from charterer—Bills of Lading Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111).

The signature of the master to the bill of lading does not estop the shipowner.

Declaration that it was agreed between the plaintiffs and the defendants by charter-party that the plaintiffs' ship should take on board, at Cardiff, a full cargo of coal, to be provided by the defendants, and proceed therewith to Buenos Ayres, "the master of the ship to sign bills of lading for weight of the said cargo put on board as presented to him by the defendants without prejudice to the tenor of the charter-party," and that the ship was loaded by the defendants with a cargo of 573 tons.

Breach, that the defendants presented to the master bills of lading for a weight of 605 tons, whereby the plaintiffs were rendered liable and forced to pay the consignees of the cargo a certain sum in respect of the difference between the cargo as indicated in the bill of lading and as actually shipped: Held, on demurrer to the breach, a bad declaration, inasmuch as the plaintiffs were not bound to pay the consignee such difference, and there was no warranty on the part of the defendants that the bill of lading was indisputably correct.

This was a demurrer to such part of a declaration as alleged a breach by the defendants of a charter-party.

The declaration stated that it was agreed by the charter-party that the plaintiffs' ship, called the Chigford, then at Newry, should proceed to Cardiff and there take on board as tendered a full and complete cargo of Powell's Duffryn steam coal, which the charterers bound themselves to provide for shipment, not exceeding what the said vessel could reasonably stow and carry, and being so loaded, should therewith proceed to Buenos Ayres or Rosario, as ordered on signing bills of lading, and deliver the cargo on being paid freight on the quantity delivered at the rate of 37*s.* per ton of 20*cwt.*, if for Buenos Ayres, or of 42*s.* per like ton if for Rosario, with 6*l.* gratuity in either case, the master paying dock and harbour dues, trimming, wharfage, and keelage on cargo, consulages, lights, pilotages, and other port charges whatsoever, certain perils and casualties excepted, the said freight to be paid as hereinafter mentioned on unloading and right delivery of the said cargo, sufficient cash for the ship's ordinary disbursements, not exceeding one-third of the amount to be advanced on signing bills of lading, less six per cent. for interest and insurance, sufficient cash for ship's disbursements to be advanced at the port of discharge, not exceeding one-third of the freight, and the remainder by approved bill upon London, at three months' date from the right delivery of cargo, the master of the said ship to sign bills of lading for weight of the said cargo put on board as presented to him by the defendants without prejudice to the tenor of the said charter-party, within twenty-four hours after the said coals should have been put on board, or pay 4*l.* per registered ton per day for each day's delay; that the ship sailed to Cardiff and was there loaded by the defendants with a cargo, consisting of a certain quantity, that is to say, 573 tons of Powell's Duffryn steam coal.

Averment of performance of conditions precedent.

Breach, that the defendants presented to the master of the said ship for his signature, and caused and procured him to sign certain bills of lading for the said cargo for a weight greatly exceeding the said weight so put on board as aforesaid, that is to say, for 605 tons, whereby the plaintiff was rendered liable to pay, and was forced to pay to the consignees of the said cargo at Buenos Ayres 31*l.*, as and for the value of the difference between the said 605 tons mentioned in the said bills of lading, and the said 573 tons so shipped as aforesaid, and a further sum of 13*l.* for dock and other dues and charges in respect of the same difference. And although the said ship was ordered to carry and carried the said agreed cargo in the said ship to Buenos Ayres aforesaid, and there unloaded and made right delivery of the said cargo according to the terms of the said charter-party, and although the said freight amounted in the whole to 1119*l.*, whereof a certain part was advanced according to the terms of the said charter-party, yet the remainder of the said freight was not paid by such bills as in the charter-party mentioned nor at all, and the same is wholly due and unpaid.

Demurrer, on the ground that it was not a breach of the terms of the charter-party.

Joinder in demurrer.

Lumley Smith, for the defendants, argued that the plaintiffs were under no obligation to pay the consignees damages for delivering a less amount than that specified in the bill of lading, inasmuch as the master could not bind the plaintiffs by his signature. This is so at common law, and the Bills of Lading Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111), (a) makes no difference:—

(a) Sect. 3 of 18 and 19 Vict. c. 111 is as follows: "Every bill of lading in the hands of a consignee or endorsed for valuable consideration representing goods to have been shipped on board a vessel shall be conclusive evidence of such shipment as against the master or other persons signing the same, notwithstanding that such goods, or some parts thereof, may not have been so shipped unless such holder of the bill of lading shall have had actual notice at the time of receiving the same that the goods had not been in fact lading on board. Provided that the master or other person so signing may exonerate himself in respect of such misrepresentation by showing that it was caused without any default on his part, and wholly by the fraud of the shipper, or of the holder, or some person under whom the holder claims."

Grant v. Norway, 10 C.B. 665;
Jessel v. Bath, L. Rep. 2 Ex. 267;
McLean v. Fleming, ante, vol. 1, p. 160; L. Rep. 2 Sc. App. 128.

"We are called upon for the first time," said Kelly, C.B., in Jessel v. Bath (ubi sup.), "to put a construction on this statute (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111), and it is fit that we should state our opinion as to its effect with reference to the character of the party signing the bill of lading where an action is brought against the owner or charterer. . . . Here the master has not signed, but other persons, the Messrs. Barchi, have; are, then, the defendants within the second branch of the alternative of the statute? They cannot be so, unless Messrs. Barchi's signature is equivalent to their own, that is, unless Messrs. Barchi have signed in their place. It appears that these gentlemen, the defendant's agents, have signed in conformity with a practice arising out of circumstances which would make it not merely inconvenient, but impossible, for the agents to weigh the goods, and that the weight is accordingly taken from the shipper. It appears that, under such circumstances, the agent signs instead of the master, and that no difference is recognised, as any matter of trade usage or understanding between the efficacy of a signature by the master. Messrs. Barchi signed instead of the master, and not instead of the defendants; and if this action had been against the master the point raised by the plaintiff might have been material, but being neither against the master nor against the person actually signing the bill of lading, it entirely fails."

F. Meadows White, for the plaintiffs, argued that the breach assigned in the declaration was a good breach of the charter-party; inasmuch as there was an express if not an implied warranty by the defendants that they would present bills of lading for the correct weight.

Lumley Smith in reply.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion that our judgment ought to be for the defendants.

The declaration is on a charter-party made between the plaintiffs as shipowners, and the defendants as charterers, and containing a stipulation on the part of the plaintiffs that the master of the ship chartered should sign bills of lading for weight of the cargo put on board as presented to him by the defendants without prejudice to the tenor of the charter-party. There is an averment that the defendants presented and the master signed bills for an amount exceeding that actually shipped by thirty-two tons, and that the plaintiffs paid the consignees of the cargo two sums of 31*l.* and 13*l.* in respect of the difference; and the breach is that the defendants have not repaid those sums to the plaintiffs. The defendants have demurred on the ground that the plaintiffs were under no obligation to pay to the consignees the sums which the plaintiffs now seek to recover from the defendants.

Now it is plain from the authorities, especially from Maclean v. Fleming (ubi sup.) that the master of a ship, by signing bills of lading, does not bind the owner to deliver the amount of goods specified in the bills, but only the amount which has been actually put on board. But it is said that although such may be the general principle of law, the charterers have by this particular charter-party avoided the application of that principle, so that the shipowners were obliged either to deliver to the consignees the exact quantity named in the bill of lading, or else to make good to them the money payment which they have made. But I take the true construction of the clause relied on for the plaintiffs to be this, that it stipulates only that the master shall sign as such, that it empowers the master to bind himself only, and that it leaves the shipowners to dispute all that was testified by his signature, if the testimony of such signature should be contrary to the fact.

WELLS v. THE MAYOR, &C., OF KINGSTON-UPON-HULL.

There is nothing in this charter-party to alter the ordinary rule to that effect. The demurrer therefore must be allowed.

BRETT, J.—This is an action by shipowners for breach of warranty on the part of charterers, the alleged warranty being that the defendants would present absolutely correct bills of lading for the master of the plaintiffs' ship to sign. No fraud whatever is alleged, and the alleged warranty amounts to an engagement not to make a mistake.

Now such a warranty must be either expressed in the charter-party or to be implied from it, and as it is admitted there was no express warranty, we have only to see whether or not there was an implied one. It is suggested that there must be such a warranty because it is said to be obvious from the terms of the charter-party that the plaintiffs would be liable to the consignees. But it appears from Maclean v. Fleming (ubi sup.), that a bill of lading does not bind the master to deliver a larger amount of cargo than that actually shipped.

But Mr. White contends that this would be different abroad. The consignees abroad might, he says, have different rights from the rights of consignees in England. But their rights would depend on the true construction of the bill of lading, which by the comity of nations would govern the contract, whatever might be the law of the country in which the consignees might reside. This we must assume to be the law in the absence of any authority to the contrary.

There is, therefore, nothing on which to ground an implied warranty. I was, I confess, much struck by the argument that the absence of liability on the part of the shipowner is in ordinary cases founded upon the absence of authority to the master, whereas by the present charter-party there is an express authority to the master to sign the bill of lading. Now I agree, that as between the plaintiffs and the defendants, the master was authorised to sign. And the obvious reason for this is that the obligation to deliver a certain quantity was not to depend on the bill of lading, but on what the quantity might turn out to be at the port of delivery. But even if the bill of lading had been signed by the plaintiffs themselves, at common law there would have been no estoppel, for they would not have been bound to deliver more than the amount actually shipped.

Then the Bill of Lading Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 111), provides by sect. 3, "that every bill of lading shall be conclusive evidence of a shipment as against the master or other person signing the same." And as the master here had no doubt authority to sign this unusual bill of lading, it is argued that this signature was the signature of the plaintiffs. Now where it is said in Jessel v. Bath (ubi sup.), that no person is to be bound except the person actually signing, the court does not mean that there must be a manual signature, but it would be enough if the signature were an authorised signature; at the same time, however, the signature must be that of the person who is to be bound by it. But whatever might be the authority of the master, there was no estoppel.

Therefore, on the true construction of the charter-party, there was no express or implied warranty, and our judgment must be for the defendants.

DENMAN, J.—I am not at all sure that the point which has been most argued is the point which was intended to be argued upon this demurrer, which is a demurrer not to the whole declaration, but to that part of it which sets out the first breach.^(a) Now, the first breach is founded on the words "the master to sign bills of lading for weight of the said cargo put on board as presented to him by the defendants," and the breach laid is that the defendants presented for the master's signature certain bills of lading for a weight greatly exceeding the weight put on board. The agreement, I take it was that the master should sign only for the cargo actually shipped, whereas the breach is framed as if his signature was intended to be conclusive as to the amount. The demurrer hits the discrepancy between the agreement and the breach, the declaration having charged the defendant with not having done that which he had never promised that he would do.

WELLS v. THE MAYOR, &C., OF KINGSTON-UPON-HULL.

Contract—Interest in land within sect. 4 of the Statute of Frauds—Licence to use graving dock—Corporation—Contract with—When it may be not under seal.

A municipal corporation being the owners of a graving dock, permitted the use of it to shipowners for the purpose of repairing their ships upon certain terms specified in a series of regulations. Under these it was necessary for the shipowner to enter the name of his vessel in a book kept by the Borough Treasurer and pay an entrance fee, and the use of the dock was granted in the order of priority of application, and each vessel was required to take her turn at the time of which notice was given to the owner. Certain charges were made for dockage, and it was required that they be paid before the vessel left the dock. The gates of the dock were under the control of an officer of the corporation who opened and closed them for the docking and undocking of the vessels. The use of blocks and shores the property of the corporation was permitted to the vessels in the dock, but the shipowners were made responsible for them, and also for cleaning out the dock daily to the satisfaction of the officer of the corporation. The plaintiff duly entered a vessel and paid the entrance fee, but the defendants admitted another vessel in the turn which properly belonged to the plaintiff. Upon an action for damages in respect of the breach of contract in not giving the plaintiff's ship her turn in order, a verdict was returned for the plaintiff.

Held, first, that the contract was not intended to be and was not concerning an interest in land, and therefore need not be in writing under the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds, and secondly, that being a matter of frequent occurrence and of daily necessity, the case came within the recognised exceptions to the rule that a corporation can only contract under its common seal, and that this contract, though not under seal, was nevertheless binding on the defendants.

(a) The other breaches were not demurred to.

This was an action tried before Archibald, J., at the Spring Assizes for the West riding of Yorkshire at Leeds in 1874.

The plaintiff was a shipowner at Kingston-upon-Hull, and the owner of a steamship called the Wells. The defendants, who are the Municipal Corporation of Hull are proprietors of a graving dock, built upon and which they hold as part of the old corporate property. They are an ancient corporation appointed by Royal Charter originally, and came under the Municipal Corporations Act on the passing of that measure. This graving dock the defendants are accustomed to let to persons requiring the same for the purpose of repairing their ships, and they let it subject to and in accordance with certain regulations, which are of importance in this case, and are as follows :

Regulations for the Corporation Graving Dock.

1. The dock will be let to parties requiring the same for the repair of vessels, at such rates as the council of the borough shall from time to time sanction.
2. With a view to secure to parties as far as possible the use of the dock, in the order of priority of application, a book is kept by the borough treasurer at the Town Hall, in which the names of all vessels intended for repair in the dock must be entered, and as far as practicable priority will be given to vessels in the order of entry, subject nevertheless to these regulations ; and also in case of any question as to priority of any vessels, such question shall be determined by the borough treasurer in such manner as he shall see fit, and his decision shall be final.
3. No changing of turns shall be allowed.
4. No vessel is to be entered in the book except by a written order from the owner or master.
5. On entering each vessel a sum of 3*l.* 3*s.* shall be paid to the borough treasurer as entrance money.
6. The entrance money will be allowed as part of the dockage if the account for such dockage and moneys payable in respect of the vessel shall be paid within ten days after the same is sent in. If the account is not so paid, the entrance money will be absolutely forfeited. The entrance money and the right of turn for the use of the dock will also be absolutely forfeited if the vessel does not take her turn at the time specified at the time of entry, or subsequently fixed by notice (written or verbal) given to the owner, master, or other person in charge, or having the docking of the vessel.
7. The treasurer may on behalf of the corporation, notwithstanding the preceding regulation require the payment of all dockage or other moneys payable in respect of any vessel before such vessel is allowed to leave the dock, and to preserve the lien of the corporation may detain any such vessel, and dockage in respect of the vessel will be chargeable during such time as she may be so detained in the dock.
8. The corporation foreman will open and close the dock gates for the docking and undocking of vessels as may be required.
9. The ground blocks and horizontal shores of the corporation may be used for vessels in the dock, but the parties using the same must take all risks and responsibility in respect thereof and of selecting and placing the same.
10. If any injury or damage shall be done to the dock, dock gates, engines, machine, blocks, shores, stores, or any other property of the corporation, by any vessel, or by any person employed thereon or connected therewith, or if any of the blocks or shores are left adrift or lost, full compensation, to be assessed and fixed by the corporation surveyor, shall be paid by the occupier of the dock or owner of the vessel, and the compensation when so fixed shall in like manner as dockage be deemed moneys payable in respect of the vessel, and shall be paid and recoverable accordingly.

11. The dock must be cleaned out each day at the expense of the vessel occupying it, to the satisfaction of the corporation foreman or other person in charge of the dock, and in the event of the occupier of the dock not fulfilling this regulation the corporation will do the work, and all charges or expenses in respect thereof shall be charged to the occupier of the dock or owner of the vessel and deemed moneys payable in respect of the vessel, and be paid and recoverable accordingly.

12. The corporation will for the convenience of parties occupying the dock, afford the usual facilities for using the same, but on this distinct stipulation, that the dock will in all cases be let subject to the parties occupying the same undertaking all risks and responsibilities whatsoever, as the corporation not being a trading body will not be responsible for any injury, damage, or detention however caused, occurring to any vessel docking or undocking, or being in the dock, or for any damage whatever resulting to the owner of such vessel or any other person connected therewith.

13. The corporation will not guarantee the depth of water shown by the scale at the entrance of the dock, or any other depth of water over the approaches to the dock.

By order of the Town Council.
Hull, 3rd Jan. 1873.

In March 1873 the plaintiff wanted to repair his steamship Wells, and on March 15th his clerk engaged the graving dock for the Wells, by going to the Treasurer's office paying the entrance fee, and having her name entered in the book. Her turn was to be next after the St. Petersburg. When, however, the St. Petersburg came out of the dock the defendants allowed another steamship called the Aberdeenshire to take the turn which belonged to the Wells, and the latter was consequently delayed, and the plaintiff put to considerable expense in having his ship repaired at another place. It was to recover damages for this delay, and for the expenses so incurred by the breach of contract by the defendants in not giving the Wells her turn, that the plaintiff sued in this action. The declaration contained three special counts, and a money count, one setting out the above regulations. The defendants' pleas traversed the agreement, and further alleged that it was made subject to its being practicable to dock the Wells, and that it was not practicable. The amount of the entrance money was paid into court.

At the trial the learned judge ruled that the contract was not a contract of an interest in land, but a mere licence of the dock, and was not required to be in writing or to be under seal.

The jury found that the plaintiff was ready to avail himself of the turn as soon as the St. Petersburg left the dock, and that there was not due care and caution on the part of the defendants to give the plaintiff his turn. Upon this the learned judge ruled that the defendants were answerable for the want of care and caution, and directed a verdict for the plaintiff, and reserving leave to the defendants to move to enter a verdict for them upon the ground that to render the defendants liable the contract in question ought to have been in writing, and that it ought to have been under the seal of the corporation.

Accordingly, in Easter Term 1874, Field, Q.C., moved for and obtained a rule nisi in the above term, against which

Wills, Q.C. and Mellor now showed cause.—The first point raised by the defendants is that this contract was concerning an interest in land. But the fair inference from the regulations and the course of business, is that there was no intention to let land, when a ship was allowed to use the graving dock. The employment of the words "let," and "take possession of" does not necessarily mean demise, see

R. v. Smith, 3 E. & E. 383;
Bean v. Hogg, 10 Bing. 345;
Wright v. Stavert, 2 E. & E. 731; 2 L. T. Rep. N. S. 175.

It is merely a licence to take the ship into the dock and there repair her. [DENMAN, J.—It would be a test to consider if trespass could be brought by the occupier against anyone interfering with his occupation, especially against one of the corporation's servants.] The regulations provide for the presence of the corporation foreman; the occupier cannot get into or out of the dock without him. The words in regulations 2, 6, and 12, "use of the dock," and "using the dock," show what was really contemplated. The case of Watkins v. Overseers of Milton-next-Gravesend (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 601; L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 350), is in point as showing that a licence to use moorings fixed to the soil is not a demise so as to make the licensee an occupier. The question is fully discussed also in Roads v. Overseers of Trumpington (23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 821; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 56). If the dock here were let to each successive person who uses it, the occupier would be liable to be rated, and would be rated in respect of his occupation. This could not be in such a case as the present. There is only a permission to come on the land for a particular purpose and for a time. Just as a person in an inn may have a right to a room, but not to any particular room. [LORD COLERIDGE, C. J.—The judgment of Hill, J., in Wright v. Stavert (ubi sup.) instances a governess to whom a room is assigned. DENMAN, J.—If this was a mere licence, was it not revocable? See Wood v. Leadbitter (13 M. & W. at p. 844).] That case decides that a right to come and remain for a certain time on the land of another can be granted only by deed; but a licence coupled with a grant of an interest in the land which would be irrevocable is not to be assumed here. The second point is that the defendants, being a corporation, could only have entered into this contract under their common seal. But to the general rule as to corporations contracting under seal, there are well recognised exceptions, one of which is that the formality may be dispensed with where the matter is of necessity or urgency. Now here the corporation cannot hold a meeting without three days' notice being given, and yet the very object of a dock like this is to admit ships immediately. As a fact the Aberdeenshire, which was admitted instead of the Wells, was in a sinking state. It would defeat the very object of the work of the corporation as owners of the dock. The South of Ireland Colliery Company v. Waddle (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 405; L. Rep. 8 C. P. 463), shows that where the contract is for a purpose connected with the objects of the corporation, the seal is dispensed with. [LORD COLERIDGE, C. J.—That is a case of a trading corporation. What do you say to Ludlow v. The Mayor of Charlton (6 M. & W. 815)?] That decision was on the ground that there was no paramount convenience so great as to amount to necessity; if there had been it would have come within the exceptions to the rule stated in the judgment as applicable to municipal as well as to trading corporations. [DENMAN, J.—Referred to Austin v. The Guardians of St. Matthews Bethnal Green (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 807; L. Rep. 9 C. P. 91.) In that case the duties of the appointee were too important to admit of an informal appointment, and another late case The Mayor, &c., of Kidderminster v. Hardwick (29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 611; L. Rep. 9 Ex. 13) was where it was a question of letting tolls, and there was no hurry. Having regard to the facts of this case it is almost a reductio ad absurdum to suppose that the admission of disabled ships into this dock could be done in any other way than it was. In Church v. The Imperial Gas Company (6 A. & E. 846), the rules and its exceptions are fully stated by Lord Denman as they are applicable to municipal corporations, and this case comes within those exceptions.

Maule, Q. C. and Cave in support of the rule.—On the point as to the necessity of the seal, there has been throughout an assumption of urgency which did not exist. It was rather a deliberate proceeding in reality, as there were the formalities of going to the office, assenting to the rules, and having the priority registered on payment of the fee. That shows that there was in contemplation time during which the ship would be waiting her turn. It would not be any difficulty so great as suggested to affix the seal to these contracts because the corporation might appoint an officer for the purpose to do this by rule. Pollock, B. says, in The Mayor of Kidderminster v. Hardwick (ubi sup.) "It is open to every corporation to get rid of the whole difficulty by appointing an agent to act for them under seal." All exceptions which have been made are in favour of trading corporations, and the last case is that of the South of Ireland Colliery Company v. Waddle (ubi sup.), where the exception is expressly put on that ground, as it was said that the contract was for a purpose connected with the objects of the corporation. This is not so here, this is an ancient corporation, and the letting of this dock is in no sense one of the objects of its existence, the dock is built on corporate land and the corporation might have made any other use of it they pleased. Dyte v. The St. Pancras Board of Guardians (27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 342), where there was a non-trading corporation decided, that the appointment of a medical officer to an infirmary must be made under seal. The exceptions then are in the case of trading corporations and in trading matters. The London Dock Company v. Sinnott (8 E. & B. 347) is even stronger in our favour because there the plaintiffs, though a trading corporation, were held not bound by a parol agreement to execute a contract for scavenging the docks. Again The Copper Miner's Company v. Fox (16 Q. B. 229), where the contract was relating to a purpose for which the plaintiffs were not incorporated, it was held not binding on them. The other point is that this contract ought to have been in writing because it was within the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds. On this point Wood v. Leadbitter is a direct authority. That was where a ticket of admission to the grand stand at Doncaster, was held to be a grant of an interest in land, and not being by deed was revocable as a mere parol licence. This is an a fortiori case because here the possession must be an exclusive one. It is said that the 8th Rule negatives exclusive possession, but it is clear that the corporation foreman is only present as a porter or concierge, and does not interfere with the occupation by the shipowner. It was asked if trespass could be maintained against the foreman, but it is to meet that possibility that there is the special provision inserted admitting him. The contention must therefore be either that we gave a licence to the plaintiff to come upon our land, in which case it was revocable, and so no action will lie, which brings the case within Wood v. Leadbitter (ubi sup.) or that we gave an irrevocable licence, and that this was a contract to grant an irrevocable licence. Now a licence only becomes irrevocable when it is accompanied by an interest, and such an interest must be either a chattel interest or an interest in land; here, however, it cannot be a chattel interest but it must be an interest in the graving dock which is an interest in land. If the action therefore is maintainable, it must be on the ground that this contract conveyed an interest in land. It seems plain that if a stranger broke down the dock gates the occupier could maintain trespass against him, and it would seem that such a licence as there was here would amount to a demise. R. v. Winter (2 Salk. 588). And if the rating be a test, such an occupier as the plaintiff might be rated, as has been held in cases where there was no such exclusive possession as the shipowners here have. R. v. The Inhabitants of St. Martin's (3 Q.B. 204), and Roads v. The Overseers of Trumington (23 L. T. Rep. N.S. 821; L. Rep. 6, Q.B. 56). We are not obliged indeed to go so far here as to show that the occupiers of the dock would be entitled to be rated, but they are as much tenants as tenants of furnished lodgings, and an agreement to occupy them is an interest in land within the statute. Inman v. Stamp (1 Stark. 12). Occupying a stall in a market under an agreement would give a settlement. R. v. Caversham (4 B. & C. 683); and Buszard v. Capel (8 B. & C. 141), shows that where the exclusive use is demised the land is demised. Selby v. Greaves (19 L. T. Rep. N.S. 186; L. Rep. 3 C.P. 594), and Mayor of Yarmouth v. Groom (7 L. T. Rep. N.S. 161; 1 H. & C. 102), show that the contract here amounted to a demise. But if the plaintiff here had an interest in land not amounting to a demise, it would still be sufficient to bring the case within the statute (Evans v. Roberts (5 B. & C. 829); Smart v. Jones (33 L. J. 154. C. P.). Wood v. Lake (Sayer 3), which is referred to in Wood v. Leadbitter (ubi sup.), and would seem to be rather against the defendants' contention has been questioned by Lord St. Leonards, who thought that the agreement there amounted to a lease; and the case cannot therefore be upheld as an authority. [HUDDLESTON, J.—The case is cited in Chitty on Contracts, p. 280, without any suggestion that it has been overruled.] It is further distinguishable as there there was only a licence to stack coals on part of a close, and here we say that the contract was for the whole use of the dock, and so was a demise; and that is what Lord St. Leonards thinks that the licence in Wood v. Lake (ubi sup.), really was, in which case the decision must be wrong: (Sugden Vendors and Purchasers, 14th edit., p. 124). He says, "Wood v. Lake was not considered an authority."

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—This case has been argued at some length before us, and a number of cases cited and arguments used more or less relevant to the points raised for our consideration, but disembarrassed of most of these, I am of opinion that the case is in reality a simple one, and admits of an easy decision.

It was an action brought by a shipowner against the defendants for an alleged breach of contract, and to recover damages for the injury to the plaintiff arising from that breach. As I understand the facts they are these. A contract in the terms of the regulations which are before us was entered into, and upon the payment of three guineas it was agreed that the plaintiff's ship should in her turn be allowed to go into the defendants' graving dock. That contract was broken by the defendants permitting another ship to go in instead of the plaintiff's ship, and for the damage consequent on the delay the action was brought and a verdict obtained.

A rule to set aside that verdict was granted, and it has been endeavoured to be supported upon two grounds. First, that the contract, if it was a contract at all, was one relating to an interest in land within the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds, and must have been in writing, and that this was not; and secondly, that the defendants being a corporation, and not a trading but a municipal corporation, could only contract under their corporation seal, and they had not here done so.

There are thus only two points to be discussed, and they may be, as I have said, in my opinion, easily disposed of.

First, was it an interest in land that this contract dealt with? This may depend on two considerations, was it intended by the parties to deal with an interest in land, and again, apart from intention, have they nevertheless dealt with such an interest? In either of these cases the contract would be brought within the 4th section of the Statute of Frauds, and it must be in writing for the plaintiff to be held responsible for a breach of it; but if neither of these suggestions be answered in the affirmative, then it is unnecessary that the contract should be in writing, and the parties to it will be bound by its terms. Now, prima facie, no one would think that such an arrangement as took place here was to be a grant of an interest in land. It was, as we know, an arrangement for the use of the graving dock by the plaintiff, but if there was such an intention as has been suggested, then it must have been the exclusive possession for a certain time of the land and the dock that was attempted to be conveyed to the plaintiff. I however am clearly of opinion that there was no intention to pass any interest in the land. It is incredible that the framers of the regulations or the shipowners, indeed, that either of the parties intended to deal with the land at all. They intended to deal with the use of the dock and the appliances for the repairing of the ships. It is equally clear that no interest was attempted to be created irrespective of intention, and intention must be gathered from the language of the regulations. Now look at that for a moment; the words "let," and "occupier" do not necessarily mean the creation of an interest in land by way of tenancy, and they are not words of art, but must be read by the light thrown upon them by the whole document. The heading speaks of the "occupation of the Corporation Graving Dock." The first no doubt says the dock will be let; and the second is a provision somewhat in favour of the defendants in so far as it says, though there is a contract, it is to be fulfilled only so far as is practicable, and the borough treasurer is to decide any question that may arise. The fifth regulation however shows that the payment of the entrance money constitutes part of the consideration, and the forfeiture of the entrance money shows that no right is given to the shipowners even to go into the dock. So far, therefore, as it seems to me, there is nothing inconsistent with the intention on the part of the defendants of keeping the dock in the possession and under the control of the corporation. That being so, what shall be said as to the 7th rule. (His Lordship then read the rule.) "Before the ship shall leave the dock"—that is before she shall leave the ground which they say is the shipowner's exclusive property. This contemplates locking the gate, for which they say the shipowner might maintain trespass against the corporation. I can scarcely conceive language stronger than this is indicative of a retention of the possession of the dock, coupled as it is with the notice of a lien being held on the ship while she is on the land said to be exclusively in possession of her owner. The 8th rule shows that the alleged tenant cannot open and shut his own door. The 9th and 10th make provision how corporation property is to be used by the ship using the corporation dock; that surely is a fair intendment that the corporation meant to keep the dock and everything belonging to it in their own possession, for they treat the owner of the ship and the occupier of the dock as synonymous terms, and hold them liable for the use of corporation property. The 11th speaks of the "corporation foreman, or other person in charge of the dock," and in the 12th they contract that the persons who use the dock shall have certain advantages which the corporation as owners can give. These, then, are the terms of the instrument from which it is said that a demise is to be inferred. It would be startling if the language in that instrument had said something so different from what we know must have been the intention of the framers of it; but the language is not, as I have shown contrary to the intention, it is to my mind quite plain, and it lays down on behalf of the corporation the terms on which this property is to be used. If the question of intention be raised, I decide against the corporation on the words which intimate no such intention; if the words are to be looked at apart from any question of intention I decide in the same way that they do not convey any interest in land.

We are well within decided cases in so holding, and the judgment of Hill, J., in the case I first referred to, Smith v. The Overseers, &c., of St. Michael's, Cambridge (3 L. T. Rep. N. S. 687; 30 L. J. 74, M. C.), is expressly in point as to the principle. He says, "We think we must look not so much to the words as to the substance of the agreement, and taking the whole together we think it must be construed not as a demise of the five rooms, but as an agreement by which the appellant came into possession of those rooms, and keeping a servant there for himself; and certainly the exclusive enjoyment of the rooms was to be given in the same way as the guest at the inn, or a lodger in a house, has a separate apartment, or the master of a ship has a separate cabin, in which case the possession remains in the innkeeper, the lodging-house keeper, and the shipowner." It is true as has been pointed out that this is a rating case, and that there may be an occupation sufficient to constitute an interest in land within the Statute of Frauds, which would not be sufficient to entitle (as it is somewhat ironically expressed) the occupier to be rated. The incidents may not indeed be the same in the two cases, but looking here at the clear words of the instrument, I say that there was no intention to demise an interest in land, and that none has been by those words demised. Wright v. Stavert (ubi sup.) is also in point, and the language of Hill, J., is again lucid and clear. He says, "the defendant's position here is directly analogous to that of a domestic servant or a governess, or a person employed to build a house upon another's land, all of whom have a right, incidental to their respective contracts, to go upon land in order to carry out their contracts; but none of whom take under their contracts any interest in the land upon which they are thus entitled to go." That hits the distinction to be taken between the cases. There was no intention to convey any interest in the land, but a leave given to go upon the land to do certain work.

I do not feel called upon to go into the nice points that have been argued upon Wood v. Leadbitter (ubi sup.). They do not seem to me fairly to arise, and the dilemma ingeniously put by Mr. Cave upon either horn of which he invited Mr. Willis to take his seat, does not really arise. This is not on the one hand a mere licence, and therefore revocable, nor on the other a licence coupled with an interest in land so as to be within the statute, but it is a contract to allow the plaintiff the use of the corporation property for a time, they keeping possession all the time by means of their servants, and only allowing the use of it under stringent regulations.

Next as to the question whether this contract should have been under seal. There is a distinction, and it is a sound distinction, between trading and municipal corporations. Therefore, the cases which have been decided on the capacity of trading corporations to contract without the formality of a seal are not applicable. There are no cases to show that municipal corporations when engaged in business which is in the nature of trading are to be allowed the immunities which are given to professedly trading corporations. This, therefore, being a municipal corporation, is subject to the rules affecting those bodies. I find in Comyn and Salkeld the rule laid down, but also that it is subject to an exception, and that exception is well put in the judgments in Church v. The Imperial Gas Company and Ludlow v. The Mayor of Charlton (ubi sup.), in the latter of which Lord Denman's judgment in the former is set out at length. We have, therefore, the authority of the Courts of Queen's Bench and Exchequer in laying down this exception to the rule: "Wherever to hold the rule applicable would occasion very great inconvenience or tend to defeat the very object for which the Corporation was created the exception has prevailed; hence the retainer by parol of an inferior servant, the doing of acts very frequently recurring, or too insignificant to be worth the trouble of affixing the common seal, are established exceptions." To this Rolfe, B. agrees in the considered judgment in Ludlow v. the Mayor of Charlton (ubi sup.). Now I can hardly conceive any matter more exactly coming under this description of "acts very frequently recurring," than that of letting a ship into dock. It comes therefore most obviously within the exceptions to the rule as to the necessity of a corporation contracting under its common seal, exceptions which have been engrafted on it from the earliest times, and which have been applied to municipal corporations. It is enough to say generally that in Williams', Saunders, in Comyn's Digest, and in Brooke's Abridgment, the exception has been recognised from the earliest time as having been engrafted on the rule; that the facts of this case bring it within the exceptions, and that upon this second point also, I am of opinion that the defendants have failed, and the rule must be discharged.

WELLS v. THE MAYOR, &C., OF KINGSTON-UPON-HULL.

DENMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion.

On the first point upon which the rule was granted, viz., that to render the defendants liable the contract in question ought to have been in writing, of course that turns on the question whether a writing was necessary under the Statute of Frauds. I agree that it is not the duty of the court to take any single words occurring in the documents which constitute the contract, as being conclusive of the rights between the parties, on the simple meaning of such words alone; as here I am of opinion that it entirely depends upon what the court may think is the real nature of the contract entered into by the payment of the three guineas on the one side and the grant of the use of the dock on the other, both being in accordance with the printed regulations. The mere use of the expression, "the dock will be let," is not conclusive of a demise, as the Lord Chief Justice has said; and if it were to be held so, it would give rise to the strange anomaly that we should treat the parties as using words in one direction as conclusive, when in the very same document other expressions might be found as strong the other way, which we should be obliged to disregard. For example, the word, "let," occurs, but "rent" is never mentioned, it is "rate" and so, in like manner, on every clause similar observations might be made. I will not go through them all again, as my Lord has done so at length and in detail, and I could add nothing. It is not anything amounting to a demise of the land to a shipowner when he pays the entrance fee of three guineas. What he acquires is a right to have his vessel repaired there, but not of taking the dock for a moment out of the possession of the corporation. It is, I think, idle to say that a liability to rating could arise in the occupier, or that he could maintain trespass against the corporation. It is not, therefore, such an agreement as to give any right to or interest in the land, for many of the terms are wholly inconsistent with that construction of it. It is a complex contract, no doubt, and under it the corporation by their servants retain full control over the dock, subject only to such use of it as is shown by the regulations to be granted to the plaintiff. I need not go through all the cases decided on the statute; if there is one which is nearer than another to this, it is Wood v. Lake (ubi sup.) nor can I find that upon the point on which it is here applicable, it has been overruled. It is true that in reference to a question decided upon another matter in it, there is the great authority of Lord St. Leonards against it. It is, however, very like this case, but to my mind the present is even stronger than that is, against there being an interest in land dealt with by the contract.

On the other point, as to whether the contract ought to have been under seal or not I think that there was no necessity for it. The grounds on which a corporate seal is required to documents binding the corporation, are that as a general rule a corporation has no other means of expressing its will. Here, however, the case does not turn on the rule, but on the exceptions to it, and those exceptions are well set out in Chitty on contracts, quoted from the judgment of Best, C. J., in the East London Waterworks v. Bailey (4 Bing. 283): "The first exception is where the contract is executed, in that case the law implies a promise and a deed under seal is not necessary. The next exception is where the acts done are of daily necessity to the corporation, or too insignificant to be worth the trouble of affixing the common seal." Now, I think that in this case this is a thing which falls within the description of daily necessity. I cannot conceive that business of this kind could be carried on, if it could be done only by affixing the seal on every occasion when a shipowner wanted to put his ship into dock. I think it also falls within the doctrine where a thing is said to be too insignificant to be worth having the seal affixed. "A fourth exception is where the acts to be done must be done immediately, and it would be impossible to wait for the formality of the corporation seal." Surely this is a case where the act must be done immediately. It would not be business-like to wait for the corporation seal when a vessel, perhaps in a sinking state, was wanting to be admitted to the graving dock. It has been said truly that there is a wide distinction between trading and municipal corporations, but these exceptions which I have read are all applicable to the latter class, and it is as so applicable that Best, C. J. points them out. He proceeds further to show how the principle of necessity applies to and is carried still further in the case of trading corporations, and therefore the result of his judgment in this respect comes to this, that he recognises the distinction between the two classes of corporations on this ground, that, in the case of trading corporations, the rule of necessity authorises things to be done without a seal which municipal corporations could not do without that formality, but, nevertheless, the rule of necessity is applicable in general terms to both, to municipal as well as trading corporations. I have said that I think this is a case of necessity, and, as it is my opinion that the exceptions to which I have referred apply, I think that this rule must be discharged.

HUDDLESTON, J. I am of the same opinion. My judgment is governed by a view of the facts before us.

On the first question, was it intended to create the relationship of landlord and tenant by this contract, and give the exclusive possession of the dock to the plaintiff? It is to me quite clear that there was no intention that the graving dock should be exclusively handed over to the occupation of the plaintiff as tenant, and, looking at the regulations and for the reasons given by the Lord Chief Justice, it is obvious that those regulations do not create an interest in it in the shipowner who uses the dock. Mr. Wills said that it was proved that some one was always present on behalf of the corporation in charge of the dock, and this not being denied would alone go far to show that the possession remained in the defendants. The case cited of Watkins v. The Overseers of Milton-neat Gravesend (ubi sup.), supports the view of the facts where Mellor, J., says: "The agreement only amounts to this, I give you liberty to moor the hulk there, and I will not give the liberty to anybody else." So as I read it, the only intention here was, you may come in in your turn, pay a certain sum when you have finished the repairs, and go out; if you do not pay we will keep you in and charge you also for the time during which we so detain you. So much for the intention; there was certainly none to demise the exclusive possession, and it was not in fact demised, therefore there was no necessity that this contract should be in writing.

On the second point, as to the seal, I agree with the rest of the court. I referred during the argument to Church v. The Imperial Gas Company (ubi sup.), and the general rule laid down by Lord Denman, which has been read. I quite agree that in this case the exceptions are as they have been stated by my Lord and my brother Denman, and the facts bring the case within them. The point was considered again in the South of Ireland Colliery Company v. Waddle (ubi sup.), and though there it was a case of a trading corporation, yet Montague Smith, J., says that the exceptions on which we rely here still apply to municipal and ecclesiastical corporations.

I think, therefore, that this rule ought to be discharged

Collision—Compulsory pilotage—Ship carrying cargo and passengers from Boulogne to London.

A steamship carrying cargo and passengers from Boulogne to London is not bound under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), to employ a pilot whilst navigating the river Thames, the general exemption continued from 6 Geo. 4 c. 125, sect. 59, and the order in council of 18th Feb. 1854, by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 353, not being overridden by sect. 379, relating to Trinity House pilotage and exempting such a ship only when not carrying passengers. Reg. v. Stanton (8 Ell. & Bl. 445), and The Earl of Auckland (Lush. 164, 387), followed.

THIS was a cause of collision instituted on behalf of the owner of the dumb barge Alice against the steamship Moselle, her owners the General Steam Navigation Company intervening. The cause was originally instituted in the City of London Court, and was transferred into the High Court by order of the latter court.

At the time of the collision the barge was moored alongside a sailing ship called the Elizabeth, in the Cherry Garden Tier, Rotherhithe, in the River Thames. This tier is a usual place for vessels to lie and unload in barges, and the Alice was wholly out of the usual course of navigation and was properly moored. The Moselle was charged by the plaintiff with neglecting to keep out of the way of the barge.

The collision was admitted by the defendants, and it was alleged in their answer that the Moselle was proceeding up the River Thames in charge of a duly licensed Trinity House pilot, at the rate of about 6 knots an hour; that just before the collision the helm of the Moselle was, by order of her pilot, starboarded to pass to the southward of a sailing barge which was driving up ahead of the Moselle; that by order of the pilot the helm of the Moselle was then put hard a port and her engines stopped, but that she with her stem and port sponson struck the barge Alice, lying in the Cherry Garden Tier. The answer then contained the following allegation:

4. The said collision was caused by the fault or incapacity of the said pilot, and not by any neglect or default on the part of the master and crew of the Moselle; and the said pilot was a qualified pilot, who, at the time of the said collision, was acting in charge of the Moselle within a district where the employment of such pilot was compulsory by law; and under and by virtue of sect. 388 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, the defendants are not liable to the plaintiff in respect of the said collision.

The plaintiffs' reply denied the statements of the answer generally, and that the employment of the pilot was compulsory by law.

By agreement between the parties, it was taken as admitted at the hearing of the cause:

1. That the collision was occasioned solely by the negligence or fault of the duly licensed Trinity House pilot in charge of the Moselle.

2. That at the time of the collision the Moselle was bound upon a voyage from Boulogne to London, laden with cargo and passengers, and at such time neither master, mate, nor other member of the crew of the Moselle held a pilotage certificate for that part of the River Thames, or pilotage district within which the collision happened.

3. That there was no neglect or default on the part of the master and crew of the Moselle.

In consequence of these admissions the sole question in the case was whether the employment of the pilot at the time of the collision was compulsory upon the owners of the Moselle.

Cohen, Q.C. (R. E. Webster with him), for the plaintiff,—This case is governed by Reg. v. Stanton (8 Ell. & Bl. 445), which was a decision upon the Acts now in question. By the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), sect. 353, it is provided that "subject to any alteration to be made by any pilotage authority, in pursuance of the power hereinbefore in that behalf given, the employment of the pilots shall continue to be compulsory in all districts in which the same was by law compulsory immediately before the time when this Act comes into operation; and all exemptions from compulsory pilotage then existing within such districts shall also continue in force." Immediately before that Act came into force, the General Pilot Act (6 Geo. 4, c. 125), was in force, as it was repealed by the Merchant Shipping Repeal Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 120) on the same day only as the Merchant Shipping Act came into operation. By 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, s. 59, it is enacted that "the master of any collier, or of any ship trading at Norway, or to the Cattegat or Baltic, or round the North Cape, or into the White Sea, on their inward or outward voyages, or of any constant trader inwards, from the ports between Boulogne inclusive and the Baltic (all such ships and vessels having British registers, and coming up either by the North Channel, but not otherwise) . . . or of any other ship or vessel whether, whilst the same is within the limits of the port or place to which she belongs, the same not being a port or place in relation to which particular provision hath heretofore been made by any Act or Acts of Parliament, or by any charter or charters for the appointment of pilots, shall and may lawfully, and without being subject to any of the penalties by this Act imposed, conduct or pilot his own ship or vessel so long as he shall conduct the same without the aid or assistance of any unlicensed pilot, or other person or persons than the ordinary crew of the said ship or vessel." By a regulation made under 16 & 17 Vict. c. 129, s. 21, and approved by order in council of 18th Feb., 1854 (see for regulation Lush. Adm., Rep. p. 167), the exemption was extended to ships trading to ports between Boulogne (inclusive) and the Baltic on their outward passages, and when coming up by the south passages, so that such vessels entering the Thames were exempt in all cases. This regulation was also in force when the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 came into operation on May 1st 1855. In Reg. v. Stanton (ubi sup.) it was held that under the Act of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, s. 59, a ship going down the Thames and bound for the Baltic and carrying cargo and passengers, was exempt from compulsory pilotage in the Thames; this decision was given in 1857, after the Merchant Shipping Act came into operation. It follows from this decision that all the exemptions in sect. 59 of that Act are preserved by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 353. But if there were any doubt in the matter, this case has been confirmed by this court and by the Privy Council in The Earl of Auckland (Lush. 164, 387; 1 Mar. Law Cas. 27, 177), which decided that a steamer trading between London and Rotterdam and carrying cargo and passengers was exempt from compulsory pilotage under these same enactments. In the present case the Moselle was carrying cargo and passengers from Boulogne to London, and that being her usual employment, she was trading from Boulogne within the meaning of the Order in Council. The fact that ships are carrying passengers does not, upon the authority of the above case, affect the question. The general exemption of sect. 353 importing the exemptions given by former Acts, overrides sect. 396, applying only to Trinity House pilotage, and exempting vessels upon certain voyages "when not carrying passengers." He cited also:

The Hannah, L. Re. 1 Adm. 283;

The Temora, Lush. 17.

Butt. Q.C. (E. C. Clarkson with him), for the defendants.—In Reg. v. Stanton (ubi sup.) Lord Campbell says that the counsel in support of the conviction "properly allows that sect. 353 continues the exemption of Stat. 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, sect. 59," and it is upon this admission that the whole of that case and the subsequent case of The Earl of Auckland (ubi sup.) proceeds. The real point was never properly argued in either of those cases, that point being whether sect. 353 continues any exemptions which are expressly or impliedly repealed by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. I submit that sect. 374 puts an end to any exemption in respect of vessels carrying passengers from Boulogne to London.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—It is impossible to distinguish this case from the cases cited, Reg. v. Stanton and The Earl of Auckland, which latter case was decided both here and in the Privy Council, and I therefore pronounce against the compulsory pilotage in this case.

Wages—Foreign plaintiffs—Security for costs.

Where a cause of wages was instituted against a foreign ship by her master and crew, who were also foreigners, and it appeared that, although they were at the time in this country, their only place of residence there was on board the ship, and that the master had stated that he had no means and intended to leave England, the High Court of Admiralty ordered the plaintiffs to give a security for costs in the sum of 130l.

THIS was a cause of wages, instituted on behalf of the master and crew of the German barque Zufall against that vessel in the sum of 450l. The ship having been arrested on the 28th Dec. 1874, an appearance was entered on behalf of Gustav Hermann Otto, of Colberg, in Prussia, the sole owner of the said ship. The cause was now brought before the court on a motion on behalf of the defendant to dismiss the suit with costs and to direct the release of the Zufall, on the ground that the ship was a German ship, and the plaintiffs were German subjects and had no residence in England, and that by German law such German subjects were prohibited from taking proceedings in any other country than Germany for the recovery of any claim they might have against the vessel or the defendant, and on the ground that nothing was due to the plaintiffs; and the notice of motion further gave notice that the defendant would, in the event of the judge deciding to retain the suit, ask the judge to order that the plaintiffs should give a sufficient security to answer costs within a week, and in default that the suit be dismissed with costs and the vessel released from arrest.

In support of the motion an affidavit of the defendant's agent in this country was filed, in which it was sworn that all the plaintiffs in the suit were subjects of the Emperor of Germany, and none of them had any place of abode in this country except on board of the said ship; and that the master of the Zufall had informed the said agent that he was without means either in this country or in Germany, and that he intended to leave England as soon as possible.

W. G. F. Phillimore, for the defendant, in support of the motion.—The ship is German and the crew are German, and the contract between the crew and shipowners is consequently governed by German law. Now, by the German General Mercantile Code, sect. 537 (See Wendt's Maritime Legislation, p. 218) no German seaman can sue for his wages before a foreign court, nor until he has returned to Germany; these wages are, therefore, not at present due. In these circumstances I submit that the court will not take jurisdiction over a suit by foreign seaman, and that it will follow The Nina (L. Rep. 2 Adm. & Ecc. 44; L. Rep. 2 P. C. 38; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 47), and refuse to entertain the suit in the exercise of its judicial discretion. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I am not disposed, except by the consent of both parties, to decide on a matter with respect to foreign law and involving such important legal questions on motion. I think that a case like the present the plaintiffs have a right to pray a petition.] The plaintiffs must, at any rate, give security for costs. The rule as to security for costs in this court is given in Williams and Bruce's Admiralty Practice, p. 295, note (y), where it is said that the former practice was to require security for costs from seamen in all cases of wages, and that "The modern practice with reference to security for costs in suits for wages instituted by masters or seamen, is the same as in other suits. It is submitted that masters or seamen suing for wages are entitled to the same privileges as other suitors, and that no security for costs can be required from seamen who are British subjects suing for wages earned on board a British ship, unless they are permanently resident out of the jurisdiction. Where the seamen are foreigners, or are suing for wages earned on board a foreign ship, it seems that it is in the discretion of the court to entertain their suit, and that it may impose whatever terms it thinks fit." Thus the rule as to foreigners suing has not been relaxed, and the plaintiffs must give security.

Nylander v. Barnes, 6 H. & N. 509.

[Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Permanent residence out of the jurisdiction seems to be the foundation of the rule as to giving security for costs]. But the court has a discretion and can order the security, if there is any chance of the plaintiffs leaving the jurisdiction and so evading payment of costs. The rule to be gathered from the cases cited in Pritchard's Admiralty Digest, p. 125, is that a foreigner having no residence in this country must give security for costs.

Webster, for the plaintiffs.—The question of jurisdiction ought not to be decided on this motion, and the plaintiffs ask that the motion should be dismissed with costs on the ground that they are not bound, to give security for costs. In The Franz et Elise (ubi sup.) it is laid down that this court will follow the practice of the common law courts. In Nylander v. Barnes (ubi sup.) the plaintiff was actually abroad when the order for security was made, and it is therefore not in point. On the other hand, it has been expressly ruled that the courts will not order security for costs if the plaintiff, although a foreigner, is actually living in this country, and there is no supposition that he intends to leave. The mere fact that the plaintiff has only a temporary place of abode here, and may be compelled to go away as soon as his present means of existence are exhausted, is not enough:

Crispin v. Dogliano, 1 Swab. & Trist. 522;
Drummond v. Tillinghurst, 16 C. B. 740.

It must be distinctly shown, in order to obtain such an order, that the plaintiff is about to or intends to leave England. There is nothing to show such an intention on the part of the plaintiffs here, and in fact, they do not so intend. They must remain to prove their case.

W. G. F. Phillimore in reply.

SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—I think this is a case in which a moderate security for costs should be given. I shall follow the case of The Franz et Elise, and order that the plaintiffs give security for costs in the sum of 130*l.*

*Collision—Costs—Damage under 300*l.—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71) sect. 4—Certificate—Costs of Reference.

*A ship was damaged by another outward bound, and the owners of the injured vessel, in the bona fide belief that their damage was greater than it actually was, instituted a suit in the High Court of Admiralty and arrested the ship for a large amount but accepted bail and released the ship at once on ascertaining their actual damage; the defendants admitted liability, and the damage was referred to the Registrar; the claim made by the plaintiffs was a little over 300*l., but the Registrar reduced the amount claimed by more than one-third and made no report as to costs. On application by the plaintiffs, the court certified for the costs of suit under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, but condemned the plaintiffs in the costs of the reference.

THIS was a cause of damage instituted on behalf of the owners of the ship Aberdeenshire against the ship Naomi, to recover for damage sustained in a collision between the two vessels, which happened on August 5, off Dungeness. The Aberdeenshire was so much damaged that she was compelled to put into Dover for repairs. The Naomi was outward bound, and the agents of the Aberdeenshire, on August 6, before the amount of injury sustained by that vessel could be accurately ascertained, gave orders for proceedings to be taken in the High Court of Admiralty against the Naomi, and accordingly this cause was at once instituted against the Naomi and her freight in the sum of 2400*l.*, and the vessel and her freight were arrested in the Downs under a warrant of the court. An appearance was entered in the cause by the owners of the Naomi on Aug. 7, and at the same time their solicitors gave an undertaking for bail, which was accepted by the plaintiffs, and the vessel and her freight were released from arrest.

After negotiations had taken place with a view of settling the plaintiffs' claim, the defendants admitted liability on Nov. 4, and the amount of damage was by the court referred to the Registrar and Merchants. At the reference the plaintiffs brought in a claim for damage done amounting to 326*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.* On Jan. 3 the report of the Assistant Registrar was filed, showing that there was due to the plaintiffs for the damage proceeded for, 186*l.* 19*s.* 9*d.*, with interest. The report entirely disallowed a sum of 83*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.* claimed for loss of freight, the ground of disallowance being that there was no sufficient proof that such freight would have been earned, even if there had been no collision. The other items of claim were reduced. The report of the Assistant-Registrar made no mention of the costs of the reference.

The cause now came before the court upon motion to certify under the County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, sect. 9), that the cause was a proper admiralty cause to be tried in the High Court of Admiralty. Affidavits were filed in support of the motion stating that at the time of the institution of the suit the master of the Aberdeenshire believed the loss occasioned to the owners of that vessel would considerably exceed 300*l.*, and that the costs actually incurred were much less than those which would have been incurred if the proceedings had been taken in a County Court having Admiralty Jurisdiction.

W. G. F. Phillimore in support of the motion contended that where a suit is instituted in the bonâ fide belief that the damage done is greater than 300*l.*, and no injury is done to the defendants by the institution of the suit in this court it was a fit cause for a certificate.

E. C. Clarkson for the defendants submitted that the plaintiffs were bound to know that their damage was under 300*l.* before they instituted the suit. The claim for loss of freight was clearly put in to swell up the amount of their claim so as to make it over 300*l.* But the real claim is the amount to which the plaintiff is bonâ fide entitled, and he cannot get his costs if he does not recover more than 300*l.* without a certificate.

Hewitt v. Cory, L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 418; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 666; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 425; Purkis v. Flower, ante, p. 226; 30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 40; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 114.

There is nothing to distinguish this case from any other, and the court should not encourage small causes being brought here by a too easy granting of certificates.

W. G. F. Phillimore in reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—In this case the screw steamship Aberdeenshire was run into on Aug. 5, by a vessel called the Naomi, and was so much damaged that it was necessary for her to put into Dover for repairs, and she arrived there on Aug. 6. On the same day the owners of the Aberdeenshire instituted a cause of damage against the Naomi, in the sum of 2400*l.*, but having discovered that her damage was not what it was expected to be, they accepted an undertaking to give bail, and the Naomi was released on Aug. 7th. No injury was inflicted upon the defendants by the mistake thus made. The damage was admitted, and the matter was referred to the Registrar, who reduced the sum claimed, 326*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.* by 139*l.* 18*s.* 9*d.*, leaving 186*l.* 19*s.* 9*d.*, allowed to be due. One of the items which was struck out at the reference was a claim for loss of freight, 83*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.* I am of opinion that this item was properly disallowed by the Registrar. In these circumstances I think I shall do justice by certifying under the statute, and allowing the plaintiffs the costs of the institution of the suit here, but condemning them in the costs of the reference.

County Court appeal—Arrest of ship—Foreign ship—Practice.

In an appeal by plaintiffs from a County Court in a cause in rem, in which there was a decree for the defendants, and the ship had in consequence been released, the High Court of Admiralty, on an ex parte application of the plaintiffs, ordered a warrant to issue for the detention of the ship, and, as the ship proceeded against was a foreign one, did not require notice of the intention to arrest to be given to the defendants.

THIS was an appeal from a decree of the judge of the County Court of Devonshire, holden at East Stonehouse, in a cause of damage instituted on behalf of the owners of the British brigantine Albert against the Danish brigantine Freir. The Freir was arrested in this cause, on an affidavit that she was likely to leave England, and no bail was given. The cause came on for hearing in the County Court on Feb. 23rd 1875, and resulted in a decree for the defendants. The ship was released from arrest on Feb. 24th by order of County Court. On March 1st the plaintiffs asserted an appeal against the decree of the County Court Judge, and applied to the registrar of the County Court to detain the ship, which he declined to do.

James P. Aspinall, for the appellants, now moved for a warrant to issue out of the registry of the High Court to arrest the ship and detain her till bail was given or the appeal decided. The vessel having been released, the plaintiff has lost his security and cannot procure bail. In The Miriam (30 L. T. Rep. N. S. 537; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 259) a warrant was issued subject to notice being given to the other side so that they might have an opportunity. In that case the defendant vessel was British and her owners were resident within the jurisdiction. If such notice is given in this case, the only effect will be that the Freir will leave the country before she can be arrested and the plaintiff will lose all security.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE ordered a warrant to issue without notice to the respondents.

Collision—Limitation of liability—Admission of liability.

Defendants in a collision cause, in which their ship was under arrest, having instituted a suit for limitation of liability, the court, upon the motion of the plaintiffs in the limitation suit, ordered the ship to be released, on payment into court in that suit of the aggregate amount of 15*l.* per ton of the registered tonnage of the ship, and of a sum to cover interest and costs, and did not require that the plaintiffs in the limitation suit should admit liability before ordering the release.

THIS was a cause of limitation of liability instituted on behalf of the owners of the sailing barge Sisters (No. 7217).

A cause of damage (No. 7186) had been instituted in rem against the Sisters, on behalf of the owners of the sailing barge Alfreda, and at the time of the institution of the suit for limitation of liability, the Sisters was still under the arrest of the court in that cause (No. 7186), no bail having been given by her owners.

The owners of the Sisters did not admit liability for the collision, and intended to defend cause No. 7186. The owners of the Sisters now moved in accordance with the subjoined notice of motion:

We, Deacon, Son, and Rogers, proctors for the plaintiffs in this cause, give notice that we shall by counsel, on the 2nd March 1875, move the judge in court to give leave to the plaintiffs to give bail in this cause in the sum of 960*l.*, being the aggregate amount of 15*l.* for each ton of the registered tonnage of the sailing barge or vessel Sisters, now under arrest in cause No. 7186, and the sum of 325l. 8s., to cover interest on the said amount and costs, and to direct that on such bail being given the said sailing barge or vessel be released.

The damage complained of in cause No. 7186, was alleged to have been occasioned by the negligence of the Sisters, which occasioned the steamship Thames to run into and sink the barges Volunteer and Alfreda, and it was in respect of the claims arising out of these collisions that limitation of liability was sought.

A cause was originally instituted by the owners of the Volunteer against the Thames, but it was dismissed with costs: (see ante, p. 512; 32 L. T. Rep. N. S. 343.) An affidavit was filed in support of the motion, in which it was stated that the registered tonnage of the Sisters was 42 $\frac{2}{3}$ tons; that none of the owners of the Sisters were on board of the Sisters at the time of the several collisions aforesaid, and that the collisions respectively occurred without the actual fault or privity of the owners of the Sisters or any of them.

R. E. Webster, in support of the motion, submitted that the court would not require, before the owners of the Sisters could claim a limitation of their liability that they should acknowledge that their vessel was to blame (The Amalia, Brown. & Lush. 151); and, consequently, that on giving bail for the full amount for which they could be liable, they were entitled to a release of the ship.

James P. Aspinall, for the owners of the Volunteer, contra.—This motion is practically an application for a decree that the plaintiffs in cause No. 7217, are entitled to limitation of liability without filing their petition or admitting liability. The authority of The Amalia (ubi sup.) is considerably shaken by the case of James v. The London and South-Western Railway (ante, vol. 1, p. 226; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 87; L. Rep. 7 Ex. 187), where it is distinctly laid down that before there can be a decree for limitation of liability there must be an unqualified admission of liability on the part of the persons seeking the limitation. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The ruling cited is only a dictum, and The Amalia has never been overruled. I must therefore follow it.] I must ask for leave to appeal on this point. Secondly, by the practice of the court the plaintiffs are only entitled to have their ship released on paying into court the aggregate amount of 15l. per ton for the registered tonnage, and a sum for interest and costs.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I shall order that the Sisters be released from arrest in cause No. 7186, on the payment into court by her owners of the sum of 960l. 7s., the aggregate amount of 15l. for each ton of the Sisters, together with the sum of 325l. 8s. to cover interest and costs. I must refuse the application for leave to appeal; I do not think I should be doing right to give leave to appeal on so small a point, when it is clear that ultimately the plaintiffs would be able to obtain limitation of liability.

MAVRO v. THE OCEAN MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Marine insurance—General average as per foreign statement—Termination of voyage at an intermediate port—Place where average adjustment to be made.

The plaintiff owner of a cargo of wheat to be carried in a certain vessel from Varna to Marseilles insured the same by a policy containing the words "General average as per foreign statement," and a warranty that corn was to be free from average unless general. The ship was injured by straining in a storm, being obliged to carry a press of canvas to avoid a lee shore; she sprang a leak and part of the cargo was damaged by the sea water. On reaching Constantinople the vessel was surveyed under an order of the Supreme Consular Court, and as she needed repair the damaged cargo was sold, and the sound portion transhipped and forwarded to Marseilles. An adjustment was made also by order of the Supreme Consular Court, at Constantinople, and the damage to the wheat was by the adjusters treated as general average, according to the law of France, which was in conformity also with the law and usages prevailing at Constantinople. The vessel was repaired in rather more than two months.

Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas), that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover from the underwriters for a general average loss. That the true construction of the policy made the underwriters liable for general average as determined by foreign and not English law, and the loss in this case though particular average by English was general average by foreign law, and so came within the terms of the policy.

Secondly, the voyage was properly terminated at Constantinople, and the adjustment properly made there.

ERROR from the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas in favour of the plaintiff in the action upon a policy of insurance. The facts and questions for the court were set out in the form of a special case, which will be found in the report of the case in the court below (ante, p. 361).

Butt, Q.C. (J. C. Mathew with him), for the defendants below, the plaintiffs in error.—The words in the policy "general average as per foreign statement," are those upon the construction of which the decision of the case depends. They mean, as we say, an undertaking on the part of the underwriters to pay to the assured any loss he may have sustained by the mode of stating the average abroad. The words only apply to the money the assured has to pay, and he cannot claim for the contribution he would make to himself. [COCKBURN, C. J.—You must admit that according to French law a contribution is to be made]. Yes, but the question is whether French or English law is to prevail. There is a distinct warranty against particular average in the memorandum clause, and they have no right to make us liable for particular average, yet this is what has been done, if the judgment of the court below be right. This is an absolute warranty, and is not to be rendered nugatory by giving such a construction to the former clause as the court below have done. It is true that we insure the owner against any loss which is put upon him by the foreign adjusters; but he cannot recover also from us the contribution which they would find was due to himself as owner of the cargo. That is a loss he must bear, for it is a particular average, and we are warranted free from it. The two clauses are to be read apart, and certainly the memorandum is a substantive engagement which cannot be abrogated by implication merely. [COCKBURN, C.J., referred to Harris v. Scaramanga, ante, vol. 1, p. 339; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 697; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 481.] — That case is not binding on this court, even if it were directly against the defendants' contention; but here it is to be observed that originally the loss was one which occurred to the assured quite independently of any statement at all, and it was a particular average loss by English law, and therefore not to be charged on the underwriters. Then we say that there ought not to have been an average adjustment at Constantinople. The matters taken into contribution would be different at Constantinople and Marseilles, and the statement was therefore improperly made. The voyage was not properly terminated there; the vessel was repaired in about two months, and could have carried the sound part of the cargo. A voyage is not properly terminated at an intermediate port unless there be a necessary separation of the ship and cargo. [COCKBURN, C.J.—The master surely has a discretion to act for the best, and is an agent for the owners of the cargo as well as for the owner of the ship.] Yes, but the state of facts must be such as to necessitate the termination of the voyage, and here they show that there was no necessity. [BLACKBURN, J.—What is your authority for that?] I do not put it upon physical necessity, but it must be very strong to overcome the general proposition that the port of destination is the place at which to adjust general average: (Simmonds v. White, 7 B & C. 805).

Watkin Williams, Q.C. and McLeod, for the plaintiff below, were not called on.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I think that this judgment ought to be affirmed.

There were two questions raised in the court below, and both decided against the appellants, and the same two questions have been argued before us to-day. Of these the first is the more important, and it is whether or not according to the terms of the policy of insurance the loss sustained by the plaintiff was within those terms, and was one which he was entitled to recover back from the underwriters. The second question is whether the adjustment made at Constantinople was properly made there, or whether it ought to have been made at Marseilles.

As to the first question, it seems to me to turn entirely upon the 3rd paragraph of the special case, which is this: On the 22nd Nov. 1867, the plaintiffs effected with the defendants a policy of insurance for 1000L (a copy of which marked A. is annexed to and is to form part of this case). This insurance is declared to be "upon 29,156 Constantinople kilos wheat, and advances valued at 9200L, general average as per foreign statement, on the ship General Chassé at and from Varna to Marseilles, "and it is also declared to be warranted free from average, unless general." How is that to be construed? Mr. Butt puts a construction upon it according to which the question whether this was general average as distinguished from particular, is to be determined according to English law, and merely the statement to be made by foreign law or custom. That, when one looks at what would necessarily to be done at the foreign ports where an adjustment might take place, is so unsatisfactory that I cannot think it is the true construction, nor one which expresses what was really meant by the parties. It would call on the foreign average stater to state his adjustment according to English law, a law which in this respect is different from, I believe, all foreign laws, and of which he might well be ignorant. Now how could that be in any sense a foreign statement? But the meaning must be this, that the underwriters are to be liable for general average, but not for particular average, only there is this extension or limitation of the term, that what is general average is to be determined, not by English, but by foreign statement. Then we ask is the loss in this case a general average loss, and the answer is that it is not so by English, but is by foreign law.

Next we must consider, being general average, how far does the liability of the underwriters extend. Now, at first I thought that Mr. Butt meant to contend that it extended only so far as the owner of the cargo was liable to contribute to the ship, but he now admits that where the case is brought within the definition of general average, then the underwriter has to pay not only what the loser has to contribute to the general fund, but also what he loses beyond what he receives contribution for. The loss sustained here by the plaintiff was in excess of the indemnity, and it is a matter for which the insurer is liable; and as I think, so I decide this point against the defendants.

Next, was the adjustment properly made at Constantinople? And that depends on whether the voyage was properly terminated there. Now the rule is that a voyage is properly terminated if the destination of the ship be reached, or if it be interrupted at an intermediate place by some intervening cause which justifies or necessitates its termination there. In the present case the vessel had to put into Constantinople for repairs, which were absolutely necessary before she could proceed, and which would take some time to execute, not less, we may say, than two months. The damaged part of the cargo was at once sold and it is admitted that it was properly sold; but Mr. Butt says that the rest, the undamaged corn, might have been carried on in the ship to its destination at Marseilles, but we must remember that it would have been delayed two months before it could have been so forwarded. Now it is laid down by very high authorities that the duty of the master of a ship is to earn freight, and otherwise consider his owner's interest; but that he has also another duty, and that is as agent for the owners of the cargo, in the event of an emergency arising, to do the best for them that he can; and applying this rule, and looking here at the fact that the corn must have remained two months at Constantinople, the question is: Did the master of the General Chassé exercise a prudent discretion in favour of the owners of the cargo in sending on the undamaged portion of it at once in another ship to Marseilles? I think he did.

I do not rest my judgment on what the Consular Court did, nor do I depend in any way on its decision. I have serious doubts as to whether it was right; but as to the course pursued by the master being wise, I have no doubt whatever. If I saw clearly that it might have been more favourable to the cargo owners to have had the adjustment made at Marseilles, and that he would distinctly have gained by the statement being made there rather than at Constantinople, there might, perhaps, have been some foundation for Mr. Butt's argument on this point. But there is nothing in the case at all to show this, and I am, therefore, of opinion that the adjustment was properly made at Constantinople, and that the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas was right, and must be affirmed.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of the same opinion.

As I understand the suggested meanings of the clause in the policy are these; the plaintiff says that "per foreign statement" is equivalent to, "You must find out what the foreign law says is included under general average, and state the loss accordingly." The defendant says "No. General average is by English law, but subject to this exception, that where there is a difference in stating the average between English and foreign custom then the foreign custom is to prevail." Upon this contention Mr. Butt founds his argument, that as corn is declared warranted free from particular average by an express term in the policy, if he is not right in his interpretation, the result would be that the corn would, in effect, get compensation for what is, by our law, particular average, notwithstanding the warranty. But I think that it is not correct to say that, and for the reason that they will not even by that arrangement get the whole of a particular average, but only a part; and it may turn out, it is quite possible, actually to be to the advantage of the underwriters that this mode of computation should be adopted; because upon a consideration of figures, I see that they might be gainers by the system. The true construction, however, is that the clause "general average as per foreign statement" is not abrogated by the later clause directed against particular average. The words are most general, and therefore, the sentence means general average, as a foreigner would state it. The difficulties in the way of the rule suggested by Mr. Butt are to me insuperable, and I think it cannot be the true one.

As to the other question whether the average was to be taken at Constantinople, I treat the case as if not a word was said as to who stated the average, or where it was stated, for it is immaterial on my distinct view of the meaning of the clause in the policy. I agree, however, that the voyage was properly terminated.

BLACKBURN.—I also think that the judgment of the court below ought to be affirmed.

Long before a policy of insurance was ever dreamt of, the Rhodian laws laid down that where there was a common adventure, and it became necessary, by the occurrence of perils in the course of it threatening the safety of the whole adventure, to sacrifice part of the cargo, or whatever constituted the subject of the adventure, for the benefit of the rest, then that merchandise which was thus saved by another's sacrifice should contribute in proportion to make compensation for the loss by which the general safety had been secured. This decree existing among the Rhodians was so just and proper, that it has been adopted in principle into the code of every civilised country since. Unfortunately, however, a different consideration prevails in different countries as to what things shall be considered a wilful sacrifice. The English law considers that where, to escape a lee shore, a great press of sail is carried, and a straining of the ship consequently ensues, and the cargo is damaged, the damage so sustained by the cargo is not in the nature of a wilful sacrifice; but other countries, and as is important for this case, the laws of France, say that as the press of sail is wilfully, that is purposely, carried to save the ship, and the injury to the cargo is the immediate result, it shall be considered a wilful sacrifice so as to entitle the owner of the damaged cargo to contribution. We have nothing to do here with any consideration as to which is the best rule, it is enough here to recognise the fact that in one foreign country it is different from ours.

Now what is the policy sued on in this case. Ordinarily in English policies there is what is called the memorandum, and here it runs thus: "It is declared and agreed that corn, &c., shall be and are warranted free from average, unless general, or the ship be stranded." This clause is inserted to avoid disputes, as to what articles shall be subject to average. I understand general average to mean, where the particular loss sustained was occasioned by a sacrifice for the benefit of the whole. That is the meaning as I think, and consequently it is not for the underwriters to make a contribution, but for them to make good the loss.

In an English contract I should say that "general average" means things which the English law calls general, but this becomes somewhat inconvenient when ships go abroad, as they are made to obey the orders of a foreign court of admiralty, and they are, when adjustments take place under foreign jurisdictions, made to pay according to their views of the law applicable to the case. If owners of cargo are thus compelled to pay, and there be no provision in their policies, it is not, I believe, settled whether the English underwriters have to pay or not. To avoid this doubt therefore, it is that clauses have been put in, such as if the ship be caught in a foreign country and compelled to pay, the underwriters will indemnify, &c. But that is not the meaning of the clause here. "General average as per foreign statement," means such sacrifices as the French laws regard as wilful sacrifices, and so as general average shall be so reckoned for the purpose of this policy. Putting this construction upon the clause, most of the other questions raised become immaterial.

It is quite immaterial whether the Consular Court at Constantinople had jurisdiction or not; and if material whether the voyage was properly terminated, for the reasons given by the Lord Chief Justice, I think it was so: but it does not matter who stated the average, whether a Turk or a Frenchman, or the arbitrator in England.

I think, therefore, that the judgment of the court below was right and must be affirmed.

POLLOCK, B.—I am of the same opinion.

After giving all due weight to the clear argument of Mr. Butt, I nevertheless come round to the opinion that the true construction of the policy is against him. He said that if the court below was right, the effect was to make the clause "General average as per foreign statement," override the memorandum clause, "Corn warranted free from average unless general;" and no doubt, if the effect of our construction was to obliterate the latter cause altogether, it would be against the well known canon. But it is not so, as I read it, for the object of the former proviso was to settle small questions that arise at foreign ports, which should then most obviously and easily be settled by foreign law and custom. And the words "unless general," being an exception to what is declared free from average, in that clause, are to be read with the former. So that they bring into the other the limitation or extension, "as per foreign statement," which would not otherwise be in it. It is this in effect: foreign and not English principles are to govern the statement of the general average excepted from the memorandum. In my judgment, therefore, the Court of Common Pleas was right, and their decision is to be affirmed.

KISH v. CORY.

AMPLETT, B.—I am of the same opinion.

Mr. Butt's ingenious argument did not venture to go the length of saying this, that under the words general average as per foreign statement, any additional burden was thrown upon the owners of cargo. Therefore he could not resist the proposition that if a contribution had to be made by cargo to ship, it would be within the policy; but he says that as to the loss to cargo, that is a loss which would have fallen on the owner of the cargo if determined by English law as a particular average loss, and is not a loss cast on the underwriters. But looking more closely into the matter it cannot be so. Suppose a second cargo aboard, and a loss occurring to that other cargo, then by the French law the cargo in question (the original one) would have to contribute to the other cargo, and would be paying such contribution as being in respect of general average. In such case it would be impossible to resist the claim made on the underwriters of this policy to pay that contribution as well as the contribution to the ship. The policy might have been so worded as to give rise to Mr. Butt's argument, but these words before me do not support it. The parties have stipulated that no average is to be payable unless general, and then "as per foreign statement" is merely a declaration that what would not be a general average loss by English law but is so by foreign is to be so construed here. I do not think it necessary to add anything as to the other questions in the case. I think the court below was right, and their judgment should be affirmed.

KISH v. CORY.

Charter-party—Demurrage—Damages for delay—Charterer's liability.

A charter-party between plaintiff, the shipowner, and defendants, the charterers, provided the number of loading days, and the rate of discharge per working day; ten days on demurrage for all like days above the said days to be paid at the rate of fourpence per register ton per day; and charterer's liability to cease when the ship was loaded, the captain or owner having a lien on cargo for freight and demurrage.

VOL. II., N. S.

Held by the Exchequer Chamber (affirming the Queen's Bench) in an action for demurrage and for damages caused by detention at the port of loading (upon demurrer to a plea alleging both claims to be for demurrage under the charter-party) that the demurrage days related to the port of loading as well as to the port of discharge; and that the charterer's liability for all such demurrage ceased when the ship was loaded.

Semle, the shipowner's lien for demurrage would include a claim for damages caused by detention beyond the demurrage days.

This was an error from the Queen's Bench upon demurrer to a plea.

The action was brought by shipowner against charterers for five days' demurrage at port of loading beyond the thirteen clear working days allowed by the charter-party for loading.

The declaration contained two counts both alleging the same default on the defendant's part in not loading and in detaining the ship: the first count claimed damages because the plaintiff lost the use and profits of the ship, and was put to expenses in consequence; the second count claimed payment by the defendants, as by alleged agreement upon default in loading the cargo, at the rate of fourpence per register ton of the said ship per day.

By the third plea the defendants, as to the said first and second counts, said that the agreement in the second count alleged was and is contained in the charter-party mentioned in the said first count, that it was not otherwise agreed between the plaintiff and the defendants; which said charter-party is as follows, that is to say:

CHARTER PARTY.

Cardiff, 17th Oct. 1872.

It is this day mutually agreed between Mr. Thomas Kish of the good ship or vessel called the Spring of 377 tons register measurement or thereabouts now en route from Falmouth to Hull, and Cory Brothers and Company, merchants, that the said ship being tight staunch and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, shall, with all practical dispatch, sail and proceed to the usual safe loading berth at Hull, as ordered by shippers in the regular and customary manner, and there take on board as tendered a full and complete cargo of coal which the said merchants bind themselves to provide for shipment, not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry, over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions, and furniture. Stiffening coal if required to be supplied at the rate of twenty tons per clear working day after written notice is given of it being required, and that the ship is ready to receive the same, each working day the ship may be detained beyond that time to be deducted from the loading days, hereinafter mentioned cargo to be loaded in thirteen clear working days from the day written notice is given that all ballast or inward cargo is discharged and the stiffening coals (if any) are on board, and of the vessel being ready to receive remainder of her cargo (any time lost through riots, strike, or stoppage of said agents, pitmen, or other hands connected with the working or delivery of the said coal, or by reason of accidents to mines or machinery, obstruction on the railway and in the docks, or by reason of floods, frosts, storms, or any cause beyond the personal control of the shippers not to be computed as part of the aforesaid loading), and being so loaded the vessel shall with all practical dispatch proceed to Alexandria or so near thereto as she may safely get, and deliver the same, as customary alongside steamer, or depot ship, or into craft as ordered, on being paid freight at the rate of 21*l.* sterling per keel of 21. One-fifth tons delivered or taken on board at charterer's option with 5*l.* gratuity: (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, frosts, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature or kind soever during the said voyage always excepted). The ship to pay consulages, lights, pilotage, and other port charges whatsoever. Freight to be paid, one-third if required in cash on signing bills of lading less five per cent. for all charges, balance at port of discharge in cash at current rate of exchange for ship's disbursements, and the remainder by an approved bill upon London at three months date or all cash equal thereto at captain's option, on the right and true delivery of the whole cargo. Cargo to be discharged weather permitting at not less than thirty-five tons per working day, time to commence on the ship's being ready to deliver. Ten days on demurrage for all like days above the said days to be paid at the rate of four pence per register ton per day. The ship to discharge as directed by consignee alongside steamer or depot ship or into craft, or at any wharf, pier, or arsenal, or at such safe place of anchorage or moorage where she can safely lie. Cargo to be brought to and taken from alongside at merchant's risk and expense. Sufficient coal to be taken on board for ship's use, the same to be endorsed on bills of lading which are to be signed as presented without prejudice to this charter-party. The ship to be addressed to charterer's agent at port of discharge, free of commission, paying the usual commission of two per cent. when loaded. Trimming cargo to be done by merchant's trimmer at market price. Any duty which may be levied in consequence of the vessel not being British to be borne by the owner. Charterer's liability to cease when the ship is loaded, the captain or owner having a lien on cargo for freight and demurrage.

And the defendants further said that the plaintiff was not ready and willing to take, and did not take the agreed cargo on board as tendered in the regular and customary manner.

For a fifth plea the defendants as to the said first and second counts repeated all the allegations contained in the third plea, except those which followed the setting out of the charter-party. And the defendants further said that the said ship was loaded by the defendants, with the agreed cargo within the ten days on demurrage stipulated in the said charter-party, and that thereupon the defendants' liabilities as charterers upon and under the said charter-party ceased.

This fifth plea was demurred to on the grounds, amongst others, that the charter-party did not provide for demurrage at the port of loading, nor did it absolve the charterers from such liability on loading the cargo.

The demurrer was argued in the court below on the 5th June 1874 before Lush and Archibald, J.J., who considered the case identical with Francesco v. Massey (a), and in accordance with that authority gave judgment for the defendants.

(a) Nov. 25, 1872, and Jan. 30, 1873.

FRANCESCO v. MASSEY.

THIS was an action brought in the Liverpool Court of Passage to recover four days' demurrage at 8*l.* a day, and damages for eight days' detention of the plaintiff's ship beyond the lay days at the port of loading, under a charter-party dated Jan. 17, 1872, by which Peraaso, as master of the plaintiff's ship Tridente, agreed with the defendant as charterer that the ship then lying in the Birkenhead docks should proceed alongside a certain dock and there load "in fifteen working days" (subject to the usual exceptions of frost, &c.) a full and complete cargo of steam coal, and being so loaded should proceed therewith to Genoa "and discharge the cargo upon being paid freight at the rate of 13*s.* 6*d.* British sterling per ton (of 20*cwt.*) on the entire quantity discharged; the freight to be paid one-third in Liverpool on signing bills of lading, and the remainder on right delivery of cargo; the vessel to be discharged, weather permitting, at the rate of not less than thirty-five tons of coal per working day from the time of her being ready to unload. And ten days on demurrage over and above her said laying days at 8*l.* per day, the vessel to be consigned to the charterer's agent at the port of discharge, paying the usual commission of 2 per cent., charterer's liability to cease when the ship is loaded, the captain having a lien on the cargo for freight and demurrage."

A. L. Smith now argued for plaintiff, the appellant. —There is a distinction between this charter-party and that in Francesco v. Massey; the words there are "ten days on demurrage over and above her

The defendant pleaded that his alleged liability for demurrage and detention was such liability as was provided for by the last clause of the charter-party, and that before action brought the ship was loaded, and that thereupon his alleged liability ceased. Upon this plea issue was joined.

At the trial before assessor of the Court of Passage, it appeared that the ship arrived at her loading dock on Feb. 12, but the charterer did not commence loading her till March 13, and did not complete the loading till March 23. The defendant had already been compelled in an action brought by the master before the demurrage days had expired, and before the ship was loaded, to pay five days' demurrage. This action was brought to recover the remaining five days' demurrage and damages for the further time the ship was detained. A verdict was given for the plaintiff for 127*l.* 10*s.*, leave being reserved to the defendant to move to reduce the verdict by the amount claimed for demurrage.

A rule having been obtained,

T. H. James and Kirby, for the plaintiff, showed cause, contending that the last clause of the charter-party did not put an end to liabilities already incurred, and that the lien for demurrage applied only to demurrage at the port of discharge:

Pederson v. Lotinga, 28 L. T. Rep. 267; Christofferson v. Hansen, ante, vol. 1, p. 305; 1. Rep. 7 Q. B. 509;

Bannister v. Breslau, L. Rep. 2 C. P. 497; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 490;

Gray v. Carr, ante, vol. 1, p. 115; 1. Rep. 6 Q. B. 522.

Goldney in support of the rule.—A lien for demurrage extends to both port of loading and discharge.

Bannister v. Breslau (ubi sup.);

Gray v. Carr (ubi sup.).

Pederson v. Lotinga is distinguishable, as there were in that case two distinct provisions for demurrage, and it was upon that ground that the lien was held to apply to the port of discharge. The lien is given expressly to compensate for the loss of right of action.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 30, 1873.—The following judgments were delivered:—

CLEASBY, B.—After stating the facts and reading the concluding clause of the charter-party, the learned judge proceeded: It has been for some time not unusual to have a similar clause in charter parties. Such a clause was probably introduced at first in cases where it appeared upon the charter-party that the charterer was only an agent, and in such cases it has been held that the charterer could not be sued for any delay in loading the cargo which was afterwards provided. In Oglesby v. Yglesias (E. B. & E. 930; 27 L. J. 356, Q. B.); and Milvain v. Perez (3 E. & E. 495; 33 L. J. 90, Q. B.) the language of the clause no doubt expressly excluded liability for default before and in shipping the cargo. There was no provision in those cases giving the ship-owner any corresponding lien for demurrage, or anything in the nature of demurrage, but the Court of Queen's Bench held the owner bound by the clause as a part of the bargain. The words of discharge in those cases were the same as in the present, viz., that upon the loading of the complete cargo the "liability should cease." Mr. Justice Hill says in his judgment in the latter case, "In the present case, according to the pleadings, the defendants have shipped the cargo; the plaintiffs say that this has been done too late, for that they were bound to do it in regular turn; but the defendants by express terms, to which the plaintiffs have agreed, have stipulated that their liability shall cease as soon as they have shipped the cargo. We must give the plain effect to these plain terms, and hold that their liability does not attach." In those cases the language was express that the liability should cease in respect of defaults as well before as after the shipping of the cargo; and the only bearing of the cases upon the present is, that it was considered that the plain meaning of the words "liability to cease" was, not that the liability should cease to accrue, but that the liability should cease to be enforced. It further appeared in those cases that the charterer was acting as agent said laying days," which naturally refer to days both of loading and discharging. Here the words are "cargo to be discharged weather permitting at not less than thirty-five tons per working day, time only, but this distinction is not so material, since it may be assumed that there was some reason for this stipulation, and unless the person interested in the goods to be delivered was a different person from the charterer there would be no object in it. In the present case the language is general, that the charterer's liability should cease, and for the cessation of liability a corresponding benefit is obtained by the shipowner in having a lien upon a full cargo of demurrage, which he would not have unless expressly agreed. If then the words "liability to cease" are to be read in the same sense as in the cases referred to, the agreement discharges the charterer from demurrage at Liverpool, unless there be something in the charter-party to show the demurrage at Liverpool could not be contemplated, which is certainly not the case. The case of Bannister v. Breslau (ubi sup.) is very like the present one. In that case it did not appear upon the charter-party that the defendant was acting as agent, and there was no precise provision as to the breaches before and after loading, but the provision was general, that "the charterer's liability was to cease" (the same words as the previous cases and the present one) "when the cargo was shipped, provided that the same was worth the freight at the port of discharge, and the captain was to have an absolute lien on the cargo for freight, dead freight, and demurrage, which he or owner should be bound to exercise." The last words ("which he should be bound to exercise") have no bearing upon the question to which breaches the discharge is to be applicable. It was held that the discharge extended to demurrage at the port of loading as well as the port of discharge, and reliance is placed in the judgments on the word "demurrage" being used in the clause giving the lien, and there being nothing to limit it to demurrage at the port of discharge. The reasons given for the conclusions arrived at apply to the present case, and we should adopt the authority of that case unless there be some other decision inconsistent with it. We were referred to two cases on behalf of the defendant, Pederson v. Lotinga (ubi sup.) and Christoffersen v. Hansen (ubi sup.) The first of those cases was decided in the year 1857. The charter-party provided that at the port of loading, after the agreed days for loading, the captain was to receive 5*l.* a day for demurrage, day by day. For the port of discharge the language was different. There was to be demurrage after the laying days at 5*l.* a day. It was considered that the express agreement that the charterer should pay 5*l.* a day, day by day, showed that the clause providing that the owners should rest on their lien for freight and demurrage, must apply to the demurrage at the port of discharge. The judgments are founded upon the use of the words "day by day" in connection with the payment of demurrage at the port of loading, and there is nothing of that sort in the present case. In the other case of Christoffersen v. Hansen (ubi sup.) the words were general, that all liability of the charterer should cease as soon as he had loaded the cargo; and it was held that those words did not relieve the charterer from liability for delay in loading. But in that case no lien was given for demurrage or delay in loading, and this forms a main ground of the judgment of Blackburn and Lush, J. Mr. Justice Lush says pointedly, "If there were any provision giving the shipowner an equivalent advantage, that would be a very good reason for his absolving the defendant altogether. But there is no such provision." And he goes on to say that if he gave up the liability of the defendant for past breaches, he would have no remedy except against the foreign principal not named and perhaps not known. The claim now in question is not for detention but for demurrage, and the charter-party clearly gives a lien upon the complete cargo for all demurrage, both at the port of loading and of discharge. Neither of the cases last referred to are at variance with the case of Bannister v. Breslau (ubi sup.), and we can give effect to the plain meaning of the words, viz., that upon the shipowner acquiring a lien upon the full cargo for freight and demurrage all liability of the charterer for both shall cease.

BRAMWELL, B.—I think this rule should be made absolute. By the charter-party the charterer was entitled to commence on the ship's being ready to deliver. Ten days on demurrage for all like days." This would seem to refer to the days of discharge only. [BRETT, J.—Surely there is nothing in that to prevent the demurrage from applying to the loading as well as discharging days.] If that be so, I must rely on my contention that the decision in Francesco v. Massey is wrong. The prima facie meaning of the words "charterer's liability to cease when the ship is loaded" gives protection to the charterer only from liabilities incurred after the completion of the loading; the charterer continues liable for his own delay at the port of loading, but for all that occurs after the cargo is on board, the shipowner can obtain his remedy by the lien which the charter-party gives him: this is the reasonable interpretation of the clause as well as that which the words import. In Pederson v. Lotinga (28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 267; 5 W. R. 290), this was the construction put upon a similar charter-party by the Court of Queen's Bench: Coleridge, J. said in his judgment "the reasonable interpretation of the words, all liability of the former shall cease as soon as he has shipped off the cargo, is that the broker (of the charterer) shall not be liable personally for anything that happens after that time, although his liability for demurrage already incurred is to remain as before." I admit that the case of Bannister v. Breslau (L. Rep. 2 C. P. 497; 2 Mar. Law Cas., O. S., 490), was to a certain number of days on demurrage. Some of these days were consumed at the port of loading, and for a portion of them the defendant paid. The present claim is for the residue of the days so consumed at the port of loading. The charter contained a clause that on loading the cargo the charterer's responsibility should cease, the captain having a lien for freight and demurrage. It is impossible to say that this would not give a lien for demurrage incurred as well at the port of loading as at the port of discharge, and so for the demurrage sued for, and it seems impossible to hold that the matters as to which the liability was to cease were not the same as the matters to which the lien was given. If so the defendant is discharged, and his action is not maintainable. Bannister v. Breslau (ubi sup.) is in point, or more than in point if the action there was one, not for an agreed sum for demurrage, but for unliquidated damages for delay in loading; and though that case has been questioned, it has not been overruled, and is binding on us. Nor is Christoffersen v. Hansen (ubi sup.) opposed to this view. On the contrary, the Lord Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Blackburn rely on the absence of a lien for the matter as to which the right against the charterer is supposed to be given up. And Mr. Justice Lush's reasoning is very striking. He says: "If there were any provision giving the shipowner an equivalent advantage, that would be a good reason for absolving the defendant altogether." And so he holds liability for freight is given up, but not liability for damages for delay in loading, because there was a lien for freight but none for such damages. Mr. James, for the plaintiff, suggested that this demurrage was payable de die in diem, and that therefore a vested cause of action accrued which it could not be supposed it was intended to give up. The demurrage is not in terms payable de die in diem, and it may be in point of law that none is due till it is known how much will be due. Here, however, all the days were consumed. But in order to give effect to clear words we must hold that the charterer's liability was contingent on his not loading a cargo, or that if a cause of action vested, it was defeasible, and divested on the loading of the cargo.

Rule absolute.

a decision of the Court of Common Pleas adverse to the plaintiff in this case; there it was held that a plea setting out a similar condition in a charter-party was a good answer to an action by the shipowner against the charterers for delay in loading the vessel; but that case was discussed by the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Gray v. Carr (ante, vol. 1, p. 115; 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 215; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 522), and the following was said by Brett, J. in his judgment at p. 536, a judgment in which Willes, J. entirely concurred and to which he declined to add anything: "With all respect for the judges, who decided Bannister v. Breslauer, I think that their interpretation of the charter-party was too severe. The case was decided on demurrer. The judges relied much on the lien given in respect of demurrage, which they assumed was for delay at the port of loading. But, if by other terms of the charter-party than those which were before the court, demurrage was stipulated in respect of delay in unloading at the port of discharge, the chief ground on which they based their interpretation would be cut away. I cannot but think that the safer and juster, and more correct construction of the clause then and now under discussion (a clause like that in the present case exempting the charterers from liability after the ship was loaded) is that it absolves the charterer, when once cargo of sufficient value is on board, from all liabilities which but for it he might incur in respect of anything happening after the sailing of the ship, or, more properly speaking, after the bill of lading is given, as it were, to replace the charter-party." Moreover, the case of Christoffersen v. Hansen (ante, vol. 1, p. 305; 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 547; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 509) recognised and followed the decision of Pederson v. Lotinga; the clause there certainly differed from this in that it gave no lien for demurrage, it being agreed that "the charter being concluded by defendant on behalf of another party resident abroad, all liability of defendant should cease as soon as he had shipped the cargo." It was held that this clause only exempted defendant from liability accruing after the loading of the cargo; and that he, therefore, remained liable for delay in loading, although he had ultimately loaded a full cargo. In Lockhart v. Falk (L. Rep. 10 Ex. 132), it was held that the clause for lien and for exemption of the charterer in that charter-party applied only to demurrage at the port of discharge, not to damages for delay at the port of loading; upon that authority, unless the exemption clause differed, this plea is no answer to the first count. I submit that the proper construction of the clause in this charter-party is to apply this exemption to the charterer from breaches of the charter-party in futuro, not from vested causes of action.

Wood Hill, for the defendants.—There is no possible distinction to be drawn between this charter-party and that in Francesco v. Massey, and I desire to adopt the judgment of Bramwell, B. in that case, as my argument on behalf of the defendants. [BRETT, J.—If this clause exempts the charterers from liability for what has occurred before the ship is loaded, from whom can the owner obtain a remedy for detention beyond demurrage? It may be that the word "demurrage" should receive its usual mercantile sense, which includes damages for delay as well as the agreed rate of payment for the agreed days of detention; in that case the shipowner would have a lien for damages caused by such detention (McLean v. Fleming, ante, vol. 1, p. 160; 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 317; L. Rep. 2 Sc. App. 128); it is sufficient, however, for me to contend that the charterer is exempted after the completion of the loading from that for which a lien is given to the shipowner. Cleasby, B., in the judgment delivered in Francesco v. Massey distinguished from a case like this all the authorities upon which the plaintiff relies. The reason for enforcing in full such an exemption as this is that the charterer is merely the agent of the consignee, and he should have no liability beyond the performance of his duty to the principal. As soon as the cargo is completed, the shipowner has a remedy for his lien against the consignee himself, and the charterer is altogether absolved.

A. L. Smith in reply.—The only authority on this point in a court of error, Gray v. Carr (ubi sup.), has questioned the decisions of the courts below, which are adverse to the plaintiff's construction of this clause. [BRETT, J.—Those decisions, however, are of long standing, and it was probably with knowledge of them and intention to abide by them that this contract was made.] The charter-party is dated just after the decision of Gray v. Carr, which threw doubt upon Bannister v. Breslauer, the only previous authority on which the defendant can rely. Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this judgment for the defendants should be affirmed.

We have to construe a charter-party in which certain days are given for loading the ship, and certain days for unloading at the port of discharge. Immediately after the clause concerning the rate and time for discharging the cargo, come the words "Ten days on demurrage for all like days above the said day to be paid at the rate of fourpence per register ton per day." At the end of the charter-party is the clause "Charterer's liability to cease when the ship is loaded, the captain or owner having a lien on cargo for freight and demurrage." The action is brought for demurrage at the rate mentioned for the days in excess of those allowed at the port of loading, and also for damages in consequence of detention beyond the demurrage days. The question we have to determine is whether in a charter-party containing these stipulations, the exemption clause covers the demurrage incurred at the port of loading as well as all liability under the charter-party which arises after the ship is loaded.

Certainly if this were res integra, and we had to interpret the contract without the assistance of decided cases, much might be said against our conclusion. Two things, however, have been clearly held up to this time; first that general words in a charter-party allowing and ascertaining demurrage, apply equally to the days employed in loading and discharging the cargo; and secondly, which apart from authority might have been doubtful, that against a claim for demurrage the liability of the charterer is protected by a clause of this kind with respect to demurrage incurred either at the loading or discharging port. Francesco v. Massey fully discusses all the previous cases on this point, and was determined in accordance with them. It is most important in mercantile cases, where contracts are generally drawn with a knowledge by both parties of points decided concerning them by courts of law, to adhere to such decisions; and in a case of this kind I am prepared to maintain the authority of the decisions which relate to it.

[Ex. Ch.]

KISH v. CORY.

[Ex. Ch.]

In Bannister v. Breslauer there was no provision in the charter-party for demurrage, although a lien for it was given to the captain. The court held that the charterer's protection clause covered a claim for damages by delay in loading, and it may have been so held, on the ground that the lien enabled the owner to enforce such a claim against the ship. Although the authority of that case has been doubted, it seems to me to be good, and to have been well decided on the ground I have suggested. There the lien for demurrage could have had no application unless with respect to such delay as that for which the action is brought; and it has been suggested by my brother Brett that the same reason for extending the lien would not exist upon a charter-party like this when demurrage, strictly and properly so called, is stipulated for. If a claim by the shipowner were to arise upon this charter-party for damages occasioned by delay beyond the days of demurrage stipulated for, it might be a matter of difficulty to determine, consistently with decided cases, whether the liability attached to the charterer or the owner of the cargo, or whether it had not ceased entirely. My own inclination is that to avoid the injustice of the last alternative we should hold the owner's lien on the cargo to be correlative with the charterer's liability, and further that the lien should extend to the wider mercantile meaning of demurrage which includes damages for such delay. This seems to me to have been the view upon which the Queen's Bench decided Christoffersen v. Hansen, and I think the judgment of Lush, J. in that case will go far to settle that point when it occurs. It is not necessary to decide it now, and I am of opinion that the judgment in this case should, at all events, be affirmed.

BRETT, J.—In this case we are called upon to construe a form of contract which has become somewhat ordinary and usual in mercantile transactions of this kind; and I am not prepared to say that, under such circumstances, although I differ from some of the decided cases in which such form has been interpreted, we ought to overrule those cases. These decisions have become generally known and acted upon, and it would be very undesirable to change the liabilities which the parties meant to undertake.

Now three interpretations have been suggested upon the clauses of this charter-party: First, that as soon as the ship is loaded all liability on the charterer's part should cease, and that the owner's lien should be extended to cover all damage, whether liquidated or unliquidated, past or future; that which occurs by breach of the charter-party before as well as after the loading; secondly, that from the loading of the ship future liability only should cease, and that the charterer should continue liable after the cargo is on board for everything which he has previously incurred. Thirdly, that the charterer's liability should cease for past and future breaches of the contract, but that the shipowner's remedy for only some of those breaches should exist against some other person. If the last were a necessary alternative, I should consider it so unjust that I should be prepared to overrule any number of decisions of courts below rather than enforce it. We have not here to interpret the extent of the shipowner's lien, but I am inclined to think it is intended to include a full remedy for all breaches of the contract which, but for this clause, would be the liability of the charterer. I will not be a party to holding that this clause entirely frees the charterer without seeing my way to a remedy by the shipowner for detention at the port of loading beyond demurrage proper. It strikes me that to deprive him of all means of enforcing a claim for such loss would be so unjust that I cannot believe it could have been the intention of parties to such a contract.

There are two ways of getting over the difficulty; one would be by making the charterer's liability in the past as well as for the future cease only in respect of the demurrage days for which the lien is expressly given—but that does not seem to be consistent with decided cases—the other way is that which I adopt in this case, viz., by freeing the charterer as fully as the decisions have gone, from past as well as future liability, but at the same time extending the shipowner's lien not only to demurrage proper as expressed in the clause, but to that which is in the nature of demurrage, and is known in the mercantile sense as demurrage, I mean damages for detention beyond the demurrage days. That point does not arise here, but it is only because I have this decision with regard to that point in my mind that I consent to hold the plaintiff's claim in this action barred by the protection clause.

I think that on this ground alone the judgment below was right and ought to be affirmed.

CLEASBY, B.—I agree with what has been said by my Lord and my brother Brett. I put my reason for this conclusion in the words of Hill, J. in Milvain v. Percy (3 E. & E. at p. 500), "The defendants have, however, by plain words in the charter-party, to be construed according to their plain meaning, protected themselves from all liability on that account, and the only person responsible to the plaintiffs is the defendants' foreign principal." The only question about the principal's responsibility for the claim in this action is as to the meaning of demurrage; and it seems to me that this charter-party was intended by the parties to it to give to the plaintiff a lien upon the cargo for all claims in the nature of demurrage as well as for those which are strictly called demurrage.

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I agree with my brother Brett in the hesitation he has expressed concerning the propriety of our conclusion. It seems to me that the normal and grammatical meaning of this clause is only to cover the charterer's future liability after the ship is loaded, but the authorities are too strong to be overruled even in a court of error. I should be inclined to hold that the demurrage for which the shipowner is given a lien includes damages for detention as well as demurrage in the ordinary sense. Indeed, I should think it the natural meaning of the word, but it may have become limited by the decisions; it will be sufficient to determine that hereafter, when the point arises.

POLLOCK, B.—I am of the same opinion. I should be prepared to hold, without reference to the authorities, that these provisions in the charter-party were to be taken correlatively, that is, that the charterer's exemption should occur only when the lien exists. The authorities are strong in applying this exemption to past breaches of the contract, and I think we ought not to disturb them. How far they would justify us in holding that the lien would satisfy a claim for unliquidated damages on account of delay at the port of loading beyond demurrage proper may be a difficult question when it comes to be considered; I say nothing about it now, for it is not necessary in deciding that our judgment should be in favour of the defendant on this demurrer.

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Monday, July 27, 1874.

THE CATHARINE CHALMERS.

Damage to cargo—Charter-party—Liability of owner of chartered ship—Perils of the seas—Stowage—Stevedore.

Damage to cargo caused by the oozing of wine from casks through straining in bad weather is damage occasioned by perils of the seas, and the ship-owners are, under the usual exceptions, exempt from liability therefor, where the cargo is properly stowed, or is stowed in such a manner that the master is not responsible for bad stowage.

Where a charter-party stipulates that a vessel is "to be stowed by charterers' stevedore, at risk and expense of vessel," and a cargo is supplied by the charterers and is stowed by their stevedore, the shipowner is not responsible for damage occasioned by bad stowage.

Blakie v. Stembidge (6 C. B., N.S., 874) followed. Semble, that charterers proceeding in a Court of Admiralty jurisdiction, for damage to cargo carried under a bill of lading, containing no exceptions, but signed by the master in pursuance of a charter-party containing the usual exceptions (perils of the sea, &c.), are bound by those exceptions.

THIS was an appeal from a decree of the City of London Court (Admiralty Jurisdiction), dismissing a cause of damage to cargo and breach of charter-party, instituted by Messrs. Robert McAndrew and Co., merchants, of the City of London, and of Tarragona, against the barque Catharine Chalmers and her owners.

Whilst the barque was lying at Tarragona, in Spain, her managing owner entered into a charter-party with Peter Consul and Co., who were admitted to be the agents of the plaintiffs for that purpose. It was thereby agreed that the barque should load for the charterers "a full and complete cargo of nuts in bags, ^{and} _{or} wine in Oporto shaped casks, or other lawful merchandise; the cargo to be loaded as customary, and taken from alongside the vessel, at merchant's risk and expense, not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, apparel, &c., and being so loaded shall proceed forthwith to a safe port in the United Kingdom," &c. The charter-party contained the usual exceptions, "perils of the seas," &c., and also the following clauses: "The freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo . . . Vessel not to be ballasted with anything prejudicial to the cargo, and to be stowed by charterer's stevedore, at risk and expense of vessel . . . The captain is not allowed to open any bag of nuts, or stow same loose, under penalty of forfeiture of freight, and payment of any loss that may arise therefrom."

Under this charter-party the charterers shipped on board the barque a cargo of nuts in bags, and wine in casks, and this cargo was stowed by a stevedore appointed by the charterers, but paid by the shipowner. Several of the bags of nuts were wet when brought on board, and were kept on deck till they were dry, and then stowed; this drying did not remove the stains from the bags. Several of the bags were broken whilst being put on board the ship by the plaintiff's men, and were fastened up again. The bags, which were very full, were brought to the ship by the plaintiff's men, thrown down over the taffrail, and then carried forward to the hold by the ship's crew, where they were stored by the stevedore. They were stowed in the usual way, that is to say, by placing the bags of nuts on top of the wine casks. The master and ship's officers did not in any way interfere with the stowing. When the loading was complete, the master gave bills of lading, by which the casks were consigned to various consignees, but the nuts to the plaintiffs only; these bills contained no exceptions whatsoever.

During the voyage the vessel met with bad weather, and although not materially injured, she strained very heavily. When the barque arrived in the port of London, and was unloaded, many of the bags of nuts were found stained with wine, and some of them had burst open and had let out their contents; this diminished the value of the consignment of nuts by about 50*l.*

Evidence given at the hearing in the City of London Court showed that severe straining of the ship would cause Tarragona wine, which is shipped new, to leak from the bungs and seams of the casks, and that such leakage had taken place in this case, and had caused the stains to the bags; and that such straining frequently had the effect of chafing the seams of the bags, and that if bags very full got so chafed, they are liable to burst, and that the bags taken out of the barque had the appearance of having been chafed. The claim of the plaintiffs was for damage to the consignment of nuts (namely 2912 bags), by reason of 108 bags being wine stained, and 47 slack or burst.

The learned County Court judge (Mr. Commissioner Kerr), dismissed the suit, saying: "I have considered this case, and I am of opinion that there is no evidence of negligence on the part of the defendants. No doubt the simple fact of the baskets of nuts arriving damaged is a fact from which some kind of negligence may be inferred, but that fact is easily accounted for by the rolling of the vessel in heavy weather, and is in fact accounted for in that way. It was proved that the wine had escaped from the casks—from the tops of the casks and the seams, and it was proved that the vessel had been subjected to heavy weather; and I assume that the wine stains were caused by that leakage, and were the result of heavy weather. Then, it was contended that they were not properly stowed. It might have been that the wine might have been kept separate from the nuts. The wine might have been put in one part of the ship, and the nuts in another, and, had that been so, of course it would have been negligence—but it was proved to me that they were stowed in the ordinary way—and if that is the ordinary way of stowage, I must assume it to be a mode of stowage which is approved of, and which is generally found sufficient. That being so, I cannot infer any negligence in the mode of stowage. But, even supposing there had been, there is another point which would have been a good answer to any negligence, which is this, that in the express provisions of the charter-party the cargo was to be stowed by the charterers' stevedore, although the owner was to pay for it. I do not think that the simple fact of the owner having to pay the stowing would relieve the charterers from the risk they incurred by undertaking the stowing of them. If, for instance, they had employed a stevedore who knew nothing whatever about his duty, and he insisted upon stowing the goods in a way to which the master objected and failed to prevent, I apprehend that the simple fact that they had been stowed by the charterer in that particular way would have been a very good answer to any objection that they were improperly stowed. The consequence is, that I find as a fact that the mischief complained of—the damage which was complained of—resulted from the perils of the sea."

A decree having been made in accordance with this judgment, the plaintiff appealed to the High Court of Admiralty.

Grantham, for the appellants.—The decision that the damage arose from perils of the seas is erroneous, because it was proved that there were no extraordinary perils affecting the ship and cargo. "Straining" is an ordinary peril which every ship must undergo, and which is contemplated by a shipowner as one of the contingencies of every voyage, and it is a contingency against which the shipowner is bound to provide. In this case the master should have provided proper dunnage to separate the wine from the nuts, and so have taken an ordinary precaution against an ordinary peril. The neglect to provide dunnage is a breach of duty on the part of the shipowner for which he is responsible. Under the charter-party the shipowner is responsible for proper stowage, and if he neglects to provide sufficient dunnage to protect the bags of nuts, he is liable for any damage arising to them by leakage of the for any damage arising to them by leakage of the casks, "leakage" not being a peril, and excepted either by the charter-party or the bill of lading. There are two questions in the case; first, whether the damage was occasioned by the perils of the sea, and I submit it was not in the real sense of that exception; secondly, whether, even supposing perils of the sea to have been the proximate cause, the injury might not have been avoided by the observance of the shipowner's duty to stow properly; and I submit that the latter question must be answered in my favour. The duty of a master to stow cargo properly is not put an end to because the charterers have power to appoint their own stevedore. There is no demise of the ship, and the master, as agent for the shipowners, remains responsible, and the defendants are consequently liable in this suit.

R. E. Webster, for the respondents.—There is abundant evidence in the case to show that the damage was such as might, and in all probability was, caused by perils of the sea, and that there were such perils is shown by the log-book put in by the plaintiffs. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—You need not press that point. I am satisfied that the finding of the court below on that head is correct.]

Secondly, even if the stowage was improper, the shipowners are not responsible, by reason of the charter-party, which makes the stevedore who stowed the cargo the agent of the charterers, and not of the shipowners: (Blakie v. Stemberidge, 6 C. B., N. S., 894; 28 L. J. 333, C. P.) If, then, the shipowner is not responsible for the stowage, it cannot be said that the shipowner is responsible for damage occasioned by an ordinary peril as distinguished from extraordinary perils. "Straining" may be ordinarily met with in a voyage, but if it occasions injury in consequence of the neglect of a person for whom the master is not responsible, the shipowners are excused:

Grantham, in reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is an appeal from the City of London Court in a cause of damage to cargo. The appellants complain that certain nuts which were put on board the Catharine Chalmers at Tarragona arrived in a damaged state in London, at her place of destination, and they contend that the burden of proof lies upon the other side to show that this damage was in consequence of the excepted perils in the charter-party and in the bills of lading, the excepted perils being perils of the sea. Now it has been rightly, as I think, argued by the learned counsel for the respondents, that there are two questions of fact and one of law. I should observe, before I go to that, that the questions argued before the learned judge of the court below were more in number than those which have been submitted to me; for the main question, and in effect the only question of fact which I have to decide, by the consent of both parties, is, whether, within the circumstances proved in the case, the nuts were damaged by the perils of the sea or not, and if they were damaged by the perils of the sea, there still remains the further question—and this is a question of mixed law and fact—whether the nuts were not originally so put on board this vessel as to render them properly liable to such damage as resulted to them? I am quite clear myself upon the questions of fact. I am of opinion, upon the evidence before me—which is really, as is commonly said, all on one side—that the damage in this case was caused by the perils of the sea, and I say so after having looked at the entries in the log book. I have no doubt, taking those entries and the evidence of the witnesses, that the right conclusion to come to is, that the damage was caused by the perils of the sea. I am unable to draw the distinction forced upon me between ordinary and extraordinary perils. In truth, it may be said that the way in which the cargo was stored was more or less a cause of the damage; but I am of opinion that the evidence shows that the cargo was stowed in the ordinary way, and if the bad weather had not occurred, and the straining had not taken place, the cargo would, I think, have arrived without damage, and, consequently, the proximate cause of the damage must be taken to have been the perils of the seas.

Then there remains the question of law, whether the nuts and the wine were not allowed to be placed in such improper proximity by the master of the vessel as to render him liable for the damage that ensued, from the wine oozing through the bung-holes and the casks leaking and injuring the nuts. I think the case of Blakie v. Stemberidge (6 C. B., N. S., 894; 28 L. J. 329, C. P.), which was referred to, was very much in point in this case, if the facts bring it within the proposition of law there laid down. I think the facts of this case do bring it within the case cited. That is an à fortiori case, because there the goods were put on board a ship, which although chartered, was put up as a general ship, and the shippers would naturally look to the master as being responsible for proper stowage; but it was held that the master was not liable for negligence, because the goods had been put on board by a stevedore appointed by the charterers. In this case the ship was not a general ship, but carried a cargo wholly belonging to the plaintiffs, who were in effect the charterers, and it is admitted that they, as shippers and charterers, put on board the wine and nuts consigned to the same consignee. The stevedore, who is the agent of the charterer by the terms of the charter-party, had an empty ship, and might have stowed the cargo as he thought fit, subject only to the master's control in matters affecting the safety of the ship; yet with all his knowledge on the subject, the stevedore deliberately places the wine and nuts in the way that has been proved. The contract may have been such that he could not stow them in any other way, but still it is a fact that he does stow them in a position from which damage ensues. I entertain no doubt in my own mind that, in point of fact and in point of law, the case has been rightly decided in the court below, and I reject the appeal with costs. At the same time, as it has been urged upon me that it is a question of importance upon the principle of law, I will give leave to appeal, in order that the question of law may be raised and decided.

THE CHASCA.

Damage to cargo—Bill of lading—Perils of the seas—Barratry.

A shipowner carrying goods under a bill of lading, by which he contracts to deliver in good order and condition, certain perils excepted, is bound to deliver in that condition, unless prevented by those perils, and is responsible for any damage to goods occasioned otherwise than by those perils.

Injury to cargo damaged by sea water during a voyage, in consequence of the barratrous act of the crew in boring holes through the sides of the ship for the purpose of scuttling her, is not a loss by perils of the seas, within the meaning of the usual exception in a bill of lading, such as will exempt the shipowner from his liability for the damage under his contract to deliver in good order and condition.

Even if such a loss would come within the meaning of the words, "perils of the seas," in a policy of insurance, it is not included in those words as used in a bill of lading.

THIS was an appeal from a decree of the Judge of the County Court of Durham (E. J. Meynell, Esq.), holden at Sunderland.

The suit was instituted in rem against the ship Chasca, as "a claim in tort in respect of goods carried in the said ship, and a claim arising out of an agreement made in relation to the use or hire of the said ship." An appearance was entered on behalf of the owners of the ship.

At the hearing before the County Court Judge the following facts were proved:

On the 23rd Jan. 1874, a charter-party was entered into at San Francisco between Henry Pratt, the master of the American barque Chasca, and E. E. Morgan and Sons, of San Francisco, by which it was agreed that the ship should proceed to Portland, Oregon, and there load a cargo of wheat and proceed therewith either to Liverpool direct or to Cork, for orders to be given there by the charterers or their agents to discharge at either a safe port in the United Kingdom, or between Havre and Hamburg inclusive, at charterer's option; the master to sign bills of lading, as decided by the charterers or their agents, without prejudice to the charter-party, but at no less rates. The barque, accordingly, proceeded to Portland, Oregon, and there loaded a cargo of wheat from the charterer's agents, and the master gave a bill of lading, by which he acknowledged the wheat to have been shipped in good order by E. E. Morgan and Sons, and undertook to deliver the same "in the like good order and condition at the port of as ordered at Cork, the dangers of the seas and fire only excepted, unto order or to assigns, he or they paying freight for the said wheat." When the wheat was shipped, the barque was perfectly sound, and was certified by a surveyor appointed under the charter-party as "suitable for carrying a dry and perishable cargo to any port in the world."

The barque sailed with the said wheat from Astoria, at the mouth of the Columbia River, on the 21st March 1874, bound for Cork for orders.

On the 2nd April, whilst on the voyage, it was found that the barque was making water rapidly, and on search being made in the forehold it was discovered that holes had been bored through the ship's sides with augers below the water line, and that the water was coming in rapidly. As soon as possible the holes were plugged, but the water came in for several hours. Later in the same month there was a mutiny on board the ship, and the mutineers (three of the crew) were seized and put in irons, and whilst in confinement they confessed that they had bored the holes in the ship's side. The ship arrived safely at Cork, and was thence ordered to West Hartlepool to discharge, and arrived there on the 26th Aug. 1874.

When her cargo was discharged, it was found considerably damaged by salt water. The bill of lading had been indorsed to a Mr. John Kidd, of Manchester, who was admitted to be the owner of the cargo at the time of the institution of the suit, and was the plaintiff therein.

On behalf of the defendants it was shown that the ship had met with very bad weather, and evidence was given to show that the damage was such as might have resulted from straining.

For the plaintiff evidence was given to show that the damaged grain was in such parts of the ship as would naturally be traversed by water coming into the ship by the holes.

On behalf of the plaintiff it was contended that the damage was occasioned by acts done by the crew of the defendants' ship, which acts were not within the excepted perils, and for which acts the defendants were therefore responsible.

On behalf of the defendants it was contended that the cause of the damage was the straining of the ship; but that even if the water coming in through the holes had damaged the cargo, the cause thereof was the water coming into the ship, and this was a peril of the seas, although the original act was a barratrous act of the crew.

The learned County Court Judge delivered the following judgment:—"This was a suit in rem for damage to a cargo of wheat. By the bill of lading the cargo, which was stated to be shipped in good order and condition, is to be delivered in like good order and condition, at the port of as ordered at Cork, the dangers of the seas and fire only excepted. The ship sailed on the 22nd March, from the port of Astoria, Oregon, and after having accomplished several hundred miles of her voyage, on the 2nd April it was discovered that the ship was making water. Upon examination it was found that holes had been bored in the ship, through which the water came in. These were plugged, and the ship proceeded on her voyage. The crew appear afterwards to have confessed that they had made the holes, and that that was the fact is admitted on both sides. The ship arrived at Cork, and was ordered to Hartlepool, and when the cargo was discharged it was discovered that it had been partially damaged by water, and I am satisfied by water which had got into the ship through the holes made by the crew. The question for me to determine is, whether the owner or the respondent is answerable for this damage. Various arguments were used, and cases cited, upon the duties of bailees and carriers, but I think it is not necessary to consider those cases, as I intimated at the hearing, because the bill of lading is a contract which the parties have entered into and by which they are bound, and we must look to that document to see what the defendant, the shipowner has undertaken to do. He undertakes to deliver the cargo in good order and condition (the dangers of the seas and fire only excepted); unless that he can bring himself within those exceptions, he is liable. That raises what seems the real question in the case—whether the damage caused by leakage, such leakage being caused by the barratrous act of the crew, is a danger of the sea. There seems much less authority on the point than we would have expected to find. Mr. Young (plaintiff's solicitor) argued it was not a danger or peril of the sea, for that those words meant danger from without the ship. It may be said, however, that the damage was caused from without, viz., from the sea coming against the side of the ship, although it would not have caused the damage but for an act within. Mr. Young instanced the case of Kay v. Wheeler (16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 66; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 302; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 466), in which it was held that an injury to goods on board by rats was not a danger of the sea. There is another case to the same effect, Laveroni v. Drury (8 Ex. 166; 22 L. J. 2, Ex.), in which Pollock, C.B., and Alderson, B. seemed to think that if the rats had made a hole in the ship, and water had come in and damaged the cargo, it might have been within the exception, Alderson, B., adding, a rat making a hole in a ship may be the same thing as if a sailor made one. This is not an express decision, but it appears to have been the opinion of two eminent judges. Mr. Brown (defendant's solicitor) cited the case of Blyth v. Shepherd (9 M. & W. 763), which, though not an express authority, is in the defendant's favour. It turned on a point of pleading. A declaration on a policy of insurance contained two counts, one charging a loss by barratry the other by perils of the sea; both were not allowed, the real reason, however, being that it was contrary to the rule prohibiting two counts on the same policy. But the court expressed an opinion that a loss by barratry might be described as a loss by perils of the sea. In the case of Heyman v. Parish (2 Camp. 149) Lord Ellenborough expressed a similar opinion. Those are the only cases I have been able to find on the point, and they are all favourable to the defendant's contention. I think, therefore, I must hold that the damage was occasioned by a danger of the sea within the exception in the bill of lading. Mr. Young also contended that after discovering the leak, the captain should have put back to Portland and discharged the cargo, as he admitted he thought it might have sustained damage. No authority was cited for this contention. No doubt it was held in Worms v. Story (25 L. J. 1, Ex), that if a vessel becomes unseaworthy during a voyage, and the master having the opportunity of repairing neglects to do so, and the cargo afterwards suffers from perils of the sea in consequence of such nonrepair, the owner is liable. That, however, is a much stronger case; here the leak was at once stopped. The master is bound to do the best he can for both the ship and the cargo, and he must exercise his discretion. I do not see anything in this case to lead me to think he did wrong, or did not exercise a proper discretion in proceeding on his voyage. Mr. Young finally contended, that although the owner might not be personally liable, yet the ship might be so under sect. 2 sub-sect. 1, of the Act of 1869, under the words 'any claim in tort in respect of goods.' I cannot agree in that argument, and think the Legislature could not have intended to make the respondent liable for that for which its owner could not be answerable. My judgment is, therefore, for the defendants."

A decree was entered for the defendants, with costs, in accordance with the above judgment, and from this decree the plaintiff appealed.

Cohen, Q.C. (H. D. Warr with him) for the appellant (plaintiff).—I submit that the judgment below is erroneous, because it holds that barratry comes within "perils of the seas": although it may be covered by perils of the seas in a policy of marine insurance, it is not covered in a bill of lading. "Perils of the seas," in a bill of lading, does not even include the negligence of a master and crew. In Lloyd v. The General Iron Screw Collier Company (Limited) (10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 586; 33 L. J. 269, Ex.; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 32), it was held that an exception in a bill of lading, of "accidents or damage of the seas, rivers, and steam navigation of whatever nature or kind soever," does not protect the shipowner from liability for damage arising from a collision caused by the gross negligence of the ship's master and crew; and in that case Pollock, C.B., says: "It is perfectly well known that there is a distinction between a marine policy on a ship or goods and an ordinary insurance against fire. If a man insures his house, and goes home in a state such as not to know what he is about, and in that condition sets his house on fire, he is as much entitled to recover the damage so done as if he had gone to bed as sober as a judge. But in the case of a marine policy of assurance, it has been decided that if the loss has been occasioned directly by the gross negligence of the master and mariners, and it is not a case within the excepted perils, the owners are liable;" and Bramwell, B., said that "perils of the seas" were inevitable accidents, and not events which might be avoided by care and prudence. The real cause of loss in the present case was the act of the crew in boring holes in the ship's side, and although the damage was done by water, the original cause is that which must be taken into account. In Ionides v. The Universal Marine Insurance Company (8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 705; 32 L. J. 170, Ex.; Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 353) it was held that if goods are reduced to such a state by perils of the seas as that there is no hope of recovery, but while they still exist in specie, they are nominally taken possession of by persons in the military service of a belligerent state, this is a loss by perils of the seas and not by capture; that is to say, that if damage naturally results from an act done, it must be considered as occasioned by that act and not by the consequences of that act. A shipowner is liable for the wrongful and barratrous acts of his crew, unless those acts are excepted in his bill of lading. The damage in the present case was occasioned by barratry, which is not excepted in the bill of lading, and the shipowner is therefore liable: (Kay v. Wheeler, 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 66; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 302; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 466). A shipowner has all the liability of a common carrier, and is liable for any losses except such as are occasioned by the act of God or the Queen's enemies, unless he limits his liability by special contract: (The Liver Alkali Company v. Johnson, ante, vol. 1, p. 380; vol. 2, p. 352; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 805; 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 95; L. Rep. 7 Ex. 267; L. Rep. 9 C. P. 338). Here the shipowner has only limited his liability in case of damage from perils of the sea and fire, whilst the damage was occasioned by the barratry of the crew; his liability therefore remains.

Milward, Q. C. (E. C. Clarkson with him) for the respondent (defendant).—The case of The Liver Alkali Works v. Johnson is distinguishable, because in that case there was no contract at all, except at common law, and moreover it was not a maritime contract. Further this is an American ship, and the English common law cannot be applied unless it has been shown to be applicable. It has never been really established that the owner of a sea-going ship is a common carrier: (The Duero, 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 37; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 351.) They are not bound to carry all goods that are brought to them. If that be so then, in order to show their liability as common carriers, it would be necessary to give evidence as to their liability as common carriers for the goods they do accept. It must be shown that there is a custom by which the liability of common carriers is imposed upon them, and such a custom would be a maritime custom. But then there is no such general maritime custom, and therefore no liability as common carriers. The question is then reduced entirely to the meaning of the contract in the bill of lading contained, and whether barratry is or is not a peril of the sea. In The Freedom (ante vol. 1, pp. 28, 136; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 452; L. Rep. 3 P. C. 594) it is said, "The words in the bills of lading, 'dangers of the seas,' must of course be taken in the sense in which they are used in a policy of insurance. It is a settled rule of the law of insurance not to go into distinct cases, but to look exclusively to the immediate and proximate cause of the loss." And in Dudgeon v. Pembroke (ante p. 323; 31 L. T. Rep. N. S. 31; L. Rep. 9 Q. B. 581) it is distinctly laid down that, in the case of loss by perils of the sea, the proximate and not the remote cause of loss must be regarded. Here the proximate cause was not the act of the crew, but damage by sea water, which is a peril of the seas. But even if the act of barratry be considered the proximate cause, it is an act for which the shipowner is not responsible. In Lloyd v. The General Iron Screw Collier Company (ubi sup.) the act of negligence was committed within the scope of the authority of the master and crew; it was a case of collision, and the charge was negligent navigation. Here the act is wholly out of the scope of the authority of the crew, and a principal cannot be liable for any wrongful act on the part of his agent committed beyond the scope of the agent's authority: Story on Agency, p. 295.

Cohen, Q. C., in reply.—The shipowner has entered into a specific contract to deliver safely, unless he is prevented by certain excepted perils named in the bill of lading. He has not been prevented by these perils, but by a wrongful act on the part of the crew. He is therefore responsible.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is an appeal from the judgment of the learned judge of the County Court of Durham, in a suit before him, which was a suit for damage done to a cargo of wheat.

The evidence established that the damage resulted from the barratrous act of the crew of the Chasca in boring holes in the bottom of the vessel, through which the water came and injured the wheat.

The question which the learned judge had to determine, and from which an appeal has been brought, was a question simply of law, namely, whether such a barratrous act as that was an excepted peril of the sea, because in this case there was a bill of lading in the following words: "Shipped in good order and condition by E. E. Morgan and Sons, on board the American barque Chasca, whereof Henry Pratt is master, now lying at the port of Portland, Oregon, and bound for Cork for orders, to say 16,050 sacks of wheat, containing 1,994,256 lbs., being marked and numbered in the margin, and are to be delivered in like good order and condition at the port of , as ordered at Cork, the dangers of the seas and fire only excepted;" and therefore, as this was not a danger by fire, the only question is, whether it falls within the category of excepted "dangers of the seas." The learned judge came to the conclusion that it did, after having an argument addressed to him by counsel, founding his opinion upon the presumed false analogy in cases of policies of insurance to cases depending on the contracts contained in bills of lading.

Now, the first question of law which the court has to decide is this; is the court entitled to look at the real cause, the causa remota, or must it confine its attention to the proximate cause, just as in a policy of insurance? The real cause the court is, in my judgment, entitled to look at.

The only case cited to the contrary is The Freedom (ubi sup.), where the learned judge who delivered the judgment of their Lordships says: "The words in the bill of lading, 'dangers of the seas,' must, of course, be taken in the sense in which they are used in a policy of insurance. It is a settled rule of the law of insurance not to go into distinct cases, but to look exclusively to the immediate or proximate cause of the loss." Now, that is a dictum in no way necessary for the judicial conclusion at which their Lordships arrived; and I say without hesitation, that in my judgment it was an erroneous dictum, that must have fallen inadvertently from the judge who delivered the sentence. It must have been an erroneous dictum, because the facts of that case, and others of the same kind decided by the Privy Council at the same period, all proceeded upon the hypothesis that a loss occasioned by negligence was a loss which was not excepted by the exception of "perils of the sea" in a bill of lading. I say, then, that if losses occasioned by negligence are not within the exception of "perils of the seas" losses occasioned by barratry, are a fortiori not within it. Not only then, is there a variance with the cases and the decision itself, but a variance with other cases. First, the case of Lloyd v. The General Iron Screw Collier Company (Limited), in which it is said by Pollock, C.B.: "We are all agreed that the plaintiff is entitled to our judgment. The declaration distinctly discloses the cause of the accident. It sets out the bill of lading, from which certain common perils are excepted, including barratry of the masters and mariners, but not gross negligence or improper conduct short of barratry. Then to the defendant's plea, that they were prevented from carrying the goods by the perils excepted, the plaintiff, to prevent any mistake, replies that the supposed perils were incurred by and through the gross negligence, mismanagement, and improper conduct of the defendants' servants, and not otherwise. The opinions handed down to us by those who have discussed these matters, and the decided cases, clearly establish the proposition that in cases of this sort we are to look, not at the causa proxima, but at the real cause of the loss. Here, therefore, if the direct negligence of the master and mariners should turn out to be the cause of the loss, the plaintiff is entitled to recover, notwithstanding the exception in the bill of lading." In the case of Grill v. The General Iron Screw Collier Company, decided in 1864 by a judge whose opinions are always cited with the highest respect in every court of justice, the late Mr. Justice Willes says: "As, however, reference has been made to cases on policies of insurance, and the interpretation that has been given to them, I may say that a policy of insurance is an absolute contract of indemnity from loss by perils of the sea, and it is only necessary to see whether the loss comes within the terms of the contract, and is caused by perils of the sea. The fact that a loss is partly caused by things not distinctly perils of the sea does not prevent it coming within the contract. In the case of a bill of lading it is different, because there the contract is to carry with reasonable care, unless prevented by the excepted perils." I am, therefore, of opinion that the dictum cited from the case of The Freedom cannot be put forward with any force as an authority that the court should derive the law as to bills of lading from the law as policies of insurance.

The next question is one of fact, and I have anticipated the opinion of the court by saying that it seems to have been admitted that it was the boring of the holes in the bottom of the vessel by the barratrous act of the crew.

Now, the third question is one of law. Was this barratrous act a peril of the sea? I have no hesitation in arriving at the conclusion to which common sense, as well as all the interests of navigation, seem to render it desirable for the court to arrive, namely, that an act of this kind is not a peril of the sea, and, on the authority of the cases and on principle I am constrained to reverse the sentence of the court below, and to pronounce in favour of the respondent, with costs.

Necessaries—Material men—Mortgagee—Maritime lien—Priority—Practice—Transfer from County Court—Reference to registrar and merchants—Ship under arrest of High Court—Subsequent arrest by County Court.

An advance of freight to enable a master to pay his ship's disbursements before sailing does not give the charterer a claim against the ship, which will take precedence of the claim of a mortgagee; nor does an advance for a similar purpose made by an insurance company.

Where it is necessary that a wooden ship bound upon a particular voyage should be coppered, the coppering is a "necessary for the voyage," which gives the material man doing the work to a foreign ship, upon the orders of the master, a maritime lien.

Where causes of necessaries and wages had been instituted against a ship in the High Court, and other causes of necessaries in a County Court against the same ship, and the latter had been transferred after decree made to the High Court for the purpose of enforcing the decrees, the ship being under the arrest of the High Court, the latter court ordered all the causes to be referred to the registrar and merchants to report the amount due thereon.

Semble, that where a ship is under the arrest of the High Court, and causes are also instituted in the County Court against the ship, she should not be arrested by the County Court, as it is not probable that the ship will be removed out of the jurisdiction of the County Court without satisfaction of the plaintiff's several claims, within the meaning of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, sect. 22.

SEVERAL suits were instituted in rem against the Greek brig Turliani, in the High Court and in the County Court of Northumberland, holden at Newcastle.

No. 6877 was a cause of necessaries instituted in the High Court on the 23rd May 1874, on behalf of Ernesto Rodinis, ship chandler and merchant. The claim made in this cause will be found set out in the first schedule to the registrar's report (post). The ship was arrested in this suit by the marshal, and remained under arrest till the claim was on the 30th June pronounced for, and the vessel was sold by an order of the court. An appearance was on the 10th Dec., subsequently entered in this cause by Demetrio Vafiadachi, a mortgagee of the ship as defendant.

No. 6893 was a cause of necessaries, instituted on behalf of George Varnakiottes, shipbroker, in the County Court of Northumberland, holden at Newcastle, but transferred before proceedings to the High Court, by order of the latter court. The claim made in this case will be found set out in the second schedule to the registrar's report (post), and was pronounced for on the 8th July 1874, without prejudice to other claims. An appearance was also entered in this suit by the mortgagee on the 10th Dec.

No. 6895 was a cause of necessities instituted in the High Court on behalf of Thomas Grieve, hardwareman. This claim appears on schedule 3 to the registrar's report, and was on the 14th July 1874 pronounced for without prejudice to other claims. An appearance was also entered in this suit by the mortgagee on the 10th Dec.

No. 6911 was a cause of necessities (so called) instituted on behalf of Feice Bruma and others. This case was originally instituted in the County Court of Northumberland, holden at Newcastle, against the ship in rem, to recover an advance of 145*l.*, made at North Shields upon the security of an instrument in the following terms :

I, the undersigned, Zani Cambani, master of the Greek brig Turliani, acknowledge to have received as a loan from Messrs. Bruma, Villa, and Schiaffino, on account of the Casa Marittima of Genoa, the sum of 145*l.*, for the last expenses necessary for the continuation of my present voyage from North Shields to Buenos Ayres, binding myself to pay the said sum to the order of the Casa Marittima fifteen days after my arrival; and for the said sum I bind the freight and the ship. In faith of which I have signed the present document in duplicate, one taking effect, the other to be void.

Done at North Shields, 14th April 1874.

(Signed) ZANI CAMBANI, Master.

The ship was arrested in this suit by the County Court on the usual affidavit that she was about to leave the jurisdiction; at the time of such arrest she was already under arrest by the High Court in cause No. 6893. No appearance was entered in the County Court, and the plaintiffs obtained a decree for the amount claimed. After this decree the cause was, on the application of the plaintiffs, transferred, on the 1st July 1874, to the High Court, in order that they might be able to enforce their judgment against the ship, which was under the arrest of the High Court. An appearance was, after such transfer, entered in this suit, also in the High Court, by the mortgagee.

No. 6913 was a cause instituted on behalf of William Boyd, under the 2nd section of the County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), to recover 290*l.* for breach of charter-party, dated the 17th March 1874, and made between the plaintiff and the master of the Turliani, the said sum of 290*l.* being an advance of freight made by the plaintiffs, as charterer, to the master of the Turliani, in relation to the carriage of goods under the said charter-party in the said vessel Turliani. This cause was originally instituted in the County Court at Newcastle, and no appearance having been entered in the County Court, the plaintiff obtained a decree for the amount claimed. The ship was arrested by the County Court in this suit, although already arrested in the High Court. After decree the cause was, on the application of the plaintiff, transferred on the 1st July to the High Court, to enable the plaintiff to enforce his judgment. An appearance was, after transfer, entered in the High Court in this suit also by the mortgagee.

No. 6918 was a cause of necessities instituted on behalf of John Freeland Fergus Common, and Robert Brotherick Avery. The items of claim in this cause will be found set out in schedule 4 to the registrar's report (post). The metal and nails appearing thereby to have been supplied were furnished by the plaintiffs for the purpose of copping the ship. This copping was done at North Shields by direction of Companis, the master, and a foreign surveyor. The vessel was at this time bound on a voyage to Sierra Leone; she was iron-fastened, and it was admittedly an imprudent thing to copper an iron fastened ship, but the plaintiffs supplied the ship under the master's orders, and to obviate any evil consequences took care that the heads of the iron holds should be well covered with lead to prevent their coming in contact with the copper sheathing. The remaining facts material to this claim will be found set out among the "Reasons" for the registrar's report: (See post.) This cause was instituted originally in the County Court at Newcastle, and the ship was arrested by that court, although already under arrest in the High Court. A decree was there obtained, in default of appearance, and the cause was afterwards, on the application of the plaintiff, transferred on the 7th July to the High Court, to enable him to enforce his judgment against the ship, then under the arrest of the High Court. An appearance was entered in the High Court in this suit also by the mortgagee.

No. 6919 was a cause of necessities instituted on behalf of the said John Freeland Fergus Common. The items of claim in this cause will be found set out in schedule 4 to the registrar's report. The work therein claimed for was in respect of docking and undocking the ship, burning and blacking her bottom, caulking her beams and butts under the metal, finding and laying on felt, punching, laying on, nailing and dressing the yellow metal (claimed for in cause No. 6919), finding all labour and material (except yellow metal), including dock dues. The extras claimed included lead for covering the iron bolts and felt. The smith's work claimed was in respect of necessary repairs to the ship's gear. The work was done under the circumstances mentioned in cause No. 6911, and the cause was instituted and transferred after decree, precisely in the same manner as cause No. 6911. An appearance was entered in the High Court in this suit also by the mortgagee.

No. 6941 was a cause of bottomry instituted in the High Court on behalf of Demetrio Vafiadachi, the mortgagee before mentioned. The claim in this cause was based upon two instruments, binding the ship for the payment of certain sums of money advanced by Vafiadachi to enable the owners of the Turliani to build and fit her out for her first voyage. These instruments, not being bottomry bonds by English law, and the plaintiff having no claim of priority over persons having maritime liens upon the ship, this cause was abandoned, and Vafiadachi entered an appearance in the other cases, as mortgagee of the ship under the said instruments.

No. 6961 was a cause of wages instituted in the High Court on behalf of Companis (otherwise Cambani), the master, and the sum claimed was 10*l.* 19*s.* 9*d.* which was on the 10th Nov. 1874 pronounced for without prejudice to other claims. The ship had been built by one John Zancopulo, who sold part of her to Companis for 35,000 drachms. It was agreed that Zancopulo was to be captain, but that when he was ashore Companis was to act as captain, and have control of the ship and her affairs. Before the ship went to North Shields she had carried a cargo to Cuxhaven from the Levant. At Cuxhaven Zancopulo was taken ill, and directed the ship to go to Swansea to take up a charter to carry coal to Sierra Leone. Companis, however, took her to North Shields, owing to contrary winds. Whilst at North Shields a charter-party was entered into by Companis to go to Buenos Ayres with coals, and the ship, after being coppered, was duly laden under the charter-party. Companis, whilst at Newcastle, received various sums for the ship from the charterer and brokers, and had previously received considerable sums from Zancopulo at various times. Zancopulo alleged that the coppering of the ship was wholly without his knowledge and consent.

Dec. 10, 1874.—James P. Aspinall moved on behalf of the mortgagee that the several claims be referred to the registrar, assisted (if necessary) by merchants, to examine and report thereon, as usual.

E. C. Clarkson, for the plaintiffs in causes Nos. 6911, 6913, 6918, 6919, transferred from the County Court, objected upon the ground that the claims therein had already been investigated and pronounced for by the County Court, and that the defendant having neglected to enter an appearance in the County Court had no right to have the claims re-opened now. In cause No. 6913, the claim is for a sum advanced; a reference is unnecessary there.

Gainsford Bruce, for the other plaintiffs, contended that as the defendant had allowed such a length of time to elapse before asking a reference, he was now too late; and, further, that it would be useless to refer No. 6895, on account of the smallness of the claim.

Aspinall, in reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I shall order all the claims, except that in causes Nos. 6895 and 6913, to be referred to the registrar. In taking this course I do not wish it to be understood that I decide that these claims in which judgments have already investigated are to be reopened. Whether it will be necessary to reopen them or not is a question with which the registrar must deal when they come before him. There is, however, one matter in the case to which I wish to call attention. It is worthy of remark that this vessel, although under the arrest of this court, was arrested in several of the other suits by the same County Court, which is hardly consistent with the spirit of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, giving power to arrest only when there is a probability of the ship being taken out of the jurisdiction, the expense being very needlessly augmented thereby. I think it is desirable that the Bar and the Profession should consider this matter, which is one of importance.

In accordance with this order, the several claims came before the registrar, assisted by Sidney Young, Esq., merchant, who issued the following report:

To the Right Honourable the Judge of the High Court of Admiralty of England.

Whereas there have been instituted in or transferred to this court nine different causes against the above-named foreign vessel, to wit:—

- No. 6877, for necessities on behalf of E. A. Rodinis.
- „ 6893, for necessities on behalf of George Varnakiottes, shipbroker.
- „ 6895, for necessities on behalf of Thomas Grieve.
- „ 6911, for necessities (so called) on behalf of Messrs. Bruna, Villa, and Schiaffino, a cause transferred from the Northumberland County Court, at Newcastle.

- No. 6913, for breach of contract on behalf of William Boyd, also transferred from the above-named County Court.
- „ 6918, for necessities on behalf of Messrs. Common and Avery, also transferred from the above-named County Court.
- „ 6919, for necessities on behalf of Mr. Common, also transferred from the above-named County Court.
- „ 6941, for bottomry (afterwards acknowledged to be mortgage) on behalf of Basilio Papayanni, agent of Demetrio Vafiadachi.
- „ 6961, for wages and disbursements on behalf of John Companis as master of the vessel.

And whereas, on the 10th Dec. ult., you were pleased, at petition of the mortgagee, the plaintiff proceeding in cause No. 6941, to refer the claims in causes 6877, 6893, 6911, 6918, 6919, and 6961, to the registrar to report the amount due thereon, to waive reference in causes 6895 and 6913.

And whereas the proctors representing the parties in all the above-mentioned causes, have agreed that I should also report as to the right of several plaintiffs to the priority of payment out of the proceeds in court, as well as on the question of costs.

Now I do most humbly report that I have, with the assistance of Sydney Young, Esq., of London, merchant, carefully examined all of the claims filed in these causes, together with all accounts and vouchers, and the papers and proceedings produced and brought in, and having on the 29th Dec. ult. heard the evidence of Ernesto Antonio Rodinis, the plaintiff in cause No. 6877, of George Varnakiottes, the plaintiff in cause No. 6893, of John Zancopulo, the owner of 32-64ths of the vessel, a witness produced by the mortgagee, and on the 4th Jan. inst. heard parties through their proctors, on all sides, I find that the several claims ought to be paid out of the proceeds of the vessel, now remaining in court, in the following order:

(1.) The taxed costs of all parties, including those incurred as well in the County Court as in this court, save the costs of the plaintiff in cause 6961.

(2.) The claims of the material men for necessities, to the extent following:—In cause 6877, 191l. 5s. 3d.; in 6893, 90l. 13s. 11d.; in 6895, 13l. 16s. 4d.; in 6918, 129l. 15s. 10d.; in 6919, 106l. 19s.; as stated in the schedules 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, hereto annexed.

(3.) The claim of the mortgagees in cause 6941, to value of 1000 French gold twenty-five franc pieces, equal to the sum of 800l. sterling, on his filing an affidavit to the effect that no part of the said mortgage debt has been paid, or any interest thereon.

(4.) The balance (if any) to be applied to the satisfaction of the remaining claim or claims in such manner as I may hereinafter, if required, report.

All which is humbly submitted by

H. C. ROTHERY, Registrar.

The reasons upon which the registrar based his report were given by him in writing as follows:—

“The circumstances of this case are very peculiar.

“It seems that the Turliani or Turlina was a Greek vessel, built at Syra in the year 1872 by one Zancopulo. Whilst she was building, Zancopulo sold one half of the ship for the sum of 35,000 drachms to a person named Companis, and the vessel was registered in their joint names. It was arranged that for the first year, at all events, Zancopulo should be the master, and Companis mate; but that when Zancopulo was on shore, Companis was to be the master, and to have the management and control of the ship and of its affairs. It further appears that the owners, being unable to provide the necessary funds for the completion of the vessel borrowed from a Greek named Demetrio Vafiadachi, two sums of 700 and 300 Napoleons respectively, for which they gave two mortgages on the ship.

“The ship left Syra with Zancopulo on board as master, and Companis as mate, and proceeded thence to Cyprus, Odessa, and other places, and ultimately arrived with a cargo at Falmouth, whence she was ordered to proceed to Leery. On her way there she got on to a bank, and was obliged to put into Cuxhaven, where the cargo was discharged. At Cuxhaven she was placed on a bank, there being no dry docks there, and her bottom was caulked and tallowed, but no other repairs were done to her. She then sailed with Companis as master, Zancopulo remaining at Cuxhaven, partly because of his health, partly to settle the averages for Swansea, where a charter had been obtained for her to carry a cargo of coals to Sierra Leone.

“It is said that on the way the vessel met with contrary winds, and, accordingly, instead of continuing her voyage, she proceeded to the Tyne, where Companis obtained a charter for her to convey a cargo of coals to Buenos Ayres. A quantity of necessaries having there been supplied to her, and her bottom having been coppered, she was ready to sail on her intended voyage, when she was arrested at the suit of the necessaries men.

“In the meantime, Zancopulo, having heard of the change of the vessel's destination, came over from Cuxhaven, and seeing the condition of affairs, he endeavoured to raise money to satisfy the claims upon her, but in vain. Accordingly the several suits, some of which had originally been instituted in the County Court of Newcastle, but were afterwards transferred to this court, proceeded; and on the 30th June last the court ordered the vessel to be appraised and sold to answer the claims against her.

“The vessel was accordingly sold, and the proceeds, amounting to 1810*l.*, were on the 14th Sept. last paid into court. But in the meantime other suits had been brought against the vessel, and amongst them one on the 8th Aug. by Demetrio Vafiadachi, the mortgagee, suing as a bottomry bondholder, and another on the 28th of the same month by Companis, the master, for his wages and disbursements. The claim, I should observe, of Demetrio Vafiadachi to sue as a bottomry bondholder was overruled by the court, but he was allowed to claim in respect of his two deeds for 700 and 300 Napoleons respectively as a mortgagee.

“There were then nine causes against this vessel, and it was agreed that they should all be referred to myself to report the amounts due thereon, and at the same time to decide the right of the respective parties to priority of payment out of the proceeds.

“Accordingly, all the causes came before me on the 29th Dec., and on the 4th and 6th Jan. last, witnesses were examined, and the case was very fully discussed; and the conclusion to which I came was as follows:—

“First, that this being a foreign ship, a claim for necessaries, strictly so called, would, on the authority of The Ella A. Clark (Brown. & Lush. 32), constitute a maritime lien under the 6th section of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, and as such take precedence of the claims of a mortgagee, which is not a maritime lien.

“Secondly, that this being a foreign ship, a claim for necessaries would, on the authority of the case of The Jenny Lind (L. Rep. 3 Adm. & Ecc. 529), take precedence of that of the master of a ship for his wages and disbursements, where the master, as in this case, was partowner, and had mortgaged his interest in the ship.

“Thirdly, that an advance of freight was not a necessary within the meaning of the Act, and that, therefore, such a claim would not be entitled to precedence over that of the mortgagee.

Fifthly, that looking at the various sums which it was proved that Companis, the master, had received at different places, to his conduct at North Shields, and to the general facts of the case,

ADM.]

THE TURLIANI.

[ADM.]

it had not been shown to my satisfaction that anything whatever was due to him in respect of his wages and disbursements, and that his claim ought therefore to be disallowed in toto.

"Sixthly, that seeing the difficulties which surrounded the case, it seemed to me that all the claimants, except Companis, were entitled to their costs, as well in this court as in the County Court. I therefore held:—

"(1.) That the costs of all parties, save those of Companis, the master, in cause No. 6961, should first be paid out of the proceeds.

"(2.) That then the claims of the material men for necessaries, in causes Nos. 6877, 6893, 6895, 6918, and 6919, should be paid to the extent reported due.

"(3.) That then the claims of the mortgagee should be satisfied on his furnishing satisfactory proof that the claim had not been paid.

"And if after the payment of the above claims any balance remained, which seemed not to be very likely, the question should again come before me to decide how such balance should be distributed amongst the remaining creditors.

"To this ruling, as I understand, no exception is taken, except in regard to the allowance of the claims in causes Nos. 6918 and 6919, which were mainly, if not entirely, for the cost of coppering the vessel; and it was contended that this was not a necessary. It was said that Zancopulo had designed the vessel for a voyage to Sierra Leone, for which it would not have been necessary to copper the vessel; but that, by altering her destination to Buenos Ayres, the coppering had become necessary. Now I am a little at a loss to see what greater authority Zancopulo had to decide upon the destination of this vessel than Companis, seeing that they both held an equal share of her, and that Zancopulo, by remaining on shore at Cuxhaven, had virtually given up the command of the vessel and the management of its affairs to Companis.

"But apart from this, I am told by my assessor that whether the vessel went to Sierra Leone or to Buenos Ayres, it was equally necessary that she should be coppered. Assuming that she was destined for a voyage to those climates, it was essentially necessary that she should be coppered. The coppering was a necessary for the voyage, whether she went to the one place or the other. Now it has been laid down by the present learned judge in the case of The Riga, reported in 3 Law Reports, A. & E., that there is no distinction to be drawn between necessaries for the ship and necessaries for the voyage. At page 522 he observes, 'I am unable to draw any solid distinction (especially since the last statute) between necessaries for the ship and necessaries for the voyage; and I shall follow the doctrine of the common law, as laid down by the high authority of Lord Tenterden, in the case of Webster v. Seekamp. In that case he says, the general rule is that the master may bind his owners for necessary repairs done, or supplies provided for the ship. It was contended at the trial that this liability of the owners was confined to what was absolutely necessary. I think that rule too narrow, for it would be extremely difficult to decide, and often impossible, in many cases, what is absolutely necessary. If, however, the jury are to inquire only what is necessary, there is no better rule to ascertain that than by considering what a prudent man, if present, would do under circumstances in which the agent, in his absence, is called upon to act. I am of opinion that whatever is fit and proper for the service on which a vessel is engaged, whatever the owner of that vessel, as a prudent man, would have ordered if present at the time, comes within the meaning of the term 'necessaries,' as applied to those repairs done or things provided for the ship by order of the master, for which the owners are liable.' Every word in this passage appears to be specially applicable to the present case. As prudent owners it was their duty, as they intended her for such a voyage, to have her coppered.

"It was said, however, that it was not a prudent thing to copper an iron fastened ship such as this was, and that Mr. Common so admitted before me, but the captain and the foreign surveyor directed it to be done, and Mr. Common took the best measures for preventing any evil consequence arising from such a proceeding by covering the heads of the iron bolts with lead.

"It was on these grounds that I allowed the coppering. Nor is it to be forgotten that the coppering must have added considerably to her value, when she came to be sold by the court; and that to a certain extent, therefore, the value of the copper may be said to be in the proceeds.

"(Signed) H. R. ROTHERY, Registrar.

"15th Feb. 1875."

To this report, in so far as it decided that the plaintiff in cause No. 6919 was entitled to recover for necessaries supplied the defendant (the mortgagee) took objection, and his petition filed in objection to the report was, so far as material, as follows:—

2. The Turliani was a Greek brig of about 274 tons register. She was built at Syra in the latter part of the year 1872, and was fastened with iron bolts. She was owned in moieties by John Zancopulo, master mariner, and Zanni L. Companis, mariner. Zancopulo was master of the Turliani until the month of February 1874, and Companis was a seaman on board her.

3. In or about the month of Feb. 1874 the Turliani, in consequence of damage received at sea, put into Cuxhaven, where she was caulked and some repairs were done to her. The said John Zancopulo, finding it expedient to remain for a time at Cuxhaven, instructed the said Companis to take the Turliani to Swansea, where the said Zancopulo had arranged a charter for her, and where he intended to rejoin her.

4. The Turliani accordingly proceeded to sea in charge of a pilot, but instead of going to Swansea the said Companis proceeded with the Turliani to North Shields, where she arrived on or about the 4th March 1874. The Turliani was then in good repair and seagoing condition, and not in want of any repairs, except some caulking and slight repairs to her upper works.

5. The said Companis, without the knowledge or sanction of the said Zancopulo, and before the arrival of Zancopulo at North Shields, employed the plaintiff to do the caulking and repairs mentioned in the preceding article, and to sheath the Turliani with yellow metal, and the sum allowed by the registrar to the plaintiff in this cause is the amount of his account for the said repairs and metalling.

6. It was most imprudent and improper to metal the Turliani, she being an iron-fastened vessel. It was impossible to place the metal in contact with the iron, in consequence of the galvanic action which would thereby be produced upon the metal, and it was consequently necessary to take unusual precautions to prevent the contact of the metal with the iron bolts, and the expense of metalling the Turliani was thereby largely increased.

7. At the time of so metalling the ship the plaintiff well knew that the Turliani was an iron-fastened vessel, and was aware of the consequent impropriety and imprudence of metalling her.

8. On the 6th Jan. 1875 the plaintiff, John Freeland

ADM.]

THE TURLIANI.

[ADM.]

Fergus Common, attended before the registrar, in the registry of this honourable court, to explain a mistake in the plaintiff's account in another cause against the Turliani, and the said John Freeland Fergus Common thereupon, in the presence of the solicitors for the plaintiff and defendant, stated to the registrar that he knew that the Turliani was an iron-fastened ship, and that he was aware of the imprudence of metalling the vessel, but that in consequence of the said Companis directing the vessel to be metallized, he took care, before placing the metal on the vessel, to cover the heads of the iron bolts with white lead, and then to place pieces of sheet iron over each bolt, and nail it on with copper or yellow metal nails.

9. By reason of the premises the defendant's solicitors submit:—

- (a) That it was not necessary or proper to metal the Turliani.
- (b) That under the circumstances hereinbefore pleaded the plaintiff's claim, in so far as the metalling is concerned, is not a claim for necessities within the true intent and meaning of the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6.
- (c) That the claim of the plaintiff for metalling the Turliani ought to be postponed to the claim of the defendant as mortgagee.

And the petition prayed the right honourable the judge to refer the said report back to the registrar, with directions to amend the same, in so far as it reported in favour of the priority of the plaintiff's claim for metalling the Turliani over the defendant's, and to condemn the plaintiff in so much of the costs of the said reference as related to their said claim, and in the costs of that objection, and that otherwise justice might be administered to the defendant in the premises.

The answer of the plaintiff, John Freeland Fergus Common, admitted the truth of the allegations contained in article 1 of the said petition, and craved leave to refer to the said report and registrar's notes and reasons. It also admitted the truth of the allegations contained in the second article of the said petition, but further stated that upon the said John Zancopulo and Zanni Companis becoming co-owners of the Turliani, it was agreed between them that when the said John Zancopulo should be on shore the said Zanni Companis should be her master, and have the control of her and of her affairs. The answer then continued as follows:

3. As to the third and fourth articles of the said petition, the Turliani, after leaving Cuxhaven, met with contrary winds, in consequence of which the said Companis, who was then her master and had the management of her affairs, took her into North Shields, where she arrived, as in the said petition stated. The said Companis was then still owner of a moiety of the Turliani. On her so arriving at Shields she was in want of caulking and repairs to her upper works, and she was not metallized. The plaintiff was not aware of any such directions having been given by Zancopulo to Companis, as stated in the said petition, until the hearing of the reference in this cause by the registrar.

4. As to the fifth article of the said petition: After such arrival at Shields, the said Companis, being such master and part owner of the Turliani and having the management of her affairs, chartered her to proceed on a voyage to Buenos Ayres, and he employed the plaintiff to do the necessary caulking and repairs to the Turliani, and to sheath her with yellow metal, and the plaintiff accordingly, by the direction of the said Companis, and of the surveyors employed by or on behalf of her owners or underwriters, did such caulking and repairs, and sheathed her with yellow metal, and the sum allowed by the registrar is the amount of the plaintiff's account for such caulking repairs and metalling.

5. As to the sixth and seventh articles of the said petition: In order that the Turliani might perform either the voyage contemplated by Zancopulo, which was a voyage to Sierra Leone, and other places on the voyage to Buenos Ayres, it was necessary to metal her, notwithstanding that she was iron-fastened. It was not imprudent or improper to metal her, provided proper precautions were taken to prevent galvanic action, and proper precautions were taken by the plaintiff, who knew the said vessel was iron-fastened, to prevent such galvanic action. The precautions taken were such as are usual in metalling iron-fastened vessels. The expense of metalling was thereby necessarily larger than it would have been if the Turliani had been a copper fastened vessel. Save as herein appears, the plaintiff denies the truth of the allegations in the said sixth and seventh articles.

6. As to the eighth article of the said petition: The plaintiff stated that after the Turliani came into dock he found that she was an iron-fastened ship, and in the sense that it would have been better to have replaced the iron fastenings with copper, if possible, before metalling the vessel, he stated that he was aware of the imprudence of metalling her—meaning that it would be imprudent, unless proper measures were taken with regard to the bolts—and he stated, that in consequence of Companis and the surveyors of the vessel directing her to be metallized, iron-fastened as she was, and ordering that before placing the metal on the vessel he should take the usual precautions, namely, those of covering the heads of the iron bolts with white lead, and then placing pieces of sheet lead over each bolt, and nailing such pieces on with copper or yellow metal nails; he followed such orders and took such precautions. Save as herein appears, the plaintiff denies the truth of the said eighth article.

7. The plaintiff submits that his said claim was properly allowed by the registrar, and that it is entitled to priority over the claim of the defendants as mortgagees.

The answer prayed the right honourable the judge to confirm the report of the registrar, and to reject the prayer of the said petition.

The pleadings in objection to the report were thereupon concluded.

June 8, 1875.—Cohen, Q.C. (J. C. Mathew with him) for the defendant (the mortgagee), stated that he was unable to urge any good reason against the report, and that he must abandon the objection.

E. C. Clarkson for the plaintiff.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I have very carefully read through the case, the facts of which all appear upon the printed papers, and I have come to the same conclusion. Subject to any argument which I might have heard, I was unable to see any reason whatever for disturbing the report, which seems to me to be quite correct, and the reasons for which are sound.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

Presentation for acceptance—Representation—Forgery.—Where a bank present bills of exchange for acceptance to the drawers with a representation that they hold bills of lading to cover them, this does not amount to a representation that the bills of lading are genuine, and even if it turns out that they are forged, the acceptors are not released from their liability. (V. C. B.) Baxter v. Chapman and others page 170

BILLS OF LADING.

1. Goods belonging to several merchants—One bill of lading—Objection to—Waiver.—Where goods ordered by merchants against their acceptances are shipped to them under one bill of lading with other goods not ordered by them, they waive any objection to the bill of lading by writing to the shippers on learning the fact of the shipment that they should send them copies of the bill of lading and other documents, treating the contract as subsisting. (Ex. Ch. from C.P.) The Imperial Ottoman Bank v. Cowan 57, 418
2. "Order or Assigns" omitted—Effect of—No notice of trust—Indorsees—Consignor and consignees.—The mere omission of the words "or order, or assigns," in a bill of lading, does not of itself affect the parties having the legal and equitable interest in goods as indorsees and holders with constructive notice of a trust existing under the arrangements between the consignor and consignee, and is not such an omission as

- BOTTOMRY.
1. Master's liability on bond.—In the absence of any special agreement to that effect, the master of a ship does not incur any personal liability to repay to a bottomry lender the sum borrowed by him on bottomry, where the bottomry bond becomes due by the safe arrival of the ship and the ship and freight prove insufficient to discharge it in full. (U. S. Dist. Ct. East. Dist. of N. Y.) The bark Irma 155
2. Master's liability—Advances—Implied contract—Extinguishment.—The implied contract of the master, arising under the general rule of the maritime law, out of an advance of money for the ship, is extinguished when a lawful contract of bottomry has been made and the debt has been put at risk. - CARRIAGE OF GOODS.
1. Bill of lading—Assignee—Rights of.—An assignee of a bill of lading may have a better right against the shipowner to recover for breach of the contract of carriage than the assignor. (Adm.) The Emilien Marie 514
2. Bill of lading—Assignee—Rights of—Arrangement between shipper and consignee—Notice.—An assignee of a bill of lading, who has given valuable consideration without notice of any arrangement between the shipper and the various consignees giving priority to the holders of the other bills of lading in the case of short shipment of cargo in bulk, may claim from the shipowner full delivery of the cargo specified in his bill of lading, even though the arrangement has been made without the privity of the shipowner, and the master has indorsed the bill of lading with the words "weight unknown." (Adm.) Id. 514
3. Bill of lading—Assignee—Rights of—Notice of bankruptcy of consignee—Putting on inquiry—Priority.—A letter written by an assignor of a bill of lading to his assignee, informing the latter that the bankruptcy of the shipper and consignor (who had indorsed to the assignor) may possibly interfere with the proceeds of the shipment, so far as the assignor is concerned; and that he thinks it best to prevent the possibility of a hitch to send the bill of lading for the assignee to deal with, the latter having advanced money thereon, is not such a notice as will oblige the assignee to make inquiries as to the quantity of and the various rights to the cargo, so as to bind the assignee with constructive notice of any arrangement between the shipper and various consignees, giving priority to the holders of other bills of lading in the case of short shipment. (Adm.) Id. 514
4. Bill of lading—Assignee—Rights of—Master signing as agent of charterers.—The rights of an innocent holder of a bill of lading are not affected by the fact that the master signed as agent for the charterers, unless the holder has notice of the charter party, or that the master signed in that capacity. (Adm.) Id. 514
5. Bill of lading—Assignment—Valuable consideration.—A bill of lading assigned in part payment of a debt already due from the assignor to the assignee, is assigned for valuable consideration. (Adm.) Id. 514
6. Bill of lading—Bills of Lading Act, sect 3—Measurements—Estoppel.—By 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111, s. 3, "every bill of lading is conclusive evidence of the shipment as against the person signing it." Semble that by this statute the bill of lading is not conclusive evidence as to the accuracy of measurements, and does not estop the person signing from disputing those measurements. (Ex.) Blanchet v. Powell's Llantwit Collieries Company, Limited 224
7. Bill of lading—"Good order and condition"—"Quality and quantity unknown".—No admission as to quality—Damage to cargo.—A bill of lading, stating goods to have been shipped in good order and condition, but indorsed by the master with the words "quality and quantity unknown," does not admit as against the shipowner that the goods were shipped in good order and condition. (Adm. and P.C.) The Ida 158, 551
8. Bill of lading—"Liberty to tow and assist vessels in all situations"—Deviation to assist—Loss—Liability of shipowner.—A ship carrying goods under a bill of lading containing the usual exceptions and also a clause "liberty to tow and assist vessels in all situations," is at liberty to deviate for the purpose of rendering salvage assistance to property in danger, and if in so doing she herself is lost with her cargo by an excepted peril the shipowners are not responsible to the owners of cargo for the loss sustained by them. (Ex.) Stuart and another v. The British and African Steam Navigation Co. 497

9. Bill of lading—Trans-shipment—Shipper's risk—Loss—Excepted perils—Liability.—Where goods are shipped for Benin, on the West Coast of Africa, under a bill of lading containing the usual exceptions, and a memorandum "the within goods to be trans-shipped at Bonny, and forwarded by branch steamer at ship's expense, but shipper's risk," the words "at ship's expense but shipper's risk," apply to the trans-shipment of the goods at Bonny, and not to the forwarding of them from Bonny to Benin, and impose no new obligation on the shipowner after trans-shipment, and if a loss takes place within the excepted perils the shipowner is not responsible. (Ex. Id. ...page 497
10. Bill of lading—Signature by master—Shipowner not estopped—Charter party—Full cargo to be shipped—Short shipment—Payment by ship owners to charterers—No right of recovery.—The signature of a master to a bill of lading does not estop the shipowner, and hence where by a charter-party it is agreed that a ship shall take on board a full cargo, to be provided by the charterers, and proceed therewith to a foreign port, the master to sign bills of lading for the weight of the said cargo put on board, as presented by the charterers, and without prejudice to the tenor of the charter-party, and cargo is shipped, and the master signs bills of lading presented by the charterers for a greater quantity than is actually shipped, there is no warranty on the part of the charterers that the bill of lading is indisputably correct, nor is the shipowner under any obligation to pay the consignees anything to make up for the apparent short shipment; hence no action will lie by the shipowner against the charterer to recover back money so paid to consignees. (C.P.) Brown and others v. Powell Duffryn Steamship Company 578
11. Bill of lading—Charter-party—Excepted perils—Damage to cargo—Charterers—Semble, that charterers proceeding in a Court of Admiralty jurisdiction, for damage to cargo carried under a bill of lading, containing no exceptions, but signed by the master in pursuance of a charter-party containing the usual exceptions (perils of the sea, &c.), are bound by those exceptions. (Adm.) The Catharine Chalmers 598
12. Bill of lading—Excepted perils—"Thieves"—Construction of—Liability of shipowner—Onus of proof.—Where goods are shipped under a bill of lading excepting, amongst other things, "robbery thieves, barratry, of the masters and mariners," and containing a clause that "the shipowner is not to be liable for any damage to any goods which is capable of being covered by insurance," the words "damage to any goods" in the insurance clause does not apply to the case of total abstraction of the goods and the word "thieves" applies, as in policies of marine insurances, only to thieves external to the ship, and the onus of showing that a loss occurring, whether by thieves robbery or barratry comes within one of the exceptions, lies upon the shipowner and not the shipper; hence if the goods totally disappear and the shipowner does not show the loss to have been occasioned by one of the excepted perils, the shipper will be entitled to recover their value. (Q.B.) Taylor and others v. The Liverpool and Great Western Steam Company 275
13. Bill of lading—Excepted perils—Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act 1869—Liability of shipowner. Where sheep, shipped on board a ship for importation into England under a bill of lading providing that they are shipped at shipper's risk, and that the shipowner is not answerable for washing or throwing overboard, are washed over-
- board on the voyage in a gale of wind, the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1869, under which the Privy Council are empowered to make and have made an Order in Council requiring foot-holds to be provided for the purpose of "protecting animals brought by sea to ports in Great Britain from unnecessary suffering during the passage and when landing," does not give a right of action to the owners of the sheep to recover for their loss happening in consequence of the breach of the statutory duty, on the ground that the object of the statute was not to benefit the owners, but to prevent the introduction of contagious diseases into this country. (Ex.) *Gorris and another v. Scott*page 282
14. Common carrier—Barge owner—Lighterman—Liability of—Goods carried for one person at a time—No special contract.—Where a barge-owner makes it his business to let out barges on hire under the care of his own servants to any persons applying for them as required from time to time to carry cargoes, not between any fixed termini but to and from different points on a navigable river as each customer requires, each voyage being under a separate engagement made for that voyage, and each barge being let to and carrying the cargo of one customer only at a time; such a barge-owner carries on the ordinary employment of a lighterman, and, as such, incurs the liability of a common carrier in respect of the goods he carries, and is liable for all loss sustained except by the act of God or the Queen's enemies. Quære, however, whether such a carrier would be liable for refusing to receive and carry goods. (Ex. Ch. from Ex.) The Liver Alkali Works (Limited) v. Johnson 332
15. Charter-party—Demurrage—Ship "to be loaded with usual dispatch"—Charterers—Engagements causing delay—Previous knowledge of master—Dock regulations.—Where by a charter-party it is mutually agreed between shipowner and charterer that the shipowner's ship is "to be loaded with the usual dispatch of the port, or if longer detained to be paid 40s. demurrage," and that the ship is to be loaded at a named dock, by the regulations of which no shipper could have more than three vessels loading in dock at the same time, and, by reason of the charterer having more than three vessels entered in their books which had to be loaded in the dock before that ship, the ship is delayed an unreasonable time, the contract to load with the usual dispatch of the port must be considered as an absolute contract to load with that dispatch and within a reasonable time, independently of any other engagements of the charterers, even if it can be shown that at the time of the making of the charter-party the shipowner knew that such previous engagements existed, and the shipowner can recover demurrage. (Q.B.) Ashcroft v. Crow Orchard Colliery Company 397
16. Charter-party—Reasonable cargo—Unseaworthy ship—Unreasonable delay—Frustration of contract—Dissolution.—Where a charter-party is entered into, the shipowner is bound to provide a reasonably fit ship to carry a reasonable cargo of the kind specified in the charter-party, and the charterer is bound to provide such a cargo; and if such a cargo is provided, and the ship after loading turn out unfit to carry such cargo and consequently unseaworthy, and has to be unloaded and cannot be made fit to carry the cargo within a reasonable time, the charterer is absolved from the performance of his contract and is entitled to recover from the shipowner the loss sustained by him in consequence of the ship-

SUBJECTS OF CASES.

- owner's default. (Ex. Ch. from C.P.) Stanton v. Richardson; Richardson v. Stanton.....page 288
17. Charter-party—Delay of outward voyage by excepted perils—Arrival after expected time—Contract not wholly frustrated—Duty of charterer to load.—Where by a charter-party it is agreed that a ship shall proceed forthwith to a foreign port and there load a cargo for the charterers, taking an outward cargo for the benefit of the shipowner, subject to usual perils excepted in the charter-party, the exception to the perils of the seas applies to the outward voyage; and if the vessel proceeds on her outward voyage as quickly as possible, consistently with the operation of the perils excepted, and arrives within such time that there has been no such delay as to frustrate the object of the contract from a commercial point of view, the charterer is bound, notwithstanding that the ship arrives at the outward port after the expected time, to provide the stipulated cargo at the port; and if he neglects to do so he is liable to an action for not loading according to charter-party, although he may offer a cargo at another neighbouring port. (C.P.) Hudson and another v. Hill and another..... 278
18. Charter-party—Freight—Advance before voyage begins—Not freight—No lien for.—A charter-party, providing that the freight shall be at certain specified rates, and that a certain sum shall be advanced in cash on signing bills of lading and clearing at the custom house of the port of shipment, and that for the security and payment of all freight, dead freight, demurrage, and other charges, the master or owners shall have an absolute lien and charge on the said cargo or goods laden on board, does not, after the loading and clearing of the ship, but before she sails and before the signing of the bills of lading, give the master and owners a lien upon the cargo loaded for the sum agreed to be advanced, such advance not being freight, and no freight having been earned. (L. C. & L. J.J.) Ex parte Nyholm; Re Child 165
19. Charter-party—Demurrage—Lay days—Civil commotion. &c. excepted in favour of charterer—Default in loading—What will exempt.—Where a charterer by his charter-party undertakes to load a ship within certain given lay days "accidents or causes occurring beyond the control of the shippers or affreighters, which may prevent or delay her loading or discharging, including civil commotion, strikes, riots, stoppage of trains, &c., always excepted," or to pay demurrage, he cannot excuse default in loading within the lay days by giving evidence of general disturbance and cessation of work in the district about the time; but to exempt himself from liability must show a disturbing cause, actually preventing the loading of the particular ship. (Adm.) The Village Belle..... 228
20. Damage to cargo—Bill of lading—Excepted perils—Damage by other causes—Liability of shipowner.—A shipowner carrying goods under a bill of lading, by which he contracts to deliver in good order and condition, certain perils excepted, is bound to deliver in that condition, unless prevented by those perils, and is responsible for any damage to goods occasioned other than by those perils. (Adm.) The Chasca..... 600
21. Damage to cargo—Bill of lading—Perils of the seas—Barratry of crew—Excepted peril—Liability of shipowner.—Injury to cargo damaged by sea water during a voyage, in consequence of the barratrous act of the crew in boring holes through the sides of the ship for the purpose of scuttling her, is not a loss by perils of the sea, within the meaning of the usual exception in a bill of lading, such as will exempt the shipowner from his liability for the damage under his contract to deliver in good order and condition. (Adm.) Id......page 600
22. Damage to cargo—Perils of the seas—Bill of lading—Policy of insurance—Barratry—Scuttling ship.—Even if damage to cargo by sea water caused by the barratrous act of the crew in boring holes through the ship for the purpose of scuttling her, loss would come within the meaning of the words, "perils of the seas," in a policy of insurance, it is not included in those words as used in a bill of lading. (Adm.) Id...... 600
23. Damage to cargo—Condition at time of shipment—Onus of proof.—In a suit against shipowners for damage to cargo, the onus is upon the plaintiffs to show in the first instance that the goods were shipped in good order and condition, before they can call upon the shipowners to show excuse for the injury done to the goods (overruled, see p. 551). (Adm.) The Prosperino Palasso ... 150
24. Damage to cargo—Bill of lading—"Good order and condition"—"Quantity and quality unknown"—Condition at time of shipment—Onus of proof.—There is no rule of law by which the consignee of goods under a bill of lading, stating goods to have been shipped in good order and condition, and containing the words "quantity and quality unknown," is bound to show that the goods were shipped in good order and condition, or fail in his suit against the shipowner for damage done to the cargo; but failing proof of the condition of the cargo when shipped, the consignee is bound to show that the damage which is sustained is traceable to causes for which the shipowner is responsible. The Prosperino Palasso (ante, p. 158) disapproved of. (P.C.) The Ida. 551
25. Damage to cargo—Straining—Perils of the seas excepted—Stowage.—Damage to cargo caused by the oozing of wine from casks through straining in bad weather is damage occasioned by perils of the seas, and the shipowners are, under the usual exceptions, exempt from liability therefor where the cargo is properly stowed, or is stowed in such a manner that the master is not responsible for bad stowage. (Adm.) The Catharine Chalmers 598
26. Damage to cargo—Charter-party—Stowage by charterer's stevedore—Liability.—Where a charter-party stipulates that a vessel is "to be stowed by charterers' stevedore, at risk and expense of vessel," and a cargo is supplied by the charterers and is stowed by their stevedore, the shipowner is not responsible for damage occasioned by bad stowage. Blakie v. Stenbridge (6 C.B., N.S. 874) followed. (Adm.) Id...... 598
27. Delivery of goods—Port—Place of delivery—Bill of lading—Freight—Shipowner's duties and rights.—The duty of a shipowner to deliver goods at the usual place of delivery of a port, to which he has contracted to carry under a bill of lading stipulating only that the goods shall be delivered at the port without any particular part of the port being named, is an implied duty only, and does not amount to an engagement to go to the usual place in all events and under all circumstances. The shipowner's express contract is to deliver in the port, and if it be impossible to deliver at the usual place of delivery by reason of the prohibition of the port authorities, or other accidental cause, the contract is not dissolved, but may be performed by the master being ready to give delivery at some other convenient part of the port, and keeping the cargo in that place for a reasonable time ready for delivery, and the shipowner will thereupon be entitled to his freight. (P.C.) Brown (app.) v. Gaudet (resp.); Cargo ex Argos 6

28. Delivery of goods—Bill of lading—Landing of goods—Shipowner's duty.—A bill of lading by which a shipowner contracts to deliver at a port, "the goods to be taken out within twenty-four hours after arrival or pay demurrage," does not absolutely require that the shipowner should be ready, not merely to deliver, but also to land the goods in the port, or that the merchant should be able, on receiving them, to land them, but it casts upon the merchant the duty of taking the goods out of, or at all events from alongside the ship; hence, if it should be impossible to land the goods, by reason of a prohibition of the port authorities, the shipowner may still perform his part of the contract if he be ready to deliver the goods to the merchant in the port without landing them. (P.C.) Id. page 6
29. Delivery of goods—Demurrage—Expenses—Bill of lading—Default of consignee.—When goods carried under a bill of lading, by which the shipowner is to deliver at the port of destination, and the merchant is to take them out within twenty-four hours or pay demurrage, cannot be landed at, but may be delivered within, that port, the shipowner cannot recover from the merchant demurrage and expenses claimed in respect of attempts to land the goods at other ports, before he is ready to give delivery at the port of destination; but he may recover expenses incurred, in consequence of the default of the merchant in taking delivery, after he is ready to give delivery at that port, in hiring a vessel to store the goods, if thereby the merchant is relieved from the demurrage payable in respect of the detention of the ship. (P.C.) Id. page 6
30. Delivery of goods—Freight—Time of payment—General average—Demurrage—Lien—Detention of cargo by master—Liability.—Where, by a charter-party and bill of lading, freight is "to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo," the master having a lien by common law for freight and general average, and a lien by contract for demurrage, the payment of the freight and the delivery of the goods are concurrent acts in which all that is required from the owner of the cargo is readiness and willingness to pay at the time of delivery; and before paying any sum for general average, the owner of cargo is entitled to be satisfied that the amount claimed is the result of a proper adjustment; and if the owner of cargo on arrival of the ship in port, and before discharge, refuses to pay the amount claimed for freight and general average before the amount due is finally ascertained, but offers to pay a large proportion of the freight, and, there being no doubt as to his solvency, to sign an average bond for the payment of the general average when ascertained, but the master, nevertheless, insists upon retaining the cargo on board ship until his lien for freight and general average is satisfied, detention by the master is not wrongful, but, quære, can he impute the delay in the discharge to the owner of cargo or claim for demurrage on that ground? (P.C.) Miedbrodt v. Fitzsimon; The Energie. 555
31. Delivery of goods—Mate's receipt—Short delivery—Liability of shipowner—Freight.—Where a mate gives a receipt purporting to represent the amount of goods shipped on board a ship, and the charterers pay the consignor for the amount so represented, and also pay the master freight on that amount, but a smaller amount is delivered; the giving of the receipt is not such an act of negligence in itself as will entitle the charterers to recover from the shipowner the amount paid in excess to the consignor if all that was actually shipped was delivered; but the charterers may recover from the shipowner the amount of freight overpaid. (Ex.) Biddulph and others v. Bingham page 225
32. Delivery of goods—Bill of lading—Where responsibility of shipowner ceases.—Where goods shipped under a bill of lading containing the words, "To be delivered from the ship's deck, where the ship's responsibility is to cease," arrive at their port of destination, and the usage of that port is that goods are unloaded by the dock company at the expense of the shipowner on to a quay, and then that the consignee should send lighters into which the goods are delivered also by the dock company and also, if within a specific time, at the expense of the shipowner, the shipowner is not responsible for the loss of any of the goods after they have been unloaded on to the quay in accordance with the usage. (C.P.) Petrocchino and others v. Bott 310
33. Delivery of goods—Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, sect. 67.—Landing and warehousing cargo—Default of consignee—Wilful default not necessary.—To justify the master of a ship in landing or warehousing a cargo under the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 67, by which it is enacted that where the owner of goods imported "fails to land and take delivery thereof, and to proceed therewith with all convenient speed" by the time named in the charter-party, &c., "the shipowner may land and unship the said goods," and warehouse them, it is not necessary that the failure of the owner of cargo should be a "wilful default" in landing, &c.; but the master is at liberty to land the goods whenever the delivery of them to the owner within the proper time has been prevented by circumstances, whether the latter is or is not to blame. (P.C.) Miedbrodt v. Fitzsimon; The Energie. 555
34. Delivery of goods—Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, sect. 67.—Landing and warehousing cargo—Lien—Stop order—Excessive amount—Wrongful detention.—The provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (ss. 67 and 68), giving power to a master to land and warehouse a cargo, and give notice of his lien to the warehouseman, enable the master to retain his lien but do not extend it to charges not due at the time of landing, and if the master wilfully, and for the purpose of exacting from the cargo owner charges for which he has no lien, places upon the goods a stop order for an excessive amount, which the cargo owner is compelled to pay before he can obtain his goods, the landing and detention of the goods for that amount is a wrongful act, for which the owner of cargo may recover. (P.C.) Id. ... 555
35. Delivery of goods—Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, sect. 67.—Landing and warehousing cargo—Lien for freight and general average—Stop order—Payment of part.—Where a master lands and warehouses goods under the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, and to preserve his lien for freight and general average, places on them a stop order for the amounts claimed, and one of those amounts is paid by the cargo owner, it becomes the duty of the master to reduce the stop order to the amount for which he can after such payment reasonably claim a lien, and his refusal to do so amounts to a wrongful detention of the cargo. (P.C.) Id. 555
36. Delivery of goods—Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, sect. 67.—Lien—Claim exceeding amount due.—Semble, that a master is not liable merely because he lands and warehouses goods under a stop order for a sum in excess of

- the amount due to him if he bonâ fide claims a lien for that sum. (P.C.) Id......page 555
37. Delivery of goods—Mersey Docks Act Consolidation Act 1858, sect. 36—Master porters—Short delivery—Liability.—The Mersey Docks Act Consolidation Act 1858, sect. 36, making the master porters, appointed under that Act to discharge cargoes in the Mersey Docks, responsible for any loss, damage, or injury sustained by the cargoes discharged by them during the receiving, weighing, and loading off by the master porters or their servants, does not in any way discharge the shipowner from his liability existing before he delivers to the master porter, and his responsibility for short delivery remains unaffected by the Act. (Adm.) The Emilien Marie..... 514
38. Freight—Abandonment of ship and cargo by crew—Brought in by salvors—Right of shipowner to recover freight—Sale of cargo by court—Refusal of shipowner to consent.—Where a ship, injured by collision without fault of her master and crew, is abandoned by them, and is afterwards taken possession of and brought in safely into port by salvors, who institute a suit against ship and cargo, the shipowner, having by the abandonment put an end to his contract of carriage, loses all claim to have the cargo put into his possession to enable him to carry it on and so earn his freight, and all claim to be paid full freight out of the proceeds of the cargo, if sold by order of the court. Nor can the shipowner have any claim for pro ratâ freight unless there be a new contract express or implied to pay the same, and if the shipowner refuses to consent to a sale of the cargo by the court, when applied for by the salvors and owner of cargo, unless he be paid full freight, no such contract can be implied. (Adm.) The Kathleen 367
39. Freight—Charter and sub-charter—Bills of lading signed without knowledge of sub-charter—Lien for freight—Delivery without prepayment—Right of recovery of freight.—Where the master of a ship enters into a charter-party with a shipbroker by which it is agreed that goods shall be carried at a certain-named freight, and the shipbroker, without authority from the master, enters into a second charter-party, relating to the same ship and to goods of the same character and quantity, with merchants agreeing that the goods shall be carried to the same port but at a higher rate of freight than that named in the first charter-party; and it is agreed in both charter-parties that the freight shall be prepaid and that the shipowner shall have an absolute lien for freight, and the merchants ship the goods without knowledge of the first charter-party; and the master, without knowledge of the second charter-party, receives the goods and signs bills of lading for them, making the freight payable as per charter-party, and without taking prepayment carries and delivers the goods; the shipowner cannot recover the freight from the merchant after payment of the same by the latter to the shipbroker, because there is no contract between the shipowner and the merchant. There being no consensus ad idem the bill of lading is no contract, as it does not refer in the minds of the shipowner and merchant to the same charter-party, nor is there any implied contract to pay freight other than as agreed upon by the charter-party signed by the merchant. (Q.B.) Smidt v. Tiden 307
40. Freight—Charter-party—Lump freight—Short delivery—Excepted perils—Rights of shipowner.—Where by a charter-party, it is agreed that a ship shall load a full and complete cargo to be provided by the charterers or their agents, freight to be paid in a lump sum fixed by the charter-party, and after the loading of the cargo part thereof is lost without default of the shipowner, by perils excepted in the charter-party, but the remainder is duly delivered according to the charter-party, the charterers are not entitled to deduct from the lump freight a sum proportioned to the amount of cargo which has been so lost; but the shipowner is entitled to his full freight. The Norway (B. & L. 404) followed. Robinson v. Knight. (C.P.)page 19

41. Freight—Charter-party—Freight payable on invoice quantity shipped—Bill of lading—Quantity and quality unknown—Right of shipowner.—When a ship is chartered to load a cargo of grain and deliver at a British port by a charter-party, by which freight is to be paid at so much for a given quantity shipped, and in the event of any part of the cargo being delivered in a damaged condition the freight to be payable "on the invoice quantity taken on board, as per bill of lading, or half freight on damaged or heated portion, at captain's option," and the cargo is shipped under a bill of lading naming the quantity shipped, but the captain, before signing the bill of lading, writes thereon "quantity and quality unknown," signing of this memorandum will not take away the captain's right to be paid freight on the invoice quantity, if on arrival he claim by notice to the indorsee of the bill of lading to be paid in that way. (C.P.) Tully v. Terry..... 61
42. Freight—Bill of lading—Lump freight—Short delivery.—The whole freight, if a lump sum, named in the bill of lading is payable to the shipowner carrying under it, although a less quantity of goods than the quantity named in the bill of lading be delivered. (Ex.) Blanchet v. Powell's Llantwit Collieries Company Limited..... 224
43. Master—Powers and duties of—Agent for shipper—Right to recover expenses.—The master of a ship being, in many cases of accident and emergency, the agent from necessity of the owners of cargo where he cannot obtain instructions from them, has not only the power, but a duty cast upon him to act in such cases for the safety of the cargo in such manner as may be best under the circumstances in which it may be placed, and is entitled as a correlative right to charge the owner of the cargo with the expenses properly incurred in so doing. The obligation on the part of the master to act for the merchant does not cease after a reasonable time for the latter to take delivery has elapsed, and hence, after such time, if it be impossible to land and warehouse the goods, or leave them at their port of destination, the master may, in the absence of all advices, carry or forward them to such place, even back to the port of shipment, as is most convenient to the owner, and charge him with the expense of so doing. CHARTER-PARTY.

1. Advances for disbursements—Indorsement on bills of lading—Insurance—Right to recover back.—A charter-party stipulating "sufficient cash for ship's disbursements to be advanced the master against freight, subject to interest, insurance, and 2½ per cent. commission; and the master to endorse the amount so advanced upon his bills of lading," entitles the shipowner to rely upon an insurance of advances so made being effected by charterers, who, by the charter-party stipulate for and receive the right to charge the premium, and in case of the loss of the ship on her voyage the neglect to insure will preclude the charterers from recovering back the advances. (H. of L. Sc. App.) *Watson and Co. v. Shankland and others*page 115
2. Breach of contract to receive cargo—Other vessels engaged—Rise in price of goods—Damages.—Where, by a charter-party, it is agreed that the shipowner shall have a ship ready at a certain time to receive a cargo for a foreign port, and the shipowner fails in the performance of his contract, and in consequence thereof the charterer is obliged to charter other vessels at a higher rate, and to pay a higher price for his cargo, the price having risen during the delay occasioned by the shipowner's default, the charterer is entitled to recover as damages against the shipowner the loss sustained by the chartering of the other vessels and the difference in the price of the cargo, provided that the shipowner does not show that the cargo has by reason of the rise in price become of greater value in the foreign port. (Ex.) Featherstone v. Wilkinson 31
3. Charterer — Demurrage — Cesser of liability—Cargo loaded—Lien for freight and demurrage.—Where a charter-party between shipowner and charterers provides a number of loading days and the rate of discharge per working day, that ten days on demurrage for all like days above the said days shall be paid at a specified rate per day, and that the charterer's liability shall cease when the ship is loaded, the captain or owner having a lien on cargo for freight and demurrage, the demurrage days mentioned include such days at both the port of loading and the port of discharge, and the charterer's liability for all demurrage at the port of loading ceases on the ship being loaded. (Ex. Ch. from Q.B.) Kish v. Cory; Francesco v. Massey..... 593, 594n.
4. Demurrage—Shipowner's lien—Detention beyond demurrage days.—Semble, the shipowner's lien for demurrage includes a claim for damages caused by detention beyond the demurrage days. (Ex. Ch. from Q.B.) Kish v. Cory 593
5. Warranty—Ship expected to be at a port.—Where, by a charter-party, it is expressed that a ship "is expected to be at" a port on a given date, these words are in a nature of a warranty that the ship will be at the port named on that date, and an action is maintainable for a breach of that warranty. (C.P.) Corkling v. Massey ... 18
6. Warranty—Ship "expected to be at a port"—Breach—Plea of knowledge of plaintiffs as to ship's engagements.—A plea that at the time of making the above agreement, the ship was engaged upon certain voyages, as was well known to the plaintiff, and that the charter-party was made subject to the condition that the ship should with all convenient speed fulfil her said engagements, and then proceed to the named port, is a good plea to a declaration for breach of warranty. (C.P.) Id. page 18

COAL DUES.

Bunker coals—Tyne Coal Dues Act 1872—Liability for dues.—Bunker coals carried away from the port of Newcastle for the purpose of being consumed beyond the limits of the port, and for the use of the ship carrying them, are coals exported within the meaning of the Tyne Coal Dues Act, 1872, sect. 3, and the persons so exporting coals must pay the dues fixed by that section. (Q.B.) Muller v. Baldwin 304

COLLISION.

1. Breach of regulations—Excuse of prior collision—Responsibility for prior collision to be considered.—Where a ship seeks to excuse her failure to comply with the sailing regulations and with a seaman-like precaution, by showing that such a failure was in consequence of her being disabled in a prior collision, it is material to inquire whether the prior collision was due to her default, or was the result of inevitable accident. Semble, if the prior collision be due to the default of the ship so seeking excuse, and if her subsequent failure to comply as aforesaid contribute to the collision proceeded for, she will be to blame therefor (Priv. Co.) The Kiobenhavn 213
2. Crossing ships—Sailing ships—Closehauled—Luffing—Sailing Rules, Arts. 12 & 18.—Where a ship close hauled is bound to keep her course luffing as close to the wind as she can without losing headway is not a deviation within Article 18 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, such as will render her liable for a collision with another vessel, whose duty it is to keep out of her way. (Priv. Co.) The Aimò; The Amelia 96
3. Crossing ships—Steamships—Taking pilots—Special circumstances—Sailing Rules, Arts. 14 & 19.—Two vessels bearing down at the same time from different directions upon a well-known pilot station to take pilots on board are to be treated as crossing vessels within the meaning of Art. 14 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, if their courses, if continued, would intersect; and the fact of their seeking pilots at the same place is not such a special circumstance within the meaning of Art. 19 as will take them out of the operation of the rule requiring that the ship which has the other on her own starboard hand shall keep out of the way of the other. (P. C. Affirming Adm. Ct. Vol. p. 475.) The Ada; The Sappho 4
4. Crossing ships—Steamships—Taking pilots—Keeping course—Sailing Rules, Arts. 14, 18, 19.—Where a vessel is approaching a pilot station to take a pilot, and has, as regards another vessel doing the same thing, the right to keep her course she has a right to keep sufficient headway on her to give her steerage way, so as to get on her proper course after taking a pilot, and is not bound within Art. 16 to stop and reverse. The other vessel is bound to stop and let her take her pilot or to take some other means of avoiding her. (P. C.) The Ada; The Sappho..... 4
5. Crossing ships—Steamships—"Keeping out of way"—Porting—Stopping &c.—Sailing Rules, Art. 14.—Art 14. of the regulations for preventing collisions at sea, which provides that "if two vessels under steam are crossing so as to involve risk of

- collision the ship which has the other on her own starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other," is not to be construed so that "keeping out of the way" means in all cases porting; a vessel may within the meaning of that article keep out of the way by stopping, or by going ahead, or by starboarding, or by porting, or by going astern, as the circumstances of the case may require. (Priv. Co.) *The Nor*page 264
6. Damage by salvor—Gross negligence—Liability.—Where damage is inflicted upon a ship by another engaged in rendering salvage services to the former, the Court of Admiralty regards the negligence of the salvor less severely than it does the negligence of a vessel wholly unconnected with the injured vessel, but will condemn the salvor in the damage where he has been guilty of gross negligence and want of proper navigation. (Adm.) The C. S. Butler; The Baltic 237
7. Danger of Collision—Wrong manœuvre—Liability.—A vessel which, having performed her own duty, is thrown into immediate danger of collision by the wrongful act of another is not to be held liable if at that moment she adopts a wrong manœuvre. (Priv. Co.) The Nor 264
8. Fog—Ferry boats—Crossing river—Liability for damage.—A steam ferry boat continuing to cross and recross the river Mersey during a dense fog takes upon herself the responsibility incident to such a course, and is not entitled to set up public convenience against the probability of loss of life and property; but she will be liable for any damage done to other vessels with which she may come into collision, provided those vessels take the precautions required by law to warn her of their position. (Adm.) The Lancashire 202
9. Fog—Steamship—Duty to anchor—Liability.—Where a steamship, whilst in a good and well-known anchorage ground, enters a dense fog, it is her duty to anchor at once; and if she neglects to do so, and continues her course, she will be to blame for a collision ensuing, provided that the other vessel has done all that the law requires. (Adm.) The Otter 208
10. Fog—Signal—Bell—Horn—Sailing ship.—Where a sailing vessel in motion during a thick fog, instead of blowing a fog horn rings a bell, there is a presumption that the failure to blow the fog horn contributes to the collision, and, as the burden of showing that it was in no degree occasioned by that failure lies upon the sailing vessel, it is impossible to rebut the presumption. (U. S. Sup. Ct.) The Steamer Pennsylvania ... 378
11. Inevitable accident—Plea of—Onus of proof—Duty to begin.—In a cause of collision, where the defendants plead inevitable accident alone, it lies upon the plaintiff to show a prima facie case of negligence against the defendants, and the plaintiffs must therefore begin. (Adm.) The Abraham 34
12. Inevitable accident—Duty to keep course—Disabled ship unable to keep out of way—Sailing Rules, Art. 18.—Where it is the duty of a ship to keep out of the way of another, but she is unable to do so by reason of being disabled in a former collision, and the other ship, being unaware of her disabled condition, continues her course, under Article 18, a collision ensuing is the result of inevitable accident. (Priv. Co.) The Aimò; The Amelia 96
13. Launch—Reasonable precaution—Onus of proof.—It is the duty of those who launch a vessel to do so with the utmost precaution, and to give such notice as is reasonable and sufficient, according to local circumstances, to prevent injury happening to other vessels from the launch, and the burden of proving that these things have been done lies upon them. (Adm.) The Gleggarry 230
14. Launch—Reasonable precaution—Notice of launch—General notice sufficient.—Where in launching a vessel in a river the usual precautions taken in that river have been taken, and the usual general notice that the launch was about to take place has been given, the persons having charge of the launch have performed all they are required to do by law, and no specific notice of the exact moment of the launch is required. (Adm.) Id. 230
15. Launch—Notice of—River Mersey.—In the River Mersey to give notice of a launch taking place it is customary to have the ship dressed in flags an hour or more before high water (about which time the launch takes place); to have tugs, one at least also dressed in flags, plying about some time before the launch in front of the yard where the ship is lying; and there are usually a number of small boats lying off ready to pick up timber when the ship comes away. (Adm.) Id. 230
16. Liability—Collision caused by negligence of third ship.—Where a steamship, in order to avoid collision with another ship, is obliged by the wrongful act of that other ship to take measures which bring her into collision with a third ship, without any negligence on her own part, the Court of Admiralty will not hold her responsible for the damage to the injured vessel. Semble, that the owners of the injured vessel should proceed against the original wrongdoer. (Adm.) The Thames... 512
17. Liability in rem—Ship chartered—Crew charterers' servants.—A ship, chartered by her owners so that the whole control and management of ship and crew are vested in the charterers, is liable in a proceeding in rem for damage done to another ship by the negligence of her crew, although they are the charterers' servants. (Adm.) The Lemington 475
18. Lights—Duty of vessel at anchor—Trimming lamp no excuse.—It being the duty of a vessel at anchor to carry a riding light always visible, no such excuse as that of taking the lamp down to be trimmed can be admitted, if the absence of the light brings about a collision. (P.C.) The C. M. Palmer; The Larnax 94
19. Lights—Distance visible—Deficiency—Merchant Shipping Act 1873, sect. 17—Infringment—Liability.—A ship carrying side lights, which are visible only at the distance of about a mile, instead of at a distance of two miles as required by the regulations, infringes those regulations so as to make her liable to be deemed in fault under the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, sect. 17. (Adm.) The Magnet..... 478
20. Light—Deficiency—Distance visible—Merchant Shipping Act 1873, sect. 17—Liability.—Semble, that a ship carrying such lights must be deemed in fault, whether the deficiency of the light did or not contribute to the collision. (Adm.) Id...... 478
21. Lights—Obscuring of—Merchant Shipping Act, 1873, sect. 17—Liability.—Semble, that where lights are so fixed that they are partly obscured from a particular point right ahead by the catheads of a ship carrying them, but are visible both above and below the catheads, there is no such infringement within the statute as will render the ship liable in a collision with another ship approaching broad on the starboard bow of the former. (Adm.) The Duke of Sutherland..... 478
22. Lights—Screens—Shorter than regulation—Merchant Shipping Act 1873—Infringment.—The regulation as to the length of the screens of a

- ship's side lights, being for the purpose of preventing those lights from being seen across the bows of the ship carrying them, and being merely subsidiary for the purpose of securing the visibility of each distinct light, a ship carrying screens shorter than those required by the regulations is not guilty of any infringement within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, if the lights are not in fact seen across her bows, and it is shown that by reason of the construction of the ship she could not have carried larger screens with safety. (Adm.) The Fanny M. Carvill page 478
23. Lights—Screens—Shorter than regulation—Merchant Shipping Act 1873—Infringement.—A ship carrying her side lights with screens shorter than required by the regulations, is not to be deemed in fault if the shortness of the screens could not by any possibility have contributed to the collision. (P.C. from Adm.) Id. 565
24. Lights—Screens—Shortness of—Peculiar build of ship—Merchant Shipping Act 1873—Special circumstance.—Semble, that the peculiar build of a ship requiring her side light screens to be shorter than provided in the regulations, is not a "circumstance of the case making a departure from the regulations necessary," within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, sect. 17. (P.C. from Adm.) Id. 565
25. Lights—Overtaking ship—Duty of overtaken ship to exhibit light astern.—There is no duty imposed upon any ship to exhibit a light or signal astern to another ship approaching the former from such a direction that the regulation lights of the leading ship are not visible to those on board the following ship, even when the leading ship is in the fair way of a harbour on a night when vessels not showing lights cannot be seen at a greater distance than one or two cables' length. (But see Vol. III., pp. 1, 4.) (Adm.) The Earl Spencer 523
26. Look-out—Report of light—Reply—Duty of look-out man—Semble, that where the look-out has once reported to the pilot or officer of the watch a light on board another ship, and the report has been answered, there is no further duty on the look-out to report that light a second time on nearing the ship. (Adm.) The City of Cambridge 193
27. Merchant Shipping Act 1873, sect. 17—Regulation for preventing collisions—Infringement—Liability.—Where a collision occurs at night, and the lights of one of the ships are not burning at the time when the vessels come in sight, and the court is not satisfied that the want of those lights is occasioned by circumstances over which the crew of the ship had no control, she must, even if the want of the lights did not contribute to the collision, be held to blame under the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, sect. 17 which provides that "If in any case of collision it is proved to the court before which the case is tried that any of the regulations for preventing collisions, contained in and made under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 to 1873, have been infringed, the ship by which such regulation shall be infringed shall be deemed to be in fault, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made a departure from the regulations necessary." (P.C.) The Hibernia 454
28. Merchant Shipping Act 1873, sect. 17—Regulations for preventing collisions—Infringement.—The Merchant Shipping Act 1873, sect. 17, renders it necessary for the court, in every case of collision, to inquire whether there has been an infringement of a regulation, and, if so, whether the circumstances rendered a departure from the regulations necessary. (P.C.) Id. 454
29. Merchant Shipping Act 1873, sect. 17—Regulations for preventing collisions—Infringement—Both ships to blame.—Although a ship must be deemed in fault for an infringement of the regulations preceding but not occasioning the collision under the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, sect. 17, she is not necessarily wholly in fault; but if the other ship has been guilty of negligence, or a breach of the regulations, the latter will also be held to blame, and the damages divided between them. (P.C.) Id. page 454
30. Merchant Shipping Act 1873, sect. 17—Regulations for preventing collisions—Infringement—Materiality to the case.—A ship, to be deemed in fault under the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), sect. 17, for having infringed any of the regulations for preventing collisions, must have infringed those regulations in such a manner that the infringement is material to the case before the court, and is such as might by possibility have caused or contributed to the particular collision; a mere infringement which by no possibility could have anything to do with the collision will not render the ship liable. (Adm.) The Magnet, The Duke of Sutherland, The Fanny M. Carvill 478
31. Merchant Shipping Act 1873, sect. 17—Regulations for preventing collisions—Infringement—Liability.—To render a ship liable to be deemed in fault under the Merchant Shipping Act 1873, sect. 17, for an infringement of the regulations for preventing collisions, the infringement must be one having some possible connection with the collision in question; a mere infringement, which by no possibility could have anything to do with the collision, will not render the ship liable. (P.C. from Adm.) The Fanny M. Carvill 565
32. Moorings—Insufficiency of—Duty of master—Order of port authorities—Liability of owner.—Although it is the duty of the master of a ship to take all such precautions as a man of ordinary prudence and skill, exercising reasonable foresight, would use to avert danger and to prevent his ship doing damage to others in the circumstances in which he is placed, there is no obligation upon a master who is ordered by the authorities of the port in which his ship lies to take up a berth in a particular part of the harbour to examine the sufficiency of a buoy to which he moors his ship in that place, although that buoy may belong to a private company, if the port authorities sanction the use of the buoy, and treat it as a proper and sufficient mooring place for vessels frequenting the port. If through the insufficiency of such a buoy the ship parts from her moorings on a storm arising, the shipowner will not be responsible for damage ensuing by collision provided the master has taken other precautions sufficient under ordinary circumstances to meet the exigencies of the case. (Priv. Co.) The William Lindsay 118
33. Moorings—Parting of—Anchor—Question of seamanship—Nautical assessors.—The question whether a master should under such circumstances have let go an anchor, or whether the having an anchor ready to let go was a sufficient precaution is a question of practical seamanship upon which the Court of Appeal will be guided by the opinion of their nautical assessors. (Priv. Co.) Id. 118
34. Onus of proof—Duty to begin—Inevitable accident—Ship at anchor.—In all causes of damage, the onus being upon the plaintiff to establish negligence against the defendant, the plaintiff must begin; and this rule applies to cases where the only defence is inevitable accident and the plaintiff's vessel is at anchor, contrary to the

- former practice of the High Court of Admiralty. (Adm.) The Otter page 208
35. Pilot—Duty of—Ship at anchor—Length of cable—Swinging—Helm—Sheering.—Where a ship in charge of a licensed pilot is anchored within pilotage waters, the pilot is responsible for the length of cable at which the ship rides, and it is his duty, when the ship swings to the tide, to superintend that manœuvre and to regulate the helm, and it is negligence on his part to go below before the ship is fully swung, leaving the helm amidships without orders as to its regulation; and if, through want of length of cable and of regulation of the helm, the ship sheers and so parts from her anchor in swinging during his absence, he will be alone responsible, provided that the watch on deck take the right manœuvre to counteract the sheering. (Adm. and Priv. Co.) The City of Cambridge 193, 239
36. Pilot—Duty of—Ship at anchor—Parting cable—Officer of watch—Duty of.—Where a ship at anchor in pilotage waters and in charge of a licensed pilot parts her cable, the necessity for letting go another anchor is a matter within the discretion of the pilot and the manœuvre should be directed by him; and if the pilot is below at the time, the officer of the watch will be justified before giving any orders to bring up the ship in calling the pilot on deck to take charge, provided that there be no immediate necessity for action. (Priv. Co.) Id. 239
37. Practice—Admiralty court—Foreign plaintiffs—Cross cause—Security to answer judgment—Appearance—Staying proceedings—Admiralty Court Act 1861, sect. 34.—Where a cause of damage is instituted in the High Court of Admiralty against a ship, in respect of a collision in which the ship of the plaintiffs is totally lost, and the defendants institute a cross cause in personam against the plaintiffs in respect of the same collision, both parties being foreigners resident abroad, and the plaintiffs decline to give security to answer judgment in the cross cause, or to enter an appearance, the court will apply the provisions of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10, s. 34), and will order proceedings to be stayed in the principal cause until security is given in the cross cause. (Adm.) The Charkieh 121
38. Practice—Costs—Damage to ship by barge—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, sect. 9.—A plaintiff proceeding without leave in a Superior Court for damage to his ship, within the body of a county, by a barge (propelled by oars only), taking judgment by default, and having his damages assessed by the sheriff at an amount under 300*l.*, is not entitled to his costs, by reason of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, sect. 9. (Q. B. Bail Court.) Purkis v. Flower 226
39. Practice—Admiralty Court—Costs—Compulsory pilotage.—In a collision cause, where a defendant raises, together with other defences, that of compulsory pilotage, and his ship is found to blame, but is dismissed on the ground that the negligent act of the compulsory pilot was the sole cause of the collision, each party pays his own costs according to the practice of the High Court of Admiralty. It has never been the custom in that court to apportion the costs in such cases according to the findings on the various issues. (Adm.) The Schwann 259
40. Practice—Admiralty Courts—Costs—Arrest—Reference—County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868—Certificate.—A ship was damaged by another, outward bound, and the owners of the injured vessel, in the bonâ fide belief that their damage was greater than it actually was, instituted a suit in the High Court of Admiralty and arrested the ship for a large amount, but accepted bail and released the ship at once on ascertaining their actual damage; the defendants admitted liability, and the damage was referred to the Registrar; the claim made by the plaintiff was a little over 300*l.*, but the Registrar reduced the amount claimed by more than one third, and made no report as to costs. On application by the plaintiffs, the court certified for the costs of suit under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, but condemned the plaintiffs in the costs of the reference. (Adm.) The Naomi page 588
41. River navigation—Byelaws made by local authority—Effect of.—Byelaws made by a local authority governing the navigation of a river are to be taken as evidence of what it is the duty of vessels to do in the circumstances named therein, and although the mere breach of one or any of them will not be sufficient reason for holding a ship to blame for a collision, yet, if that breach occasions or contributes to the collision, the existence of the byelaw will afford the best reason for holding the ship violating the byelaw to be guilty of a breach of duty, and consequently to blame for the collision. (Adm.) The Raithwaite Hall ... 210
42. River navigation—Byelaws—Side of River—Fog.—Where a byelaw regulating the navigation of a river prescribes the side of the river upon which a ship is to navigate going up or down the river, the observance of this byelaw is doubly necessary during a fog when vessels can only be made out at short distances; and the breach of the byelaw cannot be excused by the plea that it was usual during foggy weather to navigate on the wrong side of the river in order to insure greater safety for the vessel so doing. (Adm.) Id. 210
43. River navigation—Tyne byelaws—Side of river—Crossing river.—By the byelaws in force regulating the navigation of the river Tyne (clause 17) all vessels proceeding to sea must keep to the south side of mid channel, and (clause 20) "vessels crossing the river, and vessels turning take upon themselves the responsibility of doing so safely with reference to the passing traffic;" under these byelaws a vessel outward bound coming at full speed out of the Tyne dock (on the south side of the river Tyne), and crossing the river to the north side, whether intentionally, in violation of clause 17, or unintentionally by reason of the force of the tide, is bound to use the utmost caution to avoid the passing traffic, and to contemplate before attempting to come out any contingencies, such as tide, stoppage of the traffic, &c., which may arise, and she should only cross if it can be done without risk to that traffic; if a collision occurs by want of such caution the ship will be responsible. (P.C.) The Henry Morton 466
44. River navigation—Tyne byelaws—Steamships overtaking ships.—Semble, that the 21st clause of the above byelaws, providing that when "steam vessels are proceeding in the same direction, but with unequal speed, the vessel which steams slowest shall when overtaken" take certain measures to allow the overtaking steamship to pass her, applies only to a vessel overtaking and passing another actually upon the same course with itself. (P.C.) Id. 466
45. River navigation—Lights—Dumb barge—No duty to carry lights in the Thames.—Dumb barges in motion driving with the tide up or down the river Thames at night are not bound to carry lights. (Adm.) The Owen Wallis 206

SUBJECTS OF CASES.

46. River navigation—Lights—Trinity house lighter
—“Ship”—Thames Conservancy byelaws.—A Trinity House lighter, which is a vessel propelled by sails as well as oars, but is exclusively employed in the river navigation of the Thames and never goes to sea, is not a “ship” within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Acts, and is not bound to carry, when under weigh in the Thames, the lights prescribed by the Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea to be carried by all sailing vessels; and, as the existing byelaws made under the Thames Conservancy Acts 1857 and 1864 (20 & 21 Vict. c. cxlvii.; 27 & 28 Vict. c. 113) contain no provision as to the lights to be carried by sailing vessels navigating the Thames, Trinity House lighters are under no obligation to carry lights when under weigh in that river. (Adm.) The C. S. Butler... page 408
47. River navigation—Dumb barge—Side of river—The Thames.—A dumb barge coming up the river Thames on a flood tide may keep on either side of the river, and there is no obligation on her by custom or otherwise to keep in mid-channel. (Adm.) The Owen Wallis 206
48. River navigation—Dumb barge—Steamship—Duty to keep out of the way—The Thames.—There is no duty on a dumb barge driving with the tide in the Thames to keep out of the way of a steamship; but it is the duty of the steamship to keep out of the way of the barge. (Adm.) Id. 206
49. Speed—Steamship—Sailing ship—Duty to ascertain course of latter.—When a steamer sights a sailing vessel in the night time at a distance of three miles, but, owing to the fact that the sailing vessel's lights are not visible, cannot ascertain the course of the sailing vessel, it is the duty of the steamer to slacken speed and wait to ascertain that course before adopting any decided manœuvre for the purpose of avoiding the sailing vessel. If the steamer immediately on sighting the sailing vessel adopts such a manœuvre, as by porting, and a collision ensue without fault on the part of the sailing vessel, the steamer is alone to blame. (P.C.) The Bougainville v. The James C. Stevenson..... 1
50. Speed—Steamships—Lights of other ship obscured—Duty to slacken speed and ascertain course.—Where a steamship is approaching another, whose exact course cannot be at once ascertained by reason of her lights being obscured by her own smoke, it is the duty of the former to take no decided step, but to slacken speed and to wait till that course is ascertained before taking any decided step to avoid the other vessel. (Priv. Co.) The Rona; The Ava 182
51. Speed—Steamship—Lights—Uncertainty as to course—Duty to slacken speed.—A steamer seeing lights close ahead of her, carried by some ship, and being unable to make out those lights, or the course of the ship carrying them, should slacken speed until she is able to ascertain the meaning of the lights, and to avoid the vessel carrying them. (Adm.) The Duke of Sutherland 478
52. Speed—Steamship—Dark night—Entering harbour.—A steamship entering a harbour at full speed on a night when ships not showing lights can be seen only at a distance of one or two cables' length will be held to blame if she injures another ship. (Adm.) The Earl Spencer 523
53. Speed—Steamship—Smoke obscuring lights and look-out.—It is negligence on the part of a steamer to go at full speed under steam and sail before the wind whilst her smoke is blown over her bows so as to obscure her lights and to prevent her from seeing and from being seen by other ships approaching from an opposite direction. (Priv. Co.) The Rona; The Ava 182
54. Speed—Fog—Steamship.—Seven miles an hour is too high a rate of speed for a steamship in a fog. (U. S. Sup. Ct.) The Steamer Pennsylvania page 378
55. Steamship—Towing ship—Sailing ship—Duty of tug—Special circumstances—Sailing rules Nos. 15 and 19.—A steamship towing another ship is within the meaning of the Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea relating to steamships, and is not by reason of her incumbered condition altogether absolved from the duty of keeping out of the way of a sailing vessel; still allowances should be made, under the circumstances of each case, for the comparatively disabled condition of the incumbered steamer, and the duty of additional precaution is imposed upon a sailing ship approaching a steamer so incumbered. (P. C.) The American and The Syria 350
56. Steamship—Towing ship—Sailing ship—Duty of sailing ship—Sailing rules, Art. 18.—Where a ship is ordered by the regulations to pursue a certain course in relation to another vessel, she has a right to presume that that other vessel will do her duty, and also observe the regulations; hence a sailing ship, approaching a steamship towing another ship, has a right to hold on her course until there is immediate danger of collision, in the expectation that the steamship will observe the regulations and keep out of her way. (P. C.) Id. 350
57. Steamship—Towing ship—Negligence of tug—Liability of tow—Governing power.—Where a collision takes place between a tug towing a ship and another ship, the question whether the tow is liable to make good the damage done by the negligence of the tug, depends upon the determination of the question whether the “governing power” is in the tug or in the tow. If the tug is in the service of and under the orders of the tow, the tow is answerable for the negligence of the tug as for the negligence of a servant; but if the tug is, although rendering service to the tow, not under the control of the latter, but is itself the governing power, then the tow is not liable for the negligence of the tug. (P. C.) Id. 350
58. Steamship—Towing ship disabled—Same owner—Governing power in tug—Liability of tow.—Where the master of a steamship, finding another steamship belonging to the same owners with her engines disabled, undertakes, not in pursuance of any specific contract made with the master of the disabled ship, but out of his sense of duty to his employers and in the hope of obtaining salvage reward, to tow the ship home, the towing ship is not under the control of the tow, nor is the governing power in the tow, so as to render the tow responsible for the negligent acts of the tug. Nor does the fact that both ships belong to the same owners render the towed ship responsible for the acts of the tug. (P. C.) Id...... 350

COMPULSORY PILOTAGE.

1. Trinity House pilotage—Thames district—Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sects. 353, 376—General exemption—Ship carrying passengers between Boulogne and London.—A steamship carrying cargo and passengers from Boulogne to London is not bound under the Merchant Ship-

- ping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) to employ a pilot whilst navigating the river Thames, the general exemption continued from 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, sect. 59, and the order in council of 18th Feb. 1854, by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 353, not being overridden by sect. 379, relating to Trinity House pilotage and exempting such a ship only when not carrying passengers. Reg. v. Stanton (8 Ell. & Bl. 445), and The Earl of Auckland (Lush 164, 387), followed. (Adm.) The Moselle page 586
2. Trinity House pilotage—Outport district—Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 370—“Particular provision”—Local Act—Appointment of pilots—Trinity sub-commissioners.—A Trinity House outport district by sect. 370 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) comprises any pilotage district for the appointment of pilots within which no particular provision is made by any Act of Parliament or charter. A port for which by a local Act passed in 1852 the Corporation of the Trinity House are required to appoint subcommissioners resident at the said port to examine and certify pilots for the port, is not a port for which such particular provision is made, because the local Act merely adopts and incorporates the provisions of the general Pilotage Act (6 Geo. 4, c. 125, sect. 5, repealed but re-enacted in the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 369) enacting that the said corporation are required to appoint subcommissioners at such ports or places as they may think requisite to examine and certify pilots. (Q. B.) Hadgraft (app.) v. Hewitt (resp.) 573
3. Trinity House pilotage—Outport district—Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sects. 353, 379—Local act—Coasting trade exemption.—The express enactment in the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 379, that ships not carrying passengers, employed in the coasting trade, shall be exempted from compulsory pilotage overrides a provision in a local Act passed in 1852 that all ships navigating within a district (a Trinity outport) shall employ a licensed pilot, and such obligation is not continued by Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 353, enacting that the employment of pilots shall continue compulsory in all districts in which the same was compulsory before that Act. Hadgraft (app.) v. Hewitt (resp.) 573
4. Trinity House pilotage—Outport—Ipswich Dock Act—Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 374—Coasting vessel—Exemption.—The port of Ipswich, the pilotage of which is regulated by the Ipswich Dock Act (15 Vict. c. cxvi.), is a Trinity outport district, and although by the above Act (sect. 91) all ships are bound to take a pilot whilst within the district, such obligation is taken away in the case of coasting vessels not carrying passengers by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 379. (Q. B.) Id. 573
5. Mersey pilotage—Mersey Docks Acts Consolidation Act 1858—Pilot offering to take charge entitled to pilotage rate—Compulsion.—The Mersey Docks Acts Consolidation Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii.)—providing for the pilotage of the river Mersey, and enacting (sect. 139), inter alia, that if the master of any vessel (with certain exceptions), being outward bound, “shall proceed to sea, and shall refuse to take on board or to employ a pilot, he shall pay to the pilot who shall first offer himself to pilot the same, the full pilotage rate,” as if the pilot had piloted the ship, and, further, that (sect. 138) if a master requires the services of a pilot whilst his ship is lying at anchor in the Mersey, the pilot shall be paid for every day or portion of a day he shall attend, the sum of five shillings; “but no such charge shall be made for the day on which such vessel, being outward bound, shall leave the river Mersey to commence her voyage”—compels a master so proceeding to sea to take a pilot. (Adm. & P.C.) The City of Cambridge page 193, 239
6. Mersey pilotage—Mersey Docks Acts—Consolidation Act 1858, sect. 138—“Proceeding to sea”—Anchoring in river—Compulsion from leaving dock.—Where a ship ready and about to proceed to sea leaves one of the Mersey Docks at night in charge of a licensed pilot, and casts anchor in the river so as to be ready to cross the bar at the mouth of the river on the next morning's tide at an earlier hour than she could if she left the dock in the morning, the going into and casting anchor in the river is a step in the “proceeding to sea” within the meaning of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii.) sect. 139, and the employment of the pilot is compulsory under that section from the time of leaving dock, and if the ship breaks away from her moorings, and damages another vessel through the pilots sole default the owners will not be responsible. (Adm. & P.C.) Id. 193, 239
7. Mersey pilotage—Mersey Docks Act—Consolidation Act 1858, “Proceeding to sea”—Anchoring in river—Extra payment to pilot—Compulsion from leaving dock—Voluntary employment.—The fact that the pilot becomes entitled, under sect. 138 of the Act, to an extra payment of five shillings a day beyond the amount payable for compulsory pilotage, whilst employed on the ship at the requirement of the master during the time she is anchored in the river, except on the day when the ship leaves the Mersey to commence her voyage, does not alter the character of the employment during that time, so as to make it a voluntary employment or any the less compulsory. Breach of contract—Action for—Damage to partnership—Benefit to one partner—Right of defendant to take into account.—In order to entitle a defendant in an action brought against him by partners for a breach of contract causing damage to the partnership to take into account a benefit accruing to any of the plaintiffs from such breach for the purpose of reducing the damages, such benefit must be a joint benefit accruing to the partnership; and it is immaterial for the assessment of damages whether or no individual plaintiffs have actually benefited, in other ways from the very default of the defendants for which as a partnership they are suing. Where partnerships sue for breach of contract, the damages must be confined to those sustained by the partnership; and part owners of ships are for the purpose of such an action in the same position as partners. COUNTY COURTS ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION.

1. Damage—Jurisdiction—Co-extensive with Admiralty Court as to subject matter.—The Admiralty Courts Acts (3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6; 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 7), confer upon the High Court of Admiralty of England over causes of damage arising within the body of a county the jurisdiction which that court originally possesses over such causes arising on the High seas; and the jurisdiction given to the County Courts, having admiralty jurisdiction over causes of damage, by the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts 1868 and 1869 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, s. 3, sub-sect. 3; 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51, s. 4), is as large (where the amount claimed does not exceed 300*l.*), as that possessed by the High Court of Admiralty. (Q. B. Bail Court.) Purkis v. Flower..... 226
2. Damage—Jurisdiction—Barge—Ship damaged by—Admiralty Court—County Court.—Damage to a ship by a barge (propelled by oars only), would be within the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty if it occurred on the high seas, and (by the Admiralty Court Acts) if it occurred on a tidal river within the body of a county; hence the County Courts having admiralty jurisdiction would have jurisdiction over such damage. The Surah (Lush, 549) followed (Q. B. Bail Court.) Id...... 226
3. Damage—Jurisdiction—Action against pilot—Admiralty cause.—An action against a pilot for negligence in navigating a vessel whereby it came into collision with another vessel, which it damaged, is not an Admiralty cause within the meaning of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, sect. 3, sub-sect. 3), and may therefore be brought in any County Court, though such court be not one appointed under the Act for the trial of Admiralty causes. (Ex.) Flower v. Bradley..... 489
4. Freight—Demurrage—Breach of charter—Jurisdiction—Admiralty Court—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1869, sect. 2.—The jurisdiction given to the County Courts by the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71) sect. 3, and the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), sect. 2 is confined to causes within the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty; and, therefore, in an action in a Superior Court on a charter-party for freight or demurrage, which is a cause not within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty Court, a plaintiff, claiming and recovering a sum between £20 and £300, is entitled to his costs, and cannot be deprived of them by the operation of sect. 9 of the Act of 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), which is not applicable to such a case Simpson v. Blues (ante, vol. 1, p. 326; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 290; 26 L. T. Rep. N. DAMAGE.

1. Damage to pier—Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847, sect. 74—Undertakers—Maritime lien—Liability of ship in rem—Inevitable accident.—The owners of a pier, who are undertakers within the meaning of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847, acquire, under sect. 74 of that Act, a maritime lien in respect of any damage done to their pier by a ship, and may proceed in rem to recover that damage in the High Court of Admiralty, and the shipowners are debarred by sect. 74 from setting up the defence of inevitable accident. (Adm.) The Merle; Dennis v. Tovell..... 402
2. Damages to pier—Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847—Limited Company—Undertakers—Winding-up.—Where a limited company, duly constituted by provisional order made under the General Piers and Harbours Acts 1861 and 1862, as the undertakers of a pier, within the meaning of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847, is voluntarily wound-up, and its property sold by the liquidator, a purchaser of the pier has transferred to him both the property and the rights of the original undertaker, becomes the undertaker within the meaning of the last-mentioned Act, and can recover against a ship for damage done to his pier by that ship, although such damage be the result of inevitable accident. The Merle 402
3. Damage to sea wall—Harbour, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847, sect. 74—Liability of ship.—The owners of a ship which the crew have left owing to stress of weather, are answerable, under sect. 74 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 (10 and 11 Vict. c. 27) for damage done to a sea wall, after the crew have left her. (Q.B.) The River Wear Commissioners v. Adamson and others 145
4. Steam tug—Fog—Negligently proceeding—Running ashore—Pilot in charge of ship—Contributory negligence.—Where a ship in tow of a steam tug and in charge of a licensed pilot who has the control over and directs the course of both vessels, is navigating a river in a fog so dense that the banks of the river cannot be seen, and those on board the tug and ship in tow do not know in what direction they are going, it is negligence on the part of both vessels to proceed; but as it is the duty of the pilot in charge to give orders to the tug to stop so as to enable the ship in tow to come to an anchor, the neglect on the part of the pilot to give such orders is contributory negligence, which will preclude the owners of the

GENERAL AVERAGE.

1. Damage by water—Extinguishing fire—British custom.—Loss occasioned by water used to extinguish fire on board ship not having hitherto been treated by British average adjusters as a general average loss, owners of goods, carried under a bill of lading providing for "average, if and, to be adjusted according to British custom," cannot recover for damage so sustained as for a general average loss; under such circumstances the question whether such a loss is by law a general average does not arise. Bills drawn against goods—Policy of insurance—Deposit of papers with bank—Extent of bank's lien.—Where a merchant consigns goods to this country, draws a bill of exchange against the goods, and before acceptance discounts the bill with a bank, and, in order to secure repayment, insures the goods, deposits the bills of lading and the policy with the bank together with a letter of hypothecation authorising the bank in case the bill or any other bills of his should not be accepted or paid to sell the goods and recoup themselves, but making no mention of the policy, the bank acquires no right, on the goods being destroyed by the perils insured against and on the failure of the consignor and consignee, to apply the proceeds of the policy to pay other bills drawn upon other parties by the merchant, and discounted by the bank, or to satisfy anything beyond the amount of the bill of exchange, drawn against the goods and a third person to whom the policy has been assigned can claim to have the amount over the value of the bill paid over to them by the bank. JURISDICTION.

1. Admiralty Court—Damage of cargo—Breach of contract before goods laden—Admiralty Court Act 1861, sect. 6.—The High Court of Admiralty has no jurisdiction to entertain a suit for breach of contract under the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), sect. 6, where the breach occurs before the goods are laden on board the vessel which under the contract afterwards carries the goods into a port in England or Wales. (Adm.) The Dannebrog 452
2. Damage to cargo—Cargo carried into English port of call—Discharged abroad—Ship returning to England—Arrest—Admiralty Court Act 1861 sect. 6.—When a foreign ship carrying cargo, acting in pursuance of the contract of affreightment, which gives the option of several ports of call, English and foreign, puts into an English port of call for orders, she carries her cargo into the English port within the meaning of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), sect. 1; and though she be ordered to a foreign port, and there discharge her cargo, the Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction to entertain against her a suit by the assignees of the bills of lading of the cargo, for damage to cargo, and to arrest her on her return, after discharging, to this country. (Adm. and Priv. Co.) The Pieve Superiore 162, 319
3. Admiralty Court—Damage to cargo—Breach of contract by master—Master part owner—Liability in rem.—Semble, the High Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction to proceed in rem against a ship for breach of contract, within the meaning of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), sect. 6, although that breach is committed by one of the part owners of the ship only (the master), and is a breach for which the other part owners would not be responsible. (Adm.) The Emilien Marie 514
4. Levantine Consular Court—Ship disabled—Average statement—Made up under decree of Court—Customs of Levant—Presumption as to jurisdiction.—Where in an action to recover from underwriters a general average loss it appears that the ship arrives at Constantinople disabled from proceeding on her voyage, and that the British Supreme Consular Court had, on the application of the master, appointed surveyors who make recommendations as to sale of part and transshipment of the rest of the cargo, and that the court has made orders in accordance with those recommendations, and further that the court has appointed average adjusters, who investigate the various claims and make up an average statement in accordance with the law of the port of destination of the ship, and that the statement is registered and homologated by a decree of the court, and it further appears that the Orders in Council respecting the jurisdiction of the consular courts in the Levant expressly reserve to those courts the right to enforce customs obtaining in the Ottoman dominions, it will be taken by the court trying the action that the consular court had the jurisdiction so exercised. MARINE INSURANCE.

- Abandonment—Ship—Notice—Implied acceptance of—Insurers taking possession and keeping salvage—Claim for—Effect of.*—When notice of abandonment of a ship is given to underwriters, mere silence on their part will not operate as an acceptance of abandonment; but if the underwriters, on a loss occurring, and after notice of abandonment duly given, take possession of a ship by their agent, take her to a place of safety, repair her, and detain her in their custody for an unreasonable time without giving notice to the assured that they are acting on his behalf, and that they do not accept the abandonment, their acts will amount to a constructive acceptance of abandonment; nor will the fact that the insurers think fit to libel the ship in the Admiralty Court for salvage reward affect their liability, if the assured had not interfered in the salvage suit nor taken any steps to assert his continued ownership. (Priv. Co.) *The Provincial Insurance Company of Canada v. Leduc*page 338
- Abandonment—Acceptance of—Partial loss—Total loss—Estoppel—Canadian Civil Code.*—Acceptance of abandonment by underwriters is irrevocable, and makes a partial loss tantamount to a total loss, and the insurers are precluded from relying upon a subsequent recovery of the property because they are estopped from saying that the loss is not total and although by the Canadian Civil Code, art. 2545, abandonment cannot be made of a stranded ship if she can be raised so as to be sent forward to her destination, this article does not apply to cases where abandonment of a stranded ship has been accepted by underwriters, but must be read in conjunction with other articles (2547, 2549), by which abandonment and acceptance vest the property in the insurer, and cannot be defeated by subsequent events, as in English law. (Priv. Co.) The Provincial Insurance Company of Canada v. Leduc 338
- Cargo—Common Carriers—Inception of risk—“From the loading”—Named ports—Warranty—Attaching of policy—Common carriers—Intendment of parties.*—A clause in a policy of marine insurance, providing that the adventure upon goods to be carried by the assured as common carriers between certain ports, shall begin “from and immediately following the loading thereof on board the said vessels at” certain ports enumerated, is not, unless so expressly provided by the policy, to be construed as a warranty that the goods shall be loaded at such ports, but as mere recital, description, or intention, or expectation, that the goods will be there loaded; and the policy attaches to goods in the custody of the assured for the purposes of transportation in the ordinary course of their business as common carriers, carried into a port named in the policy by one of the vessels, but not in the strict sense loaded at that port on board the vessel provided that the facts show that, by reason of the nature of the transactions to which the policy relates, the parties intended that the policy should so attach. (Sup. Ct. of Cal. U. S.) Wells, Fargo, and Company v. The Pacific Insurance Company 111
- Cargo—Common Carriers—Open policy—Advice of shipments—Warranty—Condition precedent.*—A memorandum on an open policy of insurance upon goods carried between certain ports by the insured as common carriers, providing that the agents of the insured should send to their head office “advices of the amount of each shipment,” is not a warranty, or condition precedent,

- without the strict performance of which the right to demand an indorsement of a loss under the policy would not accrue; and where the usual mode of forwarding letters of advice is by the steamers in which the goods are shipped, the losses must necessarily be notified to the underwriters after they have occurred, and the insured are entitled to recover if the loss be notified to the insurers by the person in charge of the goods without any letter of advice, as this would comply with a memorandum providing for the losses being made known to the insurers as soon as known to the assured. (Sup. Ct. of Cal. U. S.) Id...... page 111
5. Cargo—Constructive total loss—Wreck—Sale of cargo by salvors—When loss takes place—Limitation of action.—Where ship and cargo are wrecked and cast ashore, but part of the cargo continues to exist in specie and is taken out, and, it being impossible to forward it to its destination, is sold by the salvors on the spot, there is no total loss of the cargo, actual or constructive, until the sale has taken place; and, consequently, a condition in a policy on the goods, that no action shall be maintainable on the policy unless commenced within twelve months after any loss shall have occurred, is complied with if an action, to recover for a total loss of the goods, is commenced within twelve months after the sale has taken place; the action need not be commenced within twelve months after the wreck. (P.C.) Browning (app.) v. The Provincial Insurance Company of Canada...... 35
6. Cargo—Brokers making advances—Insurable interest—Extent of—Interest of all concerned—Right to insure.—Brokers who in the course of their business are in the habit of receiving consignments of cotton from abroad, and of making advances by acceptances, usually negotiated abroad, against the consignment, have on accepting the bills and so becoming liable upon them an equitable interest in every part of the cotton against which they have made the advances, and have such an interest in the selling and managing the consignment, as in law gives them a right to insure to its full value, and if the goods be lost in transit may, on a declaration averring interest in themselves, recover on a policy effected by them at the request of the consignors to cover the interests of all concerned the full amount insured, applying the proceeds to the extent of their claims, and holding the remainder as trustees for the persons beneficially interested: (per Bovill, C.J., and Denman, J.); sed contra (per Keating and Brett, J.J.), the brokers making advances on the cotton in transitu, have only a contract right on the cotton to have the bills of lading delivered to them on payment of their acceptances, and as consignees, though interested in every part, are not the legal owners, nor trustees for the persons beneficially interested, and cannot therefore recover more than their own beneficial interest. (C. P.) Ebbsworth and others v. The Alliance Marine Insurance Company...... 126
7. Cargo—Insurable interest—Named ship—Cargo part loaded—Appropriation to buyer—Right to recover for part shipped.—Where a merchant buys a grain cargo per a named ship, and part of that cargo is shipped and the rest alongside when the ship goes down and, with the part loaded, is lost, there is such an appropriation of the cargo already loaded, the ship being named in the contract, as to prevent the seller from withdrawing it without the buyer's consent; the option of accepting or rejecting the part cargo remains to the buyer even after the loss, and if he does not reject, the cargo remains at his risk, and he has an insurable interest therein to the extent of the quantity shipped, and to its full value, and if he has insured the cargo at and from the loading port, "as interest may appear," he can recover the value of the quantity shipped. (C.P.) Anderson v. Morice..... page 424
8. Cargo—Insurable interest—Named ship—Cargo part loaded—Existing contract—Expectancy of benefit.—Even if the property in the cargo does not pass to the merchant under such a contract he still has an insurable interest in it, because he has an existing contract with regard to it from the time of its being loaded on board, by virtue of which he has an expectancy of benefit and advantage arising out of or depending on the safe arrival of the cargo. (C.P.) Id...... 425
9. Cargo—Machinery—Damage to component parts—Total loss.—Where the component parts of "machinery" insured "free of particular average" are by the perils insured against, some totally lost and the remainder so damaged that they are useless for the purpose for which they were intended when shipped, there is a total loss, which can be recovered from the underwriters, the species of the machinery being destroyed. U.S. Sup. Ct.) The Great Western Insurance Company v. Fogarty..... 262
10. Cargo—Tea—Packages—Damage by perils to some—Loss to be ascertained by separation and sale of contents damaged—Loss by injury to reputation—Divisibility of damage.—Where by a policy of marine insurance, packages of tea valued at a certain sum are insured against the usual risks, "and all other losses and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the said goods or any part thereof; warranted by the assured free from damage or injury from dampness, change of flavour, or being spotted, &c., except caused by actual contact of sea-water with the articles damaged occasionally by sea perils; in the case of partial loss by sea damage to dry goods, cutlery, or other hardware, the loss shall be ascertained by a separation and sale of the portion only of the contents so damaged, and not otherwise: and the same practice shall obtain as to all other merchandise as far as practicable," and certain packages of tea are damaged during transit by sea perils, the remainder being unharmed, then for the purpose of assessing the damage sustained, the packages coming under the head of "all other merchandise," are divisible, and the underwriters are liable only for the deterioration in value of such of the chests as have in fact been damaged by sea-water, and not for injury to the reputation of the rest from having formed part of a shipment of which part had been damaged by sea-water. (C.P.) Cator v. The Great Western Insurance Company...... 90
11. Cargo—Tea—Packages—Damage by perils to some—Divisibility of damage.—Semble, even if the policy had not contained the above clause, the packages would still have been divisible, and the underwriters liable only for such as had been in fact damaged by sea-water. (C.P.) Id...... 90
12. Cargo—Valued policy—"At and from"—Part of cargo loaded—Total loss of part—Valuation—Invoice price.—Where a cargo bought to arrive by a particular ship is insured "at and from" the port of loading by that ship "as interest may appear, amount of invoice to be deemed the value," and before the full cargo is loaded, the ship and part of cargo are totally lost, the policy must be treated as a valued policy, the valuation being the amount of the proper invoice,

- according to the contract between the buyer and vendor. (C.P.) *Anderson v. Morice*page 425
13. Concealment and representation—Duty of assured.—Though an assured is not bound to disclose everything which might influence the mind of an underwriter, he is bound to disclose all those facts which a rational insurer, governing himself by the principles and calculations commonly applied to policies and risks, would regard as bearing on those risks. (Q. B.) Ionides v. Pender..... 266
14. Concealment and representation—Duty of assured—Excessive valuation—Varying risk.—An excessive valuation of the subject-matter of insurance is a fact which, as bearing on the risks insured against, ought to be disclosed to an underwriter by an assured, and the concealment of such a fact will vitiate a policy if its disclosure would have materially affected the mind of the underwriter in assuming the risk. (Q. B.) Id. 266
15. Concealment and representation—Reinsurance on subject matter—Duty of communication.—An assured may effect reinsurance directly on the subject-matter of insurance against the risks or any part thereof insured against in the original policy, without being bound to disclose in the policy or otherwise that it is a reinsurance unless challenged so to do. (Ex.) Mackenzie v. Whitworth 490
16. Concealment and representation—Slip contract—Knowledge of material fact after initialling—Communication.—A slip being in practice the complete and final contract between the parties to a contract of marine insurance, although not enforceable at law or in equity, there is no obligation on the assured to communicate a material fact which comes to his knowledge after the initialling of the slip and before the issuing of the policy. (Q.B.) Cory v. Patton..... 302
(Ex. Ch. from C.P.) Lishman and others v. The Northern Maritime Insurance Company (Limited) 504
17. Concealment and representation—Slip—Knowledge of material fact after initialling—Contract made by agent of assured—Ratification by assured—Duty to communicate.—The fact that the contract of insurance has been entered into by an agent of the assured and the slip been initialled by the underwriter, subject to the approval of the assured, and that the ratification of the assured does not take place until after the material fact comes to his knowledge, does not, where the assured was ignorant of the material fact when the slip was initialled, entitle the underwriter to have the fact communicated to him. (Q.B.) Cory v. Paton 302
18. Concealment and representation—Slip contract—Warranty in policy not in slip—Material fact—Duty of communication.—The introduction into a policy on freight of a warranty (not in the original slip) for the benefit of underwriters, to the effect that the hull of the ship is not insured beyond a certain amount, does not create a new contract or new risk different from the slip, and therefore does not affect the duty of communication of material facts. (Ex. Ch. from C. P.) Lishman v. The Northern Maritime Insurance Company (Limited) 504
19. Freight—Particular ship—Chartered freight upon homeward voyage—Insurance during outward voyage—Constructive total loss of ship on outward voyage—Right to recover on policy on freight.—Where an insurance upon chartered freight, to be earned by a particular ship named in the charter-party upon a homeward voyage, is effected by the shipowner to cover risks to be incurred during the previous outward voyage,
- damage by perils of the seas sustained during the outward voyage, to an extent which result in such injury that on her arrival at her chartered port of loading the cost of repairs to enable her to perform her homeward voyage under the charter-party would be more than she would be worth when repaired, will entitle the assured to claim against the underwriters on freight as for a total loss of freight. (H. of L.) Rankin and others v. Potter and others.....page 65
20. Freight—Particular ship—Chartered freight on homeward voyage—Insurance during outward voyage—Constructive total loss of ship—Total loss of freight—Notice of abandonment.—To entitle the assured to claim as for a total loss of freight under such circumstances, no notice of abandonment is necessary, because the loss of the freight is an actual total loss resulting from the inability of the ship to perform the contract created by the charter-party, by the terms of which no other ship could earn the chartered freight, and in consequence the underwriters could not by abandonment either take or earn any part of the chartered freight; notice of abandonment being necessary only where abandonment transfers to the underwriters something beneficial to them. (H. of L.) Id...... 65
21. Freight—Particular ship—Chartered freight upon homeward voyage—Insurance during outward voyage—Total loss of freight—Notice of abandonment to underwriters on ship—No necessity for.—The right of the assured to claim as for a total loss of freight under such circumstances is not affected by his neglect to give due notice of abandonment to the underwriters on ship for the purpose of claiming against them as for a constructive total loss of ship, because the rights of the assured as to the insurances on ship and freight depend upon different considerations and totally different contracts, which ought not to be mixed together; the policy on freight ought to be considered as though the ship had never been insured; hence conduct of the assured in delaying the voyage to the port of loading for a considerable time, in employing the ship for other purposes than that for which she was chartered (as a store ship), and in having the ship surveyed and temporarily repaired in an intermediate port on the outward voyage, after the damage is sustained, so that great and unnecessary delay took place before notice of abandonment was given to the underwriters on ship, will not affect the rights of the assured under the policy on freight, which becomes a total loss as soon as the damage is sustained. (H. of L.) Id. 65
22. Freight—Payable on quantity delivered—Half on signing bills of lading—Half on delivery—Prepayment relates to whole cargo—Half cargo lost—Amount recoverable on policy on freight.—Where goods are shipped under a charter-party by which the freight is made payable at an agreed rate "on the quantity delivered," half on "signing bills of lading," and the remainder "on right delivery of the cargo," the prepayment of the freight in advance, which cannot be recovered back in case of the loss of the cargo, presupposes a delivery of the entire cargo, and is made in respect thereof, and it is not competent to the owners of the cargo, in case of a loss of half the cargo, to appropriate the whole of the amount prepaid to that portion of the cargo which is actually delivered, but he can only claim to have the prepayment distributed rateably over each portion of the cargo delivered; consequently the loss to the shipowner is not the half of the total amount of freight, but only half the freight pay-

- able under the charter-party for the portion lost ; hence if the shipowner, at the time of shipment, insures the freight still due in a valued policy, fixing the amount of the valuation at half the freight payable under the charter-party, he cannot recover as for a total loss of half the freight, but can only recover as for a partial loss, the amount recoverable being a sum bearing the same proportion to the actual loss sustained as the amount insured bears to the total amount of freight payable. (Ex. Ch. reversing C. P.) Allison v. The Bristol Marine Insurance Company page 312
23. Freight—Ship chartered to proceed to port and there load—Prevented from proceeding within reasonable time by perils insured against—Total loss of freight.—Where a ship is chartered to proceed with all convenient speed from L. to N., and there load a cargo for S., the usual perils excepted, and after leaving L., but before reaching N., she gets aground, and the delay in getting the ship off and in repairing her will be necessarily so great as to make it unreasonable for the charterers to supply the agreed cargo at the end of the time, and so great as to put an end, in a commercial sense, to the speculation entered upon by the shipowner and the charterers, the latter are discharged from their contract on the ground that there is an implied condition of the contract that the ship shall arrive at N. within a reasonable time, and on the failure of this the contract is at an end. Consequently, the adventure having been frustrated by perils of the seas, there is a total loss of chartered freight within the meaning of a policy effected by the shipowner "on chartered freight at and from L. to N. in tow, while there and thence to S.," and the shipowner may recover thereon. (Ex. Ch. from C. P.) Jackson v. The Union Marine Insurance Company (Limited) 435
24. General average—Particular average—Foreign adjustment—Warranty against average unless general—Foreign law—Liability of underwriter.—Where a policy of insurance upon goods on board a vessel from Varna to Marseilles, contains the words "general average as per foreign statement," and a warranty against average unless general, and the voyage is by perils of the seas terminated at an intermediate port, and the average statement there duly made up in accordance with the law of the port of destination, and by such statement the damage sustained by the wheat is made to appear as general average, the loss, although only a particular average loss by the law of England, must be treated as general average as per foreign statement, and may be recovered from the underwriters. (C.P. and Ex. Ch.) Mavro and another v. The Ocean Marine Insurance Company 361, 590
25. Particular average—Stranding—Foreign adjustment—Foreign law—Liability of Underwriters.—When goods are first insured under a Dutch policy, and afterwards under an English policy, the latter containing the words "to cover only the risk excepted by the clause warranted free from particular average, unless the ship be stranded, sunk, or burnt, to pay all claims and losses on Dutch terms, and according to statement made up by the official depecheur in Holland," the terms of the English policy do not, in the absence of notice of the same or existence of the Dutch policy, amount to notice to the underwriters of the Dutch policy, and the English policy must be construed independently thereof; but if the ship be stranded according to English law, but not according to Dutch law, and an average statement is made up according to the terms of the English policy, but according to the principles of Dutch law, showing a particular average loss, the English underwriters are bound by that statement and the assured may recover. (C. P.) Hendricks v. The Australasian Insurance Company 244
26. Policy—Assignment after interest ceased.—Where the interest of the insured has ceased before loss, a subsequent assignment of the policy is ineffectual. (Q. B.) The North of England Pure Oil Cake Company (Limited) v. The Archangel Maritime Bank and Insurance Company (Limited) 571
27. Policy on cargo—Assignment after interest ceased—Passing of policy.—Where cargo is insured for a voyage, including risk of lighters, and the assured during the voyage sells the cargo to be paid for in 14 days from being ready for delivery or at seller's option on handing shipping document (which option is not exercised) and the cargo is discharged into lighters employed by the purchasers, one of which sinks, and the assured afterwards assigns the policy to the purchasers, the purchasers cannot recover on the policy because the policy does not pass by the contract of sale, the interest of the assured ceases on delivery into the lighters and the subsequent assignment is void. (Q. B.) Id. 571
28. Policy—Attaching of—"At a port"—Implied understanding or warranty—Risk—Variation of.—When a policy of marine insurance is entered into insuring a ship or goods thereon "at and from a port," there is, in the absence of a direct representation, an implied understanding that the vessel shall be at that port within such a time that the risk shall not be materially varied; otherwise the risk does not attach. (Q. B.) De Wolf v. Archangel Maritime Bank and Insurance Company 273
29. Policy—Contract—Agent—Principal—Right to sue.... A contract of marine insurance, entered into with underwriters by an agent in his own name, but without expressing the interest in the subject of insurance to be in any particular person, may be sued upon by the principal in whom the interest is. (P.C.) Browning (app.) v. The Provincial Insurance Company of Canada (resps.) 35
30. Policy—Contract—Form of—A.B. As well in his own name, &c.—Agent—Principal—Certificate or slip—Right to sue.—Where the common form of policy of a marine insurance company contains the usual clause, "A.B. as well in his own name as for and in the names of all and every other person or persons to whom the same shall appertain, &c.," and it is the usage of the company on accepting a risk to issue a certificate or slip as a provisional agreement entitling the assured to a policy in their common form, the certificate is to be construed as a contract containing the above clause, and, if the certificate is made out in the name of an agent, the principal on whose behalf the contract is made may (in Canada where there are no Stamp Acts as to agreements for marine insurance) sue upon the certificate in his own name. (P.C.) Id. 35
31. Policy—Fraud—Finding by court of law—Cancellation of policy by Court of equity.—Where an action of law has been brought on a policy of marine insurance, and it has been decided in a special case stated in that action that that policy and others given under the same circumstances were procured by fraud, the Court of Chancery will, upon the facts so established, make a decree cancelling the policies. (V.C.B.) London and Provincial Marine Insurance Company v. Seymour 169

32. Policy—Warranty—Condition—Construction of—Evidence.—Where a warranty or condition in a policy of marine insurance is expressed in clear terms, evidence will not be admitted to show that it is to be construed contrary to the apparent meaning of those terms, although the desired construction may be that which has ordinarily been put upon it by persons making use of that form of policy. (Priv. Co.) *The Provincial Insurance Company of Canada v. Leduc*page 338
33. Policy—Warranty—Time of voyage specified—Breach—Liability—Abandonment.—Where a ship is insured on a time policy at and from Montreal, to trade between the Island of Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Cuba, &c., and Quebec and Montreal, and the policy contains a stipulation in the following words: "Not allowed under this policy to enter the Gulf of St. Lawrence before the 25th April, nor to be in the said Gulf after the 15th Nov.; nor to proceed to Newfoundland after the 1st Dec., or before the 15th March, without payment of additional premium, and leave first obtained, war risk, and sealing voyages excepted;" the policy is not to be construed as declaring that the vessel may proceed from any of the ports named in the policy to Newfoundland on or before the 1st Dec., notwithstanding it might have to pass through the Gulf after 15th Nov.; but under that clause the vessel is neither to be in the Gulf after the 15th Nov., nor to proceed to Newfoundland from any port after the 1st Dec.; and if the ship enters the Gulf after the 15th Nov., she commits a breach of warranty within the words of the policy, and the underwriters are not liable for any loss occurring in consequence of that breach, unless they accept abandonment with a knowledge of the breach. (Priv. Co.) The Provincial Insurance Company of Canada v. Leduc..... 338
34. Practice—Costs—Examination of defendants' witnesses before plea—Reg. Gen. H.T. 1853, R.12.—Where in an action upon a policy of marine insurance witnesses are examined on behalf of defendants to save expense after declaration but before plea, the defendants not pleading through default of the plaintiffs, the cost of the examination are not costs before instruction for plea within the meaning of Reg. Gen., H. T., 1853, R. 12, and will be allowed upon taxation where the defendant having subsequently pleaded several pleas and paid money into court under the money counts, the plaintiff discontinues. (Q.B.) Previte and another v. The Adelaide Fire and Marine Insurance Company 577
35. Reinsurance—Agents abroad—Neglect to reinsure—Damages—Suit in equity.—A claim for damages by an insurance company against their agent for not reinsuring, according to instructions, cannot be enforced in a suit in equity for an account of the transactions between the principal and agent. (L.J.J. reversing V. C. B.) The Great Western Insurance Company of New York v. Cunliffe 219, 298
36. Reinsurance—Agents abroad—Credit System—Remuneration of Agents—Discount—Custom.—Agents for an insurance company abroad, whose business it is to effect reinsurances for the company, but with respect to whose remuneration no stipulation has been made between the company and themselves, are entitled to retain, for their own benefit, the discount which they receive as brokers under the "credit" system (12 per cent.) by the custom of insurance business, more especially if the mode of remuneration has been made known to their principals; and they need not account for the same to their principals. (L.J.J. reversing V. C. B.) *Id*219, 298
37. Risks insured against—Restraint of princes—Land transit—Marine policy—Liability.—A marine policy in the ordinary Lloyd's form against the usual perils, "arrests, restraints, and detentions of princes," on goods which are expressed in the policy to be carried by a route, which is (within the knowledge of the underwriters) partly by sea and partly by land, covers the risk of transit both by land and water, and if the goods are lost by the perils insured against while upon land, the assured are entitled to recover. (C.P. and Ex. Ch.) Rodocanochi and others v. Elliot and others..... page 21, 399
38. Risks insured against—Restraint of princes—Land transit—Siege—Abandonment—Liability.—Where goods insured under a policy covering terrene risks, and against (inter alia), "arrests, restraints, and detention of princes," are in course of their transit detained in a town by reason of that town being regularly besieged, the detention is a "restraint of princes" within the meaning of the policy, which will give the assured the right to abandon and claim as for a total loss. (C.P. and Ex. Ch.) *Id.*21, 399
39. Risks insured against—Restraint of princes—Land transit—Siege—Notice of abandonment—Where to be given.—Semble, that in such a case notice of abandonment may be given immediately or within such a reasonable time after the commencement of the restraint as will enable the assured to ascertain whether the restraint is likely or not to be permanent. (C.P.) Id. 21
40. Ship—Classification—Underwriters' Association—Suspension of class—Right of shipowner to relief.—Where an underwriters' association for the registry of ships, having a ship classed on their lists submitted to them for inspection and being dissatisfied with her condition, bonâ fide and without malice make an entry on their books suspending the ship's class, and decline to remove the entry till certain alterations are made in the ship, the shipowners are not entitled to relief, although they may be injured by the entry. (V.C.M.) Clover v. Roydon..... 167
41. Ship—Illegal voyage—Carrying passengers without Board of Trade certificate—Owners ignorant of master's act—Liability of underwriters.—Where a ship, not licensed by the Board of Trade to carry passengers, does carry them, if such carriage is the act of the master alone without the knowledge of the owners and contrary to their intentions, the policy is not vitiated by the illegal carriage of passengers. (Q.B.) Dudgeon v. Pembroke 323
42. Ship—Insurable interest—Joint purchase—Payment of whole by one owner—Authority by other to insure whole—Right to recover in name of one.—Where a ship is purchased in the name of two persons A. and B., but the purchase money is by arrangement between them paid by A. only; and B., in order to give some security to A. for the payment of his share, authorises A. to insure the ship in his (A.'s) name alone, and in case of the loss of the ship, to receive the whole insurance money, and so pay himself the amount due to him from B., A. has an insurable interest in the whole ship, and may, in an action on a valued policy, recover in his own name the full amount insured. A statement by B. to a third person of this arrangement with A., being a declaration against his (B.'s) interest, is evidence against the insurers to show A.'s insurable interest. (Priv. Co.) The Provincial Insurance Company of Canada v. Leduc 338
43. Ship—Insurable interest—Material men—Necessaries—Advances—Bottomry bond.—Where ma-

- terial men lend money to a ship's captain to provide necessities for his ship at a foreign port receive a bottomry bond, insure the ship, and on an adjustment of average are awarded a sum as due to them under the policy from the underwriters, they have an insurable interest, and are entitled to recover the amount found due by the adjustment. (U.S. Sup. Ct.) The Merchants' Mutual Insurance Company v. Baring and others ...page 411
44. Ship—Insurable interest—Mortgage—Right of shipowner to insure.—A shipowner whose ship is mortgaged may, if he remains in possession, insure his ship to the full amount of her value. The Provincial Insurance Company of Canada v. Leduc 338
45. Ship—Fire—Policy on ship in dock "with liberty to go into dry dock."—Lying in river for repairs—Not covered.—A policy against fire in the hull of a ship whilst "lying in the Victoria Docks, London, with liberty to go into dry dock, and light boiler fires once or twice during the currency of this policy," although covering the ship whilst in the Victoria Dock and the dry dock and during her passage up and down the river between the two (if such passage be necessary by reason of her being unable to go into dry dock without so passing), does not cover the ship whilst lying in the river for repairs, after coming out of dry dock, and before returning to the Victoria Dock. (Ex. Ch. from C.P.) Pearson v. The Commercial Union Assurance Company 100
46. Ship—Sale by master—Total loss—Necessity for sale—Notice of abandonment.—The master of a ship may, under certain circumstances, effect the sale of his ship so as to thereby render the underwriters liable for a total loss without notice of abandonment, but he can only do so in cases of stringent necessity—that is to say, a necessity that leaves the master no alternative, as a prudent and skilful man acting bonâ fide for the best interests of all concerned and with the best and soundest judgment that can be formed under the circumstances, but to sell the ship as she lies. If he comes to this conclusion hastily, either without sufficient examination into the actual state of the ship, or without having previously made every exertion in his power with the means then at his disposal, to extricate her from the peril or to raise funds for her repair, he will not be justified in selling, even though the danger at the time appear exceedingly imminent, (P.C.) The Cobequid Marine Insurance Company v. Barteaux ... 536
47. Ship—Time policy—Unseaworthiness—Knowledge of shipowner—Warranty.—When a jury have found in an action on a time policy that a vessel was sent to sea in an unseaworthy condition, but that such condition was at the time unknown to the shipowners, there being in such case no warranty of seaworthiness, they can recover even though the unseaworthiness as a fact materially contributed to the loss. (Q.B.) Dudgeon v. Pembroke 323
48. Ship—Time policy—Warranty—Voyage and times specified—Effect of breach—Acceptance of abandonment—Estoppel.—A warranty in a time policy upon a ship for certain voyages, that the ship shall not proceed to or be at certain places after given dates, has not the effect of leaving the ship totally uninsured by the policy if, in breach of the warranty, she proceeds to, or is at those places after those dates, so as to preclude recovery in all cases; and if the underwriters, after a loss occurs whilst the ship is upon a voyage in breach of the warranty, duly accept abandonment, they will be estopped from setting up that there was no loss within the policy or the breach of warranty. (Priv. Co.) *The Provincial Insurance Company of Canada v. Leduc*page 338
49. Ship—Unseaworthiness—Sinking at moorings—Presumption—Evidence.—Where a ship, previously to all appearances staunch and sound, and recently thoroughly repaired, and a few days before examined without any defects being discoverable, sinks suddenly at her moorings when she has taken in five-sixths of her cargo, and no direct evidence can be given why she founders, and no cause assigned for her doing so, these facts raise a presumption of unseaworthiness which mere conjectures and suggestions of a cause cannot displace. But evidence of the ship's excellent conduct up to the time immediately preceding the loss, of extensive repairs recently done, of careful surveys recently made, and of the localisation of the injury, may be properly left to the jury on the questions as to seaworthiness and loss by a peril insured against, and is evidence on which they are justified in finding a loss by perils insured against, and they are not bound to find that she was unseaworthy. (C.P.) Anderson Morice 425
50. Ship—Warranty of seaworthiness—Subject matter of insurance.—The warranty of seaworthiness implied in a policy of marine insurance is to be considered with reference to each subject matter of insurance, and the ship can only be said to be seaworthy for the purposes of that warranty if it is seaworthy in respect of that subject-matter. (C.P.) Daniells v. Harris 413
51. Ship—Warranty of seaworthiness—Insurance on cargo—Effect of warranty—Destruction of cargo.—In a policy on cargo the implied warranty that the ship is seaworthy cannot be considered to contemplate the destruction, in order to save the ship on an ordinary voyage, of that very cargo which is the subject-matter of insurance. (C.P.) Id. 413
52. Ship—Warranty of seaworthiness—Insurance on cargo—Effect of warranty—Jettison of deck cargo.—Where a policy is effected on deck cargo it is not a compliance with the warranty of seaworthiness that the ship can, without danger to herself, should she encounter ordinary rough weather, be made seaworthy by the jettison of the deck cargo, which is the subject-matter of the insurance. (C.P.) Id. 413
53. Ship—Warranty of seaworthiness—Insurance on ship or under-deck cargo—Effect of warranty—Jettison of deck cargo.—Semble, that if the policy had been on the ship and under-deck cargo, and not on the deck cargo, the implied warranty of seaworthiness would have been satisfied by the safety of the ship and under-deck cargo, and would not have been affected by the peril to or loss of the deck cargo, provided that the latter, by reason of the facility with which it could have been got rid of would have caused no danger to the ship, or subject-matter of insurance. (C.P.) Id. 413
54. Ship—Policy—Stamp Act—Contract not enforceable unless stamped—Not divisible.—An underwriter's slip is a contract of marine insurance within the meaning of the Stamp Act 1870, and such a contract cannot be enforced unless expressed in a stamped policy, and the agreement on behalf of underwriters signing a slip is not an agreement divisible into two parts, the one to make a contract of marine insurance, and the other to prepare a policy in accordance with that contract, but is a whole agreement to insure, which can only be enforced against underwriters after being expressed in a stamped policy. MARINE INSURANCE ASSOCIATION.

1. Rules of—Power to expel member—Expulsion without hearing—Action against.—A mutual marine insurance association whose committee, by the rules, have absolute power to expel a member if they think his conduct suspicious, or that he is, for any other reason, unworthy of remaining in the society, cannot expel any member without hearing him, and giving him an opportunity of explaining his conduct, and any expulsion without a hearing is void; consequently an action will not lie against the committee for expelling a member without a hearing, he being still a member, and still entitled to enforce his rights in equity, and having sustained no legal damage. (Ex.) Wood v. Wood and others.....page 289
2. Rules of—Members—Shipowner not member paying contributions—Right to sue—Estoppel.—Where by the rules of a mutual marine insurance association no person can become a member, except by signing the articles; but a shipowner, having an equitable interest, and having transferred to him the legal interest in a ship, which has been insured in the association by its former owner, a member, pays the contributions claimed from him by the association, the latter are estopped from disputing the owner's interest in the policy and his right to sue on it, although he may not have complied with the rules as to membership. (Q.B.) Edwards v. Aberayron Mutual Shipping Insurance Society (Limited) ... 469
3. Rules of—Settlement of disputes—Arbitration—Appeal—Condition precedent.—Where such a society provides by its rules that disputes are to be settled by the directors, and that an appeal shall be to the whole society, and that no action, &c., should be brought for any claims on the society by its members, such appeal must be resorted to, and is a condition precedent to any action against the society by a member for the recovery of any loss, (Q.B.) Id...... 469
4. Rules of—Several insurance—Policies signed by managers—Specification of names of insurers.—Stamp act.—Where by the rules of a marine assurance association, members severally, and not jointly, insure each other's ships for one year from noon of any day named, and the members make annual contributions to meet the losses, any excess going to a reserve fund, the managers signing the policies for all members, and being authorised to issue special rate policies for less than a year to members, and the managers issue special rate policies to members signing them with the names "as joint managers per procuracy of the several members of the association for insuring each other's ships, every member bearing his equal proportion according to the sums mutually insured therein, excepting members paying special rates," such signatures to the policies are not valid within the meaning of sect. 7 of 30 Vict. c. 23, as they are not a specification of the names of the insurers, who are necessarily varying from time to time. (L. J. affirming M.R.) *Re Average Association, Ex parte Cory and Hawkesley*530, 570
5. Rules of—Special rate policies—Non-members—Ultra vires.—The issuing of special rate policies to non-members by the managers of such an association as above without authority by rule or otherwise is ultra vires. (L. J. affirming M.R.) Id......530, 570

MASTER'S WAGES AND DISBURSEMENTS.

1. Co-owners—Set-off—Counter-claim—Account—Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 191.—In a suit for wages and disbursements by a master, who is also co-owner, the other co-owners may, under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) s. 191, set up a counter claim or set-off in respect of outstanding co-ownership accounts, and claim that the balance (if any) be paid to them. (Adm.) *The City of Mobile*page 123
2. Co-owner—Set-off—Counterclaim—Account—Reference to registrar and merchant—Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 191—Pleading.—To a petition claiming master's wages and disbursements, and praying a reference of any accounts arising in respect thereto to the registrar and merchants, an answer alleging the master to be also co-owner, and that accounts are outstanding between the plaintiff and the defendants, as co-owners, showing a balance on all accounts in favour of the defendants, and praying a reference to the registrar and merchants of all master's and co-ownership accounts, will be allowed by the High Court of Admiralty. (Adm.) Id...... 123
3. Forfeiture of wages—Drunkenness in port.—Occasional drunkenness in port on the part of the master of a vessel will not, if unaccompanied with neglect of duty, work a forfeiture of wages. (Adm.) The Roebuck..... 387
4. Forfeiture of wages—Constant drunkenness.—Semble, that constant drunkenness on the part of a master, whether there be proof of neglect of duty or not, will work a forfeiture of either the whole or part of his wages, according to circumstances. (Adm.) Id...... 387
5. Forfeiture of wages—Disobedience to orders—Damage to ship—Ship worked against orders.—Where a master receives express orders from his owners as to the voyage which he is to make, and the ports to which he is to take the ship, and those orders are given under and with a view to a state of circumstances (political) out of which danger might arise to the ship, and which are known to and discussed by the master and owner at the time when they are given, the master is not justified, out of an alleged apprehension of that danger, in taking the ship on other voyages and to other ports; and if he does so take the ship, he will not be entitled to recover his wages for the time during which she is engaged against the owner's orders, even if the voyage is for the owners' benefit (Adm.) Id. 387
6. Forfeiture of wages—Desertion—What amounts to—Animus revertendi.—A master's wages may

SUBJECTS OF CASES.

- be forfeited by desertion, but there can be no absolute desertion of his ship working a forfeiture of the whole of his wages if there be an animus revertendi upon the part of the master. (Adm.) Id. page 387
7. Forfeiture of wages—Leaving ship for unreasonable time—Appointment of another master—Right to recover.—Where a master quits his ship and remains away for such a time and under such circumstances as leads his owners reasonably to suppose that he has no intention of returning, the owners will be justified in removing the vessel from the place where it is left, and appointing another master; and the original master will not be entitled to recover his wages for any period after the time when he so quitted the ship. (Adm.) Id. 387
8. Forfeiture of wages—Error of judgment—Negligence—Disobedience—No mala fides.—Where a master receives instructions to take the balance of freight due at the end of a voyage in cash, or by bank bill upon London, and, without sufficient inquiry, but without mala fides and rather through error of judgment, he takes a bill which he believes to be (but which is not) a bank bill, and which is afterwards dishonoured, causing loss to his owners, this negligence or disobedience, not being wilful, does not work a forfeiture of his wages, nor can the owners claim to deduct the amount of their loss from his wages. (Adm.) The Dunmore 509
9. Lien—Priority—Bottomry on ship freight and cargo—Marshalling assets.—Where a master has given a bottomry bond by which he has bound ship, cargo, and freight, and himself personally for the due execution of the bond, and the proceeds of the ship and freight alone are insufficient to satisfy both the bond and the master's claim for wages and disbursements, but the proceeds of ship, cargo, and freight will cover all, the High Court of Admiralty will marshal the assets, so that the master shall be paid in priority out of ship and freight, leaving the bondholders to fall back upon the cargo for the balance of their claim; the owners of cargo cannot take themselves out of the operation of this rule by becoming holders of the bond. The Edward Oliver (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 597) followed. (Adm.) The Eugenie 104
10. Lien—Priority—Bottomry bondholder—Master not personally bound.—Presuming a master to have a lien upon his ship for wages and disbursements, he is entitled to payment out of the proceeds of the ship in priority to a bottomry bondholder, provided that he, the master, has not personally bound himself by the bond. (U.S. Dist. Ct. East Dist. of N.Y.) The bark Irma ... 155
11. Practice—Admiralty Court—Costs—Detention money and board.—In calculating, on taxation of costs in a cause for the recovery of a master's wages, the amount due to the master for detention money and board whilst detained ashore as a witness, the fact that he through his wife carries on a business will not deprive him of his right to be allowed detention money; but if he lives at his place of business during his detention, the fact that he can live more cheaply at home than elsewhere is to be taken into consideration in fixing the amount to be allowed for subsistence money. NAVIGABLE RIVER.

1. Pier—Landing stage—Right to make—Local board—Admiralty.—By a local Act (27 & 28 Vict. c. cxvii.) the Wallasey Local Board are authorised for the purpose of their ferry between Liverpool and New Brighton, to make and maintain in accordance with certain deposited Parliamentary plans, a pier or landing stage at New Brighton, in the River Mersey, together with all such jetties,

- esplanades, landing places, and other works and conveniences in connection therewith as the local board shall from time to time think fit, provided they deposit with the Admiralty plans of the landing stage and works connected therewith, and the same be approved by the Admiralty and are constructed in accordance with such plans. Under this section the local board have the right (already exercised) to make and maintain at the end of a permanent fixed pier, erected in accordance with the Act, a floating landing-stage below low-water mark, and to moor the same permanently to the bed of the river by anchors, whether the same be within the deposited plans or not, provided it be approved by the Admiralty. (C.P.) Joliffe v. The Wallasey Local Board ... page 146
2. Pier—Landing stage—Erection without statutable authority—Nuisance—Obstruction.—Semble, that the erection in a navigable river, without statutory authority, of a floating landing stage, moored permanently by anchors fixed in the bed of the river, is a public nuisance and obstruction, which will entitle any one of the public using the river to recover against the erectors for any damage sustained therefrom. (C.P.) Id. 146
3. Pier—Landing stage—Authority by statute—Duty of makers—Due care.—Persons authorised by statute to place in a navigable river anything which is an obstruction to the navigation thereof, are bound to exercise their powers with due care, and if the obstruction is of a character to injure the property of the public, to prevent such injury as far as possible. (C.P.) Id. 146
4. Pier—Landing stage—Moorings—Anchors—Buoys—Damage.—Semble, that persons laying down anchors as permanent moorings of a floating landing stage in a navigable river are bound to mark the positions of the anchors by means of sufficient buoys attached thereto, and that the neglect thereof will render them liable for damage occasioned by the anchors. (C.P.) Id. 146
5. Obstruction—Nuisance—Right to place.—No person has a right to put an obstruction in a navigable river, although at the time it be not a nuisance. (M. R. & L. J.J.) Attorney-General v. Terry 174, 217
6. Obstruction—Nuisance—Benefit to trade of individual—Injunction.—If an obstruction erected in a navigable river is a nuisance to persons using and navigating the river, the mere fact that it is a benefit to the trade of a particular individual cannot be considered such a benefit to the public as will excuse the obstruction, and an injunction will be granted to abate it. (M. R. & L. J.J.) Id. 174, 217
7. Obstruction—Nuisance—Public benefit—Direct benefit.—The question whether erections made in a river or harbour are a nuisance or not depends on whether, upon the whole, they produce public benefit, not giving to the words "public benefit" too extended a sense, but applying them to the public frequenting the port. The benefit to the public must be a direct benefit. (M. R. & L. J.J.) Id. 174, 217
- NECESSARIES.
1. Lien—Material men—Home port—Attaching of lien—Arrest.—Semble, that the lien of material men for necessaries supplied to a ship in her home port—that is, their right to be paid out of the res—attaches only on the seizure of the ship under admiralty process. (U. S. Dist. Ct., East. Dist. of Wisc.) W. H. Wolf v. The Scow Selt ... 107
2. Lien—Material man—Necessary for voyage—Coppering.—Where it is necessary that a wooden ship bound upon a particular voyage should be coppered, the coppering is a "necessary for the voyage," which gives the material man doing the work to a foreign ship, upon the orders of the master, a maritime lien. (Adm.) The Turliani page 603
3. Lien—Priority—Advances of freight—Ship's disbursements.—An advance of freight to enable a master to pay his ship's disbursements before sailing does not give the charterer a claim against the ship, which will take precedence of the claim of a mortgagee; nor does an advance for a similar purpose made by an insurance company. (Adm.) The Turliani 603
4. Master's authority—Necessity—Absence of owner or authorized agent—Want of knowledge of presence of agent or owner.—The master of a ship has authority to pledge his owner's credit for money borrowed or for goods supplied by his (the master's) orders in a foreign port only where (1) it is necessary to borrow money for the prosecution of the enterprise, or the goods are reasonably necessary for the use of the ship; (2), where neither the owner or his duly authorised agent is at the port, nor within such distance that he can be reasonably expected to interfere. Want of knowledge of the presence of the owner or an agent on the part of the person supplying goods or money to a master will not entitle him to recover against the owner. (C. P.) Gunn v. Roberts 250

PRACTICE.

1. Appeal—County Court—Arrest by Admiralty Court.—Where plaintiffs appealed from a County Court in a cause in rem in which there has been a decree for the defendants and the ship has in consequence been released, the High Court of Admiralty will on the ex parte application of the plaintiffs order a warrant to issue for the detention of the ship till bail given or the appeal decided. Semble, that notice should be given before arrest to the defendants, so that they may come in and apply for the suspension of the warrant if they see fit. (Adm.) The Miriam 259

2. Appeal—County Court—Arrest by Admiralty Court.—In an appeal by plaintiffs from a County Court in a cause in rem, in which there was a decree for the defendants, and the ship had in consequence been released, the High Court of Admiralty, on an ex parte application of the plaintiffs, ordered a warrant to issue for the detention of the ship, and, as the ship proceeded against was a foreign one, did not require notice of the intention to arrest to be given to the defendants. (Adm.) The Freir page 589

3. Appeal—County Court—Judge's notes of evidence—Shorthand writer—Conflict.—In an appeal to the High Court of Admiralty from a County Court where there is a conflict between the transcript of the notes of evidence and judgment taken by a shorthand writer in the County Court under the County Court Rules No. 32, and the County Court Judge's own notes, the version given by the County Court Judge must be accepted as binding, and if the County Court Judge alter the shorthand writer's notes so as to correspond with his own version, the Court of Admiralty will order the alterations so made to be carried into effect in the printed copies of the appendix. (Adm.) The Raithwaite Hall 210

4. Appeal—Privy Council—Question undecided below.—Where the High Court of Admiralty has given no opinion on a question, which in the opinion of the Court of Appeal is a vital one in the cause, the Court of Appeal will decide that question on the evidence before them. (Priv. Co.) The C. M. Palmer; The Larnax 94

5. Arrest—Transfer from County Court—Arrest in High Court in other suits—Caveat to prevent release.—Where an admiralty cause, instituted in rem against a ship, has been transferred from a County Court to the High Court of Admiralty, and no bail has been given in either court, and the ship is already under the arrest of the High Court in other suits, the High Court will order the issue of a caveat to prevent her release, in case the other causes should be withdrawn. (Adm.) The Rio Lima 34

6. Arrest—Ship under arrest of High Court—Arrest by County Court—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts.—Semble, that where a ship is under the arrest of the High Court, and causes are also instituted in the County Court against the ship, she should not be arrested by the County Court, as it is not probable that the ship will be removed out of the Jurisdiction of the County Court without satisfaction of the plaintiff's several claims, within the meaning of the County Court's Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, sect. 22. (Adm.) The Turliani 603

7. Arrest—Ship under arrest in High Court—Arrest by County Court—Possession fees—Costs.—Where a ship, already under the arrest of the High Court of Admiralty, is arrested in an admiralty cause instituted in a County Court, the plaintiffs knowing of the previous arrest, and that cause is afterwards transferred to the High Court, the possession fees charged by the high bailiff in respect of the County Court arrest will not be allowed by the High Court upon taxation of plaintiff's costs. (Adm.) The Rio Lima 143

8. Discovery of documents—Affidavit required.—To obtain discovery of documents, the affidavit in support of the application must allege some one particular document to be in the possession of the party from whom discovery is sought. (Adm.) The Proceeds of the Cordelia 35

9. Inspection of documents—H. M. ships—Reports by captain and officers to Admiralty—Privilege.—Where a collision occurs between one of H. M.

SUBJECTS OF CASES.

- ships and a ship belonging to a private owner, and the captain of H. M. ship makes (in accordance with the usual practice) a report to the Lords of the Admiralty, the High Court of Admiralty will not, in a cause against the captain of H. M. ship, in which an appearance has been entered by the Queen's Proctor by order of the Lords of the Admiralty, order it to be produced for inspection by the opposita parties if the Secretary to the Lords of the Admiralty makes an affidavit to the effect that such production would be prejudicial to the public service. (Adm.) H.M.S. Bellerophon page 449
10. Necessaries—Wages—Transfer from County Court after decree—Reference to Registrar and Merchants.—Where causes of necessaries and wages had been instituted against a ship in the High Court, and other causes of necessaries in a County Court against the same ship, and the latter had been transferred after decree made to the High Court for the purpose of enforcing the decrees, the ship being under the arrest of the High Court, the latter court ordered all the causes to be referred to the registrar and merchants to report the amount due thereon. (Adm.) The Turliani 603
11. Notice of action—Local board—Public Health Act, 1848.—A local board authorised by a local Act to execute works out of their own district, the Act to be "executed subject to the powers and provisions" of the Public Health Act 1848, are entitled under sect. 139 of the latter Act to notice of action for anything done or intended to be done under the powers of the local Act. (C.P.) Jolliffe and another v. The Wallasey Local Board 146
12. Notice of action—Non-feasance—Misfeasance.—Notice of action must be given in a case of non-feasance, just as much as in a case of misfeasance under the Act. Id. 146
13. Outport—Agency—Charges—Separate bills of costs.—The practice, which has hitherto obtained in the High Court of Admiralty, of presenting separate bills of costs for the London proctor's own charges and for the outport or country agency charges, is now objectionable and must be discontinued for the future. (Adm.) The City of Brussels 102
14. Outport agency—Agent not solicitor—Not entitled to charge for solicitor's work.—Although a proctor may employ an agent, who is not an attorney or solicitor, to act as clerk pro hac vice for the purpose of collecting evidence in a cause, &c., in the outports, and may lawfully charge for the expenses incurred in respect of such agent as agency, charges made by such an agent for doing work which is essentially the work of a proctor, attorney, or solicitor such as "taking instructions for brief and drawing the same," &c., will not be allowed upon taxation. (Adm.) Id. 102
15. Particulars—Negligence—Collision.—Where the declaration in an action against the defendant for negligent navigation of his ship, causing injury to the plaintiff, contains only general allegations of negligence on the part of the defendant in respect of navigation, and of keeping the machinery and the ship in good repair, the court will not require the plaintiff to give particulars of matters which he may suppose to constitute the negligence of the defendant, because these matters are within the knowledge of the defendant and his servants, and not necessarily within the personal knowledge of the plaintiff. Contract abroad—Enforcement of in England.—Where an Englishman has entered into a contract abroad for the purchase of a ship then on her voyage to this country to be taken possession of by the purchaser immediately on delivery of the cargo at any place to which she might be ordered, the Court of Chancery has jurisdiction to enforce the contract, and for that purpose to issue an injunction to restrain the removal of the ship from the port of discharge, if within the jurisdiction. Where the vendor is abroad, substituted service of process upon the captain, the vendor's authorised agent in this country, in charge of the ship is sufficient. L.J.J.) Hart v. Herwig page 65

See Marine Insurance, No. 46.

SALVAGE.

1. Admiralty Court—Practice—Pleading—Salvor's expenses—Statement of amount.—Where in a salvage cause the plaintiff's petition states expenses to have been incurred in rendering the services without stating their amount, and the defendant's answer admits all the allegations of the petition, the High Court of Admiralty will not allow evidence to be called by the plaintiff to show the amount of the expenses. If specific amounts are claimed they must be pleaded so as to give the defendant the opportunity of admitting or denying them. (Adm.) The Eintracht..... page 198
2. Admiralty Court—Practice—Pleading—Statement of amount—Amendment.—Semble, that the court will, if necessary, amend the pleadings, allowing the plaintiffs to set forth the amounts, but giving the defendants time to admit or deny such amounts. (Adm.) Id...... 198
3. Admiralty Court—Practice—Pleading—Evidence.—Where, in a salvage suit the defendants admit all the allegations of fact in the plaintiff's petition, but deny the inferences of fact made therefrom in the petition, the plaintiffs may call evidence to establish those inferences. (Adm.) Id. 198
4. Admiralty Court—Practice—Pleading—Rival salvors—Allegations of misconduct—Answer.—Where in a cause of salvage against a derelict ship rival salvors institute separate causes and file separate petitions, alleging misconduct against one another, the Court of Admiralty will not allow the defendants, in their answer to the petition of one set of salvors, to plead that in the petition of the other set there are allegations of misconduct, and that they, for the purpose of the cause, and not otherwise, adopt those allegations; they must either make the allegations of misconduct as their own statements, or omit them. (Adm.) The Kathleen 367
5. Admiralty Court—Practice—Pleading—Rival salvors—Allegation of misconduct—Answers—Cross-examination.—Where rival salvors file separate petitions, alleging misconduct against each other, and the defendants in their separate answers repeat the charges of misconduct made by each salvor against the other, so that the answers are contradictory, the defendants will not be allowed, on the hearing of both causes at the same time, to cross-examine one set of salvors to show that they, and not the other set, have been guilty of misconduct. (Adm.) Id...... 367
6. Admiralty Court—Practice—Salvage bond—Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 448—Leave to proceed in High Court—County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, sect. 9.—As it is a matter of grave doubt whether the County Courts having admiralty jurisdiction have power to enforce salvage bonds given to Receiver of Wrecks under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 159) sect. 448, the High Court of Admiralty will, on the application of a salvor in respect of whose services such a bond has been given, grant leave to proceed in the High Court under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71) sect. 9. Semble, that even where leave is so given to proceed in the High Court, that court is not thereby precluded from condemning the plaintiff in costs, if at the hearing of the cause it should appear that the cause was improperly instituted in the court. (Adm.) The John Evans 234
7. Admiralty Court—Practice—Collision—Salvage suit—Right of wrongdoers to intervene—Bail.—Where a ship has been found to blame in a cause of collision, and a cause of salvage has been instituted against the other (the injured) ship, the owners of the ship found to blame have a right to intervene in the salvage cause to protect their own interest; and if they choose to put in bail to answer the claim of the salvors in lieu of the bail given by the owners of the injured vessel, the High Court of Admiralty will give them the conduct of the defence of the salvage suit; under such circumstances the owners of the injured vessel are entitled to have their bail released, and to be paid their costs up to the time when the new bail is put in. (Adm.) The Diana...page 366
8. Admiralty Court—Practice—Sale of cargo—Objection of shipowner—Carrying on cargo—Freight.—Where a ship and cargo are brought into port by salvors, and a suit is instituted in the High Court of Admiralty to recover salvage reward, that court will, on the application of the salvors, acting with the assent of the owners of the cargo, order a sale of the cargo to prevent deterioration from damage done, although the shipowner, desirous of carrying on the cargo so as to earn freight, opposes for sale, and offers to give substantial bail for both ship and cargo; but such sale will be ordered subject to all questions of right to freight. (Adm.) The Kathleen 367
9. Damage to salvaged ship—Gross negligence of salvor—Agreed reward—Right to recover.—A salvor whose ship succeeds in bringing an injured ship into safety, but in doing so inflicts damage upon her by coming into collision through negligence and want of proper navigation, which are gross but not wilful, is not thereby deprived of his right to a reward which has been agreed upon between the masters of the respective vessels. (Adm.) The C. S. Butler: The Baltic 237
10. Derelict—Ship ashore—Nature of service—Towage.—When an abandoned ship is found ashore on a shoal by two tugs which, while she is ashore are unable to render assistance, but, on her floating off with wind and tide, make safe and prevent her from going ashore again and take her to a place of safety, their service is salvage and not mere towage, nor is their service diminished in value by the proximity of a third tug, which could, but did not, render any assistance. (U. S. Distr. Ct.; East Distr. of N. Y.) The Puritan 548
11. Derelict—Taking off master and crew—Returning to render assistance to ship—No actual service—Right to reward.—Where the master and crew of a ship in distress are taken off by a steam tug (there being no immediate danger to life), and are taken ashore by the tug, which afterwards returns to the ship with her master and finds her placed in safety by other salvors, that tug has no claim for salvage reward. (U. S. Distr. Ct.; East. Distr. of N. Y.) Id. 548
12. Life salvage—Crew leaving ship without orders—Ship in danger—Crew imperilled—Right to recover against ship.—Where some of a ship's crew leave their ship shortly after a collision at sea in consequence of her dangerous condition, not against her masters order's but without orders and without his consent, and are picked up and rescued from a dangerous position by another vessel, the owners, masters, and crew of the latter as salvors of life within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (12 and 18 Vict. c. 104), sect. 458, and the Admiralty Court Act, 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), sect. 9, may recover reward against the ship. Semble, that if a crew deserted their ship without reason and contrary to orders, and afterwards found themselves in a position of danger from which they were rescued, the ship would not be liable for salvage reward. (Adm.) The Cairo..... 257

13. Misconduct of salvors—Dispossessing first salvors—Right to the amount awarded.—If first salvors lawfully in possession of a derelict ship are wrongfully and violently dispossessed by second salvors, who succeed in bringing the ship into safety, the second salvors will receive no benefit from the service they may render, but the whole reward will go to the benefit of the original salvors. (Adm.) *The Kathleen*page 367
14. Quantum—Appeal—Practice—Reduction of award.—The Judicial Committee will not reduce an award of the High Court of Admiralty in a cause of salvage, unless the amount awarded is so exorbitant and so manifestly excessive that it would be unjust to confirm it. (P. C.) The Amerique ... 460
15. Quantum—How estimated—Value of property salvaged—Services.—The value of property salvaged is to some extent to be treated as an ingredient in the calculation of the quantum of salvage remuneration, but that value must not be allowed to raise the quantum to an amount altogether out of proportion to the services actually rendered. (P.C.) Id. 460
16. Quantum—Value of salvaged property—Services.—An award of £30,000 on a value of £190,000 in the case of a derelict ship reduced to £18,000 on the ground that the reward was out of proportion to the services rendered. (P.C.) Id...... 46
17. Signal—Ambiguous—Construction of—Condition of vessel—Right to reward.—Where a vessel makes an ambiguous signal, it will be construed by the Court of Admiralty according to the condition of the vessel when boarded; if she is damaged and is in need of assistance, the signal will be treated as a signal for assistance, and those answering it as salvors; if she is not damaged and wants only a pilot, the signal will be treated as a signal for a pilot only. (Adm.) The Racer 317
18. Signal of distress—Vessel going out in answer—Unsuccessful services—Right to reward.—Where a vessel makes a signal of distress, and another goes out with the bonâ fide intention of assisting that distress, and as far as she can does so, but some accident occurs which prevents her services being as effectual as she intended them to be, and no blame attaches to her, the Court of Admiralty will not allow her to go entirely unrewarded, but for the interests of commerce and navigation, and as an encouragement to perform salvage services, will give some reward (semble) if the property is salvaged by other means. (Adm.) The Melpomene 122
19. Termination of service—Ship in safety—Lying alongside.—Where a steam tug is engaged to render assistance to a ship aground in the night time, and succeeds in getting her off, and takes her to a safe anchorage for the night, and lies alongside of her till morning, the salvage service does not end on the ship being anchored, but the steam-tug is entitled to reward for the time she lies alongside the ship ready to render further assistance if required. (Adm.) The Philotaxe... 141
20. Uncompleted service—Stopped by accident—Efforts not renewed through act of ship in distress—Right to reward.—Where a steamship has been engaged to render assistance to another in distress by towing her to a place of safety, and after several hours' towing, the ships are parted by no fault of the salvor, and the conduct of the ship in distress leads the salvor to the honest belief that his services are no longer required, and thereupon the latter proceeds to his own destination, he is not thereby deprived of his right to salvage reward, but upon the other vessel arriving safe in port by her own exertions, may proceed against her in respect of the services actually rendered. (Adm.) The Nellie 142
21. Uncompleted service—Towage in track of vessels—Abandonment—Right to reward—Life salvage.—Where a steamship having taken in tow a vessel in distress, and towed her for some hours in the track of vessels, on the weather getting worse and the lives of her crew becoming endangered, takes the crew out of her and finally abandons her in a place where she is afterwards picked up by another vessel and taken into port, the owners, master, and crew of the steamship are entitled to salvage reward in respect of the lives so saved, but not in respect of ship and cargo. SHIPBUILDING CONTRACT.

Lien—Payment by bills—Discounted by bankers—Their right on bankruptcy of shipowner.—Where a shipbuilder contracts to build a ship for a merchant, the money to be paid in instalments as the building progressed, partly in cash and partly in bills, and from the time of the payment of the first instalment the ship to become the property of the merchant to the extent of the advances, subject to the builder's lien for unpaid instalments, and the merchant gives his bills of exchange for the instalments up to a certain period, and these bills containing the words "for value received in iron screw steamer now building," are discounted in the ordinary way by bankers; these bankers acquire no lien on the ship in respect of the amount advanced by them on the bills, and in the event of the bankruptcy of the shipbuilder and the merchant and the abandonment of the contract by the merchant, cannot enforce their claim against the ship. tion of passengers or crew within sub-sect. 4 of the same Act, should not be reckoned in estimating her tonnage. (H. of L.) The Lord Advocate v. The Clyde Steam Navigation Company.....page 502

TOTAL LOSS.

See Marine Insurance, Nos. 5, 9, 19, 20, 21, 23, 38.

TOWAGE.

1. Damage to tow—Liability of tug—Contract of tug.—Whenever a tug contracts to tow another vessel from one place to another under such circumstances that the tug has the sole control over the navigation and time of the voyage, and the tow is subject to the directions of the tug, the tug is a bailee of the tow for hire, and her duties are those of a private carrier for hire, and she is bound to exercise ordinary skill and prudence in the fulfilment of her contract, and the tug will be responsible to the tow for any injury arising to the latter by the want of any such skill and prudence on the part of the tug. (U. S. Dist. Ct., Dist. of Oregon). The Merrimac 383
 2. Damage to tow—Negligence of tug—Liability of tug—Want of skill of crew of tow—Sudden emergency.—Where a tug negligently places a tow in a peril by which the latter is lost, it is no excuse that the tow might have been saved but for a mistake or a want of skill in the crew of the latter in bending a tow line on a dangerous and sudden emergency, or for the want of extraordinary ground tackle. (U. S. Dist. Ct., Dist. Oregon) Id 383
 3. Damage to tow—Collision—Tow in distress—Taking off crew—Liability for damage.—Where a tow has parted from the tug and gone adrift, and is in great peril, and the latter, at the request of the crew of the former, attempts to take them off, and in so doing collides with the tow and sinks her, the tug will not be responsible for such collision unless occasioned by gross carelessness on the part of the tug. WAGES.

1. Admiralty court—Foreign seamen—Jurisdiction—Voyage broken up—Seamen discharged by master.—A court of admiralty will not decline jurisdiction of a suit by foreign seamen against a foreign vessel to recover wages, where it appears that the voyage has been completed or broken up, or the seamen have been discharged by the wrongful act of the master. (U. S. Dist. Ct., Dist. of Oregon.) *The Hermine*page 380
2. Admiralty court—Foreign seamen—Jurisdiction—Discharge before expiration of voyage—Wages unpaid.—Sembles, that the court will not decline jurisdiction where it appears the seamen have been discharged with their own consent before the expiration of the voyage, without the payment of wages already earned, or any agreement or understanding concerning them. (U. S. Dist. Ct., Dist. of Oregon.) Id. 380
3. Desertion—Duty of seamen to stay by vessel—Knowledge of master—Ship put to expense—Set-off against wages.—A seaman is bound to stay by the vessel according to his agreement, whether the master takes any means to compel him to do so or not, and, therefore, where seamen leave a vessel before the completion of the voyage, although with the knowledge of the master, and upon his promise that they should not be arrested therefore, but without his consent, they are guilty of desertion; and if, by their breach of contract, the ship is put to greater expense than their wages amount to, they can recover nothing. (U. S. Dist. Ct., Dist. of Oregon.) The Hermine 380

4. Inequitable contract—Setting aside—Voyage incomplete.—Contracts with seamen upon a discharge before completion of voyage concerning wages already earned, will be set aside or disregarded by Court of Admiralty if inequitable. (U. S. Dist. Ct., Dist. of Oregon.) *The Hermine*page 380
5. Practice—Admiralty Court—Security for costs.—Where a cause of wages was instituted against a foreign ship by her master and crew, who were also foreigners, and it appeared that although they were at the time in this country, their only place of residence there was on board the ship, and that the master had stated that he had no means and intended to leave England, the High Court of Admiralty ordered the plaintiffs to give a security for costs in the sum of 130l. (Adm.) The Zufall 587
6. Shipping articles—Extent of voyage—How to be expressed—Merchant Shipping Act 1873, sect. 7.—The provision of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 85), s. 7, that agreements with seamen need only state the maximum period of the voyage or engagement and the places or parts of the world to which the voyage is not to extend, is sufficiently complied with if the shipping articles state the places to which the voyage may extend, as that is an implied agreement that the voyage shall not extend to any other places. (U. S. Dist. Ct., Dist. of Oregon.) The Hermine 380
