THE BOUGAINVILLE v. THE JAMES C. STEVENSON.

[PRIV. CO.]

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

April 23 and 24, 1873.

(Present: The Right Hons. Sir JAMES W. COLVILLE, SIR R. PHILLIMORE, SIR MONTAGUE E. SMITH,
SIR R. P. COLLIER.)

THE BOUGAINVILLE v. THE JAMES C. STEVENSON.

Collision — Sailing ship — Steamer — Duty of—Lights—Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea, Articles 15 and 16.

When a steamer sights a sailing vessel in the night time at a distance of three miles, but, owing to the fact that the sailing vessel's lights are not visible, cannot ascertain the course of the sailing vessel, it is the duty of the steamer to slacken speed and wait to ascertain that course before adopting any decided manœuvre for the purpose of avoiding the sailing vessel. If the steamer immediately on sighting the sailing vessel adopts such a manœuvre, as by porting, and a collision ensue without fault on the part of the sailing vessel, the steamer is alone to blame.

THESE were cross appeals from an interlocutory degree or sentence of the Vice-Admiralty Court of Gibraltar, in a consolidated cause of damage brought by and on behalf of the master and the owner of the British steamship James C. Stevenson against the French barque Bougainville and her freight, for the recovery of damages in respect of losses sustained by the owner, by reason of a collision between the two vessels; and by and on behalf of the master and the owners of the barque Bougainville, against the steamship James C. Stevenson and her freight to recover damages in respect of the same collision.

The collision occurred between 11 and 12 on the night of 29th March 1872 in the Straits of Gibraltar.

The case on the part of the James C. Stevenson was that she was proceeding under steam, steering about due W., with her masthead and side lights exhibited and burning brightly, and with a fresh wind blowing from the southward, when a vessel under sail, which proved to be the Bougainville, was seen ahead at the distance of about three miles. The Bougainville was apparently approaching in an opposite direction, but no light could then be seen on her. The helm of the James C.

Stevenson was ported in order to keep her out of the way of the Bougainville, and the Bougainville still appearing to be standing towards the James C. Stevenson, the helm of the James C. Stevenson was put hard a-port, and the green light of the Bougainville was then for the first time seen. The engines of the Bougainville were stopped, but a collision occurred, the stem of the Bougainville striking the James C. Stevenson on the port bow.

The main grounds of blame charged by the owner of the James C. Stevenson against the Bougainville were, that the lights of the latter were not so exhibited and placed as to be visible to the James C. Stevenson, and that she (the Bougainville) improperly deviated from her course under a star-board helm.

The case on behalf of the Bougainville was that she was passing through the Straits of Gibraltar on a voyage from Coromandel coast to Marseilles on the night of the 29th March 1872, with a crew of sixteen hands all told. At about 11:35 p.m. of the said 29th March, the wind being west and by south, and the weather squally and obscure at times, the Bougainville was proceeding through the Straits, steering her proper course, east by north by compass, with her regulation lights properly placed and brightly burning, when the masthead light of a steamer was reported about two points on her starboard bow, and appearing to be about three miles distant. The barque proceeded on her course, and shortly afterwards the red lights of the steamer became visible, and she came on at right angles to her original course and immediately across the bows of the barque by first porting and afterwards hard porting her helm, and a collision thereby becoming inevitable; the helm of the barque was put hard a-starboard to deaden the force of the collision, which immediately took place with tremendous force, the iron stem and part of the bow of the barque striking the port-bow of the steamer in a slanting direction, from aft to forward, about eleven feet abaft the stem.

On the part of the owners of the Bougainville, it was submitted that the evidence showed that her lights were, before and at the time of the collision, properly placed and brightly burning, in accordance with the maritime regulations in regard to the lights directed to be carried by sailing vessels, and that her duty was to keep her course, which she did, until she put her helm hard-a-starboard to ease the blow of the collision, and that the duty of the steamer was to have kept clear of her, which although she might easily have done, she failed to do.

The learned judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court held both vessels to blame; the Bougainville, because her lights did not give a uniform and unbroken light over an arc of the horizon of ten points from the stern to two points abaft the beam as required by Articles 3 and 5 of the Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea, which contributed to the collision; and because she neglected to keep her course; the James C. Stevenson, because she did not make use of the means in her pocket for keeping out of the way of the Bougainville, which means were sufficient and would have accomplished that object, and would have been resorted to by a man of ordinary nautical experience and prudence, as he was bound on ascertaining the Bougainville to be a sailing ship to have slackened speed or stopped, or taken other means to keep out of the way, and the neglect to do so was a breach of Articles 15 and 16 of the Regulations.

From this decree the owners of both vessels appealed; the owners of the James C. Stevenson on the ground that she had by porting her helm done all that was necessary to keep out of the way of the Bougainville within Article 15; that she was not bound to stop and reverse, and that if she took any erroneous measure, it was owing to the want of lights on board the Bougainville;—the owners of the Bougainville on the ground that the evidence showed that her lights were properly placed, and that she kept her course after sighting the steamer until immediately before the collision.

The facts and arguments are fully set out in the judgment of the Judicial Committee.

Milward Q. C. and Clarkson for the owners of the James C. Stevenson.

The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q. C.) and Dr. Tristram for the owners of the Bougainville.

April 24.—The judgment of the Court was delivered by Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is an appeal from the decision of the judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court at Gibraltar in a case of collision between a steamer and a sailing vessel. The collision took place in the Straits of Gibraltar, according to the best conclusion their Lordships can come to from the evidence, somewhere about 8½ miles east of Tarifa. The nature of the damage was this: The sailing vessel ran into the steamer at right angles 10 feet abaft the stem. The consequences of the collision were very serious to both vessels, both being obliged to put into Gibraltar on account of the damage they received. The learned judge of the court below found, upon the evidence, that both the vessels were to blame, and he made the usual decree. From that decree appeals have been prosecuted to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council by both parties.

It will be convenient before stating the conclusions at which their Lordships have arrived, to notice in the first instance the case of the steamer who appeared as the first plaintiff here, and also in the court below. She was called the James C. Stevenson. She was a screw steamer of 1226 tons, and 250 horse power, and was sailing from Calcutta with a general cargo for London. She passed through the Suez Canal and arrived at the entrance of the Straits of Gibraltar on the night of the 29th March. She says, that at forty minutes past eleven on that night, being eight miles from Tarifa light, which bore W. by N., and steering W., and the wind, which was squally, being W. inclining to S., the night being clear but cloudy (it is not immaterial to observe this), and proceeding at the rate of 8½ knots an hour; while so proceeding a sail was reported right ahead, distant about three miles, apparently coming end on; but she says no lights were visible. The course which she pursued was immediately to port, and she appears from the evidence to have hard-a-ported almost directly afterwards, by which she fell, before the collision took place, seven points off from her original course. It is important to observe here that there is no dispute at all that those on board the steamer were perfectly aware that the vessel right ahead of them was a sailing ship, and as the learned judge of the court below remarked, they must have known perfectly well that she was coming directly through the Straits with the wind directly aft. It is also important to observe that the captain of the steamer entirely misapprehended the existing regulation with respect to his duty in such circumstances. He says in his evidence, "I think that it was the duty of the other vessel, although a sailing vessel and myself a steamer, to have ported her helm, because she was running free, and it is the rule of the road; and I say that, although we were meeting each other stem on. It would be quite different if she had been close hauled." It is hardly necessary to state that this opinion of the captain of the steamer is directly at variance with the existing regulation of Article 15, viz., that if two ships, one of which is a sailing ship and the other a steamship; are proceeding in such directions as to involve risk of collision, the steamship shall keep out of the way of the sailing ship. The steamer ascribes this collision to two circumstances; first, to the invisibility (if I may use such an expression) of the lights on board the sailing vessel—it not being disputed that she carried lights—their invisibility resulting from their improper position; and also to the sailing vessel having starboarded instead of keeping her course. That is the case, stated briefly, on behalf of the steamer.

The case on behalf of the sailing vessel may be also stated in a few words. She was a French iron barque of very large tonnage, and was coming from the Cape of Good Hope to Marseilles. She says that on this night, when she was due south of Europa Light, and midway between it and Ceuta Light, she saw the white light of a steamer, which proved to be the James C. Stevenson, two points on the starboard bow, and distant about three miles. Both vessels agree in putting the distance at which they were mutually discerned at about three miles. She says the wind was W.S.W., one point on the starboard quarter, and her head was E. by N. Then she gives an account of her sails. She says she had her courses, fore and maintop-sails, maintop-gallant sails, and two gibs set, the starboard clew of the mainsail being hauled up. She gives the same account of the night that the other vessel does. She says that the white light of the James C. Stevenson was discovered at 11:35, and that she was supposed to be steering west; that shortly afterwards the red light of the James C. Stevenson was observed, that her course was not discovered by those on board the sailing vessel until the steamer was seen at about 300 yards distant. Then she says that the Bougainville had hitherto been kept on her course supposing that the steamer would keep out of her way, but upon the hull of the James C. Stevenson being discovered, and it being found that she was coming on at right angles towards the bows of the Bougainville, and it being then evident that a collision was inevitable, the helm of the Bougainville, was put hard to starboard, but the Bougainville only fell off one point before the collision. Now she on her part ascribes the collision to these three circumstances, that is by her pleading and by the argument of her counsel. She says that the collision was caused by the rash and improper conduct of the steamer in not waiting to ascertain what course the sailing vessel was taking; she says that the steamer ought at all events to have reversed her engines, which would have been one mode of preventing the collision; and lastly, the ship says that if the steamer did not choose to wait, she ought in the first instance to have starboarded instead of ported.

In considering this case, it will, I think, be convenient to assume in the first instance that the lights were not visible. On that assumption what, according to the 15th Article, was the clear duty of the steamer? It was to get out of the way of the sailing vessel. What getting out of the way is must depend, of course, on the circumstances of each particular case. It may be by porting, it may be by starboarding it may be by stopping. But according to her own version of the story, the steamer was aware that the sailing vessel was coming directly through the Straits with the wind directly aft, but she says that owing to the absence of her lights she had no indication of what course the sailing vessel was pursuing. That vessel was going at the rate of $8\frac{1}{2}$ or 9 knots an hour, and their joint speed must have been something like 17 or 18 knots. Being, as she says, in uncertainty as to the course the sailing vessel was steering, it was surely not the part of a prudent master immediately to take the active and decided step of porting, at the rate which she was then going, of between eight and nine knots an hour, which would carry her to the opposite coast across the bows of the ship. If she was in doubt as to the course of the vessel approaching her, as she says, stem on, or a little upon a starboard bow, and as the evidence in their Lordships' opinion seems to prove rather more than that, between one and two points on her starboard bow, surely it was the part of a prudent master to have waited until he could ascertain which course the sailing vessel was pursuing. The 16th Article seems to be precise upon this point. "Every steamship when approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision, shall slacken her speed." There is no reason why she should conceive that the ship was going to the Moorish side of the Strait, although some suggestions were made to that effect. In their Lordships' opinion, therefore, the judge came to a perfectly sound conclusion upon this part of the case, that is in holding that upon the steamer's own statement, upon the assumption that the lights were not visible owing to their improper position, nevertheless, she sinned against the rules of navigation laid down for preventing these unfortunate collisions by not slackening her speed, or waiting, or taking any of those precautions which would have enabled her before she took the decided step of porting to ascertain on what side the sailing vessel was going. It is not necessary, in their Lordships' opinion, therefore, to inquire whether it would have been a prudent course on her part, if she elected not to wait, to have starboarded instead of porting, by which manœuvre she cut in between the ship and the lee shore at the rate of seven knots an hour. Their Lordships think that the finding of the learned judge on this part was perfectly correct, and will advise her Majesty that it be affirmed.

There then remains the other part of the case, upon which the greater part of the argument has been addressed to their Lordships, namely, as to whether, in the circumstances of this case, it must not be held that the conduct of the sailing ship contributed to the collision? First, as to the contribution of the collision, which is said to have been made by the absence of the proper lights, that is to say, by the lights not being placed in a position in which they were visible. The law does not require any particular place at which the lights should be affixed; though no doubt it does require that they should be so placed as to be properly visible within the scope of the regulations upon that point; but no particular place is pointed out. The evidence in this case establishes these points with regard to the lights, first, that they were carried, and secondly, that they were proper lights, properly screened; and their Lordships incline to the opinion that it also is proved that they were carried in the place in which they were usually carried by French vessels. There has been considerable discussion upon the evidence as to whether the testimony of the master of the ship be credible with regard to the cutting or arching of the foresail, which, according to his evidence, to which he was not cross-examined, and according to the evidence of another witness, was expressly done for the purpose of rendering these lights visible. The vessel was a very large ship, and she had come all the way from Calcutta, and the presumption is in favour of her statement as to the lights. It may here be observed that if the allegation were correct on the part of the steamer, that the sailing ship had contravened the rule of navigation in not keeping her course, but in starboarding, it is quite clear that that position is fatal to the other contention that her green light was not visible, because, if the sailing vessel had starboarded earlier than she said she did, unquestionably, by that manœuvre, she must have shown her green light, which it is proved was carried, and which it is proved was of proper quality. She must have shown her green light to the approaching steamer, and have given her that information of which she complains that she was deprived. The learned judge of the court below seems, on the whole, to have come to the conclusion that there was a deficit probatio, upon this particular and material point, that it was incumbent upon the sailing vessel to have proved by more conclusive evidence than she adduced, that these lights so placed in the stern of the vessel were visible by the circumstance that the foresail was cut or arched in the manner described. The learned judge seems to have come to the conclusion that there was not sufficient evidence to warrant him in thinking that this point was established, and therefore to have decided on that ground principally that the ship contributed to this collision. Their Lordships do not think it necessary to express any opinion as to the conclusion at which they might have arrived if this particular matter had come before them as a court of first instance, whether they would or would not have been satisfied with the evidence which was produced on behalf of the sailing vessel to the effect already stated, because their Lordships are clearly of opinion, after consulting with their nautical assessors, and after a review of the whole circumstances of this case, that the sailing vessel coming through the strait with the wind, as described, was perfectly and clearly seen at a distance of three miles as stated by the steamer, but at all events between two and three miles; that upon the assumption that the lights were not visible, it was still the duty of the steamer not to take that decided course which she did take, in perfect ignorance, according to her own statement, as to which way the sailing vessel was proceeding; that it was very imprudent, rash, and careless navigation, and was the real cause of this collision; and even assuming that the lights were placed in a wrong position, and therefore were not visible, their Lordships are of opinion, upon the particular circumstances of this case, that it would not be right to come to the conclusion, that the invisibility of those lights could, in any legal sense of the term, and according to the judgments upon the question of contribution to negligence, properly be said to have contributed to this collision.

THE ADA; THE SAPHO.

Their Lordships have not failed to consider the point which was urged on behalf of the steamer, that the starboarding of the sailing vessel might have contributed to this collision. Their Lordships are clearly of opinion upon the evidence that the starboarding was done at so late a period as to take it completely out of the category of any contribution to the collision; indeed if the starboarding had been at an earlier period it is fatal to the contention of the steamer, that she was not apprised by seeing the green light of the course which the other vessel was pursuing; because the dilemma is obvious; if the starboarding took place at an earlier period, then the green light, which is proved to have been there, must have been seen; if the starboarding took place, as we are inclined to suppose, at a later period, then there was no contribution to the collision by that manœuvre at that late period in the history of the case.

Their Lordships will therefore humbly advise her Majesty that the decree of the judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court should be varied so as to pronounce that the steamer is alone to blame for this collision. We think that the costs must follow this decision, and that the sailing vessel will be entitled to her costs both here and in the court below.

Decree varied accordingly.

THE ADA; THE SAPHO.

Collision—Crossing vessels—Taking pilot—Special circumstances—Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea—Arts. 14, 16, and 19.

Two vessels bearing down at the same time from different directions upon a well-known pilot station to take pilots on board are to be treated as crossing vessels within the meaning of Art. 14 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, if their courses, if continued, would intersect; and the fact of their seeking pilots at the same place is not such a special circumstance within the meaning of Art. 19 as will take them out of the operation of the rule requiring that the ship which has the other on her own starboard hand shall keep out of the way of the other.

Where a vessel is approaching a pilot station to take a pilot, and has, as regards another vessel doing the same thing, the right to keep her course, she has a right to keep sufficient headway on her to give her steerage way, so as to get on her proper course after taking a pilot, and is not bound within Art. 16 to stop and reverse. The other vessel is bound to stop and let her take her pilot, or to take some other means of avoiding her.

THIS was an appeal from a decree of the High Court of Admiralty in cross causes of collision, instituted by the owners of the steamship Sappho against the steamship Ada, and by the owners of the Ada against the Sappho. The place of collision was the mouth of the Humber; both vessels were bound for Hull, the Ada coming from the south-east, and the Sappho from the north-east, and both were approaching a pilot cutter lying at anchor to pick up a pilot. The learned judge of the High Court of Admiralty held that the vessels were to be treated as crossing vessels under Art. 14 of the Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea, and that the fact of approaching a well-known pilot station was not such a special circumstance as took them out of the operation of the rule, and that the Ada having the Sappho on her own starboard hand, was bound to keep out of the way, and that the speed of the Sappho was not improper, and pronounced the Ada alone to blame. The facts and judgment are set out in the report of the case below: (ante vol. 1, p. 485; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 718.) From this decree the owners of the Ada appealed on the ground that the Ada having the right to approach the pilot cutter to take a pilot, also had a right to expect that the Sappho would be navigated as to avoid risk of collision under the special circumstances of the case.

Milward, Q.C. and W. G. F. Phillimore, for the appellants.—The master of the Sappho, seeing a ship there for the lawful purpose of taking on board a pilot, was bound to allow that ship to approach for that purpose, and to take steps to avoid her whilst getting a pilot. If the Ada was stopped and lying to for a pilot, the vessels were not crossing vessels within the meaning of Art. 14 of the Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea. At any rate such a state of things was a special circumstance within Art. 19, which ought to have obliged them not to throw all responsibility of avoiding a collision upon the Ada. These vessels were not on a course in the sense of Art. 14. The way a ship's head is pointed at any given moment does not constitute her course; her course is the direction in which she should be navigated to reach a given point. If this given point is known to another vessel, she should act upon that knowledge. Both vessels were bound up the river to Hull, and each must, with the knowledge of the other, take a pilot at the one place; for that purpose they must bear down upon one place and stop, and, having got their pilot, change their directions to proceed up the river. Hence, neither could be said to be on a course after stopping, until they went a-head to go up the river. The Ada was entitled to keep her course along the left bank of the river, and the Sappho in crossing over had no right to interfere with that course: (The Velocity, L. Rep. 3 P. C. 44; 21 L. T. Rep. 686; 3 Mar. Law. Cas. O. S. 308). If these vessels were approaching each other so as to involve risk of collision, then it was the duty of the Sappho to have stopped and reversed at an earlier period.

THE ADA; THE SAPPHO.

Butt, Q.C. and Clarkson, for the respondents, were not called upon.

The judgement of the court was delivered by SIR J. W. COLVILLE—Their Lordships do not think it necessary to go at any length into the facts of the case, as they clearly appear upon the judgement of the court below, and the main features are not in dispute.

The first argument upon which the appellants rely in order to disturb the judgment of the High Court of Admiralty is that it is erroneous to treat these vessels as crossing vessels, as they were not, when they first sighted each other, crossing vessels so as to involve risk of collision, and consequently not within Art. 14 of the Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea; and that even if they did become crossing vessels it was by the fault of the Sappho, which had by improper navigation created the state of things. Upon that view, of course, it would be the duty of their Lordships, provided they were satisfied that it was correct, to advise Her Majesty that the Sappho was solely to blame. The other branch of the argument was that both vessels were within the operation of Art. 16 of the regulations; that they were approaching each other so as to involve risk of collision, and that it was, therefore, the duty of each to slacken speed, and if necessary, to stop and reverse; that the Sappho certainly, and perhaps the Ada, had failed in that duty, and both were to blame. If both failed in that duty, and the breach of that duty was the cause of the collision, then, of course, both would be in fault, and the loss would have to be divided.

In dealing with these arguments, their Lordships think it desirable to consider whether the vessels were crossing vessels within the meaning of the 14th Article, and, consequent thereon, if the assumption which seems to have been the ratio decidendi in the court below was correct. Their Lordships are of opinion that it was correct. It appears that both vessels, the one coming from the northward, the other from the southward, and both bound to Kingston-upon Hull, were under the necessity of proceeding to the same point where the pilot vessel was moored. It appears to their Lordships on the evidence that when first sighted the Ada had the other vessel on the starboard bow, and therefore if they were crossing vessels, it was her duty to keep out of the way of the Sappho. Now, their Lordships think that they were crossing vessels within the meaning of the rule, because both were of necessity directing their courses to one point. That point would be the point of intersection of the two courses if prolonged. It was not, as was put in the argument, a case in which one vessel might have proceeded up the north side and the other up the south side of the river, because there was the necessity imposed upon each of going to this one point in order to procure a pilot. It appears to their Lordships that the vessels were properly treated by the learned judge in the court below as falling within Art. 14 of the regulations, and it appears equally clear that the learned judge was right in holding that the Ada had failed in the duty imposed upon her by that rule, and that there were no special circumstances taking her out of the operation of the rule.

In dealing with the disputed question of speed, the learned judge relied upon the captain of the pilot vessel, who was on board his own pilot vessel. As regards the speed of the two vessels, it appears to their Lordships that he was in the best position to judge—more particularly with regard to the Sappho's speed. Standing on the deck of his own vessel at anchor, and evidently having his attention directed to the movements of the two vessels, he could best judge of their speed, and their Lordships therefore adopt without hesitation his statement that the speed of the Sappho was $1\frac{1}{2}$ knots through the water, and therefore about three knots per hour over the ground. It also appears to their Lordships to be made out by that witness that the Ada was not motionless (as represented by some of the witnesses) at the place where she stopped expecting a pilot, but she had decided headway on her, and was approaching both the Sappho and the pilot cutter. The rate of speed attributed to her was nearly as great as that of the Sappho, namely, $1\frac{1}{2}$ knots through the water, but she was coming across the tide.

Now, it appears to their Lordships that upon this state of facts two questions arise: first, was the Sappho justified in getting so far past the pilot cutter as she certainly did, as shown by the place where the collision occurred; and, secondly, was the Ada right in advancing so near to the pilot cutter, or in fact in going ahead at all under the circumstances? As regards the first question, their Lordships are of opinion, and their opinion is confirmed by that of their nautical assessors, that if there had been no question at all of another ship, which is the fair way to treat the matter, it would have been the ordinary and proper course of navigation to keep such headway as she is represented to have had in order to enable her in getting a pilot on board to turn and follow the proper course of the river up to Hull; that is, having come as far over as the place where the pilot cutter is represented to have been moored, to turn up towards the Spurm Light, so as to get into the proper course of navigation; and that in fact both vessels, situated as they were, would have had to follow the same course up the river from that point. Their Lordships, therefore, cannot say that the allegation is made out that the Sappho improperly threw herself into the way of the other vessel, and in fact created the risk of collision which otherwise would not have existed. On the other hand, if the vessels were crossing vessels, as their Lordships think they were, and, as their Lordships also think, and the event has shown, vessels crossing 'so as to involve risk of collision, it seems to their Lordships that it was the duty of the Ada to have become absolutely motionless at a far earlier period than that at which she is said by some of the witnesses to have stopped, and this when it did, or ought to have, become clear that the Sappho was coming inside the pilot vessel, and therefore would be the first to take the pilot, to have had the means of reversing her engines, and keeping out of the way. If she could not have done that, and their Lordships can see no reason why she could not, then she ought to have been navigated differently, and have been kept out of the way by some other means. No doubt both vessels at the last moment, and when too late, did reverse their engines, but that does not show, in their Lordships' opinion, any contributory negligence on the part of the Sappho, if she was pursuing, as their Lordships think she was, her ordinary course, keeping no more headway on her than was necessary to give her steerage way enough to put her upon her proper course of navigation.

Under the circumstances of the case their Lordships must humbly advise Her Majesty to affirm the judgment under appeal, and dismiss the appeal with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

Carriage of goods—Bill of lading—Port—Usual place of delivery—Impossibility of performance—Landing goods—"Goods to be taken out."—Duty

(a) The decision in this case, and the legislation upon which it is founded, carry out a principle of maritime law which seems to be in full force in almost every country except our own, viz., that whilst the ship is bound to the cargo for the performance of the contract, the cargo is equally bound to the ship. Before the recent Acts giving maritime jurisdiction to the County Courts the only means a master or shipowner had of enforcing a lien upon goods was to retain possession of them until security given to answer his claim. Now he may proceed in rem against the goods themselves, and so enforce his lien. This assimilates the practice in this country to that of the United States: (See Parsons on Shipping, vol. 1, p. 174, and notes.) The extraordinary condition of English law in the question of liens for freight and expenses has already been noticed in a note to the case of Mors-Le-Blanch v. Wilson (ante vol. i., p. 605). The County Court is the only court in this country with jurisdiction to enforce such a lien by a proceeding in rem. Whether the new Judicature Act will, by uniting all jurisdiction in one court, revive any former powers which were exercised by the High Court of the Admiralty, but prohibited by the common law courts, is a question which will, no doubt, be raised in due time. A proceeding in rem being merely a form of procedure, it is quite possible that the High Court might by its rules give the remedies which can now only be obtained through the County Court.—Ed.

of shipowner and merchant—Master's authority—Demurrage—Expenses—Back freight.

The duty of a shipowner to deliver goods at the usual place of delivery of a port, to which he has contracted to carry under a bill of lading stipulating only that the goods shall be delivered at the port without any particular part of the port being named, is an implied duty only, and does not amount to any engagement to go to the usual place in all events and under all circumstances. The shipowner's express contract is to deliver in the port, and if it be impossible to deliver at the usual place of delivery by reason of the prohibition of the port authorities, or other accidental cause, the contract is not dissolved, but may be performed by the master being ready to give delivery at some other convenient part of the port, and keeping the cargo in that place for a reasonable time ready for delivery, and the shipowner will thereupon be entitled to his freight.

A bill of lading by which a shipowner contracts to deliver at a port, "the goods to be taken out within 24 hours after arrival or pay demurrage," does not absolutely require that the shipowner should be ready, not merely to deliver, but also to land the goods in the port, or that the merchant should be able, on receiving them, to land them, but it casts upon the merchant the duty of taking the goods out of, or, at all events, from alongside, the ship; hence, if it should be impossible to land the goods, by reason of a prohibition of the port authorities, the shipowner may still perform his part of the contract if he be ready to deliver the goods to the merchant in the port without landing them.

The master of a ship being, in many cases of accident and emergency, the agent from necessity of the owners of cargo where he cannot obtain instructions from them, has not only the power, but a duty cast upon him, to act in such cases for the safety of the cargo in such manner as may be best under the circumstances in which it may be placed, and is entitled as a correlative right to charge the owner of the cargo with the expenses properly incurred in so doing. The obligation on the part of the master to act for the merchant does not cease after a reasonable time for the latter to take delivery has elapsed, and hence after such time, if it be impossible to land and warehouse the goods, or to leave them at their port of destination, the master may, in the absence of all advice, carry or forward them to such place, even back to the port of shipment, as is most convenient to the owner, and charge him with the expense of so doing.

When goods carried under a bill of lading, by which the shipowner is to deliver at the port of destination, and the merchant is to take them out within 24 hours or pay demurrage, cannot be landed at, but may be delivered within, that port, the shipowner cannot recover from the merchant demurrage and expenses claimed in respect of attempts to land the goods at other ports, before he is ready to give delivery at the port of destination; but he may recover expenses incurred, after he is ready to give delivery at that port in hiring a vessel to store the goods, if thereby the merchant is relieved from the demurrage payable in respect of the detention of the ship.

tion). The suit was instituted in the City of London Court by the following precipe:—

We, Cattarns, Jehu and Cattarns, attorneys, hereby institute a suit for freight, demurrage, and expenses on behalf of Jules Gaudet, of No. 73, Lower East Smithfield, owner of the steamship or vessel Argos, against 147 barrels of petroleum late shipped on board the steamship Argos by W. Horner, but now lying at Plaistow Wharf, Plaistow, in the county of Essex, owner or owners unknown in the sum of 200*l.*; and we consent, &c.
Dated 28th of Dec., 1870.

To this suit an appearance was entered on behalf of Walter Horner Brown, the owner of the petroleum, and bail was given in the sum of £150. The cause was heard in the City of London Court upon the following STATEMENT OF AGREED FACTS.

The plaintiff, who trades under the style of Gaudet Frères, was, in the month of November, 1870, the owner of the British steamer Argos, and of other steamers which were frequent traders between London and Havre, and other ports in the North of France.

The defendant, Walter Horner Brown, is a merchant in Billiter Square, dealing in petroleum, oils, chemicals, and other articles, trading as Walter H. Brown and Co., and on the 25th November he received an order from Messrs. Tuffieré and Prudhon, of Rouen, for two hundred barrels of petroleum, to be delivered free on board, in London, and to be sent to Havre as soon as possible.

In consequence of this the defendant, on the same day sent his clerk to the plaintiff's London brokers (Messrs. Rowell and Racine), to inquire the freight of petroleum from London to Havre, and the probable date of sailing of the next steamer, and was informed the freight would be 15*s.* to 20*s.* per ton, and the steamer would sail about the end of the week. The defendant thereupon arranged to send 147 barrels of petroleum by such steamer, and the same was shipped on board the Argos, on the 5th December, and the captain gave the defendant the following bill of lading:—

Shipped in good order, and well conditioned, by W. Horner, in and upon the good steamship called the Argos, whereof is master for the present voyage, "Richardson," and now riding at anchor in the river, and bound for Havre, 147 barrels of petroleum.

The goods to be taken out within 24 hours after arrival, or pay 10*l.* 10*s.* a day demurrage.

421 cwt. 0 qrs. 9 lb.
Being marked and numbered as in the margin, and are to be delivered in the like good order, and well-conditioned, at the aforesaid port of Havre, the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, machinery, boilers, steam and steam navigation, of whatever nature or kind soever, excepted, unto order or to their assigns, on paying freight for the said goods at the rate of 20*s.* and 15 per cent. primage per ton gross, with primage and average accustomed. In witness whereof the master or purser of the said ship hath affirmed to two bills of lading all of this tenor and date, the one of which bills being accomplished the others to stand void.
Dated in London, 30th November, 1870.

Weight and contents unknown. Not accountable for leakage.

W. J. RICHARDSON.

The said bill of lading was by direction of the defendant made out in the name of W. Horner, his two first names.

Upon the 6th December the defendant applied to the plaintiff's brokers for the name of the ship's broker at Havre, and was informed it was M. H. Généstal, Rue d'Orleans, Havre. Defendant thereupon wrote him the following letter, which was duly received by Généstal, but of which the plaintiff had no notice.—

11, Billiter Square, 6th Dec., 1870.

Monsieur H. Généstal, 73, Rue d'Orleans, Havre.

We beg to inform you that we have shipped upon the steamship Argos,

Washington, } 147 barrels of spirit of petroleum,
1/147 } 21,392 kilogrammes, to order. These spirits are to be sent to Messrs. Tuffieré and Prudhon, at Rouen, and you must not deliver them unless they present the regular bill of lading endorsed by us.

The freight and other expenses are to be charged on the goods.

Accept, Monsieur, our salutations.

W. H. BROWN & Co.

The Argos sailed with the petroleum and other goods, being a general cargo, at midnight on the 6th December, arrived at Havre 10:30 p.m. on the 7th, and, being unable to land the cargo there, the captain proceeded to Honfleur; and being unable to land it there, he took the ship to Trouville, and was informed there he might land it there if he obtained a certificate from the engineer of bridges and ways resident at Honfleur; and the captain thereupon went to Honfleur, and obtained the following certificate:—

Honfleur, le 8 Décembre, 1870.

L'Ingénieur Ordinaire de l' Arrondissement du Nord Est.

A Monsieur, — L'Ingénieur Soussigné a envoyé le steamer Argos à Trouville à cause du danger tout particulier en ce moment qu'offre la présence du pétrole sur les quais à côté du matériel de guerre en chargement pour le Havre. Le Soussigné a écrit à ce sujet M. Dubose une lettre qui lui parviendra demain matin et qui indique les précautions à prendre sous le bénéfice de ces précautions et en installant de suite un garde-feu à bord pour empêcher.

M. Dubose peut faire entrer le steamer Argos en bassin ce-soir à la marée.

E. ARNOUX, L'Ingénieur Ordinaire.

Arrondissement du Nord Est,

Ponts et Chaussées, Département du Calvados.

The captain, under this authority, took the ship into the basin at Trouville Deauville, where he remained during the 9th, and was on the 10th compelled to go out of the basin; and the President of the Municipal Commission of Trouville Deauville, endorsed on the engineer's authority the following certificate:—

Nous Président de la Commission Municipale de Deauville certifions que nous avons été obligés malgré l'autorisation de Monsieur l'Ingénieur d'Honfleur de faire sortir du bassin de Deauville le navire Anglais Argos chargé de pétrole, le population s'opposant au déchargement du dit navire et menaçant de se laisser entraîner à des excès.

(Sd.)

HEBERT DEROCQUETT,
Le Président de la Commission Municipale,
Le Membre Délégué.

Deauville, 10 Décembre, 1870.

Upon that the captain went to Honfleur, and the following protest was noted before the British Consul there, and the statements therein are to be taken as true:—

Vice-Consulat Britannique à Honfleur.

By this public Instrument of Protest be it known and manifest unto all whom it doth or may concern, that on the 10th Dec. 1870, before me, British Vice-Consul for the port and district of Honfleur, voluntarily came and personally appeared William John Richardson, master of the British steamship or vessel called the Argos, of London, official No. 60,839, of the burden of 109 tons, or thereabouts, then lying in the port of Trouville-sur-Mer, in the consular district of Honfleur, laden with petroleum, who duly noted and entered his protest with me, the said Vice-Consul, against all losses and charges he incurred for not being allowed to unload his cargo in the port of destination and two other ports, by the local authorities of these ports, and did declare, depose, and say, That he sailed from London on the 6th Dec., present month, at midnight, with a cargo of petroleum, in destination for Havre, where he arrived on the 7th, at 10.30 p.m., having the red flag up on account of having petroleum on board, and that early in the morning of the 8th Dec. the authorities at the port of Havre compelled him to take the ship out of the harbour, as they would not allow him to remain there, having petroleum on board, and in consequence of which he started immediately, at 10.30 p.m., for Honfleur, where he arrived at 11.30 a.m., and having swung the vessel, and was about to make her fast in a position where the pilot told him, he received an order from the harbour-master to leave immediately the port, and therefore he did leave, at noon, for the next nearest port, which was Trouville-sur-Mer, and where he arrived at 1.30 p.m. And the said appearer did further declare, that on arriving at Trouville he found a difficulty for the unloading of the petroleum from the port or harbour-master, or principal of the port, who informed him that he would allow him to unload the petroleum if he could obtain a permission from the Ingenieur des Ponts and Chaussées, residing at Honfleur; and in order to hasten the despatch he immediately employed a cab, and started himself with the broker, M. Hébert, to Honfleur, and obtained the required permission, and after which he returned to Trouville, and put the ship in dock next day (Friday, the 9th), waiting further instructions. And further, that to-day (Saturday, the 10th), he met with some objection from the part of the president of the Municipality Administrative Commission of Deauville Trouville, for the landing of the casks in question; and after having made further steps in the case before other authorities he had been ordered to leave the port of Trouville as soon as possible, without landing any of the casks of petroleum, and in consequence of which he went to Honfleur at 3 p.m., in order to deposit, note, and enter his present declaration and protest at this Vice-Consulate with all reserve, to furnish further particulars if required. And therefore the said William John Richardson, master, did declare to protest, and by these presents he does solemnly protest against all and every person or persons whom it doth, shall, or may concern, against all loss of time and charges incurred by the above-mentioned opposals of landing his cargo he met in these three different ports, and doth declare that all damages for delay or detention, and all losses and charges, are and ought to be borne by the merchants and freighters interested, and reserves for himself and his owner all rights against them. And I the said Vice-Consul, at the request of said William John Richardson, master of the said steamship Argos, did and do hereby solemnly protest against the same, in the manner and form aforesaid.

Thus done and protested in the City of Honfleur, at the British Vice-Consulate.

On the 9th Dec., M. Généstal wrote to the defendant as follows:—

Havre, 9th Dec., 1870.

Messrs. Walter H. Brown and Co.,

11, Billiter-square, London.

Your letter of the 6th I have received to-day only.

For some time the entry into the port of Havre has been refused to ships carrying petroleum. I have attempted in vain to discharge the 147 barrels at Honfleur, and been compelled to send the Argos to Trouville, where I hope to be able to disembark it. Rouen has been occupied by the Germans, and I have not yet heard from Messrs. Tuffieré and Prudhon. If a judicial sequestration could be obtained at Trouville, he (the officer appointed by the court), would take care of the goods, and he would only deliver against presentation of a regular endorsed bill of lading, and after payment of the freight, and all other expenses.

I cannot truly comprehend how the buyers at Rouen should have directed this petroleum to go to Havre, since it has been forbidden in the newspapers to discharge such goods here, and that for more than two months.

Accept, gentlemen, my sincere salutations.

H. GÉNÉSTAL.

The plaintiff and defendant were throughout personally quite unaware that there was any difficulty in landing petroleum at Havre.

The Argos having other cargo in her, Mr. Duprey, on the part of Généstal, hired a lighter, called the Augustine Amélie, in order that the petroleum might be transhipped into her in Havre outer harbour, or the roads, while the Argos went into dock to unload her other cargo; and the following agreement was entered into:—

Havre, le 12 Dec., 1870.

Entre le Capitaine Ponetre desloop Français Augustine Amélie d'une part.

Et M. Généstal, agent du steamer Anglais Argos, d'autre part, a été convenu et réglé ce qui suit.

Le Capitaine Ponetre s'engage à recevoir et garder à son bord jusqu'à Samedi 17 courant 147 futs essence de pétrole les dits futs à transborder dans l'avant port ou en rade du Havre à bord du steamer Anglais Argos.

Il est bien entendu que le Capitaine Ponetre gardera son navire à disposition, de manière à ce que le transbordement s'opère sans aucun retard et des la sortie du port du dit steamer Argos, moyennant quoi il lui sera à titre de fret à forfait la somme de deux cent cinquante francs.

PONETRE.

Fait double au Havre, 12 Dec., 1870.

On Monday, 12th Dec., the Argos arrived in Havre Roads, when the captain found permission had already been obtained to enter the outer harbour, and having entered the outer harbour, he transhipped the petroleum into the lighter.

Immediately on the arrival of the Argos in Havre outer harbour the transshipment of the petroleum into the lighter was commenced, and was finished at 4.30 p.m. on the same day, and at midnight the Argos entered the dock, and was moored alongside the quay, whilst the remainder of her cargo was discharged, and a fresh cargo shipped for London; and on the 16th, a fresh cargo having been loaded, the Argos came out of dock, and having re-shipped the petroleum, as she was obliged to do by the port authorities at Havre, sailed again for London, where she arrived at 9 a.m. on the 18th Dec.

During the whole of this time no bill of lading was presented to the captain or officers of the Argos, nor was any request made for the delivery of the goods. In the ordinary course of business petroleum would be delivered on the quay at Havre, on presentation of the bill of lading. In this case it would not have been possible for the captain to have landed on the quay, even if the bill of lading had been presented. M. Généstal was well aware at the respective times that the Argos was in dock and moored alongside the quay, and of the various movements of the ship, and of the petroleum having been put on board the lighter.

By reason of the hereinbefore-mentioned circumstances the plaintiff was put to the following expenses:—

At Havre	Frs. 72.85	}	£24 16 10
„ Honfleur	85.75
„ Trouville	118.35

And he also claims the following amount of freight:—

Freight to Havre	£24 4 5
Freight back to London	24 4 5

And he also claims five days' demurrage for the detention of the Argos whilst engaged in travelling from port to port, which, at £10 10s. per day, as per bill of lading, amounts to £52 10s., and she also consumed on her extra journey 5 tons of coal, which, at 18s per ton, amounts to £4 10s.

On the 16th December Messrs. Rowell and Racine, the brokers in London for the Argos, wrote Messrs. W. P. Brown and Co. the following letter:—

90, Lower Thames-street, London,

Messrs. W. H. Brown and Co. 16th December, 1870.

Dear Sirs,—Some few days ago we heard that the 147 barrels of petroleum that you shipped per Argos, for Havre, had been landed at Trouville. We now hear that this is a mistake, the authorities there having at the last moment refused to allow it to be landed. The Captain therefore took it back to Havre, where he had to charter a sailing vessel to take charge of it, while he took his ship in port to load (not being permitted to go in with it on board). We expect the Argos back shortly with the 147 barrels on board, and give you notice of the facts at once, so that you may make any arrangement you consider necessary.

The expenses incurred will, we fear, be enormous, and amount (with the freight) to about £128 or £130.

(Signed) ROWELL AND RACINE.

but to which they had no reply. And in accordance with that letter Messrs. Rowell and Racine gave notice to Messrs. Brown and Co. of the arrival of the Argos with the said petroleum on board by the following memorandum:—

MEMORANDUM.

(Private.)
Rowell and Racine, } W. HORNER,
90, Lower Thames-street, E.C. } Messrs. H. W. Brown
19th December, 1870. } and Co., Billiter-square.

The Argos, Captain Richardson, from Havre, has arrived, having on board the undermentioned goods belonging to you.

Washington, 1/47.....147 barrels petroleum.

In reply Messrs. W. H. Brown and Co. sent the following letter:—

From Walter H. Brown and Co., } To 11, Billiter-square, London, E.C. } Messrs. Rowell
19th December, 1870. } and Racine.

Seeing that you have failed to fulfil your engagement to deliver 147 barrels petroleum at Havre, according to bills of lading for same in our possession, we herewith enclose you invoice for this lot, amounting to £240 10s. 2d., and shall feel obliged by a cheque for the amount at your earliest convenience.

We are buyers of this article at the present time, and although the market has dropped, we shall be happy to treat with you for the purchase of the 147 barrels you have, as you inform us, brought back to London, per Argos; of course, at land gauges.

WALTER H. BROWN AND CO.

And enclosed in their letter was the following invoice:—

Messrs. Rowell and Racine, } 11, Billiter-square,
To Walter H. Brown and Co. } London,
19th December, 1870.

Washington, 1/47.....147 barrels petroleum spirit.

Net gallons, 5382, at 11d per gallon £246 13 6

Discount, 2½ per cent. 6 3 4

£240 10 2

And Messrs. Rowell and Racine, in reply to that letter, sent the following letter:—

90, Lower Thames-street, London, E.C.,

Messrs. W. H. Brown and Co. Dec. 20, 1870.

Gentlemen,—We have your favour of yesterday, and in reply beg to say that, as you are well aware that it was through no act of the ship's that the goods were not landed at Havre, we can hardly imagine that your claim is intended seriously.

Nevertheless, as you seem inclined to dispute our claim, we beg to give you notice that, unless it is settled before three o'clock (3 o'clock) this afternoon, we shall place the matter in the hands of our solicitor, and instruct him to proceed at once to recover the full amount of our account as rendered, and further, the costs of lighterage of the goods from the ship to the wharf.—We are, Gentlemen, your obedient servants,

ROWELL and RACINE.

Messrs. W. H. Brown and Co. not having paid by the time mentioned, the goods were taken to Plaistow Wharf, and there lodged to the plaintiff's order; and the attorneys for the plaintiff instituted a suit in rem under the Admiralty Jurisdiction of this court against the said 147 barrels of petroleum. An appearance was entered to that suit by the defendants' attorneys, and shortly afterwards they, on behalf of W. H. Brown and Co., applied to the plaintiffs' attorneys to release the goods and deliver them to the said W. H. Brown and Co.; whereupon the defendants' attorneys put in bail to answer damages and costs in this suit, and a delivery order was accordingly given, and the said goods were duly delivered to W. H. Brown and Co.; and in order to obtain the delivery of their said goods they had to pay the wharf charges and expenses consequent upon the said goods being landed at Plaistow Wharf.

The cause was heard on the above statement of facts in the City of London Court (before Mr. Commissioner Kerr) on Jan. 4, 1872, and judgment was given on Jan. 15, 1872, for the plaintiff for the sum of 135l 5s. 8d. with costs. From this decree the defendants appealed to the High Court of Admiralty. The appeal came on for hearing on May 7, 1872, and Sir R. Philimore reserved judgment. Subsequently the Court of Common Pleas having decided (Simpson v. Blues L. Rep. 7 C. P. 290; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 697; ante, vol. 1, p. 326) that County Courts had no jurisdiction over such questions beyond that possessed by the High Court of Admiralty, and this being a question over which the latter court has no original jurisdiction, Sir R. Philimore before giving judgment on the merits, ordered the question of jurisdiction to be argued; this question was argued, and the learned judge held, in deference to the opinion of the Common Pleas, that the County Court had not jurisdiction to entertain the cause, and dismissed the suit without costs: (see ante, vol. 1, p. 360; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 64). The plaintiffs thereupon appealed to the Privy Council, and the decision of the learned judge was there reserved and the jurisdiction pronounced for, and the cause was remitted to the Court of Admiralty that the appeal might be decided on its merits (see ante, vol. 1, p. 519; 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 77). The arguments before the High Court of Admiralty on the merits were as follows:—

May 7th, 1872.—The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C.) and Murphy for the appellant (the defendant below).—The rule as to the right to freight is laid down in Maclachlan on Shipping, p. 394. It is there said, "Freight is not due until it is earned; and as the carrier's contract is in its nature entire, nothing short of complete performance satisfies the common law, unless the freighter himself interferes to prevent it. No freight, then, is due, prima facie, unless the whole is earned. By the consent of the freighter, however, the shipowner not insisting on completing his contract, imperfect performance may be a good title, under a new contract, to remuneration, in the nature of freight pro ratâ itineris peracti. If there is no performance whatever, there may yet be a valid claim for damages, although there be no title to freight. . . . Freight being the price of safecarriage and delivery of the subject of bailment at the destined port, performance of the contract is a condition precedent to any right of the carrier to recover the reward." As an authority for this last proposition Osgood v. Groning (2 Camp. 466) is cited. Here the contract is to deliver at the port of Havre. The delivery was not prevented by any act of the defendants, and the claim is made without any benefit occurring to him. This was a special contract to deliver, and it remains unperformed on the part of the plaintiff; and he, therefore, cannot have an action to recover compensation for what he has done, until the whole is completed: (Cutter v. Powell, 2 Smith L.C. 6th edit. p. 16.) It was a positive contract, not in itself unlawful, and the plaintiff was bound to perform it, or to pay damages for not doing it, although in consequence of an unforeseen accident, namely, the refusal of the French authorities to allow the landing of the petroleum, the performance of his contract became impossible: (Taylor v. Caldwell, 3 B & S. 826; 32 L. J. 164, Q. B.; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 356.) The plaintiff has at least no right against the defendant on this authority. Where a man contracts to do work for a specific sum, to be paid on completion of the whole, he is not entitled to recover anything until the whole work is completed, unless it be shown that the performance of his contract was prevented by the default of the other contracting party: (Appleby v. Myers L. Rep. 2 C. P. (Ex. Ch.) 651; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 669.) In that case, which was an action for work done, which was destroyed by fire, Blackburn, J. said, "We think that where, as in the present case, the premises are destroyed without fault on either side, it is a misfortune equally affecting both parties; excusing both from further performance of the contract, but giving a cause of action to neither, . . . The case is like the case of a shipowner who has been excused from the performance of his contract to carry goods to their destination, because his ship has been disabled by one of the expected perils, but who is not therefore entitled to any payment on account of the part performance of the voyage, unless there is something to justify the conclusion that there has been a fresh contract to pay pro ratâ." Here the complete performance was not prevented by an expected peril, and therefore, a fortiori, the plaintiff cannot claim freight. It is a rule that, if a shipowner, entering into a contract, and so creating a duty upon himself, wishes to excuse performance in certain cases, he must provide for those cases in his contract: (Spence v. Chodwick, 10 Q.B. 517, 530, citing Paradyne v. Jane, Aley's Rep. 26.) To have any claim to freight at all, the master is bound to deliver at least in part: (Christie v. Row, 1 Taunt. 300). In The Teutonia (L. Rep. Adm. & Ecc.; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 521: ante, vol. 1, p. 32) various French authorities are quoted in the judgment to show that, where an interdiction of trade is imposed, the outward freight only is due, but not the homeward freight (Valin, Ordonnance de la Marine, lib. iii. tit. 3, art. xv.; Traité des Assurances et des Contrats à la Grosse d' Emerigon, P.

S. Boulay-Paty, tom. i., cap. xii., sect. xxxi.; Cours de Droit Commercial Maritime, tit. viii., sect. 10, tom 2, p. 424, edition 1834). This is no doubt the Continental law, but by English law no freight is due without delivery, and no claim for freight pro ratâ can arise except on an implied contract. There are no circumstances here from which a contract can be implied to pay pro ratâ freight. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—If this be a court of equity, may I not presume freight to be due independently of the express contract, if the master could not reasonably deliver?] There must be a voluntary acceptance (Vlierboom v. Chapman, 13 M. & W. 230), and this court has held in accordance with that ruling: (The Soblomsten, L. Rep. 1 Adm. & Ecc. 293; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 393; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 436.) There was no acceptance here. This is a written contract, and this court should, therefore, apply the principles of common law. A party seeking payment must show that he has done all that he is bound to do. Unless the performance of a contract has become illegal by the law of the country of the ship, the contract must be performed, or there must have been an actual change of relations between the country of the ship and the place of destination: (Esposito v. Bowden, 4 E. & B. 963; 7 E. & B. 763; 24 L. J. 210, Q. B.; 27 L. J. 17, Q. B.; Atkinson v. Ritchie, 10 East, 530.) A foreign law operating to make performance illegal or impossible at the port of delivery will not excuse non-performance: (Barker v. Hodgson, M. & Sel. 267; Blyth v. Page, cited in Touteng v. Hubbard, 3 B. and P. 291-295, note; Sjoerds v. Luscombe, 16 East, 201.) Even the act of a British superintendent of trade in a Chinese port is no excuse unless it appears that he was duly authorised to act: (Evans v. Hutton, 6 Jur. 1042). The plaintiff was a regular trader to the port of Havre, and had a regular agent there. It was within the plaintiff's knowledge that this was petroleum; and if there was difficulty in landing petroleum the plaintiff should have known this, and have refused to take the goods. The ship never got with these goods on board to the quay at Havre, which is found by the case to be the ordinary place of delivery, and therefore the plaintiff was never ready to deliver. The defendant made no contract to receive until the plaintiff was ready to deliver. The two acts were to be done together, and therefore no action lies without performance or an offer to perform on the part of the plaintiff: (Pordage v. Cole, 1 Williams' Saunders' Rep. 556). There was no obligation on the part of the defendant to produce the bill of lading until the plaintiff was ready to deliver. The letter of December 6th, 1870, to Généstal, did not constitute the latter the defendant's agent, and his acts do not bind the defendant. The master was bound to have waited till the removal of the disability of the goods, and then to have landed them: (Hadley v. Clarke, 8 T. R. 259).

Milward, Q.C., and Day, Q.C., for the plaintiff (respondent).—The letter above referred to has the effect of authorising Généstal to represent the owner of the goods, and requests him to take charge of them. The goods were to be taken out within twenty-four hours after arrival, and the defendant wished Généstal to do this in order to save them the demurrage for which they would otherwise have been liable. This shows that it was the defendant's duty to remove the goods. There is no stipulation in the Bill of Lading as to any particular quay or dock, and all that the plaintiff was bound to do was to go to the port of Havre, and that he has done. We contend that delivery has been made; but even if we have failed in anything, it was through the fault of the cargo. Where delivery is prevented by the incapacity of the cargo alone, the shipowner is entitled to his freight: (The Fortuna, Edwards' Adm. Rep. 56; The Friends, lb. 246.) In the latter case the ship had got to the mouth of the harbour of the port of destination, and was prevented from proceeding by a blockading force, and Lord Stowell said: "This court sits no more than courts of common law do to make contracts; but as a court exercising an equitable jurisdiction it considers itself bound to provide as well as it can for that relation of interests which has unexpectedly taken place under a state of facts out of the contemplation of the contracting parties in the course of the transaction. . . . Now if the incapacity of completing the voyage could be exclusively attributed to one of the parties, it would be proper that the loss should fall there; but the fact is that the calamity is common to both;" and the freight was divided. There is no law which made the delivery illegal. There was a popular disturbance caused by the petroleum. This was not the incapacity of the ship, but of the cargo. We say, however, that there was an actual delivery, for we transhipped the goods into a lighter in the harbour, and so really discharged the cargo. The defendants should have presented the bills of lading and taken the goods from the lighter, but as they did not, or were not allowed, we had to bring them back. A reasonable time for delivery is all the defendant can demand, and if he detain the ship beyond such a time she is liable in damages (Ford v. Cotesworth, 9 B. & S. 559; 10 B. & S. 991); and the defendant is not excused from not unloading by the Act of the French authorities: (Adams v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, 5 C. B.; N. S. 492; Kearon v. Pearson, 7 H. & N. 386.) Here it is expressly stipulated that the cargo shall be taken out within twenty-four hours by the defendant, and he is bound to concur with the plaintiff and do all that was necessary to effect delivery and acceptance of the cargo: (Ford v. Cotesworth (ubi sup.)) Spence v. Chodwick (ubi sup.) proceeded on the ground that a mere foreign revenue law could not be noticed in this country; the defendant is here bound to be ready to take delivery, in spite of a local law. Christie v. Row (sup.) shows that freight may be earned when delivery is presented, and even that we are entitled to our return freight. We completely performed our contract. By the bill of lading we were to deliver in the port of Havre, and we did so. The place of discharge depended on the harbour authorities, and a complete performance took place on discharge into the lighter under their orders. The goods were then at the defendants' disposal on payment of charges. The defendants were bound to take out the goods.

Murphy in reply.—In the cases of The Fortuna (sup.) and The Friends (sup.) there was an implied contract raised by the fact of the owner going into the court to claim his cargo, but in this case I submit the court will not exercise any equitable jurisdiction. The Court of Chancery proceeds, with respect to the payment of freight, upon precisely the same ground as the court of common law Brown v. Tanner, L. Rep. 3 Ch. App. 597; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 624; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 94); and no freight is due until delivery is complete, "Taken out" in the bill of lading refers to the goods being taken away within twenty-four hours, and the margin of the bill shows that the plaintiff was to land them. The quay was the ordinary place of delivery, and delivery must take place according to the practice and custom of the port, and the defendant was entitled to a reasonable time to take the goods: (Gatliffe v. Bourne, 4 Bing. N. C. 314, 329, 331.) The plaintiff sailed away before twenty-four hours had elapsed after arrival. The plaintiffs were at no time ready and willing to deliver whilst at Havre, and no claim exists till they were so ready: (Duthie v. Hilton, L. Rep. 4 C. P. 138; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 285; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 166.)

March 11, 1873.—Sir R. Phillimore.—This is a cause of appeal from the City of London court, arising out of an agreement made for the use or hire of the ship Argos, under the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51, s. 2. I regret to say that I derive no assistance from the judgment of the Court below, which is in these words: "As I understand you are going to appeal in this case, all I shall say is, that I give judgment for the plaintiff. The amount I believe is agreed at 135*l.* 5*s.* 8*d.*" It appears to me that the reason here assumed for not stating the grounds of a judgment involving important questions of law is based upon a very mistaken view of the duty of a judge of the court of first instance, and deprives the appellate court of the assistance which it has a right to expect. All the material facts of this case are admitted. They are as follows: [The learned Judge then stated the facts down to and inclusive of the bill of lading, as in the statement given above, and proceeded.] A person of the name of G n stal appears to have been the shipbroker of Havre. He was selected by the defendant as his agent at Havre by the following letter [His Lordship then read the letter of Dec. 5th, 1870, from the appellant to G n stal, stated the rest of the facts as given above, and continued.] The plaintiff claims, for freight out, demurrage, freight back, and expenses, the sum of 135*l.* 5*s.* 8*d.*, for which he has recovered judgment in the court below. The defendant contends in substance that the plaintiff never performed his contract of carrying the petroleum to the usual place of delivery at Havre, which he asserts to be the quay; that, as the plaintiff was never ready to give delivery at the agreed place, the defendant was not obliged to take the goods; and that, at all events, though neither plaintiff nor defendant were holden to blame for the non-delivery, the contract was unexecuted, and no right of action could accrue to either party. The bill of lading contains the two stipulations: (1) That the goods are to be taken out within twenty-four hours after arrival or pay demurrage; and (2) that they are to be delivered at the port of Havre. Under this contract it was the duty of the defendants to take out the goods, and of the plaintiff to bring the goods to the port of Havre, where they could be taken out. Indeed, it is one of the admissions of the case that the captain could not have landed them on the quay. I think that when the ship on her first arrival at Havre went, under the direction of G n stal, to Honfleur and to Trouville, she had performed the duty of bringing the goods to the port, and was exonerated from the necessity of waiting a longer time than she did. And, in any case, I think that upon the second occasion, when she actually did deliver the goods on board the lighter, there was an entire execution of the contract, and the shipowner became entitled to his outward freight and his demurrage up to that time. But if this opinion be erroneous, and there was not an entire execution of the contract, I should still be of opinion that the shipowner was entitled to his freight, because, to borrow the reasoning of Lord Stowell in The Fortuna (Edwards's Adm. Rep. 57), there was such an execution as he could effect consistently with the incapacity under which the cargo laboured. The shipowner had done his utmost to consummate the contract; it did not lie with him that the contract was not performed: it was stopped by the incapacity of the cargo. It remains to consider that part of the claim which relates to the return freight and certain incidental expenses. In the first place, I am of opinion that Généstal must be considered as acting on behalf of the owners of the cargo; he was present and aware that the petroleum was re-shipped. In the second place it must be remembered that the authorities at Havre had power to compel the master to take the cargo on board. In these circumstances what was the duty of the master of the ship? He was obliged to take the goods out of the territorial waters of France. Would he have acted properly if he had then thrown them overboard? I should have said, on principles of common sense and justice, he could not take this course; and I feel myself strengthened by the opinion of Sir James Mansfield—no inconsiderable authority, and himself expressing the opinion of the Court of Common Pleas in the case of Christy v. Row, (1 Taunt. 314): "Where a ship is chartered upon one voyage, outwards only, with no reference to her return and no contemplation of a disappointment happening, no decision which I have been able to find determines what shall be done in case the voyage is defeated; the books throw no light on the subject. The natural justice of the matter seems obvious—that a master should do that which a wise and prudent man would think most conducive to the benefit of all concerned. But it appears to be wholly voluntary; I do not know that he is bound to do it; and yet if it were a cargo of cloth or other valuable merchandise, it would be of great hardship that he might be at liberty to cast it overboard. It is singular that such a question should at this day remain undecided." And though this judgment was delivered in 1808, I have been unable to find a further exposition of this subject. If, however, he had not this duty of necessary agent to the cargo thus re-shipped after delivery, and it was competent to him to have thrown them overboard, he is a fortiori entitled, on restoring them to the owner, to a lien upon them for the expenses of their preservation; and the proceeding in rem in a court having admiralty jurisdiction is the mode which he has adopted for enforcing that lien. I think, therefore, that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the return freight and the incidental expenses. I wish to observe that I have consulted the cases for reference to which I am indebted to the industry of counsel, though I have not thought it necessary to advert to more than those I have mentioned. I think I should also say a word as to the delay in the adjudication of this case. It is due to the following cause: After the argument, and while I was considering my judgment, the Court of Common Pleas prohibited a County Court from exercising jurisdiction in a case of this description. I was unable to agree with the judgment of the Common Pleas; but, for reasons which I have before stated, I thought myself bound to obey it, and, as my jurisdiction in these matters is purely appellate, to dismiss the suit for want of jurisdiction; but I gave leave to appeal to the Privy Council, suggesting that, if they took the same view as I did, they might think themselves warranted in coming to a different decision from that of the Common Pleas. This they have done, and have remitted the cause to the jurisdiction of this court. I affirm the decree of the court below and dismiss the appeal with costs.

From this decree the defendant in the City of London Court (the appellant in the Admiralty Court) appealed to her Majesty in Council on the following grounds, as stated in his case on appeal: That the ship was never ready to give delivery of the cargo at the agreed place, i.e., on the quay; that the obligation on him to take delivery did not arise until the respondent was ready to give it; that he broke no contract, as is admitted in the agreed statement of facts, acted with perfect good faith, and in ignorance of the prohibition against landing petroleum; that, upon the other hand, the respondent, who is a regular trader to Havre, must be taken by his agent, Généstal, to have knowledge of the regulations of the port, and for these reasons the appellant submitted: First, that he was and is entitled to judgment, with costs, upon the merits; secondly, the respondent entered into a contract with the appellant to deliver and land the petroleum at the usual place of unloading at Havre; thirdly, that until the respondent had landed the petroleum at the usual place of landing at Havre, which is the quay there, no person could possibly present any bill of lading to the captain or master and receive or demand the goods; fourthly, that the appellant never expressly or impliedly sanctioned the hiring of any sloop to receive his goods; fifthly, it was by no act or default of the appellant that the respondent did not deliver the goods, or that the ship was detained for five days in seeking to deliver goods which the respondent might have known from his own agent could not be delivered.

The respondent's case on appeal submitted that the decrees of the courts below should be upheld for the following reasons:—

1. The respondent is entitled to recover the freight mentioned in the bill of lading:

(a). Because the freight was earned when the goods were carried into the port of Havre and discharged there.

(b). Because M. Généstal was the agent of the appellant, and the goods were delivered according to his directions.

(c). Because the ship carried the goods into the port of Havre, and the respondent was ready, so far as he was concerned, to deliver the same. It was the duty of the appellant, or his agent, to present the bill of lading, and to provide for and take delivery of the goods, and he is liable for the consequences of not having done so, and the appellant, having contracted to take the goods at Havre, is not relieved from his contract by the interference of the authorities of the place.

- (d). Because there was no illegality in the contract, as petroleum is lawfully merchandise, and the difficulties created by the local people were difficulties which it was for the appellant to remove or provide for.
- (e). Because there was such an execution of the contract on the part of the respondent as he could effect consistently with the incapacity under which the cargo laboured.
- (f). Because, even if the goods were not actually delivered to the appellant at Havre, the respondent was under the circumstances excused from delivering them there; and further, the appellant by his conduct waived his right to demand delivery at Havre.
- (g). Because the respondent was ready and willing to deliver the goods, and the appellant was not ready and willing to accept them, or to make provision for receiving them, or to produce the bill of lading, or to pay the freight.
2. If the respondent is not entitled to recover the freight mentioned in the bill of lading, he is entitled to sue on a quantum meruit, or for freight pro rata itineris.
3. The respondent is entitled to recover the expenses claimed, because the expenses were forced upon the master of the ship by the act of the appellant, and were properly incurred by the master for the benefit of the appellant, and with the sanction of M. Généstal.
4. The respondent is entitled to recover the amount claimed as homeward freight, because the carriage of the goods home was the only thing that could be done under the circumstances for the safety and preservation of the goods, and was directed and sanctioned by M. Généstal, and was ratified by the act of the appellant in claiming the goods here.
5. The appellant is liable to pay the demurrage claimed according to the express terms of the bill of lading, and for detaining the ship, independently of the terms of the bill of lading.
- May 2 and 3, 1873.*—The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C.) and Murphy for the appellant.—Here the contract was to deliver at Havre and it has remained unperformed, though through no default on the part of the respondent; yet he cannot, as there was no act on the part of appellant preventing the completion of the contract, recover freight under the contract. The aid of third parties, and even of a foreign government, whereby a contract is rendered impossible of performance, cannot be set up as an excuse for non-performance unless there is an express stipulation in the contract providing for the contingency. Hence, as the respondent would be liable to the appellant for breach of the contract, he cannot recover for that which he has never performed.

The judgment in the court below proceeds greatly upon the prize cases there cited, but there is a great distinction between the admiralty prize and instance jurisdiction, because in the former the court exercises an equitable power of providing for a state of circumstances which must necessarily have been out of the contemplation of the parties, whereas in the latter the court should follow the same rules in the construction of a contract as other courts of law.

The Fortuna, Edwards' Adm. Rep. 56;

The Friends, Ib. 246.

The finding that Généstal was agent of the appellant is erroneous; the authority given to him was merely to hold the goods in safety, and not to deliver except to the holders, of the bills of lading. The respondent, never having been in a position to complete his original contract, cannot recover return freight. [Sir MONTAGUE SMITH.—Suppose it had become impossible to land these goods by misfortune, would not the master have become the agent by necessity for the owner of the cargo? If he had employed another ship to carry them back to England, would not the appellant have been compelled to pay the freight?] That question was put in Christie v. Row (1 Taunt. 300), and yet there it was held that the master could only recover against the consignor as for actual delivery. [Sir MONTAGUE SMITH.—From the judgment in that case it would seem that the plaintiff recovered not on the old contract, but on an implied contract to deliver. Here it might be said that there was, on the arising of the difficulty as to deliver at Havre, a new and implied contract on the part of the master to be ready to deliver at some other place than the quay.] In Christie v. Row it was said that a master was bound under the circumstances to do that which a prudent man would have done with his own goods, and that he did so, and yet could not on his contract recover return freights.

There was no completion of this contract on the part of the shipowner, because the master was never ready and willing to deliver at the usual place of discharge, viz., the quay at Havre. A shipowner has no right to claim demurrage until his ship arrives, not merely in the port, but at the usual place of discharge, as the lay days do not commence till then, and he is not until then ready to discharge (Brereton v. Chapman, 7 Bing. 559). The arrival at the quay was a condition precedent to the payment of freight. The quay was the agreed place, and the time for taking the goods out, viz. within twenty-four hours after arrival, never began to run, as the ship never got there with the goods on board. The holder of the bill of lading would not be bound to present it until the ship was at the quay with the goods. There was no intention of the parties in this case to contract for a substantial performance of the contract, as apart from an absolute performance; hence it cannot be said that any implied contract arose from the exceptional circumstances. In the cases where freight pro rata itineris peracti has been recovered, there has always been some acts of the parties which has given rise to an implied contract. There was no such act here, either in Havre or in London. In The Teutonia (L. Rep. 3 Adm. & Ecc. 394; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 521: ante vol. 1, p. 32; and on appeal, L. Rep. 4 P. C. 171; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 48; ante vol. 1, p. 214) there was clearly an implied contract arising out of the demand made by the consignees for the delivery of the goods in a port within the charter-party; there, moreover, the inability to complete was occasioned by the voyage becoming illegal by the law of the country to which the ship belonged. [The rest of the argument was the same as that in the court below.]

Milward, Q.C. and Gainsford Bruce for the respondent.—Assuming that the master was ready to deliver in the port of Havre, then, if the owner of the goods was prevented by the order of the authorities from taking delivery, that was the breach of the owner of the goods, and not of the shipowners. The stipulations of the bill of lading as to taking the goods out only imply that the owner is entitled to leave them twenty-four hours after arrival without paying demurrage; the duty of the shipowner was fulfilled in being ready to discharge in the port of Havre. There was nothing to prevent the master discharging the cargo over the side of the ship, which was the only obligation imposed upon him, and this in fact was done. The shipowner entered into a contract to carry on the terms that the owner of cargo would perform all that he undertakes to do by his contract; the shipowner is to deliver, and the owner of cargo to take out; the latter should come to the ship's side and take his cargo. There was no contract in law on the part of the shipowner to do more than deliver over the side. On arrival in port the master was entitled to expect some one on the part of the consignees to demand the goods and pay the freight, whereas no assistance was given by them to enable him to complete his contract.

Then as to the place of delivery. The contract, as contained in the bill of lading, is that the goods are to be delivered at the "port" of Havre. If it is contended that they must be delivered at the usual place of landing within that port, then that is introducing an implied stipulation into the contract; and if it is implied, then Paradyme v. Jane (Ayley, 26) does not apply. In Taylor v. Caldwell (ubi sup.) Blackburn, J. says: "There seems no doubt that where there is a positive contract to do a thing, not in itself unlawful, the contractor must perform it, or pay damages for not doing it, although, in consequence of unforeseen accidents, the performance of his contract has become unexpectedly burthensome or even impossible.

. . . . But this rule is only applicable when the contract is positive and absolute, and not subject to any condition either express or implied." The contract here is to deliver at the port, not at any particular part of the port. The place is only implied. It is not an express term which the shipowner has taken upon himself, but it is an implied undertaking, subject to the condition that such delivery shall be possible. There was nothing to prevent delivery to the consignees in any other part of the port of Havre. In all the cases cited by the appellants there was an express contract to do a particular thing, which the parties failed to perform. These goods were discharged into a lighter, and were there at the absolute disposal of the consignee, provided that he sent them elsewhere, and did not attempt to land them in in the port of Havre. On the other hand, the appellant had entered into an express contract to take the goods out within twenty-four hours after arrival, and in the performance of this contract he has failed, and hence is liable even if performance was impossible: (Ford v. Colesworth, 9 B. & S. 559; 10 B. & S.

991; L. Rep. 4 Q.B. 127; L. Rep. 5 Q.B. 544.) In Dakin v. Oxley (15 C. B. N.S. 646; 10 L. T. Rep. N.S. 268; 2 Mar. Law. Cas. O.S. 6.) Willes, J., says: "The true test of the right to freight is, the question whether the service in respect of which the freight was contracted to be paid has been substantially performed; and, according to the law of England, as a rule freight is earned by the carriage and arrival of the goods ready to be delivered to the merchant." That was the case here. The usual place of delivery must be taken to be the usual place at the time of the arrival of the goods; and, as this place was under the control of the port authorities, on the naming by them of a place of discharge within the port that place must be taken to be the usual place for the time being. There was a substantial performance of the contract, and that was sufficient: (The Teutonia, ubi sup.) In Waugh v. Morris (ante, vol. 1, p. 573; L. Rep. 8 Q.B. 202; 28 L. T. Rep. N.S. 216; it was held that a contract to carry and deliver goods, not in itself illegal, but the performance of which had become impossible, because to deliver at the place named had become illegal, was properly performed by delivery in another manner within the charter not illegal; hence, where performance was in this case possible by delivering elsewhere than at the quay, the contract must be considered as performed. [Sir M. SMITH: Is it not common sense that when it is impossible to deliver at the usual place, as both parties are bound to use reasonable diligence in the completion of the contract, the next best place in the harbour under the special circumstances of the case is the place where delivery should take place?]

Again, this delivery took place under the directions of Généstal, who, as we submit, was the appellant's agent for that purpose. The letter to him appointed him agent because the words as to the payment of expenses, &c., had the effect of authorising him to pay freight for the goods, and to recover it over against the consignees. As the consignee resided at Rouen, it was necessary for the appellant to appoint some one to receive the goods at Havre until the presentation of the bill of lading, and this was provided for by the appointment of Généstal. Although the letter did not arrive until after the first departure of the ship from Havre, yet after the return he was fully authorised to act as agent, and in accepting on board the lighter he accepted delivery there. Moreover, there was an implied obligation on the part of the appellant to supply goods which were capable of being carried and delivered, and he was bound to have known of the incapacity of the cargo; his ignorance cannot be used as an excuse to relieve him from the payment of the freight due for the carriage of the goods. The Fortuna and The Friend (ubi sup.) do not proceed merely on the ground of the right to freight arising out of the exceptional circumstances of hostile capture, but Lord Stowell distinctly considers the question whether a shipowner would have any right to freight independently of capture. If the agent was prevented from taking complete delivery in consequence of the incapacity of the cargo, that cannot affect the respondent's right to freight.

But even assuming that Généstal was not appointed agent for the appellant, then there remains the question of the duty of a master or ship's agent in a case of emergency arising affecting the cargo.

PRIV. CO.]

BROWN (app.) v. GAUDET (resp.); CARGO ex ARGOS.

There can be no doubt that a master is bound to use all due diligence to preserve his cargo from injury: (Notara v. Henderson, ante, vol. 1, p. 278; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 346; Id. 7 Q. B. 225; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 577; 27 Id. 447; 3 Mar. Law. Cas. O. S. 419.) Having got the goods to the port of Havre, the master was not bound to bring them back to London, and might, if he had been able, have landed and warehoused them. He could not land them in this case; was he to have thrown them overboard? If he had landed them he would have been entitled to charge the owners of the goods with the expenses of keeping them; and surely it is reasonable that, having done the best thing for the goods under circumstances, viz., brought them back to England, the master is entitled to charge the expense of so doing—that is, to charge the return freight. He is the agent of the owner of the goods to that extent. The expenses incurred at Havre and the other ports arose directly out of the conduct of the owner of the goods in forwarding such a cargo, and hence he should pay them: (Hill v. Idle, 4 Camp. 327). (The rest of the argument was the same as that in the court below.)

The Admiralty Advocate in reply.—The respondent was never ready and willing to deliver, nor was he ever in a position to do so. The ship could not enter the port of Havre in the proper sense with these goods on board, because she had to transship them before she was entered at the custom house. If the respondent had wished that any part of the port should be taken as the place of delivery, he should have expressed it in his contract: (Marquis of Bute v. Thompson, 13 M. & W. 487.) In The Teutonia (ubi sup.) a fresh contract was created by the demand for delivery at another port than that named. [SIR MONTAGUE SMITH.—The resemblance between the two cases is that here the question is whether the delivery at one part of the port is sufficient when delivery at another part has become impossible; that in The Teutonia it was held that delivery at one of several ports named in the charter was a sufficient performance of the contract where the port named became impossible.] There is no claim for expenses or back freight, as there is no contract, express or implied, on which the respondent can found the claim, he not having completed his original agreement. [SIR MONTAGUE SMITH: Suppose the contract had been dissolved without the fault of either party, what ought the master to have done with the goods? Should he keep them or throw them overboard?] He should bring them back at the shipowner's risk and expense. It is a risk he undertakes when he ships the goods, unless he expressly excepts the risk in his contract. [SIR MONTAGUE SMITH: If he were proceeding on a voyage, could he not send them back in another ship?] Certainly, but at his own expense, unless the contingency was provided for.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 30, 1873.—The judgment of the court was delivered by SIR MONTAGUE SMITH.—This was a cause originally brought in the City of London Court by the respondent, the owner of the steamship Argos, for freight, demurrage, and expenses in respect of 147 barrels of petroleum, shipped by the appellant to be carried from London to Havre. Judgment was given for the plaintiff in the City of London Court for the full amount claimed, 135*l.* 5*s.* 3*d.*, and affirmed on appeal by the judge of the Admiralty Court, with leave to appeal to her Majesty in Council. A statement of agreed facts forms part of the record, and the following general facts may be collected from it. [His Lordship then shortly stated the facts as given in the statement, and after pointing out that the letter from the appellants to Généstal of Dec. 6, 1870, did not reach Havre till Dec. 9, continued.]

It was contended for the plaintiff that by this letter the defendant constituted Généstal his agent to deal generally with the goods, and that what was done with them at Havre was by his authority as such agent. But, in their lordships' view, such an agency was not created; in fact, the Argos was despatched to Honfleur before Généstal had received the letter.

The first question is, whether the freight was earned. The bill of lading which forms the contract describes the ship as bound "for Havre," and the special and material terms are the following, viz.: "the goods to be taken out within twenty-four hours after arrival, or pay 10*l.* 10*s.* a day demurrage. . . . and are to be delivered in good order, &c., at the aforesaid port of Havre . . . on paying freight." The master, as a rule, is only bound to deliver cargo upon production of the bill of lading; and it is clear that freight may be earned before actual delivery, if the goods have been brought to the port of arrival ready to be delivered according to the bill of lading. The rule was stated in the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas delivered by Willes, J., in Dakin v. Oxley (15 C. B., N. S., 664) as follows:—"The true test of the right to freight is the question whether the service in respect of which the freight was contracted to be paid has been substantially performed; and according to the law of England, as a rule, freight is earned by the carriage and arrival of the goods, ready to be delivered to the merchant." Arrival, of course, means "at the destined port," as the next passage of the judgment explains. There is no doubt that, in this case, the goods were carried to the destined port, and the question is, whether, when they had been brought to the port the master was ready to deliver them there, if the merchant had been ready to perform his part of the contract by taking them from the ship. The express contract of the shipowner is to deliver at the port of Havre; that of the merchant to "take out" the goods there within twenty-four hours after arrival, or pay demurrage. No part of the port being expressly mentioned for discharging, there can be no doubt that under usual circumstances the ship ought to have been brought to the place in the port where cargo, such as she carried, is ordinarily discharged. It is stated that "in the ordinary course of business petroleum would be delivered on the quay at Havre, on presentation of the bill of lading." Their lordships however think that, although this may be the ordinary course, and that in the usual state of things in the port, the quay would have been the proper place for the ship to have gone to be discharged, yet that this being an implied duty only, it does not amount to an engagement to go there in all events and under all circumstances. It may be that if the shipowner had expressly agreed to go to the quay, he must have been held to a strict performance of what he had contracted to do; but his express contract is only to deliver in the port of Havre, and what is a compliance with that obligation must depend on and vary with the existing state of things in the port. The following observations on this subject occur in the judgment of Tindal, C. J., in the case Galliffe v. Bourne, (4 Bing. N. C. 329): "But we know of no general rule of law which governs the delivery of goods under a bill of lading, where such delivery is not expressly in accordance with the terms of the bill of lading, except that it must be a delivery according to the practice and custom usually observed in the port or place of delivery. An issue raised upon an allegation of such a mode of delivery would accommodate itself to the facts of each particular case, and would let in every species of excuse from the strict and literal compliance with the precise terms of the bill of lading, which must necessarily be allowed to prevail with reference to the means and accommodation for landing goods at different places, the time of the arrival and departure of the vessel, the state of the tide and wind, interruptions from accidental causes, and all the other circumstances which belong to each particular port or place of delivery." The petroleum was not allowed to be discharged at or near the quay, apparently because munitions of war were lying about. But the same impossibility of getting the ship up to it might have arisen if the quay had been under repair, or the approach to it had been prevented by a wreck. It could not be said that, had such accidents happened, the shipowner would not have performed his contract by being ready to discharge in some other convenient part of the port. It is true that on the first arrival of the Argos at Havre she was not permitted to stay anywhere in the port more than a few hours; but on her return, after her ineffectual efforts at other ports, she not only obtained permission to stay in the outer harbour, but to discharge the petroleum there. This outer harbour is within the port, and is, as their lordships understand, an artificially protected place where goods may be conveniently and safely discharged. The petroleum remained there for at least four days, during which the delivery of it could have been given, being, as their lordships think, a reasonable time for that purpose; and although the authorities would not allow it to be landed at Havre, the defendant might undoubtedly have received it, if he had chosen, in the harbour, and given it any other destination he pleased.

But it was further contended for the defendant, that, in order to perform his contract, the master must not only have been ready to deliver in the port, but to land the goods at Havre, or that, at the least, the defendant, on receiving them, must himself have been able to land them there; and that, as this could not be done, the contract became incapable of performance, and dissolved. Their Lordships are not of this opinion. They think the effect of the stipulation in the bill of lading, "The goods to be taken out within twenty-four hours after arrival, or pay ten guineas a day demurrage," was to cast upon the defendant the obligation of taking the goods out of, or at all events from, the ship, that is, from alongside. The engagement of the defendant to pay demurrage after twenty-four hours clearly implies that the parties contemplated that the ship might be detained by his default to take out the goods, and that it was not intended the master should land or take the risk of landing them. The prohibition to land the petroleum, therefore, did not prevent the plaintiff from fulfilling his part of the contract. The note in the margin of the bill of lading relating to a landing charge is probably a printed form, and may mean that goods, if landed, are subject to such a charge; but this general notice cannot control the special terms in the body of the bill. In a recent case (Waugh v. Morris, ante, vol. 1, p. 573; L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 202), a cargo of hay was brought from Trouville to London, under charter and bill of lading which made the hay deliverable at the port of London. There was a stipulation to the effect that the cargo should be brought and taken from the ship alongside. The shipper directed the master to proceed to a particular wharf in Deptford Creek, and the parties contemplated landing the hay there. It turned out that by an order in council, under the Cattle Diseases Act, of which they were ignorant, it was made illegal to land in England hay brought from France. After a long delay the shipper received the hay into another ship alongside; and the action was brought against him for demurrage whilst the ship was detained. The defence set up was the illegality of the contract; but Mr Justice Blackburn in delivering judgment made some observations which bear on the objection relied on in this case, that the contract of the shipowner was not performed because the petroleum could not be landed at Havre. The learned judge says: "When it turned out that the defendants had named a place for the performance of the contract where the performance was impossible because illegal, that did not put an end to the contract, if the performance in any other way was legal and practicable. In the present case the performance, by receiving the cargo alongside in the river without landing at all, was both legal and practicable." Again, "It is a mistake to say the plaintiff intended that the hay should be landed. He no doubt contemplated that it would be, for, except under very unusual circumstances, hay is not brought into the Thames for any other object; but all that the shipowner bargained for, and all that he can properly be said to have intended, was, that on the arrival of the ship in London, his freight should be paid, and the hay taken out of his ship." The learned judge also says that The Teulonia, lately decided by this committee (ante, vol. 1, p. 214, L. Rep. 4 P. C. 172), would have been precisely in point if the order in force had come into operation after the contract instead of before. In Waugh v. Morris, the plaintiff recovered for the detention of his ship, although it was not possible to land the hay anywhere in the port of London. The contract of the shipper in that case does not, in their Lordships' view, substantially differ from the defendant's in the present. It was remarked by Mr. Justice Blackburn that the hay might, under some circumstances, have been profitably re-shipped, and it might have so happened in this case with the petroleum. It can scarcely be contended that the master would have been justified, when he found the petroleum could not be landed, in at once leaving the port without waiting a reasonable time to give to the defendant an opportunity of receiving it there. He might, even if the prohibition had not existed, have desired to send the goods to Rouen or elsewhere by water, instead of landing them. Their Lordships, therefore, think that the means of performing the contract were not exhausted, nor the contract dissolved, when it was found the ship could not be discharged at the quay and the cargo landed; and that they ought to hold that, the master being ready and able to give delivery in the harbour, and having kept the goods a reasonable time there for the purpose, the freight has been earned. It is admitted that both parties, when they made the contract, were ignorant of the prohibition against landing petroleum, and therefore no question of intentional infraction of the law of France arises.

BROWN (app.) v. GAUDET (resp.); CARGO ex ARGOS.

It was contended for the plaintiff that, as the inability to land arose from the incapacity of the goods and not of the ship, the judgment of Sir William Scott in The Fortuna (Edwards 26) was an authority for declaring the freight to be recoverable, even if the contract of the ship had been to land the goods, or to deliver them on land. But as, in their Lordships' view, that is not the contract, it is unnecessary for them to consider whether the judgment for the plaintiff could properly rest upon this ground. The counsel for the defendant relied on some of the reasons given by the judges in Ford and others v. Cotesworth and others (L. Rep. 4 Q.B. 127; 5 Id. 544). The action in that case was for detaining the ship, and the judges were considering whether reasonable diligence had been used by the merchant in unloading the goods. The right to freight did not arise, and the attention of the judges was directed only to the question whether, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, unreasonable delay in discharging the ship had been established.

The next question to be considered is, whether the plaintiff is entitled to compensation in the shape of homeward freight for bringing the petroleum back to England. It seems to be a reasonable inference from the facts, that after the four days during which the petroleum had been lying in the harbour had expired, the authorities would not have allowed it to remain there. It was still in the master's possession, and the question is, whether he should have destroyed or saved it. If he was justified in trying to save it, their Lordships think he did the best for the interest of the defendant in bringing it back to England. Whether he was so justified is the question to be considered. As pointed out by the judge of the Admiralty Court, the same kind of question arose in Christy v. Row (2 Taunt. 300). In that case Sir James Mansfield says: "Where a ship is chartered upon one voyage outwards only, with no reference to her return, and no contemplation of a disappointment happening, no decision which I have been able to find determines what shall be done in case the voyage is defeated; the books throw no light on the subject. The natural justice of the matter seems obvious—that a master should do that which a prudent man would think most conducive to the benefit of all concerned. But it appears to be wholly voluntary; I do not know that he is bound to do it; and yet, if it were a cargo of cloth or other valuable merchandise, it would be a great hardship that he might be at liberty to cast it overboard. It is singular that such a question should at this day remain undecided." The precise point does not seem to have been subsequently decided; but several cases have since arisen in which the nature and scope of the duty of the master, as agent of the merchant, have been examined and defined. (Amongst others, Tronson v. Dent, 8 Moore P. C. C. 419; Notara v.

Henderson, ante, vol. 1, p. 278; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 225; Australasian Navigation Company v. Morse ante, vol. 1, p. 407; L. Rep. 4 P. C. 222.) It results from them that not merely is a power given, but a duty is cast upon the master in many cases of accident and emergency, to act for the safety of the cargo in such manner as may be best under the circumstances in which it may be placed, and that, as a correlative right, he is entitled to charge its owner with the expenses properly incurred in so doing. Most of the decisions have related to cases where the accident happened before the completion of the voyage, but their Lordships think it ought not to be laid down that all obligations on the part of the master to act for the merchant ceases after a reasonable time for the latter to take delivery of the cargo has expired. It is well established that if the ship has waited a reasonable time to deliver goods from her side, the master may land and warehouse them at the charge of the merchant; and it cannot be doubted that it would be his duty to do so rather than to throw them overboard. In a case like the present, where the goods could neither be landed nor remain where they were, it seems to be a legitimate extension of the implied agency of the master to hold that, in the absence of all advices, he had authority to carry or send them on to such other place as in his judgment, prudently exercised, appeared to be most convenient for their owner; and if so, it will follow from established principles that the expenses properly incurred may be charged to him. Their Lordships have no doubt that bringing the goods back to England was in fact the best and cheapest way of making them available to the defendant, and that they were brought back at less charge in the Argos than if they had been sent in another ship. If the goods had been of a nature which ought to have led the master to know that on their arrival they would not have been worth the expenses incurred in bringing them back, a different question would arise. But in the present case their value, of which the defendant has taken the benefit by asking for and obtaining the goods, far exceeded the cost. The authority of the master, being founded on necessity, would not have arisen if he could have obtained instructions from the defendant or his assignees. But under the circumstances this was not possible; indeed, this point was not relied on at the bar.

Their Lordships, for the above reasons, are of opinion that the plaintiff has made out a case for compensation for bringing back the goods to England.

But they think the plaintiff is not entitled to recover the amount claimed for demurrage and expenses in attempting to enter the ports of Honfleur and Trouville. These efforts may have been made by him in the interest of the cargo as well as the ship; but they were made before the ship was ready to deliver at all in the port of Havre, and the expenses of this deviation and of the return to Havre, after permission had been obtained to discharge there, must be treated as expenses of the voyage, and not as incurred for the benefit of the defendant. The charges for the hire of the vessel and of storing the petroleum in her at Havre, after permission had been obtained for its discharge there, stand on different ground. If the ship had then waited in the outer harbour with the petroleum on board, the defendant would have been liable to pay demurrage at 10*l.* 10*s.* a day. It was obviously, therefore, to his advantage under the circumstances for the master to hire the vessel and thus relieve him from the heavy demurrage payable for the detention of the ship. The whole expense of this operation appears to be about 15*l.* only.

In the result their Lordships think the plaintiff is entitled to recover the outward freight, and the charge made for the carriage back to England, together 48*l.* 8*s.*, and also the 15*l.* for the above expenses at Havre, in all 63*l.* 8*s.*

When their Lordships remitted the cause, after deciding the question of jurisdiction, they were told it had been fully heard by the judge of the Admiralty Court, and they presumed that the judgment he was prepared to give would be acquiesced in. The defendant, however, notwithstanding the small amount in dispute, applied for leave to appeal, which was granted only on the ground that questions of law of general importance were involved in the decision. Having failed on these questions, he ought, although the decree will be reduced in amount, to pay the costs of his appeal.

Their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the judgment given for the plaintiff ought to be affirmed, except only that the amount thereof should be reduced to 63*l.* 8*s.* The respondent will have the costs of this appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Reported by H. F. POOLEY and JOHN ROSE, Esqrs.,
Barristers-at-Law.

Saturday, May, 3, 1873.

CORKLING v. MASSEY.

Charter-party—Meaning of words, "expected to be at a port"—Warranty—Breach of.

By a charter-party it was mutually agreed between the plaintiff and defendant that a ship expected to be at Alexandria about 15th Dec. should proceed to Alexandria, or as near thereto as she could safely get, and there load a cargo.

Held, that the words expected to be at Alexandria about 15th Dec. were a matter of contract for the breach whereof an action is maintainable, also that they mean that the ship is in such a place that she may reasonably expect to be at Alexandria at the time named.

THE declaration stated that an agreement or charter-party was made by and between the plaintiff and defendant bearing date the 14th Nov. 1871, and that in the said charter-party it was agreed between Messrs. Massey and Sawyer, of the good British steamship or vessel called the Ceres, expected to be at Alexandria about the 15th Dec. 1871, and R. Corkling, of Manchester, merchant, that the ship being tight, staunch, and strong, classed A1, and every way fitted for the voyage, should with all convenient speed sail and proceed to Alexandria, Egypt, or so near therunto as she may safely get, and there load a full and complete cargo of cotton, seed, &c. setting out all the conditions of the charter-party; and averred that the said Robert Corkling, in the said charter-party mentioned was the plaintiff, and the said Massey therein mentioned was the defendant, and that all things happened, and all times elapsed, necessary to entitle the plaintiff to have the said agreement performed by the defendant, and to maintain this action for the breaches thereinafter alleged, yet the said ship was not then expected to be at Alexandria about the said 15th Dec. 1871, but it was then in such part of the world, and under such engagements that the said ship could not perform her said engagements and arrive at Alexandria about the said day.

Plea 3.—And for a third plea the defendant says that before and at the time of the making of the alleged agreement, the said vessel Ceres in the said charter-party mentioned, was on a passage to Revel and Helsingfors, and thence to load from Cronstadt or Riga for a port on the east coast of England or a port on the continent, and thence to proceed to Alexandria with a cargo from a coal port, of all which the plaintiff had notice, and the said above-named defendant says, that the alleged charter-party was made subject to the conditions that the said vessel should with all convenient speed fulfil her said engagements and then sail and proceed to Alexandria, and the said above-named defendant says that the said vessel did with all convenient speed fulfil his said engagement, and sail and proceed to Alexandria.

The defendant demurred to so much of the declaration as alleged as a breach, that the said ship was in such part of the world, and under such engagements, that the said ship could not perform her said engagements and arrive at Alexandria about the said day or days.

Replication and joinder in demurrer and demurrer to the defendant's third plea.

Joinder in demurrer.

Day, Q.C. (with whom was Petheram) for the plaintiff.—It is part of the contract that the ship shall be at Alexandria on or about the day named, and it amounts to a warranty that she was so situated that she might be there, and under such engagements that she might be reasonably expected to arrive there at the date mentioned. What the words "on or about" mean, is shown in the case of Behn v. Burness (1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 178, 329; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 207; 3 B. & S. 751); there by a charter-party dated the 19th Oct. it was agreed that the ship now being in the port of Amsterdam, should sail to Newport for cargo. On 15th Oct. the ship was at a place sixty miles from Amsterdam, and could have reached the docks in twelve hours with ordinary weather, but owing to boisterous weather, she did not reach the docks until the 23rd inst. It was held that the words in the charter-party, "now in the port of Amsterdam," implied a warranty, and that as the ship was not in the port of Amsterdam at the time the charter-party was made, the charterer was justified in saying there had been a failure of performance of an essential condition, and in refusing to load the ship on her arrival at Newport. Secondly, the plea is bad, for the charter-party being in writing, cannot be varied or added to by any parol condition. Young v. Austen (L. Rep. 4 C. P. 553; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 396) is against me, but that case is disapproved of, and Brett, J. invites the court to overrule it in Abrey v. Cruw (L. Rep. 5 C. P. 46). [KEATING, J.—We certainly sitting here should not overrule a decision of our own court.]

Butt, Q.C. and L. E. Webster for the defendant.—There is no condition precedent that the vessel should be at Alexandria. It is a mere statement in the charter-party, that the vessel is expected to be there about the 15th Dec. A statement of the tonnage of a ship in a charter-party is mere matter of description, and does not amount to a warranty: (Barker v. Windle, 6 El. & Bl. 675; see also Harris v. Mantle, 3 T. R. 307). And so here the statement is too vague to amount to a warranty, and distinguishable from Behn v. Burness (ubi sup.). It is necessary for the plaintiff to aver according to the true construction of the charter-party, that the defendant knew that the situation of the ship was such that she could not be expected to arrive. The third plea does not attempt to vary the words of the charter-party, but shows that the whole charter-party was subject to a condition that the vessel should fulfil her engagements, which she had at that time unfinished. [KEATING, J.—On that point we have made up our minds.

Day, Q.C. in reply.

KEATING, J.—With reference to the demurrer to the third plea, we have already expressed our opinion; it is decided by the opinion expressed by this court in the case of Young v. Austen (20 L. T. Rep. N.S. 396; L. Rep. 4 C. P. 553), and which case we entirely approve of. The remaining point for us to consider is with reference to the breach in the declaration. It alleges that the ship was not then expected to be at Alexandria about the 15th Dec. 1871, but was then in such part of the world, and under such engagements, that the ship could not perform her said engagements and arrive at Alexandria about the day. It depends whether the words "expected to be at Alexandria" are words of description, or are in the nature of a contract. I am of opinion they are in the nature of a warranty, and that the breach is therefore well assigned. No doubt the words are somewhat vague and uncertain, but I come to the conclusion they are part of the contract, and intended to be so. It is of the utmost importance to the charterer that he should know when to expect the ship to be at Alexandria, and such a statement one would expect to find in every charter-party. I therefore consider that the words "expected to be at Alexandria about the 15th Dec. 1871," mean she is in such a position that she may reasonably be expected to be there, else there would be no binding contract between the shipowner and the charterer, and the charterer would be at the owner's mercy. Here we do no violence to hold as we do. The proper construction is, that it is in the nature of a warranty, for breach of which there is a cause of action, and the breach is well assigned.

HONYMAN, J.—As to the third plea, I agree with my brother Keating, we are bound by the decision in Young v. Austen (ubi sup.). On the other question I consider the words used in alleging the breach as a matter of contract; they afford the only indication in the charter-party whereabouts the vessel is, and the only thing that affords the charterer any information when he will be likely to be able to ship his cargo. The words are not in the nature of description. In Gorriessen v. Perrin (2 C.B., N.S., 681), the words expected to arrive per a certain ship were held to be a warranty that the goods were then on their way. In Oliver v. Fielden (4 Ex. 135), by the charter-party it was agreed a new ship now about to be launched and ready to receive cargo in May, should load on board a cargo of timber, and it was there held that the readiness to receive a cargo in May was a condition precedent to the plaintiff's right to recover for not loading a full cargo. I do not think that the words can be made out to be matter of description; there must therefore be judgment on the demurrer to the plea for the defendant, and on the demurrer to the declaration for the plaintiff.

ROBINSON v. KNIGHT AND ANOTHER.

Charter-party—Lump freight—Loss of part of cargo by excepted perils—Deduction of freight.

By charter-party it was agreed that the ship should load a cargo of lathwood and a deck load, and "proceed to London and deliver the same, being paid freight as follows, viz., a lump sum of 315*l.* . . . the freight to be paid in cash, half on the arrival, the remainder on unloading and right delivery of cargo." The ship took her cargo accordingly, but on the homeward voyage the deck load was washed overboard and lost, by the excepted perils of the sea, without default of the shipowner. The rest of the cargo was rightly delivered;

Held, that the charterer was not entitled to deduct from the lump freight a sum proportioned to the amount of cargo which had been so lost, but that the whole freight was earned by the shipowner.

The Norway (Bro. & L. 404) followed.

ACTION in the Lord Mayor's Court to recover a sum of 16*l.* 19*s.* 9*d.* for freight under a charter-party.

By charter-party of 3rd Oct. 1870, it was agreed between the owner of the ship Nile and the defendants, merchants of London, that the vessel should go to Riga there to load at two places named a full and complete cargo of lath wood, the ship to be provided with a deckload, and "that the ship so loaded shall proceed to London and deliver the same, being paid freight as follows, viz., a lump sum of 315*l.*, the cargo to be taken from the side of the ship, freight to be paid in cash, half on the arrival, the remainder on unloading, and right delivery of cargo, less four months' discount."

The charter contained the usual clause, excepting losses by perils of the sea, &c.

The ship went to Riga, then loaded a full cargo with a deck load, and returned; but on the homeward voyage the deck load was, without default of the shipowner, washed overboard and lost by the perils of the sea.

The rest of the cargo having been delivered, the plaintiff claimed his lump freight, but the defendant sought to deduct therefrom a sum of 16*l.* 19*s.* 9*d.* in respect of the deck load lost, whereupon the plaintiff sued to recover the 16*l.* 19*s.* 9*d.*

The cause was tried by the Common Serjeant without a jury, when the defendants denied their liability to pay freight for the part of the cargo lost. Verdict for the 16*l.* 19*s.* 9*d.* Leave to move to enter a nonsuit.

A rule having been obtained accordingly upon the authorities following, viz.—

ROBINSON v. KNIGHT AND ANOTHER.

Grantham showed cause.—There was in effect a demise of the ship. The defendants have had the use of the whole vessel, and the plaintiff is entitled to the sum agreed upon for freight without deduction in respect of the part of the cargo which was lost, through no default on his part but, by the excepted perils. The Norway (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 17, 168, 254; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 57; Br. & L. 377) was cited on moving the rule. There it was held that in all cases of short delivery under a bill of lading, a deduction may be made from the freight of such proportion as would have been payable if the goods had been delivered, and this, even though the freight be lump freight, but must, if necessary, be the subject of a separate action. But here the cargo was lost by excepted perils, which was not so in the Norway, and which distinguishes this case from that. [BRETT, J.—Dr. Lushington in that case says (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 172), “The freight is lump freight, and it is urged on behalf of the defendant that lump freight cannot be apportioned, that the deduction would be difficult if not impossible to calculate, and consequently that the only remedy open to the shipper is that of an action for damages. On the other hand, Mr. Lush argued for the plaintiffs, that if there was any difference between lump freight and freight per tale, it was, that in the case of lump freight, if any part of the cargo shipped was not brought to the port of destination, the shipowner in an action for freight could not recover any freight at all, because he would not have observed his own part of the contract, and in favour of this proposition he cited the old case of Bright v. Couper (1 Brown, 21). There seems to have been no recent decision on the point, and on consulting the various text-books on the subject, I find that they all speak doubtfully as to what would be decided if a case like the present was to arise, and the court must therefore fall back upon considerations of equity.”] In Dakin v. Oxley (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 6; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 268; 15 C. B., N. S., 268; 15 C. B., N. S., 646) it was held that it is no answer to an action by a shipowner against the charterer to recover freight, that, by the fault of the master and crew, and their negligent and unskilful navigation of the vessel, the cargo was damaged so as, upon the arrival at the port of discharge, to be then and there of less value than the freight, and that the charterer abandoned it to the shipowner. [BRETT, J.—There the whole cargo of coal arrived in specie, though damaged. But I find the Norway went to the Privy Council, and the loss of part of the cargo having been occasioned by perils of the seas, the court held that, under the bills of lading and charter-party, the master’s lien on the residue for freight extended to the entire lump freight without deduction (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 254; Bro. & Lush. 404). Now, there is a decision directly in your favour.] It is. [BRETT, J.—But the charter was in somewhat different terms, for the sum of 11,250*l.* was to be paid as freight “for the use and hire of the ship.”] A little stronger phrase than is to be found here, perhaps, but both cases are governed by the same principle. The payment here is in effect to be for the use and hire of the vessel. [BRETT, J.—It is clear from the judgment of Dr. Lushington that he put the case entirely on the ground of the jettison having been caused by the neglect of the master; and in the Privy Council the Court say (p. 257), “It is right to add that we do not mean to express an opinion that, even if the jettison and sale had been attributable to the negligence of the master, there ought to have been a deduction. Perhaps in this case the proper remedy of the shipper would have been by a cross action.”]

Cock in support of the rule.—In the Norway (sup.) there was a clear demise of the vessel, and Knight Bruce, L.J. (in the course of the argument, see B. & L. 406) pointed out that the shipper had had the full value of the use of the ship. Here, however, are no such precise words. The contract for lump freight was merely made with reference to the nature of the cargo, the quantity of which could not be so easily ascertained by piece as when bales, &c. are shipped. Logs of wood would doubtless vary in size a good deal; and, therefore, it would be more convenient to estimate them in bulk and say, “For the shipload of wood delivered, you shall pay freight 315*l.* And for so much as is not delivered a proportionate deduction may be made.”

KEATING, J.—I think the rule must be discharged. This is a question which arises on the right of the shipowner to recover the whole of a sum described as lump freight, without any deduction in consequence of the loss of the deck cargo contemplated by the charter-party, which loss occurred through no default on the part of the shipowner. Now the charter was entered into on the 3rd Oct. 1872, and by it the ship was to go to Riga, and there to load, at two places named, a full and complete cargo of lath wood, the ship to be provided with a deck load. Then it provides “that the ship, so loaded, shall proceed to London and deliver the same, being paid freight as follows, viz. a lump sum of 315*l.*, the cargo to be taken from the side of the ship; freight to be paid in cash, half on the arrival, the remainder on unloading and right delivery of cargo, less four months’ discount.” The ship took in a full cargo, and took the deck load contemplated by the charter. But that deck load was lost by perils of the sea and without any default by the shipowner. The question is whether the shipowner is entitled to recover the full amount of 315*l.*, or whether there should be a proportionate deduction in respect of the freight payable on the deck load which was so lost without the default of the shipowner. Some things are quite clear in this case. There seems to be no doubt that, under this charter, if the charterers had loaded less than a full cargo, the shipowner would have been entitled to a payment of the whole lump freight. Can any real distinction in principle be established between a deficiency in the cargo caused by cargo not having been originally put on board, or a deficiency caused by peril of the sea without default of the shipowner? It seems to me that there can be no such distinction in principle. The only case relied on in moving this rule seems to be that of the Norway decided in the Admiralty Court by Dr. Lushington, and afterwards taken to the Privy Council. We have before us the decision of the Court on the appeal. There, on a charter-party not altogether identical with this, but, on the other hand, not distinguishable in principle, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council held the shipowner entitled to the lump freight without any deduction in consequence of losses occurring without anything that could be charged as negligence in the shipowner. The terms there were, in every respect, very similar to those now in question; and it is to be observed that a portion of the lump sum was to be paid in advance, and the remainder on the true and sufficient delivery of cargo at the port of discharge, similar words to those in the present charter, yet, nevertheless, they held that the whole lump sum was recoverable, although part of the cargo was lost. In the Norway, as was pointed out by my Brother Brett, during this argument, Sir M. Vaughan Williams says, that although the charter expressed the sum to be paid as freight, yet it was for the "use and hire of the ship," and this lump sum was to cover both the out and inward voyage. Now, I do not think that that makes any substantial distinction between the two cases, because it was not the less one entire sum to be paid for one entire service. What was the service for which it was to be paid? Was it the bringing and delivery of all cargo which might be put on board, or bringing cargo which might be put on board, and was not, but without default of the shipowner? Sir E. V. Williams said, "It was objected on behalf of the respondent that by the charter-party the remainder of the lump sum is made payable only on 'true and final delivery of the cargo at the said port of discharge.' But it does not necessarily mean that the whole cargo originally shipped must be delivered. It may well have been intended merely to fix the time for payment to be the time of the delivery of such cargo as the ship brings with her to the port of discharge" (7 Mar. Law Cas. O. S., p. 257). It seems to me that the same construction can be put on this charter-party. I think the better opinion is clearly that where a portion of the cargo has been lost without any default on the part of the shipowner, he is entitled to be paid his lump freight, even although there has been a partial loss.

BRETT, J.—It is quite true that the terms of this charter are not exactly the same as those apparently were in the Norway. But in the present case I think that the freight is a stipulated payment for a gross sum for the use of the whole ship for the whole voyage. Under these circumstances the rule is that in the first place the gross sum will be payable, although the merchant has not fully laden the ship, for the owner has put his ship at the disposition of the freighter to load with a full and complete cargo, if the freighter so please, but if he did not so please, and the voyage be completed the shipowner will be entitled to the lump sum. He has under his contract given the use of the ship for the purpose of carrying a cargo to the extent the freighter chooses to put on board. Therefore, it seems to me, the charters in this case, and in that of the Norway, are the same. In the Norway, it may be observed the freight was called in both courts a "lump freight," and was so treated. I do not think that either under that charter, or under this, there was what is called a "demise" of the ship, the vessel remaining in both cases in the possession of the shipowner. But it is one gross sum for the use of the entire ship, instead of a sum to be paid for each part of the cargo carried. Then the fact that the freight is to be paid half on arrival and the other half on unloading and right delivery of cargo, as in the Norway, was relied on to show that it would be payable on the delivering of the cargo. What cargo? Such as the freighter chooses to put on board. Now, in this case, it is admitted that the disputed part of the cargo was lost by perils of the sea, within the excepted perils—therefore, not only lost without default of the shipowner but, positively a loss within the exception. In the case of the Norway before the Privy Council, the court doubted whether even if the cargo was lost by the shipowner he would not be entitled to full freight, leaving the freighter to bring an action against him. But here the loss was without any default. Then, if this be in fact the same case as the Norway, that is a distinct authority for saying that the innocent loss of a portion of the cargo does not entitle the freighter to deduct any part of the lump sum. Although a decision of the Privy Council is not in one sense binding on us, I think that court has put the true interpretation on the contract, and that the freighter bound himself to pay the full sum of £315*l.* for whatever things were brought to England. RODOCANOCHI AND OTHERS v. ELLIOTT AND OTHERS.

Marine policy—Terrene risk—Goods shut up in besieged town—"Restraint of princes"—Notice of abandonment—Total loss.

Plaintiffs effected an insurance with the defendants by a Lloyd's policy in the ordinary form "lost or not lost, at and from Japan ^{and} Shanghai to ^{and} Marseilles ^{and} Leghorn ^{and} London, ^{and} ^{or} Marseilles ^{and} Southampton, and whilst remaining there for transit" on silks against the usual perils—"arrests, restraints, and detainment of princes," &c., and it was agreed that the silks should be shipped by any of three designated lines of steamers, one of which was the Messageries Imperiales. That company, as was well known to underwriters, always sent such goods overland through France, i.e., by the Lyons Railway from Marseilles to Paris, and thence by the Northern Railway to Boulogne, and thence to London. The silks were shipped at Shanghai for London on board a steamer of the Messageries Imperiales, and reached Marseilles on the 27th Aug. 1870. There was then, and from the 15th July previously had been war between France and Germany. The silks were despatched by the Lyons Railway and arrived in Paris on or before the 13th Sept. The German armies, which were at that time advancing upon and gradually surrounding Paris, on the 19th completely invested it, held military possession of all the roads leading out of Paris, and prevented communication between it and all other places, by reason whereof it was impossible to remove the silk from Paris. This state of siege continued, and on the 29th Sept., while the silks were detained in Paris, the plaintiffs gave notice of abandonment to the underwriters:

Held, that the policy covered the terrene risk of the transit through France, that the goods were lost by the perils insured against, viz., restraint of princes; that notice of abandonment was given in reasonable time; and that, therefore, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the sum insured from the underwriters as for a total loss.

ACTION to recover 400*l.* on two policies of insurance—and the following Case was stated with-out pleadings.

1. The plaintiffs effected insurances on silks by two policies in the ordinary form of Lloyd's policies. By one dated 24th March, 1870, which was for 15,000*l.*, they caused themselves in the words of the policy to be insured as follows, that is to say:

Lost or not lost at an from Japan ^{and} Shanghai to Marseilles ^{or} Leghorn ^{and} London, ^{via} Marseilles ^{and} Southampton and whilst remaining there for transit, with leave to call at any ports or places in or out of the way for all purposes.

2. The subject matter to be insured is in the policy described as follows:

The said ship and goods and merchandises, &c., for so much as concerns the assured by agreement between the assured and assurers in the policy, are and shall be valued at 15,000*l.*, being on silks, to be hereafter valued and declared.

3. The risks insured against are described in the policy described as follows:

Touching the adventures and perils which we the assurers are contended to bear and do take upon us in this voyage, they are of the seas, men of war, fire, enemies, pirates, rovers, thieves, jettisons, letters of mart and counter mart, surprisals takings at sea, arrests, restraints, and detainerments of all kings, princes, and people of what nation, condition, and quality soever, barratry of the master and mariners, and of all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the said goods and merchandises or ships, &c., or any part thereof.

4. In the margin of this policy is a memorandum in the following words:

It is hereby agreed that the silks insured by this policy shall be shipped by Peninsular and Oriental Company, Messageries Imperiales steamers ^{and} the steamers of the Mercantile Trading Company of Liverpool only. And it is further agreed that on shipments by the last-mentioned company's steamers, 20s. additional shall be charged.

5. In the above policy, dated the 8th April 1870, which was for 1000*l.*, the voyage and the subject matter insured against are described in terms nearly the same as in the first mentioned policy.

6. The defendants underwrote each policy for 200*l.* (Copies of both policies were in the Appendix to this case, and might be referred to as part of this case.)

7. Sixty-four bales of silk, the subject of this action, were shipped at Shanghai on board the Messageries Imperiales steamer Phase, and consigned to the plaintiffs under a bill of lading dated 7th July 1870. (A copy whereof was in the Appendix.)

8. The silks were duly declared on the before-mentioned policies and valued at 11,220*l.*, and 3625*l.*, part of the said sum of 11,220*l.*, was declared on the first policy, and 7595*l.*, the residue of the said sum of 11,220*l.*, was declared on the second policy. These declarations were endorsed on the policies respectively. (Copies of these declarations were in the Appendix.)

9. At the time of the said declarations, and thence until the giving of the notice of abandonment hereinafter mentioned, the plaintiffs were interested in the silks to the amount of the said sum of 11,220*l.*

10. The silks were carried in the said steamer Phase from Shanghai to Hong Kong. They were there transhipped to the steamer Peiho of the same company, the Messageries Imperiales, and they were carried on board the said steamer Peiho through the Suez Canal direct to Marseilles. This is the ordinary course of business of the Messageries Imperiales in carrying the goods from Shanghai to Marseilles. Goods from Shanghai for Marseilles are carried by that company from Shanghai to Hong Kong by a branch line of steamers, and the steamers for Marseilles start from Hong Kong. The silks arrived at Marseilles on board the said steamer Peiho on the 27th Aug. 1870.

11. The Messageries Imperiales carry goods at through rates from Shanghai to London. Freight upon the silks was paid to the Messageries Imperiales from Shanghai to London.

12. (As amended at suggestion of the Court.) Before and at the time of insurances, the steamers of the Messageries Imperiales ran from the East to Marseilles and no further. Of those of the Peninsular and Oriental Company, one line ran to Marseilles and no further; another ran direct to Southampton. Those of the Mercantile Trading Company ran direct to Liverpool. Goods were never in the ordinary course of business carried from China, Japan, or India to London via Marseilles, except by the Messageries Imperiales, and that company always sent such goods overland through France, that is to say, by the Lyons Railway from Marseilles to Paris, and thence by the Northern Railway to Boulogne, and thence to London. Silk is usually, but not invariably, sent by petite vitesse. It was well known among underwriters that goods sent from China, Japan, or India to London via Marseilles were always sent overland through France.

13. At the time when the silks reached Marseilles there was, and from the 15th July previously had been war between France and Germany.

14. On the 15th July 1870, a decree of the French Government was issued in accordance with the Laws of France, whereby both the Lyons Railway Company and the Northern Railway Company were bound immediately to place at the disposal of the French Minister of War all their means of transport; and whereby the said companies were also empowered to suppress passenger or goods trains as far as might be necessary to carry out the before mentioned order. (A translation of so much of the decree as was material was in the Appendix.)

15. Notice of the before mentioned decree was on the 16th July 1870 sent to every station on each of the said railways respectively. A copy of this decree was posted up in every station of the said Lyons Railway.

16. After the date of the before mentioned decree each of the said railway companies continued to receive goods for carriage and to carry them in the ordinary course, except as hereinafter mentioned, until such carriage was interrupted at the times and in the manner hereinafter mentioned.

17. Goods sent from Marseilles to Paris, and carried by the Northern Railway from Paris to Boulogne for London, continued to leave Paris regularly till the 6th Sept. and to arrive in London regularly till the 7th Sept. 1870. On the 10th

Sept. 1870 carriage by the said railway from Paris to Boulogne became, and thence until after the giving of the notice of abandonment hereinafter mentioned, and until after the commencement of this action, continued to be impossible and ceased altogether in consequence of the German armies having taken possession of parts of the said railway, and intercepted all communications by such railway between Paris and Boulogne. During the month preceding the said 10th Sept. 1870, the time occupied by the journey between Marseilles and London varied greatly. The time ordinarily occupied in that journey is eight days for goods sent by petite vitesse.

18. On the 29th Aug. 1870 the plaintiffs received in London a letter from their agent at Shanghai, informing them of the shipment of the silk. This letter came from Shanghai to Marseilles by post in the same steamer with the silks.

19. On the same 29th Aug. 1870 the plaintiffs wrote to their agents, Messrs. Rodocanochi, of Marseilles, a letter containing the following terms:—

We have received advices from Shanghai of the sixty-five bales of silk R. S. C. 1/65 consigned to us by the Phase steamer and overland, that is to say, by the mail which has just arrived, and we find in the advices the following clause:—"To be warehoused at Marseilles at the company's expense during one month, and to await orders from the consignee." Begood enough, therefore, to give orders to the agent that the silks may be forwarded to London.

On the same day the plaintiffs wrote to their said agents at Marseilles another letter containing the following terms:

The first 65 bales from Shanghai are coming by the French steamer, and the freight is paid to London. We do not doubt that you have given orders to send them here. They are insured, including war risk

These letters would in the ordinary course of post reach Marseilles on the 31st Aug. 1870.

20. On the 31st Aug. 1870 Messrs. Rodocanochi, of Marseilles, sent the director of the Maritime Service of the Messageries Imperiales a letter, of which the following is the translation:

Marseilles, 31st Aug. 1870.

The Director of the Maritime Service of the Messageries Imperiales,—In town. We receive the orders of Messrs. Rodocanochi, Sons, and Co. to despatch to London the 65 bales of silk, "R. S. C." arrived from China by the French steamboat, Peiho, which you hold in warehouse to their orders. We forward you their order at once, begging you to have the goodness to execute it to-day, if possible. We have, &c.

(Signed) F. & K. RODOCANOCHI.

21. On the same 31st Aug. 1870 Messrs. Rodocanochi, of Marseilles, wrote to the plaintiffs in London a letter, from which the following is an extract:

We are glad to hear that you have insured the 65 bales of silk, including war risk, and we have ordered them to be forwarded to London, as you will see by the enclosed copy of our letter to the Messageries Imperiales.

22. The silks were delivered to the Lyons Railway Company on the 2nd Sept. 1870, and a receipt for them was given by that company. [A copy of this receipt, and of the endorsement thereupon was in the Appendix.]

23. The silks were despatched from Marseilles on the 3rd Sept. 1870 by petite vitesse.

24. The silks arrived at Bercy on or before the 13th Sept. 1870. Bercy is the railway station in Paris, at which goods sent by the Lyons railway arrive.

25. At the time of the arrival of the silks at Marseilles, and thence, until and after the arrival of the silks at Bercy, the German armies had invaded and occupied a large part of France, and were advancing upon and gradually surrounding Paris, which state of things continued until the 19th Sept. 1870, on which day the German armies completely invested Paris. From the last-mentioned day until the giving of the said notice of abandonment, and thence until the commencement of this action, they completely surrounded and besieged Paris, and held military possession of all the roads leading out of Paris, and prevented communication between Paris and all other places, by reason whereof it was during all this time aforesaid impossible to remove the silk from Paris.

26. On the 29th Sept. 1870, while the silks were detained in Paris as above-mentioned, Messrs. Rodocanochi, of Marseilles, received from the Messageries Imperiales a letter informing them of the detention of the silk at Bercy. (A translation was in the Appendix.)

27. On the 7th Oct. 1870 the plaintiffs gave notice of abandoning the silks to the defendant and the other underwriters. (A copy of the notice was in the Appendix.)

28. After the commencement of this action the silks were forwarded to London, and they arrived in London in an undamaged state on the 20th March 1871.

29. A correspondence, commencing on the 17th March and ending on the 9th May 1871, took place between Messrs. Markby and Tarry, the plaintiff's attorneys and solicitors, and Waltons and Bubb, the defendant's attorneys. (A copy of this correspondence was in the Appendix.) The notice referred to in the letter of the 17th March 1871, from Messrs. Markby and Tarry to Messrs. Waltons and Bubb, was a notice of the arrival of the silks in London received by the plaintiffs from the Messageries Imperiales. The plaintiffs, taking upon themselves to act for the benefit of the underwriters, dealt with the silks in the manner hereinafter mentioned.

30. On the 2nd Sept. 1870 the plaintiffs had by a written contract bearing date that day sold the silks to arrive, on the terms that the prompt should be four months from making, and that in the event of the silks not arriving the contract was to be null and void. (A copy was in the Appendix.)

31. When the silks arrived in London the prices of silks were about the same as at the time when the contract of the 2nd Sept. 1870 was made.

32. The purchasers elected to take and did receive the silks after their arrival in London under the last mentioned contract and paid the plaintiffs the net price of 9362*l* 12*s.* 6*d.*, in accordance with the terms of the contract.

33. The court might draw inferences of fact.

34. A claim was made on behalf of the plaintiffs before the arbitrator, by whom this case was stated, to recover as for a partial loss of the silks, first in respect of an alleged loss of weight in the silks by a natural process of drying, during and in consequence of their detention in Paris, and secondly, in respect of loss of interest upon the purchase money to be received for the silks during the period of such detention.

C. P.

RODOCANOCHI AND OTHERS v. ELLIOTT AND OTHERS.

The questions for the court were: First, whether the silks were covered by the policies at the time of the alleged loss; secondly, whether the plaintiffs were entitled to recover for a total loss of the silks; thirdly, whether the plaintiffs were entitled in point of law to recover as for a partial loss, in respect of the matters mentioned in par. 34, or either of them.

If the court should be of opinion in favour of the plaintiffs on the first question, and that there had been a total loss, judgment was to be entered for the plaintiffs for an amount to be ascertained as the court shall direct, with the costs of suit.

If the court should be of opinion in favour of the plaintiffs on the first question, and that the plaintiffs were entitled in point of law to recover as for a partial loss, in respect of the matters referred to in the third question, or either of them, the case should be referred back to the arbitrator, by whom this case was stated, to find what sum (if any) was recoverable in respect of such matter or matters, and in such case judgment should be entered for the plaintiffs for the amount (if any) which should be found to be so recoverable with the costs of suit. And if nothing should be found to be so recoverable, judgment should be entered or the defendant for his costs.

If the court should be of opinion in favour of the defendant upon the first question, or upon the second and third questions, judgment should be entered for the defendant for his costs.

Field, Q.C. (with him Thesiger) for the plaintiffs—First, the risk was covered by the policy. The voyage actually made, viz. to London via Marseilles, was within the policy, and the words in the description of the voyage, “whilst remaining there for transit,” apply to any of the voyages stipulated for which involve land transit, as the voyage in question undoubtedly did to the knowledge of the underwriters (par. 12). Part of the journey was clearly terrene.

Secondly, the loss was caused by one of the perils insured against, viz. an arrest, restraint, or detention of princes. There are no English cases precisely in point, but the American case of Oliveira v. The Union Insurance Company (3 Wheat. 183; 4 Curtis, 193) is nearly so, where it was held that a vessel within a port blockaded after the commencement of her voyage, and prevented from proceeding on it, sustains a loss by a peril within this clause of the policy insuring against the arrest, restraint, and detention of kings, &c. for which the insurers are liable. [BRETT, J.—But a blockade is for the very purpose of preventing ships going out of the port.] Just as the investment of Paris, in the present case, was to prevent the exit of men and goods. [BRETT, J.—Does no English case decide that blockade is an arrest?] None; but there is one in which it was held that the fear of arrest preventing the master of a vessel from entering a port did not amount to a total loss.

Hadkinson v. Robinson, 3 Bos. & P. 388;

Lubbock v. Rowcroft, 5 Esp. 50;

Barker v. Blakes, 9 East. 283.

Those three cases are the only English authorities bearing on the question. In Oliveira v. The Union Insurance Company (sup.), Marshall, C.J. delivering the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States says, “The question, whether a blockade is a peril insured against is one on which the court has entertained great doubts. In considering it, the import of the several words used in the clause has been examined. It certainly is not ‘an arrest,’ nor is it a ‘detainment.’ Each of these terms implies possession of the thing by the power which arrests or detains; and in the case of a blockade the vessel remains in the possession of the master. But the court does not understand the clause as requiring a concurrence of the three terms, in order to constitute the peril described. They are to be taken severally; and if a blockade be a ‘restraint,’ the insured are protected against it, although it be neither an ‘arrest’ nor ‘detainment.’” (p. 194.) (He also read other passages of this judgment, which are cited by Bovill, C.J. infra.) That is a case precisely analogous to the present one. [BRETT, J.—The ship there was within a blockaded port, but I believe the American courts have gone still further and held that a blockade preventing entrance into the port is restraint.] The Saltus v. The United Insurance Company (15 Johns. N. Y. Sup. Ct. Rep. 523), an American brig bound for St. Petersburg during our war with her country put into Wingo Sound, near Gothenburg, as a place of safety; but it was impossible for her to pursue her voyage without the certainty of capture. The Baltic was thronged with British cruisers; several were stationed in Wingo Sound, one or more of which were always in sight from Gothenburg, and the vessel must have attempted to pass them to get to sea. The voyage was in consequence abandoned. Thompson, C.J. delivering judgment said, “The loss in this case may, I think, fairly fall within the risk of restraint of princes or of men-of-war. It is not necessary to constitute a loss by the peril, that actual physical force should be applied to the subject insured:” (p. 528). Exclusion may not be restraint; but here was restraint. The American authorities seem to show that the fact of the master abandoning the voyage merely quia timet, is not enough to be a total loss; but in the present case there was actual inability to move, Geipel v. Smith (ante, vol. 1, p. 268; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 404; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 361) was an action on a charter-party against English shipowners for refusing to let the ship take goods to Hamburg according to their agreement; they pleaded the blockade of the port by the fleets of France, and that an attempt to run the blockade would contravene a British proclamation of neutrality, and it was held that they were justified in throwing up the contract as the further performance was prevented by an excepted cause, viz., the blockade, which was a “restraint of princes.” [BRETT, J.—But the clause there was in a charter-party, to which case the doctrine of causa proxima does not apply.] It is difficult to understand the distinction between causa proxima with reference to a charter, and with reference to a policy, although a distinction certainly exists. If not a restraint this was an arrest: (Bird v. Jones, 7 Q. B. 242). There the plaintiff attempting to pass in a particular direction, was obstructed by defendant, who prevented him from going in any direction but one, not being that in which he had endeavoured to pass; and it was held to be no imprisonment, for as Coleridge, J. said, “A prison may have its boundary large or narrow, visible and tangible, or, though real, still in the conception only; it may itself be movable or fixed; but a boundary it must have.” . . . The restraint must be within a circumscribed space, and here it was so. [BRETT, J.—What difference is there between this case and capture?] Very little. [BRETT, J.—Considerable, for the German armies never took your goods but let them lie in Paris, saying, only “if they come out we will capture them.” Nevertheless, the American cases are strongly in your favour, as the reasoning in them seems to be that an arrest means taking possession, therefore restraint must mean something other than taking possession.] Thirdly, there was at the time of the notice of abandonment such a state of things as to give rise to a reasonable probability that the assured would be deprived of the ownership of the goods for an indefinite period, and therefore he was justified in abandoning:

Roux v. Salvador, 3 Bing. N. C. 166.

Day, Q.C. (J. C. Mathew with him), for the defendants.—First, the policy only covered the goods while they were water borne. Prima facie, a marine policy only applies to risks which may be incurred while the objects insured are afloat, and does not cover terrene risk. Moreover, there is in the present policy a clear intention to cover marine risk only. “The general rule, in fact, is clear, that the underwriter in a sea policy insures only against sea risks; the risk on goods, therefore, ends directly they are put on terra firma, unless they are placed there only for a temporary purpose, or under such circumstances as to be proposed by the usage of trade.” Arnould on Insurance (4th edit.), p. 369, citing Harrison v. Ellis (7 E. & B. 465), where although there was a memorandum on the policy giving liberty to load, reload, &c. goods on the coast of Africa, it was held that the policy embraced only maritime risks; and Lord Campbell, C.J. asked during argument, “Can the marine policy be extended to goods on shore without something on the face of the policy so to extend it?” and said in his judgment, “I can see here no words that can be reasonably extended to cover goods on land.” (p. 480.) So in S. C.; 26 L. J. 239, Q.B., Crompton, J. says, “I am of the same opinion. I am at a loss to find any words in this policy which would apply to a case of loss on shore. No such intention of the parties is expressed in the policy.” (p. 243.) No doubt two cases exist showing that terrene risk might be included in a marine policy (Pelly v. Royal Exchange Insurance Company, 1 Burr. 341; and Brough v. Whitmore, 4 T. R. 206), but of the first of them, Campbell, C. J., in Harrison v. Ellis (sup.), says, it is clearly distinguishable. . . . It was an insurance on specific goods which were the furniture of the ship, whether they were in the ship or on land.” [BRETT, J.—Would not the same principle apply to cargo? If part of the land is made part of the voyage by the usage, the loss on the island is equivalent to loss on the sea.] In Australian Assurance Company, v. Saunders, an unreported case decided by this court by Willes and Keating, J.J. on the 29th May 1872, a question somewhat like the present arose. (He referred to the shorthand notes of the judgment.) The point, however, was whether two policies covered the same time. [BRETT, J.—And I understand that the decision was that the policies were not of the same kind, and therefore it did not cover this point. Moreover there was no usage, so the case turned on the terms of the charter.]

Secondly, the policy begins by describing the voyage. The journey is laid out by the opening sentences. Taking Japan and London as the termini, the insurance is between those ports. The earlier words are merely to describe the course without extending the policy to terrene risk. Then “while remaining there for transit,” the goods are insured at the places named where they stay for transit, not in transit. If the goods were insured overland those words would be unnecessary, for the goods would then be covered while going to the station and waiting at the intermediate stations; and if it was intended to cover them in transit, why was not that expressed? [BRETT, J.—These words are always inserted to cover the risk of the carrying of the goods from the great ship by small craft to shore. Yes, they are absolutely necessary to cover the risks at the intermediate ports. If the silks came by a Peninsular and Oriental Company’s vessel, they would have to be transhipped, not so if they were brought by one of the other companies. They would be landborne by the Peninsular and Oriental Company through the Desert, and would not be insured during that period. But, as the premia are the same, why should the risks be so varied as the plaintiffs seek to make them? Secondly as to whether this was a loss by the perils insured against, there has been no loss at all. The goods reached Paris in charge of a carrier appointed by the plaintiffs. Paris was then a town to which persons went at their peril. It was uncertain when they could proceed. The silks were always at the disposal of the plaintiff, who might have disposed of them in Paris. There was no requisition of these goods or threat of seizure by the Germans. They remained in Paris simply because the carriers could not enter. The goods were, figuratively speaking, no more than windbound. [BRETT, J.—By the law of nations the goods of merchants are not touched by captors investing a town, they are only confiscated if an attempt is made to bring them out.] A mere retardation of the voyage is not a good cause of abandonment.

Anderson v. Wallis, 2 M. & S. 240;

Hunt v. The Royal Exchange Assurance, 5 M. & S. 47.

Thirdly, as to the restraint of princes. There is an evident distinction between Geipel v. Smith (sup.) and this case; for where a contract is entered into subject to an exception of restraint of princes, the parties are excused from performance when even fear of restraint operates as restraint; but a wide difference exists between a charter and a policy in this respect, for in a marine policy the proximate and not the remote risks are insured against. For example, in Taylor v. Dunbar (L. Rep. 4 C. P. 204) meat delayed on a voyage by tempestuous weather became putrid and was thrown overboard—held not a loss by perils of the sea, or within the words “all other perils and misfortunes,” &c., in the policy. “Restraint of princes,” has never been extended to a case of blockade: (see Barker v. Blakes, 9 East, 283, per Lord Ellenborough, p. 293.) There the restraint of princes was when the ship was actually seized. Blockade is not equivalent to restraint of princes: (Foster v. Christie, 11 East, 205). There a British ship, insured from Hull to St. Petersburg, having sailed under convoy to the Sound, was afterwards stopped in her course by a king’s ship in the Baltic, from an apprehension of hostilities, for eleven days, and then proceeded to a point of rendezvous for convoy, when she waited seven days longer, and then sailed under convoy till the king’s officer received intelligence that a hostile embargo was laid on British ships at St. Petersburg, when he ordered the fleet back to the place of rendezvous, from whence the ship returned to Hull. Held, that this loss of the voyage was not attributable to the arrest or detention of kings, &c. but immediately to the fear of the hostile embargo in the port of destination, and therefore not within the policy, though if the ship had not been detained in the first instance by the king's officer, she would have arrived in time at St. Petersburg to have delivered her cargo before the embargo. And see the judgment of Lord Ellenborough thereon (p. 209). [BRETT, J.—The immediate cause of retardation of the voyage was the king's officer of the ship's own country—clearly not a restraint of princes. Those cases are where there was a blockade of the port into which the ship was going, but here you want a case of blockade of the port in which the goods are. [BOVILL, C.J.—If there had been an embargo here, would that be a restraint of princes?] Certainly; and there is little or no difference between restraint and arrest. [BRETT, J.—Capture is taking possession with intent to change the property; arrest is taking with intent ultimately to restore to the owner; restraint, a prevention of the goods going]. No case in England distinguishes between exclusion and inclusion. [BRETT, J.—What is the difference between embargo and blockade of a port?] Blockade of a port with neutral goods inside is the same case as where a hostile power for the sake of naval operations refuses to allow the goods to pass out, but there is no war on the goods, nor anything done to them so long as they rest quiet. [BRETT, J.—Embargo still leaves the goods with the owner; it is no claim to seize and sell]. It is a step to seizure. [BRETT, J.—Not so; but a mere prohibition]. In Wheaton's International Law, 842, we read that "a neutral ship can only carry out the goods brought in," which tends to show that there is no analogy between this case and one of naval blockade. Here, the Prussians surrounding Paris, the carriers do not go out for fear,—a remote and not proximate cause of loss. In Hadkinson v. Robinson (3 Bos. & P. 392) Lord Alvanley, C.J. says, "Detention of the cargo on board the ship at a neutral port, in consequence of the danger of entering the port of destination, cannot create a loss within the meaning of the policy, because it does not arise from a peril insured against." [BRETT, J.—You may assume it to be settled, by a number of cases, that exclusion from a port is not restraint according to English law.] The peril is only collateral, and in this respect there is no difference in principle between an exclusive and inclusive blockade [GROVE, J.—Save the material distinction, that in the latter case the goods are restrained, and in the former they are not so. One is a restraint, the other an injunction.] [BRETT, J.—What is your distinction between a blockaded port and a besieged town?] There is a well recognised law of nations applicable to the port, and none, apparently, to a town besieged.

Field, Q.C. replied.

BOVILL, C.J.—I have never entertained the least doubt but that the object of the insurance in this case was to cover the goods from the time of departure from Japan ^{and}/_{or} Shanghai until they should have arrived at the terminus of the ourney, viz., at London, and that the general intention was that all risks should be covered, both during the transit on land as well as during the transit by water, and on board ship. The question is whether that intention is or is not expressed by the terms in which the policy is framed. That must depend, of course, on the language of the instrument itself. But in discussing the question as to the meaning of the policy we must not forget what was the whole course of business; and therefore, to what particular mode of transit the terms of the policy must be considered to apply. The course of business is stated in par. 12 as amended. [His Lordship read that paragraph.] It has been admitted, and properly so, by the learned counsel for the defendants in argument (although there is no statement in the case to that effect) that silks for London coming via Southampton, would pass from Southampton to London, overland, in the ordinary course of business. That, also, must be assumed to have been known to the underwriters here. Now, what are the terms of this policy? The statement of the insurance is this: the plaintiffs caused themselves to be insured, "Lost or not lost, at and from Japan ^{and}/_{or} Shanghai to Marseilles ^{and}/_{or} Leghorn ^{and}/_{or} London via Marseilles ^{and}/_{or} Southampton, and whilst remaining there for transit with leave to call at any ports or places in or out of the way for all purposes." According to the understood usage in mercantile business, the words "^{and}/_{or} London via Marseilles," necessarily include a passage from Marseilles, overland, through France, and the meaning to be placed upon these words must be the same as if it had been expressly stated on the face of the policy ^{and}/_{or} London, via Marseilles, by railway through France and then to Boulogne and London," clearly including a journey overland. Then come the words, "^{and}/_{or} Southampton;" and it is equally admitted that they would mean the voyage or journey to Southampton, and thence overland to London. The description, therefore, of the nature of the voyage or journey insured, clearly describes a journey both by land or water; and I should say, under these circumstances, the fair interpretation of the policy is that the goods were intended to be covered by a policy insuring them against loss by the risks mentioned, during the whole transit, whether by land or water. Mr. Day contended that the addition of these words, "and whilst remaining there for transit," shows it was not intended to cover goods while in their transit on land, but, while stopping, or remaining at rest, during the sea passage. I do not think these words have any such effect. The general terms of the policy would cover the goods in course of transit, and those words, if necessary at all, would apply to cases where there were detained for some time while in course of transit, either by land or water. There is another part of the policy which also shows it was contemplated by both parties that a portion of the voyage would be by land, viz., the description of the vessel, "by steamer or steamers per overland or via Suez Canal," which seems to contemplate the possibility of the good coming altogether by water through the Suez Canal, or a portion coming overland. Now, "steamer overland" cannot mean by steamer coming overland, and the policy seems intended to cover the transit whether by land or water. The adventure is to begin on goods from being loaded on board ship, but is to continue "until the goods or merchandise shall be arrived at as above." At where? Why, in this case, at London, by a route, partly by water, partly by land, according to the usage and understanding of merchants. Policies of the kind in question are, I believe, not uncommon in cases which have come under my notice. I have known cases where the insurance has been effected covering goods from the west coast of America, coming overland through America, and then in vessels; and here the insurance has covered stopping, &c., not only on the journey to Southampton but to London, and I can see no possible reason why an insurance should not be effected, covering the whole transit. My opinion is that the intention was to cover the transit of their goods until the arrival in London, whether they were upon land or water, and therefore that the risks of transit through France are covered by this policy.

RODOCANOCHI AND OTHERS v. ELLIOTT AND OTHERS.

The question then arises whether, by reason of what occurred after the arrival of the goods in Paris, there has been a loss within the terms of the policy which insures the plaintiff from loss "by arrests, restraints, and detention of all kings, princes, and people of what nation, condition, and quality whatsoever . . . and of all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the said goods and merchandises, or ships, &c., or any part thereof." These latter words of course must mean matters ejusdem generis as the preceding. The goods having arrived at Marseilles were sent in the usual course by the Lyons Railway for Paris, and reached there on or before the 13th Sept. 1870, and what happened thereafter is set out in the case. [His Lordship read pars 25, 26, and 27.] The question is whether there was a loss of these goods within the meaning of the policy; and it has been contended that there was not a partial, but a total loss which entitled the assured to abandon; and that notice of abandonment having been given, they are entitled to recover. No doubt those goods existed in specie and were insured. It is equally clear according to our law, that mere delay and interruption of delivery in the ordinary course of things do not give the assured a claim against the underwriters, but it is different if caused by perils insured against. Now has there been a taking or detention of these goods by any of the matters covered by the policy?

It is said there was a restraint or detention by the German army surrounding Paris, which city was in a state of siege and all exit therefrom was impossible. Mere delay will not suffice. There must be a loss by the perils insured against. Has that loss been made out? First, what is the nature of a siege such as that which existed at the time in question preventing all goods from passing out of Paris. It has been argued that it is not like a blockade, but in the American courts the judges have treated a blockade as in the nature of a siege, and a siege is à fortiori an interruption of transit in the passage of goods. Blockade and siege are placed very much on the same footing by Grotius and Wheaton, nor can I find any distinction between them; and for cases of this kind I see no difference between an embargo and blockade in so far as each is a restraint of princes. Now is blockade a restraint of princes? Various authorities have been cited wherein the question arose how far a blockade is a restraint of princes causing loss within a policy of insurance; but those cases were where the goods or ships were prevented entering the blockaded port, and it was contended there was loss by restraint of princes; but the answer is, that the immediate loss was the laudable desire of the assured not to incur the risk of attempting to enter the blockaded port, and therefore was no restraint of princes, because the insured objects never were within the port. Then suppose they were within the blockaded port; would there be a restraint of princes? Geipel v. Smith (sup.) is a clear and distinct authority on that point. True, the question there arose on a charter-party, the shipowner having abandoned the voyage in consequence of the blockade, and it became essential to consider whether the blockade was a restraint of princes or not. The Lord Chief Justice of England in giving judgment says: "First, is a blockade a restraint of princes? I think it is. It is an act of a sovereign state or prince; and it is a restraint, provided the blockade is effective; and in the eye of the law a blockade is effective if the enemies' ships are in such numbers and position as to render the running of the blockade a matter of danger, although some vessels may succeed in getting through. In such a case the obstacle arises from an act of state of one of the belligerent sovereigns, and consequently constitutes a restraint of princes. The case, therefore, is brought within the exception in the charter-party:" (p. 410.) And Blackburn, J. says: "I am unable to see why this was not a restraint of princes; it was clearly a restraint by the then Emperor of France preventing the cargo from being carried on to Hamburg:" (p. 412.) The question then arose as to the defendant being justified in breaking the charter; but throughout the case it is assumed that, if the vessel had been within the blockade, that would have been a restraint of princes and the case decided, not on any distinction as to the nature of a charter-party, but on general principles, that that was a restraint of princes. Another authority cited for the defendant was Foster v. Christie (sup.) and there, indeed, it was held that the not continuing the voyage for fear of an embargo was not a loss within the meaning of the policy; but the whole argument assumes that if the vessel had been made or subject to embargo, that would have been a restraint of princes.

Mr. Day further contended there was a difference in the meaning of the words "restraint of princes" as employed in a charter-party, and as used in a policy. I am not aware of any such distinction, nor have any cases been cited to show it. There may be a difference in a contract as to restraint of princes justifying the breaking off of the agreement, as in Geipel v. Smith (sup.) and the cases where a party is liable on a policy as an underwriter. But that does not make any difference in considering what is a restraint of princes. Moreover there is an important case in the American courts decided in 1815, viz., Oliveria v. The Union Insurance Company (sup.), which has I believe, been acted upon as law from that time to the present. One passage of peculiar bearing as to blockade or embargo being a restraint is at p. 189 of 3 Wheaton's Reports (4 Curtis, 193), where Marshall, C. J. says: "What then according to common understanding is the meaning of the term restraint?" Does it imply that the limitation, restriction, or confinement, must be imposed by those who are in possession of the person or thing which is limited, restricted, or confined; or is the term satisfied by a restriction created by the application of external force? If, for example, a town be besieged, and the inhabitants confined within its walls by the besieging army, if in attempting to come out they are forced back, would it be inaccurate to say that they are restrained within those limits; the court believes it would not; and if it would not, then with equal propriety may it be said, when a port is blockaded that the vessels within are confined or restrained from coming out. The blockading force is not in possession of the vessels inclosed in the harbour, but it acts upon and restrains them. It is a vis major, applied directly and effectually to them, which prevents them from coming out of port. This appears to the court to be, in correct language 'a restraint' by the power imposing the blockade; and when a vessel, attempting to come out, is boarded and turned back, this restraining force is practically applied to such vessel." Those observations seem to me very applicable to this case, and I entirely concur in them, and think they ought to be applied to the present case. There is an external force of a sufficient power applied to the whole of Paris and, inter alia, to those goods which are absolutely prevented by force from going to their destination.

Under these circumstances was the assured entitled to abandon or not? The case seems to me to be, not a case of capture where the property is intended to be appropriated and taken possession of, and there is no hope of recovery by speedy process but, a restraint in the nature of an embargo; and it is impossible to distinguish it from an embargo on the goods in port, or something in the nature of an arrest and detention of a competent authority, and restraint of princes. Then what is the right of the assured; The point was raised in Goss v. Withers (2 Burr. 683), when the vessel was under capture for eight days only; but in the course of delivering judgment, Lord Mansfield, C.J. took occasion to refer also to cases of restraint or embargo, saying, at p. 696, "I cannot find a single book, ancient or modern, which does not say, 'that in case of the ship being taken, the insured may demand as for a total loss, and abandon.' And what proves the general proposition most strongly, is, that by the general law he may abandon in the case merely of an arrest, or an embargo, by a prince not an enemy. Positive regulations in different countries have fixed a precise time before the insured should be at liberty to abandon in that case. The fixing a precise time proves the general principle." We have no fixed time in our law; but I think there must be a reasonable time within which the insured must exercise the power or privilege of abandoning, subject to that he has in case of restraint of princes the right to abandon to the underwriters; if he does so in proper time the underwriters are liable. Here no question is raised as to notice of abandonment having been too early or too late; and I do not think any such question could arise, because a reasonable time was allowed to elapse to see if the goods were permanently detained or whether it was a mere temporary detention. The detention having taken place was, I think, a restraint by a power within the meaning of the policy, and therefore our judgment must be for the plaintiff.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. If this case rested altogether and exclusively on the terms of the policy I should have desired more time to consider whether it was not a policy intended exclusively to cover marine risks and not terrene risks. But coupling it with the findings of the special case, I come to the conclusion, without difficulty, that it was the intention of the parties that this policy should cover terrene risks. It is expressly provided that the goods are to be shipped by any one of three modes of transit, and two out of those three modes necessarily involve a terrene risk. They contemplated by the policy to send the goods as they were sent, viz., to Marseilles, then through France, and thence by the Straits of Dover to London. Therefore I think that, having regard to the facts found, the meaning of the policy was clearly to include the risk by land, because the case expressly finds that it was known to both parties that such was the usual and ordinary mode of transit. Consequently, I cannot doubt that that was the voyage from Shanghai to London which was in contemplation.

Then, if the land risk be within the policy, was there such a loss as justified an abandonment? Now, I quite agree with my Lord with respect to the analogy between the siege of a town and blockade of a port. There are not a great many English cases, fortunately, which gave rise to the question as to the position of English goods blockaded in a port. But there are many cases relating to goods which could not get into a blockaded port. I think, however, it stands to reason that the position of goods within the blockaded port would be precisely analogous to an embargo. True, in cases of embargo, it is the sovereign power of the place which directly intervenes, whereas with respect to blockade it is an adverse foreign power preventing the escape of the vessel; but that seems to me a distinction without a difference. There is equally a restraint imposed on the party by the sovereign power; and I think that the case as stated is a particularly strong one, for it is found that during the period referred to it was impossible that the goods could leave Paris. What rendered it impossible? Why the presence of the German army. That surely is restraint of a sovereign prince within the meaning of the policy. I have not from the beginning of the case had the slightest doubt on this policy that there was a restraint of princes. If so, was there a loss within the terms of the policy? It is equally clear that if goods are inclosed beyond the control of the assured they are lost to him for an indefinite time, and then, no doubt, he had a right to abandon; and as he did abandon, he is entitled to recover as for a total loss from the underwriters.

BRETT, J.—I am of opinion that this policy covered the land transit from Marseilles to Boulogne; and, indeed, if a loss occurred during the land transit it was within the policy just as if during the passage by sea. I think that by the terms of the policy the land transit is made part of the voyage insured. Every individual policy

RODOCANOCHI AND OTHERS v. ELLIOTT AND OTHERS.

is to be construed as any other contract between the parties. Most policies are in ordinary form, and with respect to such there have been many decisions. If the policy is in unusual form the rules applied to ordinary policies must be applied as far as they can be, and beyond this the court must attempt to put a construction upon them according to the meaning of the parties. All policies are framed in somewhat the same manner; the first thing done is to describe the voyage insured, afterwards the duration of the risk is described and made applicable to the voyage already described in the policy. Now, in the case before us one of the voyages (which is sufficient for our consideration) is described as from Shanghai to Marseilles and London via Marseilles. By itself we cannot tell what that voyage is. Whatever the voyage described in a policy may be, one must look at the known and usual mode of going from one place to another, and here we find that it is well known to underwriters that the journey to London via Marseilles is invariably by land transit through France, and then from Boulogne to London by ship. That being so, the land transit by ordinary railway through France is made part of the voyage insured; but it is said here there are other parts of the policy showing it is not part of it. Mr. Day relied on the phrase "and whilst remaining there for transit;" but I apprehend and believe the ordinary voyage described is the running voyage, with the ordinary stoppages on such running voyage; and whereas there was to be a further delay or landing of the goods during the voyage, there must be a further description to apply to the time during which the goods were not in course of conveyance. Now, here the voyage necessarily involves several transshipments of goods, and landings during the voyage at different places; and but for those words, "whilst remaining there for transit," the period of time during which the goods were not actually in transit would not have been covered. And it is very usual in a policy, to cover such period of time during which the goods were not actually in transit, and would not have been covered. And it is very usual in a policy to cover such period of time as is required for landing the goods. The phrase "including all risk of craft out and from steamers," was also relied on by the counsel for the defendants. Now, it is peculiar to this policy that several steamers are to be employed, and not as more usual one steamer only; and obviously the goods are to be covered whilst in each steamer; and construing the policy as nearly as possible as we should construe an ordinary one, it would not attach until the goods were in the first steamer, and if it had not been for the last-mentioned phrase I should not have thought the goods covered while in the craft going to and from the steamers; and I should think any careful Assured would put in these words to include the times during which the goods were carried to and from the first and to and from the last steamer. It seems to me these words do not interfere with the description of the transit voyage which included the journey from Marseilles to Boulogne. The cases of Pilly v. The Royal Insurance Company (sup.) and Brough v. Whitmore (sup.) are authorities to show that when either, by a known or agreed usage, or by the terms of the policy, land is made part of the voyage, the risk covered applies to that part as well as to the other. Therefore, on these autho-ties and on the construction of the policy, I think this passage through France was part of the voyage insured. If so, then the description of the duration of risk in the afterpart of the policy must be made applicable to the voyage. And the intention is that the policy shall apply from the beginning to the end of the voyage. Quite true, one must, in some sense, apply the words in an unusual way, as Mr. Day contended; and when Mr. Field relied on them in support of his argument, he went too far as was met properly by the observation of my brother Grove.

If this part of the transit was covered, the next question is whether there was a loss during that transit by the perils insured against. I think there was a loss here occurring by restraint of princes. It was argued that there was, because the restraint was like to that put on goods in all ships which are within a blockaded port, and that under these circumstances the goods or ships have been held to be within the words, "restraint of princes," and therefore that these goods within a besieged town must be held to be within the words "restraint of princes." True, the American authorities, except as to the description given by Marshall, C.J. in Oliveira v. The Union Marine Insurance Company (sup.) would not assist us much because in America they admit to a great extent that retardation of the voyage is a loss which may be considered, and that if a person is prevented from going into a blockaded port that is a loss by restraint of princes. It has, however, been clearly decided in this country that it is not so, and our law differs from that of America in that respect. Such cases as have been decided in England have proceeded, not on the ground that a blockade is a restraint of princes but, on the ground that if the master, by his own conduct, stops the ship going into the blockaded port, that is the causa proxima; or if an order of an officer of our Queen stops the vessel the act of the officer is causa proxima, and not the blockade itself. But there is no case on a policy which has decided that when ships or goods are within the blockaded port then the loss is a loss within the phrase "restraint of princes." It is quite clear the goods are not captured, because capture within the terms of the policy means where the goods are seized by a hostile power with intent to change the property in them. Such a case cannot either be an arrest, because the word "arrest" requires an actual taking of the goods; and in the case of blockade or embargo there is no such taking possession, for the goods are left in the possession of the master of the ship for the owner. But there are other words in the policy, and the words "restraint of princes" are the important ones and we must apply to this policy the ordinary rule, that where different words are used in a mercantile instrument one must give sense to each. Here the phrase seems to apply to the case where goods are not taken, but restrained from being carried to their destination by a sovereign power. That that applies to an embargo seems beyond doubt—that it applies to a blockade seems also beyond doubt, because in both cases there is an order by a sovereign power that the goods shall remain where they are, and if an attempt is made to remove them they shall be confiscated. That seems to me as much a restraint as can be when we look to Marshall's, C.J., observations in Oliveira v. The Union Marine Insurance Company

(sup.) which give a strong authority for the interpretation of the words "restraint of princes" in an ordinary policy. I thought at one time there might be a distinction between the case of a besieged town and that of an embargo where goods are within the port, on the ground that if any one attempts to remove the goods they are confiscated, whereas it is not shown that in international law with respect to goods in a besieged town they would be subject to confiscation if removed. But although they are not to be confiscated by international law, yet it seems to me if any one attempted to carry them out they would be lost by the besieging army stopping the goods, and to suppose they would, having stopped them, hold them, to see whose they are, does not appear likely in the ordinary course of business. They would be lost to the owner. Therefore, practically, the goods are just as much restrained in a besieged town as they are in a blockaded town. Moreover, we have the two authorities justifying us in our decision, viz., the passage from Wheaton at p. 819, which obviously applies to the two cases on the same leaf, and also that of Marshall, C.J. I think these goods were restrained. Then the question is what is the amount of restraining force which, when exercised, will justify an abandonment. I am of opinion that, as when goods are in a besieged town, no one can say how long that restraint will last, there is so great a loss that the owner is entitled to give notice of abandonment immediately, or within a reasonable time after he has news of such restraint as puts his goods into such a degree of loss. Here notice of abandonment was given in proper time, and consequently there was constructive total loss by the perils insured against which became a total loss by notice of abandonment.

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. It has been contended that the strongest words in favour of the plaintiff, "or London via Marseilles" might be fulfilled because the goods might come to London via Marseilles by sea. But, according to the ordinary construction of the policy it would involve a certain portion of land transit. Then Mr. Day further contended (and that seems to be the most forcible argument) that throughout this policy are words connected with maritime matters and a maritime mode of transit, as "all risks of craft," and then that which I pointed out to Mr. Field in answer to a part of his argument, viz., that when the termination of the voyage is dealt with, the words used are, "and upon the goods and merchandises until there discharged or safely landed," which certainly seems prima facie applicable to landing from a ship, and not delivering from a railway carriage or van. Probably, the reason is that this passage is copied from some old form of marine policy; and, instead of the policy being entirely remodelled to suit the present mode of transport, the old form of expression has been maintained. It was further argued that the phrase "whilst remaining there for transit," meant to apply to remaining on land. But it seems to me that this was intended to protect the goods eundo et morando. Then the policy is "from Shanghai or Japan to London via Marseilles." Now it is found in par. 12 that goods coming from Shanghai to Japan and to London via Marseilles do come a considerable portion of the way by land; and if this policy was not intended to be more than a marine policy, why should it have gone further than Marseilles, for, except the short ship passage from Dover to Calais, the marine risk would have been ended. Why, if those who prepared this policy, which must be taken fortius contra proferentes, meant to limit it to the marine risk, they should not have said so, I cannot understand. Therefore, I think that, so far as the risk is concerned, it was intended to cover the whole voyage from Japan or Shanghai to London.

Next, as to the question whether there was restraint of princes. Now there are English cases on insurances in which it has been held that where there is a blockade at the port of destination, the goods being outside thereof, or where the captain of a vessel is only prevented by possibility or probability of risk he will run in arriving at the port of destination, this kind of hindrance does not come within the word restraint, it would be more in the nature of an injunction than restraint. So on land, a person might be kept out of a place by a cordon of troops surrounding it, when he would simply be told, "You must not go there, or if you do you will be captured." But when we consider the converse case of a person enclosed by stone walls or shut up by locked doors, if that be not restraint I know not to what the word "restraint" would apply. For I cannot apply it only to mere physical restraint, such as that of a man held by the hand, or with a chain round his body. A man in prison is as much restrained as if enchained. It is further said that a blockade of a port is different from a blockade of an inland town. The authorities of Wheaton and Grotius are distinct on this point.

Now, there are two kinds of blockade specified in treatises on international law, viz., an effective blockade and a nominal or what is called a paper blockade—the latter being a mere declaration that the place is to be deemed actually blockaded. The most effective blockade of a port is when sufficient ships are there to prevent egress and ingress, yet still that is not absolutely perfect and certain for the blockade may be "run." But in this instance the case absolutely finds not only that the siege and investiture of Paris was effected, but also that it was certain. The German armies "completely surrounded and besieged Paris, and held military possession of all the roads leading out of Paris, and prevented communication between Paris, and all other places, by reason whereof it was during all the time aforesaid impossible to remove the silks from Paris:" (par. 25). There is a direct and absolute finding that the goods could not be removed from Paris. Therefore, this seems to me even a fortiori case of blockade. The only remaining question is whether there was a loss which justified the notice of abandonment. The total and absolute loss in specie of the goods could hardly be contemplated by the parties stipulating as to the particular peril insured against, viz., restraint of princes, because when under restraint the goods can scarcely be, in one sense, said to be lost. Therefore "restraint" involves the idea of the goods not being lost in the more common acceptation of the term. So restraint must mean something other than loss of goods. Then what restraint could be, presumptively, of greater duration than that caused by the late siege of Paris in a war which had then been waged a consider-

FEATHERSTON v. WILKINSON AND ANOTHER.

Charter-party—Damages in consequence of neglect of shipowner—Hiring of other vessels, and increased cost of cargo—Evidence—Onus of proof. By a charter-party between the plaintiff and the defendants, the latter agreed that they would have a ship ready at a certain time to receive a certain quantity of coals to be shipped for a certain foreign port. The defendants having failed in the performance of this contract, the plaintiff was obliged to charter other vessels at a higher rate, and to pay a greater price for his coals, which had risen during the delay occasioned by the defendants' default. It did not appear whether or not the plaintiff was enabled to dispose of such coal at a higher price in consequence of the rise in value. An action having been brought by the plaintiff to recover the loss sustained by the chartering of other vessels, and the difference in the price of the coals:

Held, that he was entitled to recover.

This action was tried before Brett, J., at the last Summer Assizes for Northumberland, when a verdict was entered for the plaintiff, leave being reserved to the defendant to move to enter it for him.

The action was upon a charter-party, and the declaration alleged that it was agreed thereby that the defendants' ship, the Edith Emily, should proceed to the Northumberland dock on the river Tyne, and there in the first or second week in Jan. 1872 should load 1300 tons of coal, and carry the same to Havre for delivery on payment of freight; and the declaration alleged that the said ship was not ready to load in the first or second week of January as aforesaid, whereby the plaintiff was put to expense in chartering other ships, and in buying coal to load them with at an increased price.

To this the defendants pleaded payment into court of 27l. 10s., the amount of increased freight, and never indebted as to the residue.

At the trial it appeared that after the making of the charter-party the plaintiff agreed with the proprietors of the Beside Colliery to take of them 1300 tons of coal at 10s. 6d. a ton in the first or second week in Jan. 1872, and the ship Edith Emily was according to custom named by him as the ship to be loaded with such coal, and she was according to custom put on the "turn book" for such weeks. The ship lost her turn by not being ready by the default of the defendants, and, as by the custom of the Tyne, ships are loaded in regular turn, the plaintiff could not get his coal until he had procured another ship to carry it away, which ship would have to wait its turn. The defendants were aware of the custom of the Tyne. It further appeared that the plaintiff lost no time in chartering and loading two other vessels with the coal, but in the meantime the price of coal had advanced 1s. 6d. per ton, and which advance he was obliged to pay to obtain the coal. No evidence was given that the plaintiff was under any contract to deliver coal at Havre at any stipulated price, and it was contended by the defendants that they were not liable for the higher price which the plaintiff had to pay for the coal, as what he had was proportionately more valuable. At the trial a verdict was returned for the plaintiff for 97l. 10s., being the total additional cost to which he was put, leave being reserved as before mentioned, and the court being at liberty to draw inferences of fact.

Herschell, Q.C. having obtained, in Michaelmas Term 1872, a rule to enter the verdict for the defendants upon the ground that the damages were not recoverable as being too remote.

G. Bruce (Holker, Q.C. with him) shewed cause, and contended that the custom being known to the defendants, the damages were the direct consequence of the breach and neglect of the defendants in not having the ship ready for being laden according to the charter-party; that there was primâ facie evidence of the loss; and that the onus of rebutting this presumption lay upon the defendants, who should show that the plaintiff could have realised at Havre or elsewhere.

Herschell, Q.C., in support of the rule, argued that there was no evidence that the custom as to loading was known to the defendants, nor did it appear that the plaintiff had suffered any loss from having to give more per ton for the coal, since he may have made an equal sum upon its re-sale.

Kelly, C.B.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. The plaintiff contracted with the defendants that he would be ready at a given time to ship a cargo of coals, and that the defendants should have their ship ready to receive it. The defendants failed to comply with their agreement, and the plaintiff had to charter other ships, and purchase coal at a higher price—at an increased price amounting in the whole to 97l. 10s. I think that was primâ facie evidence, and indeed conclusive evidence of loss, unless rebutting evidence had been produced on the other side, and that such loss was occasioned by the default of the defendants. It was argued, because the coal bought was worth the extra 1s. 6d. a ton given for it, there was no loss, inasmuch as although the plaintiff had paid 97l. 10s. more than he would have paid if the defendants had performed their contract, he could, upon resale, get back the extra price. We have, however, no evidence in the case that the coal was of more value at Havre after its rise than before. If the coal had risen in value at Havre, it was for the defendants to have shown it, and they should have proved what really was the value of such coal at Havre, and, moreover, that the coal was intended not for the plaintiff's consumption, but for resale. If they had shown that they could have obtained an increased price at Havre, that would have gone in reduction of damages.

Martin, B.—I am of the same opinion. The only fact for consideration is, whether there was evidence to go to the jury that they might assess damages for the difference in the price of the coal. It is argued, how can it be said that the coal is not of the same value? That was for the defendants to prove. They might have given evidence of its rise at Havre, but they did not.

STEWART v. THE WEST INDIA AND PACIFIC STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

[EX. CH.]

PiGOTT, B.—I quite agree with the rest of the court. It was a question for the jury, and I think there was a prima facie case of a loss to the extent of the damages awarded. It is clear that the plaintiff had to give 1s. 6d. per ton more in consequence of the defendants' breach of contract, and any circumstance mitigating the loss, such as a rise in the market price of coal at Havre, ought to have been proved by the defendants, and not left to us to infer from a rise at the pit's mouth.

STEWART v. THE WEST INDIA AND PACIFIC STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

Ship and shipping—General average—Loss to cargo by water let into ship to extinguish fire—British custom—Agreement to be bound by custom. Certain bark was shipped on behalf of the plaintiffs on board a vessel of the defendants for carriage from Santa Martha to London, under bills of lading containing the words "average, if any, to be adjusted according to British custom." The vessel having loaded her cargo was about to sail to her port of destination, when a fire broke out in the forehold. Every effort was made to extinguish the fire by playing water down the hatchways and through holes cut in the fore-castle deck; and this not being sufficient to subdue the fire, a hole was cut in the side of the ship, and her fore-compartment was thereby filled with water. The fire was in this manner extinguished, and if this course had not been taken, the remaining cargo (a portion having been discharged into lighters) would in all probability have been destroyed, and the ship most seriously damaged, if not rendered a total wreck, and the water poured into the ship having destroyed a large portion of the plaintiffs bark, the plaintiffs brought an action against the defendants in respect of the loss. It having hitherto been the practice of British average adjusters to treat a loss occasioned by water in the manner above described as not a general average loss,

Held (affirming the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench), without determining whether the loss was, or was not, properly the subject of a general average contribution, that the plaintiffs were precluded from recovering by the words of the bills of lading that average, if any, should be "adjusted according to British custom." (a)

ERROR from the Queen's Bench on a special case.

(a) Since the decision of this case in the Court of Queen's Bench and the intimation of opinion there given, there has been a meeting of average staters, by whom it was resolved that a future loss by water used to extinguish a fire should be treated as a general average loss. As the meeting practically represented the whole body of average staters, it may be taken that the "British custom" will be, from the date of the meeting, in accordance with the resolution.—ED.

See report of the case in the court below, ante, vol. 1, p. 528; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 820.

The action was brought in respect of the loss of certain bark shipped on board the defendants' steamship Venezuelan, and consigned to the plaintiffs; and by consent of the parties the following special case without pleadings was stated for the opinion of the court:—

1. The plaintiffs are merchants carrying on business at Manchester under the style of firm of Robert Barbour and Brothers. The defendants are a company and registered pursuant to the provisions of the Companies' Act 1862, and are the owners of vessels trading regularly between the United Kingdom and the West Indies and South America, and amongst others of the steamship Venezuelan.

2. On the 19th Sept. 1871, the defendants' steamship Venezuelan left Liverpool with a general cargo of merchandise on a voyage to the West Indies. She arrived on the 8th Oct. at St. Thomas, and after discharging her cargo for that port proceeded on her voyage to the ports of Curacao, Santa Martha, Savanilla, and Colon, and having called at Curacao and there delivered her cargo for that place, came to an anchor in the port of Santa Martha on 16th Oct. The Venezuelan after discharging at Santa Martha all her cargo for that port, took on board there a general cargo of produce and merchandise for Savanilla, Colon, London, and Liverpool.

3. The general cargo taken on board the Venezuelan at Santa Martha, consisted of goods shipped by various persons, and amongst these goods were 130 serons of bark which were shipped on behalf of the plaintiffs for carriage to London under the terms of two bills of lading, one for 100, and the other for 80 serons. These bills of lading were in the same form, and the following is a copy of the one comprising the 100 serons:—"Shipped in good order and condition by Mr. Ide Mier, of Santa Martha, in and upon the good steamship or vessel called the Venezuelan, whereof Bremner is master for this present voyage, or whoever else may go as master, now lying in or off the port of Santa Martha, 100 serons bark, covered by consignee's open policy of insurance, being marked and numbered as per margin, and to be delivered in the like good order and condition, subject to the terms and conditions stated in this bill of lading, which constitute, the contract between the shippers and the Company, unto Messrs. Robert Barbour and Brother, of Manchester, or to his or their assigns, at the port of London, or so near thereunto as steamers may safely get; freight to be paid at the port of destination of the goods (without any deduction, and before delivery if required) upon the gross weights or measurements taken on the landing of the goods from the above named steamer, as per present tariff issued by the West Indian and Pacific Steamship Company (Limited), unless otherwise specially stipulated in the margin hereof; average, if any, to be adjusted according to British custom. The company reserves to itself liberty for the steamers to sail with or without pilot, to tow and assist vessels in all situations, to proceed to the port stated in this bill of lading, via any other port or ports, in any order or rotation, whether in or out of the customary or advertised route, without the same being deemed a deviation, whatever may be the reason for calling at or entering such port or ports, to transship or land and reship by lighter or otherwise the goods at the port of shipment and transshipment or at any port or ports, or into any other steamer or steamers, or to forward them from any port or ports by railway, and land, and water conveyance to port of destination; also to discharge the goods from the steamer as soon as she is ready to unload into hulk or temporary depot or lighter, or on a wharf at the shipper's or consignee's risk and expense after they leave the ship's deck. The company is not liable for any loss or detention of or damage or injury to the goods, or the consequences thereof occasioned by any or several of the following causes, viz.:—the act of God, enemies, pirates, theft on land or afloat, vermin, barratry of master or mariners, restraint of princes, rulers, or people, fire on board, in hulk, or in craft, or on shore, or wagons, stranding, collisions, explosions, or straining; perils of the seas, rivers, navigation, land transit, lighterage, storage afloat or ashore, interruption to navigation by ice, transshipments, any act, neglect, or default of the pilot, master, mariners, engineers, servants, or agents of the company; accidents from machinery, boilers, steam, or defects in hull, engines, or boilers, sweating, leakage, breakage, rust, decay, rain, spray, contact with, or smell or evaporation from other goods, effect of climate or heat of holds, absence, obliteration or inaccuracies of marks, numbers, destination or address on packages (in such cases the consignees to accept the goods as allotted by the agents of the ship), injury to wrappers, want of strength of packages, detention on board or ashore, however caused, at the ports of transshipment, or at other port or ports. The shipper or consignees to be responsible for the proper description of the goods and the due compliance with all regulations imposed by the authorities at ports of shipment and discharge, and to be liable for any fines, expenses, loss, or damage. The company is not liable for gold or silver—manufactured or trinkets—watches, clocks, timepieces, mosaics, bills, bank-notes of any country, orders, notes, or securities for payment of money, stamps, maps, writings, title deeds, paintings, engravings, pictures, statuary, silks, furs, lace, hats, cashmere, manufactured or unmanufactured, made up into clothes or otherwise contained in any parcels or packages, unless the value thereof be expressed in the bill of lading, and such extra freight paid as may be agreed upon, weight, contents, and description unknown.”

4. While the Venezuelan was at Santa Martha so loaded as aforesaid and about to sail, a fire broke out at about 11 p. m. of the 18th Oct. in the forehold. Every effort was at once made to extinguish the fire by playing water down the hatchway by means of the fire-hose, and by cutting holes in the fore-castle deck and pouring water down on the cargo stowed in the forehold. This was to be continued to be done until about 4 a. m. of the next day, when the men at work near the forehold were driven out by the heat and smoke. The steamship was then turned stern on to the wind to keep the fire forward, and portions of the cargo stowed in the afterholds of the vessel were discharged into lighters. The fire-hose was kept continually playing down the forehatch and the fore-castle skylights, but it did not subdue the flames, and about 8 a. m. the fire reached the upper deck. A hole was then cut in the side of the vessel, and her fore compartment was thereby filled with water. By this means the crew ultimately succeeded in extinguishing the fire. If this had not been done, the remaining cargo would, in all probability, have been destroyed, and the ship most seriously damaged, if not rendered a total wreck.

5. The whole of the contents of the forehold were entirely destroyed by fire, and a great part of the cargo stowed in the adjoining holds was damaged or destroyed by the water which was poured or let into the vessel as aforesaid, in order to extinguish the fire.

6. It is admitted for the purposes of this case, that 152 of the 180 serons of bark shipped on behalf of the plaintiffs were destroyed by the water poured or let into the said steamship in the manner above described.

7. It has been the practice of British average adjusters in adjusting losses, to treat a loss occasioned by water in the manner above described as not a general average loss.

8. The Venezuelan, after discharging and unloading cargo and undergoing temporary repairs at Santa Martha, subsequently proceeded on her voyage, and delivered the various portions of the cargo to the respective owners or consignees thereof.

9. The court is to be at liberty to draw such inferences of fact as a jury would be justified in drawing.

The question for the opinion of the court was, whether the plaintiffs were entitled to recover from the defendants any sum of money by way of general average, contribution, or otherwise, in respect of the aforementioned loss of the said 152 serons of bark. If the court should be of opinion in the affirmative, then the court was respectfully requested to direct on what principles such sum was to be ascertained, and judgment was to be entered for the plaintiffs for such sum as should be ascertained in accordance with the said directions of the court by the parties themselves, or if they could not agree, by Messrs. Bailey, Lowndes, and Streakley, of Liverpool, average adjuster, with costs of suit. If the court should be of a contrary opinion, then judgment was to be entered for the defendant with costs of defence.

The Court of Queen's Bench, Cockburn, C.J., Mellor, Hannen, and Quain, J.J.) held, that the loss of the plaintiffs' bark was properly the subject of a general average contribution, being a voluntary and intentional sacrifice of the bark, made under the pressure of imminent danger, and for the benefit, and with a view to secure the safety of the whole adventure then at risk; but, it having been hitherto the practice of English average adjusters to treat a loss occasioned by water, in the manner described in the case, as not a general average loss, that the plaintiffs were precluded from recovering by the words of the bills of lading stipulating that average, if any, "should be adjusted according to British custom." On this judgment error was brought.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 27.—The judgment of the court was delivered as follows:—

BRETT, J.—If it was necessary in this case to determine whether the destruction of merchandise by water thrown upon it in the course of throwing water to extinguish a fire which is burning other merchandise in the same ship, is the subject of general average, we should desire time to consider a question which is no doubt of great importance, and upon which we know of no direct authority in the law of this country. But the bill of lading, which in express terms provides that "average, if any, is to be adjusted according to British custom," appears to us to admit of no other construction than that which has been put upon it by the Court of Queen's Bench. The custom or usage prevailing among average staters in England is uniform and invariable, that goods thus damaged or destroyed are not brought into account in an average adjustment. We agree with the court below that the phrase "British custom" in this bill of lading was intended to refer, and, upon a true construction, does refer, to this custom or usage, even if it be different from the British law, a point, which in this case, we do not determine. The judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench must therefore be affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

THE ABRAHAM.

Collision—Plea of inevitable accident—Onus of proof—Duty to begin—Practice.

In a cause of collision, where the defendants plead inevitable accident alone, it lies upon the plaintiff to show a primâ facie case of negligence against the defendants, and the plaintiffs must therefore begin.

THIS was a cause of collision instituted on behalf of the owners of the ship Ulverstone, against the barque Abraham, and her owners intervening. The petition of the plaintiffs alleged that the Abraham, being a vessel overtaking the Ulverstone, neglected to comply with Art. 17 of the Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea, in not keeping out of the way of the latter vessel. The answer of the defendants admitted that the Abraham was overtaking the Ulverstone, but alleged that the Abraham had become unmanageable by reason of her rudder chains becoming entangled with her rudder head, and pleaded inevitable accident.

The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C.) and Webster, for the plaintiffs, submitted that on this state of the pleadings, the defendants ought to begin in accordance with the practice of the court.

Clarkson, for the defendants.—According to The Marpesia (26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 333; L. Rep. 4 P.C.

212; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 261), the onus is on the plaintiffs to show a primâ facie case. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I find that the practice of the court has hitherto been for the defendants to begin where the sole plea is that of inevitable accident: (The Thomas Lea, 2 Mar. Law Cas. O.S. 261)] That is now overruled by the Marpesia.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I think Mr. Clarkson's view is correct, and that the Marpesia rightly expresses what ought to be the practice of the court, and the Thomas Lea must therefore be considered as overruled.

THE RIO LIMA.

Transfer of cause—Arrest—Warrant—Caveat—Practice.

Where an admiralty cause, instituted in rem against a ship, has been transferred from a County Court to the High Court of Admiralty, and no bail has been given in either court, and the ship is already under the arrest of the High Court in other suits, the High Court will order the issue of a caveat to prevent her release, in case the other causes should be withdrawn.

THIS was a motion for leave to arrest the vessel Rio Lima in the sum of 450l., or for such an order as the court might deem meet for the purpose of affording the plaintiffs security for the amount of their claim and costs. The claim against the ship was for necessaries; the cause was originally instituted in the Newcastle County Court, but was by order of the judge of the High Court of Admiralty, transferred to that court, under the 8th section of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, on the ground that there were other suits pending in the High Court against the ship, in which she was under arrest. After the transfer the County Court released the ship. An appearance was entered in the County Court by one of the owners, and, on the cause being transferred, by two others, but no bail was given.

C. F. Jemmett, for the plaintiffs, submitted that the arrest was necessary, because the County Court had released the ship, and the plaintiff would otherwise lose all security for his claim. If the County Court had retained possession of the vessel, two sets of possession fees might have been incurred, whilst now that the vessel was released, the plaintiffs would not have any security unless some order were made by the High Court to arrest her, or to transfer the possession to the High Court.

Cohen, for the defendants, contra.—The arrest is unnecessary, as by rule 55 of the rules and regulations of this court, it is provided that where a ship is already under arrest, a caveat may be issued to prevent her release. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The registrar tells me that the practice has hitherto been, to issue a warrant for arrest in each suit. It appears to me that the rule 53 is intended to apply rather to the case where the proctor seeking a caveat is concerned in a cause in which the ship is already under arrest.] I submit that the rule applies to any case where the ship is under the arrest of the court in any suit. The effect of a caveat will be, that the ship cannot be released without notice to the plaintiff's proctor. If a warrant subsequently becomes necessary by the withdrawal of the arrest in the other suits, it can be issued on a future application.

C. F. Jemmett, in reply.—Rule 53 applies only to cases where several suits of salvage are instituted, or where a proctor wishes to preserve his lien on the res for his costs.

SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—I do not see how the plaintiffs can be injured by the issuing of a caveat instead of a warrant for the arrest of the ship. I think he must be content with a caveat, and I shall order that a caveat issues to prevent the release of the ship.

THE PROCEEDS OF THE CORDELIA.

Discovery—Suit for master's wages—Practice.
To obtain discovery of documents, the affidavit in support of the application must allege some one particular document to be in the possession of the party from whom discovery is sought.

THIS was an application on behalf of the plaintiff in a master's cause of wages and disbursements, for discovery of documents in the possession of the defendant. The affidavit of the master, filed in support of the application, alleged as follows:—

1. This cause has been instituted by me to recover the amount due to me for wages and disbursements, earned and made whilst I was master of the said vessel.

2. During the time I was master of such vessel, I wrote several letters to A. Bragaw, the defendant in this cause, relating to the sailing of the said ship, and my accounts and vouchers, of which letters I kept no copies. I also sent him accounts and vouchers, of some of which I kept no copies. The said letters, accounts, and vouchers related to my claim in this cause.

3. I am advised and believe, that it is material to me, in order to support my claim on the trial in reference of this cause, and to prepare for the trial or reference thereof, to have such letters, accounts, and vouchers, or any other documents which the defendant may have in his possession relating to the matters in dispute in this cause, produced to me or to my solicitors, and that I shall derive material advantage and support from the production of the same.

4. I am advised and believe that I am entitled to the production of the said letters, vouchers, accounts, and documents, for the purpose of discovery and establishing my claim in this cause.

5. I believe the said letters, accounts, and vouchers, are in possession or power of the said defendant.

Clarkson moved the court to order the defendant to answer on affidavit, stating what documents he had in his possession or power relating to the matters in dispute in the cause, or what he knew as to the custody such documents were in, and whether he objected to the production of such as were in his possession or power. The plaintiff is entitled to know what documents are in the defendants' possession, under the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, sect. 50. The affidavit sufficiently shows that the defendant has in his control or possession documents relating to this claim.

Gibson, for the defendant.—The plaintiff is not entitled on this affidavit to discovery. By the rule at common law, he must earmark some document before he is entitled to discovery. The mere allegation that some documents are in the defendant's possession is too vague: (Evans v. Louis, L. Rep. 1 C. P. 656).

Clarkson, in reply.—The plaintiff has shown that letters and vouchers are in the defendant's possession, and that is enough. [SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—The dates are not in any way specified.] They are stated to have been during the time he was master.

SIR R. PHILLIMORE.—I am not disinclined to grant the application, provided that the documents are more earmarked than they are in the present affidavit. There ought to be some guide to the dates. For the sake of the practice of the court I think the affidavit ought to be more precise. On an affidavit being filed which shall state specifically some one document to be in the possession of the defendant, I will make an order for discovery. The application may be renewed at an early date. (a)

BROWNING (app.) v. THE PROVINCIAL INSURANCE COMPANY OF CANADA (resps.).

Marine insurance—Policy—Principal and agent—Right to sue—Certificate or slip—Contract—Cargo—Total loss—Limitation of action.

A contract of marine insurance, entered into with underwriters by an agent in his own name, but without expressing the interest in the subject of insurance to be in any particular person, may be sued upon by the principal in whom the interest is. Where the common form of policy of a marine insurance company contains the usual clause, "A. B. as well in his own name as for and in the names of all and every other person or persons to whom the same shall appertain, &c.," and it is the usage of the company on accepting a risk to issue a certificate or slip as a provisional agreement entitling the assured to a policy in their common form, the certificate is to be construed as a contract containing the above clause, and, if the certificate is made out in the name of an agent, the principal on whose behalf the contract is made may (in Canada where there are no Stamp Acts as to agreements for marine insurance) sue upon the certificate in his own name.

Where ship and cargo are wrecked and cast ashore, but part of the cargo continues to exist in specie and is taken out, and, it being impossible to forward it to its destination, is sold by the salvors on the spot, there is no total loss of the cargo, actual or constructive, until the sale has taken place: and, consequently, a condition in a policy on the goods, that no action shall be maintainable on the policy unless commenced within twelve months after any loss shall have occurred, is complied with if an action, to recover for a total loss of the goods, is commenced within twelve months after the sale has taken place; the action need not be commenced within twelve months after the wreck.

(a) A further deposit was filed, alleging the possession by the plaintiff of letters from the defendant, in which reference was made to letters of the plaintiff received by the plaintiff on particular dates, and also alleging the possession by the plaintiff of a copy of a letter sent by him to the defendant, and its date. On this affidavit the application was granted.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench for Lower Canada, affirming a judgment of the Superior Court for Lower Canada, district of Montreal, in an action brought by the appellants against the respondents on an alleged contract of insurance of a cargo of flour.

The writ was issued on the 3rd March, 1869.

The declaration was also filed the 3rd March, 1869, and the first count set out a certificate of cargo insurance granted by the defendants to one Joel Leduc for 7,000 dols. on a cargo of flour, and alleged that the said Joel Leduc had insured the said goods as agent for the plaintiff, that the plaintiff was interested in the goods to the full value of the sum insured, and that the goods had been lost by perils of the sea. The count also contained an averment that the defendants were bound by custom to issue to the plaintiff a policy of insurance in accordance with the terms of the certificate, either in his own name or the name of Joel Leduc, and all others interested in the goods, and that they had not done so. The second count alleged generally that the plaintiff had insured the goods with the defendants through the agency of Joel Leduc, and the loss of the goods. The third count was a common money count for money had and received by the defendants to the use of the plaintiff.

The defendants filed on the 11th May, 1869, two pleas, and a défense au fonds en fait.

The first plea set up that the said Joel Leduc had previously insured the ship Babineau and Gaudry with the defendants, on the express condition that it should not remain in the Gulf of St. Lawrence after the 16th Nov., that the insurance of the cargo of flour being between the same parties and for carriage by the said ship was impliedly subject to the same condition, and that the loss occurred through the ship remaining in the Gulf of St. Lawrence after that date. The second plea set up a condition contained in the certificate of insurance that no action should be brought for any loss, except within one year next after the loss occurred, and averred that the loss of the cargo occurred more than a twelvemonth before action brought. The défense au fonds en fait traversed all the averments in the plaintiff's declaration, and in particular expressly alleged that the contract with Joel Leduc had been made with him personally, and not as agent of the plaintiff.

The plaintiff, on the 15th May, 1869, filed answers traversing the defendants' pleas, and he joined issue on the defendants' défense au fonds en fait.

The defendants on the 20th May took issue on the plaintiff's answers.

The facts as proved, or admitted, were as follows:

The plaintiff, who was a baker and merchant, living at St. John's, Newfoundland, instructed one Joel Leduc, who had acted as the plaintiff's agent for a long time previously, to purchase flour for him at Montreal, and forward it to him at St. John's, Newfoundland. Leduc accordingly purchased 1,063 barrels of flour and loaded them on board a vessel called the Babineau and Gaudry, and drew bills upon the plaintiff for the amount of the flour, including his own commission.

In Nov. 1867, Leduc applied to the defendants agent at Montreal, R. T. Routh, to insure the flour for the voyage to St. John's, and Routh, after communicating with the head office, granted him a certificate of insurance, which was in the following terms:

Provincial Insurance Company of Canada.

Certificate of Cargo Insurance, No. 116,
Montreal, 15th Nov., 1867.

Joel Leduc, Esq., has this day effected an assurance to the extent of seven thousand dollars on the under-mentioned property, from Montreal to St. John's, Newfoundland, shipped in good order and well-conditioned on board the schooner Babineau and Gaudry, wherof E. Vigneau is master this present voyage.

Said insurance to be subject to all the forms, conditions, provisions, and exceptions contained in the policy of the company, copies of which are printed on the back hereof.

(Sd.) R. T. ROUTH, Agent.
P. ALBERT VASS.

Description of Goods Insured.	Amount.	Rate.	Premium.
On 1063 barrels flour, paid 21st Nov. 1867. (Signed) R. T. ROUTH, P. ALBERT VASS.	$7,000 0 0	4%	$230 0 0

On the back were, amongst others, the following conditions:

It is furthermore hereby expressly provided that no suit or action against said company for the recovery of any claim upon, under, or by virtue of this policy shall be sustained in any court of law or chancery, unless such suit or action shall be commenced within the term of twelve months next after any loss or damage shall occur, and in case any such suit or action shall be commenced against said company after the expiration of twelve months next after such loss or damage shall have occurred, the lapse of time shall be taken and deemed as conclusive evidence against the validity of the claim thereby so attempted to be enforced.

The interest of the insured in this policy is not assignable unless by consent of this corporation, manifested in writing, and in case of transfer or termination of the interest of the insured, either by sale or otherwise without such consent, the policy shall from thenceforth be void and of no effect.

Leduc paid the premium of insurance, and included the amount in the invoice he sent to the plaintiff and the bills that he drew on him. At the time the goods were insured the plaintiff had not paid the bills drawn upon him, and Leduc took the certificate of insurance in his own name, that he might be secure if the plaintiff did not meet the bills. No policy was ever issued, and there was no evidence of any agreement express or implied to issue a policy other than the certificate of cargo insurance, except the statement by one of the plaintiff's witnesses, Routh, the agent, who issued the certificate, that it was the custom of the defendants to issue policies of insurance in a form produced by him on all certificates of cargo insurance, the certificate of cargo insurance being a temporary substitute and binding till the policy was issued. The policies used by the company were in a regular printed form, and commenced as follows: "A. B. as well in his own name as for and in the name and names of all and every other person and persons to whom the same doth, may, or shall appertain, in part or in all; doth make assurance, and cause to be insured lost or not lost, &c." The plaintiff was proved to have paid the bills drawn on him by

PRIV. CO.] BROWNING (app.) v. THE PROVINCIAL INSURANCE CO. OF CANADA (resps.) [PRIV. CO.]

Leduc when due, and to have been interested in the goods to the amount of the sum insured at the time of their loss, but no transfer was ever made to him of the insurance with the consent of the defendants. It was admitted by the plaintiff that Leduc had previously insured the vessel Babineau and Gaudry with the defendants, by a policy containing a condition that the vessel should not remain in the Gulf of St. Lawrence after the 16th Nov. 1867.

The facts as to the sailing and loss of the vessel and cargo are fully set out in the judgment.

The case was heard in the superior court, before Beaudry, J., on the 21st March, 1870, and on the 31st of March that court gave judgment in favour of the defendants, on the ground that the loss occurred more than twelve months before the commencement of the action.

The plaintiff appealed to the Court of Queen's Bench, and the case was heard on the 3rd Dec., 1870, before Duval, C. J., and Caron, Badgley and Monk, J.J.; and on the 9th March, 1871, that court gave judgment, confirming the judgment of the court below. The majority of the court were of opinion that the action had been brought in due time and that the judgment of the superior court was in that respect erroneous. The judgment of the superior court was confirmed upon the ground that the contract of insurance was in the name of Leduc only, and that Browning could not sue upon it except it were made for Browning and in his name.

Against this judgment Browning appealed to Her Majesty in council, and alleged as the grounds of his appeal the following reasons:—

First, because it is established by the evidence that the said Joel Leduc in entering into the said contract of insurance was acting as the agent of the said Gilbert Browning; secondly, because the general rule of law that an undisclosed principal may take advantage of the contract entered into by his agent applies to policies of marine insurance; thirdly, because policies of marine insurance according to universal usage and the custom of the respondent company enure to the benefit of any one beneficially interested at the time of loss in the property insured; fourthly, because the language of the policies of the respondent company is specially adapted to cover the interest at the time of the loss whoever may be the owner of the property; fifthly, because the policy on the hull of the Babineau and Gaudry did not in any manner control the insurance made upon the appellants' flour; sixthly, because no breach of warranty was established by the respondents; seventhly, because the action was commenced within due time; eighthly, because even although the court may have been of opinion that the agency of the said Joel Leduc in effecting the said insurance was not established, the appellants should under the counts for money had and received in his action have recovered the proceeds of his flour taken possession of and sold by the agents of the respondent company at Gaspé, the said proceeds, having been, as admitted by their inspector and manager, received by the said respondent company. The appellants submit that under the said counts for money had and received he should have had judgment for either 533 dollars at least as the balance of the alleged proceeds of the flour after payment of salvage, or the total amount of 1796 dollars realised by the sale of his flour, there being no proof of the value of the salvage services, but merely a statement of salvage made by the respondent Company.

Walkin Williams, Q.C. and W. W. Kerr, for the appellants.—First, on the question whether the appellant may sue on the contract made by his agent. In Sims v. Bond (5 B. & Ad. 339), it is said by Denman, C.J., "It is a well-established rule of law that where a contract, not under seal, is made with an agent, in his own name, for an undisclosed principal, either the agent or principal may sue upon it." An agent cannot escape liability under a contract which he has signed in his own name, but his principal may still take advantage of, or be sued upon the contract:

Higgins v. Senior, 8 M. & W. 834;

Humble v. Hunter, 12 Q. B. 310;

Smith's Leading Cases, 6th edit. p. 355;

Ramazotti v. Bowring, 7 C. B. N. S. 851.

In Arnould on Marine Insurance (4th ed. p. 223), it is certainly said that if it were not for the assignment clause in a policy, only the person in whose name it is effected could sue. In answer to this, however, I submit that there is no distinction between a contract of insurance and other contracts not under seal. If the agent has taken out the words "as well in his own name, &c.," and expressly described himself as owner of the goods, it might then be contended that the appellants could not come forward and claim an interest in them as against the respondents, and that is probably Arnould's meaning. This distinction is clearly pointed out by Duer on Marine Insurance (vol. ii. lect. ix. § 18). Moreover, his certificate of insurance was not the contract itself; it was only the memorandum of the contract. By the respondent's custom they were bound to issue a policy, in accordance with the certificate, containing the assignment clause. Where a memorandum for an agreement refers to another instrument containing full particulars of the contract, then both instruments are to be read together, as forming one and the same contract: (Ridgway v. Wharton, 6 H. of L. Cas. 238). It was clearly the intention of these parties that the policy and not the certificate alone was to be the contract between them. The certificate is like the slips used in this country. There can be no doubt, on the evidence, that the flour was purchased on behalf of the appellant. When the flour was shipped deliverable to the appellant, the property at once passed to him, and he became liable for it:

Broune v. Hare, 4 H. & N. 822;

Joyce v. Swann, 17 C. B. N. S. 84.

Secondly, with regard to the point that the action ought to have been brought within a year after the loss occurred. The loss having been proved, it lies on them to show when it occurred if they wish to avoid their contract. This is a limitation of our right to sue by express agreement. Such a limitation must be governed by the same rule of construction as is applicable to limitations imposed by law. It is quite clear that by Canadian law the appellant is only bound to bring this action within a reasonable time after the loss came to his knowledge, if it was impossible for him to have made his claim sooner: (Civil Code of Lower Canada, Nos. 2232, 2478.) The rule was the same by civil law: (Mackenzie's Roman Law, p. 186 et seq.) Moreover, there is no evidence to show that the loss of the vessel did not occur just before it came to the appellant's knowledge. The loss on the goods, however, clearly did not occur more than a year before action brought. This is a claim for a total loss, and at the time of the discovery of the loss of the vessel the goods still existed in part at least, and any loss to be total could be constructive only, and the underwriters must have received notice of abandonment, and until this there could be no loss within the meaning of the limitation. Even if the loss is to be considered total, and no notice of abandonment necessary, the actual total loss did not take place until after the sale of the flour, whereby it was lost to the assured. The acts of the directors of the company, after the loss became known, must be considered as a waiver of the condition that the action must be brought within a year.

Sir J. Karstlake, Q.C. and Bompas for the respondents.—Leduc was not a mere agent; he bought, and resold on commission, and so had an actual interest in the goods beyond the mere commission charged. He was a factor, or commission merchant, and had power to deal with the goods as he chose: (see Story on Agency, § 33.) This insurance was intended to cover Leduc's own interest and not that of the appellant. Until such time as the appellant accepted and paid the bills of exchange drawn upon him by Leduc, the interest in the goods remained in the latter, and it was for him to cover them by insurance. This he did, in his own name, and really for the purpose of securing himself in case the appellant failed to pay for the goods and not for the benefit of the appellant. Leduc having clearly an insurable interest, it must be taken that, as he has insured exclusively in his own name, his intention was to cover his own risk only. When a contract of insurance is not expressed to be for the benefit of all concerned, but a particular person is named therein for whose benefit the insurance is apparently effected, the contract must be taken to be limited to that particular person so far as the power to sue is concerned. Where a party insures on behalf of himself and others, but in his own name, the action must be brought in the name of the party to the contract. It cannot be said that the usual form of the company's policy, and not this certificate, is to be considered the contract between the parties, because, although a court of equity would compel the issuing of a policy, yet it would do so only on condition that the terms were no more extensive than those of the certificate and that the risks covered were no larger. In Phillips on Insurance it is said (§ 379), "only those interested in the subject at the commencement of the suit can be original parties to the policy, and they continue to be parties only while they have an interest. Others may become parties by stipulation, or transfer, either with them or in their stead. (§ 380.) Insurance made by a person in his own name only, without any indication in the policy that any other is interested, can be applied only to his own proper interest in the subject, or his interest as trustee, &c. In other words, a contract with A cannot be construed into a contract with B." A principal cannot sue upon a contract made in an agent's name and for the agent's benefit, and even if Leduc intended the policy to cover the interests of both, it is not enforceable, for a contract of insurance cannot be made by one man to cover the interests of several.

Watson v. Swann, 11 C. B., N. S., 756.

United States v. Parmele, 1 Paine's U. S. Circ. Ct. Rep. 252.

[Sir R. P. COLLIER referred to Bell v. Gilson, 1 B. & P. 345 and to Vignier v. Swanson, 1 B. & P. 346, note.] No doubt a consignee may sue upon a policy effected by an agent, but then it must appear that it was effected for the sole benefit of the consignee, and, moreover, it must appear on the face of the policy that it was as agent that the agent effected it. A contract of marine insurance is an undertaking to insure a particular interest, and not more than one unless so expressly stated. In this case the contract was, as the respondents had reason to believe, to insure Leduc's interest, and he could not by one and the same contract cover the interest of the appellant without notice of such intention to the respondents. In Duer on Marine Insurance (Lect. IX. § 18), it is said, "Where a policy is effected in the name of a particular person, without general words, or by an agent on the sole account of a person named, the form of the contract necessarily fixes and limits the construction. The insurance can only be applied to protect the interest of the person named, and parol evidence to show that other interests were meant to be covered, or that other persons were interested in the subject insured, whether offered by the assured to enlarge, or by the underwriter to diminish the amount of a recovery, must be rejected. It is not explanatory, but repugnant and contradictory." Then as to the limitation. The loss occurred more than a year before the bringing of the action. This is the fair presumption from the evidence. After the vessel was last seen there was sufficient to cause her loss. The cargo, as soon as the vessel was wrecked, ceased to be of any use to any one, and therefore became at once a total loss. The respondents are not bound to show more than reasonable evidence that the loss took place at a time which precludes the action. If they establish the presumption that is sufficient. It is said that this condition as to limitation was waived by the directors of the company. If so, they had no authority to do so. They have authority to issue policies and insure vessels, but not to deprive the shareholders of any rights they may acquire under the contract: (Montreal Assurance Co. v. McGillivray, 13 Moore, P. C. 89.)

Williams, Q.C. in reply.—Leduc, as a commission merchant, had a lien upon the goods and the policy for the price paid, and was in the position of a quasi-vendor, and could have stopped in transitu: (Feiss v. Wray, 3 East, 93.) The insurance effected by him was not upon his interest in the goods, but upon the goods themselves, and was for the benefit of his principal, to whom the property passed on shipment, subject only to the agent's lien. The agent, therefore, had a right to insure in his own name, and either he or his principal could sue upon the contract.

Watson v. Swann (ubi sup.) is not in point, as there the agent had effected the insurance for other purposes before attempting to apply it to his principal's risk. The loss did not actually occur on the goods until the sale by the company's agent: (Farnworth v. Hyde, L. Rep. 2 C. P. 204.)
April 5. — The judgment of the court was delivered by Sir MONTAGUE SMITH.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench for Lower Canada, affirming a judgment of the superior court for the province, which dismissed the appellant's suit. The action was brought on a contract of insurance made with the respondents on 1063 barrels of flour shipped in the schooner Babineau and Gaudry, on a voyage from Montreal to St. John's, Newfoundland. The contract was in the name of Mr. Joel Leduc, who had purchased and shipped the flour for the appellant. Two objections have been made to the appellant's right to maintain the action, viz: (1) that he cannot sue on the contract made in Leduc's name; and (2) that under a clause of limitation contained in the contract, his action is too late. The judge of the superior court decided against the appellant on the second objection. Upon the appeal in the Court of Queen's Bench, three judges held the action was brought in time, but that the appellant could not sue in his own name; one judge (Mr. Justice Badgley) alone upheld both objections.

The following general facts appeared on the evidence:—The appellant, who carried on business as a baker at St. John's, had for some time employed Mr. Leduc, a commission merchant, to make purchases at Montreal of flour and ship it to St. John's. In the usual course of this agency, Leduc, in November 1867, purchased 1064 barrels of flour, shipped it on board the Babineau and Gaudry (a vessel owned by himself) for St. John's, and insured it for 7000 dollars with the respondents in the form and manner which will be hereafter stated. The bill of lading stated the flour to be shipped by Leduc deliverable to the appellant or his assigns, and an invoice was sent by Leduc to the appellant, debiting the latter with the price paid for the flour, commission, the expenses of cartage, cooperage and wharfage, and the premium on the insurance. Bills were drawn by Leduc on the appellant for the amount of this invoice, which were duly accepted and paid. The Babineau and Gaudry sailed from Montreal on the 16th Nov. 1867, and left Quebec on her voyage down the Gulf of St. Lawrence on the 20th. She was last seen, proceeding on her voyage, on the 22nd, and no more was heard of her until the middle of May, 1868, when the news reached Montreal that she was ashore on the Island of Anticosti in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. An agent of the respondents reached the island in the middle of June, and found the schooner lying bottom up. None of the crew appeared to have been saved. A hole had been cut in the ship, out of which part of her cargo, including some of the appellant's flour had been taken, and some remained on board. The flour saved, or so much of it as could be recovered, viz., 547 barrels, was taken to Gaspé and sold by the respondent's agent there, for the gross price of 1796 dols. An account was made out by the agent, which, after debiting the flour with the share of salvage expense, and other charges, showed the net proceeds to be 533 dols. The schooner was recovered and repaired.

It was contended in support of the first objection by the respondent's counsel that the insurance was in fact made by Leduc on his own behalf to protect his own interest, or, at all events, partly on his own behalf, and partly on that of the appellant. Their Lordships, however, feel little difficulty in coming to the conclusion, upon the evidence in the case, that the insurance was effected by Leduc, as agent on behalf of the appellant, his principal Leduc, who was called as a witness by both parties, states that the appellant from the purchase of the flour up to its loss was le seul propriétaire, et le seul qui y avait intérêt. Again, when examined by the respondent, he says in English, "the insurance was in my name, though it was really the plaintiff's." He, no doubt, also says that he made the insurance in his own name "in case of some accident, or that the appellant should not have met his drafts;" but further explanation given by him shows that what he wanted to have, and considered he had, was a lien on the policy which would end when his drafts were honoured. All the facts are consistent with what seems to be the effect of Leduc's evidence taken as a whole, viz., that the insurance was effected for the appellant and that Leduc had a lien upon the policy. Having paid for the flour with his own money, Leduc might in the event of the appellant's insolvency have had the right, as a quasi vendor, to stop in transitu, but it nowhere appears that he kept any control over the bills of lading, under which the goods were deliverable to the appellant or his assign. The result of the evidence is that the property in the flour passed to the appellant, that it was shipped at his risk, insured at his cost, and that the insurance was effected by Leduc for him as the owner of it.

It was next urged that, if this were so, the appellant could not sue on the contract effected in the name of his agent. This objection makes it necessary to consider the form of the present contract, and how it was made. The chief office of the respondents is at Toronto, and their agent at Montreal, in taking insurances there, issues what are called "certificates of insurance" of a provisional kind, signed by the agent, upon which policies under the seal of the company are afterwards issued at Toronto. The certificate in this case, dated on the 15th Nov. 1867, commences as follows:—"Joel Leduc, Esq., has this day effected an insurance to the extent of 7000 dols. on the under-mentioned property from Montreal to St. John's, Newfoundland, shipped on board the Babineau and Gaudry," &c. The property is described as "1063 barrels flour." The certificate also states "the insurance to be subject to all the forms, conditions, provisions, and exceptions contained in the policy of the company, copies of which are printed on the back thereof." Routh, the agent of the respondents at Montreal, proved the form of policy used by the respondents, and it is set out in the record. This form runs thus:—"A.B., as well in his own name as for in the name and names of all and every other person and persons to whom the same doth, may, or shall appertain in part or in all," do make insurance, &c. These words are the same as those usually inserted in Lloyd's and other English policies. It was contended that the certificate was a complete contract, and that as it did not contain these words the appellant could not sue upon it. Some authorities, principally American, were cited for this proposition, and Arnould on Marine Insurance vol. i. p. 223, 3rd edit.) was also referred to. Mr. Arnould no doubt in this place states this to be so: but in another part of his book it is stated as a general rule that actions may be brought either by the broker whose name appears in the policy, or by the principal who instructed him to make it

(vol. ii. p. 1032). In England, policies are usually made in the name of the insurance broker, and it was long ago decided that the broker need not be described as agent to enable the principal to sue upon them (see De Vignier v. Swanson, 1 Bros. & Pul. 346 n). In a recent case, in which it was held that the plaintiff under the circumstances there existing could not maintain an action on such a policy because the insurance could not be shown to have been made on his behalf, the right of the person who, in a case like the present, has been throughout the real principal, to sue on a policy made in the name of his agent, was not doubted (Watson v. Swann, 11 C. B., N. S., 759). By the law of England, speaking generally, an undisclosed principal may sue and be sued upon mercantile contracts made by his agent in his own name, subject to any defences or equities which without notice may exist against the agent (see Higgins v. Senior 8 M. & W. 834; Calder v. Dobell, L. Rep. 6 C. B. 486). There seems no sufficient ground for making a distinction in the case of marine policies of insurance, especially when, having regard to the ordinary course of business, it must be known they are commonly made by agents. If, indeed, any particular interest were described in the policy to belong to the person named in it, an objection might arise founded on the rule that written contracts cannot be contradicted by parol evidence. This objection, however, does not occur in this case, where the insurance is general on the flour, and no interest is expressly described. But if this were not the law in the case of a policy which did not contain the usual clause "as well in his own name," &c., it is not denied that it would be so in the case of one which does; and their Lordships think that in this case the certificate ought to be construed with reference to the proved usage of the respondents to treat such a document as provisional, entitling the assured to a policy in their common form, which would contain the above clause. This common form of the respondent's policy clearly shows that in their contemplation the person named in the certificate might be contracting as an agent for another; and, therefore, as against them, the contract ought to be interpreted as if the above clause were contained in it. It may be observed that the condition against assignment contained in the policy cannot affect the right of the appellant, on whose behalf the contract was originally made. The law of the province does not appear to differ from that of England upon the question under discussion. The code of Lower Canada allows policies to be made in the names of agents. Article 2402 commences as follows:—"The policy of marine insurance contains the names of the assured or of his agents," thus giving the express sanction of the law to well-known mercantile usage. It is right to observe that although it was suggested at the bar that there might be defences available against Leduc, if the action had been brought by him, none were stated which could have been established against him. For the above reasons their Lordships think that the Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench were wrong in giving effect to the first objection.

The second objection, that the action was not brought in time, is founded upon the following clause endorsed on the certificate:—"It is furthermore hereby expressly provided that no suit or action against the said company for the recovery of any claim upon, under, or by virtue of this policy, shall be sustained in any court of law or Chancery unless such suit or action shall be commenced within the term of twelve months next after any loss or damage shall occur; and in case any such suit or action shall be commenced against said company after the expiration of twelve months next after such loss or damage shall have occurred, the lapse of time shall be taken and deemed as conclusive evidence against the validity of the claim thereby so attempted to be enforced." The action was brought on the 3rd March 1869, which it was said was more than twelve months after the loss. It appears that the Babineau and Gaudry left Quebec on the 20th Nov. 1867, in company with a vessel, the B. L. George. The latter anchored at Les Eboulements, and whilst there the Babineau and Gaudry passed that place on her voyage down the Gulf of St. Lawrence. This was on the 22nd Nov., and nothing was heard of her at Montreal from that day until the middle of May 1868, when news came of her being ashore at Anticosti. It was proved that on the 29th Nov. a violent storm raged in the Gulf, which continued until the 1st Dec., and a strong probability is raised by the evidence that the schooner was capsized and driven on shore during that gale. But although this probability is, in their Lordships' opinion, exceedingly strong, they do not find it necessary, in their view of the case, to determine whether the evidence affords a presumption of fact of such strength that the majority of the Court of Queen's Bench were wrong in refusing, as they did, to act upon it. For, in this case, the insurance was not on the ship but on goods, and the point of time to be considered is not when the peril was encountered and the vessel driven ashore, but when the loss on the flour, for which indemnity is sought, accrued. It must often be uncertain whether the damage done to cargo by a peril insured against will result in a partial or total loss, and the assured is not bound in such cases to make his election how to treat it as soon as some incipient damage has occurred. It is obvious that, in many cases, there must be some lapse of time, greater or less according to circumstances, before the extent of the damage is developed, and that the assured must in the nature of things wait until it can be ascertained what the ultimate loss for which he is entitled to claim indemnity will really be. In the present case the disaster to the ship was not known either to the assured or the respondents until May 1868, and when the agent for the respondents reached the ship he found a hole had been cut in her side by the inhabitants of the island, through which they had taken out some of the flour. Part of the flour so taken out he recovered, and some barrels he took from the ship; the total quantity saved amounted to 547 barrels. The flour so saved existed in specie, and was sold as flour, realising the gross sum of 1796 dols. It must be taken as against the respondents, by whose agent the sale was made, that the flour saved could not have been taken on to St. John's, and that the sale of it was necessary. It results from these facts that a part only of the flour having perished, and more than one half having been saved, the loss was not in its inception total, and only became so when, by the course of events consequent upon the peril encountered, it was found to be impossible from the state of the flour to carry it to its destination, and that it was necessary to sell it. The sale under this necessity at an intermediate port caused a total loss of the flour to the assured, whether actual or constructive is immaterial as regards the present point; for not until that time were the facts constituting a total loss ascertained, and the right of the assured to claim indemnity for such a loss matured. The present suit was commenced within a year afterwards, and the condition, which must receive a reasonable interpretation, was therefore in their Lordship's opinion complied with: (see with reference to this subject Roux v. Salvador, 3 Bing. N. C. 266; Farnworth v. Hyde, 18 C. B., N. S., 835; Stringer v. English and Scottish Marine Insurance Company, L. R. 6 Q. B. 676; Canada Code, Articles 2521, 2522, 2541, 2544.) In the result their Lordships are of opinion that no valid objection can be opposed to the right of the appellant to maintain the present action, to which, it may be observed, there is no defence whatever on the merits.

It appears from the English authorities above referred to that the sale, supervening upon the existing state of things, would cause an actual, and not merely a constructive, loss of the flour. Whether this would be so under Article 2522 of the Canada Code need not be considered, for no objection was taken for the want of notice of abandonment. Both parties at the bar assumed there had been a total loss of one kind or the other, and no question having been made that the flour was not worth the sum insured, the appellant is entitled to recover the full amount of the insurance, the respondents taking the salvage, i.e., the proceeds of the sale.

Their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the judgments of the Courts in Lower Canada ought to be reversed, and that judgment in the action ought to be entered for the plaintiff for the sum of 7000 dols., with interest, according to the practice of the courts below, and that the appellant ought to be paid his costs in the courts below by the respondents. They must also pay the costs of this appeal.

Appeal allowed.

SMITH AND OTHERS v. THE ST. LAWRENCE TOW BOAT COMPANY.

Contract to tow—Running tow aground—Fog—Pilot—Contributory negligence.

A steam-tug towing a sailing ship directs the course of both vessels so long as no directions are given by the person in charge of the ship in tow. The steam-tug is the moving power, but it is under the control of the master or pilot on board the ship in tow.

Where a ship in tow of a steam-tug, and in charge of a licensed pilot who has the control over and directs the course of both vessels, is navigating a river in a fog so dense that the banks of the river cannot be seen, and those on board the tug and ship in tow do not know in what direction they are going, it is negligence on the part of both vessels to proceed; but as it is the duty of the pilot in charge to give orders to the tug to stop so as to enable the ship in tow to come to an anchor, the neglect on the part of the pilot to give such orders is contributory negligence, which will preclude the owners of the sailing ship from recovering against the owner of the steam-tug in an action for negligently running the sailing ship ashore by proceeding during the fog.

This was an appeal from a judgment of Her Majesty's Court of Queen's Bench for the province of Quebec, Lower Canada, confirming a judgment of Her Majesty's Superior Court for Lower Canada, district of Quebec.

The appellants are merchants residing at Toronto, in the province of Ontario, Canada, and were, at the time of the occurrence which gave rise to this action, the owners of a vessel called the Silver Cloud. The respondents are the owners of certain tow-boats on the Saint Lawrence, and, amongst others, of a tow-boat called the Hero.

In the year 1865 the appellants commenced an action in the superior court against the respondents, to recover damages for the loss of the said Silver Cloud, which ran aground in a fog while being towed by the respondents' said tow-boat the Hero.

The declaration, filed the 23rd Jan. 1865, in effect alleged that the plaintiffs were the owners of the Silver Cloud, and that the defendants agreed for 100 dols. to tow her safely from Montreal to Quebec; that, relying on the defendants' promise, the plaintiffs placed her in tow of one of the defendants' tug-boats, which took her in tow; that whilst on the voyage the weather became foggy and navigation was thereby rendered dangerous; that the defendants' and their servant ought then to have brought the tug and vessel to anchor, which they could have done; that they, however, continued to prosecute the said voyage against the will of the persons in charge of the plaintiffs' vessel, and so carelessly navigated and directed the course of the tug that the vessel was run aground and greatly injured; that the vessel was so run aground solely through the negligence of the defendants' servants; and that the loss sustained by the plaintiffs was 17,333 04 dols., which they claimed to recover.

The declaration contained a second count which varied only in alleging the payment to the respondents for towing the Silver Cloud to have been a reasonable amount.

The respondents, on 3rd April 1865, pleaded the general issue and a perpetual peremptory exception, which alleged first:—that the Silver Cloud was under the control of her own master, crew and pilot, who gave directions to the Hero, and that the negligence, if any, was theirs, and further that after the Silver Cloud was aground, her master and crew deserted her, but for which she would have been saved; secondly, that the Silver Cloud ran on shore from inevitable accident.

The appellants, on 10th April 1865, joined issue on the defendants' exception.

The result of the evidence was as follows:

The respondents admitted that on the 12th Nov. 1863, at Montreal, they, through their agent, agreed with the appellants to tow the Silver Cloud from the harbour of Montreal to the harbour of Quebec, for the sum of 100 dols. There was no evidence whatever, except this admission, as to the agreement entered into between the appellants and respondents. It was proved that it was usual in the Saint Lawrence for vessels, when towed, to be in charge of a certified pilot (called a branch pilot), and for the tow boat to receive directions from such pilot as to its course, and to be under his control. At this date pilotage was not compulsory in these waters.(a)

In pursuance of this agreement a steam-tug belonging to the respondents, named the Hero, left Montreal on the 12th Nov. 1863, having in tow the Silver Cloud, and another vessel called the Margaret Smith, the Silver Cloud being nearest to the tug. The Margaret Smith was the larger of the two vessels, drawing eighteen feet of water, the Silver Cloud being a brigantine, drawing only twelve feet. The Silver Cloud was in charge of a branch pilot named Augustin Naud; the Margaret Smith was also in charge of a branch pilot, his name being Felix Hamelin; the Hero had two pilots on board, but neither of them were branch pilots. The vessels in tow were provided with compasses, but there was no compass on board the Hero. The Hero, and her vessels in tow, were detained several days by contrary winds on their way down the river: but they left a point in the river, called Batiscan, about mid-day on the 18th.

The evidence was somewhat contradictory as to the occurrences during the remainder of the voyage, but the evidence of Felix Hamelin, the pilot of the Margaret Smith, who was an independent witness and called by both parties, was as follows:—

The weather was clear till they reached a point in the river called Richelieu, when it became so foggy that they lost sight of land, and Hamelin then wished to come to anchor. Hamelin called to the pilot of the Silver Cloud to stop the Hero, and the latter then gave some orders to the Hero which thereupon went at half-speed. After about a quarter of an hour the fog lightened, and the land again became visible as far as Pointe Aux Trembles, and the Hero resumed her full speed. Some time afterwards, when opposite the Church of St. Augustine, which is six or seven miles lower down, and only about twelve miles from Quebec, it being then between five and six o'clock and nearly dark, the pilot of the Silver Cloud came to the stern of his vessel and told Hamelin that it would be better to anchor, as they might run against other ships; Hamelin, however, replied that there would be no danger, having then made up his mind to go on to Quebec that night, although the dusk and fog rendered it a matter of some risk. Shortly after, when opposite Cap Rogue, and about ten minutes before the accident, the fog became so dense that Hamelin lost sight of the Hero, and the vessels changed their course, and ran aground on the south side of the river, the vessels striking the ground almost simultaneously. This was about six o'clock. When the fog cleared, the bows of the vessels were found to be pointing up the river, in the opposite direction to that in which their course lay.

During the whole of this time the weather was perfectly calm, and the voices of persons on board either vessel could be heard on board the next vessel without difficulty. The pilots of the Silver Cloud and Margaret Smith, and the crew of the Hero were French Canadians, and the orders and conversations which passed between them were entirely in French. The appellants called four witnesses, Naud, Drysdale, Gray, and Lauders, all of whom, however, belonged to the crew of the Silver Cloud, to prove that before the accident the pilot of the Silver Cloud gave express orders to the Hero to stop so as to let that vessel come to an anchor, and that if they had been obeyed the accident would have been avoided. These witnesses also gave evidence that the crew went forward and got the anchor ready, and were forward when the ship struck. The evidence of these witnesses was in many points contradictory, and the two latter could give no direct evidence as to the nature of the orders which were given, as they understood no French. The respondents, called eight witnesses from the crew of the Hero, who proved that the only order given by the pilot of the Silver Cloud was to go easy, which was immediately obeyed. Their evidence was strengthened by the fact, that during the latter part of the time they were stationed at the stern of the Hero expressly to be ready for the order to stop, which they expected to receive and wished to obey it promptly, and an independent witness confirmed their statement that no order to stop had been given during the last twenty minutes before the accident.

The vessel struck the ground shortly before low tide, and on the tide rising the Hero and Margaret Smith were got off without injury, but the Silver Cloud, having sprung a leak, became full of water.

The Hero remained on the spot till about ten o'clock, and then left and towed the Margaret Smith on to Quebec. The Silver Cloud appears to have floated as the tide rose, and to have moved further on the rocks; but about twelve o'clock she fell over on her beam ends, and her crew then left her. Efforts were afterwards made to float her into harbour for repairs, but, while preparations for this were being made, the chains used to hold her in her place not being strong enough, she was swept away by the tide and carried down the bed of the river. The injuries thus received were so great that, when finally raised, the wreck was sold for only 600*l.*, and the plaintiffs altogether sustained the loss mentioned in their declaration.

The evidence having been completed the case came on for hearing in the superior court before Meredith, C. J., on the 6th June 1868, and on the 15th Feb. 1869, the court gave judgment for the defendants, the now respondents, finding as a fact that no orders had been given by those on board the Silver Cloud to those on board the Hero, and holding that, the tug and tow being both subject to the order of the branch pilot on board the tow, and the pilot being aware of the causes of danger to which they were exposed, as well as the people of the tug, the crew of the tug, although they could not have been blamed if they had insisted on coming to an anchor, did not incur any legal responsibility towards the owners of the tow by waiting for orders from the branch pilot of the tow, whilst they in the meantime followed the course which one of the branch pilots was determined to pursue, and in which the other acquiesced.

The plaintiffs appealed to the Court of Queen's Bench and the appeal was heard on the 13th March 1871, before Duval, C.J., Caron, Drummond, Badgley, and Monk, JJ.; and on the 19th June 1871, the court gave judgment confirming the judgment of the court below, Drummond and Badgley, JJ., dissenting.

SMITH AND OTHERS v. THE ST. LAWRENCE TOW BOAT COMPANY.

The majority of the Court of Queen's Bench held that, it being the duty of the pilot on board the Silver Cloud to give orders, no order was given to the Hero to stop, and that those on board the Silver Cloud therefore brought about the accident by their own negligence. The minority of the court, after an elaborate review of the evidence, held that the evidence established that orders to stop had been given by the pilot of the Silver Cloud, and also that the tug, having entered into a contract to tow safely, was bound, without waiting for orders, to have provided for the safety of her tow by stopping as soon as the fog came on, and that having neglected to do so her owners could not avoid the responsibility of having knowingly encountered without necessity, visible and palpable danger.

From this judgment pronounced by Her Majesty's Court of Queen's Bench for the province of Quebec the owners of the Silver Cloud now appealed and humbly submitted that the judgment was erroneous for the following amongst other reasons: First, because the master of the steamer Hero persisted in confronting imminent danger in defiance of the orders given by the pilot of the Silver Cloud; secondly, because in the absence of any orders it was the duty of the master and pilot of the steamer Hero to use ordinary skill and diligence in the performance of the contract to tow, and that he did not do so; thirdly, because in the face of imminent danger which could only be avoided by stopping it was the duty of the master of the Hero to stop whether he received orders or not; fourthly, because the master of the steamer Hero well knew that the pilots and persons in charge of the vessels in tow were by reason of the fog rendered incapable of fulfilling their functions, and that they could no longer superintend the navigation of the steamer or do anything to avert or lessen the danger he was voluntarily incurring.

Butt, Q.C. and J. Edward Wilkins, for the appellants.—The evidence clearly establishes that the pilot of the Silver Cloud ordered the Hero to stop. But even if the court should be of opinion that no such order was given, yet the respondents are not absolved from liability. This action is founded upon a contract to tow, and such a contract implies that those on board the tug will exercise due diligence, care, and reasonable skill in the fulfilment of their engagement: (The Julia, 14 Moo. P. C. C. 210.) The owners of the tug-boat having by their own act placed themselves beyond the control of any one pilot by contracting with two vessels, each with a licensed pilot—who might give contrary orders, and who, as a matter of fact, did differ as to what orders should be given—they are responsible for any consequences that may ensue. In the steamer Syracuse (12 Wallace, U. S. Sup. Ct. Rep. 167), it is said that "if companies engaged in the business of tug-boats will, through greed of gain, undertake to transport from Albany to New York more canal boats in one tow than can be safely handled on the waters of New York, they must see that the large amount of property entrusted to their care is not placed in jeopardy through want of caution and foresight on the part of their steamers." [Sir M. SMITH.—It must be taken that the appellants consented to a second vessel being taken in tow. Moreover, it cannot be said that the owners of tow boats are insurers of the vessels which they take in tow. They are not carriers.] It was admitted in the judgment of the superior court that the circumstances would have justified the crew of the tug-boat in disobeying the orders of the pilots if they had given them positive orders to proceed and in coming to an anchor. This clearly shows that the negligence of the respondents was of the grossest character. Admitting even that the pilot of the Silver Cloud ought to have given the order to stop and did not do so, this neglect on his part does not disentitle the appellants to recover against the respondents, because the negligence of the appellant did not directly and actively contribute to the accident.

Davies v. Mann, 10 M. & W. 546;

Tuff v. Warman, 5 C. B., N. S., 573.

The direct cause of the accident was the persistence of the respondents in pursuing their course after they became aware of the risk, and by ordinary care could have avoided the consequences of their neglect. In Shearman and Redfield on Negligence (§ 36, p. 40, 2nd ed.), it is said "According to the doctrine of the English decisions, which we have adopted in sect. 25, the plaintiff may recover, notwithstanding his own negligence exposed him to risk of injury, if the defendant, after becoming aware of the plaintiff's negligence, failed to use ordinary care and to avoid injuring him." The respondents here failed after the fog came on to use that ordinary care for which they had contracted, and which they were bound to exercise by stopping, so as to avoid injury to the appellants' vessel.

Sir J. Karstlake, Q.C. and H. M. Bompas, for the respondents, were not called upon.

The judgment of the court was delivered by Sir B. PEACOCK.—This is a suit brought by the owners of the Silver Cloud against the St. Lawrence Tow Boat Company, who are the owners of the Hero, a steam-tug, which was employed for the purpose of towing the Silver Cloud upon the River St. Lawrence from Montreal to Quebec. The suit was brought for negligence in running the Silver Cloud aground during a dense fog. Chief Justice Meredith (the Chief Justice of the Superior Court) tried the case originally. He analysed the evidence very closely, and he came to the conclusion that the owners of the Silver Cloud were not entitled to recover.

It appears to be clear that when no directions are given by the vessel in tow, the rule in the case of tug steamers is, that the tug shall direct the course. The tug is the moving power, but it is under the control of the master or pilot on board the ship in tow. The Hero was towing two vessels, but their Lordships are of opinion that that does not make any difference in this case. If it had appeared that contradictory orders were given by the two vessels, and that the orders of one were obeyed in opposition to those of the other, the case might have been different. The vessels were proceeding in a dense fog; there were no means of seeing the banks of the river, nor of knowing where they were going; and no doubt there was negligence on the part both of those on board the ship and of those on board the Hero in proceeding in the way in which they did during the fog. If the Silver Cloud had given orders to the Hero to stop, and the Hero had neglected to obey those orders, then the negligence would have been solely on the part of the Hero. But, if, on the other hand, those on board the Silver Cloud did not give proper orders to the Hero to stop, then it appears to their Lordships that they were consenting to proceed in the fog, and that they contributed to the accident which occurred. The rule was clearly laid down by Lord Kingsdown in the case of The Julia (ubi sup.). Speaking of the duties of a tug steamer, he says, "a tug is to use proper skill and diligence, and is liable for any damage by her wrongful act. When the contract to tow was made, the law would imply an engagement that each vessel would perform its duty in completing it; that proper skill and diligence would be used on board each; that neither vessel, by neglect or misconduct, would create unnecessary risk to the other, or increase any risk which might be incidental to the service undertaken. If in the course of the performance of the contract any inevitable accident happened to the one without default on the part of the other, no cause of action would arise. If, on the other hand, the wrongful act of either occasioned damage to the other, such wrongful act would create a responsibility in the party committing it, if the sufferer had not by any misconduct or unskillfulness on his part contributed to the accident."

Their Lordships concur in the opinion expressed by the majority of the Judges in the Court of Appeal, that those on board, the Silver Cloud did contribute to the accident. The case was tried by Chief Justice Meredith in the superior court, and, after analysing the evidence, he came to the conclusion that they did not give such orders to stop as they were bound to do. Upon appeal to the Court of Queen's Bench, three of the judges of that court came to a similar conclusion. Now, their Lordships are asked to reverse the decision of the superior court, and the decision of the majority of the Court of Queen's Bench, upon a question of fact. It would not be right for their Lordships to overrule the decision of those courts upon such a question unless they came to a clear conclusion that the judges of those courts had come to an erroneous decision. In this case, so far from their Lordships coming to that conclusion, their opinion is in accordance with that of the majority of the judges in the lower appellate court, and in accordance with that of the judge who tried the case (Chief Justice Meredith), that the owners of the Silver Cloud did contribute to the accident by their negligence in allowing the Hero to proceed in the fog without giving that vessel proper orders to stop when it was dangerous, and dangerous to the knowledge of those on board the Silver Cloud, to proceed in the state of the weather in which they were going on.

Under those circumstances, their Lordships will humbly recommend Her Majesty to affirm the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, with costs.

Appeal dismissed.

FISHER AND OTHERS v. THE LIVERPOOL MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED).

Marine insurance—Policy—Slip—Neglect to execute policy—Whether action will lie for neglect—Admissibility in evidence of slip—30 & 31 Vict. c. 23, ss. 7, 9.

E. and Co. were agents of the defendants (a Liverpool Insurance Company) in London, to accept risks and receive premiums. Plaintiffs instructed P. and Co., insurance brokers in London, to insure some steel rails on board a ship for them; and on the 16th Nov. 1871, P. and Co. prepared a slip, which was initialled by one of the firm of E. and Co. for 1000l. A copy slip was sent to E. and Co., and by them forwarded the same night to the defendants in Liverpool, but the defendants did not send up a stamped policy. The amount of the premium and 2s. 6d. for policy duty were paid by P. and Co. to E. and Co. The vessel, with the steel rails on board, having been lost, the plaintiffs brought an action against the defendants to recover damages for the loss:

Held (per Quain and Archibald, JJ., dissentiente Blackburn, J.), that the plaintiffs could not in any form of action recover against the defendants, as 30 & 31 Vict. c. 23, ss. 7 and 9, prevented the plaintiffs from making available a contract for marine insurance not expressed in a stamped policy.

Per Blackburn, J., dissentiente, that the sending to the defendants of the copy slip was a request to them to obtain a stamp and complete the policy, and on their acceptance of that request they entered into a new contract apart from the initialling of the slip, and that the plaintiffs could recover against the defendants for not using due skill and diligence in framing a stamped policy in conformity with the request slip, and bringing the transaction to a conclusion within a reasonable time, either by executing or repudiating that policy; and that the slip was admissible in evidence, not for the purpose of enforcing it as a contract of insurance, but for the collateral purpose of showing that the defendants had not used diligence in bringing the matter to a conclusion within a reasonable time.

DECLARATION, for that the defendants, by warranting to the plaintiffs that one Eames was duly authorised as their agent and on their behalf to accept certain risks and receive on their behalf certain premiums for insurance upon risk represented by the said Eames to have been accepted by the defendant, and in respect of policies of insurance drawn up and executed by the defendants, to cover such risks, induced and caused the plaintiffs to pay certain premiums for the said insurance, and certain other moneys for the costs and expenses of the said policy of insurance by the said Eames, for and in respect of a risk accepted by him for and in the name of the defendants, upon a ship of the plaintiffs called the Lizzie, and for the said policy of insurance represented by the said Eames to have been prepared and granted by the defendants to the plaintiffs, and restrained as usual in the hands of the defendants, and also thereby induced and caused the plaintiffs not to cover the said ship by other insurances, and to rely upon the said policy said to have been granted by the defendants; and the plaintiffs say that all conditions precedent were fulfilled, and all times elapsed, and all matters and things were done and happened necessary to entitle the plaintiffs to have the said warranty fulfilled and performed, and to sue the defendants for the breach of the said warranty hereinafter complained of; yet the plaintiffs say that the defendants were guilty of a breach of the said warranty in this respect, that the said Eames had not authority, as their agent, to accept the said risks and receive the said premiums for insurances as warranted as aforesaid, whereby the plaintiffs sustained great loss and damage, as in the second count hereinafter set forth; and the plaintiffs also sue the defendants for that the defendants, by falsely and fraudulently misrepresenting to the plaintiffs that one Eames was then duly authorised to act as their agent in accepting premiums for insurance, and also that the defendants had granted and accepted a policy of assurance in favour of the plaintiffs, covering a certain ship of the plaintiffs called the Lizzie, induced the plaintiffs to pay to the said Eames a large sum of money for and as a premium for such assurance, and for the price of a stamp for the said policy, and also to abstain from effecting insurances with other underwriters, whereas, in truth and in fact, no such policy was granted or executed by the defendants, nor was the said Eames authorised to receive premiums for the defendants, all which premises the defendants well knew at the time of the making the said false representations, whereby the plaintiffs sustained loss and damage by paying the said sum of money to the said Eames without having the benefit of the insurance, and by abstaining from covering the said ship by other insurances, and by the said ship being lost by perils of sea, against which the plaintiffs then supposed they were insured, and the plaintiffs were otherwise greatly damaged; and the plaintiffs also sue the defendants for money payable by the defendants to the plaintiffs for money had and received by the defendants to the plaintiffs' use.

Pleas (1) to the first count, that the defendants did not warrant as therein alleged; (2) that they are not guilty of such breach of warranty as therein alleged; (3) that they did not induce or cause the plaintiffs to act as therein alleged; (4) to the second count, not guilty; (5) as to the residue of the declaration, never indebted.

On these pleas issue was joined.

The case came on to be tried before Brett, J., at the Liverpool Summer Assizes 1872, when the learned judges held that there was no evidence to go to the jury of breach of warranty or of misrepresentation, but gave leave to amend the declaration so as to cover the facts, and thereupon a verdict was found for the plaintiff for 1000*l.*, leave being given to the defendant to move to enter a verdict for them if there was no evidence upon an amended declaration which should have been left to the jury, or if the learned judge ought not to have amended. All the material facts of the case are stated in the judgment of Blackburn, J. (post.)

The case had been argued once before Blackburn and Quain, J.J., when those learned judges differed in opinion, and the rule was ordered to be argued a second time, when there should be a third judge present.

Benjamin, Q.C. and Macofee showed cause against the rule.—The question is, whether an action in any form will lie against the defendants under the circumstances of the case, and it is submitted that an action will lie. The plaintiffs being interested in a certain vessel, desired to insure it, and employed the defendants as their agents to effect the insurance. By accepting that office the defendants undertook, on receipt of the premium, to issue a policy; and this they were bound to do by law; and if by their neglect to do so they have occasioned loss to the plaintiffs, they are liable for it. The plaintiffs sue not in contract but in tort for a breach of duty. [BLACKBURN, J.—Surely you are in effect suing upon a contract. QUAIN, J.—It was a contract with the defendants that they, on receipt of the premium, should issue a policy.] There is a clear distinction between the two classes of cases, an action in tort often lying where an action in contract would not lie: See Langridge v. Levy (2 M. & W. 519), where an action was held to lie for falsely and fraudulently warranting a gun to have been made by a particular maker, and to be a good, safe, and secure gun, and selling it as such to the plaintiff's father, for the use of himself and his sons, one of whom (the plaintiff), confiding in the warranty, used the gun, which burst and injured him. The defendants rely on the provisions of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 23. Sect. 7 of that Act provides that "no contract or agreement for sea insurance (other than such insurance as is referred to in the 55th section of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862) shall be valid unless the same is expressed in a policy; and every policy shall specify the particular risk or adventure, the names of the subscribers or underwriters, and the sums insured; and in case any of the above-mentioned particulars shall be omitted in any policy, such policy shall be null and void to all intents and purposes." Sect. 8 contains similar nullifying words as to policies for periods exceeding twelve months. It provides that "no policy shall be made for any time not exceeding twelve months, and every policy which shall be made for any time exceeding twelve months shall be null and void to all intents and purposes." But no such strong words are used when the statute comes to deal with the question of stamping. Sect. 9 provides that "no policy shall be pleaded or given in evidence in any court, or admitted in any court to be good or available in law or in equity, unless duly stamped." [BLACKBURN, J.—The question really is, whether you can recover on a slip to the same extent as you can on a stamped policy?] The policy must be stamped in order to be given in evidence; but the various steps taken by the parties in anticipation of this valid contract are perfectly legal. They may come to an understanding as to the form which the agreement is to take. If the plaintiffs had not paid to the defendant the amount of stamp duty, it is admitted that it would be contrary to the policy of the Stamp Act that they should be allowed to recover in this action; but the plaintiffs, having paid the amount of stamp duty, have done all they can to meet the requirements of the Stamp Act; and there is nothing to prevent the plaintiffs from making the defendants liable for a breach of duty in not, after receiving the amount of the stamp duty, obtaining the requisite stamp and issuing the policy. There has been no evasion or attempt at evasion of the

Stamp Act on the part of the plaintiffs. It is acknowledged that there can be no valid policy unless it is stamped, but the statute does not say that the slip may not be used to prove other things. E. g., it may be used for the purpose of convicting offenders against the statute; sect. 13 providing that "if any person shall become an assurer upon any sea insurance, or shall subscribe or underwrite, or otherwise sign or make, or enter into any contract, agreement, or memorandum, for or of any sea insurance, or shall receive or contract for any premium or consideration for any sea insurance, or shall receive, or charge, or take credit in account for any such premium or consideration as aforesaid, or shall wilfully or knowingly take upon himself any risk, or render himself liable to pay, or shall pay or allow, or agree to pay or allow, in account or otherwise, any sum of money, upon any loss, peril, or contingency relative to any sea insurance, unless such insurance shall be written on vellum, parchment, or paper duly stamped; or if any person shall be concerned in any fraudulent contrivance or device, or shall be guilty of any wilful act, neglect, or omission, with intent to evade the duties payable on policies under this Act, or whereby the duties may be evaded, every person so evading shall for every such offence forfeit the sum of 100*l.*" This section clearly shows that there are collateral purposes for which an unstamped policy is admissible in evidence. Now the plaintiffs do not use it in the present case to show that there has been a contract of insurance, but to show that through the default of the defendants the plaintiffs have been prevented from obtaining a contract of insurance. The claim is for unliquidated damages to recover the amount of the loss sustained owing to the defendants' neglect of duty. If the plaintiffs are held not entitled to recover, it will follow that the party who has provided the money for the stamp duty will have to suffer, and not the party who received it. In Ionides v. The Pacific Fire and Marine Insurance Company (ante, vol. 1, p. 141; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 674; and on appeal, ante, vol. 1, p. 330; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 517) it was held that notwithstanding sect. 7 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 23, a slip may be given in evidence, though not valid as a contract, as evidence of the intention of the parties. BLACKBURN, J., in the court below, said: "As the slip is clearly a contract for marine insurance, and is equally clearly not a policy, it is by virtue of these enactments not valid, that is, not enforceable at law or in equity; but it may be given in evidence wherever it is, though not valid, material; and in the present case it is material." And in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, Kelly, C.B. said: "The second question is, whether this slip was admissible in evidence at all, and if it were, whether it was admissible in evidence for the purpose for which alone it was used on the trial of this cause. Now, it is quite true that under the statute in question (30 Vict. c. 23, ss. 7, 9), the document called a slip, although it is binding in point of honour between parties circumstanced as these parties were, is made void as a contract, and as such inadmissible in evidence. It is not like an agreement for a lease, upon which an action can be brought for the non-acceptance of the lease, or the refusal to grant a lease; but as a contract for a policy of assurance to be afterwards made, is a mere nullity. It does not, however, follow that it is not admissible in evidence for a great variety of purposes. In this case it is unnecessary to do more than consider whether it is admissible in evidence for the purpose of showing what the two parties intended at the time they entered into this transaction; in other words, whether they intended it to be a policy pursuant to a previous contract, although that contract was not binding, or whether the policy was a new, separate, and substantive contract, to be construed without reference to the previous acts of the parties. . . . If it had been applied to a purpose forbidden by the Act of Parliament, I should not have hesitated to say that it ought not to be considered as admitted, or if admitted applied to any such purpose. But for many purposes it may legitimately be used, as in cases where a fraud is suggested, or where there is a plea, as here, of misrepresentation, the slip may be evidence of the fraud or of the misrepresentation charged. Suppose a slip, with a view to an insurance from a port in South America, which had been under a blockade little while before the date of the policy, and the slip, at the instance of the plaintiff, described the port as an open port, and the question had arisen whether the policy had been procured by misrepresentation, or whether there was a concealment of the material fact that the port had been under blockade; no one can doubt that upon the collateral question of misrepresentation, the slip would be admissible in evidence to prove what the plaintiff had represented. It is quite enough, therefore, to say that here it was not given in evidence to prove a binding contract between the parties, or to contradict or to explain, or in any way affect the construction of the policy in question; but it was given in evidence only to show what their intention was in preparing the policy. For that purpose I am clearly of opinion that it was admissible in evidence." The point for which the slip is sought to be used in the present case is clearly a collateral one, and the authority of the case cited shows that for such a purpose it is admissible in evidence. Dutton v. Powles (2 B. & S. 174) was also referred to.

R. G. Williams and James P. Aspinall (Aspinall, Q.C. with them) in support of the rule.—A slip is a contract for sea insurance; it is a contract to execute an instrument by which the vessel named shall be duly insured; and that is the only contract in the case. There is no such thing as a contract merely to make and deliver a policy. The contract for a sea insurance arises immediately on the initialling of the slip. Apart from the Stamp Acts, the slip would be a good contract of sea insurance: but the statute has provided that "no policy shall be pleaded or given in evidence in any court, or admitted in any court to be good or available in law or in equity, unless duly stamped." The cases of Cory v. Patton (ante, vol. 1, p. 225; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 304), and Ionides v. The Pacific Fire and Marine Insurance Company (ubi sup.), could never have arisen if a slip could in any way be made enforceable in an action. In the last cited case, the court distinctly say that "it is void as a contract, and as such inadmissible in evidence;" "as a contract for a policy of assurance to be afterwards made, it is a mere nullity." Now it is only as a contract for a policy of assurance afterwards to be made that the slip can in any way be made available in the present action, and as such it is "a mere nullity." A contract to execute a policy of insurance is indisputably a contract for sea insurance, and therefore comes expressly within the application of the Stamp Act. What is a sea insurance and what is a policy are defined by the 4th section, which provides that "the expression 'sea insurance' means any insurance (including re-insurance) made upon any ship or vessel, or upon the machinery, tackle, or furniture of any ship or vessel, or upon any goods, merchandise, or property of any description whatever, on board of any ship or vessel, or upon the freight of or any other interest which may be lawfully insured in or relating to any ship or vessel; and the word 'policy' means any instrument whereby a contract or agreement for any sea insurance is made or entered into." In Xenos v. Wickham (L. Rep. 2 Eng. & Ir. Ap. 314; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 537), Willes, J. says: "The statutes requiring contracts of marine insurance to be in writing and stamped (35 Geo. 3, c. 63, s. 11; 54 Geo. 3, c. 144, ss. 3, 4, 5) annuls contracts not so framed; consequently a marine policy or contract for a marine policy, to be valid, must be in writing, which, by the consent of both parties, shall represent the contract between them." But for the decided cases, it might have been supposed that, upon the slip being completed, there was a contract upon the part of the assurers to prepare and hand over a policy according to the slip: and that although, because of the statutes, no action could be maintained as upon a policy of insurance, yet an action might be maintained for not preparing a policy. And causes have been tried without objection upon the notion that the insurance is complete from the date of the slip. But the law, as settled by the decisions upon the construction of the statutes referred to, is that as there can be no valid insurance or contract for an insurance, unless by writing with the statutory requisites, the slip by itself has no binding force. Thus, it has been held that, notwithstanding the slip, the proposed assured, upon the one hand, can insist upon being assured, and can retract his order and refuse to accept the policy: (Warwick v. Slade, 3 Camp. 1279), where the employer retracted the broker's authority after the slip was signed, though before the policy was completed; and, on the other hand, that the slip imposes no liability upon the proposed insurer, and there is no remedy against him until the policy is complete: (Parry v. The Great Ship Company, 4 B. & S. 556; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 397.) To give effect to a slip, as sought to be done in the present action, would be to give it the same effect as a policy, and thus to frustrate the clear intention of the Stamp Acts. It is submitted that the absence of a duly-stamped policy is a fatal obstacle to the plaintiffs' recovering in any form of action against the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 5.—The Court being divided in opinion, the following judgments were now delivered:

BLACKBURN, J.—In this case, on the trial before my brother Brett at Liverpool, the plaintiffs had a verdict for 1000*l.*, subject to leave to move to enter a verdict for the defendants reserved by the learned judge, in the following terms, "if there was no evidence upon an amended declaration or if I ought not to have amended." The Common Law Procedure Act 1852, sect. 222, gives the judge at Nisi Prius power to make all amendments on such terms as he thinks fit; and requires that all such amendments as may be necessary for the purpose of determining in the existing suit the real question in controversy between the parties, shall be made. No suggestion was made, either at the trial or on the argument, that there were any terms which it was proper to impose. That being so, we must construe this reservation as meaning that if there is any form of declaration under which the evidence at the trial would prove the plaintiff's right to recover, the verdict is to stand.

Mr. Aspinall obtained a rule on four grounds, thus stated in the rule: First, that there was no evidence to go to the jury; secondly, that no action will lie on the slip alone without a policy; thirdly, that no interest was shown in the plaintiffs; fourthly, that the learned judge should not have allowed the declaration to be amended. Against this cause was shown in the first instance before my brother Quain and myself, when we were agreed that there was no foundation for the objection that no interest was shown in the plaintiffs, and that was disposed of on the argument, and we need not further notice it. On the other points we felt so much difficulty that we directed a second argument when my brother Archibald could be present, and after that argument the court took time to consider.

To make the case intelligible it is necessary to state the material part of the evidence. From the judge's notes it appears that the defendants, a Liverpool insurance company (limited), employed the firm of Eames and Co. as their agents in London, to accept risks and receive premiums in London. One of that firm was called as a witness and gave evidence that the course of business was that he accepted risks for the defendants by himself initialling the slips. That when he had initialled the slip a copy of the slip (as he called it) was sent to him. This appears to have been the practice described in the 7th paragraph of the case stated in Xenos v. Wickham (14 C. B., N. S., 438). In that case I expressed (at p. 454) an opinion to which I still adhere, that what is here called the copy of the slip is not, like the first slip, in legal effect, a memorandum of the terms on which the parties agree to insure, but a request unto or mandate to the company to make out and execute a policy according to the practice. The witness proceeded to explain that the course of business was that the witness always forwarded the copies of the slips or request notes to the defendants at Liverpool on the same night that they were received by him in London. A circular, approved by the defendants, informing the public that Eames and Co. were their London agents, was put in. The plaintiffs had instructed John Patten, jun. and Co., insurance brokers in London, to issue for them steel rails, and on the 16th Nov. 1871 Patten and Co. prepared a slip which was put in evidence at the trial, and which has been produced before us. It was headed in print, "Cash acc., John Patten, jun. and Co." and was dated 16th Nov. 1861. Then in writing followed:

Barrow.		f. p. a.
Steel rails.		£880
f. g. a.		60/0/0.
f. e. & s.		600 }

Below followed several sums initialled by different parties. These sums in all amounted to 4200*l.* Amongst them was "1000*l.*, T. R. E." It was proved by the evidence of Mr. Eames that these were his initials. No evidence was given as to the effect of this; but there is no doubt that in mercantile understanding this amounted to an agreement between the brokers, Patten and Co., and Eames (acting for the defendants) to insure on the ship Lizzy, on a voyage from Barrow to New York 1000*l.*, part of 6880*l.* on steel rails, free of particular average, and of general average, and of capture and seizure at 60*s.* per cent., and that the premiums were to go into the cash account. I will consider the effect of the revenue laws on this afterwards. The copy slip or request note was made out by Patten and Co., and sent to Eames and Co. who, on the same night, sent it on to the defendants at Liverpool. It was not stated by any witnesses when this was done. In regular course it ought to have been done directly after the slip was initialled, and the stamped policy ought then to have been sent up by the defendants to Eames and Co. duly executed by them soon after. Had this been done in November the amount of the premium in this case 30*l.* less 10 o/o on that amount for discount, or in this case 27*l.* making the net sum 25*l.* 13*s.*, would have been payable on the 8th Dec. by the broker to the defendants. And as the defendants would have advanced for the broker the amount of the stamp, that would have been due at once, though for convenience sake the actual payment would in practice, no doubt, be made at the same time when the larger sum for the premiums was paid. The defendants, for some reason not explained but probably connected with their being in liquidation, neglected to send up the stamped policy. Patten and Co.'s clerk proved that he several times called for it at Eames and Co., and was told that it had not come up, and that Eames and Co. would write to the defendants sharply about it. At last, on the 29th Jan. 1872, the defendants' liquidators wrote a letter to Eames and Co. inquiring whether this slip was to go forward. Eames immediately communicated with Patten and Co., and in consequence of their directions the slip was put forward, and Eames and Co. forwarded to Patten and Co. an account of which the following is a copy:

Q. B.] FISHER AND OTHERS v. THE LIVERPOOL MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED).

The Liverpool Marine Insurance Co. (Limited).

London agency,

Eames & Co.,

St. Michael's House,

Cornhill, E.C.

To premiums for the month of	} £25 13 0
Jany. 1872, less brokerage and 10 per cent. discount for cash.....
Policy duty	0 2 6

NOTE.—The discount will be forfeited in default of prompt payment on the 8th Feb.

This account, it will be observed, is made out exactly as if there had been a fresh slip initialled in January, and the stamp had been duly procured by the defendants. For some reason, not explained, actual payment was not made by Patten and Co. till the 13th March, on which day they paid the amount to Eames and Co. by a cheque payable to defendant's order. Eames and Co., by virtue of an authority which they had from the defendants, indorsed that cheque and received the money. These facts are very strong evidence that as between Eames and Patten it was understood that the company had undertaken the duty of preparing the policy. The defendants never did prepare or execute any stamped policy. The Lizzy was totally lost, and then the defendants refused to execute any policy or to pay the insurance.

The main contention of the defendants was that the plaintiffs could not recover unless the court, in a direct contravention of the 30 Vict. c. 23, sects. 7 & 9, permitted the plaintiff to make available a contract for marine insurance not expressed in a stamped policy; and on the pleadings as they stood at the trial this was the case. But the learned judge was of opinion, and we think quite correctly, that if by any amendment the pleadings could be made such as to enable the plaintiffs to recover for the breach of the defendants' duty, without contravening the statute, that amendment should be made. He asked the jury three questions: First, did the defendants authorise Eames to issue slips, and accept risks, and receive premiums; secondly, did the defendants, by approving the circular and the authority which they gave to Eames to issue slips and accept premiums, give the plaintiffs reasonable ground to believe, and did the plaintiffs believe, that if they paid the premium and stamp on a slip initialled by Eames they, the defendants, would issue a policy in accordance with the slip? thirdly, were the plaintiffs prevented by the conduct of the defendants from insuring elsewhere? The jury found for the plaintiffs, and the verdict was entered for 1000*l.*, subject to the leave already mentioned.

I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs may in this case recover without infringing the existing revenue laws. In Marsden v. Reid (3 East, 572) the Court of King's Bench decided that the then Stamp Acts forbade them to look at the slip for any purpose. In that case the defence was that a material representation was made to the first underwriter to induce him to subscribe, which representation the defendants contended was to be taken to have been made to all the rest of the underwriters who acted on the credit of that first underwriter without the necessity of repeating it to each. It is obvious the underwriter who was the first in this sense, was the first underwriter who agreed to subscribe, and first initialled the slip, not the one who first signed the policy; but the court thought themselves bound to hold the contrary. A subsequent statute (54 Geo. 3, c. 144) provided for the stamping of slips, but I believe that slips never were in practice stamped, though that Act remained on the statute book till the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 23. The whole of the Stamp Acts were, as far as related to marine insurance, repealed by 30 & 31 Vict. c. 23, and therefore we need not inquire whether the monstrous injustice done in Marsden v. Reid was really forced upon the King's Bench by the then Stamp Acts. It has been determined on the construction of the now existing Act, that though the slip being a contract for insurance, not expressed in a stamped policy is void as a contract; and as such, not admissible for other purposes: (Ionides v. Pacific Marine Company, ante, vol. 1, p. 330; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 525, in the Exchequer Chamber; Cory v. Patton, L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 304; ante, vol. 1, p. 225; Lishman and others v. Northern Marine Assurance Company, L. Rep. 8 C. P. 216; ante, vol. 1, p. 554.)

In the case now before us Patten and Co., as brokers to the plaintiffs, had undertaken a duty to use due care and diligence about procuring, making, and completing the insurance for them. When a slip is initialled the contract is binding in honour but not in law; and the broker's duty requires him to take the further steps to procure it to be made binding in law. For this purpose it is necessary that the policy should be drawn up on stamped paper, and the brokers have to advance the stamp and see that the policy is properly drawn up, and then to take care that within a reasonable time the matter is concluded. The broker does not undertake that the underwriter who has initialled the slip shall sign the policy, though that is the way in which in the great majority of cases the matter is concluded. As soon as the underwriter has signed, the premiums are as between the assured and the underwriter paid, the underwriter taking in satisfaction of them the broker's personal promise to pay at the end of the customary period, subject to the customary deductions. But if the underwriter refuses to sign there is no mode either at law or in equity to force him to do so. The matter in that case is concluded by this breach of honour on the part of the underwriter; and if the broker has used due diligence to bring it to a conclusion, either one way or the other, within a reasonable time, he has done his duty. If the broker has been negligent, and in consequence of the final conclusion of the matter has been unreasonably delayed, the broker is responsible to his principal for the damage sustained through that delay. That damage must depend on circumstances. If, notwithstanding the delay, the risk will be still taken by other underwriters at the same premiums the damage would generally be nothing. If the risk was still insurable, but at an enhanced premium, the measure of damages would generally be the increase of the premium. But if, in consequence of the delay, news of the loss had come, or for any other reason, the risk was no longer insurable, the damage would generally be the amount which would have been recoverable if a stamped policy had been duly executed within a reasonable time. In order to prove the case against the broker it would be necessary to give in evidence the slip, not for the purpose of enforcing it as a contract of insurance; but for the collateral purpose of showing that the broker had not used due diligence in bringing the matter to a conclusion within a reasonable time, so that the principal might be insured elsewhere if this underwriter did not insure him, and I think on the authority of the cases above cited the slip is admissible for such a purpose.

Then it seems to me that on the usage stated in Xenos v. Wickham (14 C. B., N. S., 457), and followed in this case, the effect of giving to a company a request slip, or copy slip, and of the company accepting it, is that the company by what I consider a fresh arrangement, no part of the contract made by initialling the slip, take on themselves that which would otherwise be the duty of the broker, viz., to use due skill and diligence about preparing the policy properly and bringing the transaction as regards the company's subscription to a conclusion in a reasonable time. And for this undertaking the mere fact that they were trusted with that duty would be a sufficient consideration. I do not think that the company by this acceptance of the request slip promises to execute the policy. That it had already done by initialling the slip, and the acceptance of the request slip carries that contract no further. But I think that it does by what, when the practice first began, must have been in each case an express subsequent agreement, and what I think still is a subsequent agreement, though now a casual one, take upon itself a responsibility co-extensive with that which the broker would otherwise have undertaken. If the company at once returns the request slip, and without any delay informs the assured that it will not execute a policy, though bound in honour so to do, I do not think that any action would lie against it. The assured would then be at liberty to insure elsewhere. But if the company is guilty of unreasonable delay, the damages to which it would be liable would, I think, be just the same as the broker would have been liable to if he had been guilty of the same delay. And I see nothing inconsistent with the objects of the revenue laws in enforcing a contract to pay the government for the stamp. Nor do I see any reason why we should strive to turn the second independent contract into a part of the first, in order to bring the same within the letter of the statute, if it is not within its spirit. In the present case I think the evidence and the answer of the jury to the first question put by my brother Brett, would prove a count framed on the undertaking of the defendants to use due skill and diligence in framing a stamped policy in conformity with the request slip, and bringing the transaction to a conclusion within a reasonable time, either by executing or repudiating that policy. And I think that the evidence and the answers of the jury to the two and three questions show a breach of that duty and damage sustained by the plaintiffs justifying the verdict for 1000*l.* And I think that by giving effect to that verdict, that we should not transgress the 30 Vic. c. 23, as we should neither treat the contract for assurance contained on the slip as valid, nor make it available at law as a policy, but merely receive it in evidence for the collateral purpose of showing the duty which the defendants took upon themselves and neglected.

I think therefore that the rule should be discharged, but as the majority of the court are of a different opinion, it must be made absolute.

The judgment of Quain and Archibald, JJ. was delivered by ARCHIBALD, J.—The question in this case is, whether upon the facts, and assuming the necessary amendment made, the plaintiff is under any form of declaration entitled to recover, notwithstanding the provisions of the 30 Vic. c. 23. The facts as proved are fully set forth in the judgment of our brother Blackburn, and it is unnecessary therefore to repeat them in detail. Those which are the most material relate to the difference in regard to the preparation of the stamped policy, between the usage in the case of private underwriters and that which prevails in the case of insurance companies.

In the former case, after the slip has been initialled, the usage is for the broker of the assured to advance the stamp, draw up the policy on stamped paper, and present it to the different underwriters for execution. But in the case of an insurance company, after the slip has been initialled by an agent of the company, it is retained by the broker of the assured, and a copy of it is then sent to the company by the broker, in order to enable the company to prepare the policy. The policy is then drawn up on stamped paper by the company, who themselves advance the stamp and execute the policy ready to be delivered to the assured or his broker. The duty of the broker of the assured in ordinary cases, and the measure of damages for any breach of it, are well established and understood, and if the evidence in this case satisfied us that a precisely analogous duty unconnected with and separate from a promise to execute the policy, was undertaken by the defendants' company, we should have no doubt that the consequences of a breach of duty by the company would be similar to those of a breach by the broker.

It appears to us also that inasmuch as the slip, though invalid as a contract, would be admissible in evidence for the collateral purposes of establishing the existence and the breach of such a duty—see Ionides v. The Pacific Marine Insurance Company (ante, vol. 1, pp. 141, 330; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 525); Cory v. Patton (ante, vol. 1, p. 225; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 304)—the plaintiff would, if the declaration could be made to assume such a shape, be entitled to recover. Indeed, this seems to us to be the only conceivable form of declaration upon which, if at all, the defendants can be rendered liable; for the 30 Vict. c. 23, expressly renders invalid any contract or agreement, for sea insurance, unless it be expressed in a policy (in which also certain prescribed particulars must be specified) and prohibits its being pleaded or given in evidence, or admitted into any court to be good or available in law or in equity, unless duly stamped, i.e., stamped before being signed or underwritten. So that no action can be directly maintained upon the slip itself, which in the opinion of all of us amounts to an agreement for sea insurance within the meaning of the Act. (Per Willes, J., in Xenos v. Wickham, L. Rep. 2 H. of L. Cas. 296.)

It is abundantly clear that, in consequence of the provisions of the Act, the engagements entered into by initialling the slip cannot be directly enforced, either at law or in equity; and being therefore only binding in honour, it is open to unconscientious men to break it, unless it can be indirectly enforced in the manner and on the grounds suggested by brother Blackburn in his judgment, whether it can or not, in the present case, depends upon the true nature and effect of the usage with respect to the preparation of the policy. In the case of private underwriters, the engagement entered into by initialling the slip must, having regard to the course of business, be understood to be an engagement to execute a stamped policy when it has been prepared and presented by the broker. In the case of insurance companies, it is equally understood to be an engagement to execute a stamped policy, at some time and under some circumstances; and the question is whether it does not also import that the company are, on receipt of the slip, to procure the stamp and fill up the policy. Where or how the difference of usage between the case of private underwriters and that of companies first sprung up does not appear. The monopoly of the two old companies—the Royal Exchange and the London Assurance—was done away with in 1824 by the 5 Geo. 4, c. 114; and it may be that when other companies were first established for carrying on the business of marine insurance, the practice as it exists between policy brokers and private underwriters, was in the first instance adopted, and that the present practice of sending a copy of the initialled slip to the company, in order that they, and not the broker, might procure the stamp and prepare as well as execute the policy, afterwards came into use; or it may be that from the first the latter course was found to be the most convenient. However this may be, it makes in our judgment little difference to the question under consideration; for it appears to us that when this became the fixed and settled usage, the only reasonable implication from the initialling of the slip on behalf of a company is that it is an engagement, not merely generally to execute a binding policy, but to execute it in accordance with the usual and accustomed course of business, including, therefore, and undertaking, on receipt of the copy of the slip, to procure a stamp and fill up the policy. If then this be (as we think it is) the true effect of the transaction, the agreement being one and entire, and including as part of it, an undertaking to execute the policy, i.e., an agreement for sea insurance, the statute applies and presents an insuperable obstacle to any action founded on a supposed breach of duty in not procuring a stamp and preparing a policy, or in failing to give notice within a reasonable time that the company decline to prepare and execute it.

It is contended that in the case of companies there are in fact two separate transactions, first, the initialling of the slip constituting an agreement to execute a policy; secondly, an agreement on a new and separate consideration, upon receipt and acceptance of the copy slip, to do all that it is the duty of a broker to do in the case of private underwriters. We are wholly unable to concur in this view. It appears to us that there is no evidence of any such second agreement, separate and distinct from the agreement which arises from initialling the slip, namely, to execute the policy. In our opinion, there is only one agreement, viz., that which is to be implied in accordance with the usual course of business, from the initialling of the slip. Nor do we think that there is any duty cast upon the company, separate and distinct from the rest of their agreement, or which bears any true analogy to the well-known duty of a policy broker. The copy slip sent by the broker of the assured to the company, is sent merely for the purpose of enabling the company to prepare and fill up the stamped policy; and we do not think that it imposes on them any fresh duty different from that which they had already undertaken, or transforms the company into brokers for the assured. The broker in his endeavour to procure the completion of the policy, has to deal with third persons, over whose intentions or decision in the matter, he has of course no control. If, when he has done all that his duty in the matter prescribes, the underwriter should decline to execute the policy, the broker would be discharged if, within a reasonable time, he gave notice of it to his employer, in order that the latter might effect or direct an insurance to be effected elsewhere. But the company, if any analogous duty were supposed to be incumbent on them, would certainly not fulfil it by merely preparing a stamped policy ready for execution in their office, if they stopped short of executing it; and if it were added to their supposed duty, that they were, within a reasonable time after they decided not to execute, to give a notice of such intention, this would imply a duty to make up their minds within a reasonable time, whether to keep or break their agreement, a duty altogether unlike anything undertaken by a broker. We are unable upon the facts to find that there is any such duty undertaken upon a new consideration, or any duty whatever severable from the contract to insure in the usual and customary manner; and upon the whole, therefore, we are of opinion that there is no possible form of action, under the circumstances of the case, which could be maintained without contravening the 30 Vict. c. 23.

For these reasons we are of opinion, that the rule to enter the verdict for the defendants must be made absolute.

Rule absolute.

MERCHANTS SHIPPING COMPANY (LIMITED) v.
ARMITAGE.

Charter-party—Lump sum freight—Entire discharge and right delivery—Loss of part of cargo by fire.

By a charter-party made at Colombo it was agreed that the plaintiffs' ship which was there should load there, or sail and proceed to Cochin, and there load from the defendants, the charterers or their agents, a full and complete lading. The ship being so loaded was to proceed to London and discharge; a lump sum freight of £5000 to be paid after the entire discharge and right delivery of the cargo in cash two months after the date of the ship's report inwards at the custom house, or under discount at 5 per cent., at option of charterers' agents.

*The plaintiffs' ship proceeded to Cochin, and was there put up by the defendants as a general ship and loaded with a full and complete cargo, the property of various merchants, and shipped under several bills of lading. On her voyage from Cochin to London the cargo was found to be on fire, and the ship had to be scuttled. Afterwards the water was pumped out, the damaged cargo was sold and accounted for by plaintiffs to the owners; the remainder of the cargo was re-laden on board and brought to London in the ship. The defendants had paid freight in proportion to the cargo and distance, but refused to pay the balance of the lump sum freight, about 1150*l., which was claimed in this action.

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to this sum, and also to interest from the time agreed for payment in cash.

This was an action for the recovery of 1152*l.* 18*s.* 1*d.* and interest, as hereinafter mentioned. By the consent of the parties and by order, the following case was stated for the opinion of the court without any pleadings:

The plaintiffs are a company carrying on business as shipowners in the City of London, and were and are the owners of the ship Clyde, herein-after mentioned, and the defendants are merchants carrying on business at Colombo and London.

On the 25th Jan. 1872, the ship was lying in the harbour at Colombo, and upon that day the charter-party, hereinafter set out, was made and entered into by Edward Shrewsbury, the master of the said ship, on behalf of the plaintiffs and the defendants. The charter-party was as follows:

Colombo, 25th Jan. 1872.

1. It is this day mutually agreed between Edward Shrewsbury, of the good ship or vessel called the Clyde, classed A 1 in Lloyd's, of the registered tonnage of 1151 tons or thereabouts, now lying in the harbour of Colombo whereof he is master, of the one part, and Messrs. Armitage Brothers, of Colombo, merchants, on the other part. That the said ship being tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, shall, with all convenient speed, load here or sail and proceed to Cochin (orders to be given on or before the 29th inst.), and, if ordered to Cochin, there load from the said charterers or their agents, completing at Colombo or Tuticorin, if so required by charterers, a full and complete lading of legal merchandise, which full and complete lading the captain binds himself to receive on board and properly stow, but not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions, and furniture, and being so loaded shall therewith proceed to London into the East or West India Docks, and discharge there as customary,

2. The act of God, restraints of princes and rulers, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature and kind soever during the said voyage always excepted.

3. A lump sum freight of 5000*l.* to be paid after the entire discharge and right delivery of the cargo in cash two months after the date of the ship's report inwards at the Custom House, or under discount at 5 per cent. per annum (or at the Bank rate if higher) at option of charterers' agents.

4. Thirty-five working days are to be allowed the said charterers (if the vessel be not sooner dispatched) for loading, to commence and be continued from the time of the vessel having a clear hold and ready for that purpose, the master giving charterers or their agents written notice twenty-four hours in advance to that effect. And the charterers to have the option of keeping the vessel fifteen working days on demurrage, paying 20*l.* per day to be paid to the master day by day.

5. All goods to be brought to the vessel and taken from alongside at the risk and expense of the freighters.

6. The master to sign bills of lading at any rate of freight required, without prejudice to this charter-party; but should the aggregate freight by bills of lading amount to less than the lump sum of 5000*l.* already stipulated for, the difference to be deducted from the amount to be drawn for disbursements, and the balance, if any, to be paid in cash at the rate of exchange for sight bills existing at the time of the ship's clearing at Colombo.

7. The owners of the ship to have an absolute lien on the cargo for the amount of freight stipulated for except as to the captain's draft for disbursements and commission as before mentioned, in case of default.

8. And it is hereby agreed that the charterers are to furnish cash for the disbursements of the ship at port of loading at current rate of exchange not exceeding 750*l.*, free of interest, but subject to a commission of 2½ per cent. and cost of insurance, for the due appropriation of which the charterers are not to be held responsible, and for which and agency commission, the master shall give his draft on the owners payable in London at sixty days sight; and in the event of the bill not being accepted or paid at maturity, the amount to be deducted from freight at settlement thereof together with interest and cost of insurance.

9. The ship to be consigned to owner's agents in London, and in case of the vessel having to put into the Mauritius, the vessel to be consigned to Messrs. Blyth Brothers and Co. there, or to Messrs. Thompson, Watson, and Co., at the Cape of Good Hope.

10. A survey certificate to be supplied by the captain (if required) to the effect that the vessel is in every way fitted to carry a dry and perishable cargo to any port in the world.

11. The captain to carry cargo for charterer's benefit in any cabin store room or other place not absolutely required for use during the voyage.

12. The charterer's to have the option of appointing the own stevedore at the expense of the master, but at not exceeding current rates; but the captain is not thereby relieved of the responsibility regarding the proper stowage of his vessel.

13. The captain and charterers to be at liberty to add any clause to this charter-party by mutual consent, without prejudice to this agreement.

14. In default of performance of this agreement it is hereby mutually agreed that the amount of freight herein agreed for to be paid and taken as liquidated damages for such default.

(Signed) E. SHREWSBURY.
(Witness) ARMITAGE BROTHERS.

In accordance with the orders of the defendants, the said ship proceeded to the port of Cochin, and was there put up by the defendants as a general ship and loaded with a full and complete cargo, the property of various merchants, which cargo was shipped under several bills of lading signed by the captain upon the orders of defendants. The total amount of the bill of lading freight was estimated by the charterer at 4995*l.* 10*s.* 6*d.*, and was payable in London on delivery of the goods there.

The said ship with the said cargo on board sailed from the said port of Cochin, upon her voyage to London under the said charter-party, and on the 2nd May 1872 the said cargo was found to be on fire; the master of the said ship, after attempting ineffectually to extinguish the fire at sea, put into Table Bay, which was the nearest port of refuge; and after a survey it was found expedient, in order to extinguish the fire, to scuttle the said ship; as it was deemed that the said fire could not be otherwise extinguished, the said ship was scuttled in Table Bay, and the said fire was thereby extinguished.

After the said fire had been extinguished, the water was pumped out and the greater portion of the cargo was unladen; and as a large quantity thereof was greatly injured by fire and water, surveys as customary were called, and the surveyors pronounced a great part of the said cargo unfit for reshipment, and it was therefore ordered to be sold, and it was sold accordingly; and the proceeds thereof were paid into the hands of the plaintiffs, who have since accounted for the same to the owners of the goods sold.

The remainder of the said cargo was reladen on board the said ship; and on the 9th June 1872, the said ship having undergone some repairs, resumed her voyage to London with the remainder of the said cargo on board, and with no other cargo, and arrived in port and proceeded to the West India Docks and on the 12th Aug. 1872 was reported inwards at the Custom House.

The bill of lading freights upon the cargo which arrived in London have been received by the plaintiffs, and amount to the sum of 3482*l.* 7*s.* 10*d.*, and the defendants advanced to the master at Cochin the sum of 364*l.* 14*s.* 1*d.* for disbursements of the said ship, making together the sum of 3847*l.* 1*s.* 11*d.*; but the defendants have not paid the plaintiffs the sum of 1152*l.* 18*s.* 1*d.*, being the balance of the said lump freight of 5000*l.* mentioned in the said charter-party; and they refuse to pay the same to the plaintiffs.

The court may draw inferences of fact.

The question for the opinion of the court is—

Whether the plaintiffs are entitled to payment by the defendants of the balance of the said sum of 5000*l.* under the said charter-party, after giving credit for the said aggregate sum of 3847*l.* 1*s.* 11*d.*, which has been received by them on account thereof.

If the court shall be of opinion in the affirmative, then judgment shall be entered up for the plaintiffs for the balance of the lump freight of 5000*l.*—viz., 1152*s.* 18*s.* 1*d.*, with cost of suit.

And if the court shall be further of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to interest, then for a further sum for interest to be calculated for such period at such rate and by such person as the court may direct.

If the court shall be of opinion in the negative, then judgment with costs of defence shall be entered up for the defendants.

Sir J. B. Karlake, Q.C., (with him Petheram) argued for plaintiffs.—Although there was here only a part delivery of the cargo, the whole lump freight is payable under this charter-party. In the case of the Norway, before the Privy Council (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 17, 168, 254; 3 Moo. P. C., N. S., 245, Browning and Lushington 404; in the the court below 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 57), the words of the charter-party were that the freighter promised and agreed to “pay, or cause to be paid as freight for the use and hire of the vessel 11,250*l.* lump sum, if ordered to the United Kingdom, Havre, or Bordeaux; 11,250*l.* if ordered to Antwerp or Marseilles, the master guaranteeing to carry 3000 tons dead weight of cargo upon a draft of 26ft. of water, or to forfeit freight in proportion to deficiency:” . . . “payment whereof to become due and to be paid as follows, viz., 2000*l.* to be advanced on the vessel clearing at Liverpool, subject to insurance only, say 1000*l.* by freighter’s acceptance at four months and 1000*l.* at six months, sufficient cash for ship’s disbursements, not exceeding 2500*l.*, to be advanced at Calcutta, and the necessary disbursements, if ordered to the rice ports subject to interest and insurance only, all at current rate of exchange, for six months’ bills on London against the captain’s receipts. Such advances to be made on account of chartered freight, and the balance as follows, viz., one third in cash on arrival at port of delivery, and the remainder on true and final delivery of the cargo at the port of discharge by good and approved bills payable in London or cash.” Some of the cargo was jettisoned, and some spoilt was sold. The judgment upon this point is to be found at p. 264 of 3 Moo. P. C., N. S., “The next question is whether, in respect of the rice jettisoned and that which was sold, there ought to be a deduction from the lump freight because they were not delivered. We think that there ought to be no deduction. It is obvious that this question stands on a somewhat different footing from that on which it stood when it was decided by the learned judge below, because it was then taken for granted that the jettison and sale, and consequent failure to bring home the goods, were owing to the misconduct of the master. But in the view we take of this part of the case, it must be understood that they were owing to the perils of the sea, and that the master was free from blame in the matter. Although the lump sum was called ‘freight’ in the charter-party and bills of lading, yet we think it is not properly so called, but that it is more properly a sum in the nature of a rent to be paid for the use and hire of the ship on the agreed voyages. The charter-party expresses that a sum of 11,250*l.* is to be paid as freight for the ‘use and hire of the ship,’ and this lump sum is to cover both the outward and homeward voyages, without any distinction as to how much of it is to be attributed to the outward and how much to the homeward voyage. If this be so, the shipper has had the full consideration for the money agreed to be paid. The ship took out the salt, and received the rice on board, and performed her homeward voyage according to her engagement, and the event, that by the act of God it became impossible to carry to the port of destination the rice jettisoned and the rice sold, ought not to effect the shipowner's right to receive the full amount of the stipulated payment. It was objected, on behalf of the respondents, that by the charter-party the remainder of the lump sum is made payable only on 'true and final delivery of the cargo at the said port of discharge.' But this does not necessarily mean that the whole cargo originally shipped must be delivered. It may well have been intended merely to fix the time for payment to be the time of the delivery of such cargo as the ship brings with her to the port of discharge. And it should be observed that the 'one third in cash' is made payable 'on arrival at the port of delivery,' without any reference to the cargo the ship shall bring with her. It is right to add that we do not mean to express an opinion that, even if the jettison and sale had been attributable to the negligence of the master, there ought to have been a reduction. Perhaps in this case the proper remedy of the shipper would have been by a cross action. But it is not necessary to decide this point, which does not now arise." This decision of the Privy Council applies to the present case, and was acted upon by the Common Pleas in a case more nearly resembling this, on the 31st May last (Robinson v. Knight, since reported ance, p. 19; 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 820). There the charter-party was dated London, 3rd Oct. 1872, and it was agreed between Robinson, the owner of the ship Nile, now expected at Copenhagen, and Knight of Landau, merchant, the charterer, that the said ship should, with all convenient speed, having liberty to take an outward cargo direct or on the way for owner's benefit, sail and proceed to Riga, to load at Bolderaa or Multilgraben, or so near thereto as she might safely get, and there load from the agents of the said affreighter a full and complete cargo of lathwood; and being so loaded should therewith proceed to London or so near thereunto as she may safely get, and deliver the same on being paid freight as follows: a lump sum of 315*l.*; the freight to be paid in cash, half on arrival and remainder on unloading and right delivery of the cargo, less four months' discount on half at 5 per cent. per annum. The deck load was lost on the voyage by perils of the sea, and Keating and Brett, J.J., held that the freighter must pay the whole sum, whatever cargo was delivered.

MERCHANT SHIPPING COMPANY (LIMITED) v. ARMITAGE.

Watkin Williams, Q.C. (with him Cohen) for the defendant.—The charter-party in The Norway differs from this. There a lump sum was to be paid "as freight for the use and hire of the vessel," whilst taking one cargo out from, and bringing another back to, London; here the ship, at the date of the charter-party, was at Colombo, and she was merely to proceed to Cochin and bring a cargo to London, "a lump sum freight of 5000*l.* to be paid after the entire discharge and right delivery of the cargo." Under this clause the owners can recover nothing without a right delivery of the cargo, although they might be entitled to recover freight pro ratâ, as in Luke v. Lyde (2 Burr. 882)

This was not a lump sum for the use and hire of the ship, but a lump sum for freight, which cannot be earned except by carriage and delivery. This is in accordance with American law, and it is to be found clearly laid down by Thompson, J., in Post v. Robertson (1 Johnson's Rep., New York Supreme Court, 26). "The contract of affreightment is an entire contract; and the general rule is that unless it be entirely performed by a delivery of the goods at the place of destination, no freight is due." And, further on, "According to the terms of the charter, the freight is made payable on the delivery of the cargo. The delivery, therefore, is a condition precedent. And where a contract is entire, and the promise to pay depends on a condition precedent, to be performed by the other party, such condition must be performed before the other party is entitled to receive anything." [BLACKBURN, J.—The contract in that case was to pay on the delivery of the homeward cargo; there was no completion of the voyage and no delivery.] Bright v. Cowper (Brownlow & Goldesborough's Rep. 21), referred to in Abbott, 11th edit. p. 395, was an "action of covenant brought upon a covenant made by the merchant with the master of a ship, viz, that if he would bring his freight to such a port, then he would pay him such a sum, and shows that part of the goods were taken away by pirates, and that the residue of the goods were brought to the place appointed and there unladed, and that the merchant hath not paid, and so the covenant broken; and the question was whether the merchant should pay the money agreed for since all the merchandise were not brought to the place appointed; and the court was of opinion that he ought not to pay the money, because the agreement was not by him performed."

Sir J. B. Karlake was not heard in reply.

BLACKBURN, J.—I think this question is settled by the decision of the Common Pleas in Robinson v. Knight. The only distinction between the Norway and the present case is that in the Norway the contract was for payment of a certain sum as freight for the use and hire of the ship during two voyages, whilst the amount was to be paid here upon one voyage after the entire discharge and right delivery of the cargo. The latter words are almost identical with those of the charter-party in Robinson v. Knight, and as they have been held by a court of concurrent jurisdiction to be within the rule laid down in the Norway, we must follow that decision. Our judgment will be for the plaintiffs, and if the defendants still believe in the distinction drawn between this charter and the Norway's, they must go to error.

QUAIN and ARCHIBALD, J.J., concurred.

Sir J. B. Karlake asked for interest upon the amount claimed by the plaintiffs, and referred to 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 42, s. 28: "Upon all debts or sums certain, payable at a certain time or otherwise, the jury may, if they shall think fit, allow interest to the creditor at a rate, not exceeding the current rate of interest, from the time when such debts or sums certain were payable if such debts or sums be payable by virtue of some written instrument at a certain time." Moreover, interest is recoverable here at common law as damages.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am inclined to consider this amount as freight due to the plaintiffs; therefore, according to the usage of trade, we should, as a jury, give interest at 5*l.* per cent. from two months

Barristers-at-Law.

ALLISON v. THE BRISTOL MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Insurance — "Freight" and "freight payable abroad" — One half freight payable in advance.

The plaintiff's vessel was chartered to carry a cargo of coal from Greenock to Bombay, where the plaintiff was to be paid at the rate of 42s. a ton for all coal delivered. It was also agreed that one half of the freight should be paid as soon as the goods were put on board at Greenock. After the goods were put on board, and one half of the freight had been paid, the plaintiff effected two policies of insurance with the defendants, one being for 500l. on "freight" valued at 2000l., the other being for 700l. on "freight payable abroad," valued at 2000l. The defendants did not see the charter-party, nor were they informed that one half the freight had been paid. During the voyage the vessel was wrecked, but one half the cargo was saved and delivered to the consignees at Bombay. The defendants refused to pay for a total loss, alleging that they were only liable to pay on the portion of goods lost, as one half the freight had been earned:

Held, that the interest insured was the interest the plaintiff had in one half the freight payable at Bombay, and that the plaintiff was at liberty to show what was intended to be insured by the terms "freight" and "freight payable abroad."

The declaration stated that the plaintiff, by his agents duly authorised, caused to be made with the defendants a policy of insurance, dated the 23rd April 1867, whereby the plaintiff caused himself to be insured, and the defendants by and through their directors authorised in that behalf, became insurers to the plaintiff to the amount of 700l., upon "freight payable abroad," valued at 2000l., in the ship called the Merchant Prince, at and from Greenock to Bombay, and that the plaintiff thereupon paid the premium of 51l. 9s. for the insurance, and certain goods loaded on board the vessel at Greenock to be carried on the voyage, and the ship, whilst proceeding on the voyage, and during the continuance of the risk, was lost by the perils of the seas, and the freight was by the perils insured against wholly lost, and all conditions necessary to entitle the plaintiff to be paid the said sum of 700l. happened, &c., yet the defendant has not paid the same.

The second count was on a similar policy, dated 13th April 1867, insuring 500l. on "freight," valued at 2000l., in the Merchant Prince, alleging a total loss.

Pleas.—Except as to 250l., parcel of the money claimed, payment into court of the sum of 440l.; secondly, as to the sum of 250l. so excepted, payment before action brought.

Issue thereon.

In March 1867, the plaintiff was the owner of the ship Merchant Prince, and he chartered the vessel, then in the Clyde, to proceed the Greenock. By the charter-party it appeared that she was there to load a full and complete cargo of coals, and therewith to proceed to Bombay, or as near thereto as she might safely get, and deliver the same alongside any craft, steamer, or floating depot, wharf, or pier, where she could be afloat, as ordered by the consignee. The freight was to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo, at and after the rate of 42s. per ton of 20cwt. on the quantity delivered, in full of all port charges, &c., as customary, such freight to be paid, say one half, in cash, on signing bills of lading, less four months' interest at Bank rate, but not less than 5 per cent. per annum, 5 per cent. insurance, and 2½ per cent. on the gross amount of freight in lieu of consignment at Bombay, and the remainder on right delivery of the cargo, agreeably to the bill of lading.

The bill of lading was endorsed with a stamped receipt, dated 15th April 1867, by the plaintiff for 2286l. 18s. from the charterer, being an advance of half freight on the shipment.

The cargo, to the amount of 2178 tons, was duly shipped under the bill of lading, and the vessel sailed for Bombay on the 22nd April 1867. She encountered rough weather on the voyage, and on the 8th Aug. she struck on a rock about eight miles from Bombay, where she eventually became a complete wreck.

The consignees of the ship, who were communicated with at once employed salvors for the benefit of the ship and cargo, and in the result about one half the cargo (1050 tons) as carried to Bombay, and there sold by the consignees for the benefit of the parties ultimately interested, and the rest of the cargo was totally lost.

The defendants disputed their liability to pay for a total loss, on the ground that the prepayment of freight was to be considered as a payment of so much per ton, and must be so apportioned among the whole cargo; and that as the insurance covered half the whole freight, the loss sustained must also be apportioned, and the underwriters pay only half the actual loss; that is, half the freight that would have been payable in Bombay if the full cargo had been delivered.

The defendants having before action paid on account 250l., paid 440l. into court in respect of the two policies for 700l. and 500l., and refused to pay the remainder.

At the trial, before Brett, J. and a special jury, a verdict was found for the plaintiff, for the damages in the declaration, leave being reserved to the defendants to move to enter a verdict.

C. Russell, Q.C. accordingly obtained a rule, calling upon the defendants to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside, and instead thereof a verdict entered for the defendants, on the ground that on the facts proved there was no loss of freight beyond the sum of money paid into court, or why the verdict should not be reduced to such sum as the court could determine.

Watkin Williams, Q.C. and McLeod showed cause.—Although one-half the freight under the charter-party has been earned, there has been a total loss of the freight covered by the two policies, and the question is, whether the true interest of the plaintiff was insured. The question depends, to a great extent, on the construction of the policy of insurance and the charter-party; but there are no words in the policy which refer to the charter-party, and the policy is in the ordinary form of a policy on freight at and from Greenock. If the assured has a partial interest, can he not appropriate the sum insured to his particular interest? or can the underwriters say that part of the freight is earned, or that he will only pay upon part? Take the case of a mortgagee of a ship. It is clear he can apply to his own peculiar interest a policy on the ship: (Arnould on Marine Insurance, 2nd edit. 301.) So in Irving v. Richardson (2 B. & Ad. 193), where a mortgagee effected policies at two offices on a ship, valued in each policy at 3000*l.*, and, the ship being lost, he received, on the two insurances, 3700*l.* An action being brought against him by one set of underwriters, to recover back their portion of the sum paid about 3000*l.*, and the question being whether the defendant had received more than the actual value of the ship insurable, and insured by him, it was held that it was properly submitted to the jury, whether, in effecting the policies, the defendant meant to insure his own interest only, or that of the mortgagee also; a mortgagee, at least since the Register Act (6 Geo. 4, c. 110), not being an owner to any greater extent than that of the value mortgaged, and the mortgagee continuing the owner. So, if a ship be mortgaged for 900*l.* and the mortgagee and the mortgagee agree together that the ship is to be insured at the expense of the mortgagee, but the policy is to be taken out at the expense of both for 1000*l.*, the mortgagee is covered, but you cannot tell what interest the mortgagee has; and if the intention was to cover the interest of both, then, I say, the interest of both would be covered. It was certainly here not the intention of the shipowner to cover the whole freight, for he is only interested in one half. If a broker raise one quarter of a ship for the carriage of goods for 200*l.*, and he obtains parcels for which the freight which he will receive will amount to 500*l.*, and he then goes to Lloyd's and insures the freight for 300*l.*, which is all he can earn, would the underwriter, if the goods in his compartment be lost, be able to say that he was not entitled to recover for a total loss, as the insurance was on the goods in the ship. If he was only interested in the goods in a particular part of the ship, it is competent for him to say his interest was only partial. Suppose a part owner takes out a valued policy for 32-64ths of 5000*l.*, in a ship worth 10,000*l.*, the underwriter cannot say this is an insurance of value of the whole ship. For, in the case of a person who takes out a policy in a general form, it is a policy to cover his interest; of course it may be a policy to cover the whole interest, but he may show he has insured his part interest. Suppose a shipowner carries a cargo, part of cotton and part of grain, for which the freight is to be 2000*l.*, payable in advance for the cotton, and 2000*l.*, payable at the port of destination for the grain. He insures the freight for 2000*l.* May he not say, the grain is the only interest I have at stake, as I have been paid for the cotton. My contention makes the underwriters liable for all freight, being the amount paid above in advance at Greenock. He cited

2 Duer, Lect. xiii. s. 18;

Dumas v. Jones, 4 Massack, 467;

Rising v. Burnett, Marshall on Insurance, 730.

Charles Russell, Q.C. and Benjamin, Q.C.—
There are two questions: first, does this freight mean the entire freight of the voyage? or, secondly, is it a total loss which is intended to be covered? The defendants are willing to pay one half the loss. The plaintiff says the meaning of the policy is, that although the underwriters had no notice of a prepayment of freight, and that he was only intending to insure the part remaining unpaid for, yet they have agreed to pay unless more than one half the goods carried are delivered. The plaintiff was interested in every ton carried: (Phillips on Insurance, part 2, s. 1204.) A valuation of the freight of a ship is presumed to be that of a full cargo, or the charter of the entire ship, and is so applied, unless the phraseology of the policy or the circumstances are ground for a different construction. If, therefore, only a part of the freight of any entire cargo is at risk at the time of a loss, the valuation is applied pro rata in adjusting the loss. What was the real interest insured here? Was the plaintiff entitled, in respect of one half the cargo, to demand the freight at Greenock? The words in the charter-party, "such freight," refers to the quantity put on board, and not to the quantity delivered, and it is a payment in consideration of the shipowner allowing the charterer to put the goods on board, and strictly no freight at all. [BRETT, J.—The prepayment is only an estimate, and the difference is to be paid at Bombay.] If the plaintiff is only interested in one half the cargo, does he mean that the interest does not attach until one half the cargo is put on board, or that it ceases to attach if the cargo is jettisoned. The plaintiff's contention is, that the risk is to begin when the goods are put on board, and must continue day by day, until they are landed at the port of destination. The old law was, that no freight was earned except on what goods are delivered, but modern commerce and modern laws have altered that, and now payment of freight is often made in advance.

BOVILL, C.J.—The claim in this case arises upon two policies of insurance effected by the plaintiff with the defendant, one for 500*l.*, the other for 700*l.*; the first was on freight, valued at 2000*l.*, the second, which was on "freight payable abroad," was also valued at 2000*l.* The first was effected after the charter-party had been entered into, and is dated 13th April 1867, the second after payment had been made on account of freight, and is dated 23rd April. The charter-party is dated 7th March, and chartered the Merchant Prince to proceed to Greenock, and there load, in the usual manner, a full cargo of coals, and thence to proceed to Bombay and there deliver them; the freight to be paid on unloading or right delivery of the cargo, at and after the rate of 42*s.* sterling per ton of 20cwt on the quantity delivered, and such freight is to be paid say one half in cash on signing bills of lading for four months' interest at Bank rate, but at not less than 5 per cent. per annum, 5 per cent. for insurance, and 2½ per cent. on the gross amount of the freight in lieu of consignment at Bombay, and the remainder on right delivery of the cargo, agreeably to bills of lading, less cost of coal short delivered, in cash, at current rate of exchange for bills on London at six months' sight. The shipment having been made, one half freight was paid to the plaintiff, which was estimated on the amount of coals shipped. The payment so made was a payment on account. After the ship had proceeded on her voyage she was lost on a reef near Bombay, and half the cargo was jettisoned. The rest was delivered at Bombay. The Plaintiff had received at this time one half the freight, in pursuance of the terms of the charter-party, and by it, it appears to me, the freight was to be paid on the amount alone delivered, and by the express terms of the charter-party there is no liability for the payment of freight except for the amount of goods delivered. It is said that the payment of half freight may be taken as a payment in respect of each ton of goods shipped, but I cannot assent to that proposition. The payment was made on account and in respect of the amount of goods to be delivered. Under these circumstances, and further, taking the rate of freight stated in the charter-party, and calculating the amount already paid, we see that the shipowner could claim no further sum in respect of the charter-party. Now, if the voyage had been performed, the plaintiff would receive half the amount by payment in advance, and the other half upon his arrival at the port of destination, for which he would also have a lien on the cargo; but, by the events which have happened, the plaintiff has lost one half his freight by the perils of the sea. We then come next to the consideration of the question whether the plaintiff has insured that which he has lost, and whether the policy of insurance will cover this loss. This depends on the construction to be put on the policy, and it is to be borne in mind that the second policy was made after the payment on account of the freight had taken place. Now at the time these policies were made, what could be subject to a sea risk? One half the freight had been paid, and therefore only the other half could be exposed to peril. There can be no doubt, and indeed it is not disputed, that the plaintiff intended to insure the freight which was exposed to peril, and it is equally plain that the plaintiff was only interested in that portion of the freight, and therefore the only remaining question is, whether it is or it is not covered by the terms of the policy. Sometimes an insurance is effected on freight, sometimes on chartered freight, or even on advances made on account of freight. In these instances there is no specification of what is intended to be insured. The term freight generally is applied to cases of goods carried in a ship and delivered, but it would equally apply to a payment in the nature of dead freight, or for the increased value of goods to the owner, arising from their carriage from one place to another, which was the point which arose in Flint v. Flemyng (2 B. & Ad. 45), and has been recognised ever since. It would include the case where a ship was ready to go to sea, but was prevented by some unexpected peril insured against, and from the time of Lord Tenderden the term has borne wide and general meaning. In Flint v. Flemyng, he said that if it be a necessary ingredient in the composition of freight that there should be a money compensation paid by one person to another, the benefit accruing to a shipowner from using his own ship is not freight. But if the term freight, as used in the policy of insurance, import the benefit derived from the employment of the ship, then there has been a loss of freight. It is the same thing to the shipowner, whether he receives that benefit of the use of his ship by a money payment from one person who charters the whole of the ship, or from various persons who put specific goods on board, or from persons who pay him the value of his own goods at the port of delivery, increased by their carriage in his own ship. The assured may fairly consider that additional value as freight, and so term it in a policy. And so in Phillips on Insurance, cap. 3, sect. 11, the author says:—" 'Freight,' in the common acceptation of the term, is either the amount paid by the hirer of the ship to the owner for the use of it, or the amount paid to the shipowner for the transportation of goods. The term is also used to signify the cargo. In insurance, the term 'freight' signifies the earnings or profits derived by the shipowner or the hirer of the ship from the use of it himself, or by letting it to others to be used, or by carrying goods for others." These terms would all be included in the definition which I adopt, viz., the benefit derived from the employment of the ship. This being the meaning of the term, the freight would be included in the meaning of the policy. This general meaning having been attached by underwriters to the term "freight," it seems to me that if they desire to limit the word, it is for them to do so. The modes of payment of freight are known to be various, and it is a common practice to pay part in advance, and several provisions are generally inserted in the charter-party to regulate the manner of such payment. I think, therefore, these policies would include anything in the nature of freight; here nothing was said to alter the usual proceeding in such matters. No inquiry was made, and we cannot suppose that anything but the ordinary course was to be pursued. The policy does not specify what freight is insured and what not, and the subject-matter would therefore depend upon the facts. The facts here show what was at risk, viz., half the freight of the entire ship. That was intended to be covered, and was lost. The words are sufficient to cover such a loss, and the plaintiff is entitled to recover the whole amount.

BRETT, J.—The plaintiff seeks to recover the balance of loss, and as half only of the freight was insured, the defendant has paid 50 per cent., and says the plaintiff must show a total loss before he is entitled to succeed. It is suggested that the plaintiff has a right to assume that the insurance of freight was in respect of the whole goods on board, and that the defendant would not be bound to pay unless there was a total loss. The plaintiff, on the other hand, urged that the insurance was on the only freight in which he had an insurable interest. With regard to the first part, I had some little doubt whether the defendant was not entitled to assume that these policies were on all the goods on board the ship, as generally policies on freight would apply to the whole cargo on board, but Mr. Williams has convinced me that where a policy of insurance is in general terms, we must confine the assurance to that which was intended to be insured at the time, although the insurer did not disclose what was intended to be insured to the underwriter. As the policy was in general terms, if the assured intended only to insure a part of his interest, either party might show that which was really intended to be insured, and by evidence these policies might be shown to apply to something less than all the goods on board ship. The court here are to draw inferences of fact. Now the only thing the plaintiff could effectually insure was the freight payable abroad. The whole interest, therefore, was about 2000*l.*, and this policy was made out on freight generally valued at 2000*l.* That was the only interest he had, and the inference is irresistible, that this was the freight he intended to insure, and which he would, under the terms of the charter-party, lose, if all the goods were not delivered at Bombay. The real point then is, what is the proper interpretation of the charter-party? Did the charterer lose the whole freight he had at risk, or only part? On that part of the case, I have very little doubt. The freight is to be paid on unloading and delivering of the cargo, at the rate of 42s. per ton on the quantity delivered. To average the payment at Bombay, you must ascertain the amount which is due on the whole cargo, and then deduct the amount prepaid in Greenock. I cannot think it was a prepayment of one guinea a ton; it is an estimated amount of the whole, and therefore I think the insurance was on what the plaintiff had at risk, and that it has been totally lost. My judgment must therefore be for the plaintiff.

GROVE, J.—When an insurance has been effected in general terms, either party may show what in fact was insured, and here the charter-party becomes important. Here the assured may show that he has one half the freight at risk, and that is his only interest in the concern, and unless there is something repugnant in the policy, he ought to recover.

THE IMPERIAL OTTOMAN BANK v. COWAN; COWAN
v. THE IMPERIAL OTTOMAN BANK.

Bill of lading—Mixed cargo—Delivery of the cargo to different consignees.

In Jan. 1868, C. and Co., the defendants, contracted to purchase 1400 quarters of rye, then at Salonica, from the plaintiffs, at 41s. per quarter free on board, March shipment, the plaintiffs finding the vessel. The plaintiff having chartered the Agatha, the captain on loading her informed the bank that she would take from 200 to 300 quarters of rye beyond that ordered by the defendants. The plaintiffs being unable to obtain any rye, purchased seventy quarters of maize to make up the cargo. The rye and maize were shipped on board, and one bill of lading was made out for both rye and maize and sent to the plaintiffs. The maize was then offered to the defendants, and two invoices and two bills of exchange were made out, one for the rye, the other for the maize. The defendants, who refused to have anything to do with the maize, had in the meantime sold the rye to C., but C. on finding there was not a clean bill of lading refused to accept either it or the bill of exchange. The plaintiffs on being informed of this informed the defendants that they would discharge the maize from the ship at their own expense, and shortly afterwards indorsed the bill of lading as follows: "Deliver the rye to Messrs. C. and Co. or their order, and the within mentioned maize to us or our order. The delivery of the maize, and the freight, and all charges thereon to be at our expense, and the maize to be delivered so as not to interfere with the working and delivery of the rye."

Held, that the delivery of a clean bill of lading was not a necessary condition of the contract, the plaintiffs having been ready to pay all the expenses incident to the maize being included in the bill of lading, and also absolutely and unconditionally to deliver the rye in time; and also that there was a sufficient delivery to entitle the plaintiffs to recover for non-acceptance.

SPECIAL CASE.

1. The Imperial Ottoman Bank has its principal place of business at Constantinople, with a branch at Salonica, and an agency in London, and Messrs. Cowan and Co. are merchants carrying on business at 33, West Register street, Edinburgh.

2. The bank in addition to its ordinary business has been and is in the habit of making purchases of grain in the Levant, and of disposing of the same to or to the order of persons requiring such grain, and of reimbursing itself by drawing on the latter. Messrs. Horsley, Kibble, and Co., of 79, Gracechurch-street, in the City of London, are commission agents, and the bank has been and is in the habit of forwarding to them offers of grain with a view to their effecting the sale of the grain to merchants in the United Kingdom, the bank paying Messrs. Horsley and Co. a commission on these transactions.

3. Prior to the 4th Jan. 1868, the bank at Salonica forwarded to Messrs. Horsley and Co. an offer of a parcel of 1400 quarters of Orphano rye, March shipment, at 42s. free on board, and on the 4th Jan. Messrs. Horsley and Co. communicated this offer to Messrs. Cowan and Co.

4. The following correspondence in reference to this offer then took place between Messrs. Horsley, Kibble, and Co., and Messrs. Cowan and Co. On the 4th Jan. 1868, Messrs. Horsley and Co. sent on one of their printed forms a notice of this offer. The following is a copy thereof:—

On the 6th Jan. 1868, Messrs. Cowan and Co. telegraphed to Messrs. Horsley, Kibble, and Co., offering 41s. for the rye, and wrote to Messrs. Horsley, Kibble, and Co. on the same day as follows:—

Dear Sirs—Your favour of the 4th instant duly to hand, and in answer to your offer of rye, we telegraphed to you offering 41s. and have your answer. Rye is under offer until 6th, if not taken, will write, but have no authority to take under 42s. We will await your communication.
—Yours, obediently,
COWAN AND CO.

And on the 7th Jan. 1868, Messrs. Horsley and Co. replied as follows:—

Dear Sirs,—We have yours of the 6th, and telegraph and wire our friends to ship the 1400 quarters rye at 41s. free on board, they providing vessel.—Yours, &c., HORSLEY AND CO.

5. On the 7th Jan. 1868, Messrs. Cowan and Co. filled up a lithographic form which was supplied to them by Horsley and Co., and returned the same to Messrs. Horsley and Co.

and ship for our account by sailing vessel to U. K. or continent the following quantity of rye: About 1400 qrts at not over 41s. per 480lb. f. o. b.

Your friends will execute the order under the limit, if practicable. For cost they will please draw on us payable in London at 3 m. d. which drafts will be duly accepted on presentation.

The order is to be telegraphed at our expense in words or cypher at your option (we taking the risk of any errors in transmission), and it is to remain in force until cancelled by Yours respectfully,

COWAN AND CO.

6. On the 9th Jan. 1868, Messrs. Horsley and Co. wrote to the bank at Salonica a letter from which the following is an extract:—

Firm offers. We are obliged by yours offering 1400 quarters of Orphano rye, March, at 42s. f. o. b., but have not been able to find buyers at the price. We have, however, forwarded you from our friends, Cowan and Company, Edinburgh, a counter offer of 41s. per 480lbs. f. o. b. for the 1400 quarters rye, and we wait to learn whether this is accepted, March shipment, you finding vessel.

7. In reply to the said letter of the 9th Jan. 1868, the Bank at Salonica on the 14th Jan. 1868, wrote to Messrs. Horsley, Kibble, and Co., a letter from which the following is an extract:—

We have been able to execute Messrs. Cowan's order for 1400 qrs. rye at 41s. f. o. b. Orphano shipment in March. We are trying to charter a vessel of the suitable size.

8. Messrs. Horsley and Co. having informed Messrs. Cowan and Co. that their offer had been accepted, received instructions from them to resell the rye. Accordingly on the 28th Jan. 1868, Messrs. Horsley and Co., acting under the instructions, sold through Messrs. P. and A. D'Arcy, a cargo of from 1400 to 1800 quarters of rye to Messrs. Corneille, David, and Co., and the following is a copy of the contract of sale:—

London, 28th Jan. 1868.

Sold by order for account of Messrs. Horsley and Company to Messrs. Corneille, David, and Co. a cargo of 1400 quarters of rye, of fair average quality of the season at the time of shipment. To be shipped at Orphano by a vessel not inferior to A 1 in red Lloyds or 5-6ths. 1. 1. French, Italian, or Austrian Veritas (Greek and Turkish flags excepted) shipment to be made not later than the 10th of April next at the price of 52s. less 2 per cent. (say 52s. less 2 per cent.) per quarter of 480lb. sound or damaged, cost freight and insurance to a safe direct port on the continent between Havre and Hamburg, both inclusive, and to discharge as per charter-party afloat, calculating provisionally (till final outturn is ascertained) as customary, per quarter of 448lb. No charge for damage. All accidents of the sea (pumping up grain excepted) which may cause a deficiency in invoice weight, to be for buyer's account, and provisional invoice in such case is to be final as to measure, and the weight is to be adjusted by the average weight of the sound grain delivered.

Payment by cash in London, less interest at 5 per cent. per annum or bank rates of the day on which the invoice is handed, at buyer's option, for the unexpired term of three months from date of bill of lading, in exchange for bill of lading and policy of insurance to be for 2 per cent. over invoice amount, including the 2½. Sellers to pay our commission of ½ per cent. whether this contract is or is not cancelled.

Computation of weight to be as customary at the port of discharge. In case of prohibition of export or blockade preventing shipment contract to be cancelled. Payment to be made for the cargo within seven days from the day notice is given to the buyer that the documents are ready for delivery. Sufficient lay days are to be reserved for discharging. In case of any dispute respecting this contract it is agreed by buyers and sellers to leave the same to the arbitration of two London corn dealers, one of whom is to be nominated by each party, or their umpire, and to be bound by their award, or by the award of their umpire. Orders to be given in sufficient time before signing bill of lading.

9. The above mentioned purchase by Messrs. Cowan and Co. was one of a series of purchases which had been made by them from the bank through Messrs. Horsley and Co. who acted in these transactions as agents for, and received commission from, the bank. These purchases were made by Messrs. Cowan and Co. for the purpose of resale, and Messrs. Horsley and Co. were aware of this fact. The date on which the bank first heard of the aforementioned resale to Messrs. Corneille, David and Co. was on or about the 6th Feb. 1868, but the bank was not then, or any time prior to the shipment of the rye as hereinafter mentioned, aware of the terms of the resale, further than that the cargo was sold for shipment not later than the 10th April 1868. This circumstance was communicated to the bank in a letter of the 6th Feb. 1868, written by Messrs. Horsley and Co., from which letter the following is an extract:—

Please note that the cargo is sold for shipment not later than the 10th of April.

10. The bank chartered for the carriage of the rye a vessel called the Agatha by a charter-party which was dated the 2nd March 1868. [Then followed the charter-party.]

11. On the 17th March the brokers of Messrs. Corneille, David, and Co. gave notice to Messrs. Horsley, and Co., that the destination of the cargo of rye was Antwerp, and notice having been given to the bank of the place to which the cargo was to be sent, the vessel was thereupon ordered to go to Antwerp to discharge her cargo.

12. Early in April the captain of the Agatha informed the bank at Salonica that the vessel would take from 200 to 300 quarters of rye beyond the 1400 quarters so ordered by Messrs. Cowan and Co., but although the bank used all reasonable endeavours, it was found impossible to purchase the additional quantities of rye, and the bank consequently instructed the agents to complete the cargo by purchasing the only grain then to be found at Orphano, and on the 7th April 1868 informed Messrs. Horsley as follows:—

Agatha. The captain has informed us that his vessel will take 200 or 300 quarters over the quantity of rye we have at Orphano (1400). Notwithstanding all our efforts we have been unable to procure the necessary rye to complete, this article being entirely absent. We have, however, instructed our agent to complete the cargo with the only cereal which is to be found there, i.e. maize, which we will invoice at the lowest possible price. Should Messrs. Cowan and Co. refuse to accept it, it will then have to be sold on our account. We, however, trust they will make no difficulty in accepting it, as we had chartered the vessel for 186 tons, i.e. about 1450 qrs., and it is not our fault if it takes more.

Accordingly, seventy-eight quarters of maize were purchased by the bank and shipped on board the Agatha, together with 1447 quarters of rye, and then the cargo of the Agatha was completed.

13. The rye and maize were shipped on board the Agatha, and a bill of lading was duly signed by the master and handed to the bank. The bill of lading was in the usual form, and was indorsed as follows:—

Deliver to the Imperial Ottoman Bank, London Agency or order.

Pour la Banque Imperial Ottoman,
A. NOBLET, Directeur,

There was no separate bill of lading for the rye. The maize and rye were so loaded on board the ship that the one could without difficulty or delay be discharged and delivered separately from the other.

14. Two invoices were duly made out, one for the rye and one for the maize. Two bills of exchange, dated respectively the 7th April 1868, at one month's date, were drawn by the bank at Salonica on Messrs. Cowan and Co., one for the sum of 2959*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.*, the other for the sum of 151*l.* 9*s.* 1*d.* The bill for 2959*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.* was drawn after one month's date, instead of three months, in pursuance of an agreement duly entered into for that purpose.

15. The bill of lading was sent by the bank at Salonica to the bank in London, and the invoices and bills of exchange were forwarded by the bank at Salonica, through the London branch, to Messrs. Horsley, Kibble, and Co., to be by them tendered to Messrs. Cowan and Co., and on the 24th April the invoices and drafts were forwarded to Messrs. Cowan, in a letter, of which following is extract:

Agatha. Enclosed invoices and drafts for costs. The maize is on the same bill of lading as the rye, and dated 7th April, as there would no doubt be a loss on the maize we presume you will wish to leave it for account of shippers, but if you will accept the bill we will get an undertaking from the bank to hold you harmless for so doing.

The 16th and 17th paragraphs contained correspondence between Messrs. Horsley and Co. and Messrs. Cowan.

18. Messrs. Corneille, David, and Co., on the 2nd May, informed Messrs. Horsley and Co. that they could not accept the Agatha's documents against the contract of the 28th Feb., unless the buyers for whom they acted as commission agents consented to take the rye off their hands, and on the 4th May the following letter was sent:—

Messrs. P. and H. D'Arcy.

Dear Sirs,—Confirming our memorandum of 1st instant. We now beg to refuse positively the Agatha's cargo of Orphano rye in consequence of our buyers rejecting it as not in accordance with contract of Jan. 28th, and we return the copy of invoice you sent us, and will be obliged for a cheque for our commission, say £73 14*s.*, and another for the profit our buyer loses, which at the exchange of 25 francs, 12½ is £22 14*s.*, without prejudice to claiming further charges in case of arbitration.—We are, dear Sirs, yours truly, CORNEILLE, DAVID, AND CO.

20. On May 7, Messrs. Horsley and Co. sent Messrs. Cowan the following telegram:—

The Imperial Ottoman Bank here requests you will return to-day the draft against rye, per Agatha, accepted or not.

On the same day Messrs. Cowan and Co. answered this telegram by the following:—

We are in receipt of your telegram, and send you, as requested, Ottoman Bank Draft, £2959 15*s.* 1*d.* unaccepted.—Yours, &c., COWAN AND CO.

21. On the 8th May, Messrs. Cowan and Co. having refused acceptance of the said draft, Messrs. Horsley and Co. wrote to the bank as follows:

Enclosed is the bill on Cowan and Co. for rye per Agatha, unaccepted, for which we wired yesterday at your request.—Yours, &c., HORSLEY AND CO.

On the same day Messrs. Cowan and Co. wrote to Messrs. Horsley, Kibble, and Co., the following letter:—

8th May 1868.

As we did not state yesterday our reasons for returning the draft against rye per Agatha we do so now, and will thank you to communicate them to the Imperial Ottoman Bank. We refused to accept the draft because the bank had not given us a proper bill of lading for the rye. We presume the question will be settled by arbitration, and we shall be glad to hear that it is arranged. We can hardly doubt its decision will be against our buyers.—Yours &c., COWAN AND CO.

And on the 11th May a copy of this letter was forwarded by Messrs. Horsley and Co. to the bank.

Subsequently, the question whether Messrs. Cowan and Co. had broken their contract with Messrs. Corneille, David, and Co., by not delivering proper shipping document, was submitted to arbitration, and on the 30th May 1868, the arbitrators awarded that the cargo of rye per Agatha was not a proper tender under the contract, and that there was due to Messrs. Corneille, David, and Co. the sum of 85*l.* 14*s.*, in full of all claims for nonfulfilment of the contract.

On the 13th May 1868, the solicitor for the bank wrote to Messrs. Cowan and Co., calling upon them to accept the bill of exchange for 2959*l.* 15*s.* 10*d.*, and to perform their contract, and on the 14th May he sent the following letter:—

60, Threadneedle-street, London, E.C.
14th May, 1868.

Imperial Ottoman Bank and Yourselfs

Dear Sirs,

I have this morning seen Messrs. Horsley and Co., and understand from them that Mr. Nicholson, of Lime-street, is your London solicitor. I would suggest that you should put him in communication with me. I beg to give you notice on behalf of the bank that they do not and never have required you to take the maize, nor to accept the bill for it, but they are prepared to hand over to you the bill of lading, it being arranged that maize is to be delivered to them, and that they will discharge the maize from the ship at their own costs, and so as in no way to interfere with the delivery to you or your order of the rye. I believe you have already been informed of this, but I think it desirable to formally repeat the notice.—

I remain, Gentlemen, your obedient servant,
Messrs. Cowan and Co. G. M. CLEMENTS.

On the 21st May 1868, the solicitor for the bank wrote to Mr. Nicholson the following letter:—

60, Threadneedle-street, E.C.
21st May, 1868.

Imperial Ottoman Bank and Cowan.

Dear Sirs,

With reference to my letter to Messrs. Cowan, of the 14th instant, I am authorised by the Imperial Ottoman Bank to say that they are willing the bill of lading shall be specially indorsed to the effect that the rye is to be delivered to the Imperial Ottoman Bank or their order. And that it is to be so delivered at the bank's expense and risk; and so as not to interfere with the working and delivery of the rye. The bill of lading so indorsed will be handed to Messrs. Cowan.—I remain, Dear Sirs, yours truly, G. M. CLEMENTS.

J. Wilson Nicholson, Esq.

To this Mr. Nicholson replied, that in consequence of the Ottoman Bank having failed to supply Cowan and Co. with a proper document for the shipment of rye, they have lost their sale, and shall therefore proceed against the bank for all damages and losses which they may sustain.

22. On the 16th June 1868, the bank indorsed the said bill of lading so indorsed, together with the sum of 35*l.* (which was sufficient to cover all possible charges for freight or otherwise in respect of the said carriage), to Messrs. Cowan and Co., who then refused to take the bill of lading and to accept the said bill of exchange for the price of the rye, or otherwise pay for the same. On the 5th July 1868, the Agatha arrived at Antwerp, and Messrs. Cowan and Co. might, if they had then chosen so to do, have obtained the rye without delay or difficulty.

23. After the arrival of the ship at Antwerp the rye was by arrangement of the bank and Messrs. Cowan and Co. sold by the bank without prejudice to the rights of any of the parties concerned, and the amount realised thereby, after payment of freight and expenses, was the sum of 1860*l.* 16*s.* 2*d.*, which was received and retained by the bank. The bank claims of Messrs. Cowan and Co., by reason of their not having taken to the said rye and accepted the said bill of exchange drawn on them for the price thereof, the sum of 1098*l.* 18*s.* 11*d.* (being the difference between the said sum of 2959*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.*, for which the said bill of exchange was drawn, and the said sum of 1860*l.* 16*s.* 2*d.*), and also the sum of 217*l.* 14*s.* 1*d.*, being interest on the said sum of 2959*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.*, from the time the said bill would have become payable, until the 29th Oct. 1869, when the said sum of 1860*l.* 16*s.* 2*d.* was realised by the bank (such sums of 1098*l.* 18*s.* 11*d.* and 217*l.* 14*s.* 1*d.*, making together the sum of 1316*l.* 13*s.*), and also interest on the said sum of 1098*l.* 18*s.* 11*d.*, from the 29th Oct. 1869 to the present time.

Messrs. Cowan and Co. claim of the bank, by reason of their being prevented from performing their contract with Messrs. Corneille, David, and Co., the sum of 235*l.* 15*s.* 1*d.* After the time when the bill of lading and the bill of exchange were first tendered to Messrs. Cowan and Co., the price of rye had fallen, so that, except by reason of the said resale to Messrs. Corneille, David, and Co., there was no loss to Messrs. Cowan and Co.

24. The shipment of the rye is to be taken to have been in all respects regular and correct, except so far as it may have been irregular and incorrect by reason of the maize having been shipped in the same vessel together with the said rye, and by reason of the maize and the rye having been both included in the same bill of lading.

The court is to be at liberty to draw such inferences of fact as a jury would be justified in drawing.

The questions for the opinion of the court are: First, whether the bank has any right of action against Messrs. Cowan and Co.; secondly, whether Messrs. Cowan and Co. have any right of action against the bank? If the court shall answer the first question in the affirmative, then judgment shall be entered in the first action for the bank for such sums as the court shall direct, with costs; and if in the negative, then judgment shall be entered in the first action for Messrs. Cowan and Co., with costs. If the court shall answer the second question in the affirmative, then judgment shall be entered in the second action for Messrs. Cowan and Co. for such sum as the court shall direct, with costs; and if in the negative, then judgment shall be entered in the second action for the bank, with costs.

H. Matthews, Q.C. and J. C. Mathew, for the Bank.—The contract is contained in the letters of the 7th and 9th Jan. It is a condition of the contract that there shall be a single bill of lading for the rye. Suppose no ship of the right size could be found, and that the captain says I will not issue separate bills of lading, I presume the bank would be entitled to say, we have done the best we can, but we could only get one bill of lading. It is not a condition precedent to the bankers' right to recover. [KEATING, J.—Take the case where the shipment was only a small proportion of the whole, would it not be hard for the consignee to have to pay the whole freight to get his goods? It might be, but he would have his remedy over. If the defendants wanted to have the documents in a particular form, they must stipulate for them. He cited

Brown v. Hare, 4 H. & N. 822;
Green v. Sichel, 7 C. B., N. S., 747; 2 L. T. Rep. N. S. 745.

Field, Q.C. (with whom was Holl.) for Messrs. Cowan.—All the documents previous to the 7th Jan. are to be read as part of the case. The master had a lien on the rye for the freight of the maize. The invoice of the rye only was sent in to the purchasers, yet the defendants are asked to accept a bill of exchange for both rye and maize, on condition of being held harmless by the bank. The case of Wait v. Baker (2 Ex. 1) is in point, and that case has been confirmed by the Exchequer Chamber in Turner v. The Trustees of the Liverpool Docks (6 Ex. 543). In Kreuger v. Blunck (L. Rep. 5 Ex. 179; 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 128; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 470), the defendant ordered of the plaintiffs a "small cargo of lathwood, of about the following lengths, &c., in all about sixty cubic fathoms," and the plaintiffs accepted the order. The plaintiffs not being able to procure a vessel of the exact size, chartered a vessel to the defendant's port loaded with eighty-three fathoms. On the arrival of the vessel the plaintiffs' agent unloaded, measured, and set apart timber to answer defendant's order, and tendered him a bill of lading for that quantity, and a draft for acceptance; but the defendant declined to accept, on the ground that the cargo was in excess of the order. In an action for nonacceptance of the goods, it was held that "cargo" meant a whole cargo and not a parcel of a cargo, and that the plaintiffs had not complied with the order, so as to entitle them to maintain an action. So, in a similar manner, the contract here is to be construed as if there were a distinct clause referring to the bill of lading.

Henry Matthews, Q.C. in reply.

KEATING, J.—These are cross actions—the one brought by the Imperial Ottoman Bank against Messrs. Cowan and Co., for non-acceptance of certain rye, and the other brought by Messrs. Cowan and Co. against the bank for special damages, and also for nondelivery of the rye. I am of opinion that the bank are entitled to our judgment, and this will also dispose of the second action. It seems that, through the intervention of Horsley and Co., who were agents to the bank, the contract was entered into to deliver 1400 quarters of rye to the defendants, Cowan and Co., and the question seems to be whether there was such a delivery as would entitle the plaintiffs to recover as against the defendants. I think there was. The whole of the difficulty has arisen in consequence of the bill of lading. Cowan and Co. agreed to take the rye at a certain price, and, in accordance therewith, the rye was shipped free on board. But the Ottoman Bank at the same time shipped about seventy or eighty quarters of maize on the same vessel, and one bill of lading was made out, to include both the rye and the maize; the captain, therefore, having a lien on the whole cargo for the freight of either the rye or the maize. The plaintiffs then forwarded the invoices of both the rye and the maize to their agents in this country, who forwarded them to the defendants, who had, in the meantime, effected a sale of the rye. When it came to the knowledge of the sub-vendee that the bill of lading included both rye and maize, he refused to complete the purchase. It is quite clear that the defendants, having effected a sub-sale, it was a matter of indifference to them what the form of the bill of lading was: all they wanted was the difference in price they sold it for. Mr Matthews has argued that the contract was performed; for when the rye was shipped on board the property vested in the defendant, so as to take it out of the plaintiff's hand. That is too broad a proposition; for when the rye was on board, and the bill of lading was sent to obtain delivery, the bank could have exercised such property over the rye that it should not pass, and if it becomes necessary to decide this question, I should say they did exercise such a power over the property. But I do not think we need decide that question, for what the plaintiffs contracted for was free delivery of the rye to the defendants. It is not necessary to go into what occurred when the sub-vendee first objected; the defendants did in terms object, and that was by their letter of the 8th May. It seems at that time the bill of lading was in an objectionable form, and one in which they were not bound to accept, for the shipowner would have a lien for the freight of the maize. However the rye did not arrive until the 5th July, and before that time, after a correspondence, the bank proposed to remove the objections to the bill of lading by offering the rye free from the maize, and offering to indorse the bill of lading, so as to remove any objection there could possibly be, in order that free delivery of the rye might be had. Consequently when the Agatha arrived at Antwerp, Cowan and Co. might have obtained the rye without any difficulty. On their behalf, it has been insisted that they had a right to the bill of lading before the arrival of the ship, but I do not find anything that points to a free bill of lading in the contract at any period. What the contract entitles the defendants to is a free delivery of the rye, and this the plaintiffs were willing to give them. Under these circumstances, our judgment must be for the plaintiffs.

BRETT, J.—I am of the same opinion. In the first instance there is no doubt that a contract was made between the bank and Messrs. Cowan for the sale of the rye, and it is equally clear that the defendants subsequently refused to accept it. It was submitted on behalf of the defendants that they were entitled to a clean bill of lading, but the plaintiffs disputed that proposition, and also that it was a condition precedent to their right to recover. This was a contract for an unascertained quantity of rye, and is a contract by which the vendors, who were abroad, contract to deliver a certain quantity free on board at Orphano for the March shipment. Upon such a contract the property does not pass, but the vendor is entitled to put the goods on board ship to pass the property, and the question in all these cases is, whether the vendor put the goods on board with the intention that the goods should pass. The goods having been put on board the vendors sent an invoice to the defendants, but they sent the bill of lading in a form which made it a bill of lading for goods deliverable to themselves; so far that is not conclusive to show they did not intend the goods to pass. But let us see what they do then: they indorse the bill of lading to their own agents, and send out a draft for acceptance. The bill of lading was detained, but the bill of exchange sent forward, and this is I think quite enough to show the property did not pass to the defendants. If upon the arrival of the ship the plaintiffs were to offer to give the defendants an endorsed bill of lading, they must give a clean bill after the arrival, although if the plaintiffs had gone to the defendants and offered the rye, they might have called on them to accept it without any bill of lading at all. It seems the plaintiffs were bound to offer a clean and unconditional bill of lading upon arrival; yet the conditional endorsement calling on the captain to deliver one half of the cargo to one party and the remainder to another party is good; and it is found that the rye could have been delivered without difficulty; however the plaintiffs went further, for they not only offered the bill of lading with a special endorsement, but they also tendered the defendants the money for freight, and then the case finds they might have had the delivery of the whole of the rye at the ship's side without the imposition of any duty whatever upon them. I therefore think the plaintiffs are entitled to recover in the first and also in the second action, as the bank have done all they are bound to do, and have committed no breach of duty.

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. I have been unable to see in what respect the defendants can complain of having lost anything under this contract. Mr. Field was obliged to admit all that the defendants could claim was to have dominion over the rye on the arrival of the ship. Now it appears by the case that they had it in the clearest possible manner. The plaintiffs tendered 35*l.* for freight and other charges incident to the maize, and on the arrival of the ship the defendants might have obtained the rye without trouble. They had then all they asked for; they had dominion over the subject matter of the purchase which they under this contract claimed.

Judgment in the first action for the plaintiffs, and in the second action for the defendants.

TULLY v. TERRY.

*Bill of lading—Quantity and quality unknown—
No alteration in effect.*

*The Avoca was chartered to ship a cargo of grain at Ibraila and deliver at a port in the United Kingdom on being paid freight, "7*s.* per imperial quarter delivered," and in event of any part of the cargo being delivered in a damaged condition, the freight should be payable "on the invoice quantity taken on board as per bill of lading, or half freight on the damaged or heated portion, at the captain's option."*

The cargo was shipped under a bill of lading, describing the quantity as 1021 kilos., and the captain before signing the bill of lading added a memorandum, "quantity and quality unknown." The captain, on his arrival at a port in England, having experienced bad weather, gave notice to the indorsee of the bill of lading that he claimed to exercise the option given to him by the charter party, and requested to be paid freight on the invoice quantity.

Held, that the addition of the memorandum to the bill of lading, "quantity and quality unknown," did not take away the captain's right to be paid freight on the invoice quantity taken on board (a).

SPECIAL case on appeal from the County Court of Kent, to recover a balance of freight alleged to be due to the plaintiff in respect of a cargo of barley. The facts of the case fully appear in the judgment of the court.

Gibson, for the appellant, the plaintiff.—It is material to look at the object of the clause of the charter-party, “that in the event of the cargo, or any part thereof, being delivered in a damaged or heated condition, the freight should be payable on the invoice quantity taken on board, as per bill of lading, or half freight upon the damaged or heated portion, at the captain’s option.” The merchant might claim to pay on the original quantity shipped, where the grain swells by heat, and not by its measurement, at the port of discharge, as was held in the case of Gibson v. Sturge (10 Ex. 622), and the custom is to pay one half freight on the damaged portion where the grain swells. The master is absolutely concluded against the quantity put on board by the Bill of Lading Act against all bonâ fide indorsees of the bill of lading, and as the master cannot tell who will have possession of the bill of lading, on his arrival at the port of discharge, he naturally endeavours to protect himself. [KEATING, J.—The judge below seems to have thought that the condition was neutralised by the words “quantity and quality.”] The addition of the words “quantity and quality unknown,” have only the signification given to them by Bramwell, B. in Jessel v. Bath (L. Rep. 2 Ex. 267), where he said: “This document, although apparently contradictory, means this, a certain quantity of goods has been brought on board, which is said by the shipper for the purpose of freight to amount to so much, but I do not pretend or undertake to know whether or not that statement of weight is correct. On a bill of lading so made out, I think no one can be liable in such an action as the present.” The quantity delivered was never proved. [HONYMAN, J.—In Hadow v. Parry (3 Taunt. 303) it was decided that if the master guards himself by acknowledging “that the contents are unknown,” so that he does not charge himself with the receipt of any goods in particular, the bill of lading alone is not evidence, either of the quantity of the goods or of the property in the consignee.] The bill of lading is primâ facie evidence of the amount of goods against the shipowner:

Lebeau v. General Steam Navigation Company, ante, vol. 1., p. 435; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 435.

C. M. Lanyon, for the respondent.—The clause, half-freight, is put into the charter-party for the benefit of the charterer. We are not entitled to pay more than the full freight on the sound cargo, and one-half freight on the damaged portion. Secondly, as to the words, “quantity and quality unknown;” if the word quality had been left out, the shipowner could recover. The words are binding on the charterer, and not binding on the shipowner or captain. He cited Hadow v. Parry, 3 Taunt. 303.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 15.—The judgment of the court (Keating and Honyman, JJ.) was delivered by KEATING, J.

(a) For American cases on the construction of the words “weight and contents unknown,” see Clark v. Barnwell (12 Howard’s U. S. Sup. Ct. Rep. 272); Vernard v. Hudson (3 Sumner, 405); Shepherd v. Naylor (5 Gray, 591); Kelley v. Bowker (11 Gray, 428).—ED.

—This was an action brought in the County Court of Kent, to recover a balance of freight alleged to be due to the plaintiffs, who were owners of the bark Avoca, in respect of a cargo of barley shipped at Ibraila in Sept. 1872. The County Court judge nonsuited the plaintiffs, but referred to this court the question whether such nonsuit was right. The case was heard in Easter Term, before my brother Honyman and myself. The Avoca was chartered by charter-party, dated 2nd Sept. 1871, to ship a cargo of grain at Ibraila, and deliver at a port in the United Kingdom on being paid freight, “7s. per imperial quarter, delivered;” and it was provided that, in the event of the cargo, or any part thereof, being delivered in a damaged or heated condition, the freight, should be payable “on the invoice quantity taken on board, as per bill of lading, or half freight, upon the damaged or heated portion, at the captain’s option, provided no part of the cargo be thrown overboard or otherwise disposed of on the voyage.” A cargo of barley was accordingly shipped at Ibraila under bills of lading describing the quantity 1021 kilos., which the captain signed, but before doing so he added the memorandum usually added in cases of grain cargoes, “Quantity and quality unknown.” The Avoca experienced bad weather on her homeward voyage; and the captain having reason to believe that some of the cargo would be heated, gave notice on arrival to the defendant, who had become indorsee of the bill of lading, that he claimed to exercise the option given him by the charter-party, and required payment of freight upon the invoice quantity as per bill of lading. The Avoca discharged her cargo at Ramsgate. The quantity of barley actually delivered did not clearly appear; but it was argued that eighty quarters were damaged by heating. There was no suggestion of fraud on the part of the plaintiffs. The defendants paid into court a sum calculated upon the quantity he alleged to have been delivered, but the plaintiffs claimed to be paid upon the invoice quantity, as per bill of lading, according to the terms of the charter-party. The County Court judge was of opinion, that in consequence of the above-mentioned addition by the captain to the bill of lading, that document ceased to indicate any particular invoice quantity of barley to have been taken on board, and non-suited the plaintiffs. We do not concur in that opinion. The liability of grain cargoes to heat during the voyage, thereby causing an increase, often considerable, in its bulk, doubtless suggested the insertion in charter-parties of the clause referred to, and which is now so common in the case of cargoes shipped from the Danube; the object being to protect the merchant from having to pay full freight on the larger quantity caused by the heating, the freight having—in consequence of the decision in Gibson v. Sturge (10 Ex. 622)—been made payable on the quantity delivered; and the provision seems in such cases the more necessary, from the fact that those cargoes, frequently sold as floating cargoes, pass from hand to hand by transfer of the shipping documents or by reference to them, so that the arrangement by which it may become unnecessary to ascertain the quantity of the damaged portion of the cargo becomes one of great mercantile convenience; nor do we think this at all affected by the addition made by the captain at the foot of the bill of lading, the object of that memorandum being merely to protect the captain against any mistakes that might occur in the invoice quantity in the bill of lading, in case of alleged short delivery or deterioration not caused by his default. It was argued, in conformity with the decision of the court below, that the effect of the memorandum was to strike out the invoice quantity from the bill of lading, but we think no such effect can be given to it; and we are fortified in that opinion by the case of Covas v. Bingham (2 El. & B. 836), wherein a contract of sale of a cargo afloat, the quantity stated in the bill of lading was construed to be the quantity to be paid for, notwithstanding a similar memorandum in the bill of lading. Upon the whole, therefore, we are of opinion, that the event having happened by reason of which the captain, according to the terms of the charter, had the right to be paid freight upon the invoice quantity in the bill of lading, he did not lose that right by the addition of the memorandum referred to, and consequently that the appellants are entitled to our judgment. We think the costs of the appeal ought to follow the event, and be paid by the respondent.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

(Before the LORDS JUSTICES.)

HART v. HERWIG.

Foreign contract — Specific performance — Jurisdiction — Substituted service — Vendor out of jurisdiction — Subject matter of contract within jurisdiction — Injunction.

An Englishman entered into a contract abroad with a foreigner for the purchase of a ship, then on her homeward voyage to Cork, the purchaser to take possession of the ship immediately after the delivery of the homeward cargo at any place whither she might be ordered. The ship was ordered to Sunderland, where she discharged her cargo.

On a motion by the purchaser for an injunction to restrain the removal of the ship from Sunderland:

Held (affirming the decision of Malins, V.C.), that substituted service on the captain in charge of the vessel was sufficient, and that the court had jurisdiction to restrain the removal of the ship pending the suit.

This was an appeal from a decision of Malins,
V.C.

The hearing in the court below is reported ante, vol. 1, p. 572, where the facts of the case are sufficiently stated.

The Vice-Chancellor having granted an injunction to restrain the removal of the ship from Sunderland pending the suit, and having previously ordered substituted service on the captain in charge of the ship, the defendants (the vendor and the captain in charge of the ship) appealed.

Glasse, Q.C. and Cozens Hardy, for the appellants.—This court has no jurisdiction to decree specific performance of a contract of this kind against a vendor who is out of the jurisdiction.
At all events, this is not a case for substituted service. Drummond v. Drummond (14 L. T. Rep.

N. S. 822; L. Rep. 2 Eq. 335; and on appeal, 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 337; L. Rep. 2 Ch. 32) shows that the vendor should have been served abroad under Consolidated Order X, Rule 7, under which the court has jurisdiction to direct the service of its process abroad. But this is not a case in which the court will exercise its jurisdiction even in that way, as is shown by the decision of the full court of appeal in Davis v. Park (28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 295) where an order for service on a defendant out of the jurisdiction was discharged on the ground of the suit being in respect of a purely foreign contract. Under the Common Law Procedure Act a Court of Common Law would have no jurisdiction to order service abroad upon the vendor in a case like this, and, that being so, it cannot be right for this court to assume such jurisdiction.
This is not such a contract as this court will enforce; the remedy is by action for damages.

Cookney v. Anderson, 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 295; 1 De G.
J. & S. 389.

Cotton, Q.C. and Dauney, for the respondent.— Substituted service on the captain in charge of the ship was sufficient, as he was in communication with the vendor till just before the filing of the bill, and was in possession of the ship as agent for the vendor:

Hope v. Hope, 4 De G. M. & G. 328, 341-2;

Hobhouse v. Courtney, 12 Sim. 140.

The court has jurisdiction to decree specific performance of a contract for sale of a particular chattel. The principle is that the contract passes the property, and the vendor becomes a trustee for the purchaser. Holroyd v. Marshall (7 L. T. Rep.
N. S. 172; 10 H. of L. Cas. 191) shows that this principle applies to personal property as well as to real estate. The ship itself is within the jurisdiction of the court, and that being so, Lariviere
v. Morgan (26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 859; L. Rep. 7 Ch.
550) shows that its removal may be restrained. If the injunction is dissolved, that will be a practical denial of justice to us, for we have no other remedy. They also cited

Cozens Hardy having been heard in reply,

Lord Justice JAMES said: Now that this matter has been fully discussed, it is clear that it is an important matter, and that it deserves the full discussion which it has received. I am of opinion that there really is no objection whatever to any part of either of the orders which the Vice-Chancellor has made. In the first place, I am of opinion that the order for the substituted service is quite in accordance with the established principles and practice of this court. It is an order for substituted service upon the man who in this country was the authorised agent of the person abroad, in respect of the very thing which is the subject matter of the suit, and the service upon that agent is as effectual to all intents and purposes as service upon the gentleman himself would be.
With regard to the substantial question whether this court has jurisdiction to prevent a specific chattel from being removed out of the jurisdiction until the question is tried, I am of opinion that although, of course, if this suit were a suit for damages only, or which could result in damages only, the plaintiff must go and seek the forum of the defendant in order to enforce that claim for damages, for according to the established comity of nations that would be the right thing to do, yet where the contract, as in this case, although it is a contract made abroad, and by a gentleman abroad, is a contract to deliver a thing in specie to a person in this country, and the thing itself is brought here, and then the right thing and the honest thing to do is that the vendor should deliver it here; and the court here, in the exercise of its discretion, will see that that thing to be delivered in this country does not leave this country, so as to defeat the right of the plaintiff to have it so delivered. I am of opinion that if the converse case had arisen, and the ship had been in Hamburg, and the contract had been enforced through the intervention of the tribunal there, no one would ever have supposed that there was any violation of international rights, or any violation of the comity of nations, as between this country and the city of Hamburg or the Empire of Germany, or whatever the country might be to whose tribunal the application would properly have been made. Having regard, therefore, to the nature of the contract, the subject matter of the contract, the place where the contract was and is to be specifically performed, I am of opinion that the order of the Vice-Chancellor was quite right to keep the ship here so that it might be delivered in performance of the contract, and not to allow the ship to go, as was suggested by the Lord Justice, all over the world under such circumstances as actually to prevent the contract from ever being fulfilled. For it would be utterly impossible for the plaintiff to ascertain what he was to pay or how he was to get the ship. The right of the plaintiff was to have the ship delivered to him in exchange for the purchase money. The purchase money is prima facie 4750*l.* It is possible that that may have to be reduced to some extent by showing that the ship has arrived in a damaged state over and above ordinary wear and tear. But I do not think that, because there may be an uncertainty as to what the amount of the reduction is to be, it ought to make any difference as to the security which the defendant is entitled to have before the possession of the ship is interfered with. Therefore I think the order ought to be varied to that extent, that is to say, the plaintiff must undertake to pay into court the sum of 4750*l.*, and there will be an order upon him to pay that sum of money into court within fourteen days. The motion will, however, be refused with costs, because that condition does not substantially affect the question which has been brought before our notice.

[CHAN.]

HART v. HERWIG.

Lord Justice MELLISH.—I am entirely of the same opinion. Mr. Glasse relied very much on the analogy of the Common Law Procedure Act, which, he said, did not give the court of common law jurisdiction in this case, and he argued that if the court of common law had not jurisdiction it could not be right for the court of equity to assume jurisdiction. But really the analogy of the Common Law Procedure Act, when you come to examine the case, is really against that argument, and not in favour of it. It is quite true that if you simply look at an action brought upon a contract to recover damages, the contract having been made abroad, the defendant could not, under the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act, be served abroad; and if he did not choose voluntarily to appear in the action in this country, the plaintiff, for the purpose of recovering damages for a breach of the contract, must have gone to Hamburg, and could not have sued him here. But if, on the other hand, the contract had been of such a nature that the property had passed, and the chattle having been sent to this country, the agent of the owner, by the authority of the owner, had refused to deliver it in this country, then, if that had been the state of things, an action of detinue or trover could have been brought, because the whole cause of action would have arisen here. Now the real truth is, that in the view of the court of equity the property has passed from the defendant. The plaintiff, upon complying with the conditions substantially, is to be considered as the owner. I think that shows very clearly that if the Common Law Procedure Act does not violate, as I am clearly of opinion that it does not violate, any rule of the comity of nations, we shall not violate any rule of the comity of nations by saying that we have jurisdiction to compel the defendant, who has agreed to sell his ship to an English subject, and has agreed in the result, according to the terms of his contract, to perform that contract in England, namely, at Sunderland, which was to be the port of discharge, who has voluntarily sent the ship to Sunderland, and who has voluntarily given directions to his agent the master, to perform that contract—we shall not violate any rule of the comity of nations by saying that we have jurisdiction to compel the defendant to perform that contract. I am quite clearly of opinion that we are not in the least degree infringing any rule of the law of nations by saying that this court, which is the only court which can compel the actual specific performance of the contract, has jurisdiction so to compel its performance. This is peculiarly a case for the interference of the court, inasmuch as if specific performance were denied to the plaintiff, he practically would get no justice at all, because the loss which he would sustain by a breach of the contract, that is to say, the amount of value of the ship over and above the purchase money, would be the damages which he could recover, and it would be almost impossible for him to prove with any satisfaction in Hamburg how much the ship was worth, or that it was worth anything beyond the sum that he was giving, so as practically to make out that he was damaged at all. In fact, he has entered into this contract for the purchase of the ship, and he is entitled to the ship. There may be a doubt as to what the purchase money is to be, but that he is entitled to the vessel there appears to be no doubt at all; yet he might actually, although he would be unable to prove it in Hamburg, suffer very considerable damage. I am, therefore, clearly of opinion that the order of the Vice-Chancellor is substantially correct.

Appeal accordingly dismissed with costs.

RANKIN AND OTHERS v. POTTER AND OTHERS.

Marine insurance—Insurance of chartered freight to be named on homeward voyage during outward voyage—Total loss actual or constructive—Perils of the sea—Notice of abandonment.

The plaintiffs as mortgagees in possession of a ship, entered into a charter-party, with De M. in Feb. 1863, by which it was agreed that the ship should proceed from the Clyde to Southland and thence to New Zealand with a cargo for the owners' benefit, and having arrived and discharged the same, and being made tight, staunch, strong and fitted for the voyage, should proceed to Calcutta, and there being tight, staunch, &c., should load from the factors of the freighter a cargo and convey it for certain freight to Liverpool or London. The plaintiffs then insured the homeward chartered freight in ordinary terms against perils of the sea during the outward voyage to New Zealand, and thirty days after arrival there.

The ship arrived in New Zealand in April 1863, damaged by weather and by having been aground. Surveys were held, but the extent of the damage could not be ascertained, because there was no dry dock, nor other appliances, necessary for a full examination. The captain was delayed at the port in New Zealand by want of funds for repair of the ship, and meanwhile the ship was used as a storehouse for coals at a rent.

In April 1864, funds having arrived and some repairs having been done, the ship proceeded in ballast to Calcutta. There the agents of De M., having heard that De M. had failed in Dec. 1863, refused to have anything to do with the ship, or to provide a cargo. The ship was then fully examined, and it was found that the damages were much more serious than had been supposed, and that the cost of repairs would exceed the value when repaired.

Thereupon, in Aug. 1864, the plaintiffs gave notice of abandonment to the underwriters on ship and to the underwriters on freight, but neither notice was accepted.

In an action on the insurance on freight:

Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber), first, that there was a total loss of the freight by the perils of the sea whilst the policy was still in force; secondly, that there was no necessity for a notice of abandonment, such notice only being necessary where something exists which can be taken by the underwriters for their benefit; and, thirdly that the conduct of the owners with respect to the ship did not prejudice their claim against the underwriters on freight.

THIS was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of the Exchequer Chamber, reversing a decision of the Court of Common Pleas, by which a rule to set aside a verdict found for the defendants was discharged.

The claim was upon a valued policy upon chartered freight. At the time of entering into the charter-party, the ship Sir W. Eyre was on an outward voyage from the Clyde to New Zealand for owner's benefit, and it was agreed that on arrival there she should be made staunch and strong, and proceed thence to Calcutta, and load there a cargo for the charterer, and carry the same to England, for which her owners were to be paid an agreed sum. The policy was effected two days after the charter-party, and covered the freight to be earned under the charter-party, not during the homeward voyage, but during the outward voyage to New Zealand, and thirty days after arrival. The facts are fully set out in the opinions of the judges, and the judgments of the Lords, but a clear statement of facts will be found in the judgment of Willes, J., in this case in the Court of Common Pleas (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 122), and in Barker v. Janson (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 28).

The case will be found reported in the Common Pleas, 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 122; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 562; in the Exchequer Chamber, 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 374; L. Rep. 5 C. P. 545.

The following questions of law were then propounded to the judges.

1. Was there a loss by the perils insured against during the term of the policy?
2. Was notice of abandonment either of ship or freight, or of both, necessary to enable the plaintiffs to recover for a total loss on the policy on freight?
3. If notice of abandonment was necessary, was the notice given in time?
4. If notice of abandonment of the ship was necessary in order to make a constructive total loss of the ship, and such notice was not given in time, does the want of due notice as to the ship affect the right of the plaintiffs upon the policy on freight?
5. Was there any such conduct on the part of the assured, after the time of the alleged constructive loss of the ship, as discharged the underwriters from their liability upon the policy on freight?

6. Ought the judgment to be for the appellants or the respondents?

Feb. 24.—BRETHERTON, J.: My Lords,—In order to answer your Lordships' questions, it seems to me convenient to determine, in the first place, what is the correct interpretation of the policy in respect of which those questions arise, and to point out its peculiarity. What is the subject-matter insured? The description is that the insurance is made "on homeward chartered freight." Having regard to the surrounding circumstances when the policy was made, to these words of reference, and to the statement in paragraph 7 of the case, the policy is not on homeward freight generally, i.e., on any homeward freight, but on the homeward chartered freight to be earned under the charter-party of the 9th Feb, 1863. It was argued that the subject-matter insured was not freight strictly so called, but some right which the counsel described at different times in different terms. It seems to me that those terms are either other phrases to describe the charter-party freight have mentioned, or that they do not describe what is the only subject-matter insured by this policy. The voyage insured, as descriptive of the voyage during which the perils insured against may arise, is a voyage "at and from the Clyde to Southland, while there, and thence to Otago (New Zealand), and for thirty days in port there after arrival." This is a different voyage from and does not comprise any part of the voyage on which the charter-party freight can be earned, which latter is a voyage from Calcutta to Liverpool or London. The subject-matter insured then is freight; the freight insured is not any but one particular freight; it is not freight which might be earned on the voyage insured or part of it; the goods in respect of the carriage of which the insured freight may be earned cannot be at risk during any part of the voyage insured; and therefore the loss of freight covered by this policy cannot occur through damage to goods by a peril insured against, but only through damage to the ship. Assuming, then, this to be a valid policy, which is not disputed, the true interpretation of the contract seems to be, that the insurers undertake to indemnify the assured if there be a loss of the freight to be earned by the charter-party, in consequence of and proximately caused by such damage to the ship from a peril insured against during the voyage from England to New Zealand, as will prevent the assured from being able to earn the whole or any part of the charter-party freight on the voyage from Calcutta to England. The next matter material to be observed seems to me to be that there is only one contract to which the plaintiff and the defendant are both parties, namely the policy, and there are only two contracts with which both of them are concerned in this matter, namely, the policy and the charter-party referred to in the policy. The defendant is in no way a party to the policy on ship. He incurs no liability under it, and has no rights by virtue of it. It seems, therefore, contrary to all rule to argue either as for or against him from anything depending for its materiality on the existence or non-existence of the policy on ship.

It seems to me convenient, in the next place, to consider what does or does not amount to a loss, and what amounts to a total loss under ordinary policies on freight. On an ordinary policy on "freight in general terms" there is no loss at all on freight for which the underwriter on freight is liable by reason of partial damage to the ship, however great, causing an average loss of a policy on ship, or of partial damage to cargo causing an average loss, however great, on the cargo generally under a policy on goods. There is a partial loss of freight under a general policy on freight if there be a general average loss caused by a peril insured against giving rise to a general average contribution; or under certain circumstances if there be a total loss of part of a cargo; or if in case of total loss of the ship the cargo be sent on in a substituted ship; or if in case of a total loss of the cargo the ship earn some freight in respect of other goods carried on the voyage insured. There may be an actual total loss of freight under a general policy on freight, if there be an actual total loss of ship, or an actual total loss of the whole cargo. An actual total loss of ship will occasion an actual total loss of freight, unless when the ship be lost, cargo be on board, and the whole or a part of such cargo be saved, and might be sent on in a substituted ship so as to earn freight. An actual total loss of the whole cargo will occasion an actual total loss of freight, unless such loss should so happen as to leave the ship capable, as to time, place, and condition, of earning an equal or some freight by carrying other cargo on the voyage insured.

It has become a question in this case whether there may not be on a general policy on freight another kind of actual total loss—namely, by such damage to the ship as would justify notice of abandonment and make thereupon a constructive total loss of ship under policy on ship, although there be no loss of cargo, or an average loss of cargo without means of sending on the cargo. In such a state of things the ship may or may not be insured; if the ship be insured, due notice of abandonment of ship may or may not have been given. If the ship be not insured, what must happen upon the assumption? The assumption is that a prudent owner will not repair. Then the ship will not be repaired. If not repaired, she will remain a wreck, or be sold as a wreck. She cannot, therefore, sail on the voyage insured in the policy on freight. Then such freight is and must be in fact absolutely and totally lost. There is no freight, no chance of freight, to abandon to the underwriter on freight. It has never been suggested that the ship should be abandoned to the underwriter on freight. There is nothing, then, which can be abandoned to him of which he could take possession or from which he could derive profit. If the ship be insured, and due notice of abandonment be given to the underwriter on ship, the property in the ship passes to the underwriter on ship. In such cases the new owner of the ship will in almost every case sell her as a wreck. Again, there would be nothing and no chance of anything to abandon to the underwriter on freight. If from exceptional facilities the underwriter on ship should repair the ship and earn full freight on the voyage described in the policy on freight, such freight would belong to the new owner of the ship; none of it could go to the assured or underwriter on freight; but freight would have been earned on the voyage insured in the policy on freight, and as the insuring of the ship is the voluntary act of the shipowner, and the abandonment is also his act, it has been decided in your Lordships' House that in such exceptional case there is no loss at all of freight for which the underwriter on freight is liable: (Scottish Marine Insurance Company v. Turner, 1 Macq. H. of L. Cas. 334.) If this had not been a decision in your Lordships' House, I should have ventured to think that a valid abandonment of ship was of the same effect as leaving her a wreck, and that the real total loss of freight suffered by the assured on freight was covered by the only policy which could cover it, namely, the policy on freight. But the exceptional case thus mentioned, which according to the decision causes no loss at all of freight on the policy on freight, need not be further noticed. It is the same case as if the shipowner, uninsured on ship but insured on freight, should unnecessarily and unreasonably repair the ship, sail her on the voyage insured in the freight policy, and earn full freight. In such case it is held that there is no loss at all on the freight policy. If the ship be insured, but due notice of abandonment of the ship be not given to the underwriter on ship, then the ship is left on the hands of the assured as if she were not insured. Does not this case become the same as that first put, namely, the case of the shipowner having insured freight but not ship? It seems impossible to maintain that upon a question of construction the rights of either the assured or underwriter on the freight policy can be altered by anything done or omitted to be done on the policy on ship. To hold otherwise is to mix up two independent contracts, and contracts between different parties. The excepted case above mentioned of the ship being repaired and earning freight on the voyage insured is made to depend not on what is done under or by virtue of another contract, but on what is done to and by the ship. If the ship earn freight by reason of repairs recklessly or imprudently made, the same result follows whether the ship was insured or not.

RANKIN AND OTHERS v. POTTER AND OTHERS.

In determining, then, the construction of the policy on freight as to liabilities and rights under it, it must be immaterial whether the assured on a policy on the ship has lost or made perfect his right to recover on that policy for a constructive total loss of ship by failing to give or giving due notice of abandonment under that policy. The only question is whether there is any implied contract or condition in the policy on freight, under any of the states of circumstances above mentioned, where there is any loss of freight, imposing upon the assured under that policy the obligation of giving notice of abandonment to the underwriter of that policy. And it was to meet this question that the arguments were propounded at the bar with regard to the reason for giving notice of abandonment. On the one side it will be found that the arguments were founded on the assertion that notice of abandonment need not be given where there is nothing to abandon, where there is nothing and no chance of anything which can pass or be of value to the abandonee. On the other side, the real point of the argument was that if the thing insured could be said to exist in specie, notice of abandonment of it must be given, although it could not pass to the abandonee, and he would not derive any value from it. This argument took the form of asserting that the notice is required in order to signify an election by the assured, or to give an opportunity for inquiry to the underwriter. The propositions thus enunciated on the two sides were treated by the appellant's counsel as so contradictory the one of the other, so inconsistent, that if the one prevailed the other must fail. It may, however, be that they are consistent, and that where there is anything to abandon, the caution of great merchants and lawyers has by usage engrafted upon contracts of marine insurance the implied condition that notice of abandonment must be given quickly, both in order to signify the election of the assured and to give the underwriter opportunity for inquiry and action, but that where there is nothing to abandon notice of abandonment, being futile, is unnecessary. The end to be obtained by abandonment would seem to be the preservation of the cardinal principle of marine insurance, the principle of indemnity, and to that end to prevent the assured from having at the same time payment in full of the sum insured and the thing insured of value in his hands. It may be that it is as an incident of the rule, and in order to secure its application, that the assured, where he must abandon in order to recover the full sum insured, must give quick notice of his intention to abandon. But whatever be the reason of the rule as to the time of giving notice of abandonment, it is and must be inapplicable where no abandonment need be made. The question, therefore, really is whether there must be abandonment in order to enable an assured to recover as for a total loss when there is nothing to abandon. If there is such a necessity, it arises upon a condition to be implied. It seems to me to be a proposition without foundation of reason to say that there must be an abandonment where there is nothing to abandon. If the case of Knight v. Faith (15 Q. B. 649) decided the contrary, I with deference think it is a wrong decision. The view of the Court of Common Pleas in Farnworth v. Hyde (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 187, 429; 18 C. B., N. S., 835; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 375), not overruled as to this point in the court of error, seems to me to be correct. I venture to affirm that it is a correct proposition of insurance law to say that no abandonment is necessary and no notice of abandonment is required where there is nothing to abandon which can pass to or be of value to the underwriter. It follows that on a policy on freight in general terms there need be no abandonment of freight, and no notice of abandonment is required, where the ship is damaged to such an extent or under such circumstances as would authorise an abandonment of the ship on a policy on the ship, and where there is no cargo on board the ship, or if on board, where none is saved with the chance of an opportunity of its being forwarded in a substituted ship.

In the several states of circumstances above set forth and considered, the loss of freight on the policy on freight, would be an actual total loss. This conclusion does not, as it seems to me, go the length of determining that there never can be a constructive total loss of freight. If, for instance, the ship be damaged as described, but cargo which was on board be saved under circumstances which leave it doubtful whether such cargo might or might not be forwarded in a substituted ship, or if the cargo be lost and the ship may or may not probably earn some freight by carrying other goods on the voyage insured, it may be, and I think the rule is, that in order to make certain his right to recover as for a total loss on the policy on freight, the assured should give notice of abandonment of the chance of earning such substituted freight.

Another form of policy on freight, not unusual, but not so frequent as a policy on freight in general terms, is a policy insuring "chartered freight." In such policies the voyage insured commences usually at or from the port of sailing on the voyage described in the charter-party, or on or at the commencement of the voyage the ship must make to reach that port; but in both cases the voyage insured usually covers also the whole voyage to be sailed under the charter-party. Such a policy attaches earlier than a policy on freight in general terms; it attaches before any goods are on board the ship. If the ship be lost or damaged, or the cargo be lost after the goods are on board, the same circumstances must arise and the same considerations apply as have been related and treated of in the case of a policy on freight in general terms. Before any goods are shipped the loss can occur solely by reason of damage to the ship; but if the ship be then actually totally lost, or so damaged as to be possibly a constructive total loss, so much of the above reasoning as is applicable to a loss by damage to the ship seems to be equally if not more cogent to show that no part of the charter freight could possibly be earned by the assured, that there would be no freight or chance of freight to be abandoned, and therefore that no abandonment or notice of abandonment would be necessary; but that the loss of the chartered freight would be an actual total loss on the policy on freight.

These considerations and this inquiry into the rules applicable to ordinary policies on freight seem to me to determine what must be the decision on this unusual policy on freight under the circumstances which have arisen. The questions raised are, whether there is any loss of freight by a peril insured against, and if so, is that loss a total loss? The ship was damaged during the voyage insured. She was damaged by a peril insured against. Unless the damages to the ship should be wholly or sufficiently repaired, the insured freight could not be earned. If the damage to the ship could not be sufficiently repaired to enable the assured to earn the charter freight by carrying goods on board that ship, it seems to me that the damage to the ship caused by a peril insured against during the voyage insured is the cause of the loss of the earning the chartered freight by that ship. Loss of freight by reason of such damage to the ship caused by such a peril is a loss against which, according to the interpretation put upon the policy at the commencement of this opinion, the underwriter on this policy on freight has in terms agreed to indemnify the assured. The question therefore is, whether the ship could have been sufficiently repaired to enable the assured to earn the chartered freight. Physically or mechanically she could. But as matter of business carried on according to the dictates of sense she could not. The true meaning of the 24th paragraph (a) of the case is that a prudent owner of this ship, that is to say, an owner conducting himself according to the dictates of common sense in business, would not repair the ship. In such case the law holds that within the meaning of such a policy as this, the ship could not be repaired so as to earn the freight or any part of it by the use of that ship. The assured not being able to tender that ship, and having none of the goods in his possession, had no claim to carry any goods under the charter-party in a substituted ship. Without therefore relying upon the obvious other impediment and prevention in the way of the plaintiff's earning the charter-party freight, namely, the certainty from the extent of damage that the ship could not be repaired so as to be seaworthy within any time during which the charterer would be bound to wait for her, it seems to me that the other facts which I have mentioned show conclusively that there was a loss of freight by reason of damage to the ship caused by sea perils happening during the voyage insured; and that such loss of freight is, upon the construction put upon the policy at the commencement of this opinion, a loss by a peril insured against; and that inasmuch as without repairing the ship, which the assured did not do, and was not bound to do, because in consideration of law it could not be done, no part of the chartered freight could be earned by anyone; and that there was therefore no part of the chartered freight, or any chance of earning any part of it, which by a pretended abandonment could pass to or be of value to the underwriter on freight; and that consequently the loss of freight was an actual total loss without notice of abandonment. If notice of abandonment were necessary, the question whether in this case it was given in due time seems to me to be more doubtful. There was no reason in this case to doubt the accuracy of the information forwarded to the assured. The question, therefore, as it seems to me, is, whether at any time before the surveys made at Calcutta were received, the assured had information of damage to the ship of such a nature and to such an extent as rendered the prospect of a total loss of the chartered freight imminent but not certain. If he had he was bound to give notice at once. If the case had been on trial before a jury I should say that they should have been asked to find whether at any time there was laid before the assured information so certain and of such a nature as would lead an assured of ordinary care and intelligence to conclude that there was great danger of a total loss of the chartered freight, but a chance of such loss being obviated, and that they should have been directed that, if such information was at any time conveyed to the assured, he was bound immediately to give notice of abandonment. As in this case the court was to draw inferences of fact, the question is, whether before the surveys made at Calcutta were received, the assured had information of damage to the ship of such a nature and to such an extent as I have described. The information upon these points which the assured had received were the surveys made at Bluff Harbour and at Port Chalmers. As to the first, made on the 27th May 1863, I think it was of no importance. The Survey of the 10th July 1863, made at Port Chalmers, does not seem to me to disclose formidable damage to the ship. If it had stood alone I should have been inclined to think that it disclosed such damage as ought to have so greatly alarmed the assured as that he ought to have acted upon it by giving immediate notice of abandonment. But it seems to me that the surveys of the 25th Aug. 1863, and of the 4th Sept. 1863, received about the same time, would modify the view to be derived from the former survey, and would lead the assured to believe that the ship could proceed to Calcutta, and be repaired to such an extent, and within such time, as would enable him to earn the chartered freight. I therefore come to the conclusion, though with some doubt, that there was no information before the arrival of the surveys made at Calcutta which made it incumbent on the assured to give notice of abandonment, assuming notice at some time to be necessary, and that upon the same assumption the notice given upon the receipt of the Calcutta surveys was given in due time.

(a) The 24th paragraph of the case is set out in the opinion of Martin, B., post, p. 81.—ED.

If no notice was necessary, if there was an actual total loss, I cannot think that the right of the assured to payment of a total loss can be effected by a delay in demanding such payment. Delay in giving notice of a total loss seems to me to amount to no more than delay in asking for the settlement of it. I know of no obligation in insurance law to give immediate notice of an actual total loss. Immediate notice would not enable the underwriter to make the loss in any way less.

I therefore answer your Lordships' questions thus: As to the first, there was a loss by the perils insured against during the term of the policy. As to the second, no notice of abandonment either of ship or freight was necessary. As to the third, if notice of abandonment was necessary, it was given in time. As to the fourth, that in the case supposed want of due notice as to the ship would not affect the rights of the plaintiffs upon the policy on freight. As to the fifth, there was no such conduct on the part of the assured as discharged the underwriters from their liability upon the policy on freight. As to the sixth, that the judgment ought to be for the respondents.

MELLOR, J.—My Lords: I answer all the questions proposed by your Lordships to the judges who attended during the argument in this case in favour of the plaintiffs below, the respondents in your Lordships' House. In answer to the first question, I am of opinion that there was a loss of the subject matter of insurance by the perils insured against during the term of the policy. In answer to the second question, I am of opinion that no notice of abandonment either of the ship or freight was necessary under the circumstances to enable the plaintiffs to recover for a total loss on the policy on freight. In answer to the third question, I am of opinion, although with some hesitation, that if notice of abandonment was necessary, it was under the circumstances given in time. To the fourth question, I answer that in my opinion if notice of abandonment of the ship was necessary in order to make a constructive total loss of the ship, and such notice was not given in time, the want of due notice as to the ship does not affect the right of the plaintiffs upon the policy on freight. To the fifth question, I answer that in my opinion there was no such conduct on the part of the assured, after the time of the alleged constructive loss of the ship, as discharged the underwriters from their liability upon the policy on freight. To the sixth question, I am of opinion that the judgment ought to be for the respondents.

In order to arrive at a right conclusion in this case, it is most essential accurately to ascertain the subject matter insured by the policy in question, and against what perils it was agreed by the underwriters to insure; and to keep absolutely distinct the considerations which alone effect the policy on the contemplated homeward freight from those considerations which would apply to an ordinary case of insurance of the ship; and I cannot help saying, with great respect, that the error into which the Court of Common Pleas appears to me to have fallen, has arisen from not keeping distinct the character of the plaintiffs as owners of the ship, from their character as insurers of an entirely distinct subject matter of insurance, viz., the freight contemplated to be earned on the homeward voyage.

The charter-party is [The learned Judge then stated the charter-party]. It is to be observed that the nature of the interest insured is not an interest in anything actually existing and of which possession can be had, such as a ship or cargo, or freight of cargo on board, but it is the interest only in the right to have a cargo provided by the charterer at Calcutta on the condition that the ship, when it arrived there, should be tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage home, notwithstanding any perils of seas which might happen to the ship on her voyage to New Zealand, and for thirty days in port there after arrival. In other words, it is a warranty that no "peril of the seas" which might happen to the ship on her voyage to New Zealand, and for thirty days in port there after arrival, should prevent the ship from arriving at Calcutta, and from being there tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage home, with the cargo there stipulated to be loaded by the agent of the charterer, and the right to have such cargo loaded, and to earn the stipulated freight on the voyage home, and the interest in such right is by the policy valued at the sum of 4000*l*. And the question really is, was the ship so damaged by perils of the seas during the period covered by that policy as to be practically disabled from arriving and being at Calcutta in such condition of seaworthiness as to entitle her to require from the charterers' agent the loading of the stipulated cargo.

In the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas it is said that "the case of insurance of specific charter freight to be carried upon a future voyage against perils to be incurred in the present one, is, so far as we can learn, exceptional in practice, though not unprecedented." And I cannot forbear to add that I think it to be an eminently inconvenient and unsatisfactory course of insurance. The subject matter of the insurance under the policy in question appears to me to be accurately appreciated and stated by the Court of Common Pleas (3 Mar. Law Cas. O.S. 122; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 567, 568; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 715); but I think that the foundation of the error into which, as it appears to me, the court fell, is to be found in the following passage of the judgment: "The insurance of a subject thus dependent upon the possession of the ship, though not properly an accessory thereto, nor incident to the voyage insured, yet, being insured by the ordinary form of policy, ought to be dealt with upon the same principles as an insurance of the ship itself, and as subject to the same conditions in respect of abandonment and otherwise, unless so far as the character of the subject matter rendered abandonment idle or inapplicable."

I have already stated that in my opinion the true effect of the policy under consideration was to insure the ability of the ship to earn the freight contemplated by the charter-party, upon the cargo to be loaded at Calcutta for the homeward voyage, against perils to be encountered by the ship on the voyage to New Zealand, and for thirty days in port there after arrival, so that she should not be prevented from getting to Calcutta in such a state of seaworthiness as to give the owners a right of action against De Mattos if he did not load the cargo pursuant to the charter-party. The condition of the ship when at New Zealand, as regarded the sea damage which she sustained there during the time covered by the policy, was such as it is admitted in the joint case would have justified an abandonment and claim for a constructive total loss.

The admitted facts as regards the condition of the ship at New Zealand being such as would have justified an abandonment of the ship as for a constructive total loss, it now becomes important to consider whether the right to earn the freight under the charter-party was, and to what extent, effected by the actual condition of the ship at New Zealand. Cleasby, B., is reported to have said in the Court of Exchequer Chamber that the thing insured "is the right to earn the freight, and this is neither destroyed nor irretrievably lost because the ship is damaged to the extent alleged. The condition of earning it, namely, repairing the vessel, is not made impossible but expensive, and therefore difficult of performance, but these expenses and the difficulty form the equivalent in such case to damage to the thing, where the thing exists in specie, and mere damage to any extent does not constitute total loss." With great respect this appears to me to confound the considerations which arise upon two distinct contracts, viz., that of an ordinary policy on the ship, and a policy confined to the right and ability of the ship to earn the stipulated freight. The ship was in fact in such condition from sea damage in New Zealand that no uninsured owner of ordinary prudence would have repaired her, and so far as he was concerned, had he known the actual facts, he would have been justified in at once abandoning her to the underwriters. So soon as the ship becomes so sea damaged that no prudent uninsured owner would repair her, I think that from that moment her capacity to earn the stipulated freight on the homeward voyage had become a practical impossibility, so that she could not be effectually tendered to the agent of the freighter at Calcutta as a ship "tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage," that is the homeward voyage. It must be taken for granted that if the actual extent of the damage had been ascertained at New Zealand, the owner would then have done what he did at Calcutta, namely, abandon the ship to the underwriters; but the doing that, or the not doing it, either at New Zealand or Calcutta, could not and does not, as I think, assist in determining whether in fact by reason of perils of seas during the time covered by the policy the ship had become incapable of earning the contemplated freight, pursuant to the charter-party. I accept the dilemma proposed in the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, that "the assured must answer that the total loss was complete, actual, and absolute, without abandonment at Bluff Harbour, immediately upon the happening of the damage, to repair which would cost more than the value of the vessel, and if that were so, the subsequent proceedings of the owner were immaterial, inasmuch as no freight, properly so called, was in fact subsequently earned." I think that my Brother Lush was right in the opinion he expressed in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, namely, "That which in the language of maritime commerce constitutes a loss of a ship, is damage to an extent not worth repairing, followed by a determination not to repair. As respects her capacity to earn freight, a ship in such condition is as much lost to the owner as if she had sunk or broken up." It is true that the ship was taken to Calcutta under the charter-party as an existing ship, such as was supposed capable of being repaired at a cost which might reasonably be incurred in order to enable her to prosecute her voyage. But when the true condition of the ship was ascertained, and she was found to be damaged to an extent which justified the owners in abandoning her to the underwriters, as a constructive total loss, and they did abandon her, the inference arising from those facts is entirely rebutted. I do not feel it incumbent on me to do more than to say, that whatever was then done or omitted to be done with a view to abandonment by the plaintiffs as owners of the ship, has no real bearing upon the question to be determined in this case.

If I am right in assuming that by reason of damage from perils of the sea she had within the time covered by the policy become practically disabled from being tendered at Calcutta to the freighters' agent, as a ship answering the conditions of the charter-party, the subject-matter of insurance had become a total loss. There was nothing which the assured as insurers of the anticipated freight could do, or leave undone, which could affect the position or conduct of the underwriters in regard to the conduct contained in the policy on freight. To say that the plaintiffs as insurers of the freight were in fact identified with the owners of the ship, and were therefore bound to act or not to act, to elect or not to elect, in conformity with the proceedings of the plaintiffs as owners of the ship, is to confound the rights and obligations of the parties under two separate and distinct contracts. It does not appear from the case whether there was an insurance on the ship, but I collect from the judgment in Potter v. Campbell (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 28, note; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 474, note; 16 W. R. 499), that there was such a policy on the ship covering the voyage to New Zealand; but I am entitled, in considering the effect of the policy in question, to treat the ship as uninsured, and to deal singly with the loss of the anticipated freight. The right to call upon De Mattos to load a cargo at Calcutta had been rendered abortive by perils of seas, resulting in such damage to the ship at New Zealand as rendered it practically impossible to make an effectual tender of her to receive cargo at Calcutta. What was then in the power of the assured under this policy to do or say to the underwriters which would not have been an idle ceremony? The plaintiffs in their character of owners of the ship had a duty to elect and give notice of abandonment within a reasonable time after the discovery of the true state of the facts, and it may be that they were guilty of such laches in delay in the discovery as rendered their notice of abandonment when given inoperative; but I am at a loss to see how that affects the plaintiffs under the policy in question. Their election was made for them, when the condition of the ship owing to perils insured against became such as practically destroyed her capacity to earn the contemplated freight.

RANKIN AND OTHERS v. POTTER AND OTHERS.

The ground upon which a notice of abandonment is held not to be necessary, where a ship founders at sea, and actual total loss takes place, is, that there is nothing left which the assured can cede to the underwriters, or by which their position can be affected, and it appears to me that the reasoning of Lord Abinger in delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chambers in Roux v. Salvador (3 Bing. N. S. 278), applies strictly to the circumstances of the present case. Had it not been for the respect which I feel for the opinions of the judges who, expressing the same view which I entertain of the subject matter of insurance under the policy in question, have come to a different conclusion, I should have been content to have stated my opinion to be in conformity with the judgments of Cockburn, C.J. and my brother Lush in the Court of Exchequer Chamber.

Entertaining a very strong opinion that no notice of abandonment was necessary, I feel some difficulty in dealing with the question whether if a notice of abandonment was necessary it was given in time. In considering this question as applicable to the policy on freight simply, it appears to me that questions of fact quite distinct from those which would affect the policy on the ship may arise, and it may well be that what is a reasonable notice in the one case, is not reasonable in the other; but I cannot fix any precise time, under the circumstances of the present case, from which if a notice was necessary to be given, it would be or not be in time, as a matter of reasonableness. If it is to depend upon the diligence with which the owner pursues the inquiry into the actual condition of the ship arising from sea peril, I do not discover in the facts stated any such laches or neglect, or any such conduct on the part of the master in his dealing with the ship until the extent of the damage was discovered, as would induce me to differ from the opinion expressed by the majority of the judges in the Exchequer Chamber.

Before concluding, I ought not to omit to notice a point that was made in the argument, and which I believe is adopted by one of my learned brothers for whose opinion I entertain the greatest respect—namely, that the insolvency of De Mattos, and not the perils of the seas, was the proximate cause of the loss of the anticipated freight, and further, that the delay in the ship's arrival at Calcutta had discharged De Mattos, even if solvent, from loading a cargo under the terms of the charter-party. I cannot help thinking that this view of the case arises from not keeping strictly in view the subject matter of insurance under the policy. If the matter insured was the right and ability of the ship to earn the homeward freight by being at Calcutta, tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage home, and that such state of the ship was a condition precedent to the right to require the loading of a cargo at Calcutta by the agent of De Mattos, the ship neither did nor could fulfil that condition, owing to the perils of the seas during the time covered by the policy, and that I think was a loss insured against independently of the solvency or insolvency of De Mattos on her arrival. It was further said that the fact of the insolvency of De Mattos would have equally prevented his agent from providing a cargo, even if the ship had arrived at Calcutta in seaworthy condition. Had the policy not been a valued policy, the fact might have seriously affected the damages, but I do not see how it can afford an answer to the present action. Then with regard to De Mattos being discharged from the obligation to load a cargo in consequence of the delay which had taken place on the arrival of the ship, that can be no answer to the action, if I am right in attributing that delay to the effect of sea damage within the policy.

I have therefore come to the conclusion that all the questions propounded by your Lordships to the judges ought to be answered in favour of the plaintiffs below who are the respondents in your Lordships' House.

BLACKBURN, J.—My Lords: Your Lordships have in this case proposed six questions to the judges, all of which I answer in favour of the plaintiffs in the cause, who are the respondents in your Lordships' House. With your Lordships' permission I will first state generally my reasons for deciding in favour of the plaintiffs on the merits.

The plaintiffs being mortgagees in possession of the ship Sir William Eyre, then on a voyage to New Zealand from the Clyde, had entered into a charter-party with De Mattos, by which it was agreed that the ship should sail to New Zealand with a cargo for owners' benefit, and having arrived and discharged the same, and being made tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, should proceed to Calcutta, and there being tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, should load from De Mattos' agents a cargo and convey it for freight to Liverpool or London. It is to be observed on this charter-party that it is a condition precedent to the earning of the freight, that the Sir William Eyre should be in due time at Calcutta, and there seaworthy for the voyage from Calcutta to Liverpool or London. The plaintiffs could not substitute any other vessel for her, and, that being so, the plaintiffs might be prevented from earning that freight by any disaster which befel the Sir William Eyre on her voyage out to New Zealand, or during her stay there, or on the voyage from thence to Calcutta, or during her stay there, if the effect of that disaster was to render it impracticable to tender the Sir William Eyre at Calcutta in due time, and in a seaworthy condition for the voyage home round the Cape of Good Hope; but that they had a vested expectation of earning this freight, if no such disaster happened. They had therefore in respect of this freight an insurable interest during the whole of the outward voyage. This is not, as I understand, disputed, but if authority is required for it, I would refer your Lordships to Barber v. Fleming (L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 59), and Foley v. United Fire and Marine Insurance Company of Sydney (3 Mar. Law Cas. 352, L. Rep. 5 C. P. 155; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 108). Being so situated they entered into the policy. In my opinion the whole merits in this case depend upon the accurate understanding of the contract contained in this policy.

I must first observe on a matter which perhaps not strictly before your Lordships. It is stated in the appendix to the case that this insurance was for 4000*l.* on freight valued at 5000*l.*, and throughout the argument, and in the judgments below, the policy was treated as a valued policy, and consequently no question was discussed as to the amount to be recovered, nor whether the insolvency of De Mattos, and the consequent diminution in value of the freight insured, affected that amount. In the policy itself, however, as set out in the appendix to the case, the space which, if this was the case, ought to have been filled up with 5000*l.*, is left blank, and the policy is in form an open one. It is possible that the policy is miscopied, but I think it more probable that it was drawn up in this form by mistake, and that the underwriters, either from a sense of honour or from knowing that the contract could be reformed in equity, have been content to act on the contract as it ought to have been drawn up. I presume your Lordships would not like to put any obstacle in the way of such a fair proceeding. I shall therefore make no further remark on the amount to be recovered.

The insurance is, "lost or not lost at and from Clyde to Southland, while there, and thence to Otago, New Zealand, and for thirty days in port there," upon the Sir William Eyre. And the subject-matter is 4000*l.* on homeward chartered freight. I think that the meaning of this contract is that the underwriters are to indemnify the assured if by any of the perils insured against the Sir William Eyre is, during the voyage from the Clyde to New Zealand, or during thirty days after arrival there, so damaged that in consequence the homeward chartered freight cannot be earned. In the judgment in the Common Pleas in this case it is said, "The policy under consideration thus differs from an ordinary insurance upon freight. First, in that it could not be affected by loss of cargo, because the freight insured was not for cargo in existence or appropriated during the risk; next that it was not subject to general average either of ship or cargo, because the freight was not to be earned during the voyage insured, and as a consequence, that the underwriter was not in any case to contribute to repairs of the ship, not even in respect of general average. And lastly, that as the freight rested in contract for the future employment of the ship only, it would not pass by bare abandonment to the underwriters upon ship, but would simply come to nothing upon such abandonment if justifiable, because the abandonment would be in effect an election by the owner to treat the charter as at an end by reason of the usual exception of sea perils in the charter-party, and he would not be bound to incur in favour of the underwriters on ship any new responsibility not connected with the voyage on which the ship was insured." So far I completely agree, and instead of repeating this in other words I adopt this language as my own, but in what follows in that judgment I do not agree. I think that if there was damage to the ship, such that though it was physically possible to repair the ship, the expense would be so great that, according to the rule laid down in Moss v. Smith (9 C. B. 104), it was unreasonable so to do, the owner might, as between him and the charterer, elect not to repair the ship, but to treat the charter as at an end by reason of the exception of the sea perils, and if under such circumstances the owner did not in fact repair her, the freight was totally lost by the perils, insured against, and not, as stated in the judgment in the Common Pleas, by the owner's default, for the owner was not bound to repair the ship. There would be no loss from the perils insured against, if the owner did in fact repair the ship, which, though not bound to do so, he had a right to do if he pleased. If indeed there had been a partial loss or damage, such that the owner could reasonably repair the ship, he was bound to do so, and if in such a case he declined to do so, I should agree with the judgment in the Common Pleas in saying that he would lose the freight by his own choice or default, and not by any peril insured against. But I think that where the damage is so great that the owner is not bound to repair the ship, if he declines to do so he would lose his freight, not by his own default, but by the peril insured against. This seems an elementary proposition, but as much of what I consider the error in the judgment of the Common Pleas arises from not bearing it in mind, I will proceed to state some authorities for it. The principle is thus expressed in the judgment of the Queen's Bench in Stringer v. English, &c., Insurance Company (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 440; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 691): "The assured, if he, by any means such as he could reasonably be expected to use, could have prevented the loss" (which was in that case by a sale in the Prize Court) "was bound to use them, and if the sale was directly occasioned by his default, though remotely by the perils insured against" (in that case a seizure) "he cannot recover against the underwriters. But the assured are not bound to use unreasonable exertions in order to preserve the thing insured; and if the giving of a bond or deposit of money" (in the present case the repairing of the ship) "would have exposed them to expense or risk of expense beyond the value of the object, or as the same idea is often expressed, if the steps necessary to prevent the sale" (loss) "were such as a prudent uninsured owner would not have adopted, we think they were not in default, and the sale was then a total loss occasioned by the seizure." I do not cite this as conclusive, for it is for your Lordships to determine whether it is correct or not, but as expressing what I think the true principle. So far as regards the case of a ship, it is very concisely, and I think accurately expressed, by my brother Lush in his judgment in the court below when he says, "That which in the language of maritime commerce constitutes the loss of a ship is damage to an extent not worth repairing, followed by a determination not to repair."

I must here observe that in my opinion (which in this respect differs from that expressed in the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas below) there might well be a state of things in which the assured could recover on this policy for a total loss of the freight, though the assured could not, either with or without notice of abandonment, recover against the underwriters on ship for a total loss. The questions between the assured and the two sets of underwriters are not the same. The question between the assured and the underwriters of the ship is whether the damage sustained may be so far repaired as to keep her a ship, though not perhaps so good a ship as she was before, without expending more than she would be worth. The question between the assured and the underwriter on the chartered freight is whether the damage can be so far repaired that the ship can be at Calcutta, seaworthy for a voyage round the Cape of Good Hope, without expending more than she would be worth. I should have added a further term that the repairs could be done so promptly that she might arrive at Calcutta within a reasonable time, as between the shipowner and De Mattos, were it not for the case of Hurst v. Osborne (18 C.B. 144), which seems to me an authority against this position. And though I should not hesitate to advise your Lordships to reconsider that case if necessary, I think it is not necessary so to do in the present case.

RANKIN AND OTHERS v. POTTER AND OTHERS.

My position therefore is that if the ship were so damaged that she could be brought to Calcutta and there made seaworthy for a voyage round the Cape, but not without expending say 10,000*l.*, and would then, all things considered, be worth only say 9000*l.*, but that she could by an expenditure of say 4000*l.* be made a ship quite fit for short voyages, though not for such a voyage as that round the Cape, and would then be worth say 5000*l.*, there would be a total loss of the freight, though no total loss of the ship. No notice of abandonment whatever given to the underwriters on ship could have converted that which on those figures was only a partial loss into a total one. This was decided by the Exchequer Chamber in Kemp v. Halliday (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 271, 370; 6 B. & S. 723; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 762), a case which was not cited at your Lordships' bar, but to which I venture to refer your Lordships, as the passages contained in pages 749 to 754 of the report will show your Lordships that the opinions I now express are not formed for the first time.

I now proceed to consider the answer to your Lordships' first question. That in my opinion depends upon a question of fact, which I think is answered by the very important addition to the case made during the argument in the Exchequer Chamber, and now contained in the case: "It is admitted that the sea damage which the ship sustained at New Zealand during the time covered by the policy would have justified an abandonment and claim for a constructive total loss." This can only mean that the damage to the ship was so great that the ship could not be repaired without expending more than she was worth, and consequently that the shipowner might justifiably elect not to repair her. I think that under such circumstances the shipowner had a right as against his underwriters on ship to come upon them for a total loss. But if he does so, then on general principles of equity not at all peculiar to marine insurance, he who recovers on a contract of indemnity must and does, by taking satisfaction from the person indemnifying him, cede all his rights in respect of that for which he obtains indemnity. It was held in Mason v. Sainsbury (3 Doug. 61), that the Hand-in-Hand Insurance Company having paid the plaintiff for a loss under a fire policy, were entitled to recover in an action in his name against the hundred. This cession or abandonment is a very different thing from a notice of abandonment, though the ambiguous word "abandonment" often leads to confounding the two. There is no notice of abandonment in cases of fire insurance, but the salvage is transferred on the principle of equity expressed by Lord Hardwicke in Randal v. Cochrane (1 Ves. sen. 98), that "the person who originally sustains the loss was the owner, but after satisfaction made to him the insurer." In Godsall v. Boldero (9 East, 72), the same principle was acted upon in a case of life insurance. That case was overruled in Dalby v. The India and London Life Assurance Company (15 C. B. 365), because the principle was misapplied to a life insurance, which is not a contract of indemnity; but the principle itself has never (that I know of) been questioned. When therefore the party indemnified has a right to indemnity, and has elected to enforce his claim, the chance of any benefit from an improvement in the value of which is in existence, and the risk of any loss from its deterioration, are transferred from the party indemnified to those who indemnify, and therefore if the state of things is such that steps may be taken to improve the value of what remains, or to preserve it from further deterioration, such steps from the moment of the election concern the party indemnifying, who therefore ought to be informed promptly of the election to come upon him, in order that he may if he pleases take steps for his own protection. And on general principles of law (still not confined to marine insurance) an election, once determined, is determined for ever, and such a determination is made by any act that shows it to be made. And therefore anything that indicates that the party indemnified has determined to take to himself the chance of benefit from an increased value in the part saved, and only claim for the partial loss, will determine his election so to do. I may refer for an exposition of this general principle to the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Clough v. London and North Western Railway (L. Rep. 7 Ex. 34, 35; 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 708.) In cases of marine insurance the regular mercantile mode of letting the underwriters know that the assured mean to come upon them for a complete indemnity is by giving notice of abandonment, which is a very different thing from the abandonment or cession itself. This notice when given is conclusive that the assured, if still in a situation to determine his election, has determined to come upon the underwriters for a total loss, the consequence of which is that everything is ceded (to avoid the use of the ambiguous word "abandoned") to the underwriters. Abbot, C.J., in Cologan v. London Assurance (5 M. & S. 456), says: "I do not consider an abandonment as having the effect of converting a partial into a total loss." . . . The abandonment, however, excludes any presumption, which might have arisen from the silence of the assured, that they still meant to adhere to the adventure as their own." If before giving this notice the assured have already indicated by their acts, or if the circumstances are such that they indicate by their silence that they have elected to adhere to the adventure as their own, the notice of abandonment obviously comes too late. A very good example of such a case is afforded by Mitchell v. Edie (1 T. R. 608), as explained in Rowe v. Salvador (3 Bing. N. C. 666). There a ship laden with sugar, and bound for London, was captured and finally taken into Charlestown, where the sugar was sold and the proceeds lodged in the hands of a person resident in Charlestown. From the state of political affairs at that time sugar was dear at Charlestown, and as Lord Abinger conjectured, the sugar had come to a very good market and the assured was satisfied and took to the proceeds. A year afterwards the person in whose hands the money was became insolvent, and after that it was, with obvious justice, held that it was too late to come upon the underwriters for a total loss. Thus explained, the case is a good example of the principle stated in Stringer v. England, &c., Insurance Company (L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 688), where it is said, "As is well pointed out in 2 Phillips' Insurance, sect. 1669, where the cargo still subsists in specie and may be recovered, the question depending on abandonment is, which party should be at the risk of the market and the solvency of agents, neither of which, independently of the direct effect of the perils insured against, concerns the insured. To allow the assured to change his election whilst the circumstances remain the same, would enable the assured to treat the property as his so long as there was a prospect of profit from the rise in the market, and as the property of the insurers, so soon as there was a certainty of loss, which would be inequitable: qui commodum sentit sentire debet et onus." I should apologize to your Lordships for dwelling so long on what seems to me the principle on which abandonment and the necessity of notice of abandonment, when required, depend, had it been argued at your Lordships' bar, on the authority of Knight v. Faith (15 Q. B. 649), that there is a technical rule of insurance law by which notice of abandonment must be given if the thing exist in specie at all, though the state of things is such that the underwriters could do nothing in consequence of the notice. I think it more convenient to postpone my remarks on that case till I answer your Lordships' last question. In the meanwhile, I proceed to say that I should be very sorry to throw any doubt on the principle expressed by Lord Abinger in the following passage in his judgment in Roux v. Salvador (2 Bing. N. C. 286), where, after stating the state of circumstances which give the insured a right to treat the case as one of total loss, he proceeds: "But if he elects to do this, as the thing insured, or a portion of it, still exists and is vested in him, the very principle of indemnity is that he should make a cession of all his rights to the recovery of it, and that too within a reasonable time after he receives intelligence of the accident, that the underwriter may be entitled to all the benefit of what may still be of any value, and that he may, if he pleases, take measures at his own cost for realising or increasing that value." But I think this is from the nature of things confined to cases where there are some steps which the underwriter could take, if he had notice. When they can do so, I think that the neglect to give a notice of abandonment may determine the owner's election. This is a matter that is now of much greater practical importance than it was when Lord Abinger delivered that judgment. For then the assured could not learn that his ship had got into difficulties at a distant place till long after the disaster, and the underwriters could only send out orders which would arrive later still. Under such circumstances, a notice of abandonment was often a very idle ceremony, and, in my opinion, unnecessary if the facts did amount to a total loss, inoperative if they did not. Now, when by means of the electric telegraph the underwriters' orders might promptly reach the spot where the ship was in peril, a notice of abandonment may be of great practical importance. What would be a reasonable time and whether the neglect to give notice of abandonment does determine the election, must, I think, depend in each case on the circumstances, and principally on what steps the underwriters might take if they had notice. If there was nothing they could do, no notice, I think, is required. This, I apprehend, is the principle of Cambridge v. Anderton (2 B. & C. 691), Roux v. Salvador (3 Bing. N. C. 266), and Farnworth v. Hyde (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 187, 429; 18 C. B., N. S., 835; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 395). For, as has often been observed, a sale by the master is not one of the underwriters' perils, and is only material as showing that there is no longer anything which can be done to save the thing already sold for whom it may concern. It conclusively determines that neither assurers nor assured can do anything, and consequently that a notice of abandonment would be but an idle form on which nothing could be done, and which therefore is unnecessary. If these which I have submitted to your Lordships are the true principles on which the law depends, it seems to me to be obvious that in this case there was a total loss of the freight in consequence of the damage by sea perils being so great that the shipowner was not bound to repair her. No doubt the shipowner might have repaired her if he pleased, and if, as in Benson v. Chapman (2 H. of L. Cas. 695), he had elected to repair her, and had done so, though at a ruinous expense, the freight would not have been lost. But the ship in this case never was repaired so as to make her capable of earning the freight, and the insured was under no obligation to repair her at a ruinous cost. This brings me to the second question. I cannot see how the contract between the plaintiff and the defendant, by which the latter undertakes to indemnify the former against loss on the freight, can be in any way affected by the fact that the plaintiff had made a contract with other persons by which they undertook to indemnify him against loss on the ship. If the facts are not such as to amount to a loss of freight from the perils insured against, no transaction between the plaintiff and third persons could make them amount to such a loss. If they were such as to amount to a loss of the freight, it can make no difference to the now defendant whether the plaintiff can or cannot recover for the damage to his ship from other persons. It is true that a transaction with third persons may, as evidence, prove that the plaintiff had elected not to repair the ship, as the sale of the wreck in Cambridge v. Anderton and in Farnworth v. Hyde, did. And so if the plaintiff in the present case had given notice of abandonment at once to the underwriters on ship and recovered from them as for a total loss, it would have afforded conclusive evidence that he had elected not to repair the ship. As it was, he delayed so long that I think the fair conclusion of fact is that, as between him and the underwriters on ship, he had elected to take his chance of making a better thing of it by keeping her as a ship to himself and coming on the underwriters for a partial loss only. I do not go into the facts, as the question whether they could have recovered a total loss on the policy on ship or not is only collaterally raised in this case, but, in my opinion, they completely bring the case within the principle stated by Lord Chancellor Cottenham in Fleming v. Smith (1 H. of L. Cas. 530), where he says, "They were sufficiently informed of what had taken place to enable them, if they thought proper, to take upon themselves the chance of the benefit of retaining the ownership of the property, instead of taking the sum which was secured to them by the policy effected with the underwriters on the vessel; and if they acted upon that opportunity of election, they surely cannot afterwards turn round and go against the underwriters as for a total loss." I should therefore, as at present advised, have concurred with the Court of Common Pleas in their decision in Potter v. Campbell (ubi sup.). But I think that this in noways affects the question between the plaintiffs and the underwriters on freight. I agree with what has been said by my brother Brett; the plaintiffs not having come upon the underwriters for ship leaves the case just as if the ship had never been insured at all.

This brings me to consider whether it was necessary for the plaintiffs to give notice of abandonment to the underwriters on freight. It was argued at your Lordships' bar that by the law of marine insurance a notice of abandonment was as imperatively necessary as a notice of dishonour is by the law merchant on bills of exchange. On this I shall submit some observations at the end of this opinion, but at present I will assume that the true principle is that notice of abandonment is only requisite when from the state of facts it may make a difference to the underwriters if the assured delays making his election whether he will adhere to the property, taking his chance of profit or loss from so doing, or come upon the underwriters for a total loss. If that be the principle, it seems to me to follow from it that inasmuch as there was nothing which the underwriters on freight could have done to alter their position in consequence of a notice of abandonment, and that it would have been an idle ceremony, no notice could ever be required, and, not being required at all, could not be too late. These are the reasons for which I answer to your Lordships' second question by saying that, in my opinion, no notice of abandonment, either of ship or freight, was necessary to enable the plaintiffs to recover for a total loss on the policy on freight.

To the third question, that, in my opinion, no notice at all being required, it never could be out of time.

To the fourth question, that, though I think that under the circumstances of this case the plaintiffs have precluded themselves from recovering for a total loss of a ship, that in no way affects the rights of the plaintiffs upon the policy on freight.

I now come to your Lordships' fifth question. From what I have already written, your Lordships will perceive that in my opinion the decision of the case really should depend on the answer to this question. I have already indicated that I think that the assured so conducted themselves as to discharge the underwriters on ship from the liability for a total loss, for the assured took to themselves the chance of benefit from retaining the ship as their own, and so made their election as to the ship. But as to the freight, I can see nothing which could have been done by the underwriters if the idle ceremony of a notice had been gone through. It was indeed suggested that the underwriters on freight might have made some arrangement with the underwriters on ship, by which they were to repair the ship, send her on, and, in the name of the owners, tender her to De Mattos. But in all cases, and especially in cases of insurance, we look to what is practically possible, and not to remote theoretical imaginations. If it could be shown that the delay in this case, which was certainly considerable, had in any way altered the position of the underwriters, if there was anything which they could have done, if the claim had been made on them at the time when the disaster happened at New Zealand, or in the interval, which they cannot now do, or if any prejudice had been sustained by them in consequence of the delay, the case would be different. I should then have to consider whether the prejudice sustained was sufficient to give rise to a preclusion. But, as the facts are, there is nothing of the sort. I therefore answer your Lordships' fifth question by saying that, in my opinion, there was no such conduct as to discharge the underwriters from their liability upon the policy on freight.

The answers to those five questions would answer the sixth and last, were it not that I have reserved to this time the discussion of the proposition argued at your Lordships' bar, that there is a technical necessity for a notice of abandonment in a case of marine insurance, whether any use can be made of it or not, and whether the failure to give it works any prejudice or not. It was said it was required by the law merchant as to insurance, just as notice of dishonour is required by the law merchant on a bill of exchange. Such is the law in some foreign countries, but I will submit to your Lordships my reasons for thinking that it is not and never was the law of England. Emerigon, in the first section of the 17th chapter of his celebrated Treatise on Insurance (vol. 2, p. 207, of the edition by Boulay Paty, 1827), states that by the general law merchant, or, as he calls it, "le Droit des Nations," there was no need for any notice of abandonment, the contract being one of indemnity only. I do not pretend to have made any research myself as to what was the ancient law merchant, but from Emerigon's high character for learning and research I assume that he is correct. He then proceeds to say that the law merchant did not prohibit persons from making a stipulation that under certain stipulated circumstances the subject matter of the assurance might be abandoned to the underwriters, who then should pay the whole sum assured, without having any option merely to indemnify the assured. And he observes that doubtless the usual clauses to that effect gave rise to established rules on the subject. He then cites from Casaregis three rules from Emerigon seems to consider as truly stating the law merchant on the subject. They are as follows:—1. That the abandonment is a form which is sufficiently complied with by the simple fact that the assured demands from the assurers payment of the sole sum insured. 2. That the assured may, without having recourse to abandonment, recover the salvage, and claim payment from the assurers of an average loss only. 3. That in case of total loss abandonment is an idle form, "le délaissement est une formalité inutile." The editor of Emerigon observes in a note that the first and third of those rules are not the law of France at this day. And Emerigon points out that all this was in France (and, in consequence, in those countries which have adopted the French law) altered by the positive enactment contained in the celebrated Ordonnance de la Marine of 1681, by the 46th article of which it was enacted that "No abandonment shall be made except in case of capture, "shipwreck, bris" (a word for which I know of no English equivalent, "breakage" or "fracture" not being used in this technical sense), "stranding, arrest of princes, or total loss of the things assured, and that all other losses shall be deemed average losses only." On this Emerigon treats at great lengths in the following sections of the 17th chapter. There seems to have been at first much controversy and dispute as to the true effect of the enactment, but it seems to have been finally settled in France that the assured could never recover for a total loss without abandonment, even though the thing assured was totally destroyed. "Such," says Emerigon (c. 17, s. 6, vol. 2, p. 252), "is the enactment of our Ordonnance, to which we must submit." And it was further established that when any of the events specified in the 46th article had happened, the assured might by giving notice of abandonment recover for a total loss, though the thing insured was quite safe and uninjured. This Emerigon justifies, or at least accounts for, by saying that the Ordonnance created a presumption, which was juris et de jure, that where any of the first five cases had happened the thing was lost. This was carried so far that where a ship was stranded and got off without injury either to herself or cargo, the owners of the cargo were permitted to give notice of abandonment and recover as for a total loss. This highly artificial conclusion was corrected by a supplemental ordinance of 1779, but till then it remained the French law: (see Emerigon, c. 17, s. 2, vol. 2, p. 212.) Now the enactments of the French law, contained in the ordinance of the Marine, can have no force in England, except in so far as they have been adopted into our law. As far as regards the law that by giving notice of abandonment the assured can recover for a total loss, because by a presumption juris et de jure the property is to be taken as lost in law, though it is safe in fact, it certainly is not the law of England, and never was. In Hamilton v. Mendez (2 Bur. 1198) Lord Mansfield strongly laid down the doctrine that a policy of marine insurance is a contract of indemnity, and that "if the thing in truth was safe, no artificial reasoning shall be allowed to set up a "total loss." No one would for a moment now venture to contend that a notice of abandonment could in England entitle an assured to recover as for a total loss on a policy on goods if the ship was captured, though set free, or wrecked but the cargo saved uninjured, or in a case of simple stranding. So far the law of the Ordonnance is clearly not adopted in England. Even in the case where the loss is at the time of the notice of abandonment total, though capable of being reduced by a change of circumstances to a partial loss (Dean v. Hornby, 3 E. & B. 180), the assured (unless in the very uncommon case of the notice being accepted) cannot recover as for a total loss if that change of circumstances does occur before the trial. Nor can it be for a moment contended that a notice of abandonment is essential to the assured's right to recover for a total loss where the loss is in fact total. But though in no one of these cases has the French enactment been adopted in the English law, it is argued that it has been so adopted as, in the case of what is somewhat unhappily called a constructive total loss, to render a notice of abandonment a necessary technical preliminary to an action for the total loss, though it is not required for any useful purpose, though no prejudice has been sustained for want of it, though the loss at the time of the trial still continues total, and though, according to Casaregis, as cited and approved of by Emerigon, the law merchant looked on the notice of abandonment in case of total loss as being une formalité inutile. It is unnecessary to refer to any English decisions prior to the great case of Roux v. Salvador. All the authorities bearing on the point were, I believe, cited and considered in the elaborate judgments delivered in that case; and the decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber was that no notice of abandonment was necessary, because, as stated by Lord Abinger (3 Bing. N. C. 281), "Neither the assured nor the underwriters could at the time when the intelligence arrived exercise any control over the goods, or by any interference alter the consequences." It may be, however, convenient to refer your Lordships to the portion of Mr Phillips' Treatise on Insurance in which he treats on this subject. I know of no text writer who treats the law of insurance with more learning, and certainly of none who treats it with as much sound sense and appreciation of the bearing of the doctrines laid down on practical business. It is, however, to be borne in mind that he writes in America, and that, as he clearly states in sect. 1536 (vol. 2, ed. 3, p. 271), "It is a general rule in the United States that if the ship or goods insured are damaged to more than half of the value by any peril insured against, or more than half the freight is lost, the assured may abandon and recover for a total loss." He adds in sect. 1536, "This rule of abandonment on account of loss over 50 per cent. of the value of the subject makes the most material difference between the American and English jurisprudence, relative to total loss and abandonment, and is to be kept in mind in examining the decisions of the tribunals of the two countries. This rule, and that rule in the United States whereby the validity of the abandonment is tested by the circumstances existing at the time of making it, instead of the time of bringing the suit, as in England, give a wider range to constructive total loss and abandonment in the United States." Bearing this distinction in mind, anyone who wishes to understand this subject will derive great assistance from perusing the whole of Mr Phillips' 17th chapter on total loss and abandonment. I will only refer your Lordships to sect. 1491, where he says, "An abandonment being a transfer, it can be requisite only where there is some assignable transferable subjects on which it can operate." "When nothing remains to be assigned or transferred, an abandonment is useless and unnecessary." And to sect. 1494, where he observes, "But the better rule in such case is that if the insured neglect to abandon, he shall recover only according to the state of things at the trial; since, as we shall see, under a declaration for a total loss he may recover for a partial loss, and the underwriter ought to have the advantage of whatever may occur to make the loss partial so long as the assured delays to elect a total loss. If he has judgment for a total loss, this is equivalent to an abandonment and gives the underwriter a right to salvage." And to sect. 1497, where he says, "The distinction mentioned above as to recovering a total loss without abandonment is to be observed, viz., that the assured is charged with the proceeds in the adjustment of the loss as in a salvage loss, though the same may not have actually come to his hands. This circumstance being borne in mind will reconcile most of the decisions on this subject which otherwise would appear to be directly contradictory according to the language commonly used by the courts, which must, however, be constructed in reference to one or the other description of case under consideration." Your Lordships will appreciate the shrewdness of the latter part of this remark if you examine the various dicta cited in Roux v. Salvador and Knight v. Faith. To return to the English authorities, the decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Roux v. Salvador was, as far as I can learn, received with general approbation at the time. There was, however, one exception. Lord Campbell never could be brought to think it right. In the case of Fleming v. Smith (1 H. L. Ca. 513), the counsel for the appellants (the Attorney-General Jervis, afterwards Chief Justice, and Sir S. Thesiger, now Lord Chelmsford) argued, as I think logically, from the decision in Roux v. Salvador, that notice of abandonment could not be in any case required except where there is something which could be done by the underwriters in consequence; and then the failure to give notice of abandonment might be material as determining the election which the assured had, whether to treat the loss as total or not. This, as I have already stated to your Lordships, is what I consider to be the law. Lord Campbell was of a different opinion, and in his opinion says, "The law therefore requires that notice shall be given in order to convert a constructive into a total loss;" but though that was his opinion, it was not the judgment of the House of Lords. Lord Cottenham (and Lord Brougham concurred in his opinion), carefully puts the decision exclusively on the ground that the assured had in fact elected to treat the loss as a partial loss only. This studied silence on his part may prevent us from saying that he differed from Lord Campbell; but he certainly did not express any concurrence with him. After this in the Queen's Bench, when Lord Campbell was Chief Justice, there arose the case of Knight v. Faith (15 Q. B. 649.) The manner in which that judgment came to be delivered was very peculiar. There was a very brief case stated for the opinion of the Court of Queen's Bench. On the statements in it the court came to the conclusion, as stated in the judgment, that "slight repairs might have been sufficient again to fit her, the ship, for navigation," and the court say that, though she was sold, "we are of opinion that as against the insurers the sale is not shown to be lawful." On such facts the assured could never have recovered for a total loss, even if he had delivered all possible notices of abandonment from the first to last. Yet the court forced the council to amend the case by inserting a statement that no notice of abandonment was given, and pronounced an elaborate judgment on a point which it was wholly unnecessary to notice, except for the purpose of recording dissent from the decision of the Exchequer Chamber in Roux v. Salvador. It should in candour, however, be added that the other judges of the court joined Lord Campbell in this. Still I think that the fact that a judgment was not necessary for the decision of the case before the court always diminishes its authority. And I think that on perusing the judgment in Knight v. Faith it will be found that no argument is produced which had not been used in Roux v. Salvador, and that no new authority is produced except Lord Campbell's own opinions in Fleming v. Smith, and a passage from the judgment of Cottenham, L.C., in Stewart v. Greenock Marine Insurance Company (2 H. of L. Ca. 159). The question in that latter case was what passed to the underwriters on ship, who were liable for a total loss of ship. They raised the very question alluded to in the section 1497 of Phillips already cited. The ship having been destroyed just before she entered the docks, kept together as a ship so that she entered the docks, delivered her cargo, and so earned freight, and the underwriters on ship said they were entitled as salvage to the freight thus earned after the disaster. This House decided that they were entitled to the benefit, on the precise principle long before laid down in Randal v. Cochrane, and the other cases I referred to in the beginning of this opinion, that the plaintiffs "claiming as upon a total loss must give up to the underwriters all the remains of the property recovered, together with all the benefit or advantage belonging or incident to it." But I cannot see how, or in what way, the assertion of the doctrine that recovering for a total loss operates as a cession of everything, can be said to amount to the assertion of that other doctrine that the handing in a notice of abandonment is a condition precedent to the right to claim for a total loss. And as it seems to me, every dictum cited in Knight v. Faith is capable of being reconciled with the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Roux v. Salvador, if it is only borne in mind that the abandonment or cession consequent on recovering for a total loss is one thing; the notice of abandonment supposed to be a condition precedent to claiming for a total loss is another.

I have dwelt on this point at perhaps unnecessary length, for all that it is necessary to decide in this case is that where there is nothing to abandon no notice is requisite. I have therefore to conclude by saying, in answer to your Lordships' last question, that in my opinion judgment ought to be for the plaintiffs in the cause, the respondents in your Lordships' House.

BRAMWELL, B.—My Lords: In this case I think it convenient to consider (though it has been already done in the judgments delivered), the precise effect of the contract the plaintiffs seek to enforce. The owners of the ship, Sir William Eyre, had entered into a charter-party with Do Mattos, whereby the ship, then on a voyage to New Zealand, was to proceed to Calcutta and there load a cargo for Liverpool or London, to be provided by him. The contract in question is a policy of insurance by the owners (now represented by the plaintiffs), whereby the underwriters (the defendant being one), insured against certain perils of the seas, which might happen on the voyage then in progress to New Zealand, preventing the owners from earning or being entitled to earn the charter freight. And the policy is to be taken to be a valued policy, and 4000*l.* the value. The insurance did not extend to the voyage from New Zealand to Calcutta, the stay there, nor the voyage home. In effect, therefore, the insurance was against perils on the voyage to New Zealand which should prevent the ship getting to Calcutta in such a state as to give the owners a right of action against De Mattos if he did not load the cargo, and in such a state as should enable the vessel to bring the cargo home loaded, and earn the freight. For if De Mattos had loaded the cargo, and if owing to perils covered by the policy (perhaps undiscovered at Calcutta), the vessel had failed to bring the chartered cargo home, I apprehend the underwriters would have been liable.

It seems to me, therefore, with great respect, that on this policy there might have been a partial or total loss of the ship. I am not speaking of what is probable, but it is possible, I suppose, that the ship might have been so injured on the outward voyage as to be unseaworthy for a whole cargo; it is possible that the charterer, though having a right to refuse to load an unseaworthy ship or a partial cargo, might have elected to do so. In such case there might be a partial loss. And it is, I suppose, possible that a peril covered by the policy might have injured the ship in such a way that it became necessary to jettison a part of the cargo on the home voyage, and yet the rest might be carried home in the ship and freight earned. This, also, I conceive, would be a partial loss, and without a total loss of the ship. So also, if by perils insured against the ship had been disabled from reaching Calcutta by an agreed time in the charter, or not in time to make the voyage the same as the charter provided for. I do not know that it is necessary to enter into these speculations, but to my mind they help to clear the matter.

It seems, to me, then, that the insurance was that perils of the seas on the voyage to New Zealand should not destroy or prevent the right of action against De Mattos to accrue on the ship's arrival at Calcutta, and his refusal to load, and should not prevent the earning of the freight, if he performed his contract to load. Whether such an insurance should be called an insurance on freight is only a question of words. But it is very important, in most cases, to use the right words. Certainly this insurance is practically more an insurance on ship in respect of freight than on the freight. For if the ship sustained no damage on the voyage to New Zealand from perils insured against, there could be no claim on the underwriters. This, perhaps, is true of all insurances on chartered freight till the cargo is loaded. For, till then, nothing that can happen to the cargo, or its carriage, can be in question. If Willes, J.'s expression is accurate in this respect, this is wholly an insurance on the ship. He says, "The policy was in its nature therefore against total loss of freight by total loss of ship." Of course I do not mean that all the incidents of an ordinary insurance on ship attach, nor that none of those on freight do.

It seems to me that the before statement of the case answers the first difficulty put on behalf of the defendant, viz. that De Mattos' insolvency or the destruction of the ship by the cyclone was the cause of the plaintiffs' loss of the freight. This is not so. For the perils on the outward voyage had put the ship into such a condition that the plaintiffs had not the right of action against De Mattos for not loading. They thought they had when the vessel arrived at Calcutta, and so probably did De Mattos' agents. But they thought so because they did not know the true state of the facts. Had they sued De Mattos he would have had an answer that the ship was not seaworthy. Nor could they have said in reply that they were ready to make her so within a reasonable time. For her state was such that on its being known to them they would not have been ready to do so. One of the losses, therefore, insured against, viz., inability to enforce the charter against De Mattos, accrued by reason of perils insured against. The assured would indeed probably, as the charter freight was higher than the market rate, have lost the benefit of the charter by reason of De Mattos' refusal or inability to load, even though they had not lost it through perils of the sea. But the loss would have been different. They might have recovered damages from him, or proved against his estate. No doubt they would not in this way have got 4000*l.*, but they would have got something. I agree with the illustration of Willes, J. of the house left out of repair and subsequently burned down, and with that of Sir George Honyman, of an injury to a man's leg which a subsequent injury made it necessary to cut off. I think, therefore, there was a loss of the chartered freight by perils insured against, loss which accrued, and gave a vested cause of action when the ship was damaged by taking the ground at New Zealand.

Another difficulty made for the defendants was, that as the ship remained in specie, and could have been repaired so as to carry the cargo and earn the freight, and the assured did not think fit to repair, but abandoned the ship to the underwriters on ship, therefore the freight was lost not by perils of the sea, but by the voluntary act of the plaintiffs. I think the answer to this is that it was not their voluntary act, but one to which they were practically compelled by the extent of the damage. If this argument is good, it must apply to every case of insurance on freight, where the ship remains in specie. But this is not pretended. I think, therefore, there was a loss of the thing, or one of the things, insured by perils insured against. But the great question is, was there a total loss?

I think this question ought to be and is unaffected by there having been an insurance on ship. For suppose there had been none, then the ship, or her materials, would have belonged to the assured, who would have broken her up or sold her to be broken up. In that case they would own the salvage of the ship, instead of the underwriters doing so. And indeed in this case the Court of Common Pleas held that the abandonment was ineffectual. There is no estoppel on that matter between the present parties, and the question there decided would have to be reconsidered in this case. But it seems to me immaterial whether the ship was insured or not, whether validly abandoned or not. In any case, if she was so damaged by the perils insured against that a prudent owner would not repair her, her owners were rendered practically unable to enforce the charter-party against De Mattos, and so there would be a total loss of the chartered freight, actual or constructive. Now there was a damage or loss to such an extent. But the ship though so injured remained a ship, and could have been repaired so as to earn the freight, though at a loss. The loss of the ship, therefore, though total, was what is called constructive, an unfortunate expression, but one for which I know no substitute. It was actually a total loss, the materials of the ship remaining in the form of a ship. In such a case if the materials cannot be kept together as a ship at an expense less than their value as a ship when so kept, plus their value as materials not so kept together, the vessel is totally lost, or rather the loss of the vessel is total. One might put a case where the loss was greater where the vessel held together, than where it fell to pieces; as where a vessel went on shore and broke to pieces without damage to the materials, the ship breaker's labour would be less than if the materials remained together in the form of a ship. These are very trite and obvious remarks, but I hope as this case has been discussed as one almost depending on first principles, that they may be forgiven, as it is very desirable in such a discussion to keep elementary matters clearly in view. Whether this should be called an actual or constructive total loss seems to me very doubtful. I incline to think it was an actual total loss of the freight by a constructive total loss of the ship. The damage or loss to a ship may be absolutely or necessarily total, as where it is burned or sunk to a hopeless depth. It may be total where it remains in specie afloat or ashore. In that case it is so, or not, at the option of the assured. He may, if he thinks fit, treat the loss as partial, and repair her. It is obvious that except in cases of valued policies the question is comparatively unimportant. In the case of a valued policy the question may be much more important. But in both sorts of policies where the ship remains in specie, afloat or ashore, though the loss is really total, though she is practically lost as a ship, and what remains is the materials of a ship fastened together in the form of a ship, the option is with the assured to keep his ship or his salvage, and claim for a partial loss, or to claim for a total loss, giving up his interest in the ship or its materials to the underwriters. This is abandonment. It always supposes there is something to abandon, something to cede. If the ship is burned, or sunk to a hopeless depth, there is nothing to abandon. So if she is dashed to pieces on the shore there is no ship to abandon; by the destruction of the ship the loss of the ship is total, and the pieces as a consequence belong to the underwriter. What would be the law in the supposable case of the ship being rebuilt of the old materials, to whom she would belong, and what consequences would follow as to other matters, it is not necessary to consider. It is enough to say that where the thing exists, as it is called, in specie, in such condition as to be capable of utilisation as the thing insured, the assured to claim for a total loss must abandon; where it does not so exist he need not. Surely this is equally true of goods and of every other subject of insurance. Now here there was absolutely nothing to abandon. To hold that it was necessary to abandon, or to give notice of abandonment, would be to hold, not that it was necessary to do, but to say, something. For let what might be said, nothing would thereby be done, no possible effect could follow. I cannot find the notice of abandonment in the case, and I can hardly think what words could be used. If they were that all right to the freight was abandoned they were idle words, for there was no such right, no right at all. It is suggested that the underwriters might have chartered a ship and proposed to De Mattos to let them bring home the cargo. But the power to do this, and the possibility of their doing it, would not be anything, nor the consequence of anything abandoned to them. It would not be a right at all, much less a right acquired by abandonment. It might equally be done by them though there was no abandonment. But this is the utmost that can be suggested; as there was nothing to be done, as nothing could be abandoned, nothing, no right, I think it was not and could not be necessary for the assured to say they abandoned, nor consequently to give any notice thereof. I beg to refer to the judgments of Cockburn, C.J. and Lush, J. on this point, to which I cannot profitably add.

RANKIN AND OTHERS v. POTTER AND OTHERS.

But it is argued that though no notice of abandonment may have been necessary, or possible, yet that the assured ought to have given notice that they elected to treat the loss as total. That is, that they elected not to repair the ship, and so qualify themselves to enforce the charter against De Mattos. I may observe in passing that I could not find as a fact, acting as jurymen, that they could have repaired the ship in time for it to be ready for the adventure for which De Mattos agreed to find the cargo, and indeed, as the case stands, I should think he might have refused on the ground that the ship was a year overdue. But on the question of giving notice of their election, if they were bound to do so, it must be by virtue of some general rule of law, or some rule of insurance law, some implied part of the contract of insurance. I know of no such rule, either of the general or particular law. I know of no rule which compels a person, having an option, to give notice which way he exercises it, where the position of the other party would not be affected by the giving or withholding of notice, when his conduct would not be regulated thereby. On this point I refer to the judgment of Lush, J.

The opinions in favour of the defendants seem to me to be influenced by a fallacy, which may be thus expressed. The plaintiffs, it is argued, are prosecuting the voyage or adventure till they give notice of abandonment of the ship; therefore they are prosecuting what would give them a right to the freight; therefore there could not be a total loss of freight at that time; and that time was long after the damage, and therefore the total loss was not then actual. In a sense this is true. But as soon as the ship is abandoned there is a total loss of freight, or rather that which was doubtful when the damage happened is by the abandonment of the ship ascertained to be a total loss of the freight. Suppose instead of abandonment, and instead of destruction by the cyclone, the assured had themselves broken up the ship at Calcutta, would not the loss of freight then have been total? No doubt the cause of action would have accrued when the damage happened at New Zealand, and from that date the statute of limitations would run; but the character of the loss would be doubtful till the owners of the ship elected to treat the loss of ship as total. Suppose this had been a case of a sub-charter, viz., that the owner had chartered to the assured, who had sub-chartered to De Mattos. Whether in such case there would be a total loss of the sub-chartered freight would depend on whether the shipowner elected to treat the loss of the ship as total. So here, though the owners and the persons with whom De Mattos made his charter are the same, yet it is on their election as owners to treat the ship as totally lost or not that their total loss of freight as letters of the ship to charter depends. They fill two characters, owners and parties to the charter; on their election in the former character depends their loss in the latter. With great respect this seems to me the answer to the argument in the judgment of the Common Pleas. I think their judgment for the defendants arises from not adverting to this consideration. No doubt had the owner repaired the ship the loss of freight would not have been total, supposing the repairs in time for the voyage for which De Mattos undertook to find a cargo, which, if it were in controversy, I could not find in the plaintiff's favour. True it is also that for a long time the plaintiffs thought they could and would repair, but when they found out they practically could not, and so would not, the loss of the freight, till then in doubt, became certain and fixed. On these grounds I think no notice of abandoning of the freight was necessary.

On the question of whether if notice of abandonment was necessary it was given in time, I feel this difficulty. Thinking none necessary, I am yet to say when it ought to have been given—whether the assured used due diligence in the performance of a duty which did not exist? I come to the conclusion that if it was necessary to give it, it was not given in time. I agree with the reasoning of Willes, J., on this. It is a rule that where a man is put on informing himself, he is in the same position as though he had notice. I think that what had happened was enough to make the assured bound to inform themselves as to the extent of the damage. I think their delay in doing so was unreasonable, bearing in mind that the stay in New Zealand was attributable, in part at least, to their own misconduct in breaking the law.

Further, I incline to think the question raised by Willes, J., should be answered unfavourably to the assured. I think that (as a matter of fact, not as a matter of law) the vessel should have been taken to Sydney to be examined: (See Gernon v. Royal Exchange Assurance Company, 6 Taunt. 383.) On this part of the case I feel great doubt, arising from the complication of the facts and the conflict of opinions. Dealing generally with the case, I cannot but think that much of the difficulty has arisen from the unusual nature of the policy and the peculiar circumstances of the loss, the delay, the insolvency of the charterer, and the subsequent destruction by the cyclone. For suppose the ship safe and arrived at Calcutta, the charterer ready to load, a policy on the freight extending to perils at and from Calcutta, and the day before the loading began the ship driven ashore by a storm, and so damaged as certainly and obviously not worth repair, in short, a constructive total loss, would abandonment then have been necessary, and of what? There would have been, could have been, nothing to abandon. But that case does not in substance differ from the present. Suppose that instead of the vessel proceeding to Calcutta her state had been known in New Zealand, and that she was not worth repair, and suppose there had been no insurance on ship, but her owners had kept her there existing in form as a ship, but used as a coal hulk only, would there not have been a total loss of this freight, and would notice of abandonment have been necessary? It seems to me clearly not.

I answer your Lordships' questions as follows: To the first, yes; the second, no; the third, no; the fourth, no; the fifth, no; the sixth, for the respondents.

MARTIN, B.—My Lords: I assure your Lordships if I had merely consulted my own feeling I would rather not have delivered my opinion upon this case; but having read very carefully the judgments delivered in the Court of Common Pleas and in the Exchequer Chamber, and having arrived at the conclusion that the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas and that of my brother Cleasby in the Exchequer Chamber are right, I think it my duty to state the reasons which have led me to that conclusion, especially as your Lordships will find yourselves obliged in determining this case to decide what is the effect of a constructive total loss of ship upon an insurance on freight. Under these circumstances your Lordships will excuse me for bringing before you my view, and the more so as it is not exactly that either of my brother Cleasby or of the Court of Common Pleas.

This is an action upon a policy of insurance on freight, and the main question arises upon a novel state of facts. Nothing similar, so far as I know, has been the subject of decision in a court of law. A ship called the Sir William Eyre had sailed from the Clyde on a voyage to New Zealand, to deliver cargo and passengers at two places, viz., Southland and Otago. After she had sailed a charter-party was executed on behalf of the plaintiffs, who were mortgagees in possession and a Mr. De Mattos whereby it was agreed that the ship after having discharged her cargo at New Zealand should proceed to Calcutta, and there load from the agents of De Mattos a full cargo of merchandise for England for freight, 4*l.* per ton. It was also provided that the ship should be consigned to De Mattos' agents at Calcutta. On the 16th Feb. 1863, a few days after the date of the charter-party, the policy now sued upon was effected. It is in the common printed form. The risk was "lost or not lost, at and from the Clyde to Southland, whilst there, and thence to Otago, and for thirty days in port there after arrival." The subject insured was "4000*l.* homeward chartered freight." The freight was to be earned on the voyage from Calcutta to England. The perils insured against were to be incurred on the voyage from the Clyde to Otago, and thirty days after arrival. The plaintiffs to succeed must therefore establish that the freight from Calcutta to England was lost by a peril which occurred on or before the 5th Aug. 1863, when the last of the thirty days expired, and their contention is that the facts stated in the special case do so. The material ones are these: The ship arrived at Southland on the 23rd April 1863, and remained there until the 1st July. Whilst there she sustained very considerable damage. Upon the 4th July she arrived at Otago, and there discharged the remainder of her cargo. Whilst there she was surveyed, but there was no dry dock, and the extent of damage could not be ascertained. And I think it must be taken that the master acted bonâ fide, and believed that with some temporary repairs the ship would be capable of proceeding in ballast to Calcutta, and there made fit to carry the chartered cargo to England and earn the freight. The temporary repairs were not commenced until Feb.

1864, and the ship remained at Otago (Port Chalmers) until the 14th April. The cause of the delay is thus stated in the 14th paragraph of the case: "The Sir William Eyre remained at Port Chalmers until 14th April 1864, being prevented solely by want of funds from making the necessary preparation to proceed to Calcutta; the master had not sufficient funds to defray the ship's charges and disbursements, and the liabilities which she had incurred in New Zealand, and not being able to raise such funds in New Zealand, nor Messrs. Dalgetty, to whom the ship was consigned at Otago, being willing to advance him the money he required for the purposes aforesaid, he was obliged to wait until he had obtained a sufficient remittance from the plaintiffs." Whilst the ship was there the master, in order that she might not be wholly unproductive, used her to store coal, and earned upwards of 700*l.* for storage rent. On the 14th April she sailed for Calcutta, and arrived there on the 7th June. The master immediately went to the agents of De Mattos, and applied to them to carry out the charter. A copy of it had several months before been forwarded to them, but De Mattos had become insolvent in the December previous, and they had provided no cargo, and absolutely refused to provide any, or to have anything to do with the ship. The ship was afterwards put into a dry dock and surveyed. On the 2nd Aug., upon the receipt in the United Kingdom of the survey, dated 8th June, the plaintiffs gave notice of abandonment of the ship to the underwriters on ship, and of freight to the defendants, the underwriters on the freight. Neither were accepted. The ship in her damaged state was of the value of 3000*l.* On 8th Oct. the ship was stranded in a cyclone and became a wreck. Paragraph 24 of the case is as follows:— "It is admitted that the sea damage which the ship sustained at New Zealand during the time covered by the policy was such as would have justified an abandonment, and claim for a constructive total loss." There are some other statements in the case, but the above are the material ones.

Upon these facts it was contended, first, that there was a loss of the freight insured by perils of the sea at New Zealand, by reason of the damage sustained at Southland before the expiration of the thirty days. This contention I think cannot be sustained. The loss of the ship no doubt causes a loss of freight, but there are two kinds of losses of ship, actual and constructive, and so long as a ship exists in specie, and retains the character of a ship, and is dealt with as such, and is capable of being repaired, there is no actual loss; there may be the elements of an inchoate constructive total loss, but to make such a loss of ship there must be an abandonment: Knight v. Faith (ubi sup.) The only case referred to in the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber upon this point was Roux v. Salvador (ubi sup.) But it seems to me to have no bearing upon it. It was an insurance on hides from Valparaiso to Bordeaux. The ship sprang a leak, and put into Rio; the hides were found there to be in an incipient state of putrefaction, and it was certain that if they had been sent on to Bordeaux they would have lost the character of hides and become a mass of putrefaction before their arrival. The master of the ship sold them at Rio, and it was held to be not an average but a total loss, with benefit of salvage. I do not see how this case bears upon the present. The ship after the expiration of the thirty days existed in specie, was treated and dealt with as a ship, performed a two months' voyage from New Zealand to Calcutta without apparently exhibiting any symptom of weakness or damage, and was tendered by the master to De Mattos' agents there as a ship capable of being repaired and earning the insured freight, and was of the value of 3000*l.* Under such circumstances I think there could not be a loss of freight by perils of the sea until the plaintiffs had elected not to repair the ship, and not prosecute the voyage from Calcutta.

Secondly, it was contended that there was a constructive total loss of the ship by the abandonment to the underwriters of the ship on the 2nd August. The Court of Common Pleas, in Potter v. Campbell (ubi sup.), and which was an action upon a policy on the ship, adjudged that the abandonment was not in time, and that there was not a constructive total loss of ship. I think this judgment right, and I understand all my learned brethren are of the same opinion. I also agree with them that the constructive total loss of ship and the validity of the abandonment is not the test of the defendant's liability, and that the question is the same as if there had been no insurance on the ship at all. The main and substantial question is, was the freight from Calcutta lost to the plaintiffs by perils of the sea? In my opinion this is to be determined by the state of facts existing at the time the plaintiffs elected not to repair and prosecute the voyage from Calcutta to England, and is in a great measure, if not entirely, a question of fact. When the policy was effected the subject insured was freight expected to be earned, and if the ship had been sunk or wrecked before the expiration of the thirty days (the 5th Aug. 1863), the defendants would have been liable, for the expected freight would have been lost proximately, indeed directly, by a peril of the sea. But the ship arrived at Calcutta, and assuming the liability of the defendants to be then continuing, it seems to me that the ordinary rule as to insurance on freight applies, viz., there must have been cargo at Calcutta in order to earn it; if there were no cargo, it might be that the plaintiffs might have had a cause of action against De Mattos for not providing it; but unless there were cargo the freight insured was lost to the plaintiffs, not by the peril of the sea, but by default of De Mattos. The ship arrived at Calcutta on the 7th June, and was immediately tendered to De Mattos' agent, under the provision in the charter-party; but De Mattos had become insolvent in December previous, and the agent declared that he had no cargo for the ship, and would provide none, and did provide none. Therefore before the extent of damage was ascertained, and the election not to repair made, the earning of the freight had become hopeless, indeed impossible, and was in reality and truth lost to the plaintiffs by a cause wholly beside, and independent of, the perils of the sea. It seems to me a crucial test that if the ship had sustained no damage, and had arrived at Calcutta perfectly sound and seaworthy, the freight would have been equally lost to the plaintiffs. In my opinion the utmost that can be said is, that, if De Mattos had been willing to provide the cargo, and had had it to provide, there would have been a loss of the freight by reason of the damage to the ship at New Zealand. But this hypothetical loss is not a loss by perils of the sea for which underwriters are liable. It is a well-established and settled rule that the underwriter is liable for no loss which is not proximately caused by the perils insured against. The maxim, "Causa proxima non remota spectatur," is a fundamental principle of insurance law. The rule laid down by Lord Ellenborough in Forbes v. Aspinall (13 East. 324) is, "that it is incumbent upon the assured, in order to recover on a policy on freight, to prove that unless the perils insured against had intervened the freight would have been earned." The facts stated in the special case disprove this, indeed prove the contrary. It has hitherto been assumed that De Mattos was bound to supply a cargo at Calcutta; but it is quite clear that he was not, and that he was discharged from this obligation by the delay at New Zealand. In any action brought against him it would have been a material and traversable averment, that the ship had sailed and proceeded from New Zealand to Calcutta in a reasonable time, and this the delay at New Zealand would have disproved. De Mattos was in no way responsible for or concerned with this delay, and its existence would have been an answer to the action against him. In my opinion, therefore, the freight was not lost by perils of the sea; the proximate and direct cause of its loss was the non-existence of cargo and to bring the perils of the sea to bear upon it, two things must have existed which do not: one that De Mattos was willing to provide cargo, although he was under no legal obligation to do so; the other, that he had had it to provide. For these reasons I think the underwriters are not liable.

But a much more important question remains behind, viz., the application of the principle of constructive total loss of ship to insurance on freight. No case has been cited, and I believe none exists, in which this has hitherto been done. The doctrine as regards ship was conclusively established by this House in 1847, in the case Irving v. Manning (1 H. of L. Cas. 287). But it must be admitted by its warmest admirers, that its application coupled with valued policies has in many instances enabled shipowners to obtain, and compelled underwriters to pay, double the value of ships which the owners were desirous to get rid of. For the purpose of this question, it may be assumed that De Mattos had provided a cargo, and was ready and willing to load it. There are several definitions of constructive total loss, but that given by Tindal, C.J. in Roux v. Salvador is generally adopted, "that where the damage to the ship is so great from the perils insured against, that the owner cannot put her in a state of repair necessary for pursuing the voyage insured, except at an expense greater than the value of the ship (when repaired), he is not bound to incur the expense, but is at liberty to abandon and treat the loss as a total loss, and recover the whole amount." A constructive total loss of ship can therefore only be upon condition that the assured abandon the ship. Abandonment is of the essence of it, it is a different thing altogether from total loss with benefit of salvage, of which Roux v. Salvador is an instance. The word "abandoned" is one in ordinary and common use, and in its natural sense well understood; but there is not a word in the English language used in a more highly artificial and technical sense than the word "abandon" in reference to constructive total loss; it is defined to be a cession or transfer of the ship from the owner to the underwriter, and of all his property and interest in it, with all the claims that may arise from its ownership, and all the profits that may arise from it, including the freight then being earned. Its operation is as effectually to transfer the property of the ship to the underwriter as a sale for valuable consideration, so that of necessity it vests in the underwriter a chattel of more or less value, as the case may be. In the numerous discussions which preceded the final establishment of the doctrine of constructive total loss, nothing was more strenuously urged in favour of it than that by abandonment the underwriter became the absolute owner of the ship, a thing of value, capable of being repaired and earning freight, if the abandonee thought fit. A constructive total loss is grounded upon a calculation. In the present case the calculation would be: present value of the ship 3000*l.*, expense of repairs 7500*l.*, total 10,500*l.*; against value of ship when repaired 5264*l.*, freight, which if repaired she would have earned, say 3500*l.*, total 8764*l.*. The valued freight was 4000*l.*. It would, therefore, be for the pecuniary interest of an uninsured owner of ship not to repair, and if insured to abandon the ship and claim for a total loss; but against this the underwriter would have the ship of the value of 3000*l.*

The present question is, in such case can the freight be truly said to be lost by perils of the sea? The assured has made a calculation upon certain items, one of which is this very freight, and satisfied himself that it is for his pecuniary interest to sacrifice it and make no attempt to earn it, and has by his own voluntary act transferred the ship, by which alone it could be earned, to a third person, and thus deprived himself of the possibility of earning it. The freight is lost, remotely it may be, in consequence of sea damage, or in other words the perils of the sea, but directly and proximately by the voluntary act of the assured himself. The perils of the sea may be the "sine quâ non," but certainly they are not the "causa causans." Suppose the underwriter thought fit to repair the ship and earn the freight, as he had a right to do, the underwriter on freight would be free, the event would have happened the not happening of which by reason of certain perils creates his liability. And can it be that the right of the assured and the liability of the underwriter on freight depend upon the conduct of a third person, a stranger to both, and over whom neither of them has any control? But the point seems to me decided by the cases of McCarthy v. Abel (5 East, 383) and The Scottish Insurance Company v. Turner, in this House (ubi sup.). In McCarthy v. Abel an insurance had been effected on homeward freight from Riga. The greater part of the cargo had been loaded, but on the 7th Nov. 1800, the ship was seized under a Russian embargo. On receipt of the intelligence, the assured gave notice of abandonment to the underwriters on ship and on freight, he having effected separate insurances with different sets of underwriters. The embargo was taken off in May 1801, and the ship arrived safely and earned her freight. This freight belonged to the underwriter on ship by reason of the abandonment, and the assured brought an action against the underwriter on freight as for a total loss. The court held it could not be recovered. Lord Ellenborough said it could not, for two reasons. First, that there had been no loss of freight at all, as in the event the freight had been earned; second, that if it could be considered in any other sense lost to the assured, it had become so by his own act in abandoning the ship to the underwriter thereon, with which, and its consequences, the underwriter on freight had nothing to do. The principle of the second reason of this judgment seems to me directly against the plaintiffs' contention in the present case. I will hereafter refer to The Scottish Insurance Company v. Turner; for my own part I am at a loss to see why, if the contract of insurance of freight in the present case was of any value, it did not pass to the underwriter on ship by the abandonment, so that the plaintiffs' interest in it was at an end before action brought; and it is not alleged that the action was brought or is now maintained for the benefit of the underwriter on ship.

RANKIN AND OTHERS v. POTTER AND OTHERS.

But, secondly, suppose the ship was not insured upon the above calculation, it would have been for the pecuniary interest of the plaintiffs not to repair and to abandon the charter-party and the voyage to England. He would then have the ship of the value of 3000*l.* Can it be that he can realise this and at the same time compel the defendants to pay him the freight as if the ship had become an actual wreck at New Zealand? There would be no obligation upon the plaintiffs to sell the ship or break her up, and if after they had received the sum claimed (4000*l.*) they thought fit to repair her, there would then be a ship sailing the sea, and earning freight, which had by construction of law been totally lost. Nor is there any reason why, by application of the same principle, she might not be totally lost half a dozen times over with the same result.

But it is said the plaintiffs have abandoned the freight. It is true that in one sense they have abandoned it, they have thrown up the adventure, and if there was anything to earn have, so far as in them lay, deprived the defendants of the possibility of its being earned. But they have made no abandonment in the sense of transferring to the defendants a thing of value, anything which might go in part to indemnify them against the payment of the loss. The abandonment was a mockery, there was nothing to abandon, not even a right of action against De Mattos for not loading the ship. It is an abuse of language to call this an abandonment of freight in the sense and meaning of the word in reference to a constructive total loss.

In the case The Scottish Insurance Company v. Turner, there were separate insurances on ship and freight. The ship sustained such damage as to justify an abandonment, but it was not known until the arrival of the ship with her cargo at the port of discharge. The plaintiff then abandoned to both sets of underwriters. The underwriters on ship seem to have accepted the abandonment, and became entitled to the freight. The plaintiff then brought an action against the underwriters on freight, and claimed a total loss. He contended (the precise contention of the plaintiffs here) that the real cause of the loss to him was the perils insured against, that the abandonment of the ship was a legal and proper act superinduced by these perils; that it made no difference to him that the freight was earned by the master of the ship, who became agent to the underwriters on ship by the abandonment, as it was lost to him. The Court of Session in Scotland held him entitled to recover, but your Lordships reversed the judgment, and held that the freight was lost to the plaintiff by his own election in abandoning to the underwriters on the ship, and not by the perils which caused or led to that election. This appears to strike at the root of the argument on behalf of the plaintiff, that the freight was lost by the damage sustained at New Zealand. It was said this case did not govern the present, because the abandonment was after the freight was earned. I do not see how this affects the principle of the judgment. But in the case of McCarthy v. Abel the abandonment was before the freight was earned.

I think these cases have a distinct bearing upon the present question. The plaintiffs could have repaired the ship, but for their own pecuniary interest elected not to do so, and abandoned her. The present question is, did they thereby secure to themselves the sum insured on freight as if the ship had gone to the bottom at New Zealand, or did they discharge the underwriters on freight. There is a further subordinate point, viz., that the defendants were discharged by the delay at Otago. I have already said that in my opinion De Mattos was thereby discharged from the obligation to load the ship. He was entitled to have the ship dispatched from New Zealand in a reasonable time, and he was neither directly nor indirectly concerned with the want of funds wherewith to repair her between July 1863 and February 1864. She was used for a very considerable time as a store ship, a purpose quite beside and foreign to, indeed inconsistent with, the due prosecution of the voyage contemplated by the charter and the policy of insurance. The time is not stated, but it must have been considerable, as the storage rent amounted to between seven and eight hundred pounds. Looking at the time actually occupied by the repairs and by the voyage to Calcutta, the ship ought to have been there in October or November 1863, and no one can tell what would have been the consequence if she had arrived before De Mattos's failure, and had found a cargo awaiting her by the carriage of which she would have earned a good freight. It might have materially affected the judgment of the plaintiffs as to repairing. It may be said that the occasion of the delay was the perils insured against, and had there been no damage there would have been no delay. But the underwriters on freight were under no obligation to make these repairs, or provide funds for the purpose. The delay for the time necessary to make them was excusable; but the delay from July to February consequent upon the misunderstanding between the plaintiffs and their agents at Otago as to advances seems to me to be the misfortune of the plaintiffs, and one with which the defendants are in no way connected. I agree with the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas, that great and substantial delay is attributable to the plaintiffs in keeping the ship at Otago, and is traceable to causes for which they and the master were alone answerable, and not to sea perils. The question is, does this delay discharge the defendants? The case of Movnt v. Larkin (8 Bing. 822) and the judgment of Chief Justice Tindal were much relied on. He says, "The voyage in the commencement or prosecution of which any unreasonable delay takes place becomes a voyage at a different period of the year, at a more advanced age of the ship, and in short a different voyage from that prosecuted with reasonable and ordinary diligence; the risk is altered from that which was intended when the policy was effected." Besides this, it seems to me that persons who carry on the business of underwriting have a right to have the voyage insured prosecuted with due and reasonable dispatch, in order that their risk may be determined within a reasonable time. There can be no doubt as to the delay. The question is, do the facts stated in the 14th paragraph of the special case excuse it as between the plaintiffs and the underwriters on the freight? I think they do not. The law and all the cases on the subject will be found in Mr. Arnould's books, p. 383.

The result is that in my opinion there are only two ways by which the plaintiffs below can establish a case against the defendants. One is, that the sea damage at New Zealand, being such as would have justified an abandonment and a claim for a constructive total loss of ship, was a loss of the freight by perils of the sea at New Zealand, and entitled the plaintiffs to maintain an action upon a writ sued out immediately after this damage occurred. This I think not sustainable, and that until the plaintiffs elected not to repair and not to prosecute the voyage from Calcutta, there was not a loss of the freight by perils of the sea in any sense. The other is, that all the circumstances of the case, including the election not to repair and the abandonment of the ship and freight in August 1864, constituted a loss of the freight by perils of the sea. I have already stated at length why I think they do not. It may suffice to state here that one of these circumstances, viz., that no cargo ever existed whereby freight could be earned, created the real and actual loss of freight before the election not to repair and the abandonment were made, and that this, and not a peril of the sea, was the direct and proximate cause of the loss of freight to the plaintiffs. The liability of the underwriters is upon a written contract; if the contract be that they shall pay 4000*l.* if the ship should sustain damage from the perils insured against on the voyage from the Clyde to New Zealand and the thirty days there, to such an extent that a prudent uninsured owner would not have repaired her, or in other words be a wager policy that such damage should not occur, the underwriters are liable. On the other hand, if the contract be one of indemnity, and if it be essential for the plaintiffs to show that the freight insured was lost to them by reason of such damage, the underwriters are not liable, for as a matter of fact it is established beyond doubt or controversy that the freight, and all remedy in respect to it, was lost to the plaintiffs by the insolvency of De Mattos and its consequences, and the unjustifiable detention and delay of the ship at New Zealand. The facts stand in the following order: First, policy on freight; secondly, damage to ship capable of being repaired, but to such an extent as to make repair not prudent for shipowner; thirdly, failure of charterer to provide cargo wherewith to earn the freight; fourthly, election not to repair. The question is, are the underwriters on the freight liable under these circumstances? I think they are not.

I answer your Lordships' first question, that there was not a loss by the perils insured against during the term of the policy. I answer the second, that notice of abandonment either of ship or freight was not necessary in one sense of the word "abandonment;" but notice of the election of the assured not to repair, and to give up and abandon the voyage, was, under the circumstances, necessary to enable the assured to maintain an action against the underwriters. I answer the third question, that if notice of abandonment was necessary it was not given in time. I answer the fourth question, that the notice of abandonment of ship does not, as such, affect the right of the plaintiffs upon the policy on freight. I answer the fifth question, that there was such conduct on the part of the assured as discharged the underwriters from their liability upon the policy on freight. I answer the sixth question, that judgment ought to be given for the appellants.

May 5.—LORD CHELMSFORD.—My Lords, this is a case of some novelty, and, from the difference of opinion which has existed upon it amongst the judges, must be regarded as not entirely free from difficulty. [His Lordship stated the facts and history of the case.] Upon this appeal from the Court of Exchequer Chamber, the questions raised were, first, whether there was an actual total loss of the chartered freight by perils insured against during the term of the policy? Secondly, whether notice of abandonment, either of ship or freight, or both, was necessary to enable the plaintiffs to recover for a total loss on the policy on freight? Thirdly, if notice of abandonment was necessary, whether the notice was given in time? And, fourthly, whether the conduct of the plaintiffs, the owners of the ship, after the time of the injury sustained by her in New Zealand, was such as to discharge the underwriters from their liability upon the policy on freight?

First, upon the question as to the loss of freight, it is necessary to bear in mind the exact nature of the insurance. The freight insured is chartered freight upon a cargo to be loaded on board the Sir William Eyre at Calcutta and to be conveyed to Liverpool or London. The voyage insured is a voyage "at and from Clyde to Southland, while there, and thence to Otago, New Zealand, and for thirty days in port there after arrival." In other words, it is an insurance that the assured shall not be prevented earning the freight under the charter-party by any perils of the sea which might happen on the voyage from Clyde to Otago, and for thirty days afterwards. As this outward voyage is entirely distinct from that on which the freight was to be earned, and has no right to such freight could possibly accrue until the arrival of the Sir William Eyre at Calcutta, the loss of freight could only happen by such damage to the ship by the perils of the sea during the time covered by the policy, as would prevent the assured from earning the chartered freight on the voyage from Calcutta to England. It is admitted that the sea damage which the ship sustained at New Zealand during the time covered by the policy, was such as would have justified an abandonment, and a claim for constructive total loss. The owners might, if they pleased, have repaired the ship, and she might have been sent to Calcutta in a fit state for a voyage from thence to England. But they merely effected temporary repairs sufficient to enable the ship to reach Calcutta, and on her arrival there a survey disclosed the extensive nature of the injuries which she had sustained in New Zealand, and the consequent impossibility of her performing the homeward voyage without such an amount of repairs as would have cost more than what her value would have been when repaired. Upon this fact being ascertained, notice of abandonment was given to the underwriters, which, if sufficient, would have entitled the shipowners to recover for a total loss.

RANKIN AND OTHERS v. POTTER AND OTHERS.

Upon these facts and circumstances the first question arises; was there a total loss of freight during the period covered by the policy? In determining this question, I think it right to leave out of consideration the fact of the insolvency of De Mattos before the arrival of the ship at Calcutta, because, although one of the learned judges, whose assistance your Lordships had upon the hearing of the appeal, delivered an opinion that "the freight was not lost by perils of the sea, but that the proximate and direct cause of the loss, was the non-existence of the cargo," it appears to me that this is not a correct view of the case. Between the underwriters and the assured on freight the question is, whether the ship had sustained such damage in New Zealand as to prevent her arriving at Calcutta in such a state of unseaworthiness as would enable her to be tendered to the charterer as being "tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage" to England. Upon this question it is obviously immaterial whether a cargo would have been provided at Calcutta or not. The loss for which the underwriters are liable, if at all, cannot depend upon such a contingency, and if it could, it must be observed that their liability attached long before the insolvency of De Mattos, which happened in Dec. 1863, months after the ship had sustained the sea damage for which the claim upon the underwriters is made. In the arguments the counsel for the appellant complicated the question by introducing the consideration of the conduct of the plaintiffs with reference to the policy on the ship as bearing upon their rights under the policy on freight. It appears to me that this cannot properly be done in this case, where the injury to the ship was practically not reparable. The contracts are entirely independent of each other, and between different parties. The rights and liabilities ought to be determined without reference to what may have been done, or omitted to be done, by the assured on a policy on the ship upon which his rights under that policy may depend. A plain and clear view upon the facts and circumstances of the case can only be obtained by removing the policy on the ship out of the way, and looking at the case as if there were no other policy in existence but that upon freight. Under this policy it seems to me that the only question is whether by the perils of the sea the ship was so damaged at New Zealand during the term of the policy as to be rendered incapable, unless sufficiently repaired, of performing the voyage from Calcutta to England, for which she was chartered. Upon that subject, it appears from the admission, to which I have already adverted, that the sea damage was such as would have justified an abandonment and claim for a constructive total loss. By this, I understand that the amount of damage was such that a prudent uninsured owner would not have incurred the expense of repairing the ship. And this appears clearly from a further admission, stated in the report of this case in the Court of Common Pleas, viz., that the cost of repairing the vessel at Calcutta so as to make her seaworthy for carrying a cargo to England, would have exceeded the value of the ship when repaired, plus the difference between the chartered freight and the current freight, which would amount to about 450*l*. No prudent man would in such a state of things incur the expense of repairing the ship, and the shipowners, electing not to repair, were entitled to consider the charter at an end, and the chartered freight as totally lost by a peril of the sea.

Secondly: The next question to be considered is, whether the assured can recover against the underwriters without a notice of abandonment. The counsel for the appellants argued that by the law of marine insurance a notice of abandonment is in every case required, just as by the law merchant notice of dishonour is upon bills of exchange. The rule as to abandonment appears to be that which is referred to by Mr. Justice Blackburn, as contained in Mr. Phillips's Book on Insurance, sect. 1491, where he says, "an abandonment being a transfer, it can be requisite only where there is some assignable transferable subject on which it can operate. Where nothing remains to be assigned or transferred, an abandonment is useless and unnecessary." It must be observed that "abandonment" and "notice of abandonment" are two distinct and separate things, though they are frequently confounded together in expression. Where a notice of abandonment is given it is conclusive proof that the assured intends to claim from the underwriters for a total loss, and then the assured must, as Lord Cottenham said in Stewart v. Greenock Marine Insurance Company (2 H. of L. Cas. 183), "give up to the underwriters all the remains of the property recovered, together with all the benefit and advantage belonging to or incidental to it, or rather (he adds) such property belongs to the underwriter." But although an abandonment or cession must be the necessary result of every claim for a total loss, it does not follow that notice of this abandonment must always be given to the underwriters before a total loss can be claimed. It was argued at the bar, on the authority of Knight v. Faith (15 Q. B. 649), that in every case where the subject-matter insured exist in specie, though in a damaged state, a notice of abandonment is necessary to entitle the assured to make a claim as if it had been actually destroyed. This was the opinion expressed by Lord Campbell in delivering the judgment of the court in that case. The necessity for notice of abandonment was not considered upon the first argument, but the court desired to hear the case further argued on the question, whether, under the circumstances of the case, the plaintiffs could claim for a total loss without given notice of abandonment. It seems to have been quite unnecessary for the determination of the case to introduce this question, because the circumstances were such that the assured could not have been entitled to recover for a total loss if he had given the most timely and sufficient notice of abandonment. Lord Campbell had before this, in the case of Fleming v. Smith (1 H. of L. Cas. 535), stated the rule as to notice of abandonment in the same unqualified terms, saying, "According to all the old authorities a constructive total loss can only entitle the owners to recover as for an actual total loss by a notice of abandonment." It had previously been decided by the Court of Exchequer Chamber in the case of Roux v. Salvador (3 Bing. N. C. 266), that notice of abandonment was unnecessary where it could be of no use to the underwriters, who, in that case, if they had received notice of the loss, could not have exercised any control over the goods insured, nor by any interference have altered the consequences. The case was an action upon a policy of insurance of hides from Valparaiso to Bordeaux. On the voyage the hides were found to be in a state of putridity occasioned by a leak in the ship and they were sold for a fourth of their value at Rio Janeiro. The assured received the news of the damage to the hides and of their sale at the same time. The Court of Common Pleas (1 Bing. N. C. 526) gave judgment for the defendant, the underwriter, on the ground that the assured could not recover as for a total loss without a notice of abandonment. But this judgment was reversed in the Court of Exchequer Chamber, and Lord Abinger, in a very elaborate and carefully considered judgment, laid down the principle, as to notice of abandonment when an assured claims for a total loss and part of the subject insured exists in specie, that notice is only necessary where upon receiving it the underwriters could do something in the exercise of their rights over the salvage. In that case, the assured receiving the news of the damage to the hides and of the sale of them at the same time, notice of abandonment to the underwriters would have been altogether idle and useless. In Farnworth v. Hyde (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 187, 429; 15 L. T. Rep. N. S. 395; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 204), under similar circumstances of the loss of the ship insured and of her sale having reached the assured at the same time, it was held that the underwriters were liable for a total loss without notice of abandonment. This seems to place the rule as to notice of abandonment on a reasonable foundation. No prejudice can possibly arise to the underwriters from withholding a notice where it is wholly out of their power to take any steps to improve or alter their position. Upon this ground, therefore, I am of opinion that there was no necessity for the assured in this case to give a notice of abandonment of the chartered freight to the underwriters. Willes, J., in delivering judgment in the Court of Common Pleas, apparently adopting the rule as laid down in Knight v. Faith (ubi sup.), said (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 126; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 573; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 712): "The general rule of insurance law applies—that where the thing insured subsists in specie (and here the thing insured, viz., the chance of earning the freight, did survive the risk), and can be restored, though at an improvident expense, in order to make a total loss there must be an abandonment." But I am at a loss to understand what chance of earning the freight can be said to have existed after the ship Sir William Eyre mentioned in the charter-party, had sustained such sea damage as would render her incapable of performing the voyage by which the freight was to be earned, and had become at the election of the owners a total loss. The underwriters could not have substituted any other ship and tendered her to the charterer in performance of the charter-party on the owners' part. It was suggested in argument that the underwriters on freight, if they had had timely notice of abandonment, might have arranged with the underwriters on ship to repair the ship at their joint expense and have sent her on to Calcutta and tendered her to De Mattos in fulfilment of the owners' contract. But this is the suggestion of a mere possibility and contains in it nothing practical, nor can it reasonably be taken into account in judging of the rights and liabilities of the parties. I have no difficulty in coming to the conclusion that there was no necessity for any notice of abandonment of the chartered freight to the underwriters on freight.

Thirdly, this being my opinion, it appears to me to be wholly unnecessary to consider whether the notice of abandonment that was given, was given in time. The rule is, that where notice of abandonment is necessary it must be given within a reasonable time after information of the damage which has occurred to the subject of insurance. Whether sufficient notice was given depends upon the facts of each particular case, and the decision of one case, therefore, can be no guide or authority upon any other. I must, therefore, decline to express any opinion with which of the learned judges I should be disposed to agree upon this question.

Fourthly, there only remains to consider the question whether the conduct of the owners of the ship after the damage she sustained was such as to discharge the underwriters on freight. Upon this I have already incidentally made some observations. It is unnecessary to examine in detail the various acts by which it was contended that the owners had elected to retain the ship, and to come upon the underwriters merely for a partial loss. I think that they had precluded themselves by dealing as they did with the ship, and also by delaying so long their claim for a total loss. But I do not see how the conduct of the shipowners, however it may affect their rights under one contract, can have any influence upon a separate and independent contract. If the sea damage which the ship sustained in New Zealand was such as to reduce her to a state which rendered her utterly incapable of performing the voyage to England without an expense which no prudent uninsured owner would incur, then the freight was totally lost from that moment, and how the owners chose to deal with the disabled ship afterwards was wholly immaterial. If the damage to the ship had been such that it might have been repaired at a reasonable expense, and put into a condition to earn the freight, and the shipowners had declined to take that course, they would have lost the freight, not by the perils of the sea, but by their election. But the damage being such as to render the repair of the ship practically impossible, the question between the assured and the underwriters on freight, must be regarded as if there were no policy on the ship; and then it becomes the simple consideration whether the freight was not totally lost by perils of the sea, by what must be regarded in relation to it, as the total destruction of the ship by which it was to be earned.

I think that the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber ought to be affirmed.

Lord COLONSAY.—My Lords, this case appears to be attended with a great deal of nicety. It is novel, too in its circumstances. Indeed the policy here is peculiar, and the consequence has been that there has been a great deal of difference of opinion among the judges, and a great expenditure of ability and ingenuity in discussing the question. It appears to me that a good deal of that has been expended in consequence of mixing up things which are substantially separate. I think that there are two questions, or rather perhaps only one, namely, whether the freight was lost by the perils of the sea insured against, and I think that that question must be considered altogether separate from the question of an insurance by other parties upon the ship.

RANKIN AND OTHERS v. POTTER AND OTHERS.

Now, notwithstanding that one of the learned judges, of whose assistance we have had the benefit, and for whose opinion I entertain the highest respect, has expressed the opinion that the loss was not caused by the perils insured against, but by the inability of De Mattos to furnish a cargo, I am compelled to differ from him. It appears to me that upon the admission contained in the case before us, we are bound to hold that the condition of things, within the period to which the insurance applied was such that the vessel was in a condition in which an abandonment might have been made as for what is called a constructive total loss, that is to say, that she was in such a condition as not to be worth repairing. If that be so, I think that the liability then attached, and that the risk having been incurred, and the peril having been sustained, and the vessel having been rendered incapable of earning the freight by reason of the damage done at sea, or in port, within the period insured against, that terminated the question. No doubt it was not then ascertained what the damage was, but it was afterwards ascertained that that damage was sustained within that period, and that must be treated as an admission in the case. Now I do not see how the matter of De Mattos having failed in the month of December, and having been unable to supply a cargo, or having declined to supply a cargo, is a matter which can be said to be the cause of the loss of freight. Something was said about remote and proximate causes, and these are matters which are very apt to lead us into philosophical mazes, but I think it is very clear that before De Mattos failed, the ability to earn the freight was gone by reason of the perils insured against having happened, and that appears to me to be sufficient. De Mattos was under no obligation, it is said, to furnish a cargo, because of the delay of the owners of the vessel to tender the vessel. I think De Mattos was under no obligation to furnish a cargo, unless there was presented to him a vessel fit and sufficient to carry that cargo to England, and that was the failure that occurred. There was no vessel fit and sufficient to carry the cargo to Britain presented to De Mattos, and that was a state of matters that occurred before the vessel arrived at Calcutta.

The only other question is the question as to the notice of abandonment. I think that throughout this matter we must consider this case as if there had been no insurance on the ship. If there had been no insurance upon the ship, what would have been the object of the notice of abandonment, or what was to be gained by such notice being given? I do not see, after what had occurred, what the underwriters on the freight could have done. The vessel was not fit to be repaired. They could not have compelled the owners to repair her when she was not worth it. What was to be gained, then, by the notice of abandonment being given? It is true that there was a puzzle raised by some of the judges as to who would have been the party entitled to the freight and, therefore, the party entitled to the insurance on the freight, if the vessel had been timeously abandoned, and had been repaired, and freight had been earned. But, my Lords, I do not think there is any real puzzle in the case at all. At all events, it is clear that if the freight had been earned, there would have been no loss of freight, and a different condition of affairs would have arisen. The question as to the right to demand the insurance if the vessel had been lost is a different question altogether. The only party who had a right to demand the insurance is the party who effected it, and, if there had been no insurance upon the vessel, that right would equally have existed with regard to the freight. I therefore think that there is really no substantial ground for this question as to the notice of abandonment, and, until there is more decided authority adduced upon the subject, I am not prepared to receive the doctrine that notice of abandonment in a matter of this kind stands upon the same mercantile footing as a notice of dishonour of bills of exchange. The reason of the thing, in my apprehension, is against that doctrine being applied. I think the reason of the thing tells us that, where there is nothing substantially to abandon to the party to whom the notice of abandonment is given, and he could gain nothing by it, it is not necessary to give that notice. Therefore, I think that all that puzzle, which has arisen from the circumstance of there being an insurance upon the vessel, is quite out of the question when you come to consider purely the liability of the underwriters upon the freight. In this case it appears that there was no timeous notice of abandonment, or no notice of abandonment at all according to a judgment elsewhere, and therefore in that view also the question would not arise. But I think that the real question is, whether the right to freight was lost by the perils of the sea during the period embraced in the policy of insurance. I think it was, and I think the liability attached, and I see nothing afterwards to relieve the parties from that liability.

LORD HATHERLEY.—My Lords, the case is really now brought simply to this. The owner of a ship under a certain charter-party arranges that this vessel, being about to proceed to New Zealand, shall, after her voyage thither, and after a certain delay there, proceed to Calcutta and take on board a cargo from one De Mattos, he having in the first instance entered into that undertaking with him. When she arrives at Calcutta she is to be tendered to De Mattos for the purpose of receiving the cargo to be so provided, and she must then be in a condition sufficiently staunch, tight, and strong for the purpose of her voyage from Calcutta to England, or rather Great Britain, in order to earn the freight that will then be due from De Mattos in respect of his having so conveyed his goods. This being the entire course of the vessel's proceeding, the owner is minded to insure himself against the perils of the sea in two respects, first, as regards the vessel, and secondly, as regards the freight to be carried between Calcutta and England. I mention this because there can be no reasonable doubt (indeed the learned judges said they hardly thought it right to consider the question as it was not raised) that however peculiar the form of this policy may be (and it is of a somewhat unusual form), there is nothing to prevent any person, during the whole course of the voyage, insuring the freight against the perils of the sea during any part of that voyage, whether the perils of the sea may occur during that part of the voyage as to which the ship is insured, or whether the chance of loss against which insurance is effected may be the chance of her being so damaged in the anterior part of the voyage as not to be able to fulfil the subsequent part of her voyage (in respect of which part of the voyage itself she is not insured), and in consequence of being unable to fulfil the subsequent part of the voyage, she cannot earn the freight which is insured. I think one of the learned judges, who has given a very valuable and able judgment in this case, though I do not agree with him, Baron Martin, seems to have thrown out some slight doubt as to whether or not the mode of effecting this policy was one that could be sustained. But he dwelt but lightly upon that point, and I need say no more upon it, because no authority was cited for saying that the insurance which was effected was in any way contrary to the law of insurance.

RANKIN AND OTHERS v. POTTER AND OTHERS.

The insurance effected was simply this. The vessel is to proceed to New Zealand. During the whole period of her voyage thither and of her stay there for thirty days, she is not, says the policy, to be injured or damaged by perils of the sea to such an extent as to prevent her from being staunch, tight, and strong enough on her arrival at Calcutta to take the expected cargo to England. That is the undertaking which is given by the policy, and that is the risk which is insured against. It is clear and plain from the admissions in this case and the evidence that has been given, that she was injured during the period insured against—that is to say, she was injured just about the time of her arrival in New Zealand, and while she was in the neighbourhood of Bluff Harbour. She was injured to such an extent that, although at Bluff Harbour it could not be ascertained what the extent of the injury was, and although at Dunedin a certain amount of repair was effected which enabled the vessel to proceed to Calcutta, she was not staunch, tight, and strong enough for the voyage to England when she arrived at Calcutta, and her being in that condition was wholly due to the injuries she had sustained during the insured period. It is further admitted in the case that the injury was of such a character that no prudent owner would have repaired her for the benefit of the contract which had been entered into as to freight, because, in order to make these repairs, it would have been necessary to expend more than the whole value of the ship; in other words, when it was ascertained what the extent of the injury was, it was found that she was in such a condition that, had the owners been minded to abandon her at the time when the injuries were sustained to those who had taken the policy on the ship (and who must be distinguished from those who had taken the policy on the freight which is now before us), they would have been justified in so doing.

As between the owners and those who insured the ship itself there must arise a question, and indeed there did arise a question, which was determined, I think, in the action against Campbell, as to whether or not they had given timely notice of the abandonment of the vessel to those who had insured her, or whether by their conduct in delaying her voyage to Calcutta for a very considerable time, by their employing the ship in the mean time to a certain extent as a store-house for coals, and by taking other steps which occasioned great and possibly unnecessary delays in New Zealand, before giving notice of abandonment, they had put themselves into such a position as respected those who had insured the vessel as to have lost their right of abandonment. But that appears to me, I confess, as it seems to have done to your Lordships who have preceded me, to be entirely immaterial as regards the question before us in respect to the insurance on the freight. When the vessel arrived at Calcutta it appears to me that there was (and this was somewhat relied on), in the first instance, an actual tender of the vessel to De Mattos and those who represented him, but it was found that De Mattos had become insolvent, and those who represented him, viz., the assignees of De Mattos, declined to furnish any cargo. All this took place before there had been a thorough examination of the amount of injury in Calcutta. When a thorough examination took place afterwards the result was, what I have described, that no prudent owner would have thought of putting her into a condition to continue her voyage to Great Britain. That being so, it appears that every element of the contract with the underwriters on the freight is brought out in a clear and distinct light, showing that the liability of the underwriters on the freight had actually accrued, unless indeed the question that has been raised with respect to the notice of abandonment as applying to the insurance of the freight should prevail with your Lordships. The ship was undoubtedly insured during the period when the injury was sustained. The ship undoubtedly, in consequence of that injury, was unable to perform the voyage, and could not, therefore, be tendered in the condition in which she ought to have been tendered to De Mattos, and therefore the freight was lost in consequence of that injury. I will postpone for the moment the consideration of the question of De Mattos' insolvency. Putting the question aside as to how far De Mattos' insolvency may be regarded as the proximate cause of the loss of freight rather than the damage sustained by the ship in the anterior part of the voyage, there comes the question, was it, or was it not, necessary to give notice of abandonment in this case, and, if necessary, was the notice given in time?

As regards the necessity for giving notice of abandonment, I think that is the point that was most vigorously pressed upon us by the counsel for the appellant, who relied upon some dicta of Lord Campbell on the subject, and contended strongly that it was necessary in all cases whatsoever of claims upon underwriters as for a total loss upon a policy for the owners to give notice to the underwriters of abandonment of the thing insured, and whether in truth any advantage could possibly be made of that notice of abandonment or not. It was put upon this ground, that it was rather for the underwriters to say in their judgment what advantage they might be able to derive from that notice of abandonment so given in regard to their position in their policy. I apprehend, my Lords, that certainly no authority has been cited to show that this notice of abandonment is to be considered necessary in a case where no such advantage could possibly accrue to the underwriters. If the vessel be not really wholly lost, if it be only a constructive total loss, as it is termed (though that is perhaps not a very happy phrase), occasioned by the impossibility of effecting repairs, the cost of which will not exceed the whole value of the ship when repaired, then, there being something in esse to be handed over to the underwriters, it is necessary that they should be informed of this, in order that they may have an opportunity of making the best use they can of what remains, of that which the owners give up in electing to make a total loss of that which in fact is not a total loss, there being something in the nature of salvage, or fragment, or wreck, or something of that kind, which may be of value to the underwriters, although not of any to the owners. But in this case there is nothing suggested, and nothing can be suggested (except one single point which I will notice in a moment), as to any advantage that could have been derived by the underwriters from any such notice of a constructive total loss being given to them on the part of those who had insured. The only exception is that it is suggested that they might have said, "True it is we insured that this freight should be earned, and certainly that earning depended upon the arrival of the ship at Calcutta in a condition to earn it; she did not arrive at Calcutta in a condition to earn it, and it would have been folly to have expended money in repairing the ship, which would have exceeded the value of the ship when repaired; but if you had told us that you were about to claim as for a total loss in respect of this freight, we should have been in this position—we should have found that you had insured the vessel, and the underwriters on the vessel would have been in an equally disadvantageous plight with ourselves, having a heavy demand upon them in respect of their insurance, and we two together might have been minded to make such an arrangement each with the other, that, regard being had to what we each should have had to pay on our respective insurances, it might have been worth our while to put the vessel into a state to earn the freight." Those who had insured the freight could not tender any other vessel; so that that question does not arise in the peculiar insurance before us, because it was an insurance of freight to be earned by the Sir William Eyre, and by no other vessel. De Mattos, of course, might have refused any other vessel than that. It could not, therefore, be earned by tendering any other vessel. It is supposed that if the underwriter on the freight had had timely notice, they might have made such an arrangement with the underwriters on the hull of the vessel herself as would have saved a total loss accruing. I apprehend, my Lords, that that is much too remote a contingency to render it necessary for the insured to give the insurers notice of abandonment upon the principle which I have before referred to, viz., of their being able to save something out of the wreck. It is not necessary to illustrate that, but it might be shown in a variety of ways how such a doctrine as that would carry the necessity of notice to the remotest extent in respect of bargains which might be made by persons who might or might not be interested at the moment in the ship, such as persons who might purchase the damaged vessel, or the wreck or the like. Numerous arrangements might be made of that kind which would create, I apprehend, far too remote an interest to be considered upon a question as to the law requiring notice of abandonment to be given. The whole principle of the notice of abandonment is that you are to place the underwriters in such a position that they shall have all the advantages you now possess in respect of the vessel, supposing that they can make those advantages available for the purpose of effectuating a salvage of some portion of that which has been lost in consequence of the perils which they have insured you against.

RANKIN AND OTHERS v. POTTER AND OTHERS.

Now, my Lords, with regard to the observations made by Martin, B., that the loss really was not a loss by perils of the sea, but was due to the insolvency of De Mattos, I think there is a clear fallacy in that view in two points, the first of which has been noticed by my noble and learned friend who first stated his views upon this appeal; it is, that the loss accrued before the insolvency of De Mattos occurred. The loss accrued when the accident happened in which the damage occurred at Bluff Harbour, and that was some time before the insolvency of De Mattos took place. But I do not think it necessary to rest upon that. I apprehend that it is not a thing which would absolve the underwriters from the liability for the loss, which undoubtedly accrued on account of the ship not being fit for the voyage. There is nothing to absolve them from the liability to pay the insurance in the circumstance of the insolvency of De Mattos, who in the chapter of accidents might have become solvent and won wealth again before the necessity arose for the vessel completing her voyage. But the point that has to be looked at is this: Were the owners in a position to enforce their rights against De Mattos, whatever they may have been; were they in a position, by tendering the vessel to him, either to insist upon his paying the freight then and there, or to insist upon such rights as might accrue to them by action in respect of his non-performance of the contract; or were they disabled from occupying that position by the consequences resulting from the perils of the sea which arose at Bluff Harbour, preventing them from fulfilling their part of the contract with De Mattos, by tendering to him a ship staunch, tight, and strong, for carrying his goods to Great Britain? If that be the case, of course it is clearly and distinctly within the terms of the policy, and, that being so, it seems to me clear that the underwriters must be liable unless this one point, which was strongly insisted on, of want of timely notice of abandonment, precluded their liability. I think your Lordships are all agreed that such notice was unnecessary, and therefore it is not necessary to consider the question as to the time at which such notice was given.

Therefore, my Lords, upon all the points, I think that the appellants have failed, and consequently the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

Judgment affirmed.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Reported by H. F. POOLEY and JOHN ROSE, Esqrs.,
Barristers-at-Law.

Jan. 22 and July 7, 1873.

CATOR v. THE GREAT WESTERN INSURANCE COMPANY.

Marine insurance—Chests of tea—Damage to some by sea water—Injury to others by suspicion of buyers that the whole cargo was affected—Divisibility of damage.

By a marine policy on 1711 packages of tea, valued at a certain sum, and part of a general cargo, they were insured against the usual risks, "and all other losses and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the said goods and merchandise, or any part thereof, occasioned by sea perils." . . . "Warranted by the assured free from damage or injury from dampness, change of flavour, or being spotted, discoloured, musty or mouldy, except caused by actual contact of sea water with the articles damaged occasioned by sea perils. In case of partial loss by sea damage to dry goods, cutlery, or other hardware, the loss shall be ascertained by a separation and sale of the portion only of the contents of the packages so damaged, and not otherwise, and the same practice shall obtain as to all other merchandise as far as practicable." The vessel carrying the tea met with bad weather, and shipped much sea water, by which 449 packages of this tea, which were stowed in different parts of the ship, were greatly damaged by contact with sea water; the remainder, viz., 1262, arrived in perfectly sound condition, and unharmed but, from the injury to their reputation from having formed part of a shipment of which 449 packages had been damaged by sea water, sold for a less sum than they would otherwise have realised.

Held, that for the purpose of assessing the damage the packages were divisible; that the underwriters were only liable for the deterioration in value of such of the chests, viz., 449, as had been in fact harmed by sea water; and that the injury to the reputation of the others from the suspicion of buyers was not a loss covered by the policy.

This was an action upon a marine policy tried before Bovill, C.J., at Guildhall, 7th July, 1873, when his Lordship directed a verdict for the defendants, with leave to the plaintiff to move to enter the verdict for such sum as the court might direct, and a rule was afterwards obtained pursuant to the leave reserved.

The material clauses of the policy, and the pleadings and facts, were stated in the written judgment of the court as follows:—

"The policy in this case was expressed to be 'on 1711 packages of teas,' by the Eurydice, at and from New York to London, valued at the sum insured, viz., 31,000 dols., and after enumerating the usual perils covered by the insurance, contained the words, 'and all other losses and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage, of the said goods and merchandises, or any part thereof, occasioned by sea perils.' There was a special warranty in the following terms: 'Warranted by the assured free from damage or injury from dampness, change of flavour, or being spotted, discoloured, musty, or mouldy, except caused by actual contact of sea water with the articles damaged occasioned by sea perils. In case of partial loss by sea damage to dry goods, cutlery, or other hardware, the loss shall be ascertained by a separation and sale of the portion only of the contents of the packages so damaged, and not otherwise, and the same practice shall obtain as to all other merchandise as far as practicable. The term 'dry goods,' it was agreed in the argument, would not include or apply to tea. There were also special warranties against partial loss or particular average under 5 per cent., and other special warranties against average as to different goods, unless general or over a certain rate per cent., and then came the following clause: 'On risks from China each ten packages of silk or other dry goods in the order of invoice subject to separate averages. Each interest of 5000dols. insured value or less, subject to separate average. If over 8000dols. value, each of the following kinds of teas, Imperial gunpowder, Hyson, Hysor skin, young Hyson, and black teas, and each 5000dols., value thereof, in the order of invoice, subject to separate average, and the different excesses over 5000dols. subject to average, if the damage amount to 250dols.' The declaration averred that the goods were damaged, and injured, and lost by the perils insured against. This tea formed a portion only of the cargo of the Eurydice, which loaded as a general ship. In the course of the voyage the vessel met with bad weather and shipped large quantities of sea water by which various portions of the cargo were damaged, and amongst others 449 packages of this tea which were stowed in different parts of the ship were greatly injured by contact with the sea water; the remainder of the teas, viz., 1262 packages arrived in a perfectly sound and good condition, and uninjured except by the injury to their reputation from having formed part of a shipment of which 449 packages had been damaged by sea water. The full amount of the damage to the 449 packages was paid into court. The shipment consisted of several different kinds of tea, each of which was distinguished as a chop of a certain name and mark, and all the chests were numbered consecutively. There were altogether ten different chops, and which at the sale were divided into thirty-five breaks. The 449 packages that were damaged by sea water were portions of different chops and formed parts of the series of consecutive numbers on the chests. When teas are sold they are usually sold in the order of the consecutive numbers marked on the packages, and if the numbers be broken by some being omitted, or if some of the chests are marked as damaged, a suspicion is created that the other packages may be affected, and those other packages, though perfectly sound and uninjured, do not realise so high prices as they would have done if none of the packages had been damaged. In the present instance the teas were sold in the usual way, but in consequence of the suspicion created by the damage to so large a number as 449 packages, and the prejudice arising from that circumstance to the rest of the teas, the 1262 sound chests did not fetch so much as they would have done if the 449 had not been damaged by sea water, and the difference in price upon the 1262 chests from this cause amounted to a very considerable sum, which was to be settled by an arbitrator if necessary. The plaintiffs sought to recover the same as a loss which was caused by the perils insured against, and contended that the whole shipment was to be considered and treated as one entire subject matter. The defendants, on the other hand, contended that they were liable only for such of the packages, viz, the 449, as were, in fact, damaged by sea perils; that for the purpose of ascertaining such damage the packages must be considered as divisible, and that injury to the reputation of the teas from suspicion only, when the teas were in fact sound and had not been injured, was not a matter covered by policy."

There were other questions raised at the trial, which are embodied in the above statement, but which, from the findings of the jury became now immaterial. The court were to draw such inferences of fact as the jury should have drawn.

C. Russell, Q.C., Benjamin, Q.C., and Cohen, for the defendants, showed cause.—The insurance was certainly of the whole 1711 packages, valued at the sum insured, and not on each chest, but the damage must be taken separately. First, on the construction of the policy it excludes the damage for which the plaintiff now seeks to make the underwriters liable, and restricts the claim to loss occasioned by sea perils in consequence of the direct contact of sea water with the goods insured. If damage to fifty chests were damage to the whole, there would be no sense in the warranty clause which relates to "actual contact of sea water with the articles damaged." That the damage must be that occasioned by the contact of sea water with the article so damaged is evident on the face of the clause, but if the history of the clause is considered, there can be no doubt as to the meaning. It does not appear in policies earlier than the case of Montoya v. The London Assurance Company (6 Ex. 451), where a vessel laden with hides and tobacco, in the course of her voyage, shipped large quantities of sea water. On the termination of the voyage it was discovered that the sea water had rendered the hides putrid, and that the putrefaction of the hides had imparted an ill flavour to the tobacco, and had thereby injured it. Held, that the damage thus occasioned to the tobacco was a loss by perils of the seas. The clause now in question does not appear in policies prior to that case, and was probably framed to meet it. The statement of average was drawn up as on an ordinary Lloyd's policy without this clause, for the stater had not then seen the policy. "If goods are damaged by actual contact with sea water, the underwriters are certainly liable, and it has been held that if part of the cargo is damaged by sea water, and vapour and gases arising from it injure another portion of the cargo which is insured, the underwriters on this latter portion are liable, although it was not immediately in contact with the sea water"—1 Parsons on Insurance, 546, citing Montoya v. London Assurance Company (6 Ex. 451); but the learned author adds in a note "In Baker v. Manufacturing Insurance Company (Sup. Ct. Mass., March 1., 1851; 14 Law Reporter 203), it was held that the underwriters were only liable for the damage done to those goods with which the sea water came into actual contact, although the plaintiff offered to prove that the injury was not caused by the usual dampness in a vessel's hold, but by the steam and moisture arising from goods damaged by an unusual quantity of water entering the hold in consequence of a peril of the sea. We have examined the policy in this case, and find that it did not contain the clause, now common in Boston policies, which exempts the underwriters from loss of this kind." The authorities in America uniformly show that if this clause is inserted there can be no such claim as the present. [BRETT, J.—But if this tea is one article it is damaged by sea water.] It consisted of a number of chests capable of separation, not like a machine composed of parts belonging to each other. [BRETT, J.—What would you say of grain in bulk?] That it was one article. The fact of the amount insured being one lump sum does not make it an insurance on each package, but it is an insurance on so much tea divided into individual packages. No case on insurance law can be cited in which it has been contended that a number of distinct packages must be taken as an indivisible whole like a machine, which, if damaged in part, the whole is impaired; for some chests of tea may be utterly destroyed and the rest left good. Can anybody say that the destruction of some is damage to the whole? [BRETT, J.—Yes. BOVILL, C.J.—I take an insurance on twenty horses, is damage to one damage to the whole lot?] Arnould on Marine Insurance (4th edit.), p. 830, writes: "But where several articles are insured together in the same policy, and each suffers a particular average loss by sea damage, the loss must be adjusted separately on each, even though the clause 'to pay average on each species as if separately insured' be not inserted in the policy; for otherwise the underwriters would be involved in the rise and fall of the markets, except in the very improbable case when the state of the markets at the port of arrival is alike as to all the article; i.e., when all the articles, had they arrived sound, would have realised in the port of arrival exactly the same percentage of profit and loss upon their first cost or valuation in the policy;" and in a note the learned author adds, "This is most ingeniously and incontestably proved both by Mr. Benecke and by Mr. Stevens; by the former algebraically, and by the latter arithmetically;" and the reader is referred to Benecke Pr. of Indem. 441, note, and Stevens on Average, 153—155. Mr. Arnould then proceeds in the text, "When out of whole packages or bales of manufactured goods only a few articles or pieces in each arrive sea-damaged, it is a frequent practice to sell the sound and damaged goods together at the same auction. The practice does not appear objectionable, but it must be carefully borne in mind that in adjusting the average on such a sale the diminished value at which the sound part of the package may sell, owing to the assortment being broken, is not a loss for which the underwriter is liable; for, as Mr. Stevens observed, 'he is accountable only for the actual damage done to the thing insured, and engages to guarantee the assured against the direct operation of sea damage, but not against the consequential results:'" (pp. 830—831.) [KEATING, J.—If that be law it much aids your argument.] Stevens and Benecke are referred to in support of the proposition. [BRETT, J.—But see Balli v. Janson (6 E. & B. p. 441).] "Where different articles are damaged, the loss ought to be adjusted on each separately; since otherwise the adjustment will be erroneous, unless the rate of increase or diminution of the market value at the place of adjustment is the same on all, or, which would almost never happen, unless the different rates of increase and diminution of the value of different articles exactly countervail each other in the computation," [BRETT, J.—In the United States the law, after much discussion, is the same as that laid down by the Exchequer Chamber: (see 2 Arnould, p. 906, citing Wodsworth v. Pacific Insurance Company, 4 Wendell, N. Y. R. 33.) The whole question depends on whether the insurance is on all articles as one, or on each separate package: and the conclusion seems to be that both in England and America that is the test.] That applies to the case of memorandum articles only. This system of insuring in series is for the purpose of aiding the assured. [BRETT, J.—Suppose the policy had been "on tea valued at so much," and it was packed in packages—or grain?] Grain can be shipped either in bulk or in sacks, and if the shipper chooses to send it in bulk, and it is therefore not divisible, he has himself only to blame. [BRETT, J.—Do you lay so much stress on the mere mention of the 1700 packages?] The bargain here between the assured and underwriters, is that the subject matter shall be in packages. Even a package would be divisible. If any part could have been carried to the port of destination, there would have been no total loss (Rosetto v. Gurney, 11 C. B. 176). Then if the subject matter be divisible, the proper mode of ascertaining the damage is not by selling the thing insured, but the damaged part. [BRETT, J.—How ought the damage to have been ascertained?] As if they had separated what was damaged from what was not, had sold the damaged part, had ascertained the actual loss on that part, and, having done so, they would have ascertained the loss for which the underwriters are liable, and then the percentage on the insured value of the whole. The real question is whether there is any principle which makes the subject matter of insurance indivisible for the purpose of estimating the damage. Secondly, the first branch of the warranty clause has no application, and the second clause has no direct application, and therefore the whole has no direct application. But it has a most important indirect application as tending to show whether the thing insured is, in a mercantile consideration, divisible or not. The clause says, that although damage by dampness may occur, if that dampness is not caused by sea water the underwriters are not liable—à fortiori not liable for such remote injury as damage to the reputation of the sound tea. [BRETT, J.—You say the words in the warranty alter the effect of other parts of the policy.] Yes. [BRETT, J.—Then you say that if this was a loss by perils of the sea within an ordinary policy, it is not a loss under this policy, because of the warranty in the policy, although the damage may not be within the warranty.] We do not contend that it has direct application. [BRETT, J.—A bale of cotton or chest of tea are not ejusdem generis with hardware, cutlery, &c.] In the case of a cargo of wood, if any part could be carried to the port of destination at a cost less than its value, then there would not be total loss. But one could not cut a particular log, and say "here take the sound part."

Sir John Karlake, Q.C. and Watkin Williams, supported the rule.—First, it is broadly said by defendants that this is practically an insurance on different packages of tea, because of the words of the policy. But whether for the purpose of estimating loss one package can be severed from another is a very different question from the question whether each is a separate subject matter of insurance. Suppose the insurance had been on 70,000lb. of tea contained in packages. As to whether this is a single subject matter of insurance in Ralli v. Janson (6 E. & B. 423) it was held by the Exchequer Chamber that where memorandum goods of the same species shipped in packages are insured, and it is not expressed by distinct valuation or otherwise in the policy that the packages are separately insured, the ordinary memorandum exempts the underwriters from liability for a total loss or destruction of part only (not being general average), if there be no stranding, though one or more entire package or packages be entirely destroyed, or otherwise totally lost, by the specified perils. Any buyer acquainted with the tea trade would say in the present case, "I take 1711, the whole of this number of packages; I find a certain number damaged, and you have practically damaged the value of the whole shipment by a half." The defendants say it is mere prejudice to the rest. But a valuer would treat it as real depreciation amounting to the value of one-third, by a part meeting with perils of the sea (Benecke and Stevens on Average, by Phillips, 338, par. 2). It is by reason of the damage to the subject matter of insurance that the whole parcel insured has become of less value. The defendants contend that the subject-matter is divisible. No doubt it is so physically, but not commercially. This was an insurance on a parcel of tea contained in 1700 packages. Suppose an insurance on 400 clocks shipped in pieces—all the wheels in one package, all the faces in another, and so on. Could it be, contended, if the package containing all the escapements was destroyed by perils of the seas that inasmuch as the faces, &c., have a particular commercial value, the whole shipment of clocks was not damaged by perils insured against? The history of the clause in question favours the plaintiff; in Montoya's case (sup.) the hides and tobacco were included in one parcel, which is conclusive. [BRETT, J.—And were of different species: the accident happened to one, causing indirect damage to the other. The decision is in your favour.] Yes; the insertion of the word "damaged" is relied on contra, but of course that was rendered necessary by the last-mentioned case. The question is not settled in America as Mr. Benjamin contended. See per Jervis, C.J., in Ralli v. Janson (sup.), as to the law of that country. Secondly, it is a strong proposition to say that where the things insured are not dry goods, a part of the policy which refers to dry goods may be regarded. The "mouldy" clause applies only where dry goods are actually harmed in part, and separation is possible. But here it is not practicable to sever one portion from another without injury to the selling value. The tea fell in value from the time of arrival until sale. The underwriters are not, however, liable for the fall of the market, but to arrive at the sum payable the difference must be ascertained between the sound value on arrival and the damaged value on sale, for delay in sale was directly consequent on the damage.

Our. adv. vult.

July 7.—The judgment of the court (Bovill, C.J.,

C. P.]

CATOR v. THE GREAT WESTERN INSURANCE COMPANY.

Keating and Brett, JJ.) was delivered by BOVILL, C.J., who, after stating the facts and points as above, proceeded thus:—The case was argued very elaborately, and with considerable ability, but the plaintiff failed to produce any authority to show that goods which arrived perfectly sound and uninjured could be deemed to be damaged or injured by sea perils. The strongest case in his favour was Montoya v. The Royal Exchange Insurance Company (6 Ex. 451), where hides and tobacco having been insured, and shipped in the same vessel, which sustained damage, the sea water had affected the hides and caused them to ferment and decompose, and the stench which was thus created had affected the flavour, and consequently the value, of the tobacco. In that case the tobacco itself was actually injured, and the only question was whether the injury arose proximately from the sea water, and it was held that it did, and that the underwriters were therefore liable for the actual damage to the tobacco; but the present case seems to us to be distinguishable on the ground that here there was no damage whatever to the 1262 packages of tea, which arrived perfectly sound and untouched, and altogether unaffected by the sea water. The insurance is against damage to the goods, and not against loss to the assured otherwise than by reason of damage to the goods themselves. The plaintiffs, however, contended that the whole 1711 packages must be treated as one indivisible and entire subject matter, so that damage by the perils insured against to any part of them would be an injury to the whole, if it affected the value of the whole. It seems to us that this contention is not made out.

A shipment of the kind is not like an entire article, such as a machine, where one part being injured or destroyed by sea perils the machine itself becomes changed in character and value, and comparatively useless. The underwriters insure against damage to the goods by the perils insured against, but they do not, in our opinion, insure against damage by prejudice or suspicion, though such damage or suspicion be reasonable, and be general in fact in business, when there is no damage in fact to the goods themselves; and if this policy were to be so construed it would make them insurers not only against direct damage to the goods insured, but against damage to other goods in the same ship, affecting the credit and thereby the value, of the goods insured, and would create indirect and collateral and consequential liabilities from suspicion and prejudice which it would be almost impossible for the underwriters to estimate in fixing a premium proportionate to the risk.

In Duff v. Mackenzie (3 C. B., N. S., 16), it was held that, under a policy "on master's effects, valued at 100*l.*, free from all average," the insurance must be treated as divisible, and that the master might recover for a total loss of part of his effects, although the whole were included under the general term "effects." So in Wilkinson v. Hyde (3 C. B., N. S., 30), where the insurance was for 240*l.* on goods, so valued "against total loss only," the goods were considered as divisible, and the assured was held entitled to recover for a total loss of part of the goods. The case of Ralli v. Janson (6 E. & B. 446), was much relied upon by the defendants; but the decision there turned entirely upon the terms and effect of the warranty in the memorandum against average, unless general, and it was held that the memorandum was intended to include the whole of the particular species of goods, viz., seed, whether shipped in bulk or in packages, and the decision in that case does not in our opinion, govern the present case.

The insurance here is on 1711 packages, valued at one sum, and if each package had been separately enumerated, it would scarcely have made them more distinct. Even if they had been insured simply as "tea" or as "goods," if they were in fact contained in separate packages, we should still have thought that for the purposes of calculating or ascertaining the extent of the sea damage they would be divisible, and that the plaintiffs could have recovered only in respect of the damage done to those packages which were actually damaged by sea perils. The special terms of the present policy, however, seems to us to be still more favourable for the underwriters than the terms of an ordinary policy. It expressly excludes direct actual damage or injury from dampness or change of flavour, &c., unless caused by actual contact of sea water with the articles damaged, occasioned by sea perils, and it could scarcely, therefore, have been intended that the underwriters should be liable for what was not actual damage but mere suspicion, and so indirectly an injury, not to the goods but, to the pecuniary interests of the assured. After providing that in case of partial loss by sea damage to dry goods (which does not include tea, cutlery, or other hardware, the loss shall be ascertained by a separation and sale of the portion only of the contents of the packages so damaged, and not otherwise, the policy goes on to provide that the same practice shall obtain as to all other merchandise so far as practicable. These last terms would, in our opinion, include the tea in question, and tend strongly to show that the intention was that the subject matter of the insurance was not to be treated as entire and indivisible. It might well be contended that the language of the policy would seem to indicate that not only each package was to be treated separately, but that even the contents of each package might be separated, so as to confine the loss to the exact portion of tea that were actually damaged by sea perils. The defendants, however, have not relied upon this last construction of the warranty, but have paid into court the full loss upon the 449 packages without attempting to separate the contents of each of these packages.

The special average warranties at different rates on different kinds of goods, the differences of classification and average in this policy, seem also to show that it was never intended that the 1711 packages should be treated as one entire and indivisible subject matter of insurance, and, if not, then there is no practicable division of the packages, except by treating each package as a separate article. The whole shipment consisted of several different kinds or chops of tea, and could it have been successfully contended that if only half the chests in any particular chop had been damaged or lost, and the consecutive numbers of the chests in that chop thereby interfered with, that each chop could be considered as a separate subject matter of insurance, and that the plaintiffs could have recovered for the injury to the reputation, and consequent loss in price, of the rest of the chests in that chop? Or suppose the policy had been on 1711 packages of tea at one valuation "by ship or ships," and part had come in one vessel and part in another, could it have been said that sea damage to the packages in one ship, whereby the continuity of the numbers was destroyed, was an injury to the packages in another ship which sustained no damage, and yet there would be an injury by suspicion, to the reputation of the teas, by the numbers not being consecutive, and caused remotely by sea perils?

If such a claim as this could be supported, it might next be contended that the underwriters would be responsible if the reputation and value of sound teas were affected by serious damage to the ship, or to other persons' goods in the same ship which were damaged by sea-water, or for the loss of markets by delay through the perils of navigation. It appears to us that the underwriters insure against actual damage, and do not in any sense guarantee that the goods shall arrive free from suspicion of damage. In like manner a shipowner was held to guarantee only the fitness of his vessel for a cargo of tea, but not that the ship should be free from a suspicion of unfitness for such a cargo: (see Towse v. Henderson, 4 Ex. 896.)

Each package of this shipment was separate from the others as if it had contained a different article. Each might and would be subjected to different risks, according to its position and stowage in the vessel, and where the packages are severable they ought to be severed. As far as we are aware, the practice in such cases has been to separate the sound packages of goods from those which are damaged, and to allow the claim for damage upon those only which are actually damaged by the sea perils. That practice is supported by the passages that were cited from Mr. Arnould's valuable work, 3rd edit. 836, and the authorities to which he refers, and Mr. Stevens, in his book upon Average, at pp. 157 and 158, clearly considered that a consequential loss upon goods which arrived sound by reason of the breaking of an assortment, was not a loss for which underwriters were responsible, there being no actual damage done to the goods themselves. In our opinion, that is the correct view of the law.

A further point was raised by Mr. Williams at the close of the case as to the fall in the market price after the arrival of the vessel, and the valuation of the damaged teas, and before the actual sale of them, but underwriters have nothing to do with the mode or time of sale, and are not responsible for a fall in the market price; their liability depends on the value of the goods upon arrival, and the defendants have paid into court the full amount for which they are liable upon that footing.

Upon the true construction of the policy, we think the plaintiffs are entitled to recover only in respect of the 449 packages which were actually damaged, and as the amount of that damage has been paid into court, our judgment is in favour of the defendants.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ON APPEAL FROM THE HIGH COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

April 30 and May 20, 1873.

(Present: The Right Hons. Sir J. W. COLVILLE, Sir BARNES PEACOCK, Sir MONTAGUE SMITH, and Sir R. P. COLLIER.)

THE C. M. PALMER; THE LARNAX.

Collision—Principal question not decided—Court of appeal—Practice—Riding light.

Where the High Court of Admiralty has given no opinion on a question, which in the opinion of the court of appeal is a vital one in the cause, the court of appeal will decide that question on the evidence before them.

It being the duty of a vessel at anchor to carry a riding light always visible, no such excuse as that of taking the lamp down to be trimmed can be admitted, if the absence of the light brings about a collision.

THIS was an appeal from an interlocutory decree of the High Court of Admiralty in cross causes of damage instituted on behalf of the owners of the barque Larnax against the screw steamer C. M. Palmer and her owners intervening, and on behalf of the owners of the C. M. Palmer against the Larnax and her owners intervening.

The Larnax was lying at anchor about 9.30 p.m. on 19th Feb. 1873 in the river Thames, about two miles below Gravesend, and, according to the statement made on her behalf, carried a good riding light for some time before, and at the time of the collision.

The C. M. Palmer was coming down the river with her lights duly burning, but, the night being dark and hazy, her master determined to come to an anchor, and was rounding to for that purpose, and whilst doing so came into collision with the Larnax. According to the evidence produced on behalf of the C. M. Palmer, the Larnax had no light exhibited, whilst the C. M. Palmer was approaching her, but immediately before the collision a light was seen going up the rigging of the Larnax. The engines of the C. M. Palmer were stopped and reversed, and the Larnax was made out, but it was then too late to prevent the collision.

The learned judge of the Admiralty Court, acting on the advice of the Trinity Masters, by whom he was assisted, pronounced the C. M. Palmer alone to blame, on the ground that the master of the C. M. Palmer might and ought to have dropped her anchor as soon as he descried the Larnax, and gave no decision on the question of lights. No evidence has been given, nor cross-examination taken place; no argument addressed to the court on the question of the duty of the master to drop his anchor under the circumstances; but the main question to which evidence and arguments had been addressed was whether the Larnax carried her riding light.

From this decree the owners of the C. M. Palmer appealed, on the ground that the main question had not been decided, viz.; whether the Larnax carried her riding light when the C. M. Palmer was rounding to in order to anchor; that the evidence proved that the light was not up; that the omission to let go the anchor of the C.

[PRIV. CO.]

M. Palmer was not raised in any way in the court below, nor suggested until the delivery of the judgment in that court; that the letting go of an anchor was in the circumstances impossible, and that the omission to do so did not amount to legal negligence.

The facts are sufficiently set out in the judgment of the Judicial Committee.

Butt, Q.C. and Clarkson, for the appellants, submitted that the appellants were entitled to a decision on the main question at issue, and that the evidence clearly showed that there was no riding light on the Larnax till immediately before the collision, when it was too late to take any effectual steps to avoid it; that the absence of the light was the cause of the collision, and the appellants having shown that none was visible, the onus of proof that there was a light was thrown upon the respondents; that anchoring was an impossibility under the circumstances, and that to give a decision on that ground was an error on the part of the Court of Admiralty, as the point had never been so raised as to give an opportunity of discussing the evidence with respect to it.

Milward, Q.C. and R. A. Pritchard, for the respondents.—A steamship is bound to take all means to avoid a vessel at anchor, and if the court finds on the facts that such steps have not been taken, it is justified in coming to a conclusion adverse to the wrongdoer without considering other points. The C. M. Palmer could and ought to have cast anchor.

The Girolamo, 3 Hagg. Adm. Rep. 173;

The Batavier, 2 W. Rob. 407;

The Bothnia, Lush. 52.

The evidence as it stands, however, clearly shows that the Larnax carried her riding light. Even supposing the light to have been taken down previous to the collision for the purpose of being cleaned, that is a necessary operation, and if a collision occurs in consequence, it is to be treated as an inevitable accident.

Clarkson, in reply.

Our adv. vult.

May 20.—Judgment was delivered by SIR MONTAGUE SMITH.—This was a case of a very disastrous collision between a steamer and a sailing vessel, whereby three lives were lost. Cross suits were instituted in the Admiralty Court. The barque Larnax, of 380 tons, was at anchor in the lower part of Gravesend Reach on the night of the 19th Feb. in this year. The screw steamer C. M. Palmer, of 628 tons, left London that evening for Newcastle-upon-Tyne with a cargo of merchandise and a number of passengers. On reaching Gravesend her pilot left her; the night being so unusually dark that her captain thought it unsafe to proceed on her voyage, he determined to come to anchor in Gravesend Reach; and, after passing several vessels at no more speed than was necessary to keep steerage way, was in the act of turning towards the southern shore, with a view to anchoring in what he deemed a vacant place, when he struck the Larnax on the starboard side with the stem of his vessel, whereupon she sank in a few minutes.

The principal controversy in the case was whether or not the Larnax carried a riding light which could not have been seen by an approaching vessel in sufficient time before the collision to enable such vessel to get out of her way; the contention on the part of the Larnax being that she had a bright light from the time of its becoming dusk, with the exception of two or three minutes, when it had been taken down for the purpose of being trimmed, and that this was half-an-hour before the collision: that on the part of the Palmer being that the Larnax had no visible light until one was affixed to her rigging almost immediately before the collision, when the collision had become inevitable. The result of the evidence on the part of the Palmer is, in their Lordships's view, this:—That the Larnax herself was seen for the first time at a very short distance, and that when so seen no light was visible in her, and that almost immediately after a light was seen going up into her rigging. That the captain of the steamer upon a vessel a-head being reported gave the order to "stop," and almost immediately afterwards the order to reverse;" that, although the orders were obeyed, and the engines made many reverse motions, the way of the steamer could not be altogether stopped in time, and the Larnax was cut down by her sharp stem.

The learned judge has given no opinion on the question of light or no light on board the Larnax, but has decided (as their Lordships understand) that, assuming the evidence on this subject on the part of the steamer to be true, nevertheless that she was solely to blame, because her captain, in addition to the precautions of stopping and reversing, did not take the further precaution of immediately dropping his anchor on a vessel ahead being reported. Their Lordships have to observe that this point was not raised during the course of the case, no suggestion being made on the part of the Larnax, either by evidence or cross-examination, or by the speeches of counsel, that such a proceeding would have been proper on the part of the steamer. The suggestion appears to have been made for the first time by the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, when both cases had been concluded, when the steamer had no opportunity of adducing evidence of facts, or the evidence of experts, or of offering any explanation, or of being heard by counsel on the subject. To dispose of a case on such a ground appears to their Lordships unsatisfactory, and not unattended with hardship.

Their Lordships are advised by their nautical assessors that for the steamer to have dropped her anchor under the circumstance, though it might possibly have averted the collision, was a proceeding of a very doubtful and speculative character, not unattended with risk. Their Lordships are of opinion that on the assumption that the Larnax had no light when first seen, and that the captain of the steamer lost no time on her being seen in giving orders to stop and reverse, he is not proved to have been negligent, because it did not at the instant occur to him to let go his anchor. Their Lordships have further to observe that, even assuming the negligence imputed by the judgment to the captain of the steamer, the barque would in their judgment have been guilty of contributory negligence in not showing a light. It is true that the duty of vessels in motion to keep out of the way of vessels at anchor has been strongly insisted on in many cases, but these cases assume that the vessel at anchor could be seen; if the Larnax could not be seen until closely approached, through her own fault in not exhibiting a light in a night unusually dark, it is difficult to acquit her of negligence, if she is run down by a vessel unaware of her position.

For these reasons their Lordships are of opinion that, assuming the truth of the case on the part of the Palmer on the subject of the light, the judgment of the court below is incorrect. If, on the other hand, the case of the Larnax be true, it would undoubtedly be correct: the determination of this question is therefore necessary. Their Lordships are aware of the disadvantages under which they labour in determining matters of fact without an opportunity of seeing and hearing the witnesses, and they regret that they have not the assistance of the finding of the learned judge of the Admiralty Court on this question, which, in their Lordships' view, is a vital one in the cause; but they feel called upon to decide it according to the best of their ability in the somewhat unusual character of a court of first instance.

Their Lordships, not without some hesitation, have come to the conclusion that the case of the Palmer is the true one. She acted with proper caution in determining to anchor in so dark a night instead of to proceed. She was on the look-out, and (in their Lordships' judgment) keeping a proper look-out, for a safe anchoring-ground; and it appears almost incredible that she should have selected for her anchoring-place almost the spot where the Larnax was lying, if the light of the Larnax had been visible. Her evidence that the Larnax carried no light is not merely of a negative character. It is positive that just before the collision the light of the Larnax was carried or hoisted up. The evidence of the captain is that in rounding towards the Kentish shore in order to anchor, a vessel was reported by the second mate from the top-gallant fore-castle in these words, "Vessel nearly ahead with no light;" that he (the captain) saw her at the same time; then he asked the mate, "Can you make out how she is going?" whereupon the mate reported, "There is a riding light just being hoisted up." The captain says that at the same time he saw a "gleam of light" in what he took to be the barque's foredeck, which dipped once above the rail, and appeared to him to be hoisted or carried up above the rail, and a voice sang out, "Steamer ahoy, where are you coming to?"; that, on first seeing the ship, he ordered the engines to stop, and almost immediately after to be reversed, in which statement he is confirmed by the engineer. The same account substantially of what happened, and of the words spoken, is given by the first and second mates, and by two able seamen. Unless the inquiries of the captain and the replies to them are a sheer invention, it is proved that a light was being carried or hoisted up into the rigging of the Larnax almost immediately before the collision. But it is almost impossible to suppose the conversation reported a sheer invention, inasmuch as evidence was given by a passenger on board the steamer—a witness apparently unimpeachable—that he heard this very conversation, though he was not in a position to see the light. On board the Larnax two persons only were on deck; an able seaman and a boy of fourteen. They depose that, although the light had been taken down to be trimmed about half an hour before the collision, from that time until the collision it was attached to the fore-rigging, burning brightly; and they are confirmed as to the time when it was taken down by a man named M'Gregor, who was, however, below at the time of the collision. The evidence of the boy is, indeed, a good deal impeached, he having admitted on cross-examination that the light had been taken down, "just before the collision," although he afterwards explained "just" to mean about half an hour; and it being further proved that he said that the "light was taken down to be cleaned, and was in the act of being put up when the steamer came on to them." Evidence was also given of the captain having said "If it had not been for the boy, it (the accident) never would have occurred." The evidence of the witnesses on board the ship was confirmed by that of a pilot on board the Europa, a vessel lying at anchor about a quarter of a mile higher up the river than the Larnax, and which had been passed by the Palmer. The pilot says that he had watched the light of the Larnax from 10 minutes before 9 to the time of the collision, and that it was burning all the time. This is undoubtedly cogent evidence; it is subject, however, to the observation that, if the pilot had been watching the light as closely as he represents, he must have noticed its absence for at least two or three minutes when it was admittedly taken down to be cleaned. Evidence is also given of a pilot on board another vessel called the Hjalmar, anchored about a cable's length from the Larnax, of his having seen the Larnax's light a quarter of an hour before the collision; but, inasmuch as he then went below, and did not return on deck till after the collision, his evidence is of little value.

On the whole, their Lordships have come to the conclusion that the evidence preponderates on the side of the Palmer. They adopt the conclusion that the light of the Larnax was taken down to be trimmed, that it probably remained down for a longer time than is admitted by the seaman and boy who had charge of it, and that the time of its being taken down has been shifted by them from almost immediately before the collision to half an hour before it.

It is unnecessary to say that it was the bounden duty of a ship lying at anchor where the Larnax was, on so dark a night, to keep a light always visible, and that no such excuse as that of taking down the lamp to be trimmed can be admitted. They are of opinion that the Palmer, seeing no light, had reason to suppose that the ground in which she was about to anchor was unoccupied, and that the collision was caused solely by the negligence of the Larnax.

Under these circumstances they will humbly advise Her Majesty that the decrees appealed from be reversed, and the Larnax condemned in the whole of the damages, together with the costs, both in this court and in the court below.

course, luffing as close to the wind as she can without losing head way, is not a deviation within Article 18 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, such as will render her liable for a collision with another vessel, whose duty it is to keep out of her way.

Where it is the duty of a ship to keep out of the way of another, but she is unable to do so by reason of being disabled in a former collision, and the other ship, being unaware of her disabled condition, continues her course, under Article 18, a collision ensuing is the result of inevitable accident (a).

THESE were appeals from a decree of the judge of the High Court of Admiralty in cross causes of damage, instituted on behalf of the owners of the American barque Amelia, against the Russian ship Aimo, and on behalf of the owners of the Aimo against the Amelia.

The collision occurred at about a quarter before ten on the night of the 7th Oct. 1872, in the English Channel, about 22 miles S.E. of the Lizard. The wind, at the time of the collision, was S.W. and the weather hazy, with a little rain.

The Aimo was sailing close hauled by the wind, on the starboard tack, under all plain sail, heading about S.S.E., and making about five knots an hour. She had a green light exhibited on her starboard side, and a red light on her port side, and both lights were burning brightly, and a look-out was being kept.

The case on behalf of the appellants was, that whilst the Aimo was proceeding under the foregoing circumstances, the red light of the Amelia, which vessel was on the port tack, was seen at the distance of about half a mile, bearing about a point on the port bow, that the Aimo kept her course on the starboard tack, expecting the Amelia to keep out of her way, but that the Amelia, instead of doing so, came into collision with the Aimo, the starboard side of the Amelia, between her main and mizen rigging, coming into contact with the stem of the Aimo.

The appellants attributed the collision to the neglect of those on board the Amelia to keep the Amelia out of the way of the Aimo.

The case on behalf of the Amelia was, that about an hour and a quarter before the collision with the Aimo, she (the Amelia) had come into collision with a brig, about 25 miles S.E. of the Lizard, and in consequence of this collision she had lost her bowsprit, jibboom, and stem, and some of her head sails, and had received other serious injuries. She was now heading into land and looking out for the vessel with which she had been in collision, and was proceeding under foresail, lower foretop-sail, and maintopsail, maintopgallanteail, and spanker, close hauled on the port tack, and making from one to two knots an hour headway, and some considerable leeway. Her lights were duly exhibited and burning brightly, and a good look-out was being kept on board her.

(a) The point whether a ship disabled by her own default in a prior collision could set up the defence of inevitable accident was not here raised. It has been raised in a subsequent case, but not decided. It would appear to be a reasonable view that, if the second collision were directly the result of the previous collision, then the prior negligence would prevent the plea of inevitable accident; but if the second collision occurs a sufficient time after the first to have enabled the vessel to have got again to some extent under command, any collision then ensuing through inability to manœuvre properly would only be indirectly the result of the previous negligence. It is a question of some importance, and is now frequently arising in cases in the Admiralty Court.—Ed.

In these circumstances, those on board the Amelia saw the green light of the Russian ship Aimo bearing at first from three to four points on their starboard bow, and about three-quarters of a mile off. The Amelia kept her course, those on board her watching the light. The light drew nearer, and the two vessels got within about three ships' lengths of each other, and were about to pass, when those on board the Amelia observed that the Aimo had ported her helm and was coming towards them. They therefore loudly rang their ship's bell and hailed, and put their helm hard a starboard. Notwithstanding, the Aimo came with considerable force into collision with the Amelia, striking her with the stem on her starboard quarter, between the main and mizen rigging, and doing her considerable damage.

At the hearing in the Admiralty Court, the Aimo was charged with improperly changing her course by porting and improperly luffing. The question of fact mainly in dispute was, whether the vessels were green light to green light or red light to red light, the Amelia alleging the former, the Aimo the latter. The judgment of the Admiralty Court, after reviewing the facts, was as follows:—

“ Sir R. Phillimore.—The court upon the evidence has arrived at a clear conviction that the story told by the Amelia is the true story, and that the vessels were mutually visible in the first instance, green light to green light. The court is confirmed in that opinion, derived from perusal of and deliberation upon the evidence, by the strong and decided opinion of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House. Indeed, the collision, looking to the admitted facts of the case, could have happened in no other way. It was the duty, no doubt, of the port tacked vessel, under the Regulations for the Prevention of Collisions at Sea, to keep out of the way of the starboard tacked vessel, and I have to consider, therefore, having arrived at the conclusion that the vessels were mutually visible, green light to green light, and that the wind was as stated, whether the Amelia did obey the regulations in keeping on her course as near as possible to the wind. The Elder Brethren of the Trinity House assure me that she did so, that that was a practical obedience to the rule, and that without any reference to her disabled condition, or any reference to the distance at which the vessels were seen, if they were, as they agree with me in thinking they were, mutually visible green light to green light, it was her duty to keep on as she did. The question is, what caused the collision in this case? and the Trinity Masters are of opinion, and with that opinion I am inclined to agree, that it was caused by the luffing of the starboard tacked vessel. It is very true that the amount of that luffing is very doubtful—whether it was half a point or two points, or something between the two; but they are of opinion that half a point would have sufficed, considering the relative positions of these vessels, to have caused the collision. That being their opinion, I shall find the Aimo to blame; but it is not to be omitted, among the reasons which the court think it right to state, that the 12th article, which orders the port tacked vessel to keep out of the way, is mitigated and tempered (otherwise it would be fraught, in the opinion of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, and I agree with them, with great danger to navigation) by the 19th article, which provides that 'in obeying and construing these rules, due regard must be had to all dangers of navigation, and due regard must also be had to any special circumstances which may exist in any particular case, rendering a departure from the above rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger;' and I am of opinion, independently of what I have stated, that the luffing caused this collision; that it was, having regard to the special circumstances of the case, the duty of the starboard tacked vessel to have payed off a little, which would certainly, in the opinion of the Elder Brethren, have prevented the collision altogether. I have, therefore, for the reasons which I have briefly stated, arrived at the conclusion that the port tacked vessel, the Amelia, has made out her case, and that the Aimo, the starboard tacked vessel, must be pronounced to be alone to blame for this collision."

From this judgment the owners of the Aimo appealed, on the ground that there was no such improper luffing on her part as to amount to a deviation from her course, and that the Amelia was bound to have taken measures to keep out of the way.

Milward, Q.C. and Clarkson, for the appellant.—A vessel has a right to keep close-hauled, and may come as near to the wind as she can get without deviating from her course, so long as she does not lose control: (The Marmion, ante, vol. 1, p. 412; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 255). The vessel with the wind free is bound to take some means to get out of the way, and if she cannot the collision is at most the result of inevitable accident. If a ship departs from a rule, she takes upon herself the obligation of showing that she takes upon herself the obligation of showing that the course she adopts is calculated to avoid danger of collision: (The Agra and The Elizabeth Jenkins, 4 Moore P. C. C., N. S., 435; 16 L. T. Rep. N. S. 755, and 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 532.) If the Aimo had altered her course to avoid this ship, she would have taken upon herself an improper responsibility.

Butt, Q.C. and W. G. F. Phillimore, for the respondents.—The Amelia adopted the best means in her power to keep out of the way, namely, keeping her course. Her disabled condition prevented her doing otherwise. It would have been impossible for her to bear up.

May 20.—The judgment of the court was delivered by Sir R. P. COLLIER.—This was a case of collision between two sailing vessels, the Amelia, an American vessel, and the Aimo, a Russian, there being cross suits. The collision took place about twenty miles south of the Lizard, at between ten and eleven at night, in October. The wind was south-west; the Amelia was heading N.W. by W, or perhaps a point or two more to the north; the Aimo S.S.E. The Amelia was on the port tack; the Aimo on the starboard tack, close hauled. Under these circumstances, the 12th and 18th articles of the regulations applied. It was the duty of the Amelia to keep out of the way of the Aimo, of the Aimo to keep her course, subject to the qualifications of the 19th article. It appeared that the Amelia had shortly before come into collision with another vessel, whereby she had become in some measure disabled. The Amelia kept her course, starboarding her helm when the collision became imminent. The Aimo continued on her starboard tack, slightly luffing, and struck the Amelia on her starboard side, between the mizen mast and the stem. The learned judge held that the Amelia, by keeping her course, was taking the best means in her power to keep out of the way of the Aimo, and that the Aimo caused the collision by luffing, and was solely to blame. Having regard to the disabled condition of the Amelia, which, as their Lordships are advised by their Nautical Assessors, would have had great difficulty in paying off so as to pass to leeward of the Aimo, their Lordships are not prepared to differ from the finding of the learned judge that want of ordinary care and skill is not proved against her.

The question remains whether want of ordinary care and skill is proved against the Aimo. She could not know that the Amelia was disabled, and had reason to expect that the Amelia would keep out of her way; she was, according to uncontradicted evidence, close hauled to the wind; the extent to which she luffed the learned judge treats as doubtful, not appearing to consider it proved that she luffed more than half a point. It is clear that she did not luff so much as to lose her headway, for one of the witnesses for the Amelia says that, immediately before the collision her sails were full. This being so, their Lordships are of opinion that she did not deviate from her course, but that she substantially kept it, as she was required to do by the 18th rule, and their view is in accordance with that expressed in the Marmion: (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 412.) The learned judge, however, further finds that having regard to special circumstances, such as are contemplated by article 19, it was the duty of the Aimo not to have kept her course, strictly speaking, but to have somewhat changed it by paying-off a little. Considering, however, that the Aimo could not be aware that the Amelia was in a disabled condition, their Lordships are unable to find that any such special circumstances were brought to her knowledge as to fix her with negligence in not adopting this latter manœuvre, and are, therefore, on the whole of opinion that no want of ordinary care and skill is proved against her.

Under these circumstances, they are of opinion that neither vessel has made out its case against the other, and they will humbly advise Her Majesty that the decrees appealed against be reversed, and that both suits be dismissed. Neither party should have his costs, either here or in the court below.

pledging their own credit, on behalf of L. S. and Co., a firm in London, having a branch at Hong Kong. By the invoice for these goods, L. S. and Co., of Hong Kong, were to realise the goods and to transmit the proceeds to L. S. and Co., in London, for the purpose of meeting their acceptances to the appellants. The bill of lading for the goods was in the usual form, except that the words "or order, or assigns," were omitted. L. S. and Co., at Hong Kong, having received the invoice and bill of lading, indorsed the latter to the respondents, bankers at Hong Kong, as a security for payment of a loan due on a promissory note. On the arrival of the goods they were delivered to the respondents, who then gave up the bill of lading to L. S. and Co., who gave a receipt for it, engaging to pay the proceeds of the goods as collected on account of the promissory note, it being understood that the goods belonged to the respondents until such proceeds were paid. In accordance with the terms of the receipt, L. S. and Co. sold the goods, and remitted the proceeds to the respondents in part payment of the promissory note.

Held (affirming the judgment of the Supreme Court, Hong Kong), that the respondents had, under the circumstances stated, an equitable title to the goods by the indorsement and delivery to them of the bill of lading, and a legal title to the goods, the transaction amounting to an actual delivery of the goods to them.

Held further, that the mere omission of the words "or order, or assigns," in the bill of lading, did not affect the respondents with constructive notice of the trust existing under the arrangements between the appellants and L. S. and Co., and was not such an omission as ought to have excited the suspicion of the respondents, and put them on inquiry as to the said arrangements.

Semble, that in order to make bills of lading negotiable, some such words as "or order, or assigns," ought to be in them.

THIS was an appeal from the Supreme Court, Hong Kong. The facts fully appear in the judgment.

Sir R. Baggallay, Q.C. and Gardiner for the appellants.

Jackson, Q.C. and Everitt for the respondents.

Judgment was delivered by Sir ROBERT P. COLLIER.—The facts of this case, about which there is no dispute, may be very shortly stated. A firm in Manchester, Messrs. Henderson and Co., purchased a quantity of goods, pledging their own credit, on behalf of Messrs. Lyall, Still, and Co., who were a firm in London, having a branch at Hong Kong. An arrangement was entered into by the parties, which is embodied in an invoice of these goods, which is as follows: "Invoice of fifty bales, T. cloths, shipped by C. P. Henderson and Co., per Ariel, from London to Hong Kong, and consigned to Messrs. Lyall, Still, and Co., there for realisation, the proceeds to be remitted to Messrs. George Lyall and C. F. Still, London, in first class bank bills, specially to meet their acceptance of C. P. Henderson and Co.'s draft (or any renewal thereof) against the shipment, and bought for account and risk of Messrs. George Lyall and C. F. Still, London." Now, that was the arrangement entered into between the parties, and, as between the parties, their Lordships are of opinion that Messrs. Lyall, Still and Co., of Hong Kong, were under the obligation so to deal with the goods as to realise the proceeds from their sale, and to transmit those proceeds to Lyall, Still, and Co., in London, for the purpose indicated in this invoice, namely, of meeting their acceptances to Messrs. Henderson. It appears that a bill of lading was made out, which is in the usual form, with this difference, that the words "or order, or assigns" are omitted. It has been argued that, notwithstanding the omission of these words, this bill of lading was a negotiable instrument, and there is some authority at Nisi Prius for that proposition; but, undoubtedly, the general view of the mercantile world has been for some time that, in order to make bills of lading negotiable, some such words as "or order, or assigns" ought to be in them. For the purposes of this case, in the view their Lordships take, it may be assumed that this bill of lading was not a negotiable instrument. The bill of lading and the invoice were received by Messrs. Lyall, Still, and Co. at Hong Kong on the 13th Nov. 1866, and soon after, it does not precisely appear when, this bill of lading was endorsed to the defendants, who are bankers at Hong Kong. It was endorsed for this purpose: it was in order to enable Messrs. Lyall, Still, and Co., of Hong Kong, to obtain back from the defendants certain silk documents, as they are described, which were deposited with them to meet two acceptances, one for 22,000 dols. and the other for 22,500 dols. It appears that Lyall, Still, and Co. met the first bill; but when the second bill became due they borrowed a sum of money sufficient to pay it of the bankers, the defendants, on giving their promissory note dated 31st Dec. 1866, and from that time this bill of lading remained with the bankers as a security for their repayment of that loan upon their promissory note. What next occurred, which is material, is stated very fairly in the case of the appellants. They state that the ship Ariel, that is the ship carrying these goods, "arrived at Hong Kong early in January 1867, and the said fifty bales were delivered to the respondents on the 7th January 1867; the respondents handed to the said firm of Lyall, Still, and Co. the said bill of lading endorsed to the respondents as aforesaid, receiving from them a receipt as follows:—'Hong Kong, 7th Jan. 1867. Received of the Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris (Hong Kong agency) bill of lading for E. S. C. P. H. 51,100 dols., 50 bales merchandise per Ariel, valued at 7625 dols., proceeds of which we hereby engage to pay to the said bank as soon as collected on account of our promissory note for 22,500 dols., dated 21st Dec. (it should be 31st Dec.) 1866, and interest 209 dols. 59 cents. It is at the same time understood that the goods in question are stored for account and belong to the said bank until such proceeds have been paid Lyall, Still, & Co.' The case further states that in accordance with the terms of the said receipt, the said firm of Lyall, Still, and Co. sold the said 50 bales for 6837 dols. 50 cents. and remitted the proceeds of the sales of the said bales, amounting to 6837 dols. 50 cents. to the respondents, who applied the same in part satisfaction of the said promissory note for 22,500 dols."

The view of their Lordships is this, that assuming as they do, that the bill of lading was not a negotiable instrument, its endorsement and delivery to the bank gave them only an equitable right to the goods. But in their Lordships' view the transaction, which took place subsequently, amounted to a delivery of these goods to the bank after the goods had been landed and delivered in pursuance of the bill of lading, and when the bill of lading was functus officio. It appears to their Lordships that Lyall, Still, and Co. having received these goods at Hong Kong did deliver the possession of them to the bank. It is true that the bank did not take them to their own warehouses, probably because they had not warehouses convenient to hold them; and the bank did not sell them themselves, probably because it would not be in the way of their business to sell them. They employed Lyall, Still, and Co. to sell them for the bank; but, in their Lordships' opinion, in so selling them Lyall, Still, and Co. acted but as brokers to the bank; and possession was in fact delivered to the bank of the goods by Lyall, Still, and Co., after Lyall, Still, and Co. at Hong Kong had the goods in their possession, and were able so to deliver them. That being so, in their Lordships' opinion, the bank after that delivery united in themselves a legal and equitable title to the goods. If that be so, the only question which remains is, whether they had actual or constructive notice of the trust which, as between the original parties, Henderson and Co., and Lyall, Still, and Co., in their Lordships' opening existed? It is conceded that there was no actual notice. The question remains whether there was constructive notice, and it should be—in order to make out the case of the plaintiff—constructive notice at the time of the endorsement of the bill of lading. That constructive notice is attempted to be inferred in this way, and in this way only: It is said that the bill of lading was in an unusual form, omitting the words, "or order, or assigns," that the bank ought to have taken notice of the bill of lading being in that unusual form, that they ought hence to have inferred that it was probable that some such equitable arrangement existed as that which is now proved, and that they ought to have made inquiries on the subject. It does not appear why the words "or order, or assigns" were omitted. There is no evidence whatever that they were omitted intentionally with a view in any way to carry into effect the arrangement between the parties. It is admitted as a fact that Lyall, Still, and Co., at Hong Kong, when they endorsed the bill of lading to the bank, were not aware of this omission. And their Lordships think that it may be assumed, from the conduct of the bank and from other circumstances, that they did not notice it. Their Lordships are further of opinion that the omission of these words, if noticed, was not a circumstance from which the peculiar arrangements subsisting between the appellants and Lyall, Still, and Co., were necessarily to be inferred; nor even one which would necessarily excite the suspicions of a man of business of ordinary prudence, and put him on inquiry into the nature of those arrangements. They cannot, therefore, impute to the respondents, either from their failure, if they did fail, to observe the omission, or from their failure, if they did observe it, to make further inquiry into the title of Lyall, Still, and Co., what in the decided cases is sometimes called "wilful blindness," and sometimes "gross negligence." And they are of opinion that, to hold that the mere absence of these words from the bill of lading, without more, was constructive notice to the bank, would be carrying the doctrine of constructive notice further than it has ever been carried—certainly much further than it has been the tendency of the courts in recent cases to carry it. Their Lordships are, therefore, of opinion that the decision of the court below was right, and they will humbly advise Her Majesty that that decision be affirmed, and that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

PEARSON v. THE COMMERCIAL UNION ASSURANCE COMPANY.

Policy of insurance against fire—Construction—Vessel lying in docks, with liberty to go into dry dock.

Plaintiff's vessel was insured against fire by the defendants under a policy of insurance expressed to be "on the hull of the steamship Indian Empire, with her tackle, furniture, and stores on board belonging, lying in the Victoria Docks, London, with liberty to go into dry dock and light the boiler fires once or twice during the currency of the policy." There was no dry dock attached to the Victoria Docks, but there was a pontoon dock, called the Thames Graving Dock, attached to the Victoria Docks, in which repairs ordinarily executed in a dry dock could be done, but the vessel was too large to go into it. Preventive measures against fire and appliances for extinguishing it existed both in the Victoria Docks and the Thames Graving Docks. The vessel was towed from the Victoria Docks to the nearest convenient dry dock, her paddle wheels having been taken off in the Victoria Docks in order to enable her to go into the dry dock. After completing her repairs in the dry dock and coming out of it, she was taken up the river Thames to a buoy some few hundred yards above the dry dock, and there moored for ten days in order that her paddle wheels might be replaced. This was according to the ordinary course pursued by ship-builders; but the vessel might have been towed at once to the Victoria Docks, and have had her paddle wheels replaced there, though at a far greater expense. The vessel was burnt at her moorings, during the currency of the policy, and the defendants disputed their liability.

The Court of Common Pleas having given judgment for the defendants:

On appeal, held (affirming the decision below), that the ship was covered by the policy while in the dry dock, and while going to and returning therefrom, but not during the time she was moored in the river for a purpose unconnected with the transit.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for the defendants in an action upon a policy of insurance against fire. The policy was expressed to be "on the hull of the steamship Indian Empire, with her tackle, furniture, and stores belonging, lying in the Victoria Docks, London, with liberty to go into dry dock and light boiler fires once or twice during the currency of this policy;" and the currency of the policy was from

14th May 1862 to 14th Aug. 1862. The ship was lying in the Victoria Dock, to which there was no dry dock attached; there was a graving dock adjoining, in which ships were lifted by pontoons, so as to be dry, but the ship was too wide to allow her to go into the pontoons. Lungley's dry dock, about two miles distant, was the nearest dry dock that could receive the ship conveniently, and for the purpose of entering there, the lower half of her paddle wheels had to be removed. This was done in the Victoria Dock, and the ship was towed to Lungley's dock, and she was there repaired. After the repairs were completed the ship was taken to the Government buoys on the Thames off Deptford, and moored there for the purpose of replacing her paddle-wheels. The ship lay at the buoys for this purpose for ten days, and then whilst still there, was burnt at her moorings. It appears that it was usual for shipbuilders to replace paddle-wheels in the river, but that it might have been done in the Victoria Dock, although at a much greater expense. It also appeared that the appliances for extinguishing fires were much greater in the Victoria Dock than in the river.

The Court of Common Pleas held that the defendants were not liable under the policy, as it covered the risk of fire only during the time that the ship was in Victoria Dock, the dry dock, and going and returning between the two, and a delay in the river for the above purpose. The case will be found reported below, 15 C. B., N. S., 304; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 401.

Watkins Williams, Q.C. and Lanyon for the plaintiff.—The policy covered the ship in the Victoria Dock, in dry dock, and in going to and returning from the dry dock according to the usual courses. It is found to be usual to replace the paddles of large steamers in the river, therefore any delay or deviation from the direct course for that purpose was not deviation. [BLACKBURN, J.—Do the same principles apply to a fire as to a voyage policy?] Suppose, in returning, this vessel had been obstructed by some pageant on the river attracting a crowd of ships, and that she had anchored for a few hours to allow them to disperse, she would surely have still been covered by the policy. KELLY, C.B.—No doubt, if redeundo, but to stop ten days for repairs at a buoy is a different case.] Suppose she had waited outside the dock gates for a tug, the period of her stay would have been covered. The question for the jury ought to have been whether the course adopted was the usual customary one. [BLACKBURN, J.—This is not a case of deviation as on a voyage policy. If my goods are insured in a warehouse, and I take them out, they are uncovered while out; but if I bring them back again, the risk is again covered. Not so in a voyage policy, where, if the vessel is once off the voyage, the policy is at an end.] The leave to go to a dry dock covered all necessary incidents of the journey thereto. [KELLY, C.B.—Yes; but not necessarily what is usual. Many things may be usual which were never contemplated by the policy.] He cited Bouillon v. Lupton (15 C. B., N. S., 113), per Willes, J., p. 144. [BLACKBURN, J.—But that does not apply to this fire policy.]

Benjamin and Cohen for the defendants were not heard.

KELLY, C. B.—No doubt the judgment below must be affirmed. This is an insurance of a peculiar character. It is not an insurance on a voyage at all; but is against fire for a certain period of time, and while the ship shall be in a proper place or places. The insurance has reference to the place itself. It has been rightly said, nor is it denied by Mr. Watkin Williams, that there are peculiar facilities and safeguards against fire in the Victoria Docks. This is an insurance against fire in the Victoria Dock; and if the policy had stopped there, and the vessel had, for even an hour, and for a lawful purpose, and usual purposes, passed into the Thames, the insurance could not have been effective. But the policy goes further, viz., to insure the vessel against fire, not only in the Victoria Dock, but in dry dock, to which it was known she was about to go in order to make considerable repairs. If it rested there without more, it might be said that the insurance attached only while the vessel was in the Victoria Dock or dry dock; but, inasmuch as common sense and reason tell us that a vessel which is to be insured in the Victoria Dock must necessarily proceed out of it into dry dock, for considerable repairs, it is no great latitude of construction to say that the insurance for three months is to extend to the very short period of time necessary in going from one dock to another, and in returning. But there the insurance ends. Although there is no express insurance against fire while in the Thames, yet, inasmuch as it must have been contemplated by the parties that the vessel should proceed from the Victoria Dock to dry dock, then, in conformity with reason and the intention of the parties, we must say that while the vessel was going from one to the other the insurance would attach, and the underwriter be liable in case of fire under these circumstances. But here the vessel, instead of returning direct and without any unnecessary deviation from dry dock to the Victoria Dock, not only went further up the river (to which I do not attach much importance, for there might have been a temporary obstruction to the navigation, as by a crowd of other vessels for instance, rendering it necessary to get out of the way) but, instead of proceeding at once to return—the insurance being eundo, morando et redeundo,—the persons in charge go further up the river, and moor the vessel for ten days in order to reinstate the paddle wheels. Therefore they have remained for ten days in the river Thames; and if the parties had contemplated an insurance in the river Thames, they would have expressly insured her “in the Victoria Dock and dry dock, and in the river Thames,” during the period over which the policy extended. There is, however, no such insurance. There are facilities to extinguish fire in the Victoria Dock and all docks, and no such facilities existing for ships lying in the Thames. So it would be to increase the risk and insure the ship while in a place not within the policy, if we said that this insurance would attach to the vessel when moored as she was. It is said that it is usual in cases like this to act as those in charge of this ship have done. It might have been usual to effect a considerable portion of the repairs in the river Thames; but if so, the owners ought to have insured their vessel in the river just as much as in the Victoria and dry dock. A point, too, has been made about the adjoining dock but nothing turns on that. I think the parties must have intended a practicable dry dock, and I do not think they should be at liberty to go to Portsmouth or other distant locality, but that they were not necessarily limited to the immediately adjoining one. I think this was an insurance against fire in the Victoria Dock, or in any practicable dry dock to which the ship might resort to effect repairs, and in course of passage from the Victoria to the dry dock and back.

MARTIN, B.—I am quite of the same opinion. In my judgment, the doctrine of deviation has nothing to do with the case. This insurance is for a limited time on a vessel being in a certain place. Probably what happened was not in the contemplation of either party at the time of the policy being made, but we must have regard to the policy itself. [His Lordship read the clause in question.] It is a policy on the vessel being in the Victoria Dock and dry dock, and whilst going and returning to and fro.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think probably the only doubt would be as to whether the policy covered the ship during her passage from one dock to another; but I agree with this court even on that point. This, however, is really not a voyage policy at all. The vessel is covered in the Victoria dock and dry dock, and going and returning. When burnt she was lying in the river to do repairs more cheaply than in the Victoria Dock; but she was not in a place covered by the policy, and the parties should have insured her there also.

CLEASBY, B.—I am of the same opinion. If we were to give judgment upon what the parties probably contemplated, then the plaintiff might have had good ground for succeeding but for the statement of the fact which seem to show that the difficulty respecting the paddle-wheels did not become apparent until after the execution of the policy.

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Reporte by J. P. ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

July 30 and Aug. 2, 1873.

THE CITY OF BRUSSELS.

Taxation of costs—Outport charges—Agent not attorney or proctor—Revision—Separate bills of costs.

The practice, which has hitherto obtained in the High Court of Admiralty, of presenting separate bills of costs for the London proctor's own charges and for the outport or country agency charges, is now objectionable and must be discontinued for the future.

Although a proctor may employ an agent, who is not an attorney or solicitor, to act as clerk pro hac vice for the purpose of collecting evidence in a cause, &c., in the outports, and may lawfully charge for the expenses incurred in respect of such agent as agency charges made by such an agent for doing work which is essentially the work of a proctor, attorney, or solicitor, such as "taking instructions for brief and drawing the same," &c., will not be allowed upon taxation.

THIS was a motion to the court to direct the registrar to review his taxation of the plaintiff's costs in a salvage suit against the City of Brussels "by disallowing the outport charges and such portion of the town bill as relates to the work done at the outport."

A cause of salvage was instituted in the name of Henry Charles Coote, a proctor, on behalf of eighty-one of the crew of the steamship City of Paris against the steamship City of Brussels; both vessels formed part of the Inman Line, and belonging to the port of Liverpool. From affidavits filed in support of the motion it appeared that, although Mr. Coote was acting as proctor in the cause, the greater portion of the work had been actually done by a Mr. Cowl, a notary, but not a proctor, attorney, or solicitor, practising in Liverpool. Mr. Cowl had in the first instance obtained the authority of the crew of the City of Paris to institute the suit, had throughout obtained instructions from them, drawn all the necessary documents, and in fact done everything that an attorney or proctor would do in preparing a case for trial, except those things which the practice of the court required should be done by or in the name of Mr. Coote, the proctor. Mr. Cowl was not a clerk of Mr. Coote, nor expressly employed by the latter. The suit resulted in a salvage award of 600*l.* being made by the court to the plaintiffs, and subsequently the plaintiffs' proctor presented in his own name the bills of costs for taxation by the registrar.

By the practice of the Court of Admiralty it is usual in cases which originate in an outport, that is a port other than the port of London, for two bills of costs to be filed by the plaintiffs' proctor; one of his own charges for the conduct of the suit in London; the other of the charges of his agent who has conducted the suit in the outport; these two bills are separately taxed. It has been the practice of some proctors to receive instructions to institute suits from persons, not attorneys, solicitors, or proctors, at different outports, and on the suits being concluded, the proctors have brought in on taxation the charges of those persons for the work done by them in the country; and these charges have been allowed by the registrars, because they have considered the proctors as the only persons whom they could recognize, and the work done at the outport as done by a person acting as the proctor's clerk; if the proctor were compelled to proceed to the outport himself, the costs would be considerably increased. In the bills of costs presented by Mr. Coote, it did not appear that Mr. Cowl acted as clerk to Mr. Coote or as his agent. The outport bill of costs contained charges made by Mr. Cowl for attendances on the plaintiffs before action, attendances on various plaintiffs to obtain their instructions to institute the suit, preparing documents, &c., for counsel's opinion, affidavit to lead warrant, letters to the proctor and to various plaintiffs, for perusing the answers thereto, instructions for preparing petition, for settling the same, obtaining value of the salvaged ship and the names of the plaintiffs, instructions for briefs for the examination of defendants' witnesses, and for the hearing, attendances on various plaintiffs to inform them of progress of the suit, perusing prints of defendants' proofs, various affidavits, and taking copies; these charges were however disallowed by the registrar on taxation, and the amounts claimed

Millward, Q.C. (A. Cohen with him) appeared in support of the motion.—Mr. Cowl was acting as an attorney, and not as clerk to Mr. Coote, and hence came under the penal clause of the Stamp Act (33 & 34 Vict. c. 97, s. 59), which provides that if any person, directly or indirectly, acts or practises in any court as an attorney, solicitor, or proctor, without having a certificate (under sect. 62), he shall forfeit 50*l.*, and be deemed incapable of maintaining any action for the recovery of any fee or reward. Although no penalty will be pressed for, yet the practice is objectionable, and ought to be stopped by the court. It was clear that Cowl had originally instructed Mr. Coote, and was not his agent, but rather acted as an independent country attorney. The charges allowed were such as could only be made by an attorney, and having been made by Cowl ought to be disallowed.

Clarkson, contra.—The practice of allowing unqualified persons to act as agents for proctors in outports, arose out of the exclusive position of the proctors before the admission of attorneys to practise in this court, and this practice has never been objected to. Formerly the proctor was the only person recognised, and his country agent stood in the same position whether an attorney or not. Whatever the position of the agent, the costs as between party and party were allowed only to the proctor, and it could make no difference whether the work had been done by a clerk sent down to the outport by the proctor, or by some one acting at the outport on behalf of the proctor. There can be no advantage in compelling a proctor or attorney to have the whole work done by some one in his own office. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I may, perhaps, be speaking somewhat rashly, but I should say there is not. The question seems to be, whether he was acting as an agent pro hac vice. I do not suppose that Mr. Milward would contend that he might not have any number, provided they were his agents, and did not do what was substantially the duty of the proctor. It might be true enough that the complaining party in this action was not injured at all, and yet it might be that the charges he objects to might be such that the court must necessarily take cognizance of them.] The greater part of outport business necessarily comes, in the first instance, into the hands of the agent; and in this case Mr. Cowl has placed it in the proctor's hands; no costs were allowed for anything done before it was so placed. The proctor, once having the business, might have employed another person to do the work he could not do himself. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—But he draws out briefs and charges for them.] They were drawn for the proctor, and he is responsible for them; the place where they were drawn is immaterial. Mr. Cowl was clerk pro hac vice for Mr. Coote. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—If certain items in the bill are breaches of the law, can the court allow those charges, though no injury may be done?] The whole question is rather whether the proctor might employ a clerk pro hac vice. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—No; it is whether the clerk, employed pro hac vice, as a right to act as a solicitor.] Every clerk in a solicitor's office must at some time act as a solicitor. Mr. Cowl had a right to act as a salvage agent in the employ of the proctor.

Millward, in reply.—There is no question of Mr. Cowl being a clerk pro hac vice; he was acting as the attorney, and not Mr. Coote, who was rather in the position of Mr. Cowl's London agent. The case was already in the hands of Mr. Cowl before Mr. Coote had heard of it. If Mr. Cowl was only a clerk it could be proved, and this had not been done.

Cur. adv. vult.

Aug. 2.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—In this case objections have been taken to certain items allowed by the registrar in the bill of costs brought in by the proctor of the plaintiffs.

The principle upon which the objections are founded is that a person, who is not a proctor or solicitor, employed in a case of salvage as agent by the proctor at an outport has been allowed remuneration for doing work which the law does not permit to be done except by a proctor or solicitor. Two bills were delivered in by the proctor in this case, one headed, "Plaintiff's Bill," the other, "Outport Charges," but the only person who is responsible and who seeks for payment is the proctor. It is easy to see how the custom of presenting two bills arose under the old practice of the court. In my recollection all causes were conducted by affidavits, and evidence vidæ voce was never taken. It was then just as lawful to employ an unprofessional agent as a solicitor. Moreover, from the nature of these salvage suits, it was necessary to collect evidence from sailors in different outports, and an agent was almost necessarily employed for that purpose. The expenses incident to his employment were allowed on taxation, and gradually, for the sake of supposed convenience, his charge formed the subject of a separate bill, though the agent himself had no persona standi before the registrar or the court, and could obtain payment from the proctor only. This practice, however, of separate bills, is upon various grounds now objectionable, and must be discontinued for the future.

THE EUGENIE (Nos. 6491 & 6524).

The substantial question before me is, whether the proctor is to be allowed to charge in the outport charges bill for certain acts done by his agent. The charges amounted to 87*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.*, 39*l.* 2*s.* 4*d.* were allowed on taxation. No charge was allowed for acts done by the agent before the proctor appeared before the court as conducting the case. But certain acts since he so appeared have been done by the agent for which the proctor claims to be paid, that he may pay his agent for them. The acts, it is alleged, are such as the general policy of the law and several statutes enforcing that policy forbid. I am of opinion that there are in this case certain charges allowed which on the face of them do violate this policy, at the same time I wish it to be understood that I do not pronounce the employment of agents at outports in these cases unlawful, or that they may not act as clerks pro hac vice of the proctor, and be remunerated on that ground. An illustration of what I mean is afforded by the case of The Karla (Bro. & Lush. 367), in which the expenses of an agent employed to see foreign witnesses and interpret what they said, was allowed by the court. But the items which I am about to disallow challenge attention as claiming remuneration for acts done not as agent, but substantially so to speak, as proctor or solicitor.

The general charge for agency, 10*l.* 10*s.*, I think quite proper. The items which I disallow are on the fourth page. "Instructions for brief for examination of defendant's witnesses;" that seems to have been disallowed; then there follows, "Drawing same, forty-five folios, 2*l.* 2*s.*; two fair copies for counsel, 2*l.* 2*s.*; two fair copies, captain's depositions to accompany, 5*s.*" On the sixth page there is 6*s.* 8*d.* allowed for instructions; for affidavit of plaintiff and drawing the same 5*s.*; and engrossing, 2*s.* 6*d.*; and a little lower down, also drawing instructions and for engrossing; and so again a little lower down I have marked with pencil one 5*s.* and 1*s.* 6*d.*; and on the next page there is drawing instructions for affidavit to be made, 6*s.* 8*d.*; drawing same 5*s.*; engrossing, 2*s.* 6*d.*; and then these are the only considerable reductions in the case in the last page, drawing brief, 256 folios, 12*l.* 16*s.*; allowance, 7*l.* 10*s.* That I strike out; two fair copies for counsel, 8*l.* 12*s.*; 5*l.* allowed. You will see marked with pencil those which I have struck out.

The Registrar.—All the charges connected with the brief and the affidavits.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Yes. With regard to the costs, I shall not give costs in this case, I shall make no order as to costs. The practice, I must say, has been uncertain, but has rather appeared to warrant this charge, and I have no doubt that what Mr. Milward said to me was correct, that his clients were only desirous to see that the law was enforced.

THE EUGENIE (Nos. 6491 & 6524).

Bottomry—Master's wages, and disbursements—Priority—Bottomry bond held by owners of cargo. Where a master has given a bottomry bond by which he has bound ship, cargo, and freight, and himself personally for the due execution of the bond, and the proceeds of the ship and freight alone are insufficient to satisfy both the bond and the master's claim for wages and disbursements, but the proceeds of ship, cargo, and freight will cover all, the High Court of Admiralty will marshal the assets, so that the master shall be paid in priority out of ship and freight, leaving the bondholders to fall back upon the cargo for the balance of their claim; the owner of cargo cannot take themselves out of the operation of this rule by becoming holders of the bond.

The Edward Oliver (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 507) followed.

THIS was a motion on behalf of bottomry bondholders for the payment out of court of the proceeds of the French lugger Eugénie, which had been sold by order of court in a cause of bottomry (No. 6491), the proceeds whereof had been paid into the registry. The motion was opposed on behalf of the master, who had also instituted a suit (No. 6524) against the Eugénie for his wages and disbursements.

The French lugger Eugénie, bound on a voyage to Bristol with a cargo of oats consigned and belonging to Messrs. Stoate, Hosegood, and Co. of that city, was forced by stress of weather into the port of St. Malo in a damaged condition; her master, being without funds and credit, was forced to raise money upon bottomry. He borrowed the sum of 2500 francs (100*l.*), and gave in consideration thereof a bottomry bond by which he undertook to repay the said sum and maritime interest to the amount of 245 francs 75 cents (5*l.* 18*s.*) within forty-eight hours after arrival at Bristol "for the payment of which sum," according to the words of the bond, "I bind and hypothecate by custom my said vessel Eugénie, her tackle and apparel, as well as her cargo consisting of oats, and I expressly bind my person according to law;" and the bond was to be void in case of total loss by perils of the sea. The Eugénie was duly repaired by the aid of this money, and set sail for Bristol, but was again damaged by bad weather, and was compelled to put into the port of Milford, and her master, having no credit, was again compelled to raise money on bottomry. He borrowed the sum of 120*l.*, and gave in consideration thereof a bottomry bond, by which he undertook to repay the said sum together with 6l. as maritime interest two days after arrival at Bristol, and for the payment thereof he hypothecated the said vessel, her cargo and freight to the lender, and also bound himself personally for the repayment of the said sum; the bond was to be void if the vessel should be totally lost by perils of the sea. The Eugénie after being repaired sailed for and duly arrived at Bristol, but the bonds were not paid. The bonds passed from the original lenders through several hands, and were ultimately bought up by the owners of the cargo, who by indorsement became the legal holders. On May 5th, 1873, a suit of bottomry was instituted on behalf of Messrs. Stoaie, Hosegood, and Co., the legal holders of the bonds and owners of the cargo, and on June 10th, the learned judge in default of appearance pronounced for the force and validity of the bonds, and condemned the Eugénie in the amount due on the bonds with interest and costs, and ordered the vessel to be appraised and sold at Bristol.

The master of the Eugénie had been engaged as master at the rate of 112 francs 50 cents (4l. 10s.) per month, and had served as master from Sept. 11th, 1872, to June 11th, 1873, and had thus earned as wages 1012 francs 50 cents (40l. 10s.), and had also made disbursement to the amount of 4l. 10s. 8d. To recover these sums a suit of wages and disbursements was instituted in the High Court of Admiralty on June 12th, 1873, to which suit an appearance was entered by the bottomry bondholders on June 21st. The bondholders admitted the wages and disbursements to be due, and the judge ordered any questions as to the payment of any amount which might be due to the master should come before the court on motion.

The Eugénie, when sold, realised, after the expenses of the sale had been paid, the sum of 102l. 0s. 6d. which was paid into court. The cargo was in the hands of the bondholders, and no bail had been required or given for it, nor had the freight been paid into court.

Cohen, for the bondholders, moved for the payment out of court of the amount of the bond. The master claims priority for his wages, but he has bound himself personally by the bonds, and has thereby abandoned his right to priority:

The Salacia, Lush. 545; 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 440; 1

No doubt The Edward Oliver (L. Rep. 1 Adm. and Ecc. 379; 16 L. T. Rep. N.S. 575; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O.S. 507), will be relied upon for the master; but I submit that the principle of that case ought not to be extended, as it will be if the master has priority here. In that case there was a bond upon ship freight and cargo, and the master had bound himself personally; but the owners of cargo had put in bail, and hence the bondholders, being different persons, had security amply sufficient to satisfy their claim after the master had been paid. Dr. Lushington there said, "It is argued for the master that the master's lien on ship and freight for wages and disbursements in general takes precedence of a bottomry bond, and though this lien is liable to be postponed to a bottomry bond, for which the master has made himself personally liable, there is no absolute rule to that effect; that it is a rule made only for the protection of the bondholder, and consequently does not obtain where the bottomry bondholder does not need such protection. That in this instance the bottomry bonds will certainly be paid in full out of cargo, if not out of ship and freight; that the holders, therefore, have no interest in claiming to be paid out of ship and freight before the master, and that the owners of cargo have no equity to insist upon the holders of the bonds pressing their claims." On this argument the judgment proceeded, for it is further said that from the manifest wrong, which would be created if the master were paid in priority to bondholders to whom he has personally bound himself, springs "the rule by which the master's claim is liable, under these circumstances, to be postponed. But this rule frequently operates with great severity against the master, depriving him of his real remedy for recovering his wages and disbursements, and certainly ought not to be carried beyond the exigency of the case; that it ought not to be extended to circumstances where the bottomry bondholder would not be prejudiced by the master being paid before him." In this case the bondholder is also owner of the cargo, but that fact alters his position to the extent that, if he would be prejudiced by the payment of the master's wages, he ought to have priority according to the principle laid down in The Edward Oliver. The proceeds of the ship in the registry are not sufficient to satisfy the bonds without the cargo. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—If the assets of ship cargo and freight were marshalled, as in The Edward Oliver, there would be enough to pay all. Can you by having purchased the bonds get priority over the master, and so avoid the principle laid down in that case?] If the bondholders were deferred to the master, they as owners of cargo would pay his wages and would have to recover them over against the shipowner by action. Why should not the shipowner be made personally liable to the master in the first instance. The principle of The Edward Oliver ought not to be extended so as to affect owners of cargo who have not given bail. There it was really held that, inasmuch as the owners of cargo had given bail, the bondholders were secure, and the master might be paid out of ship and freight. It cannot be said that the owners of cargo are bound to pay the wages of the master. By his own act he has deprived himself of his lien as against the bondholders, and he ought not to be allowed to take anything in derogation of his act. The only right he has remaining is a personal action against the shipowners. The principle of The Edward Oliver, even if not in my favour, is wrong, being founded upon the fact that security having been given by the owners of cargo, the bondholders could proceed against the bail. Here there is no bail for the bondholders to proceed against. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—But you have got the cargo and are safe so far.] Dr. Lushington was wrong, as I submit, in taking the fact of bail having been given into consideration at all. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—But he puts the case upon the ground that the master, although contracting with the bondholders, has made no contract with the owners of cargo, and the latter cannot invoke a rule made only for the protection of bondholders.] That is a very narrow ground and ought not to be extended. Where the owners of cargo and bondholders are the same person the case is not applicable, and by purchasing the bond owners of cargo can take themselves out of the rule.

Clarkson, for the master.—The master, in giving the bond, had no interest in the money advanced. The ship, cargo, and freight are the principal, and he is only surety. Nothing goes into his pocket, and no interest passes to him. That is the principle underlying the decision in The Edward Oliver. The only distinction between the two cases is, that here the owner of cargo has bought the bond. In The Edward Oliver the owners of cargo had to pay the bond; and here also, by having bought it up, they will have paid it; practically the same thing in result. The master bound the cargo, in the exercise of his right as agent for the owners of cargo, and they cannot now come forward in their character of bondholders and refuse to allow him to recover his wages. The master's interest was never in any way involved, and he bound himself only as surety for the owner, and not personally as for his own debt.

Cohen, in reply.—If for the purposes of the ship, ship and cargo are hypothecated, then the owners of cargo have a right of action against the owner of the ship if they have to pay (Duncan v. Benson, 1 Ex. 537; 3 Ex. 644); this shows that the theory about principal and surety is wrong; the cargo is never the principal in such a case. The master acts only as agent for the shipowner in giving the bond. If the argument for the master be good, the owners of cargo must pay his wages, and this is unjust. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Your argument is, that the owners of cargo, by buying up the bond, have deprived the master of his right to enforce his lien, because The Edward Oliver decided that the owners of cargo are not obliged to pay the masters wages, although the assets may be marshalled so as to satisfy them out of the ship and freight, provided there is any cargo to satisfy the bond; whilst here there is practically no cargo to proceed against.] That is my contention. By buying up the bonds, the owners of cargo have placed themselves in the position of creditors of a bankrupt firm who have bought up from the holders bills accepted by the firm; they acquire the right of the holders, and the additional security, without harming their former position.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 29.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I have taken some time to consider this case, in which I have pronounced for the validity of the bottomry bonds. They are on ship, cargo, and freight; the ship has been sold; the proceeds are insufficient to cover the bonds; the net proceeds being 76*l.* 16*s.* 5*d.*; the bonds are for 236*l.* The master has instituted a suit for wages for 50*l.* The master has signed both the bonds, and made himself personally liable for them. Nevertheless, under the authority of the decision in The Edward Oliver (ubi sup.), as the proceeds of the ship and cargo would be sufficient to pay his wages and the bonds, the court might so marshal the effects as to do justice to both parties.

In The Edward Oliver the court said: "This is the first time the point has been raised. The general principal is clear. If a master by the terms of the bottomry bond has bound himself, as well as ship and freight, for the payment of the bond, it would be manifestly wrong that in defeasance of his own contract he should not only not pay the bond himself, but obtain out of the proceeds of the ship and freight payment of his own claims against the owners, leaving the bottomry bondholders unpaid. Hence the rule by which the master's claim is liable, under these circumstances, to be postponed. But this rule frequently operates with great severity against the master, depriving him of his real remedy for recovering his wages and disbursements, and certainly ought not to be carried beyond the exigency of the case; that is, ought not to be extended to circumstances where the bottomry bondholder would not be prejudiced by the master being paid before him. I see no reason why the owners of the cargo should be benefitted at the expense of the master. For the master, though he may have bound himself for the payment of the bond to the holders thereof, has made no such contract with the owners of cargo, and they are not entitled to invoke a rule made only for the protection of the bondholder. The court will therefore pronounce the proceeds of the ship and freight to be first applied in payment of the master's claim for wages and disbursements."

In the case before me, the owner of the cargo has bought up the bonds apparently with a view of taking this case out of the application of the rule in The Edward Oliver. Moreover, it is urged that in The Edward Oliver the owner of the cargo had given bail, which they have not done in this case. This does not appear to me to affect the principle on which I must decide.

It is said, though, that it is hard that the owners of the cargo should pay the wages of the master, who may bring an action at common law against the shipowner. But I am unable to distinguish this case from The Edward Oliver, and as far as general equity is concerned, I think it is in favour of the master's claim. The cargo owners may recover against the shipowner (Duncan v. Benson, 1 Ex. 537; 3 Ex. 644), and it is by the skill and exertions of the master that the ship has been safely navigated and the cargo brought to its destination. The bonds are somewhat curiously worded, but this circumstance does not affect the principle applicable to the case. The money is not raised for the benefit of the master, but of the ship, freight, and cargo—they are the principals, he is the surety. I do not see why the circumstance that the owner of the cargo has purchased the bond should put him in a better condition than any other purchaser.

I shall follow The Edward Oliver, and decree as prayed by the master. (a)

(a) The decree, as entered in the minute book in the cause of wages, was as follows:—"The judge, having maturely deliberated, pronounced that the sum of 48*l.* 1*s.* 2*d.* is due to the plaintiff for wages and disbursements, together with costs, and he directed that the said sum and costs be paid out of the proceeds of the vessel Eugénie and freight, in priority over the claim of the plaintiff in cause No. 6491, and he further ordered that the defendants, the owners of the cargo lately taken on board the said vessel Eugénie, do forthwith pay into court the freight due on the said cargo."

(a) Although it is becoming a much more common practice in our courts to cite American decisions than it was a few years back, still it frequently happens that our judges in the Superior Courts are not very willing to accept the decisions of American courts as authorities on questions of law argued before them, with one notable exception, namely, the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. The reason for this hesitation is apparent. In England there is a very prevalent notion that almost all the English judges in the United States, except those of the Supreme Court, are elected by the people for a term of years only. This, in the opinion of the English judges and lawyers, is calculated to diminish the authority of their decisions, on the ground that a judge, the tenure of whose office depends upon the will of an electoral body, cannot be free from extraneous influences; political pressure can be brought to bear upon him, and, it is to be feared, pressure of even a more demoralizing nature. This is not only the opinion of Englishmen but of many Americans of the highest intellect. Alexander Hamilton, whose name is well known throughout the United States, writing in the Federalist, says, "The standard of good behaviour, for continuance in office of the judicial magistracy, is certainly one of the most valuable improvements in the practice of government. . . . Nothing can contribute so much to its firmness and independence as permanency in office. . . . And next to permanency in office, nothing can contribute more to the independence of the judges than a fixed provision for their support." In Story's Commentaries (No. 1626) this independence is pointed out with special commendation. From these considerations it is evident that wherever judges are appointed by an executive to hold their offices during good behaviour, their decisions are entitled to be treated with respect and as of authority, so long as there are no other circumstances, such as undeveloped system of jurisprudence or lack of means of acquiring knowledge of the law, to detract from the value of those decisions. In a country like the United States public opinion is likely to secure the appointment of judges from amongst those men best qualified for their posts, wherever their tenure of office is permanent. In considering, therefore, what decisions in courts of the United States are to be treated as of authority in this country, without question and without the necessity of examining minutely the reasons given for such decisions, it may be taken as a rule that those courts whose judges are appointed during good behaviour are entitled to the most weight in this country. We have no wish to say, however, that there may not be judges in the United States, who are elected periodically to their offices, whose opinions are not most valuable; but considering the enormous number of State courts with elected judges, and the unfortunate instances of the behaviour of judges of those courts in the administration of the law, it is impossible for lawyers in this country not to draw a distinction between the two classes of judges. Another very prevalent idea in this country is that the Federal courts have power to deal only with constitutional questions or points of law connected in some way with treaties or statutes. Unfortunately but little is known in this country of the constitution of the various courts in the United States, and it is proposed to give a short notice of those courts which are, according to the rule stated, entitled to be treated with the utmost respect in this country. It would be a difficult task to deal minutely with their jurisdiction; but still, with a view of showing that almost every question that can come before our Superior Courts is also within the jurisdiction of such may be no maritime lien upon the res against which the claim is made.

*There is no maritime lien for necessaries supplied courts as we have mentioned, it may be useful to point out in a general way the nature of these powers.

The Courts in the United States are composed of two separate and distinct branches, frequently exercising the same jurisdiction over the same area. The first are the Federal or national courts, which derive their authority from the constitution of the United States, and have jurisdiction in certain matters over the whole of the States forming the United States; the second are the State courts, having a separate existence in each several State, depending upon the constitution of each State. The judges of the Federal courts are all appointed during good behaviour by the President, with the consent of Congress. The judges of the State courts are, as a rule, elected either by the people or the assemblies for various terms. There are, however, seven exceptions. In New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Delaware, and Florida, they are appointed during good behaviour; in Rhode Island, when appointed, they are removable on a vote of the majority of both Houses of Assembly; in Georgia they are appointed by the governor, but are removable on the address of both Houses of Assembly, or on impeachment and conviction; in the district of Columbia, the seat of government of the United States, they are appointed by the President of the United States during good behaviour; the courts of this last district are rather Federal than State courts. The State courts have jurisdiction in suits of every nature except where their jurisdiction is taken away by express enactment of the United States Legislature. The jurisdiction of the Federal courts is defined by various enactments of the United States Legislature, and, as it is rather with these latter courts that the present notice is concerned, from the nature of their constitution, an attempt will be made to show over what questions their power extends.

By the Constitution of the United States (Art. III. s. 1) the judicial power of the United States, that is of the Federal courts "shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish. The judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behaviour." By sect. 2, "The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under the constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more States, between a State and citizens of another State, between citizens of different States, between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants from different States, and between a State or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens, or subjects. In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, and those in which a State shall be a party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all other cases before mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as Congress shall make." By Art. XI, amending the Constitution, "the judicial power of the United States shall not be considered to extend to any suit in law or equity commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another State, or by citizens or subjects of any foreign State." Under the powers thus given by the Constitution, Congress constituted three courts: the Supreme Court named in the Constitution, and certain inferior courts, the circuit courts, and district courts. The Supreme Court has had a varying number of judges, but by an Act passed on the 10th April 1869 (41st Congress, sess. 1, c. 22), s. 1, it now consists of a Chief Justice and eight associate justices, any six to form a quorum. The circuit courts for the different districts, formerly, under the Judiciary Act 1789 (c. 22, s. 1), and Acts passed in 1793 (c. 22, s. 1), and in 1802 (c. 31, s. 4), consisted of a justice of the Supreme Court and the district judge of the district, the judgment of the court being in accordance with that of the justice of the Supreme Court: considerable doubt existed at one time as to whether Congress had power to make the justices of the Supreme Court act as circuit judges, and as to whether they ought not to appoint circuit judges: (see Stuart v. Laird, 1 Cranch Rep. 299; 1 Cond. 316.) Now, however, by the above-mentioned Act of the 10th April 1869, s. 2, a circuit judge has been appointed for each of the nine judicial circuits, with the powers of a justice of the Supreme Court within his circuit; and circuit courts are to be held by the justice of the Supreme Court, or by the circuit judge, or by the district judge sitting alone; or by the justice of the Supreme Court and the circuit judge sitting together, the justice of the Supreme Court presiding; or in the event of the absence of either of them, the other (who shall preside) and the district judge; and (sect. 4) it is the duty of the justice of the Supreme Court to attend at least one term of the circuit court in each district of his circuit during every period of two years. The circuit of each justice of the Supreme Court and each circuit judge, extends over several districts. The district courts are held by one district judge for each district, who is compelled to reside in the district for which he is appointed: (Judiciary Act 1789, c. 20, s. 3.) These districts consist either of the whole of a State, or of parts of a State divided into Northern, Southern, Eastern, and Western districts, as the case may be; and there are district courts having jurisdiction over every State of the Union. Here then there is a complete system of courts whose judges are appointed by the highest authority of the United States, and hold their offices apart from popular will. It only remains to show that these courts have jurisdiction in all matters which come before our courts in order to prove that, being competent to deal and dealing with all questions arising in a commercial country bearing an intimate resemblance to ours in its laws and customs, their decisions are entitled to respect at our hands.

States' rules of practice for Courts of Admiralty the material men may proceed in rem against the ship. Semble, that the lien of material men for necessities supplied to a ship in her home port—that is,

It will, perhaps, be more convenient to deal with the lowest court first, and, in so doing, we shall only deal with the civil jurisdiction, omitting the criminal as apart from our subject. The district courts "have exclusive original cognizance of all civil causes of Admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, including all seizures under laws of impost, navigation, or trade of the United States, where the seizures are made on waters which are navigable from the sea by vessels of ten or more tons burden, within their respective districts, as well as upon the high sea, saving to suitors in all cases the right of a common law remedy, where the common law is competent to give it; and shall also have exclusive original cognizance of all seizures on land, or other waters than as aforesaid made, and of all suits for penalties incurred under the laws of the United States. And shall also have cognizance concurrent with the courts of the several States, or the circuit courts, as the case may be, of all cases where an alien sues for a tort only in violation of the law of nations, or a treaty of the United States. And shall also have cognizance, concurrent as last mentioned, of all suits at common law where the United States sue, and the matter in dispute amounts, exclusive of costs, to the sum of 100dols. And shall also have jurisdiction exclusively of the courts of the several States, of all suits against consuls or vice-consuls:" (Judiciary Act 1789, c. 20, s. 9.) They have also an inherent jurisdiction in all matters of prize and capture at sea: (Glass v. Sloop Betsey, Dallas, 6; Bingham v. Cabot, 3 Dallas, 19; The Amiable Nancy, 3 Wheaton, 546; The Emulous, 1 Gallison, 563, 575), as well as by statute (Act of 1812, c. 107, s. 6); both on the high seas and inland waters (Act of 1818, c. 88, s. 7); and in cases of quasi admiralty jurisdiction arising in the inland lakes of the United States they may exercise the ordinary admiralty jurisdiction (Act of 1845, c. 20). The circuit courts have original cognizance concurrent with the courts of the several States, of all suits of a civil nature at common law or in equity, where the matter in dispute exceeds, exclusive of costs, the sum or value of five hundred dollars, and the United States are plaintiffs or petitioners; or an alien is a party, or the suit is between the citizens of the State where the suit is brought, and the citizen of another State, and "if a suit be commenced in any State court their right to be paid out of the res—attaches only on the seizure of the ship under admiralty process.

Mortgagees have no maritime lien upon a ship upon against an alien, or by a citizen of the State in which the suit is brought against a citizen of another State, and the matter in dispute exceeds the sum of 500 dollars, exclusive of costs, to be made to appear to the satisfaction of the court," the defendant may by petition to the State Court have the cause removed into the district court (Judiciary Act 1789, s. 12), and this removal is of right (Gordon v. Longest, 16 Peters, 97, 104); similarly, any cause where citizens of the same State claim land under grants from different States may be removed into the circuit court: (Judiciary Act 1789, s. 12). The circuit courts have also cognizance in cases of patents and copyright: (Act of 1819, c. 19; Act of 1836, c. 357, s. 17; Act of 1842, c. 263, s. 5.) The circuit courts have also appellate jurisdiction from the district courts. Final decrees and judgments in civil actions in a district court, where the matter in dispute exceeds the sum or value of 50 dollars, exclusive of costs, may be re-examined and reversed or affirmed in a circuit court held in the same district upon a writ of error, but there can be no reversal on a writ of error for error in ruling any plea in abatement, other than a plea to the jurisdiction of the court, or such a plea to a petition or bill in equity, as is the nature of a demurrer, or for an error in fact: (Judiciary Act 1789, c. 20, s. 22.) From final decrees of a district court in cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, when the matter in dispute exceeds the sum or value of 300 dollars, exclusive of costs, there is an appeal to the next circuit court held in such district (Judiciary Act 1789, c. 20, s. 21), and also an appeal from all final judgments and decrees in any of the district courts where the matter in dispute exceeds the sum or value of 50 dollars to the next circuit court held in the district (Act of 1803, c. 40). The original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court has already been stated. It has, moreover, exclusive jurisdiction of all controversies of a civil nature where a State is a party, except between a State and its citizens, and except also between a State and citizens of other States, or aliens, in which latter case it has original but not exclusive jurisdiction; and has exclusive jurisdiction of such suits or proceedings against ambassadors, or other public ministers, or their domestics, or domestic servants, as a court of law can have or exercise consistently with the law of nations; and original, but not exclusive jurisdiction of all suits brought by ambassadors, or other public ministers, or in which a consul or vice-consul, shall be a party: (Judiciary Act 1789, c. 20, s. 13.) The Supreme Court, moreover, has power to issue writs of prohibition to the district courts, when proceeding as courts of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction: (See United States v. Peters, 3 Dallas, 121; 1 Cond. 60; Bonnis v. Schooner James and Catherine, Baldwin, 544, 563); and writs of mandamus, in cases warranted by the principles and usages of law, to any courts appointed, or persons holding office, under the authority of the United States: (Judiciary Act 1789, c. 20, s. 13.) The appellate jurisdiction has already been noticed in Article 3 of the Constitution before set out, and the way in which it is exercised is prescribed by Act of Congress. It has appellate jurisdiction from the circuit courts and from the courts of the several States in certain cases: (Judiciary Act 1789, c. 20, s. 13.) Final judgments and decrees in civil actions and suits in equity, in a circuit court, brought there by original process or removed there by appeal from a district court, where the sum in dispute exceeds 2000 dollars, may, upon a writ of error, be re-examined and reversed or affirmed in the Supreme Court, subject to the same limitations as writs of error in the circuit courts (Judiciary Act 1789, c. 20, s. 22), and writs of error also lie to the Supreme Court from all judgments of a circuit court in cases brought there by writs of error from the district courts with the same limitations: (Act of 1840, c. 43, s. 3.) From all final judgments and decrees rendered, or to be rendered in any circuit court or in any district court acting as a circuit court in any cases of equity, of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, and of prize or no prize, where the matter in dispute, exclusive of costs, exceeds the sum or value of 2000 dollars, an appeal is which they hold a mortgage; and, according to United States' law, no remedy against the ship in rem in the admiralty courts, but may appear as respondents in a suit in rem, and set up their mortgage as the conditional owners of the ship, and claim that their mortgage is a legal lien on the ship prior in date to the attachment under the monition in a suit by material men for necessaries supplied in a home port, and also prior to the contract for the supply of the necessaries.

Where mortgagees know that repairs are being made on, and necessaries supplied to, a ship on which they hold a mortgage, whereby she is made a more valuable security, and the material men execute the repairs, &c., with a knowledge of the mortgage but relying on their right to proceed in rem against the ship, the parties are entitled, upon principles of equity, to be placed upon an equality as to the distribution of the proceeds of sale of the ship. (b)

allowed to the Supreme Court: (Act of 1803, c. 40, s. 2.) An appeal or writ of error lies to the Supreme Court from the circuit courts in copyright and patent cases (Act of 1819, c. 19; Act of 1836, c. 357, s. 17); an appeal lies in cases of habeas corpus: (Act of 1842, c. 257.) From the final decree or judgment in any suit in the highest court of law or equity in a State in which the decision in the suit could be had, where is drawn in question the validity of a treaty, a statute of, or an authority exercised under, the United States, and the decision is against their validity; or where is drawn in question the validity of a statute of, or an authority exercised under, any State on the ground of their being repugnant to the constitution, treaties and laws of the United States, and the decision is in favour of such their validity; or where is drawn in question the construction of any clause of the constitution, or of a treaty, or statute of, or commission held under, the United States, and the decision is against the title, right, privilege or exemption, especially set up by either party, a writ of error lies to the Supreme Court: (Judiciary Act 1789, c. 20, s. 25.)

We have now set out the jurisdiction of the several Federal Courts so far as is necessary for our present purpose, and in doing so have endeavoured for the sake of greater accuracy to follow the words of the various Acts conferring that jurisdiction. The jurisdiction of the State courts in all civil matters, save such as are expressly excepted, is concurrent and co-extensive with that of the Federal courts. A perusal of the above statement will be sufficient, we think, to show that there exists in the United States a number of courts which possess jurisdiction over every matter—bankruptcy, divorce, and probate only excepted—that can come before our own courts, and which possess those qualifications which confer upon the judgments of our courts the authority universally yielded to them. When it is remembered that the Federal courts have jurisdiction in all cases arising between citizens of different States, it will be seen at once that almost every question of law may arise, and be decided by the Federal courts. The opinions, then, of the judges of these courts may be accepted in this country, not as binding, it is true, but as of the highest authority, and the same may be said also of the judges of those few States we have before enumerated, making allowance for the fact that the better lawyers would naturally be chosen for the Federal courts. It is not in any way our intention to depreciate the decisions of the State courts; but our object has rather been to point out, as far as our limited space would allow, the value of, and wide field covered by, the decisions of the Federal courts, about which there is little accurate knowledge in this country.—ED.]

(b) The doctrine that there can be no right to proceed in rem unless there be a maritime lien has had many ardent supporters; no less has it been contended that where there is a lien given, no matter how, there ought to be a proceeding in rem to enforce it. This question was very ably discussed in an article in that admirable periodical, The American Law Review, for Oct. 1872, in the United States District Court in Admiralty against the Scow Selt. An appearance was entered on behalf of the mortgagees of the vessel. The facts are sufficiently set out in the judgment.

Markham for libellants.

Emmons and Hamilton for respondents.

Opinion of the court by MILLER, J.: The libellants are shipbuilders and proprietors of dry docks in the city of Milwaukee, and as such made necessary repairs upon the Scow Selt, a vessel owned in said city. This libel is brought to recover the amount of the repairs and supplies. The owner of the vessel not appearing, Osuld Torrison, a mortgagee was allowed by the court to appear as a claimant and answer the libel. The answer alleges that the libellants have no maritime lien upon the vessel, and no lawful right to bring or maintain their libel, the said vessel being owned at the port of Milwaukee by a resident of the said city, and that the repairs and materials were performed and furnished in said city at the instance and request of the owner of the vessel. The respondent further alleges and propounds that one Patrick Hoye, by under the head of "Admiralty Rule XII.," which is cited in the judgment of the present case. It was there contended that if a material man has by an Act of Legislature acquired a lien for necessaries supplied, he has a right to enforce that lien through the admiralty process: hence that where a State Legislature has given a material man such a lien upon a domestic ship, the Admiralty is bound to enforce that lien. It must be remembered, however, in discussing this question that Congress has reserved to itself the power of legislating on commercial questions: and it is, to say the least, questionable whether a State Legislature can create what is ordinarily understood by a "maritime lien," that is, a right to attach the res for a debt, and to enforce payment out of it in priority to other claims. The State may give power to attach the res, or rather, if the admiralty forms permit, the res may be attached as on a maritime contract; but to give priority over other claims is to affect commercial relations, and to interfere with the rights of Congress. It would seem that the American Law Review has scarcely apprehended the distinction between maritime liens and other liens, which, although giving a right to attach the res as security, do not affect priority of payment. If a State statute gave in express terms a "maritime lien" upon domestic ships, it is possible that it might be held to be enforceable as such in an Admiralty Court: (see The Planter, 7 Peter's, U.S. Sup. Ct. Rep. 324), but even this is doubtful. But where the local statute gives only a lien, a mere right to proceed in rem against a ship, it cannot be said that it gives a maritime lien with all its attendant consequence. A maritime lien and a proceeding in rem are no longer equivalent terms, despite what was said in The Bold Buccleugh (7 Moore P.C.C. 284), which was decided at a time when the English Admiralty had jurisdiction to proceed in rem only in cases where there always existed a maritime lien. Now that the jurisdiction has been extended, proceedings in rem may be instituted by material men against British ships or by mortgagees; (3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6; 24 Vict. c. 10, ss. 5, 10, 35), yet in neither case is there a maritime lien conferred: (The Pacific, B. & L. 243; The Two Ellens, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 40, 208.) It would seem more correct to conclude that a local statute giving a right to proceed in rem does not necessarily create a lien, or oblige an Admiralty Court to entertain a suit by a person having the right, but rather that the lien created by the local statute, unless expressly enacted to be a maritime lien, is to be applied by the Admiralty Courts only to enable the creditor to enforce his right against the ship whilst remaining in the hands of the owners, on whose orders the supplies are furnished; in other words, the lien attaches only on the commencement of the Admiralty process, and any prior claim against the res will take precedence of the claim of the material men, unless circumstances show that the prior claimant knowingly allowed the value of the ship to be increased and then seized her.—ED.

a mortgage dated 23rd Dec. 1869, conveyed said vessel to him to secure a portion of the purchase price of the vessel, and that the mortgage was recorded in the office of the collector of customs in the city of Milwaukee on the 24th of the same month of December. He claims title to said vessel paramount to the claim of the libellants. The facts pleaded are not disputed.

A maritime lien was considered the foundation of proceeding in rem when admiralty and maritime jurisdiction was conferred upon the federal court. Such proceeding was to make perfect a right inchoate from the moment the lien attached. When a maritime lien existed, a proceeding in rem was the proper course to carry it into effect. An Act of Congress, approved 29th Sept. 1789, entitled "An Act to regulate process in the courts of the United States" (1 Statutes at Large, 93) directed that the forms and modes of proceeding in causes of Admiralty and maritime jurisdiction shall be according to the course of the civil law. By the Act of 8th May, 1792 (1 Statutes at Large, 275), "the forms and modes of proceeding are to be according to the principles, rules, and usages which belong to the courts of admiralty in contradistinction from courts of common law, except so far as may have been provided for by the Act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, subject however to such alterations and additions as the said courts respectively shall in their discretion deem expedient, or to such regulations as the Supreme Court of the United States shall think proper from time to time by rule to prescribe to any circuit or district court concerning the same." The power here conferred on the Supreme Court was enlarged by an Act of Congress, approved 23rd Aug., 1842 (5 Statutes at Large, 517, sect. 4). Pursuant to the authority of these two Acts of Congress, the Supreme Court of the United States, at the term of Jan. 1842, adopted rules of practice for the courts of admiralty; one of these rule is this rule 12: "In all suits by material men for supplies or repairs or other necessities for a foreign vessel or ship, or for a ship in a foreign port, the libellant may proceed against the ship and freight in rem or against the master or the owner alone in personam. And the like proceeding in rem shall apply to cases of domestic ships where, by the local law, a lien is given to material men for supplies, repairs, or other necessities." At the December term of the Supreme Court, 1858, the said 12th rule of practice was repealed, and the following rule was substituted in its place: "In all suits by material men for supplies or repairs, or other necessities, for a foreign ship or for a ship in a foreign port, the libellant may proceed against the ship and freight in rem, or against the master or owner alone in personam. And the like proceeding in personam, but not in rem shall apply to cases of domestic ships, for supplies, repairs, or other necessities." If this rule had not been repealed nor modified, these libellants could not maintain this libel in rem. But at the December term of the Supreme Court of 1871, the said 12th rule was amended, so as to read: "In all suits by material men for supplies or repairs, or other necessities, the libellants may proceed against the ship and freight in rem, or against the master or owner in personam." This libel is brought under this last rule.

The 9th section of the Act to establish the judicial courts of the United States (1 Statutes at Large, 73) confers upon the district courts "exclusive original cognizance of all civil cases of Admiralty and maritime jurisdiction." The English rules that were supposed to exist at the date of the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, and when the above-mentioned Act was passed by Congress, that the admiralty jurisdiction did not extend beyond tide waters, and that proceedings in rem could only be sustained for the adjudication of a maritime lien, have been exploded. The admiralty and maritime jurisdiction granted to the Federal Government by the Constitution of the United States, is not limited to tide waters, but extend to all public navigable lakes and rivers where commerce is carried on between different States and with foreign nations: The Genesee Chief, 12 Howard, U.S. Sup. Ct. Rep. 443, and many subsequent decisions.) Liens by bottomry bonds, for seaman's wages, salvage service, and for supplies and repairs in a foreign port, are supposed to be founded in contracts upon the credit of the vessel, and are extinguished from contracts at the home port of the vessel, which are contracts on shore on the credit of the owner. Contracts at the home port for repairs, supplies for the use, or insurance of a vessel, are now considered as maritime contracts cognizable in the Admiralty. In the case of the Moses Taylor (4 Wallace, U. S. Sup. Ct. Rep. 411) it is announced that the distinguishing and characteristic feature in a suit in admiralty is, that the vessel proceeded against itself is seized and impleaded as a defendant, and is judged and condemned accordingly. And in The Hine v. Trevor (Idem, 555), and in Insurance Company v. Dunham (11 Wallace, 1), it is stated that the true criterion, whether contracts are within the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, is their nature and subject matter, as whether they are maritime contracts having reference to maritime service, maritime transactions, or maritime casualties, without regard to the place where they are made. In view of these principles, it was held in this case that the contract of marine insurance is a maritime contract within Admiralty and maritime jurisdiction in personam. I think it is now settled that these libellants can maintain their libel in rem for the recovery of their claim for repairs and supplies.

The question is not presented in this case whether the lien attached at the date of the work done and the supplies furnished, or by the attachment under the monition. My impression at present is, that the rule merely extends a remedy to a domestic creditor, and that his lien attaches by the seizure. It is clear that a mortgagee of a vessel has no maritime lien or remedy in rem in the Admiralty Courts. The mere mortgage of a vessel, other than that of an hypothecated bottomry, is a contract without any of the characteristics or attendants of a maritime loan, and is entered into by the parties to it without reference to navigation or perils of the sea: (The John Jay, 17 How. U. S. Sup. Ct. Rep. 399.) The record of the mortgage set up in the answer makes it a legal lien, but not a maritime lien. The mortgagee, as such, cannot proceed in this court in rem for the condemnation and sale of the vessel. After a sale of a vessel under an admiralty decree, the mortgagee can petition the court for payment out of remnants and surplus. A legal title passes conditionally by the mortgagor to the mortgagee; and it is more equitable to pay out of the registry the surplus of proceeds of sale of a vessel to a mortgagee than to the owner of the equity of redemption. The mortgagee was allowed as the conditional owner of the vessel, and, in the absence of the mortgagor, to appear and set up his mortgage, and claim that it is a legal lien on this vessel prior in date to the attachment under the libellants' motion, and also prior to their contract propounded in their libel.

The state law provides for a lien for supplies and repairs upon boats and vessels used in navigating the waters of the State, and authorizes proceedings in rem against said boats and vessels. If this law has any validity as authority for such proceeding in the State courts, I need not decide. Since the cases of The Belfast (7 Wallace, U. S. Sup. Ct. Rep. 624), The Moses Taylor, and The Hine v Trevor (ubi sup.), it is nugatory as authority for such proceeding in this court. The States can neither enlarge nor limit the admiralty and maritime jurisdiction of the Federal courts. The constitution and laws of the United States necessarily conferred exclusive admiralty and maritime jurisdiction upon the Federal courts for the protection of commerce, and for the preservation of amicable commercial relations with foreign nations. This vessel is libelled as a national, enrolled and licensed vessel used in navigating the lakes, and is not within the scope of the State law. The libellants might have proceeded in the State court against the owner of the vessel, or in this court, in personam; and before the modification of the rule, they would have had to make choice of these remedies. A sale of the vessel under an execution against the owner issued from either of the courts might not disturb the mortgagee's interest. The modification or alteration of Rule 12 was, no doubt, intended to place contracts for repairs and supplies for all ships and vessels on an equality as to proceeding in admiralty, whether foreign or domestic. All distinction in regard to proceeding in rem is abolished; but I do not suppose it was intended by the Supreme Court to abrogate the distinction between a domestic contract for supplies and repairs, and a maritime lien upon a foreign vessel. The alteration of the rule, in my opinion, applies to the character of the process to be used, and has no relation to the question of jurisdiction. The rules established, or altered, by the Supreme Court, under legislative authority, are not rules of decision, but are merely rules of practice prospective in their operation: (The steamer St. Lawrence, 1 Black. U. S. Sup. Ct. Rep. 522) In that case it is decided, that the change of the rule in the year 1844, prohibiting a proceeding in rem on domestic contracts, could not interrupt the prosecution of a libel pending on such a contract.

But in this case the mortgagee rested upon his mortgage and its record, without having either instituted proceedings for the recovery of the amount secured, or having taken possession of the vessel under his mortgage. The mortgagee had knowledge of the repairs being made on the vessel by the libellants, who thereby made her a more valuable security. And it appears that the libellants with knowledge of the mortgage, expended a large amount in supplies and repairs, under the belief that they had a right to attach the vessel. By the ruling in the case of The Island City (1 Lowell's Decisions, 375), the mortgage would be postponed to the claim of the libellants, upon the ground of a lien created by the State law. But in this case there is no such lien. It appears that the vessel was a wreck, affecting the security of the mortgage, and that the repairs have restored her to usefulness.

I think, upon principles of equity, these parties should be placed on an equality as to the distribution of the proceeds of sale. The proceeds of the sale of a vessel are not appropriated to liens, according to their priority in date. The seamen who brought a vessel into port are paid before a bottomry bond, and a bottomry bond before a lien on a contract of affreightment. Maritime liens are usually preferred on the score of merit and necessity, for the advancement and protection of commerce. Salvors are first paid out of property saved.

SUPREME COURT OF CALIFORNIA.

Dec. 10, 1872.

WELLS, FARGO, AND COMPANY v. THE PACIFIC INSURANCE COMPANY (a).

Marine insurance—Common carriers—Loading of goods—Advices—Warranty—Notice of loss.

A clause in a policy of marine insurance, providing that the adventure upon goods to be carried by the assured as common carriers between certain ports, shall begin "from and immediately following the loading thereof on board the said vessel at" certain ports enumerated, is not, unless so expressly provided by the policy, to be construed as a warranty that the goods shall be loaded at such ports, but as mere recital, description, or intention, or expectation, that the goods will be there loaded; and the policy attaches to goods in the custody of the assured for the purposes of transportation in the ordinary course of their business as common carriers, carried into a port named in the policy by one of the vessels, but not in the strict sense loaded at that port on board the vessel, provided that the facts show that, by reason of the nature of the transactions to which the policy relates, the parties intended that the policy should so attach.

A memorandum on an open policy of insurance upon goods carried between certain ports by the insured as common carriers, provided that the agents of the insured should send to their head office "advices of the amount of each shipment," and another memorandum provided for the "risks applicable to be reported to this company (the underwriters) for indorsement on the policy as soon as known to the assured." The course of business was that the agents of the insured at each port, on shipping goods for delivery to the insured, sent by the same steamer letters of advice, and by the succeeding steamer sent duplicate letters of advice. The goods whilst on board the steamer were in charge of an express messenger of the insured. One shipment the local agent omitted to advise by the steamer by which it was shipped. The steamer and goods were lost, but the messenger escaped and informed the insured of the loss, and they notified it to the underwriters for indorsement on the policy. The underwriters refused to indorse it. By the next steamer the local agent forwarded a letter of advice of the shipment, and the insured again requested the underwriters to indorse the loss on the policy.

(a) From the Pacific Law Reporter.

AMERICAN REPS.] WELLS, FARGO, AND CO. v. THE PACIFIC INSURANCE COMPANY. [AMERICAN REPS.]

Held, that the first memorandum was not a warranty, or condition precedent without the strict performance of which the right to demand an indorsement would not accrue.

Held also, that as the usual mode of forwarding letters of advice was by the steamers in which the goods were shipped, the losses must necessarily be notified to the underwriters after they had occurred, and that the insured were entitled to recover.

THIS was an action on a policy of insurance upon treasure, bullion and bonds, underwritten by the defendants, and was brought to recover the sum of 10,000*l.*, the value of treasure lost by the perils of the sea, whilst on board the ship Continental on a voyage from Guaymas to San Francisco. The facts and arguments are fully stated in the judgment.

The opinion of the court (Wallace, C. J., Rhodes, Niles, and Crockett, JJ.), was delivered by CROCKETT, J.—This action is founded on an open or running marine policy of insurance, whereby the defendant agreed to insure the plaintiffs in the various sums to be indorsed on the policy, upon treasure, bullion and bonds laden or to be laden on seaworthy steamships, steam vessels or propellers, “at and from Victoria, B. C., Portland, O., Astora, O., Los Angeles, Cal., La Paz, Mazatlan Guaymas, Mexico, to San Francisco, or vice versa, San Francisco to either of the before-mentioned ports or places . . . beginning the adventure upon the said treasure, bullion and bonds from and immediately following the loading thereof on board the said vessels at ports and places aforesaid, and so shall continue until the said treasure, bullion and bonds shall be safely landed at ports and places aforesaid; . . . in all cases the agent of Wells, Fargo, and Co. to forward to the San Francisco office of Wells, Fargo and Co., advices of the amount of each shipment.” On the left hand margin of the policy is a memorandum, which need not be recited, except one clause thereof, in these words: “Risks applicable to be reported to this company for indorsement on the policy as soon as known to the insured.” On the right hand margin is a memorandum in these words: “This underwriting to cover treasure and bullion shipped by Wells, Fargo and Co.’s express, at their risk, and by reason of their assuming the responsibility of insurance thereon.” These are the only provisions of the policy affecting the present controversy.

It appears from the agreed statement of facts that it was the usual custom and course of business between these parties for the local agents of the plaintiffs at the ports of shipment to forward by each steamer on which a shipment was made to the San Francisco office of the plaintiffs, advices of each shipment, on the receipt of which plaintiffs sent said order to the defendant, and the proper indorsements were then made on the policy, in accordance with the advices; that the steamer on which the shipment was made, being the ordinary and most expeditious means of communication between the said ports, the advices were necessarily received and indorsements made after the safe arrival (or loss) of the treasure; that the premiums were paid by the plaintiffs after the indorsement upon the monthly statement made up and presented by the defendant. It further appears that in Sept. 1870, the steamer Continental left Guaymas in a seaworthy condition for San Francisco; and that in the due course of her voyage she touched at Mazatlan, where she received and discharged freight and passengers; after which she resumed her voyage, and within a few days thereafter, while in the due course of her voyage, was wrecked by the perils of the sea, and became with her cargo, including the treasure hereafter to be mentioned, a total loss: that at Guaymas and Mazatlan the agents of the plaintiffs received for them from various shippers money and treasure to be carried to San Francisco, which were shipped on the Continental, accompanied with advices in the usual form from the local agents, which advices were lost with the vessel. But duplicate advices were forwarded by the succeeding steamer, and on being received by the plaintiffs were sent to the defendant, and the indorsements made on the policy in accordance therewith. The advices sent from the agent at Mazatlan notified the plaintiffs of a shipment of treasure by the Continental to the amount of 6148 dols. only; which sum was duly indorsed on the policy. But it appears from the agreed statement while the vessel was en route from Guaymas to Mazatlan, one Smith, a messenger for the plaintiffs, and in the due course of his business and employment as such, received from passengers on board the sum of 7342 dols. 50 cents., to be by the plaintiffs, as an express company, carried to San Francisco, “and for which—being duly authorised so to do—he had given to divers shippers receipts in which the safe carriage of said treasure was insured against all peril;” that said messenger had said treasure in his possession on board said steamer during the time she was lying at Mazatlan; and whilst lying at said port other treasure was brought on board by other shippers, and delivered to and received by said messenger to the amount of 2658 dols. 50 cents., to be in like manner transported to San Francisco, and for which he gave similar receipts; and whilst at Mazatlan, with all of said treasure in his possession as messenger on board said steamer, he notified the local agent at that place of his receipt and possession of these sums, amounting in the aggregate to 10,000 dols., in order that the local agent might embrace that amount in his letter of advice to be sent to plaintiffs by the steamer; but the local agent forgot and omitted to do so, and included in his letter of advice only the 6158 dols. shipped by himself. It further appears that the 10,000 dols. was lost with the steamer, and the plaintiffs have paid to the several shippers the full amounts thereof. But the messenger escaped from the wreck, and on his arrival at San Francisco the plaintiffs ascertained from him the foregoing facts in respect to the 10,000 dols.; and thereupon on delivering to the defendant duplicate letters of advice above mentioned verbally notified the defendant of said facts, and that they had learned the same from Smith, and requested that the 10,000 dols. be indorsed on the policy, which request was refused. Subsequently the plaintiffs procured from their local agent at Mazatlan a correct letter of advice, bearing date as of the day of the shipment of the Continental, and which included the 10,000 dols.; and after serving this on the defendant, again requested that this sum be indorsed on the policy, which request was again refused.

This action is brought to enforce payment of the 10,000 dols., and the only question for consideration is, whether on these facts the defendant is liable on the policy.

The principal points relied upon by the defence

are: First, that by the terms of the policy the defendant is not liable for treasure or bullion except "from and immediately following the loading thereof on board the said vessel" at one of the enumerated ports; and it is claimed that this treasure was not loaded on the Continental, in the sense of the policy, at either of the said ports; secondly, that one of the conditions of the policy is that "in all cases agent of Wells, Fargo, and Co. (shall) forward to the San Francisco office of Wells, Fargo, and Co. advices of the amount of each shipment," and it is insisted that this condition was not complied with in respect to the 10,000 dols. The argument is that this provision has the force and effect of an express warranty on the part of the assured, and that without performance of it the defendant under the policy never attached.

In construing policies of insurance, courts are governed by the same general rules which are applicable to other instruments, and effect is to be given to the intention of the parties, to be ascertained by the same method which is employed in the interpretation of other written contracts. Notwithstanding the numerous technical phrases which are usually inserted in policies, and the peculiar language in which they are generally couched, they are, after all, only written contracts, to be interpreted by the same rules which apply to other contracts, and to be enforced according to the intention of the parties. Applying these rules to this policy, the first inquiry is what was intended by the provision, that the adventure was to begin from and immediately after the "loading" of the treasure on board the vessel at one of the enumerated ports? In order to comply with this condition, was it essential that the treasure should have been actually placed on board at one of these ports, or was it sufficient that it was already on board when the vessel arrived in port, and continued on board until she departed on her voyage? Similar clauses are generally inserted in marine policies, and have been frequently considered by the courts.

In Murray v. The Columbian Insurance Company (11 John., N. Y. Sup. Ct. Rep. 301) the policy was "at and from Cagliari to St. Petersburg . . . upon all kinds of goods and merchandise, laden or to be laden on board the good American ship Rolla, beginning the adventure upon the said goods and merchandise from and immediately following the loading thereof on board the said vessel at Cagliari." It appeared that on arriving at Cagliari the vessel had still on board a portion of the outward cargo, and also merchandise put on board at Messina. On her arrival at Cagliari the cargo was hoisted out of the hold and re-stowed, but no new cargo was taken on board except a quantity of salt. The court held that the policy did not attach any portion of the cargo except the salt taken on board at Cagliari. In its opinion the court says, it has "been solemnly determined, on different occasions, by this court, as well as the courts of England, that in policies like the present the insurance attaches only on the cargo taken on board at the port where the venture is to begin." In commenting on this case, Phillips, in his treatise on insurance, says: "But if in this case the goods had been landed upon a wharf, and then taken on board again, there seems to be no ground to doubt of this being a 'loading' within the terms of the policy:" (sect. 939.) Some of the English cases also hold that a partial unloading of the cargo and then putting it on board again will not constitute a loading at the port of departure on the voyage covered by the policy: (Spitta v. Woodman, 2 Taunt. 416; 16 East. 188, n.) In another case of a similar character, and which was decided in the same way, the court puts its decision partly on the ground that a partial unloading and reloading of the cargo, at the port of departure of the voyage insured against, is not a "loading" at that port within the terms of the policy, because it could not be known whether the goods had been damaged on their previous transit, before the commencement of the risk insured: (Horney v. Lushington, 15 East. 46.) But in a later case, where enough of the cargo had been unloaded to enable the Custom House officers to examine the whole, and it was then again placed on board, Lord Ellenborough held this to be a loading at port within the policy. He said "the period of time from which the responsibility of the underwriter is to commence as to goods, and to which the policy refers to that purpose, is as fixed by this partial unloading and reloading at Landscrona, as by a more perfect and entire re-shipment there; it is sufficient for supplying a date, which is the only object of the reference in question:" (Nonnen v. Reid, 16 East. 176.) In commenting on this rule, in Bell v. Hobson (16 East. 240), the eminent judge said that "a very strict, and certainly a construction not to be favoured, and still less to be extended, was adopted in Spitta v. Woodman. If there be anything to indicate that a prior loading was contemplated by the parties, it will release the case from that strict construction." In Rickman v. Carstairs (5 B. & Ad. 651) the rule we are commenting upon is adverted to "as strict and to be relaxed when there is anything in the policy to satisfy the court that the policy was intended to cover goods previously on board." The same proposition, substantially, is announced in Robertson v. French (4 East. 130). After summing up all the decisions on this point the result is thus stated in Phillips on insurance (sect. 939): "From all these cases it is not easy to determine the construction of a policy, in which the risk is to commence on the loading of the goods at a port named. If it be considered a warranty that the goods shall be loaded at such port, the courts, seem, in some of the above cases, to have departed from the usual construction of express warranties. But if these words are to be considered as merely description, having at most the force of a representation, they will not affect the contract if the policy provides any other way of ascertaining the time when the risk commences. These discrepant decisions certainly do not coincide in support of any general proposition. That to which they seem to be the nearest approximation, and which may be adopted without a departure from any general principle is, that this specification of the terminus a quo, unless it appear by the policy to be intended as a warranty of the loading at a designated place is to be taken as mere recital, description or intention or expectation, being at most an implied representation of the loading, and is to be construed accordingly." The author further adds: "There is no need of resorting to the doctrine of warranty to provide for the case of aggra-vation of the risk by reason of the cargo not being put on board at the place named, which is mentioned in some cases, since that comes appropriately within the doctrine of representation and concealment."

Testing the policy under consideration by these rules, we think the clause which provides that the adventure is to begin "from and immediately following the loading" of the treasure on board at one of the enumerated ports is not to be construed as a warranty, but, in the language of Mr. Phillips, "as mere recital, description, or intention or expectation" that the treasure was to be shipped from the enumerated ports. We arrive at this conclusion from the policy itself and from the agreed statement of facts. It was known to the defendant that the plaintiffs were engaged in the business of common carriers of treasure by their express between San Francisco and Guaymas and the intermediate ports; and the agreed facts leave little room for doubt that it was also aware that the treasure whilst on board was to be in the care and custody of the plaintiff's messenger, who was authorised to receive treasure for transportation from passengers on board en route between San Francisco and the enumerated ports. But leaving this fact out of view enough appears on the face of the policy to indicate clearly that the "loading" in a strict sense at one of the specified ports was not intended as a warranty. From the very nature of the transactions to which the policy relates it cannot be reasonably inferred that if treasure was received on board at some other place than one of those designated, and was carried on the vessel, in the custody of the messenger, into one of the specified ports, en route for San Francisco, the policy was not intended then to attach, unless the treasure was put over the vessel's side and again placed on board. It cannot be denied that if this had been done at Mazatlan, with the treasure received by the messenger, it would have been a "loading" at that port within the very letter of the policy. But the parties contemplated no such idle and useless act as a condition on which the risk was to commence. We have not the least doubt that the risk was intended to commence when the treasure was actually on board at one of the specified ports, in the possession of the plaintiff's messenger for transportation, whether it was first taken on board at that port or at some other place in the course of the voyage. The rule of law is that policies are to be construed liberally in favour of the assured: (Rolker v. Great Western Ins. Co., 3 Keys, 23.) But to hold that this treasure was not "loaded" on board at Mazatlan in the sense of the policy would be to sacrifice the substance to the shadow and to defeat the rights of the assured by a strict and over-technical construction at variance with the plain intention of the parties, to be deduced from the nature of the transactions to which the policy relates.

In considering the second point made by the defendant, it will be necessary to construe, in connection with other provisions of the policy, the clause which requires "in all cases the agent of Wells, Fargo, and Co., to forward to the San Francisco office of Wells, Fargo, and Co., advices of the amount of such shipment." The policy does not require these advices to be forwarded nor in any manner delivered to the insurance company. On the contrary, another clause provides how the information was to be given to the defendant of the shipment—"risks applicable hereto to be reported to this company for indorsement on the policy as soon as known to the assured." It was the duty of the plaintiffs under this clause to report to the defendant the amount of the shipment as soon as the fact was made "known" to them, by whatever method the information was obtained. They were not to be at liberty to await advices from their agent, provided the fact came to their knowledge earlier and through a different channel. The clause requiring advices from the agent was doubtless intended in some degree for the benefit of the insurance company, to enable it to guard against fraud or mistake as to the fact, date, and amount of the shipment. It was apparently inserted for the purpose of affording evidence of these points in case a controversy should arise either before or after the indorsement, as to the fact, date, or amount of the shipment. But it was not a condition precedent without the performance of which the plaintiffs could in no event nor under any circumstances become entitled to the indorsement. If it had been so intended, the policy would have proved that the advices or duplicates thereof should be forwarded or delivered to the underwriter, and that the indorsement should correspond with the advices. But so far from this, the policy fails to provide that the advices were even to be shown to the defendant prior to the indorsement; but requires the plaintiffs to report the shipment for indorsement "as soon as known" to them, omitting any reference to the advices as the source of the information. If the forwarding of the advices by the agent is to be deemed an express warranty on the part of the assured, as contended by the defendant, then it must have been strictly and even literally performed before the right to demand the indorsement accrued. Even an overwhelming necessity, an accident against which no degree of vigilance could have guarded, a force which was irresistible, would not have excused its performance. In Pawson v. Watson (Cowp. 785) Lord Mansfield says: "A warranty must be strictly performed; nothing tantamount will do." In Blackhurst v. Cockell (3 Term, 360) Mr. Justice Butler said: "It is a matter of indifference whether the thing warranted be material or not; but it must be literally complied with." In De Hahn v. Hartley (1 Term, 343), Mr. Justice Ashurst said: "The very meaning of a warranty is to preclude all questions whether it has been substantially complied with; it must be literally." In Newcastle Fire Insurance Company v. Macmorran (3 Dow's Ho. of L. Cas. 255), Lord Eldon said: "When a thing is warranted, it must be exactly what it is stated to be." See also Phillips on Insurance, s. 762. It is clear, therefore, that if the provision under discussion is to be deemed an express warranty, it must have been strictly performed to entitle the plaintiffs to an indorsement of the 10,000 dols. on the policy. Treated in that light, they would not have been entitled to the indorsement, even though the treasure had been shipped by the agent in the most formal manner at Mazatlan, but before preparing his advices he had suddenly died or been disabled; nor even though some other person, having knowledge of the fact, had sent the advices of his own accord. In the case supposed, if the treasure had arrived safely at its destination, the defendant, on this theory, would not have been entitled to demand the premium on it, nor the plaintiffs to recover its value, if it had been lost. In other words, it would not have been protected by the policy, as the risk had never attached.

Construing the whole policy, according to what we think was the intention and understanding of the parties, and considering the nature of the transactions to which the policy related, we are satisfied it was not contemplated that the forwarding of advices by the agent should be deemed a condition precedent without a strict performance of which a right to demand an indorsement by the one party or the payment of premiums by the other would not accrue.

The only remaining point made by the defendant is that the loss having already occurred and become known to the parties before the indorsement was demanded, the defendant was under no obligation to assume a loss which was known to have already happened. If this theory be correct, the plaintiffs were under no obligation to report for indorsement shipments which had already arrived safely, nor to pay the premiums thereon. Such a construction would practically nullify the policy in respect to shipments from the Mexican ports named therein. The agreed statement shows that the usual and most expeditious method of forwarding advices from those ports was by the steamer on which the treasure was shipped; and if the plaintiffs were not bound to report for indorsement, nor to pay premiums on shipments which had already arrived, nor the defendant to pay losses known to have occurred before the indorsement was demanded, it results that the policy was a nullity in respect to shipments from these ports, and imposed no obligation on either party. But the parties have themselves interpreted the contract in this respect. The agreed statement shows that it was the practice of the plaintiffs to pay and of the defendants to receive premiums on shipments which had already arrived, and it ought not now to be permitted to escape liability for a loss on the ground that the loss was known to have occurred before the indorsement was demanded.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded, with an order to the court below to enter judgment for the plaintiffs on the agreed statement of facts. (a)

HOUSE OF LORDS.

WATSON AND COMPANY v. SHANKLAND AND OTHERS.

Charter-party—Advances against freight—Stipulation for insurance upon advances being effected by charterers.

By a charter-party made at Bombay, a ship of the respondents, merchants at Greenock, was to proceed from Bombay to Calcutta, and there load a cargo to be conveyed to the United Kingdom. A clause in the charter-party was as follows: "Sufficient cash for ship's ordinary disbursements to be advanced the master against freight; subject to interest, insurance, and 2½ per cent. commission; and the master to indorse the amount so advanced upon his bills of lading." Of this charter-party the appellants were indorsees. While the ship was at Calcutta preparing for the voyage, various advances for the ship's ordinary disbursements were made by the appellants, and the master gave them, on account of such advances, a bill drawn on the respondents. The respondents refused to accept the bill, on the ground that the master had no power to give it, and that under the charter-party the appellants should have effected an insurance on freight to the amount of their advances. No such insurance was, however, effected, though the appellants had time to insure after notice of the respondents' refusal to accept the bill. The ship having been lost on the voyage to the United Kingdom, the appellants brought an action to recover the amount of their advances.

Held (affirming an interlocutor of the First Division of the Court of Session), that under the charter-party the respondents had a right to rely on an insurance upon the advances being made by the appellants, who had stipulated for and received the right to charge the premium; and that the appellants, having chosen not to insure, must bear the loss.

Held further that a clause in the interlocutor appealed from, affirming that in law advances against freight for a ship's ordinary disbursements can be recovered in the event of the loss of cargo, should be omitted, because unnecessary and, assuming the question to be governed by English and not Scotch law, incorrect. (a)

THIS was an appeal from the Court of Session.

The facts were as follows: On 20 Aug. 1863, a charter-party was entered into between James M'Kirdy, master and part owner of the ship Janet Cowan, and Ralli Brothers, of Bombay, where the vessel then was, in terms whereof the ship was to proceed to Calcutta, there to be loaded by the charterers or their agents with a cargo for the United Kingdom, "the freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo."

The charter-party contained the following clause: "Sufficient cash for the ship's ordinary disbursements to be advanced the master against freight, subject to interest, insurance, and 2½ per cent. commission; and the master to indorse the amount so advanced upon his bill of lading."

On 2nd Oct. 1863, Ralli Brothers transferred their rights and interest in the charter-party to Messrs. Grant, Smith and Co., by whom it was indorsed to Messrs. William Watson and Co. on the 13th of the same month.

The vessel, in pursuance of the charter-party, proceeded to Calcutta, where she was loaded with a cargo for the United Kingdom by Watson and Co., who, between 7th Nov. and 17th Dec. 1863, while the ship was preparing for the voyage, made various cash advances to or on the order of the master for the ship's ordinary disbursements, to account whereof the master granted a bill to Watson and Co. for 500*l.* drawn upon Robert

(a) There is no doubt that by English Law an advance against freight made in the port of loading cannot be recovered if the ship be lost before reaching her destination. The American rule, on the other hand, is directly contrary to the English rule. All the authorities on the subject, both American and English, will be found collected in a note by the Sheriff, who decided this case, appended to the report of the case in the Court of Session: Court of Session Cases, 3rd series, vol. 10, p. 144.—ED.

(a) This case is taken from a report furnished by the official reporter of the court to The Chicago Legal News.

Shankland, merchant, in Greenock, the managing owner of the vessel. This bill was presented for acceptance on 17th Dec. 1863, but Shankland refused to accept it, on the ground that the master had no power to grant it, and that under the charter-party Watson and Co. should have effected an insurance upon the freight for the amount of their advances. No such insurance, however, was made by Watson and Co., although they had time to do so after receiving intimation of Shankland's refusal to accept the bill. The ship sailed from Calcutta on 9th Nov. 1863, and was, with her cargo, totally lost on 7th April, 1864.

Under the circumstances Watson and Co. brought an action in the Sheriff Court of Renfrew against Shankland, M'Kirdy, and the other owners of the ship, for recovery of 596*l.* 0*s.* 3*d.*, the alleged amount of their advances against freight for the ship's disbursements while preparing for the voyage, with interest and 2½ per cent. commission on the total amount of freight, which they claimed as having acted in the capacity of shipping agents for the vessel. This action was not founded on the bill for 500*l.* granted by the master, which, not being stamped, was invalid under the stat. 17 & 18 Vict. c. 83, s. 5, but the bill was referred to as evidence of the nature of the transaction.

The pursuers pleaded; First, the defenders are liable for the obligations of the defender M'Kirdy, incurred in his character of master and part owner of their ship; secondly, the defender Robert Shankland, as managing owner or ship's husband, having authorised the defender M'Kirdy to pass drafts on him for the ship's debts, was bound to accept the bill, and is liable therefore and for the loss caused by non-acceptance; thirdly, the whole defenders are liable for the acts of the master and part owner and of the managing owner or ship's husband; fourthly the defender M'Kirdy is liable individually for the sum in the bill granted by him and dishonoured.

The defenders pleaded: First, the advances by the pursuers for the ship's disbursements at Calcutta, being a payment and not a loan, cannot be recovered back from the defenders; secondly, the pursuers, as the charterers of the vessel, or the transferees or indorsees of the charter-party, were not entitled to take and the master was not entitled to grant, a bill of exchange for repayment of a sum of money in which the pursuers themselves under the charter-party were at the time indebted to the master and owners of the vessel; thirdly, the master of a vessel has no power in a foreign port to bind his owners in a bill debt, even for the ordinary disbursement of the vessel; and more especially he has no power to bind his owners in such a debt to the charterers of the vessel when such parties are themselves bound to provide, by means of a payment on account of freight, the master of the vessel with the funds necessary to pay such disbursements.

The Sheriff-Substitute (Tennant) pronounced an interlocutor, which, after various findings in regard to the facts, proceeded: "In point of law finds that the money thus paid by the pursuers was not a loan made by them to or for before of the defenders, or of the master of the Janet Cowan, but that it is to be held as having been made in terms of the clause of the charter-party, in regard to cash for ship's disbursements, to which the pursuers were parties: Finds that by the terms of the said clause the pursuers were bound to furnish sufficient cash for ship's ordinary disbursements, as an advance against the freight which it was expected would be earned at the conclusion of the voyage; and that the defenders were not bound to repay to the pursuers the sum thus advanced to them in terms of the charter-party: Finds that the pursuers are entitled to receive interest, the premium of insurance, and a commission of 2½ per cent. upon the advances made by them; and of consent of parties decerns for the same, amounting to the sum of 441*l.* 4*s.*: Finds that it has not been proved that the pursuers were agents for the ship at Calcutta, and therefore finds that they are not entitled to the commission charged by them in the account appended to the summons. With the exception of the sum above-mentioned, assoilzies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, finds the defenders entitled to expenses, &c."

On appeal the Sheriff (Fraser) allowed the pursuers to add the following plea in law to the record: "Sixthly: the sums sued for having in any view been made as an advance against freight, and no freight having been earned, the defenders are obliged to repay the same and commission thereon to the pursuers, with interest, as libelled."

The Sheriff afterwards re-recalled the judgment of the Sheriff-Substitute, and in place thereof: "Finds that the money paid by the pursuers to the captain was not a loan made by them to or for behoof of the master of the Janet Cowan as representing the defenders, but was an advance as against freight for ship's ordinary disbursements, subject to interest, insurance, and 2½ per cent. commission. Finds in law that the defenders are bound to pay to the pursuers the sum of 441*l.* 4*s.* thus advanced to the captain, with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent. from the last date of the advance together with commission of 2½ per cent. upon the advances: Finds that, as the pursuers did not effect insurance upon the advances so made by them, they are not entitled to recover from the defenders any sum under that head; Finds that the pursuers were not agents for the ship at Calcutta, and that they were not entitled to charge commission as such. Decerns against the defenders for the said sum of 441*l.* 4*s.*, together with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent., from 17th Dec., 1863, till payment; and also for the sum of 11*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.*, being commission of 2½ per cent. upon the said advances together with interest on the said sum of 11*l.* 0*s.* 6*d.* at 5 per cent. from 17th Dec., 1863, till payment: Finds no expenses due to either party," &c. The defenders appealed, and, after hearing counsel, the court appointed the cause to be re-argued before them, with the assistance of three judges of the Second Division.

On 2nd Dec. 1871, the court pronounced the following interlocutor. "Recall the interlocutors of the sheriff and sheriff-substitute. . . . Find that by this action the pursuers as charterers claim repayment of their advances to the master at Calcutta, besides interest at 5 per cent. thereon till payment, and 2½ per cent. commission; but find that they do not claim the amount of premiums that would have been required to insure so much of the freight as corresponds to the amount of their advances: Find in law that cash advanced against freight to the master of a ship for ordinary ship disbursements at the port of loading is not, in ordinary circumstances, equivalent to a payment of freight, but is to be held as an advance in consideration of the subsequent performance of the contract by the owners and shipmaster by the right delivery of the cargo at the port of discharge; and that if there is a failure of the consideration, by the voyage not being accomplished and the cargo rightly delivered at the port of discharge, the charterers are entitled, in respect of such failure of consideration, to recover the amount of the said advance from the owners; but find that in the present case the charterers, having stipulated that they should be entitled to insure freight at the owner's expense to an amount corresponding with the amount of their advances, must be held to have limited their security for repayment of the advances to the right of set-off in settling with the owners if the freight should be earned, and to the amount of the said insurance if the ship and cargo should be lost, and to have relinquished or discharged the personal obligation of the owners for repayment in the latter event: Therefore, find that the pursuers have failed to establish their claim of repetition against the defenders; but, in respect of the agreement and covenant of parties, decern against the defenders for payment to the pursuers of 21l. 17s., being the amount of the premium of insurance and commission stipulated by the charter-party to be paid to the charterers in respect of the advance made to the master at Calcutta as aforesaid, with interest thereon at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum from and after 7th July, 1864, till payment. Quoad ultra assoilzie the defenders and decern: Find the defenders entitled to expenses both in this court and the inferior court; allow accounts, &c." The grounds of this interlocutor were: First, that an advance by the charterers of a ship to account of freight is, on the loss of ship and cargo, recoverable from the ship-owners where the charter-party contains no stipulation, express or implied, to the contrary; the law of Scotland upon this point, although contrary to that of England, being in conformity with the law-merchant of every other trading community; but, secondly (by a majority of seven judges, diss. the Lord Justice Clerk and Lord Kinloch), that the clause in the charter-party in this case, "sufficient cash for ship's ordinary disbursements to be advanced the master against freight, subject to interest, insurance, and 2½ per cent. commission," exempted the shipowners from liability for repayment of such advances, by giving the charterers an insurable interest in the freight to the extent of the sums advanced, so that not having insured, as they might have done, at the expense of the shipowners, they were in the position of being their own insurers, taking upon themselves the risk of the safe arrival of the ship and cargo: (Court of Session Cases, 3rd series, Vol. 10, p. 144.)

Butt, Q.C. and F. M. White, for the appellants, contended that the Court of Session was wrong in deciding that the terms of the contract overrode the general rule of the law of Scotland.

Young, Q.C. (Lord Advocate), and Benjamin, Q.C., contra, cited the judgment of Willes, J., in Trayes v. Worms (34 L. J. 274, C.P.; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 548).

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Selborne).—My Lords, the true construction of this contract may be that the advance was to be a loan upon the security of the freight, and not a prepayment of freight. It is not necessary that your Lordships should decide the question, and I should not advise your Lordships to pass your decision in such a form as to affect the future determination of such a question should it arise. But, assuming this was to be a loan upon the security of the freight, and not a prepayment of the freight, or a part payment of the freight, or a payment on account of the freight, within the principle of the authorities which have been referred to, still the question is whether, according to the true and sound construction of this contract, it was not understood and agreed between the two parties that the insurance, which it was for the interest of both to have made in the most proper and convenient manner, should be made by the charterers.

Apart, my Lords, from any evidence as to usage, I cannot but think that it is a sound view of this mercantile contract to hold that it provides for insurance, and does not leave the subject of insurance uncertain and indeterminate. Insurance is mentioned, as your Lordships will observe, in direct connection with two other things, which were not uncertain, and which were not indeterminate, namely, interest and commission. Interest was to be charged at all events; commission was to be charged at all events. It appears to me that there is nothing to lead us to suppose that insurance was not to be as much a fixed term of the contract as interest and commission, and that not the less because all these terms are primarily in favour of and for the protection of the person advancing the money. The shipowners subject themselves to the burden, but both parties have an interest in diminishing that burden; and, therefore, as either one or the other ought to make an insurance, it was reasonable that they should make a contract between themselves as to how the insurance was to be effected.

One of your Lordships put to Mr. Butt this observation, in which Mr. Butt expressed his concurrence, that "these are all things as to which the charterers were to be creditors of the other party." But if the charterers were to be the creditors of the other party for all these things, then that was a part of the contract. The charterers were to advance the money, they were to charge interest, they were to charge commission, and they were to charge insurance; and how could they charge insurance unless insurance was effected?

The good sense of the matter concurs with that view; because the charterers would not be satisfied unless the insurance was made under their control—a control for which it was reasonable that they should stipulate; and it would be only by them, when the advances were made, that the precise amount for which the insurance was to be effected would be known. I take it, therefore, that as between these parties it is a contract in substance to this effect: "I, the borrower, give you, the lender, a right to charge me with the premium of insurance," which is very much the same thing in principle as if the borrower had put the money into his hands for the purpose of effecting that insurance. I by no means think it necessary to say what the result might have been if for any reasonable cause he had determined not to avail himself of the right to insure and to charge the premiums of the insurance, and had given notice of that to the other party in reasonable time. The charterers here did not, in fact, do so; although, according to the evidence, there was abundance of time for them to do so. Still less do I desire to say anything which would affect the question which might have arisen, if, having effected that insurance, that insurance had, through some cause not imputable to the charterers, become unavailable. I proceed, my Lords, upon the assumption that it may be the construction of this contract, that in either of these events the charterers, acting reasonably and according to good faith, would be held entitled to recover in the event of the loss of the ship.

The question is, whether under this contract the shipowners had not a right to rely upon that insurance being made by the charterers, who here stipulated for and received the right to charge the premiums. I think the shipowners had this right.

The charterers neglected to insure, and neglected to give notice of the non-insurance. What must be the consequence of a loss of the ship, the charterers knowing that the insurance was not effected? Upon one or the other of these two parties that loss must fall. If the insurance had been made, and the money paid by the shipowners, then the benefit of the insurance would have accrued to the shipowners. It is very much like the right of a man who gives several securities, when he pays off the mortgagee, to have all the securities delivered up into his own hands, unless a reason, which is a sound and good one, and consistent with the duty of the mortgagee, and which is not imputable to his own fault, can be given for the failure of any one of them. This seems to have been really the view which prevailed, on the whole, in the minds of the learned judges in the court below, and I think the soundest course for your Lordships to take will be to found your judgment entirely upon that view.

But in the interlocutor under appeal, there are certain findings which your Lordships will probably think go beyond the requirements of the present case. There is a finding as to the general law upon the subject. Now I do not think it expedient that that finding should be retained; first, because it does not appear to me that upon this occasion we ought to decide any question of general law at all; and, secondly, because if we did it would be necessary to consider how far that law ought to be the English or the Scotch law; and, finally, if it ought to be the English, whether it would be a safe thing to lay down the rule in the terms which are here stated—terms which certainly do not agree with the rule lately stated in the English case of Byrne v. Schiller (25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 211; L. Rep. 6 Ex. 319). I should therefore propose to your Lordships to vary the interlocutor appealed from, by omitting the following words:—

“Find in law that cash advanced against freight to the master of a ship by the charterers for ordinary ship’s disbursements at the port of loading, is not in ordinary circumstances equivalent to a payment of freight, but is to be held as an advance in consideration of the subsequent performance of the contract by the owners and shipmaster by the right delivery of the cargo at the port of discharge; and that if there is a failure of the consideration by the voyage not being accomplished, and the cargo rightly delivered at the port of discharge, the charterers are entitled, in respect of such failure of consideration, to recover the amount of the said advance from the owners.”

The court below further propose to put a construction upon the contract, going beyond the view which I have submitted to your Lordships, the interlocutor appealed from, containing these words:—

“That the charterers having stipulated that they should be entitled to insure freight at the owners’ expense, must be held to have limited their security for repayment of the advances to the right of set-off in settling with the owners if the freight should be earned, and to the amount of the said insurance if ship and cargo should be lost; and to have relinquished or discharged the personal obligation of the owners for repayment in the latter event.”

I cannot think, my Lords, that we are called upon to leave such an interpretation of the contract upon the face of the interlocutor. One of your Lordships has suggested words to be substituted for those which I have read, words which would make the finding run thus:—

“Find, that in the present case the charterers having stipulated that they should be entitled to insure freight at the owner’s expense, to an amount corresponding to the amount of their advances, must be held to have made such insurance a part of their security, and, not having effected any such insurance, must be held to have relinquished, in the event of the snip being lost, any claim against the owners for repayment.”

I would submit to your Lordships that these words should be adopted, and that the interlocutor should be varied in the manner I have suggested.

Lord CHELMSFORD.—My Lords, I agree with my noble and learned friend. By the contract between the parties, the insurance upon the advances was to be effected by the charterers. There was no obligation upon them to insure, except for their own protection; but as they chose not to insure, they took the risk upon themselves, and, therefore, they must bear the loss.

Lord COLONSAY.—My Lords, I concur in the result which has been arrived at; and I think the grounds which have been stated are quite sufficient for the determining of this case.

Lord CAIRNS.—My Lords, I also concur.

THE WILLIAM LINDSAY.

Collision—Duty of master—Reasonable precautions—Private mooring buoy authorised by port authorities.

Although it is the duty of the master of a ship to take all such precautions as a man of ordinary prudence and skill, exercising reasonable foresight, would use to avert danger and to prevent his ship doing damage to others in the circumstances in which he is placed, there is no obligation upon a master who is ordered by the authorities of the port in which his ship lies to take up a berth in a particular part of the harbour to examine the sufficiency of a buoy to which he moors his ship in that place, although that buoy may belong to a private company, if the port authorities sanction the use of the buoy, and treat it as a proper and sufficient mooring place for vessels frequenting the port. If through the insufficiency of such a buoy the ship parts from her moorings on a storm arising, the shipowner will not be responsible for damage ensuing by collision if the master has taken other precautions sufficient under ordinary circumstances to meet the exigencies of the case.

The question whether a master should under such circumstances have let go an anchor, or whether the having an anchor ready to let go was a sufficient precaution, is a question of practical seamanship upon which the court of appeal will be guided by the opinion of their nautical assessors.

This was an appeal from a decree of the High Court of Admiralty of England pronounced by the right honourable the judge of that court on the 26th Jan. 1873, in a cause of damage instituted on behalf of the owners of the barque Estrella against the William Lindsay, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and against her owners intervening, for the recovery of damages in respect of a collision between the said two vessels.

The Estrella was a barque of about 499 tons register, and the William Lindsay a ship of 970 tons register. The collision in question took place in the port of Valparaiso, shortly after 11 o'clock a.m. on the 23rd Sept. 1871.

The case set up by the petition filed on behalf of the Estrella was that, on the evening of the 22nd and morning of the 23rd Sept., the Estrella was lying safely moored in the harbour of Valparaiso, and at the same time the William Lindsay was lying about three-quarters of a mile to the northward of the Estrella, fastened to a buoy in the said harbour by her starboard cable, from which the anchor had been unshackled. The said buoy was not one of the buoys belonging to the port authorities, nor intended nor adapted for use as a mooring buoy, and was not on the usual mooring ground. On the evening of the 22nd it came on to blow a gale from the north, but the William Lindsay did not let go any anchor, remaining at the buoy as before the gale. On the 23rd she became detached from the buoy, and began to drift to the southward. Those on board of her let go her port anchor in great haste; but, when about 30 fathoms had run out, the cable became "jammed" in the windlass, and, continuing to drive to the southward, she struck the Estrella with great violence, doing her much damage.

The case set up by the answer filed on behalf of the William Lindsay was as follows: "On the 19th Sept. the William Lindsay went into Valparaiso Bay to discharge fifty tons of coal, and moored to a buoy on the eastern side of the bay on the customary mooring ground. On the morning of the 20th Her Majesty's ship Scout was about to practise with shot, and the William Lindsay, happening to be in the line of fire, was ordered by the port authorities to remove to the western side of the bay and moor to a buoy there. This she accordingly did, mooring by 30 fathoms length of the starboard cable to a buoy not belonging to the port authorities, but used by vessels of her size. On the morning of the 23rd a fresh breeze came on from the north, with a swell, and about 3 a.m. 15 fathoms additional cable were paid out as a matter of precaution. Soon after 11 a.m. the shackle-band of the said buoy gave way, and the William Lindsay went adrift. The port anchor which was in readiness to let go, was let go at once, but accidentally jammed under the windlass, and although the crew endeavoured to clear it they were unable to prevent the William Lindsay coming into collision with the Estrella." The respondents further alleged that the collision happened without negligence on the part of the William Lindsay, and that it was the result of inevitable accident.

At the hearing before Sir R. Phillimore, evidence was given in support of these respective allegations. It was shown that the master of the William Lindsay had moored to the buoy without examining it, but it was not proved by the respondents that the defect in the buoy was such that it could not have been discovered by ordinary care.

The remaining facts will be found set out in the judgment of the Judicial Committee.

The learned judge held that the collision was the result of inevitable accident, being of opinion that it was unnecessary to consider the question whether the owners of the William Lindsay were responsible for the breaking of the buoy, as was contended by the plaintiffs (the appellants), because the master having taken the ordinary precaution of having an anchor ready to let go in case of emergency, had done what a prudent seaman was required to, and was only prevented from bringing up his ship by that anchor through the jamming of the cable, which must be considered as an inevitable accident; the learned judge dismissed the defendants from the suit without costs.

From this decree the plaintiffs (the appellants) appealed on the grounds that the court below ought to have considered the question of the liability of the defendants for the insufficiency of the buoy; that the defendants should have proved that the defect could not have been discovered by ordinary care; that the master of the William Lindsay was guilty of negligence in mooring to the buoy without examining its strength and security; and that he was guilty of negligence in not letting go an anchor at the beginning of the gale.

Butt, Q.C. and H. Davison, for the appellants.—The question of the insufficiency of the buoy ought to have been determined in the court below. The defect in the buoy being the primary cause of the collision, it lay upon the respondents to show that the defect could not have been discovered by ordinary care. No doubt the appellants are bound to show a primâ facie case of negligence, but that shown, the onus shifts to the respondents to show excuse for the collision. The appellants have shown that the respondent's ship broke away from her moorings and came into collision with their ship, and that in itself establishes a primâ facie case of negligence, which requires the respondents to show that they took all reasonable precautions to ascertain the security of those moorings. It has been held that once primâ facie evidence has been given, which will justify the court in concluding that the defendant's negligence was the cause of the collision, the onus shifts and the defendant must show that the collision was not occasioned by his negligence, but by some other cause for which he is not responsible: (The Egyptian, 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 56). Here the respondents are bound to prove that they had tested the buoy with a view of ascertaining its sufficiency, otherwise it must be taken that its condition was defective, and that they could have discovered the defect by inspection. It was a private buoy, and must therefore be treated as the property of the respondents for the purposes of this case. No evidence on this point having been given by the respondents, the appellants are entitled to succeed. Again after the storm arose, the master of the William Lindsay was bound as a prudent man to let go his anchor; and, having neglected this precaution, his owners must be held responsible: (The Volcano, 2 W. Rob. 337.) The subsequent jamming of the cable cannot relieve them from the responsibility incurred by their prior negligence.

Dr. Deane, Q.C. and Clarkson for the respondents.—The use of the buoy was permitted by the port authorities, and the master was therefore entitled to consider it as safe and secure without examination. If this is correct, then the having an anchor ready to let go was a sufficient extra precaution, which would have been available but for an inevitable accident.

Butt, Q.C., in reply,

July 26.—Judgment was delivered by Sir MONTAGUE E. SMITH.—This is a case of collision which occurred at Valparaiso on the 23rd Sept. in the year 1871. On that day the William Lindsay, a steam vessel of the respondent's, was driven against the Estrella, a barque of about 500 tons, belonging to the appellants, doing her considerable damage. The Estrella was lying in the harbour at the usual mooring place for vessels to discharge cargo. She was moored in the usual way, with two anchors out at the bow, and one at the stern. She was in a position of entire safety, and undoubtedly no fault can be attributed to her. The William Lindsay was driven against her by the wind, and did her the damage complained of. The question is, whether the injury which was done to the Estrella by the William Lindsay was the result of an accident which ordinary care could not have averted, or whether it was due to any want of care and skill on the part of the William Lindsay. The William Lindsay entered the port on the 19th Sept., and she was moored by the tug which brought her into the port at one of the buoys which belonged to the Steam Tug Company. It appears from the evidence that there are several of these buoys in the port, and that it is usual, when vessels are towed into the port, to moor them to these buoys; that when they discharge cargo they are moored usually to mooring berths, which are appropriated to the discharge and taking in of cargo; but that it occurs at times, where a small quantity only of cargo is to be discharged or taken in, the port authorities allow it to be done at some of these mooring buoys. On the 19th the William Lindsay came in and was so moored. On the 20th, the following day, one of Her Majesty's vessels, the Scout, which happened to be in the port, was about to practise with shotted guns, and the William Lindsay was in the line of fire. It was necessary, therefore, that she should be moved, and it would appear that she was moved by the order of the captain of the port to another buoy belonging to the Steam Tug Company on the other side of the port. This being done, she fastened her cable to the buoy, and she rode there from the 20th Sept. until the 23rd, when the collision took place. It seems that on the 23rd a strong breeze, some of the witnesses say a gale, arose, and blew with considerable strength. It was what is known in the port as a norther, a wind very well known—and undoubtedly a wind which blows with considerable violence, and usually for some length of time.

The vessel rode out the greater part of the gale, and she rode safely until the gale had moderated; but there was, after the gale had moderated, a heavy swell, and during that time the accident occurred which has given occasion for the present suit. The accident was that the iron band which was round the buoy, and in which there was a shackle to which the ship's cable was attached, broke. Of course the ship was no longer held by the buoy, and she began to drift. Now at the time that she so began to drift before the wind she had her anchor ready to let go; and it appears that, without any delay, and as promptly as they well could, her crew let go the anchor, and were paying out the chain, when the windlass became jammed. The consequence was that the anchor did not touch the ground, and she drifted until she came into collision with the Estrella. Now no blame is imputed to the William Lindsay for that jamming of the chain. It appears from the evidence, and was so found by the learned judge below, that the windlass was a proper one, that there were the usual appliances, that the chain was good, and that the men had done nothing wrong in the way they had handled it. It, therefore, was a purely accidental circumstance that the anchor did not find its way to the ground; and if it had found its way to the ground there seems to be no doubt that the ship would have been brought up, and this collision would not have occurred. These being the facts, the question arises whether there was any negligence in what was done or omitted to be done on board this vessel. Now, the master is bound to take all reasonable precautions to prevent his ship doing damage to others. It would be going too far to hold his owners to be responsible because he may have omitted some possible precaution which the event suggests he might have resorted to. The true rule is that he must take all such precautions as a man of ordinary prudence and skill, exercising reasonable foresight, would use to avert danger in the circumstances in which he may happen to be placed. In this case the immediate cause of the mischief was the breaking of the band on the buoy, and it is said that the William Lindsay must be responsible for that breaking, because the master had chosen to moor her to it, and to treat it, without examination, as if it was his own mooring chain. Their Lordships consider that that is not the correct view of the question. The first question is, whether there was negligence on the part of the master in availing himself of the use of the buoy; and, in order to see whether there was such negligence or not, it is necessary to ascertain what was the nature of the buoy, and how it was used and sanctioned. Now it appears that it was one of several buoys which had long been laid down in the port by the Steam Tug Company. It was undoubtedly under the care of a private company, as far as can be collected from the evidence; but the mooring of ships to these buoys is sanctioned by the authorities in the port. It must be assumed that when they give permission to vessels to moor at them, not only when they come into the port, but occasionally to take in and discharge cargo, they sanction the use of these buoys, and treat them as proper and sufficient mooring places for vessels frequenting the port. That being the state of the case as regards these buoys, their Lordships cannot think that there was anything like negligence on the part of the master of the William Lindsay in mooring at one of them without examining for himself whether there might be latent defects in it. These questions of negligence must be decided by what a prudent and skilful seaman would do under the circumstances, and by what he is able to do. It is obvious that no man, however prudent and however desirous to be on the safe side, would be able to examine these buoys, so as to discover whether there were latent defects in them or not. He must, to a certain extent, trust to the sanction which has been given to them by the authorities of the port. No doubt that would not absolve him from all further precaution. He ought not implicitly to trust to that which he cannot to a certainty know is a safe buoy, and he ought to take reasonable precautions, in the event of its not holding him, to bring up, and secure himself from danger. Their Lordships think, however, upon this first question that there was no negligence on the part of the master in mooring to the buoy, and not discovering the defect which undoubtedly led to the accident. Then the next question is, whether, having moored to this buoy, he ought to have taken any other precaution than he did. Now, it is scarcely contended on the part of the appellants that the master need have done more in ordinary weather than fasten his chain as he did to the buoy; but it is suggested that when the gale came on, and when he found it was likely to continue, he should have taken the further precaution of letting go his anchor—not only of keeping it prepared to take the ground, but that he ought to have let it down, and given that further security to his ship. Undoubtedly that is a question well worthy of consideration, but it is a question which depends entirely upon practical seamanship; and their Lordships upon that question have thought it right to consult the nautical assessors, whose valuable assistance they have, and to put the question to them very much in the way in which Dr. Lushington put a similar question to the Trinity Masters in the case of The Volcano (2 W. Rob. 237), which was relied on by the appellants. In that case the Volcano was not moored to a mooring buoy, but she had a small anchor dropped, and a large anchor ready to let go. The question Dr. Lushington put to the Trinity Masters was this: "How far there was an immediate necessity or otherwise for dropping the second anchor, is not the real question in this case. The question is, whether it would not have been a prudent and proper precaution to have done so. I do not mean that you are to strain the matter; but, considering the facts of the case with reference to position of the Helen, the state of the wind, and all the circumstances, you will have to determine how far it is a measure which men acquainted with nautical affairs ought, in ordinary prudence, to have adopted." The nautical assessors, in answer to the question put to them, have informed their Lordships that they think it was a better course for the master of the William Lindsay to have kept his anchor, as it was, prepared to be let go, than, when the storm came on, to have dropped it; that it is not usual nor safe, when vessels are riding at mooring buoys with the length of cable which this vessel had out, to drop an anchor. The more usual and practical, and, as they think, the better course, is to keep the anchor ready to let go in case of accident. That opinion having been given to their Lordships by gentlemen of nautical experience they think it determines the second question in the case in favour of the respondents. It is clear that the William Lindsay had her anchor ready to let go, that she did all that was possible to effect that manoeuvre and to drop the anchor, and she did not succeed in that operation by reason only of an inevitable accident. Under these circumstances their Lordships are of opinion that the judgment of the Judge of the Admiralty Court is right; viz., that no negligence can be imputed to the William Lindsay. The result will be that they will humbly advise Her Majesty to affirm the judgment of the court below, and to dismiss this appeal, with costs.

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Tuesday, July 1, 1873.

THE CHARKIEH.

Collision—Cross cause—Security—Foreign parties—Practice—Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), sect. 34.

Where a cause of damage is instituted in the High Court of Admiralty against a ship, in respect of a collision in which the ship of the plaintiffs is totally lost, and the defendants institute a cross cause in personam against the plaintiffs in respect of the same collision, both parties being foreigners resident abroad, and the plaintiffs decline to give security to answer judgment in the cross cause, or to enter an appearance, the court will apply the provisions of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), sect. 34, and will order proceedings to be stayed in the principal cause until security is given in the cross cause.

In this case a cause of collision was instituted in rem against the Charkieh, a vessel belonging to the Khedive of Egypt, by the owners of the Dutch steamship Batavier, and the Charkieh was arrested. The Batavier was sunk and totally lost, and the owner of the Charkieh instituted against the owners of the Batavier, who were resident abroad, a cross cause of collision in personam in respect of the same collision. (a) The owners of the Batavier had entered no appearance in the cross cause against them, and had declined to give bail.

The cause against the Charkieh now came before the court on motion made on behalf of the owners of the Charkieh that "all proceedings be suspended until appearance has been entered and security given to answer judgment in the cause of damage entitled the Batavier, being the cross cause brought for damage sustained by the defendant herein in respect of the collision which caused the damage for which the plaintiffs are in this cause proceeding against the defendant's ship Charkieh."

Service of the citation in the cross cause had been made upon the attorneys for the plaintiffs in the principal cause in accordance with rule 171 of the Admiralty Rules of 1859.

(a) In this case the Khedive of Egypt had protested against the jurisdiction of the court, but the protest was overruled and the cross cause afterwards instituted: See The Charkieh, ante, vol. 1., p. 581.—ED.

THE MELPOMENE.

[ADM.]

Gibson for the owner of the Charkieh in support of the motion.—Formerly no security could be demanded in a cross cause where the defendant in that cause was out of the country, although this court endeavoured by every means to enforce the giving of such security:

The Seringpatam, 3 W. Rob. 41;

The North American, Lush. 79;

The Heart of Oak, 29 L. J. Adm. 78.

Now by the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), sect. 34, it is enacted that "The High Court of Admiralty may on the application of the defendant in any cause of damage, and on his instituting a cross cause for the damage sustained by him in respect of the same collision, direct that the principal cause and the cross cause be heard at the same time and upon the same evidence; and if in the principal cause the ship of the defendant has been arrested or security given to answer judgment, and in the cross cause the ship of the plaintiff cannot be arrested, and security has not been given to answer judgment therein, the court may, if it think fit, suspend proceedings in the cross cause, until security has been given to answer judgment in the cross cause." Here the Charkieh has been arrested in the principal cause, but the plaintiffs in that cause decline to enter an appearance or to give bail. They are resident abroad, and the owner of the Charkieh has no remedy against them without the assistance of the court. The owners of the Batavier are not entitled to come here and claim against the Charkieh, except upon the terms that they submit to the jurisdiction of the court and give security in the cross cause. The Batavier, being lost, cannot be arrested, and is therefore within the meaning of the section.

Clarkson for the owners of the Batavier.—We are not bound to find security for a non-existent ship. A foreigner cannot institute a suit in this country against another foreigner also non-resident and having no property within the jurisdiction. Unless the owners of the Batavier can be attached there is no jurisdiction. There is no res to proceed against, and no means of putting the process of the court into effect. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The contention is that the party claiming must submit to the lex fori. It has often been held here that the court has jurisdiction in cases of collision between foreign ships.] No doubt it was so held in The Johann Friederich (1 W. Rob. 35), but that was a proceeding in rem, and the res was in the hands of the court; whilst here the cross cause is in personam. The fact that we are before the court in another cause will not give jurisdiction in the cross cause. Moreover the section relied on only applies to a case where the ship is in existence, and a proceeding in rem is instituted, but the ship, having been removed from the jurisdiction cannot be arrested. It does not apply where there can be no arrest under any circumstances. No bail can be required where there is no proceeding in rem.

Gibson in reply.—The section is remedial, and should be liberally construed. The words "security has not been given," would apply rather to a suit in personam than to a suit in rem. The word "bail" is not used, and that is the ordinary expression when a ship can be arrested.

July 1.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The court ought not to be astute to find other than a liberal meaning to the sections of a remedial statute.

I take a different view from Mr. Clarkson of the construction of the statute. The court has power, I think, to stay the proceedings in the principal cause until such time as security shall have been given by the defendants in the cross cause. I think it is equitable that such should be the rule. The owners of the Batavier have instituted a cause of damage in this court, and they have obtained security in that cause by the arrest of the ship, but as defendants in the cross cause they refuse to give security. This court administers private international law, and here it must be remembered that both parties are foreigners, and that they are proceeding in this court for a tort. Now this Act was expressly passed to remedy a defect in the former curtailed practice of the court in this respect. I am clearly of opinion that the plaintiff in the cross cause is entitled to the security for which he asks, and it must be given within a week.

THE MELPOMENE.

Salvage—Attempt to render assistance—Ultimate salvage by others—Right to reward.

Where a vessel makes a signal of distress, and another goes out with the bonâ fide intention of assisting that distress, and as far as she can does so, but some accident occurs which prevents her services being as effectual as she intended them to be, and no blame attaches to her, the Court of Admiralty will not allow her to go entirely unrewarded, but for the interests of commerce and navigation, and as an encouragement to perform salvage services will give some reward (semble) if the property is saved by other means.

THIS was a consolidated cause of salvage instituted on behalf of the owners, masters, and crew of the steamtugs Fiery Cross and Resolute, and against the ship Melpomene, and her cargo and freight. Both tugs belonged to the New Steamtug Company (Limited), and were of considerable power and value. The Melpomene at the time of the services had just started upon a voyage from Liverpool to Melbourne, and her values were agreed to be—ship, 17,500*l.*, cargo, 72,324*l.*, and freight to be paid at Melbourne, 2421*l.* 7*s.* 8*d.*, making a total value of 92,245*l.* 7*s.* 8*d.*

From the evidence it appeared that about 3 a.m. on the morning of 9th Dec. 1872, the Resolute was lying in the river Mersey, near Seacombe Wall, when she sighted the Melpomene in collision with a screw steamer and drifting up the river on the flood tide. The Resolute followed the two vessels for the purpose of rendering assistance, and on the screw steamer getting clear of the Melpomene, went close to the latter, and was hailed by the Melpomene's crew to pass a hawser on board. This was attempted, but at first without success, and the Melpomene continued to drift up the river, and thereupon began to burn blue lights for assistance. When the Melpomene was nearly abreast of Woodside Ferry, another tug came up and attempted to make fast, but also failed. The Resolute having again got into position, succeeded in passing a hawser on board the Melpomene, and her crew were told that it had been made fast on board the Melpomene, and were ordered to go ahead. The Resolute accordingly went ahead, but the hawser, not having been made fast, came away, and the Resolute again got out of position. Meanwhile the Fiery Cross came up, in answer to the signals for assistance, and succeeded in getting hold of the Melpomene and towing her, with the assistance of two other tugs, to a place of safety. The wind and sea during the whole service were very high, and there was considerable danger to the Melpomene from the risk she ran of drifting into other vessels or on shore.

THE CITY OF MOBILE.

The defendants admitted that the Fiery Cross had rendered salvage services and paid into court a sum of 120*l.* as sufficient remuneration for those services; but they denied that any service was rendered by the Resolute, and prayed that her claim might be dismissed.

Butt, Q.C. and Cohen, for the plaintiffs, contended that the tender was insufficient. As to the claim of the Resolute, it is not because the efforts of a vessel to render assistance are unavailing, that she cannot recover reward. The ship was ultimately saved by other persons, but the Resolute endeavoured to render assistance, and would have done so, but for an accident which occurred through no fault of her own. Moreover the burning of blue lights was a call for assistance, and in consequence of that call any vessel bonâ fide attempted to render aid in a proper manner, the owners of the Melpomene must be considered to have given an implied undertaking through their servants that they would pay for such services.

The E. U. 1 Spinks, 66;

The Undaunted, Lush. 91; 2 L. T. Rep. N. S. 520.

Milward, Q.C., and E. C. Clarkson for the defendants.—The amount tendered is sufficient. No further claim can be made in respect of the Resolute, because there can be no salvage reward where the exertions, however meritorious, do not contribute to the successful result.

The Edward Hawkins, Lush. 515.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE stated the facts, and awarded to the owners and crew of the Fiery Cross the sum of 150*l.* and then continued:—With regard to the question in this case, whether the Resolute is entitled to any remuneration at all, I have had considerable difficulty, seeing that her intention, however good, was according to the evidence practically executed, but, on the other hand, I think there are no cases which would stand in the way of my adopting as a principle this, which appears to me of considerable importance to the interests of commerce and navigation, especially at the present time—namely, that where a vessel makes a signal of distress, and another goes out with the bonâ fide intention of assisting that distress, and, as far as she can, does so, and some accident occurs, which prevents her services being as effectual as she intended them to be, and no blame attaches to her, she ought not to go wholly unrewarded. I think it is for the interests of commerce and navigation, and also for the encouragement of others to perform salvage services, that some remuneration should be given. I think a slight remuneration will suffice on the present occasion, and I shall award the Resolute 50*l.*

Master's wages and disbursements—Master also co-owner—Right of the co-owners to set-off ship's expenses—Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict., c. 104) s. 191—Pleading.

In a suit for wages and disbursements by a master, who is also co-owner, the other co-owners may, under the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) s. 191, set up a counter-claim or set-off in respect of out-standing co-ownership accounts, and claim that the balance (if any) be paid to them.

To a petition claiming master's wages and disbursements, and praying a reference of any accounts arising in respect thereto to the registrar and merchants, an answer alleging the master to be also co-owner, and that accounts are outstanding between the plaintiff and the defendants, as co-owners, showing a balance on all accounts in favour of the defendants, and praying a reference to the registrar and merchants of all masters' and co-ownership accounts, will be allowed by the High Court of Admiralty,

THIS was a cause of wages and disbursements, instituted on behalf of Thomas Purday, late master of the City of Mobile. The petition alleged that the plaintiff had agreed to become master of the ship at the wages of 300*l.* per annum, and 2*l.* per week board wages when ashore: that the plaintiff had made two voyages as master of the ship, and in respect of the first voyage his account for wages and disbursements had been settled; that upon the completion of the second voyage in March, 1873, the plaintiff had delivered to the owners of the said ship his account for wages and disbursements upon the said voyage; that there was due and owing to the plaintiff as master, 554*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* for such wages and disbursements, in respect of the second voyage, and notwithstanding the plaintiff had applied to the defendants for payment, they had refused and neglected to pay the same, and that the said sum was still due to the plaintiff, together with a sum equal to ten days' double pay, under and according to the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (sect. 189). The petition concluded by praying the judge to pronounce for the said claim, and to condemn the defendants therein, and in the costs of the cause, and to refer any question of accounts arising between the parties with reference to such accounts, to the registrar and merchants.

To this petition the defendants filed the following answer:—

The defendants admit that the plaintiff earned wages, and made certain disbursements as master of the City of Mobile, but they say that his accounts in respect thereof are not accurate, and that the plaintiff was during the voyage in respect of which he is claiming, and that he is still, owner of sixteen sixty-fourth parts or shares in the said ship, and that accounts are outstanding and unsettled between the plaintiff and defendants as co-owners of the said vessel, and that upon the balance of all the accounts between the plaintiff as master and co-owner, and the defendants, nothing is due from the plaintiff, but on the contrary, a sum of money is due from the plaintiff to the defendants.

The answer concluded by praying the judge "to refer all accounts outstanding and unsettled, between the plaintiff and the defendants, both as to the wages and disbursements of the plaintiff as master of the said ship, and as to the earnings and disbursements of the said ship, to the registrar, assisted by merchants, to report thereon, and to condemn the plaintiff to pay the defendants the balance which shall appear due from him to them with costs."

The plaintiff, on this answer being filed, gave notice of motion calling on the defendants to show cause why so much of the prayer of the answer as related to the plaintiff's co-ownership and the co-ownership accounts, and so much of the prayer of the answer as prayed that those accounts might be referred to the registrar and merchants should not be struck out.

R. G. Williams and H. James in support of the motion.—It is not competent for the defendants to set-off a claim not directly arising out of the relation of master and owners; hence they cannot plead by way of set-off any such claim arising out of matters immaterial to the issue. The claims pleaded here are matters in account between the plaintiff as owner and his co-owners, and not between him, as master, and his owners. [The Admiralty Advocate referred to The Feronia, L. Rep. 2 Adm. & Ecc. 65; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 619; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 54.] That case does not go beyond the short point that a co-owner may sue as master for his wages, and so far supports our case, but it does not show in any way that the other co-owners may set-off their claims. Fair deductions the court is entitled to make; but what is purely matter of set-off arising out of extraneous matters not connected with wages cannot be entertained—

Williams and Bruce, Adm. Practice, pp. 170, 171;

The D. Jez, 13 L. T. Rep. N. S. 22; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 263.

In Parsons on Shipping, p. 433, it is said: "If the respondent has a claim against the libellant, he can in many cases avail himself of it in his answer as a set-off. The Admiralty has no jurisdiction of an independent set-off, and those usually allowed are where advances have been made upon the credit of the particular debt or demand for which the plaintiff sues, or which operates by way of diminished compensation for maritime services, on account of imperfect performance, misconduct, or negligence, or as a restitution in value for damages sustained in consequence of gross violations of the contract."

The Lady Campbell, 2 Hagg. Adm. 14, n;

Dexter v. Monroe, 2 Sprague (U. S. District Court, Massachusetts), 39.

In the last-cited case a court of admiralty refused to allow a set-off to be pleaded in a suit for master's wages, he being co-owner, and his co-owners seeking to retain the balance of his wages on account of a claim made by them as co-owners, against the master as co-owner. It is equitable that master's wages should be paid to him as subsistence money. The set-off should only be allowed if it arises out of a claim made in respect of the particular voyage in which the wages are earned, and out of the relation of master and owner as such. No doubt the language of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 194), sect. 191, is very wide, but looking at the subject matter and the interpretation given to it in The D. Jez (ubi sup.), it can only relate to claims as between master and owner.

The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C.) and Clarkson for the defendants.—This is a suit for wages and disbursements, not, as in the cases cited from Parsons on Shipping, for wages only. The plaintiff claims a balance, and the defendants say that for the purpose of ascertaining that balance all the accounts must be gone into. The 191st section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 includes not only a set-off but also a counter-claim; and this signifies any outstanding accounts. The section directs the payment of the balance to whomsoever it may be due, and this we claim. Once the accounts are opened they must be all gone through, and a balance made.

The Glentanner, Swab. 422;

The Caledonia, Swab. 19.

A master who is also co-owner has only the same rights as the other co-owners, and cannot claim to be paid a balance except upon the whole accounts between them. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—That does not agree with The D. Jez (ubi sup.); for there it is said that only matters relating to wages and disbursements can be gone into.] In that case the only question at issue was whether the court should take cognizance of an equitable claim of the master, and it was held that such a claim could not in any way come under the head of either wages or disbursements. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Can you in any way bring your counter claim under the head of wages and disbursements?] The counter claim relates to disbursements made by the managing owners on ship's account during the last voyage only, and the plaintiff's share of these disbursements we claim to deduct. A master cannot equitably claim a balance in his favour as master, and evade payment of a balance against him as co-owner, more especially where part of his claim is for disbursements against which his co-owners seek to set-off other disbursements. If this part of the answer is struck out the court will, in effect, compel the defendants to bring another suit for co-partnership accounts. The plaintiff might in one suit claim not only his wages and disbursements, but also his share of the ship's earnings, as co-owner; why cannot his other co-owners set these last off in this suit? The master could have no action at common law to recover wages against his co-owners, as they would have to be paid out of property in which he himself holds a share. He sues in this court, therefore, as in a court of equity, and such a court will not allow him to succeed against his co-owners, when he himself is indebted to them. The 191st section is wide enough to include such a set-off, and really gives power to refer all matters of account between the parties.

R. G. Williams, in reply.—The co-ownership accounts are necessarily complicated, and should be settled in another suit; otherwise the court has before it no claim in respect of these accounts. At the time of the passing of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, a master could only claim in respect of his wages, and not for disbursements as well; and by The D. Jez only such things as directly related to wages could be set-off. The right to claim for disbursements arose only under the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, sect. 10, and the passing of that section does not give any right to set off claims other than might have been set off previously.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is an application to the court to strike out certain portions of the answer in a suit of wages and disbursements, instituted on behalf of the master of the vessel, against certain owners of the vessel. The master is himself a co-owner, and his co-owners set up a defence that "upon the balance of all the accounts between the plaintiff as master and co-owner, and the defendants, nothing is due to the plaintiff, but, on the contrary, that a sum of money is due from the plaintiff to the defendants." Now, the 191st section of the Merchant Shipping Act enacts that "every master of a ship shall, so far as the case permits, have the same rights, liens, and remedies for the recovery of his wages which by this act, or by any law or custom, any seaman, not being a master, has for the recovery of his wages; and if any proceeding in any court of Admiralty or Vice-Admiralty, touching the claim of a master to wages, any right of set-off or counter-claim is set up, it shall be lawful for such court to enter into and adjudicate upon all questions, and to settle all accounts then arising, or outstanding and unsettled between the parties to the proceedings, and to direct payment of any balance which is found to be due." I think it would be impossible to deny that the language of this section is amply wide enough to cover the set-off pleaded in the article objected to—and the only question which has perplexed the mind of the court is whether the decision in the case of the D. Jez (13 L. T. Rep. N. S., 22; 2 Mar. Law Cas., O.S. 263) affords a precedent which limits the construction to be put upon the words of the clause, in the manner contended for; that is, whether the provisions of the section are wholly confined to a set-off of claims in the capacity of master and owner, or include a set-off of claims arising out of the relation of master and co-owner. In the case of the D. Jez, Dr. Lushington, after referring to the section, said, "Now what is the meaning of the words, 'to settle all accounts then arising or outstanding and unsettled between the parties to the proceeding.' It will be observed that it was only in case of a set-off or counter-claim that this power was conferred upon the court. It is true that in this case there has been a counter-claim, but it appears to me that the intention was not to refer to this court the decision of all questions which might exist between the parties on matters entirely foreign to wages and disbursements. The object of this section was to enable the court to do justice whenever the owners set up a counter-claim with reference to the ship or her disbursements. All these are matters properly cognizable by the Court of Admiralty, but the exposition set up by the plaintiff might include matters wholly foreign to its jurisdiction, and to the decisions of which it is unaccustomed." It has been truly said that it would be competent to the court to entertain in counter-claims now set up by the defendants in another suit, and that in all probability the court would hold its hand, and not pay out the sum found due to the master for wages till after the decision in this second suit. It is clear that these counter-claims relate to the ship and her disbursements, and are cognizable by the court in another, if not in this, suit. Then the court has a strong inclination in the interests of justice, as well as of the parties, not to lean towards that construction of the section which would lead to a multiplicity of suits. I am of opinion that the portions objected to in the answer should stand, and I must therefore reject the prayer of the motion. The costs to be costs in the cause.

EBSWORTH AND OTHERS v. THE ALLIANCE MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Marine insurance—Insurable interest—Open policy—Right of consignees to insure.

The plaintiffs who are cotton brokers and agents in London were, in the course of their business, in the habit of receiving consignments of cotton from Bell and Co., of Bombay, and other correspondents abroad, the plaintiffs making advances by acceptances against the consignments. The bills of exchange were usually negotiated in India and sent to the plaintiffs with the bills of lading attached, who accepted the same against delivery of the shipping documents. The plaintiffs usually insured the cotton thus consigned to them from Bombay with the defendants, by means of an open floating policy for 5000*l.* on cotton, lost or not lost, from Bombay to London, in ship or ships, and the insurances were expressed to be made "as well in their own names as for and in the name or names of all and every person and persons to whom the same doth, may, and shall appertain in part or in all."

Bell and Co., having advised the plaintiffs of a shipment of cotton, drew upon the plaintiffs for 3000*l.*, at six months' sight, at the same time requesting the plaintiffs to insure the cotton. The bill of exchange was negotiated by a bank in India and the plaintiffs accepted it on its arrival in London against the delivery of the shipping documents. The plaintiffs having two open policies then running with the defendants declared the cotton against them, and at the same time wrote to the London branch of the bank offering "to hold the amount insured at their disposal until payment of the acceptance for 3000*l.*"

The vessel in which the cotton was shipped having been lost at sea, the plaintiffs paid the bill of exchange for 3000*l.*, obtained possession of the bill of lading, and demanded the policy moneys from the defendants. Payment being refused, the plaintiffs brought an action on the policies, averring that the plaintiffs, or some or one of them, were or was interested in the goods to the full amount claimed, and that the insurances were made for the use and benefit and on account of the person or persons so interested.

Held (per Bovill, C.J., and Denman, J.), that the plaintiffs had an equitable interest in every part of the cotton, they being liable upon their acceptance, and that the plaintiffs had such an interest in selling and managing the consignment as in law entitled them to insure; and also that as the plaintiffs intended to cover the interests of all parties interested in the cotton, they might recover the full amount under a declaration averring interest in themselves, applying the proceeds to the extent of their claims, and holding the remainder as trustees for the other persons beneficially interested.

Held (per Keating and Brett, JJ.), that the plaintiffs having made advances on goods in transitu, had only a contract right in the cotton to have the bill of lading endorsed to them on payment of their acceptance: and that they, as consignees, though they were interested in every part, were not the legal owners, nor the trustees for the persons beneficially interested, and could not therefore recover more than their own beneficial interest.

THIS was an action brought to recover the amount due to the plaintiffs on two open floating marine policies on goods for 5000*l*.

The plaintiffs were cotton brokers and agents in London, and as such were in the habit of receiving from Belt and Co., of Bombay, consignments of cotton for sale. Against such consignment they made advances by acceptances. Having in May 1870 received from Bell and Co. advice of the shipment of 250 bales of cotton per Aurora, consigned to them on the joint account of Bell and Co. and one Cursondas Madhowdass, the plaintiffs, accepted a bill at six months sight for 3000*l*., drawn by Bell and Co. on account of the shipment, and acting on instructions from Bell and Co., declared the cotton so consigned on the open policies with the defendants. The plaintiffs paid their acceptances at maturity and received the bill of lading; this was after the loss of the cotton. Both ship and cargo were totally lost on 11th June 1870.

The plaintiffs alleged in their declaration "that the plaintiffs or some one of them were or was interested in the said goods to the amount of the moneys by them insured thereon, and that the said insurance was made for the use and benefit and on account of the person or persons so interested." The pleas traversed the allegations that the plaintiffs caused them to be insured or alleged, and that the goods or any part of them were shipped as alleged, and also that the plaintiffs were not interested in the said goods, nor were the insurances made for the benefit of such persons as alleged. At the trial before Keating, J., at the sittings at Guildhall, after Hilary Term, 1872, a verdict was found for the plaintiffs for the whole amount insured subject to leave reserved to the defendants to move to enter a verdict for them, if the court should be of opinion that the plaintiffs had not an insurable interest, or to reduce the damages to 3000*l*. in the event of the court being of opinion that the interest alleged and proved and the plaintiffs' right to recover was limited to the amount of their actual advance. The court was to have power to draw inferences of fact.

Sir John Karlake, Q.C., having obtained a rule pursuant to leave reserved.

H. James, Q.C., and Watkin Williams, Q.C., showed cause.—The whole legal interest was in the plaintiffs when they accepted the draft; that from that date they would only be obliged to account to the consignees for any surplus that might remain after they had been paid. Even if they had not the whole interest, they had such an interest in whole and every part of the goods as would give them an insurable interest in the whole. They might insure to the full value in their own names holding the surplus above their own actual interest as trustees for the consignors. The whole of the goods must be treated as security for these advances. They cited:

 2 Duer on Insur. 22, 29, 74.

Sir John Karlake and Cohen in support of the rule.—The plaintiffs have no insurable interest in the cotton. Their interest is only an expectancy of profit resting upon a contingency. If they have any interest at all, it is merely to the extent of their actual interest, viz., 3000*l*., and they can only insure in their own names and on their own behalf to the extent of that interest. The plaintiffs were not in law nor in equity trustees of this cotton, and hence without a beneficial interest equal to the whole value of the goods, they cannot insure to the full value nor recover the full value. July 15.—BOVILL, C.J.—I regret to say that, after the very able arguments of the learned counsel on both sides, and the assistance which we derived from them, and after much consideration on our part, the members of the court who heard the argument are equally divided in opinion as to the result. I will first deliver judgment on behalf of my brother Denman and myself. The action was brought upon two policies of insurance, to recover a loss upon cotton shipped at Bombay for Liverpool by a vessel called the Aurora. Both policies were effected by the plaintiffs in their own names, under the firm of Irving, Ebsworth and Holmes, and were two of a series of insurances which they had effected in the usual course of their business. The plaintiffs were brokers and agents engaged in the cotton trade in London, and were in the habit of receiving consignments of cotton from Bombay for sale on behalf of the shippers, who drew bills upon the plaintiffs against the consignments. These bills were usually negotiated in India, with the bills of lading attached as security, and were then remitted to this country. The holders of the bills on their arrival here presented them to the plaintiffs for acceptance, and the plaintiffs accepted them against delivery of the shipping documents; their security being the goods in respect of which the bills were drawn. The holders of the bills of lading had no further interest in them, or in the goods which they represented, than as security for payment of the bills drawn upon and accepted by the plaintiffs, subject to which the plaintiffs had the right to the bills of lading as security for the amount for which they had come under acceptance against the consignment; and they had also the right to sell the goods for their reimbursement, as well as to earn their commission upon the sales, and had generally to manage the consignment. The plaintiffs were in the habit of effecting insurances with the defendants to cover goods thus consigned to them; and the policies, including those now sued upon, were all in the same form, expressing in the usual way that they were made by the plaintiffs "as well as in their own names as for and in the name or names of all and every person or persons to whom the same doth, may, or shall appertain in part or in all," and were each for 5000*l.* "on cotton [or] produce from Bombay to London or Liverpool direct or via Havre . . . by ship or ships," and at the rate or premium per cent. stated in each policy. As the plaintiffs received advices of the shipment, they declared to the defendants, and upon the policies, the particulars and value of the goods and the names of the vessels by which they were shipped. The terms on which goods were to be shipped are contained in the following extract of a letter from the plaintiffs to Messrs. Robert Bell and Co. of Bombay, dated the 28th Oct. 1869 :

EBSWORTH AND OTHERS v. THE ALLIANCE MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Our previous letters of credit for advances on cotton to our consignment having expired, we beg leave to renew the same as follows : You are by the present authorised to value on us at usance at the rate of 10*l.* sterling per bale of cotton, cost f. o. b. and freight, against shipping documents and timely insurance orders or policies of insurance ; and we engage to accept your drafts so drawn on presentation, and to pay the same at maturity, or previously, at our option, under discount. The shipments not to exceed 200 bales of cotton by any one vessel, and the present credit to be limited to 30th April next, unless previously withdrawn.

On the 28th April 1870, Messrs. Robert Bell and Co., in Bombay, shipped 250 bales of cotton on board the Aurora for Liverpool, under bills of lading making the goods deliverable to them or order, and the freight to be paid at the port of discharge. On the 29th April, Messrs. Robert Bell and Co. wrote to the plaintiffs as follows :

We have now the pleasure to inform you that we have induced Mr. Cursondas Madhowdass (respectable merchant of this place) to ship in joint account with ourselves 250 bales new Dho Uera cotton per ship Aurora (freight at 1*l.* per ton), and against this shipment we have valued upon your good selves by this opportunity, through the National Bank of India, p. 3000*l.*, at six montas sight (ex. 1*s.* 11*d.*), to which we crave your kind protection. Sample of this shipment goes forward overland to your address by this mail. We hope this cotton will arrive with you at a very favourable opportunity ; and confiding the same to your care and attention, and referring to the accompanying letter for market information we remain, &c.,

ROBERT BELL AND CO.

There was a further shipment by Messrs. Robert Bell and Co., of 250 other bales of cotton by the same vessel ; and upon the whole of the cotton Messrs. Bell and Co. had advanced Cursondas Madhowdass a sum of 6000*l.* A bill of exchange for 3000*l.* in respect of the 250 bales first mentioned was drawn by Robert Bell and Co., payable to their own order, upon the plaintiffs, and payable at six months after sight. This bill of exchange was indorsed by Robert Bell and Co., and then discounted by them with the National Bank of India, in Bombay ; and at the same time, as security for the acceptance and due payment of the bill, Messrs. Robert Bell and Co. placed in the hands of the bank the bills of lading for the 250 bales of cotton against which the bill of exchange was drawn. The following letter was also signed by Robert Bell and Co., and given to the National Bank of India :

Bombay, 28th April, 1879.

To the Manager of the National Bank of India, Limited.

Sir,—Having this day negotiated to you one bill of exchange drawn by us on Messrs. Irving, Ebsworth and Holmes, of London, the particulars of which are noted at foot, and having at the same time as collateral securities for the due payment of the said bill indorsed to you the bills of lading and handed to you the shipping documents of the several goods, also stated at foot—we hereby authorise you or any of your managers or agents, if you or he shall think fit, at our expense to insure the above goods from sea risk, including loss by capture, and also from loss by fire on shore, in case Messrs. Irving, Ebsworth and Holmes (the plaintiffs) shall omit to do so immediately after notice from you to that effect, and to add the premiums and expenses of such insurances to the amount chargeable to us in respect of the said bills. We also authorise you or any such manager or agent, if you or he shall think fit, to sell any portion of the said goods which you or he may deem necessary, for payment of freight and of such premiums and expenses of insurance, and to take such charges for commission as in ordinary cases between a merchant and his correspondent. We also authorise you and the holders of the above bills for the time being to take, if you or they shall think fit, conditional acceptances to all or any of such bills, to the effect that, on payment thereof at maturity, the above-mentioned bills of lading and shipping documents shall be delivered to the drawees or acceptors thereof ; such authorisation on our part to extend to cases of acceptance for honour. We further authorise you or any of your managers or agents, on default being made in acceptance on presentment or in payment at maturity of any of the above bills, to sell the said goods or a competent part thereof, and to apply the net proceeds (after deducting usual commission and charges), as far as they will go, in or towards payment of such bills, with re-exchange and charges, and to retain the surplus balance, if any, and place the same against any other of our bills which may at the time be in your hands ; and, subject thereto, we request you to account for such surplus, if any, to the proper parties. We further authorise you or the holders of the said bills, for the time being, at any time before their maturity, to accept payment from the drawees or acceptors thereof, if required so to do, and on payment to deliver the said bill of lading and shipping documents to such drawees or acceptors ; and we request that you or the holders of the said bills will allow, if required, in that event, discount thereon for the time such bills may have to run, at the Bank of England minimum rate of the day, if taken up in London, or if in ———, at the current rate of discount of the day on government acceptances in ———, but not to exceed the rate of five per cent. per annum.

Messrs. Robert Bell and Co. at the same time also handed to the National Bank an order for insurance addressed to the plaintiffs, in the following terms :

Bombay, 28th April 1870.

Messrs. Irving, Ebsworth, and Holmes, London.

Dear Sirs,—We have to request you will effect English insurance on 250 bales of cotton shipped by us per Aurora for Liverpool, to the extent of 20*l.* per bale, and will thank you to deliver the policy to the National Bank of India, London, with their lien duly secured thereon, to be held by them until payment of our draft on you for 3000*l.*, dated 28th April 1870. We beg to add that, should you omit to effect insurance, the bank will be at liberty to insure the shipment for their own protection, and recover the cost from you before giving up the bill of lading.

(Signed) ROBERT BELL AND CO.

The letter of hypothecation was countersigned by Cursondas Madhowdass, who was interested with Bell and Co. in the adventure ; and he also indorsed the bill of exchange, and wrote and gave to the National Bank a letter addressed to the plaintiffs (but which was not shown to them until after payment of their acceptance), in the following terms:

Bombay, 29th April 1870.

Messrs. Irving, Ebsworth, and Holmes.

Gentlemen,—I beg to advise you that I have shipped to your care, through Messrs. Robert Bell and Co. of this place, the undermentioned cotton; and I enclose invoice thereof, amounting to R. 38,981, 6. Against the same I have drawn upon you as at foot, with the endorsement of the above-mentioned firm, and I beg your kind protection of my draft. I shall also feel obliged by your effecting insurance to the extent of 18*l.* p. B. (eighteen pounds per bale). On arrival of the shipment, please sell it to the best advantage, remitting to me any balance that may be due hereafter. Should, however, the net proceeds fall short of the amount of your acceptance, together with any charges that may have been incurred by you, I hereby authorise you to draw upon me at usance for the difference, and I agree to honour any such draft or drafts that may be passed upon me, and also to accept as correct all accounts that may be rendered.

(Signed)

CURSONDAS MADHOWDASS.

Then followed particulars of the shipment, describing by marks the 250 bales new Dho Uera, per Aurora, and bill dated 28th April 1870, for 3000*l.*, adding—“The cotton sample sent to you represents fair average quality of the 250 bales.” No bill of exchange, however, was drawn by Cursondas Madhowdass in respect of the 250 bales of cotton now in question. The National Bank of India remitted the bill of exchange for 3000*l.* and the other documents which had been given to them by Robert Bell and Co. to the chief manager of their bank in London. The bill of exchange was presented to the plaintiffs for acceptance on the 21st May, and they gave a conditional acceptance, as contemplated by the letter of hypothecation, in the following terms: “Accepted, 21st May 1870, against delivery of shipping documents for 250 bales cotton per Aurora. Irving, Ebsworth and Holmes.” The order for insurance from Messrs. Robert Bell and Co. was also shown to the plaintiffs by the National Bank; and it was arranged between them that the 250 bales of cotton per Aurora should be declared by the plaintiffs upon their own policies with the defendants’ company, which were then running. At this time the plaintiffs had effected two open policies with the defendants for 5000*l.*, one of which was dated the 23rd Nov. 1869, and the other the 17th Dec. 1869; and as there remained a balance of 846*l.* not declared for upon the November policy, the plaintiffs declared that amount upon the policy, and a declaration, following other similar declarations, was made on the policy, under the general heading of “The interest attaching to the within policy is hereby declared to be shipped and valued as under,” as follows, viz.: “23/5/70. per Aurora to Liverpool direct. [Marks] 250 bales of cotton, valued at 5000*l.*, attaching to this policy 846*l.*” A similar declaration of interest was endorsed upon the December policy, stating it to be “Per Aurora, balance from preceding policy on 250 bales cotton, valued at 5000*l.*, 4154*l.*” These are the policies upon which the plaintiffs are now suing in this action. The plaintiffs then sent the following letter to the National Bank of India:

London, 27th May, 1870.

To the chief manager of the National Bank of India, Limited, London.

Sir,—We beg to inform you that we have declared on our open marine policies for 5000*l.* dated 23rd Nov. 1869, 5000*l.* dated 17th Dec. 1869, effected with the Alliance Insurance Company, the following shipments from Bombay to Liverpool, as per specification at foot; and we hereby undertake and guarantee to hold the amount insured at your disposal until payment of our acceptance for 3000*l.* due 24th Nov.

IRVING, EBSWORTH, and HOLMES.

The Aurora left Bombay on the voyage in question, and was lost at sea on the 11th June 1870, and there was a total loss of the cotton. On the 24th Nov. following, the plaintiffs paid their acceptance at maturity, and received from the National Bank the bill of lading, which until that day had remained with the bank as security for payment of the acceptance. The declaration contained averments (which were traversed) that the plaintiffs, or one of them, were or was interested in the goods to the amount of all the moneys by them insured thereon, and that the insurances were made for the use and benefit and on account of the person or persons so interested; and the question discussed upon the argument depended upon the issues raised. There was also a denial of the plaintiffs having caused themselves to be insured. It was agreed on the argument that the court should be at liberty to draw such inferences of fact as a jury should have drawn; and power was reserved to the court to amend the pleadings, if necessary. Upon the facts proved at the trial, it appears to us that the shipment in question was one of that description which was intended to be covered by, and which the plaintiffs were at liberty to declare upon, their floating policies. From the nature of the transactions in which they were engaged, their object in keeping on foot a succession of open policies must have been to cover shipments which might from time to time be consigned to them; and both they and the underwriters must, we think, be taken to have contemplated that the transactions would be conducted in the usual course of business, which is, that, when goods are so consigned, bills of exchange would be drawn upon the plaintiffs by the shippers, which would or might be negotiated with third parties with the bills of lading attached as security. Before the bill of exchange in this case was accepted the bill of lading and the goods which it represented would be a security to the holders of the bill of exchange, and the plaintiffs would have no present interest in them; but as soon as the plaintiffs accepted the bill, they became bound to pay it upon the shipping documents being delivered to them: Smith v. Vertue (9 C. B., N. S., 214); and, in the ordinary course of business, when the bill arrived at maturity, upon the plaintiffs paying the amount, the bill of lading would be handed to them. It was also contemplated as appears by the concluding part of Messrs. Bell and Co.’s letter to the National Bank, of the 28th April 1870, that the plaintiffs might desire to take up the bill of lading and pay the amount of their acceptance before maturity, and this would be in accordance with the usual course of business, in order to enable the plaintiffs, as consignees for the shippers, to take advantage of a favourable market and to make immediate sales of the cotton.

The bill of exchange being drawn by the shippers, and accepted by the plaintiffs against the consignment, that consignment immediately became an equitable security to the plaintiffs for the amount of their acceptance; and they would have been entitled in equity to have the cotton appropriated for their reimbursement—Ex parte Barber (3 Mont. D. & D. 174); Ex parte Mackey (2 Mont. D. & D. 136); and see also the recent case before the Lords Justices of Ex parte Smart, Re Richardson (L. Rep. 8 Ch. 220; 28 L. T. Rep. N. L. 146); and The Bank of Ireland v. Perry (L. Rep. 7 Ex. 14; 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 845). The plaintiffs would further be entitled to their commission on the sale of the goods, and also to be reimbursed the cost of the insurance, and their other expenses in respect of the consignment; and it was their business to sell, manage, and dispose of the cotton as consignees. The equitable interest of the plaintiffs, after coming under acceptance against the shipment, was not in any particular portion of the cotton, but in the whole and every part of it: and no portion of it could have been withdrawn without diminishing their security. They had also the power to sell and dispose of every portion of it, and to receive the purchase-money. Under these circumstances, were they entitled to insure in their own names the whole of the cotton, and to its full value, or were they entitled to insure the cotton only to the extent of their personal liability under their acceptance?

It is clear that the mortgagee of goods by assignment would be entitled to insure the whole of the goods in his own name, and to their full value, and, in case of a loss, would be entitled to recover in his own name the full amount of the insurance, and would be a trustee for the mortgagor as to any surplus beyond the amount of his own debt. The plaintiffs, having an interest in every part of the cotton, would, as it appears to us, stand in the same position in equity as a strict mortgagee in a court of law, and would be clearly entitled to insure themselves against the loss of the cotton, as affecting not only their security for reimbursement of the amount of their acceptance, but also their commission on the sale; but it also appears to us that, having an equitable security upon the whole of the goods and every part of them, and the duty of selling and managing the consignment, they might, if it was so intended, insure in their own names, not only their own individual interest in the cotton, but also the interest of the other parties interested. viz., the shippers (Messrs. Bell and Co.) and the National Bank of India. Prima facie, an insurance by a mortgagee, whether legal or equitable, would cover only his own particular interest in the goods; but if the insurance was, as between him and the underwriters, intended to cover the interest of all parties and the whole value of the goods, there would be no objection to a legal mortgagee so insuring in his own name to cover all the interests and the entire value of the goods; and we think there is equally no objection to an equitable mortgagee, or a person who stands in a similar position, insuring in like manner. An insurable interest is clearly not confined to a strict legal right of property. It then becomes a question of fact what was the interest intended to be covered by the policy. If it was only the individual interest of the mortgagee, he could recover only the amount of that interest; but if the insurance was intended to cover the interest of the mortgagor also, then he would be entitled to recover in his own name for both interests: (See Irving v. Richardson, 2 B. & A. 193). In that case the assured, though a mortgagee of the ship, had under the Registry Acts no legal ownership, but only an equitable interest in it; and yet it was considered that he might insure and recover in his own name the whole amount, if the insurance was intended to cover the mortgagor's interest as well as his own; and that whether it was so intended or not, was the proper question to be left to the jury in such a case: (See also the observations of Parke, B., in Sutherland v. Pratt, 12 Mee & W. 17). Upon the facts of the present case, and having power to draw inferences, we can entertain no doubt that the insurances effected by the plaintiffs were intended to cover the whole interest of all the parties interested in the consignments. They seem to us to have been effected for that express purpose, and to have been so treated by all parties, and we think that they must be considered in that light. It is, we believe, the common practice of consignees and underwriters to have floating policies of this description, with a view of covering the interest of all parties in the goods; and it seems to us that as each shipment was declared the policies would enure for the benefit of the different parties who were interested in the goods so declared. In this case the cotton was declared by the plaintiffs under their floating policies after orders to insure from Bell and Co., and with the assent of the National Bank of India; and, upon the declarations being made, these policies would as to this shipment enure, not only for the benefit of the plaintiffs themselves, who were interested in the safety of the whole of the goods, to cover their own liabilities and claims, but also for the benefit of the National Bank of India to secure to them the amount of the acceptance, as well as for the shippers, as the persons entitled to the surplus proceeds of the goods when sold by the plaintiffs. There was also the very possible contingency that the goods when sold might not from various causes realise the amount for which the plaintiffs had come under acceptance.

Although the insurances would, in our opinion, as they were intended to do, cover the whole value of the shipment, and all the different interests in the goods, yet from the nature of these floating policies, and their being effected in anticipation of future transactions of the plaintiffs with various persons who were unknown at the dates when the policies were effected, they were necessarily effected by the plaintiffs in their own names; and it could not be said that as contracts they were made by the plaintiffs by order or for account or on behalf of persons who were then unknown, but who might at some future time consign goods to the plaintiffs. The consequence of this is, as it seems to us, that no action could be maintained upon the policies in question by or in the names of any persons except the plaintiffs; and, in this particular case, if it had been averred that Messrs. Bell and Co. were interested in the cotton, and that the insurances respectively were made for their use and benefit and on their account, we think that such an allegation would not have been maintained (Watson v. Swann, 11, C. B., N. S., 756). Neither could it have been properly alleged that the plaintiffs and Messrs. Bell and Co., either with or without the National Bank of India, were jointly interested in the cotton, and that the policies were effected on their account; for no such joint interest existed, and the policies at the time they were made were not effected on their behalf; and the only proper conclusion in law from the facts, as it appears to us, is that the plaintiffs, having effected the policies in their own names to cover future consignments, such as the cotton in this case, not only may, but must, sue upon the policies in their own names, but we think that the averments in this declaration that the insurances were made for their use and benefit and on their account, and that they were the parties interested, were the proper, and, indeed, the only correct mode of framing the declaration. It is quite true that Messrs. Bell and Co. had an interest in the cotton, and were, in fact, the general owners of it, subject to the rights which they had created on the part of the National Bank of India and the plaintiffs; but, as between the underwriters and the plaintiffs, the former must, we think, be taken to have agreed that the plaintiffs might declare goods consigned to them under circumstances like the present, upon the floating policies effected by them, and that they might recover upon them the full value in their own names. There is no doubt that in a declaration, the averments of interest, and as to the person on whose behalf the insurance is effected, must be correctly made, and that a variance in that respect would be fatal, though the interest is now allowed to be alleged alternatively in various persons. It is also not sufficient to aver the interest to be in another person, without also alleging that the insurance was made on his behalf. These averments likewise affect the evidence and right of recovery at law, though where a plaintiff sues as trustee for another, a recovery might be had in equity from the cestui qui trust, and relief obtained as against him. It is quite true that, after the floating policies had been opened, and when the shipment was made, there was an order by Messrs. Bell and Co. to the plaintiffs to insure, and that by agreement with the National Bank of India the declarations of interest by the plaintiffs under these floating policies were to be treated as covering this cotton; but that would not entitle either Bell and Co. or the bank to sue upon the policies in their own names, or maintain an allegation that the policies were made on their behalf. The law with respect to the insurable interest which a consignee may include in a policy and recover in his own name, is, we think, correctly stated in the third edition of Arnould on Insurance, at p. 72, in the following terms: "As a general principle, then, there can be no doubt that consignees of the goods, being in advance to the consignors, or under acceptances for them, may insure in their own names and on their own account to the full value of the goods, and apply the proceeds of the policies to their own benefit up to the extent of their claims in respect of such advances and the acceptances, holding the residue in trust for the consignors." The practice of the mercantile community, as well as of underwriters, has also, we believe, been entirely in accordance with this view of the law; and there is the manifest convenience in it, that it saves a multiplicity of insurances upon the same subject-matter, and avoids the necessity for any nice distinctions as to the precise nature of the various interests of the several parties which are intended to be covered by the particular insurance. This more especially applies to the case of floating policies effected by consignees to cover goods of all persons who may thereafter consign goods to them, and to similar floating policies which wharfingers, warehousemen, factors and others are in the habit of effecting to cover the owners' interests as well as their own; and it seems to us that it would lead to great practical inconvenience if a different rule were now to be laid down. Many of the passages which were cited for the defendants from text-writers had reference only to what a person might insure on his own account; and a great part of the argument for the defendants rested on the assumption that there was, in fact, an insurance in this case of the separate interests of Bell and Co., and that these policies were made by the plaintiffs as the agents of Bell and Co. and on their behalf; but which assumption, for the reasons before stated, we consider to be not well founded. The case of Robertson v. Hamilton (14 East, 522) is an important decision to show that, where a person having a limited personal interest in the safety of every portion of the subject-matter of insurance insures not only that particular interest but the whole of the subject-matter to its full value for the benefit of the other parties who are interested in it as well as of himself, he will be considered entitled to recover the full amount in his own name upon an averment of interest in himself, and will be considered a trustee for the other parties interested. In that case the plaintiffs were owners of the Rose, which, with another ship called the Atlantic, belonging to Fisher and Co., and their cargoes, had been captured as Spanish prize. The plaintiffs and the respective owners of the other ship and of the cargoes employed one Cowan as their agent in Spain to obtain restitution or compromise the claims of the captors, and to send the property back to England. He effected an arrangement by giving up part of each cargo, and upon the terms that the two ships and the rest of the cargoes should be restored for the common benefit of the original owners of both ships and cargoes in the lump; and he drew a bill upon the plaintiffs (which was accepted and paid by them) for the general expenses of effecting the arrangement, and for the outfit of the vessels on their return homewards. The agent stated in a letter to the plaintiffs "The whole property restored is to form a mass, and the reparation made agreeably to the respective values that may be affixed to both ships and cargoes. The Atlantic I shall consign to you, in order to simplify the concern; and you can arrange with the owners. The above information will guide you with respect to insurance." The plaintiffs then effected an insurance upon the Atlantic, and that vessel was again captured by the French. The plaintiffs thereupon sued in their own names to recover for a total loss of that vessel. It was held that the plaintiffs, though not the owners of the Atlantic, had an insurable interest in her and to the full amount of the insurances. In the course of the argument, when the case of Lucena v. Crawford (3 Bos. & P. 75) was cited, Lord Ellenborough said (14 East, 526), "Independent of that case, can there be any doubt but that the plaintiffs had an insurable interest? The ships and cargoes were all thrown into hotchpot; and the plaintiffs had an interest in the conjoint property, and had expended their own money upon it, and were further authorised to make the insurance, by Cowan, of Corrunna, who had full powers of attorney from all the original owners of the property." And, upon its being argued that the ship insured never was in the possession of the plaintiffs, and therefore that they could have no lien on it (and which argument was also pressed upon us in this case), Lord Ellenborough said (14 East 530), "This is no question strictly of lien. Cowan was in possession of the whole, and Cowan continued to be the plaintiff's agent for this purpose after the Atlantic and the Ross were thrown into hotchpot for the benefit of all concerned. The whole then became a new property, and a new interest was constituted in the former several owners conjointly, so that the proprietors of the ship Ross thereby came to have an interest in the Atlantic. Upon the arrangement made with the captors, Cowan received restitution of the whole property in the lump, and it is said, for the common benefit of the original owners of both ships and cargoes; and then Cowan being such agent of the conjoint interest, as well as agent for the plaintiffs, consigned the Atlantic to them, and drew bills upon them for the general expenses of the whole concern, which they accepted and paid. If this does not give them an insurable interest, it is difficult to say what will." And, in giving judgment, Lord Ellenborough says (14 East, 532): "The plaintiffs, having an insurable interest in the whole mass of the property restored, may recover upon this policy as trustees for those who are interested in themselves in the whole, though they may be afterwards called upon to divide it amongst the several claimants in the proportions due to each, and a recovery in this action will not exclude any of the parties from unravelling the account in equity." And again (14 East, 534): "The assured, therefore, upon this policy, are entitled to recover from the underwriters if they had an insurable interest in the ship. The question then is, who had such an interest? I answer the original proprietors of both ships and cargoes, whose interest had been united in hotchpot through the medium of their common agent, Cowan. Cowan himself had an interest in the whole, and the plaintiffs had also an interest in respect of the bills which they had accepted and paid for Cowan on account of this conjoint property. The whole was thrown into hotchpot when it was delivered up to Cowan by the first captors; and therefore the plaintiffs, who were the original owners of the ship Ross, became interested in the whole. They were also interested in it as the consignees and representatives of Cowan, who had expended money upon the whole in hotchpot, and for whom they had accepted and paid bills on that account. It cannot therefore be said that the plaintiffs had not an insurable interest in the subject matter." It was held that the plaintiffs might insure and recover for a total loss on the policy on the Atlantic, of which they were not the owners, though they might be responsible over to the owner of that vessel or his representatives for a proportion of the money when recovered. That case seems to us a very good authority in favour of the plaintiffs in this action.

A similar principle has been adopted and acted upon in the case of fire policies, where persons having a very limited personal interest, such as a warehouseman, in one case, having only a lien for his charges, and not being himself an insurer by law, and a carrier in the other, had effected and kept on foot floating policies for the purpose of covering, and which were considered to cover, not only their own individual interests, but also the interests of the owners of the goods, and these persons were held to have insurable interests as against the insurers, to the full value of the goods, and to have a right to recover the whole amount of the insurances in their own names, though they would be trustees as to any surplus beyond their own individual claims for the other parties interested: (see Waters v. The Monarch Insurance Company, 5 E. & B. 870, and The London and North-Western Railway Company v. Glyn, 1 E. & E. 652.) It is true that those were cases of fire insurance, and upon policies which expressly covered "goods in trust;" but if the policies in this case were intended to cover the interests of all parties in the goods, as we think they were, then they must be treated as if they had contained express words to include all such interests; and in that view the cases above cited would be quite analogous to the present, for the purpose of considering the other question, viz., whether the persons insuring had an insurable interest in and were entitled to recover the whole value of the goods in their own names. It is upon the latter point, viz., as to the nature and extent of the insurable interest and the right to recover the full amount, that these cases seem to us to have an important bearing upon the present question.

In the case of the warehouseman (who is not an insurer) Waters v. The Monarch Life Assurance Company, Lord Campbell, after deciding that upon the proper construction of the policy the interest of the general owners of the goods was intended to be covered, proceeds as follows (5 E. & B. 881): "And I think that a person intrusted with goods can insure them without orders from the owner, and even without informing him that there was such a policy. It would be most inconvenient in business if a wharfinger could not at his own cost keep up a floating policy for the benefit of all who might become his customers.

The last point that arises, is to what extent does the policy protect those goods? The defendants say that it was only the plaintiffs' personal interest. But the policies are in terms contracts to make good 'all such damage and loss as may happen by fire to the property hereinbefore mentioned.' This is a valid contract; and, as the property is wholly destroyed, the value of the whole must be made good, not merely the particular interest of the plaintiffs. They will be entitled to apply so much to cover their own interest, and will be trustees for the owners as to the rest." Crompton, J., also says (5 E. & B. 882), "The parties meant to insure those goods with which the plaintiffs were intrusted, and in every part of which they had an interest, both in respect of their lien and in respect of their responsibility to the bailors. What the surplus after satisfying their own claim might be, could only be ascertained after the loss, when the amount of their lien at that time was determined; but they were persons interested in every particle of the goods." In The London and North Western Railway Company v. Glyn, where the plaintiffs were carriers, Wightman, J., says (1 E. & E. 660), "The question in this case is whether the plaintiffs are entitled under this policy to recover more than their own particular interest in the goods which they, as carriers had in the warehouse when it was burnt. I think that they are, and that they ought to recover the full value of the goods. They must, in my opinion, be considered as having insured the goods which they held in trust as carriers, for the benefit of the owners, for whom they will hold the amount recovered as trustees, after deducting what is due in respect of their own charges upon the goods." And again (1 E. & E. 661), "It is true that this insurance is in the nature of a voluntary trust undertaken by the plaintiffs without the knowledge of the cestuis que trust, the owners of the goods; but it is a trust clearly binding on the plaintiffs in equity, who will hold the amount which they now recover, in the first place, for the satisfaction of their own claims, and in the next, as to the residue, in trust for the owners. If a different construction was put on such a policy as this, it would be necessary, as my brother Crompton has observed, that several policies should be effected on the same goods, and thus insurance companies would obtain several premiums instead of one in respect of what to them is the same risk." Crompton, J., at p. 663, also states that, in his opinion, the plaintiffs intended to insure, first their own interest (if any) in the goods, and secondly, the interest of their cestuis que trust, the owners of the goods, and the case of Waters v. Monarch Assurance Company has established that persons who are the bailees of goods, have an insurable interest in them as against the assurers to their full value, although the assured may be trustees for third persons of part of the amount recovered on the policy.

In the great case of the Dutch commissioners, Lucena v. Craufurd (3 B. & P. 375), the ultimate decision of the House of Lords awarding a venire de novo, rested upon the ground that general damages had been assessed in one aggregate sum for all the vessels, whereas one of them having been lost after the declaration of hostilities, and thus become vested in the Crown, could not in any sense be considered within the jurisdiction of the commissioners. But, at the same time, the House of Lords expressed a clear opinion, adopting the views of Chambre, J., and Lawrence, J., that the commissioners had not an insurable interest. This was, however, on the ground that their authority was derived entirely from an Act of Parliament and a commission, which gave them no power or right of interference or control over any of the ships or property until after they were detained or brought into the ports of this kingdom; that up to that time the control and power over the vessels rested entirely with the Crown; that the vessels might never have come under the power of the commissioners; that they had nothing more than a mere expectation or hope and possibility that the vessels might come under their control; and that they therefore had no insurable interest to support the policies which had been affected whilst the vessels remained abroad, and before they had been brought to this country. It was contended for the commissioners, the plaintiffs, in that case, that they had authority to sell, manage, and dispose of the vessels, and were therefore in a position similar to that of ordinary consignees, and entitled equally as such consignees to insure and recover the full amount of the insurances in their own names, under an averment of interest in themselves. It seems to us to have been considered by all the judges, as well as by the House of Lords, to be clear law that ordinary consignees having a beneficial interest in the whole subject-matter, might recover the full sum insured, under an averment of interest in themselves; and that if the commissioners could be considered as such consignees, they were entitled to recover. After the three arguments in the Exchequer Chamber (3 Bos. & P. 75), and the argument in the House of Lords, it was said by the majority of the judges (2 N. R. 292) that no one ever questioned that an ordinary consignee having a beneficial interest might insure for the benefit of the owner of the goods, though a naked consignee, as he was termed, being a mere agent of the consignor, could not do so. But, as different views have been taken of the effect of the observations of the learned Judges and of Lord Eldon (who, as Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, had heard the three arguments in the Exchequer Chamber) upon the subject of insurable interest of consignees generally, it may be useful to refer to those observations more in detail. They are as follows, namely, in the judgment of the majority of the seven Judges in the Exchequer Chamber (3 Bos. & P. 95): "Independent, however, of these observations, it is not necessary that an insurer should have a beneficial interest in the property insured; it is sufficient if he be clothed with the character of a trustee, an agent, or a consignee: and if these commissioners can be considered in either of these capacities, they have an insurable interest. According to the terms of the statute (35 Geo. 3, c. 80), it seems as if they may be considered in either of these capacities. They may be considered as trustees for the Crown, or for the persons who shall be ultimately entitled to the property; as general agents for the purpose of disposing of the property on its arrival in England, or as statutable consignees." Again (3 Bos. & P. 97): "Suppose a merchant upon his marriage to covenant with trustees in his marriage-settlement, that certain ships then upon the sea should when they came to England be vested in them for the purposes of the settlement, are we to be told that the trustees might not insure, because the settler did not in terms convey and assign over the ships immediately? A court of equity would consider the interests in the trustees exactly the same as if the ships had been immediately conveyed. It is objected, however, that the Dutch commissioners did not resemble consignees, because they were directed to sell and dispose of the property intrusted to them according to the directions which they should receive from Government. But many consignees receive goods with orders to attend to the directions of the consignor as to their disposal; and yet they are not the less able to insure. So, every trustee is subject to the directions either of the cestui que trust or of the Court of Chancery." In the judgment of Chambre, J., whose views were ultimately adopted by the House of Lords, he says (3 Bos. & P. 104): "I am not disposed to question the authorities in general: on the contrary, there appears to me to have been great propriety in establishing the contract of insurance wherever the interest declared upon was, in the common understanding of mankind a real interest in or arising out of the thing insured, or so connected with it as to depend on the safety of the thing insured and the risk insured against, without much regard to technical distinctions respecting property, still, however, excluding mere speculation or expectations, and interests created no otherwise than by gaming. What the parties themselves may do, they may also do by their trustees, consignees, or agents, provided the act done by an agent comes within the scope of the authority given him by his principal, either expressly or impliedly from the nature of his employment." In the House of Lords, in the opinions of the seven Judges, and in which Thompson, B., concurred, the following passage occurs (2 N. R. 289, 290): "It is with reference to these premises, they (the plaintiffs) aver that they as such commissioners were interested, and that the insurance was made for their use and benefit as commissioners. The nature of their connection with the property insured appears from the previous part of the declaration. They claimed no beneficial interest in it; they were merely consignees, agents or trustees for others; and, to make the whole declaration consistent, the averment must be taken to import, what the words will fairly admit, that the insurance was made for the benefit of those for whose benefit the plaintiffs were authorised by the Act of Parliament and commission to manage the property as consignees, that is, in the present instance, for the King. A consignee without any beneficial interest in himself is agent for the consignor, and may insure for his benefit; and, if such a consignee were to state in his declaration the circumstances of the consignment of goods to him to manage, sell and dispose of for certain persons abroad, might he not aver the interest in himself as such consignee? and would not such an averment, coupled with the disclosure of his having no interest but for the consignors' use, be equivalent to an averment of interest in his consignors?" Again (2 N. R. 291, 292): "Though a consignee be usually appointed by bill of lading, it is not necessary to invest a person with that character. Mr. Justice Buller, in the case of Wolf v. Horncastle (1 B. & P. 316), defines a consignee to be a person residing at the port of delivery, to whom the goods are to be delivered on their arrival. A consignee, as distinguished from a vendee, is the mere agent of the consignor; and such a consignee may be appointed by any direction, verbal or written, to the captain, to deliver the goods to such particular person, or by a letter to the person himself requesting him to take care of the goods upon their arrival. Where, then, is the difference between such a consignee and these commissioners? The ships were directed, by the person who had the possession and power to direct the voyage, to Great Britain; and the commissioners were appointed to receive the ships and cargoes, and to manage and dispose of them upon their arrival. What is the effect of the most solemn appointment of a consignee different from this? What greater interest or closer connection with the ship does he acquire? If, then, there be no difference, no one ever questioned that a consignee or agent of the description spoken of might make an insurance for the benefit of the owner and person entitled, and for whom he as consignee is authorised to act." . . . "At the time both of the insurance and the loss, their (the commissioners') title, like that of a consignee, was inchoate; occupancy was necessary to perfect it. It is true that their interest was revocable. But so is that of a consignee." Again (2 N. R. 294): "And if it were now to be decided that the interest of these commissioners was not insurable, it would render unintelligible that doctrine upon which merchants and underwriters have acted for years, and paid and received many thousand pounds." Mr. Justice Chambre, who thought that the commissioners had no insurable interest, says (2 N. R. 298): "The duties of their office were confined to Dutch property that was actually in the kingdom, and provisionally detained there under the King's authority. No matter who brings it in. They have nothing to do as commissioners with consignments from abroad; nor was any consignment in fact made to them. They have been called statutable consignees. If that phrase means anything, it must mean that the statute had consigned these particular ships to the commissioners; but, look at the statute, and we find nothing more than that it authorises a commission under which whatever property of a certain description arrives, it will if they continue commissioners fall within their care and management officially, to prevent its perishing. But the Act had in no respect attached upon this property: it had only created a capacity in the plaintiffs in certain events to receive these or any other Dutch ships or merchandises." Again he says (2 N. R. 299): "A consignment is a species of mercantile conveyance operating upon the particular effects consigned, which, though it may be defeasible, may operate in the meantime, and enable the consignee by his acts to bind the consignor." In the opinion of Lawrence, J., who also thought that the commissioners had not an insurable interest, and whose opinion was also adopted by the House of Lords, there are the following passages (2 N. R. 304): "Conceiving for these reasons that the contract of marine assurance is not from its nature confined to protect the interest arising from the ownership of the subject exposed to risk insured against, I shall proceed to consider," &c. "Had they (the commissioners) been authorised generally to take care of ships detained by his Majesty's orders, by the act of detainer the ships would have become objects of their concern, and from thence a duty might possibly have been inferred to take all proper steps to prevent any damage from their loss, and an averment that the defendants in error insured as such commissioners might have borne the meaning which has been contended for. But that cannot be understood in this case: for the averment in effect refers their interest to the Act of Parliament and their commission, the terms of which respect only the case of ships and goods detained and brought into the ports of this kingdom; and I know not how to conceive an interest dependent on a thing with which thing the persons supposed to be interested have nothing to do. The defendants in error have been considered as trustees or consignees, who, it is said, have an insurable interest. But I do not think they can be considered as trustees or as consignees having such interest as will support this averment. A trustee who has an insurable interest must, as I conceive, have some existing right to the thing insured for the benefit of another; but the commissioners in this case had not any such right, and therefore cannot, according to my notions of a trustee, be considered as such. Nor can they be considered as consignees in whom any interest or right is vested by bill of lading or other instrument or consignment by which the property of the subject-matter of the consignment prima facie will pass. If they be consignees, they were naked consignees for the purpose of doing some act respecting the goods consigned, and rather agents than consignees, according to the common understanding of that word; and, taking them to be naked consignees who have not the legal property of the subject-matter of the insurance, and who are not beneficially interested in it, they ought, I conceive, to have averred the interest to be in those on whose account the insurance was made, whether they were defined persons or uncertain persons, and not in themselves as commissioners; for, taking the meaning of the word interest to be what I have stated it to be, it is obvious that a naked consignee who means that the insurance should be applied to the protection of the things insured and the indemnification of him who suffers by losing the value of those things, his object being not to secure himself from some damage consequential to the loss as his commission, but that others interested as proprietors should be indemnified,—it is obvious, I say, that such consignee can himself suffer no prejudice by the total or partial destruction of a thing which forms no part of his property. In the safety of such thing such naked consignee can in this view have no interest. The persons prejudiced by the loss of property are his consignors, or those for whose benefit the property is to be disposed of, and in them only in such case and in such light is there any interest" (2 N. R. 306, 307). Lord Eldon, in giving judgment in the House of Lords, says (2 N. R. 324): "With respect to the case of a trustee, I can see nothing in this case which resembles it. A trustee has a legal interest in the thing, and may therefore insure. So, a consignee has the power of selling; and the same may be said of an agent. I cannot agree to the doctrine said to be established in the courts below, that an agent may insure in respect of his lien upon a subsequent performance of his contract, nor can I advise your Lordships to proceed, without much more discussion, upon authority of that kind. There are different sorts of consignees: some have a power to sell, manage, and dispose of the property, subject only to the rights of the consignor. Others have a mere naked right to take possession. I will not say that the latter may not insure, if they state the interest to be in their principal." Lord Ellenborough and Lord Erskine concurred entirely in the views of Lord Eldon.

In the previous case of Craufurd v. Hunter (8 T. Rep. 13), in the Court of King's Bench, where precisely the same points arose, it was considered that the commissioners were in the nature of consignees, and had therefore a right to insure and recover the whole sum insured in their own names; and it appears to us that the correct opinion to be collected from the observations of all the learned judges and also of the peers who took part in the judgment in the House of Lords in Lucena v. Craufurd (ubi sup.) is, that an ordinary consignee, who has made advances or come under acceptance, and has a beneficial interest in the subject-matter, is entitled to insure to the full value and recover the whole sum insured, and to aver the interest to be in himself. In Carruthers v. Sheddon (6 Taunt 14), the plaintiffs by order from Dowrick and Way had effected an insurance upon coffee in which Dowrick and Way were interested to the extent of seven-sixteenths jointly with three other persons. The policy professed to be made by the plaintiffs as agents and by order of and for account of Dowrick and Way. The adventure was managed by Dowrick and Way, who made advances and paid what was required. Gibbs, C.J., held at the trial that, as Dowrick and Way were the managers of the adventure, if the policy was intended to cover the interests of the three other persons (of which the jury were to judge), the plaintiffs might, as the agents of Dowrick and Way, recover the whole amount insured; and he also thought "that Dowrick and Way, as consignees of the cargo, had an insurable interest in the whole amount, for that a consignee may insure as well as a principal;" and the court confirmed his ruling. We are unable to discover any intimation of opinion by the court in that case, or to see any inference that can properly be drawn from it, to the effect that a consignee who makes advances can insure and recover only to the extent of his own lien; and the language of Gibbs, C.J., which was adopted by the court, seems to us to be exactly contrary to that view. In Godin v. The London Assurance Company (1 Burr. 489), the only question was whether, where two persons having different interests had each insured by a separate policy, this was to be considered as a double insurance, so that the amount insured was to be apportioned between the two sets of underwriters; and, though some observations were made as to persons being entitled to insure for a lien, the case does not appear to us in any way to affect the main question in this case. In Wolf v. Horncastle (1 B. & P. 316), the plaintiffs had, without orders in the first instance (though their act was adopted afterwards), effected the insurance for their correspondent, Lund, for whom they were under advances, and for whom they were acting in respect of the shipment in question after it had been refused by the original consignee. They had also accepted for 300*l.* against the shipment. The declaration contained two counts, the first averring the interest in Lund, and the second averring it in themselves. Objections were taken as to the first count, that it could not be supported under the statute of 28 Geo. 3, c. 56, for want of a previous order to insure from Lund, the principal; and, as to the second count, that the plaintiffs had not an insurable interest, and that they made the insurance on account of Lund, and not of themselves. The court supported the verdict for the plaintiffs on the first count for the full amount, upon the facts, on the ground of ratification by Lund; but they also held that the second count was supported; for that the plaintiffs had a clear right to insure to the amount of 300*l.* for which they were interested in the goods. The court considered that, upon the consignment being refused by the original consignee, the plaintiffs became consignees for Lund; and Buller J., said, in the course of his judgment (1 B. & P. 323), that "a debt which arises in consequence of the article insured, and which would have given a lien on it, does give an insurable interest;" and that "the case is not at all altered by the goods not having arrived." The plaintiffs in that case recovered the full amount of the insurance; and it does not seem to us that because the court thought it clear that the plaintiffs had no insurable interest to the amount of their acceptances sufficient to support the second count against the only objection that was taken to it, and gave judgment for the plaintiffs for the whole amount insured, that therefore it is to be inferred that the court thought the plaintiffs had no insurable interest beyond the amount of their acceptances; and more especially as that point was never raised upon the argument.

The subject appears to have been much considered in America; and in the year 1836, a case came before the Supreme Court of New

EBSWORTH AND OTHERS v. THE ALLIANCE MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

[C. P.]

York, of De Forest v. The Fulton Insurance Company (1 Hall, 84). In that case a commission merchant had effected insurances against fire upon goods in his own warehouses, "as well the property of the assured as held by him in trust or on commission," and a fire had destroyed goods belonging to his consignors as well as his own goods; and it was held that the plaintiff had an insurable interest in the goods held on commission for his consignors to their full value, and might recover the whole amount under an averment of interest in himself, though he would be accountable as a trustee to his consignors for any sums beyond his own individual claims. Very elaborate judgments were delivered by the learned Judges in that case, which are well worthy of perusal; and the general principles applicable to insurable interests as regards marine insurances, as well as terrene policies against fire, are fully and very ably discussed. Mr. Duer, in his Law of Marine Insurance, vol. 2, pp. 108, 109, refers to this case in the following terms—"It must, however, be admitted that it has been held by a court of high authority that a consignee, as such, has in all cases an insurable interest co-extensive with the value of the property, and consequently that, when he has effected a policy in his own name, he is entitled to recover the entire loss that is claimed, on an averment in himself of a sole and exclusive interest; and this without any evidence of an authority express or implied, or of any previous advances, or of any subsequent adoption of the contract. It is true that this decision was made in relation to a policy against fire; but the reasoning of the Judges was just as applicable to a marine insurance, and has been so considered by an eminent jurist (Mr. Justice Story), who seems to have given to their doctrine the sanction of his approval. I am, however, constrained to express the conviction that the decision thus interpreted is not sustained by prior authorities. My researches have not enabled me to discover a single case in the English reports in which a consignee, on an averment of a sole interest in himself, has been permitted to recover beyond the amount of his own advances; but, on the contrary, there are several decisions from which the opposite doctrine viz., that in such a case his right to recover is limited to his own beneficial interest, seems a plain and necessary deduction." At the date when this was published—in 1846—the English cases upon fire policies had not been decided. This decision of the Superior Court of New York is afterwards elaborately controverted by Mr. Duer in a long note at p. 161 of the same volume. With his views, however, we are entirely unable to concur. A great portion of his reasoning is founded upon the assumption which he makes at p. 167 with reference to Lucena v. Craufurd (3 B. & P. 75), that "it is not to be denied that the assured in this case (that is, in Lucena v. Craufurd) were consignees." It seems to us, however, that this assumption, and the argument of Mr. Duer which rests upon it, are not well founded. It is quite true that the Court of Queen's Bench in Craufurd v. Hunter, and the whole of the Judges except Chambre, J., in the Exchequer Chamber, in Lucena v. Craufurd, and all the judges except Chambre, J., and Lawrence, J., in the same case in the House of Lords (2 N. R. 269), considered that the commissioners were in the position of ordinary consignees of the Dutch vessels and goods, and as such entitled to insure them on their own account. But the two dissentient judges whose views ultimately prevailed, and the peers who decided the case in the House of Lords (though upon a point which applied to one only of the vessels), expressly repudiated that view of the position of the commissioners under the Act of Parliament, and considered that they had no right, interest or power of interference or control in or over the property in any way until its actual arrival in this country; and that, if they were consignees in any sense, it could only be as mere agents, or, as it was termed, naked consignees, having no beneficial interest whatever in the property, and having merely a right to take possession of it and act as agents for the owners after its arrival in this country. We think, therefore, that it not only can be, but after the decision of the House of Lords must be denied that the commissioners were consignees; and, if so, a great portion of Mr. Duer's argument as to the insurable interests of consignees, which is founded on this assumption, necessarily fails. We also think that the other conclusions which Mr. Duer has drawn from those English cases which he cites, and which have been already noticed, are not warranted by those decisions, and that he has failed to establish that the decision of the Supreme Court of New York in De Forest v. The Fulton Insurance Company, which proceeded in a great degree upon the doctrines of Lucena v. Craufurd, was not well founded. Mr. Justice Story, in his Law of Agency, s. 111, refers to this subject in the following terms: "The question has often been discussed, whether factors or consignees for sale have an implied authority to insure for their principal; for there cannot be a doubt that they may insure upon their own account to the extent of their own interest. The general doctrine now established is, that they may insure both for themselves and for their principal. But they are not positively bound to insure, unless they have received orders to insure, or promised to insure, or the usage of trade, or the habit of dealing between them and their principals, raises an implied obligation to insure. They may insure in their own names or in the name and for the benefit of their principal; and, if they insure in their own name only, they may in case of loss recover the whole amount of the value of the property insured from the underwriters, and the surplus beyond their own interest will be a resulting trust for the benefit of their principals. Whether, if they are mere naked consignees to take possession of the goods only, without a power to sell, they have a right to insure for themselves or for their principal, is perhaps more questionable; but the point has not as yet become the subject of a direct adjudication." And in a note to this passage, after referring to the authorities, Mr. Justice Story says; "The whole subject underwent much examination in the case of Lucena v. Craufurd; but the most ample and satisfactory discussion of it is to be found in the very elaborate opinions delivered by Mr. Chief Justice Jones and Mr. Justice Oakeley in the superior Court of New York, in De Forest v. The Fulton Insurance Company." The case of De Forest v. The Fulton Insurance Company is cited by Mr. Phillips, 4th edit., p. 176, s. 311, without dissent or comment, though in some other passages he seems rather to adopt the view that a consignee's insurable interest is limited to his own lien. In Parsons on Insurance, edit. 1868, at p.

50, it is said, "but if the goods are insured by a consignee, or a warehouseman who describes them as goods in trust, he can recover, not only to the extent of his lien for charges, commission, &c., but also to the full value of the goods, and the balance will be held in trust for the owner of the goods." And at p. 201, "A commission merchant may insure for the full value of the goods consigned to him, and may recover, not only what will indemnify him for the loss of his commissions, but the value; so much of that value as is not needed to indemnify him being recovered by him for the benefit of the owners of the goods, provided he intends to insure for them, and the terms of the insurance are wide enough to cover their interest, and he has their previous authority to insure or their subsequent ratification of his act."

Upon the whole, it appears to us that the weight of authority in America, as well as in this country, is against the views of Mr. Duer; and, with all respect for so learned a writer, we cannot subscribe to his opinions upon the subject. We adhere to the law as stated by Mr. Arnold and by the Superior Court of New York, and by Mr. Justice Story and Mr. Parsons, which we consider to be in accordance with the decisions of the courts and the opinions of the great majority of the judges in this country, which have been already referred to. We believe it also to have been adopted in practice by merchants, agents, and underwriters, for a long series of years, without inconvenience or objection; and we are of opinion that the plaintiffs had an insurable interest to the full value of the cotton, and that the whole interest of all parties was covered by and recoverable by the plaintiffs in their own names, under the policies in this case. The effect of the plaintiffs' insuring and recovering in their own names would be to place them in the position of trustees for the other parties interested, as to any surplus beyond the amount of their own claim; and they, having received orders from Bell and Co. to insure, and having arranged with the National Bank of India to make their open policies available by declaring the whole value of the cotton under them, did by so doing constitute themselves, in our opinion, trustees for the other parties interested. The plaintiffs effected these policies in their own names. It appears to us that, with the concurrence of the underwriters, they effected them on their own behalf, and not as agents, they having then no persons as principals, and to cover goods to be thereafter consigned by various persons to them, and in every portion of which they would have an interest. The insurances were, we think, intended to cover the whole value of the goods to be declared, and the interests of the consignors as well as of the plaintiffs themselves, and, when the declarations were made, did in fact cover the interests of both. No other person except the plaintiffs could, in our opinion, sue upon these policies; nor could it be correctly alleged in the declaration that they were made on behalf of any persons other than the plaintiffs themselves; and, under these circumstances, and for the reasons before stated, we are of opinion that the allegations in this declaration were supported by the facts, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the whole amount of the insurances in their own names in this action.

I will now proceed to read the judgment of my brother Brett, who is unavoidably absent, being upon the circuit.

BRETT, J.—This action is brought on two policies of insurance. By the first, dated the 23rd Nov. 1869, Messrs. Irving, Ebsworth and Holmes, the plaintiffs, as well in their own names as for and in the name or names of all and every person or persons to whom the same doth, may or shall appertain in part or in all, did cause themselves and every of them to be assured to the extent of 5000*l.* on cotton, lost or not lost, from Bombay to London or Liverpool direct, or via Havre, in ship or ships, to follow policy of the 4th Sept. 1869. By the second, dated the 17th Dec. 1869, the plaintiffs in the same terms as before caused themselves to be insured to the extent of 5000*l.* on cotton, lost or not lost, from Bombay to London or Liverpool direct, or via Havre, in ship or ships, to follow former policy. On 23rd May 1870, 846*l.* on the first policy was appropriated to 250 bales of cotton per Aurora; and on the same 23rd May 1870, 4154*l.* on the second policy was appropriated to the same 250 bales of cotton per Aurora. The declaration stated the interest in the cotton as follows: That the plaintiffs or some or one of them were or was interested in the said goods to the amount of all the moneys by them insured thereon, and the said insurance was made for the use and benefit and on account of the person or persons so interested. There were pleas traversing the allegations that the plaintiffs caused themselves to be insured as alleged, and that the goods or any part were shipped as alleged, and a plea alleging that the plaintiffs were not, nor were any, nor was either of them interested in the said goods, nor was the said insurance made for the benefit of the persons or person so interested as in the said counts alleged. It was proved at the trial before my brother Keating, at Guildhall, that Messrs. Bell and Co. of Bombay, were correspondents of the plaintiffs, merchants in London, and that, on the 28th Oct. 1869, the plaintiffs in London wrote and sent to Bell and Co. in Bombay a letter of credit, in the following terms—"Our previous letters of credit for advances on cotton to our consignment having expired, we beg leave to renew the same as follows, You are by the present authorized to value on us at usance at the rate of 10*l.* sterling per bale of cotton, cost f. o. b. and freight, against shipping documents and timely insurance orders or policies of insurance; and we engage to accept the drafts so drawn on presentation, and to pay the same at maturity, &c. The shipments not to exceed 200 bales cotton by any one vessel, and the present credit to be limited to 30th April next, unless previously withdrawn." On the 23rd Nov. 1869, the plaintiffs effected with the defendants the first, and on the 17th Dec. 1869, the second floating policy sued on. The plaintiffs on the 23rd Nov. 1869, declared on the first policy cotton per Ann Milicent, and on the 13th Sept. 1869, other cotton per Clutha, and so on. It is to be taken that, in April 1870, Bell and Co. and Cursonadas Madhowdass, of Bombay, agreed to consign cotton to Liverpool on joint account, and that 250 bales were shipped by Bell and Co. on such joint account on board the Aurora. The bill of lading, dated the 28th April 1870, was as follows—"Shipped, &c., by Robert Bell and Co., of Bombay, &c., 250 bales of cotton, &c., to be delivered, &c., unto order or their assigns, he or they paying freight as per margin," &c. On the same 28th April 1870, Bell and Co. drew on the plaintiffs a bill of exchange in the following form—"Bombay.

28th April 1870. Six months after sight, &c., pay to the order of ourselves the sum of 3000l. sterling, value received, which place to account of shipment of 250 bales cotton per Aurora." This bill was endorsed in blank by Bell and Co., and then specially to the National Bank of India or order by Cursondas Madhowdass. Bell and Co. on the same day entered into a transaction with the National Bank of India, in Bombay, which is described in the following letter written and handed by them to the bank. (See this letter set out, ante, p. 127.) On the 29th April 1870, Bell and Co. wrote direct to the plaintiffs—"We have the pleasure to inform you that we have induced Cursondas Madhowdass, of Bombay, to ship on joint account with ourselves 250 bales cotton per Aurora, and against this shipment we have valued upon your good selves by this opportunity, through the National Bank of India, for 3000l. at six months, to which we crave your kind protection. Sample of this shipment we forward overland to your address by this mail. We hope this cotton will arrive with you at a favourable opportunity, and, confiding the same to your care and attention, we are," &c. On the 29th April 1870, Cursondas Madhowdass wrote to the plaintiffs, and sent their letter open to the bank—"I beg to advise you that I have shipped to your care through Messrs. Bell and Co., of this place, the undermentioned cotton, and I enclose invoice thereof. Against the same I have drawn upon you as at foot, with the endorsement of the above-mentioned firm; and I beg your kind attention to my draft. I should also feel obliged by your effecting insurance, and on arrival of the shipment please sell it to best advantage, remitting to me my balance, &c. Should, however, the net proceeds fall short of the amount of your acceptance, together with any charges, &c., I hereby authorize you to draw upon me," &c. The bill of exchange or draft before mentioned for 3000l., endorsed by Bell and Co., and Cursondas Madhowdass, being discounted by the National Bank of India, was forwarded by them to their agents in England, together with the bill of lading and shipping documents. The draft was presented and accepted by the plaintiffs on the 21st May 1870, in the following form—"Accepted 21st May 1870, against delivery of shipping documents for 250 bales cotton per Aurora." On the 23rd May, the plaintiffs declared on the open policy of the 23rd Nov. 1869, 846l. on the 250 bales cotton per Aurora, valued at 5000l., and on the same day, on the open policy of the 17th Dec. 1869, 4154l., to make up 5000l., on the same 250 bales per Aurora, valued at 5000l. On the 27th May 1870, the plaintiffs wrote to the National Bank of India, in London, as follows:—

We beg to inform you that we have declared on our open marine policies for 5000l. dated 23rd Nov. 1869, and 5000l. dated 17th Dec. 1869, effected with the Alliance Insurance Company (the defendants), the following shipments from Bombay to Liverpool; and we hereby undertake and guarantee to hold the amount insured at your disposal until payment of our acceptance for 3000l., due 5th Nov.

The ship and cargo were lost by the fraudulent scuttling of the ship on the 17th June 1870. The plaintiffs met their acceptance when due, i.e., on the 24th Nov. 1870, and then received from the National Bank of India the bill of lading endorsed and the shipping documents. The plaintiffs gave evidence at the trial as follows:—"The insurance was effected for Bell and Co. and ourselves." A verdict was found for the plaintiffs for 5000l., with leave to reduce the amount to 3000l. Sir John Karslake obtained a rule calling upon the plaintiffs to show cause why the verdict should not be entered for the defendants on the third plea, on the ground that the plaintiffs had not proved that which was therein traversed; or to reduce the damages.

Before entering on an examination of the different propositions of law which have been discussed as applicable to the relative positions of the plaintiffs, the defendants, and the other parties mentioned in the case, it is necessary to determine accurately what that relation was. The first transaction in evidence is the letter of credit from the plaintiffs to Bell and Co., dated the 28th Oct. 1869, authorising Bell and Co., within certain limits and on certain conditions, to draw on the plaintiffs. The next transactions—and which were before any act done by Bell and Co. having reference to the plaintiffs—were, the taking out by the plaintiffs of the floating policies now sued upon, and the declarations on them of cargoes shipped on consignment to the plaintiffs by other correspondents than Bell and Co. or Cursondas Madhowdass. These policies were therefore clearly not taken out solely to cover any goods which might be consigned by Bell and Co. They were taken out before there was any binding contract between the plaintiffs and Bell and Co. as to future shipments. They were taken out when the name of Cursondas Madhowdass was unknown in business to the plaintiffs. They were taken out with a view to cover either any interest which the plaintiffs might afterwards have in consignment from any correspondents of theirs, or such interests and also the interests of any as yet unascertained correspondents who might consign to them. The shipment of the cotton on board the Aurora is to be taken to have been made on the 28th April 1870. It was not within the terms of the letter of credit; it exceeded the limits, and was not according to the conditions; it was not on behalf of Bell and Co. only, but on behalf of Bell and Co. and Cursondas Madhowdass jointly. It was a shipment which the plaintiffs were not bound to recognise. Until they did recognise it they had no interest in it. Bell and Co., however, drew in respect of it on the plaintiffs. The next transaction was between Bell and Co. and Cursondas Madhowdass on the one part, and the National Bank of India on the other, which took place also on the 28th April 1870. The bank discounted the draft for 3000l. drawn by Bell and Co. on the plaintiffs, and took as security an indorsement of the bill of lading of the cotton with a power of sale if the draft should not be accepted and paid. Such an indorsement passed the legal property in the cotton to the bank, subject to a trust in favour of Bell and Co. and Cursondas Madhowdass jointly. Bell and Co. and Cursondas Madhowdass then both addressed the plaintiffs, requesting them to accept and honour the draft and insure the cotton, and authorising the plaintiffs, on payment of their acceptance, to obtain the bill of lading and to sell the cotton, in order, first, to reimburse the plaintiff's advance, and then, subject to commission, to hold and pay over the surplus for and to Bell and Co. and Cursondas Madhowdass jointly. On the 21st May 1870, the plaintiffs accepted the draft for 3000*l.*, and thereby recognised the shipment and accepted the terms proposed to them. Then for the first time was established a relation of the plaintiffs to the cotton in question. Then arose a contract between them on the one part, and Bell and Co. and Cursondas Madhowdass on the other, by which they undertook to pay their acceptance and to receive and to sell the cotton, and to hold and pay over any surplus proceeds, and by which they acquired a right to have the bill of lading eventually indorsed to them, and to have the cotton placed in their hands for sale to cover their advances. This contract and position of affairs did not pass the legal property in the cotton to the plaintiffs, for that was still in the National Bank of India. It did not give a present right of possession of the bill of lading, or even a right of possession of the cotton on arrival. It gave a present interest in the cotton to the plaintiffs, that is to say, a right by an existing contract to have the bill of lading indorsed to them on the payment of their acceptance, so as to enable them to sell the cotton to pay themselves 3000*l.* and their expenses, and to earn their commission, and to hold the surplus proceeds as agents for Bell and Co. and Cursondas Madhowdass. The right in equity would, I apprehend, be to have a decree for a specific performance of such contract. But, until the acceptance should be met, I should apprehend that the plaintiffs could not be held to be either legal or equitable owners of the cotton. Nor were the plaintiffs trustees for Bell and Co. of the cotton. Speaking of the relation of the Dutch commissioners to the ships of which they would have had the disposal if they should have arrived, Lord Eldon says, in Lucena Craufurd (3 B. & P. 75)—“With respect to the case of a trustee, I can see nothing in this case which resembles it. A trustee has a legal interest in the thing, and may,” he adds, “therefore insure.” It was after entering into this relation with Bell and Co. and Cursondas Madhowdass, and having acquired this interest in the cotton, that the plaintiffs, on the 23rd May 1870, declared 5000*l.*, in respect of the cotton on the policies. And, whatever may have been the terms used by the witnesses in giving evidence, it must, I think, be taken with regard to the declarations then made, that it was stated “that the plaintiffs insured for Bell and Co. and themselves.” In reality they intended then to declare for, and so to insure their own interest of 3000*l.*, and the interest of their correspondents in the anticipated or valued surplus of 2000*l.* It was whilst the transactions thus stood that the ship was lost. The plaintiffs then had the interest above described; they were not legal owners nor equitable owners, nor trustees, but contractors, having by contract certain rights to deal with the cotton in a certain way, on the happening at a future time of a certain contingency. Afterwards, on the 24th Nov. 1870, the plaintiffs paid their acceptance of 3000*l.*, and received the bill of lading indorsed by the bank. But the cotton was already lost, and no property therefore passed by such indorsement.

EBSWORTH AND OTHERS v. THE ALLIANCE MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Upon these facts it was contended, on behalf of the plaintiffs, that they had the whole legal interest in the goods when they accepted the draft, and that all their obligation to Bell and Co. from that time was to account as trustees for the surplus proceeds of sale; and, if not, that they still had an interest in the goods which gave them an insurable interest in the whole, so that they might insure the whole to their full value in their own name, holding the surplus (if any) above their own actual or beneficial interest as trustees for Bell and Co. and Cursondas Madhowdass, one or both. It was contended, on behalf of the defendants, that the plaintiffs had no insurable interest at all; that they had only an expectancy of profit resting on a contingency; that, if they had an insurable interest, it was to the extent only of their own beneficial interest, viz., 3000*l.*, that they could not insure in their own names and on their own behalf more than such interest; that the only persons who, without having a beneficial interest equal to their own value, can insure in their own names to the full value, holding a surplus as trustees, are those who are in law owners and in equity trustees of the property insured, and that the plaintiffs were not such legal owners, and consequently not such trustees. It was further argued that, if in consideration of law the plaintiffs could be said to have insured for themselves and Bell and Co., they failed on the pleadings, because they had invited and accepted an issue that they alone were interested and they alone had insured. In answer to this last objection, it was urged on behalf of the plaintiffs that the plea was severable; that, as to the allegation that the insurance was made on their behalf alone, it was true; and that there was no allegation that they alone were interested, but that the allegation amounted only to an assertion that they had an interest, which was true.

The first point thus raised is, whether the plaintiffs had any insurable interest. I think they had; because they had an existing contract with regard to the cotton, by virtue of which they had an expectancy of benefit and advantage arising out of, or depending on, the safe arrival of the cotton.

The next question is, what was the amount of the plaintiffs' insurable interest? If they had any, it would seem to be at least to the extent of 3000*l.*, their advance, and their expenses and expected commission. The main question is, whether they could insure for more than that in their own name, and recover for more on a declaration alleging the interest to be in themselves. Their relation to the cotton was described in argument, and I think fairly described, to be that of consignees for sale of goods not yet arrived, who have made advances on the goods, but have only a contract right with regard to the goods, without being legal owners of them. They have the interest described in every part of the goods, but are not legal owners of any part.

The ruling principle of insurance, which is that it should afford only an indemnity to any assured for his loss, would seem to limit the right of the plaintiffs under such circumstances to the recovery of their own beneficial interest only. If in an action at law the assured can recover on the contract of insurance more than his own beneficial interest, he recovers, according to law, more than an indemnity. It would seem to be no answer in a court of law to say that he holds a surplus of what he has recovered as trustee for some one else. The law has no means of enforcing the payment over by him, on the mere ground of his being a trustee. This view, it is true, should prevent a legal owner, but trustee, of the property insured from being able to insure and recover in his own name: yet it seems to be stated on high authority that a legal owner, being trustee, may insure and recover in his own name, holding the proceeds in trust for his cestui que trust. This must be on the ground that the law will not dispute the legal interest which is the legal result of the legal ownership; though in insurance contracts it will also recognise an equitable interest as entitling the owner of it to enter into or take advantage of the legal contract of insurance.

In Lucena v. Craufurd, Lawrence, J., says—“The defendants in error have been considered as trustees or consignees, who, it is said, have insurable interest. A trustee who has an insurable interest must as I conceive, have some existing right to the thing insured, for the benefit of another.” Having regard to what follows, and to the statement of Lord Eldon in the same case, the phrase “existing right” as here used, means an existing legal right. “But,” continues the learned judge, “the commissioners in this case had not any such right, and therefore cannot, according to my notions of a trustee, be considered as such. Nor can they be considered as consignees in whom any interest or right is vested by bill of lading or other instrument of consignment by which the property of the subject-matter of the consignment primâ facie will pass. If they be consignees, they were naked consignees for the purpose of doing some act respecting the goods consigned, and rather agents than consignees according to the common understanding of that word; and, taking them to be naked consignees who have not the legal property of the subject-matter of the insurance, and who are not beneficially interested in it, they ought, I conceive, to have averred the interest to be in those on whose account the insurance was made.” The real effect of the decision of the House of Lords in this case is well discussed by Duer, vol. 2, p. 161 et seq., in n. 2 to sect. 10. The proposition to be discussed, he says, and for the maintenance of which the case has been cited, is, “that a consignee clothed with the power of sale has in all cases an insurable interest to the full value of the goods consigned to him, and may cover them on the voyage of importation by a policy effected in his own name and on his own account. The truth of this proposition, and the justness of its deduction from the authorities relied on, are the questions I propose to examine: but I shall first endeavour to show that the opposite doctrine, viz., that the right of a consignee to recover on an averment of interest in himself is limited to his own advances, constituting a lien on the goods insured (which necessarily implies that he has no insurable interest beyond those advances), is established, not by ambiguous dicta, but by positive decisions.” The learned author then minutely, and I think accurately, discusses the case of Lucena v. Craufurd, and sums up thus:—“The result is that the final decision in Lucena v. Craufurd seems definitely to have settled the law, that a consignee, where he means to cover, not a beneficial interest of his own, but the entire property of the consignor, must so frame the policy as by its terms to embrace that interest; and, to enable him to recover a loss, must aver that interest in the declaration, and on the trial, not only prove its existence, but his own authority to make the insurance, or the adoption of his contract.” In Wolff v. Horncastle (1 Bos. & P. 316), the plaintiff, who was held by the court to have become before the loss the consignee of the goods, and to have advanced 300*l.* on the security of the goods, was further held to be entitled to recover on the second count of the declaration, in which he averred the interest to be in himself. But Buller, J., says expressly: “I hold that the plaintiffs had a clear right to insure to the amount of 300*l.* for which they were interested in the goods. In Caruthers v. Sheddon (6 Taunt. 14) the plaintiffs were held entitled to recover the full value of the cargo, upon a count alleging the count to be in Dowrick and Way. The cargo was shipped under an agreement by which it was stated that Dowrick and Way and two others had agreed to become partners in an adventure of sending goods which Dowrick and Way had on their own separate and personal credit actually and really purchased, &c. The jury found for the plaintiffs, and that the policy was intended to cover all the partners in the adventure. The objection taken in argument was, not that the interest ought to have been declared to be in all, but that Dowrick and Way could not insure more than their own interest as partners. The court did not hold that Dowrick and Way might insure to the whole value merely on the ground of their being consignees; if that ground had been sufficient the whole argument was futile: the court held in terms, “that Dowrick and Way might protect all their species of interest under one policy.” Duer, vol. 2, p. 162, holds that “the sole ground of the decision was that the advances which they had made as consignees, added to their individual interest as partners, were equivalent to the entire value of the property insured.” It does not appear in the case whether Dowrick and Co. were indorsees and holders of the bill of lading. It may be inferred from the nature of the transaction and their position, that they were; and, if so, they were legal owners as well as consignees. Speaking of this case, and of Wolff v. Horncastle, Mr. Phillips, vol. 1, sect. 423, says—“So a consignee or other party entitled to a lien upon property on account of advances or otherwise may cover his own interest by insurance on it in his own name generally.” In Godwin v. The London Assurance Company (1 Bur. 489) it was held that the English factor, to whom the bill of lading was not indorsed, might insure to the full value of the goods; but on the ground that his advances were to the extent of the full value and more. “Such factor,” says Arnould, Vol. 1, p. 247, abstracting this case, “had an insurable interest to the extent of his general balance, and might recover, averring the interest to be in himself.” In Robertson v. Hamilton (14 East, 522), it is difficult to extricate the exact grounds of the decision. The interest was in two counts alleged to be in the plaintiffs; in the third count, in Fisher, Kidd and Co., the registered owners of the ship. The plaintiffs were consignees of the ship, and had made advances the amount of which is not disclosed in the case. It was held that the plaintiffs might recover the full value of the ship “as trustees,” it is said, “for those interested with themselves in the whole.” If the plaintiffs were entitled to recover as agents for Fisher, Kidd and Co., they recovered as for the legal registered owners. If they recovered on the counts alleging their own interest, it may be that their advances, primâ facie, and until the accounts were settled in equity, were equal to the whole value. Lord Ellenborough says—"The plaintiffs had an insurable interest as upon a hotchpot right." That, I confess, I do not understand. In Irving v. Richardson (2 B. & Ad. 193), the question was whether the assured had insured in fact, that is to say, had intended to insure more than his own interest as mortgagee. If he intended to insure only that, he could keep only as much as his interest amounted to. If he had intended to insure both his own interest and that of the mortgagor, I collect from the judgment of Littledale J., that, in an action on the policy, he must under the new Registry Acts have alleged interest both in himself and the mortgagor. "Before the late Registry Act (6 Geo. 4 c. 110 s. 45)," he says, "the mortgagee of a ship was in point of law the owner, and might insure to the full extent of the ship's value to the mortgagor as well as to himself. But by the statute the interests of mortgagor and mortgagee are more distinctly severed than they formerly were." That says, in effect, that, when the mortgagee was legal owner, he could insure to the full value of the ship, though not beneficially interested to that extent; but now he was not legal owner, and could therefore insure and recover in his own name only to the extent of his beneficial interest. In Sutherland v. Pratt (12 M. & W. 17), it is obvious that the bill of lading, indorsed generally to bearer, was delivered to the plaintiff, so that he was the legal owner of the goods. In Crowley v. Cohen (3 B. & Ad. 478), the plaintiffs who were carriers and not the legal owners, were allowed to insure and recover the full value in their own name; but it was on the ground that they were carriers, and were themselves liable for the full value. Speaking of this case, it is said in 1 Phillips on Insurance, § 424, p. 234, "This is in effect a re-insurance, as the carriers may be considered to be insurers." In 1 Arnold on Insurance, 4th edit. p. 70, the cases of factors, consignees and agents are treated of—"There are different sorts of consignees; some have a power to sell, manage and dispose of the property, &c.; others have a mere naked right to take possession; others, again, though not instructed to sell, are yet interested in the property, as having a lien or claim upon it for their advances." As to mere naked consignees, i.e., those only entitled to take possession, they have, he says, no insurable interest—"they have no legal property; they are not beneficially interested." But, "with regard to consignees who have a lien or claim on the property in respect of advances, or commission-agents to whom it is intrusted for the purpose of sale, or indorsees of the bill of lading to whom a general balance is due, there is no doubt they may effect an insurance on the property in their own names and on their own account to its whole value, and recover thereon, averring interest in themselves, at all events to the amount of their lien, claim or balance." It is true that he afterwards says, "As a general principle, there can be no doubt that consignees of goods, being in advance to the consignors or under acceptances for them, may insure in their own name and on their own account to the full value of the goods, and apply the proceeds of the policies to their own benefit, up to the extent of their claims in respect of such advances and acceptances, holding the residue in trust for the consignors." For this proposition he quotes Carruthers v. Shed- don (6 Taunt. 14), with which I have already dealt, and the American case of De Forest v. The Fulton Insurance Company. The terms of the policy, which was a fire policy, are set out in 1 Phillips on Insurance, § 311, p. 177, and they were "on goods as well the property of the assured as held by them in trust or on commission." It seems to me that this is no authority for Mr. Arnould's proposition as to consignees of goods on board ship who insure by a marine policy in the ordinary terms. And for the same reason the English cases on fire policies are no authority. The proposition may be correct if it be applied to consignees under advance or acceptance, who are holders of bills of lading, and thereby legal owners of the goods mentioned therein. In 1 Phillips on Insurance (c. 3, s. 7, sub-sect. 309, p. 174), the law is thus stated: "A consignee, factor, or agent, having a lien on goods to the amount of his advances, acceptances, and liabilities, stands in this respect (i.e., as to his insurable interest) precisely in the situation of a mortgagee. A debt is due to him from his principal for which he holds the property as collateral security, and the property is at the risk of the principal, as the debt would still subsist though the property should be lost; and the excess over the proceeds of the goods would be still due to him in case of the proceeds being insufficient to satisfy his claim. He has, therefore, an insurable interest in the goods to the amount of his lien." And in sect. 204: "It is a familiar doctrine that a party having a lien on a vessel or cargo under a contract for advances may be rightly considered as the special owner of them to the extent of those advances, and, as such, may protect himself by insurance; and that a creditor to whom goods are assigned as collateral security, has an insurable interest in them not exceeding the amount of his debt." To the elaborate note of Duer, n. 2, on sect. 10, I have already referred. In vol. 2, p. 109, he says: "My researches have not enabled me to discover a single case in the English reports in which a consignee, on an averment of a sole interest in himself, has been permitted to recover beyond the amount of his own advances."

It seems to me to follow from these authorities, and from principle, that a consignee, as such, has no insurable interest at all. "To assert the universal right of a consignee to insure the entire property on the voyage of importation, is to assert that a valid insurance may be made by a person who has no title or interest, legal or equitable, and no authority express or implied"—2 Duer, p. 111. If it is necessary to bring in some advance, or some contract giving an interest, in order to give the consignee a right to insure, it seems to me to follow necessarily, i.e., logically, that the insurable interest is limited to the amount of the advance, or to the amount of the interest under the contract. It cannot be that a consignee without personal interest cannot insure at all, and that a consignee in advance to the extent of 100l. can insure to 10,000l., and recover such an amount upon an averment that it is the interest he has. He has no such interest. It seems to me therefore, both upon principle and authority, that the plaintiffs in this case, being only consignees to sell, under advance, and with a contract right to earn commission, but not being the legal owners of the cotton, could only properly insure, so as to recover in their own name, the 3000l. for which they were liable on their acceptance, and any commission they would have earned by selling. It was urged that if that be the law, the plaintiffs could not recover at all, because they intended to insure, not only their own interest, but also the interest of their correspondents. But Duer, vol. 2, p. 45, points out that, in Wolff v. Horn-castle "the judgment of the court is an express decision that, where a policy is effected on behalf of the consignor, the consignee is at liberty to apply it to his own use to the extent of his own insurable interest, and that his claim is not answered by showing that, when he effected the insurance, he expected that it was to apply exclusively to the interest of the consignor." Moreover, it may be doubted whether the policy in this case could cover an interest of Bell and Co. or Cursondas Madhowdass. At the time it was effected, the plaintiffs had no authority, express or implied, to insure on their behalf. It may be, though I think it unnecessary to determine the point, that Watson v. Swann (11 C.B., N.S., 756) is an authority for saying that a policy cannot cover the interests of persons who, at the time of effecting it, are wholly unconnected with and unknown to the person effecting the insurance. If the policy did not and could not cover the interest of Bell and Co. or Cursondas Madhowdass, the declaration on the policy, though made with intent to cover those interests, has no effect—Stephens v. The Australasian Insurance Company (ante, vol. 1, p. 458; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 585; L. Rep. 9 C. P. 18; 42 L. J., N. S., 12, C. P.)

As I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs can recover to the extent of their own interest, and to that extent only, it seems to me unnecessary to determine the controverted question arising upon the third plea by way of traverse. I doubt whether the distinction affirmed by Mr. Duer between the allegation of interest and the allegation with respect to the party for whom the contract of insurance was made, is sound. It may be true to say that Bell v. Ansley (16 East, 141) and Cohen v. Hannam (5 Taunt. 101) do not necessarily overrule Page v. Fry (2 B. & P. 240). But most certainly in Cohen v. Hannam Lord Mansfield intended to overrule it; and the reasons in favour of confining the allegations of interest are, it seems to me, precisely the same as the reasons for confining the allegation as to the person on whose account the policy was made. It is equally objectionable to have a person interested on the jury, as to have a person who is a party to the contract. It is equally just that the defendant should have the opportunity of interrogating a party interested as a party to the action. The present case is a remarkable instance. It was of the utmost importance to the defendants, if their suspicions were well founded, to have the opportunity of interrogating Bell and Cursondas Madhowdass.

I am of opinion that the rule should be made absolute to reduce the damages.

BOVILL, C. J.—My brother Keating, who is also absent upon the circuit, concurs in the judgment of my brother Brett, which I have just read. The court being equally divided in opinion, the rule to enter the verdict for the defendants or to reduce the damages will be discharged, and the defendants will be at liberty to appeal to a court of error.

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

THE PHILOTAXE.

Salvage—Termination of service—Place of safety—Right to reward.

Where a steam tug is engaged to render assistance to a ship aground in the night time, and succeeds in getting her off, and takes her to a safe anchorage for the night, and lies alongside of her till morning, the salvage service does not end on the ship being anchored, but the steam tug is entitled to reward for the time she lies alongside the ship ready to render further assistance if required.

THIS was an appeal from a decree of the judge of the City of London Court (Mr. Commissioner Kerr, in a cause of salvage instituted on behalf of the owners, master, and crew of the steam tug Palmerston, against the ship Philotaxe. On the night of the 16th April 1873, the Philotaxe got on to the Shoebury sand, at the entrance to the river Thames. The Palmerston came up and offered her services, and was engaged to render assistance and tow her up to London, but no price was agreed upon, as the master of the tug declined to name any sum, leaving the amount to be settled thereafter. The Palmerston made fast to the ship at about 11.30 p.m., but did not succeed in getting her off until 2.30 a.m. on the 17th April. In getting her off the tug had to resort to clicking; that is, getting her hawser slack, and going ahead full speed, so as to give the ship a jerk. When the ship got off the sand, she was taken to an anchorage off the Chapman Sand, and there she lay at anchor until 9 a.m. of the same day. The tug lay alongside of her until that time, and then towed her up to London.

The value of the ship and cargo was agreed at 2000*l.* The value of the tug was about 5000*l.*, and the plaintiffs claimed 60*l.* for damage and demurrage caused by the service. The defendants tendered 110*l.* and costs, which the plaintiffs refused to accept.

At the hearing in the City of London Court, no separate claim was made for the towage from the Chapman to London, but the question of when the ship was brought to a place of safety, and when the service ended, was discussed, and the learned commissioner found, as a matter of fact, that she was anchored in a place of safety off the Chapman; that the weather was perfectly fine, and that nothing was wrong with the vessel; that the salvage service ended there; that the payment into court was sufficient; and he allowed the plaintiff his costs up to the time of tender, and the defendant his costs after the tender.

From this decree the plaintiffs appealed to the High Court of Admiralty.

The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C.) and W. G. F. Phillimore, for the appellants.—The reward is insufficient on two grounds: First, because it does not include reward for the time during which the tug lay alongside the ship at the Chapman, nor for the towage up to London, which was all part of one service, and ought not to be divided. Moreover, the ship might have been injured by grounding, and the attendance of the tug was necessary; the Chapman could not be considered a place of safety; secondly, the award does not take into consideration the amount of damage and demurrage, as that would leave only 50*l.* for salvage, which is insufficient.

Butt, Q.C., and Charles Hall, for the respondent.—The result proved that the Chapman was a place of safety, and the service, therefore, ended there. The reward was sufficient. Towage was not claimed below, and cannot be claimed now.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is an appeal from a decree of the learned commissioner of the City of London Court. There can be no doubt that a salvage service was rendered, and the only question is, whether the amount awarded is sufficient. The Philotaxe was a full rigged ship of 370 tons, and having got on the sand clearly required steam assistance to get her off. The weather no doubt was fine, but was liable to change, and no vessel would be safe if left to lie on that sand. The tug was of considerable value and power, and did her work well, and the evidence has established that she was damaged by clicking, which operation was necessary to get the ship off the sand, and succeeded in its object. The tug took the ship to a berth near the Chapman Sand. It was contended by the defendants that the service ended as soon as the ship was anchored off the Chapman, and so it was found by the learned commissioner. No doubt the towage from the Chapman to London, for which no claim seems to have been made in the court below, was rightly excluded in the award; but it appears that the tug lay by the ship all night, and that both were in no very safe position, lying in the neighbourhood of the Chapman. If the ship had been injured whilst aground, as she well might have been, or as her master might reasonably have supposed she was, the tug's services would have been of great importance during the night, in case bad weather came on. This was no doubt the reason why the tug, at the request, or at least with the consent, of the master of the Philotaxe, lay by the latter all night. Hence, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, I must hold that the service continued whilst the tug lay by the ship during the night, and this I am justified in doing upon the construction of the cases heretofore decided in this court. That being the case I am of opinion that the amount of the tender was not sufficient. The damage and demurrage, even if they do not amount to the sum claimed by the plaintiffs, reduce the reward given below to that to which the nature and extent of the service entitled the plaintiffs. I shall increase the amount tendered to 170*l.*, but it must be understood that I intend this sum to include, as I consider I have a right to include, the 10*l.* claimed for towage service from the Chapman to London. I shall allow the appellants their costs.

THE NELLIE.

Salvage—Engagement to render assistance—Signals of distress—Uncompleted service—Right to reward.

Where a steamship has been engaged to render assistance to another in distress by towing her to a place of safety, and after several hours' towing, the ships are parted by no fault of the salvor, and the conduct of the ship in distress leads the salvor to the honest belief that his services are no longer required, and thereupon the latter proceeds to his own destination, he is not thereby deprived of his right to salvage reward, but upon the other vessel arriving safe in port by her own exertions, may proceed against her in request of the services actually rendered.

THIS was a cause of salvage instituted on behalf of the owners of the Russian ship Lazareff, against the English ship Nellie, cargo and freight, and against the owner of the Nellie intervening. Before the arrest of the ship the cargo had been sold out of the jurisdiction, and could not be proceeded against.

The Nellie was a screw steamer of 548 tons register, and 95 horse power nominal, manned by a crew of twenty-one hands, and at the time of the services was bound on a voyage from Kustendje to Falmouth, with a cargo of grain: the value of ship and freight was 13,378*l.* The Lazareff was a screw steamer belonging to the port of Odessa, of 1650 tons gross, and 1300 tons nett register, and had a crew of forty-nine hands; she was bound from Odessa to Antwerp with a cargo of grain; the value of the ship was 50,000*l.*, of her cargo 25,000*l.* On the 4th Feb. 1873, at about 9 a.m., the Nellie was in the Bay of Biscay, about 50 miles from Ushant and 120 miles from the Lizard. She had lost her foremast, and her starboard boiler was leaking, so that the fires under it had to be extinguished, and she could only use her port boiler. She was under sail and steam, but was making slow progress, and as the weather was bad her master signalled for assistance. The signal used was that of Maryatt's Code, signifying "in distress and want assistance." In reply to this signal the Lazareff came up; both vessels lay to and were made fast with two hawsers. The Lazareff then commenced to tow the Nellie towards Falmouth, at the request of the master of the Nellie. About half an hour after the Nellie signalled to be towed to Plymouth, and the course was accordingly changed. Shortly after one of the tow lines broke, and then two others were made fast, and the two vessels went ahead till about 9.30 p.m., when all three tow lines parted. The Lazareff went ahead slow, getting in the tow lines; the Nellie meanwhile passing her. The Lazareff burnt blue lights, which were answered by the Nellie by other blue lights. The Lazareff followed the Nellie until 3 a.m. on the morning of the 5th Feb., and then went up to her. The Nellie had then ceased to burn blue lights for some time, and when the Lazareff got up, the Nellie shut out her side light, which had been visible, and went ahead, and did not ask for further assistance. Meanwhile the hawsers had been got on board the Lazareff, and one had the appearance of having been cut in two. The master of the Lazareff thereupon judging that his services were no longer required, altered his course and proceeded on his voyage to Antwerp. The Nellie proceeded to Falmouth, where she arrived in safety at about 10 a.m. on the 5th Feb.

The Lazareff had towed the Nellie for about twelve hours, and had remained already to render further assistance for six hours more. In respect of these services her owners, master, and crew claimed salvage reward. In answer to this claim, the defendants set up that the master of the Lazareff agreed to tow the Nellie to Falmouth, but had failed to complete his engagement, and that he did not do his utmost to complete it; and they submitted that there was no salvage service.

Butt, Q.C. (Phillimore with him), for the plaintiffs.—Where a ship, in answer to signals of distress, renders salvage service, which she fails to complete through no fault of her own, she is entitled to reward. There is no fault to be attributed to the plaintiffs here. The acts of the defendants caused the Lazareff to continue on her voyage, and hence we are entitled to reward.

The Undaunted, Lush, 90; 2 L. T. Rep. N. S. 520.

Clarkson (Webster with him), for the defendants.—There is no distinction in an agreement of this kind, whether made on sea or land. Where a man undertakes to perform a service, he must perform it all or can have no claim. The cases only decide that where a salvage is completed by third persons, those who rendered the first services, but did not complete, are entitled to share. There was no completion of the service here at all. The ship was left in the Channel, the engagement being to tow to Falmouth. Even if there was no express agreement as to place, an agreement to tow to a place of safety will be implied by salvage law. Hence the contract has not been performed, unless the plaintiffs were exonerated from the performance by those on board the Nellie, and no such exoneration took effect, because the Nellie continued to burn blue lights. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—You admit that the Russian bonâ fide believed that her services were not wanted. She has rendered service for eighteen hours; is she to have no reward?] Without completion of the service there can be no claim to payment. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—What shows the agreement?] The evidence establishes an agreement to tow to Plymouth; and even if he bonâ fide believed that we no longer required his services, but was mistaken, he must suffer for his mistake, and cannot recover. It lies upon the plaintiff to show exoneration.

W. F. G. Phillimore, in reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE (after stating the facts).—It has been argued by the defendants that there was a bargain made by the master of the Lazareff to take the Nellie to Plymouth, or at least to a place of safety. I cannot, however, think that this is a conclusion which the premises warrant. It cannot be said that there was any absolute contract at all to tow to any particular place. There can be no doubt that Falmouth was the Nellie's destination, but it was at no time agreed that she should be taken there; in fact, the only understanding between the parties was, that assistance should be given. Although it is true that in these cases there is usually a tacit contract that the ship shall be taken to a place of safety, and that contract must in the first instance have existed in this case, there was on the other hand no express contract to do anything.

The facts are undisputed, in so far as they show that the Lazareff went to the Nellie in answer to signals of distress, and duly performed the services required of her up to a certain point, when she left the Nellie, supposing her services to be no longer required. It is admitted that no moral blame attaches to the Russian ship for leaving the Nellie, and that in so doing her master acted as he thought was for the best, believing that his services were dispensed with. It was argued, however, that the master of the Lazareff was mistaken in supposing that the Nellie no longer required his services, and that the consequence of this mistake being that the service was not completed, the Lazareff loses her right to reward, although there had been in the first instance an actual request to render assistance. Now, in the case of The Undaunted (Lush, 90: 2 L. T. Rep. N. S. 520), my learned predecessor said:—"there is a broad distinction between salvors who volunteer to go out and salvors who are employed by a ship in distress. Salvors who volunteer go out at their own risk for the chance of earning reward; and if they labour unsuccessfully, they are entitled to nothing; the effectual performance of salvage service is that which gives them a title to salvage remuneration. But if men are engaged by a ship in distress, whether generally or particularly, they are to be paid according to their efforts made, even though the labour or service may not prove beneficial. Take the case of a vessel at anchor in a gale of wind, hailing a steamer to lie by and be ready to take her in tow, if required; the steamer does so; the ship rides out the gale safely without assistance. I should, undoubtedly, hold in such a case that the steamer was entitled to salvage reward; the quantum to be determined by the risk encountered by both vessels, the value of the property at hazard, and the other circumstances of the case. The engagement to render assistance to a vessel in distress, and the performance of that engagement, so far as necessary, or so far as possible, establish a title to salvage reward."

Now it was no fault of her own that the Lazareff went away after the breaking of the hawsers. She stood by the Nellie for some time, burning blue lights, and I do not consider that the statement of the plaintiffs is at all exaggerated, where it shows that efforts were made to render further assistance. It has been proved that the Nellie got ahead of the Lazareff, and although lights were burnt, did not wait for the latter to come up. Moreover, when the Lazareff did come up, the Nellie altered her course, and stood away for Falmouth, which may have deceived the Lazareff. I consider that the master of the Lazareff arrived upon the facts at the honest conclusion, after the lights ceased burning, that he was no longer wanted, and thereupon went on to his destination.

I cannot then agree with the contention that upon these facts there is no salvage due. There was a manifest engagement to render assistance, and assistance was rendered, for which the plaintiffs are entitled to be paid. The case comes within the sensible remarks of Dr. Lushington, in the case I have cited. There was no mala fides on the part of the plaintiffs; their services were actually beneficial, and they are therefore entitled to remuneration. I shall award 300*l.*, with costs.

session fees charged by the high bailiff in respect of the County Court arrest will not be allowed by the High Court upon taxation of plaintiff's costs.

THIS was an objection to the registrar's taxation of costs in a cause of necessities, instituted against the ship Rio Lima.

The cause was originally instituted in the County Court of Northumberland, under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, sect. 3, and a warrant of arrest was issued out of that court. Previous to the institution of this cause, two other causes, one of mortgage and the other of possession, had been instituted in the High Court of Admiralty, and in these two causes the ship was arrested by the deputy of the marshal of the High Court, on the 10th March 1873. On the same day, but at a later hour, the ship was also arrested by the high bailiff of the County Court in the cause of necessities. At the time of this arrest, the warrant of the High Court was affixed to the mast of the ship, and the marshal's deputy gave notice to the man in possession, on behalf of the high bailiff, that the ship was already under the arrest of the High Court. The high bailiff, however, remained in possession until the 22nd April 1873. On the 21st April 1873, an application was made by the plaintiffs to the High Court to transfer the cause of necessities from the County Court to the High Court, and in support of the application an affidavit, made by the plaintiff's solicitor, was filed, stating that at the time of the institution of the suit othersuits had already been instituted in the High Court, and that the High Court had in those suits arrested the ship. On this application, the cause of necessities was transferred to the High Court, and according to the practice of the High Court, was again there instituted by præcipe. On the 22nd April the ship was released by the high bailiff of the County Court, and the plaintiffs filed in the registry of the High Court a caveat against the release of the ship, which continued under arrest in the other suits above mentioned. Appearances were duly entered in this suit for certain owners of the ship. On the 29th April the plaintiffs applied to the court to order the arrest of the ship in the cause of necessities; but this the judge refused to do, holding that a caveat was sufficient so long as the arrests in the other suits held good; (see The Rio Lima, 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 775; ante, p. 34.) On the 3rd May the plaintiffs withdrew the caveat against the release, the cause on necessities having been settled for an agreed sum and taxed costs. The plaintiffs' costs were accordingly taxed by the registrar, and in the bill of costs, among the outport charges, there appeared an item, "Paid high bailiff's bill for arrest, possession, and maintenance, 16l. 13s. 6d." This charge covered the period from the arrest of the ship on the 10th March to the release on the 22nd April. This was disallowed by the registrar, on the ground that at the time the warrant was served the ship was already under the arrest of and in possession of the High Court, and that, it being the practice of the marshal only to charge one set of possession fees, some arrangement producing the same result ought to have been made.

The defendants had in the first instance objected to the double possession, and the following letter was written to the high bailiff of the Northumberland County Court by the defendants' solicitor:—

6, Copthall-court, London, E.C.
March 20, 1873.

Rio Lima.

Sir,—I am informed by the marshal of the Court of admiralty that a person has been put on board this steamer at the instance of a suitor in your County Court. The vessel is under arrest in three suits instituted in the Admiralty Court, and the expense incurred in keeping the man above referred to on board will not be allowed as an item in the account sales upon the sale of this vessel. I will undertake that before the vessel is released due notice shall be given to you, so that if it is considered advisable so to do, possession may be taken by the plaintiffs in your court; but if, notwithstanding this, the man is continued on board, the additional expense occasioned by his remaining there will have to be borne by those who instruct him.—Yours truly,

To the High Bailiff. ROWLAND MILLER.

The plaintiffs' solicitors replied as follows:—

Newcastle-on-Tyne, March 21, 1873.

Rio Lima.

Dear Sir,—Your letter to the high bailiff of the County Court of Newcastle has been handed to us, as the plaintiffs' solicitors in the County Court. We find there are five arrestments against the ship and cargo, of which ours is only the third, and under such circumstances we cannot accede to your request and withdraw possession.—Yours truly,

INGLEDEW & DAGGETT.

Rowland Miller, Esq.

To this taxation the plaintiffs objected, and gave notice of motion to review.

Phillimore, for the plaintiffs, in support of the motion.—The County Court was bound to arrest and to hold. Having no knowledge that there were suits already instituted in the High Court, the plaintiffs were bound to institute in the County Court, on account of the amount of our claim. We were entitled to institute a cause in rem., under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), and without doing so we had no means of preserving our lien for necessities. The object of the arrest is for the purpose of keeping the property within the jurisdiction of the court: (see Williams and Bruce Admiralty Practice, supp., p. 26, rule 15.) This shows that the arrest must be continued. The arrest is not for the purpose of ousting the marshal, but in order to hold concurrently. If the marshal found the sheriff in possession of a ship, he would not withdraw, but would also enter into possession. Where there are several claims against a ship, those entitled to priority of decree are entitled to priority of payment out of the proceeds; hence, if the ship were released, no decree could be got against her, and the plaintiff would allow the other creditors to take priority. Moreover, the bailiff was entitled to hold the ship until the payment of his own fees:

The North American, Swab. 466;

County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Rules; Rule 20, Williams & Bruce Adm. & Pr. supp., p. 27.

We could not have compelled the bailiff to withdraw without payment of his fees, nor was he entitled to do so without a formal release, which only takes place on abandonment of suit, or on a decree of the court against the plaintiff. In either case the bailiff would have his fees; but we could not be expected to abandon, having a good claim. The Rules do not seem to have contemplated that the ship might be under the arrest of several persons at one time in different courts, but the plaintiffs ought not to suffer for that. The fees have been paid to the bailiff, and if we had not transferred to this court, the bailiff would have been paid everything by the County Court.

at one time. The plaintiffs were not bound to go to the County Court. It has often been held that when a ship is under arrest in the High Court, any person having a cause of action, however small, may sue in that court—in fact, ought to sue here to prevent confusion. Suppose this court ordered the ship to be brought round to London in charge of the marshal, would he have to bring the high bailiff of the County Court with him out of jurisdiction of the County Court? This clearly shows that there can only be one valid possession, and that the arrest of this court supersedes that of the County Court. The plaintiffs must have known that the ship was under arrest by the marshal, and ought at once to have transferred the cause here. The taxation is a matter in the discretion of the registrar, and this discretion has for the above reasons been rightly exercised.

Phillimore, in reply.—The ship was arrested on both suits on the same day, and we had no means of knowing of her previous arrest till we took possession. We are at least entitled to possession fees for one day.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 19.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is an objection to the disallowance of one item in the taxation of the plaintiffs' cost by the registrar. That item consists of the high bailiff's charges for possession of the vessel Rio Lima during forty-four days, from March 10th to April 22nd, under a warrant issued from the County Court of Northumberland; the amount disallowed is 1*l.* 13*s.* 6*d.* At the time this warrant was served the Rio Lima was already under arrest under two warrants from this court, and in possession of the marshal's deputy. Both these warrants had been served at an earlier hour on the same day (the 10th of March in this year) on which the County Court warrant was served. These warrants had been issued on the 7th and 8th March; the return showed that they were served in the usual manner by affixing the warrant, and afterwards the copy to the mast of the vessel. The vessel was subsequently arrested by warrants from this court in three other suits, namely, in a cause of possession on the 18th of March, of master's wages on the 21st of March, of co-ownership on the 29th of May. For holding possession of the vessel in all these five causes, the marshal has charged only one set of possession fees.

I am by no means prepared to say that, if the County Court arrest had been first in order of date, the subsequent arrest by the Superior Court would not have dispossessed the officer of the inferior court. But here the question is, whether it was necessary or justifiable that whilst the ship was thus in the custody of the Superior Court, a second person should have been placed, under the County Court warrant, in possession of the ship. The practice of this court with respect to cases in which proceedings have been taken in this court and in the County Court has been established for some time. In such cases I have invariably exercised the power given me under the statutes of transferring all the proceedings to this court, thereby, I believe, saving much expense and delay to the suitors. The plaintiff ought to have been, and must have been aware of this practice; and they applied on the 21st April to this court for an order to remove the suit from the County Court into this court. The order was granted. This course should have been taken in the first instance.

VOL. II., N.S.

Moreover, an arrangement to avoid the expense of this double possession might easily have been made with the custom-house officer who acts as the deputy of the marshal on these occasions. He might have been instructed by the plaintiffs, in the event of the vessel being released from the warrants of the High Court of Admiralty, to retain her under the County Court warrant. The marshal has shown me a letter from his deputy, dated March 25th, in which is this paragraph—"I have given notice to the party on board under the County Court Admiralty jurisdiction process, that the vessel was before he was placed on board, and still remains under arrest under an Admiralty warrant;" and in the affidavit sworn by the plaintiffs' solicitor at Newcastle, I find this paragraph—"I have been informed and verily believe that previous to the institution of the suit in the County Court at Newcastle, that three different suits had been instituted in this honourable court, and the said court was and still is in possession of the said vessel."

I am of opinion that the plaintiffs were bound to know that the vessel was in possession under the warrant of this court, and, moreover, that the fact was distinctly brought to their notice by the correspondence which is set out in this case a month before they applied to transfer the cause, and that the charge for possession fees for forty-four days under the County Court warrant was rightly disallowed by the registrar. I agree with the observations that the County Court Acts were not drawn with due care or perhaps adequate knowledge of the practice of this court, but that is no reason why I should put such a construction upon them as would result in the defendant being made to pay a double set of fees to the plaintiffs for the detention of his vessel in a case where no concurrent possession was necessary. I dismiss the motion with costs.

THE RIVER WEAR COMMISSIONERS v. ADAMSON AND OTHERS.

Damage to sea wall by vessel—Damage the result of stress of weather—Vessel abandoned by crew at the time—Liability of owner of vessel—The Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Acts 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 27), s. 74.

The owners of a vessel, which the crew have left owing to stress of weather, are answerable, under sect. 74 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act (10 & 11 Vict. c. 27) for damage done to a sea wall, after the crew have left her.

In this case, which was tried at the last Durham assizes before Quain, J., a verdict was entered for the plaintiff for an amount to be settled by an arbitrator, leave being reserved to the defendant to move to enter a verdict, or for a nonsuit.

The action was brought to recover damages for an injury done by the defendant's vessel to the sea wall of the port of Sunderland, the property in which is vested in the plaintiffs. The defendants' vessel, meeting with bad weather, made for the harbour of Sunderland, but grounded near the sea wall, and her crew were then taken off from the vessel. Some time after the crew had left the vessel, the tide rose, and the vessel was driven gradually against the sea wall, to which injury was thereby done.

Holker, Q.C. (with him Greenhow) now moved in pursuance of the leave reserved. Sect. 74 of the Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vic., c. 27) enacts that "The owner of every vessel or float of timber shall be answerable to the undertakers for any damage done by such vessel or float of timber, or by any person employed about the same, to the harbour, dock, or pier, or the quays or works connected therewith, and the master or person having charge of such vessel or float of timber, through whose wilful act or negligence any such damage is done, shall also be liable to make good the same; and the undertakers may detain any such vessel or float of timber until sufficient security has been given for the amount of damage done by the same; provided always that nothing herein contained shall extend to impose any liability for any such damage upon the owner of any vessel where such vessel shall, at the time when such damage is caused, be in charge of a duly licensed pilot, whom such owner or master is bound by law to employ and put his vessel in charge of." This enactment points to the case of injury done by a vessel which, at the time the injury is done, is under the control of some one, and not to such a case as the present, where the vessel, at the time, was abandoned by her crew. This view is confirmed by the words that "the master or person having charge of such vessel or float of timber through whose wilful act or negligence any such damage is done, shall also be liable to make good the same." [BLACKBURN, J.—The vessel in the present case must have been actually in charge of some one; it was not a derelict.] It was practically a derelict. It cannot have been the intention of the Legislature to make the owners of a vessel liable in case of such an inevitable accident. [BLACKBURN, J.—I entertain a suspicion that the Legislature never had in their contemplation such a case as the present. But if your contention is correct, then the case of Dennis v. Tovell (L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 10; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 482) was ill decided. There this court was compelled to hold that sect. 74 applies to cases of damage done to a pier by a vessel through inevitable accident caused by stress of weather.] The present case is distinguishable from Dennis v. Tovell in this, that the vessel here was not under the control of any one at the time the damage was done. [BLACKBURN, J.—The vessel was clearly not a derelict; and I do not think that the fact of having been grounded makes a difference. I shall be very glad if a court of error can put a different construction on the 74th section from that which we have felt bound to put upon it; and for that purpose we will give the defendants leave to appeal if they wish to do so.]

JOLLIFFE AND ANOTHER v. WALLASEY LOCAL BOARD.

Obstruction to tidal river—Negligent exercise of statutory powers—Omission to indicate obstruction by sufficient buoy—Notice of action.

By a local Act the defendants were authorised to construct in conformity with certain deposited plans, "and upon the lands delineated upon the said plans," a pier or landing stage, "together with such other works and conveniences in connection therewith," as they should from time to time think fit. Before the landing stage was commenced plans of the proposed works were to be deposited at the Admiralty for approval. The local Act was to be executed "subject to the powers and provisions" of the Public Health Act 1848, sect. 139 of which requires notice of action "for anything done or intended to be done" under the provisions. The defendants deposited plans (differing in extension from the plans under the Act) which received the approval of the conservators of the river, representing the Admiralty, and constructed the landing stage in conformity therewith. The landing stage was a floating one, and was moored by anchors lying in the bed of the river. The position of the anchors was indicated by a buoy, which, being carried down by the tide, became concealed from view. One of the anchors becoming displaced, stove in and swamped a vessel of the plaintiffs which was lawfully navigating the river.

Held (1), that the anchor, although placed where it was for the benefit of the public, was an obstruction which the defendants could not have created without statutory authority, and was a nuisance to the river; (2) that the defendants were guilty of negligence in their management of the buoy, but (3) that inasmuch as the plans had received the approval of the Admiralty, such approval was tantamount to the sanction of the Act, so as to entitle the defendants to statutory notice of action.

Notice of action must be given in a case of non-feasance, just as much as in a case of misfeasance.

Per Denman, J., Reg. v. Russell (6 B. & C. 566) is overruled by Reg. v. Ward (4 Ad. & E. 384.)

This was an action for obstructing a navigable river, whereby a vessel of the plaintiffs was swamped.

The declaration stated that the defendants had constructed, and were in possession, and had the management of a certain landing stage, called the New Brighton Landing Stage, upon a certain public navigable tidal river, and defendants sunk, placed, and kept, in and upon the bed of the said river, at a part thereof where it was navigable, a certain anchor of the defendants, attached by a cable to the said landing stage, which said anchor was covered with water and wholly concealed from view, and in such a position and at such a depth, that vessels in navigating the said river, and passing in and along and over the said place where the said anchor was so sunk and placed as aforesaid, without having notice of the said anchor being so sunk and being in the said place, would be and were in great danger of striking against the same, and of being thereby damaged, and while the said anchor was so sunk,

&c., no notice was given nor any proper precaution taken by the defendants to guard against the said danger to vessels lawfully navigating the said river, and passing in, along, and over the said place where the said anchor was so sunk, and by means of the premises a vessel of the plaintiffs, while lawfully navigating the said river and passing in, along, and over the said place, struck against the said anchor and was swamped.

The second count charged that the anchor became in a dangerous position, whereby vessels navigating the river and passing over the place where the anchor was sunk were in danger of striking against the same, whereof the defendants had notice, yet the defendants wrongfully and negligently allowed the said anchor to be, and kept the same for a long and unreasonable time in, the said dangerous position.

The third count charged that by the Wallasey Improvement Act 1864, it was enacted that the defendants, subject to the provisions of the said Act and the statutes incorporated therewith, might construct certain works according to certain deposited plans, and among the said works a certain pier or landing stage at New Brighton, with all such jetties, &c., and conveniences, as the defendants should from time to time think fit, and that previously to commencing the said pier, the defendants should deposit plans at the Admiralty Office for approval, and should not extend or alter the said works without the like approval, and that the defendants did deposit such plans, whereof the approval of the Admiralty was signified, yet the defendants did not construct the said pier in accordance with the said approval and the said Act of Parliament, but so that the same deviated from the line or situation thereof shown on the deposited plans, beyond the limits of deviation shown on the said plans, without the defendants having obtained such like approval to such deviation, and by reason of so doing placed and kept the anchor as in the first count mentioned, and omitted to give notice and to take precaution as in the first count mentioned.

The fourth count charged the same matter as the third count, omitting all mention of the approval of the Admiralty Office.

The material pleas were Not guilty by statute 11 & 12 Vict. c. 73, s. 139, a public Act; and 21 & 22 Vict. c. 63, s. 4; 27 & 28 Vict. c. 117, s. 2, and 30 & 31 Vict. c. 132, s. 5.(a)

(a) The following are the material parts of the enactments referred to in the plea:

11 & 12 Vict. c. 63 (the Public Health Act 1848), s. 139: "No writ shall be sued out . . . for anything done or intended to be done under the provisions of the Act, until the expiration of one month next after notice in writing . . . clearly and explicitly stating the cause of action . . . and every such action shall be brought or commenced within six months next after the accrual of the cause of action."

21 & 22 Vict. c. lxxiii. (the Wallasey Improvement Act 1858), s. 4: "This Act shall be executed by the Local Board according to the powers and provisions of the Public Health Act 1848, and of the several Acts supplemental thereto, or otherwise relating to the public health, and from time to time in force within the limits of this Act."

27 & 28 Vict. c. cxvii. s. 2: "This Act shall be executed by the Local Board, subject to the powers and provisions of the Public Health Act 1848."

30 & 31 Vict. c. cxxxii. (the Wallasey Improvement Act 1867), s. 5: "This Act shall be executed by the Local Board, with the powers and indemnities, and according to the provisions of the Public Health Acts."

And to the first count that the defendants did what was complained of by virtue of their powers under the Wallasey Improvement Act 1864, and the Acts incorporated therewith.

The cause came on to be tried before Kelly, C.B., at the Liverpool Summer Assizes 1871, when a verdict was found for the plaintiffs by consent for 1000*l.* (the full amount claimed), subject to be reduced or vacated, and instead thereof a verdict for the defendants, or a nonsuit, to be entered according to the decision of the court upon the following case (stated by an arbitrator (Mr. Higgin, Q.C.); the court to be at liberty to draw inferences of fact.

CASE.

1. The plaintiffs are the owners of steam-tug boats plying for hire within the port of Liverpool, and were on the 15th June 1870, the owners of a certain steam tug boat called the Lioness.

2. The defendants were possessed of a certain pier, bridge, and landing-stage at New Brighton, which said bridge at one end thereof was and is attached to the said pier, and at the other end thereof was and is attached to the said landing stage, which said landing stage and bridge rose and fell, and still rise and fall with the tide. The said pier was and is constructed of piles screwed down into the soil of the river, Mersey between high and low water mark, and the whole of the said pier was and is above low water mark of ordinary spring tides. The said bridge did not and does not rest upon or touch the soil or waters of the said river Mersey, and the greater part thereof in length was and is above low water mark of ordinary spring tides; the remaining part thereof was and still is suspended to the said landing stage below low water mark of ordinary spring tides, and the whole of the said landing stage which was and still is moored by anchors fixed into the bed of the river, floated and still floats upon the waters of the said river below low water mark of ordinary spring tides, and certain anchors which moored the said landing stage were and are still fixed into the bed of the said river outside the line of the said river, and below low water mark of ordinary spring tides. The river at the locus in quo runs north and south, and the landing stage, which is 204ft. long and 30ft. 6in. wide, was and still is moored in the said river lying north and south.

3. 5 & 6 Vict. c. 110, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 63, 27 & 28 Vict. c. 177, 30 & 31 Vict. c. 132, and all other Acts relating to the port of Liverpool and to the Mersey Dock and Harbour Board, a copy of the plans deposited under 27 and 28 Vict. c. 117, a plan of the said pier, bridge, and landing stage, showing the low water mark of the river at ordinary spring tides, and also the true position of the old and now disused slip as distinguished from its false position as shown in the parliamentary plan, a general plan showing the whole of the bridge, landing stage, and approaches, and a plan of the mooring of the said landing stage, signed by Admiral Evans, acting conservator, are to be taken as part of the case.(a)

5 & 6 Vict. c. cx. By sect. 1 the conservancy of the Mersey, as the same is vested in Her Majesty in right of Her Crown and of Her Duchy of Lancaster, or in the Lord High Admiral or commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral, but not further or otherwise," is vested in three commissioners, who by sect 2

5. No such notice as mentioned in 5 & 6 Vict. c. cx., s. 6, was sent to the clerk of the peace for the county of Chester and borough of Liverpool, and no Parliamentary plans were deposited with the clerk of the peace for the borough of Liverpool, nor was any notice given to him. Though Parliamentary plans were deposited with the clerk of the peace for the county of Chester, no notice was deposited therewith.

6. The only mooring anchor which is important in this case was laid out with an iron chain from the south end of the said landing-stage, in a southeasterly direction, in a part of the bed of the river Mersey, below low water mark of ordinary spring tides, and over which vessels navigating the said river used and had a right to sail, and where vessels navigating the said river used and had a right to bring up and anchor.

Sect. 8: Previously to commencing the pier or landing stage the local board shall deposit at the Admiralty office plans . . . of the said landing stage and works connected therewith for the approval of the Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom or the commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral, such approval to be signified in writing under the hand of the Secretary of the Admiralty, and such pier or landing stage shall be constructed only in accordance with such approval. . . . Sect. 15: The local board in the construction of the pier or landing stage may deviate laterally from the line . . . shown on the deposited plans to the extent of the limits of deviation, and may deviate from the lands shown on the deposited sections . . . as regards the pier and landing stage, not exceeding five feet.

The state of things shown by the plans was as follows: The pier only was executed upon the lands delineated on the Parliamentary plans. The landing stage, bridge, and moorings were executed in conformity with the Admiralty plans, and did not extend beyond the limits fixed by them. The Admiralty plans extended beyond the limits of deviation prescribed by sect. 15 of the Act of 1864. Lastly, the buoy was marked upon the Admiralty plans.

the river, and to the ring at the end of the shank was attached a long piece of light iron chain, having at the end of it a piece of timber, intended to act as a buoy, but which piece of timber, by reason of the strength of the current of the river, was carried below the surface of the water, and in no respect indicated the position of the mooring-anchor below, except at and about dead high and low water of the tides. The said piece of timber was wholly insufficient to indicate the position of the anchor, and the defendants were guilty of negligence in not placing a buoy of sufficient size and dimensions over the anchor to resist the current of the ebb and flow of the tides, so as properly and efficiently to indicate the position of the anchor below.

8. The defendants frequently, and as often as they deemed necessary, with a long rope, each end of which was attached to a boat, swept over the whole of their mooring anchors, including the mooring anchor in question, in order to ascertain whether the said anchors were in their proper places and undisturbed, and this they had done two or three days before the occurrence hereinafter mentioned.

9. The defendants were not guilty of any negligence in the mooring anchors they used, in the mode of laying them down, or in the means they adopted to ascertain from time to time whether they were undisturbed, and in doing what is complained of, acted in the bonâ fide belief that they were acting under the powers given them by their Act of 1864, and the Acts incorporated therewith.

10. The plaintiffs did not give the defendants any notice of action.

11. Early in the morning of the 15th June 1870, the plaintiffs' steam tug boat Lioness anchored 400 or 500 yards to the south and east of the said landing stage, and in about four hours afterwards, having lifted her anchor, the tide being an ebb tide and near low water, she struck against the arm of the said mooring-anchor, which went through the bottom of the said steam tug boat Lioness, and there and then sank her, and caused her considerable damage. She was afterwards raised, taken in dock, and repaired.

12. The said mooring anchor, by some means unaccounted for and unknown to the defendants had been lifted from the bed of the said river, and the arm of the said anchor, instead of resting in a horizontal position upon the bed of the said river, had assumed an upright position, and penetrated the bottom of the steam tug boat.

13. The plaintiffs were guilty of no negligence whatsoever in navigating the said steam tug boat, in anchoring, or in raising the anchor, but in all respects navigated and managed the said steam tug boat in a lawful, careful, seamanlike, and proper manner.

14. There was no floating landing stage at the locus in quo, or at or in connection with the old slip, but the present floating landing stage is the only one which has ever been placed in that part of the river Mersey.

15. The question for the opinion of the court is whether the plaintiffs are entitled to recover from the defendants upon the facts as stated in this case. If the court should be of opinion in the affirmative, then the verdict is to stand, but the damages are to be reduced to the sum of 550*l.* If the court should be of a contrary opinion, then the verdict which has been entered for the plaintiffs is to be vacated, and instead thereof a verdict or nonsuit is to be entered for the defendants.

Nov. 10.—Aspinall Q.C. (Leofric Temple Q.C. with him) for the plaintiffs.—First, the defendants had no right to construct the landing stage in the channel of a navigable river. They had no power either by statute or common law so to do; secondly, assuming that they had such a right, then they having anchors in the fairway of a navigable river, were bound to take precautions so as to prevent damage being caused by them to passing vessels, and the defendants have been expressly found guilty of negligence in this respect; thirdly, no notice of action was necessary.

I.—By 27 & 28 Vict. c. cxvii. s. 7, the defendants are empowered to construct “a pier or landing stage at New Brighton,” with adjuncts. But this floating landing stage is out of the limits prescribed by the plans and sections referred to in the statute. The plans show no floating stage at all, but only a fixed pier. And this stage is not within the provision as to “landing places,” which does not relate to a construction as large as the principal work. [BRETT, J.—One cannot call it an “erection” any more than one would call another floating ship in the river by that name. This stage does not occupy any fixed place on the land, but moves with the tide.]

II.—Independently of statutes this is a nuisance:

White v. Crisp, 10 Ex. 312.

[DENMAN, J., referred to The Mayor of Colchester v. Brooke (7 Q. B. 339). The Free Fishers of Whitstable v. Gunn (11 H. of L. C. 192: 35 L. J. 29, C. P.); 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 150) went further still, while confirming the court in the case of the Mayor of Colchester v. Brooke (sup.)] It did. So also

White v. Phillips, 15 C. B., N. S., 845;

Brown v. Mallett, 5 C. B. 599.

An anchor without a buoy to mark its position is more likely to be dragged up by the cables of vessels near than an anchor having a buoy. In the Black Book of the Admiralty (published by the master of the Rolls), p. 111, it is said that “Two ships or more lying in a haven at scant of water, and one of the anchors lying too near another ship, the master of the said ship ought to say, ‘Master, take up your anchor, it is too near us and may do us harm.’ . . . And if they lie dry in a haven they ought to set marks and buoys at their anchors that may plainly be seen above the water.” [BRETT, J.—That passage seems only to apply to two vessels having a foul berth from having anchored too close together.] If they “lie in a dry haven,” they ought to buoy the anchor; where the ship is afloat she herself acts as a buoy by indicating the position of the anchor at which she rides. [BRETT, J.—Do you contend that the Black Book is an authority for saying that whenever a ship takes ground at anchor she is bound to buoy it?] Yes, whenever the ship herself has ceased to be a buoy. In the Laws of the Sea (edition of 1705), p. 142 article 15 is one of same tenor with the passage from the Black Book, and the observation is that the Ordinances of Wisbury require masters to put out buoys to warn others where their anchors lie, on pain of making satisfaction for whatever damage may happen for want of them, for anchors hid under water may do a great deal of mischief at ebb and low water. So in Hale, De Portibus Maris, p. 85, “The leaving of anchors in the ports without buoys or marks, whereby ships or vessels may strike against them and be spoiled,” is mentioned as one of the “nuisances that are common to all men that have occasion to come, go, or stay at ports.” An obligation lies on every one who has a thing which is reasonably liable to become dangerous to take reasonable precautions to protect persons from it.

III. As to notice of action. The right to such notice is contained in 11 & 12 Vict. c. 63, s. 139 (The Public Health Act). No doubt the defendants are a local board. In their plea they refer to 21 & 22 Vict. c. 63, s. 4; 27 & 28 Vict. c. cxvii, s. 2. But it does not follow that what is done under the local Act is done under the Public Health Act, so as to make the notice of action prescribed by the latter statute necessary. The Public Health Act (see 30 & 31 Vict. c. cxxxii, s. 5), is only in force in Wallasey township so far as relates to particular limits. And the anchor and chain at least were outside those limits. The act of negligence consists in not guarding the anchor; but that is not something done in execution of the Act. And no amount of bonâ fide belief that they were acting under the powers of an Act of Parliament will protect the defendants, if they were in fact doing something altogether beyond the powers of the Act. They had, as it were, executed the Act, and this omission to place a proper buoy was a distinct act of negligence five years afterwards. [DENMAN, J.—Their Act empowers them “to make and maintain” the works.] Assuming, however, that this confeasance comes within the provision as to notice under the words “thing done not intended to be done” as defined in Newton v. Ellis (5 E. & B. 115), there the defendant was actually doing the works authorised, and while doing them omitted to light them: whereas here the works had been long since done: (see as to this the judgment of Coleridge, J., in Newton v. Ellis.) [BRETT, J.—Suppose a drain made twenty years ago falls in for want of repair, would notice of action be needed?] No, for there would be mere nonfeasance.

Sir John Karlake, Q.C. (R. G. Williams and Douglas Walker with him) for the defendants.—First, the defendants had a right, under the Act, to put the stage on the foreshore, and also the floating dummy, with a connecting bridge. [He reviewed the Acts in question.]

Secondly, they were entitled to notice of action. On the statement in the case the anchor in its proper position could not be a nuisance at all, and it is not found that the anchor itself is a nuisance. Assume the defendants had gone beyond their power, they would still be entitled to notice of action, the only good of which is when powers are exceeded bonâ fide. [The learned counsel read paragraphs 8 and 12 of the case as to the cause of accident.] The plaintiffs argue that it is an act of omission, and, therefore, that the Act does not apply. But the Act complained of is the negligently omitting to put a better appliance to show where the anchor was. A buoy has been placed and maintained, but the arbitrator says that the buoy is not so good as it might be, so that the defendants are guilty of negligence; and, although it may be described as omission, yet it is within the observations of Lord Campbell, C.J., in Newton v. Ellis (sup.): "I am of opinion that the defendant was a person acting under the direction of the Local Board." Sect. 139 of the Public Health Act 1848 is to be read into the local Acts. The defendants will then be protected; although what is complained of was an act of omission:

Newton v. Ellis, 5 E. & B. 115;

Davis v. Curling, 8 Q. B. 286;

Wilson v. Mayor, &c., of Halifax, L. Rep. 3 Ex., 113;

17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 660;

Selmes v. Judge, L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 724; 24 L. T. Rep.

N. S. 904.

Nor was the putting down of the anchor in itself a nuisance. It is an open question whether the owners of a ferry might not put down such an anchor, independently of the Act. It is not necessarily a nuisance to do such a thing: (R. v. Russell 6 B. & C. 566) [KEATING, J.—Do you contend that the public have not a right to every portion of a navigable river?] According to R. v. Russell, this right may be infringed without creating a nuisance. Nor is the anchor here found to be a nuisance. [KEATING, J.—Would it be necessary to find such a thing? Is it not an undoubted nuisance to place any obstruction in any water which ships usually navigate?] The defendants had done nothing to the anchor to make it dangerous; they had swept a day or two before the accident, and found all right, and afterwards the anchor went wrong from some unknown cause, for which the defendants cannot be held responsible: (White v. Phillips) (sup.). [KEATING, J.—The fact of the precautions taken show their own opinion of their liability.] Everybody must have known of the anchor. The plaintiffs passed over the anchor, expecting to find it properly placed; it had been properly placed, but the accident arose from its having been displaced. [DENMAN, J.—But as an anchor is liable to be displaced, an anchor ought to be buoyed, and the not buoying it would seem to be negligence. KEATING, J.—You are inviting us to say that the buoy would not have prevented the accident.]

Aspinall, in reply.—As a matter of fact, not only the anchor, but even the landing stage, extends beyond the prescribed limits within which the local board has authority to construct works. The meaning of limits of deviation is that the works may or may not extend within them, according to circumstances, but may not extend an inch beyond them. By 27 & 28 Vict. c. cxvii, s. 2, the board has authority only to construct works upon the lands delineated upon the said plans. It has been suggested that the landing stage was a "convenience," but whatever it is, it is one of the "works" under the Act, and these may be constructed only on the "lands" prescribed by the Act. [BRETT, J.—It may be that "works" includes pier, landing stage, and reservoir. DENMAN, J.—If you may take the strict grammatical view, your argument is strong; but looking to the way in which Acts of Parliament are drawn, is it not more probable that the words are added loosely on purpose to make a working scheme?] The whole river Mersey is delineated on the plans. Is it as arguable that the works may extend over the whole river, as that the narrow construction of the words should prevail? Every plan contains such delineations, for the purpose of illustration, but nothing more. The board might have had power conferred upon them to occupy the whole river, but they have not got it. 5 & 6 Vict. c. cx, from which the Conservators of the Mersey derive their powers, was much pressed upon the arbitrator, and he probably thought that this enactment was incorporated in the Wallasey Improvement Acts, whereas it is not. [Karslake observed that he did not rely upon this statute, and that it had not been noted in the margin.]

Nov. 13.—KEATING, J.—We have carefully considered this case, which, no doubt, is of considerable general importance. It is also of peculiar local importance, both to parties using this ferry and landing-stage, which is the subject of the action, and to all the inhabitants of Liverpool. The plaintiffs complain that while they were lawfully navigating this water where they might lawfully navigate it, while they were exercising an undoubted legal right, their vessel struck against the stock of an anchor, placed there by the defendants, which went through the bottom of the vessel, and caused them very considerable damage.

Now, it appears from the facts in the case, that the defendants are the Wallasey Local Board, and as such local board have, by virtue of several Acts of Parliament, been allowed to engage in the transport of passengers by a ferry upon the Mersey, and to procure boats and other articles and appliances for the purpose of conducting that ferry. Such was the state of things up to the Act of 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. cxvii). What led to the passing of that Act was that it was found that the landing place already erected was inconvenient, and therefore it was sought by the defendants to obtain powers from Parliament to construct a ferry and landing stage for the purpose of facilitating the embarking and landing of the passengers at New Brighton. Accordingly the Act of 1864 was obtained, and under that Act a pier and landing stage was constructed. The pier was constructed as a solid structure, but from the pier there ran a bridge to a landing place, which was a structure floating upon the river, and that landing place was so made under the powers of the Act of 1864.

But the plaintiffs contend, first, that in the construction of the landing stage the defendants exceeded the powers of this Act; that they constructed the landing stage in a way not authorised, and partly in a place not authorised, and then, for the purpose of securing the landing stage, threw out a certain cable from the part not authorised, to which cable was attached the anchor which caused an undoubted injury to their vessel.

Upon the question whether these works were authorised, although the Act is by no means perfectly clear, I think it right to deliver the opinion which I have come to, which is that the Act did authorise these works. The plans are before us, and there is no doubt as to the mode in which this landing stage was constructed. Mr. Aspinall has argued upon the plans at great length and with great ability, and has pointed to certain limits of deviation in the Parliamentary plans, and I think he is right in saying that the Legislature did not authorise expressly any structure beyond certain red lines. Now the northern part of the landing stage is within these lines, and Mr. Aspinall does not, as I understand, contend that that portion of the landing stage was not authorised by the Act. But the southern part is beyond them, and the difficulty arises with reference to that part of the landing stage. Now the landing stage, as it has been constructed, and with respect to a part only of which a doubt has arisen, is made under sect. 7 of the Act of 1864. [The learned judge read the section.] Under this section, in my opinion, the local board is undoubtedly confined to "lands" within the limits of the plans, with reference to any permanent structure which they erected; for I think that the words "upon the lands delineated in the said plans" override all the subsequent words in the section. [The learned judge having observed that the conservators of the Mersey represented the Admiralty office, then read sect. 8 and proceeded.] It appears that plans were deposited in fact, and that the approval of the Admiralty was in fact obtained to plan B which, it is admitted, faithfully represents the state of things as it now exists—represents the landing stage as it was afterwards constructed, and the anchor as afterwards laid in the bed of the river. In every respect it represents the works which received the approval of the Admiralty under sect. 8. Now, what is the meaning of these two sections? I think the intention of the Legislature was, "We will deal with the taking by the local board of any lands which it may be necessary to schedule in the book of reference; but in the construction of the landing stage there may arise something that will interfere with the navigation of the river, and therefore we will require that the plans shall be approved by the Admiralty, and that the works shall be executed according to their approval. It was intended, that is, that everything connected with keeping the water way clear should be left, as it was left, in the best possible hands, in the hands of the Admiralty, or of the Conservators of the river. Their approval draws with it the sanction of the Legislature, as much as if the works which they have approved had been originally authorised by the Act itself. I am not quite clear upon the meaning of the Act of Parliament, but I think that the landing stage and the moorings have thus become legalised structures.

But even assuming this to be so, Mr. Aspinall contends, and I think properly, that the local board were bound to exercise their powers with due care; and he says that as the arbitrator has found that the laying down of insufficient buoys was an act of negligence, for which the defendants are to be held responsible, I think that they are so responsible, and would be so responsible even if the anchor had in the first instance been legally placed where it was. As a matter of fact, looking to the whole of this case, I come to the conclusion that the negligence complained of was negligence causing the accident in question. Taking the whole finding of the arbitrator together, my impression is that the negligence which the arbitrator meant to find here was a negligence contributing to the accident, and therefore I think that that would give the plaintiffs in this case a cause of action against the board.

There remains the question whether notice of action was requisite; and I must say, for myself individually, that I very much regret that the case should be decided on any such point: but the point is raised in the case, and we are bound to consider it. I am of opinion that the defendants were entitled to notice of action under the Public Health Act 1848, sect. 139. But the question arises chiefly under subsequent Acts under which the landing stage was constructed. Does the Act of 1848 extend to them? That chiefly depends upon sect. 7 of the Act of 1864. But it is material to consider the objects of the Act of 1864, and look to the recital in the preamble of that Act. [The learned judge read the preamble.] The Legislature then, having recited these objects, goes on to enact that the Act shall be carried out "subject to the powers and provisions" of the Public Health Act 1848. I think that these words are quite large enough to take in sect. 139 of the Act of 1848, which is a "provision" of that Act, and a most important one. All the reasons for sect. 139 would be reasons for extending its operation; it would be just as much wanted in working the latter as in working the former Act. But Mr. Aspinall says that the local board are limited to the Wallasey district. I think, however, that the intention of the Legislature was to make the construction of the works a workable scheme in all its parts, and it could not be worked in all its parts if it were confined to the limits that Mr. Aspinall would assign.

But there still remains the question—argued at great length—whether the acts complained of were acts that could be done within the meaning of the statutes stated to authorise them, so as to entitle the board to notice of action. Now the arbitrator has found a bonâ fide belief in the defendants in this respect. The finding is as express as it can possibly be, and if it were necessary, I would say that we are not bound by it. But I see no reason to differ in the slightest degree from the propriety of that finding. It is said, however, that the provisions as to notice of action do not apply to a nonfeasance. I think that the cases of Wilson v. Mayor of Halifax (L. Rep. 3 Ex. 113), Davis v. Curling (8 Q. B. 286), Newton v. Ellis (5 E. & B. 115; 24 L. J. 337, Q. B.), and Selmes v. Judge (L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 724) establish the exact contrary. But the defendants are not driven to a case of dry nonfeasance. The case for the plaintiffs is, not that the defendants have omitted to set up a buoy, but that they have set up a buoy which proved ineffectual. That is, they inefficiently did that which they were bound to do, and the arbitrator has found that they have done it negligently. This is an act which, if they did, and intended to do, as the arbitrator finds, in the belief that they were complying with their Act, comes within the statutory protection. Notice of action indeed is always required where something has been done which ought not to have been done; otherwise no notice would be necessary, for there would be no action. I cannot help repeating my regret that the point should have been taken, and the case decided upon it.

BRETT, J.—I apprehend that the plaintiffs shape their case in one of two ways. First, they say that the defendants had placed an unauthorised structure in a tidal river, that is to say, in a public highway, so as to become an obstruction and a nuisance to the highway, whereby, without any negligence on their own part, the plaintiffs suffered damage. And this no doubt is a valid cause of action. But the plaintiffs go further, and say that even if the obstruction were authorised by Act of Parliament, yet if they did place the obstruction in the river, the defendants were bound not to do something which they have done, or to do something which they have not done, so that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover. The defendants reply that the obstruction was not unlawful, but authorised by Act of Parliament; and therefore, they say the first cause of action necessarily fails. If they are right of course it does. They also say that even though the arbitrator has found negligence he has not found that the injury complained of was caused by that negligence. Lastly, they say that even though they are liable either on the first ground or the second, they are entitled to a notice of action, which it is admitted was not given, and that therefore the plaintiffs cannot recover. Now if the court thinks that notice of action was required, it is not necessary to decide the first question at all; but that question is of the greatest importance to all the inhabitants of Liverpool, and I think the court ought to state what opinion it has formed upon it; either that it is clear, it it be clear, or, if otherwise, that it is a matter of doubt. It is so important that this ferry should be maintained, that if it is clear that this floating landing-stage is beyond the powers of the Wallasey Board, or even if it is doubtful whether it is beyond their power or not, they and the parties interested ought to know it, so that a remedy may be applied. It is for that reason, and that reason only, that I think we ought to give our opinion upon the first point.

And now with regard to that first point, it must depend entirely upon the construction of the statute, and unless the statute gives the defendants authority, I take it to be clear that they could not place in the river Mersey this permanent obstruction. Unless that is done by authority from Parliament it seems clear to me that it is an unlawful obstruction of the rights of the public, and a nuisance. In order to construe this Act of Parliament, which is by no means a clearly worded one, I think it necessary to consider in the first place, what was the state of things before it, and what it was that was required. The defendants, for their own private benefit, and for the public benefit also, had become the purchasers, under a former Act of this ferry. This is a peculiar ferry. It consists of carrying people from Liverpool to New Brighton, and vice versa, a distance of some four miles or more, I should think, in steamboats, and landing them at Liverpool, and landing them at New Brighton. I think the preamble of the Act shows that the conveniences for landing the public at New Brighton were not what they ought to have been on the passing of their Act of 1864, that they were not what was desirable, and the Act upon the face of it shows that what was required was a new ferry or landing stage. Now, in order to erect that landing stage it is obvious, if they were to erect or construct a landing stage, the defendants would require Parliamentary powers, because this landing stage, to be of any use as a ferry landing stage in that place, must be constructed on some land which would belong to private owners. It must necessarily in that place, as it seems to me, be constructed on a part of the foreshore, between high and low water-mark, which either belonged to the Crown or the lord of the manor. But to take the pier or landing stage to the edge of low water would not make a sufficient landing place in that river, where there is such a rise and fall of the tide. If the pier or landing stage, or any part of it necessary for the purpose of landing was taken into the river below low water mark, the question of taking other people's land did not arise. If there was a permanent structure laid below low water mark, it would be upon land which, I apprehended, did not belong to anybody, at all events not in the sense in which the foreshore or other lands belonged, and if what was done as a part of the whole landing was not fixed into the bed of the river at all, obviously the question of taking land did not arise, and the only question upon the navigable part of the river would be, whether the rights of the public were to be, or not to be, obstructed. It is therefore with regard to that state of things that this Act of Parliament was passed.

The Act of Parliament contains first of all the enactment in words, and then by reference it brings in the deposited plans. The deposited plans might, one would think, show the mode in which the permanent structure was to be made; and with regard to any land which was to be taken for the purpose of the permanent structure, one would expect it to have lines of deviation in the ordinary way. But it does not at all follow that when they came to deal with the mere obstruction to navigation, they would be laying out the plans which were to be followed with regard to a matter floating on the river, or even with regard to the driving of piles into the bed of the river, in which land nobody was interested; and it would not signify to anybody whether that land was used, unless the using it became an obstruction to the navigation of the river. And therefore, I think, it may be well anticipated that these plans would deal with only what was to be done by way of permanent obstruction, and would not deal with that which was done by way of floating obstruction. All must depend upon the construction of the statute. By sects. 7 and 8, the local board "may make or maintain in the line or situation, and according to the levels defined on the deposited plans and sections, and upon the lands delineated in the said plans, and described in the books of reference thereto, the following works." Now, if all after that had related to permanent structures, or if it had been clearly shown that the word "works," and all that precedes it, was to be applicable to all that comes after it, I should have felt very great doubt whether the word "floating stage" could be added; but the word "works" seems to me to be capable of being applied to the more permanent works which would require the taking of other people's lands. There are more things than one required to be constructed as a permanent work. There is to be a pier or landing-stage, which, taking the plans into account, was clearly a construction upon other people's land, and there is to be a reservoir, which is a matter which we have not had to deal with in this case; but which, I think, was another permanent work to be done on other people's land, and must have been required to be shown in some deposited plans. The Act says that the board have power "to construct a pier or landing-stage at New Brighton, together with all such jetties, &c., as the board shall from time to time think fit." It seems to me that this contemplates not merely works which were then in the minds of the defendants, nor merely works which were shown upon the deposited plans, but works which were not then in their minds, which might from time to time become necessary as conveniences, not as parts of these works, but as conveniences in connection with them.

JOLLIFFE AND ANOTHER v. WALLASEY LOCAL BOARD.

And when you think what it was that was required, this view seems to be strengthened. Here, according to the deposited plans, is this fixed pier, which is in fact itself a jetty, which according to the deposited plans is carried out to low water mark and a little beyond, and I am inclined to think that at one time the defendants did not contemplate making the adjuncts to it which they afterwards did. But this was to be taken out into the Mersey. Now we know what sort of a river that is; the bed alters, not only from year to year, but from month to month, and from week to week. Everybody must know that even though steamers might come to the foot of that fixed pier or landing stage at the time it was constructed, although they might come there at any height of the water, still in such a river as that it must be subject to the possibility, nay, to the probability, that at any time that might be silted up so that the boats could not come to the pier; and if they could not come to the pier at low water, the inconvenience to a large body of people became at once monstrous; and that it had been. As everybody who knows Liverpool knows, up to the time of the passing of this Act of Parliament, although there used to be formerly a landing pier, which ran out at low water, yet at spring tides and different conditions of the river, it could not reach far enough, and people were obliged to get out of the steamboats into flat bottomed boats, and so were carried, with great danger, to the landing place. Therefore, it seems to me what the Legislature contemplated was further conveniences—no part of the original plans—which were to be dealt with from time to time.

Still, the defendants were not to have absolute power to deal with the Mersey according to their views of the convenience of the public with reference to this landing stage; the rest of the public and those who frequented the Mersey were to be considered also; and, accordingly, the power of sect. 7 were given to them subject to the control mentioned in to sect. 8. At the first blush sect. 8 would seem to be somewhat against what I have said, because it runs: "Previously to commencing the pier or landing stage," the matter is to be laid before the High Admiral, or the person acting for him at Liverpool; but I think that must be read subject to what I have said, and that the meaning is "previously to commencing a pier or landing stage at the beginning, and previously to commencing the works which are to be done from time to time as the necessity arises, previously to doing any work which it may be necessary to do from time to time, the plan of that work is to be deposited at the Admiralty office, and the Admiralty is to pass its judgment upon it." That would give the necessary protection to all the public. That being the true meaning, it would come to this: whether it does not give the defendants power to do any work, with the consent of the Board of Admiralty, which it does not seem to me to give anywhere. It must be to do work which may fairly be considered as a convenience in connection with the pier or landing stage at New Brighton.

Now, what was it that happened? According to the original plan, no doubt there was to be a permanent pier or landing stage going down somewhat below low water. Before that was actually constructed, it seems to me that it became obvious to the defendants that that was not the best plan, and thereupon they abandoned the permanent pier; they did not take it down to low water mark, they made a bridge which might be thrown over from that pier to a floating landing stage, and, having constructed the floating landing stage, they moored it below low water mark, and threw the bridge from that permanent pier on to the floating landing stage. It has been remarked, as Mr. Justice Keating has pointed out, that the floating landing stage is not to the north or to the east to go beyond the line of the permanent pier, as at first projected; and he has in part grounded his judgment upon that fact. I, of course, in what I am now about to say, seeing that he has partly grounded his judgment upon that fact, speak with the greatest possible hesitation, but, as I said, I feel bound to give my opinion—I feel bound to say that in my judgment, even if it had gone beyond these lines, as long as it could fairly be said to be a convenience attached to this landing place, and has the assent or the consent of the Admiralty, and also of the conservators, it would be within the Act. I, therefore, have come to the same conclusion, not absolutely for the same reason, as my brother Keating, that the floating landing stage, and the mooring of it, being undoubtedly capable of being considered conveniences in connection with the pier or landing stage, and having been approved by Admiral Evans, who was acting for the Admiralty and for the conservators, it being found that it was approved by the conservators, and their agents, and by the Admiralty—the floating landing stage and its moorings, although obstructions to the navigation of the river, were constructions authorised by this Act of Parliament. It seems, therefore, to be clear to me that the plaintiffs cannot succeed upon the first cause of action.

But then comes the question whether, assuming this landing stage and its moorings to be within the authority of the Act, there is nevertheless a cause of action which the plaintiffs can maintain. I think it is true that they were bound to exercise due care in the way in which they did that which they were authorised to do. Whatever my own private opinion may be as to the particular finding which has been found by a most able arbitrator, and by an arbitrator most able in this matter of seamanship, if it may be so called, I should not think of acting on any private view of my own as against the real spirit of his finding, but he has found there was negligence in the defendants in not placing a different kind of buoy to notify the position of one of the anchors. He has found—I take it to be, the real meaning of his finding, because otherwise his finding would have been obviously futile—that there was no negligence of any kind in the plaintiffs. He has therefore found that the defendants had either done something negligently which they were bound to do with reasonable care, or that they had negligently omitted to do something which they ought to have done, and that this has been the cause of injury to the plaintiffs. That seems to me to be, under the ordinary rules, a cause of action under which the plaintiffs would be entitled to recover.

Then comes the question, whether the plaintiffs are prevented from recovering by not having given notice of action. That again depends on the construction of the Acts of Parliament, and wherever there is to be a construction of Acts it is impossible to say that the matter can be without difficulty. The floating landing stage is either placed as it is without any authority at all, or it is placed as it is under the authority of the Act of 1864. It is found as a fact that the floating stage and anchor were both established by the defendants under a bonâ fide belief that they were acting under the powers of that Act. The first question then is, whether if the thing be done under such bonâ fide belief, any notice of action is to be given to the defendants by this Act. That is said first to depend upon whether sect. 139 of the Public Health Act 1848 is not incorporated in it, and whether it can be applied to anything which is bonâ fide supposed to be done under the Act of 1864, or indeed to anything which is actually done under that Act. This depends upon the construction of sect. 2 of the Act of 1864. [The learned Judge read the section.] I understood Mr. Aspinall to say that no powers could be given to the local board under the Public Health Act except such powers as they would have to execute within the Wallasey district. It must be obvious, I think, that in constructing the pier, in dealing with the landing stage, they are executing this Act, because it is only by executing this Act that they can do these things. It is no doubt an anomalous state of things that the Wallasey Board should be given this ferry at all; but it is done. It was done by a former Act of Parliament, and their powers are increased under this; and when they are constructing and maintaining the landing stage at New Brighton, and when they are carrying out everything which this Act authorises, it seems to me impossible to say that they are not "executing" the Act. The real question seems to be, is sect. 139 a "provision" of the Public Health Act 1848? Undoubtedly it is, and a provision of the most important kind; and therefore it is within the terms of this section that what they do in order to execute this Act is to be subject to that provision. But the cases go further, and say that it is not only what is done under the Act but what is done under a bonâ fide belief that the Act is being executed, that is to be protected; and the protection is hardly wanted unless they have gone beyond the Act. But then Mr. Aspinall takes two objections. He says, even supposing that that is a provision which is applicable, yet it is not applicable to this case, because here it is a mere nonfeasance. As I understand the former decisions, they come to this, that whenever you sue in tort for either a breach of duty or for an omission to perform a duty properly, either case is within the meaning of a clause requiring notice of action. In Newton v. Ellis (ubi sup.) Coleridge, J. says, "This is not a case of not doing. The defendant does something, omitting to secure protection to the public." And Erle, J. says, "The cause of action is making the hole, blended with the not putting up a light." It is said by Kelly, C.B., in Wilson v. Mayor of Halifax (L. Rep. 3 Ex. 119; 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 660), "It is now settled by authority that an omission to do something that ought to be done in order to the complete performance of a duty imposed on a public body under an Act of Parliament, or the continuing to leave any such duty unperformed, amounts to an act done or intended to be done within the meaning" of the clauses requiring notice of action. I cannot conceive words which would more completely control the present case. See also the remarks of Byles, J. in Davis v. Curling (ubi sup.) Then it is said that as the omission is to mark an anchor which was placed entirely beyond their authority under the Act, the negligence of omitting to give notice with regard to something which they had no right to do, does not come within the statute. That is, as I understand it, to say that a negligence upon a negligence deprives a party of his right to notice of action. But all the conduct of the defendants, whatever it is which gives rise to the cause of action, was conduct which they bonâ fide believed to be authorised by the Act. I think that the plaintiffs do not maintain their first cause of action; that they might have maintained their second cause of action if they had given notice; but inasmuch as they have not given notice, they cannot maintain the second cause of action any more than they can the first. I further think that even though they could have maintained the first cause of action as well as the second, yet that for want of notice they could not maintain either.

DENMAN, J.—The cause of action here is not buoying the anchor, and it has been contended for the plaintiffs that the defendants had no authority to put down the anchor at all. To this the defendants have replied, even if they had no such authority, they are still not to be held liable, on the ground that what they did was for the benefit of the public, and for this they cite R. v. Russell (6 B. & C. 566). Now I had long understood that R. v. Russell was practically overruled, and I am of opinion that R. v. Ward (4 Ad. & E. 384) does practically overrule it. Since the date of R. v. Ward, no case following R. v. Russell can be found. Without statutory authority, therefore, there was no right to put an anchor where this anchor was put. But the plaintiffs say that, even if there were statutory authority, it has been negligently exercised, and the arbitrator has found negligence in fact, so that the substantial question in the case is whether or not notice of action was requisite, that is, whether section 139 of the Public Health Act 1848, can be taken to apply. I think that notice of action was required; and the cases have been so fully gone into both during the argument, and by my learned brethren, that I think it is quite unnecessary to add anything to that part of the case, except to say that I entirely concur that here a notice of action was required. But from the importance of the case, I think it right to say also, that although sections 7 and 8 of the Act of 1864 are not very clear, they are, in my judgment, quite clear enough to show that the act done in placing the anchor at the bottom of the river was done under the authority of those statutes. The words of sect. 7 are not very artificial, because they raise a considerable doubt as to whether the first user of the word "works" might not be held to overrule the subsequent user of the same word; and if so, whether the whole work must not be taken to have been done on the lands delineated on the plans. But a sufficient answer, I think, has been given to that by my brother Brett when he severs the word "works" from the word "conveniences;" and I think, taking the whole of the Acts and clauses together, that "conveniences in connection therewith" are not necessarily conveniences upon any lands delineated on the plans in the same strict sense in which permanent works must be so held to be confined. This view is strengthened by looking at the whole of the statutes together, and by seeing what powers the Board took under the Act of 1858, as well as that of 1864. It must be remembered that this is a ferry to be worked by steamers running between Liverpool and New Brighton and some stress must be laid on sect. 37 of the Act of 1858 which after sect. 36 had given the power for the first time to leave or purchase the ferry, confers upon the board the power to hire and maintain steam-vessels, &c., so that they were a board with the power given them, and the duty imposed upon them of working the ferry to and fro. Then from sect. 7 of the Act of 1864 an intention is gathered from the plans deposited of having certain permanent works, a portion of them between high and low water mark, and a portion below low water mark; whereupon sect. 8 comes, and not only gives the Admiralty a veto upon the pier or landing stage or the works connected therewith, but orders that the local board shall deposit plans at the Admiralty office "of the works connected therewith." Those works were to be works to enable the board to work the ferry to and fro, and it does in fact appear from the case that the Admiralty had before them plans not only of a solid structure upon certain delineated lands, or on the part expressly delineated below low water mark, but that they had before them this very scheme, and that they sanctioned it as a useful mode of carrying out the operations of the Act; and that being so, and the question being one on which we may draw inferences of fact, I come to the conclusion that this was, in the strictest sense of the word, a convenience in connection with the landing stage at New Brighton; that it was a work which was convenient for the carrying on of the very duty which the board had to perform, and consequently, that the putting down of the anchor, which I take to have been an essential part of the floating stage itself, was an act which the statute had authorised. Then, having committed some act of negligence in the course of buoying that particular anchor, I think that they are entitled to notice of action, and that therefore on these two grounds our judgment must be for the defendants.

AMERICAN REPORTS.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT,
EASTERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

Reported by R. D. BENEDICT, Proctor and Advocate.

THE BARK IRMA.

Bottomry—Priority—Non-liability of master.

In the absence of any special agreement to that effect, the master of a ship does not incur any personal liability to repay to a bottomry lender the sum borrowed by him on bottomry, where the bottomry bond becomes due by the safe arrival of the ship, and the ship and freight prove insufficient to discharge it in full.

The implied contract of the master, arising under the general rule of the maritime law, out of an advance of money for the ship, is extinguished when a lawful contract of bottomry has been made and the debt has been put at risk.

The contract of bottomry, which is not only a contract of great sanctity, but also of great peculiarity, is not a mere agreement for security.

The reasons for the presumption of liability on the part of a master to seamen and to material-men, fail in case of bottomry.

The master of a ship, although an agent of the owner, is also, in a certain sense, a public officer.

Presuming a master to have a lien upon his ship for wages and disbursements, he is entitled to payment out of the proceeds of the ship in priority to a bottomry bondholder, provided that he the master has not personally bound himself by the bond.

THIS was an application to the District Court, for an order to determine the priority of payment of the respective demands against the proceeds of the bark Irma, which were insufficient to satisfy all claims. Several libels had been filed against the vessel, but the only libels which are at present material are those filed by Timothy Darling and Co., holders of a bottomry bond upon the said ship, to recover the amount of the bond, and by Chummings, the master, for his wages and disbursements, and by the mate and pilot of the said vessel to recover their wages.

The bond had been signed by the master abroad, but although binding the ship, it contained no covenant making him, the master, personally liable. The master by his libel claims a lien for his wages and disbursements. The libels were not put in issue, and to save expense this application was made to the court to settle the priorities before proceeding with the suits. The facts and arguments are sufficiently noticed in the opinion of the court.

BENEDICT, J.—These are two causes which have been brought before me on an application for an order determining the priority of the respective demands in the distribution of the proceeds of the vessel, which are insufficient to pay all the claims against her. The only question which calls for any particular examination, has arisen between the libellants, Timothy Darling and Co., whose libel is filed to recover the amount of a bottomry bond executed by Cummings, as master of the vessel, and Cummings himself, who has filed his libel to recover a balance due to him for his own wages, and for advances of wages made by him to the crew. If the demand of Cummings be paid out of the proceeds of the vessel, in preference to the bottomry bond, the remainder will be insufficient to pay the bottomry bond in full, and therefore the bottomry lenders contest the right of the master of the vessel to priority over the bottomry bond.

The position taken is, that the master is personally liable to the bottomry lender for the sum borrowed, and supposing that he has a lien for his demand, he cannot be paid in preference to the bottomry bond, when such payment will create a deficiency in the bond, which he is liable to make good. The question raised is one which has seldom arisen, owing doubtless to the fact that in very many if not in most, cases of bottomry, the master binds himself personally for the debt, by means of a special covenant inserted in the bond, and is not, therefore, in a position to dispute his liability for any deficiency that may arise from the distribution of the proceeds of the ship. But, in this instance, the bottomry bond contains no such covenant, and the master denies any liability whatever to the bottomry lenders for any part of the bottomry loan. I am therefore called on to determine the question of law, whether, in the absence of any special agreement to that effect, the master of a ship incurs any personal liability to repay to the bottomry lender the amount borrowed on bottomry, when the bond becomes due by the safe arrival of the ship, and the proceeds of the ship and freight prove insufficient to discharge it in full.

In considering this question, I am not required to speak of the liability of the ship master for neglect or malfeasance, nor of a case where the bottomry bond proves invalid, or when no risk has ever attached, or where the stipulated voyage is not performed, or where the ship and freight is not abandoned to the bondholder, nor yet of a case where the bond is executed by an owner of the ship. What I have occasion to say is, therefore, intended to refer to the case here presented, where it is sought to hold the master personally liable for the loan, where the bond is a valid bottomry bond executed by the master, as such, in a foreign port, for a voyage which has been duly performed, and where the ship and freight are applied, so far as they will go, to the payment of the bond, and where the master has made no special agreement, to be responsible for the loan. Upon this question I remark—first, that the bottomry lender, in order to establish a personal liability on the part of the master, cannot resort to the general liability, which the master of a ship is presumed to incur for debts contracted and advances made in behalf of the ship. The implied contract of the master, arising, under the general rule of the maritime law, out of an advance of money for the ship, is extinguished when a lawful contract of bottomry is made and the debt has been put at risk. All other obligations merge in the new contract, which places the lender in a new and different relation to the vessel, and it is to the rights and obligations arising out of the contract of bottomry alone that the lender must thereafter look.

The contract of bottomry, which is not only a contract of great sanctity, but also of great peculiarity, is not a mere agreement for security. "It is neither a sale, nor a partnership, nor a loan properly speaking, nor insurance, nor a compound of different constructions—undique collatis membris; but it is a contract having a specific name—un contrat nommé—and a character peculiar to itself:" (Emerigon, Contrat à la grosse, ch. 1, s. 2.) When once the bottomry risk has attached, the creditor becomes a bottomry lender, and nothing else. "He who lends money on bottomry, makes a contract, which is to be followed out in all its remedies as such:" (Curtis, J., 1 Cur. C. C. 351; The brig Ann C. Pratt, Brady v. Bates, 9 Met. 250; The Ann C. Pratt, 18 How.) The holders of a bottomry bond are therefore not holders of a mortgage, and the rules applied in cases of mortgage have little or no application here.

But although the only contract, upon which these bottomry lenders can rely, is the contract of bottomry, it does not follow that they have not by that contract the personal liability of the master upon the safe arrival of the ship, notwithstanding the circumstance that the instrument given to bind the ship does not expressly provide for any personal liability of the master. A personal liability on the part of the master in case of the safe arrival of the ship may form part of a valid contract of bottomry, as has often been held where that liability had been stipulated for in the bottomry bond. The question here is whether such a liability does not, by implication of law, constitute an element in every such contract, as, for instance, it does in the contract with the seamen. These bondholders maintain that such a personal liability is implied by the maritime law, and that it can be resorted to, at least to make good any deficiency after exhausting their remedies against the vessel and freight. In support of this position, the words of Lord Tenterden are cited, when he says the remedy of the lender on bottomry is "against the master or the ship" (Abbott on shipping, 5th edit., p. 156), and also the statement in Kent's Commentaries (3 Kent, p. 355), that "for the repayment of a sum borrowed on bottomry the person of the borrower is bound as well as the property charged." These two citations from the high authorities named will be found on examination not to be to the same point. The borrower alluded to by Chancellor Kent is not the master, but the owner of the ship, as the context shows. On page 360 the master will be found spoken of as distinguished from the "borrower." So understood, the citation has no direct bearing on the question under discussion; and as to the remark of Lord Tenterden, it must be understood as referring to such a bond as he describes in a subsequent paragraph, and sets out at length in his appendix, which contains a special covenant on the part of the master: (Abbott on Shipping, p. 160.) Reference is also made to the general principle of the maritime law, according to which the master of a ship is presumed to bind himself personally in every contract made in behalf of the ship, as showing the existence of such a liability in the contract of bottomry. But, if such were the rule in all other cases, it would afford little reason for supposing the liability to exist in a contract of bottomry, for "bottomry is a contract resembling nothing, and being consistent with nothing but itself" (Curtis, J., 1 Cur. C. C., p. 350), and I am of opinion that the reasons on which the general rule rests will be found to be, for the most part, wanting in the case of bottomry. Take, for instance, the reasons which led to the personal liability of the master to the crew. The master is personally liable to the seamen, for sailors, because of well known traits, must have every security possible, to prevent them from losing their wages and becoming objects of charity. They naturally look for their wages in the first instance to the master, who commands them during the voyage, who provides them their food, who cures them when sick, and punishes them when they disobey, and from long usage he has thus become personally bound for their wages. Another instance is the personal liability of the master for the bills of material men and for advances of money. Obligations of this class derive their distinctive character from the fact that they are generally made in foreign ports, where they are to be discharged, and where the owners are not, and it is therefore permitted to look to the master who is present, leaving him to reimburse himself from the owners when he returns home. Considerations of this character, coupled perhaps with the fact that in the earlier history of navigation as well as afterwards on the revival of commerce in the middle ages, the master almost invariably was an owner unless he was a slave, led to the establishment of the presumption of personal liability on the part of the master in contracts made for the ship as a "usage and custom of the seas." But it will be difficult to find in the maritime law any trace of such presumption in cases of bottomry; and the considerations which press in favour of it, on other occasions have in such contracts little force. The lender on bottomry is not ignorant and poor like the sailor. He becomes beneficially interested in the voyage. His loan is never to be repaid in the foreign port where it is effected, but on the contrary, is payable where the owners are supposed to be or to have funds, and the ship is specifically bound. No necessity, therefore, exists for the personal responsibility of the master.

Furthermore great injustice must follow if such a personal responsibility on the part of the master be attached by the law to the contract of bottomry, because the master is without remedy over against the owners of the ship for any sum thus extracted from him, notwithstanding the fact that the owners receive the benefit of the loan. This results from the character of the transaction, and the nature of the liability on the part of the shipowner which grows out of it. The owner of a ship is indeed said to be liable for a bottomry bond, as well as the ship, if the ship arrive safe, but this is not a liability arising from a contract of the owner made by the hand of his agent, the master, with the bottomry lender. The master of a ship, although an agent of the owner, is also in a certain sense a public officer. "The master of a ship is not an ordinary agent, but one of a special kind—sui generis." (Sir R. Phillimore, The Thetis, 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 357; 22 L. T. Rep. 77.) "He is a known and public officer." (Sea Laws, Art. 2, Of the Masters of Ships.) "The rights and duties springing out of the position of ship master are of a public character." (Bedarride, Com. de Code, Liv. 2, Tome 2, Art. 359.) "The master of a ship has a threefold responsibility, to the owners, to the freighters, and to society—the State. (Boulay Paty, vol. 1, 383.) "Though he (the master) receive a salary, yet he is a known and public officer." (Molloy, Book 2, Ch. 11, s. 2.) The contract of bottomry, when made by the master, is made by him to a certain extent in an official capacity. He does not, in a transaction of that character, act simply as agent of the owners, but as master of the ship. It is not within the scope of the shipmaster's authority, as the agent of the owners, to bind them personally as his principals by a bottomry contract. The owners are liable when the vessel comes to them safe, but not because of the acts of their agents in borrowing money for them. Theirs is an original liability to the holder of the bottomry bond, arising out of their possession of the property bound for the loan, namely, the ship and freight. This peculiarity in the liability of the shipowner, growing out of bottomry, is pointed out by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the Virgin, where the court says: "In England and America the established doctrine is that the owners are not personally bound, except to the extent of the fund pledged, which has come into their hands. To this extent indeed they may correctly be said to be personally bound, for they cannot subtract the fund and refuse to apply it to discharge the debt. But in this case the proceeding against them is rather in the character of possessors of the thing pledged than strictly as owners." (The Virgin, 8 Pet. 538, 554.) The later authorities in England and America are to the same effect: (The Brig Ann C. Pratt, Curtis, J. 1 Curtis's C.C. p. 350; Stainbank v. Fenning, 11 C. B. 51; 15 Jur. 1032.) Not only is such the law in England and America, but the same law exists upon the Continent. By the German Mercantile Code, which, in respect to such a subject, may be presumed to state the rule of the maritime law, as understood throughout a large part of Europe, it is declared (Art. 680, 7th part), that the bottomry creditor can enforce his claims only to the extent of the bottomried objects after the arrival of the vessel: (see Maritime Legislation by Wendt, Appendix, p. 254.) The maritime law as administered in France appears to be the same.

If then the owners of a ship are not rendered directly liable, by a contract of bottomry made by the master, they cannot be rendered indirectly liable through a liability on their part to the master for any sum exacted of him by reason of the contract. And if the master be without remedy over against the owner of the ship, it is not to be supposed that he can be held personally liable, and thus compelled to bear without recourse the burden, not only of a loan effected solely for the benefit of the shipowner, but also of the maritime interest, and that, too, when he is compelled by the responsibility of his office to effect the loan, whether willing or not to assume such a burden. The unjust effect of such a rule warrants the supposition that it does not exist in the maritime law. Aside from its injustice, there is reason against it, founded in public policy, for to make the master by operation of law liable for the payment of the bottomry bond, or even for the deficiency after the ship and freight are exhausted, is to offer him an inducement to lose the ship, inasmuch as her safe arrival will cast upon him a responsibility which he escapes if she does not arrive. A rule which would in any case place the interest of the mariner in opposition to the welfare of the ship would be contrary to the whole spirit of the maritime law.

These considerations, which are of a nature entitling them to much weight in determining a question of maritime law, appear to me sufficient to warrant a rejection of the doctrine contended for by this bottomry lender, and I find no adjudged case which impels me to a different conclusion. No case has been cited by the advocates where the doctrine in question has been sustained, and I find a decision to the contrary in the English Admiralty, where the same question arose, and in the same way, and where the determination was that the master of the ship had not ceded his prior right against the ship by taking up money on bottomry. Dr. Lushington says: "Here the master has not bound himself personally to pay the bond; his covenant in the bond is that he is master, and therefore he has authority to charge the barque, cargo, and freight, and that the barque, cargo, and freight shall at all times after the voyage be liable to the payment of the money. He has not, therefore, incurred that personal liability which a master giving a bottomry bond generally incurs in express terms." (The Salacia, 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 261; 1 Lush. 543.) Many remarks will be found scattered through the other cases in the English Admiralty which I have above cited looking in the same direction: (See also The Edward Oliver, 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. p. 507: The Jonathan Goodhue, Swabey, 524.) It may, therefore, be said that the authorities in the English Admiralty are adverse to the position here taken by the bondholder. The continental writers are directly opposed to such a position. Thus Emerigon (Traité de Contrats à la grosse, ch. 7, sect. 12, cl. 4) says, "If in the bottomry bond the master has bound himself and his goods (of which I have seen a thousand examples), he is held personally liable, in spite of the fact that he acted in the known capacity of agent, because he has rendered himself bound for the bond, and the lenders have trusted his credit. If then the vessel arrives safely, they may compel the master himself to pay the principal and the maritime interest which he has in his own name promised to pay. But, if he has contracted only in the capacity of captain, the lenders in case of the safe arrival of the ship, will be limited to an action in rem against the vessel and freight, without recourse to the owners who abandon the property, or to the master who, having contracted only in a qualified capacity, is not responsible for the unfortunate result of the voyage." Emerigon cites the Ordinance in his support. Later continental authority is to the same effect. Bedarride declares that the master cannot be held personally liable for the payment of a bottomry bond which he has signed in his capacity as master for the necessities of the ship (Com. de Code, Liv. 2, tit. 9, s. 931), and again (sect. 935) he says, "On principle, therefore, the master borrowing money on bottomry contracts no personal obligation, neither on the part of the owner nor with the lender, but with this exception, that it is always lawful for the captain to bind himself directly and personally." The German Mercantile Code, already referred to, restricts the personal liability of the master on a bottomry contract to those cases where the master has arbitrarily changed the voyage, or arbitrarily deviated, or has improperly assumed new sea risks, and then gives him the opportunity to relieve himself, by proving that the non-payment of the bond has not been caused through the change of voyage, or through the deviation, or through the new sea risks: (Art. 694, Part 7: see Maritime Legislation by Wendt, Appendix, p. 257.) And the 18th Admiralty Rule of the Supreme Court of the United States clearly recognises a similar rule of law (a). Indeed, the 18th Admiralty rule goes far to compel the determination of this court in this case adversely to the bottomry lenders upon this question under consideration, although this libel is not in conflict with the rule.

My conclusion, therefore, is that in the present case no personal liability for any part of the loan has attached to the ship master; and the bottomry lender and the master must, therefore, in respect to order of payment, upon this motion, be declared to be subject to the general rule by which wages are entitled to be paid in preference to a bottomry bond. But this is upon the assumption that the master has a lien upon the ship as averred in his libel. The present being a motion founded upon the respective libels alone, for the simple purpose of determining at this period of the controversy the question of priority, in order to save expense, the right to a lien is not put at issue. If it is intended to question that right, an issue must be formed by answer or exception, upon which a decree may be rendered.

(a) The 18th rule of practice for the District Court in Admiralty cases is as follows:—In all suits on bottomry bonds, properly so called, the suit shall be in rem only against the property hypothecated, or the proceeds of the property in whosoever hands the same may be found, unless the master has without authority given the bottomry bond, or by his fraud or misconduct has avoided the same, or has subtracted the property, or unless the owner has, by his own misconduct or wrong, lost or subtracted the property; in which latter cases the suit may be in personam against the wrongdoer.—Ed.

Upon this motion the order will be that in the distribution of the proceeds in the registry, any decrees that may be entered upon the libels before me will be satisfied out of the proceeds in the following order:—First, the wages decreed the mate; next, the pilotage decreed to Eugene Gallagher; next, the sum decreed Cummings, the master; next, the sum decreed Timothy Darling upon the bottomry bond. The priority of the other demands arising thereunder need not be determined, as the demands above mentioned will absorb the whole fund.

THE PROSPERINO PALASSO.

Damage to cargo—Onus of proof—Bill of lading "shipped in good order and condition"—"Quantity and quality unknown"—Effect of.

In a suit against shipowners for damage to cargo the onus is upon the plaintiffs to show in the first instance that the goods were shipped in good order and condition before they can call upon the shipowners to show excuse for the injury done to the goods.

A bill of lading stating that goods were shipped in good order and condition, but also containing an endorsement by the master, "quantity and quality unknown," does not admit, as against the shipowners, that the goods were shipped in good order and condition.

Evidence of the condition of goods on delivery tending to show that the damage sustained could not be accounted for by any damage existing at the time of shipment, and that such damage, had it existed, must have been noticed by the master or officer in charge of the ship at the time of shipment, will not, where goods are shipped under a bill of lading endorsed "quantity and quality unknown" satisfy the onus cast upon plaintiffs seeking to recover against shipowners for damage to the goods. Positive evidence of the condition of the goods when shipped must be given.

This was a cause of damage to cargo instituted under the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 on behalf of Messrs. G. König and Co., merchants, London, against the vessel Prosperino Palasso, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and against Guiseppe Lavarello of Genoa, in the kingdom of Italy, the owner of the vessel intervening. The Prosperino Palasso was an Italian vessel, of which no owner or part owner was at the time of the institution of the cause domiciled in England or Wales. In the months of January and Feb. 1873 Messrs. E. B. Liddell and Co., of Alexandria shipped on board the said vessel then lying at Port Said, in Egypt, 5630 ardebs of cotton seed (about 704 tons), in pursuance of a charter-party entered into between themselves and the master of the ship. The persons constituting the firm of Messrs. E. B. Liddell & Co. were identical with the members of the plaintiffs' firm. The charter-party was in the usual form, and contained this stipulation: The merchants engage to provide mats and the ship the necessary wood for dunnage." The master received and accepted the cotton seed so loaded to be carried on board the said vessel on the terms of three bills of lading, signed by the master, and delivered by him to Messrs. E. B. Liddell & Co. The wording of these bills of lading was as follows:

Shipped in good order and well conditioned by E. B. Liddell & Co., Alexandria (Egypt), in and upon the good ship called the Prosperino Palasso, whereof is master for this present voyage Agostino Della Casa, and now riding at anchor in the port of Port Said (Egypt), and bound for Hull, 5630 ardebs cotton seed, being marked and numbered as in the margin, and are to be delivered in the like good order and well conditioned at the aforesaid port of Hull (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature and kind soever, save risk of boats so far as ships are liable thereto excepted) unto order or to assigns paying freight for the said goods at the rate of (19s.), say nineteen shillings sterling in full per ton of 20cwt. delivered with £10 gratuity. Other conditions as per charter-party dated London, 25th Oct. 1872, with primage and average accustomed. In witness whereof the master or purser of the said ship hath affirmed to three bills of lading all of this tenor and date the one of which three bills being accomplished, the other two to stand void. Dated in Port Said (Egypt) 4th Feb. 1873. 400 dunnage mats. Fifteen working days remain for discharging.

Across these bills of lading the master wrote the words "ignoro quantita è qualita," and after so doing signed the bills of lading.

The vessel sailed from Port Said on her voyage for Hull on 5th Feb. 1873, and arrived in Hull on the 2nd May 1873, and when she had discharged her cargo was found to be heated and damaged.

6. The said cotton seed was not delivered to the plaintiffs according to the terms of the said bills of lading in as good order and condition as it was in when it was shipped on board the said vessel at Port Said as aforesaid; but on the contrary, the same was delivered to the plaintiffs in much worse order and condition and greatly damaged.

7. Such non-delivery as aforesaid to the plaintiffs of the said cotton seed in as good order and condition as when it was shipped was not occasioned by any of the perils or causes in the said bills of lading excepted.

8. The plaintiffs paid to the master of the said vessel the freight and gratuity due according to the terms of the said bills of lading, and did and were ready to do all things necessary to entitle the plaintiffs to have the said cotton seed delivered to them in as good order and condition as it was in when shipped at Port Said as aforesaid.

9. By reason of the premises the plaintiffs lost a great part of the value of the said cotton seed, and were put to great expense in and about keeping, warehousing, and improving the condition of the said cotton seed, and in and about having the same surveyed.

The defendant's answer, after denying the 6th, 7th, and 9th articles of the petition proceeded as follows:

3. As to the 5th article of the said petition, he says that the Prosperino Palasso duly arrived at Hull on the 2nd May 1873, and after her arrival she, by order of the plaintiffs, remained in the roads, with the cotton seed in the petition mentioned, until the 10th day of the said month, when she went into the Victoria Docks.

4. The deterioration and damage, if any, to the cotton seed in the said petition mentioned, were occasioned by the character and quality of the said cotton seed when shipped on board the Prosperino Palasso, and by the inherent qualities of the said cotton seed, and by the dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation, or by some or one of such causes, and not by any breach of contract on the part of the defendant.

5. Save as appears by the last preceding article, the defendant admits the truth of the allegations in the 8th article of the said petition.

On this the plaintiffs concluded the pleadings.

The cause came on for the examination of witnesses, and for hearing on Nov. 13th and 14th 1873. In a similar case (a) tried immediately before the present, the plaintiffs (who were the same as in this case) had produced evidence to show that the damage had been occasioned by reason of the ship being improperly dunnaged, but had failed to establish by positive evidence that the cargo had been shipped in good order and condition, and consequently that case had resulted in a decree for the defendants. In consequence of this result it was suggested on the part of the plaintiffs that in the present case evidence should first be given to establish the condition of the cotton seed when shipped, and that the court should upon that evidence express its opinion as to whether the plaintiff had established a prima facie case, before hearing other evidence on the part of the plaintiffs; such other evidence being for the purpose of showing that the injury to the cotton seed was such as would have been caused by heating, from some portion of the cargo becoming wetted by salt water coming in contact with it through insufficient dunnage; if the plaintiffs failed in establishing the good condition of the seed when shipped, the other evidence would be unnecessary, upon the authority of the Ida (b).

(a) A case entitled The Po.

(b) THE IDA.—This was also a cause of damage to cargo. The plaintiffs and shippers were the same as in the Prosperino Palasso; the ship was also an Italian vessel. The facts stated in the pleadings in the two cases were identical, changing only the names of the ship, defendant, master, and the quantity shipped, and the same charges were made and the same defences raised in the same words. The same witnesses were called as to the condition of the seed when shipped, but the evidence of the witness Liddell was as follows: "The cargo was shipped as far as I know in good condition. No complaint was made by the master. The weather was fine during the loading of the vessel. We do not attend to the preparation of the ships for the cargo. We provide the mats, and expect the ship to provide wood for dunnage. There is no difficulty in getting wood in Alexandria, nor stone ballast." Cross-examined: "Alexandria is 120 miles from Port Said. The ship came from Port Said. I never saw this ship, her captain or crew. I saw samples of the cargo, but nothing more of the cargo. My knowledge of the weather depends on the daily reports, I being at Alexandria. I had the reports and letters from Port Said about this cargo, but they are not here. The samples I got at Alexandria are not here. We do not keep the samples after the ship is despatched. We received samples every day of the day's work. The average of cargoes of that season were worse than usual."

Evidence was also called by the plaintiffs for the purpose of establishing that the dunnage of the ship, both permanent and temporary, was insufficient, part being sand, and more wood being required; and that in consequence thereof the sea water had come in contact with and damaged the cargo; that the damage done was such as would result from sea water; that sand ballast was likely to absorb the water, and injure the cargo. The defendants called evidence to show that the ship was properly dunnaged, and that the injury to the cargo resulted from the heating of the cargo by its inherent vice, except in such places where the salt water

Aug. 2, 1873.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE commented on the evidence as to the dunnage, found, as a fact, that it was insufficient, and proceeded; There still remains an important question whether this insufficiency of dunnage did or did not lead to the mischief done to the cargo. The bad state of the cargo when it was delivered must have arisen from one or two causes. Either from the greenness of the seed at the time when it was put on board the vessel, or from sea water oozing through and affecting the sand at the bottom of the vessel, and so affecting the cotton seed which was on the sand. It was contended on the one side that there was sufficient evidence in this case, to show that the seed was shipped in good order and condition, on the bill of lading, and the bill of lading does say that it was "shipped in good order and well conditioned," and it is signed by the master; but also what is not stated in the petition appears on reference to the original document. There was written across that "ignoro quantita e qualita"—that is to say, in other words, the captain distinctly averred that he was ignorant of the quantity and quality of seed so put on board his vessel. It might be a question perhaps whether by "qualita" was intended the same thing as "order and condition," or whether it was only intended to say that the captain made no admission with respect to the particular quality of the seed that was put on board; but, assuming it to be the same thing as good order and good condition—which, upon the whole, I think the court ought to assume, having reference to the cases which were referred to a good deal in argument, viz., Jessel v. Bath (L. Rep. 2 Ex. 267) and the earlier case of Haddon v. Parry (3 Taut. 305), in which the reporter expressed the decision of the court in a very summary and pithy manner, viz., as follows: "On this day the court declared that the words 'contents unknown'—which, I think, must be taken on the whole to be pretty much the same as 'ignoro quantita e qualita'—rendered the bill of lading no declaration of what the chests of dollars contained; it was therefore no evidence at all." Chief Justice Mansfield had previously said, in the course of the argument, "If the master qualifies his acknowledgment by the words 'contents unknown,' he acknowledges nothing"—I say, assuming the words to be the same as "good order and condition," there is other evidence in the case with respect to the condition in which this cotton seed was laden on board the vessel, and that evidence was furnished by Mr. Liddell, who was one of the plaintiffs, and was examined. He was a merchant, carrying on business in Alexandria and also in London, and he said, in answer to a question whether the cargo was shipped in good order and condition, that it was, and he gave as the ground of his opinion that he knew it was from the samples which he had seen of it at Port Said. It is very true that his personal knowledge seems to have been founded on that fact; but I am of opinion myself upon the whole that that furnishes the court with sufficient prima facie evidence, at least, that the seed was shipped in proper condition. This is evidence, of course, that may be very easily rebutted on the other side; but the question is, has it been so? If it has been rebutted at all, it must be by the opinion of the witnesses who saw it in its blackened and burnt and bad condition, no other evidence having been produced before the court on this point. [His Lordship then commented on the evidence given by the defendants for the purpose of showing that the damage was occasioned by salt water shipped by perils of the sea and by the greenness of the seed when shipped, found as a fact that the sand ballast got wet by salt water at the bottom and sides, and that the water got into the ship by her being thrown on her beam ends and by her straining in severe weather and continued.] The question of course arises, how did the water get away? It was very strongly urged for the defendants that the lower part of the sand was quite dry. I am not quite certain that this is proved in every

The following evidence was produced on behalf of the plaintiffs:

Edward B. Liddell, examined by Butt, Q.C.:

I am a member of the plaintiffs' firm carrying on business at Alexandria. Our firm is largely engaged in the purchase and export of cotton seed from Egypt. Cotton is there grown in pods, and before it is gathered the pods burst open, and the white cotton and the seeds appear mixed together. Cotton cannot be gathered until the pod is burst. The bursting of the pod indicates ripeness. The seed is separated from the cotton by a machine called a cotton gin. If the cotton and the seed were unripe it would be almost impossible to separate the seed from the cotton; the seed would be all crushed in the process of ginning. If the seed can be extricated from the cotton at all it follows that it must be ripe, as otherwise it would be extremely difficult, in fact practically impossible to separate them by ginning. All seed coming from Egypt is ginned before it comes. The cotton seed is conveyed from the interior to the ports of loading principally by rail, sometimes by boat. At the ports of lading the cotton seed is stored in our own warehouses, either at Port Said or at Alexandria, which are about 125 miles apart. At Port Said the ships lie a short distance from the wharf. The seed is sent on board the ships in sacks by means of covered barges, holding 20 to 40 tons each. From the warehouse to the barge the seed is carried in sacks on camels backs. On board the ship it is shot out of the sacks into bulk. It seldom rains at Port Said, but if it does cotton seed is never loaded during the rain. When a cargo is being loaded we always take samples of it. This at Port Said is done in the ordinary course of business by my agent there. [Milward, on the witness admitting that he had never seen the samples drawn at Port Said, objected to these last two answers, on the ground that the witness never having seen the samples drawn, could only have derived his knowledge from hearsay. The court sustained the objection.] In the course of my business I got samples of all shipments at Port Said sent to my office in Alexandria. [Milward objected to this answer on the ground that the witness not having seen samples drawn could not say that the packets of seed which he received were samples of shipments. The objection was overruled on the ground that the evidence being merely as to the custom of trade was admissible.] The ordinary course of business is to have a large basket, into which a sample is put out of each barge load shipped, and when the whole is shipped a sample is taken out of this basket, or perhaps two or three samples, in the course of the loading, and the samples are sent to Alexandria. Sales by sample are common in the trade, and the sales are affected by the samples so taken. In the course of business I receive a number of samples purporting to be samples of cargoes landed at Port Said. Amongst others I received some seed purporting to be a sample of the cargo of the Prosperino Palasso. [Objected to, but allowed.] That seed was in perfectly sound condition, and was ripe. In my experience such seed as that would not heat from its own inherent nature. I have never seen sound seed heat from its own inherent greenness or vice. By sound seed I mean seed that has not been damaged by external causes. Seed gathered unripe would heat from its own internal qualities. Damaged seed will also heat of itself. From my experience of respect, but if it were so I find a solution of the difficulty. I trust, in Dr. Voelcker's (a chemist called by the defendants) evidence. He said if the sea had damaged a portion of the cargo it would set the heat going in another part of that cargo, which was not sea damaged and in that part he should not expect to see salt; and in answer to a question put by me he said, "If the sand got wet and the seed was warm, the seed would draw up the water through the mats." Upon the whole the result of the evidence in my mind is that the defendants have not shown that the great amount of damage to her cargo was caused by the excepted perils in the bill of lading or by the improper condition of the seed when put on board. I must, therefore, make the usual reference to the registrar to determine what quantity was affected in consequence of the imperfect dunnage to which I have adverted, and the registrar will make his report accordingly.

cotton seed I do not think that a cargo of cotton seed shipped green, that is, unripe, would heat from its own inherent vice to an extent of 10 per cent.; still less to 20 or 30 per cent. If a cargo of unsound seed or some barge loads of unsound seed were shipped so unsound that it would tend to heat materially, that would be apparent to the eye; even a small quantity would be apparent. No experience of cotton seed is required to say whether it is damaged or not. The cotton seed produced in bags (marked Nos. 1 and 2) is sound. Judging from its appearance, feel, and taste, this could not have been shipped in a green unripe state. This bag of seed produced (marked No. 3) is damaged, as I should judge, by salt water. This bag (No. 4) I should judge was damaged by heat. I consider that the heating of this seed was not caused by its being shipped green; it does not present the appearance that seed shipped green would have presented. There is no difficulty in detecting the difference. I have never known green cotton seed shipped, and, consequently never knew of cotton seed heating from being shipped unripe.

Cross-examined by Milward, Q.C.

I do not think unripe cotton seed can be procured for shipment. It may be got out of the pod, but the cotton could not be ginned unless perfectly ripe, and there would be no use in gathering it. It may be unsound, nevertheless. It may be damaged in transport to the place of loading in course of shipment. I have not known it shipped when damaged. I have not got here the sample which purported to come from the Prosperino Palasso. It was destroyed at the end of the cotton season in March or April. My agent at Port Said, who has charge of the shipments at that place is alive.

Evidence was then given identifying the four bags of samples referred to as having been taken out of the Prosperino Palasso on her arrival in this country.

Cohen for the plaintiff.—The onus does not lie in this case upon the plaintiff as to the condition of shipment; if the court holds that that onus is on the plaintiff, no effect will be given to the words in the bill of lading, "shipped in good order and condition." No doubt the words "ignoro quantita è qualita" are important, but some meaning must be given to both sets of words. The effects of both sets is that the master represents that the cargo appeared to him, using the judgment of a person of ordinary care and skill, to be in good order and condition, but by adding the words "ignoro quantita è qualita" he declines to warrant its weight or condition. He says, "it is apparently in good condition, but may have defects which I cannot detect." According to The Freedom (ante, Vol. 1. p. 28; L. Rep. 3 P. C. 594, 600; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 452) it is sufficient to show that the goods were delivered in worse condition than they were when shipped. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Then the condition in which they were shipped must be proved in the first instance by the plaintiff.] It lies upon the plaintiff to show that the goods were delivered in worse order than when shipped, but they need not establish the actual condition at the port of shipment. It is enough to prove facts which show that the damage to the goods discovered on delivery was such that they could not have been shipped in a condition likely to produce that damage without being noticed by the master. The condition of these goods on delivery was such that if they had been shipped in a condition likely to produce such damage the master must have noticed it. Moreover, goods shipped in a condition which would have produced such injury before delivery would have been still more damaged than these were. Hence the master, having represented by his bill of lading that the goods were shipped in good order and condition, cannot by inserting words as to ignorance of their condition relieve himself from his former representation, namely, that the goods were primà facie in good order when shipped. Then if we have proved that they were in bad order when delivered, we have given primà facie proof that they were in worse order than when shipped, which is all we need prove to entitle us to call upon the other side to prove excuse.

Milward Q.C., for the defendants.—This point has already been decided in the Ida (see note, ante p. 159). The plaintiff must prove positively that the goods were in good order and condition when shipped, and of this there is no evidence.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The court has been requested by counsel on both sides to consider the case as it now stands, and to express an opinion on the effect of the evidence now before it. I am of opinion, as I expressed more at length in the Ida (see note, ante p. 159), that the law requires the party complaining that his goods had been damaged by the fault of those who undertook to carry them, to establish the order and condition in which the goods were put on board the ship by proper evidence. The question as to what evidence will establish that proof must depend upon the circumstances of each case. In the present case the proof which is offered to the court is, first of all, the bill of lading, in which the goods are stated to be shipped in good order and condition, but on the margin of which the master has inserted the words "ignoro quantita è qualita." In the case of the Ida (ubi sup.) I expressed my opinion that those words must be considered to have the same meaning as "quantity and quality unknown," and that by appending these words the master cancelled any admission he would otherwise have made as to the quality and condition of the goods when shipped. I am of opinion, therefore, that the bill of lading in this case does not furnish the proof which the law requires from the plaintiffs as to the state of the goods when put on board. The other proof furnished is of a very circuitous character, consisting of evidence of the state of samples of the cargo on arrival in this country, and not of the condition of the cargo when shipped at Port Said. If I am called upon to express my opinion at this stage of the case I must pronounce that the plaintiff has not proved the order in which the goods were shipped at Port Said, and, therefore, the defendant has a right, in default of other evidence, to be dismissed from the suit with costs.

Milward, Q.C.—Then I must ask what course the plaintiffs propose to take.

Butt, Q.C.—I have no further evidence on this point. I can produce evidence which will show that the damage might have been produced by another cause, viz., by sea water getting at the cargo and heating it through defective dunnage, but after your Lordship's decision that would be useless.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Then I must dismiss the suit with costs.

THE PIEVE SUPERIORE.

[ADM.]

Dec. 9 and 18, 1873.

THE PIEVE SUPERIORE.

Damage to cargo—Jurisdiction—Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10, sect. 6).—“Goods carried into any port in England or Wales”—Ship calling for orders—Goods delivered at foreign port.

When a foreign ship carrying cargo, acting in pursuance of the contract of affreightment, which gives the option of several ports of call, English and foreign, puts into an English port of call for orders, she carries her cargo into the English port within the meaning of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), sect. 6; and though she be ordered to a foreign port, and there discharge her cargo, the Court of Admiralty has jurisdiction to entertain against her a suit by the assignees of the bills of lading of the cargo, for damage to cargo, and to arrest her on her return to this country.

THIS was a cause of damage to cargo instituted under the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), against the Italian ship Pieve Superiore, and her owners intervening. The plaintiffs were Messrs. Gladstone, Wyllie, and Co., merchants, of London, and Messrs. merchants, of Hamburg. The defendants appeared under protest, and filed the following petition on protest:—

(1.) By charter-party, dated London, the 30th March, 1872, and Genoa, the 6th April, 1872, between the defendant and Ferdinand Schiller, for self and partners of Messrs. Borrodalle, Schiller, and Co., of Calcutta, merchants and freighters, it was mutually agreed that the above named ship should, with all convenient speed, having liberty to take outward cargo and passengers from Europe to a port on the way for owners' benefit, sail and proceed thence to Akyat for orders to load at either Akyat, Rangoon, or Bassein, and there load for the agents of the said freighters, a cargo of rice in bags, which the said freighters bound themselves to ship, and being so loaded, should proceed therewith to Belle Isle, Scilly, Queenstown, or Falmouth, at the option of the master for orders, whether to discharge at a good and safe port in the United Kingdom or on the Continent between Havre and Hamburg, both ports inclusive, or so near thereunto as she might safely get, and deliver the same in any dock freighters might appoint, agreeably to bills of lading, on being paid freight as therein mentioned; the master to sign bills of lading at any current rate of freight required, without prejudice to such charter-party, but not under chartered rate.

(2.) Pursuant to the said charter-party, the said ship proceeded to Rangoon, and there loaded a cargo of rice in bags, for which the master of the said vessel signed and delivered a bill of lading, in the words and figures following, that is to say:

“Shipped in good order and well-conditioned by Gladstone, Wyllie, and Co., in and upon the good ship or vessel called the Pieve Superiore, whereof is master for the present voyage, Consigliere, and now riding at anchor in the Rangoon river, and bound for Belle Isle, Queenstown, or Falmouth, for orders to discharge at a port in the United Kingdom or on the Continent, between Havre and Hamburg, both inclusive, 5000 bags, of rice, each 210lb. nett, 5300 bags, each 198lb. nett, being marked and numbered as per margin, and are to be delivered in the like order and condition at the aforesaid port of _____, as ordered (all and every the dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature or kind soever excepted), unto order or its assigns, he or they paying freight for the said goods at the rate of 3*l.* 15*s.* (three pounds fifteen shillings sterling) per ton of 20 cwt., nett weight, with average accustomed. In witness thereof the master or purser of the said ship hath affirmed to three bills of lading, all of this tenor and date the first of which bills being accomplished, the others to stand void. Dated in Rangoon, this 26th day of March, 1873.—F. CONSIGLIERE.”

(3.) The said ship sailed with the said cargo from the Rangoon, and her master, in the exercise of his said option, proceeded therewith to the said port of Falmouth for orders, and there received orders from the plaintiffs, or their agents to proceed with the said cargo to Bremen, which is a port on the Continent between Havre and Hamburg, and to discharge the said cargo at Bremen.

(4.) The said master accordingly sailed from Falmouth in the said vessel with the said cargo to Bremen, and there delivered the said cargo.

(5.) The said vessel, after having discharged her said cargo of rice at Bremen, left Bremen on a second voyage for Cardiff to load coals there, and subsequently arrived at Cardiff, where she has been arrested by the plaintiffs in this suit.

(6.) The plaintiffs allege themselves to be assignees for valuable consideration of the said bill of lading, and allege that the said cargo of rice suffered damage in the said vessel, and they have instituted this suit, as such assignees, for the recovery of losses, which they allege themselves to have sustained by negligence or misconduct, or by breach of duty, or by breach of contract, on the part of the master or crew of the said vessel.

(7.) Save as aforesaid, the said cargo of rice was never brought into any port in England or Wales.

(8.) The defendants submit that the said cargo of rice was not carried into any port in England or Wales, within the true intent and meaning of the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, and that by reason thereof this honourable court has not jurisdiction to entertain this suit.

The plaintiffs now moved to reject this petition on protest, on the ground that, under the circumstances therein stated, the court had jurisdiction.

Dec. 9.—Butt, Q. C. and Cohen, for the plaintiffs, in support of the motion.—To sustain the protest it must be made out by the defendants that the words of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 15), sect. 6, “any goods carried into any port in England or Wales in any ship,” mean goods “imported into,” or “finally discharged in” this country. It is clear that this cargo was carried into Falmouth, within the literal meaning of those words, and hence to oust our right of remedy here the defendants must show that the words have a more restricted meaning. The owner, consignee or assignee of any bill of lading of any goods so carried have, under the section the right to proceed in this court for damage done to the goods, or for breach of contract, provided the owner of the ship be not domiciled in this country. We are assignees of the bills of lading, and the ship is the property of a Genoese. This right may, by sect. 35 of the same Act, be exercised either in personam or in rem. The right of proceeding in rem is a power given to prevent the defeat of the ends of justice by reason of no person being resident in England or Wales who would be liable to be sued in an action at common law. If the defendant was in this country there would be no difficulty in suing him, but as he is not here, the only question is, whether there can be a proceeding in rem. There is undoubtedly jurisdiction in some court; does the Act give this court jurisdiction? The point has already been decided. In The Bahia (Bro. & Lush. 61), the ship only came into an English port by accident, and it was there argued that the action was for a breach of contract, and that to give the court jurisdiction, the contract must be performable in England; that is to say, that the words “carried into,” mean “carried under a contract into” England or Wales. This argument was rejected and the jurisdiction upheld. Here, although the place of delivery, as eventually ordered, was not in England or Wales, still the goods were carried into Falmouth under a contract, the ship going there for orders, in pursuance of the terms of the charter-party and bill of lading. This is a remedial statute, and the defendants should be called upon to show why the court should not uphold a jurisdiction which its plain words give. No argument as to the inconvenience of upholding this jurisdiction is here applicable. It must be assumed that the ship has been guilty of a breach of duty, and if the court has once had jurisdiction, the ship can be arrested at any time. Her cargo belonged to one person, and when she went to Cardiff she was going to load; hence no third person is inconvenienced by her arrest. Moreover, the same argument would equally apply to all cases of proceeding in rem, as in collision, salvage, and other causes, and yet it is not raised. The inconvenience is really balanced by the advantages on the other side. The question has in fact been decided in the recent cases arising out of the Franco-German war:

The Act applies mainly to foreign ships, and its spirit and policy is to give reciprocity of remedy, which would not exist if its meaning were to be thus restricted.

Milward, Q.C. and Clarkson, for the defendant, in support of the protest.—Before this court can have jurisdiction, the ship must be bound for some port of delivery in this country. There must be an intention to deliver here. A mere accidental putting into an English port will not give jurisdiction. Where ship, contract, and place of delivery are all foreign, the mere accident of a call for orders can give no jurisdiction. The real question is, whether the cargo was carried into port animo remanendi. If a master carries into a port in England, with the intention of keeping the goods there wrongfully and against the terms of his contract to carry elsewhere, there is no doubt jurisdiction; but if his sole intention in coming into port is to wait for orders, having the right to do so under his contract, without acting wrongfully towards the cargo, no jurisdiction can accrue, however long he stays, because he cannot be said to be doing anything wrongful within the jurisdiction. In The Patria (ante, vol. 1, p. 71; 24 L. T. Rep. N. S. 849; L. Rep. 3 Adm. and Ecc. 436), the master committed a breach of contract by refusing to proceed on his voyage whilst in an English port, whilst here there was no refusal. They are not suing for an act done in Falmouth, entering which port must be considered a mere step in a foreign voyage by a foreign ship. The tort here, if any, was committed under a foreign flag abroad, and in violation of a foreign contract, so that to uphold the jurisdiction the court must hold that the British Legislature can give jurisdiction over foreigners. The ship could have been sued at Bremen. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—By general international law she could be sued in the competent courts of any country whose port she entered.] Even if the ship had been ordered to London, it would have been illegal to arrest in Falmouth, because the carrying into that port was not a carrying into an English port within the meaning of the statute. The right of arrest does not arise until arrival at the port of delivery. The statute is intended to provide a remedy where British subjects are sufferers, not foreigners; to compel foreign ships coming into the jurisdiction, to give a remedy for breach of contract with British subjects.

But even if the words, "goods carried into any port," have a more extensive meaning than goods carried into a port for delivery, that meaning will only include goods carried into a port for the purpose of being done something with, which gives a right of action. The Bahia (Bro. & Lush. 61) decides that goods must be carried into a port where the goods are dealt with, as at the termination of a voyage, or where the shipowner commits a tort, which gives a right of action. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—In The Patria (ubi sup.), and the other Franco-German war cases, the goods were not brought into court for the purpose of delivery. There was a refusal to proceed during war risk.] In those cases, that very refusal was a breach of duty. In The Bahia (ubi sup.), the wrong complained of was the refusal to carry on, and the shipowner had thereupon the right to make the port in which the ship then was the port of delivery, and this founded the jurisdiction. In The Ironsides (6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 59; Lush. 458; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 200), it was decided that there was no jurisdiction, because the goods were not carried into port in the ship; that is, because there must be an actual carrying into port by the ship entering into the contract. In The Danzig (9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 236; Bro. & Lush. 102; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 392), however, Dr. Lushington held that "carried into" meant "carried or to be carried into," and that the court had jurisdiction over a claim for non-delivery of goods which had been wrongfully thrown overboard. This is inconsistent with the former case, and the question, owing to the difference of decision, is so far open, that it is practically res nova. Then the evil which the statute sought to remedy was the inability to proceed against foreign shipowners whose ships in the performance of their contracts brought goods to this country. The master it was useless to sue; the owners could not be sued because not here. The statute gave power to proceed against the ship, and so provided a remedy for the evil; and this is sufficient to satisfy the terms of the statute. If it is held to extend further, there will be great inconvenience. In the case of a general ship, the action of one shipper might delay the goods of all the rest at the port of call. The reasonable construction of the statute is, that the word "port" in the statute must mean the port of delivery named in the contract, or the final port of delivery in fact. Would the court have jurisdiction over a foreign ship loaded by a foreigner in America for a port on the Continent, merely because the ship came by accident, such as stress of weather, into an English port? In such a case the ship could be proceeded against in the foreign port, and there would be no hardship that the Legislature intended to remedy by this Act. Here the ship is foreign; the master may call either at an English or a French port for orders; the contract for delivery is inchoate; there is no contract to deliver at a particular port until orders given; orders are given to deliver at Bremen, and are accepted; then the shipowner is under a contract to deliver at Bremen, a foreign port; the contract must then be considered as if it had stipulated in the first instance that delivery should take place at Bremen ; that is to say, a contract to be entirely performed abroad. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—At the same time the ship calls at Falmouth, in obedience to her contract. She was not there by accident. All that the plaintiffs need contend is, that a ship which, in pursuance of her contract goes into an English port for orders, submits to the jurisdiction.] The ship was not bound to call at an English port ; she could call at one of several ports ; there was no compulsion by the contract. Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—She did arrive at Falmouth in the execution of her contract, and that is an English port. The question is, does the Act apply under these circumstances ? Putting into a port of call cannot give jurisdiction over a foreign contract.

Butt, Q.C., in reply.—If the owner of the ship were in this country, there would be no difficulty in suing him at common law ; and if these goods were carried into an English port within the meaning of the Act, he would be sued in personam in this court. Then all the arguments as to inconvenience would fail. Can it be said that the doing of an act which compels the shipowner to enter an appearance in this court, which he would have to do at common law, if by chance in this country, is such an inconvenience as can be used as an argument against a jurisdiction. It is not pretended that the act creates a maritime lien ; it only gives the power to compel appearance by a proceeding in rem. If the ship had left the English port and had been sold to a third person, the plaintiff could not have arrested her. But here she still belongs to the same owners, and they being liable for a breach of contract, may they not be made answerable through their ship, even when she is on a new voyage. If the owner had been on board the ship and had landed here, he could have been summoned, why not the ship ? This cannot be called a foreign contract ; the plaintiffs are British subjects ; the contract is in the English language, and under it the ship calls for orders at an English port. The Bahia (ubi sup.) is an à fortiori case, as there it was never contemplated by the contract that the master should come into an English port at all.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 18th.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a motion to reject a petition on protest. A suit was instituted for damage to cargo on behalf of certain consignees against the vessel Pieve Superiore, whose owners are foreigners. They have appeared under protest, and set forth their defence in the petition. The petition states that the ship was chartered in March and April 1872 to take an outward cargo from Europe to a port in the East Indies, and there to load a cargo of rice, to “proceed therewith to Belle Isle, Scilly, Queenstown, or Falmouth, at the option of the master for orders, “whether to discharge at a good and safe port in the United Kingdom, or on the Continent between Havre and Hamburg.” The ship proceeded to Rangoon and loaded the cargo ; and the master signed and delivered a bill of lading to Gladstone, Wyllie, and Co., in which the vessel is described to be bound for the places mentioned in the charter party. The bill of lading and charter party are in English, and the freight is to be paid in English money. The vessel sailed from Rangoon to Falmouth, and then received orders to go to Bremen, which is between Havre and Hamburg, and there discharged her cargo. She sailed from thence to Cardiff on a new voyage, and was then arrested on this suit.

The contention on behalf of the protestors, which was very ably conducted, proceeded upon two grounds. The first and principal ground was, that the words in the statute (24 Vict. c. 10, sect. 6), “Any goods carried into any port in England and Wales in any ship,” must mean carried in for the purpose of delivery in that port. The second ground, which was, I think, more reluctantly put forward, was, that the goods must at all events be carried into a port, which from circumstances became the final port ; or, according to a different form of the same proposition, that the goods must be carried into a port, in which port a wrong was done to the shipper. It is proper here to observe that the petition on protest does not allege that whatever damage was done happened after the vessel had left the English port and was on her way to Bremen. It is obvious that the second proposition of the counsel for the protest cannot be reconciled with the first, inasmuch as the second admits that circumstances may happen which found the jurisdiction, although the goods are not carried into the port of discharge mentioned in the charter party or bill of lading.

Various cases have been decided by my immediate predecessor upon this point, and also by myself ; and in the arguments addressed to the court upon former occasions, as upon the present, the principal topic has been the inconvenience which would result from the plain and literal construction of the words of the statute, which it cannot be denied are in favour of the jurisdiction of the court. And I must here remark that the large and descriptive words are not narrowed or restricted by any subsequent proviso, though it seems that when a restriction is intended to be imposed, as in the case of the domicile of the defendant, it is plainly expressed. If the words are plain and unambiguous, I do not think myself at liberty to consider the argument from inconvenience, although it is very possible that a full investigation into this topic would show that the inconveniences are balanced by contrary advantages.

In The Bahia (Bro. & Lush. 61), the ship carrying the cargo was bound for Dunkirk. She put into the port of Ramsgate, and the master refused to proceed to Dunkirk, or to give delivery at Ramsgate, and the court held that it had jurisdiction. In The Patria (Law Rep. 3 Adm. & Ecc. 436, 459), I referred to that case, and upon its authority decided one portion of the case then before me, and from that judgment there has been no appeal. Also in The Patria the vessel was bound for a port in Germany, and put into Falmouth from accidental circumstances, and the master refused to proceed further, on the ground of French cruisers. I held that the jurisdiction of the court was founded under the statute. It is true that in both these cases the ship had not left the English port in which she was arrested. In the present case she has deposited her cargo, alleged to have been damaged, in the foreign port, and is seized on her return to this country for a new cargo. But it is to be observed that it is not averred in this case that the shipper has had recourse to the tribunals of Bremen. If he has, as he alleges, sustained an injury for which the owner of the ship is liable, it is still unredressed ; and I have already observed upon the pervading English character of the transaction. It becomes unnecessary to refer to the other German cases arising out of the recent war. It appears to me that the principal of these decisions must govern my judgment in the present case, more especially as the vessel had come into an English port in compliance with the terms of the charter-party, and that there was thereby a partial fulfilment of the contract; and the order which she received there might have been to discharge in the English port, and perhaps in that particular port.

On the whole, having regard to the particular circumstances which I have stated, and being unable to distinguish this case in principle from those which have been already determined on this point, I see no adequate reason for not following the plain words of the statute, and I must overrule the protest and direct the party to appear absolutely, with costs.

Shipping law—Charter-party—Lien for freight—Part payable on signing of bills of lading—Bankruptcy of charterer—Disclaimer of contract.

By a charter-party, after providing that the freight was to be at certain specified rates, it was agreed that 250*l.* should be advanced in cash on signing bill of lading and clearing at the custom house of the port of shipment, and the remainder on a true and faithful delivery of the cargo at the port of discharge; and that for the security and payment of all freight, dead freight, demurrage, and other charges, the master or owners should have an absolute lien and charge on the cargo.

The loading of the ship was completed, and the ship was cleared, but she never started on her voyage, nor were the bills of lading signed.

The charterer filed a liquidation petition, and the trustee under the liquidation disclaimed all interest under the charter party.

Held (affirming the decision of the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy), that the shipowner was not entitled to a lien in respect of the 250*l.* agreed to be paid in advance, inasmuch as the ship had never earned freight; the compensation to which the shipowner was entitled for the loss sustained by reason of the charterer's default was not freight, and the 250*l.* did not come within the lien given by the charter-party.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, affirming a decision of the Judge of the Manchester County Court.

The facts, which will be found more fully stated in the judgment of the court, were shortly as follows:

Messrs. Child, Mills, and Co., merchants, of Manchester, entered into an agreement by charter-party with one Nyholm, the owner of the Danish brig Vaering, by which it was agreed that the vessel should take a general cargo to Lagos, on the west coast of Africa, and should bring back a cargo from Lagos, at 77*s.* 6*d.* per ton for freight and hire, the payment of which was to be made as follows: 250*l.* to be advanced in cash on signing bills of lading and clearing at the Custom House, Liverpool, and the remainder on delivery at the port of discharge.

After the vessel was loaded, but before she sailed, Messrs. Child, Mills, and Co. filed a petition for liquidation, and the trustee under the liquidation disclaimed the charter-party.

The bills of lading were not signed, the 250*l.* payable in advance not having been forthcoming.

Nyholm claimed a lien on the cargo for freight and demurrage, but his claim was disallowed, both by the County Court Judge and by the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy.

He now appealed from the decision of the Chief Judge, but on the appeal restricted his claim to a lien for the 250*l.*, payable in advance.

Cohen (of the Common Law Bar), and F. Thompson, for the appellant. We were ready and willing to sign the bills of lading at the time when the trustee under the liquidation disclaimed the contract. Therefore the 250*l.* had become payable as a sum certain, and was immediately recoverable, notwithstanding the disclaimer of the contract, and were entitled to a lien on the goods for the amount:

Paynter v. James, 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 450; 15

L. T. Rep. N. S. 660; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 348;

Black v. Rose, 2 Moore P. C., N. S., 277;

Small v. Moates, 9 Bing. 574.

It is true that this 250*l.* is not a sum in respect of which the usual lien for freight would have arisen, but we claim the lien under the clause in the charter-party which gives us an absolute lien on the cargo for the payment of all freight, dead freight, demurrage, and other charges, and when that clause is read in connection with the preceding clause, which provides that 250*l.* is to be paid in advance, that sum clearly comes within the words of the clause giving us an express lien, as that sum is in the preceding clause expressly stated to be payable as part of the freight. This contention is supported by what Lord Kingsdown says in Kirchiner v. Venus (12 Moo. P. C. 301): "No doubt parties who have superseded by a special contract the rights and obligations which the law attaches to freight in its legal sense may, if they think fit, create a lien on the goods for the performance of the agreement into which they have entered, and they may do this either by express conditions contained in the contract itself, or by agreeing that in case of failure of performance of that agreement, the right lien of what is due shall subsist as if there had been an agreement for freight. But in such case the right of lien depends entirely on the agreement." They also referred to:

Dec. 12.—The COURT intimated that they would not call upon Swanston, Q. C. and Winslow who appeared for the respondent, and Lord Justice JAMES delivered the following written judgment of the court.—This is an appeal from the decision of the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, affirming the decision of the County Court judge of Manchester.

The circumstances are shortly these: The appellant is the owner of the vessel called the Vaering. The bankrupts, or quasi-bankrupts, entered into an agreement with him for the chartering of his vessel. The particular language of the charter-party relied on, I shall refer to later. One of the terms of the charter-party was that 250*l.* should be paid in advance on account of freight when the bills of lading were signed and the ship cleared. The cargo was put on board, and the mate's receipts given for it. The ship was cleared at the Custom House, and the captain was ready and willing to sign the bills of lading in exchange for the 250*l.* The 250*l.* was not, however, forthcoming, and the bills were consequently not signed. The allegation in the affidavit avers that no bills of lading had been tendered to him for signature. The charterer became insolvent. The trustee gave notice that he abandoned all interest under the charter-party. Conflicting claims were made to the cargo, and an order was made by the County Court judge for taking it from the ship, and selling it, and bringing the proceeds into court, except some parts that were given over to some owners, and an issue was directed by the County Court judge as follows: "Whether H. C. Nyholm had on the 10th April, or the 25th April 1873, being the date of the final discharge of the cargo and goods laden on board the Danish brig Vaering, under a charter-party dated the 6th Nov. 1872, and made between H. C. Nyholm and the above-named debtors, a complete or some lien and charge on the cargo and goods so laden on board the vessel, or some part thereof, for damages freight, demurrage, detention, and other charges, for some of them." The learned judge of the County Court decided that issue in the negative. That decision was affirmed, and from that affirmation the appeal has been brought before us.

It was admitted in the argument that the claim must be confined to the 250*l.* It was not contended that there was any such lien by the ordinary mercantile law. It was also admitted that the ship had not commenced her voyage, and had, in fact, elected to free herself from the charter-party by reason of the insolvency and default of the charterers, and therefore that no freight, properly so-called, had been earned or commenced to be earned, and consequently that there was nothing in respect of which the ordinary mercantile lien for freight would arise. But the claim was raised on what was alleged to be the peculiar language of the instrument. The clauses referred to for that purpose are the clauses for payment "In consideration whereof and of everything hereinbefore mentioned, the said Child, Mills, and Co., of Manchester, do hereby promise and agree to load and receive," and so on, "and pay or cause to be paid as freight for the use and hire of the vessel in respect of the said voyage out and home, at and after the rate of 77*s.* 6*d.* per ton of 20 cwt.," if she went to some particular port, and something different if she went to any other port, "the payment of which is to become due and be made as follows: 250*l.* to be advanced in cash on signing bills of lading and clearing at the Custom House, Liverpool, less 5 per cent. for all charges, insurance thereon included. Such money as the master may require for the ordinary disbursements of the vessel at Lagos, on the west coast of Africa, to be advanced free of interest and commission, or other charge, and the remainder on a true and faithful delivery of the cargo at the said port of discharge." Then there is another clause: "It being agreed that for the security and payment of all freight, dead freight, demurrage, and other charges, the said master or owners shall have an absolute lien and charge on the said cargo, or goods laden on board." It was contended first, on the principle of the cases as to concurrent acts, that the 250*l.* became payable as a sum certain under the contract as soon as the captain was ready and willing to sign the bills of lading, and that that, therefore, constituted a sum certain immediately and still recoverable as such, notwithstanding that the whole contract was determined and the voyage put an end to. If it were necessary to decide that point there would be very great difficulty in applying the principle of the cases referred to to the case of the payment in advance, or at a particular stage, of an instalment of one entire consideration for one complete voyage or other service, where the complete voyage or other service had never been performed, and was on the non-payment entirely given up. But, assuming even that it were so, how does it become freight for which the nautical lien arises? It was admitted that it would not be ordinarily so, but it was contended that the lien was created by the express clause of lien. The express clause is, however, for freight, dead freight, demurrage, and other charges. It is not dead freight nor demurrage nor other charge, and it is not freight in the ordinary sense of the word. But the contention was that the word "freight" here was not to be read in the ordinary sense, but that the clause was to be read in connection with the previous clause as to the payment of freight. The 250*l.*, it is said, is there expressly stated to be payable as part of the freight, and the freight is to be paid as follows: 250*l.* in advance. Therefore it was contended that the clause of lien was to read thus: "for freight, which word is to include the 250*l.* hereinbefore made payable in advance, and hereinbefore spoken of as a part payment of freight." There is some ingenuity, but, in our judgment, no substance, in this contention. It would be an unwarranted thing to lay hold of a particular form of expression in one part of a charter party or other instrument, in order to give to plain unequivocal language in another part of the instrument a meaning different from its ordinary meaning. The ship never earned freight, and never began to earn freight. That it was prevented from doing so by the default of the other party entitles the owner to full compensation for all the loss sustained thereby, but the compensation is not freight, and the nautical lien for freight does not extend to such compensation. The order of the Chief Judge is right, and the appeal will therefore be dismissed with costs.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Selborne) concurred.

Appeal accordingly dismissed with costs.

V. C. MALINS' COURT.Reported by T. H. CARSON, and F. GOULD, Esqrs.,
Barristers-at-Law.

Thursday, Dec. 18, 1873.

CLOVER v. ROYDON.

Association—Registry of ships—Certificate of merit—bona fide opinion—Laches—Injunction.

The defendants were an association for the registry of iron ships, and classed the ships in a register of merit according to the reports of their own surveyors. A list from the register might be obtained by anyone.

The plaintiffs were members of the association and the owners of a ship which in 1870 was ranked in the highest class in the register. The plaintiffs in 1870 made an alteration in the ship, and submitted her to the defendants' inspection, who not approving of the alteration, entered in the register "class suspended 1871," and refused to restore the previous first-class entry unless some further alteration was made. The advisability of the alteration was a matter of opinion, as since the alteration the vessel was classed in the highest rank at "Lloyd's" (London).

The plaintiffs continued to use the vessel, but it was proved that her value had been depreciated in consequence of the entry in the defendants' register.

On a bill being filed by the plaintiffs in Nov. 1873 to restrain the defendants from disposing of any copies of their list containing the words "Class suspended 1871."

Held on motion that the plaintiffs were not entitled to relief, first, because the entry was the bona fide opinion without malice of the society to whose judgment the plaintiffs had submitted the vessel; secondly, because of their laches in applying to the court for relief.

This was a motion by the plaintiffs to restrain the defendants, the chairman and committee of an association called The Underwriters Registry for Iron Vessels, from printing or disposing of any copy of their list of iron vessels having the words "class suspended 1871," placed opposite or so as to apply to the plaintiff's ship, the Tyne Queen.

The defendant's association was formed at Liverpool about the year 1862, the purpose of the association being to keep a registry of all iron vessels classed according to their quality. The committee published annually on behalf of the association a list of iron vessels for the use of their subscribers, a copy of which, however, any person might obtain by paying the annual subscription of 2*l.* 2*s.*

A vessel considered by the surveyors of the association as satisfactory was classed by them under the term of "twenty years red." This was the highest classification, and entitled the owner to a red certificate.

The following is an extract from the rules of the association:—

2. The committee propose to class ships on their general merits, having special reference to the quality of the materials, to the character of the workmanship, to the arrangement and size of the parts where the principal strains are experienced, and to the equipment, a system of classification which is considered preferable to one based merely on tables of scantling.

3. The committee continuing the classification adopted by the Liverpool Underwriters' Association for the last six years will class in red for periods varying from ten to twenty years, all iron vessels whether steamers or sailing ships, which have been or may be submitted to the inspection of the surveyors of that association or of this committee during construction, and be built and completed to their satisfaction.

7. A thorough survey will be required once in every four years for vessels with a certificate for twenty years. When vessels are abroad at the time they become due for survey they must be thoroughly examined on their return to the United Kingdom. The surveyors are at all times to have free access to examine vessels holding a certificate from this committee, and in case of defects reported by them not being made good, the classification of the ship shall be revised.

10. Vessels due for periodical survey which leave the United Kingdom without being duly surveyed and passed by the surveyors to this registry will have their class suspended until such survey has been properly made. Notice of suspension of class will be given in the first monthly supplement issued after the sailing of the vessel. Vessels remaining abroad for two years after they become due for periodical survey will have their class suspended until they have been re-surveyed.

The Tyne Queen was built in 1865, and was submitted to the inspection of the surveyors of the association during construction, and was built and completed to their satisfaction, and was thereupon entered in the highest class as "twenty years red," and a red certificate was given. The plaintiffs purchased the vessel in 1870, and having determined to have her lengthened they entered into a contract for the purpose, the contractors for the work having the option to execute it in such a manner as to entitle the ship either to be retained in the highest class in the Liverpool registry, or to be classed A_B at Lloyds (London).

The bill stated that the said class A_B at Lloyds was considered fully equivalent to the class "twenty years red," in the Liverpool registry. The contractors elected Lloyds' classification, but executed the alterations in such a satisfactory manner that the vessel was classed A_1 at Lloyds' (London), a higher classification than A_B . The vessel was not at this time withdrawn from the Liverpool registry, where for some little time longer she continued to appear as belonging to the highest class, viz., "twenty years red."

In November 1871, the plaintiffs' added to the "awning" or "spar" deck over the engine-room, so as to make it cover in the whole length of the main deck. This alteration was approved by the surveyors of Lloyds, but the surveyors of the Liverpool registry objected to it, and in the following publication of their list of iron vessels for the year from September 1872 to August 1873, the vessel appeared with the following words printed in the margin under the figures "twenty red," class suspended, 1871."

The managing directors of the vessel, Messrs. Girvin and Slater, having applied for an explanation of this, they received from the secretary of the Liverpool registry, a letter dated 2nd Sept. 1872, informing them that on certain alterations being made in the vessel under the inspection and to the satisfaction of the surveyors of the registry, the committee would be ready to reinstate her to her former class.

Messrs. Girvin and Slater replied as follows on the 3rd Sept. 1872: "We are in receipt of your favour of yesterday, and as it will not be in our power at present to comply with the request contained therein for the continuation of the (s.s.) Tyne Queen in your book of classification, we have to request that you will in the meantime withdraw the vessel altogether therefrom."

V. C. M.]

CLOVER v. ROYDON.

[V. C. M.]

Paragraph 18 of the bill was as follows: "The said request to withdraw the said vessel entirely from the said register is in accordance with the constant practice of the said association, in fact, in their present list of steamers published in Sept. 1873 no less than twelve different vessels are marked in the said list as having been withdrawn by the owners, and the plaintiffs show that it is the absolute right of the owners of any ship in the said list to have it withdrawn therefrom, and so marked in such list or to have it entirely withdrawn."

Further correspondence ensued, but the association still declined to remove the words "class suspended" from the register, stating in one of their letters that "until the cause for suspension of class has been removed to their satisfaction, the committee will be unable to insert the words 'withdrawn by request of owners.'"

The plaintiffs filed their bill on the 19th Nov. 1873, stating in addition to the above facts, that the book being commonly referred to by insurance brokers, and underwriters and shippers, for the purpose of ascertaining the merits of the various vessels in the list, the words "class suspended" would not only injure the vessel for selling purposes, but also prejudice the plaintiffs in effecting insurances on the vessel, and diminish the amount of freight which they could otherwise earn by her. It appeared that the alterations required by the committee would cost about 200l. The alterations required were for the further strengthening of the vessel on account of the alterations previously made with regard to which different views prevailed between the defendants' association and Lloyd's. The value of the vessel was stated to be about 25,000l.

The case now came on on motion for injunction.

In answer to paragraph 18 of the bill above set out the secretary of the association by his affidavit stated as follows:

"The nature of the entry referred to in the 18th paragraph . . . when a ship has been withdrawn and which entry the plaintiffs desire to have substituted for the entry 'Class suspended 1871.' in the said register is as follows:

[²⁰ in red.] withdrawn by owners.

Such entry in the opinion of the committee contains a representation that the ship has not forfeited her class at the time of withdrawal and to have substituted that entry in the case of the Tyne Queen in lieu of the entry 'Class suspended 1871' would, in the opinion of the committee, have misled underwriters into supposing that the cause of the suspension of the certificate had been removed since the date when the entry 'Class suspended 1871,' occurred in the registry, and before the time when the requested entry 'Class withdrawn by owners' was inserted, and for that reason the committee declined to make the required alteration."

The vessel had been used by the plaintiffs since the suspension of her class and it was proved that the effect of the entry complained of had had an injurious effect upon the character of the vessel.

Glasse, Q.C., W. F. Robinson, and R. G. Williams (Common Law Bar) for the plaintiffs.—The words "class suspended" are calculated to injure the character of the ship, for they will be understood by the public as meaning "untrustworthy" but the vessel is classed ^A1 at Lloyd's. It is said no legal right is threatened, but our right is to use the ship free from any imputation on its merits. The defendants are a self-elected body. The fact of suspension which appears on the register is only half the truth, as the reason of the suspension is not given. They cited

Dixon v. Holden, L. Rep. 7 Eq. 488; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 357;

Clark v. Freeman, 11 Beav. 112.

Cotton, Q.C., Cohen (Common Law Bar), and F. Thomson for the defendants.—We need show only that the committee have acted bona fide in making the entry, which is their candid opinion, and which it is their duty to publish. There is no violation or threatened violation of any legal right. The words complained of do not mean "unseaworthy." The standard of merit required may be high, but the plaintiffs have previously had the benefit of it, and must also take the correlative disadvantage. In Springhead Spinning Company v. Riley the question was as to jurisdiction, and there was a criminal offence. In Dixon v. Holden the statement was false and libellous. We admit that if the defendants' act was libellous, or would give rise to an action, the court would interfere, but no action would lie in this case. They referred to

Glasse, Q.C. replied, and referred to

Evans v. Harlow, 5 Q. B. 624; 13 L. J. 130, Q. B.; 8 Jur. 571.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said that the plaintiffs had proved that the vessel was a first-class vessel, registered at Lloyd's as ^A1, and that the alteration which had been made in her was not calculated to weaken her, but that the entry in the defendants' registry was calculated to injure her, and had done so. But everyone entering the association must know that the committee were to exercise their own discretion as to the class in which they would place a vessel in their register. The plaintiffs had already submitted the Tyne Queen to the inspection of the society, and had, in his Honour's judgment, bound themselves to admit the society's right to form its own opinion as to her merits. The whole book was a matter of opinion, and if in the honest exercise of their judgment the committee thought that the vessel did not come up to their standard, they had a right to enter that in their books. But what was the meaning of the entry "class suspended?" Did it mean any more than that at present the society had not made up their minds as to how the vessel was to be classed? If that were so they had a right to enter that. There was no malice, no want of truth or plain dealing on the defendants' part. No doubt the plaintiffs had sustained injury, but it was through their own mistaken view. If they had been willing to expend 200l. on a ship which was worth 25,000l., she would have remained on the register under her former classification as "twenty years red." But considering that her class had been suspended in 1871, that she had been used since, and the evil had only just been found out, his Honour was of opinion that the plaintiffs were barred from relief by lapse of time, if by nothing else.

Motion refused.

LONDON AND PROVINCIAL MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY v. SEYMOUR.

[V.C. B.]

V.C. BACON'S COURT.Reported by the Hon. ROBERT BUTLER and F. GOULD, Esq., Barristers-at-Law.

Wednesday, Dec. 10, 1873.

LONDON AND PROVINCIAL MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY v. SEYMOUR.Fraud—Action at law on policy of insurance—Relief in equity—Cancellation.

The defendants brought an action at law against the plaintiffs on a policy which, with another policy, had been effected by gross fraud. There being several actions arising out of the same transaction, all the actions but that of the defendants were stayed, and a special case was agreed upon, and judgment was to be delivered at law upon the facts stated and found.

The facts showed gross fraud on the part of the plaintiffs at law, and judgment was given against them.

Held, that the defendants at law were entitled to a decree in equity for cancellation of both the policies.

THE bill in this suit was filed against George Seymour and certain shippers and other persons interested in two policies of insurance effected with the plaintiff company by Seymour, and the relief sought by the amended bill at the hearing, was that the policies might be cancelled so far as concerned the plaintiffs.

The policies, which were effected upon certain goods which were shipped on board the British vessel Peterhoff, were dated the 3rd Dec. 1862, and the 10th Dec. 1862, and were for the sums of £3000 and £3000 respectively.

At the time the policies were effected, a state of war was existing between the United States of America and the Confederate States. At this time the ports of the Confederate States were blockaded by the United States, but the mouth of the Rio Grande, which divided Texas from Mexico, was not included in the blockade, and neutral commerce with the port of Matamoras, which was on the Mexican side of the Rio Grande, was with the exception of contraband of war, entirely free.

The goods covered by the policy were shipped by various persons, and comprised, besides innocent articles, certain articles contraband of war, and were, as it afterwards appeared, intended from the beginning to go to Matamoras, not to be disposed of there as part of the merchandise of such port, but for the purpose of being transhipped to Texas, and delivered to the Confederate Government.

The plaintiffs were not aware when they subscribed the policies of the nature of the goods intended to be covered by the policies, but it was represented to them that no contraband of war would be allowed to be carried on board the vessel.

The vessel sailed from London in Jan. 1863, and on her way was captured by a vessel of the United States, and the vessel and cargo were condemned and forfeited.

The defendants thereupon commenced an action at law against the plaintiffs on the policy of the 10th December 1862, in the Court of Common Pleas, and other actions also were brought against the underwriters. In November 1865, an order was made staying all the actions except one, and the action ultimately proceeded with was that by the defendants against the plaintiffs on the policy of the 10th December 1862. The original bill in this suit was filed on the 31st January 1866, praying that the last-named policy might be cancelled, and the defendants restrained from proceeding with the action, but the bill was amended on the 19th February following, stating further as follows: That the said action came on for trial in the sittings after Michaelmas Term 1866, when a special case was ordered to be stated for the opinion of the court, and that by the order it was directed that the facts found in the special case might be used in the suit in Chancery. The amended bill also stated that an action was pending against the underwriters on the policy of the 3rd December 1862. The amended bill prayed that both the policies might be cancelled so far as concerned the plaintiffs.

The special case was argued in Trinity Term 1872, when judgment was given for the defendants in the action. (a)

Kay, Q.C. and A. G. Marten for the plaintiffs.—The court will entertain this suit, though there is an action at law with a complete defence. The only remedy in such a case as this is to file a bill to set the policy aside. The court will take the verdict of the common law court, and if the court is satisfied with the result of the action on one policy it will stay proceedings on both by ordering them to be given up. Little, Q.C., De Gex, Q.C., Heath, Dundas Gardiner, Westlake, and Linklater for the defendants.—There is no necessity for a double litigation. The only question is whether the means of this court are greater than those of a court of law, but the constituted proceedings at law are amply sufficient. There can be no object in cancelling a policy after a verdict against it in an action. In De Costa v. Scandret it does not appear that any action had been brought. They cited Ochsenbein v. Papelier, L. Rep. 8 Ch. 695; 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 58.

Kay, Q.C. was not called upon to reply.

THE VICE-CHANCELLOR.—I thought that a man who had been defrauded had a right to come to this court to be relieved. This is an attempt to confuse the plain equity of the case by referring to the action at law. There was an agreement for a special case, and that judgment should be delivered upon the facts. Those facts show as gross a fraud as could be expressed in words. I cannot hesitate to make the decree for cancelling the policies.

BAXTER v. CHAPMAN AND OTHERS.

Bill of exchange—Bills of lading—Acceptance—Misrepresentation.

The U. Bank presented a bill of exchange to B. and Co., the drawees, for their acceptance, accompanied by a ticket representing that the bank held bills of lading to cover it, B. and Co. thereupon accepted the bill relying on the statement that the bank held bills of lading which both parties thought to be genuine. The bills of lading had been forged by the drawer of the bill of exchange. Held that B. and Co. were not entitled to demand from the bank genuine bills of lading before paying the amount of the bill of exchange.

THE bill in this case was filed to obtain a declaration that the plaintiffs were not liable in equity on a bill of exchange for 5932*l.* 4*s.*, which had been accepted by them, unless the defendants or some of them handed over to the plaintiff's genuine bills of lading of certain bales of cotton, and to restrain a threatened action at law against the plaintiff's on the bill. The facts were as follows: The plaintiff Baxter carried on the business of a merchant and commission agent in New York, under the firm of A. Baxter and Co., and carried on the same business with the two other plaintiffs, Steedman and Coates, at Liverpool, under the firm of Baxter, Steedman, and Coates. The defendant Chapman was the registered public officer of the Union Bank of London, and the other defendants were the firm of F. Schuchardt and Son, G. B. Shute, who carried on business in New Orleans as an exporter of cotton to England, and the bank of New Orleans.

In May 1870, Shute having arranged with the plaintiff Baxter that he would consign to the plaintiffs Baxter, Steedman, and Coates, certain cotton, by the ship William Cummings, shipped 350 bales accordingly, and sent to Baxter, Steedman, and Co., the invoice and a letter as follows:

New Orleans, 26th May, 1870.

Messrs. Baxter, Steedman, and Co., Liverpool.

Dear Sirs,—I have much pleasure in handing you the inclosed invoice of 350 bales, per William Cummings, and beg your kind protection of my draft for the advance of 5932*l.* 4*s.*—Yours truly,

GEORGE B. SHUTE.

The bill was drawn by Shute on the plaintiffs at sixty days sight, and was dated 25th May 1870. The bill was sold by Shute to the New Orleans Bank, who received what purported to be, and what they believed to be, the bills of lading of the cotton.

The bill of exchange was indorsed by the New Orleans Bank to the defendants Schuchardt and Son, their agents, who forwarded it, and the supposed bills of lading, and also a letter by which the bales of cotton had been hypothecated to meet the bill, to the Union Bank of London, where they arrived about the 12th June 1870. The Union Bank sent the bill to their agents at Liverpool, in order that they might get it accepted by the plaintiffs. The Union Bank had attached a ticket to the bill of exchange as follows:—"The Union Bank of London holds bills of lading for 350 bales cotton, per William Cummings."

The plaintiffs accordingly accepted the bill of exchange on 13th June 1870, believing that the Union Bank held genuine bills of lading, and the bill remained in the possession of the Union Bank.

The William Cummings arrived at Liverpool at the end of July 1870, and on the plaintiffs being applied to by the Union Bank to know whether they were desirous of retiring the bill, their brokers sent to the Union Bank the customary undertaking that on receiving the bills of lading they would hold them and the property therein represented in trust to secure the payment of the bill. It was subsequently discovered that the supposed bills of lading held by the Union Bank were forgeries, the genuine bills of lading being held by a firm of J. N. Beach and Co., who were also correspondents of Shute, and who claimed to hold them against another bill of exchange drawn upon them by Shute.

The plaintiffs on their bill of exchange becoming due refused to pay the amount to the Union Bank except on receiving in exchange the genuine bills of lading; and on the Union Bank threatening to bring an action against them for the amount, they filed their bill in Aug. 1870, stating, in addition to the above-mentioned facts, that Shute had no authority to draw bills upon them except against bills of lading, and praying as above.

Benjamin, Q.C. and W. F. Robinson, for the plaintiffs.—The question is merely between the plaintiffs and the New Orleans Bank. The plaintiffs accepted the bill only on the representation that the Union Bank held bills of lading for the cotton. We do not put the case on the ground of a statement of fact. They referred to Gompertz v. Bartlett, 2 Ell. & Bl. 849.

Kay, Q.C., Jackson, Q.C. and Stevens, for the defendants, were not called upon.

THE VICE-CHANCELLOR said that unless there was a representation by the Union Bank that they held good bills of lading, the plaintiff's case must fail. He was of opinion that the plaintiffs had failed to show such a representation as was necessary to found their argument. The case was that of an ordinary mercantile transaction in good faith as between the plaintiffs and the Bank, and was covered by the authorities referred to. The bill must be dismissed.

HATHESING v. LAING.

Broker's lien—Mate's receipt—Endorsement—Bills of lading—Hypothecation.

C. and Co. were cotton brokers in Bombay, who used to buy and ship cotton for H. and Co., retaining the mate's receipts for the cotton until the payment of their charges. C. and Co. having purchased and shipped for H. and Co. a quantity of cotton, took receipts from the mate in the name of H. and Co., which were endorsed to them by H. and Co.

H. and Co. obtained from the captain of the ship, to whom C. and Co. gave no notice of their lien, bills of lading for the cotton which were hypothecated to a firm of bankers who also had no notice of C. and Co.'s claim:

Held, that C. and Co.'s lien was gone when they had shipped the cotton; that the bankers' security was not affected, nor the captain chargeable with default.

THE plaintiffs were a firm of cotton brokers carrying on business in Bombay under the name of Currumchund Premchund, and the principal defendants were a firm of merchants (who also carried on business in Bombay under the name of Harbord and Co., and in London under the name of Harbord, Wilkinson and Co.), the Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris, which was a corporation of bankers carrying on business in Bombay, Paris, and London, and James Laing and Mary Gourley, the owners of the steamship Alabama. The bill prayed a declaration that the plaintiffs were entitled to have delivered to them certain bales of cotton comprised in two mate's receipts, or to a lien on the cotton for the purchase money, or that the defendants Laing and Gourley were liable to make good to the plaintiffs the value of the cotton, and an injunction restraining the delivery of the cotton to the Comptoir d'Escompte, the present holders of the bills of lading thereof.

The bill stated as follows :

For some time previous to the month of May 1870, the plaintiffs used in the course of their business to purchase in Bombay cotton for Harbord and Co., the course of business being that the plaintiffs should pay for the cotton, and have it delivered to themselves, and load it on board ship at Bombay, taking the usual receipts for the cotton from the mate or officer in charge of the ship, which receipts were retained by the plaintiffs and taken by them to the firm of Harbord and Co., in order that the receipts might be endorsed to the plaintiffs by the firm of Harbord and Co., without the firm of Harbord and Co. at any time having possession of them. The plaintiffs so kept the receipts in order that they might preserve their right to the possession of the cotton, and the receipts so kept and endorsed to them were retained by them till the cotton represented by the receipts was paid for by Harbord and Co. Upon such payment the receipts were handed over to Harbord and Co., in order that they might present them to the captain of the ship and obtain bills of lading which they could not get without the receipt.

In the beginning of the year 1870, the plaintiffs having received orders from Harbord and Co. to purchase for them a large quantity of cotton, such cotton was purchased by the plaintiffs' agent, Currumchund, and according to the usual course of business between the plaintiffs and Harbord and Co., it was loaded on board the Alabama, then commanded by Captain Bland. Amongst the cotton were two lots of eighty and eighty-two bales, the subject of the suit, for which receipts were given to Currumchund by the mate of the ship. The receipts were taken in the name of Harbord and Co., and were taken by Currumchund to Harbord and Co., and were without his parting with the possession of them, handed to Harbord and Co., who endorsed them and handed them back to Currumchund as the plaintiffs' agent. A few days after the endorsement of the receipts, Harbord and Co. requested the plaintiffs, or Currumchund, to give up the receipts for the eighty and eighty-two bales, in order that Harbord and Co. might get from the captain of the ship bills of lading for the cotton, but they refused to do so without first receiving payment for the cotton. The bill then stated, that upon such refusal, Harbord and Co. induced the captain of the ship improperly to sign and hand to them bills of lading for the cotton, represented by the mate's receipts. The bill of lading was dated 30th May 1870.

The bill stated that the plaintiffs' solicitors, on the 13th June 1870, by a letter, demanded from the captain bills of lading, to be signed by him, for the eighty and eighty-two bales, but he refused, on the ground that he had already signed and delivered other bills of lading for the same cotton to Harbord and Co.

The bills of lading which had been signed by the captain, and delivered to Harbord and Co., were hypothecated with the Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris, as security for advances made by them to Harbord and Co.

The Alabama sailed from Bombay on the 13th June 1870, and arrived at Liverpool in August following.

The plaintiffs filed their bill on the 16th Sept. 1870, and prayed as above.

There was no question that the Comptoir d'Escompte de Paris had made their advances on the bills of lading, without notice of any other claim.

The affidavit of Currumchund and another stated as follows :

Par. 10. The said cotton mentioned in the said set of bills of lading and mate's receipts, so produced and marked as aforesaid was shipped by the direction of me, this deponent, as moonim and agent for the said firm of Currumchund Premchund, in the name of the said firm of Harbord and Co.

Par. 11. In accordance with the usual course of business, the said receipts, marked respectively B. and C. were taken by me as the agent of the said firm of Currumchund Premchund to the said firm of Harbord and Co., and without my parting with or quitting possession of the same, the said receipts were indorsed by the said firm of Harbord and Co., as appears from the said receipts, and immediately after such indorsement the said receipts were handed back to and retained by me as the agent of the said firm of Currumchund Premchund.

Part 12. A few days after the said mate's receipts were so indorsed and handed back to me as aforesaid, the said firm of Harbord and Co. requested me to give up the said receipts, in order that the said firm of Harbord and Co. might be enabled to obtain bills of lading for the same from the captain of the said ship, but I refused to deliver up the said mate's receipts without first receiving payment for the said cotton, as I do not wish to let the said firm of Harbord and Co. have possession of the same without the usual payment.

Evidence of two Bombay merchants, as to the custom of Bombay, was produced as follows :

We say that, according to the usage and customs of merchants in Bombay, such mate's receipts represent the property in the goods therein specified, and are always negotiable in the Bombay market, and are sold and pledged, and pass the property in such goods, in the same manner as bills of lading. And that captains or masters of ships are bound to have the mate's receipts returned to them before they sign any bill or bills of lading for the goods mentioned in such mate's receipts.

The evidence of Capt. Bland was, that he never signed any bills of lading the mate's receipts for which were not before him, and that no document demanding bills of lading on behalf of the plaintiffs had ever been delivered to him.

Eddis, Q.C. and Morshead, for the plaintiffs.—According to the custom of Bombay, the mate's receipts are considered, to a certain extent, as the title deeds of the property, and are negotiable. If they never left our hands, the captain could not properly sign bills of lading—the production of them is a condition precedent to the signing of the

Where there has been a fraud upon the shipper, such as by stealing the bills of lading, it may be that they cannot be indorsed so as to give a good title; but this is a case of the shipper himself parting with the bills of lading. That is the distinction between this case and Gurney v. Behrends (3 Ell. & Bl. 634). Harbord and Co. were the only persons who could give a bill of lading. No fraud committed by persons other than them and their indorsees could affect the indorsees' title. They cited

THE VICE-CHANCELLOR.—This case is very important, if the several topics which have been urged have any application to it, or ought to regulate the decision; but, in my opinion, it can be disposed of upon much shorter grounds, and for the consideration of those legal grounds, I turn first to the bill itself, and I here find that the course of business between the plaintiffs and the firm of Harbord and Co. was, that the plaintiffs should purchase and pay for the cotton, and have it delivered to themselves. [His Honour then went on to describe the course of business between the plaintiffs and Harbord and Co., and continued.] That is the course of trade as it is described, and that as I read it is, that the plaintiffs were brokers for Harbord and Co., and bought on behalf of Harbord and Co., the cotton in this case, which they had a right to retain until they were paid their charges, which charges included the amount that they had laid out for their principals, and that that would give them a lien is beyond all doubt; but any other title than that of lien is not pleaded and cannot, according to the circumstances of the case, exist. If the value of the cotton, after the plaintiffs had bought it for Harbord and Co., had increased, no matter to what extent, can it be doubted that Harbord and Co., upon this statement of the course of business, would have been entitled to the increase, upon paying the price contracted for? If there had been any diminution in the value, the plaintiffs would have suffered no part of the loss occasioned by that diminution. Brokers they were according to their own statement—brokers with a lien, and brokers generally, if not always, have a lien upon the goods which they purchase for their principals, and the possession of which they retain. Other rights than that they do not allege they have, and it would be inconsistent with every fact of the case to suppose they had any other right. Then they go on to say, "Among the said cotton were two lots of eighty and eighty-two bales," and so on; and, in accordance with the usual course of business,

"they were respectively put on board the said ship." Whatever their possession was, their right being only to a lien, that lien was discharged as to the possession of the property in the bales of cotton when they put them on board Harbord's ship. There is no question about stoppage in transitu. They were Harbord and Co.'s goods from the beginning, subject to Harbord and Co. paying the price; they were by Harbord and Co.'s agents, the brokers, put on board Harbord and Co.'s ship, and a receipt was taken from the mate in the name of Harbord and Co. The bill states it distinctly, and the affidavit, if anything, more so. [His Honour then read par. 10 of Currumchund's affidavit, and continued:] That is to say, the lighter coming alongside Harbord and Co.'s ship, delivers the goods on to the ship, and takes a receipt, describing the things which have been so delivered to or on account of Harbord and Co. The broker's lien was then gone. I am at a loss to see that they had any other lien or right, or that they can by any perversion of terms be called vendors. If they were vendors to anybody, they were vendors to Harbord and Co., through their agency, and there were no other vendors, properly speaking, in the case. [His Honour then read from pars. 11 and 12 of Currumchund's affidavit, and, referring to par. 11, continued.] Now, the bill does not state when that was done, nor does the affidavit state when that was done, and when that was done appears to me to be a point of vital importance in this case, because from the statements and from the nature of the transaction, it is quite clear that the plaintiffs thought that the mere possession of the receipts was nothing. The possession of the receipts by them was simply an act of agency, and in proper course the receipts ought to have been handed to Harbord and Co., and so the plaintiffs thought. They felt they had parted with their lien; that the receipts held by them were good for nothing, for they were Harbord and Co.'s receipts, and, therefore, they procured an indorsement to be made upon them.

What is the effect of that indorsement? It is a transfer of the right which Harbord and Co. had by virtue of the delivery of the mate's receipts to the plaintiffs, and it is upon that that they claim. Upon that the whole of their complaint against the present defendant [i.e. the Comptoir d'Escompte] is founded. It is the indorsement on the receipts, and the possession of the receipts, upon which they found their claim, nor could they claim otherwise, for in everyone of the cases that have been referred to, in which the mate's receipts are mentioned, they are mate's receipts taken by the true owner of the property, in order that his right to and possession of that property may not be questioned or disturbed by the fact of his having deposited the goods on board somebody else's ship. All that the skipper has to do, under those circumstances, is to satisfy himself that the receipt expresses no more in quantity and description than the goods which are then received by him. Having done that, he has discharged his duty; he has given vouchers which prevents him ever thereafter saying he did not receive the bales of cotton. That is the extent of his liability, and if he discharges himself from that liability, the possession of the mate's receipts by somebody else than Harbord and Co., does not signify at all, and as between himself and Harbord and Co., it is not necessary even to produce them. The goods were delivered as Harbord and Co.'s goods; he acknowledged the receipt of them for Harbord and Co., and gave it to the man who came alongside, that he might carry it to whomever it belonged. It went into the hands of the plaintiffs, and it was held by them to be of no earthly use to them until they got a transfer of Harbord and Co.'s right.

HATHESING v. LAING.

[V. C. B.]

Now, in my opinion, it would add greatly to the perils of the sea and the perils of commerce, if I were to hold, in opposition to every principle which regulates such transactions in this court, that they acquired that title, which they say they had acquired by means of indorsements, of which they gave no notice to the captain or to anybody else, until after it was too late for the captain to do anything for them. Without such notice being given, I am of opinion that their right cannot avail against the rights which the defendants acquired through the bills of lading. See to what mischief it might lead, without saying at the present moment a word about the custom—what difference is there between the mate's receipts, taken as the plaintiffs took them, and any other choses in action, or any other chattel? A book debt, a policy of insurance, or anything else, may be well assigned in equity, but the assignment is of no avail except notice is given to the person who is to be charged with it. The captain, from the time he receives the goods, is chargeable with those goods. If he has no notice that any other owner in the world exists but the man in whose name he has given the receipt, what liability does he incur when he either transfers or assigns the bills of lading, or pays a debt, or anything else to the person who, as far as he is concerned, is the sole owner? It is the universal principle, and in my opinion it is directly applicable to the transaction in this case. If I were to consider that that principle required any support from the facts of this case, nothing can by any possibility be stronger than they are. Here is a captain, sailing from the port of London, going to Bombay for the first time, knowing nothing about local customs, but knowing very well what his duty as skipper is; he is fourteen days in the port of Bombay, half of which time is occupied in delivering the cargo that he brought there and the other half in taking in the new cargo. During that time, as I gather, a great many things were done. The plaintiffs here say that for 965 bales they got bills of lading, and yet upon none of those occasions, when those bills of lading were applied for, was any notice given to the captain, or any intimation to him that they had a claim upon those goods. They were assignees, it is said, by the indorsement. Surely, for the common protection of innocent persons in mercantile transactions, it was incumbent upon them to give him notice. They saw him sign bills of lading daily; they knew he might sign a bill of lading at any time, and there was not the slightest intimation or notice given to him at any time until, according to their statement, the 13th June, a date which I will mention on the subject hereafter. The bill of lading bears date the 30th May. On the 30th May, when the goods were in the possession of the captain, he, upon the request of the only person he knew of in the transaction, at the place of business of Harbord and Co., the proper place for the transaction of such matters, is called upon to sign, and he does sign, a variety of bills of lading, 965 bales being comprised in those bills. Now the captain's account of what he did upon that is very clear, and I shall mention it a little hereafter when I come to deal with the evidence, but looking at the case only as a matter of law, what is there to induce me to say that by the transfer by Harbord and Co., by indorsement, of the mate's receipts, no notice having been given to the captain, he is in the slightest degree in default. I can apply no principle to the case as the plaintiffs themselves state it.

Then the evidence is not to be disregarded, and the evidence stands thus: With the mate's receipts in their possession, the plaintiffs' agents go to Harbord and Co. to desire them to indorse the notes; I have already said to what end the indorsements were required. The mate's receipts, if they were the things that had the effect the plaintiffs here contended for, no indorsement in the world would make good. Then between the 30th May and the 13th June the ship was loaded. There is no pretence that an application was made to Capt. Bland till the 13th June, and upon that there is a conflict of statement. During that period the bills of lading were signed, and the ship sailed, I suppose, on the 13th June. Then the evidence on the part of the plaintiffs is, that having these notes so indorsed, they never parted with the possession of them. That expression is not satisfactory, since they were getting these other bills of lading signed. Considering the nature of the transactions, the hurry with which they were performed, as appears by Capt. Bland's evidence, his sole business being to see that he did not incautiously or improperly sign bills of lading, the business of Harbord and Co. being that they should produce mate's receipts for the goods for which they required bills of lading, he says, that he never signed any bills of lading for which the receipts were not before him. Upon comparing the evidence I cannot hesitate to say that I adopt and believe what Captain Bland says upon this subject, and it is perfectly consistent with the plaintiffs' case, that although they did not part with the possession, the mate's receipts were before Captain Bland at the time. [Then referring to the conflict of statement as to the demand made upon Captain Bland to sign a bill of lading to the plaintiffs, his Honour said that upon the evidence he must adopt Captain Bland's statement. Then referring to the evidence of the Bombay merchants as to the custom of Bombay, his Honour continued:]

But that must be read with the proper understanding of the custom. They represent what? Not that the holder of the note, but that the person in whose favour the note is made, is entitled to the possession of the goods in question. But is that a custom I can adopt? Is it a local custom you can fix upon a captain from Stepney who saw Bombay for the first time in his life in 1870? That may be a custom between the parties concerned, but even taking it in the terms they express it, there is not a word about indorsing the mate's receipts, nor any suggestion that the indorsement, if it is of any use at all, does not create a new title, of which title notice must be given. They go on to say what is clear [i.e. as to the captain's being bound to have the mate's receipts returned to them before signing bills of lading]. Why should I adopt that? It cannot be true. Suppose a mate's note to be lost, are the goods the captain's, so that he cannot be called upon to sign a receipt?

If the captain satisfies himself that the goods are on board, then the mate's receipts become to him a matter of perfect indifference. He is told, and he knows they are the goods of Harbord and Co., therefore he signs the bill of lading. [Then referring to the custom of the brokers to retain the mate's receipts by way of lien on the goods shipped by them in the name of a firm, his Honour continued:] The custom cannot override the plain well established law, which is, that to assert a lien you must be entitled to possession. Capt. Bland did not, as he says, sign the bill of lading without seeing the receipt, and if he had signed it without seeing the receipt at the instance of the plaintiffs, I think he would have been perfectly justified, and that nobody would have had any right to complain. Well, if that be so, and that is the law and conclusion to be drawn from the facts, what case is there as far as the Comptoir d'Escompte is concerned? In the most ordinary course of trade, without notice, I can see nothing which could at all affect the validity of the security in their hands.

But then come the owners, and they are sought to be made liable upon the authority of Schuster v. M'Kellar. Schuster v. M'Kellar does not furnish the slightest foundation for any such contention. In Schuster v. M'Kellar, the owners had given directions to the captain to do what he did in storing the goods at Calcutta, and it was by his unjust interference that he was made liable. The question was put to the jury, and it was found by the jury against the owner, and the judges were of opinion that that was properly so found, and they saw no reason to disturb it, it being a question of fact, and the law applicable to it being the result of the facts. But it has no kind of application to the present case, and so far from being any authority for it, in that case the only question that was considered was, whether Schuster who had shipped the goods was the real owner of the goods. Then, having sent the goods on board the particular ship, and having taken a mate's receipt, which was an acknowledgment that the goods were his and that the skipper held them for him, he is afterwards induced to part with the receipt for a short time. Then he gets them back, but Cole persuades the captain to sign the bill of lading. He had no more right than I have, or anybody else has, either with regard to the bill of lading or any other transaction to assign or give away another man's property. But in all the cases that Mr. Eddis referred to, the validity of the mate's receipts was only in question because they were title deeds held by the owner of the goods. Here the plaintiffs never were the owners of the goods in the true sense, they were not their goods, they were not cotton merchants, but they were cotton brokers, and they thought they had a right to retain these goods until they were paid their purchase money, but they have parted with it, and they try to perfect their title by getting Harbord and Co. to endorse the receipts to them. Now I observed that the time when that transaction took place was of most vital importance. The plaintiffs have brought their case into court without saying when that took place, and that it might take place afterwards is perfectly clear, and thereby a very gross fraud might be committed if I yielded to the claim that the plaintiff's have made.

In my opinion there is no ground whatever upon which the suit can be sustained against the Comptoir d'Escompte, or the owners of the ship. The other parties who appear are merely ornamental parties. Therefore I must dismiss the bill with costs against the defendants whom I have mentioned, and they must also pay the costs of the other parties.

Barristers-at-Law.

Dec. 9 and 10, 1873.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. TERRY.

Navigable river—Erection of piles in bed of river by wharf owner—Obstruction—Nuisance—Injunction.

An information was filed by the Attorney-General at the relation of the Mayor and Corporation of Sandwich to restrain by injunction the defendant, who was the owner of a wharf abutting on the river Stour, a public navigable river forming the harbour of Sandwich, from erecting a structure, having its foundation in the bed of the river, which interfered with the navigation:

Held, that no person has a right to put an obstruction in the bed of a navigable river, although at the time it may not be a nuisance.

Held, also, that the erection of the structure was a nuisance to persons using and navigating the river; that, the erection being for the purposes of the defendant's trade, it was too remote a benefit to the public to say that the encouragement of the trade of a single individual was a benefit to the public; and that the injunction must be granted. The question whether erections made in a harbour are a nuisance or not depends on whether, upon the whole, they produce public benefit, not giving to the words "public benefit" too extended a sense, but applying them to the public frequenting the port. The benefit to the public must be a direct benefit.

Rea v. Russell (6 B. & C. 566) disapproved of. (a)

(a) The case of Rea v. Russell has been twice called in question within a short period. In the case of Jolliffe v. The Wallasey Local Board (ante p. 146), Denman, J. said, "I have long understood that Rea v. Russell was practically overruled, and I am of opinion that R. v. Ward (4 Ad. & Ell. 384), does practically overrule it. Since the date of R. v. Ward no case following Rea v. Russell can be found." Hence it may be taken for granted that Rea v. Russell can no longer be cited as of authority: (See also R. v. Betts, 16 Q. B. 1022.)

The right of the public to the free passage over a navigable river has always been most strenuously upheld by the courts of this country, and even was one of the rights expressly reserved by Magna Charta. Even the right of fishing was not allowed to interfere with the right of navigation, and many statutes were passed suppressing fisheries which obstructed navigable rivers: (see 25 Ed. 3, sh. 4, c. 4; 45 Ed. 3, c. 2; 1 Hen. 4, c. 12; 4 Hen. 4, c. 11; 12 Ed. 4, c. 7). The rule of law in the country seems to be that, to justify an obstruction being placed in a navigable river, there must result therefrom a public convenience which overbalances the public inconvenience caused thereby; and the word "public" must naturally be applied to such persons as use the navigable river.

In the United States no less care has been observed in securing the navigable rivers as public high-

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. TERRY.

[ROLLS.]

THIS was an information filed by the Attorney-General at the relation of the Mayor and Corporation of Sandwich to restrain by injunction the defendant, who was the owner of a wharf abutting on the river Stour, from erecting or allowing to remain any piles or works in or above the river beyond the line of his wharf, and from otherwise obstructing the free navigation of the river.

The facts of the case are fully stated in the judgment.

Rozburgh, Q.C., and Hanson, in support of the information cited :

Bickett v. Morris, L. Rep. 1 H. L. Sc. 47; 14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 835;

Attorney-General v. Earl of Lonsdale, L. Rep. 7 Eq. 377; 29 L. T. Rep. N. S. 64.

Fisher, Q.C. and Beaumont for the defendant contended upon the authority of Rex v. Russell (6 B & C. 566) that the proposed erection would be beneficial to the public. They referred to Hale's Treatise De Jure Maris, pars. II. cap. 5; Har. greave's Law Tracts, p. 85; where he says:—"An erection in a river is not to be deemed a nuisance simply because it infringes on the water highway."

They also cited :

Rex v. Ward, 4 Ad. & E. 384;

Attorney-General v. Sheffield Gas Consumers' Company, 3 D. M. & G. 304.

Sir G. JESSEL:—The facts of this case, on which there is really no controversy whatever, or no substantial controversy, are as follows: The river Stour appears to be a small river. I am not personally acquainted with it, though I believe the court is supposed to know the topography of all England. It is a small navigable river, forming the port or harbour of Sandwich. That portion of the river is a public navigable river, that is, the tide flows and reflows there, and the defendant is accused of obstructing the harbour or haven of Sandwich. Now there is no dispute that this is a public navigable river, that the soil is in the Crown, that the defendant has a wharf there, and that he has erected the works which I will mention more particularly, and which are complained of by the information. The defendant, it appears, fifteen, or at all events less than sixteen, years ago, acquired the wharf in question, now called Terry's Wharf, and at that time he did what was certainly illegal and entirely indefensible; what ways. By various Acts of Congress it is provided that all the navigable rivers within the United States territory shall be and remain public highways, and it must be remembered that there it is even more important than in this country, because the United States' rivers are navigable far away above the highest point to which the tide reaches, and form in many cases the principal means of communication from point to point. There, however, the question of the right to obstruct has usually arisen in cases where bridges have been erected across navigable rivers, and it has always been held that bridges if erected by and in accordance with State authority, so long as they were not a material obstruction to the navigation, might be erected. At the same time it is there universally held that obstructions to navigation whether by bridges or in any other manner, without direct authority from the legislature within whose jurisdiction the waters lie, are public nuisances: (see State of Pennsylvania v. The Wheeling Bridge Company, 13 How. (11 S. Sup. Ct.) 518; Williams v. Beardsey, 2 Carter (Ind.) 591; Knox v. Chaloner, 42 Maine, 150; Hart v. The City of Albany, 9 Wendell, 471; Angell on Watercourses, p. 743, et seq.) Before such an obstruction can become lawful, the erection or works causing it must be productive of public benefit greater than the injury.—ED.

no doubt many wharf owners do if they have the opportunity—he took in a portion of the river. It is clearly proved in evidence that there was a small creek or portion of the river between an old boat-house and a former wharf he bought, that he filled in this and extended his wharf, and literally took in a portion of the river. Nobody seems to have prevented him, and he remained, and has remained ever since, in quiet possession of the wharf as far as he has extended it. In addition to that, he put a campshore outside his newly formed wharf, which projected some two feet, as I understand it, beyond the wharf, and within a short distance of the campshore he put in some sloping piles, which in the evidence are called fender piles. This structure seems to have been as much unauthorised as the extension of the wharf.

Sandwich Harbour is, or ought to be, under the especial protection of the corporation, who have an Act of Parliament which was obtained in 1847, which, although not appointing them in form and in terms conservators of the river, really gave them much larger powers than ordinary conservators have of maintaining and improving the harbour. They do not seem to have been so much alive to the interests of the harbour fifteen or sixteen years ago as they are now. They allowed these encroachments to take place without objection or resistance, the natural result of which is that the defendant now thinks that it is a hardship when further encroachments are resisted, and I am not surprised at it. Recently, that is in the course of this year, the defendant thought he would improve his wharf, and I must say he seems to have acted bonâ fide, and in the belief that he had a right to do what he is doing. What he did was this, he took away the old campshore and piles, which having been there only fifteen years, it is not pretended that he had actually any right to—I do not mean to the piles themselves, or to the campshore—but to the maintenance of them in that particular place. The time required for prescription had not run, or anything like it, so that he had not acquired any right; but although he had not acquired any right, he seems to have considered that he had, and that if he did not by his new work do much more mischief to the navigation than the old work had done, he was entitled to erect the new work. Having taken away the old structures, he put in their place three very strong piles opposite his wharf, at a distance below of something under 3ft., but at the top they were 3ft. 3in., from the face of the wharf—that is, from the face of the wharf as he had formed it fifteen years ago. Upon this he was going to put some planking, or something of the kind, so as to make a platform. Upon this platform he intended to raise a structure of beams about 22ft. in height, and then he was going to put a sort of hut at the top, or an erection of that shape and appearance, which would project 4ft. 8in. over the river, and would be connected with his warehouse behind, which was no doubt a very convenient arrangement for carrying on his business, and the landing and carrying away of his goods. That is what he proposed to do, and which he partly executed by putting in the piles. It seems he had gone through the formality of asking the consent of the Corporation as being the recognised guardians of the public interest at this part of the town, and that permission had been refused. Thereupon he proceeded to do these works without permission, and the result was the filing of the present information.

Now, the information states the facts pretty well as I have stated them, but also refers to the towing path. I am not going to found my judgment on the towing path, and therefore I shall state nothing more about it. Then having stated the facts, it says that the defendant has commenced certain works and they are in progress, and that the width of the channel will be substantially diminished, and the navigation will be attended with difficulty; and, moreover, the yards and rigging of the vessels passing along the same will be in constant danger of coming in contact with, and getting entangled in, the defendant's platforms and other works, and the machinery and gear attached thereto, and under the circumstances aforesaid, the defendant's work will seriously interfere with and obstruct the public right to navigate the river, and will be to the damage and common nuisance of all Her Majesty's subjects using or exercising the same. And then the 9th paragraph says: "The works of the defendant are not yet completed, but he has made considerable progress therewith, and he persists in proceeding with the construction thereof in spite of the warnings of the corporation, and he will very shortly complete the same unless restrained by the injunction of this honourable court."

It appears to me the information is founded upon two complaints. The one complaint is that the obstruction caused by the erection of the structure of the defendant will be a nuisance in the common acceptance of the term—that is, will actually impede the navigation of the river; the other ground is this, that whether that be so or not, the defendant has no right to erect such structure, and he ought to be restrained by injunction quite independently of the fact of there being an actual nuisance or not. I think the information is entitled to succeed on both grounds.

Now, as regards the law upon the subject it is necessary to say a word or two, because an argument was addressed to me yesterday to this effect: it was said on the first ground, admitting that it is some nuisance—that is, some interference in the navigation; a little nuisance—as the counsel for the defendant stated to me to-day, yet the rights of the public as to restraining a nuisance are confined within reasonable limits, and that there may be such a public benefit arising from the works in question as would entitle the person or body erecting these works to say that the public benefit far more than counterbalance the small impediment to navigation which the works occasion, and for that some authorities were cited which I think it is well to notice. It was said that that had been decided in the well-known case of Rex v. Russell (sup.)

Now I must say that Rex v. Russell, in my opinion, is not law, and it is right to say so in the clearest terms, because it is not well that cases should be continued to be cited which have been virtually overruled, although the judges have not said so in express terms. In that case there had been some staiths erected in the river Tyne, and a very eminent judge of those days, Mr. Justice Bayley, in charging the jury had told them this—he pointed out that the staiths were erected simply for the purpose of carrying on trade. He said that "the staiths were not merely a private benefit, for that by means of them the coals were brought to market at a smaller expense, and in a better condition, in both which respects the public were benefited; and he then left to their decision the following questions:—"Were the staiths erected in a reasonable place? Was there a reasonable space left for the public navigation in the Tyne? Were the staiths a public benefit? Did the public benefit countervail the prejudice done to individuals? The jury said that in consequence of this direction they found the defendants 'Not guilty.'" That was brought before the full court, consisting of the same judge, Mr. Justice Bayley, and two other very eminent judges, Mr. Justice Holroyd and Lord Tenterden. Mr. Justice Bayley adhered to his own opinion; Mr. Justice Holroyd did not in terms agree to that; he did come to the conclusion that the verdict should not be disturbed, but, having stated the facts, he did not lay down the law quite in the same terms as Mr. Justice Bayley, but put it in rather wider terms as regards the public benefit. As I understand it, he only put the law to this extent, that the public benefit might possibly countervail the public injury, for really they are both public, so that, taking it on the whole, the public was benefited. Lord Tenterden disagreed. The case came, I cannot say under review, because it was before the same court, but came under discussion in the case of Rex v. Ward (sup.) Sir William Follett argued that case, and it was his interest to support the case of Rex v. Russell (sup.) as far as he could. The way he speaks of it in argument is this, "The doctrine of Rex v. Russell need not come under discussion, nor is there any conflict of authorities. Erections may be made in a harbour, below high water mark, and in places where vessels might perhaps have sailed; and the question whether they are a nuisance or not will depend on this, whether upon the whole they produce public benefit, not giving to the terms 'public benefit' too extended a sense, but applying them to the public frequenting the port." Now I take it that the statement in argument of Sir W. Follett of the law was a correct statement: it must not be given too extended a sense, and must be applied to the public frequenting the port. Lord Denman, in giving the opinion of the full Court of Queen's Bench, says: "The greatest weight is due to the authority of Mr. Justice Bayley, who thus charged the jury, and afterwards upheld his opinion in this court, and no person can hesitate to ascribe every quality of an excellent judge in Mr. Justice Holroyd, who agreed with him in thinking that the rule for a new trial for misdirection ought to be discharged. But when we examine the grounds of this opinion as delivered by the latter they will not be found to support in any degree the proposition noticed in the summing up," (that is—the summing up of Mr. Justice Bayley) "on the contrary, he plainly considers the topic to have been introduced as an answer to some observations invidiously made to the defendant's prejudice by the counsel who conducted the prosecution, and thinks that it must be qualified throughout the summing up, and even to its close, by its connection with that argument. Mr. Justice Bayley himself, who delivered his judgment after Mr. Justice Holroyd, takes a much wider range, maintaining the right to estimate the balance of public benefit and public inconvenience, and to take into the account of the former the advantages that may be derived from the change by any part of the public. He takes for an example the purchasers of coal sent from an indicted staith to a distant market. Lord Tenterden thought it wrong to submit such extensive views to the jury, and that the question ought simply to have been whether the navigation and passage of vessels over this public navigable river was injured by those erections." Now that is the final judgment, but there had been a previous judgment, a short judgment of Lord Denman, as to the whole of the case that goes into detail, and what he said was this: "My understanding at the trial certainly was that the question was much the same as that in Rex v. Russell, a case the authority of which has been much doubted, and is perhaps likely to be more so as it is further examined." So that it must be taken to have been the opinion of the full Court of Queen's Bench in Lord Denman's time that the summing up of Mr. Justice Bayley in Rex v. Russell (sup.), could not be supported; he does not say so in distinct and clear terms: it being the judgment of the same Court of Queen's Bench, I suppose he did not like to do so, but the effect of the judgment of the full court was, that they agreed with Lord Tenterden, and disagreed with Mr. Justice Bayley.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. TERRY.

What really were the points on which they disagreed? I think they were two, and I think on these two points the charge of Mr. Justice Bayley was erroneous. In the first place I think the benefit, whatever it is, must be a benefit, to the public who use the navigation, or, as was put by Sir William Foylett, "the public frequenting the port;" he allowed the benefit to the public in London, or in distant parts far away from the Tyne to be taken into consideration, and as I said before I think he was wrong in that. In the next place I think there was another error in the charge, because I think the benefit to the public must be a direct benefit. Now the benefit which he was considering was an indirect, and as it appears to me, too remote a benefit. It was that coals came to the London market in rather a better condition, and were possibly sold at a lower price. That does not appear to me to be a public benefit within the sense of the term in which it ought to be used when considering the question of nuisance.

Then it may be asked what is a public benefit in my view? I say it is a benefit of a similar nature showing that on the balance of convenience and inconvenience the public at that place not only lose nothing, but gain something by the erection. There are two cases in the books which will illustrate my meaning, and I think fairly show what sort of public benefit it is. The first is this: In the case of a tidal harbour of irregular shape, it may be desirable to straighten the sides, the result of which would be, of course, in the parts where you take away the water way, to diminish the area usable for navigation, and in those parts where you add to the water-way you would increase the area. If in the course of this straightening the whole of the harbour is made larger and more commodious, then I think the public benefit gained overbalances the public injury at the particular point where the navigable water is narrower, and in that sense that improvement of the harbour would not be a nuisance, and that is what I understand Lord Hale intends to say in the passage which has been referred to: (De Jure Maris, Part II., cap. 7; Hargreave's Law Tracts, p. 85.) Another case is this, which also appears in reported cases: Suppose you have a navigable river, and it is necessary to cross it by a bridge, and the river is too wide to allow of a bridge of a single span, you must then put one or more piers into the middle of the river, and, of course, according to the extent you introduce bridge piers or bridge arches into a navigable river, you to some extent diminish the water-way, and to some extent, perhaps to a more or less material extent, obstruct the navigation. But it is for the public benefit at that spot that a public road should be carried over the river by the bridge, and that benefit may so far exceed the trifling injury, if injury it be, to the navigation that on the whole a court of justice may fairly come to the conclusion that a public benefit of a much greater amount has been conferred on the public than the trifling injury occasioned by the insertion of the piers into the bed of the river. In that case also it would be a case of public benefit that would counterbalance the public injury. (a) I give those as illustrations, but I think it must be confined as put by Sir William Foylett in his argument to cases of public benefit, and not used in too extended a sense.

In this case, really, I have no evidence whatever of benefit to the public. The defendant is doing this for the purposes of his own trade; it is too remote a benefit to the public to say that the encouragement of the trade of a single individual is therefore a benefit to the public. It seems to me to be an extravagant use of the doctrine even had it been sound law as laid down by Mr. Justice Bayley in the case of Rex v. Russell (sup.), and therefore I cannot for a moment listen to the argument of the defendant on those grounds.

Is there a nuisance? Counsel for the defendant admitted a little nuisance, but I take it a little nuisance will do. The doctrine of the court is no doubt De minimis non curat lex; but that is something of a very trifling character. The instance given by Lord Cranworth in a case to which I am about to refer was merely putting in a single stake in the stream, something too trifling to bear discussion; but where there is really an interference with the navigation, of course it is not within that doctrine.

Then is there an interference? Upon that when you come to look at the facts there really does not seem to be much room for argument. I cannot consider the comparison which has been so often suggested, both in the evidence and in the argument, of the illegal state of things produced by the defendant before he constructed these works, and the state of things produced by the new works. I must look upon it that the defendant has not acquired a right to keep his campshore or his sloping piles there, and has chosen to remove them; that the case must be treated in exactly the same way as if they had never existed, and therefore the question is, whether erecting these piles and putting up this platform in this narrow river can, to a person of ordinary common sense, on the facts which I am about to state, be considered as an interference with the navigation. [His Honour examined the evidence as to the width and depth of the river; finding as a fact, that defendant's works materially lessened the width of the river at a point where vessels could only pass each other just about high water, and that there was therefore a material interference; that, although it was not shown that vessels had there come into collision, it was because they only passed each other at high tide, and continued:] I am of opinion that this is a material obstruction to the navigation, and would be indictable at law as a nuisance.

If it was necessary to rest my decision on that I should have no difficulty in doing so, but I do not think it is necessary. But there is another ground also, and a ground of very great importance, upon which I say the informant is entitled to a decree, and that is this, that no man has a right to put an obstruction in the bed of a navigable river. As I understand the law it is not an answer to say that at the moment the obstruction is not a nuisance. It may become so, a change may take place either in the mode of navigating the river, that is as regards the vessels using the river, or a new mode of constructing vessels be adopted, or a change may take place as regards the form of the harbour itself by removing an obstruction or otherwise, which might make that usable and navigable which was not before navigable. That is to say in a useful sense, and if you allow the obstruction to remain, you allow the person erecting the obstruction to obtain by law, by reason of the lapse of time, a right to keep the obstruction there, so that when the time arrives at which the obstruction really impedes the navigation, you will not be able to remove it. It is for that reason so important that a person complaining of the obstruction, though not able to maintain an indictment for nuisance, because the actual nuisance has not yet been committed, should be able to come to a court of equity and ask that court to restrain the continuance of the obstruction. This matter has been considered several times. I will refer to two cases on the point, though they do not actually relate to a public navigable river.

The first is the case of Bickett v. Morris (sup.) (14 L. T. Rep. N. S. 835.) That decided this, that in the case of a private river, where there were two riparian owners, each entitled to the soil ad medium filum aquæ, both entitled to the uninterrupted flow of water, that neither of these could erect on his own land any structure which might be eventually, though not then, an obstruction to navigation. Now, as Lord Westbury put it, this decision establishes the important principle that an encroachment on the alveus of a running stream may be complained of without the necessity of proving that damage had been sustained, or is likely to be sustained, the reason being that which I have given, that you cannot tell what may happen hereafter, and that the obstruction itself, being allowed to remain, will gain for the obstructor a prescriptive right. That was a Scotch case, but it was decided by English judges, and expressly on the ground that the Scotch and English law were the same. So it is an authority for English law. That is a case to a certain extent a fortiori, because there the man was erecting a structure on his own soil, the half bed of the river belonging to him. The point was considered as regards a navigable river in the case of the Attorney-General v. Lord Lonsdale (sup.) Vice-Chancellor Malins distinctly held that the same principle extends to the case of a navigable river as regards interfering with navigation; and that in a case where the rights of the Crown to the soil had passed by grant to the defendants, Lord Lonsdale being the owner of the whole soil of the river, having obtained a grant from the Crown. There again it was a more favourable case for the defendant, because he was doing it on his own soil. Here in the present case the defendant has no right to put a stake in the soil of the Crown; he has no right whatever. It is a trespass to interfere with the soil; it is something like an ouster to put on a permanent erection as he has done. He is in a much more unfavourable position than the defendant was in either of the cases to which I have referred; but in those cases it was said, even without proof of damage either sustained or likely to be sustained, you have a right to prevent that which may hereafter, under altered circumstances, become a nuisance, without proving that it is likely to become so. Here, as I said before, we have an a fortiori case; here is a case in which the defendant has been putting these things (they are called piles, they are structures of very great solidity and strength, very substantial structures indeed, with a platform above them) into the soil of a navigable river, where the soil belongs to the Crown; and I am not prepared to say that even if the nuisance had not been proved, there is no apprehension of a nuisance, because as to all the points that have been raised as to the other wharves, and so on, now erected, the nuisance may be got rid of by the owners of the other wharves putting back their wharves, or the Corporation compelling them to remove all their illegal encroachments. How is it to be limited? If this defendant, the wharfinger, can take away 3ft. so can his neighbours; they may all take away 3ft. each, and the whole line of the river, according to his theory, may be diminished 3ft. 3in., and a week after that they may fill up their wharf to the frontage, and take 3ft more, until finally they have appropriated all the river. If this sort of encroachment is not to be prevented I cannot see where it is to stop. It seems to me that the public body who have the guardianship of the river should apply to the Attorney-General to stop the encroachment at the beginning. It perhaps shows how very desirable it was to stop him at the very beginning, that this defendant thinks that now to be a hardship which he would not have considered a hardship if he had been stopped fifteen years ago when he first began these encroachments.

I have no hesitation in granting an injunction according to the prayer of this information in the terms of the first paragraph, and in ordering the defendant to pay the costs of the suit.

LATHAM v. THE CHARTERED BANK OF INDIA, AUSTRALIA AND CHINA.

V., a merchant in Bombay, consigned cotton to C. and Co., at Liverpool, per the Aurora, and drew a bill against it on C. and Co., which before acceptance, was sold to a bank. V. insured the cotton, and deposited the bills of lading and policy with the bank, with a letter of hypothecation, authorising the bank in case that bill or any other bills of his held by the bank should not be accepted or paid, to sell the cotton and recoup themselves. The letter of hypothecation made no mention of the policy.

V. shipped cotton on other vessels to W. and Co., and drew bills against it upon W. and Co., which were accepted by them and sold to the bank. The bank, at W. and Co.'s request (for value), deferred presenting their bills for payment at maturity. The ship Aurora with her cargo was burnt at sea, and the bank received from the insurance company the whole amount of the insurance money. C. and Co. failed before their acceptance matured.

V. and also W. and Co. failed, and the bills accepted by W. and Co. were not presented to them for payment.

Held, first, on the construction of the letter of hypothecation, that the bank had no claim on the policy moneys beyond the amount of C. and Co.'s acceptance, so as to apply the balance towards payment of the bills on W. and Co.

Secondly, that independently of that, they had, by agreeing not to present the bills accepted by W. and Co. for their payment at maturity released the estate of V., the drawer.

THE plaintiffs carried on business at Bombay as general merchants, under the firm of Finlay, Scott, and Co., and the principal defendants were the Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China. The bill prayed that the Bank might be declared to be trustees for the plaintiffs of the balance of certain policy money after the payment thereout to the Bank of the amount due on a bill of exchange then held by the Bank. The circumstances of the case were as follows :

In the month of April 1870, one Vullubjee, a native trader in Bombay, shipped 100 bales of cotton by the ship Aurora from Bombay to Liverpool, the cotton being consigned to Messrs. Coupland Brothers there, for sale on account of the shipper. Vullubjee drew a bill or bills of exchange against the cotton on Messrs. Coupland for 1200*l.* The cotton was insured by Vullubjee in the sum of 1700*l.* in the British and Foreign Marine Insurance Co., and upon the shipment he sold the bill of exchange before acceptance to the Bank, depositing with them at the same time the bills of lading and the policy of insurance, and also a letter of hypothecation, which so far as material, was as follows :

To the Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China.

Bombay, April 14, 1870.

Having this day sold to you three bills of exchange, drawn by me on Messrs. Coupland Brothers, of Liverpool, and at the same time handed to you as collateral securities for the due payment of the said bills, the bills of lading and shipping documents of the several goods. The agreement is understood to be as follows. . . .

I further authorise the Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China, or any manager or agent thereof, on default being made in acceptance on presentment, or in payment at maturity of any of the above bills, or on the drawee's suspension of payment during the currency of the bills, to sell the said goods, or a competent part thereof, and to apply the nett proceeds (after deducting usual commission and charges), in payment of such bills with re-exchange and charges, the balance, if any, to be placed against any other of my bills which may at the time be in the hands of the said bank, and subject other liability of me to the said bank, and subject thereto to be accounted for to the proper parties. In case the nett proceeds of such goods shall be insufficient to pay the amount of any such bills with re-exchange and charges, I authorise the Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China, or the holders thereof for the time being to draw on me for the deficiency, and I engage to honour such drafts on presentment, it being understood that the account current rendered by the said bank shall be acknowledged and allowed as sufficient proof of sale and loss.

Lastly, it is mutually agreed that the delivery of said collateral securities to your bank shall not prejudice your rights on said bills in case of dishonour, nor shall any recourse taken thereon affect the title of the bank to said securities, to the extent of my liability to your bank as above.

Your obedient servant,

JAITHA VULLUBJEE.

The bill of exchange was dated 14th April 1870.

In the month of October 1870, before the bill of exchange arrived at maturity, the firm of Messrs. Coupland Brothers stopped payment.

In the month of May 1870 Vullubjee shipped other cotton to Liverpool in the ships Western Belle and Canute, such shipments being consigned to Messrs. Haigh, Wilson, and Co. in England, against which Vullubjee drew two bills of exchange for 3000*l.* each, dated 6th May 1870. These bills also were sold to the bank, and the bills of lading thereof, together with letters of hypothecation similar to that of the 14th April, were deposited with the bank. Haigh, Wilson, and Co., failed to meet the acceptances, and the cotton on board the Western Belle and Canute was sold by the Bank, but the amount raised was not sufficient to cover the amount of the bills drawn against it.

The Aurora, with all her cargo, was burnt at sea, and the cotton on board her became a total loss.

Vullubjee consigned various other parcels of cotton by the Aurora to various persons in London and Liverpool, and being largely in debt to the plaintiffs and pressed by them for payment, he on the 18th Jan. 1871 gave to the plaintiffs a letter of assignment, as follows :

Bombay 18th January 1871

Messrs. Finlay Scott and Co. Bombay

Dear Sirs—In consideration of your now advancing me the sum of rupees five thousand (R. 5000) and with reference to the various claims on me and on my agents . . . of yourselves . . . and for payment of all which claims you have . . . at my request agreed to forego immediate legal proceedings against me . . . and to compromise all those claims for the sum of R. 75,000 secured and to be secured as follows namely Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co. already hold policies of insurance for £7900 effected by me in the various offices noted in margin on 250 bales of cotton per the late ship Aurora burnt at sea the proceeds of which when received after satisfying the drafts against these consignments (which drafts are not effected by or included in this letter) and which proceeds after such satisfaction are for the purposes of this letter and subject as hereinafter is mentioned taken to amount to the sum of R. 25,000 will be applied in reduction of the said sum of R. 75,000 thereby reducing the same to the sum of R. 50,000 and as security for the same I hereby assign to you the various policies of insurance particularised at the foot of this letter effected by me on goods per the said late ship and all the proceeds of and moneys recoverable and to be recovered on the said policies (subject nevertheless to all now existing legal charges and incumbrances on such policies proceeds or moneys) And I hereby direct the various persons in whose hands the said policies, proceeds or moneys now are or for the time being may be to account to you as the assignees thereof (subject as aforesaid) for the same respectively and I hereby authorise and empower you or Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co. or whomsoever else you may from time to time nominate for that purpose to collect and receive the same respectively in my name or in the name of my executors or administrators or legal representatives if thought desirable and I hereby agree to execute at your request a valid legal mortgage of the same policies proceeds and moneys with such covenant for payment and power of sale and other covenants and powers as you may desire and I declare that if the surplus proceeds of the said policies held by Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co. shall not amount to R. 25,000 (twenty-five thousand) then the balance shall be recoverable from any excess there may be in the proceeds of the policies particularised below over the sum of R. 50,000 and further that if these two sets of proceeds do not together realise to you R. 75,000 (seventy-five thousand) I am still liable for the balance of that sum—Yours truly

JAITHA VULLUBJEE.

The list of policies accompanying the letter included the policy for 1700*l.* effected in the British and Foreign Marine Insurance Company.

The two bills of exchange drawn by Vullubjee on Messrs. Haigh, Wilson, and Co. were accepted by them, and matured on the third Dec. 1870, but they, being unable to pay them at maturity, wrote to the bank the following letter:

Liverpool 3rd Dec 1870

To the Chartered Bank of India Australia and China, London

Gentlemen—We have to request that you will defer presentment for payment of our acceptances maturing to-day as follows viz

[Here followed four acceptances, which are immaterial]

£3000 drawn by Jaitha Vullubjee against 250 B/C per Canute

And in consideration of your so doing we hereby hold ourselves in every respect liable to you on account of the said acceptances as if the same had been regularly presented at due date as farther security for all our obligation to your bank we now hand you £750 as additional margin. It is understood that the cotton represented by the above-named shipments is to be sold under the supervision and control of your agent in Liverpool Mr John Scott and to whom our broker will have to account for the net proceeds and that should all our acceptances not be fully paid before the re-drafts on the respective native drawers for deficiencies are sent out such re-drafts are to be placed in your hands for collection and the proceeds to be held by you against any balance that may be due to the bank by us

HAIGH WILSON AND Co

The letter further stated that as further security for all their obligations Messrs. Haigh, Wilson, and Co. assigned to the bank all their interest in certain contracts, which were not specified.

In compliance with this request the bank deferred presentment of the two bills, and at the time of the filing of the bill they had not been presented or paid, Messrs. Haigh, Wilson, and Co. having failed. Vullubjee subsequently became bankrupt.

The British and Foreign Marine Insurance Company paid to the bank the sum of 1700*l.*, being the whole amount of the policy effected on the cotton shipped to Messrs. Coupland Brothers, in the Aurora, out of which the bank paid themselves the amount due on Messrs. Coupland's acceptance, thus leaving in the hands of the bank a balance of about 470*l.* The bank now claimed, under the letter of hypothecation of the 14th April 1820 to hold this balance of 470*l.* towards the discharge of the two bills drawn by Vullubjee on Haigh, Wilson, and Co., for 3000*l.* each.

The plaintiffs thereupon filed their bill, stating that there was a large sum due to them from Vullubjee's estate under the assignment of the 18th January 1871, and contending that Vullubjee's estate was not liable to the bank on the two acceptances of Messrs. Haigh, Wilson, and Co., and charging that, even if Vullubjee's estate had been liable thereon, it had been discharged by the agreement of the bank with Messrs. Haigh, Wilson and Co., the acceptors, to give them time for payment of the bills, such agreement being without Vullubjee's consent, and praying as above.

Kay, Q.C., and Ferrers, for the plaintiffs.—We are the second mortgagees of the policy under the letter of assignment of the 18th January 1861. The special power given by the letter of hypothecation of the 14th April 1870, in case of a sale of the cotton on board the Aurora, cannot be extended to a case where there was no sale at all, as was the case here, the cotton having been burnt. The letter of hypothecation refers only to proceeds of sale, which sale never took place. The letter of hypothecation does not even refer to the policy which was deposited only to meet the one bill of 1200*l.* drawn on Messrs. Coupland. The policy does not represent the goods insured: (Berndtson v. Strang, 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 154; L. Rep. 3 Ch. 588; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 40). But even if the bank are right in their construction of the letter of hypothecation, yet by giving time for payment of the two bills for 3000*l.* to Haigh, Wilson, and Co., for valuable consideration without the consent of Vullubjee, the drawer, they have released him: (Oriental Financial Corporation v. Overend, Gurney and Co., L. Rep. 7 Ch. 142; 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 813.)

Eddis, Q.C. and Westlake for the bank.—We submit that the money received on the policy is liable under the letter of hypothecation as the proceeds of sale would have been if a sale had taken place. The letter of hypothecation charges the shipping documents. That term would include the policy which had been deposited. Wherever a right to sell the goods would arise, as it arose here by the bills not being paid at maturity, the policy money must be taken to represent the goods which are not forthcoming. As to the alleged discharge of Vullubjee's estate, a mere promise not to sue on a bill does not discharge anyone. Here the bank were merely to defer presenting the bills on a given day. No time was fixed. They might have been presented the next day. The bank, as holders, had a perfect right to delay presenting the bills without any contract for that purpose, and this would not have altered the position of the drawers. The effect of the undertaking of Haigh, Wilson, and Co. was that they would hold themselves liable just as if the bills had been presented, and they merely desired not to have the bills protested. In Oriental Financial Corporation v. Overend, Gurney and Co., there had been a positive contract to give time. We are not seeking a remedy under the law merchant but upon the guarantee. They cited

Hitchcock v. Humphrey, 5 Man. & Gr. 559;
Walton v. Mascall, 13 M. & W. 452;
Murray v. King, 5 B. & Ald. 165;
Philpott v. Bryant, 4 Bing. 717;
Hall v. Cole, 4 Ad. & Ell. 577.

Kay, Q.C. in reply.—The policy is merely a contract of indemnity. The undertaking not to present a bill for an indefinite time is even more injurious to the drawer. There is no case showing that giving an indefinite time to the principal is not a discharge of the surety.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—It is a little surprising

V.C. B.]

LATHAM v. THE CHARTERED BANK OF INDIA, AUSTRALIA, AND CHINA.

that, out of one of the most ordinary mercantile transactions that can be, such a question as this should arise, and that it should be discussed at such length. I have listened very willingly, because the thing is not without its interests. The transaction is simply this: A shipper in India draws a bill on his consignees in England; he sells it in the market in India, and accompanies it with the bill of lading, which is the only shipping document that I know of; but it is stated that at the same time he deposited with the person who bought the bill of exchange of him a policy of insurance against damage by fire to the cargo.

Now, what is the meaning of that transaction, without stopping for a moment to consider the terms in which it is expressed? It is this, and this only; "I have shipped to England goods that are worth at least 1200*l.*, for which I have drawn; I give you by means of the bill of lading the power to secure to yourself the payment of that 1200*l.*, if the parties liable upon the bill do not pay." Is there anything more in the contract between the parties? Is any other sum than 1200*l.* in the contemplation of either of them—the man who buys or the man who sells the bill? It is impossible to say that anything else entered into their contemplation. The only use of the policy of insurance is to guard against any accident that may happen by which the value of the goods shipped should be diminished, and to insure to the holder of the bill that he shall have at least the value of the 250 bales of cotton which are shipped on board the ship.

That is the plain transaction, that is so stated in the answer. I do not wish to attach more importance to the words of the answer than really belongs to them, or endeavour to strain them beyond what I take to have been the true intention of the parties, and the true nature of this most ordinary mercantile transaction. The statement in the answer is, that at the same time the shipper handed to the bank as security for the payment of the said draft the bill of lading of the cotton and the policy of insurance. That is the real transaction between the parties, and the benefit of that to the full the defendants, the bank, have had. The letter of hypothecation, as it is called—and rightly enough so called—does not extend that in the slightest degree. [His Honour then read from the letter of hypothecation, and continued.] It is confined in its terms as well as it is confined entirely in its nature to those bills amounting to 1200*l.* and to those 250 bales of cotton which are mentioned in the document to which I have been referring. Upon what ground can it be said that, if by any accident beyond the terms of this contract a sum of money came into the hands of the Chartered Bank of India, Australia, and China, they were therefore at liberty to apply that in satisfaction of any debt which the Indian merchant might owe to them? There is no ground whatever for any such pretence. The contract is clear, plain, usual, ordinary, and open to no doubt or question. Nobody has questioned the right of the banks to have the bills in this memorandum satisfied, and they have been satisfied, not exactly in the mode here contemplated, but by means of the delivery to them of the policy of insurance, which was so delivered to them only that they might have the bills paid when they arrived at maturity. It would be putting a construction on these words wholly at variance, not only with the intention of the parties, but at variance with the very expressions themselves, if I were to hold that by means of this transaction—this letter of hypothecation and the policy of insurance against fire which accompanied it—they were entitled to any more than the very sum which was expressed in the bills of exchange.

The case might be decided upon that point, and upon that point alone. That would be enough to justify the plaintiffs in the demand which they now make. But another point has been suggested, and that is, the transaction with Haigh, Wilson, and Co. Messrs. Haigh, Wilson, and Co., having transactions with the bank, prevailed on the bank not to present for payment the particular bills. It is said that they desired to avoid the notoriety which might attend the protest. Why should the drawer of the bill be prejudiced by that? If that was convenient as between the bank and Haigh, Wilson, and Co., they might settle that for themselves, but that the memorandum, which is set out in the answer, is a plain agreement on the part of the bank to postpone for an indefinite time the payment of the money due on the acceptance, according to the tenor of it, no one who reads it can doubt. The agreement is this: [His Honour read the letter of the 3rd Dec. 1870.] Now, if it is said that no definite time is to be gathered from this document, although I admit that there is no particular day or month or year mentioned in it, it is quite clear that it is a contract that they will not enforce payment of the particular acceptances until the redrafts have been made for the deficiency upon the native merchant, and the result of those drafts shall be ascertained, and in the meantime the drafts themselves are pledged to or placed in the hands of the bank for collection by them of the moneys for which they are drawn. Then it goes on, "As further security for all our obligations to the bank we assign to you all our interest" in certain contracts, which are not explained. That comes within the ordinary rule, a rule, as I understand it, without exception, that if the holder of a bill, having the right to present it, and the duty of presenting it as far as the drawer is concerned, when it arrives at maturity, neglects to do so, and gives time to the person, the acceptor, who ought to pay the bill, he thereby discharges the drawer. That is a rule most reasonable and just in itself, when you consider the consequences which it may have upon the drawer, and how his position may be grievously altered, not only by the neglect, but by the contract which the bank chose to enter into upon this occasion. I think upon that ground also the plaintiffs would be entitled to that which they ask by their bill.

Now, cases were referred to in answer to this part of the case, which I cannot help thinking have no real bearing upon it; cases, I mean, of collateral security. If a man has by an independent and separate contract agreed that, in a particular event, namely, in the event of the non-payment of a sum of money at a particular time, he will be answerable for that money, what has that to do with any formalities that may have been neglected or not properly enforced in the way of presenting the bills, if there were bills in the case, or giving time for the payment of the money if that had been done. It is a plain collateral security in every one of the cases which Mr. Eddis mentioned to me. The judgment of the court goes upon the terms, tenor, and effect of the collateral security, and excludes from the operation of that security all extraneous circumstances, and all that is not referable to the plain express contract between the parties. The policy of insurance I take to have been, not only from the words which are used, but in its very nature, simply a security that the bills [i.e., Coupland's] should be paid when they became due. They have been paid after they became due. The whole demand of the bank in respect of those bills, all that was contemplated by the letter of hypothecation, has been accomplished. The bank have had all they contracted, and are entitled to have, and to say that the proceeds of the policy of insurance are to stand instead of the goods, is in contradiction of that principle of law which I gather from Berndtson v. Strang (ubi sup.), where the main purport of the decision is, to point out clearly that the goods themselves and the policy effected in respect of damage which might happen in respect of those goods, are in their nature distinct, and are not to be confounded, and that one is not to be taken for the other. The same thing is equally apparent here. There is no connection not only in the expressions in the documents referred to, but there is no connection in right, or reason, or in fair justice in an ordinary mercantile transaction, between the policy of insurance, which was only to effect the payment of the bills, or provide the means of paying the bills, and the surplus which, if the goods had arrived safely and had been sold, the Bank might have made some claim to.

THE RONA—THE AVA.

In my opinion the plaintiffs succeed in their demand, and they are entitled to the 470*l.* which is the balance of the policy of insurance, and for which alone the bill was filed.

THE RONA—THE AVA.

Collision—Speed—Lights obscured by steamer's smoke—Duty to stop and ascertain course.

It is negligence on the part of a steamer to go at full speed under steam and sail before the wind whilst her smoke is blown over her bows so as to obscure her lights and to prevent her from seeing and from being seen by other ships approaching from an opposite direction.

Where a steamship is approaching another, whose exact course cannot be at once ascertained by reason of her lights being obscured by her own smoke, it is the duty of the former to slacken speed and to wait till that course is ascertained before taking any decided step to avoid the other vessel; if, before having ascertained the exact course of the other, she, without slackening speed, executes a manœuvre, which, although appearing to be right at the time, contributes to the collision, she will be to blame.

THESE were appeals from decrees of the Hon. Henry John Ball, the acting judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court of Hong Kong, in cross causes of damage lately pending in that court, brought by the appellants, the owners of a steamship called the Rona, against the steamship Ava, of which the respondents were owners, and by the respondents against the owners of the Rona, for the recovery of damages in respect of losses sustained by the respective parties by reason of a collision between the said two vessels.

The collision happened at about 7.40 p.m. on the 14th April 1872, about twenty miles S.S.W. of Turnabout Island, on the east coast of China.

The Rona was an iron paddle wheel steamer of 784 tons register, and 150 horse power, and was proceeding from Shanghai to Swatow with cargo and passengers.

The Ava is an iron screw steamer of 1902 tons, French register (over 3000 tons English), and was one of the French mail packets, and was carrying the mails from Hong Kong to Shanghai.

There were no pleadings in the court below, but each party filed a preliminary act, setting out the facts as here given.

The facts of the case, as appearing by the evidence of the appellants, were, that the Rona, under steam and sail, was steering S.S.W. by compass (S.W. by S. $\frac{1}{2}$ S. true), and proceeding at the rate of about ten knots an hour, with a bright light exhibited at her mast head, and a green light on her starboard side, and a red light on her port side, all burning brightly—that the night was bright and clear—that the wind was blowing a gale from N.E. by E., carrying the smoke of the Rona over her starboard bow; the smoke was spread out over the water by catching the foresail—that a good look out was kept on board the Rona—that the three lights of the Ava were seen a little before the starboard beam of the Rona, distant about 300 or 400 yards (eighteen or twenty seconds before the collision)—that the helm of the Rona was immediately put hard a-starboard, but that the Ava, with her stem struck the Rona with great violence at her starboard forward gangway, and did her so much damage that she very soon afterwards foundered and was lost, with a number of those on board her. Those on board the Rona had been unable to see the Ava sooner owing to the smoke from the funnel of the Rona being carried by the wind over her starboard bow.

The case made by the respondents by their evidence was, that the Ava was steaming at the rate of from ten to eleven knots, steering N. 41 degrees E. by compass (N. 51° E. true), with her proper masthead and side lights up; that the officer in charge of her saw on the horizon and on the port bow of the Ava what resembled a shower of rain, and, shortly afterwards smelling smoke, supposed that the object which he saw was a steamer, and caused the helm of the Ava to be ported; the smoke then appeared to be from two to three miles away; that he afterwards saw the white light only of the Rona, distant about 700 or 800 metres (about a mile), and about three points on the Ava's port bow; and then caused the helm of the Ava to be put hard aport. This brought the white light of the Rona $4\frac{1}{2}$ points on his port bow, and in about a minute and a half he saw the green light of the Rona at a distance of about half a mile, and about $5\frac{1}{2}$ points on his port bow; he at once ordered the engines of the Ava, which until then had been kept going ahead full speed, to be stopped and reversed, but that the collision ensued. At the time of the collision the head of the Ava was E. by N. by compass, (E. true). The smoke of the Rona prevented her lights being sooner seen from the Ava.

The learned acting judge of the court below (who was assisted by Capt. Hewlett, R.N., and Capt. J. B. Barnett, R.N. as assessors), pronounced the collision to have been wholly occasioned by the fault of the Rona, and decreed accordingly.

The reasons of the learned acting judge for the conclusion at which he arrived, as appearing in the judgment, were as follows:

First, that there was want of proper care and caution on the part of the Rona in carrying sail and maintaining such a high rate of speed when her lights and those of any vessel approaching from the opposite direction would obviously be obscured by her smoke.

Secondly, that there was neglect, in not porting the helm of the Rona at the instant of seeing the Ava's lights. That the case was one of vessels meeting nearly end on, each having the other (according to calculation) not more than a point on the bow.

Thirdly, that was further neglect, on the part of the Rona, in not causing her engines to be stopped when danger was imminent.

Fourthly, that no blame attached to the Ava.

From these decrees the owners of the Rona, appealed, for the following (amongst other) reasons:—

1. Because the learned acting judge of the court below erroneously held that the vessels were meeting nearly end on.

2. Because the evidence proved that the two vessels were brought into dangerous proximity by the porting of the helm of the Ava, and that there would not have been any collision if the helm of the Ava had not been ported.

3. Because the officer in charge of the Ava acted without due care and caution, in porting the helm of the Ava, before he had ascertained the course and position of the Rona, and when the Ava was in fact on the starboard side of the Rona.

4. Because there was negligence on the part of those in charge of the Ava in not easing the speed of the Ava when or soon after the smoke of the Rona was seen, and in not stopping and reversing the engines of the Ava in due time.

5. Because the sail and speed of the Rona did not cause or contribute to the collision.

6. Because the evidence proved that porting the helm of the Rona, when the Ava's lights were first seen, would not have been proper, and would not have had the effect of avoiding the collision.

7. Because stopping the engines of the Rona, at the time indicated by the learned acting judge of the court below, would not have avoided the collision, and would not have been proper.

8. Because the evidence proved that the collision was not occasioned by any negligence on the part of those in charge of the Rona.

Milward, Q.C. and Clarkson, for the appellants.

—These were not meeting ships within the meaning of Rule 13 of the Regulations for preventing Collisions at Sea, as explained by Orders in Council of the 30th July 1868; there was more than a point and a half divergence between their respective courses. They were crossing vessels, and the Rona having the Ava on her own starboard hand, was bound to keep out of the way (Rule 14), and the Ava was bound to keep her course (Rule 18). This she neglected to do, and violated the rule by porting her helm. Moreover, she ported before she could have known in any way what was the course of the Rona; this was improper; she ought to have slackened speed and waited until she had ascertained the other's course before taking any decided step. Again, the Ava was wrong in continuing to port on seeing the white light of the Rona; she ought to have continued her then course, and not to have gone round in a circle. If she had done so the Rona would have crossed her bows in safety.

The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C.) and R. E. Webster, for the respondents. The Rona was to blame for coming down before the wind at such a speed, whilst her own and other vessel's lights were obscured by her smoke. The porting the helm of the Ava in the first instance was right, because it was the duty of the Ava to discover the course of the other ship, and, the smoke being on her port bow, the port of her helm would carry her clear of it, and enable her to make out the other ship. Stopping or easing the engines would have involved the risk of bringing the other ship down upon the Ava, and starboarding the helm would, as the Ava's watch supposed, have been crossing the Rona's course. There was no duty cast upon the officers of the Ava after they had once taken the proper steps to avoid the collision; having ported they were not bound to stop and reverse.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 6.—The judgment of the court was delivered by Sir BARNES PEACOCK:—These are appeals from two decrees of the learned judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court of Hong Kong, pronounced against the appellants, in two causes of damage promoted in that court, one by the present appellants, the owners of the steamship Rona, against the steamship Ava, the other by the present respondents, the owners of the steamship Ava against the present appellants, the owners of the Rona. The Rona was a paddlewheel steamer of 784 tons and 150 horse-power, belonging to the Union Steam Navigation Company of Shanghai, and was on a voyage from Shanghai to Swatow, with passengers and cargo. The Ava was one of the French mail packets, a screw steamer of upwards of 3000 tons (English), belonging to the Messageries Maritimes, and was carrying the mails from Hong Kong to Shanghai.

The suits arose out of a very lamentable accident, caused by a collision of the two vessels, which took place about 7.40 on the evening of the 14th April 1872, in the Formosa Channel, on the east coast of China, about 20 miles south-west of Turnabout Island, and 20 miles north-east of Ocksen. Each of the parties contended that the collision was caused solely by the fault of the other. There were no pleadings in the suits, but each party filed a preliminary act, which is set out at page 5 of the record. The two causes were heard together upon the same evidence, which was taken orally in open court. The learned judge was assisted by two nautical assessors, to whom, after hearing the evidence, he submitted two questions:—"1. Was there such negligence or want of ordinary care or caution on the part of the Ava, the Rona, or both, as, but for such negligence or want of care or caution, the collision would not have occurred? 2. Was the collision, in your judgment, occasioned by inevitable accident, understanding by the term inevitable accident whether the collision could not possibly have been prevented by proper care and seamanship, under the particular circumstances of the case?" and he further asked the nautical gentlemen, if they answered the first question affirmatively, to be pleased to state what, in their opinion, such negligence or want of care or caution consisted.

It may be convenient to deal with the second question first, and to state that their Lordships concur entirely with the opinions of the learned judge and of the two assessors, that the collision was not the result of inevitable accident. They will now proceed to consider the first question—whether there was negligence on the part of the Rona, or of the Ava, or of both.

Their Lordships are of opinion that the Rona was to blame in maintaining such a high rate of speed when she was aware that her own lights and those of any approaching vessel would be, as they in fact were, obscured by the smoke from her own funnel. It was proved by Henry Archibald McInnes, her own master, that from 4 p.m. to the time of collision, they were going at from 9 to 10 knots an hour. He said, "We went very regularly, and kept up the same pace all through." The officer of the watch, the chief officer, the engineer on watch, the two look-out men, and all those who were on the deck of the Rona at the time when the Ava was sighted, were unfortunately lost when the Rona went down. There was, therefore, no one at the trial who could speak as to the nature of the look-out on board that vessel. It may fairly be assumed, as against the Rona, that a good look-out was kept, and that it was in consequence of the smoke which obscured her view that the Ava was not sighted until the time at which the signal whistle was sounded, about 18 or 20 seconds before the collision. If, however, the Ava might have been seen in time, if a good look-out had been kept on board the Rona, and was not seen, or, being seen, the Rona did nothing to avoid the collision, there was equally negligence on the part of those on board the Rona, and such negligence contributed to the accident. The learned judge held that the case was one of two vessels meeting "end on," each vessel having the other not more than a point on the bow; and that there was neglect on the part of the Rona in not porting her helm; from which their Lordships understand him to mean that the case was one falling within Article 13 of the Sailing Rules of the 9th Jan. 1863. By that article it is laid down:—"If two ships under steam are meeting end on or nearly end on, so as to involve risk or collision, the helms of both shall be put to port, so that each may pass on the port side of the other." The rule is explained by the Order of Her Majesty in Council of the 30th July 1863. It was there said: "The said two articles, numbers 11 and 13 respectively, only apply to cases where ships are meeting end on or nearly end on, in such a manner as to involve risk of collision. They consequently do not apply to two ships which must, if both keep on their respective courses, pass clear of each other. The only cases in which the said two articles apply are when each of the two ships is end on or nearly end on to the other; in other words, to cases in which, by day, each ship sees the mast of the other in a line or nearly in a line with her own, and, by night, to cases in which each ship is in such a position as to see both the side lights of the other. The said two articles do not apply, by day, to cases in which a ship sees another ahead crossing her own course, or, by night, to cases where the red light of one ship is opposed to the red light of the other, or where the green light of one ship is opposed to the green light of the other, or where a red light without a green light, or a green light without a red light is seen ahead, or where both green and red lights are seen anywhere but ahead."

There can be no doubt, even if the additional rules had not been made, that rule 13 would not properly apply to a case such as the present, for their Lordships are of opinion that it must be taken on the evidence that the Rona, when her smoke was first seen by the Ava, was steering S.S.W. by compass, and that the Ava was then steering N. 41° E. by compass, which may be taken as somewhere between N.E. and N.E. by N. It is clear that two vessels so steering could not be considered as vessels each having the other not more than a point on her bow, or as meeting end on within the meaning of the rule. But however this may be, it cannot be held that the vessels were within the 13th rule when neither of them could see the other, and when they were at such a distance from each other as by the evidence they are described to have been when the Ava first saw the smoke. The vessels were clearly not within the rule when the Ava first saw the white light, or when almost immediately afterwards she saw the green light of the Rona and when, as it is to be concluded from the evidence, the Rona could not see the Ava; nor were they within the rules when the Rona first sighted the Ava, about 18 or 20 seconds before the collision, and when, from the evidence, it appears that all the lights of the Ava were seen, and when she was about a point before the starboard beam of the Rona, and only 300 or 400 feet from her.

The fault on board the Rona was not in not porting her helm, in obedience to the 13th rule before she saw the Ava, or when she saw the three lights of the Ava almost on her starboard beam. It is clear that at that time the vessels were not meeting end on or nearly end on. The fault of the Rona was in proceeding, at the rate of 9½ or 10 knots an hour when she could not from her own smoke see, and when she must have known that she could not be properly seen by other vessels.

The next question to be considered is, whether there was any fault or negligence on the part of the Ava which contributed to the accident. The learned judge, concurring in opinion with the two assessors by whom he was assisted, held that there was not. One of the assessors in his answer, says:—"Although the Ava appears to have acted right in porting her helm, the question naturally occurs—'she should have slackened her speed when the white light appeared, in accordance with section 16? I am of opinion that this would not have been right under the circumstances, for her officer of watch having seen the smoke of the Rona for some time previous, would know, when he saw the mast-head light, that she was coming in his direction, and would assume that she, the Rona, would, on seeing his lights, port her helm, and that, therefore, if he slackened speed he would be increasing the chance of collision."

Their Lordships cannot concur in the opinion of the learned judge that the Ava was free from all blame. The Ava, according to her own account, was going at, at least, $8\frac{1}{2}$ knots when she first saw the smoke of the Rona. The second captain in his evidence says,—at first it resembled a shower of rain 15 deg. or 20 deg. on his port bow. In about a minute or a minute and a half he smelt smoke, and, supposing it might be a steamer, he ported his helm a little; that his first impression was that it was $2\frac{1}{2}$ or 3 miles distance, but at that time he could only estimate it approximately. Afterwards, and when he had ported a little more, he saw a white light through his glass three points on the port bow, about a mile or 700 or 800 metres off. He then ordered his helm hard-a-port, considering that in doing so he was conforming to the regulations. It appears to their Lordships that in this construction of the regulation he was mistaken. The ships at that time were not, according to his own showing, end on, or nearly end on within the meaning of the rule. It appears to their Lordships that when he first saw the smoke and had reason to believe it was caused by a steamer, he ought to have slackened his speed, for he could not tell whether the steamers were end on or nearly end on, or whether they were passing or crossing, or at what rate of speed the Rona was going. It is clear from the position and bearing of the two vessels at the time of the collision, taking them according to the evidence of the Ava's own witnesses, that the Rona must have crossed from port to starboard the line of the Ava's course, that is to say, the course which the Ava was taking at the time when she first knew that the smoke was the smoke of a steamer on her port bow. At that time the Ava, as already pointed out, was steering N. 51 deg. E. true, or N. 41 deg. E. by compass, or between N. E. and N. E. by N., whereas at the time of the collision she was, according to the evidence of her own second captain, heading E. by N. by compass, or true course east. In this he was corroborated by the pilot on board the Rona. The second captain says, "At the time of the collision I did not see the compass, but I think I was three to four points to starboard of my course; that would be E. by N. by compass—true course E. The Rona's head would be S.E. by E. Judging from the position of the Rona's head, and her coming down channel, she must have been starboard sometime. To shift the Ava's helm from hard-a-port to hard-a-starboard would take $1\frac{1}{2}$ to 2 minutes." See his evidence in answer to the Assessors' questions, page 28 of the Record, line 30. The pilot on board the Rona says, "The course of the Ava when I first saw her was E. southerly as far as I could judge." It is evident that if the Ava had kept her course and slackened her speed, instead of porting in the first instance and afterwards putting her helm hard-a-port when she saw the white light of the Rona, the collision would not have occurred as it did after the Rona had crossed the line of the Ava's original course.

If the Ava, when she first saw the white light of the Rona, almost immediately before she saw the green light, had known what were the real position and bearing of that vessel, it would certainly have been a wrong manœuvre to put her helm hard-a-port. If it be said on the part of the Ava that at that time the Rona was nearly enveloped in her own smoke, the answer is that if from the first the Ava had slackened her course until she knew what the real position of the Rona was, she need not have been in a position of having to make any manœuvre in ignorance of the real state of things. The second captain of the Ava says, "I could not tell which way the steamer was going; it was impossible to form any opinion when I saw nothing but a cloud."

After considering the whole of the evidence attentively, their Lordships have arrived at the conclusion that the Ava was in fault in not slackening her speed, and waiting to ascertain, before she ported her helm, what was the real position of the Rona.

For the above reasons their Lordships are of opinion that each of the vessels was in fault, and that the fault of each contributed to the accident.

They will therefore humbly advise Her Majesty in Council, that the decree of the Vice Admiralty Court in each of the causes be reversed; that it be declared that both vessels were in fault, and that such fault contributed to the accident, and that a decree be made in each case accordingly.

Looking at all the circumstances of the case, and considering that each of the parties was to blame, their Lordships are of opinion that each ought to bear their own costs in the court below and of these appeals.

Their Lordships have only to add that the view which they have taken of this case is entirely in concurrence with the opinions of the nautical gentlemen by whom they have been assisted, and of whose great experience and practical knowledge in cases of this nature they have had the benefit.

Appeal allowed and decrees reversed.

MERCHANT SHIPPING COMPANY v. ARMITAGE.

Ship and shipping—Charter-party—Lump freight—Loss of part of cargo by perils of the sea without the fault of shipowner—Right to recover full amount of lump freight.

A charter-party provided that the ship should load a full cargo at Colombo or Cochin, and proceed to London and there discharge (fire, and all other dangers of the seas, rivers and navigation excepted); "a lump sum freight of 5000l. to be paid after entire discharge and right delivery of the cargo in cash two months after the date of the ship's report inwards at the Custom House."

The cargo having taken fire on the homeward journey, it was found necessary to scuttle the ship in Table Bay, and a large part of the cargo which had been injured by the fire and water was there sold. The voyage was then resumed, and the remainder of the cargo was delivered in London. The charterers having refused to pay the whole of the lump sum of 5000l.,

Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench), that the shipowners were entitled, notwithstanding the non-delivery of the entire cargo, to the payment of the lump sum of 5000l., but (reversing the judgment of that court) that they were not entitled to interest.

ERROR from the Queen's Bench in an action brought for the recovery of 1152l. 18s. 1d., and interest as hereinafter mentioned. By the consent of the parties, and by the order of Channell, B., dated the 2nd April 1873, according to the Common Law Procedure Act 1852, the following case was stated for the opinion of the court without any pleadings:

1. The plaintiffs are a company carrying on business as shipowners in the City of London, and were, and are, the owners of the ship Clyde, hereinafter mentioned, and the defendants are merchants, carrying on business at Colombo and London.

2. On the 25th Jan. 1872, the ship was lying in the harbour at Colombo, and upon that day the charter-party hereafter set out was made and entered into by Edward Shrewsbury, the master of the said ship, on behalf of the plaintiffs and the defendants. The charter-party was as follows:

Colombo, 25th Jan. 1872.

It is this day mutually agreed between Edward Shrewsbury, of the good ship or vessel called the Clyde, classed A1 in Lloyds, of the register tonnage of 1151 tons, or thereabouts, now lying in the harbour of Colombo, whereof he is the master, on the one part, and Messrs. Armitage Brothers, of Colombo, merchants, on the other part. That the said ship being tight, staunch, and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, shall with all convenient speed load here or sail and proceed to Cochin (orders to be given on or before the 29th inst.), and if ordered to Cochin, there load from the said charterers or their agents, completing at Colombo or Tuticorin, if so required by charterers, a full and complete lading of legal merchandise, which full and complete lading, the captain binds himself to receive on board and properly stow, but not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry, over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions, and furniture, and being so loaded, shall therewith proceed to London, in the East or West India Docks, and discharge there as customary. The act of God, restraints of princes and rulers, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other of the seas, rivers, and navigation, of whatever nature and kind soever, during the said voyage, always excepted. A lump sum freight of £5000 to be paid after entire discharge and right delivery of the cargo in cash two months after the date of the ship's report inwards at the Custom House, or under discount at 5 per cent. per annum (or at the bank rate, if higher) at option of charterers' agents. Thirty-five working days are to be allowed the said charterers, if the vessel be not sooner despatched for loading, to commence and be continued from the time of the vessel having a clear hold and ready for that purpose, the master giving charterers or their agents written notice twenty-four hours in advance to that effect, and the charterers to have the option of keeping the vessel fifteen working days on demurrage, paying 20l. per day, to be paid to the master day by day. All goods to be brought to the vessel and taken from alongside at the risk and expense of the freighters; the master to sign bills of lading at any rate of freight required, without prejudice to this charter-party, but should the aggregate freight by bills of lading amount to less than the lump sum of 5000l. already stipulated for, the difference to be deducted from the amount to be drawn for disbursements, and the balance, if any, to be paid in cash at the rate of Exchange for sight bills existing at the time of the ship's clearing in Colombo. The owners of the ship to have an absolute lien on the cargo for the amount of freight stipulated for, except as to the captain's draft for disbursements and commission as before mentioned in case of default. And it is hereby agreed that the charterers are to furnish cash for the disbursements of the ship at port of loading at current rate of exchange, not exceeding 750l., free of interest, but subject to a commission of 2½ per cent. and cost of insurance, for the due appropriation of which the charterers are not to be held responsible, and for which and agency commission the master shall give his draft on the owners, payable in London at sixty days' sight, and in the event of the bill not being accepted or paid at maturity, the amount to be deducted from freight at settlement thereof, together with interest and cost insurance. The ship to be consigned to owner's agents in London, and in case of the vessel having to put into the Mauritius, the vessel to be consigned to Messrs. Blyth, Brothers, and Co., there, or to Messrs. Thompson, Watson and Co., at the Cape of Good Hope. A survey certificate to be supplied by the captain (if required) to the effect that the vessel is in every way fitted to carry a dry and perishable cargo to any port in the world. The captain to carry cargo for charterers' benefit in any cabin, store room, or other place not absolutely required for use during the voyage. The charterers to have the option of appointing their own stevedore at the expense of the master, but at not exceeding current rates; but the captain is not thereby relieved of the responsibility regarding the proper stowage of his vessel. The captain and charterers to be at liberty to add any clause to this charter-party by mutual consent, without prejudice to this agreement. In default of performance of this agreement it is hereby mutually agreed that the amount of freight herein agreed for to be paid and taken as liquidated damages for such default.

E. SREWSBURY.

ARMITAGE BROTHERS.

3. In accordance with the orders of the defendants the said ship proceeded to the port of Cochin, and was there put up by the defendant as a general ship, and loaded with a full and complete cargo, the property of various merchants, which cargo was shipped under several bills of lading, signed by the captain upon the orders of the defendants. The total amount of the bill of lading freight was estimated by the charterers at 4995l. 10s. 6d., and was payable in London on delivery of the goods there.

4. The said ship, with the said cargo on board, sailed from the said port of Cochin upon her voyage to London under the said charter-party, and on the 2nd May 1872 the said cargo was found to be on fire. The master of the said ship, after attempting ineffectually to extinguish the fire at sea, put into Table Bay, which was the nearest port of refuge, and, after a survey, it was found expedient, in order to extinguish the fire, to scuttle the said ship, as it was deemed that the said fire could not be otherwise extinguished. The said ship was scuttled in Table Bay, and the said fire was thereby extinguished.

5. After the said fire had been extinguished the water was pumped out, and the greater portion of the cargo was unladen, and as a large quantity thereof was greatly injured by fire and water, surveyors, as customary, were called, and the surveyors pronounced a great part of the said cargo unfit for reshipment, and it was, therefore, ordered to be sold, and it was sold accordingly and the proceeds thereof were paid into the hands of the plaintiffs, who have since accounted for the same to the owners of the goods sold.

6. The remainder of the said cargo was reloaded on board the said ship, and on the 9th June 1872, the said ship having undergone some repairs, resumed her voyage to London with the remainder of the said cargo on board, and with no other cargo, and arrived in port and proceeded to the West India Docks, and on the 12th Aug. 1872, was reported inwards at the Custom House.

7. The bill of lading freights upon the cargo which arrived in London have been received by the plaintiffs, and amount to the sum of 3482*l.* 7*s.* 10*d.*, and the defendants advanced to the master at Cochin the sum of 364*l.* 14*s.* 1*d.* for disbursements of the said ship, making together the sum of 3847*l.* 1*s.* 11*d.*, but the defendants have not paid the plaintiffs the sum of 1152*l.* 18*s.* 1*d.*, being the balance of the said lump freight of 5000*l.*, mentioned in the said charter-party, and refused to pay the same to the plaintiffs.

The court may draw inference of fact.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the plaintiffs are entitled to payment by the defendants of the balance of the said sum of 5000*l.* under the said charter-party, after giving credit for the said aggregate sum of 3847*l.* 1*s.* 11*d.* which has been received by them on account thereof? If the court shall be of opinion in the affirmative, the judgment shall be entered up for the plaintiffs for the balance of the lump freight of 5000*l.*, viz., 1152*l.* 18*s.* 1*d.*, with costs of suit. And if the court shall be further of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to interest, then for a further sum for interest to be calculated for such period at such rate and by such person as the court may direct. If the court shall be of opinion in the negative, then judgment with costs of defence shall be entered up for the defendants.

The Court of Queen's Bench were of opinion that the plaintiffs were entitled to payment by the defendants of the balance of the said sum of 5000*l.*, viz., 1152*l.* 18*s.* 1*d.*, and also to interest on the sum of 1152*l.* 18*s.* 1*d.* at the rate of 5 per cent. from the 12th Oct. 1872, and gave judgment accordingly, (See ante, p. 51.) On this judgment error was brought.

The plaintiffs' points for arguments were: first, that by the terms of the charter-party the lump freight of 5000*l.* became payable without reference to the amount of the cargo delivered; second, that the ship having been chartered by the defendants for a lump sum for a certain voyage, and by them put up as a general ship, any amount of 5000*l.* which she had earned on the voyage would have belonged to the defendants, and as there has been a loss upon the voyage, it must fall upon them, and not upon the plaintiffs; thirdly, that the lump sum of 5000*l.* was by the terms of the charter-party payable for the use and hire of the ship.

The defendants' points were: first, that the sum of 5000*l.* was payable for the carriage and delivery of the cargo, and not merely for the performance of the voyage by the ship; secondly, that the said lump freight did not become due because there was not a delivery of the cargo; thirdly, that no action lies on the charter-party for the said lump freight, because it did not become due under the charter-party; fourthly, that the plaintiffs can recover only on an implied assumpsit for a quantum meruit; fifthly, that enough money has been paid to satisfy the claim of the plaintiffs.

Watkin Williams, Q.C. (with him M. Leod), for the defendants, contended that the lump freight was not, under the terms of the charter-party, earned by the plaintiffs because there was not a delivery of the entire cargo, the words of the charter-party being "a lump sum freight of 5000*l.* to be paid after entire discharge and right delivery of the cargo in cash two months after the date of the ship's report inwards, &c." Subsequent clauses of the charter-party show that the 5000*l.* was not to be paid by way of hire or rent of the ship for a given time, or for several services, but was a lump sum which the charterers agree shall be the minimum amount of the freight to be earned, thus: "the master to sign bills of lading at any rate of freight required without prejudice to this charter-party, but should the aggregate freight by bills of lading amount to less than the lump sum of 5000*l.* already stipulated for, the difference to be deducted from the amount to be drawn for disbursements, and the balance, if any, to be paid in cash at the rate of exchange for sight bills existing at the time of the ship's clearing in Colombo." The "balance" referred to here means the difference between the bill of lading freight and the charter-party freight, minus the disbursements. The 5000*l.* was not agreed to be paid for the voyage: the charter-party was, in fact one of a speculative character, the charterers being willing to run a certain risk. It is submitted that the 5000*l.* was freight in the strict sense of the term, and consequently was not earned as to the goods destroyed, and, therefore, not delivered.

Further, assuming that the defendants are not right in this contention, then, according to the plaintiffs, the 5000*l.* is one indivisible lump sum and cannot be apportioned. In Bright v. Cowper (Brownlow's Rep. 21), an action of covenant was brought upon a covenant made by a merchant with a master of a ship, that if he would bring his freight to such a port, then he would pay him such a sum; part of the goods having been taken away by pirates, and the residue brought to the place appointed, and there unloaded, the merchant would not pay, and the question was whether the merchant should pay the money agreed for since all the merchandise was not brought to the place appointed; and the court was of opinion that he ought not to pay the money, because the agreement was not by him performed. In Abbott on Merchant Shipping, p. 385, 11th edit., it is stated, "In the case of a general ship, or of a ship chartered for freight, to be paid according to the quantity of the goods, there can be no doubt that freight is due for so much as shall be delivered, the contract in these cases being distinct, or at least divisible in its own nature. But suppose a ship chartered at a specific sum for the voyage, without relation to the quantity of the goods (in which case the contract as observed by Lord Chancellor Hardwicke is more properly a contract for the use of the ship than for the conveyance of the merchandise) should lose part of her cargo by a peril of the sea, but convey the residue to a place of destination, in this case I do not find any authority for apportioning the freight. And it seems to have been the opinion of Malynes (p. 100) that nothing would be due; and the case of Bright v. Cowper, which will be mentioned hereafter, may be considered as an authority in support of that opinion." An authority to the same effect is 3 Kent's Com. 227, "In the case of a general ship, or one chartered for freight, to be paid according to the quantity of goods, freight is due for what the ship delivers. The contract, in such a case, is divisible in its own nature. But if the ship be chartered at a specific sum for the voyage, and she loses part of her cargo by a peril of the sea, and conveys the residue, it has been a question whether the freight could be apportioned. The weight of authority in the English books is against the apportionment of freight in such a case, and the question has been repeatedly discussed and determined of late years. It has been held that the contract of affreightment was an entire contract, and unless fully performed by delivery of the whole cargo, no freight was due under the charter-party, in the case where the ship was chartered for a specific sum for the voyage. The delivery of the whole cargo is, in such a case, a condition precedent to the recovery of the freight. The stipulated voyage must be actually performed. A partial performance is not sufficient, nor can a partial payment be claimed, except in special cases." For this last proposition Kent refers to Post v. Robertson (1 Johnson's Rep. 24.) Parsons (in his Law of Shipping, vol. 1, p. 293, note 4) says: "We have seen that in the case of a general ship freight is sometimes due for the goods delivered; but, when a ship is chartered for a specific sum for the voyage, and only a part of the cargo is delivered, the rest being lost by a peril of the sea, it has been held, both in England and in this country, that in an action of covenant on the charter-party there can be no apportionment of freight. In Post v. Robertson (1 Johnson's Rep. 24) the question came before the Supreme Court of New York, and it was held that in an action of covenant freight could not be recovered unless all the goods had been delivered. A majority of the court were also of opinion that if a portion of the goods had been received an action of assumpsit would lie to recover freight pro rata on the implied promise. See also Sturgis v. Gairdner (2 Brevard's Rep. 233.) The question was raised and discussed in Weston v. Minot (3 Woodb. & Min. 436), but not decided. Woodbury, J. suggested that to avoid the difficulty, the proviso that freight should be paid pro rata, though a full cargo should not by accident or other unblamable cause, be delivered, should be inserted in the contract of affreightment." [POLLOCK.—B.—In Ritchie v. Atkinson (10 East, 305), Lord Ellenborough says: "No doubt if the master do not bring home a full loading, the other shall recover; but the writer (Malynes) does not say that that is a condition precedent to the claim of freight in proportion to what is actually brought home. In all the cases of conditions precedent the thing to be done is some indivisible thing, but delivery of a cargo of goods is not one entire thing, but in its nature divisible."] The Court of Queen's Bench decided the present case, on the authority of Robinson v. Knight (ante, p. 19; L. Rep. 8 C. P. 486) but the charter-party in that case was not of the speculative character which it is submitted the charter-party in the present case is; and the same remark applies to the case decided by the Privy Council of the Norway (2 Mar. Law. Cas. O. S. 17, 163, 254; 3 Moore's P. C. N. S., 245.) [BRAMWELL, B.—Are we not bound by the case decided by the Privy Council, unless it can be distinguished? It has been decided that courts of common law are not bound by a decision of the Privy Council (a); and the case of the Norway is distinguishable. There the freighter, by the charter-party, agreed to pay a lump sum as freight "for the use and hire of the vessel." That was not freight in the strict sense of the term, in which sense, it is submitted, it is used in the present case. Sir E. V. Williams said, in delivering judgment (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 257): "although the lump sum is called freight in the charter-party and bills of lading, yet we think it is not properly so called but that it is more properly a sum in the nature of a rent to be paid for the use and hire of the ship on the agreed voyages. The charter-party expresses that a sum of 11,250*l.* is to be paid a freight for the "use and hire of the ship," and this lump sum is to cover both the outward and homeward voyages, without any distinction as to how much of it is to be attributed to the outward and how much to the homeward voyage. If this be so, the shipper has had the full consideration for the money agreed to be paid. The ship took out the salt, and received the rice on board, and performed her homeward voyage according to her engagement, and the event, that by the act of God it became impossible to carry to the port of destination the rice jettisoned and the rice sold, ought not to affect the shipowners' right to receive the full amount of the stipulated payment. It was objected on behalf of the respondent that by the charter-party the remainder of the lump sum is made payable only on 'a true and final delivery of the cargo at the said port of discharge.' But this does not necessarily mean that the whole cargo originally shipped must be delivered. It may well have been intended merely to fix the time for payment to be the time of the delivery of such cargo as the ship brings with her to the port of discharge." If the cargo taken home and delivered is accepted, the shipowner, though he cannot recover the whole of the lump sum, may recover a proportionate part of it, on a quantum meruit.

Manisty, Q.C. (with him Petheram), for the plaintiff, was not called upon.

LORD COLERIDGE, C.J.—I do not think that we need trouble you, Mr. Manisty. Error is brought on a judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, which proceeded on the authority of the case of Robinson v. Knight (ubi sup.) decided by the Court of Common Pleas, and in accordance with the decision of the Privy Council in the case of The Norway (ubi sup.). I do not find from the short note of the present case given in the Law Reports (8 C. P. 469) that the members of the Court of Queen's Bench in following the decisions in these two cases intimated any doubt as to the correctness of the decisions or in any way dissented from them.

The present case seems to me to be in reality on all fours with those two cases. It is true that the words of the charter-party in the present case are not identical with those in either of the two cases referred to. In Robinson v. Knight the contract was that the ship should proceed to Riga, to load at Bolderan or Mulgraben a full cargo of lathe wood, the ship to be provided with a deck load, not exceeding what she could reasonably stow, &c., and should then proceed to London and deliver the same on being paid freight as follows: a lump sum of 315*l.*; the freight to be paid in cash, half on arrival and the remainder on unloading and right delivery of the cargo, less four months' discount on half, at 5 per cent. per annum. Part of the cargo loaded in accordance with the charter-party having been lost by perils of the sea, without any default of the master or crew, it was held

(a) See Smith v. Brown, ante, p. 56.—ED.

[Ex. Ch.]

MERCHANT SHIPPING COMPANY v. ARMITAGE.

that the shipowner was, on delivery of the remainder of the cargo, entitled to the full sum. In the case of the Norway the contract was a little different. The ship was to be made ready and load at Liverpool a cargo of salt, not exceeding 2200 tons, and therewith proceed to Calcutta, and after the discharge of the outward cargo, reload (or at freighter's option proceed to other towns) a complete cargo of lawful merchandise not exceeding what she could reasonably stow and carry, and being so loaded, should proceed therewith to Cowes, Queenstown, or Falmouth, at the master's option, &c. "In consideration whereof and everything before mentioned, the freighter hereby promises and agrees to load and receive, or cause to be laden and received, in the manner and within the time therein mentioned for these purposes, and pay or cause to be paid as freight for the use and hire of the vessel 11,250*l.* lump sum, if ordered to the United Kingdom, Havre, or Bordeaux; 11,250*l.* if ordered to Antwerp or Marseilles, the master guaranteeing to carry 3000 tons dead weight of cargo upon a draft of 26ft. of water, or to forfeit freight in proportion to deficiency," &c. It was found as a fact by Dr. Lushington in the court below that the jettison of a portion of the cargo and the sale of the damaged portion of it were the consequence of negligence or want of skill on the part of the pilot, for which the shipowner was responsible, but the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council found, as a conclusion of fact, that the jettison had not arisen from any negligence on the part of the pilot. There was, however, a non-delivery in point of fact of the entire cargo. Notwithstanding that it was held that the contract was satisfied, and that as to the portion of the cargo jettisoned and that damaged, as it was not shown to have arisen from the negligence of the pilot, or want of prudence on the part of the master, there ought to be no deduction from the lump freight on account of non-delivery. And Sir E. V. Williams, in his judgment, intimated an opinion that even if the jettison had been attributable to the negligence of the master, there ought not to be a deduction, saying that perhaps in such a case the proper remedy of the shipper would be by a cross action.

These two cases we are now in truth called on to review. Robinson v. Knight (ubi sup.) is not binding on us, neither is the decision of the Privy Council in the case of the Norway, unless we concur in it. The courts of Westminster Hall do not feel themselves bound by decisions of the Privy Council unless they agree with them. At the same time I must say that the judgments of the Privy Council are entitled to the greatest possible weight, and, though not binding, are to be regarded with the greatest respect by any court in this country. The contract which we have to consider in the present case, is one, as it seems to me, not substantially distinguishable from that in the two cases referred to.

In the present case the ship was to proceed to Cochin, there load from the charterers, completing at Colombo or Inticorin, if required by them, a full and complete cargo, and thence proceed to London in the East or West India Docks and discharge there as customary, the act of God, restraints of princes or rulers, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever kind soever during the said voyage excepted. Then comes the stipulation, "A lump sum freight of 5000*l.* to be paid after entire discharge and right delivery of the cargo in cash two months after the date of the ship's report inwards at the Custom House or under discount at 5 per cent. per annum (or at the Bank rate, if higher) at option of charterers' agents." On her way home to London some part of the ship's cargo took fire. After every effort was made to extinguish the fire, and the ship was taken to Table Bay, it was found necessary to scuttle her, and more of the cargo was thereby damaged, and had to be sold. The part remaining was duly delivered. Freight, then, in the more ordinary sense of the word, had not been earned as to that portion of the cargo which was not delivered; and we are asked to decide, on appeal, that the lump sum freight of 5000*l.* had not been earned under the contract. I must say for myself that, if this case stood alone, and the two cases referred to had not been already decided, the intention of the contract was to ascertain and fix the sum at which the freight to be earned by the ship on this voyage was to be taken, as between the parties to the charter-party, for the purposes of the contract. The charterer, being content to run a risk, hired the ship for this voyage for a sum of 5000*l.*, this sum being called freight, and substantially being freight, being paid for the use of the ship in carrying cargo from Cochin to London. A lump sum was fixed upon to prevent inconveniences to the parties.

This being the interpretation of the contract, the question arises whether the non-delivery of a certain portion of the cargo interferes with the contract—whether under the circumstances there has been, in the words of the contract, an "entire discharge and right delivery of the cargo." On this point we have heard a good deal of argument, and I do not say that something might not be urged in support of the defendant's contention, if the matter were entirely free from authority. It might be said that the words of the contract mean "after the entire discharge and right delivery of the cargo originally put on board." But, regard being had to the fact that a lump sum is agreed on, the fair construction of the contract seems to be that which the courts have already put on similar contracts; namely, that the cargo is entirely discharged and rightly delivered when the whole of it, not covered by any of the exceptions mentioned in the contract has been discharged and delivered. It appears to me that the contract has been complied with, that the lump sum has been earned, and that the part of it unpaid should be paid to the plaintiffs.

But an ingenious argument has been addressed to us, the effect of which is to introduce obscurity into a portion of the contract, based on a subsequent stipulation in the charter-party, by which it was agreed that the master should sign bills of lading "at any rate of freight required without prejudice to this charter-party, but should the aggregate freight of bills of lading amount to less than the lump sum of 5000*l.* already stipulated for, the difference to be deducted from the amount to be drawn for disbursements and the balance, if any, to be paid in cash at the rate of exchange for sight bills existing at the time of the ship's clearing in Colombo." Mr. Williams says that according to the true interpretation of this, in the events which have happened the facts do not apply themselves to the words of this stipulation; but that a state of facts may be easily supposed which will test it. Mr. Williams says that the lump sum of 5000*l.* is the most which the charterers stipulate to secure; they engage that that much cargo shall be put on board, in respect of which freight may be earned. Suppose, then, the bills of lading amount only to 4000*l.*, that leaves the sum of 1000*l.* to be covered by the charterers according to the contract. That, Mr. Williams says, is to be paid in two ways, either in the way of disbursements, or by cash at the rate of exchange for sight bills existing at the time of the ship's clearing in Colombo. If the sum they give the captain for disbursements is not sufficient, the difference is to be paid in cash. Mr. Williams contends that this shows the real construction of the contract to be not that a lump sum of 5000*l.* was to be paid in substitution for freight, but that the charterers should guarantee that bills of lading amounting to 5000*l.* freight should be forthcoming, and that if the amount were not made up in that way, it should in another way, but that the freight should not be claimed unless it were earned. I am very far from saying that this interpretation of the contract is not the correct one; my own individual opinion is that it is correct. But it seems to me not to prevent the operation of the construction which I have already given to the former part of the contract. The stipulation relied on seems to me to be only a mode of securing the payment of the 5000*l.*, the character of which sum has already been impressed upon it by the former portion of the contract.

It appears to me, therefore, upon the true construction of the charter-party, and on the reason of the thing, as well as on the authority of the two cases cited, that the judgment of the court below was right, and ought to be affirmed.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am entirely of the same opinion. This case ought certainly to be a warning to one not to be too confident, for at one time I felt certain as to the construction of this clause in the charter-party, and I have now great misgivings as to whether I am right. I thought that "the balance, if any," was the balance to be got by deducting one sum from the other sum, and if it does mean anything different to that, then to my mind the parties have taken the most inconvenient means of expressing it. There is some difficulty in understanding it, if you look at it in that way—"the balance, if any, to be paid in cash at the rate of exchange for sight bills existing at the time of the ship's clearing in Colombo." That merely states at what rate you shall ascertain Colombo currency, and that the amount shall be paid in cash. I think, if that be so, it goes undoubtedly to show that it was a sum of money to be paid at Colombo, and it was to be paid to the master; and it furnishes an argument that it must be some other sum than the balance. The balance, I suppose, was arrived at by the deduction of that one sum from another which has been previously mentioned. If that is so, what it can mean is what Mr. Williams has said, not "and the balance," but "if the bill of lading freight shall be so much less than the charter-party freight, and the difference between the two shall be greater than the disbursements, then the difference between the disbursements and that difference shall be paid to the master." I must say that if that was the in-tion of the parties, they have used words most inconvenient for the purpose of expressing it; but there is some ground for Mr. Williams's construction in the expression which afterwards occurs, that the disbursements are to be drawn for—which must mean disbursements less deductions, when there are any—by bills at sixty days' sight. There is great justification therefore for Mr. Williams's contention, for I think it would be almost impossible for any court of law to hold that the words "and the balance, if any, to be paid, &c., meant, not what the words express, but, "if when the bill of lading freight has been deducted from the charter-party freight, the sum which shall remain after such deduction shall exceed the amount of disbursements, then the balance shall be paid."

But I confess I cannot think that the solution of this puzzle is necessary to the decision of this case. Besides, even if Mr. Williams were right it would be but a step in furtherance of the argument which he has addressed to us. There may, indeed, be another reason for giving the construction contended for to the words. Mr. Williams argues that if the words are construed in that way, then the shipowner always has, in the amount of disbursements, and in the amount of cash paid, and in the amount of bill of lading freight, his full 5000*l.*; that is to say, if the disbursements are 500*l.*, and the bill of lading freight 4000*l.*, making in all 4500*l.*, he is to be paid 500*l.* in cash. That is the object, according to Mr. Williams, of inserting this clause; and he says that the shipowner, having thus got in disbursements, money, and lien his 5000*l.*, trusts to his lien, and not to the covenant in the charter-party. That, however, is an assumption. What is there to show, even supposing this construction of the clause in the charter-party to be the right one, that the shipowner has trusted to his lien? There is nothing, in my opinion, to show that he has done so. Cases might very well happen in which that lien would not be sufficient. Take, for example, the case of a consignee not taking to the goods and becoming insolvent. I think, therefore, that the second step in Mr. Williams's argument is an assumption for which no valid reason has been given. It is, no doubt, a customary thing for persons to let goods be taken on board their ships with a guarantee from the broker that the freight shall amount to a certain sum; and in such case, Mr. Williams urges, they must trust to the person guaranteeing, and not to the charter-party or the bill of lading. But is it likely that, if it was intended to limit in this way the liability, the parties would not have said so in their contract? They have not said it. The charter-party is an ordinary one, and were it not for the difficulties that have been raised as to the lump sum, it is one upon which the charterer would be clearly liable. It seems to me that Mr. Williams has not succeeded in establishing this second step in his agreement, that the charterer's liability was to be limited to the amount of the difference between the bill of lading freight and the charter-party freight, minus the disbursements. No sufficient reason for this has to be given, even assuming the construction contended for to be correct.

Mr. Williams next relies on another clause of the charter-party, which made it, he says, a condition precedent to the right to recover the 5000*l.* that the whole of the cargo should be delivered. I am not sure that I have correctly apprehended the contention, whether it goes the length of saying that if the whole of the cargo is not delivered there is no right whatever to the lump sum, or any part of it, or whether it is meant that there is some contrivance by which a proportionate amount, which would be fair, could be ascertained and recovered. Supposing that a lump sum is agreed to be paid, and that the charterer is liable for it, subject only to the question whether it is a condition precedent that the entire cargo should, be delivered, I cannot see, if this is really a condition precedent, how the charterer could be held liable to pay half the lump sum on half the cargo being delivered. The argument, it seems to me, must therefore go to this extent, that by reason of non-delivery of a single article of the cargo the whole amount of the lump sum would be lost.

In support of the contention that this is a condition precedent, Mr. Williams relies on the clause of the charter-party that the ship shall take on board a full and complete cargo, and shall proceed therewith to London and discharge it. That is the duty, but there is a qualification to that duty, "the act of God, restraints of princes and rulers, the Queen's enemies, fire," and so forth. It is said that this qualification only diminishes the liability, but afterwards comes this, "a lump sum freight of 5000*l.* to be paid after entire discharge and right delivery of the cargo, in cash, two months after the date of the ship's report inwards at the Custom House." Now, Mr. Williams says that until the ship is discharged, and there is a right delivery of the cargo, the lump sum is not due. It may possibly be that in this he is right, verbally right. If so what is the meaning of "the cargo?" In my opinion it is the cargo which she has to deliver. It does not mean the cargo she has shipped, but which she is not bound to deliver, which the ship owner is excused from delivering. It means the right delivery of the cargo which is to be delivered, not the right delivery of the cargo which was originally shipped on board of the vessel. This means to me a most cogent argument in favour of this construction. Suppose that 5*l.* worth of these goods had been stolen by the sailors, that would not be within the exceptions, could it possibly be said by reason of that that the whole lump sum was lost? Would not the common rule have applied that that did not go to the whole consideration. Supposing the defendant had said "I shall not pay you; you have not delivered the whole cargo." Could not an action be brought against him? Would not the common rule apply? If that is so, is it not very odd that the shipowner is worse off by reason of his not being subject to an action in this case than he would have been if he had been subject to an action? That is to say, he is worse off because fire has caused the loss than he would have been if the loss had been owing to a depredation. I venture to think some interpretation must be put upon the contract which precludes its being a condition precedent that the whole cargo should be delivered.

Then Mr. Williams asks what would happen if nothing were delivered? I say that in that case the day from which the time of payment was to be reckoned could never arrive, because the payment is to be a lump sum to be paid after the entire discharge and right delivery of the cargo two months after the date of the ship's report inwards at the Custom House.

This supposes that there would be a right delivery of the cargo before the amount is payable, and if there was none of the cargo delivered, I suppose the event would never happen upon which the lump sum was to be paid. It may be said that it would be a very odd thing that if the ship brought home in safety one hundredth part of the cargo, the shipowner should be paid the entire 5000*l.*, whereas if that hundredth part was lost he would lose his 5000*l.* That is a difficulty, but not a technical difficulty.

I might further say that I think the case of the Norway (ubi sup.), as my Lord has said, is absolutely undistinguishable from this case. All the ingredients exist there that exist here. There is the same obligation to land a full and complete cargo, the same obligation to deliver, and the same statement that the sum to be paid is only payable on delivery of the remainder at the port of discharge. It is true that there the words used were that the sum payable was for the use and hire of the ship. Suppose these words had been left out, what difference would there have been between that case and this? No reliance is placed upon them in the judgment of the court, and I think when one comes to look at the legal principles involved the words cannot be of any consequence. The question is in substance is it a condition precedent to the right to recover the lump freight that there should be a delivery of the entire cargo? Besides the case of The Norway there is also the case in the Court of Common Pleas of Robinson v. Knight; and there is also the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, in the present case, intimating their satisfaction at the former decisions. The judgment is shortly reported thus: "The judgment in The Norway had been followed by the Court of Common Pleas in Robinson v. Knight, and there as here, the charter-party was for a single voyage only." I infer from that that they were rather content than otherwise with the decision in the former cases. Indeed, Mr. Williams does not say that the Court of Queen's Bench intimated any doubt as to the propriety of the former decisions. I think, on the authority of those cases, the plaintiffs are entitled to our judgment.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with the Lord Chief Justice that Mr. Williams's construction of this clause of the charter-party is the right of construction; but assuming it to be so, I cannot see how it meets the difficulty, because what he seeks to establish by means of this construction, is that the security of the freight was to be substituted, not to be a collateral security, but to be submitted for the security of the contract. I cannot at all agree in that. But looking at this charter-party without being perplexed at all by the ingenious suggestion of Mr. Williams, what does it amount to? It amounts to this: the charterer agrees to pay a lump sum for the use of the ship for this particular voyage, but the shipowner wishes to be secure, and inasmuch as he has a cargo of goods it is reasonable he should have the security of the goods, and therefore it is agreed that he shall have the security of the goods; and the various provisions that are made in this disputed clause are merely provisions to guard against any interference with the security which the shipowner is to have. Mr. Williams is driven by his argument reluctantly to contend that this is a condition precedent, and that the shipowner, unless he brings every ounce of the cargo home, cannot be paid anything. He suggests a mode of meeting that difficulty thus: that although the shipowner could not recover anything upon the contract, yet if the consignees of the cargo accepted it, the shipowner possibly might recover from them upon a quantum meruit for services performed. I suppose the answer to that would be that a special contract is contained in the bills of lading. At all events, it would scarcely get rid of the difficulty which would arise—namely, that this contract must be put an end to, and that the shipowner is to lose all security under this contract without any fault of his own being suggested. It seems to me that would be a most irrational construction to put upon a contract not very difficult to understand. I think, therefore, that the judgment of the court below ought to be affirmed. With reference to the authorities that have been cited, I quite agree with what my Lord Chief Justice and my Brother Bramwell said with reference to them. We are not bound by those authorities farther than to regard them with the respect they deserve from what they contain. So far as I am concerned, I agree with what has been laid down in both those cases. The less I say about the last of them the better; but still I can say with reference to that that I have not seen the slightest reason to change the opinion which I there expressed.

MERCHANT SHIPPING COMPANY v. ARMITAGE.

[Ex. Ch.]

CLEASBY, B.—Undoubtedly, in this case the shipowner looks to be paid principally by means of his lien upon the cargo. I never heard it suggested that because he does rely mainly upon the security he has by no means of the cargo that, therefore, there is no person liable to him. Now, in this case, in order to give him a full security for the 5000*l.* by means of the cargo, various provisions are introduced into the contract. There is to be an advance of 750*l.* and a bill is to be given in respect of it. If you suppose the bill to be actually given, and the bills of lading and freight only amounted to 4500*l.*, he would be in the position of giving, without any security, to the charterer 750*l.*, in order to guard against that which was originally introduced. First of all, we have this provision, that the bill which is to be drawn is not to be for the full amount of disbursements, unless the bill of lading freight amounts to 5000*l.* Supposing the bills of lading freight amounts to 4500*l.* you deduct the 500*l.* from the 750*l.*, and the bill will only be for 250*l.* You provide for the balance in that way, but then the balance may be the other way, and I confess I do not feel the difficulty which my brother Bramwell does in applying these words, “and the balance, if any.” That means the other balance, if any, because if the balance is that way, it has been already provided for by the bill to be drawn; and the meaning of “and the balance, if any, is to be paid in cash,” is to me plain. There is the 5000*l.* provided for substantially by the security of the goods. With respect to the other point, there is a very pertinent question of my brother Brett in the judgment in the case in the Common Pleas, where he says that in the case of the Norway it was dependent upon the right delivery of the cargo. Then he asks “what is the cargo?” That is the question that my brother Bramwell has asked. The words of the charter-party are not upon the delivery of the entire cargo, although the word “entire” is made use of. It is the entire and complete delivery of the cargo. I am satisfied with the reasons already given, and with the authorities that have been cited, and I think the judgment of the court below must be affirmed.

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion. I cannot see that Mr. Williams’s argument stopped short of this, and indeed some of the cases support it, that in case the entire cargo as laden is not delivered this clause would so operate that nothing in fact would be earned. It is true that he says proceedings may be taken upon a quantum meruit, but I do not gather from the charter-party anything to satisfy me that you could recover consistently with the existence of this contract, upon a quantum meruit. Then the clause does not necessarily import the meaning put upon it by Mr. Williams. To do so, it must not only be altered to “after discharge and delivery of the entire cargo, but to the entire cargo as laden.” Why should the court put a forced construction upon these words which do not necessarily import the delivery of the entire cargo, which it would not put in the case where the parties hired the ship for 5000*l.*? And why should the court put the person so bargaining in a worse position than he would be in under an ordinary contract? With regard to the other clauses, they have been commented on by the court, and I confess that I can find nothing in the words which without considerable addition, could support Mr. Williams’s argument. This argument is certainly not founded on the clauses as they actually exist in this charter-party. I am of opinion, therefore, that the judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

DENMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. I did for some time entertain a doubt as to the meaning of the words “the cargo,” in the charter-party, but I have come to the same conclusion as the rest of the court have arrived at, that “the cargo” means the cargo that arrives, notwithstanding that a considerable portion of the original cargo may not arrive.

POLLOCK, B.—I agree that the judgment of the Court of Queen’s Bench should be affirmed. In substance I think that the decision in that court is in accordance with the two cases of the Norway, and Robinson v. Knight; but inasmuch as we are sitting as a court of error, neither of those cases is binding upon us. I listened with the greatest attention to the argument of Mr. Williams on the clause providing for payment, and I am far from saying that his argument would not have weight as to the construction to be put upon the words of the earlier clause, if the words of that earlier clause were doubtful and uncertain. But in instruments of this kind, where you have the well-known words adopted, it is extremely uncommon to allow any inference to be drawn as to what the parties intended with regard to any portion of the contract.

Manisty, Q.C., asked for interest.

BRAMWELL, B.—On what ground is it recoverable?

Manisty, Q.C.—Because it is a sum payable on a day certain.

Williams, Q.C. submitted that interest was not payable, there being no contract to pay interest.

Manisty, Q.C.—It is a sum of money to be paid at a day certain—two months after the arrival of the ship.

argued, but we will look into it and let you know about the interest to-morrow morning.

Nov. 29.—Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—We have been considering the case, and we cannot see that the plaintiff is entitled to interest.

Manisty, Q.C.—Blackburn, J., thought we had been kept out of the money, and therefore we ought to have interest. There is no declaration, the case being stated without pleadings. We have a right to frame a declaration, and we could put in a special count for interest, they not having paid on the day they should.

BRAMWELL, B.—According to that, every case would carry interest.

Manisty, Q.C.—Wherever there is a day fixed.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—But there is not a day. We cannot see that there is a day certain, and therefore we are of opinion that we cannot give judgment for interest. You have it for the principal.

Judgment affirmed as to the principal, but reversed as to the interest.

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Nov. 19, 20, and 21, 1873.

THE CITY OF CAMBRIDGE.

Collision—Pilot's duties and responsibility—Ship at anchor—Look-out—Compulsory pilotage—River Mersey—Ship proceeding to sea—Mersey Dock Acts Consolidation Act (21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii.), ss. 138, 139.

Where a ship in charge of a licensed pilot is anchored within pilotage waters, the pilot determines and is responsible for the length of cable at which the ship rides, and it is the duty of the pilot, when the ship swings to the tide, to superintend that manœuvre and to regulate the helm, and it is negligence on his part to go below before the ship is fully swung, leaving the helm amidships without orders as to its regulations; and if, through want of length of cable and of regulation of the helm, the ship sheers and so parts from her anchor in swinging during his absence, the pilot will be alone responsible, provided that the watch on deck take the right manœuvre to counteract the sheering:

Semble, that where the look-out was once reported to the pilot or officer of the watch a light on board another ship, and the report has been answered, there is no further duty on the look-out to report that light a second time on nearing the ship.

The Mersey Docks Acts Consolidation Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii.)—providing for the pilotage of the river Mersey, and enacting (sect. 139), inter alia, that if the master of any vessel (with certain exceptions), being outward bound, "shall proceed to sea, and shall refuse to take on board or to employ a pilot, he shall pay to the pilot who shall first offer himself to pilot the same, the full pilotage rate," as if the pilot had piloted the ship; and, further, that (sect. 138) if a master requires the services of a pilot whilst his ship is lying at anchor in the Mersey, the pilot shall be paid for every day or portion of a day he shall attend, the sum of five shillings; "but no such charge shall be made for the day on which such vessel being outward bound, shall leave the river Mersey to commence her voyage,"—compels a master so proceeding to sea to take a pilot.

Where a ship fully equipped and ready for sea leaves one of the Liverpool docks at night, with the intention of proceeding straight to sea, but her master, on getting into the river Mersey, determines, on account of the weather, to anchor for the night, he is proceeding to sea within the meaning of the Mersey Docks Acts Consolidation Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii.), sect. 139, and is compelled by that section to take on board a licensed Liverpool pilot on leaving dock; and if the ship breaks from her anchor during the night, and a collision ensues through the sole negligence of the pilot, the owners are exempted from liability.

Semble, that in such circumstances the right of the pilot, under sect. 138, to an extra payment of five shillings a day whilst employed on the ship at the requirement of the master during the time she is anchored in the river, except on the day when the ship leaves the Mersey to commence her voyage, does not alter the character of the employment during that time, so as to make it a voluntary employment.

THIS was a cause of collision instituted on behalf of the owners of the ship Birmah, her cargo and freight, and on behalf of her master and crew, proceeding for their money, clothes, and private effects, against the screw steamship City of Cambridge, and her owners intervening.

The plaintiffs' petition alleged that the Birmah was an iron ship rigged vessel of 797 tons register; that on the evening of the 26th Feb. 1872, the Birmah being on a voyage from Ilo Ilo to Liverpool, with a cargo of sugar and other produce, was towed into the river Mersey in charge of a licensed pilot, and was brought to anchor by her starboard anchor, at about 9.30 p.m., in about seven or eight fathoms of water, and to the N.E. of Egremont Ferry; that two regulation anchor lights were hoisted, one on the forestay, the other on the gaff end of the Birmah, and there continued to burn brightly until after the collision; that a good look-out was kept; that it was high water about 11.10 p.m., and about 11.30 p.m. the Birmah swung to the tide; that about 2.30 a.m. of the 27th Feb., those on board the Birmah perceived a screw steamer (which afterwards proved to be the City of Cambridge) about a quarter of a mile off, and a little on the port bow of the Birmah; and smoke was coming from the funnel of the steamer, but she appeared to be drifting rapidly with the ebb tide towards the Birmah; that the City of Cambridge continued to approach the Birmah until she struck her heavily with her starboard bow; the starboard anchor of the City of Cambridge was hanging just under the hawse pipe, and the force of the blow drove the anchor through the plates of the Birmah near her port fore-rigging, making a large hole below the water line; that the steamer struck the Birmah a second time abaft the port main-rigging, carrying away a davit and a part of the bulwarks, and then went astern of her; a few minutes afterwards the City of Cambridge came up the river again under steam, passing between the Birmah and the Lancashire shore; that the Birmah began to fill rapidly through the hole in her port side; blue lights were thrown up, and a steam tug coming alongside, the crew escaped on board her leaving their effects behind; in less than half an hour from the time of the collision the Birmah sunk; that the collision was wholly caused by the negligence and misconduct of those on board the City of Cambridge, who neglected to keep clear of the Birmah, and neglected to keep a proper look out.

The answer filed by the defendants was as follows:—

1. At about 11 p.m. on the 26th Feb. 1873, the screw steam ship City of Cambridge, of 1489 tons register, fitted with engines of 200 horse power nominal, and manned by a crew of forty-six hands, all told, left Morpeth Dock, in the port of Liverpool, on the way to sea, on a voyage to Calcutta, with a general cargo and passengers, in charge of a duly licensed Liverpool pilot.

2. At such time the City of Cambridge was properly furnished and equipped, and in all respects ready for sea. It was intended that she should, as a matter of precaution, come to anchor in the Mersey until daylight, and that she should then leave the river, but it was necessary for her to leave the Morpeth Dock at the aforesaid time, in order that she might so leave the Mersey at daylight.

3. The City of Cambridge was accordingly brought to anchor in the Mersey, by her said pilot, about abreast of the Woodside Landing stage, and a little on the Cheshire side of mid-river, by her port anchor and about sixty fathoms of chain.

4. About 12.15 a.m. on the following day, the wind was blowing fresh from the north-westward, with squalls and showers, and the night was dark and the tide was strong ebb, and the City of Cambridge was still at anchor in her said berth, with her proper riding lights duly exhibited and burning brightly, and with her fires banked and a proper watch being kept, when her said port cable parted, and she began to drift down the river athwart the tide.

5. By order of her said pilot steam was got on the City of Cambridge, and her helm was put a-starboard, and endeavours were made to get her head on to the tide, and shortly afterwards, by order of the said pilot, her engines were stopped, and her starboard anchor, which was in readiness, was let go. She was then over towards the Cheshire shore.

6. A large scope of chain was given to the starboard anchor, but it failed to bring the City of Cambridge up, and she continued to drift, and the pilot thinking that it might be foul, it was, by his order, hove up and sighted and found to be clear. The City of Cambridge continued to drop down the river, looking out for a berth in which to bring up, her engines and helm being used as directed by the pilot for the purpose of keeping her clear of the vessels at anchor.

7. When the City of Cambridge had got a little to the northward of Egremont Ferry, the Birmah, the lights of which had, with other riding lights, been previously seen, was noticed on the starboard quarter of the City of Cambridge, distant about two or three ships' length. At this time there were several other vessels at anchor near. By order of the pilot the engines of the City of Cambridge were set ahead, full speed, and her helm was put hard-a-starboard, but the tide taking the City of Cambridge so quickly towards the Birmah, that it appeared that these measures would not enable the City of Cambridge to clear the Birmah, the engines of the City of Cambridge were reversed full speed astern, but the City of Cambridge, with her starboard bow and anchor, came into collision with the port bow of the Birmah, and so much damage was thereby done to the Birmah that she subsequently sank.

8. Save as herein appears the defendants deny the truth of the several allegations contained in the petition filed in this cause.

9. At the time of the said collision the Birmah was at anchor, improperly steered under a starboard helm, and with her yards braced up on the port braces, and with her head angling to the Liverpool shore, and sheering about without anyone attending to her helm, and those on board her improperly neglected to port her helm before the said collision, and the said collision was occasioned or contributed to by the negligence of those on board or in charge of the Birmah.

10. The City of Cambridge parted from her said port anchor without any negligence on the part of the defendants or those on board of her, and owing to her great length, and the strength of the tide, and the state of the weather, and of the number of vessels in the river, those on board her were unable to avoid the said collision, which was, so far as the City of Cambridge was concerned, the result of inevitable accident.

11. Before and at the time of the said collision, the City of Cambridge was in a district and under circumstances in which the employment of a qualified pilot was compulsory by law upon her and her masters and owners, and before and at the time of the said collision, the City of Cambridge was in charge of a duly licensed and qualified pilot, the employment of whom was compulsory by law, and all the orders of such pilot were duly obeyed by the master and crew of the City of Cambridge, and if the said collision was not occasioned by the negligence of those on board the Birmah, and was not the result of inevitable accident, so far as the City of Cambridge was concerned, it was occasioned by the fault or incapacity of the said pilot.

The pleadings were thereupon concluded.

Nov. 19 and 20.—The cause was heard before Sir R. Phillimore, assisted by Trinity Masters, and the plaintiffs' ship having been at anchor, the defendants were called upon to begin (a). The evidence called by the defendants proved substantially the allegations of fact made in paragraphs 1—7 of the answer: and it further appeared that the City of Cambridge was first anchored on a flood tide, which was then running about three knots. The ebb tide began to make shortly before midnight; it runs in the Mersey about six knots. The pilot was on deck at this time, and a proper anchor watch was set, a quartermaster being near the helm. When the City of Cambridge had swung three parts to the ebb, the helm was left amidships by the pilot's orders. The pilot thereupon went to lie down in the chart-room, or upon deck, giving orders to be called in the event of any emergency arising; the watch remained on deck. Soon after this, about 12.15, the City of Cambridge gave a sudden sheer, and the quartermaster immediately put her helm over, but before the helm had any effect on the ship the cable parted. The pilot was at once called, and came on deck almost immediately afterwards (the time elapsing between his being called and his coming on deck was found by the court to be very inconsiderable). When the pilot got on to the bridge, he gave directions for getting the ship's head to the tide, and she drifted stern foremost down the river. Her steam was up and ready for use. After she had so drifted for about twenty minutes, the pilot ordered her starboard anchor to be let go, and this was at once done. The ship, however, continued to drag till about twenty minutes before the collision, when the anchor was by the pilot's orders hove up and found to be clear, and not foul, as was supposed. It was not again let go before the collision. The City of Cambridge continued to drift, stern foremost, being manoeuvred by the aid of steam and helm, so as to avoid the shipping through which she was running, and the amount of which was considerable. In trying to avoid another ship, the City of Cambridge ran into the Birmah. In the log of the City of Cambridge, it was stated that that vessel "took a sheer into the Birmah." Some few minutes before the collision the look-out had reported, and the pilot had answered the report, and had then seen

(a) No objection was, taken by the defendants to beginning in this case, although it had been intimated in The Abraham (ante, p. 34), that the onus in such cases always lies upon the plaintiff in the first instance. It has now, however, been formally decided, in a case named the Otter, which will be shortly reported, that in all damage cases the plaintiff must begin.—Ed.

THE CITY OF CAMBRIDGE.

the light of the Birmah, but the look-out did not again report that ship on nearing her. The distance from the place where the City of Cambridge was anchored to the place of collision was about a mile and a half. After the collision, the City of Cambridge steamed up the river, and anchored in the Sloyne. Evidence was given in support of the ninth paragraph of the answer.

On the part of the Birmah, it was proved that the allegations of fact contained in the petition were substantially true. It was further proved that before the Birmah swung to the tide her helm was fastened a-starboard; her helm was worked by a screw, and when placed in one position, remained under ordinary circumstances; when the ship had swung to the tide, her helm was altered by putting it over two to or three spokes to port, and there left; she was lying steady at the time of collision, and was not sheering about.

It was admitted that the anchors and chains on board the City of Cambridge were of a proper quality, and had been duly tested, and that the owners of that vessel were not to blame in that respect.

It was agreed that the question, whether the City of Cambridge had her pilot on board by compulsion of law, should be argued separately, in case the Court should be of opinion that the collision was the fault of the pilot alone, as far as regarded that vessel.

Sir John Karlake, Q.C. (Milward, Q.C. and Clarkson with him), submitted for the defendants—First, that the cause of the collision was the breaking of the chain, and that was an inevitable accident; secondly, that even if this were not the cause of the collision, all subsequent acts were the acts of the pilot, and he alone was responsible; thirdly, that the officers and crew were guilty of no negligence; that the quartermaster had done what was best in putting over the helm, and had merely carried out the pilot's direction, who left him in charge, and that a proper look out had been kept.

Butt, Q.C. (Gully with him), for the defendants.—To establish a plea of compulsory pilotage the defendants must show that the collision was caused by the sole act of the pilot, and that no act of their master and crew contributed thereto; and of this they must give positive proof:

The Annapolis—The Johanna Stoll, 4 L. T. Rep. N.S. 421; Lush, 295; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 69;
The Iona, L. Rep. 1 P. C. 426.

Assuming it to be the duty of the pilot to bring the ship to anchor, and take charge of her whilst at anchor, it is the duty of the master and crew to carry out the pilot's orders, to see that the proper amount of chain is out, that the yards are properly trimmed, and that she lies steady while the pilot is below, and they must prove that they did these things, and they have not so proved. They must show affirmatively that the sheering was the result of no negligence of theirs, and that they did all they could to prevent an accident at the critical period of the swinging of the ship. If a pilot is incapable, a master may supersede him; similarly, when a pilot is in bed, and an emergency rises, the officer in charge is bound to act independently, and the owners must be responsible for his acts or omissions. They must show that the quartermaster took the proper measures to counteract the sheer, and took them in good time; if they do not show this, then the pilot cannot be said to be solely responsible:

The Mobile, Swab, 128; 10 Moo. P. C. C. 471.

Before the pilot came on deck they could and ought to have let go the starboard anchor. The parting of the cable must be considered as the causa causans of the collision, and for this the crew are responsible; and if by this negligence the pilot was put in a difficulty and exercised a wrong judgment, he was not solely responsible, for it conduced to the collision: (The Iona, sup.) Under the circumstances, the look-out was insufficient just before the collision; it was not enough to call attention to the Birmah's lights in the first instance, as they approached her the pilot's attention ought again to have been directed to her:

Sir J. Karlake in reply.

Nov. 21.—Sir R. PHILLIMORE stated the facts as given above, and proceeded:—Upon these facts the first question arises, was the City of Cambridge to blame for the collision? and there are a variety of questions which I have had to put to the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House in order that I may be guided by their advice upon the principal nautical points which arise in this case. And, first, they are of opinion that she ought to have had more cable let out in the first instance; that sixty fathoms of cable was not sufficient; but that, at all events, when she swung to the ebb tide, expecting, as she must have done, a spring tide of six knots, then more cable should have been veered out. It is in evidence in the case that she had 150 fathoms of cable on such anchor, which was available for use.

The Elder Brethren think also that the pilot was to blame for leaving the deck when he did, that he ought not to have gone away into the chart room when she was three quarters swung to the ebb tide; he ought to have waited till she was fully swung, and himself superintended that manœuvre, and seen that her helm was properly put. He left her helm amidships. No blame attaches to the City of Cambridge with respect to the men that were left on deck. There seem to have been sufficient men, and they were properly stationed. It is to be observed that when the vessel swung, the wind and tide were opposed, and no blame at all attaches, in the opinion of the Elder Brethren, with which I agree, to Boyle, the quartermaster, in the manœuvre which he effected. He executed the right manœuvre in counteracting the sheer the vessel had taken, and there was no delay in executing it, nor is there any reason to suppose that the pilot, if he had been on deck instead of in the chart room, would have directed anything to be done different from what was done in his absence.

The next observation which the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House make is this; that the starboard anchor ought to have been ready to have been dropped, or ought to have been dropped instantly, if it was intended to rely on it. But the real and principal matter of blame in this case is as follows: The City of Cambridge ought never to have been allowed to go down the river stern foremost, as she was, into a crowd of shipping, scarcely avoiding one vessel before she was nearly into another; and in the opinion of the Elder Brethren, it is really a matter of great astonishment that she did not do more damage than she actually effected. She ought to have gone ahead, at all events, immediately after she sighted the starboard anchor, and found it clear in the way I have described. The ship might have been under perfect command, and she ought to have been brought up in the Sloynce, and to have waited there till daylight. Upon that point the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House have no hesitation at all, nor have I any doubt that their judgment is perfectly correct.

THE CITY OF CAMBRIDGE.

With respect to the second point, I find upon the evidence that the pilot's orders were duly obeyed; and with respect to the third point, I have taken into my careful consideration the ingenious argument of Mr. Butt, but, nevertheless, I am of opinion, under the advice of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, that the crew on board the City of Cambridge cannot be said in any way to have contributed to the collision. There was no want of look out, and no want of due notice, on the part of those whose duty it was to keep a look out, to the pilot.

Lastly, I come to consider the question, which is fourth in order, whether the Birmah contributed in any way to the collision. The Birmah was riding with her starboard anchor, quite steady, with seventy-five fathoms of chain; although in mere shoal water, with more chain than the City of Cambridge. She certainly did not sheer, in our opinion, into the City of Cambridge, but the truth is told in the log kept on board the City of Cambridge that that vessel sheered into her. She was lying quiet, and it matters not, in the opinion of the Elder Brethren, whether her helm was lashed to port or starboard; though I am bound to say that the evidence shows that she had her helm two or three spokes to port before the collision took place.

Upon these facts, I can, of course, come but to one conclusion, namely, that the City of Cambridge is solely to blame for this collision.

There remains another question to be discussed, namely, the question of law applicable to the pilot, as to which it is not necessary to detain the Elder Brethren.

THE question of compulsory pilotage then came on for argument.

It had been proved by the Master of the City of Cambridge that when he left the dock on the night of the 26th Feb., he had intended to go straight to sea, but that on getting into the dock gates, and seeing the state of the weather outside, he, acting on the advice of the pilot, determined to anchor in the river and wait till daylight. The City of Cambridge, on leaving the dock, was fully equipped and ready for sea.

When a Liverpool pilot has completed his pilotage service, and is about to leave the ship, he presents to the master for signature a certificate on a printed form, setting out the nature and extent of his service. The rates which the pilot is entitled to charge are printed on the back of this certificate. The pilot either obtains the money from the master, or the pilotage authorities obtain it from the agents of the ship in Liverpool by means of the certificate. The certificate signed by the master of the City of Cambridge was as follows:—

The pilotage of the port of Liverpool is under the control of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, and is regulated by the Mersey Docks Consolidation Act 1853 (21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii.), sects. 118 to 164. The sections material to the present case are as follows:—

Sect. 123. If any person shall pilot any vessel into or out of the port of Liverpool, without having been first duly licensed by the board to act as a pilot, or after the expiration of his licence, and before the same shall have been renewed, he shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding 20l.

Sect. 124. In case any pilot shall refuse to take charge of any inward bound vessel, upon a proper signal being made for a pilot, or of any outward bound vessel, upon the request of the master thereof . . . the board may recall the licence granted to such pilot, and declare the same to be void, or may suspend the same for such time as they shall think proper, &c.

Sect. 127. Every pilot taking upon himself the charge of any vessel shall, if so required by the master thereof, pilot such vessel, if sailing out of the port of Liverpool, through the Queen's Channel, so far to the westward as the buoy, commonly known by the name of the Formby North-west Buoy, or Fairway buoy of the Queen's Channel; and if sailing through the Rock Channel, pilot the same so far to the westward as the North-west buoy of Hoyle; and any pilot who shall in any such case refuse to pilot such vessel to such distance as aforesaid, shall forfeit his right to receive any sum of money for piloting such vessel, and may also, at the discretion of the board, be deprived of his licence.

Sect. 128. The pilot in charge of any inward bound vessel shall cause the same (if need be) to be properly moored at anchor in the river Mersey, and shall pilot the vessel into some one of the wet docks within the port of Liverpool, whether belonging to the board or not, without making any additional charge for so doing, unless his attendance shall be required on board such vessel while at anchor in the river Mersey, and before going into dock, in which case he shall be entitled to receive 5s. per day for such attendance.

Sect. 129. The master of every inward bound vessel liable to pay pilotage rates shall, on coming within the pilot stations, as fixed by the bye laws made under the authority of this Act, display and keep flying the usual signal for a pilot to come on board; and if any such master shall omit so to do, he shall be liable to a penalty on every such omission of not exceeding 5*l.*; and if any pilot shall come within any reasonable distance of any such vessel, the master thereof shall render all necessary assistance (so far as may be consistent with the safety of such vessel) to enable such pilot to come on board.

Sect. 130. In case the master of any inward bound vessel, other than a coasting vessel in ballast or under the burthen of 100 tons, shall refuse to take on board or employ a pilot, such pilot having offered his services for that purpose, such master shall pay to such pilot, or if more than one, then to the first of such pilots who shall have offered his services, the full pilotage rates which would have been payable to him if he had actually piloted such vessel in the port of Liverpool.

Sect. 136. And, whereas outward bound vessels are sometimes forced back, by storm or otherwise, before the pilots have left such vessels, or before such pilots have conducted such vessels as far as is required by this Act, and it is expedient that such pilots should have reasonable compensation made to them in addition to the usual rates of pilotage: be it enacted, that in every such case the board may determine the amount of such compensation, so that such compensation shall not in any case exceed a moiety of the rates which such outward bound vessels would have been liable to pay in case such vessels had not been forced back as aforesaid.

Sect. 138. If the master of any vessel shall require the attendance of a pilot on board any vessel during her riding at anchor, or being at Hoylake, or in the river Mersey, the pilot so employed shall be paid for every day or portion of a day he shall so attend the sum of 5*s.* and no more; provided that the pilot who shall have the charge of any vessel shall be paid for every day of his attendance whilst in the river; but no such charge shall be made for the day on which such vessel, being outward bound, shall leave the river Mersey to commence her voyage, or, being inward bound, shall enter the river Mersey.

Sect. 139. In case the master of any vessel, being outward bound, and not being a coasting vessel in ballast, or under the burthen of 100 tons, for which provision is otherwise made, shall proceed to sea, and shall refuse to take on board or employ a pilot, he should pay to the pilot who shall first offer himself to pilot the same, the full pilotage rate that would have been payable for such vessel if such pilot had actually piloted the same into or out, as the case may be, of the said port of Liverpool, together with all the expenses incurred in recovering the same.

Sir J. Karlake, Q.C. and Milward, Q.C. (Clarkson with them), for the defendants.—The main question is, whether the City of Cambridge was "proceeding to sea;" if so, then she was within the provisions of sect. 139, which makes pilotage compulsory in such a case. It is admitted that the vessel was ready for sea; and the going into the Mersey must be considered as a mere step in that direction. In Rodriguez v. Melhuish (24 L. J. 26, Ex.), which was a case decided under the similar section of a former Act (5 Geo. 4. c. lxxiii, s. 35), Pollock, C.B. said: "Here the owners were bound to show that the vessel was compelled to have a pilot on board at the time of the accident. . . . The question is, whether this vessel was proceeding to sea. Now, if she had her cargo on board, if her master had been ready and everything prepared for starting, there would be good ground for saying that she was proceeding to sea, within the meaning of the section. But her rigging was not complete, and, being a vessel carrying the mail, she was not to sail until the following day. I think, therefore, that she was not proceeding to sea, and might lawfully refuse to take a pilot on board whilst thus in the river. The owners, therefore, are not exonerated, and this rule must be discharged." Under the corresponding sections relating to inward bound ships, it has been held that ships coming into the river with a pilot are bound to employ that pilot or another to take them into dock.

The Annapolis—The Johanna Stoll, 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 417; Lush. 295; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 69.

In that case it was said by Dr. Lushington, "The original employment of the pilot to take the ship into the port of Liverpool being compulsory, the next question is, whether the compulsion prevailed at the time when the ship was proceeding from the river into dock and the collision occurred. The ship had been anchored for some days previously in the river. The 128th section of the local Act is as follows:—(For this section see sup.) This section prescribes the duty of a pilot piloting a vessel inward bound. It appears to me to provide for all probable contingencies. First, the pilot is to moor the vessel in the river, if need be, that is, if she cannot go at once into dock; secondly, he must pilot her into dock without making any additional charge; thirdly, he is entitled to 5*s.* a day, if his attendance is required on board the vessel whilst at anchor, and before going into dock. It appears to me that this section contemplates considerable delay between mooring the ship and taking her into dock, and it provides for the consequences of that delay in two ways; for the master, that he shall not pay more for complete pilotage, that is, the bringing into dock; for the pilot, that if detained on board the ship, he shall be paid for such additional service. I put a very different construction on the proviso beginning, 'unless his attendance shall be required, &c.' than that contended for by the plaintiffs. The words, in my judgment, do not diminish or control the duty of the pilot, but under circumstances increase the pay." Similarly, under sects. 138 and 139, the pilot is bound to pilot an outward bound vessel from dock, and if there is any delay he becomes entitled to more pay, but is not relieved from any duty. The obligation is imposed upon the pilot by sect. 124, which imposes upon him a penalty if he refuses to take charge of an outward bound vessel, "upon the request of the master thereof." This vessel was outward bound, and the pilot went on board, at the request of the master, in dock, and was bound so to do. The vessel left the dock on her way to sea, and only paused in the Mersey for a favourable opportunity to cross the bar at the mouth of the river. Hence, on leaving the dock, she was "proceeding to sea," within the meaning of sect. 139, and was bound to take a pilot. The test to be applied is that, being quite ready for sea, she broke ground for that purpose, and hence is within the dicta of Pollock, C.B. in Rodriguez v. Melhuish (ubi sup.). Moreover, to give exemption it is not necessary that pilotage should be compulsory at the time the collision happens; it is enough that the pilot be employed within a district within which pilotage is compulsory by law:

The Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) s. 388.

The General Steam Navigation Company v. The British and Colonial Steam Navigation Company (Limited), L. Rep. 3 Ex., 330; L. Rep. 4 Ex. 238; 19 L. T. Rep. N. S. 357; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 581; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 168, 237.

A liberal construction should be put upon the statute, and the pilot having been employed for the purpose of taking the ship to sea, such employ ment being compulsory, it should be considered that he was on board by compulsion of law whilst the ship, although delaying her final departure, did so only on her way to sea, and whilst waiting for daylight. The pilotage certificate itself represents the compulsory pilotage rate outwards to be paid for pilotage from dock to the Bell Beacon.

Butt, Q.C. and W. C. Gully, for the plaintiffs.—The master was not bound to take a pilot until he actually proceeded to sea. On his being advised by the pilot not to go until the next morning, he could have declined his services until that time, and would have incurred no penalty for so doing; he might have anchored his own ship in the river. The keeping the pilot on board on leaving dock was a purely voluntary act, and the pilot must be considered as the servant of the owners until the ship weighed anchor to go out of the river. No pilotage became due until that time, and no penalty for refusing pilotage could till then be incurred. The mere refusal to have a pilot on board before proceeding to sea constitutes no offence. Under the 139th section there must be an actual proceeding to sea, and a refusal to take on board or employ a pilot for that purpose, before the master became liable to pay the penalty; this differs from the inward bound section (section 130) in so far as the latter inflicts the penalty on a mere refusal. On leaving the dock the master was not proceeding to sea, but to an anchorage in the river. Proceeding by any number of steps from one part of the port to another is not proceeding to sea; the proceeding to sea within the meaning of this section takes place when the master weighs anchor for the last time and goes out of the river. No rate for pilotage proper would become payable until the ship actually began to leave the river, and the pilot in this case had at the time of the collision earned, not a compulsory rate, but a rate which is expressly called in the certificate "voluntary;" that is to say, a rate extra and beyond that which the shipowner is compelled to pay. The payment of this rate the master might have avoided, if he had declined a pilot before the time he actually sailed. Suppose the ship had been sunk in consequence of the collision, or had been so damaged that she had to wait some weeks for repairs, the pilot would have had no claim for the compulsory rate, and the master would have had the right to dismiss him on his services being no longer required, with the payment of the voluntary rate for as many days as he had served. Rodriguez v. Melhuish (ubi sup.) does not really affect this contention, as all that is there decided is that pilotage is compulsory only whilst a ship is actually proceeding to sea. The Annapolis—The Johanna Stoll (ubi sup.), is clearly distinguishable, because in that case there was a special clause, compelling pilots to take ships from anchorage to dock, and it was whilst performing this operation the collision occurred, and not whilst the ship was, or ought to have been, at anchor; here, on the other hand the master was not bound to take a pilot to pilot his ship out of dock and to anchor her in the river, nor was the pilot bound to go on board for that purpose; and, moreover, the collision took place whilst the ship should have been at anchor in the river, and whilst she was neither going from dock nor proceeding to sea.

Milward, Q. C. in reply, was stopped by the court.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—As my own private judgment is strongly adverse to the immunity of a wrongdoer on the ground of compulsory pilotage, I should not be at all sorry if I could come to the conclusion which has been pressed upon me by the argument for the plaintiffs; but I cannot do so.

It seems to me that the 139th section must be construed, as far as one can apply it to this Act of Parliament, according to the light of common sense.

Now what is the section: "In case the master of any vessel being outward bound," then there are certain exceptions which do not apply to this case—"shall proceed to sea, and shall refuse to take on board or employ a pilot, he shall pay to the pilot who shall first offer himself to pilot the same, the full pilotage rate that would have been payable for such vessel if the pilot had actually piloted the same into or out, as the case may be, of the said port of Liverpool, together with all expenses incurred in recovering the same."

Now it appears to me that the real point to which the court's mind must be directed is, what did the Legislature mean by the word "shall proceed to sea?" It could not be intended that the offence of refusing to take on board a pilot should not be completed until the vessel was actually at sea, because the section provides that he must take the pilot, the first who shall offer himself for the purpose of taking her to sea.

Now in this case what was the state of the vessel? The state of the vessel was this: she was in every way equipped for her long voyage to Calcutta. There is no doubt upon the point. What are the facts? That she intended to go to sea, but that after a conference between the captain and the pilot, who had been taken on board for the purpose of going to sea (a conference which had been brought about by the circumstances of the night, and other reasons), as to whether it was expedient she should go to sea that night or wait till morning to cross the bar, it was determined to lie in the Mersey that night, and cross the bar in the morning.

Shortly after she had begun to lie in the Mersey the collision happened, and in these circumstances can I really come to the conclusion that the vessel was not proceeding to sea, because an accidental circumstance prevented her from going to sea that very night? It was, as I think, fairly enough put by Sir John Karlake in this case, that her staying outside the dock that night was a step in her progress of procedure to sea. I really must think that common sense compels me to put that construction on the statute, and having a strong opinion upon it I do not see why I should delay expressing it to-night; although, if there is any desire of the parties that I should delay it, and give a more elaborate judgment, I would do so, but I see no reason myself why I should delay expressing my opinion that this was a compulsory pilotage under the statute.

states expenses to have been incurred in rendering the services without stating their amount and the defendant's answer admits all the allegations of the petition, the High Court of Admiralty will not allow evidence to be called by the plaintiff to show the amount of the expenses. If specific amounts are claimed they must be pleaded so as to give the defendant the opportunity of admitting or denying them.

Semble, that the court will, if necessary, amend the pleadings, allowing the plaintiffs to set forth the amounts, but giving the defendant time to admit or deny such amounts.

Where, in a salvage suit the defendants admit all the allegations of fact in the plaintiffs' petition, but deny the inferences of fact made therefrom in the petition, the plaintiffs may call evidence to establish those inferences.

Where a steamship having taken in tow a vessel in distress, and having towed her for some hours in the track of vessels, on the weather getting worse and the lives of her crew becoming endangered, takes the crew out of her and finally abandons her in a place where she is afterwards picked up by another vessel and taken into port, the owners, masters, and crew of the steamship are entitled to salvage reward in respect of the lives so saved, but not in respect of ship and cargo.

THESE were two causes (Nos. 6645 and 6665) of salvage instituted against the barque Eintracht and her cargo, the one on behalf of the owners master and crew of the steamship Countess of Dublin, the other on behalf of the owners master and crew of the steamship Hoopoe. A separate petition was filed on behalf of each steamer, but the causes were then by order of the court consolidated, leave being given for each set of plaintiffs to appear separately by counsel at the hearing. The plaintiffs' petitions setting out the facts were as follows:

No. 6645.

1. The Countess of Dublin is a steamship of 474 tons register, and of the value of 25,000*l.* or thereabouts. At the time of the occurrences hereinafter mentioned, she was manned by a crew of twenty-four hands all told, and was in the prosecution of a voyage from Dublin to Falmouth with a general cargo of the value of 4460*l.* or thereabouts, and thirty passengers, including some emigrants.

2. The Eintracht is a barque of 355 tons register, and was loaded at the time of the occurrence hereinafter mentioned with a cargo of deals and firewood; the value of the said barque and her cargo is agreed between the parties hereto at 3000*l.*

3. Between 9 and 10 a.m. on the morning of the 16th Nov. 1873, the said Countess of Dublin fell in with the said barque about seventy miles from the Longships, in the Irish Channel. The barque was derelict and water-logged, her bowsprit and gear gone, her fore-topmast and fore masthead carried away, and her port bow stove in. It was then blowing a whole sail breeze, from E. to E.S.E., with a rolling sea.

4. The captain of the Countess of Dublin thereupon sent the mate and carpenter and three hands on board the barque in a boat, and the mate having examined the condition of the said barque and reported to the captain thereon, sent the steamer's boat with three hands back with a line, to get a tow-rope on board. The said line was then made fast to a tow-rope on board the steamer, and the boat and the three hands returned to the barque; but the said line parted in hauling the tow-rope on board the barque. The tow-rope was then hauled back on board the steamer, and ultimately the steamer steamed round the barque, and one of the steamer's lines was thrown on board, by which the tow-rope was at last got on board the barque and made fast, and the steamer took the barque in tow at 12 30p.m.

5. The steamer continued to tow the barque until 12.30 a.m. of the 17th, the sea had by that time become very rough, and the wind was blowing a fresh gale. The barque was full of water, the waves washing clean over her, and the men on board being in constant and imminent danger of being washed overboard. At this time the steamer's wheel-ropes parted, and she was for a considerable time unable to continue towing, and had to ship fresh steering gear, which caused great danger to both vessels.

6. The steamship continued to tow the barque, stopping once when in shelter under the lee of the Longships to freshen the nip of the tow-rope, until about 12-30 a.m. of the 18th, when the tow-rope, which was a sound ten-inch rope, parted. At this time the wind was blowing a fresh gale from east by south to east south east, and there was a very heavy short broken sea on. The steamer's boat, which had been towing behind the barque, sank, and it became necessary to cut her adrift in order to prevent her fouling and damaging the barque's rudder. The vessels were at that time in the race of the Lizard, the Lizard's light bearing about north-west by west. There was no other serviceable boat on board the barque.

7. The steamer stood by the barque till morning in considerable danger, and the mate endeavoured to rig up some side lights for the barque with candles, but they were constantly washed out and quite useless, and it was necessary to prepare torches, to light in case of danger of collision with any other vessel arising.

8. The wind and sea continued very heavy, and the barque was drifting on to the Stag rocks, with her head on shore, when at about 3 a.m. the men on board the barque got the helm a-starboard and hauled the afteryards round, and got the ship's head to wind. They then pulled the main-stay sail up, with the sheet to windward, till the ship's head paid off. They then set the main trysail, hauled the main staysail sheet aft on the starboard side and lashed the helm a little to port, it being impossible for any person to remain at the helm, on account of the waves washing over, and the men being obliged to stop in the rigging. By these acts, which were accomplished with great difficulty and danger, they succeeded in getting the barque to drift clear of the Stag rock by about fifty yards.

9. Between three and four in the morning, when daylight broke, the weather moderating slightly, the steamship again succeeded in getting the barque in tow with two hawes, a ten-inch and a new six-inch hawser, but it not being possible, on account of the wind and sea, to get round the Lizard, the steamship, with the barque in tow, bore up for Mullion, under the lee of the Lizard, and anchored there at 11 a.m. of the 18th until 2 a.m. of the 19th.

10. On the evening of the 18th, two small tugs came to the steamer, having been sent by the steamer's agents to assist her if necessary, but the steamer began to tow the barque to Falmouth at 8 a.m. of the 19th without their assistance. After two and a half hours towing by the steamer alone, the two tugs assisted to tow, and the barque was finally brought into Falmouth Harbour at 2.30 p.m. of the 19th.

THE EINTRACHT.

11. Had it not been for the services aforesaid, the steamship would have arrived at Falmouth on the night of Sunday the 16th, when she was due, and in consequence she consumed forty tons extra coals and a large extra quantity of provisions were consumed by the passengers, and many of the passengers had to be forwarded to their destinations by train, and their fare had to be paid. Some of the emigrants missed their ships from Plymouth to New South Wales, and had to be compensated and kept by the owners of the steamship for a considerable time. And the tugs have to be paid 30*l.* at least between them. The barque was finally made fast at Falmouth with an eight-inch hawser belonging to the steamship, which was left in her, and was of the value of 10*l.*

12. During the whole of the time aforesaid the captain and crew of the steamship, and the mate and men on board the barque, were in constant exertion, and the captain never had his clothes off, and never left the deck except for two hours. The mate and men on board the barque were constantly wet, and in risk of their lives.

No. 6665.

1. The Hoopoe is a screw steamer of 1004 tons register, and 120-400 horse-power, and is of the value of 18,500*l.* or thereabouts. At the time of the events hereinafter stated, she was manned by a crew of twenty-four hands, and was bound on a voyage from Antwerp to Liverpool, with a general cargo. The value of the said cargo was 13,387*l.* or thereabouts.

2. About noon on the 15th Nov. 1873, the Hoopoe was about fifty miles from the Longships light, and steering a course for the Smalls. The wind was about S.E. very light. At this time those on board the Hoopoe observed a barque on the star-board bow, flying a signal of distress.

3. The Hoopoe bore down upon the barque, which was the Eintracht, of Griefswalde, of 355 tons register, laden with a cargo of timber. She had come into collision with a vessel in the Bristol Channel some days before, and had been seriously damaged, and had become waterlogged, and was being driven by the wind out into the Atlantic Ocean, without power to help herself.

4. The master of the Eintracht hailed the Hoopoe to take his vessel in tow; he at the same time stated that he had nothing for the crew to eat but a barrel of biscuits and some salt provisions.

5. The mate of the Hoopoe was accordingly sent with four men in a boat to get a line from the Eintracht, but in consequence of the condition of the Eintracht her crew could not get out either line or hawser, and the master of the Eintracht asked the master of the Hoopoe to send his own line and hawser. This was done, the hawser sent being a nine-inch one, and the best on board the Hoopoe. It was made fast to the chain of the Eintracht, and thirty fathoms were paid out.

6. The Hoopoe then began to tow the Eintracht towards Milford Haven, and continued towing till about 4 p.m. It was then getting dark; the wind, still from the eastward, was increasing in force; the sea had risen, and beat heavily against the bows of the Eintracht, causing so great a strain on the tow-rope that it appeared likely to part. And the weather looked even more threatening.

7. In these circumstances, the master of the Hoopoe advised those on board the Eintracht for their own safety to come on board the Hoopoe. It was then discovered that the boats of the Eintracht were disabled, and her master and crew (twelve in all) were therefore taken off in two trips by the boats of the Hoopoe.

8. The Hoopoe continued to tow the Eintracht, though the wind and sea continued to increase, till 8 p.m. At this time she had brought the Eintracht about twelve miles on her road to and within forty miles of Milford Haven. The after iron bits of the deck of the Hoopoe then gave way, and then first one and then another of the strands of the hawser gave way, and the whole parted and was lost. The night was very dark, the weather kept getting worse, and the Hoopoe had not a large supply of coal on board. Her master was therefore obliged to continue his voyage to Liverpool.

9. The Eintracht was on the following morning found by the steamship Countess of Dublin, then on a voyage from Dublin to Falmouth, and ultimately towed into the Port of Falmouth and saved.

10. If the Eintracht had not been met with and towed by the Hoopoe as aforesaid, she would have drifted further into the Atlantic Ocean and out of the track of vessels. The Hoopoe, by towing her as aforesaid, brought her nearer to the coast and more within the track of vessels, and in particular into the course of the Countess of Dublin, which otherwise would never have met her.

11. The aforesaid services of the Hoopoe largely contributed to the saving of the Eintracht, her cargo and freight, from total loss.

12. By the aforesaid services of the Hoopoe, the lives of the master and crew of the Eintracht were saved.

13. In rendering the aforesaid services, the Hoopoe, lost her hawser, worth 40*l.*

14. The value of the Eintracht, her cargo, and freight, is 3000*l.*

The answer filed by the defendants to both petitions was as follows:

Thomas Cooper, solicitor for the owners of the barque or vessel Eintracht, and of the cargo now or lately laden therein, says as follows:

1. He submits to the judgment of this honorable court upon the statements of fact contained in the petition filed in course No. 6645, which statements he admits to be true in substance.

2. He admits the truth of the statements contained in the first nine articles of the petition filed in course No. 6665, but he denies the truth of the deduction sought to be drawn therefrom in Articles 10 and 11 of the said petition, and submits to the judgment of this honorable court as to whether such deductions ought or not to be drawn from the facts stated.

3. He further says that the Hoopoe finally and altogether abandoned her attempted services of saving the Eintracht and her cargo, and left her a derelict, and without any other assistance near her, and he submits that the owners, master, and crew of the Hoopoe are not entitled to any remuneration for their towage of the Eintracht.

4. He denies the truth of the allegation contained in Article 12 of the said petition in cause No. 6665, and says that the master and crew of the Eintracht would in fact have been saved by the Countess of Dublin, or by some other vessel.

ADM.]

THE EINTRACHT.

[ADM.]

The pleadings were thereupon concluded, the value of the Eintracht and her cargo being agreed at 3000*l.*

Jan. 27, 1874.—The cause came on for hearing before the learned judge, assisted by Trinity Masters.

Bayford and Davidson appeared for the Countess of Dublin.

Phillimore for the Hoopoe.

Clarkson and Lamb for the defendants.

Bayford proposed to call evidence for the purpose of showing what was the amount of the expenses alleged in par. 11 of his petition (No. 6645), to have been incurred.

Clarkson objected on the ground that, the answer (par. 1) having absolutely admitted the statements in the petition, it was against the practice of the court to allow evidence to be called in support of any allegations made. If the plaintiffs had wished to charge the defendants with specific amounts they were bound to have set those amounts out in extenso in their petition, and so given the defendants an opportunity of considering whether they would admit them or deny them. Moreover the court never allows these amounts in solido; it roughly estimates the expenses to which the salvors have been put, and includes these in its general award; it will not ordinarily allow specific evidence to be given of the loss. The court is quite capable of judging these amounts without figures being laid before it.

Bayford, in reply.—If I am not allowed to produce evidence in the pleadings as they now stand, I must ask for leave to amend.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—There can be no doubt that if the plaintiffs wished to give in evidence these amounts, they ought to have been pleaded, and I cannot in the present state of the pleadings allow evidence to be called to show what they were. These amounts are always taken roughly in salvage causes, and I have never allowed any evidence to be given where the defendants have admitted the whole petition. To do so would admit all kinds of side issues, and increase the expenses of these suits enormously, and so defeat the very object of the admission. I must, however, accede to Mr. Bayford's application for an amendment if he presses it, provided the defendants have the opportunity of considering whether they admit or deny the petition as amended, but I think that the defendants have enough in the pleadings already for practical purposes.

Clarkson objected to evidence being called, but was willing to accept the statement of the plaintiffs' counsel of the amount of the expenses, and this was agreed to.

Phillimore then tendered evidence in support of the allegations in paragraphs 10, 11, and 12 of the petition (No. 6665), which were denied by the answer; this evidence was objected to by the defendants on the ground that the answer did not deny any facts, but only the deductions from facts already admitted; evidence however was admitted by the court on the ground that the position of the Hoopoe, and the degree of peril to which her crew was exposed, were facts which were denied by the answer, and which consequently must be proved.

Evidence was then called to show that the Eintracht, when found by the Hoopoe, was about in the track of vessels, but the wind having freshened from the E. S. E., she would have drifted (the winding continuing the same) out into the Atlantic out of the track of vessels if the Hoopoe had not towed her as she did; the Eintracht had actually drifted from the time she had been in collision some forty or fifty miles; at the time the crew were taken off she was dragging under water.

Bayford for the Countess of Dublin, submitted that the service was meritorious and deserving of considerable reward.

Phillimore for the Hoopoe contended that his clients were entitled to reward for salvage of both life and property; for the former by reason of rescuing the crew, for the latter by reason of having brought the ship into a place where she was more certain of being salvaged. It is not because salvors abandon after making meritorious efforts to save and bringing to a place where there is a greater chance of her being saved that they lose their reward.

The E. U. 1 Spink's Eco. and Adm. 63.

Clarkson, for the defendants.—We admit that the Hoopoe has rendered life salvage, but deny any service to ship and cargo by that vessel. To constitute salvage service there must be a leaving of the property in safety; here the ship was left as a derelict at sea. It is true that first salvors may recover although the salvage is completed by others, but there must be no actual abandonment by the first salvors, and they must have contributed to the result.

The Atlas, Lush, 518; 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 434; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 168, 235.

The real question is whether there has been an entire service rendered by both sets of salvors resulting in the entire safety of the ship. The first salvors did not contribute in any way to the service.

Phillimore in reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is undoubtedly a case in which a very meritorious service has been rendered to both life and derelict property. After consultation with the elder brethren of the Trinity House, as to the effect of the towage performed by the Hoopoe, I am clearly of opinion that that vessel is not entitled to reward in respect of services rendered to ship and cargo, but that she is unquestionably entitled in respect of the lives which she saved. The other service rendered by the Countess of Dublin was to ship and cargo alone. The service was well rendered, there being great probability that the vessel might have been lost, or, what never must be forgotten in these cases, that she might have been a source of danger to other vessels whilst floating about in the ocean. Unfortunately the sum with which I have to deal is very small, and I am sorry to say that the reward cannot be very large. I shall award 200*l.* to the Hoopoe, and 800*l.* to the Countess of Dublin, with costs. These sums will cover all expenses and damage sustained by the salvors. I will certify for costs in the case of the Hoopoe.

THE LANCASHIRE.

Collision—Fog—Ferry boat—Right to run—Liability—Depositions before Receiver of wreck.

A steam ferry boat continuing to cross and recross the river Mersey during a dense fog takes upon herself the responsibility incident to such a course, and is not entitled to set up public convenience against the probability of loss of life and property; but she will be liable to any damage done to other vessels with which she may come into collision, provided those vessels take the precautions required by law to warn her of their position. (a)

A receiver of wreck in taking depositions under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) sect. 448, should put down the facts deposed to as given by the deponent, and should not correct any statement made by the deponent which within the personal knowledge of the receiver is erroneous. (b)

(a) This same principle is affirmed with regard to vessels crossing a good anchorage ground at sea in The Otter, post p. 208—Ed.

(b) Depositions taken before receivers of wreck are now commonly used in the High Court of Admiralty for the purposes of cross-examination, and sometimes even for contradicting witnesses who have made different statements at different times. On the purposes of cross-examination there is no doubt these depositions may lawfully be used just as much as any other statement in writing signed by a witness. But to contradict a witness they are not admissible, although so used in the Admiralty Court (see Northard v. Pepper, 2 Mar. Law Cas. O.S. 52); and it should not be forgotten that they have been used for that purpose in that court rather by consent than in consequence of any decision. If they were admissible for such a purpose, no doubt it would be very important that the receivers should take down only what the deponents say, and should not themselves offer any suggestions. When, however, the object of the enactment is considered, it will be seen that it is obviously the receiver's duty to extract from a deponent the best and most accurate information that it is possible to procure on the subject of the loss inquired into, and that the Act never contemplated these depositions being used to contradict witnesses as to the mode in which the loss occurred; if they could be used to contradict at all it would only be in case the witness denied that injury or loss of any kind had taken place after having sworn so in the deposition. The object of the enactment (Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 448) is to enable the receiver on ascertaining that a vessel has been lost or damaged, to obtain accurate information respecting her name and character and her cargo, the cause of her loss or injury, whether salvage service was rendered to her, and such other things as the receiver may think useful to the Board of Trade and to Lloyds, to each of whom he is bound to send a copy of the deposition. The provision has two objects: First, to let the Board of Trade, upon inquiry as to the causes of the loss and injury, and as to the necessary steps to be taken in that particular case, and to prevent the recurrence of similar catastrophes; secondly, to inform the persons most interested, whether owners or underwriters, by publication in a place where such losses are usually announced. The exact act of negligence which occasioned the loss it is no part of the receiver's duty to inquire into; he has to do only with the broad fact of the loss. If this be the case, it is his business to make the deposition accurate, if within his power. He would not be justified in allowing a man to depose by mistake, or even wilfully, that a collision had occurred off the North Coast of Ireland if it had to the receiver's knowledge occurred off the coast of Cornwall. The deponent might so depose to state of things which would have the effect of setting up a policy of insurance which would otherwise be vitiated by deviation. With the greatest respect to the learned judge, whatever value a receiver may take from a deposition by correcting a palpable error in it, he thereby only

THIS was a cause of collision instituted on behalf of the owners of the screw steamship Levant against the steam ferry boat Lancashire and against the Birkenhead Improvement Commissioners, her owners intervening.

The case on behalf of the plaintiffs, as appearing from their petition and evidence was that the Levant was a screw steamship of 472 tons register, and at the time of the collision was bound from Liverpool to Constantinople. She left the Queen's Basin in the river Mersey, on Oct. 26th, 1873, about one a.m., in charge of a licensed pilot, and came to an anchor in the river opposite the Albert Dock warehouses, according to the evidence of her pilot and crew (the exact place in which she was being a matter in dispute), she rode to sixty fathoms of chain in a clear berth, and, as alleged by the plaintiffs, in a safe and proper anchorage. At the time the Levant came to an anchor it was a fine clear night and lights were plainly visible, and the Levant hoisted her regulation riding lights. It was alleged by the plaintiffs that the crew of the Levant kept an anchor watch and a good look-out. About 6.30 a.m. on the morning of Oct. 26th a dense fog set in, and as alleged by the plaintiffs the fog bell on board the Levant was rung loudly at intervals of less than half a minute. The Levant had come to anchor on the flood tide, but when the fog came on the tide had turned and she was riding on the ebb, with her head to the southward. At about 7.30 on the same morning the Lancashire approached the Levant in the fog, and in spite of hailing from the Levant struck that ship's stem with her own port sponson. The petition of the plaintiffs after setting out the above facts charged the Lancashire with negligence as follows:

7. Those on board the Lancashire were navigating her at an improper rate of speed before the said collision.

8. A proper and sufficient look out was not kept on board the Lancashire before the said collision.

9. Those on board the Lancashire improperly neglected to keep clear of the Levant.

10. Having regard to the state of the weather, it was an improper proceeding on the part of those on board the Lancashire to cross the river Mersey.

11. Those on board the Lancashire improperly neglected to blow her whistle as frequently as is required by law.

12. The said collision was occasioned solely by the negligence or carelessness of those in charge of the Lancashire, and was not occasioned by any negligence or carelessness on the part of those in charge of the Levant.

The defendant's answer was as follows:—

1. The Lancashire is a large double-ended paddle-wheel steam ferry boat, and is steered from a platform placed in the middle of the vessel upon the saloon deck, which is above the passengers' deck cabin.

2. On the morning of the 26th Oct. last, at or about a quarter past seven o'clock, the Lancashire left the Woodside landing stage for the George's landing stage on the Liverpool side of the river Mersey. The tide being ebb, and it being the practice of the ferry boats to leave and approach the stages head to tide, the Lancashire left the stage with her head to the south, came round under a starboard helm, and proceeded in a north-easterly direction towards the George's landing stage. A good look-out was kept. The master was at the engine telegraph, one man was forward on the saloon deck on the look-out, two men were at the wheel, and one man was at the steam whistle. The Lancashire proceeded at a slow speed, about three knots an hour.

3. At the time the Lancashire left the Woodside performs his duty, and this he is bound to do quite irrespective of any future consideration as to the cross-examination of witnesses in the Admiralty Court.—Ed.

landing stage there was a dense fog, the wind calm. From the time of leaving the stage the whistle was continuously sounded.

4. A few minutes after leaving the Woodside landing stage, and in about mid-river, abreast of the George's landing stage, the look-out man forward called out "Vessel right a-head." The engines were immediately reversed full speed. The Levant was seen about half a boat's length a-head, no lights visible on her, and no bell ringing, as required by law. The port bow of the Lancashire struck the starboard side of the stem of the Levant, causing damage above the water line only.

5. The Levant was anchored in the regular track of the Woodside ferry boats, had no bell ringing as required by law, and no proper look-out.

6. Except so far as they are herein admitted, the defendants deny the truth of the allegations contained in the plaintiffs' petition.

7. The said collision was caused wholly by the negligent and improper conduct of those on board the Levant. They anchored their vessel in an improper and unsafe berth, in the known track of the ferry steamers. They had not a proper look-out, nor a bell ringing as required by law.

8. The said collision was not caused by any negligence on the part of those on board the Lancashire, and was, so far as they were concerned, an inevitable accident under the circumstances.

The pleadings were therefore concluded.

Evidence was called by plaintiffs to support the allegations in their petition that they duly sounded their bell during the fog, &c. It appeared in the course of the cross-examination of the mate of the Levant that when making his deposition before the receiver of wreck as to the injury to that vessel, he had stated in the first instance that the vessel was lying at the time of collision on the flood tide with her head to the northward; this statement the receiver, from his own knowledge of the circumstances perceiving to be incorrect, altered by inserting the actual fact, viz., that the Levant was lying at anchor on an ebb tide, with her head to the southward. The plaintiffs evidence is sufficiently set out in the judgment.

The evidence called by the defendants showed that the Lancashire is one of three large ferry boats running between Liverpool and Woodside in the river Mersey; they carry both goods and passengers, and, during the night and also during foggy weather, form the only means of communication between the Lancashire and Cheshire shores in that part of the Mersey; they always run during foggy weather in order to keep open the communication. These boats cross the Mersey within a certain space commonly known as the "Ferry Track," which is within a line drawn from the north pierhead of the Manchester Dock entrance on the Liverpool side to the south end of the Woodside landing stage, and another line drawn from the north pierhead of the Morpeth Dock entrance on the Cheshire side to the south end of the Prince's landing stage. When running in a fog only two boats are worked, and the running is so arranged that only one is making the transit at the same time. Attempts had been made by the Birkenhead Commissioners to induce the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board to make a by-law prohibiting vessels from anchoring in the ferry track, but the board had declined to do so on the ground that they did not consider that they had the power under their Acts; it appeared, however, that the superintendent of pilots had given informal directions to pilots ordering them to keep vessels under their charge clear of the ferry track whilst at anchor. Masters of the ferry boats had instructions from the Birkenhead commissioners to endeavour during foggy weather to induce all vessels lying in their course to keep their bells going constantly, so as to give them due warning of their position. During foggy weather a bell is rung on the George's Landing Stage, and another on the Woodside Landing Stage; when a ferry boat is about to leave either stage, her steam whistle is sounded, and is replied to by the bell on the other stage, so that the steamer may know the right direction to steer. This is repeated at short intervals during the passage. The defendants' witnesses alleged that the Levant was so anchored that on the flood tide she swung opposite the north end of the George's Landing Stage, and that she was consequently right in the track of the ferry boats. There were two other steamships lying at anchor within or close to the outside lines of the ferry track, the one to the north, the other to the south of the Levant; that to the southward of the Levant was the Anna. At 5.30 a.m. on the 26th Oct. 1873, the Lancashire, going from Liverpool to Woodside, passed under the Levant's stern, and the Levant's riding lights were then out; the master of the Lancashire hailed the Levant, but got no reply. On the return from Woodside at 6 a.m. her lights were still out and the fog was just then coming on. At 6.30 a.m. the Lancashire left the George's Stage whistling to warn ships; there were no other ships moving about, but those at anchor began ringing their bells as the fog had then come on. Passing to the southward of the Levant, the master of the Lancashire could only see her masts; not her hull. There was no bell ringing on board of her, according to the defendant's evidence. The Lancashire stopped, her whistle was blown, and her crew hailed the Levant, but got no answer. The Lancashire then continued her passage, and on arrival at Woodside, the master who had been in charge during the night left, and was succeeded by another man. The former master warned his successor of the position of the Levant and the other vessels. The collision occurred on the next trip from Woodside to Liverpool. The crew of the Levant and a number of passengers were called to prove that no bell was heard from the Levant before the collision, although they heard bells from the other vessels.

The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C., Myburgh with him) for the plaintiffs, contended, first, that it was a negligent act on the part of the defendants to cross the river in such a dense fog, and that no public convenience could justify the risk of loss to life and property run by such a course; the danger was shown by the defendants seeking to have the ferry track kept clear; secondly, supposing the Levant's bell was not rung the defendants had sufficient knowledge of the position to have enabled them to keep out of her way, and they were bound to do so; thirdly, the Levant was not in the ferry track, and even if she was she had a right to be there, no bylaw to the contrary existing; fourthly, the Levant's bell was continually rung. The requirement of the law is every five minutes (Regulations for preventing Collisions, Art. 10), and this having been fulfilled the speed of the defendant's boat would account for the not hearing it after leaving the stage.

Milward, Q.C. (Tidswell with him) for the defendants.—The substantial question is whether the Levant's bell was rung or not. Their duty was clearly to ring it oftener than five minutes under the special circumstances of the case (Art. 19). As long as the Lancashire went at a proper speed she was entitled to go, and ought not to be held liable. When such precautions are taken it cannot be said that the public are to be put to the inconvenience of having the ferry stopped. The ferry track ought to be kept open, and this is acknowledged by the pilots being ordered by their superintendent to keep it open. It may not be illegal to anchor in the ferry track, but it is clear that by the custom of the river it is not usual, and hence is improper. The speed of the Lancashire was very slow, as evidenced by the small amount of damage done.

The Admiralty Advocate in reply.—Even if it was improper to anchor there, which I contest, the defendant had no excuse for running into the Levant, knowing where she lay.

Sir R. J. PHILLIMORE.—In this case the Levant, a screw steamship of 472 tons register, and the Lancashire, a large paddle-wheel steam ferry boat, came into collision on the 26th Oct. last either at thirty minutes past seven in the morning, or at a very approximate time to that, in the river Mersey. The exact place is a matter of controversy, but it is sufficient to state at present that it was between the Woodside landing stage and the George's landing stage, and one-third from the Liverpool side. It appears from the evidence that this Levant had been brought by the pilot at about forty-five minutes past one in the morning out of the Queen's Basin, and he says that he anchored her abreast of the Albert Warehouses, and he brought her up by her starboard anchor with sixty fathoms of chain. A great deal of the discussion which has taken place before me has turned on the particular position in which this vessel, the Levant, was placed by the pilot. There is in this, as, I regret to say, in other parts of the case, a very great conflict of testimony. It is not to be laid out of consideration that she was brought up on the flood tide, and the ebb tide, of course, would make a considerable difference in her position. That she was at the time of the collision lying north and south, with her head to the south, there is no doubt at all. The probability appears to the court to be, after a consideration of the evidence, that she was not exactly in the place that is described either by the witnesses produced on behalf of the Levant or by those produced on the part of the Lancashire. She was probably nearer to the outside line, the southern line of the track in which this ferry-boat was in the habit of going; even if she was not actually within the two lines she was probably nearer than she represented herself to have been towards the southern line. However, she certainly was not in a place where it was unlawful for her to be, nor can I say, upon the evidence before me, that she was in a place in which it was improper for her to be.

The weather was perfectly calm, it was an ebb tide, it was a Sunday morning, and there appears to have prevailed, speaking generally from the evidence, great tranquillity at the time. I should observe, too, before I go into the other parts of the case, that the damage was slight, and I think that fact has been fairly used by the counsel for the Lancashire in aid of establishing the position that the ferry-boat, the Lancashire, was not going at a great speed at the time when the collision happened. I think I may as well say at once, to get rid of this part of the case, that the result of the evidence appears to be that she was going at the rate of about three knots an hour at the time the collision happened.

The Lancashire crosses, as I understand, about every ten minutes till eight o'clock in the evening, and after that once every hour during the night. On her last expedition she set out from the Woodside Ferry somewhere about a time variously stated from a quarter to twenty minutes past seven o'clock in the morning. Before she started there had come on a very dense fog. There is no dispute whatever as to this fact. It was a very dense fog, and the captain who had come over from the Liverpool side on the last trip warned the other captain to whom he gave up his charge, and who was to go back with her to the Liverpool side, that he had passed three vessels which were lying—to use his own expression—badly in her track.

Now a very great deal of dispute also has arisen as to the position of these two other vessels, one to the south and one to the north. With regard to the southernmost vessel we have the evidence of the pilot, who placed her in her position, with regard to the northernmost we have no evidence at all, because the ship had gone before the fog finally lifted; at all events no witnessess have been produced from on board of her. It was stated by several of the witnesses produced on behalf of the Lancashire that these other vessels, the north and south vessels, were also within the two lines which have been so much referred to—that is, in other words, within the usual track of the ferry-boat steamer. But it was fairly admitted by the manager, Mr. Penny, who was the last witness examined, and by other witnesses that those two vessels to the north and south were out of the tract of the steamer, and that is to be borne in mind. But Captain White who came over in command of her on her last expedition from the Liverpool shore, before the collision, tells us he passed round the Levant at twenty minutes past six, that he hailed her, sounded his whistle, that he could get no answer, and he came away; and certainly as the fog was just beginning to show itself at that time, it seems a very strange thing that, if he thought the Levant was in a dangerous position for the steamer which was about to return, he should have contented himself only with hailing and whistling, and come away without having drawn the attention of those on board to the situation in which she was. However, such appears to have been the case, and, as I have already said, he thought it his duty to warn the captain who succeeded him, Captain Howard, that there were three vessels badly in his way, or, as Captain Howard says, "He told me there were three steamers lying right in the track, two ringing their bell, and the centre one he could not get an answer from, but she was called the Levant."

The first question that arises in this case is, whether it was proper and right in this ferry-boat to go deliberately across the river in a fog of such a dense nature as here described, and with the knowledge of these vessels lying in her track, or one of them in her track, and the others nearly so, and also with the knowledge, as she contends, that one of them was insufficiently watched? It has been urged very strongly on the court that if this were not to be so, if the ferry-boat vessel was to be delayed on account of the fog the greatest possible inconvenience would ensue to the public; and the enormous number of ten millions and a quarter passengers per annum has been cited to me as a proof of this assertion. I have no doubt that it is very much for the convenience of the public that the ferry-boat should go in all weathers, and at all times; but at the same time I cannot myself think it right to set the possibility, or rather the probability, of danger to human life, to say nothing of damage to property—I mean, to set the great convenience of the public in competition with the probability of injuring human life, and greatly damaging property. At the same time, the custom appears to have been for this vessel to have gone in a fog always, and regulations appear to have been made with a view to preventing accidents, surrounding her with every precaution that was possible. That such precautions are not always available is perfectly clear, not only from what has happened in this case, but from the evidence of White himself, the captain, who says he has met occasionally with disasters in fog time, and from the knowledge which unfortunately the court has acquired while sitting in this judgment seat that such disasters have occurred notwithstanding the precautions such as the blowing of whistles, and the ringing of bells which the Legislature has provided. But one thing appears to me quite clear that if this ferry-boat vessel thinks herself justified in going across the river in such a dense fog as this she takes upon herself all the responsibility incident to such a course. She has the advantage if she goes over safely, and she must have the disadvantage if she injures life or property in the course of the passage.

One of the questions which I thought it my duty to put to the Elder Brethren was, assuming that there was no bell rung on board the Levant, and taking into consideration the assistance which the Lancashire derived in her navigation from the ringing of the bells on the George's landing stage, and from the knowledge of where these three vessels were on this occasion, whether ordinary skill would still have avoided the collision? The Elder Brethren are of opinion, and I entirely agree with them, that this would be the case, and that assuming that she had a right to cross the river in such a fog, and assuming that there was no bell rung on board the Levant, she could not be found to be to blame for this collision.

Upon this follows the next question, which is really and in fact the important question in this case, namely, the question whether the Levant did comply with the requisition of the law in ringing a proper bell, at proper times during the prevalence of this fog, and whether she did thereby convey to the Lancashire that knowledge which the Legislature thinks it right that all vessels should have in fogs? On that question the great controversy in the case has arisen, and there is unfortunately in this case, as often happens in this court, the greatest possible conflict of evidence upon the point. I must endeavour, and I have been assisted in this matter—although it properly devolves on the court alone, being a question of credibility of the witnesses—by many observations made to me by the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House. In the first place I must remark that there is no doubt there was a bell on board this ship, and a proper bell; and there is no doubt at all, considering the time, namely, that it was half-past seven or later, in the morning, that there is every probability that the bell would be rung during this fog, because the men, although there were only a few of them on board besides the two officers, would be at their work at that time in the morning, and there is every à priori probability of their taking the very natural and easy precaution of ringing the bell which, as I have already said, it is proved that they had on their deck. The positive evidence is very strong and very uniform. The witnesses are produced who rang the bell. The amount of time which was occupied by it is proved, although some little difference has been pointed out, as to the interval which elapsed in the ringing of the bell; but on examining that part of the case, I find very little difficulty in dealing with it. The first mate says, "I rang the bell every half minute for two minutes, and then I stopped half a minute." That is said to be in a direct contrast with the evidence of Davis, the Liverpool pilot of the Anna, whose evidence is extremely valuable in the opinion of the court, because it can be looked upon as perfectly disinterested. He says he brought the Anna to anchor in the river at the South end of the Albert Dock Warehouses; then he marked on the chart where she was; then he says he saw the Levant on his starboard quarter, a cable's length off. He went to sea at ten; at seven there was a dense fog, and he kept his bell going; then he says he heard the Levant's bell every half minute, and he heard the bell going at the time when he also heard the paddles of the approaching ferry boat. I do not think myself that this discrepancy between his hearing this bell every half minute, and the other man who said that he rang it for two minutes and then stopped, is a serious discrepancy at all. The great question is the fact, was there any bell rung or not? and it might very well be that this pilot of the Anna may be mistaken as to the pause that there was. Whether he heard it every half minute or not, he could not be mistaken very well, considering his position, as to whether the bell was rung or not, and it is very strong evidence as it seems to me in favour of the statement of the Levant, that the bell was rung during this period. But if I turn to the evidence on the other side, I must say, though it is at variance, and in conflict with that to which I have referred, that a close examination of it will very much diminish its efficacy. In the first place the variety of statement is very remarkable in this case. The witnesses who naturally would hear exactly the same sound from the same bell are very far from having done so. To take an instance which I have under my hand at this moment, Spargold, who was on board the Lancashire on the occasion, as a passenger, and who was standing on the port bow, he says, "There were several bells ringing, and I should not like to say how many bells there were," and again he says, "There were more bells than one to the southward." A previous witness, Young, who was the helmsman on board the Lancashire, said he heard two bells, one to the south and one to the north, and he heard the hailing to those on board the Levant, "Why don't you keep that bell going." The witness Kearing says, "I heard no bell at all before the collision,"—"up to the time of sighting the vessel," he said, which afterward he explained to be the same as the collision. He heard no bell at all

THE OWEN WALLIS.

After he heard one from the steamer to the north, and no other, except, he said, from the small tugs that were not in our track. And I think to the same effect was the evidence of the witness Gibbons, who was engineer of another steamer which had no connection with this case. He was a passenger, and was standing on the port side of the Lancashire. He said he heard one bell to the north of the Levant, he heard none to the south. He says the Levant's bell had a very good clear sound, and was a very good bell. Another witness of the name of Seed, who was master of a steam-tug, and who also happened to be a passenger, says he heard one bell a good bit off to the south. It is part of the case of the Lancashire that the two vessels between which the Levant was placed did ring their bells, and yet from what I have read it appears that some heard the bell from the northern; some heard that from the southern vessel, some heard both, and some heard none. And this satisfies me of the extreme difficulty with regard to these acoustics at sea of knowing with any very great accuracy, in such circumstances as these, the exact quarter from which the sound of the bell may come. And the Elder Brethren tell me, and I am very glad to have their opinion on this point, that they very much doubt whether in this case it was possible to tell whether the sound came from the northern vessel or the southern vessel.

Therefore, the case resolves itself into this, that there is affirmative, positive evidence on one side, supported by the independent testimony of the pilot of the Anna, that their bell was, as in all natural probability it would be, rung properly from the beginning of the coming on of the fog, and on the other side there are those statements which I have already pointed out, which are really at variance with themselves, as showing the great varieties of ways in which the sense of hearing seems to have been affected by those who were on board the Lancashire on that night. It is very far from the wish of the court to charge the witnesses produced on behalf of the Lancashire with wilful perjury. I can see that they may very fairly have been mistaken as to the quarter from which they heard the bell, whereas it would be quite impossible with respect to the witnesses who give their affirmative evidence, from the Levant that her bell was ringing, to come to any other conclusion, if that were not so, but that they were guilty of deliberate perjury.

Looking to the circumstances of the case, and without going further into the evidence, although other discrepancies might be pointed out, I am of opinion that the Levant has established the fact that her bell was rung at this time. It follows as a consequence, as it was admitted throughout, that if the court is of opinion that the bell was rung by the Levant, that she has done all her duty. Hence I must hold that the Lancashire is alone to blame for this collision.

Before I leave this case I wish to make an observation in consequence of what was said by the counsel, with respect to an error which I think the receiver of wreck has fallen into. He seems to have thought it his duty when he took the statement of one of the witnesses in this case, not simply to take down the witness's evidence as he gave it but to import his own evidence into it. That is a very great error on his part, and I trust will not be repeated by any receiver of wreck in the future. It will tend to make the depositions of witnesses of no value at all in this court.

THE OWEN WALLIS.

Collision — Steamship — Dumb barge — Lights — Course on river Thames — Duty to keep out of the way.

Dumb barges in motion driving with the tide up or down the river Thames at night are not bound to carry lights.

A dumb barge coming up the river Thames in a flood tide may keep on either side of the river, and there is no obligation on her by custom or otherwise to keep in mid-channel.

There is no duty on a dumb barge driving with the tide in the Thames to keep out of the way of a steamship; but it is the duty of the steamship to keep out of the way of the barge.

THIS was a cause of collision instituted on behalf of the owners of the dumb barge Lord Clarendon and of her cargo against the Owen Wallis and her owners intervening.

The plaintiffs petition was as follows :

1. At the time hereinafter stated the plaintiffs were possessed of a dumb barge called the Lord Clarendon and of certain cargo laden on board of her.

2. At about 2 a.m. on the 29th Dec. 1871, the said barge Lord Clarendon, of 60 tons burden, laden with cargo, was proceeding up the river Thames in charge of a licensed waterman and an apprentice, and was off the entrance to the Regent's Canal.

3. The wind at such time was about from south-east to east-south-east, the morning was fine and moonlight, and the tide was about half-flood, and of the force of about four knots per hour, and the Lord Clarendon was driving up the river with one oar out to keep her with her head up the river, and was over towards the south side of the river.

4. At such time the above-named steam vessel, Owen Wallis, which was under steam, came out of the entrance to the Regent's Canal, and instead of keeping clear of the Lord Clarendon, as she ought to have done, ran against, and with her stem struck the Lord Clarendon on her starboard side, and did her so much damage that those on board had to take the assistance of a steam tug, which towed her into shallow water, where she grounded, and some of her cargo was lost and the rest greatly injured.

5. The Owen Wallis went away without rendering or offering to render any assistance to the Lord Clarendon.

6. The Owen Wallis improperly neglected to take proper measures for keeping clear of the Lord Clarendon.

7. The Owen Wallis improperly neglected to comply with the provisions of Article G of the 29th of the By-laws for the Regulation of the Navigation of the River Thames. (a)

8. The said collision was occasioned by the negligence of those on board the Owen Wallis.

9. The said collision was not in any way occasioned by any negligence on the part of the plaintiffs or of those on board the Lord Clarendon.

The defendants' answer was as follows ;

1. At about 2 a.m. of the 29th Dec. 1871, the screw steam-ship Owen Wallis, of 599 tons register or thereabouts, propelled by engines of 95 horse power and manned by a crew of twenty hands, left the Regent's Canal Dock in the port of London in charge of Henry George Row, a licensed waterman, in water ballast, bound on a voyage to Newcastle-on-Tyne.

2. Shortly before 2.15 a.m. of the said morning the wind was about west-south-west, a light breeze, the weather was fine and clear, the tide was flood, and of the force of between three and four knots an hour, and the Owen Wallis was on the north side of the river Thames opposite the entrance of the said Regent's Canal Dock, and had her head down the river, her engines just beginning to work slowly ahead, and the Admiralty regulation lamps, to wit, a bright white lamp at her foremast head, a green lamp on her starboard side, and a red lamp on her port side, duly exhibited and burning well and brightly, and a good look-out being kept on board her.

(a) This bye-law corresponds with Art. 19 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea.—ED.

3. In this state of circumstances, and when the Owen Wallis had only been moved a few feet on her course down the river, a barge, which afterwards proved to be the Lord Clarendon, the owners of which are the plaintiffs now proceeding in this cause, was made out ahead of the Owen Wallis, at the distance of about two hundred feet, driving up athwart the tide and inside of the canal buoy, and thereupon the engines of the Owen Wallis were stopped and reversed full speed, but the starboard side of the barge came in contact with the stem of the Owen Wallis.

4. The barge had no light exhibited, and made no signal to warn vessels of her approach, and was not being navigated in a careful and proper manner, or in a proper part of the Channel, and those on board her neglected to use proper means to prevent her drifting against the Owen Wallis.

5. Those on board the Owen Wallis spoke to the men in charge of the barge after the collision, but the men in charge of the barge refused to receive advice or assistance from the Owen Wallis. The barge was picked up by a small steam tug and towed into the new ship entrance alongside the west pier at the Regent's Canal Dock.

6. The said collision and the damages and losses consequent thereon are attributable to the negligence and improper conduct of those on board the Lord Clarendon.

7. No blame is attributable to the Owen Wallis, or to any one on board of her.

8. The defendants deny the several allegations in the petition save such as are admitted by this answer.

The pleadings were thereupon concluded.

Jan. 23.—Evidence was called by plaintiffs and defendants in support of the allegations in the petition and answer respectively, the effect of which is sufficiently stated in the judgment. Evidence was also called by the defendants to show that it was the custom of dumb barges going up the river or a flood tide to keep in mid-channel so as to keep out of the way of vessels coming out of dock.

Butt, Q. C. (Clarkson with him) for the plaintiffs, contended that it was the duty of the defendants to keep out of the way of the barge, and that they might have done so if they had kept a good look out.

Gainsford Bruce (Herschell, Q. C., with him) for the defendants.—It is a question of importance whether barges ought to come up the side of the river on a flood tide when they know that vessels are coming out of dock; it is plainly the custom to go up mid-channel. A ship coming out of dock would not expect a barge to be coming up the side of the river, and hence the want of look out such as would discover a barge, a small object on the river, without a light, is not such an act of negligence as would render the ship to blame.

[Sir R. PHILLIMORE—Your witnesses said that if they had seen the barge 200 yards off they could have avoided the collision, and that a barge could have been seen at that distance.] If the look out did not see the barge as soon as he might have done, he was no doubt to blame. But is not the barge also to blame? She ought to have been in mid-channel, and to have kept out of the way. The rule as to keeping out of the way does not apply to a steamer in the case of a barge, and, moreover, there are exceptional circumstances here which require the barge to keep out of the way. The barge ought to have exhibited a light to warn the steamer of her position.

Butt, Q. C. in reply.—There is nothing in the Sailing Rules or the Thames Conservancy By-laws requiring barges in motion to carry lights, and if they did so it would be most misleading.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a case of collision which took place between a dumb barge and a steamer of 559 tons on Dec. 29, 1871. There is in these cases extreme difficulty in ascertaining facts when a suit is heard and decided in recentissimo facto, but the difficulty is greatly increased when such a length of time has elapsed between the collision and the hearing. The excuse for the delay given is that the parties were trying to come to some arrangement. On Dec. 29, 1871, in the early morning the barge was going up the Thames in charge of a licensed waterman on the flood tide. Unfortunately the waterman who had charge of the barge is since dead. When the barge got near the entrance of the Regent's Canal, about 2 a.m., the Owen Wallis, a steamer, which was in charge of a licensed waterman, was coming sternforemost out of the dock entrance. The barge was sweeping up in the flood tide, broadside on with two oars out. One man rowing with his face to her stem, the other with his face to her stern. One of the men discerned the Owen Wallis about 30 or 40 yards off. The steamer, according to her own statement, sighted the barge about 200 feet away and ahead.

Two questions have been raised; first, whether the barge was to blame, assuming she was not in mid-channel but to the north of it, for not keeping further out into the river, and so out of the way of the steamer; secondly, whether the barge was to blame for not carrying a light.

Now, I cannot hold that the barge was out of her right in coming up the river on either side as far as the law is concerned. It has been laid down in recent decisions, that vessels may navigate on either side of the river. It may be desirable that some uniform practice should be established; but I am by no means sure that it has been shown in this case that the barge was not in mid-channel.

It is further said that she carried no light. Now, not only is there no law requiring dumb barges to carry lights, but even if it were suggested that common prudence required it in such a place, there would be great difficulty as to what light a dumb barge ought to carry. The ordinary lights would on a barge be most misleading, and there is no provision for any other.

Then, what could the barge have done to get out of the steamer's way? Even if this were possible, there is no duty imposed by statute upon a barge to get out of the way of a steamer; nor do I consider that there was any duty under the special circumstances of the case. On the contrary, it was the duty of the steamer to get out of the way of the barge.

Now, the result of the evidence given on the part of the steamer is that, it being a morning when vessels could be seen at a fair distance, they ought to have made out the barge at a distance of 200 yards, whereas in fact no report was made at all of the barge by the look-out, and the pilot on going on to the bridge saw the barge at a distance of 30 or 40 yards only. The pilot had been aft whilst the ship was coming out of dock, and came on to the bridge only just before the collision. I must, therefore, hold that the evidence establishes that if there had been a good look-out and the barge had been reported in sufficient time, the steamer might have gone astern, and so have avoided collision.

I think it right to say that the Elder Brethren have suggested difficulties as to this being done by the steamer; but, as these difficulties were not proved, I must decide that the steamer is alone to blame, and this I do on my own responsibility.

Collision—Practice—Duty to begin—Fog over anchorage ground—Duty to anchor.

In all causes of damage, the onus being upon the plaintiff to establish negligence against the defendant, the plaintiff must begin; and this rule applies to cases where the only defence is inevitable accident and the plaintiff's vessel is at anchor, contrary to the former practice of the High Court of Admiralty.

Where a steamship whilst in a good and well-known anchorage ground, enters a dense fog, it is her duty to anchor at once; and if she neglects to do so, and continues her course, she will be to blame for a collision ensuing, provided that the other vessel has done all that the law requires. (a)

THIS was a cause of collision, instituted on behalf of the owners of the steamship J. H. Lorentzen, against the Tyne Steam Shipping Company (Limited), the owners of the late steamship Otter.

The plaintiffs' petition was as follows:—

1. The steamship J. H. Lorentzen, of 567 tons register, with a crew of seventeen hands, left Sunderland on the 19th Feb. 1873, with a cargo of coals, bound for Portsmouth. In the course of her voyage she encountered thick and foggy weather, and in consequence thereof was brought up to anchor between Mundesley and Hasborough, on the coast of Norfolk.

2. Between 7 and 7.30 a.m., on the 25th Feb. aforesaid, the J. H. Lorentzen was riding at anchor as aforesaid, in a good and proper berth, Hasborough Light Vessel bearing about north-east by north; Hasborough Church about south-west by south, and distant about five miles; Bacton bearing about south-west by west half-west, and Cromer Light about north-west by west. The wind was very light from the west, and it was very foggy. The tide was in the last quarter ebb, and of the force of nearly two knots an hour. The J. H. Lorentzen was riding with her head about south-east; a good look out was being kept on board her, and her bell was being frequently sounded, as required by law.

3. In these circumstances those on board the J. H. Lorentzen heard a whistle sounding several times on their port bow. Their bell was kept going. After a little time those on board the J. H. Lorentzen observed a steamship, which was the Otter (whose owners are proceeded against herein), about half a ship's length off, and crossing their bows from port to starboard; those on board the J. H. Lorentzen hailed the Otter to port her helm; but instead of this being done, the helm of the Otter was put a-starboard, and the Otter almost immediately came into collision with the J. H. Lorentzen striking her on her stem, with the starboard quarter very violently, and doing her considerable damage.

(a) This decision carries out to a legitimate conclusion the arguments to be derived from former decisions as to the precautions to be taken by vessels in a fog. In many instances it would be impossible for a ship to anchor whilst on its voyage on a fog overtaking it, and then she must go ahead to avoid drifting and loss of reckoning. Where, however, there is an opportunity of anchoring, common sense teaches that it is the right course to adopt. This principle has already been carried out in The Lancashire, ante, p. 202, where a ferry boat was held liable for damage done in crossing the Mersey in a fog.—Ed.

4. Shortly after the collision the Otter herself sank, from the damage which she received. Her master, crew, and passengers were received on board the J. H. Lorentzen.

5. The collision aforesaid, and the damage consequent thereon, were caused by, and are only attributable to the neglect, default, or mismanagement of the Otter, or those on board her.

6. No blame in respect of the said collision or damage is attributable to the J. H. Lorentzen, or to any of those on board her.

The defendants' answer was as follows:—

1. Between 7.30 a.m. and 8 a.m. on the 20th Feb. 1873, the screw steamer Otter, of 472/300 tons register, and 86-horse power, whilst on a voyage from Newcastle to Antwerp, with a general cargo and four passengers, was in the wold off Hasborough.

2. The wind at such time was about north, a light breeze, the tide was ebb and of the force of about three knots per hour, and there was a thick fog. The Otter was under steam, proceeding dead slow, feeling her way with the lead with a view to finding a safe and proper anchorage, and to coming to anchor on account of the fog. She was heading about south-west, and a good look out was being kept, and her steam whistle was being duly sounded at short intervals.

3. At such time the bell of the J. H. Lorentzen was heard, and immediately afterwards the J. H. Lorentzen was made out through the fog at a very short distance from the Otter, and bearing about a point on the starboard bow. The engines of the Otter were stopped and her helm was put hard a-starboard, but she, with her starboard quarter, came into collision with the stem of the J. H. Lorentzen, and the Otter received so much damage that she shortly afterwards foundered.

4. Save as herein appears the defendants deny the truth of the several statements and allegations contained in the first five articles of the petition filed in this cause, and say that the collision was, so far as the Otter was concerned, the result of inevitable accident.

The pleadings were thereupon concluded.

The case came on for hearing.

The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C.) (W. G. F. Phillimore with him), for the plaintiffs, claimed the right to begin; contending that in all causes of damage the plaintiffs having to prove negligence ought to have the right of reply, which they lost if the defendants began.

Clarkson (Webster with him) submitted that the defendants ought to begin, the plaintiffs' ship being at anchor.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The practice of the court has of late got out of gear as to the right to begin in cases of damage where the defendants rely on a defence of inevitable accident. Up to the time of the decision of the Privy Council in The Marpesia (26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 333; L. Rep. 4 C.P. 212; 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 261), following the practice of my predecessor on the point, I was accustomed to hold that the party pleading inevitable accident was bound to begin; but after that case I thought it my duty, rightly or wrongly, to hold that the party complaining must begin, notwithstanding that the pleadings set up the defence of inevitable accident alone. I wish the matter to be finally settled to-day. In the case of The Benmore (L. Rep. 4, Adm. & Ecc. 132), where no charge of negligence was made against the plaintiff, and the only defence raised in the pleadings was inevitable accident, I said that after the recent case of The Marpesia (ubi sup.)

THE OTTER.

[ADM.]

I could no longer allow the former practice to prevail, and I ruled that the plaintiffs must begin. Again, in the case of The Abraham (28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 775; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 34), I was persuaded by Mr. Clarkston that the effects of the ruling in the Marpesia was to oblige me to call upon the plaintiff to begin; and I said that I thought his view was correct, and that the Marpesia rightly expressed what ought to be the practice of the court. I therefore think it better to say that until the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council take a different view of this matter, I shall rule that the plaintiffs must begin in all cases of damage, whatever are the circumstances. I do not think that the rule I now lay down will make much, if any, difference in most cases which come before me, but at all events it is right that there should be a definite practice on the point.

Evidence was then called by the plaintiff and defendants in support of the allegations in the petition and answer respectively, which is sufficiently noticed in the judgment.

The Admiralty Advocate, for the plaintiffs, contended that the Otter ought to have anchored at once on the fog coming on, she being then in a good anchorage ground; that the plaintiff's crew had in every respect performed their duty in ringing their bell, and were guilty of no negligence.

Clarkson for the defendant, contended that the plaintiffs did not ring their bell, and that the defendant's ship was entitled to choose her own anchorage ground, having regard to safety.

Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—This is a case of collision between the J. H. Lorentzen, a steamship of 567 tons register, and the Otter, a screw steamship of about 472 tons register. The collision took place on the coast of Norfolk, with "Hasborough Light vessel bearing about N.E. by N., Hasborough Church bearing about S.W. by S. distant five miles, Bacton about S.W. by S. $\frac{1}{2}$ W. and Cromer Light about N.W. by N.," according to the statement in the plaintiff's preliminary act and pleadings; according to the statement by the defendant's preliminary act, "in the Wold off Hasborough."

The spot where the collision happened is, however, admitted, so there is no controversy between the parties on that point. The direction of the wind at the time is stated by the plaintiff to have been about W., and by the defendant as about N., but as it is admitted by both sides that the wind was very slight, this contradiction is not of any consequence, and can make no difference as to how the case is to be decided. Now, the J. H. Lorentzen appears to have been bound for Sunderland with a cargo of coals to Portsmouth; and in the course of her voyage she found herself in a dense fog, and in consequence anchored at about thirteen fathoms in the spot where the collision afterwards occurred, about a quarter to one in the morning of the 20th Feb. last. In the position which she had so taken up the J. H. Lorentzen lay in safety till about 7.30 a.m., when the Otter ran into her, her stem being struck by the starboard quarter of the Otter, and so much damage being done to the latter that she sank shortly after the collision. Now, the first question which arises in the case is this: If, in fact, the J. H. Lorentzen in anchoring where she did came to an anchor in a proper place—and that she did anchor in a proper place is the opinion of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, agreeing with my opinion formed during the argument upon perhaps less scientific consideration—were the precautions required by law to be taken by a vessel anchored under such circumstances, namely, by ringing her bell as often as the law required, observed by her? We think these precautions were observed. From these facts this proposition arises: that if the J. H. Lorentzen was anchored in a proper place, and made use of the signal, of which she was under an obligation to make use, she was in law entitled to have lain at her anchorage unmolested by any other vessel. I do not agree with the contention which has been made, that the approaching vessel, the Otter, by the sound of her steam whistle (which is stated to have been almost continuously blown) must have drowned the sound of the bell of the J. H. Lorentzen, and this prevented those on board the Otter from hearing it ringing. I must assume as to this that the Legislature in enacting as it has done, that during fog steamships shall sound a steam whistle at least every five minutes did not lay down the rule without consideration of all the consequences which might flow from its observance. I must also assume that the bell on board the J. H. Lorentzen was sounded according to law. This is in evidence. There is evidence, indeed that her bell was rung much oftener and more frequently than was required by the law. Then if the case is—as I must hold—that the J. H. Lorentzen is in nowise to be blamed for the collision, the further question arises, Was the collision occasioned by inevitable accident so far as the Otter was concerned? This involves two questions, and here I must refer to the statement of the case set up by the Otter. Now the Otter says in her statement that she was on a voyage from Newcastle to Antwerp with a general cargo and passengers; and was in the Wold of Hasborough. The tide was ebb, and of the force of about three knot per hours, and there was a dense fog—as dense a fog, the evidence proves, as could be described. "The Otter" (the statement goes on to say) "was under steam, proceeding dead slow, feeling her way with the lead with a view to finding a safe and proper anchorage, and to coming to anchor on account of the fog." Now what was the duty of the Otter in such a dense fog? I am of opinion she was, from after the time she passed the Hasborough Light vessel up to the time of collision, in a fair and proper anchorage ground. I am of opinion, and with this opinion the Elder Brethren agree, she ought to have come to an anchor before the collision. She knew her whereabouts. She was near Cromer Light and had just passed the Hasborough Light. These circumstances, in my opinion, which is borne out by that of the Elder Brethren, ought to have guided the master of the Otter as to the advisability of anchoring at once and not proceeding further through the fog. The Otter ought to have stayed where she was until the tide turned. It was merely an act of common prudence that she should have dropped her anchor in the position she found herself long before the collision occurred. I am of this opinion, and so the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House assure me. This, however, is not all; for the Elder Brethren also assure me that she ought not to have run on trying to find ten fathoms to anchor in, but ought to have anchored in water which she found as shallow as thirteen fathoms. It has been said that the rule laid down in Art. 16 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, does not contemplate that steam vessels in a fog must stop, but directs that "every steamship shall when in a fog go at a moderate speed," I am of opinion that the Legislature could not, by passing the rule, have intended to hold that such an extraordinary proposition was true as this, namely, that in whatever position a vessel might be in a fog it would be contrary to her duty, or that there would be no obligation on her, to stop. With regard to the speed at which the Otter was going, I think, as Mr. Clarkson rightly said, she was proceeding with all due care. I do not found my judgment on the question whether the manœuvre the Otter adopted, but unsuccessfully, to avoid the J. E. Lorenzen by starboarding her helm was the right manœuvre for her to take; but I think, for the reasons I have stated, that the Otter has not made out the plea of inevitable accident raised by her, nor show that she was not by negligence on her part liable for the collision. I find the Otter entirely to blame for the collision.

Collision — County Court appeal — Shorthand writers' notes — Corrections by County Court Judge — River navigation — Effect of river byelaws — Duty in fog.

In an appeal to the High Court of Admiralty from a County Court where there is a conflict between the transcript of the notes of evidence and judgment taken by a shorthand writer in the County Court under the County Court Rules No. 32, and the County Court Judge's own notes, the version given by the County Court Judge must be accepted as binding, and if the County Court Judge alters the shorthand writer's notes so as to correspond with his own version, the Court of Admiralty will order the alterations so made to be carried into effect in the printed copies of the appendix.

Byelaws made by a local authority governing the navigation of a river are to be taken as evidence of what it is the duty of vessels to do in the circumstances named therein, and although the mere breach of one or any of them will not be sufficient reason for holding a ship to blame for the collision yet, if that breach occasions or contributes to the collision, the existence of the byelaw will afford the best reason for holding the ship violating the byelaw to be guilty of a breach of duty, and consequently to blame for the collision.

Where a byelaw regulating the navigation of a river prescribes the side of the river upon which a ship is to navigate going up or down the river, the observance of this byelaw is doubly necessary during a fog when vessels can only be made out at short distances; and the breach of the byelaw cannot be excused by the plea that it was usual during foggy weather to navigate on the wrong side of the river in order to insure greater safety for the vessel so doing.

THIS was an appeal from decrees of the Judge of the County Court of Northumberland, holden at Newcastle-on-Tyne, in cross causes of damage instituted in personam, the one by the owners of the screw steamship Holmside, against the owners of the screw steamship Raithwaite Hall, the other by the owners of the Raithwaite Hall against the owners of the Holmside. The appellants in both causes were the owners of the Holmside.

The story told by the appellants was as follows: The Holmside was a screw steamship of 593 register tons, and 98 horse power, and on the 2nd April 1873 she left the Tyne Dock, on the river Tyne, at about 6.30 a.m., with a cargo of coals bound for London. During the previous night a very dense fog had prevailed, and at the time of the Holmside leaving dock still continued, but was beginning to lift. The Holmside was in charge of a licensed pilot, and went down the river dead slow, keeping on the south side of the river about 30 feet from the tiers of ships on that side. At that time those on board of her could see for a distance of about 700 feet. The Holmside went dead slow till she got into the Narrows opposite a shipbuilding yard known as Wallace's Yard; there she stopped her engines to wait for the pilot's coble. She had way on her, however, and continued down the river till she came to another yard known as Softly's Yard. Then a steamer was reported right ahead. The Holmside was at this time nearly stopped; her engines were immediately put full speed astern, and her helm put hard a port. The other steamer, which was the Raithwaite Hall, came on and struck the Holmside port bow to port bow. The allegations of negligence against the Raithwaite Hall were that she had not a proper look-out, that she neglected to port her helm, and that she was coming up the river on the wrong side, contrary to the provisions of the Tyne Byelaws which will be found set out in the judgment of the court.

The evidence on behalf of the respondents was as follows: The Raithwaite Hall was a screw steamer trading from and to the port of Newcastle-on-Tyne. At about noon on the 1st April 1873 she arrived off the Tyne. The weather was very thick, and her master, not being able to make out the river, cast anchor. On the following morning, about 5.30 a.m. the fog was beginning to lift, and the Raithwaite Hall got under weigh and entered the river. When she started, the Souter Horne bore about W.S.W.; she made the Bell Buoy at the end of the South Pier, and then the Herd Sand Buoy, and kept up the south side of the river till she came to the Fish Pier. Her head was then put slightly over towards the northward; her speed was slackened, and she whistled for her pilot. Immediately afterwards the Holmside was reported ahead; the Raithwaite Hall's helm was put hard a port and her engines reversed. The collision then occurred. At the time of the collision the Raithwaite Hall was stopped, if she had not stern way on. The place of the collision was, according to some of the respondents' witnesses, in midchannel; according to others to the south of midchannel. In entering the river the master of the Raithwaite Hall had declined to take a pilot, because he could not get his usual pilot, and after entering the river did not use his lead to ascertain the position in the river. The respondents charged the Holmside with proceeding at an improper pace in such a fog, and with being unable in consequence of that pace to stop in sufficient time to avoid a collision.

The learned County Court Judge (Thomas Bradshaw, Esq.) gave judgment in favour of the respondents, as soon as the case was concluded, holding that the Holmside was alone to blame, on the ground that she was going at an improper pace. Afterwards, when an appeal was asserted, he gave his reasons in writing; he then found as a fact, that the collision took place south of mid-channel, abreast of Softley's Yard, at a distance of about 200 feet from the south shore line, and somewhere about eighty or ninety feet from the Fish jetty end, and about the same distance west of the jetty, and then said:—"Upon the state of things thus shown, the plaintiffs' counsel contended that, as the Raihwaiite Hall was not in her proper water, under the seventeenth rule of the Byelaws for the Navigation of the Tyne, the plaintiffs were entitled to my judgment in their favour, on the ground of the infraction of this rule by the defendants' vessel. I have before had occasion to say that I cannot accede to this view. These byelaws were authorised to be made for the orderly navigation of the river in ordinary circumstances, and for the infraction of any of them they prescribe their own penalties. But the principle upon which regulations of this nature are to be construed and obeyed is well understood. Due regard is to be had to the dangers of navigation and also to any special circumstances that may arise in any particular case rendering a departure from them excusable or even necessary. But I do not rest my opinion in this matter on principle alone. I have authority with me also. In giving judgment in the Court of Exchequer, in Smith v. Voss (26 L. J. 233, Ex. ; 2H. & N. 97), Bramwell, V. uses some words which are in point. He says: 'Disobedience of the rule of the road is some evidence against the vessel or vehicle; obedience is some evidence in its favor; but it still leaves the question open, whether the one or the other caused the collision.' I quote these words as showing that such an infraction of a byelaw would not, even under ordinary circumstances, be regarded as conclusive of the question. But the circumstances here are not ordinary ones. It is in evidence that the fog was drifting to the northward. I have already stated, and it is in evidence, that the Raihwaiite Hall had been grappling up the river on the south side in the dense fog. Now this is precisely, as it seems to me, one of those special cases in which a departure from the byelaw might become necessary in order to avoid danger. Moreover, the evidence shows that there are differences of opinion among the pilots as to what is the best and safest course to take in entering and proceeding up the river Tyne in densely foggy weather. It is sufficient to refer to James Young's evidence. He said, in reply to the assessors, 'that in foggy weather he should have taken the course taken by the Raihwaiite Hall that morning, grappling up the south side, till he got abreast the jetty, and then angling over to the northward.' He said, also, in re-examination to Mr. Blackwell: 'In foggy weather we must do so.' Young probably speaks with as much authority as anyone on a matter like this. He is a man of the greatest experience—a pilot of thirty-six years' standing—the plaintiffs' witness, and pilot of the plaintiffs' vessel at the time. If any other evidence were needed, it may be found in the fact that the two experienced men who sat with me as assessors were divided in opinion about it, and I was thereby deprived of the benefit of their united counsel and assistance, and forced to give my judgment without their sanction. I cannot, therefore, and I do not find that the Raihwaiite Hall was a wrongdoer in thus infringing the 17th byelaw, or that she was guilty of contributory negligence in taking the course she did under the circumstances. The cause of the collision must be sought for elsewhere." He then found that the Raihwaiite Hall was almost stationary at the time of the collision, and that the Holmside—whatever her pace, which he did not exactly fix—was going too fast, considering the circumstances and state of the weather on the morning in question; that she was not sufficiently in hand, and, consequently, could not bring herself up in time to avoid a collision within the distance that her look-out could see vessels on that morning; and that the Holmside was on that account alone to blame.

From these decrees the owners of the Holmside appealed. The evidence had been taken below by a shorthand writer, and his notes were printed and filed for use on the appeal. The printed transcript of the notes of the evidence and notes having been submitted to the County Court judge, he corrected the evidence in respect of certain questions which he himself had asked, and also corrected his judgment where he alleged it to have been incorrectly reported. These corrections were made by indorsements in the margin of one of the printed appendices.

Jan. 20.—Webster, for the respondents, now moved that the shorthand writer's notes and the printed copies thereof should be altered, in accordance with the County Court judge's corrections. The shorthand writer's notes are admitted to prove the evidence of the witnesses, under rule 32 of the General Orders Regulating the Practice of the County Courts of Admiralty Jurisdiction, but they cannot be taken as against the judge's notes; in common law cases the judge's notes are always held binding.

E. C. Clarkson, for the respondents, contended that the shorthand writer's notes were binding, and could not be altered. The shorthand writer is sworn to take the evidence and judgment correctly, and the 32nd rule clearly shows that his notes are intended to be binding. Unless it is positively shown that the notes are erroneous, they should not be altered, and this has not been done. The judge ought not to be allowed to correct the notes with a view of making his judgment appear correct.

Webster, in reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—There is no dispute in this case as to the decree; no dispute as to the judgment; no conflict of evidence as to what the judgment was in its result; and the only question which the court has before it is, whether the court shall accept as accurate the shorthand writer's notes or the version of the evidence and reasons for the judgment, as corrected and stated by the judge himself. I am of opinion that it is my duty to accept the latter. I am clear that the judge has a perfect right to place before the Court of Appeal the actual reasons for his judgment, and that where there is a conflict between the judge and the shorthand writer as to questions and answers put and received, the judge's version must be accepted, more especially where those questions were put by the judge himself. I will only repeat, what I have so often said, that the practice of the County Court judges giving reasons for their judgments in cases coming up on appeal, ought always to be followed, and is, indeed, of great assistance to the court. There is no difficulty in the present case. The course I shall pursue in the matter is this: I shall direct the registrar to see that the amendments made by the learned judge are inserted in the margin of the printed appendix in red ink, so that the alterations may be opposite to the parts which are, in the learned County Court judge's opinion, inaccurate. I shall therefore grant the prayer of the motion. The costs will be costs in the cause.

Feb. 12.—The appeal now came on for hearing.

Millward, Q.C. and Clarkson for the appellants.

Webster and Davidson, for the respondents.

The arguments sufficiently appear in the judgment.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is an appeal from a decree of the judge of the County Court of Northumberland, holden at Newcastle-on-Tyne, in cross causes of collision, brought by the owners of the screw steamer Holmside against the owners of the screw steamer Raithwaite Hall, and by the latter against the former respectively. The collision took place about seven o'clock in the morning of the 2nd April 1873, on the south side of the river Tyne, off a yard known as Softley's Yard. The learned judge of the court below found that the Holmside, which was coming down the river, was alone to blame, and his decision was founded upon the pace at which she was going in a fog—founded solely on her speed.

The learned judge has taken great pains to render his judgment perspicuous by most carefully stating his reasons—a circumstance which, of itself, would make the court most reluctant to reverse the decision of the tribunal, which has had the great advantage of having the witnesses examined before it. The judgment, however, rests almost entirely upon the learned judge, for the nautical assessors appear to have differed among themselves and from the court; and this is a circumstance deserving of notice. Hence the decision was rightly given upon the responsibility of the judge alone, and rests, as I have already pointed out, upon the fact of there being a very thick fog, and the pace of the Holmside during that fog.

It appears that the Raithwaite Hall had arrived off the Tyne the night before the collision, and had there anchored, thinking it not safe to proceed on account of the fog. The next morning, however, her master deemed it right to attempt to enter the river.

Now certain bye-laws have been admitted and put in as binding upon vessels navigating the river Tyne, and they purport to be made by the Tyne Improvement Commissioners under various Acts of Parliament. There should, however, be no misunderstanding as to the effect of these and similar byelaws governing the navigation of a river. It cannot be held that, because they or any of them are disobeyed, the vessel disobeying them must therefore be held to blame. They are only evidence of what it is the duty of a vessel to do under the circumstances named in the particular byelaw. As such evidence, however, they are an important element in every case that comes within their provisions, and if it should appear that by the breach of one of them a ship has occasioned or contributed to a collision, the existence of such a byelaw would afford the very strongest reason for holding that that ship had been guilty of a breach of duty, and was to blame for the collision.

Now, by clause 17 of these bye-laws, it is provided that "All vessels navigating the river, when proceeding towards sea, shall keep from south of mid-channel; and when coming to the seaward, shall keep to the north of midchannel, so that the port helm may be always applied to clear vessels proceeding in the opposite direction." By clause 18, "All steam vessels, and vessels towed by steam vessels, must so approach the river from sea as to enter on that side of the channel reserved for their navigation." By clause 19, "All vessels when under weigh, requiring to pass over a part of the channel which is not within that half reserved for their navigation, for the purpose of proceeding to or from landing moorings or other places, must take upon themselves the responsibility of doing so in safety, with reference to the passing traffic, &c." The 22nd clause is, "When steam vessels, proceeding in opposite directions, approach each other, they shall, at a proper distance, put their helms to port, and when within thirty yards shall ease their engines sufficiently, and keep as near as possible to the right or starboard side of the river, so as to afford all possible facility for passing each other."

The fact is admitted, and upon this point there is no controversy, that this collision took place south of mid-channel, or in what may be called the waters of the Holmside. This fact is most material in the consideration of the case. There is no question either as to the state of the weather. There was a very thick fog, lifting occasionally, but, as one witness says, "no one could judge accurately as to what course to take." Other witnesses used various words to express its density, but they all agreed that it was sufficiently dense to prevent vessels being seen at a greater distance than 700 or 800 feet.

The observation which the court naturally makes on this part of the case is, that, if vessels choose to navigate in such a fog as this seems to have been, they do it at their own peril, and it is incumbent on them to navigate with every precaution and act of prudence possible; and if a course of navigation has been laid down by competent authorities and well-known rules, surely it is not less, but rather more, incumbent upon vessels to keep that course and to observe those rules, and if they neglect to do so they must answer for the consequences of that neglect. I am at a loss to understand the argument, that because there was a dense fog, the rules might therefore be departed from. I myself should have arrived at the conclusion that the existence of the fog was the most conclusive reason for obeying the rules, and that each vessel would on that very account have good reason to think that the other was obeying the law. That a vessel should navigate in a river at all during such a fog is a dangerous and reprehensible thing, and it is probable that the Holmside would not have started if the fog had not begun to lift shortly before she left dock. This, however, was not alleged against the Holmside in the court below as an act of negligence, probably because the river regulations do not prohibit navigation in a fog, for they provide (clause 38), that "during fogs the speed of steam vessels navigating the port shall not exceed half speed;" but, nevertheless, the existence of a fog renders it the more incumbent upon vessels so navigating to observe the regulations.

THE KJOBENHAVN.

Now, not only did the Raithwaite Hall disobey the rule as to the side of the river on which she was to navigate, but she did not even take the ordinary precaution of employing a pilot. Her captain took upon himself the responsibility of taking his ship into port in that fog. He entered the river on the south side, and intended to cross from the Fish Pier to the northward, and his defence for his disobedience to the rules is, that there is a custom that overrides the law. Some of the pilots who were called for the Raithwaite Hall, say that there may be such a regulation, but that when a ship is entering the river in a fog, it is the custom to come in on the south side until she sights the Fish Pier, and then make over to the northward.

In the first place it would be extremely difficult for any court to support the proposition that it is competent for any person to set aside an established regulation, which is binding in law, for their own convenience. It is incumbent upon the court to uphold the law.

But I am by no means satisfied that any such general custom has been proved, nor that there was any such safety for vessels taking that course in a fog as would form good ground for establishing such a custom. One of the nautical assessors was evidently struck by this, for he asked the master of the Raithwaite Hall: "Q. If you had come up on the north after you saw the Herd Buoy, and had gone and found the Beacon on the Middens, would there have been a collision? A. You see the danger is putting your ship aground.—Q. I am not asking you about that; I have my opinion of that, and I was the one who had the Beacon put there? A. There is just as likely to be a collision as there was, because the ships were not in sight.—Q. You would not have been able to grapple your way up there? A. Not so well as on the south side.—Q. Because you never put your lead overboard? A. I told you the truth; I never used the lead in the harbour, in the river." There can be no doubt that the Middens is a dangerous place, but the cause indicated by the nautical assessor might have been pursued in the opinion of the Elder Brethren, provided the master had taken careful soundings.

This shows that the collision might have been avoided, despite the weather, if the Raithwaite Hall had taken ordinary precautions, and had obeyed the regulations. But here is a vessel going up the Tyne in a thick fog, on her wrong side, without employing a pilot or using her lead, and the court is asked to find another, which is navigated with both care and skill, alone to blame for an ensuing collision. The learned judge found the Holmside to blame, on the ground of her speed alone; but he admitted that he could not fix that speed accurately. No doubt the result of the evidence is to leave her speed uncertain, but it is clear that she was not going more than four knots. According to her master she was going dead slow, and just before the collision was nearly stopped. The Raithwaite Hall was then reported right ahead, and was at the distance of about 700 feet; she came straight on and struck the Holmside's port bow with her own port bow.

The Elder Brethren are quite agreed upon the nautical points in this case, and also agree with me as to the effect of the evidence. I am unable to make out from that evidence how the judgment below can be maintained on the basis on which the learned judge has placed it, namely, that the Holmside was going at an undue pace. It never seems to have occurred to the learned judge that the Raithwaite Hall was to blame for her infraction of the law, and he condemns the Holmside alone. The evidence leads me to the exactly opposite conclusion, and, however much I regret it, I must reverse the judgment below, and find the Raithwaite Hall alone to blame. I shall allow the costs of this appeal, and those in the court below.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

ON APPEAL FROM THE HIGH COURT OF ADMIRALTY OF ENGLAND.

Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Feb. 13, 14, and 17, 1874.

(Present: The Right Hons. Sir J. W. COLVILLE, Sir BARNES PEACOCK, Sir MONTAGUE SMITH, Sir R. P. COLLIER.)

THE KJOBENHAVN.

Collision—Defence—Inability to comply with regulations—Disabled ship—Prior collision—Responsibility for.

Where a ship seeks to excuse her failure to comply with the sailing regulations and with a seaman-like precaution, by showing that such a failure was in consequence of her being disabled in a prior collision, it is material to inquire whether the prior collision was due to her default, or was the result of inevitable accident.

Seemle, if the prior collision be due to the default of the ship so seeking excuse, and if her subsequent failure to comply as aforesaid contribute to the collision proceeded for, she will be to blame therefor.

THIS was an appeal from a decree of the learned Judge of the High Court of Admiralty of England (Sir R. Phillimore) in a cause of damage lately pending in that court, promoted and brought by the appellants, the General Steam Navigation Company as owners of the late steamship Mermaid against the Kjobenhavn and her owners, the respondents intervening, to recover damages for the total loss of the Mermaid in a collision between the two ships. The collision occurred in the river Thames, about half-a-mile above the Ovens Buoy, off Coal House Point, on the north side of the river.

The Mermaid was a screw steamship of 377 tons register, and 90 horse power, and was bound from Shields to London with a cargo of coals. The Kjobenhavn was a screw steamer of 700 tons register and 100 horse power.

The case on behalf of the Mermaid, was that she was proceeding up the river at full speed on the north shore, rounding Coal House Point, when the masthead light of a steam vessel, which proved to be the Kjobenhavn, was seen a little on the starboard bow of the Mermaid, distant about half a mile; that the engines of the Mermaid were eased, and her helm ported, in the expectation that the Kjobenhavn, which was supposed to be under way coming down, would also port her helm, so that the two vessels might pass port side to port side, but that the Kjobenhavn proved to be at anchor, and although the engines of the Mermaid were stopped and reversed, the Mermaid with her port side came into collision with the stem of the Kjobenhavn, and suffered a great deal of damage. That the Mermaid was run ashore, but slid off again into deep water, and became a total wreck.

Priv. Co.]

THE KJOBENHAVN.

[Priv. Co.]

The appellants attribute blame to the Kjobenhavn for having been improperly lying at anchor in an unusual and improper place, for having improperly had her masthead light up and burning, and for not having had a riding light up. They called the harbour master of Gravesend, to show that the place where the Kjobenhavn was anchored was improper, and that he should have removed her if he had seen her.

The respondents in their answer alleged—

2. That the Kjobenhavn was lying at anchor near the Essex shore, just above Coal House Point. That the wind was about E.N.E., very light. That the tide was about half flood, and of the force of about three and a half knots an hour; that the weather was fine with a slight haze on the water; that there were occasional clouds of smoke issuing from some cement factories a little lower down, and borne across the river; that the Kjobenhavn was riding with twenty-five fathoms of chain, heading steadily to the tide, and sheered out from shore under a port helm.

3. That the Kjobenhavn had not been long at anchor; that the bright white or masthead light was, when she came to anchor, carried on the outer jib stay, about thirty-six feet above the hull, and remained there till the collision; that it exhibited a clear light to all vessels coming up the river; that just before the Kjobenhavn had come to anchor, as aforesaid, she had been in collision without any fault on her own part with a brig riding at anchor. That in this collision her riding light had been destroyed; that at the time she came to anchor, as aforesaid, and up to the time of the collision, she had not any proper riding light, and could not exhibit one.

4. In these circumstances those on board the Kjobenhavn observed the white and red lights of a steam ship from one to two ship's lengths off and nearly ahead. They were unable to do anything to avoid the steamship carrying these lights, which was the Mermaid, whose owners are proceeding herein, and she almost immediately came in collision with the Kjobenhavn, her port side striking the stem of the Kjobenhavn with considerable violence. The Mermaid then passed, and no damage was done to the Kjobenhavn.

5. Save as hereinbefore in Art. 3 has been stated, the Kjobenhavn had not improperly her masthead light up and burning, and was not improperly lying at anchor without having a proper riding light up. The light which was hung on the Kjobenhavn as in Art. 3 stated was for all vessels coming up the river equivalent to a proper riding light, and the presence of this light and the absence of any other light did not in anywise contribute to the collision.

The respondents denied that the Kjobenhavn was at anchor in an unusual or improper place, and attributed the collision to the neglect, default, or mismanagement of those on board the Mermaid.

The cause was heard before the learned judge, assisted by two of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity Corporation, and the witnesses were examined orally in open court.

It was proved and found by the learned judge, as a fact, that the Kjobenhavn was lying at anchor in an improper and unusual place, and evidence was given to prove that she had come into collision with the brig owing to the carelessness of those on board the Kjobenhavn. The brig was lying at anchor about a quarter of a mile below the Ovens Buoy, and about three lengths to the south of mid channel in the fairway, and in the midst of a thick smoke coming across the river. The defence of the Kjobenhavn was that by reason of this smoke, her master and crew were unable to distinguish the brig until too late to avoid a collision, and that the brig injured them to such an extent that her steering gear would not act, their lamp room was broken in, their riding lights broken, and that they were compelled to come to anchor at once, and even if they had had another light they had not time to have hoisted it between the two collisions. The master of the Kjobenhavn in his evidence admitted that the respondents had paid to the owners of the brig the whole of the amount (116*l.*) of the damage claimed by the owners of the brig in respect of the collision between the Kjobenhavn and the brig.

The learned judge of the court below found that the Kjobenhavn was lying at anchor in an improper place, and that she had not a proper light up, carrying as she did her masthead light, hung 15 or 16 feet higher than an ordinary anchor light; but that this was necessitated by the collision with the brig, which occurred by no fault of the Kjobenhavn, but rather by the fault of the brig; and that the Kjobenhavn must be considered as having been reduced to that condition by inevitable necessity, and by no misconduct on her part; that she anchored out of the fairway, and no vessel ought to have come near her; that there was not time to lower the light to the proper level of an anchor light, and even if there was this light could not have deceived the Mermaid, or in any way contributed to the collision; and that the Mermaid was going at an improper speed when entering the smoke, and ought not to have ported her helm; that she ought to have slackened speed and held on her course, that the effect of porting was to cause the collision; and pronounced the collision in question in the cause to have been solely occasioned by the improper navigation of the Mermaid, and by his decree dismissed the suit with costs.

It is from such decree that this appeal was brought.

The appellants submitted that the decree appealed from ought to be reversed for the following amongst other reasons:

1. Because the evidence proved that the Kjobenhavn was lying at anchor in an improper and unusual place.

2. Because the evidence proved that the Kjobenhavn was improperly lying at anchor without any proper riding light up, and that she improperly had a masthead light exhibited at a height of thirty-six feet above her deck, being a height exceeding by sixteen feet the height at which anchor lights ought to be exhibited.

3. Because it lay upon the respondents to prove that the collision between the Kjobenhavn and the brig happened without any negligence on the part of the Kjobenhavn, and that the Kjobenhavn was therefore compelled by no fault of her own to anchor where she did, and prevented by no fault of her own from exhibiting a proper anchor light, and the respondents failed to discharge such burden of proof.

4. Because the evidence proved that the said collision with the brig was occasioned or contributed to by some neglect on the part of those on board the Kjobenhavn.

5. Because those on board the Kjobenhavn improperly left the masthead light of the Kjobenhavn at too great a height from her deck.

Priv. Co.]

THE KJOBENHAVN.

6. Because the evidence proved that those on board the Mermaid were misled by the position of the Kjobenhavn, and by seeing her masthead light, into supposing that the Kjobenhavn was under way, and into acting accordingly.

7. Because the evidence proved that the collision was occasioned by the negligence of those on board the Kjobenhavn.

8. Because the evidence proved that the collision was not occasioned by any improper navigation on the part of the Mermaid.

Butt, Q.C. and E. C. Clarkson for the appellants—The respondents are liable both because their ship was anchored in an improper place, and failed to carry the proper light; they have failed to show excuse for these acts of default, inasmuch as they have not shown that they were free from blame in respect of the collision with the brig. No doubt it was the porting of the Mermaid's helm, which brought about the collision, but she was led into that act by the misleading light carried by the other vessel. The Mermaid was bound to port, supposing the other ship to be coming down the river, because she was going round the curve of the river, and would expect the other ship to keep outside. The course up and down the river is a line parallel with the banks, and hence the meeting or crossing rules do not strictly apply, but vessels are bound to keep their relative courses with regard to the banks of the river.

The Velocity, L. Rep. 3 P. C. 44; 21 L. T. Rep. N. S. 686; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 308;

The Ranger, The Cologne, ante, vol. 1, p. 484; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 769.

The Mermaid knowing that no large ship anchored in that place properly assumed that the Kjobenhavn was coming down the river, and that some action was necessary. The masthead light was easily distinguishable from an ordinary anchor light, and this misled the Mermaid.

Sir J. Karlake, Q.C. and W. G. F. Phillimore for the respondents.—The Mermaid kept a bad look out, and ought to have known that smoke was usually in that place, and to have come through it at a slower speed. They ought not to have ported till they discovered side lights, even if they did mistake the Kjobenhavn for a vessel under way. The Kjobenhavn cannot be held to blame for the collision with the brig. After that collision there was no time to change the lights, even if it was possible. The Kjobenhavn was anchored in a proper place. [Sir J. W. Colville.—There can be no doubt that if you had cast anchor in that neighbourhood without being compelled to do so by the first collision, you ought to have gone up beyond the point B., and have anchored on the south side.] (a). Their porting was an improper act, even if we were in motion; it would have run them ashore.

Clarkson in reply.—The Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), sect. 27 is very stringent, and enacts that a vessel shall carry the prescribed lights and no others; hence the respondents were carrying not merely a wrong light but a prohibited light. They must show, in order to be excused, that they did this from absolute necessity. In this they have failed, as they admit that they had a globular light, and do not show why it was not put up. They were guilty of negligence in getting into such a position, and they have practically admitted this by paying for the damage done to the brig. [Sir BARNES PEACOCK.—The Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, sect. 29, provides that a ship guilty of a breach of the regulations which occasions the collision, "shall be deemed in fault, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the circumstances of the case made a departure from the regulations necessary." If by reason of the first collision the Kjobenhavn was compelled to anchor in an improper place, would not that be a circumstance which rendered it necessary to anchor in that place, and, having by the same means lost her lights, to carry the one she did? Could her former negligence, if it existed, render her liable for the second collision? or to follow it out, if the brig was to blame for the first collision could she have been proceeded against for the damage to the Mermaid? Sir MONTAGUE SMITH.—A similar case arose here, but I do not think the point was decided.] (a) There is no decided case on the point, but the real question is whether the default was occasioned by any negligent act in the first instance. The Kjobenhavn was without her lights, and she pleads that this happened without her default; she must therefore show that she was not to blame for that which caused her to be in the fairway without her proper light.

Feb. 17.—The judgment of the court was delivered by Sir J. W. Colville.—The general facts of this case are stated by the learned judge of the Court of Admiralty in the two first paragraphs of the judgment, against which the appeal is brought, as clearly as it is possible for me to state them. He says:—"This is a case of collision between a screw steamship called the Mermaid and a screw steamship called the Kjobenhavn. It took place between nine and ten o'clock on the night of Friday the 28th March. The place of collision was about half a mile from the Ovens Buoy off Coal House Point, on the north side of the river Thames, and in Gravesend Reach. The tide was about half flood, running at a speed of between three and four knots. The Mermaid was a vessel of 577 tons register, and 90 horse-power, with a crew of 23 hands. She was on a voyage from Shields to London, with a cargo of coals, and was proceeding up the river Thames and rounding Coal House Point. The Kjobenhavn was a larger vessel of 700 tons register and 100 nominal horse-power, with a crew of 20 hands; and at the time of this collision she was lying at anchor with 25 fathoms of chain heading to the tide, at the place which has been marked by the witness on the map here, which is close to the Ovens Buoy and off a bank called Ovens Flat."

There is but one action, namely, the action brought by the Mermaid to recover damages from the Kjobenhavn, and there being no cross action, it follows that the first and possibly the only material question in the cause is whether

(a). The case referred to was The Amelia; The Aimante, p. 96.—ED.

[Priv. Co.]

THE KJOBENHAVN.

[Priv. Co.]

the Mermaid has established a case of negligence, contributing to this collision, against the Kjobenhavn, because if she has failed to do so, it is immaterial whether the collision was due to inevitable accident or to the fault of the Mermaid. On the other hand, if she has established such a case of negligence against the Kjobenhavn then the question arises whether there was not also contributory negligence on the part of the Mermaid, in which case, both vessels being in fault, the rule of the Court of Admiralty would apply and the damage would be divisible between them.

There is also this peculiarity in the case, that the vessel complaining, the plaintiffs' vessel, was the only vessel in motion, the Kjobenhavn being admitted to be at anchor; and in all such cases it is incumbent on the vessel which has the power of motion and the means of manœuvring to show some sufficient reason why it should have come in contact with a vessel lying at anchor and incapable of motion.

The negligence attributed to the Kjobenhavn is that she was anchored in an improper place, and that she failed to carry a riding light, pursuant to the seventh article of the sailing rules. Those are the facts in respect of which negligence is imputed to her; but even if those facts are established it will be a further question whether that negligence contributed to the accident.

Now, upon the evidence their Lordships think it has been correctly found in the court below that the Kjobenhavn was anchored in a place in which a vessel of that size ought not, in ordinary circumstances, to have anchored. We have upon that point the evidence of the harbour-master, who is very strong in his general conclusion that the place of anchorage was an improper place for a vessel of that size, although he admits in another part of his evidence that small craft did occasionally anchor on that northern shore, and near the place where the Kjobenhavn was anchored. The greater part of his examination was indeed directed to show that the proper place of anchorage for vessels in the Gravesend Reach which have the power of anchoring in the proper place and intend to remain there for any time, is on the southern shore, above the point marked B. on the chart; but that evidence has no bearing upon the present case, since it was impossible for the Kjobenhavn in her disabled state to get so far into the reach. This witness, however, persistently contended that the place where she did anchor in point of fact was primâ facie an improper place of anchorage, and it is to be remarked that his evidence on that point is in some degree confirmed by that of Mr. Claxton, the pilot of the Kjobenhavn, who, at page 42, line 39, is asked: "It is not a proper place to anchor in if you can help it, is it?" and answers "No." Their Lordships then will assume that the Judge of the Court of Admiralty has correctly found that the Danish steamer was anchored in that which was primâ facie an improper place.

Again it is admitted that the Kjobenhavn did not carry the proper riding light; but the amended pleading (Art. 3), which is in the nature of a plea in confession and avoidance, states upon that point: "The Kjobenhavn had not been long at anchor, the bright white or masthead light was when she came to anchor carried on the outer jib stay about thirty-six feet above the hull, and remained there till the collision. It exhibited a clear light to all vessels coming up the river.

Just before the Kjobenhavn had come to anchor as aforesaid, she had been in collision without any fault on her part with a brig riding at anchor. In this collision her riding light had been destroyed. At the time she came to anchor as aforesaid, and up to the time of the collision, she had not any proper riding light and could not exhibit one." Now that pleading seems distinctly to put forward as an excuse for not having the proper light, that she had been, without any fault of her own, in collision with the brig, and therefore it became a material question in the cause whether her collision with the brig was due to her default, or whether it was, as her pilot put it, the result of inevitable accident.

Their Lordships have considered the evidence upon that point, and they have also had the benefit of consulting their nautical assessors upon it. They are not disposed to differ from the conclusion of the learned Judge of the court below, who says not only that it has not been proved that she was in fault, but that the contrary is established. It seems to them upon the evidence that the Kjobenhavn was coming up necessarily more or less under a port helm, and that she was coming only at half speed. There is also evidence that there was a considerable fog about that place, either fog or smoke proceeding from the cement factories, and that by reason of that the brig and its riding light must have been more or less obscured. Again, it appears clear to them upon the evidence that the brig was anchored in an improper place, in a place in which she should not have anchored without excuse. The fog seems to have been her excuse for dropping her anchor there, but still she was in a place in which a steamer coming up the river would not reasonably expect to find a vessel at anchor. Taking into consideration these circumstances, the moderate speed at which the vessel was proceeding, that she was proceeding under a port helm, and that owing to the fog she could not see the brig earlier than she did, their Lordships are of opinion that the Kjobenhavn cannot be said to have been in fault in respect of that collision. It was indeed argued by Mr. Clarkson that she ought not to have ported her helm under the circumstances, but as she was going up under a port helm their Lordships think that no fault is reasonably to be attributed to her in respect of that manœuvre. Their conclusion is that the collision between the Kjobenhavn and the brig must be taken for the purposes of this suit to have been the result of inevitable accident.

It then appears that the effect of the collision was such that the Kjobenhavn was compelled to drop her anchor, and that she could not, in the state in which she was, have dropped it in any other place than that where she did anchor. It is clear that she could not by any means have got to the anchorage on the south side of the river. It further appears that the effect of this collision was to knock out one of her side lights, to scatter the parafine about the deck, to cause considerable damage on the bridge and to bring across the bridge, so as to interfere with her steering power, a considerable portion of the rigging. It is also a material circumstance with reference to the lights that the locker in which the riding light was kept was stove in, and consequently that no proper riding light was forthcoming or capable of being put up. These circumstances appear to their Lordships sufficient to account both for the place of anchorage and for the absence of the ordinary riding light, and to relieve the Kjopenhavn from any imputation of negligence upon those two points.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. TERRY.

The question however remains, whether she was justified in keeping up her bright mast light and omitting to lower it to that height above the deck, namely, a height not exceeding 20 feet, at which, according to Article 7 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions, a riding light ought to be carried. Upon that point their Lordships have in the course of the argument felt considerable doubt. It has been said that not having the proper riding light she ought to have taken away the masthead light altogether, and to have put up some globular light, which it is supposed might have been found in the engine room, or the particular globular light which after the collision which is the subject of this action, was really put up, viz., a lantern ordinarily in use in the fore-castle. But considering the state of the vessel, and the short interval of time which elapsed between the two collisions, their Lordships are not satisfied that there was time in which that lantern, supposing it would have answered any effectual purpose, or in any degree have affected the collision, could have been put up. They therefore think that negligence cannot be imputed to the Kjopenhavn by reason of her omission to exhibit that fore-castle light before the second collision.

It is then said that at least she might have lowered the masthead light? but even if her failure to do this be taken to have been an act of negligence, which their Lordships, considering all the circumstances of the case, are not satisfied it was, the question would remain, whether that negligence can be said to have caused or contributed to the collision?

That question necessarily opens the inquiry into the conduct of the other vessel. Now the Mermaid was coming up the river and had gone round the Ovens Buoy at a distance of one ship's length from the buoy, at a very high speed, at a speed which has been almost admitted in the reply to have been improper. It cannot be taken upon the evidence to have been less than eight or nine knots through the water, and therefore eleven or twelve miles over the ground. Again the conclusion which their Lordships draw from the evidence is that the look-out kept on board the Mermaid was very imperfect. There was nothing in the position of the two vessels to prevent the Mermaid, if she had kept a proper look-out, not merely for the buoy, but for the vessels ahead of her, from seeing that bright masthead light at a considerably greater distance than that at which the witnesses agree she first saw it, namely, half a mile. They cannot then acquit the Mermaid, coming at this rate of speed upon a vessel with a bright masthead light visible above the fog about her, of culpable negligence in respect to this collision. But the point immediately to be considered is whether the Kjopenhavn, by reason of her carrying that bright masthead light was guilty of negligence contributory to the accident. The case of the Mermaid is, that seeing this masthead light at a distance of half a mile and half a point on her starboard side, she came to the conclusion that the vessel that carried that light must be under weigh and coming down the river. She admits that she did not see any side light. Her master and others on board of her say they supposed that the smoke coming from the factories, or the mist had obscured those lights; but they admit that they saw no side light. In those circumstances the master chose to assume that the two vessels were meeting end on, and that he was acting in obedience to the sailing rules by porting her helm.

It seems to their Lordships that he was not justified in that conclusion, and that he cannot be said to have been deceived into executing that manœuvre by merely seeing the bright masthead light. The Mermaid had this light a little on her starboard bow, and she saw no side lights; and in these circumstances their Lordships are of opinion (and in that opinion they are confirmed by their assessors) that her proper manœuvre, even if those on board of her believed that the other vessel was moving down the river, was to starboard her helm and to go towards the south shore so as to pass in the mid channel outside the Kjopenhavn. Not seeing the side lights of the other vessel, she had no reasonable grounds for supposing that that vessel would port her helm so as to cross her course and come into collision with her. Their Lordships are also informed that according to the ordinary course of navigation, a steamer coming down the river would keep along the north shore until she came to Ovens Buoy, and then, and not until then, would stand across the reach.

Therefore it cannot be said that either by reason of a strict adherence to the sailing rules, according to which she would not be justified in coming to the conclusion that the two vessels were meeting end on unless she saw the side lights, or by reason of any general or established course of navigation in that part of the river, the Mermaid was right in porting her helm. And since it is clear that had she starboarded she would have gone clear of the Kjopenhavn, it follows that the exhibition of the masthead light was not an act of negligence which contributed to the collision.

For these reasons their Lordships are of opinion that the court below was right in holding that the Mermaid had failed to establish a case of negligence contributing to the accident against the Kjopenhavn, and that if it were necessary to pronounce any opinion on that point, the Mermaid was solely to blame for the collision. Their Lordships will therefore humbly advise Her Majesty to affirm the judgment of the court below, and to dismiss this appeal, with costs.

thus caused an obstruction which diminished by three feet the navigable breadth of the river in the front of the wharf, such navigable breadth having been sixty feet prior to the erection of the obstruction :

Held (affirming the decision of the Master of the Rolls) that this was a substantial interference with the free navigation of the river, and that it ought to be restrained by injunction. (a)

THIS was an appeal from a decision of the Master of the Rolls.

The hearing in the court below is reported ante, p. 174, where the facts of the case are fully stated.

The Master of the Rolls having granted an injunction, the defendant appealed.

Fischer, Q.C., and G. Beaumont, in support of the appeal, contended that no case of obstruction or public nuisance had been established against the defendant; no evidence was produced of any vessel having been impeded or injured by reason of the alleged obstruction. Indeed the works erected by the defendant would be a benefit rather than a hindrance to the navigation of the river. At all events, on the principle of the maxim "De minimis non curat lex," the obstruction, if any, was so infinitesimally slight that the court ought not to interfere by injunction. They cited

The Sandwich Haven Improvement and Regulation Act, 1847, ss. 12, 37.

Without calling upon

Roxburgh, Q.C., and E. P. C. Hanson, who appeared in support of the order of the Master of the Rolls,

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Cairns).—In disposing of this case I refer merely to facts as to which there is no controversy, and make no reference to facts that are in dispute between the parties.

The river Stour is a navigable river, which seems to be considerably used, especially by ships trading in connection with the town of Sandwich. Its navigation was placed in a special manner under the guardianship of the Corporation of Sandwich by an Act of Parliament passed in 1847, by the 12th section of which act the Mayor and Corporation of that town are themselves prohibited from constructing any work in the river without the consent of the Admiralty, and by the 37th section the water bailiff, an officer of the Corporation, is authorised to remove any obstruction. I refer to that Act for the purpose of pointing out that it was considered of great public importance to preserve navigation of the river Stour unimpeded, and that a special duty devolved upon the relators to keep the river free from obstruction.

The defendant has a private wharf and a warehouse, in front of which there is a way for horses and foot passengers, over which the public had a free right of passage, and high up over this way there is a projecting hutch or loft, which forms part of the defendant's warehouse, from which the defendant pulls up and lets down goods. Before the commencement of the works complained of, there had been a row of old piles in front of the wharf, which had been placed there some sixteen years ago, perhaps for the purpose, on the one hand, of preventing injury to ships from their scraping against the river bank, and, on the other hand, of protecting the river from injury which would be occasioned by ships rubbing against and bringing down the banks. These old piles rotted away, and there was no distinct evidence before the court who had placed them there; but it is sufficient to say that if they had occasioned any obstruction to the navigation of the river, no right was thereby acquired by the owners of the ground opposite to them to continue the obstruction.

The defendant, finding that his warehouse was sinking, and that he could not place anything in the nature of a support upon a public way between the river and his warehouse, had driven piles deep into the soil of the river, and erected a platform, resting on a tripod, floored over at the top and boarded on the front parallel to the bank. This projects three feet into the river, and the practical effect of it is that the defendant has provided himself with a wharf three feet in width outside his old wharf. He uses this structure in the first place for the purpose of supporting his warehouse by fixing poles from it to the foundations of the warehouse; and he further proposes to send a shoot from the hutch up above to the floor of the platform erected on the piles, and to use this shoot for the purpose of loading and unloading vessels ranged alongside the platform.

At this part of its course, the breadth of the river Stour for navigable purposes is about sixty feet at high water—there is sixty feet of navigable space for ships drawing from eight to eleven feet of water, the ordinary class of ships employed on the river. I think that the evidence clearly establishes that prior to the erection of this structure a ship drawing not more than eight and a half feet of water could at high water have ranged close up to the defendant's wharf and have remained close to that wharf, and that ships drawing more than eight and a half feet of water would probably have grounded. Now, all ships that could have got close up to the old wharf are compelled to range up against the new structure, three feet further out.

The undoubted effect of this is, whether we take the case of ships lying against this new projection, or of ships not lying there at all, that the defendant has lessened the navigable breadth of the river by about three feet; in other words, he has taken and abstracted three feet out of sixty. It has been strongly urged that there is no real obstruction, and that this court ought not to interfere, but I feel bound to say that this is exactly one of those cases in which it is proper that such an act should be challenged at the very outset by the persons appointed to act as conservators of the river. In my opinion, if three feet be taken unchallenged at one time, it is very likely that six feet would be taken at another time, and although I cannot say that there might not be an obstruction of such a very trifling nature that this court would not interfere, I am prepared to hold without any qualification that this subtraction of three feet from the navigable breadth of the river is a tangible and substantial interference with the free navigation of the river, which ought at once to be challenged by the corporation in performance of the duty, with which they had been entrusted, of preserving unimpaired the navigation of the river, and ought to be restrained by an injunction of this court.

(a) See note (a), ante p. 174.

GREAT WESTERN INSURANCE COMPANY v. CUNLIFFE.

The question of the towing path is out of the case; it crept into the decree per incuriam. I regret that application was not made to the Master of the Rolls as to that mistake, but that ought not to make any difference in the order to be now made. The appeal must therefore be dismissed with costs.

Lord Justice MELLISH was of the same opinion, This was an indictable nuisance upon which a jury, properly directed by a judge, would give a verdict. The piles were erected in the stream of a navigable river where every foot was required for the purposes of navigation. There might, indeed, be places by the banks of the river where the water was so shallow that it was practically of no use for navigation, and as to such places that which would otherwise be a nuisance might not be such as to make it the duty of this court to interfere to prevent it, but in places which were actually useful for navigation there was no difference between the obstruction of them and of a highway. It was no answer to the bill to say that there was room enough left for navigation, and that if ships were navigated with skill and care they would not suffer from the obstruction. The public had a right to navigate over the whole space of the river. Neither was it any answer to say that the obstruction only occurred at certain states of the tide, that it made no difference to ships drawing eleven feet of water, and that in some respects the works complained of would be advantageous. The advantage of one person could not be set off against the disadvantage of another. If this was, in the ordinary course of navigation, an obstruction, it was in point of law an indictable nuisance, and that being so it was the duty of the Court of Chancery to restrain it by injunction.

Lord Justice JAMES was of the same opinion. He only desired to add that where a public body was entrusted with the duty of being conservators of a river, it was their duty to take proceedings to prevent any obstruction to the navigation of the river. This was eminently a case for their interference.

Appeal accordingly dismissed with costs.

Reported by the HON. ROBERT BUTLER and F. GOULD, Esq., Barristers-at-law.

Feb. 13, 17, and 18, 1874.

GREAT WESTERN INSURANCE COMPANY v. CUNLIFFE.
Marine insurance—Principal and agent—Negligence—Broker's allowance—Jurisdiction.

A marine insurance company, carrying on business in New York, employed C. as their agent in this country, for the purpose of taking risks, and adjusting and paying losses, for which he was to receive a commission of 5 per cent. upon the premiums made in each year. The company also effected insurances in this country through C.

On the 8th Dec, 1865, C. received instructions from the company to reinsure fifteen ships upon which their lines were full. C. endeavoured to effect the insurances, but in consequence of news of a disastrous gale he was unable to do so except at exorbitant rates; he therefore wrote the same day to the company, informing them thereof, and stating that he left it to the company, if they deemed it necessary, to insure on their side where it could be done at a profit, instead of here, where it would have to be done at a loss. After sending this letter, C. made no further attempt to insure these ships. Before the company received this letter, one of the ships which C. was directed to reinsure was wrecked and thereby a loss was incurred by the company:

Held, that C. had not discharged the duty cast upon him as the company's agent to reinsure, by writing the above letter, and that he was liable for the loss which had been sustained in consequence of his neglect to insure as directed, and was not entitled to set-off against such loss the amount of the premiums which, by not insuring as directed, he had saved the company.

Under the "credit" system of conducting marine insurance business, which was the system adopted by C., it is customary for the underwriter to allow a discount of 12 per cent. to the broker upon the settlement of accounts with the broker at the end of the year:

Held, that C. was not entitled to retain the discount for his own benefit, but must account for the same to the company. (a)

THE plaintiffs, who were a marine insurance company, carrying on business in New York, in 1858 constituted the defendants, Messrs. John Pickersgill and Son, their agents, the nature of the agency being expressed in certain letters, which, as far as they were material, were as follows:

The first of these letters, dated the 15th June 1858, was from Mr. Lathers, the president of the plaintiff company, to the defendants, in which he stated:

This company, for the purpose of extending its usefulness, proposes to make some of its policies on cargoes on cotton, and other produce destined for Europe, payable in London or Liverpool in case of loss or claim, and in such cases will issue printed certificates on such risks, adjustable and payable there by an agent, to be selected for that purpose. The reputation of your house induces me to tender the appointment to your good selves, and the object of this letter is to ascertain if such an appointment would be agreeable to you, and what compensation you would expect for such service. I send you also a copy of the company's charter containing the last fiscal statement.

In reply to that letter, the defendants wrote, on the 29th June 1858:

We shall have much pleasure in undertaking your agency for settling and paying claims, on the usual terms say 2½ per cent. on the amount paid.

On the 26th July 1858, Mr. Lathers wrote:

Sir,—I am favoured with yours of the 29th ult., accepting the agency of this company, for the purpose of adjusting and paying losses, the compensation to be 2½ per cent. on the amount actually paid. . . . Perhaps it would be well for you to employ an intelligent clerk, at a moderate salary, and set apart a special desk for his use, at the expense of the company, as, with your permission, we shall frequently have reinsurance and other business negotiations to make through you. Our Southern Cotton business is very large and increasing, and often requires heavy reinsurance on cargoes by British vessels, which we cannot always get covered here. We are compelled to take these large amounts, as they come under our numerous open policies. Indeed, we often have excessive lines from East India and other distant parts, falling under open policies, which cover bankers credits. Is it practicable to get them reinsured with your underwriters? Could I rely upon being able to place from 50 to 100,000 dols. through you at any time, current rates?

(a) This decision has since been reversed on appeal.—ED.

In answer to that letter the defendants wrote, on the 15th Aug. 1858:

We are in receipt of your favour of the 29th ult., appointing us agents in this country for the Great Western Insurance company. With regard to reinsurances, we do not anticipate any great difficulty in effecting at Lloyd's any you may have at the current rates, and the conditions usual at that establishment, provided that there is nothing very unusual or extraordinary in the risk, and that you give us instructions to reinsure as early as practicable.

The agency so constituted continued until the 26th June 1863, when an agreement of that date was entered into between the plaintiffs and defendants, which, after reciting that the plaintiff company were desirous of appointing agents in this country to take risks on their behalf, and to issue policies to the parties in respect of the risks so taken, and that the defendants had agreed to accept such agency, it was witnessed that the defendants should become and be the exclusive agents of the plaintiffs in London, "for the purpose of taking risks upon ships or freights, or upon goods," &c.; and the defendants were also to act "as such agents, for the purpose of investigating, and settling, and adjusting and paying all claims" that might arise upon such policies, and of resisting claims which ought not to be paid.

The defendants were to keep proper accounts "of all moneys received for premiums of insurance, and of all moneys paid and disbursed by them in respect of the settlement of any claims upon policies issued by them," and interest was to be allowed upon the balances from time to time in their hands. In the absence of written instructions to the contrary, the amount to be taken upon any one ship was to be left to the discretion of the defendants.

The defendants were to receive as remuneration "for conducting the business as such agents," a commission of 5l. per cent. upon the premiums made in each year, to be calculated upon the premiums, after deducting therefrom the discount to be allowed to the assured, and the usual brokerage of 5l. per cent. allowed to the broker; but in the event of any premium being lost, the commission upon such premium was to be calculated upon the net amount, after deducting the brokerage and discount that would have been allowed had such premiums been duly paid at maturity. These commissions were to include all charges for settling, adjusting, and paying losses, averages, or returns on policies issued in London or Liverpool.

On the 24th Nov. 1865, the plaintiffs wrote the defendants a letter which, so far as was material, was as follows: "Annexed, please find a list of vessels from Gulf ports upon which we are already full, and should you have taken any risks upon any of them you will please reinsure." The defendants received this letter on the 8th Dec., at which time they had taken risks upon fifteen of the vessels named in this list, amongst them being the Roger A. Heirn, upon which they had taken a risk of 3500l. The defendants sent one of their clerks, a Mr. Bullen, to Lloyd's for the purpose of effecting the reinsurances, but in consequence of advices of a most disastrous havoc among shipping, caused by a tremendous gale on the American coast, which advices produced a sort of panic, it was, as the defendants alleged, impossible to insure, except at most exorbitant rates. The defendants accordingly wrote the same day to the plaintiffs (being the day on which the American mail left London), stating:

In consequence of the recent numerous and heavy losses on cotton in the Gulf, there is almost a panic amongst many of the underwriters on this side, and therefore we could not reinsure as you wish, except at extraordinary (and what we consider excessive) rates, if then, especially as some of the vessels sailed about the time of the hurricane in October, and are about due. We therefore think it better to enclose you herein a list of the vessels not arrived by which we have taken lines, and leave you, if you deem it necessary, to effect reinsurance on your side. If we remember rightly you stated, when here, that these risks were freely taken in New York at 1½ per cent., which will enable you to reinsure at a considerable profit, whereas we should have to do so at a loss.

This letter was received by the plaintiffs on the 21st Dec. In the meantime, on the 19th Dec., the Roger A. Heirn stranded at Mobile, whereby the risk taken by the defendants on behalf of the plaintiffs was converted into a loss of 3500l.

The plaintiffs contended that the order to reinsure, contained in their letter of the 24th Nov., was peremptory, and ought to have been effected at any rate of insurance which would have been obtained for the time being, and they denied that there was any such panic as described in the defendants' letter, and they now sought to make the defendants liable for the loss they had sustained in consequence of the defendants having omitted to reinsure the Roger A. Heirn, in pursuance of their instructions.

Another question raised in the suit was, whether the defendants were entitled to retain for their own benefit, in addition to the regular 5 per cent. brokerage on premiums, a discount or allowance of 12 per cent., allowed by the underwriters to brokers upon the sum paid to the underwriters as the balance owing to them upon the settlement of accounts at the commencement of each year.

It appeared that it was the custom for underwriters, when the insurance business was conducted on the "credit" system, which was the system adopted by the defendants, to make this allowance to the brokers as an inducement to them to bring a profitable class of business. The plaintiffs contended that the defendants were their agents for the purpose of reinsuring, and that, as such, they could not accept a gratuity, but must account to the plaintiffs for the amount of discount they had received.

For the defence, it was submitted that the matters in dispute were properly subjects for proceedings at law. That the defendants were justified, in the exercise of their discretion, in refraining from effecting any reinsurance at the ruinous rates at which alone, if at all, such reinsurances could have been effected, especially as the plaintiffs had previously informed them that they could reinsure these risks very chiefly on their own side, but that if they were liable for the loss upon the Roger A. Heirn, they ought to be allowed to set-off against such loss the amount of the premiums which, by not reinsuring as directed, they had saved to the plaintiffs.

As to the discount, they denied that they were the plaintiffs' agents for the purpose of reinsuring, and alleged that they simply executed the plaintiffs' orders for reinsurance upon the same terms as they did those of other persons who employed them as brokers, and that, therefore, they were entitled to the customary brokers' allowances for their own benefit.

Kay, Q.C., Benjamin, Q.C. (of the Common Law Bar), and Marten, Q.C. for the plaintiffs.—As to the jurisdiction of the court, we refer to Makepeace v. Rogers, 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 12; on app. 221; 4 De G. J. & S. 649;

Southampton Dock Company v. Southampton Pier and Harbour Board, 23 L. T. Rep. N. S. 698; L. Rep. 11 Eq. 254; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 828; L. Rep. 14 Eq. 595.

The defendants were our agents for the purpose of effecting insurances. They were in a fiduciary position, and could not accept a gratuity. They must, therefore, account to us for the discount which they have received:

Turnbull v. Garden, 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 218; 28 L. J., N. S. 331, Ch.;

Ritchie v. Couper, 28 Beav. 344.

As to the defendants' liability for not reinsuring, they were our agents for hire and reward; there was an express contract, and the duty cast upon them by the contract was an absolute duty to effect an insurance, and not merely a mandatum: (Turpin v. Bilton, 5 Man. & Gr. 455, 470.) Even an insurance broker is liable, à fortiori an agent would be. This is a case of breach of trust, and, therefore, the trustee cannot set-off against the loss the amount that has been saved by his disobedience and breach of trust.

John Pearson, Q.C. and Millar, for the defendants.—There is nothing to justify the allegation in the bill that the accounts are complicated or in dispute; the only questions in dispute are questions which could be more properly tried by a jury in an action at law: (Moxon v. Bright 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 961; L. Rep. 4 Ch. 292.) As regards re-insuring, we acted as brokers, and not as agents; there is nothing in the agreement about re-insurance. We were agents for adjusting and paying losses in London, and for taking risks only, and you cannot import anything into the agreement which is not there already. The transactions between the broker and underwriter are distinct and separate from the transactions between the broker and the assured. This is not a question of principal and agent, or of trustee and cestui que trust, but two transactions separate and distinct. The practice as to these transactions is very clearly stated by Blackburn, J., in Xenos v. Wickham (14 C. B., N. S., 460.) The discount allowed is a discount upon the balance of accounts between the underwriter and the broker in respect of all his clients, and not a discount upon any particular premium. With respect to the alleged negligence, an agent must use the same discretion and diligence for his principals as he would for himself. If he finds himself unable to insure as desired, he must communicate at once with his principals (Callendar v. Oelrichs, 5 Bing. New Cas. 58), which is the very thing we did, and having written, we could not afterwards reinsure in London; if we did, and the ships came in safe, the plaintiffs would have been justified in refusing to pay the premiums. The agreement states that we are to exercise our discretion, and there was nothing in the plaintiffs' letter directing us to reinsure which took that discretion away and rendered it imperative upon us to insure at any price. If, however, the court is of opinion that we are liable for the loss occasioned by our not insuring as directed, then in estimating the damages, the amount saved by the same act of negligence must be taken into consideration.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said:—The bill in this suit is filed by the Great Western Insurance Company against Messrs. Cunliffe, praying that an account may be taken between them, and praying relief upon certain matters specifically mentioned in the bill. The defendants admit the existence of a kind of agency, but say that the particular agency alleged by the bill in respect of which one portion of the relief is sought, and the matters which might have been the subject of account between them and the plaintiffs might and ought to have been the subject of an action at law, and that a court of equity is not the proper forum for deciding such disputes. It becomes, therefore, absolutely necessary to consider the nature of such agency as was constituted.

Now the plaintiffs are an insurance company carrying on business in marine insurance at New York. A portion of that business was and is transacted in this country, and for the purpose of that business it was and is indispensably necessary that the plaintiffs should have agents in this country, persons to carry out their business, which consisted of making such payments as the plaintiffs might have to make upon policies of insurance granted by them payable in England, and for issuing policies in England, and for effecting reinsurances on risks which they had undertaken. And that that is the object with which the agency was constituted seems clear, not only from the nature of the case, but from the evidence which has been adduced, and the admissions and statements on both sides. The agency undertaken by the defendants is expressed in certain letters which were referred to in the course of the proceedings. [The Vice-Chancellor having read the portions of the four first letters set out ante, continued:] Now, upon the basis of those letters the agency is constituted, and it seems to me impossible not to say, after reading those letters, and having regard to the subsequent transactions between the parties, that an agency, in the full sense of the term—an agency for conducting in this country that business in which the plaintiffs were engaged, but which they could not conduct—was constituted and was undertaken by the defendants.

It seems to me impossible, in the face of the evidence, as well as from the transactions between the parties as they are stated and admitted, to doubt that the defendants did undertake from the beginning the business of reinsurance, as well as whatever other business might be committed to them by their correspondents in New York, and that it is a mistake to call them brokers. It has been convenient for the defendants in their argument to refer to cases and to conduct the argument as if the defendants were insurance brokers. They are not, that I know of, properly called by that name in any instance. They are not brokers; they are described in the bill as being merchants; they are addressed as merchants; they admit in their answer that they are merchants, and in the character of merchants, acting as agents for persons in a foreign country, but in their name and on their behalf, they effect insurances at Lloyd's, not qua brokers; they are not, as Mr. Millar read to me from the case which he cited last, agents both for the underwriters and the persons insuring; it is a mistake altogether, a fallacy, which I think has pervaded the greater part of the argument I have listened to on behalf of the defendants—to treat these defendants as ever having been in any sense insurance brokers. If the company at New York had been resident in this country, and had desired to reinsure, they would have gone to Lloyd's and have effected the reinsurances—they would want no broker. Brokers may be usefully employed in a variety of transactions relating to insurances and reinsurances; but a shipping broker or an insurance broker has no place in the case I am considering here. It is, in short, an agency in its full terms; it is doing by a hand here that which the company in America was not able to do for itself; it is done for the company, and in a sense by the company.

GREAT WESTERN INSURANCE COMPANY v. CUNLIFFE.

Now the bill states that, besides the agreement or engagement, whatever it may be called, constituted by the letters and by the course of dealing, there was another agreement entered into between the parties, and that is stated in the bill, and described by the bill as being an extension of the business; and it is admitted in terms by the answer to have been entered into for the purpose of extending the sphere of operations; but it is impossible to read that and to suppose that it was intended to qualify or diminish the authority which had been given in the first instance—extend it, no doubt it does, and prescribes other terms, but it does not in the slightest degree diminish, detract from, or qualify the nature of the agreement or the duties which each party owed the other having entered into that arrangement. That is the agreement of 1863. These are the only documents which it seems necessary to refer to, because upon them the agency was constituted. That agency continued under those agreements until sometime in April 1868, when the agency was resigned.

Before that time came, questions had arisen between the plaintiffs and the defendants, and the principal question which then and now subsists between them, I mean in point of amount, though not the chief in point of principle, was occasioned by the stranding of one of several ships which the plaintiffs had instructed the defendants, as agents, to reinsure for them. By a letter, dated the 24th Nov. 1865, the plaintiffs instructed the defendants, as their agents, to reinsure certain ships. That letter is in very clear and explicit terms, and is beyond the possibility of misconstruction, regard being had to the nature of the business which the plaintiffs had conducted through their agents up to that time. [The Vice-Chancellor read the letter as set out, ante, and continued.] Accompanying that letter is a long list of vessels, among which is the Roger A. Heirn. That letter was received in London about mid-day on the 8th Dec.; between one and two o'clock on the same day the defendants instructed their clerk, Mr. Bullen, to go to Lloyd's and effect the insurances, according to the instructions they had received from their principals. Mr. Bullen, it appears, discharged that duty by going and offering a list of the vessels, and having devoted about two hours of that day in endeavouring to effect the reinsurances, and having failed to effect them, nothing more whatever was done to fulfil the instructions. Then by the post of that day the defendants wrote to their principals in America, apprising them that the insurance had not been effected.

I admit, as indeed the cases which were cited yesterday decide, that an agent, if he declines to exercise his power to execute the orders of his principals, may properly refuse to do so, but that cannot be without qualification; he may do so provided he does not break the contract between them, so that he does not frustrate the expectation of his principals. If he were living in the next street he might go and knock at his door and say, "I will have nothing to do with your reinsurance;" but if he is dealing with a principal, at the distance of about twelve or fourteen days' post, it is not sufficient. Surely it would be utterly opposed to all common sense and justice to say that he could write on the 8th Dec. in London a letter, which by no possibility can come into the hands of his principals in less than twelve days, saying, "I refuse to execute your order, and suggest to you, as you once said you could insure in New York for 30s., that you had better do so." I do not say that, consistently with the cases which were referred to, an agent is not at liberty to decline to perform the direction of his principal, but I say that, having constituted himself an agent for such a purpose as this, the duty of reinsuring was, in the first instance, cast upon him, and that he could not get rid of that obligation unless he put his principal in the same position as that in which he was when that commission was given to him; and if he does it under circumstances which make it impossible for the principal to reinsure, then I say he fails in his duty as agent.

[The Vice-Chancellor here read the letter of the 8th Dec. 1865, set out ante, and continued:] That letter being dispatched on the 8th Dec., on the 19th Dec. the Roger A. Heirn—a ship at Mobile when the directions were given—stranded in or near the part of Mobile, and thereby a loss was incurred at 3500l.

Now, one of the questions in the cause is, whether there was such neglect on the part of the defendants as justified the plaintiffs in seeking to be reimbursed for the consequence of that neglect. It may be, if that was the only transaction between the parties, the only subject of difference between them, a bill in equity would not lie for the purpose, but in the relations which existed between this principal and this agent, I cannot take out of the transactions between them any particular topic or any particular article, and say, because that is in its nature separate, that therefore it cannot be included in the prayer for relief which is sought by this bill. If I could, the same might be said of every particular item in every account; you might take out a particular thing and say, "that is no part of the account, that is the purchase of goods, not advances of cash," and so on, and a variety of such like excuses might be made. If it is, as I think it is, a part of the duty of the agent to reinsure the ship upon that letter which he received; and if the reinsurance formed any part of the general agency, it must be covered by the general agency accounts, and is to be taken into consideration when those accounts are settled

GREAT WESTERN INSURANCE COMPANY v. CUNLIFFE.

[V C. B.]

The cases which were referred to do not in the slightest degree touch this principle. The case of Turpin v. Bilton (ubi sup.), was a case in which a man had employed a broker, not an agent in any other sense, to effect an insurance for him, and he had done it in such a clumsy way, so negligently, as that the assured could not bring an action against the insurance company, therefore he brought his action against the broker for his neglect to put him in the position which he ought to have been put in, and he succeeded in that action. The decision in the case was plain and distinct, and founded upon principles which no one can question for a moment. The other case which was referred to I have already mentioned, that which does justify an agent, upon certain conditions, in refusing to execute the commission of his principals. That does not apply to this case.

The reasons suggested for not re-insuring are, a storm which happened in the Gulf of Mexico, which it is said prevented the possibility, after the receipt of the American mail upon that day, of any reinsurance being then effected, "except at most exorbitant rates of premium." The agents in this country had nothing to do with exorbitant rates of premium; they were ordered to reinsure, and from the evidence, showing the manner in which the defendants had previously conducted reinsurance business, it is clear that they considered themselves bound to reinsure. I have not heard a suggestion why, on the 9th or 10th Dec., or some subsequent time, efforts were not made to reinsure these vessels, and the evidence satisfies me that if the duty undertaken by the agents had been properly discharged no such loss as that of which the plaintiff complains, could by possibility have happened.

Well then, the agency being constituted, the instructions being complete, the duty is cast upon the defendants to show why they did not comply with them. In my opinion they have totally failed to do so, and they have failed by suggesting excuses which are not true in fact, as I must say, upon the evidence. They have failed to do so, by writing a letter, which could be of no use for the purpose of the business in which the principals and agents were concerned, until after the loss had taken place. I think, therefore, upon the principles not only of the cases that have been referred to and other cases, but upon the commonest principles of justice and honesty, the defendants have occasioned this loss by neglecting their duty as agents, and that they are liable to make it good. From the time when the agency began, the plaintiffs had their agents, bound to conduct their business prudently, properly, and above all faithfully, and they find out that there are certain things in the accounts which they are entitled to complain of and they file the bill for an account, and I do not know any reason why they should not. I have heard no reason. It is said, because it has been decided in the case of a particular agent in a particular instance, the demand against whom might be settled at law, that that course should be taken, that therefore there could not be any approach to this court in any case where the agent is a defaulter, where the principal has a right to have an account from him. The law is well settled as to that: it is that a principal has a right to have an account from his agent. Of course he takes it at his own risk. All that can be expected, or that can reasonably be required from him, is that he should state a case to satisfy the court that there is some

Now as to the question of allowance, that goes upon very delicate ground, because nothing is better settled in this court than that if a man is an agent—that is, in other words, a trustee—an agent in a fiduciary character, it is incompetent for him to receive a gratuity of any sort or kind. That cannot be disputed as a general principle. The question is, whether that applies to this particular case. Now what is this case? I have said, this is simply the case of a man who cannot be bodily present in this country, but who employs another to go in his name and person, and enter into certain commercial engagements for him. Can anything be more strictly within the description of fiduciary employment than that? He stipulates for his hire, he agrees to the commission he shall pay him, and then says, "Now go in my name, in my person, on my account, for my interest—not for your own; go and do this thing for me," and the agent goes; and in discharge of that duty he stipulates for or receives a benefit for himself not included in the contract between himself and his principal. Is there an instance to be referred to where that has been endured in a court of equity? There are plenty of instances to the contrary. If Mr. Lathers had been here in his own person, as president of the society, he would have gone to Lloyd's and would have effected the insurance for himself. He did not want a broker. There would be no account between them, because if it suited this gentleman in the course of his business to have dealings on another footing, well and good; he was perfectly competent to do that, but he was not competent to take an allowance which but for his stipulation, if it was made at all, would have been made for his principal. If it was his intention to do so, then the observation of Lord Justice James in the case referred to yesterday, applies directly. "If you thought that was right, why did you not say so, and why did you not state that you were taking the allowance?"

Then it is said because this was discovered in 1866, and the bill has not been filed until 1869, there has been acquiescence. One can understand that there was not any great disposition to quarrel or make any great fuss between persons who had been so long connected together in important transactions of this kind. I cannot think that the lapse of time furnishes the least reason why the plaintiffs should not, when they desired it, have the accounts overhauled and put upon the right basis, and made consistent, not only with the principles of this court, but with the principles of fair dealing between parties. I cannot think that the lapse of time which occurred should preclude them from the right which they insist upon; and, therefore, I think that the plaintiffs are entitled to a declaration that this loss happened in the course of transactions which cannot be severed from the ordinary agency subsisting between the parties; and that they are entitled to the relief asked in that respect, and it must be ascertained what the damage is which they have sustained. I should have been very much pleased if a jury had had to consider this, rather than I should, but the law requires me to consider it, and it is a position from which I cannot retire.

The accounts must be taken as prayed by the bill, and in taking those accounts, the defendants must be charged with the loss upon the risk taken by them on account of the plaintiffs on the ship Roger A. Heirn, and must also be charged with the discount or allowances, and all other benefits obtained by them from the underwriters, over and above the customary commission of 5 per cent.; and the defendants must pay the costs up to the hearing.

BLANCHET v. POWELL'S LLANTWIT COLLIERIES COMPANY (LIMITED).

Bill of lading—Delivery of less quantity than that stated in bill—Whether lump freight payable without deduction—French law—18 & 19 Vict. c. 111, s. 3.

The whole freight named in the bill of lading is payable to the shipowner carrying under it, although a less quantity of goods than the quantity named in the bill of lading be delivered, if the quantity delivered be no less than the quantity received by the shipowner.

By French law the whole freight is payable whether the whole quantity named in the bill of lading be carried or not, and therefore, in the case of a bill of lading executed in France, it is immaterial whether or not the shipowner received the whole quantity named in the bill of lading.

By 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111, s. 3, "every bill of lading is conclusive evidence of the shipment as against the person signing it."

Seemle that by this statute the bill of lading is not conclusive evidence as to the accuracy of measurements, and does not estop the person signing from disputing those measurements.

DEMURRER to a plea, and to a replication.

The declaration stated that one M. A. Parangue in parts beyond the seas at L'Orient in the Republic of France delivered to the plaintiff certain goods, that is to say a cargo of pitwood to be by the plaintiff carried and conveyed in a certain ship of the plaintiff's, from L'Orient to Cardiff, under a certain bill of lading, dated the 2nd Jan., A. D. 1873, signed for the same by the plaintiff, and there delivered (accidents and dangers of the sea excepted), to the holder of the said bill of lading, or his order, he or his said assigns paying the plaintiff for freight the sum of 344s. sterling, and 4l. gratuity to the plaintiff, amounting together to 176l. 1s. and after the said 2nd of Jan. 1873, the said M. A. Parangue indorsed the said bill of lading to the defendants, in order to pass the property in such goods to the defendants, and thereupon, and by reason of such endorsement, the property in the said goods passed to the defendants, and all conditions were fulfilled, and all things were done, and happened, and all times elapsed necessary to entitle the plaintiff to have the said freight and gratuity paid according to the said bill of lading, and to sue the defendants for the non-payment thereof. Yet the defendants have made default in paying the said freight and gratuity.

Pleas—(1.) Except as to so much of the above count as related to the carrying and delivery by the plaintiff to the defendants of 217 tons of pitwood being a portion of the cargo in the said count mentioned, that the bill of lading was in the words and figures following: [The plea then set out the bill in French], which is properly rendered in the English tongue by the words and figures following:

I, Blanchet, master of the ship named Christopher Columbus, of Granville, being at present at the port of L'Orient in order at the first opportunity to go in the direct road to Cardiff, acknowledge to have received and stowed on board my ship under the free deck thereof, of you, Madame A. Parangue, 256,782 kilogrammes at 1015—253,782 kos., payable the whole safe and in good condition, marked and numbered as in the margin, which I bind myself to carry and convey in my said ship, perils and wrecks of the sea excepted, to the said place of Cardiff, and to deliver to the bearer, or his order on his paying me for my freight the sum of 3441 shillings sterling, plus 4l. gratuity to the captain, according to the uses and customs of the sea, and to hold and accomplish this, I bind myself body and goods with my said ship, freight and tackle thereof. In faith of which I have signed three bills of lading of the same tenor, one of which being accomplished, the others of no value.

Signed at L'Orient the 2nd Jan., 1873.

and that the plaintiff did not carry and deliver to the defendants the goods in the said bill of lading mentioned, but a proportion of the same only, to wit, the quantity of 217 tons, and, except the said quantity of 217 tons, the defendants say that the plaintiff did not carry the said goods and deliver the same to the defendants.

(2.) As to the carrying of the 217 tons, payment into court of 217l. 16s. 10d.

Replication—(3.) As to the first plea that the plaintiff did carry and deliver to the defendants the whole of the said goods, which were delivered to him under the said bill of lading, and which were intended to be thereby described, and that the said goods so delivered, and which are in the said bill of lading described as weighing 256,782 kos., a weight exceeding 217 tons, in fact weighed 217 tons only, and no more, and that the said weight mentioned in the said bill of lading was a mere misdescription of the goods to be carried inserted in the said bill of lading, without fraud or default on the part of the plaintiff.

(4.) As to the first plea that the bill of lading was made at L'Orient, in the Republic of France, and that according to the law of France the whole of the said freight was and is payable, notwithstanding that the said part only of the said goods was carried and delivered as in the first plea mentioned.

(5.) Repeating the third replication that the said bill of lading was made at L'Orient, in the Republic of France, and that according to the law of France the whole of the said freight was and is payable.

Demurrer to the first plea on the ground that it does not set out the French law on the subject, and affords no answer even by English law.

Demurrer to the third and fifth replications, on the ground that they do not allege a misrepresentation.

tation caused wholly by the fraud of the shipper, or of some person under whom the defendants claim; and to the fourth and fifth that the contract set out in the first plea was to be performed in England, and that the French law is inapplicable thereto.

Joinder in demurrer.

R. E. Webster for the plaintiff.—The question here is whether the defendant is entitled to deduct some proportion of the freight in respect of non-delivery, or whether he must resort to a cross-action in order to obtain any deduction to which he may be entitled. It is submitted that the freight cannot be apportioned upon the record; it being clear law that if the ship be not fully laden, the whole of the lump freight is nevertheless recoverable.

[He was then stopped.]

E. Clarke for the defendants.—The just principle is that an indorsee of a bill of lading is not bound to pay the full amount if the full quantity has not been shipped or carried. The delivery of a complete cargo is not a condition precedent to the payment of the freight, and what is to be looked to is the intention of the parties.

Ritchie v. Atkinson, 10 East, 295;

Gibson v. Sturge, 10 Ex. 662.

"If the shipowner fail to carry the goods to the destined port the freight is not earned," says Willes, J., in Dakin v. Oxley (2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 6; 33 L. J. 119, C. P.; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 268), and he adds, "If he carry part, but not the whole, no freight is payable in respect to the part not carried, and freight is payable in respect of the part carried, unless the charter-party make the carriage of the whole a condition precedent to the earning of any freight—a case which has not within our experience arisen in practice." By 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111, s. 3, (a) the bill of lading is made conclusive against the captain of the amount shipped. The decision in The Norway (ubi sup.) turned upon these words, "freight for the use and hire" of the vessel, being used in the charter-party. He also cited

Meyer v. Dresser, 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 27; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 268; 33 L. J. 289, C. P.

BRAMWELL, B.—I think that the plaintiff is clearly entitled to our judgment in this case. The plea is ambiguous, but the ambiguity is cleared up by the statement in the third replication, that the plaintiff delivered all that was delivered to him. If this was an action for non-delivery, perhaps the statute 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111, would bind the master in respect of the freight, but I doubt extremely whether the statute was intended to be conclusive in such a case as this. If it were not for the third replication, the plea would be a defence, and if I am to say that whether the third replication be good or not, I say that it is good. However that may be, I think that the fourth replication is clearly good. The original parties were bound by the French Law by virtue of the contract having been made in France. The fifth replication is even better still. [The learned judge read the fifth replication.] The plaintiff there shows that he has done that which would entitle him but for the statute to recover, and he then proceeds to show that the statute does not apply. Very clearly, therefore, the fifth replication is good, clearly the fourth, and I think also the third.

(a) By 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111, s. 3, "Every bill of lading in the hands of a consignee or indorsee for valuable consideration representing goods to have been shipped on board a vessel shall be conclusive evidence of such shipment as against the master or other person signing the same, notwithstanding that such goods or some part thereof may not have been so shipped, unless such holder of the bill of lading shall have had actual notice at the time of receiving the same that the goods had not been in fact laden on board: Provided that the master or other person so signing may exonerate himself in respect of such misrepresentation by showing that it was caused without any default on his part, and wholly by the fraud of the shipper, or of the holder, or some person under whom the holder claims."

VOL. II., N.S.

PIGOTT, B.—I agree. I will not say anything about the construction of the statute, except that I agree with what my brother Bramwell has said upon that head.

CLEASBY, B.—It is not easy to arrive at the meaning of this plea, but it should be read with a view to what it abstains from stating as much as to what it actually states. The effect is, applying the established rule of construction of pleadings, that an ambiguity is to be construed against the person who uses it, that we have an action upon a contract by the defendant to pay the plaintiff a lump sum for freight. The plaintiff has performed his part of the contract, and is therefore entitled to the lump sum. The only way to defeat his claim, is to apply the statute against him, but I am of opinion that the statute cannot be so applied. If the contract had been to deliver ten horses and ten cows, it would have been different. But the statute does not apply to measurements, which vary infinitely from many causes, so that it would be quite unreasonable to maintain that the captain is estopped from saying that a measurement is not accurate. If an exaggeration partaking of the character of fraud could be shown it would be otherwise.

BIDDULPH AND OTHERS v. BINGHAM.

Verbal chartering—No bill of lading—Mate's receipt not conclusive evidence against master of quantity shipped.

The plaintiffs having verbally chartered the ship of the defendant to carry iron from Glasgow to Swansea, the ship was loaded with iron bought by the plaintiff from W. and Co. The iron was weighed by the agents of W. and Co., to whom the mate gave a receipt signed by him for 330 tons, but there was no bill of lading. On delivery at Swansea the quantity of iron was discovered to be 326½ tons only, but the mate deposed, and was not contradicted, to the delivery of all that had been shipped. The plaintiffs having paid on the full amount of 330 tons to W. and Co., who refused to repay them the difference, sued the defendant for short delivery.

defendant, and that if there had been, it would not be negligence causing loss to the plaintiffs, and a County Court judgment in favour of the plaintiffs for short delivery reversed.

THIS was an appeal from the County Court of Glamorganshire, upon the following case stated by the learned judge of that court.

1. The action was for 21l. 7s., on the following particulars :

Short delivery of cargo per Jane Bingham ,
Scotch pig iron, 3½ tons, at 45s.	£20 2 6
Freight paid on above at 7s.	1 4 6
	£21 7 0

2. The plaintiffs chartered the Jane Bingham, of which the defendant is owner, to carry a cargo of iron from Glasgow to Swansea, at a freight of 7s. a ton. No charter-party was signed, and the agreement was a verbal one.

3. The Jane Bingham thereupon proceeded to Glasgow, and was loaded with iron purchased by the plaintiffs from Messrs. Watson and Co., of that city, at 115s. a ton, free on board. As the iron was put on board it was weighed by Messrs. Connell and Co., who acted as shipping agents to Messrs. Watson and Co. The mate of the Jane Bingham watched the iron put on board, and when the loading of the cargo was completed, gave Messrs. Connell and Co. a receipt, of which the following is a copy :

Jane Bingham. Received of Connell and Co. 330 tons numbers 1 and 3 pig iron, account of James Watson and Company

GEORGE HOPKINS, mate.

4. The master of the Jane Bingham sailed from Glasgow on the evening of the day on which the cargo was loaded without seeing the consignors, and there was no bill of lading.

5. The mate's receipt was forwarded by Messrs. Watson and Co. to the plaintiffs, and on the arrival of the Jane Bingham at Swansea it was produced to the master, who obtained payment of freight on the quantity of iron (namely, 330 tons) acknowledged in the receipt to have been shipped. The plaintiffs thereupon remitted to Watson and Co. the price of the quantity so acknowledged to have been shipped.

6. The quantity of iron delivered to and received by the plaintiffs from the Jane Bingham was subsequently found to be 3½ tons less than the quantity acknowledged to have been shipped; but it was admitted by the plaintiffs that about 7cwt. of this deficiency was due to an intermixture of sand. It was stated by the mate and uncontroverted that he watched all the iron being put on board, and that he delivered at Swansea all but the dross. On discovering the deficiency of 3½ tons, the plaintiffs applied to Watson and Co. to repay the price of the 3½ tons. This Watson and Co. declined to do, whereupon this action was brought.

7. The learned County Court Judge having decided that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover from the defendants the amount which they had paid to Watson and Co. as the price of 3 tons 3 cwt. of the 3½ tons deficient in quantity (7 cwt. being allowed for sand), as well as the sum which they had paid to the defendant as freight for that quantity.

The question for this court was whether his judgment was correct.

Wood Hill, for the appellants, the defendants below.—The defendant having delivered all the iron which was in fact shipped, there was no short delivery. The mate's receipt is only prima facie evidence of the quantity of iron shipped, and this evidence is rebutted by the uncontroverted evidence of the mate that all that was shipped was delivered. He admitted that the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment for the 1l. 4s. 6d. claimed for overpayment of freight.

Arthur Williams, for the respondents, the plaintiffs below.—The position of the parties has been clearly altered by the act of the mate in giving an incorrect receipt. [PIGOTT, B.—Does not the statement in paragraph 6 of the case amount to a finding against you?] The Plaintiffs have acted upon the receipt, and suffered damage from acting upon it.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am of opinion that this judgment should stand for the 1l. 4s. 6d. on account of freight, and for nothing more. There is no evidence of negligence, and if there were negligence, it would not be negligence causing loss to the plaintiffs. The receipt was probably given in order that the ship might sail away as soon as possible, and when the plaintiffs come forward to complain of its incorrectness, the answer is that they should not have believed it to be true. If the plaintiffs have paid more money than was due by them upon the faith of the receipt, they may recover it, so that no damages are attributable to any act of the defendant.

PIGOTT and CLEASBY, BB. concurred.

Judgment reversed, quoad the alleged short delivery, but to stand for 1l. 4s. 6d. No costs.

PURKIS v. FLOWER.

Admiralty jurisdiction of County Court—Collision in the body of a county—Ship injured by barge—Costs.

The Admiralty Court Acts (3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6; 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 7), confer upon the High Court of Admiralty of England over causes of damage arising within the body of a county the jurisdiction which that court originally possesses over such causes arising on the high seas; and the jurisdiction given to the County Courts, having admiralty jurisdiction over causes of damage, by the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts 1868 and 1869 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, s. 3, sub sect. 3; 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51, s. 4), is as large (where the amount claimed does not exceed 300l.), as that possessed by the High Court of Admiralty.

By the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, sect. 9, if any action is brought without leave of the court in a Superior Court, which might have been brought in a County Court having admiralty jurisdiction, and the plaintiff shall not recover a sum exceeding the amount to which the jurisdiction of the County Court is by the Act limited, he shall not be entitled to costs, and shall be liable to be condemned in costs, unless the judge before whom the case is tried certifies for costs.

only) would be within the jurisdiction of the High Court of Admiralty if it occurred on the high seas, and (by the Admiralty Courts Acts) if it occurred on the tidal river within the body of a county; hence the County Courts having admiralty jurisdiction would have jurisdiction over such damage.

The Sarah (Lush, 549) followed.

A plaintiff proceeding without leave in a Superior Court for damages to his ship by a barge (propelled by oars only), taking judgment by default, and having his damages assessed by a sheriff at an amount under 300*l.*, is not entitled to his costs. (a)

This was a rule calling upon the plaintiff to show cause why the master should not be at liberty to review his taxation of costs, and disallow the plaintiff's costs, on the ground that the action was brought improperly in the Superior Court.

The facts were briefly as follows:

The plaintiff's vessel, the Silent, was lying at her moorings at Chalk Stones, in the river Thames, where the defendant's barge (propelled by oars only), through improper and unskilful handling, came into collision with the Silent, and the plaintiff in consequence brought an action to recover compensation for the injury to his vessel.

The defendant admitted his negligence, and no plea being entered, the damages were assessed in favour of the plaintiff upon a writ of inquiry at 15*l.* The plaintiff claimed costs, which were allowed by the master upon taxation.

Webster obtained the above rule, contending that this was a cause over which the Admiralty Court would have jurisdiction, that the admiralty jurisdiction in claims of damage not exceeding 300*l.* was given to certain County Courts by the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Acts 1868 and 1869, and that under the Acts, if a plaintiff failed to recover in a cause of damage brought in a Superior Court a sum exceeding 300*l.*, he was not entitled to his costs. (b)

(a) This decision and that of the Sarah ruling that the Admiralty Court has jurisdiction over a claim for collision by a ship against a barge, and the Malvina (Lush, 493; Bro. & Lush, 57; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 218, 341) ruling that the court has jurisdiction over a claim by a barge against a ship, it is obvious that any collision occurring in a tidal river between a barge and a ship is within the jurisdiction. These decisions do not in any way conflict with the decision in Everard v. Kendall (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 391), where the collision was between two barges. In that case, however, the judges expressed some opinions which are scarcely consistent with the present decision. They seem to indicate that for the Admiralty Court to have jurisdiction over a collision, it must have occurred between two ships, that is, two vessels not propelled by oars only. This might have been the case within the body of a county before the 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 7 (see the Debaio, Lush, 151; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 5), but it certainly is not so now.—Ed.

(b) By the County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71) it is enacted: Sect. 3. Any County Court having admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction, and all powers and authorities relating thereto, to try and determine, subject and according to the provisions of this Act, the following causes (in this Act referred to as Admiralty causes). . . . As to any claim for damage to cargo or damage by collision, any cause in which the amount claimed does not exceed 300*l.* Sect. 9. If any person shall take in the High Court of Admiralty of England, or in any Superior Court, proceedings which he might, without agreement, have taken in a County Court, except by order of the judge of the High Court of Admiralty or of such Superior Court, or of a County Court having admiralty jurisdiction, and shall not recover a sum exceeding the amount to which the jurisdiction of the County Court in that admiralty cause is limited by this Act . . . he shall not be entitled to costs, and shall be liable to be condemned in costs, unless the judge of the High Court of Admiralty, or of a Superior Court before whom the cause is tried, shall certify that it was a proper admiralty cause to be tried in the High Court of Admiralty of England, or in a Superior Court. By the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51), it is enacted: Sect. 4, The 3rd section of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, shall extend and apply to all claims for damage to ships, whether by collision or otherwise, when the amount claimed does not exceed 300*l.*

(a) By the 3rd and 4th Vict. c. 65, s. 6, it is enacted that the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction to decide all claims and demands whatsoever in the nature of salvage for services rendered to or damage received by any ship or sea going vessel, or in the nature of towage, or for necessaries supplied to any foreign ship or sea-going vessel, and to enforce the payment thereof whether such ship or vessel may have been within the body of a county or upon the high seas, at the time when the services were rendered or damage received or necessaries furnished in respect of which such claim is made. By the 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 7, it is enacted that the High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for damage done by any ship.

W. G. F. Phillimore now showed cause.—The collision being within the body of the county, the Admiralty Court would have no jurisdiction, unless it were given by an Act of Parliament passed in the present reign. Neither 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6 (a), nor 24 Vict. c. 10, s. 7 apply to the case. "Damage received by a ship" in the first of those statutes must mean damage received by a ship "from another ship," for at the time it was passed process in personam was practically obsolete, and process in rem would have been useless except against a ship. In Everard v. Kendall (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 391; L. Rep. 5 C. P. 428; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 408), it was admitted by Day, arguendo, that there was no case to be found where the Court of Admiralty has dealt with a case of collision between two barges; and there it was held, on a motion for a writ of prohibition to the judge of a County Court who has assumed to exercise jurisdiction in a case in which two barges had come into collision on the river Thames, that the admiralty jurisdiction of the County Court in cases of collision was not more extensive than that of the High Court of Admiralty. As to the second question which is whether the County Court can entertain this action under its admiralty jurisdiction, the jurisdiction was conferred on the County Courts by 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, and extended by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51. But the County Court has no jurisdiction where the Admiralty Court would have none. In The Dowse (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 424; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 627; L. Rep. 3 Adm-135), "necessaries" in the County Courts Acts (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, s. 3, sub-sect. 2) was held only to refer to such claims as the Admiralty Court had jurisdiction over. The Act (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51) should be construed as the previous Act, so as to limit it to such matters as the Admiralty Court have jurisdiction over—and this was decided in Simpson v. Blues (ante vol. 1, p. 326; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 697; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 292), Cargo ex Argos and The Hewsons (ante vol. 1, pp. 360, 519; L. Rep. 3 Adm. 568; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 64; 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 77), are distinguishable, as they were decided on a different section. [Lush, J.—The second Act was only an extension of the first, which was clearly limited in respect of causes of damage at least, by the admiralty jurisdiction.]

R. E. Webster in support of the rule.—In the case of the Sarah (1 Lush. 549), the Court of Admiralty held that it had jurisdiction over a barge in a collision on the high seas, independently of the present Acts; and I rely upon that case, and the words of the Act of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6. I also contend that the words in the second Admiralty Act (24 Vict. c. 10), s. 7, “damage done by any ship,” cover all kinds of damage. Independently of the Admiralty Court, the County Court has jurisdiction under the words of the County Court Acts. The case of Simpson v. Blues (ubi sup.) decided that the County Courts had not a jurisdiction which the Court of Admiralty never possessed; but that case was subsequently fully considered in the Privy Council, and that court refused to follow the decision without attempting to distinguish it: (Cargo ex Argos, ubi sup.)

LUSH, J.—The plain object of the Admiralty Court Acts was to give jurisdiction over Acts committed within the body of a county where such jurisdiction already existed upon the high seas. It is not necessary to decide this question upon the interpretation of the County Courts Acts. I am clearly of opinion, and that opinion is strengthened by the case of the Sarah (1 Lush. 549), that the Admiralty Court would have had jurisdiction under 3 and 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6.

ARCHIBALD, J.—I am also of the same opinion. The moment it is shown, as it is by the case of the Sarah, that the Admiralty Court would have had common law jurisdiction on the high seas, the case is clear, and it is unnecessary for us to decide between the conflicting decisions of the Privy Council and the Court of Common Pleas.

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Monday, Feb. 9, 1874.

THE VILLAGE BELLE.

Charter-party—Demurrage—Exceptions—Civil commotion—Onus of proof.

Where a charterer by his charter-party undertakes to load a ship within certain given lay days, “accidents or causes occurring beyond the control of the shippers or affreighters, which may prevent or delay her loading or discharging, including civil commotion, strikes, riots, stoppage of trains, &c., always excepted,” or to pay demurrage, he cannot excuse default in loading within the lay days by giving evidence of general disturbance and cessation of work in the district about the time; but to exempt himself from liability must show a disturbing cause, actually preventing the loading of the particular ship.

THIS was an appeal from a decree of the judge of the County Court of Glamorganshire, holden at Swansea.

The suit was instituted under the 2nd section of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act Amendment Act 1869, by the owner of the Village Belle against the charterer of that vessel, to recover damages for breach of the charter-party. The shipowner claimed demurrage in respect of detention of the ship after the lay days had expired, for thirty-nine days. The defence of the charterer was, that the default in loading during the lay days was excused by the happening of certain events excepted by the charter-party in favour of the charterer (civil commotion, strikes of pitmen and workmen, &c.) At the time of the arrival of the Village Belle at Bilbao, that place was threatened by the armed forces of the Carlist party in Spain. The facts of the case will be found fully set out in the judgment.

The County Court judge held that there was evidence of general disturbance and civil commotion delaying the loading of vessels, and this was sufficient to excuse the charterers from the performance of their contract. From this decree the shipowner appealed. (a)

(a) The exact amount of evidence required to establish the existence of such a civil commotion as would prevent or delay the loading of a particular ship is not easily arrived at. The charterers are aware that they have great difficulty in obtaining the necessary cargo, and that the difficulty is created by the exception named in the charter-party, but when they attempt to prove that all the sources of supply have been affected by that exception, they find it almost an impossibility to produce any testimony of a stronger character than of general disturbance of trade; the merchants do not altogether abandon their work, but cannot, in face of the public panic, carry it on with their usual rapidity. Still this general disturbance affecting particular trades must affect the loading of a particular ship whose cargo is to be of goods forming the staple of that trade. The difficulty of proof in these cases is so well pointed out by the learned County Court judge (Thos. Falconer, Esq.) that we give his judgment.

His Honour, after stating the facts, said: “It was stated that the defendant could not have chartered the vessel unless he had protected himself from the probable effect of civil commotions in Spain. Of the necessity of such a course there can be no doubt. In countries where educated men influence the multitude, and society is protected by legal equality—the only equality which in this world can be perpetuated or even exist—there is necessarily continued security. Contracts can be made and entered into in such countries without reference to any expectation of a disturbance of the ordinary business of life. In Spain, however, revolution succeeds revolution, general after general, ecclesiastic after ecclesiastic, stimulate to frequent civil strife the desperate and fierce passions of an ignorant population. Against the effects of such events even private contracts require the protection of exceptional conditions. But in the expression of the terms of exceptional conditions, such as ‘civil commotions,’ charter-parties are defective in not declaring what shall be received as sufficient evidence of the facts connected with such conditions. What, for example, shall be sufficient evidence of a ‘civil commotion?’ A claim or demurrage may relate to 50*l.* or 100*l.*, and the claim, if contested, though perfectly just, may involve the expenditure of a very large sum of money to sustain it and an equally large expenditure to oppose it if it be unjust. A ‘civil commotion’ means much more than a local riot. It means attacks by force on the authority of the government through measures which disturb the ordinary trade or business of a locality or a district. The occurrence of such an event, from its publicity and importance, it may have been assumed, would not be disputed. But suppose it is disputed, see what expense may be incurred! Witnesses must be brought from a great distance, and as the knowledge of each witness can extend only over a limited space of ground, many witnesses must be summoned. At one end of a disturbed district all may appear to be peace; at another place there may appear to be the activity of business, and yet what is seen may be only hasty efforts to preserve what may be threatened with destruction; and in another locality the beasts of burden which may usually be employed to supply a port or city with its common articles of trade may be driven off. The bolt

Wood Hill, for the appellant.—To excuse the charterer it must be shown, not only that there was civil commotion, but that it prevented the loading of the ship during the lay days. This the

of war may fall on one place, and the effect of its explosion may shake the whole district. One witness might relate little, and several might appear to contradict each other when even no real ground of disagreement existed. In the case of the San Roman (ante, vol. 1, p. 603), where a ship had been delayed by its captain at Valparaiso, under the apprehension of being captured, the evidence seems to have included reports respecting the movements of a vessel of war and newspaper reports, which might have been correct and incorrect, and the advice of a consul not to sail. The evidence of the most justly apprehended danger must oftentimes be imperfect. But surely there would be no difficulty to provide in charter-parties that those who are the parties to them shall be bound by local official statements of facts relating to causes of delay, matters of regular turn in loading; the amount of cargo; or such other facts as are connected with what are usually called 'exceptional clauses.' This could be especially done when the evidence relates to events of a public character. Commissions to examine witnesses abroad are the source of a great money outlay, and the testimony of witnesses brought from abroad is frequently enormously expensive. It is thus that the great difficulty in this case arises—What is sufficient evidence of 'civil commotions' disturbing the trade of a port? The plaintiff, through his agents, may know what occurred. He should, as a just man, disclose it. He may be ignorant, and then it is the duty of the defendant to excuse the non-performance of his contract. The seamen on board the Village Belle can tell us little. Their knowledge is limited to the business of their own vessel, and to what they can imperfectly observe from its deck. Neither the master, mate, nor seamen could relate what is passing on the not distant mountains which may interfere with the trade they are engaged in. They may know nothing of the injury done to the railway leading to Miranda, though they may have heard where were the chief quarters of the Carlists. John Jones, the mate of the Village Belle, says, 'There were 400 or 500 vessels at Bilbao; there were lots arrived after us.' 'Did they get away before you?' 'Yes—one; she loaded before us.' Surely such an accumulation of ships at the end of February and in March, and down to near the end of April, is strong evidence of great disturbance of trade, caused by those political events referred to by the witnesses. The ship Daniel was at Bilbao in February, but the master was not able to get away till April—though it was early in April. The payment to him of demurrage is of no importance, as his delay might not have been excused by any exception contained in his charter-party. The ship Campanile was a steamer, and it is admitted that a preference is given to the loading of steamers; perhaps even 'regular turn' might permit such a preference. The evidence of Mr. Warburton and of vice-consul Tutor, proves a state of commotion and disturbance, extending from February to April—that is, to the time of the departure of the Village Belle. How, in such a state of affairs, could there be order or regularity in the transaction of business? Some merchants of San Nicholas, or persons having private wharves, or who were placed in favourable positions on the river, between the first loading-place on the river Nervon to Bilbao, may have loaded vessels. 'All accidents and causes occurring beyond the control of the affreighters preventing or delaying loading' are specified in the exceptional clause as well as 'civil commotions.' Is there not sufficient evidence of general commotion and disturbance of the trade delaying the loading of vessels? The case of Tendwilsden v. Hardcastle, heard by me at Cardiff so far back as the year 1857, has been cited. That case, in its principles, has been sustained by several decisions of the Superior Courts: (Adams v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, 28 L. J. 33, C. P.). The charter-party in the Cardiff case provided that the freighters should not be held to be liable for any delay in loading caused by frosts, floods, strikes of workmen, or accidents. I held that a strike at a particular colliery was no defence to the action, the general market for the purchase of coal not respondent has failed to establish, having giving evidence of general disturbance only, and the onus lies entirely upon him.

Clarkson, for the respondent.—There is enough evidence to establish the fact that there was such a general disturbance in the Bilbao district as to prevent the procuring of the usual quantity of ore. It is shown that vessels were kept waiting for ore, and that the miners were taken away by the Carlists. The fair inference from this is, that the delay in loading was occasioned by the general disturbance. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—You must show, not merely that there was a general commotion, but a particular disturbance, by which the loading of the ship during this time was affected. In the German war cases, I held that positive evidence of the presence of French men of war must be given (a); so here evidence of actual prevention must be given.] It is clear on the evidence that there was not enough ore to enable him to fulfil this stipulation. If the charterer had had all the ore there was to be got in Bilbao, this exception would have applied. Why should it not apply equally when the deficiency is spread among several charterers?

Wood Hill was not called upon to reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is an appeal from the County Court of Glamorganshire, under the provisions of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51). The action in the court below was brought by David Rees, the owner of the Village Belle, against the charterer of that vessel, William Henry Thomas, of Swansea, merchant. The charter-party is dated Swansea, 9th Dec. 1872, and is made between David Rees and William Henry Thomas and Co., as agents for the merchant. The charter-party set forth that the Village Belle should proceed to Bilbao, and there load, from the agents of the freighter, a full and complete cargo of iron ore in bulk; it then proceeds in the usual language, till it comes to a clause expressed in these words: "Eight working days to be allowed for loading the said ship at Bilbao, and to be discharged in regular turn, and in the customary manner, with all such despatch as the usage of the port will permit;" and here follow certain excepted perils in favour of the charterers: "All accidents and causes occurring beyond the control of the shippers or affreighters which may prevent being affected by the strike. The strike at a particular pit did not prevent the obtaining of coal in the ordinary course of the coal trade, and now it is usual to meet such a case by a special provision in charter-parties referring to the particular pit or pits from which it is intended to procure coal. If, however, vessels are laden in a port during the general disturbance of trade from some general cause, or during civil commotions, such cases of loading are exceptional. The excusing cause is to be a general disturbance in the business of the port, caused by civil strife. The inference I draw is that there was a prevalent general cause of delay, arising from circumstances named in the exceptional clause existing up to the time the ship was laden, as well as at the time of her arrival. There was clearly disturbances in those districts from which the customary supply of ore at the port of Bilbao came. The disturbances were not merely local riots which could be suppressed by the ordinary civil power of the town, and this was shown by the preparations made for the defence of the town of Bilbao itself. Judgment for defendant."

It is to be regretted that this question, considering its great importance in point of principle, did not go up to the Privy Council.—Ed.

or delay her loading or discharging, including civil commotion, strikes of any pitmen or workmen, riots, frost, floods, stoppage of trains, accidents to machinery, &c., always excepted." Demurrage (if any) was payable at the rate of fourpence per register ton per day.

The vessel arrived at Bilbao on the 23rd Feb. On the 26th Feb. the captain gave notice that he would be ready to take in cargo on the 27th. Then for the purpose of loading the cargo there were eight working days allowed by the charter-party, and these expired on the 6th March. The actual loading did not begin till the 7th April, when fifteen tons were put on board for stiffening. The loading was continued on the 12th April, and was completed on the 16th April, when the vessel sailed. The shipowner claims thirty-nine days' demurrage, at 4*d.* per register ton per day.

It cannot be denied—what is really an important principle of law in these cases—that the burden of proving that the non-compliance with the terms of a charter-party similar to the present was occasioned by one of the exceptions in favour of the charterer therein contained lies upon the charterer, that is, upon the respondent in the present case. The whole question seems to lie in a very narrow compass, and it is: Has he produced such adequate proof that he is within the exceptions of the above clause of the charter-party as will reasonably satisfy the mind of the court? What is the proof he has produced? He called two persons only, although he had abundant opportunity to produce other evidence. The cause was instituted on the 8th June, and heard on the 8th Aug. No application was made for any adjournment before the hearing, but at the hearing, for good and sufficient reason I have no doubt, the case was adjourned until November, and this sufficient postponement afforded ample opportunity for the introduction by the respondent of any further evidence which might appear necessary.

Now the plaintiff had produced several witnesses who said, in substance, that there were commotions and that there was a stoppage of the line of railway for four days—but that that stoppage took place on the 18th, 19th, 20th, and 21st March, long after the time for loading had expired. It was shown that iron ore was brought down every day except those four days. That evidence had been produced by the plaintiffs, but it must not be forgotten that the burden of proof was on the defendant, the present respondent. The respondent produced a Mr. Warburton, who said he was an iron merchant, and in the beginning of the year 1873, from January to April, he was at Bilbao, as a general manager of the Eva Iron Works; that there were great disturbances in the district generally; his mines were near the town, and they were affected, although they were under more protection than mines in the country; the miners absented themselves, and being in fear of the Carlists did not work; on the 18th March the Carlists cut the Deputation Railway which brings ore down from the mines; for four or five days the line was cut, and it was cut again for a day, later; he loaded a good many ships at Bilbao during the time; his ore was from the Eva Mines close to the town, and was all brought down in barges; the Eva Mines were never stopped during this time. No evidence was given why the vessel could not have got ore from this mine. The respondent also called a Mr. Tutor, Spanish Vice-Consul, I presume at some English port, and partner of the other witness. Now, this gentleman says that he was resident at Bilbao during the time this ship was there; that the disturbed state of the country interfered with hauling of the ore, and that the interruption was such as to make a sensible difference in the quantity brought up; during the time he loaded a good many vessels, and but for the disturbances he should, without doubt, have loaded more.

Now, does this kind of evidence, so entirely general and vague, satisfy the burden of proof and show that there was any civil commotion or other interruption with the exception, preventing the loading of this vessel during the lay days? The learned judge of the court below thought it did, but I cannot see the force of his reasoning. It is admitted that the cases cited by the learned judge are not in point, and his reasons are in effect summed up at the end of his judgment, where he says, "The excusing cause is to be a general disturbance in the business of the port caused by civil strife. The inference that I draw is that there was a prevalent general cause of delay, arising from circumstances named in the exceptional clause existing up to the time the ship was laden, as well as at the time of her arrival. There were clearly disturbances in those districts from which the customary supply of ore at the port of Bilbao came. The disturbances were not merely local riots, which could be suppressed by the ordinary civil power of the town, and this was shown by the preparation made for the defence of the town of Bilbao itself."

In my opinion the burden of proof is not satisfied by the respondents' producing, as he has done, evidence of general commotion. It is not sufficient to show that there is a general civil disturbance and a stoppage of the railway for a short period. The respondent was bound to show that between the 27th Feb. and the 7th March there was a disturbing cause of such a character as would prevent the loading of this vessel, that it did actually prevent the loading, and so brought the respondent within the excepted perils.

The question then narrows itself to this, whether such proof has been produced. I am clearly of opinion that the proof is not adequate to show that the loading was prevented by the above perils. That being my opinion, and having the same evidence before me as there was in the court below, I must, however reluctantly, reverse the sentence and pronounce that the plaintiff is entitled to thirty-nine days' demurrage and the costs of this appeal.

Appeal allowed, and decree below reversed.

THE GLENGARRY.

Collision—Launch—Precautions required—River Mersey.

It is the duty of those who launch a vessel to do so with the utmost precaution, and to give such notice as is reasonable and sufficient to prevent injury happening to other vessels from the launch.

and the burden of proving that these things have been done lies upon them.

What is reasonable and sufficient notice depends upon local circumstances; the size and breadth of the river or waters in which the launch takes place, the amount of shipping, and other like things.

Where in launching a vessel in a river the usual precautions taken in that river have been taken, and the usual general notice that the launch was about to take place has been given, the persons having charge of the launch have performed all they are required to do by law, and no specific notice of the exact moment of the launch is required.

In the River Mersey to give notice of a launch taking place it is customary to have the ship dressed in flags for an hour or more before high water (about which time the launch takes place); to have tugs, one at least also dressed in flags, plying about some time before the launch in front of the yard where the ship is lying; and there are usually a number of small boats lying off ready to pick up timber when the ship comes away.

This was a cause of damage instituted by the Bridgewater Navigation Company, owners of the flats or barges Industry and Atlas, and of the cargo lately laden therein, and of the freight payable in respect thereof, against the ship Glengarry, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and against the owners thereof intervening. The petition filed in behalf of the plaintiff was as follows:

1. The Industry was a flat plying on the River Mersey, of tons register. The Atlas is a flat of tons register. The Glengarry is an iron ship of 3000 tons burthen, register 1800.

2. At about 11.45 a.m. on the 23rd Oct. 1873, the plaintiff's steam tug Bridgewater left the Morpeth Dock, Birkenhead, and proceeded to steam up the River Mersey, having a train of four flats in tow over her starboard quarter, and a train of five flats in tow over her port quarter. The Industry was the second flat in the port train, and the Atlas was the second flat in the starboard train.

3. The weather was fine and clear, with a light breeze from the south-east. The tide was flood, about half an hour off high water.

4. When the Bridgewater was about opposite the Tranmere Beach and near mid-river, the Glengarry was suddenly launched, stern foremost, from the ship-building yard of Messrs. Royden, on the Liverpool shore, and ran at great speed across the river towards the flats which the Bridgewater had in tow.

5. The helm of the Bridgewater was at once put hard-a-port, and the helms of the flats were also ported. When the master of the Bridgewater saw that it was impossible to draw the flats clear of the Glengarry he hailed the flatmen to cast off the tow ropes between the first and second flats in each train.

6. This was done at once, but the Glengarry came on and struck the Industry with great force on the port bow and drove her against the Atlas. The Industry shortly afterwards sank, in consequence of the injuries she had received in the collision; the Atlas also received considerable damage.

7. The said collision was caused wholly by the negligence and improper conduct of those having the charge and control of the Glengarry.

8. They negligently permitted the Glengarry to be launched when her course across the river was not clear.

9. They negligently omitted to give proper and sufficient notice or warning of the said launch.

10. They improperly neglected to keep a good look-out.

11. They negligently omitted to take proper measures or precautions for controlling, directing or arresting the course and speed of the Glengarry.

The answer filed on behalf of the owners of the Glengarry was as follows:

1. The Glengarry is an iron ship of one thousand eight hundred tons register, and belongs to the Port of Liverpool.

2. Previous to the 23rd Oct. last, the Glengarry had been building in the defendants' building yard on the Liverpool side of the River Mersey, and it had been determined to launch her on that day.

3. Accordingly, the necessary preparations were made for the launch on that day, the Glengarry had a flag flying on each of three poles erected on her deck, and two tugs, which had been engaged to take her into dock, when launched, and one of which was decorated with flags, were manœuvring off the building yard.

4. About 12.15 p.m., the wind being about S.S.E., a gentle breeze, the weather being fine and clear, and the tide flood, but slack water in shore, it being high water at 12.24 p.m., those in charge of the launch, having first ascertained that the river abreast of the said building yard was clear, gave orders to knock away the daggars and the Glengarry had begun to move down the ways, when the tug Bridgewater, towing a double string of flats, eight or nine in number, and altogether about six hundred to seven hundred feet in length, was observed to the westward of mid river, and in a north-westerly direction from the Glengarry, coming up the river heading to the southward, so as to cross the course of the Glengarry; it was going at a speed of about four knots, and was distant between a quarter and half a mile from the Glengarry.

5. It was then too late to stop or check the Glengarry, and she took the water stern foremost, and as her stern got into the flood tide, she made a south-westerly course.

6. Although those on board the Bridgewater, and the flats, saw, or might have seen that the Glengarry was being launched, they continued their course, and as the Bridgewater neared the Glengarry, she appeared very much to increase her speed, and although loudly hailed by those on board the Glengarry to stop and let go the flats, she went on and crossed the course of the Glengarry, taking with her the two headmost flats, but the flat Industry, which was next in line astern of the leading flats, came into collision with the rudder of the Glengarry. The flat Atlas, which had been towing abreast of the Industry, did not come into collision with the Glengarry, but was damaged by the Industry.

7. Nothing could be done by those on board the Glengarry to avoid the collision.

8. Proper and sufficient notice and warning was given by those having charge of the Glengarry, that the launch was about to take place, and it was the duty of those in charge of the Bridgewater and the flats to leave the course of the launch clear.

9. Those on board the Bridgewater and the flats improperly neglected to keep a proper look-out.

10. These on board the Bridgewater and the flats improperly neglected to leave the course of the Glengarry clear.

11. Those on board the Bridgewater and the flats neglected to keep out of the way of the Glengarry.

12. Those on board the Bridgewater improperly neglected, before the said collision, to slacken her speed, or to stop and reverse, and improperly increased her speed, and crossed the course of the Glengarry.

13. Those on board the Bridgewater improperly neglected in proper time to port her helm, and to cast off the said flats.

14. Those in charge of the Industry and Atlas neglected to cast off or cut their tow ropes in time to avoid the said collision.

15. The said collision was caused wholly by the negligence or default of those in charge of the Bridgewater and the said flats, and was not caused in any way by any negligence or default on the part of those on board or in charge of the Glengarry, and so far as the latter are concerned the said collision was an inevitable accident.

16. Except so far as they are herein admitted, the defendants deny the truth of the several allegations in the plaintiff's petition.

The pleadings were thereupon concluded.

The main facts in dispute between the parties were first the position in the river of the Bridgewater and the flats, when the Glengarry was launched; and secondly the precautions which it is usual to take in the River Mersey when a ship is launched.

The plaintiffs produced evidence in support of the allegations of their petition. High water on that day was about 12.24 p.m. The tug in going to the Morpeth Dock, to fetch the flats had passed the yard from which the launch was afterwards made about an hour before the collision, but had seen no flags indicating that a launch was about to take place. There was nothing however to prevent the crew of the tug seeing Royden's yard from the inside of Morpeth Dock. The master of the tug did not actually see the Glengarry until just after he left the Morpeth Dock, and then knew she was going to be launched about high water, but could not tell the exact time. It was alleged by him that it was usual when there was a launch in the river Mersey, not only to dress the launch in flags, but to have a steam tug dressed in flags in the middle of the river to warn passing vessels of the time when the launch was coming off; if he had had this warning he would have kept farther over to the westward. The tug and flats were as alleged by the plaintiffs about one hundred yards to the westward of mid river and abreast of Tranmere ferry when the Glengarry was launched. Launches always take place about high water, but according to the plaintiffs they took place any time within an hour before high water.

Evidence was given for the defendants in support of their answer, and thence it appeared the usual precautions taken on the Mersey to give warning of a launch are that the ship is dressed with flags, and has in attendance on her one or two tugs, according to her size; one of these tugs is dressed with flags, and manœuvres off and on at the entrance to the building yard till shortly before high water, and then prepares to follow the launch, which takes place about that time; small boats are also in attendance to pick up timber as the ship comes away. From Mr. Royden's yard launches always took place at about 10 minutes before high water, as the yard abutted on to the river, and it was consequently necessary to wait until the tide ceased to flow, in order to avoid having the ship twisted on the ways as she took the water. There were two tugs in attendance on the Glengarry; one was dressed with flags and was up and down the river in front of the yard for an hour before the launch; the Glengarry had flags flying for about an hour before the launch took place. The pilot in charge of the Glengarry alleged, that when the word was given to let go the river was clear abreast the yard, but that no sooner had the ship begun to move than he saw the tug and flats coming up the river; it was then too late to stop the launch. From the time the ship left the ways to the time of the collision eight minutes elapsed. When the tug and flats were first seen from the Glengarry they were about opposite Monk's Ferry. The Glengarry when launched went about three quarters of the way across the river.

Aspinall, Q.C. (W. C. Gully with him) for the plaintiff, contended that the general notice that there was going to be a launch about the time of high water was not sufficient, but that a special notice of the approximate time ought to be given by means of a tug flying flags in the middle of the river, lowering or raising a flag, firing a gun, or some such act calculated to attract particular attention. The defendants have no right to require that vessels shall keep out of their way for an hour before high water; that is practically to block up the navigation of the river for an hour. The plaintiffs were using a highway in a proper manner, and had the right to suppose it safe, and no negligence can be imputed to them, except upon the supposition that they ought to have expected the defendants to be negligent. There is evidence that there is a custom to give particular notice of the approximate time of the launch, and even if the evidence on this point is not very strong, such a course is so reasonable that I submit that this court ought to hold that such notice should be given.

The launch might have been delayed if they had had a good look out, or they ought to have given the plaintiff notice. The plaintiff had a right to go ahead, or receive notice. The defendants saw us in time, or ought to have seen us in time, and yet let the ship go; this was negligence on the part of the defendants, even if the tug and flats were wrong in being where they were:

Davies v. Mann, 10 M. & W. 549.

Myburgh (Butt Q.C. with him) for the defendants.—The notices of the launch being those which are usual in the Mersey were sufficient on the authority of the cases quoted. There was no reason why the tugs and flats should not have kept further over to the westward on seeing the flags; the Mersey is sufficiently broad for both the launch, and the free passage of vessels. There was nothing to prevent the tug from waiting in the Morpeth Dock till the launch was over.

Aspinall, Q.C., in reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—On the 23rd Oct., in last year, shortly before high water, between twelve and a quarter past twelve, or twenty minutes past twelve, in the river Mersey, the Glengarry, which was then launched from the Liverpool side of the river, went stern foremost into the port bow of the Industry, forcing her into the port side of the Atlas, they being two out of a number of vessels called flats, which were on the port and starboard side of a tug called the Bridgewater, and the question for the court is who is to blame for this collision? Whether the tug which had these flats in tow is to blame, or whether the Glengarry, the launch, is to blame, having regard to all the circumstances of the case?

It may be almost unnecessary to make any observations on the general law relating to these cases of vessels launched, after the full discussions which they have undergone in the three cases, to which reference has been made, the case of The Blenheim (4 N. of C. 393), the case of The Vianna (Swab. 405) and the more recent case before the Privy Council (The United States, 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 166). There is no doubt whatever as to the law which has been laid down for a considerable period, and always observed in this court—viz. that it is the duty of those who launch a vessel to do so with the utmost precaution, and to give such a notice as is reasonable and sufficient to prevent injury, happening from that event, and that the burden of proof lies on them. There is no doubt at all that those who appear for the launch have the obligation cast upon them of showing that it took place in such circumstances, which ought, with reasonable precautions on the other side, not to have brought her into collision. What is reasonable notice must of course depend very much on the facts of these cases. It was very well said in the case of The Blenheim, "what is reasonable notice depends on local circumstances; the breadth of the river, the number of vessels passing, and other circumstances of that kind. It must not be a mere general notice of a launch on a particular day, the notice must so specify the time of the launch, that vessels navigating up and down the river may not be damaged or incur danger."

THE GLENGARRY.

The first subject which the court must consider is whether, according to the evidence in this case, there was such reasonable notice as the law requires, given by those who launched the Glengarry? Now the Glengarry was a very large vessel, I think of 3000 tons. She was launched from the slip of Mr. Royden, on the Liverpool side of the Mersey, and it appears from a variety of evidence, which at this late hour of the evening it is not necessary to go into in detail, that it is customary in the river Mersey before a launch takes place, that a certain number of flags should be put on poles, which are placed where the masts are to be—if it is a barque or a ship, three poles, a brig two poles, a schooner one pole, and so on—but that there should be a certain number of flags put on poles in the vessel, as indicating that the vessel is about to be launched. It appears also that it is customary to have two steam tugs in attendance on the vessel, and for one of the steam tugs to have bunting, or flags of various kinds, on it; and it appears also that it is customary to have small boats called gigs, pulling about, in order to pick up some of the timber, which would otherwise be lost, when the operation of launching takes place. All these precautions were taken in this instance, and it is not denied, and could not be denied, that the proper and usual general notice was given that the launch was about to take place. It is said that a more specific notice was required, and various suggestions were made as to what the specific notice should be, but no evidence was produced before me at all, that any such specific notice is habitually given in cases of this description. One witness indeed did say that it was usual that a tug should be in the mid river, just before the vessel is launched, but that witness stood almost alone in his opinion, and the pilot who was produced on behalf of the plaintiffs in this case, in enumerating what precautions were necessary to be taken in order that a launch should take place in safety, did not mention that it was a necessary circumstance that there should be a boat in mid-river, but he did recapitulate all these precautions, which, as a matter of fact, were taken in this case. The yard or slip, from which this launch took place, is one in which it appears from the evidence a great number of vessels are built, and I think the evidence was that a considerable number were launched every year. I think Mr. Royden, who was examined, said twelve or thirteen.

Therefore, putting all these circumstances together, I am of opinion that the principle of the law to which I have referred, justifies me in saying that there was not only a general notice, but a sufficient notice according to the usage of the place, that a launch was about to take place at this time. It was known perfectly well that the launch could only take place very near to the time of high water. Now high water was about twenty-four minutes past twelve on this occasion. The collision I think took place somewhere about a quarter past twelve, and the launch took place about six or seven minutes after twelve, according to the best calculation one can arrive at. I must mention what has made a considerable impression on the mind of the court. It appears not only from the evidence produced on behalf of the plaintiffs, but also from that produced on behalf of the defendants, especially the evidence of the master of the tug Bridgewater, that this vessel, the Glengarry, stood very high on the ways, and that there was nothing to prevent his seeing it from the Morpeth Dock, and that in fact he did see it from there and must have seen that she had her proper flags up.

It becomes necessary to make some short statement with regard to the plaintiffs in this case the tug and the flats. The Bridgewater came out of Morpeth Dock, with I think eight or nine flats in tow, so many on her port side, and so many on her starboard side. Now, according to the statement of the master, before she came out of Morpeth Dock, the Glengarry, with the flags indicating an approaching launch, was visible to her, and she knew, for the reasons which I have already stated, that the launch would take place very nearly about high water, and I admit the proposition that was contended for by the counsel for the plaintiff in this case, that it is not competent to those who are about to launch a vessel to block up the navigation not only for a day, but any considerable period of time. But in this case the evidence satisfies the court that the tug must have been aware that the launching would take place within a very short time of high water—say twenty minutes or a quarter of an hour; and that being made plain to her when she was within the Morpeth Dock, it was her duty—as it appears to the court after consulting with the Elder Brethren of the Trinity House, who are entirely of the same opinion—it was the duty of the tug when in Morpeth Docks, either to wait a quarter of an hour or twenty minutes, if she thought there was any danger to be incurred by the launch; or it was her duty when she came out (she had full option to choose which course she would take), to have ported her helm, and to have kept up on the west shore, in which case the collision would not have happened. According to the evidence we believe that she did not take this course, and indeed it seems to be perfectly well proved in the case that she came out into mid-channel.

Now what precautions were taken besides those general precautions I have mentioned? What precautions were taken by those who were about to launch the Glengarry? Really it seems every precaution that could be required was taken. The look-out, so far from being as suggested a bad look-out in this case, appears to us to have been of a very good description. The pilot says he was aft on the ship; there were two steamers in attendance, the Railler and the Garter, flying about for an hour before. Then the pilot says he looked to see if the river was clear, he saw three flats, and he waited till they got clear; he looked again to see if it was clear, and then he gave the order to let go, and when he had given the order to let go, Mr. Royden, who was on a stage under the bows, performed what I believe is the usual ceremony on these occasions of cutting the rope himself, and the vessel began to move. After the vessel had so begun to move the pilot called out, "Hold on," or "stop the launch," and it has been contended that if he had discharged his duty properly he would have said that before the vessel began to move, and before the last rope had been cut, but we are not of that opinion at all.

It may very well be, as was very ingeniously suggested by Mr. Myburgh, that as this tug and the flats came out of Morpeth Dock, they came in a direct line and did not present themselves, until the tug had ported, to the view of the pilot; but, be that as it may, there was no necessity for any collision in this case if the tug had taken the proper course of porting to keeping herself along the west shore. We believe upon the evidence—there is great conflict as there always is in these cases—but we believe that the tug when reported had arrived a quarter of a mile N.N.W. of Mr. Royden's slip in mid channel, and was not as she represents herself to have been, off Tranmere Ferry. The launch had to go 800 yards to the place of collision, and she was stopped in mid river against the barge, into which she ran. In fact, when the whole case comes to be examined, it resolves itself into this, that in our judgment the tug steamed right across the path of the launch, and that she did nothing but go on full speed, and took no measure whatever to avoid the collision in this case.

Having arrived at this conclusion, it becomes unnecessary in my judgment to go into the other parts of the case, and I have no hesitation in pronouncing, under the advice that I have received, that the plaintiffs in this case have failed to establish the averments in their petition, and that I must reject that petition.

THE JOHN EVANS.

Salvage—Bond given to Receiver of Wreck—Leave to proceed in Admiralty Court—Jurisdiction of County Court—County Courts' Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71) sect. 3, 9, 21—Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), sect. 468.

As it is a matter of grave doubt whether the County Courts having admiralty jurisdiction have power to enforce salvage bonds given to Receiver of Wrecks under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) sect. 468. the High Court of Admiralty will, on the application of a salvor in respect of whose services such a bond has been given, grant leave to proceed in the High Court under the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), sect. 9.

Seemle, that even where leave is so given to proceed in the High Court, that court is not thereby precluded from condemning the plaintiff in costs, if at the hearing of the cause it should appear that the cause was improperly instituted in the court.

This was an application by the defendants to rescind an order made by the Judge of the High Court of Admiralty, giving leave to institute a suit in that court, or to order that the suit should proceed subject to costs in the same way as though such order had not been made.

The plaintiffs, who were the owners, master, and crew of the lugger, Wild Boy, moved the court on the previous motion day "for liberty to institute a cause of salvage on behalf of the owners, master, and crew of the lugger Wild Boy against the ship or vessel John Evans, her cargo and freight, and to direct that the bond given to the receiver of wreck at Ramsgate in the sum of 600*l.* in respect of such salvage services may be brought into the registry of this honourable court." In support of this motion, an affidavit was filed stating that salvage services had been rendered by the plaintiff to the John Evans and her cargo; that a bond had been given to the receiver of wreck at Ramsgate in the sum of 600*l.* to secure the payment of compensation for such services; that by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) sect. 468, power is given to the Admiralty Court to adjudicate upon the amount of salvage, and enforce bonds given under the foregoing circumstances; and that the County Courts have no such power, nor has any other court except the Admiralty Court. Upon these facts and allegations the Admiralty Court gave leave to institute the suit. The order was made upon the ex parte application of the plaintiff. The defendants now moved to rescind the former order, and in support of their motion filed an affidavit alleging that, although a notice of the former motion had been served upon the defendant, it had come too late for them to instruct any one to appear on their behalf; that the services were of a very trifling character, and deserving of a small reward, and that the cause ought to have been brought in a county court. In reply to this affidavit the plaintiff filed another denying the plaintiff's statements of fact, and calling the attention of the court to the fact that similar orders had on many previous occasions been made by the court although opposed by the owners of the salvaged property. (a) The ship was actually at Monmouth at the commencement of the proceedings.

W. G. F. Phillimore for the defendants in support of the motion.—The plaintiffs applied for leave to proceed here in order to avoid being condemned in costs under sect. 9 of the County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71) if they should recover a less sum than 300*l.* The reason alleged for their application is that the County Courts cannot enforce a salvage bond given under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) sect. 468, (b) I

(a) Similar orders were made in The Oneiza, The Snaresbrook; The Zetland and The Clotho. In the last mentioned case leave was given to proceed in the High Court although opposed by the owners of ship, cargo, and freight.—Ee.

(b) This section is as follows:—"468. Whenever any salvage is due to any person under this Act, the receiver shall act as follows; (that is to say)

First if the same is due in respect of services rendered in assisting any ship and boat, or in saving the lives of persons belonging to the same, or the cargo or apparel thereof,

He shall detain such ship and boat and the cargo and apparel belonging thereto until payment is made, or process has been issued by some competent court for the detention of such ship, boat, cargo, or apparel. . . .

But it shall be lawful for the receiver, if at any time previously to the issue of such process security is given to his satisfaction for the amount of salvage due, to release from his custody any ship, boat, cargo, apparel, or wreck so detained by him as aforesaid; and in cases where the claim for salvage exceeds two hundred pounds it shall be lawful in England for the High Court of Admiralty of England,

ADM.]

THE JOHN EVANS.

submit that there was no need of the order as the bond might have been enforced in the county court. The County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, sect. 3, gives County Courts having admiralty jurisdiction power to try "as to any claim for salvage—any cause in which the value of the property saved does not exceed one thousand pounds, and in which the amount claimed does not exceed three hundred pounds." [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—Does that Act give a plaintiff an absolute right to costs if he obtained leave to proceed here in the first instance?] Sect. 9 would appear to bear that construction. The plaintiff would be entitled to his costs unless the court positively ordered him to pay them, and in practice this is never done in salvage cases. The Merchant Shipping Act 1854, simply provides a mode in which salvors can get security for the payment of their claims without detaining the property. The receiver is to arrest and take security instead of waiting for the warrant of the court, the amount of salvage is to be settled afterwards. The taking security in this form is only another mode of getting bail. The proceeding to recover salvage remained the same as it was before the Act in claims exceeding 200*l.*, the security only being changed. The jurisdiction of this court in such a case is over a claim of salvage and that jurisdiction is transferred by the County Courts Act to the County Court. Bonds under the amount of 200*l.* given as security for salvage reward are not under the Act within the jurisdiction of any named court; still it is to be presumed that some court has jurisdiction over them. This court has not power over them. It must be concluded that the justices have power by implication to enforce them under sect. 460 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. Hence a reason can be found for the express words, giving jurisdiction over bonds over 200*l.*; the justices would refuse under sect. 460, to entertain a claim where there was a bond for a greater amount, and yet in the Admiralty Court the plaintiff might be condemned in costs if he recovered less than that amount, although he was obliged to introduce his suit there. This is the reason why express power is given to this court; but this does not alter the nature of the claim which still remains a salvage claim. Otherwise the magistrates, having no express power given to them, could not enforce bonds under 200*l.* If these are ordinary salvage claims they are transferred to the County Courts where under 300*l.* The bond can be enforced in the County Court in whose district the bond is given. The bond is no more than bail or security given to an officer of the court.

Clarkson for the plaintiffs, contra.—This court is the only court which has power to enforce a bond, given to the receiver of wreck in such a case as this. The object of the bond is to release the ship, and in Ireland for the High Court of Admiralty of Ireland and in Scotland for the Court of Session, to determine any question that may arise concerning the amount of the security to be given or the sufficiency of the securities; and in all cases where bond or other security is given to the receiver for an amount exceeding two hundred pounds, it shall be lawful for the salvor or for the owner of the property salvaged or their respective agents, to institute proceedings in such last mentioned courts for the purpose of having the questions arising between them adjudicated upon, and the said courts may enforce payment of the said bond or other security, in the same manner as if bail had been given in the said courts."

to enable her to leave the port where the bond is given. Now by the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71) sect. 21, proceedings in an admiralty cause in the County Court must be commenced "in the County Court having admiralty jurisdiction within the district of which the vessel or property to which the cause relates is at the commencement of the proceedings," provided that this rule is applicable; which is the case here, as the ship is at Monmouth within the district of a County Court having admiralty jurisdiction. Hence the suit in this case must be begun, if in any County Court, at Monmouth. What jurisdiction can the County Court at Monmouth have over the receiver at Ramsgate, to require him to produce and to enforce a bond given there, or pay over a deposit of money? On the other hand the Admiralty Court has jurisdiction over all receivers of wreck, and can compel the bonds or deposits to be sent to the registry of this court. There is no difficulty as to bonds for amounts under 200*l.*; the justices on the spot where those bonds are given can enforce them. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—If the justices have, without express words and by implication only, jurisdiction over bonds for amounts under 200*l.*, why have not the County Courts jurisdiction by implication also over bonds for amounts under 300*l.*?] Because the County Courts have no power over receivers of wreck out of their own jurisdiction, and could not enforce a bond given out of their own circuit, even if they could within it. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—The County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 does not prevent me, if it should turn out that this suit was improperly instituted in this court, from condemning the plaintiff in costs even if this order stands. The order for leave to proceed is given on an ex parte application, and if I have given it improperly I am not bound by it, and I should be at full liberty to give no costs or less salvage reward. It is a question of considerable doubt whether the statutes have given jurisdiction over receivers of wreck and these bonds in every part of England to the County Courts, whilst there is no doubt that this court has such jurisdiction. That alone is enough to entitle me to give leave to proceed here.] Besides it is doubtful whether the County Courts can have, under any circumstances, jurisdiction in these cases. Their jurisdiction in causes of salvage is in rem or in personam only. This is not a proceeding in rem; nor can it be strictly called a proceeding in personam. It is not against the owners alone; it is against the obligee of the bond, who may or may not be the owner. The general terms of the County Courts Act cannot embrace the jurisdiction given by express terms to this court by the Merchant Shipping Act. If such a transfer of jurisdiction had been intended, the Legislature would at least have effected it by giving to the County Courts in express terms jurisdiction over the receivers within their district.

W. G. F. Phillimore in reply.—There is nothing to prevent an agreement being entered into to try at Ramsgate, and then the County Court there would have jurisdiction over the receiver and the bond. The receiver is an officer of the court, and would be of any court where the cause was instituted, and could be punished for not bringing in the bond. This is a cause of salvage, and the County Court has clearly jurisdiction in such causes.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—This is a cause of salvage, in which under the provisions of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), I made an order permitting the salvors to institute proceedings in this court. An application is now made to me by the defendants to rescind the order.

The words of the 9th section are: "If any person shall take in the High Court of Admiralty, or in any superior court proceedings, which he might without agreement have taken in a County Court, except by order of the judge of the High Court of Admiralty, and of such superior court, or of a County Court having admiralty jurisdiction; and shall not recover a sum exceeding the amount to which the jurisdiction of the County Court in that admiralty cause is limited by this Act; and also if any person without agreement shall, except by order as aforesaid, take proceedings as to salvage in the High Court of Admiralty, or any superior Court in respect of property saved, the value of which when saved does not exceed 1000*l.*, he shall not be entitled to costs, and shall be liable to be condemned in costs, unless the judge of the High Court of Admiralty, or of a superior court before whom the cause is tried or heard, shall certify that it is a proper admiralty cause to be tried in the High Court of Admiralty of England, or in a superior court."

Now I am of opinion that this section contemplates proceedings being taken by order of this court upon an ex parte application by the plaintiff. At the same time it is competent to the other parties in the suit to apply to have any order so made rescinded; and, moreover, although the section apparently gives alternative modes of avoiding condemnation in costs, the alternatives must be taken together, and there is nothing to prevent the court—if need be and justice should require it—for condemning the plaintiffs in costs at the hearing, notwithstanding that they may have obtained an order of the court to take proceedings here, and that the court had refused to rescind that order on the application of the defendants.

The grounds asserted in the first instance, why an order under the transfer sections should be granted in this case, were that there was a salvage claim against property valued at 600*l.*, which had been placed in the hands of the receiver of wreck at Ramsgate; that the receiver, exercising the power given to him by the 468th sect. of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 and 18 Vict. c. 104), had taken from the owners of the property, in lieu of bail, a bond in the amount of 600*l.*: that the County Court had no jurisdiction to enforce that bond, and that it was therefore necessary to bring the suit in this court.

I know that there are no reported cases to be found with respect to the practice of the court on this point, but I remember that in many cases orders for proceedings to be taken here have been made by the court where applications have been based upon the same grounds as upon the present occasion, namely, that neither the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 71), nor in the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51) are there any express words giving to County Courts jurisdiction over bonds, or any power to enforce them, or to compel the receiver to deliver up the bonds or security he may have received from salvors, under the powers given to him by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. It is clear that this court has no original jurisdiction, or power over bonds given to a receiver of wreck, and that it was thought necessary to confer this power by express words; and accordingly the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 468, having given salvors the right to institute proceedings in this court, where the claim for salvage exceeds 200*l.*, gives the power to the court to enforce the bonds in these words:—"and the said courts may enforce the payment of the said bond or other security, in the same manner as if bail had been given in the said courts." It has been argued that, although the County Courts have not acquired jurisdiction; in such cases by express words, yet it is given by necessary implication from the words of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, sect. 3, which says, "Any County Court having admiralty jurisdiction shall have jurisdiction, and all powers and authorities relating thereto, to try and determine, subject and according to the provisions of this Act, the following causes (in this Act referred to as admiralty causes): (1) As to any claim for salvage—any cause in which the value of the property saved does not exceed one thousand pounds, or in which the amount claimed does not exceed three hundred pounds, &c." It has been contended that under these words the power in question has been sufficiently given to the County Courts, having admiralty jurisdiction, and it has been pointed out that if this were not the case there would be a casus omissus in the Merchant Shipping Act, because, if express words are necessary to confer the jurisdiction, by that Act the Justices have no power to enforce these bonds or to adjudicate upon salvage disputes, where security has been given to the receiver of wreck, even though the value of the security is under 200*l.*

It is undoubtedly true that a great many imperfections exist in the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, and that many difficulties may be suggested arising out of the mode in which those Acts have been drawn, without accurate knowledge of the subjects they were going to affect, and it is at least a matter of grave doubt whether the County Courts having admiralty jurisdiction would be held to have the jurisdiction contended for. This, however, in my opinion furnishes good reason why the proceedings should be commenced in this court; moreover, it should not be forgotten, I am not thereby prevented in any way from visiting the applicant with costs if it should appear that the suit has been improperly instituted.

I shall refuse this motion; but I do not mean that my refusal to rescind the order will in any way bind the hands of the court as to costs or prevent it from condemning the plaintiffs in costs, if it should become necessary to do so by reason of the plaintiffs having proceeded in this court when they might have proceeded in an inferior court, or otherwise improperly instituted the suit.

As the question in this case is novel, and raised in court for the first time, I shall order the costs of the motion to be costs in the cause.

THE C. S. BUTLER; THE BALTIC.

[ADM.]

Wednesday, March 4, 1874.

THE C. S. BUTLER; THE BALTIC.

Collision—Damage done by salving ship—Right to salvage reward.

Where damage is inflicted upon a ship by another engaged in rendering salvage services to the former, the Court of Admiralty regards the negligence of the salvor less severely than it does the negligence of a vessel wholly unconnected with the injured vessel, but will condemn the salvor in the damage where he has been guilty of gross negligence and want of proper navigation.

A salvor whose ship succeeds in bringing an injured ship into safety, but in so doing inflicts damage upon her by coming into collision through negligence and want of proper navigation, which are gross but not wilful, is not thereby deprived of his right to a reward which has been agreed upon between the masters of the respective vessels.

THESE two causes were respectively a cause of collision instituted by the owners of the barque Baltic, against the steamship C. S. Butler, and a cause of salvage by the owners master and crew of the C. S. Butler against the Baltic. The cause of collision was instituted in the High Court of Admiralty on 8th Dec. 1872. The cause of salvage was instituted in the County Court of Hampshire, and was on 27th June, 1873, transferred to the High Court on the ground that the cause of damage was there pending. It was agreed between the solicitors of the respective parties that pleadings should be filed in the damage cause only, and that the two suits should be heard at the same time, and upon the same evidence, and that if the court should decide that the C. S. Butler was entitled to salvage reward an award in respect of such reward should be made for 100*l.*, the amount agreed upon by the respective masters of the two vessels, and costs. The facts will be found sufficiently stated in the pleadings in the damage cause.

The petition filed on behalf of the owners of the Baltic against the C. S. Butler, and against the owners of the said steamship, the defendants intervening, was as follows:

1. Between 5 p.m. and 6 p.m. on 27th Oct., 1873, the Barque Baltic of 458 tons register, laden with a cargo of deals, and bound from New Brunswick to Hull, and carrying a crew of eleven hands was off Beachy Head in the English Channel.

2. The Baltic during the previous night had lost her jibboom and foreyard, and had suffered other damage by collision, and was at such time proceeding down channel on the starboard tack with a view to getting into port to repair damages; she had a signal for a pilot flying.

3. At such time the above named screw steamship C. S. Butler, which was steaming up channel, turned to the northward and came round under the stern of the Baltic and on to her starboard quarter, and after some hailing between the two vessels the C. S. Butler again passed the stern of the Baltic and came on to her port side.

4. The mate and afterwards the master of the C. S. Butler boarded the Baltic by means of the C. S. Butler's boat, and after a good deal of bargaining an arrangement was made for the C. S. Butler to take the Baltic in tow. It was then between 7 p.m. and 8 p.m., the weather was fine and clear, the wind was light from about north to north-north-east, and the Baltic was close-hauled on the starboard tack, making about two knots an hour. The Baltic had her proper regulation green light duly exhibited and burning brightly. Her red lamp had been carried away, and by arrangement with or at the suggestion of the master of the C. S. Butler a globe lantern covered with red bunting was exhibited and burning in the port forerigging of the Baltic.

5. The tow rope of the Baltic was got ready, and her mainyard was laid aback, and the boat of the steamer, having put the master and mate of the C. S. Butler on board their vessel, came back to the Baltic and lay alongside her on her port side, and those in the boat proceeded to coil in her the hauling line of the Baltic.

6. Whilst this was being done the C. S. Butler, instead of keeping clear of the Baltic, as she could and ought to have done, ran against and with her starboard quarter struck the Baltic on her port quarter, doing her some damage.

7. The C. S. Butler then steamed ahead, and turned round and ran against and with her stem struck the Baltic a violent blow on the port bow, and did her so much damage that she filled with water in a very few minutes, and was only saved from sinking by her cargo of deals.

8. The C. S. Butler subsequently took the Baltic in tow, and proceeded with her towards the Downs, but the master of the Baltic not thinking it prudent to proceed to the Downs, arranged with the master of the C. S. Butler to tow the Baltic to Cowes. On the following day, at about noon the two vessels on their way to Cowes were just inside the Isle of Wight and the C. S. Butler was towing ahead of the Baltic with two hawsers fast to her when one of such hawsers parted. The C. S. Butler backed astern with a view to the remaining hawser being shortened in, but in consequence of the want of care and skill of those on board her she with her starboard side ran against the bowsprit of the Baltic and broke it, and did further damage to the Baltic. The C. S. Butler subsequently towed the Baltic to Cowes.

9. The said collisions between the C. S. Butler and the Baltic, and the damages and losses consequent thereon, were occasioned by the negligence or want of skill of the master or crew of the C. S. Butler.

10. The same collisions were not in any way occasioned by any negligence on the part of those on board the Baltic.

The answer filed on behalf of the C. S. Butler, the defendants, was as follows:

1. Shortly before 6 p.m. of 27th Oct., 1873, the screw steamship C. S. Butler, of the burthen of 516 tons nett register, propelled by engines of 80 horse power and navigated by William Dodds, her master, and a crew of sixteen hands, was about ten miles distant from the Owers Light Vessel, which bore about north-north-west proceeding in the prosecution of a voyage from Southampton to Shields in water ballast.

2. The wind at this time was from north-east to north-north-east and the weather was fine and clear, the tide was flood and approaching high water and of the force of about a knot and a half an hour. The C. S. Butler was steering east by south half-south, her proper course up channel, and she was making about eight knots an hour. A good look-out was being kept, and the Admiralty regulation lamps were duly exhibited and burning well and brightly on board her.

3. Whilst the C. S. Butler was so proceeding a flash light was seen on board a vessel on the port bow, and the same being waved about it was believed on board the C. S. Butler to be a signal from some vessel requiring assistance. The C. S. Butler then proceeded towards such vessel and found her to be the Baltic.

4. The Baltic was then in a damaged condition and had had all her yards forward carried away and her upper maintopsail yard was broken and hanging down; she had only her foretopmost-staysail and lower maintopsail; her mainsail was in the brails, and the clews of it were hauled up. She was heading about north-west and was making scarcely any headway.

5. The C. S. Butler proceeded to the Baltic, and upon getting near her the engines were stopped and she hailed the Baltic and inquired if assistance was wanted, and was informed that the Baltic required assistance. The boat of the C. S. Butler was thereupon lowered and the chief mate went in it to the Baltic, and the master of the Baltic then endeavoured to make an agreement with such chief mate for the amount to be paid for the services required, but the chief mate of the C. S. Butler asking 200*l.*, and the master of the Baltic only offering 50*l.*, no agreement was then come to.

6. The mate of the C. S. Butler proceeded to leave the Baltic, and her master then requested to see the master of the C. S. Butler, and he afterwards proceeded on board the Baltic. The master of the Baltic then again offered 50l., but the master of the C. S. Butler refused to take less than 150l., and was about leaving the Baltic when her master offered 112l. 10s. to have the ship towed to the Downs; this the master of the C. S. Butler ultimately agreed to accept and went again on board his vessel.

7. The engines of the C. S. Butler were then set on slowly ahead and she proceeded on to the port side of the Baltic, and the boat of the C. S. Butler proceeded with lines to the Baltic to be made fast to the hawser of that vessel. The lines were made fast and the C. S. Butler then lay stopped, and her crew commenced hauling in the topline of the Baltic; owing to the line having been improperly secured to the hawser the same slipped off just as it was being got to the taffrail of the C. S. Butler. The hawser then had to be hauled in on board the Baltic, and whilst this was being done the C. S. Butler was steamed slowly round the Baltic, and back again to her port quarter for the purpose of again getting her hawser.

8. By this time the night had got very dark, and as the C. S. Butler passed under the stern of the Baltic the mizen-boom of the Baltic which was adrift, came into contact with the starboard bulwark of the C. S. Butler. After the C. S. Butler had steamed round the Baltic her engines were stopped about 100 feet off the Baltic on her port side; the boat then went with the lines again to the Baltic, and to keep the C. S. Butler in position her engines had to be put on ahead and astern slowly. The Baltic now and again burned the flash light. Whilst the C. S. Butler was thus attempting to get the rope of the Baltic, the Baltic fell off from the wind a little, and the stem and port bow of the C. S. Butler struck the port bow of the Baltic; the blow was so light that the effect of it was not felt and the vessels cleared almost immediately. The rope was then got on board the C. S. Butler and secured to her sampson post, and she proceeded to tow the Baltic for the Downs.

9. After the C. S. Butler had been towing about half an hour the master of the Baltic hailed to the C. S. Butler and wished to be towed to Cowes. The course was accordingly changed for Cowes, and both vessels proceeded on such course for about a quarter of an hour, and then the rope parted. The C. S. Butler, after making unsuccessful efforts to get the rope again made fast, went under the stern of the Baltic and her master told those on board the Baltic that he would lay by the Baltic all night, and he did so. During the night some of the crew of the Baltic came on board the C. S. Butler and refused to return to their vessel.

10. At daylight on the following morning the master of the C. S. Butler boarded the Baltic, and the master of the Baltic then said that as the distance to Cowes was shorter than to the Downs, that he, the master of the C. S. Butler, ought to accept 50l. for the towage of the Baltic; this offer was declined, but the sum of 100l. was subsequently agreed upon between the two masters, and a written memorandum of agreement to that effect was made out by the master of the Baltic in pencil.

11. A towrope belonging to the C. S. Butler and a small warp belonging to the Baltic were then made fast on board the Baltic and at 8 a.m. the C. S. Butler commenced towing the Baltic again, and continued to do so for about four hours. When the two vessels were abreast of Spithead the pilot on board the Baltic ordered the towropes to be shortened, and the engines of the C. S. Butler were accordingly stopped and the ropes hauled in and shortened, and then made fast, and in commencing to tow the Baltic again the two vessels came into collision, the bowsprit of the Baltic coming into contact with the starboard side of the bridge of the C. S. Butler.

12. The C. S. Butler afterwards towed the Baltic in safety, and arrived in Cowes Roads at about 4 p.m., where the Baltic came to anchor.

13. Neither the regulation starboard side light, nor the globe light mentioned in the fourth paragraph of the petition were exhibited on board the Baltic until after the collision in the seventh paragraph of the petition mentioned.

14. The flash light shown from time to time on board the Baltic during the time the C. S. Butler was endeavouring to get the towropes made fast dazzled the sight of those on board the C. S. Butler, and greatly embarrassed them in the management of their vessel.

15. The defendants deny that the collisions in the petition mentioned were occasioned by any negligence or want of skill on the part of the master or crew of the C. S. Butler.

16. The said alleged collisions are attributable to the unmanageable condition of the Baltic, and to the difficult nature of the services the C. S. Butler was called upon to render.

17. The said alleged collisions, so far as concerns the C. S. Butler, resulted from inevitable accident. The said alleged collisions took place under circumstances which absolve the C. S. Butler from all blame in respect thereof.

18. The defendants deny the several allegations in the petition, save as appears by this answer.

The pleadings were thereupon concluded.

Butt, Q.C. and Clarkson for the owners of the Baltic.—The damage done was the result of gross negligence on the part of the master and crew of the C. S. Butler. It was their duty as salvors, and under their agreement, to perform the service in a proper and seamanlike manner, and their neglect so to do renders them liable for negligence: (The Thetis, L. Rep. 2 Adm. & Ecc. 365; 22 L. T. Rep. N. S. 272; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O.S. 357.) The negligence was of such a gross character that the C. S. Butler has forfeited all claim to salvage.

Milward, Q.C. and R. E. Webster for the owners, master and crew of the C. S. Butler.—There was no negligence on the part of the defendants; the collisions were the result of the difficulty of the service they had agreed to perform. A salvor cannot be held liable for damage done in performing a difficult service in the same way, or with the same strictness, as another ship, having no such duty to perform, nor is The Thetis (ubi sup.) any authority against this proposition. No liability for damage done can be imposed upon a salvor except in case of gross negligence. A salvor, who brings property into safety, is not deprived of his salvage reward, for services rendered, because he has inflicted damage on that property, unless it can be shown that that inflicting of the damage was in the nature of a criminal act, or done wilfully for the purpose of increasing the gain.

Butt, Q.C. in reply.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—On the night of the 26th Oct. a barque called the Baltic of 458 tons register, and as it fortunately turned out laden with a cargo of deals, suffered damage by collision with two sailing vessels, which left her without rendering any assistance, or revealing their names. On the next evening, after receiving this damage, she was off Beachy Head, and about six or seven o'clock she made signals of distress to the screw steamship C. S. Butler, which was steaming up channel. There is no doubt that the Baltic had received considerable damage, and was in need of assistance, but at the same time it must be remembered that she was in no danger of sinking. In answer to her signals of distress the C. S. Butler came to her assistance, but in rendering assistance came into collision with her three separate times, and did her much damage. This damage I should observe may be said to be the result of negligence of the C. S. Butler, but there is no suggestion that it was the result of anything but clumsy navigation on her part; it could not be said that the injuries were in any way wilfully inflicted with the design to increase the danger of the Baltic, and so increase the value of the salvage service.

Now I think there is a difference in principle between a collision, which is caused by the clumsiness of the salvor, whose assistance is requested and entreated, and carelessness on the part of a vessel wholly unconnected with the vessel which is injured. And I do not think that I said anything in the Thetis (ubi sup.) at variance with that position. At the same time that opinion only goes this length, that the court will look with a less severe and austere eye at damage caused by the unintentional clumsiness of a salvor whose services have been invoked than it would at damage done by a vessel not so engaged, and not in any way connected with the injured vessel.

Therefore the question I have had to take the opinion of the Elder Brethren on is this, whether this damage, on all these three occasions, but especially on the second, when the material damage was done, can fairly be excused on the ground of accidental mishap, having regard to the size of the vessel, and other circumstances, or whether it does show crassa negligentia, as we are in the habit of saying, a gross want of proper navigation, in which latter event she certainly would, in my judgment, although acting as a salvor, be liable for the damage she thus caused. We are of opinion, having regard to the state of the weather and to the fact that the C. S. Butler was a steamer with full power to take whatever course was most expedient, that this is a case of negligence of that gross kind which entitles the salvaged vessel to redress and reparation; that the C. S. Butler ought to have brought herself parallel, instead of going nearly stem on, as she did on the occasion of the second collision; and also that the other two, though slight in their effect, are not to be justified on the principles which I have laid down.

I then asked the Elder Brethren, whether it was a fair suggestion to make that the burning the flare on board the Baltic had any effect in bringing about the collision, and the Elder Brethren are of opinion that the flare shown by the Baltic in no way excused the collision in this case, and that that charge appears to us to have been an afterthought on the part of the C. S. Butler to furnish some excuse for a very gross piece of clumsy navigation.

In the result, the conclusion the court has arrived at is, that in the first case, the case of collision, the Baltic must recover against the C. S. Butler, and the damages must be assessed in the usual way by the Registrar and merchants.

With regard to the second case, the cause of salvage, I do not think the negligence was of that character which would deprive the C. S. Butler of her right to salvage reward, and I am of opinion that it would be a very harsh and unjustifiable proceeding to pronounce that she should forfeit her claim. The amount she will recover will be the amount agreed upon—viz. 100*l.* The costs in the collision cause must be given against the C. S. Butler; in the salvage cause against the Baltic.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL

ON APPEAL FROM THE HIGH COURT OF ADMIRALTY OF ENGLAND.

Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

March 18, 19, and 20, 1874.

(Present: The Right Hons. James W. COLVILLE, Sir BARNES PEACOCK, Sir MONTAGUE SMITH, and Sir ROBERT COLLIER.)

THE CITY OF CAMBRIDGE.

Collision—Compulsory pilotage—Mersey Docks and Harbour Board Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii.) sects. 138, 139—"Proceeding to sea"—Duties and responsibility of a pilot—Ship at anchor—Length of chain—Parting cable—Right to summon pilot to take charge.

Where a ship ready and about to proceed to sea leaves one of the Mersey Docks at night in charge of a licensed pilot, and casts anchor in the river so as to be ready to cross the bar at the mouth of the river on the next morning's tide at an earlier hour than she could if she left the dock in the morning, the going into and casting anchor in the river is a step in the "proceeding to sea," within the meaning of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii.) sect. 139 and the employment of the pilot is compulsory under that section from the time of leaving dock, and if the ship breaks away from her moorings, and damages another vessel through the pilot's sole default the owners will not be responsible.

The fact that the pilot becomes entitled under sect. 138 of the Act to a payment, beyond the amount payable for compulsory pilotage, of five shillings a day for every day save the day on which the ship actually leaves the Mersey, does not render the pilotage any the less compulsory.

Where a ship in charge of a licensed pilot is anchored in pilotage waters, the length of cable at which the ship rides is a matter entirely within the province of the pilot, and it is his duty, when the ship swings to the tide to superintend that manœuvre, and to regulate the helm, and it is negligence on his part to go below before the ship is fully swung, leaving the helm amidships without orders as to its regulation; and if, through want of length of cable and of regulation of the helm, the ship sheers and so parts from her anchor in swinging during his absence, the pilot will be alone responsible, provided that the watch on deck take the right manœuvre to counteract the sheering.

Where a ship at anchor in pilotage waters and in charge of a licensed pilot parts her cable, the necessity for letting go another anchor is a matter within the discretion of the pilot, and the manœuvre should be directed by him: and if the pilot is below at the time, the officer of the watch will be justified before giving any orders to bring up the ship in calling the pilot on deck to take charge, provided that there be no immediate necessity for action, as for instance to prevent a collision which is imminent.

THIS was an appeal from a decree of the learned Judge of the High Court of Admiralty of England (Sir R. Phillimore) in a cause of damage lately pending in that court brought by the appellants, the owners of the ship Birmah, and the owners of cargo laden therein, and of the freight payable in respect of the said cargo, and the master and crew proceeding for their money, clothes, and private effects against the steamship, City of Cambridge, of which the respondents are owners for the recovery of damages in respect of losses sustained by the appellants by reason of a collision between the Birmah and the City of Cambridge in the River Mersey, at about 2.30 a.m. on 27th Feb. 1873. The Birmah was at anchor off Egremont Ferry, in the River Mersey. The City of Cambridge left Morpeth Dock at about 11 p.m. on 26th Feb. in charge of a licensed Liverpool pilot on a voyage to Calcutta. She was fully equipped and ready for sea, but her master and pilot not deeming it prudent to cross the bar that night, brought her to anchor abreast the Woodside Landing Stage. It was then flood tide. At about 11.30 p.m. the tide turned, and the City of Cambridge began to swing. At 12.25 a.m. on the 27th Feb. the cable parted, and the City of Cambridge began to drift stem foremost down the river, and after about two hours came into collision with the Birmah.

The pleadings and facts will be found fully stated in the report of the case in the court below, ante, p. 193; and in the judgment of the Judicial Committee.

The main questions in the case were whether the pilot of the City of Cambridge was compulsorily employed, whether the collision was due to the default of the pilot alone, or to the joint default of the pilot and crew of the City of Cambridge, and whether the Birmah contributed in any way to the collision.

Sir R. Phillimore held that the City of Cambridge was alone to blame for the collision, but that the collision was caused by the default of her pilot alone, and hence dismissed the City of Cambridge from the suit. (See report of the case below).

From this decree the owners of the Birmah, her cargo and freight appealed on the following grounds: First, because the City of Cambridge was not at the time in question in charge of a licensed pilot by compulsion of law; secondly, because the City of Cambridge, at the time in question, had not proceeded to sea, and was not proceeding to sea within the meaning of the 139th section of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii.); thirdly, because the pilot was at the time in question employed on board the City of Cambridge, under the provisions of sect. 138 of the last named Act; fourthly, because the orders of the pilot were not promptly and duly obeyed; fifthly, because the master and crew of the City of Cambridge contributed by their neglect and default to cause the said collision.

March 18 and 19.—Butt, Q.C., and W. C. Gully for the appellants.—Under the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. xcii.) sect. 139, there is no compulsion to take a pilot unless a vessel is proceeding to sea. In this case the master of the City of Cambridge had no intention of proceeding to sea that night on leaving dock; his avowed intention was to remain at anchor in the river for the night. A vessel could only be said to be proceeding to sea when she unmoored or weighed anchor for the last time, with the intent of going, without stopping, to sea. The master, in deciding to anchor in the river, would have been entitled to dispense with the pilot's services, until he actually left the river, and his retention was a purely voluntary act for which he paid a voluntary rate under sect. 138: (Attorney-General v. Case, 3 Price, 302; Rodriguez v.

Melhuish, 10 Ex. 117; 24 L. J. 26, Ex.) Under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 362, there can be no compulsory pilotage for moving a ship from one part of a port to another; these sections of the local Act evidently carry out that provision. The respondents have failed to prove that there was an act on the part of their crew contributing to the collision. There was a clear want of attention to the helm whilst the ship was sheering; secondly, there was negligence on the part of the officer in charge, in not letting the starboard anchor go at once when the port cable parted, and before the pilot came on deck; thirdly, there was a failure on the part of the look-out to warn the pilot of the position of the Birmah: (The Iona, L. Rep. 1 P. C. 426.) The sheering in the first instance was the cause of the accident, and in ordinary weather when a vessel sheers that goes a long way to establish negligence on the part of those in charge. The onus of showing that the crew did not contribute to the collision lies upon the respondents; it is not for the appellants to show negligence on the part of any particular person on board the respondents' ship. Although the pilot may have acted wrongly, yet the primary negligence of the crew in not counteracting the sheer and in not letting go the second anchor renders the owners responsible: (Scott v. Shepherd, 2 W. Bl. 892.) This negligence is not too remote, the acts of the crew before the collision must be considered.

Sir John Karlake, Q.C., and Milward, Q.C. (E.C. Clarkson with them) for the respondents were asked by the court to confine themselves to the questions of compulsory pilotage and of negligence of the crew in not letting go the second anchor.—The City of Cambridge anchored in the river only for the purpose of enabling her to proceed to sea with greater facility; she was fully equipped and ready for sea, and her going into the river was only a step in proceeding to sea. In Rodriguez v. Melhuish (24 L. J. 26, Ex.) it is intimated that if a ship were fully equipped and ready for sea, the mere fact of anchoring would not render the employment of a pilot the less compulsory. If the appellants' contention is right there can be no compulsion until the ship gets to sea, for not until then is she proceeding to sea in their sense. The 139th section really contemplates a pilot being taken from the commencement of the voyage. It cannot be competent to a master to refuse a pilot, because he may say that he is going to anchor on his way down the river; if that were the case, a master might anchor for the night, and because he did not find a pilot immediately in the morning, weigh anchor and go over the bar without one. Even if he had waited for three or four days, and had paid the river rate all that time the pilotage would still be compulsory. Sect. 138 does not apply only to the case of a ship at anchor in the river; it applies equally to vessels moving about in the river. The words "provided that the pilot who shall have charge of a vessel" seem to contemplate this very case, and to meet the possibility of a pilot compulsorily in charge being detained beyond the ordinary time necessary for taking a ship to sea. In The Annapolis—The Johanna Stoll (4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 417; Lush, 295; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O.S. 69) it was held under a similar enactment that the mere payment of a voluntary river rate to a pilot who was once compulsorily employed, did not put an end to the compulsion, and that clearly shows that the court then considered that the convenience attaching to the continuing of the pilot's services did not destroy the compulsory nature of his service; it was a reasonable thing that he should have extra pay, but this was for his benefit, and did not alter his position. A pilot must have been employed at some period, and if more convenient to employ him in dock he was as much compulsory then as at any other time. Now as to the anchor; the pilot being close at hand it was obviously the duty of the officers of the ship to consult him on the steps to be taken, and in fact he was on deck before any order could have been given by the officer in charge. The ship was broadside on to the tide, and the anchor could only have been dropped on her being straightened in the river.

Butt, Q.C., in reply.

March 20, 1874.—Judgment was delivered by Sir MONTAGUE E. SMITH.—This is a suit brought by the owners of the steamship Birmah against the owners of the steamship City of Cambridge to recover the damages occasioned by a collision between the two ships. The collision was of a disastrous character, for the effect of it was that the Birmah with a valuable cargo was sunk. The questions in the appeal relate to the construction of certain pilotage clauses in the Mersey Docks Consolidation Act, 1858, and to the relative duties of the crew and pilot who were on board the City of Cambridge.

The facts are that the Birmah, a homeward bound vessel, had anchored in the Mersey off Egremont. She was lying there at anchor at the time of the collision, and no blame is attributable to her. The City of Cambridge left the Morpeth Dock, on a voyage to Calcutta, at or about 11 o'clock on the night of the 26th February in charge of a licensed pilot of Liverpool. She was fully equipped and prepared for sea. It appears that the pilot had been hired whilst the vessel was in the dock to take her out to sea, and he came on board and took charge of her before she left the dock. It had been arranged between the master and the pilot that the ship should not cross the bar on that night, but should go into the Mersey and be anchored there ready to cross the bar on the morning tide, and it is in evidence that the state of the weather was such that she could not have crossed the bar on the following morning's tide, unless she had been taken out of dock and placed in the Mersey so far on her way. The City of Cambridge having been taken out of the dock, was brought up opposite Woodside Ferry and was there anchored by a single anchor, the port anchor. The vessel was swung first to the flood, and then to the ebb tide, but had not been brought to her proper state, and on to the ebb tide, when the pilot left the deck to go to the chart house to lie down. Shortly afterwards the vessel took a heavy sheer, the effect of which was to throw her across the tide, and the strain upon her anchor broke the chain, and the vessel went adrift. There was a strong wind at this time, and a heavy tide running down, and the wind and tide were opposed. The ship's anchors and chains were of usual size and strength. The mate and a proper number of the crew were on deck. As soon as the cable parted, the mate went to the chart house, which was under the bridge, to tell the pilot, who had left directions that he should be called in case any thing went amiss. The pilot came at once upon deck and finding the state of the ship, and that she was drifting broadside down the river, or nearly broadside, he thought the right course was to put her under steam and endeavour to bring her end on to the tide. He was not successful in that manœuvre, and he afterwards dropped the starboard anchor. That anchor did not hold. It appears to have nipped the ground only, and the pilot in that state of things allowed the vessel to drift down the river. He had her so far under command, that he used the steam power and the helm to avoid the various vessels which he passed in his downward course, but ultimately the vessel drifted between the North Star and the Birmah. He was able to avoid the North Star, but the vessel whilst so drifting was driven against the Birmah with such violence that the Birmah was sunk. It was not disputed upon the argument that the collision was due to the negligence of some persons on board the City of Cambridge.

There are two questions to be considered in the case: first, whether the employment of the pilot before and at the time of the collision was compulsory by law, and, secondly, assuming it to be so, whether the collision was attributable exclusively to the want of care or skill of the pilot.

Now it is admitted that the pilotage would be compulsory in this case, and that the owners would be entitled to the exemption from liability provided in the 388th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, if the circumstances were such as to bring the case within the 139th section of the Mersey Docks Consolidation Act 1858. That section is ill drawn, and the construction of it is by no means free from difficulty. But it is the legislation under which the pilotage in the great river Mersey has been conducted for many years, and the construction put upon the clause has been, that when the circumstances bring a vessel within it, and the employment of a pilot is under its provisions, such employment is compulsory. The clause is this.—“In case the master of any vessel, being outward bound, and not being a coasting vessel in ballast, or under the burden of 100 tons, for which provision is otherwise made, shall proceed to sea, and shall refuse to take on board or to employ a pilot, he shall pay to the pilot, who shall first offer himself to pilot the same the full pilotage rate that would have been payable for such vessel if the pilot had actually piloted the same, into or out, as the case may be, of the said port of Liverpool, together with all expenses incurred in recovering the same.”

The question is, whether this vessel was proceeding to sea, so that the employment of the pilot was compulsory before and at the time of the collision. When the ship left the dock, the object of the master was to prosecute his voyage by getting to sea as soon as he could. It is true it had been arranged between the pilot and himself that the vessel should anchor in the Mersey for the night, but that was done to further the object of getting out to sea by going so far on her way as would enable her to cross the bar on the next morning's tide, which the vessel could not have done if she had remained in dock, or at least she could not have crossed it so early. Their Lordships think that under these circumstances the ship was proceeding to sea within the meaning of the Act at the time she left the dock, and that the anchoring was not a discontinuance of her progress to the sea, but an act proper and reasonable to be done in the course of it.

It was argued that the employment of the pilot fell under the 138th section which relates, it was said, only to the voluntary engagement of pilots. That clause is, "If the master of any vessel shall require the attendance of a pilot on board any vessel during her riding at anchor, or being at Hoylake, or in the River Mersey, the pilot so employed shall be paid for every day or portion of a day he shall so attend the sum of 5s. and no more." This part of the clause no doubt relates only to the voluntary employment of a pilot; but the latter part of it relates not only to such voluntary employment, but to the extra remuneration to be given to a pilot when he is compulsorily employed under the 139th section. The proviso is this, "Provided that the pilot who shall have the charge of any vessel shall be paid for every day of his attendance whilst in the river, but no such charge shall be made for the day on which such vessel being outward bound shall leave the River Mersey to commence her voyage, or being inward bound, shall enter the River Mersey." Now the pilot in the present case was not hired under the first part of this clause. His attendance was not required for the sole purpose of remaining on board during the time the vessel was riding at anchor. He was engaged to take the vessel to sea. The proviso in the section may be applicable to his remuneration, because, although he was hired to take the vessel to sea, if, in the course of taking her to sea, any delay took place by which she remained a day in the river, he would be entitled to the extra payment which is provided by that section. So far from such a payment being necessarily an incident of voluntary employment only it is obvious that the clause assumes that the pilot may be compulsorily employed; that the rate fixed for taking the vessel out to sea, which is fixed according to a scale having relation to the size of the vessel, may be insufficient to remunerate him; and provides when he is delayed for an extra remuneration. It by no means follows that the pilotage was not compulsory under the 139th section, because the pilot might be entitled to extra remuneration under section 138. It was said that the 139th clause would not have been infringed if the employment of the pilot had been delayed until the vessel left her anchorage on the following morning. But if the employment be compulsory upon the vessel proceeding to sea, and a fixed remuneration to the pilot be also obligatory on the master, he surely must be entitled to have the services of the pilot at the commencement of, and throughout the vessel's progress to sea, so as to get the full benefit of the compulsory payment.

The view taken by their Lordships of this Act does not in the least conflict with the decisions in the Attorney-General v. Case (3 Price, 302, and Rodriguez v. Melhuish (10 Ex. 117; 24 L. J. Ex. 26.) Those were both cases of vessels remaining as such, intending to remain at anchor, and not instances of vessels proceeding to sea. In the case of Rodriguez v. Melhuish, this passage occurs in the judgment of the Lord Chief Baron Pollock. He says, "It was contended by one of the learned counsel on the part of the owners, that if a pilot were taken on board a vessel previous to her leaving the dock, whilst she was in the act of quitting it with the intention of going to sea, no step being necessary except the different operations requisite for her to go on, the vessel in such case would be said to be proceeding to sea. If this vessel had had all her cargo on board, and the master had been ready to get on board, and she had had everything ready to commence her voyage forthwith, and had left her berth with that intention, it might no doubt have been said that she was proceeding to sea from the time she first left her berth." The case supposed by the Lord Chief Baron is very like the actual case here. Their Lordships think that the City of Cambridge was proceeding to sea from the time she first left her berth, and that there was no break in the continuity of her progress to sea after she had left it and before the collision.

The next question is whether, assuming the employment of the pilot to have been compulsory the collision is solely attributable to the default of the pilot.

Now the remote cause of the disaster was the vessel parting from her anchor by the breaking of the chain cable, and the proximate cause was allowing the vessel to drift down the river so as to come into collision with the Birmah. The breaking of the cable was caused by the vessel having sheered when being swung to the tide and bringing too great a strain upon the cable. This was found in the court below to be mainly due to the improperly short length of cable which had been let out, 60 fathoms only. Allowing the vessel to drift in a crowded river like the Mersey was also found by the court below to have been an improper and unskilful mode of managing the vessel which brought about the collision. It was also the opinion of the judge of the Admiralty Court that this drifting of the ship was not a necessary consequence of the first parting with the anchor, inasmuch as there was sufficient steam-power at hand to have allowed of her being navigated into a safe anchorage. Their Lordships see no reason to disagree with any of the above conclusions of fact, and they concur in the opinion of the court below that the pilot is alone to blame for the mismanagement of the ship in the instances just referred to. Indeed, it was not disputed that the length of the cable proper to be let out, and the manœuvring of the ship after she parted with her anchors were matters entirely within his province. It was contended, however, that the master and crew were to blame, or partly to blame in three respects. It was said the quartermaster ought not to have allowed the vessel to sheer when at anchor. It has been already stated that the pilot left the deck before she had fully swung to the tide. Upon this point the court below found as follows:—"The Elder Brethren think also that the pilot was to blame for leaving the deck when he did; that he ought not to have gone away into the chart room when she was three quarters swung to the ebb tide; he ought to have waited till she was fully swung, and himself superintended that manœuvre, and seen that her helm was properly put. He left her helm amidships. No blame attaches to the City of Cambridge with respect to the men who were left on deck; there seem to have been sufficient men and they were properly placed. It is to be observed, that when the vessel swung, the wind and tide were opposed, and no blame at all attaches, in the opinion of the elder Brethren, with which I agree, to Boyle, the quartermaster, in the manœuvre which he effected. He executed the right manœuvre in counteracting the sheer the vessel had taken, and there was no delay in executing it,"—what he did was to starboard the helm,—“nor is there any reason to suppose that the pilot, if he had been on deck instead of in the chart room, would have directed anything to be done different from what was done in his absence.” Their Lordships concur in that finding.

Another ground of blame is that a good look-out was not kept by the crew when the vessel was drifting, and particularly that they did not report the Birmah. It is unquestionable that, as a rule, it is the duty of the crew of the ship to keep a good look-out, and to assist in that way the pilot in charge. But in the present case the court below have found that there was no want of look-out, and their Lordships agree with this finding. The master was on the bridge with the pilot, and the Birmah was seen and reported by him to the pilot, and both had her in view for a considerable time before the collision.

The only remaining imputation on the crew is, that as soon as the chain of the port anchor broke, the starboard anchor ought to have been at once let go. This may have been a right manœuvre, or it may be, that as the vessel was athwart the tide, it was better to use the steam at command, so as to get her head to the tide, as the pilot afterwards attempted to do. She was to some extent athwart the tide when she originally sheered and the cable snapped, and no doubt at the moment when the cable snapped her head flew still further to the west. She was therefore to a great degree broadside to the tide at the time when it is suggested that the anchor ought to have been dropped. But, however that may be, it was a manœuvre that was properly within the province of the pilot to judge of and direct. If he had not been at hand, it would have been the duty of the officers of the ship at once to have acted, and dropped the anchor, if it had been a proper measure; but in this case the pilot was at hand. It is true that he had gone to the chart-house to lie down, but he had given directions to be called if anything went amiss. In point of fact he felt the jerk caused by the snapping of the cable, and came to the chart-house door as soon as the mate, who instantly ran to him, reached it, and very shortly afterwards he was on deck.

Now, although it would have been the duty of the officers of the ship to act at once if there had been immediate necessity for so doing, as, for instance, to prevent a collision which was imminent, their Lordships think it cannot be said that the emergency was so pressing, or the measures to be adopted so plain, that they were not justified in resorting to the pilot in charge of the ship when he was so near at hand. The dangers of a divided command are great, and must be taken into account in dealing with questions of this kind. The relative duties of the crew and pilot were discussed in two cases, which are to be found in 7 Moore P.C.C. The first is The Christiana (p. 171). In that case Baron Parke, in giving the judgment of the Committee says, “The duties of the master and the pilot are in many respects clearly defined. Although the pilot has charge of the ship, the owners are most clearly responsible to third persons for the sufficiencies of the ship and her equipments, the competency of the master and crew, and their obedience to the orders of the pilot in everything that concerns his duty, and under ordinary circumstances we think that his commands are to be implicitly obeyed. To him belongs the whole conduct of the navigation of the ship, to the safety of which it is important that the chief direction should be vested in one only.” Then there being a question about the neglect to set the staysail and jib under the circumstances in which the ship was placed, the learned judge says:—“The pilot has unquestionably the sole direction of the vessel in those respects where his local knowledge is presumably required. The direction, the course, the manœuvres of the vessel when sailing belong to him; and the Trinity Masters therefore rightly decided that the neglect to set the staysail and jib, after the Christiana was driven from her anchorage, was the fault of the pilot alone. It was also his sole duty to select the proper anchorage place and mode of anchoring and preparing for anchoring, as was held to be clear in the case of The Gipsy King (2 W. Rob. 537.)” And in the case of The Lochlibo (7 Moore P.C.C. 430), Lord Kingsdown in giving the judgment of the Committee in that case, it being a question whether the vessel ought to have sailed through the Downs, says:—“It was contended at the bar that in this case the impropriety of sailing through the Downs was so manifest that the captain ought to have refused, in spite of the pilot’s opinion, to permit the ship to proceed, but we cannot assent to this. It would be very dangerous to hold that there can be any divided authority in the ship with reference to the same subject; and whether the ship was to anchor or to proceed was a matter which we think belonged exclusively to the pilot to decide.”

Their Lordships, therefore, have come to the conclusion that as regards this point of blame, none is properly imputable to the crew. Being of this opinion, it becomes unnecessary to consider the further points urged by the respondent’s counsel, namely, that this default, if established, was too remote from the immediate cause of the collision to render the respondents liable for the consequences of it. But it is to be observed that in the interval between the time when the vessel parted from her anchor and the collision she was under the control of the pilot, who might, if he had employed the engine power at his command, have given her a new and independent course which would have avoided the collision.

In the result their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the judgment of the court below ought to be affirmed, and this appeal dismissed, with costs.

GEORGE v. WATTS.

Action for negligence—General allegations of negligence.—Application for particulars—Negligence in the navigation of a ship.

Where the declaration in an action against the defendant for negligent navigation of his ship, causing injury to the plaintiff, contains only general allegations of negligence on the part of the defendant in respect of navigation, and of keeping the machinery and the ship in good repair, the court will not require the plaintiff to give particulars of matters which he may suppose to constitute the negligence of the defendant, because these matters are within the knowledge of the defendant and his servants, and not necessarily within the personal knowledge of the plaintiff.

The declaration in this action alleged that the plaintiff was received as a passenger, to be safely and securely carried on the defendant's steamer for reward to the defendant, and that the defendant did not find or provide a suitable cabin, or proper and sufficient food or accommodation, or do what was necessary for the personal comfort of the plaintiff, though not prevented by perils, &c., and that the defendant did not use proper care that the ship should be kept in proper repair, or that it should be navigated with due skill, &c., whereby the plaintiff was injured.

An order was obtained by the defendant for particulars to be delivered of the negligence and injuries complained of under this declaration, and this order was made by the master in very wide terms, ordering the plaintiff to give particulars to the defendant of the wounds, bruises, and injuries mentioned in the declaration, of the number of days the plaintiff was kept without food, and of the expenses he had incurred, and of the negligence alleged in respect of the navigation and repair of the ship, and of its machinery.

L. Kelly, on a previous day, obtained a rule calling on the defendants to show cause why so much of the order should not be rescinded as required the plaintiff to give particulars of the negligence in navigation and repair of the ship and machinery. In moving for the rule nisi he cited Brown v. The Great Western Railway Company (26 L.T. Rep. N. S. 398) and Peppiatt v. Smith (11 L.T. Rep. N. S. 139; 3 H. & C. 129).

Gainsford Bruce now showed cause.—If these particulars are not given to the defendant he will have no intimation of what is the negligence complained of, and will be unable to prepare evidence to disprove it. There has been a Board of Trade inquiry in this case, so that the plaintiff will have had his attention drawn to the circumstances of the shipwreck, and we want to know on what, among the facts there elicited, he relies as evidence of negligence. Some time, sooner or later, it must be stated; why is he not before the trial to give us this reasonable information? The judge at the trial will amend particulars if something is omitted in them which the defendant ought to have been prepared to meet; but now we shall be prevented from knowing at all what sort of evidence will be produced against us, while the plaintiff will be practically unfettered. Where negligence in navigation and in repair of a ship is alleged, questions involving scientific witnesses may arise on numberless little points, and we are entitled to know beforehand what points are intended to be raised. [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—It is for you to know what your own servants' negligence is, not for the plaintiff to guess at what it may have been.] This will entirely prevent particulars being given in actions of this kind, and the plaintiff will never know before the trial what is complained of, what he has to go into court to meet. This is surely contrary to the general practice hitherto, which tends to make the issue between the parties as distinct as possible. The two cases cited are totally beside the question. In Brown v. The Great Western Railway Company the particulars of injuries were refused because no affidavit had been filed of want of knowledge of the nature of those injuries. In Peppiatt v. Smith the question related to interrogatories, and not to particulars. Interrogatories are for the purpose of establishing a plaintiff's or defendant's own case, whilst particulars are given by a defendant to define his claim.

L. Kelly, in support of the rule, was not called on.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I think this rule must be made absolute, rescinding the order of the master to the extent to which we are asked to do so. That is, the plaintiff ought not to be required to give particulars of the alleged negligence of the defendant in respect of the navigation and machinery and repair of the ship. In the case in the Exchequer, cited when this rule was moved, the court would not give the particulars which are here given, by consent, or at any rate not objected to as included in this order, viz., as to the injuries sustained by the plaintiff: à multo fortiori as it seems to me, the court would not give particulars of the defendant's negligence. The plaintiff does not object to specify everything within his personal knowledge, but he does reasonably object to speculate on things within the knowledge of the defendant; he might easily make a wrong guess, and the defendant might so evade the decision of the true issue. We do not mean to lay down a rule that in actions of tort particulars will not be allowed, but what is asked for here seems to go beyond anything that is proper or necessary.

KEATING and DENMAN, JJ., concurred.

Rule absolute.

HENDRICKS v. AUSTRALASIAN INSURANCE COMPANY.

Marine insurance—English and Dutch policy—Whether implied—Implied reference in one policy to the other—Particular average—Meaning in English policy of "to pay losses on Dutch terms"—"Stranded"—Whether parties to English policy bound by Dutch average statement.

The plaintiff having insured goods with Dutch underwriters upon a Dutch policy, afterwards insured the same goods with the defendants, being English underwriters, upon an English policy, which latter policy contained the words, "to cover only the risk excepted by the clause warranted free from particular average unless the vessel be stranded, sunk, or burnt. To pay all claims and losses on Dutch terms, and according to statement made up by the official dépêcheur in Holland." The defendants, at the time the policy was effected, knew that the goods had been already insured somewhere, but had no notice either of the terms or of the existence of the Dutch policy. The vessel "stranded," according to English law, but not according to Dutch law. An average statement was made up according to the terms of the English policy, but according to the principles of the Dutch law, showing a particular average loss:

Held, upon a special case, first, that the terms of the English policy, did not amount to notice to the defendants of the Dutch policy, and that the English policy was to be construed independently thereof; but,

Secondly, that the defendants were bound by the average statement, and the plaintiff, consequently, was entitled to judgment.

Harris v. Scaramanga (ante, vol. 1, p. 339; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 697; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 481), and Stewart v. West India and Pacific Steamship Company (ante, vol. 1, p. 528; vol. 2, p. 32; 28 L. T. Rep. N. S. 740; L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 362), discussed and followed.

This was an action to recover the sum of 503*l.*, the amount of a particular average loss alleged to be sustained by the plaintiff, as owner of a cargo of sugar, and the following case was stated by consent of the parties for the opinion of the court, without pleadings, pursuant to sect. 46 of the Common Law Procedure Act 1852.

CASE.

1. The plaintiff is a merchant carrying on business at Amsterdam, in Holland, and the defendants are a company carrying on business as underwriters in the city of London.

2. On the 1st March 1870, the plaintiff, under the name of A. Hendricks and Co., effected with the defendants a policy of insurance upon sugars, the cargo of the British ship Perpetua.

3. In that policy the insured voyage is described as follows:—"Lost or not lost, at or from any port or ports and, (or) places in Java, and (or) Sumatra, in any rotation backwards and forwards, and forwards and backwards, to the vessel's port or ports of discharge in Holland;" and the subject matter insured and the risks insured are described as follows:—"The said ship, &c., goods, and merchandise, &c., for so much as concerns the assured, by agreement between the assured and the said company in this policy, are and shall be rated and valued at 2000*l.* on 6715 bags unclayed brown sugar (being in 22 series of 300 bags each, and 1 series of 115 bags), valued at 4000*l.*, to cover only the risks only excepted by the clause, 'warranted free from particular average, unless the vessel be stranded, sunk, or burnt;' to pay all claims and losses on Dutch terms, and according to statement made up by official dépêcheur in Holland, being warranted free from particular average, unless amounting to 10 per cent. on each series." A copy of this policy marked A, will be found in the appendix to this case, and may be referred to as part of this case. (a) The risk so described, as hereinbefore stated, except as to the words commencing with "to pay," and ending with "series," is a risk well known among English underwriters as a P. A. risk only. The term P. A. only means that the insurance is to cover only the risks excepted from what is called a F. P. A. policy. The term F. P. A. means that the insurance contains an exception in the following terms: "Warranted free from particular average, unless stranded, sunk, or burnt." The P. A. risk only, with the addition of "Dutch terms," or an exception of average under 10 per cent., is not a usual insurance.

4. Previously to the making of the before mentioned policy, the plaintiff had effected a policy of insurance upon the same cargo with Dutch underwriters in Amsterdam. A translation of the last mentioned policy, marked B(a), will be found in the appendix to this case, and may be referred to as part of this case.

5. At the time when the defendants executed the

Upon the said ship &c. until she hath moored at anchor twenty-four hours in good safety and upon the goods and merchandise or profits on goods and merchandise until the same be there discharged and safely landed, and it shall be lawful for the said ship &c. in this voyage to proceed and sail to and touch and stay at any ports and places whatsoever for necessary or customary purposes without prejudice to this insurance. The said ship &c. goods and merchandise &c. for so much as concerns the assured by agreement between the assured and the said company in this policy are and shall be rated and valued at 2000*l.* on 6715 bags unclayed brown sugar, being in 22 series of 300 bags each, and 1 series of 115 bags valued at 4000*l.* To cover only the risks excepted by the clause warranted free from particular average unless the vessel be stranded sunk or burnt. To pay all claims and losses on Dutch terms and according to statement made up by official dépêcheur in Holland, being warranted free from particular average unless amounting to 10 per cent. on each series. Touching the adventures and perils which the said company are contented to bear and do take upon them in this voyage they are of the seas men of war fire enemies pirate rovers thieves jettisons letters of mart and counter mart surprisals takings at sea arrests restraints and detentions of all kings princes and people of what nation condition or quality soever barratry of the masters and mariners and of all other perils losses and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt detriment or damage of the said goods and merchandise &c. and ship &c. or any part thereof. And in case of any loss and misfortune it shall be lawful to the assured their factors servants and assigns to sue labour and travel for in and about the defence safeguard and recovery of the said goods and merchandise &c. and ship &c. or any part thereof without prejudice to this insurance to the charges whereof the said company will contribute according to the rate and quantity of the sum herein assured. . . . And further it is agreed by the said company that this writing or policy of assurance shall be of as much force and effect as the surest writing or policy of assurance heretofore made in Lombard-street or in the Royal Exchange or elsewhere in London and so the said company are contented and do hereby promise and bind themselves. . . . for the true performance of the premises in consideration of a premium being paid unto the said company for this assurance by the assured as and after the rate of 50s. per cent.—N.B. Corn fish flour saltpetre salt fruit and seeds are warranted free from average unless general or the ship be stranded. Sugar tobacco skins hides spirits hemp wax rice are warranted free from average under 5*l.* per cent. and all other goods also the ship and freight are warranted free from average under 3*l.* per cent. unless general or the ship be stranded."

(a) It will be seen from the judgment that it is not necessary to set out policy B.

(a) The following is the material part of a policy A:—"In the name of God Amen. A. Hendricks and Co. . . . doth make assurance and cause themselves and them and everyone of them to be assured lost or not lost at and from any port or ports and (or) places in Java (and) or Sumatra in any rotation backwards and forwards and forwards and backwards to the vessel's port or ports of discharge in Holland. policy A, being the policy now sued upon, they knew that the goods had already been insured, but they had no notice where the previous insurance was effected, or what were its terms, unless the court shall be of opinion that the terms of the policy amount to such notice.

6. On the 6th Jan. 1870, the Perpetua sailed on the insured voyage from Probolingo, in Java, bound for Amsterdam, and while descending the river, about midnight of the 11th Jan. 1870, took the ground at Oosthook, near the mouth of the river.

7. The following extract from a protest made by the master at Sourabaya correctly describes the means used to get the ship off:

Got the gig out and ran the stream anchor out with seventy fathoms of a 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ in. warp, and hove a strain on it, when the ship canted with her head to the eastward; the water falling, could do no more till the next flood. At eight, strong gales and squally, with rain from S.W.; at ten, same weather—set all canvas that could draw, the ship striking but very slightly—hoisted the long boat out and sounded round the ship, and found deep water all round. Pumps attended all the while, the ship making one inch of water per hour, being half an inch more than before striking. Noon, squally, with rain; wind from the . . . The 12th Jan. began with squally weather from the W. to the S.W. At 1 p.m. the ship drew ahead about ten or fifteen feet, and held fast again; got the starboard bower in long boat with fifty fathoms of strain chain; ran it out and hove a strain upon it, but without any effect, the ship to all appearance laying fast a little before the mizen rigging upon the port side, the ship making ten inches of water per hour from midnight to 4 a.m., the ship striking heavily on the stern post; being past high water could do no more till the next flood. About 2 p.m. heavy rain and squalls. The 13th Jan. began with heavy squalls of wind and rain; every stick set. At 1 p.m. the ship began to move; manned the windlass and hove all possible strain, when a heavy squall coming on at the time, the ship slipped off and swung to her anchor, the pumps all the time constantly going. Clewed up all the small sails, veered away upon the starboard anchor to fifty fathoms, and seventy fathoms upon the warp.

8. The ship having been got off in the manner described in the last paragraph, sailed for Sourabaya. The cargo was there discharged, and the repairs to the hull of the ship rendered necessary by her taking the ground at Oosthook were effected. The cargo was then reloaded, and about the end of March 1870 the ship sailed for Amsterdam, where she arrived in due course, and delivered her cargo.

9. The sugars, on being unshipped at Amsterdam, were found to have received damage from the ship having taken the ground at Oosthook, and thereupon the owners of the ship Perpetua, and the plaintiff, as owner of the cargo, made an application to Dr. James Wertheim to draw up a statement of average. Dr. Wertheim is an official dépêcheur at Amsterdam, that is, an average adjuster appointed to prepare average statements by the Association of Underwriters and Shipowners at the Exchange at Amsterdam.

10. In pursuance of the before-mentioned application, Dr. Wertheim prepared, amongst other things, and signed a statement, dated the 23rd March 1871, of particular average, showing a sum of 503*l.* as payable by the defendants to the plaintiff under the policy A now sued upon. A copy of this statement marked C (a) will be found in the

(a) This statement was headed, "Account particular average on unclayed brown sugar, per Perpetua," &c., and after setting out the facts and figures, and showing a sum of 503*l.* due from the defendants to the plaintiff, concluded as follows:—

"Considering that the sugar was insured free from appendix to this case, and may be referred to as part of this case. The figures upon which this adjustment is made are to be taken for the purposes of this case to be correct.

11. By the expression "series," in the policy A, was meant the packages in which the sugars were packed. The loss amounted to or exceeded 10 per cent. on each series, upon which a loss has been adjusted in the statement so prepared by Dr. Wertheim.

12. At Amsterdam and Rotterdam, there are regulations in force as between underwriters and shipowners. These regulations are made by the Association of Underwriters and Shipowners in each of those towns, and are altered from time to time. These regulations are recognised by the Dutch law as binding in the sense that they are taken to be imported into every policy of insurance made at Amsterdam and Rotterdam respectively, unless the terms of the policy exclude them. The regulations of Amsterdam, at the times of the making of the policies hereinbefore mentioned, contained and still do contain provisions as to particular average, of which the following is a translation:—"In insurances contracted with the condition, 'free from particular average,' the insurer has to indemnify the damage that has occurred only when the vessel has suffered shipwreck, the ship and cargo, or the cargo alone, has taken fire, or in case of stranding, provided that such damage amounts to 10 per cent. or more."

13. By stranding is understood that a ship having got aground remains fixed, and can be got off only by extraordinary measures. In the sense of this clause are regarded as extraordinary measures the cutting of masts, the heaving overboard or landing of the cargo, &c.; and as ordinary measures, the winding on of the anchors or on the shore, the working with the sails, and the like. The regulations of Rotterdam contain provisions identical with these, except that for 10 per cent. is substituted 3 per cent. It is agreed that according to the regulations, assuming them to be applicable to the policy A now sued upon (which the defendants deny), the ship had not, under the circumstances stated in this case, stranded.

14. At the time of the making of the policy A now sued upon, and at the time of the commencement of the risk, and until and at the time of the happening of the loss described in this case, the plaintiff was interested in the sugars to the amount of the valuation in and of the sum insured by the policy.

15. It is well known among underwriters that the adjustment of particular average in Holland is more favourable to the underwriters than an adjustment in England. The court may draw inferences of fact.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the plaintiff is entitled to recover in this action? If the court shall be of opinion in the affirmative, then judgment shall be entered up for the plaintiff for 503*l.*, together with such interest thereon, as the court may direct, and costs of suit.

particular average, according to Amsterdam Exchange conditions, and that risk covered by the English insurance.

"Considering that the aforesaid damage, however, the ship stranded, but (sic) was floated by no extraordinary measures, cannot be claimed from the Dutch underwriters, the insured is entitled to recover the said damage under the English policies.

(Signed) "JAS. WERTHEIM, LL.D."

HENDRICKS v. AUSTRALASIAN INSURANCE COMPANY.

If the court shall be of opinion in the negative, then judgment of nol pros. shall be entered for the defendants, with the costs of defence.

The plaintiff's points were, that by the terms of the policy sued on the defendants had notice that the risks intended to be covered by the policy sued on, were risks excepted out of a Dutch and not out of an English policy of sea insurance; that the expression, "Dutch terms," used in the policy sued on, means the law and regulations recognised and observed as between underwriters and assured in Holland; that the defendants, by agreeing to pay all claims and losses on Dutch terms, become liable to pay all such claims and losses as would be valid and binding on them according to the law and regulations recognised and observed as between underwriters and assured in Holland; that according to such law and regulations the ship was not stranded; that according to such law and regulations, and upon the facts stated in the case, the plaintiff sustained a particular average loss, the amount of which the plaintiff is entitled in this action to recover against the defendants; that under the terms of the policy sued on, the plaintiff and the defendants agreed to accept and be bound by the statement to be made up by an official dépêcheur in Holland, and such statement having been in fact made up by an official dépêcheur in Holland, is both in principle and details absolutely conclusive between the plaintiff and the defendants, and that it is not open to the court to inquire into the propriety of such statement.

The points of the defendants were: That the loss in question is not within the terms of the defendants' policy, but is one from which the defendants are expressly exempted; that the defendants' policy is to be construed with reference to the law of this country, and that the disaster to the ship was a stranding according to English law; that the terms of the defendants' policy were no notice to the defendants that the goods were already insured by a Dutch policy, and that if the defendants were intended to be bound by the Dutch law it was material that they should have had notice of the law of Holland when they took the risk; that the regulations referred to in sect. 12 of the case have no operation upon the defendants' policy; that the clause in the policy, "To pay all claims and losses on Dutch terms," &c., cannot be construed to extend the defendants' liability to a risk already excepted from the policy; that the statement referred to in sect. 10 of the case (Dr. Wertheim's average statement), was not such an adjustment as was contemplated by the policy; that the official adjustment contemplated by the policy was not one which could not operate to extend the risks described in the policy, but only to ascertain the amount of admitted losses.

Butt, Q.C. (with him Cohen, Q.C. and Witt), for the plaintiff.—The object of the policy sued upon is plainly to supply the defects of the Dutch policy, which did not protect the defendants against particular average losses. This object must have been known to the defendants, and the terms of policy A are notice to them of the terms of policy B. The cargo insured was Dutch, the owner was Dutch, the average adjuster was to be Dutch, and the cargo was deliverable in Holland. [BRETTE, J.—Would not the words of the English policy be equally effective without any Dutch policy?] An underwriter must be taken to exercise his own knowledge, so that the defendants must have known practically of the Dutch policy. They were in fact put upon inquiry by the use of the expression, "Dutch terms," which is found to be an unusual expression by par. 3 of the case, while at the same time it is found by par. 15 that it is well known that average adjustment is more favourable in Holland than in England. [BRETTE, J. referred to Potter v. Rankin (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 122; 18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 112; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 562). Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—The policy seems to stipulate not only for Dutch customs, but for payment of losses on Dutch terms; the question is, what does that expression mean?] The meaning is that the Dutch law is to be applied by the Dutch average adjuster. [BRETTE, J.—Supposing the ship had stranded in English waters, would the losses be settled according to English law or Dutch law?] According to Dutch law. [DENMAN, J.—The court may draw inferences of fact.] That being so, it is a reasonable inference that policy A was intended to cover the defects of policy B. It is impossible otherwise to account for the insertion of the clause relating to "Dutch terms."

Secondly, the defendants are precluded from contesting the statements of the average adjuster. That is the effect upon this case, of

Harris v. Scaramanga, ante, vol. 1, p. 339 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 797; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 481; 41 L. J. 170, C. P.;

In Harris v. Scaramanga (ubi sup.), a cargo of rye was insured for 4160*l.* from Tagarrog to Bremen. The policy contained the memorandum, "Corn, &c., are warranted free from average unless general, or the ship be stranded," &c.; and in the margin were the words, "To pay general average, as per foreign statement, if so made up. Warranted free from particular average, unless the ship or craft be stranded, sunk, or burnt." The underwriters were held to be bound by average statements admitted to be accurate and correctly made up in accordance with the law in force in Bremen in respect of a loss treated at Bremen as a general average loss and not as a particular average loss. In Stewart v. West India and Pacific Steamship Company (ubi sup.), the question was, what was the proper construction of the terms, "average, if any, to be adjusted by British Custom," and it was held that the plaintiff had by those terms made the admitted practice of British average adjusters part of his contract, and was therefore bound by such practice, although erroneous; and this was a point on which the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench was expressly affirmed by the Exchequer Chamber, while that court guarded itself from pronouncing whether or not the loss was according to the law of England the subject of general average contribution. Both Harris's case and Stewart's case are in point for the plaintiff, but especially the latter.

Walkin Williams, Q.C. (with him J. C. Mathew), for the defendants.—The policy is an English policy, and must be construed according to English law, so that "particular average" must mean particular average as defined by English law. [He referred to the judgment of Lord Ellenborough, C. J. in Burnett v. Kensington (7 T. R. 210; 1 Esp.

HENDRICKS v. AUSTRALASIAN INSURANCE COMPANY.

[C. P.]

416; Peake's Add. Cas. 71.) The words, "to pay all losses," &c., cannot extend the risk defined by the words preceding them; they only define the manner in which that risk is to be ascertained. The decision in Harris v. Scaramanga (ubi sup.) can be supported upon different grounds from those stated in the judgments. [Lord COLERIDGE, C. J.—The court is inclined to support that decision upon its own ground. DENMAN, J.—"Stranded" is an ambiguous word known in different countries to have a different meaning. After the word "stranded" in this policy we have "Dutch terms" occurring in the very next sentence.] That is so; but to give that expression the meaning contended for would be to incorporate Dutch law into an English policy. [BRETT, J.—The average adjuster would have to say whether there was a stranding or not. In this case there was no stranding by Dutch law. How are the "Dutch terms" to operate if your contention be right?] It is submitted that neither in Holland nor anywhere else can an average stater have the power to determine whether there has been a stranding or not, either in law or fact. [Lord COLERIDGE, C. J.—In one sense that may be right, but in another it is wrong. The average stater decides neither law nor facts, but he must have both the law and the facts before him. It seems to me that both in Harris v. Scaramanga (ubi sup.) and Stewart v. The West India and Pacific Steamship Company (ubi sup.), the average stater did in fact what you say he cannot do. In both these cases it was found that he was correct both in law and fact. It is not contended that he was wrong in his view of his own, the Dutch law, here.] His average statement is not a statement at all; it is an opinion with as it were judicial reasons [DENMAN, J.—Supposing those reasons to be wrong, that will not make the decision wrong.] Stewart's case (ubi sup.) is distinguishable, because there was an express agreement to be bound by British custom. [BRETT, J.—In that case it had been strongly argued before the Exchequer Chamber that the practice of average adjusters cannot alter the law. I was very unwilling to hold this to be so, and, therefore, I drew up the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in the form in which it now is.] The words in the policy are, "unless stranded, sunk or burnt." Suppose the ship had taken fire, that would of itself be a particular average loss according to English law, but not so according to Dutch law, unless the cargo were burnt too. The average stater would then, if the argument on the other side is followed out to its conclusion, have a great and unreasonable responsibility; he would have, that is, the power of altering the words of a policy. The functions of the Dutch average stater here never arose. [Lord COLERIDGE, C. J.—Before a claim can be paid it must be made. In what manner are the losses under the policies to be estimated, unless it be known what they amount to according to Dutch law? Have you not agreed to be bound by Dutch principles? DENMAN, J.—What is the difficulty of holding that stranding means a Dutch stranding? The difficulty is that this is an English, not a Dutch policy. [Lord COLERIDGE, C. J.—The losses whereupon are to be paid on Dutch terms. DENMAN, J.—The more differences you make out between English and Dutch law in the matter, the more it seems to be against you.] The insertion of "Dutch terms" cannot alter the meaning of

"stranded, sunk, or burnt." [DENMAN, J.—According to your argument, "Dutch terms" might be struck out altogether.]

Cohen, Q.C., in reply, argued, first, that the expression "Dutch terms" must have some meaning; that if it did not mean Dutch law, the expression, "Dutch average statement" would have been sufficient, so that "Dutch terms" must have some meaning not included in "Dutch average statement," which meaning could only be that the claims were to be made according to Dutch law, and paid according to Dutch average statement; and, secondly, that the parties had expressly agreed to be bound by the statement of the Dutch average adjuster, wherefore Harris v. Scaramanga (ubi sup.) was precisely in point.

Lord COLERIDGE, C. J.—I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to recover in this case.

The question is, whether the defendants are bound to pay upon a policy in which the following words occur: "To cover only the risks excepted by the clause warranted free from particular average, unless the vessel be stranded, sunk, or burnt?" Now, I agree in the argument that this policy is to be construed for all purposes of construction as if it stood absolutely alone. Whether the words which I have read refer to another policy or not is quite immaterial to the question how they are to be construed. The words, then, are such as I have read. Now if the clause went no further than the words, "stranded, sunk, or burnt," the argument used by Mr. Williams with great force would prevail. The policy would be taken to cover such risks as are well known to be covered in an English policy, and the only claim sustainable under it would be a claim sustainable in a case where, according to English law, the vessel was stranded, sunk, or burnt. But the words of the clause do not end here, but are followed by words which have no meaning unless they are incorporated with and govern the previous words, with which they form one sentence. These words are, "to pay all claims and losses on Dutch terms, and according to statement made up by official dépêcheur in Holland, being warranted free from particular average, unless amounting to 10 per cent. on each series." I am of opinion that the whole sentence must be taken together, and cannot be split. The claims and losses are claims and losses according to British law, and are claims and losses which are to be considered as accruing and to be paid for according to the Dutch law applicable to the foregoing words in the sentence. The meaning is, that the claims are to be under Dutch law, and the statement of them made by a Dutch average stater, who is to make that statement on considerations drawn from the law with which he is himself acquainted—that is, the law of Holland. That being the fair construction of the contract, we have the facts that the average stater made up his statement correctly according to Dutch law, and that the claim arose and the losses were suffered and stated according to Dutch law. I think, therefore, on principle, the plaintiff is entitled to recover.

My judgment would have been to the same effect had the case stood by itself. But it also happens that this is not the first case of the kind. I am of opinion that, quite independently of principle, the question in this case is absolutely concluded by the two cases of Harris v. Scaramanga (ubi sup.), and Stewart v. The West and Pacific

HENDRICKS v. AUSTRALASIAN INSURANCE COMPANY.

Steamship Company (ubi sup.). Now in Harris v. Scaramanga, the agreement stood thus: "To pay general average, as per foreign statement, if so made up, warranted free from particular average, unless the ship be stranded, sunk, or burnt." It does not become me to say that all the ingenuity expended in arguing that case was thrown away, but the words there were not clearer than the words here. It was contended in that case, then, that the object of the disputed memorandum was, not to extend the risk which the insurers agreed to take upon themselves under the policy, but a mere provision that if there should be a general average loss according to English law arising from a peril insured against, the underwriters would pay it according to the foreign average statement, if made. But the court held the contrary, saying that the words were clear to bind the defendants to pay according to the statement of the average adjuster made according to the law of his own country, and that the defendants were bound by that statement. Harris v. Scaramanga (ubi sup.) was afterwards reviewed in Stewart v. The West India and Pacific Steamship Company (ubi sup.). There the words were, "average, if any, to be adjusted by British custom," and the contention was that the defendants were not bound to pay, because they would not be bound to pay by English law. Then the Court of Queen's Bench entered into a discussion as to whether the loss was, according to the general law, properly the subject of a general average contribution, and pronounced an opinion that it was, but further held that the parties had agreed to make "British custom" a part of the contract, so as to be bound thereby, for which reason the judgment of the court, which would otherwise have been for the plaintiff, was given for the defendants. Afterwards the Exchequer Chamber distinctly affirmed the judgment of the Queen's Bench upon that very point.

I think that these two cases, though I will not say they are on all fours with, are conclusive in principle of the present case, so that on authority, as well as upon principle, our judgment ought to be for the plaintiff.

BRET, J.—In this case the contention for the plaintiff was, that there were two policies, one including the risks excluded from the other; and, further, that although the only risks excepted were the risks excepted by an ordinary English policy, yet that those risks were enlarged by the use of the expressions, "to pay all losses and claims on Dutch terms." It was argued for the defendant that the policy was to be construed as if no other policy existed. It was said that the risks were contained only in the words, "sunk, stranded, or burnt," and that the insertion of the subsequent phrase as to Dutch terms does not alter the construction of the contract.

Now, on the first point, I am of opinion that this policy, as it does not either refer to or incorporate the Dutch policy, is to be construed as if no other policy were in existence. On the second point, the risks excepted are those excepted eo nomine, the losses where the vessel had not been sunk, stranded, or burnt. If the clause in the policy had ended with its first phrase, according to all recognised rules of construction, the policy would be treated as a pure English policy, and as there was stranding, there would be no loss. The only claim that could have been maintained would be such as the facts would make out to be a loss according to English law. But the clause does not end with its first phrase. That first phrase is followed by other words which must have some meaning. They are:—"To pay all claims and losses on Dutch terms, and according to statement made up by official dépêcheur in Holland, being warranted free from particular average, unless amounting to 10 per cent. on each series." These words do not apply to any claim or any loss, but to a claim for particular average, where the ship has been stranded, sunk, or burnt. But these words can have no meaning unless sunk, stranded, or burnt, according to Dutch law, is intended. It must be remembered that a Dutch average stater, would have to inquire, or an English court, if without the assistance of the Dutch average stater would have to inquire, what is the meaning of stranded by Dutch law? If no more than the first words were to be found in the policy, there would be no necessity for a Dutch average stater. But what we have here is an application of English law to the first part of the policy, subject to the condition that the only claim should be made before a Dutch average stater in Holland. And the intention was, that the Dutch average stater should be governed in his statement by Dutch law, with which he was presumed to be perfectly acquainted.

Therefore, on the true construction of this policy, I am of opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to recover. But the case is not the first of its kind. I concur with the Lord Chief Justice in thinking that it falls within the principle of Harris v. Scaramanga (ubi sup.) and Stewart v. The West India and Pacific Steamship Company (ubi sup.). It is quite true, I suppose, that if a foreign average stater made a statement founded on no claim at all, his statement would not bind. But that is by no means the present case. It is admitted that the Dutch average stater here was right both in his law and his facts.

DENMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. I entirely agree that this policy is to be construed without any reference to the Dutch policy, and I do not think that I need say any more on this head. On the second point, the question is, what does this policy mean? [After reading the clause in dispute, the learned judge proceeded:] After the careful discussion which this clause has undergone, I can entertain no doubt that it means that the policy is to be interpreted by Dutch law. But the defendant says that this is extending the terms of the contract beyond their fair meaning. Now if we were bound to go by the first part of the clause that would be a very tenable argument. But we cannot take the first part by itself; and, going on to the second part, we come to the expression, "stranded," and if we ask what stranded is, the answer is, stranded according to Dutch law. But there remains one point in favour of the defendants. There is an official dépêcheur, and what he says is conclusive. Then, argues Mr. Williams with much force, that the official dépêcheur cannot make law, and that if he had made a wrong statement, that statement would not be binding. But this last point fails, when we consider that in this case the statement was made up on correct facts, and was correct according to Dutch law. I do not say that if the statement were wrong it would bind the parties; the probabilities are that it would be inoperative. But in the present case it is quite correct, so that there is nothing to prevent the plaintiff from recovering.

Judgment for plaintiff.

Cohen, Q.C. stated that the arbitrator had left it to the court to say whether the plaintiff should have interest or not, and asked for interest accordingly, stating that the defendants had had the use of the money for three years.

The COURT allowed interest for two years only, deducting one year's interest for the period during which the special case had been pending.

GUNN v. ROBERTS.

Power of captain to bind owners by a contract for necessaries—Foreign port—Agent duly authorised—Existence of agent not known to person supplying the necessaries—What are necessaries for a ship?

The master of a ship has authority to pledge his owner's credit for money borrowed or for goods supplied by his (the master's) orders in a foreign port only where (1) it is necessary to borrow money for the prosecution of the enterprise, or the goods are reasonably necessary for the use of the ship; (2), where neither the owner or his duly authorised agent is at the port, nor within such distance that he can be reasonably expected to interfere.

Want of knowledge of the presence of the owner or an agent on the part of the person supplying goods or money to a master will not entitle him to recover against the owner. (a)

Where the captain of a ship in a foreign port obtained from the plaintiff advances of money and supplies for the ship, both of which were necessary, in the sense that the ship could not have made her voyage without obtaining them from some one in the port, and it was proved that the owners had instructed R. and Co. to be agents for the ship in the port, and had provided them with funds for the purpose, of which the captain was fully aware, and that R. and Co. had undertaken the duties of agents, and had paid money, and were willing to have paid any more that the ship might require :

(a) The decisions of the United States courts fully support this view, and even go further, for it has been held in more than one case, that the person who supplies goods or money cannot recover against the ship, and consequently not against the owners, if it appears that the master had no necessity to pledge the ship's credit by reason of his having funds in hand to supply the ship's wants; there is a duty on the material man to make inquiries as to the master's authority, before making advances: (Thomas v. Osborn, 19 Wallace U. S. Sup. Ct. Rep. 22; Pratt v. Read, Ib. 359; The Eledona, 2 Benedict U. S. Dist. Ct., 2nd Dist. Rep. 31). The general rule of law to be deducted from the various American cases seems to be that even in a foreign port a master cannot pledge his owner's credit, if the owner himself or his agent be present: (See Parsons on Shipping, vol. 2 pp. 8, 9, 10, 17, and the cases there cited.) The general rule never seems to have been really disputed. Several cases have been decided which have been distinguished on the ground that the owner has ratified the master's authority: (See Provost v. Patchin, 9 N. Y. Rep. 235, and the cases there cited.) The English rule as here laid down will be found expressly adopted in a later case (Gager v. Babcock, 48 N. Y. Rep. 154).—Ed.

Held, on the authority of Arthur v. Barton (6 M. & W. 138), that the plaintiff could not recover against the owners for the goods and money supplied to the captain, because they had appointed R. & Co. as their agents in the port; and that notwithstanding that the plaintiff was ignorant of there being any agents, and had contracted with the captain on the faith of the latter's representation that he was his own master, and that there were no agents for the ship in the port.

THE declaration in this action was for money advanced and lent, and for goods sold by the plaintiff to the defendant; and the plea was never indebted, except as to £98 paid into court. The case came on for trial before the late Lord Chief Justice Bovill, at the Guildhall, in July, 1873, and the plaintiff obtained a verdict for £113 beyond the sum paid into court. Leave was reserved to the defendants to move, and in Michaelmas Term a rule nisi was obtained to set aside the verdict and enter it for the defendant, on the ground that "upon the facts proved and found by the jury and admitted, the defendant was not liable in point of law for any part of the plaintiff's claim, or beyond the sum paid into court."

The facts were that the plaintiff was a ship's chandler at Quebec, and that the defendant's ship Aracana arrived there in ballast on the 13th Oct. to find a cargo. She was consigned to Ross and Co., who had a credit of 500l. from the defendant for the purposes of the ship. It was admitted that they would have advanced more than the 500l. if they had been applied to by the captain. The captain had been instructed that Ross and Co. were agents, and that he was not to pay bills himself, but was to send them to Ross and Co.; and Ross and Co. had been told not to allow the captain to have more than small sums at a time. These were all private instructions, and were not known to the plaintiff. It was plain that the stevedore, and probably the captain, committed a fraud on the owner in reference to the loading of the ship with timber. However, the captain applied to the plaintiff and obtained from him 427l., of which 300l. was in cash, and the supplies and money were such as the ship was in actual need of, being for the most part necessary for the loading of the ship.

1. Did the plaintiff before or at the time of making the supplies know that Ross and Co. had authority to supply the ship with all things necessary?—Answer: No.

2. Did the plaintiff know that Ross and Co. were agents for the ship?—Answer: No.

3. Ought the plaintiff to have inquired in the ordinary course of business?—Answer: Yes.

4. The jury also found that the goods supplied were necessaries, and it was admitted that the plaintiff might have ascertained that Ross and Co. were agents if he had inquired.

Benjamin Q.C. and Wormald showed cause.—The point made on the part of the defendant is that the captain was not the agent of the defendant so as to bind him; but we contend that any limitation of authority not known to the plaintiff cannot bind the latter, and the captain is prima facie clothed with a general authority to bind the owners for necessaries. A ship comes once, not like a trader on a regular line, to a port seeking a cargo. The captain says he is his own master, and the things which are supplied to him are just such as would be wanted for the ship. No one else supplies them and yet it is suggested that the owners who have had the things are not liable. All that is shown here is that Ross and Co. were ready to supply money for these things, but they did not do so.

It is an important fact that the captain having borrowed 1500 dollars from the plaintiff, gave an account to the owners at Liverpool, and showed a balance in hand of 252 dollars which the defendant took from him. This sum has never been returned, the 98l. paid into court was stated by the defendant to be for fresh meat, &c., supplied in Quebec, but we contend that the owners cannot ratify the act of the master in part only, but must do so altogether if they accept any benefit. Here the defendant actually took some of the money: (See Bristowe v. Whitmore in the House of Lords, 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 95; 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 622) What the defendant is trying to say is this, "The captain is not my agent, but I will keep what he has got for me from you." This is a ratification of what the master has done.

But independently of that the master can bind the owners for necessities, and the jury have found that these were necessities. [BRETT, J.—In the sense in which you use necessities it would be the same if the owner were in the port.] No secret instructions can affect the position of the plaintiff, nor take away the general authority possessed by the master as agent of the owners. In Grant v. Norway (10 C. B. 686), a passage from Smith's Mercantile Law, p. 59, is quoted by Jervis, C.J., as being a correct exposition of the law. "The master is a general agent to perform all things, relating to the usual employment of his ship, and the authority of such an agent to perform all things usual in the line of business in which he is employed cannot be limited by any private order or direction not known to the party dealing with him." [BRETT, J.—Does that go further than that the captain may bind within his general authority, notwithstanding secret orders, but that if things are not necessary he cannot bind the owners? What then is the meaning of the term? It must mean necessities for the ship, not that they could not be got from some one else. [BRETT, J.—I take it that if the owner is in the port with money or credit, nothing is a necessary in the proper sense.] Yes that is so, if the owner or the agent be known; but there is no case deciding that the plaintiff is bound to make inquiries if there has been an agent secretly appointed. In Williamson v. Page (1 Car. & Kir. 581), it was held that the only question for the jury was whether under the circumstances the captain's position was such as to constitute him the authorised agent of the owner, in order to procure advances, and that the state of accounts between the captain and the owner had nothing to do with the case. Arthur v. Barton (6 M. & W. 138), which will be urged most strongly against the plaintiff, is not a decision against the view we are contending for. In the first place, what was assumed to be there decided, was not in reality decided. It occurs merely in the reasoning of the judge, it is an obiter dictum, and entitled no doubt to the respect due to a great judge, but still it was not a decision on the point of the known existence of an agent in the port. In the second place, accepting it as far as it goes, it may well be that the attention of the court not being directed to that particular matter, the proposition is stated without the qualification which we think is understood though not expressed throughout, viz., that agent means "known agent," not secret agent. And that this is implied may be argued from the use by Lord Abinger, of "general" agent. He says, "Therefore, if the owner or his general agent be at the port, or so near it as to be reasonably expected to interfere personally, the master cannot unless specially authorised, or unless there become custom of trade warranting it, pledge the owner's credit at all, but must leave it to him or to his agent to do what is necessary." [BRETT, J.—That is the proposition you have to negative; the fact of the presence of the agent in the port deprives the master of any implied authority,] The law is not now so rigid as at the date of Arthur v. Barton (ubi sup.). Edwards v. Havill (14 C. B. 107) shows that when there was a reasonable necessity the captain might act so as to pledge the owner's credit, though the owner was within one day's post. So in McIntosh v. Mitcheson (4 Ex. 175), where it was held that the onus is on the plaintiff to show that the money and goods supplied were necessities. That onus we accepted here, and proved at the trial. In The Riga (ante, vol. 1, p. 246; 26 L. T. Rep. N. S. 202; L. Rep. 3 Ad. 516) there is a review of the authorities on the meaning of "necessaries," and the Court of Admiralty adopted Lord Tenterden's definition, given in Webster v. Seekamp (4 B. & Ald. 352): "Whatever the owner of the vessel as a prudent man would have ordered if present at the time, comes within the meaning of the word 'necessary' as applied to those repairs done or things provided for the ship by order of the master, for which the owners are liable." In a recent American case McCready v. Thorn (6 Sickels, 51 N. Y. R.) the law is reviewed, and thence it appears that the necessity of borrowing money and the application of it must be proved by the lender to entitle him to recover, but that is all; nothing is said about the discovery of a secret agent. There is the analogy of necessities for infants and married women in favour of my contention. [BRETT, J.—Is not the analogy of hypothecation a better one? It is the fact always of there being an agent which it is important in reference to bottomry bonds to discover. The captain cannot hypothecate if there is an agent.] Hypothecation is so extreme and exceptional an act, that an agent must become known if you advertise. Consider, also, how dangerous it would be to hold that the mere fact of there being a secret agent, necessarily prevents a plaintiff from recovering for goods actually needed and actually supplied and enjoyed. It would open a wide door to fraud by collusion between owners and mere colourable agents. And then with regard to bottomry bonds, the principle is not so precise as is suggested by the court, for the judgment of Dr. Lushington in the case of The Faithful (31 L. J. 61, Adm.) shows, that the question of knowledge is not unimportant. He says, there is this qualification of the general principle, "If the merchant who furnishes those supplies, and at the same time takes a bottomry bond, is in a state of invincible ignorance as to the existence of an agent in the same town—the bond will be good; but we must recollect that invincible ignorance means that ignorance which it is not in the power of the merchant to overcome by taking requisite means to obtain information on that subject." If invincible ignorance will support a bottomry bond, surely such bona fide ignorance as existed here will support a contract for necessities actually supplied, nothing having occurred to excite even a suspicion that the statement of the captain that there was no agent was untrue. [BRETT, J. also referred to The Alexander (1 W. Rob. 346; Johns v. Simons, 2 Q. B. 424).]

C. Russell, Q.C. (Cohen, Q.C. with him) in support of the rule.—First, I say, that the payment into court is not an admission of liability, nor that the captain was authorised to pledge the owners' credit. Then as to the supposed ratification. The captain had borrowed money from the plaintiff and from Ross and Co., and though on returning home he had 250 dollars in hand, there was nothing to show whose money that was, so that the defendant in receiving it did not thereby ratify the captain's dealing with the plaintiff; and there is no finding of the jury to support the theory of ratification. I contend the onus is on the plaintiff to establish that there was authority in the captain to bind the owners.

Secondly, the onus is not discharged by merely showing that the things were necessary to the ship, in the sense of being needed in the prosecution of the voyage, and that some one must have supplied them, but that regard must be had to the fact of whether or no the owner has provided the captain with funds or means of otherwise providing himself with such necessities. [BRETT, J.—Will you go so far as to say that it must be a direction to the jury, if it be proved that there was an agent, that they cannot find that goods supplied abunde are necessities?] Yes, we must go that length, and it was so taken at the trial. The hypothecation cases are in Williams and Bruce's Admiralty Practice, p. 42. But the cases cited as modifying or questioning Arthur v. Barton, do not upon examination really do so at all; and unless Arthur v. Barton (ubi sup.) is overruled, there can, I submit, be no doubt about this case. It is admitted that the captain has only a limited authority, even without relying upon Lord Abinger's judgment: he cannot pledge the owner's credit except for necessities for the ship, that is, except in case of necessity. It comes round, therefore, to the question, What is a case of necessity? and I contend that the true consideration is not merely whether the thing itself is necessary, but whether it was necessary to pledge the owner's credit to get it. [DENMAN, J.—The captain might buy goods a dozen times over, and they would be equally necessities each time.] Yes, that shows it by a reductio ad absurdum; if the captain made away with or misappropriated the things supplied, the owners might be held liable for necessities ad infinitum were the construction contended for on the other side to prevail. [He was then stopped by the court.]

BRETT, J.—In this case the facts are that the plaintiff has supplied the captain of the defendants' ship with certain goods and money while she was seeking a cargo in a foreign port, and such goods and money may be taken to have been necessities for the ship in the sense that the ship could not have sailed without their having been supplied by some one. But it was proved that the owners, the defendants, had previously instructed Ross and Co. to be their agents in that port for the ship on this voyage, and had supplied them with certain funds on purpose, and had authorised them to advance more if necessary for the voyage, and had appointed them to be their agents for the management of the ship at the port. Ross and Co. had accepted the office, and it was proved were ready, able, and willing to do anything that was necessary, and had in fact already made some advances and provided some supplies. The captain, though he knew all this as to the appointment of Ross and Co. as agents (although I may say that it seems to me immaterial whether he knew or not) yet fraudulently gave orders to the plaintiff for goods for the ship. It was admitted that the plaintiff was not cognisant of the fraud, and knew nothing of Ross and Co.; but it was found by the jury that he might by inquiry have discovered that there was an agent, and then by inquiry of Ross and Co. have known of the real position of the ship and of the captain. Under these circumstances the plaintiff having supplied goods on the defendant's credit brought an action for money lent and for goods delivered under an alleged contract between the plaintiff and the defendants, the latter acting through their agent, the captain of the ship.

One point which is urged on behalf of the plaintiff is this, that although the captain was not authorised to pledge the defendant's credit, yet as he did actually borrow money, and the defendants have, by receiving part of that money, ratified the act of the captain, they are liable to repay the money so borrowed. Now that they might have ratified is undoubted, but then it was necessary to show that they had received part of the money as coming from the plaintiff, and that they knew of the proceedings and arrangement. But here there was no knowledge; and I am clearly of opinion that here there has been no ratification. The case, therefore, is an ordinary one of money and goods supplied on a captain's order.

The action is on a contract and the onus is on the plaintiff to show the contract. There is certainly no express contract, for what was made was between the plaintiff and the captain, and the defendants are not bound unless the captain had authority. It is said that the captain had a general authority. That is a vague statement, but it is so far true, because a captain has a general implied authority to pledge the owner's credit under certain circumstances, but only then. To raise the presumption of the existence of that authority, it is recognised law that two main things must exist. First it must be necessary to borrow money for the prosecution of the enterprise, and as to goods, such must be shown to be reasonably necessary for the use of the ship—I don't say absolutely necessary, but they must certainly be reasonably necessary, for if the goods are not necessary then even if the captain could not get money from the owner or his agent, still he would not be entitled to pledge the owners' credit for such goods. Secondly, even if the things are necessities, that alone does not give the captain authority. It must also be shown that it was reasonably necessary to order them on the credit of the owners, or of the ship, and that the master could not get the supplies through an authorised agent. If the captain is at a port of his own country, or at a foreign port, and if neither the owner nor an agent be there, or near there, and the captain be not in funds, then there is a reasonable necessity to order goods or borrow money on the owner's credit, as in the case of Edwards v. Havill (ubi sup.). But if the owner be present, with means to pay for the goods, or credit to procure them, then there is no necessity for the captain to pledge his owner's credit. Where the owner is present and in a position to pay, if this be proved in fact, it is the law of England that the judge trying the case ought to direct the jury that the captain has no right to pledge the owner's credit, and that he has therefore no authority, express or implied to do so; and that therefore there can be no evidence of a contract between the owner and the person who may have supplied goods or lent money to the captain under such circumstances.

GUNN v. ROBERTS.

This is equally the fact if the owner has an agent who stands in his place, who has been instructed to act as agent and accepted the appointment and who is ready and able to fulfil the duties. Here, also, there is no necessity for the captain to act on behalf of the owner, for the agent can act; the captain is servant of the owner, and so is servant of the agent, who is in the owner's place for the time being; if it were otherwise, and if he do act, he in effect takes away the owner's discretion.

This view of the law is supported by every authority. The leading case on the subject, which has always been so treated on account of the exposition of the law in it by Lord Abinger, is Arthur v. Barton, and it has ever since been quoted with approbation, has never been questioned, and has been copied into all the books. This exposition of the law is well and accurately summed up in McLachlan's Law of Shipping, 1st edit., p. 131, where the law on many subjects is well stated, though I do not invariably agree with the author when he theorises as to what the law ought to be. The passage is this, "There are well defined limits to the exercise of the authority of the master to pledge the owner's credit. First, in cases where the owner or his agent is at the port of the ship's anchorage, or so near to it as to be reasonably expected to interfere, the master cannot, without special authority for the purpose, pledge the owner's credit for the ship's necessities." Now the general law that is contended for by Mr. Benjamin, and rightly, is that the master is agent for the ship, and so for the owner for all that is necessary for the working and navigation of the ship, and the prosecution of the voyage. Quite so, but there is this limitation as shown in Arthur v. Barton (ubi sup.), that if the owner or his agent be at the port the authority of the master ceases. Then there is also a second limitation, given by MacLachlan, p. 132, viz., that the authority of the master, when it exists, extends only to such things as the owner, if there, would deem to be necessary; to such things only "as a prudent man would deem reasonably necessary and proper to be done or supplied for the purposes of the voyage on which the vessel is engaged."

The plaintiff, therefore, must show, taking these limitations, in inverse order, first, that the things which have been supplied to the captain are such things as the owner would if present have thought necessary; and, secondly, that neither the owner nor any agent of his was there with money or credit to supply the things, whether the port be a home or a foreign port. If the plaintiff fails in these, he fails in the primary part of his proof; he fails, that is to say, in proving the authority of the captain, and, if so, there is no contract.

This is in harmony with the law in respect to hypothecation as held universally in the Admiralty Court. In case of hypothecation the lender must, to justify such a proceeding, and enforce his bond, show that neither the owner nor his agent were at the port, and that there was no means of communication with them, and that by no reasonable efforts could the master have obtained money upon less security. Although the money may be absolutely necessary for the ship, yet the fact does not give the master authority to hypothecate, without showing what have been just stated to be the other requisites, notwithstanding the indisputable possession by the captain of a general authority. It has been argued that the plaintiff might, if he knew of no agent, deal with the master, but it has been held to the contrary. The knowledge of the plaintiff who lends the money is immaterial, and has always been held to be so, and that being so, can it be maintained that necessity alone, in the sense of the ship being in need of the goods or money, apart from any consideration whether or not the owner or agent is ready to supply them, is to justify any one in dealing with the captain and fixing the owners with liability.

But it is said that the course of authorities has been broken in upon by the case of The Faithful (ubi sup.). I would always speak of any judgment of Dr. Lushington with the greatest respect, as I believe him to have been one of the ablest judges who ever sat on the bench, and his decisions are those of one who had the widest knowledge of law, especially in relation to nautical matters; but I am bound to say that the propositions put before us from The Faithful (ubi sup.) seem to me to be novel, and I doubt if they could be sustained in the form in which they have been cited. But even if they can be sustained they would not help the plaintiff here, for the finding of the jury takes this case out of those limitations, as the plaintiff might have by inquiry discovered the agent. That also was a case of bottomry, and not strictly or necessarily applicable to a case of goods supplied to a captain. The American case (McCready v. Thorn, ubi sup.) which has been mentioned does not derogate from the long list of authorities which have affirmed the state of the English law.

I am of opinion therefore that upon proof or admission that Ross and Co. were agents appointed by the owners to manage the ship in the port (I do not rely upon their being consignees) and to see the ship supplied, and that they had accepted the appointment and were ready to act—on that proof or admission, I think the Lord Chief Justice would have been justified in directing, and would, if he had acted strictly, have directed the jury that there was no case on behalf of the plaintiff for them to consider. For these reasons I am of opinion that this rule to enter the verdict for the defendant must be made absolute.

DENMAN, J.—I am of the same opinion. The only difficulty which presented itself to my mind during the argument was owing to the fact that the case most relied upon for the defendant and which has been taken to govern this, does not contain on the point for which it is cited an absolute ruling but only a dictum. But I think that as that judgment was delivered in a case where the whole law on the subject was before the court, and was discussed and considered, and as it has been adopted everywhere since that time, and has been inserted in the text books and recognised in later cases, the dictum may be acknowledged to be a correct statement of the law. I find in Maude and Pollock (Law of Merchant Shipping, 2nd edit., p. 102), it is laid down in this way. "The master under the general authority which he possesses may do all things necessary for the due and proper prosecution of the voyage in which the ship is engaged. This implied authority, however, does not usually exist in cases in which the owner can himself personally interfere; as for instance when the ship is in a port where the owner resides, or at which he has beforehand appointed an agent." It seems that the law is always stated as being settled in favour of non-liability of the owner where there is an agent in the port, and every case goes to corroborate the view that such is the law, though no case is founded on exactly the same circumstances as the present one. All, however, recognise the principle that the agent, if there be one, is the proper person to furnish all supplies, and the liability of the owners does not arise if the master takes upon himself to do what he should not, and no implied authority to bind the owners is created. On the other points it is unnecessary for me to enlarge; but as to the evidence of ratification I agree with my brother Brett, and I also think that we need not resort to the fourth finding of the jury unless the doctrine alleged to be laid down by Dr. Lushington in the case of The Faithful (ubi sup.) is to be applied, which I am of opinion it is not.

FISHER v. LIVERPOOL MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED).

[EX. CH.]

FISHER v. LIVERPOOL MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED.)

Marine insurance—Slip—Contract to prepare or execute policy—30 & 31 Vict. c. 23, ss. 7, 9.

An underwriter's slip is a contract of marine insurance within the meaning of the Stamp Act 1870, and such a contract cannot be enforced unless expressed in a stamped policy, and the agreement on behalf of underwriters signing a slip is not an agreement divisible into two parts, the one to make a contract of marine insurance, and the other to prepare a policy in accordance with that contract, but is a whole agreement to insure, which can only be enforced against underwriters after being expressed in a stamped policy.

Defendants' agent in London initialled a slip for the insurance of some steel rails of plaintiffs on board a ship. Defendants' agent, in the ordinary course of his business, sent a copy of this slip the same day to the defendants. The plaintiffs' brokers paid defendants' agent in London for the premium due upon the policy, and also for the stamp of the policy, but although some correspondence passed concerning it, no policy was executed. The steel rails were totally lost by perils insured against, and the defendants refused to pay the amount named for insurance on the slip.

Held by the Exchequer Chamber (affirming the majority of the Queen's Bench), that the whole transaction between the parties constituted one indivisible contract; and that sects, 7 and 9 of the Stamp Act 1870, prevented the plaintiffs from recovering the insurance from the defendants in any form of action.

THIS was an appeal by the plaintiffs under the provisions of the Common Law Procedure Act 1854, against the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in making absolute a rule of that court, obtained by the defendants pursuant to leave reserved, calling upon the plaintiffs to show cause why the verdict found for the plaintiffs should not be set aside, and instead thereof why a nonsuit should not be entered or a verdict for the defendants, on the grounds hereinafter set out.

The pleadings, the arguments upon the rule, and the judgments of the court below are reported ante p. 44.

The following were the facts as stated in the appeal case:

The plaintiffs carry on business as merchants and shipowners at Barrow-in-Furness, and were at the time of the orders to insure hereinafter referred to, the owners of the ship Lizzie and continued to be such owners up to and at the time of the loss of the ship as hereinafter mentioned. The defendants are a marine insurance company, carrying on business at Liverpool under the name and style of the Liverpool Marine Insurance Company (Limited) and in Dec. 1871 they entered into a voluntary liquidation.

The defendants appointed and employed before such liquidation the firm of Eames and Co. to act as their agents in London to accept risks and receive premiums on their behalf; and a circular was issued by the defendants informing the public of the said appointment.

Eames was called as a witness by the plaintiffs, and proved the course of business to be as follows:—His firm accepted risks for the defendants by himself initialling the slips. Copies were then sent to him by the brokers, and he invariably forwarded copies of the same to the defendants at Liverpool on the same day.

The plaintiffs employed their brokers in London, Messrs. John Patton, jun., and Co., to insure for them a cargo of steel rails per the said ship Lizzie.

The said cargo was the property of the Barrow Hematite Company, as agents for whom the plaintiffs were shipping the said cargo; and the Lizzie being the plaintiffs' own vessel, they were carrying the cargo upon a charter-party, and took upon themselves the risk of the cargo, and to pay the Hematite Company any loss thereupon. After the loss the plaintiffs paid the Hematite Company the amount thereof.

On the 16th Nov. 1871, the said brokers submitted a slip, of which the following is a copy, to Eames, who initialled the same:—

The initials T. R. E. appearing opposite the sum of 1000*l.* on the slip are the initials of Eames, and the said slip was put in and proved at the trial, and was not objected to.

A copy of the said slip or request note was made by the brokers and sent to Eames, and he the same day forwarded to the defendants a document of which the following is a copy:—

On the 29th Jan. 1872, the defendants' liquidators in Liverpool wrote a letter to Eames and Co., of which the following is a copy:—

T. R. Eames, Esq., London. 29th Jan. 1872.

Dear Sir,—We have open slips as at foot, and shall be glad to receive instructions regarding them.—Yours faithfully, for Self and Co., Liquidators. J. S. MCGHIE.

Nov. 16th.—Lizzie. Barrow to New York.—1000*l.* on steel rails. J. Patton, jun., and Co.

To this letter Eames & Co. sent no reply, but upon receipt of it communicated with Patton and Co., and received their instructions to put the slip forward. The slip was put forward, but on what date did not appear, except by the correspondence hereinafter set out.

On the 13th March 1872, Patton and Co. paid to Eames and Co. by cheque to the defendants order the sum of 25*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.*, being 25*l.* 13*s.* for premium and 2*s.* 6*d.* for stamp duty on the policy; and Eames and Co., acting on their authority, endorsed the said cheque for the defendants and paid it into their own banking account, and it was duly paid.

The brokers on that occasion, and on several occasions afterwards, applied to Eames for the policy, and were told it had not been sent up from Liverpool, and that he would write a sharp letter about it.

The Lizzie and cargo were on the 21st March 1872 posted as, and were in fact, totally lost, and the defendants refused to execute any stamped policy or to pay the insurance.

The following correspondence took place between Eames and the defendant:—

London, 13th March 1872.

Gentlemen,—Messrs. Patton and Co. have applied to us for policy per Lizzie, the slip of which was sent to you some time since. Please send us the policy at your earliest convenience.—Yours faithfully, EAMES & Co.

London, 25th March 1872.

Referring to your note in reference to the Lizzie we are surprised at your refusing to issue a policy. This slip was sent to you some time since, and we have written more than once for the policy, and moreover, Messrs. Patton and Co. have paid the premium.

Dear Sirs,—Will you please say when you received the premium per this vessel, as we have no account of it? The earliest request we had for a policy was contained in your letter of the 13th March.—Yours faithfully, J. S. MCGHIE.

27th March, 1872.

In reply to yours of yesterday, respecting the Lizzie, the copy of the slip was sent to you some time since; we have no record of the date, because it was sent down without any letter being written (as customary). The cheque was paid 13th March. Messrs. Patton and Co. inform us that they wish to know by wire to-morrow, without fail, if you intend to issue a policy or not?

Defendants to Eames and Co.

28th March 1872,

I have yours of yesterday, and repeat a policy cannot now be issued. The liquidators do not recognise the payment to you by Messrs. Patton, as you had no authority to receive it on behalf of this company. Permit me to ask you why advice of the payment was not made to the liquidators before?—Yours faithfully,

J. S. MCGHIE.

Yours of the 28th duly to hand. Never having had our authority to receive money on behalf of the Liverpool Marine cancelled, we of course considered we were justified in applying for and receiving premiums overdue; and referring to your other question, it has not been our custom, as you well know, to make daily advice of payments made to us on behalf of the Company Messrs. Patton and Co. inform us that they consider you are bound to issue a policy.

FISHER v. LIVERPOOL MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED).

The company did not at any time return the said slip, nor did they in any way intimate that they would not grant a policy until the 21st March 1872.

The learned judge put the following questions to the jury:—First, Did the defendants authorise Eames to initial slips, to accept risks and to receive premiums on their behalf? Secondly, Did the defendants by approving the circular issued, stating that Eames had authority to accept risks, give the plaintiffs reasonable ground to believe, and did the plaintiffs believe, that if they (the plaintiffs) paid the premium and stamp duty on a slip initialled by Eames, the defendants would issue a policy in accordance with the slip? Thirdly, Were the plaintiffs prevented by the conduct of the defendants from insuring elsewhere? And the jury having answered all these questions in the affirmative, a verdict was thereupon entered for the plaintiffs with damages 1000*l.*, the declaration to be taken as amended to meet the facts and findings, his Lordship ruling that there was no evidence on the record as it stood, and reserving leave to the defendants to move to enter a verdict for them or a nonsuit, on the grounds that there was no evidence to go to the jury of liability on the part of the defendants, and that his Lordship ought not to have allowed the declaration to be amended.

The defendants obtained a rule nisi in pursuance of the leave reserved, which was made absolute on the 5th July 1873 by a majority of the Court of Queen's Bench, consisting of Quain and Archibald, J.J.; Blackburn, J. dissenting.

The grounds of the rule were; First, that there was no evidence to go to the jury; secondly, that no action will lie on the ship alone without the policy; thirdly, that no interest was shown in the plaintiff; fourthly, that the learned judge should not have allowed the declaration to be amended.

Benjamin, Q.C. (with him Aspland) argued for plaintiffs, the appellants.

R. G. Williams, Q.C. (with him Aspinal, Q.C.), for defendants.

For the arguments, see report of the case in the court below, ante, p. 46.

COLERIDGE, C. J.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the majority of the Queen's Bench should be affirmed; and I base my opinion upon the short and simple ground that all the transactions between the parties from the initialling of the slip constituted one and an indivisible contract. If that be so, it is admitted that the contract cannot be enforced. It has been laid down again and again that a slip is a contract of marine insurance; and by sect. 7 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 23. "No contract or agreement for Sea Insurance," with exceptions not relating to this case, "shall be valid unless the same is expressed in a policy." Although this contract, which was expressed only on the slip, cannot be expressed at law, it is not the less a contract, and the parties are bound in honour to carry it out. The learned judges in the court below have differed in opinion, and I think it was natural enough under the circumstances of this case that any one should endeavour as far as possible to maintain and enforce a contract which was repudiated as this was by the defendants. It can, however, be supported at law only by separating that part of the contract of which the slip might be evidence from the other part, which can only be inferred, that the defendants should tender to themselves a policy which they themselves should sign. Now, certainly it would require an extreme refinement of words and some violence to common understanding to support such a contention; everyone knows that the ordinary contract in a case of this kind is that which the slip contains, and on this ground I think the judgment of the majority of the court below was correct. Something has been suggested as to a subsequent contract contained in the correspondence, but there is no reference therein to any but the one whole and indivisible contract which alone existed between the parties. This being so the judgment of the Queen's Bench should be affirmed, I think, on the grounds stated in the opinion of the majority of that Court.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am entirely of the same opinion. It has been said that there are here two contracts between the parties; a very ingenious suggestion, and emanating, probably, from a natural feeling of indignation at the conduct of the defendants. When the practice in these matters is borne in mind, it is impossible to hold that this transaction constituted two contracts. When Eames initialled the slip, the company in the ordinary course was bound to issue and pay for the policy; it was all arranged at one time, and no further bargain was required. Nothing further needed to be done by the plaintiffs. If this had been a lawful contract, or I should rather say a contract enforceable at law, no one would have suggested there were two contracts. Take, by illustration, the sale of land, which can be enforced at law without difficulty; no action would ever be brought merely for not preparing the conveyance; or in a sale of goods, no action would be brought for not making a memorandum in writing. It is admitted here that this is not a contract to execute a policy, which, if it were, would not improve the plaintiff's position; but it is said there was a breach of a contract to prepare a policy. The result of this contention would be that although no action would lie for not executing a policy, there might be an action for not preparing one. It is very curious if such an obligation exists. I should like to see the form of the count into which Mr. Benjamin wants to amend the declaration. Another argument was that the plaintiffs were misled by the defendants' statements, and that the latter were estopped from denying the existence of a policy. That argument comes to this: That the defendants were bound to execute and forward a policy; but as they had not forwarded it, the plaintiffs had a right to assume that they had done the other part of their duty and had executed it. I am of opinion that the judgment of the majority of the court below should be affirmed.

BRETT, J.—If I had not tried this cause at Nisi Prius, I should not have added anything to the judgments which have been delivered. I sought at the trial every possible means to upset the defendants, and now I would do anything I can to accomplish that result which is in accordance with my view of the law. Eames had bound the defendants as far as he could, but this slip as it appeared to me was the only evidence of a contract between plaintiffs and defendants. If there be evidence of any other contract between them I do not see it in the case. It has been urged in the argument that by reason of the course of business there was another and independent contract that the defendants would execute and stamp a policy; if so it was only because the slip was signed. Then it was said there was an independent contract by the defendants to procure an executed policy from themselves; this, however, could be only a roundabout way of evading the Stamp Act. It has been urged also that there was a contract in February to get the policy prepared. But there was no agency in Eames for that purpose, and the point was not raised at the trial, nor left by me to the jury. As this rule is upon leave reserved, I do not think that it is open to the plaintiffs to argue this point now. Nay, more, I doubt whether even my brother Blackburn's judgment was founded upon that point at all. There is nothing to distinguish this action from one upon a Lloyd's slip against an ordinary underwriter; if this contract could be upheld, so could any of which a slip is the only evidence. Although with great reluctance, I cannot concur in the opinion of my brother Blackburn.

CLEASBY, B., DENMAN, J., POLLOCK and AMPHLETT, BB., concurred.

Judgment affirmed.

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Reported by J. P. ASPINALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Monday, April 27, 1874.

THE CAIRO.

Salvage of life—Ship damaged by collision—Crew leaving her without orders—Liability of ship and shipowners — Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), sect. 458—Admiralty Court Act, 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), sect. 9.

Where some of a ship's crew leave their ship shortly after a collision at sea in consequence of her dangerous condition, not against their master's orders, but without orders and without his consent, and are picked up and rescued from a dangerous position by another vessel, the owners master and crew of the latter, as salvors of life within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), sect. 458, and the Admiralty Court Act, 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), sect. 9, may recover reward against the ship.

Seemle, that if a crew deserted their ship without reason and contrary to orders, and afterwards found themselves in a position of danger from which they were rescued, the ship would not be liable for salvage reward.

This was a cause of salvage instituted on behalf of the owner, master and crew of the smack Emerald, against the foreign steamship Cairo and her freight and her owners intervening.

The Emerald was a fishing smack of fifty-one tons register, belonging to the port of London, and was manned by a crew of eleven hands all told. On the 15th Dec. 1873, she left Harwich for the fishing ground off Cromer. Between 7 and 8 p.m., on that day, she was three-quarters of a mile from the Newarp lightship, and her crew saw the Cairo in collision with another steamer. When the steamers separated the crew of the Emerald heard cries from the direction of the Cairo, and headed their smack in that direction.

After about twenty minutes a boat was made out with several men in her, and pulling only two oars. The weather was then fine, but with a fresh breeze blowing, and an attempt was made to get the boat alongside, but the men in the boat not speaking English, were unable to understand the directions of the master of the smack, and there was great danger of their being run over by the smack. The smack was then laid to, and the boat succeeded in getting alongside. The men in the boat were very frightened, and at once jumped on board the smack letting go the boat, and had not the mate of the smack jumped into the boat and fastened it astern of the smack it would have gone adrift. The men turned out to be some of the crew of the Cairo. One of them was much injured about the head and back. When they got on board the smack they all went into the cabin, and the smack bore up for the Cairo. The master of the smack in getting within hailing distance of the Cairo, asked that vessel if any assistance was required, and getting no answer lowered a boat, but at this moment the Cairo steamed away towards Winterton, where she was beached to prevent her sinking. The smack then bore away for the Wold, where she lay to till daylight. Between 1 and 2 a.m., on Dec. 16, it came on to blow hard from the N.N.E., with a heavy sea, and the boat of the Cairo, which was astern of the smack was struck and carried away. At 7 a.m., the weather having moderated, the smack sailed for Yarmouth, where she arrived at about 11 a.m., and landed the Cairo's crew. The services rendered entailed upon the Emerald the loss of two days fishing, equal to about 40l. The allegations in the plaintiff's petition relating to their services were as follows:

9. When the boat's crew from the Cairo were picked up they were in a very dangerous position; from the darkness of the night it was impossible to see the boat until very near, and the men ran great risk of being run down by passing vessels; those on board the Emerald would not have reached them if they had not heard their cries, and it was only by the exercise of great care on the part of those in charge of the Emerald that they managed to get near the boat in the darkness without running it down. The boat's crew had no compass with them and only three oars, one of which they were obliged to use for steering so that they had little or no power over the boat and were at the mercy of wind and tide, and with the wind at W.S.W. and the flood tide they could never have gained the lightship (the Newarp), which they were attempting to reach, for they were already to the south of the lightship, and they must have driven towards the cross sand and into broken water before the wind changed to the N.N.E. If the boat's crew had not got on board the Emerald before 1 a.m., on the morning of the 16th they must in all probability have been lost.

10. In rendering the aforesaid services the master and crew of the Emerald incurred some risk and underwent great exertion and fatigue.

The facts alleged by the plaintiffs were admitted by the defendants, except in so far as they alleged that the character of the services were exaggerated, and the defendant further pleaded:

5. When the boat's crew left the Cairo she was in no danger, and there was no reason for leaving her, and the said boat's crew left without the master's orders, and against his consent and most improperly.

6. They submit that in the circumstances no salvage services were rendered for which the defendants are liable, or which they ought to be ordered to remunerate.

From the evidence produced at the hearing it appeared that the Cairo was an iron ship, built in compartments, and that by the collision only one compartment was damaged. The master of the

THE CAIRO.

[ADM.]

Cairo had immediately after the collision ordered the boats to be lowered by way of precaution, but had given no orders for the passengers and crew to get into them; according to his account there was no such danger as justified the boat's crew in deserting the Cairo, and they left without his consent, although not against his positive orders. He heard the hailing from the Emerald, but did not answer it because he had enough hands on board to enable him to get to a place of safety, and did not require assistance. When the men returned to the ship a few days afterwards he allowed them to return to their duty without remonstrance.

The Admiralty Advocate (Dr. Deane, Q.C.), and G. Bruce for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs are entitled to life salvage under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) sect. 458, and the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10) sect. 9. (a) The boat's crew at the time the services were rendered still belonged to the Cairo, and the plaintiffs may recover in rem against that ship. The object of the statute was to give encouragement to salvage of life. If it should become necessary for salvors to inquire as to the right of persons in danger to leave their ship before instituting a suit, this inquiry will be made before rendering the service and the result will be that fishermen and others will refuse to take people on board their vessels unless they are satisfied that they can recover salvage reward. There was here a substantial life salvage. In The Willem III. (ante, vol. 1, p. 129, L. Rep. 3 Adm. & Ecc. 487; 25 L. T. Rep. N. S. 386), a claim for life salvage rendered to persons in boats who had left their ship was entertained.

Butt, Q.C. and Phillimore for the defendants.—In The Willem III. (ubi sup.) the ship was on fire before she was abandoned. Owners ought not to be made responsible for services rendered to sailors who abandon their ship without necessity. To decree salvage reward will be to give a direct premium for cowardly desertion of ships in distress. There was no such danger as justified the desertion. The services afterwards rendered were of a most trifling character.

The Admiralty Advocate in reply.

SIR ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—In this case, the Emerald, a fishing smack of 55 tons register,

(a) The Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, s. 458. "In the following cases (that is to say): Whenever any ship or boat is stranded or otherwise in distress on the shore of any sea or tidal water situated within the limits of the United Kingdom and services are rendered by any person.

1. In assisting such ship or boat.
2. In saving the lives of the persons belonging to such a ship or boat.
3. In saving the cargo or apparel of such ship or boat or any portion thereof.

And whenever any wreck is saved by any person other than a receiver within the United Kingdom there shall be payable by the owners of such ship or boat, cargo, apparel, or wreck, to the person by whom such services or any of them are rendered or by whom such wreck is saved, a reasonable amount of salvage, together with the expenses properly incurred by him in the performance of such services or the saving of such wreck, the amount &c., . . . to be determined, &c."

By the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10) s. 9, the provision is "extended to the salvage of life from any British ship or boat, wheresoever the services may have been rendered, and from any foreign ship or boat where the services have been rendered wholly or in part in British waters."

belonging to the port of London, and navigated by eleven hands, having put into Harwich with a cargo of fish, sailed from that port on the morning of the 5th Dec. last year. On the night of that day she was in the fishing-ground off Cromer, and those on board her saw two steam-vessels in collision, and heard cries, and shortly afterwards, after sailing about for twenty minutes, they made out a boat with several men in her, pulling only two oars and calling out for assistance. The men in the boat were foreigners, and unable to understand the directions given by the master of the Emerald. The men in the boat, ten in number, were taken on board the Emerald, and the court is now asked by the owners, master, and crew of that vessel, to award salvage remuneration to them on the ground that, under the 458th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), a salvage service has been rendered by them in saving the lives of the crew of the boat from imminent danger. The action has been brought against the steamship Cairo, to which the men belonged, and which proved to have been one of the two vessels seen by the Emerald to have been in collision as before mentioned.

The defence raised by the owners of the Cairo is two-fold. It is first alleged that the lives of the men picked up by the Emerald were in no danger; secondly, that if their lives were, in the circumstances, in any danger, the men had improperly left their ship, and therefore the ship ought not to be made responsible in respect of the services rendered to them.

The facts of the case lie in a very small compass. I must remember what were the circumstances, the time of the year, the time of night, the fact that the men taken on board were foreigners ignorant of the locality, ignorant also of the English language. I must also remember the state of the weather. At the time the men left the Cairo the weather was fine, but it changed, and the sea became rough not long after the men had been received on board the Emerald, so that in all probability if they had remained at sea in the boat, they would have been lost. At the same time it must certainly not be forgotten that although when the men were taken on board it was moonlight, there was some haze on the water, and the boat, when discovered, was in the track of vessels and in danger of being run down. In all the circumstances I am of opinion that these men were saved from danger of loss of life by the assistance rendered by the Emerald, and that if no other objection can be shown to exist, the plaintiffs are entitled to recover salvage.

The question of law raised by the defendants is of a grave kind, and I should be sorry by any words of mine to countenance the idea that the section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, to which I have referred, could be so strained as to compel the court to hold a ship liable for salvage because some of her crew had deserted her without reason and contrary to orders, and afterwards found themselves in a position of danger, from which they had been rescued. It might be that the persons rescuing them from peril might be salvors of life, and yet not be able to charge the ship with their reward. Whether a ship is or is not liable for life salvage is a question which can only be answered by considering the circumstances of each case. In this case, no doubt, the Cairo herself has suffered serious damage, and was in great danger, and the boat's crew left the ship to avoid that danger, and shortly afterwards her master accepted the services of another set of salvors, who assisted to beach her. It must be remembered that before the men left their vessel the boats had been ordered out. There is, moreover, the fact that the captain of the Cairo, who has given his evidence, does not state that the men left the vessel contrary to his orders; but he does state that two days afterwards they went back on board their vessel, and that he allowed them to return to their duty without making any remonstrance to them. Certainly it would not be to the interests of navigation or commerce if the court were to put a narrow construction on a statute passed for the encouragement of efforts to save human life and to look too strictly at the acts of men leaving their ship in time of peril, and so to deprive salvors who have relieved them from a position of danger from all reward.

THE MIRIAM—THE SCHWANN.

[ADM.]

On the whole, taking into consideration the special circumstances of the case, I am of opinion that the ship must be held liable to be condemned in salvage on the ground that the lives of the men belonging to her were saved from danger by the services rendered by the plaintiffs in this case. At the same time, the sum I have to award as salvage remuneration, bearing in mind the facts, must be moderate. Considering that it has been proved that the Emerald lost two days' fishing, which involved a loss of 40*l.*, I think that I shall not be wrong in awarding the sum of 140*l.* to the salvors with costs.

County Court Appeal—Arrest of ship—Practice.
Where plaintiffs appeal from a County Court in a cause in rem in which there has been decree for the defendants and the ship has in consequence been released, the High Court of Admiralty will on the ex parte application of the plaintiffs order a warrant to issue for the detention of the ship till bail given or the appeal decided.

Seemle that notice should be given before arrest to the defendants, so that they may come in and apply for the suspension of the warrant if they see fit.

THIS was an appeal from a decree of the judge of the County Court of Carnarvon, holden at Bangor, in a claim of tort in respect of goods carried in a ship made under the provisions of the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act Amendment Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 51) sect. 2. The claim was in rem against the ship for the wrongful conversion of a quantity of coals shipped by the plaintiffs on board the Miriam; the master had sold the coals, and the plaintiffs claimed 80*l.* The ship was arrested and no bail given. The County Court judge found that the master was justified in selling the coals, and gave a decree for the defendants with costs. From this decree the plaintiffs appealed.

Clarkson, for the appellants, now moved for a warrant to issue to arrest the ship so that she might be detained till bail should be given or the appeal decided.—The suit having been dismissed in the court below, the vessel has been released. There is no means of continuing an arrest on appeal to the court. On judgment for the defendants the County Court necessarily releases, and the only way of obtaining security for judgment on appeal is to re-arrest the ship. There is no settled practice on this point, and hence it is necessary to apply to the court. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE: Has notice of this motion been given to the other side?] No. If notice was given the ship would go at once.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—I shall order the warrant to issue, but at the same time I direct that notice be given to the shipowner before the arrest takes place, so that he may, if he thinks fit, come in and apply to the court for the suspension of the warrant on good cause shown.

THE SCHWANN.

Collision—Costs—Compulsory pilotage—Practice of Admiralty Court.

In a collision case, where a defendant raises, together with other defences, that of compulsory pilotage, and his ship is found to blame, but is dismissed on the ground that the negligent act of the compulsory pilot was the sole cause of the collision, each party pays his own costs, according to the practice of the High Court of Admiralty. It has never been the custom in that Court to apportion the costs in such cases according to the findings on the various issues.

THESE were cross causes of collision instituted, the one by the owners of the barque Robert Morrison against the steamship Schwann and the North-German Lloyd, her owners, intervening, and the other by the owners of the Schwann against the Robert Morrison and her owners intervening. The two causes were heard at the same time, and upon the same evidence, under the 34th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861 (24 Vict. c. 10), but pleadings were printed in both causes.

The facts are shortly as follows:

The Robert Morrison was coming up the river Thames in tow of a steam tug, and in charge of a licensed pilot; she had her lights duly exhibited, and whilst proceeding along the south shore of Limehouse Reach, at the rate of about two knots an hour, her pilot sighted the lights of a vessel, which turned out to be the Schwann, coming down the river. The Schwann came on and struck the Robert Morrison in the starboard bow, and drove her on to the south shore. The petition on behalf of the Robert Morrison alleged that her lookout first sighted the green light of the Schwann, bearing about two points on the Robert Morrison's starboard bow, and that the Schwann improperly ported into the starboard bow of the Robert Morrison. The answer on behalf of the Schwann alleged that her lookout first sighted the red light of the tug of the Robert Morrison, a little on the Schwann's port bow; that the helm of the Schwann was ported; that shortly afterwards the tug showed her green light; that the engines of the Schwann were set full speed astern, but that the collision nevertheless happened; the answer then continued as follows:—

ADM.]

THE SCHWANN.

[ADM.]

5. Save as herein appears, the defendants deny the truth of the several allegations contained in the petition filed in this cause.

6. The Robert Morrison and her said tug improperly neglected to port their helms.

7. The Robert Morrison and her said tug improperly starboarded their helms.

8. The Robert Morrison and her tug improperly neglected to keep to the north or Middlesex side of the river, and improperly neglected to take proper measures for passing the Schwann on her port side.

9. The Robert Bruce did not duly comply with the provisions of the 29th of the Rules and Bye-laws for the Regulation of the river Thames.

10. The said collision was occasioned by all or some or one of the matters set forth in Articles 6, 7, 8, and 9, of this Answer, or otherwise by the neglect or default of those on board the Robert Morrison or her tug.

11. The said collision was not occasioned by any neglect on the part of those on board the Schwann.

12. Before and at the time of the said collision the Schwann was navigating within a district, and under circumstances in which it was compulsory upon her and her master and owners that she should have on board, and be in charge of a duly-licensed pilot for such district, and before and at the time of the said collision the Schwann was in charge of and being navigated by and under the direction of a pilot duly licensed for such district, and all the orders of such pilot were duly obeyed by the master and crew of the Schwann, and if the said collision was in any way occasioned by any improper navigation of the Schwann it was solely occasioned by some neglect or default on the part of the said pilot, and not in any way by the master or crew of the Schwann.

The main questions of fact between the parties were, which of the two vessels was nearest to the south shore when they first sighted each other, and consequently whether they showed each other their respective green or red lights.

This case was heard before Sir R. Phillimore, assisted by Trinity Masters on May 1st and 2nd 1874, and he then pronounced that the collision was entirely owing to the negligence on board the Schwann, but that the owners of the Schwann had succeeded in establishing their pleas of compulsory pilotage; and consequently the cause against the Schwann was dismissed. The cross-cause against the Robert Morrison was dismissed with costs, but the owners of the Robert Morrison claiming the costs of issue of which ship was to blame, in which they succeeded, that question was reserved.

May 5, 1874.—The question of costs now came for argument.

Milward, Q.C. and Gainsford Bruce for the owners of the Robert Morrison.—We submit that the practice in these cases have never been definitely settled, and that on principle the owners of the Robert Morrison are entitled to costs of the issue in which they have been successful. It has no doubt been usual where a defendant raised a double defence, but succeeds on the plea of compulsory pilotage only, to give no costs, but it has never been so definitely decided. In The Admiral Boxer (Swab. 193, 107) Dr. Lushington only expresses his belief that the practice has been to give no costs to the defendants. In The Batavier (4 Notes of Cases, 356; 10 Jur. 20) it was intimated that if the defendants had admitted the facts and relied upon the plea of compulsory of pilotage alone they would have got their costs. In the Muriel (a)

(a) This was a cause of collision instituted by the owners of La Escocesa against the Muriel. The defendants pleaded after setting out the facts as follows:

10. In respect of the alleged cause or causes of the said collision, the defendants deny the truth of the statements relating thereto, in the several articles of the peti-costs were refused although the only defence raised was that of compulsory pilotage. In the Royal Charter (L. Rep. 2 Adm. & Ecc. 362; 20 L. T. Rep. N. S. 109; 3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 262) costs were allowed the defendants as they raised the defence of compulsory pilotage only and succeed thereon. From these cases it is clear that there are instances where costs are given to a party to a damage suit where the defence is compulsory pilotage, and that it is not the mere nature of the defence which is the foundation of the supposed rule as to costs. The owners of the Robert Morrison ask only for costs of the issue on which they had been successful, namely, which ship was to blame. They do not claim the costs of the compulsory pilotage issue. On this point there is no decided case, but we ask it on principle. If the cross-cause had been the principal cause, the Robert Morrison having been dismissed with costs, her owners would have got all costs, whereas as it is they got nothing but nominal costs, unless the rule is altered. We suggest that the court should follow the course adopted in the courts of common law, and that the costs should be apportioned according as the issues have been determined. [Sir R. PHILLIMORE.—It was a very common thing in the Ecclesiastical Courts to apportion costs according to the results of the various issues, but there is no precedent in this court.] In the Lawrel (Bro. & Lush. 191), plaintiffs in a bottomry suit were allowed to reply that by the law in force at the place where the bond was given, the lenders had a tion made, save and except that the defendants, without thereby admitting the truth of any one or more such statement or statements, in particular do admit that the said collision was occasioned by the improper navigation of the Muriel so far and so far only as such admission is consistent with the 11th section next hereinafter following and subject always to the same.

11. The Muriel was before and at the time of the said collision in charge, as aforesaid, of a duly licensed pilot of the port of Liverpool, to wit the said J.H., whose employment was at the time and place of the said collision compulsory by law upon the Muriel, her masters and owners, and the Muriel was at such time under the sole charge of the said J. H., whose orders in reference to her navigation were promptly and implicitly obeyed, and the said collision, if it was occasioned by the Muriel or any one on board her was exclusively occasioned by the said J. H., and neither the Muriel nor her owners are liable in respect thereof.

At the trial a discussion arose as to the meaning of these allegations, and it was contended by Milward, Q.C., and Clarkson, on behalf of the plaintiffs, that they contained no absolute admission of the fact that the Muriel was to blame, and hence put the plaintiffs to the expense of being compelled to bring their witnesses to show the negligence of the Muriel. On the other hand Gully and Kennedy argued for the defendants that the allegations were an absolute admission of default on behalf of the Muriel, and they admitted then at the trial that the Muriel was to blame for the collision, but claimed exemption from liability on the ground that the Muriel was in charge of a pilot by compulsion of law, and that his acts alone were the cause of the collision.

Sir R. PHILLIMORE, after finding as a fact that the crew of the Muriel did not in any way contribute to the collision, and that the pilot was solely to blame said; Looking at the peculiar facts of this case, without meaning in the least to trench upon the authority of The Royal Charter (Bro. & Lush 191) and the other cases which have been cited—authorities to which I shall adhere on all occasions till properly instructed by the Superior Court—I shall dismiss the case without costs.

lien upon the ship for the advances made, which the bond secured, and could have arrested the ship and would have done so, but for the bond having been given; but Dr. Lushington said that if the allegation were put in issue, the party failing on such an issue would have to pay the costs whatever the ultimate result of that litigation. That is the principle for which we contend; if the defendants raise false issues they ought to take the consequences. At common law where there are several pleas, each raises a distinct issue, and the costs are apportioned.

Butt, Q.C. and Clarkson for the owners of the Schwann, contra.—This is an attempt to upset the long existing practice of the court. The chief argument is the analogy of common law cases. Now at common law, in an action for damage by collision, the declaration usually alleges that the defendants by themselves or their servants are guilty of negligence and, although it may be usual to plead compulsory pilotage specially, still there is no reason why a defendant should not, under the general issue of "not guilty," show that the ship was not under the management and control of himself or his servant, but under that of a compulsory pilot (a); and if this defence were established the defendant would be entitled to his costs. In this court, when the defence of compulsory pilotage is raised, whether after admitting negligence or in conjunction with allegations, that the plaintiff's ship was, and that the defendant's ship was not, to blame, the question of how far the crew are to blame or not must necessarily be tried; for, one of the questions in either case is whether the crew of the defendant's ship have or have not contributed to the collision; and in both cases the same evidence must be adduced. Hence it would be impossible for the registrar to apportion the costs between the issues. In The Muriel (see note ante p. 538) it was distinctly admitted by counsel at the hearing that the defendant's ship was to blame; and costs were not given, upon the ground that the admission in the pleadings was not sufficiently distinct to indicate to the plaintiffs that the defendants did not intend to raise any issue but that of compulsory pilotage. In The Admiral Boxer (ubi sup.) it is distinctly laid down that in these cases it is the practice not to give costs. The court is asked to overthrow a practice which has existed ever since, and, according to Dr. Lushington, long before the date of that case (1857). The question may now have been solemnly raised for the first time, but that happens because the practice was considered so settled that it was never raised; the practice ought not now to be disturbed except by a court of appeal. In The Annapolis, The Johanna Stoll (Lush. 295; 1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 69), where there were cause and cross cause as here, it was found that the Annapolis was alone to blame, but that the act of default was the sole act of the pilot, who was employed by compulsion of law, and the suit against the Annapolis was dismissed. As to costs, Dr. Lushington, after argument claiming apportionment, said "The owners of the Johanna Stoll, the plaintiff's in the cross action, have failed only because the collision was occasioned by the act of the pilot of the Annapolis, who was employed compulsorily. According to the usual practice, therefore, they are entitled to be dismissed without costs in their action, and I see no reason for departing from the established rule." This decision shows that there is not any practice in this court by which costs are apportioned in these cases. In the City of Cambridge (ante, pp. 193, 239), the suit was dismissed without costs. It is too late now to ask the court to depart from its established practice.

Milward, Q.C., in reply.

Sir ROBERT PHILLIMORE.—In this suit a double defence was raised by the defendants, who by their answer denied that there was any neglect on the part of those on board their vessel, and further pleaded that if the collision was in any way occasioned by the improper navigation of the Schwann, it was occasioned by the default of the pilot in charge, who was employed by compulsion of law. The plaintiffs have succeeded in proving that the collision was occasioned solely by the improper navigation of the defendants' vessel, and the defendants have succeeded in substantiating the defence that the collision was caused by the sole default of the pilot.

Now, the contention has been that the defendants ought to pay all the costs incurred in determining the question which vessel was to blame, inasmuch as they did not admit that they were to blame, and rest on the pilotage issue alone, but forced the plaintiffs to try the question on the merits, and on that part of the case failed. It was admitted and could not be denied that the whole practice of the court ran counter to this contention. Several cases have been cited in which this distinct proposition was laid down, viz., that when a defendant admits upon the pleadings that his vessel is to blame, but sets up the defence of compulsory pilotage alone, he becomes entitled to costs if he succeeds in establishing that defence; indeed it could hardly be otherwise, because the defendant having given notice to the plaintiffs that he raises that defence alone, and succeeding therein, the responsibility of further contesting the suit is thereby thrown upon the plaintiff. But no single case has been cited in which a defendant in a damage suit who has raised the double defence and has succeeded upon the defence of compulsory pilotage alone, has been ordered to pay any portion of the costs of the suit.

The analogy of common law cases has been brought to the notice of the court, as has frequently been done on previous occasions, and it has been said that the common law rule by which the costs of issues are apportioned lays down a principle which this court should adopt; but in my opinion this court ought not easily to depart from its own established practice as to costs. This court does not always follow the rules of practice laid down by the Common Law Courts. There are various instances in which it takes a different course from the Courts of Common Law; as for instance where defendants in causes of damage succeed in establishing the defence of inevitable accident, or where the court holds both ships to blame, the court acts upon well established rules of its own. Dr. Lushington, my learned predecessor, who had extraordinary experience reaching a long way back of the practice of this court, and was peculiarly cognisant of all the authorities on the subject, expressed an opinion that where a defendant in a collision cause succeeded in establishing the defence of compulsory pilotage, he was never condemned in costs: (The Admiral Boxer, Swab. 193.) Now I am of opinion that it would require very clear and decisive proof that this practice was productive of evil, before it ought to be altered by the court; but I do not think it at all proved that such evils exist as to call for any change; on the contrary, to alter the practice as suggested might be to cast on the officers whose duty it is to tax the costs, a burden of extreme difficulty. There can be no doubt that evidence must be given under a plea of compulsory pilotage as to all the circumstances attending the collision, and hence as to the orders of the pilot being duly obeyed, as to immediate information being given him by the look-out, and as to his being duly assisted in the execution of his duty by the other persons on board the ship. This is the same evidence as would be given under the issue raising the question of which ship was to blame.

After carefully considering the matter, I am of opinion that there is no evidence to show that the present practice—admitted to be unmistakably of long and ancient standing—is so full of faults as to call upon and induce the court to exercise so strong an authority as to alter the rule. I must refuse the application to condemn the defendants in any portion of the costs, but as it is the first time the question has been solemnly argued, I shall make no order as to the costs of the application.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

October Term, 1873.

THE GREAT WESTERN INSURANCE COMPANY (apps.)
v. FOGARTY (resp.).

Marine insurance—Policy on machinery free of particular average—Destruction of species—Total loss.

Where the component parts of "machinery" insured "free of particular average" are by the perils insured against, some totally lost and the remainder so damaged that they are useless for the purpose for which they were intended when shipped, there is a total loss, which can be recovered from the underwriters, the species of the machinery being destroyed.

Under an open policy on machinery, at and from New York to Havana, free of particular average, the plaintiff (defendant in error) shipped the various parts necessary for a complete sugar-packing machine, including, as part of it, three sets of truck irons, and also other extra truck irons. The vessel on which this machinery was shipped was driven on the rocks in a violent gale just before reaching Havana, filled with water, became a total wreck, and was abandoned to the underwriters. A large number, but not all, of the pieces composing plaintiff's machinery were recovered and tendered to him, but he refused to accept them, as they were much broken and rusted, and the cost of repairing and polishing and putting the pieces in order would cost more than a new machine.

Held, a total loss.

MILLER, J., delivered the opinion of the court.—This was an action on a policy of marine insurance, in which the plaintiff recovered a judgment for 2511.95 dols. and costs. The policy was an open one, and the indorsement procured by the plaintiff on it was of insurance for 2250 dols., on machinery on board the bark Ella Adele, at and from New York to Havana, free from particular average. The memorandum clause of the policy provides that machines and machinery of every description are warranted by the assured free from average unless general. The machinery insured consisted of the various parts necessary for a complete sugar-packing machine, including as part of it, three sets of truck irons, and also other extra truck irons. It is described in the bill of lading and invoice as eight pieces and eight boxes, composing one sugar-packer and three trucks. The vessel on which these articles were being transported from New York to Havana, just before reaching the latter city, was driven on the rocks in a violent gale, filled with water, and finally became a total wreck, and was abandoned to the underwriters. Their agent at Havana took possession, and was engaged about a month in raising the cargo. A large number of the pieces composing plaintiff's machinery was recovered and tendered to him at Havana, which he refused to receive, on the ground that the insurance company was liable to him as for a total loss. They denied that under the circumstances of the case there was a total loss within the meaning of the policy; and the soundness of the instruction to the jury on that point, given and refused by the circuit court on the trial, is the only question now before us. There is very little conflict of testimony as to what was recovered and what was its condition when tendered to the plaintiff. It was all of iron. About half of it in weight was saved, and the remainder left at the bottom of the sea. That which was saved was entirely useless as machinery, and was of no value except as old iron, for which purpose it would sell for about 50 dols. The machinery, in working order, was worth 2250 dols. That which was saved was much broken and rusted, so that it would cost more to repair it, polish it, and put it in order for use than to buy a new machine.

Upon the testimony offered by plaintiff the counsel for defendant moved the court to instruct the jury that the action could not be sustained, because it showed that there was not a total loss. The court declined to do this, and the request was renewed at the conclusion of the defendant's evidence and again declined. Several prayers for instruction were then presented by the defendant, based upon the leading proposition, that if any of the pieces of the machinery insured were recovered and tendered in specie to the assured, there was no total loss. These were refused, and exceptions taken to all these refusals, on which error is assigned here. An exception was also taken as to the charge of the court laying down the law by which the jury were to decide the question of total loss submitted to them. That charge was in the following words: "The meaning of the term 'free from particular average,' used in the policy, was that the defendants should be liable only for a total loss of the subject insured; that the subject insured was not machines, but machinery, by which is generally understood the several parts or portions of machines, adapted and fitted to be put together so as to constitute a machine (in this case a sugar-packing machine), and applying the rule of law as to what constitutes a total loss to this particular subject insured, the jury will find whether any piece or portion of the machinery insured arrived at its destination in a perfect condition, so that it could have been used with its corresponding or connecting pieces had they also arrived in good condition; in that case the plaintiff could not recover, as the loss would not be total; but that if every piece of the machinery was so damaged by the perils insured against as to be entirely unfit for use on being supplied with its corresponding or connecting pieces, then there was a total loss of the subject insured as machinery, although the material itself might still exist; and if they so found, they would find a verdict for the plaintiff for the sum named in the policy, with interest from the 10th Sept. 1868."

The question here presented for consideration has been often in the courts, and the discriminations between what is a total loss and what is not, are frequently very nice and delicate. The authorities are by no means uniform or consistent with each other, when, as in the present case, the line of distinction is very narrow. Several cases bearing upon the one before us have been decided in this court and perhaps a short review of them may aid us here better than a more extended examination of the numerous other authorities on the subject. In the case of Blays v. Chesapeake Insurance Company (7 Cranch, 415), plaintiff was insured upon hides, the whole number of which was 14,565. Of these, 789 were totally lost by the sinking of a lighter, and 2491 of those sunk were fished up in a damaged condition and sold. The hides were memorandum articles, and this court held that, inasmuch as less than 800 hides insured as part of a much larger number of the same kind were lost, it could not be a total loss, and overruled the argument that it was a total loss as to the 789 hides. In the case of Marcadier v. Chesapeake Insurance Company (8 Cranch, 39) it is said that "it seems to be the settled doctrine that nothing short of a total extinction, either physical or in value of memorandum articles at an intermediate port, would entitle the insured to term the case a total loss, where the voyage is capable of being performed. And perhaps even as to an extinction in value, where the commodity specifically remains, it may yet be deemed not quite settled whether, under like circumstances, it would authorise an abandonment for a total loss. In the case of Morean v. The United States Ins. Co., (1 Wheat. 219), more than half a cargo of corn was thrown overboard and lost. The remainder was saved in a damaged condition and sold at about one-fourth the market value of sound corn. This was held not to be a total loss, because part of the corn was saved, and though damaged was of some value. It was, therefore, only a partial loss. The next case is that of Hugg v. Augusta Ins. Co. (7 How. 595). The question there arose on an insurance of jerked beef of four hundred tons, part of which was thrown into the sea and part of the remainder so seriously damaged that the authorities of the city of Nassau refused to allow more than one hundred and fifty of it to be landed. This was wet and heated, and not in a condition for re-shipment. In answer to a question on this subject, certified to this court by the judges of the Circuit Court, it was replied: "That if the jury found that the jerked beef was a perishable article within the meaning of the policy, the defendant is not liable as for a total loss of the freight, unless it appears that there was a destruction in specie of the entire cargo, or that it had lost its original character at Nassau, or that a total destruction would have been inevitable from the damage received if it had been re-shipped before it could have arrived at Mantanzas, the port of destination." And though there are some very strong expressions of the judge who delivered the opinion as to the necessity of the total destruction of the thing insured to establish a total loss of memorandum articles, no doubt the language here certified is the true expression of the court's opinion. And it will be observed that in this case, as in the case in 8 Cranch, the destruction spoken of is destruction as to species, and not mere physical extinction. Indeed, philosophically speaking, there can be no such thing as absolute extinction. That of which the thing insured was composed must remain in its parts, though destroyed as to its specific identity. In the case of the jerked beef, for instance, it might remain as a viscid mass of putrid flesh, but it would no longer be either beef or jerked beef. And when the case went back for trial in the Circuit Court, the charge of C. J. Taney to the jury places this point in a very clear light. He says there was not a total loss at Nassau, because a part of the jerked beef remained in specie, and had not been destroyed by the disaster. And if there was reasonable ground for believing that a portion of this beef could, by repairing the vessel, have been transported to Matanzas, although it might arrive there in a damaged condition, but yet retaining the character of jerked beef, there was no total loss. Taney's Decisions, 163. The jury found there was a total loss. The case of Judith v. Randall (2 Caines' Cases, N.Y. 324), where a carriage was insured and all was lost but the wheels, is another illustration of the principle. A part of the carriage, namely the wheels, a very important part, was saved; but the court held that the thing insured, to wit, the carriage, was lost—that it was a total loss. Its specific character as a carriage was gone. In the case of Wallerstein v. The Columbian Insurance Company (44 N.Y. 204) the whole doctrine is ably reviewed with a very full reference to previous decisions, and it is there shown that there is far from unanimity in the language in which the rule is expressed; and the extreme doctrine of an absolute extinction or destruction of the thing insured is not the true doctrine, or, at least, is not applicable in all cases as a criterion of total loss.

The Circuit Court was right in holding that what was insured was machinery—pieces or parts of a machine; pieces made and shaped to unite at points with other pieces, so as to make a sugar packing machine. If parts of them were absolutely lost, and every piece recovered had lost its adaptability to be used as part of the machine; had lost it so entirely that it would cost as much to buy a new piece just like it, as to repair or adapt that one to the purpose, then there was a total loss of the machinery. If no piece recovered was of any use, or could be applied to any use connected with the machine of which it was a part, without more expense on it than its original cost, then there was no part of the machinery saved, however much of rusty iron may have been taken from the wreck. The court went quite as far in behalf of defendant as the law justified when it told the jury that plaintiff could not recover if any piece or portion of the machinery insured arrived at its destination in a condition so perfect that it could have been used with its corresponding or connecting pieces had they also arrived in good condition.

THE NOR.

[Priv. Co.]

We are of opinion that the charge of the court put the case very fairly to the jury, as we understand the law, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

Judgment affirmed.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

ON APPEAL FROM THE VICE-ADMIRALTY COURT OF GIBRALTAR.

HIGH COURT OF ADMIRALTY (Sir R. Phillimore),

Collision—Regulations for preventing collisions at sea, art. 14—Construction of—Immediate danger of collision—Responsibility for act done under.

Art. 14 of the regulations for preventing collisions at sea which provides that "if two vessels under steam are crossing so as to involve risk of collision, the ship which has the other on her own starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other" it is not to be construed so that "keeping out of the way" means in all cases porting; a vessel may within the meaning of that article keep out of the way by stopping, or by going ahead, or by starboarding, or by porting, or by going astern, as the circumstances of the case may require.

A vessel which, having performed her own duty, is thrown into immediate danger of collision by the wrongful act of another is not to be held liable if at that moment she adopts a wrong manœuvre.

This was an appeal from a decree of Honourable Sir James Cochrane, the learned Judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court of Gibraltar, in cross causes of damage promoted respectively in that court by the appellants, the owners of the steamship Asturias, against the steamship Nor, of which the respondents are the master and owners, and by the master and owners of the Nor against the Asturias, for the recovery of damages arising out of a collision between the said two vessels.

The Asturias is an iron screw steamship of 272 tons register and 110 horse-power, manned by a crew of twenty-two hands all told, and belonging to the port of Gijon, in Spain.

The Nor is an iron screw steamship of 760 tons register and 130 horse-power, belonging to the port of Bergen, in Norway.

The collision took place about two a.m. of the 31st March 1873, off Marbella, on the coast of Spain, twenty-eight miles from Gibraltar.

The wind at the time was about W.N.W., the weather cloudy, but otherwise fine.

The case set up in the court below on behalf of the appellants, as stated in the petition, was that the Asturias was bound on a voyage from Bilbao to Barcelona, touching at the intermediate ports of Gijon, Villa Garcia, Cadiz, Malaga, Carthagena, Alicante, Valencia, and Tarragona, and that, after leaving Cadiz for Malaga on the 30th March, when nearly abreast of Marbella, she was steering a course N.E. true, proceeding at the rate of from eight to nine knots an hour under steam only. Her regulation lights were said to be duly placed and burning brightly at the time.

About ten minutes past two a.m. a red light, which afterwards proved to be that of the Nor, was observed about three points on the starboard bow, and distant about one and a-half miles. The Asturias kept her course, until shortly afterwards the white light of the Nor, which was alleged to be obscure came in view. Thereupon the helm of the Asturias was starboarded, in order to get out of the way of the approaching vessel, and her head veered to port—that is, towards the north. Shortly afterwards the hull of the Nor came in view, when the Asturias' helm was put hard a-starboard in order to carry the vessel all round. Whilst in the act of going round the collision took place, the Nor with her stem and port bow striking the Asturias amidships on the starboard side, thereby doing her considerable damage and disabling her.

The case on the part of the respondents was that, on the occasion in question, the Nor bound from Alexandria for Dunkirk, was steering for the port of Gibraltar for the purpose of obtaining a supply of coals. Her course at the time was W. by compass, and she had her proper regulation lights burning brightly, and a good look out was being kept.

Under these circumstances about two a.m. on the 31st March, the mast head and green lights of the Asturias were observed distant between three or four miles, bearing about two points on the port bow. Those on board the Nor kept their course and continued to watch the lights of the Asturias, but when the Asturias approached at great speed, and rendered a collision inevitable, the helm of the Nor was put hard a port and her engines immediately stopped and reversed, in order to lessen the shock. The port bow and stem of the Nor came into collision with the starboard side of the Asturias about amidships. At the time of the collision the Asturias was still going full speed, but the way of the Nor was almost stopped. By her porting the Nor had gone off ten points at the time of collision. After the collision the Nor stayed by the Asturias and rendered her assistance, and ultimately towed her to the Bay of Gibraltar.

The appellants alleged that the collision was caused by those on board the Nor neglecting to keep their course, and also by reason that the regulation lights of the Nor were not brightly burning.

The respondents attributed blame to those on board the Asturias for not taking due and proper measures to keep out of the way of the Nor, and also for improperly neglecting to stop and reverse their engines.

The evidence was taken orally in open court before the learned judge of the court below. The learned judge found the Asturias alone to blame for the collision, on the ground that it was the duty of the Asturias to keep out of the way of the Nor, and for that purpose it was "unquestionably the duty of the Asturias to port her helm and show her red light to the Nor," whereas in fact she "starboarded her helm, and pursued her course with undiminished speed," and obtaining sight of the hull of the Nor put her helm hard astarboard. The Nor he held not to blame on the ground that she held on her course, as she was bound to do, until there was immediate danger of collision and then put her helm hard apart which was "the only course that offered any reasonable prospect of lessening the effect of the collision, if not of avoiding it altogether."

[PRIV. CO.]

THE NOR.

[PRIV. CO.]

From this decree the owners of the Asturias appealed on the following amongst other grounds.

1. Because the vessels were crossing steamers under steam, and it was the duty of the Asturias, having the Nor on her starboard bow, to keep out of the way of the Nor, and it was the duty of the Nor to keep her course.

2. Because the Asturias was at liberty to get out of the way of the Nor either by porting or starboarding, as she thought fit, and the learned judge of the court below erroneously held that she was bound to port her helm.

3. Because the Asturias starboarded her helm sufficiently to have avoided the collision if the Nor had performed her duty by keeping her course, and the collision was occasioned by the improper porting of the helm of the Nor.

4. Because the judgment and decree of the court below were in favour of the respondents, whereas upon the pleadings and evidence they ought to have been in favour of the appellants.

The judgment of the court was delivered by THE JUDGE OF THE HIGH COURT OF ADMIRALTY (Sir R. Phillimore):—This is an appeal from the Vice-Admiralty Court of Gibraltar. It was a case of collision between two screw steam-ships, a Spanish screw steam-ship, the Asturias of 272 tons, with engines of 110 horse power and a crew of 22 hands, and a Norwegian screw steam-ship of 760 tons and 130 horse power. The collision took place on the 31st March, shortly after two o'clock in the morning, abreast of Marbella, on the coast of Spain, fourteen miles distant. The course of the Asturias, that is, the true course, at this time was north-east, and the course of the Nor was west by south half south. The speed that they were going at was about eight knots each. The nature of the damage which was inflicted was that the Nor struck with her stem and port bow the Asturias amidships on the starboard side, what would appear to be somewhat of a slanting blow. The distance is variously stated, but the Asturias says that she saw the red light of the Nor at a mile and a half distance, and the Nor says that she saw the white and the green light of the Asturias at between three and four miles distance. The state of the weather appears to have been cloudy, but on the whole fine. The judge of the court below found that the Asturias was alone to blame.

Now, these vessels were crossing vessels, and the rules applicable to them are: the 14th, "If two vessels under steam are crossing so as to involve risk of collision, the ship which has the other on her own starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other;" the 16th,—“Every steamship when approaching another ship so as to involve risk of collision shall slacken her speed or if necessary, stop and reverse;" and the 19th, which is always applied in these cases, which says, that "regard is to be had to special circumstances which may render it necessary not to obey the rule." Now, there is no doubt at all, nor has it been disputed for a moment, that it was the duty of the Asturias in these circumstances to keep out of the way of the Nor, and it was the duty of the Nor to keep her course.

It has been much argued before their Lordships that the judge miscarried in his sentence in the court below, mistaking the application of the rule which I have read, enjoining the vessel which has the other on her starboard hand to keep out of the way, by putting upon it a limited and rigid construction, that keeping out of the way must mean in all cases porting. But their Lordships are by no means inclined to put that construction on the learned judge's language. There is no doubt that he thought that in this particular case, and in these particular circumstances, porting was the right course, and he probably knew perfectly well that keeping out of the way might be by stopping, or by going ahead, or by starboarding, or by porting, or by going astern, as the circumstances of the case might require. The conclusion at which he did arrive was, that the circumstances of this case did require, and that skilful seamanship did require, that the getting out of the way should be effected by the porting and not by the starboarding of the helm.

Now, what happened was this, the Asturias says that she observed a red light three points on her starboard bow at about half a mile distance, and that she did nothing for a short time; that then she saw the white light, which she says was a very obscure light, when she was distant from her about three quarters of a mile; that then she starboarded, and that then in about a minute and a half from that time she hard astarboarded, and that the collision took place in the way in which I have mentioned.

The version of the story which was given by the Nor is to this effect, that she saw the masthead light and the green light of the Asturias approaching her about two points on her port bow and at a distance of from three or four miles; that she kept her course unaltered expecting that the steamer, the Asturias, would port her helm and show her red light, and that it was not until she saw the hull of the Asturias that she varied her course by porting, and that she went off under the influence of her port helm ten points. The Asturias says that she went off under the influence of her starboard helm four points.

Now, two questions have to be decided by their Lordships, as indeed they had to be decided by the court below—one is, did the Asturias adopt the right manœuvre for getting out of the way by starboarding as she did in this case? and the other is, did the Nor cause or did she contribute to the collision by porting? In the court below a great discussion took place upon the question whether the Nor did or did not carry proper lights; and after that question had been shifted and examined closely by the court below, it came to the conclusion that the Nor did carry proper lights, and that those lights ought to have been visible at the usual distance. Their Lordships see no reason whatever to differ from the conclusion at which the learned judge arrived on this point and the consequences of it in the application of the law to this case are not unimportant, because their Lordships are of opinion that the Asturias ought to have seen the white light when she saw the Nor's red light, and, indeed, before she saw the Nor's red light. It is an admitted fact in the case that she did not see the white light at all until she was within three quarters of a mile. In the first instance she did not see it at all, and the inevitable consequence appears to their Lordships to be that the Asturias could not have had a good look-out.

The next question which their Lordships have to consider is, when the Asturias saw the red light what is the course which she ought to have pursued? Their Lordships, after conference with the nautical gentlemen who have given their assistance to the court on this occasion, are of opinion that her duty was then to have slackened her speed and to have waited and ascertained the character of the vessel which was then approaching and the course which she was pursuing.

Another question upon which their Lordships have had the benefit of the advice of the nautical assessors is this—when the Asturias admits that she saw the white light of the Nor, that is, when she was three quarters of a mile and four minutes distance from her, did she or did she not execute a right manœuvre in starboarding and afterwards hard starboarding, or was it her duty to have ported? The nautical gentlemen by whom the court are assisted are most clearly of opinion that it was her duty at that time to have ported, and that she did not exercise a proper discretion in starboarding her helm, and by that means endeavouring to get out of the way of the Nor. Here I may mention that their Lordships are of opinion, under the same advice, that the Asturias' account of her starboarding cannot be correct; that if she has starboarded at the time she mentioned she would have gone off more than four points, probably eight points, and, therefore, that her version of the time when she executed the manœuvre of starboarding cannot be relied upon.

The next question which arises is this—was the Nor to blame, and did she contribute, in the legal sense of contributing, to the collision by doing what unquestionably she did do, namely, hard a-porting her helm so as to go off ten points? Now it is to be observed that the conduct of the Asturias had put the Nor into a great dilemma, and it would be in their Lordships' opinion a very harsh construction of the law to say that even if at this moment, of what may be called the agony of the collision, just before the collision, she had erred in porting, she would be liable for that mistake; and it is also to be observed that at the time when she ported, the Nor stopped and reversed simultaneously; but in fact their Lordships are of opinion that the Nor was well founded in thinking that she had a right to expect that even at that time the Asturias would port her helm, because in the opinion of their Lordships, assisted by that of the nautical gentlemen who attend upon this occasion, that would have been the proper manœuvre in the case. Their Lordships have further to observe that the Asturias ought not to have kept on at full speed after the time when she admits she saw the white light, but ought to have stopped and reversed.

For these reasons, without going into any detail of the evidence, which would be quite unnecessary at the present time, their Lordships are of opinion that the decision of the court below ought not to be disturbed but ought to be affirmed, namely, that the damage in this case was caused by the wrong navigation of the Asturias, and that what was done by the Nor in no way caused or contributed to this collision.

Their Lordships will therefore humbly advise Her Majesty to affirm the sentence of the court below with the usual costs.

Decree affirmed and appeal dismissed.

IONIDES v. PENDER.

Marine insurance—Excessive valuation—Concealment of material fact.

Though an assured is not bound to disclose everything which might influence the mind of an underwriter, he is bound to disclose all those facts which a rational insurer, governing himself by the principles and calculations commonly applied to policies and risks, would regard as bearing on those risks.

An excessive valuation of the subject matter of insurance is a fact which, as bearing on the risks insured against, ought to be disclosed to an underwriter by an assured, and the concealment of such a fact will vitiate a policy if its disclosure would have materially affected the mind of the underwriter in assuming the risk.

On the trial of an action against an underwriter, on policies of insurance on goods, valued to the extent of about double their real value, the jury found that the valuations were excessive, that it was material to the underwriter to know that they were excessive, that that fact had been concealed from the underwriter, but that there was not sufficient evidence to show that the excessive valuations were made with a fraudulent intent.

Held, that on these findings, the underwriter was entitled to the verdict entered for him on a plea alleging the concealment of a material fact.

DECLARATION on a policy of insurance dated the 1st May 1871, subscribed by the defendant at and from Hamburg to Wladiwostock, Victoria Bay, upon and in respect to goods carried in the Da Capo, beginning the said adventure from the loading of the said goods aboard the said ship, and continuing during her abode there until the said ship should be arrived at Wladiwostock, and until the said goods should be there discharged and safely landed, against perils of the seas, bartrary of the master and mariners, and of all other perils, losses and misfortunes, &c.; the subject matter of the insurance being valued at "900l. on commissions, goods valued 14,071l., said commissions valued at 1500l.," &c., &c., and the said ship, with the said goods on board thereof, sailed on the said voyage, and afterwards, whilst the said ship with the said goods on board thereof was proceeding on the said voyage, and during the continuance of the said risk, the said goods were, by the perils so insured against as aforesaid, wholly lost, and it became thereby wholly impossible to receive or earn commissions in respect thereof, and all conditions were fulfilled, &c.

Second count on a policy of insurance of same date, subscribed by the defendant at and from Hamburg aforesaid to Wladiwostock, Victoria Bay aforesaid, upon and in respect of goods carried in the said ship, the Da Capo, the subject matter of the insurance being "valued at 250*l.* as profits on charter valued thereat," and continuing the adventure, as in the first count mentioned, until the goods should be discharged and landed as in the first count mentioned, against like perils, losses and misfortunes as in the first count mentioned, &c.

Third count on a policy of insurance of same date, subscribed by the defendant, at and from Hamburg aforesaid, to Wladiwostock, Victoria Bay aforesaid, upon and in respect of goods carried in the said ship, the Da Capo, the subject matter of insurance being "valued at 1800*l.* on sundry goods as per annexed specification, valued at 3173*l.*," &c., &c.

Fourth count, that after the making of the said policy in the last count mentioned, it was declared and agreed by and between the plaintiffs as agents for the persons interested, and the defendant by indorsement on the said policy that the interests insured by the said policy should be 1800*l.* on certain goods specified in the said indorsement, carried in the said ship on the said voyage, that is to say, 222 casks of spirits valued at 2800*l.* instead of 1800*l.*, on goods as by the said annexed specification in the policy, and the last count mentioned, valued at 3173*l.* on the said ship on the said voyage, but that in all other respects the said policy should be, and remain as in the last count mentioned, &c.

Pleas, first, to all the counts of the declaration that the defendant did not become an insurer to the plaintiffs as alleged; secondly, that the said goods were not loaded on board the said ship, to be carried on the said voyage as alleged; thirdly, that the said ship did not set sail on the said insured voyage as alleged; fourthly, that the said goods were not lost by the perils insured against as alleged; fifthly, that the said policy was not made for the use and benefit, or on account of the person or persons interested as alleged; sixthly, that the said persons for whose benefit the said policy was made were not, nor were any, nor was either of them interested as alleged; seventhly, that the defendant was induced to become an insurer, and to subscribe the said policy by the fraud of those for whom and on whose account, and by whose directions the plaintiffs acted as agents in effecting the said policies as in the declaration mentioned; eighthly, that the said vessel when she set sail on the said insured voyage was not seaworthy for the same; ninthly, that the defendant was induced to effect the said insurance, and to subscribe the said policy by the wrongful and improper concealment by the plaintiffs and their agents from the defendant of certain material facts and information then known to the plaintiffs and their agents, and unknown to the defendant, and which ought to have been communicated to the defendant; tenthly, to the last count of the declaration, that it was not agreed and declared as therein alleged.

Replication joining issue on the several pleas.

The following were the particulars of fraud and concealment delivered by the defendant under the seventh and ninth pleas: First, that the subject matter of insurance was grossly and fraudulently overvalued by the assured; secondly, that at the time of making the insurance it was known to the assured that the Da Capo set sail without any intention of ever reaching her destination; thirdly, that at the said time the assured knew that the shipowner intended that the Da Capo should be scuttled and cast away on the voyage; fourthly, that at the time of making the said insurance it was known to the assured that other policies had been effected, and that others were about to be effected by themselves or other persons, upon interests alleged to be at risk upon the said ship and voyage, to amounts and upon valuations greatly in excess of the true value of the said alleged interests.

Under the eighth plea the following particulars were delivered—that the master of the Da Capo, when she set sail, intended to scuttle and cast away the ship upon the insured voyage, and to prevent the vessel ever reaching her destination.

The case came on for trial before Hannen, J. and a special jury, on the 1st July 1872, at the sittings in London after Trinity Term of that year. The material facts as proved in evidence, the questions put by the learned judge to the jury, and the findings of the jury thereon, are set forth in the judgment of the court infra (see ante, vol. 1, p. 432). On the findings the learned judge directed the verdict to be entered for the defendant. Subsequently a rule nisi was obtained on behalf of the plaintiff for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection, and that the verdict was against the weight of evidence.

Sir Henry James, Q.C., Watkin Williams, Q.C., and Lanyon showed cause against the rule, and went at considerable length through the facts as proved in evidence, as to excessive valuation, and the materiality of such a fact as bearing on the risks insured against. Then, as to whether the findings of the jury, stopping short of fraud on the part of the plaintiff in not communicating the fact of over valuation, would support the verdict entered for the defendant, it was contended that the findings were sufficient for that purpose. In Carter v. Boehm (3 Burr. 1910) Lord Mansfield, C.J., said: "Good faith forbids either party by concealing what he privately knows to draw the other into a bargain from his ignorance of that fact and his believing the contrary. But either party may be innocently silent as to grounds open to both to exercise their judgment upon, aliud est celare, aliud tacere, &c. This definition of concealment, restrained to the efficient motives and precise subject of any contract, will generally hold to make it void in favour of the party misled by his ignorance of the thing concealed." Arnould on Marine Insurance (vol. 1, 4th edit.), p. 511, thus states the rule on the subject: "It is the duty of the assured to communicate to the underwriter all the intelligence he has that may affect the mind of the underwriter as to either of the two following points: First, whether he will take the risk at all; secondly, at what premium he will take it." And Phillips (Law of Insurance, s. 531) says: "Concealment in insurance is where, in reference to a negotiation therefor, one party suppresses, or neglects to communicate to the other, a material fact which, if communicated, would tend directly to prevent the other from entering into the contract, or to induce him to demand terms more favourable to himself, and which is known or presumed to be so to the party not disclosing it, and is not known or presumed to be so to the other." And again (sect. 537), "It is sufficient to state here that generally, if either party, whether purposely or through negligence, mistake, inadvertence, or oversight, misrepresents a fact which he is bound to represent truly, or omits to communicate a fact which he is bound to communicate, the other is wholly or partially exonerated from the contract. The effect of a misrepresentation or concealment in discharging the underwriters does not seem to be merely on the ground of fraud, as has been usually laid down by writers on insurance, but also on the ground of a condition implied by the fact of entering into the contract, that there is no misrepresentation or concealment;" and, after referring to Duer's criticism of the phraseology of the books on this subject, and Mr Arnould's adherence to this application of the term, he goes on: "But I cannot think that this anomalous use of the term is justifiable on this ground, since ambiguous phraseology is not to be tolerated in any science, and least of all in that of law, where it can possibly be avoided, as it may easily be in this case, by stating the practical doctrine in direct terms, namely, that it is an implied condition of the contract of insurance, that it is free from misrepresentation or concealment, whether fraudulent or through mistake. This implied condition involves no more difficulty than that of seaworthiness or any other implied warranty. And if insurance is thereby distinguished from other contracts, which I apprehend it is not entirely, this peculiarity is not, that I can perceive, of great weight, certainly not enough to excuse an anomalous application of the technical term 'fraud' and 'fraudulent' to many of the misrepresentations and concealments whereby a policy of insurance has been held to be defeated." Kent (3 Com. 282) lays down the rule now contended for in equally clear language: "A positive misrepresentation to the underwriter, or concealment of a fact material in relation to the risk, or material in the mind and judgment of the insurer, will avoid the policy. It will avoid it though the loss arose from a cause unconnected with the misrepresentation, or even though the misrepresentation or concealment happened through mistake, neglect or accident, without any fraudulent intention. . . . The special facts upon which the contingent chance is to be computed usually lie in the knowledge of the insured only, and the underwriter trusts to his representation and proceeds upon the confidence that he does not withhold any facts material to the estimate of the risk. The suppression of any such facts, whether by design or mistake or negligence equally renders the policy void, for the risk run becomes different from the one assumed in the policy." And again: "If the misrepresentation was by fraudulent design, it avoids the policy without staying to inquire into its materiality; or if it was caused by mistake or oversight, it does not effect the policy, unless it was material, and not true in substance; and in that case it will vitiate the policy without assuming the ground of fraud, for it is not the contract the party undertook to make. If the representation of the policy insured greatly overrate the value, it will avoid the policy, whether the representation be through ignorance or design." A similar definition of concealment is given by Tindal, C.J., in Elton v. Larkins (5 C. & P. 392): "A material concealment is a concealment of facts, which, if communicated to the party who underwrites, would induce him either to refuse the insurance altogether, and not to effect it except at a larger premium than the ordinary premium." Parsons (on Insurance, vol. 1, p. 494) states the law relating to the present question thus: "While all material intelligence and even rumours and reports must be communicated, the line must be drawn somewhere between these and mere conjectures, suspicions or possibilities. Outside of such facts as any reasonable insurer would take into consideration, lies a large class of those which some might deem material, and others not. There may be those which would very generally be disregarded, but which a timid or fanciful insurer would think worth notice. In some cases this line of distinction is drawn. In such cases the test of materiality, which is the question whether the insurer under that policy would have regarded those facts in making the policy? should perhaps in justice to both parties have been modified into this form—would a rational insurer, governing himself by the principles and calculations commonly applied to policies and risks have regarded these facts as bearing on these risks?" Duer (on Marine Insurance, vol. 2, p. 386) says: "The parties do not deal upon equal terms unless they have an equal knowledge of the facts and circumstances from which the risks arise, or by which they may be affected; and to produce this equality, the obligation of a full disclosure must of necessity be imposed. Without such a disclosure the parties have not the same knowledge of the subject of the contract." This might be expressed even more strongly—that in such a case there is not an identity in the subject matter of the contract.

IONIDES v. PENDER.

An over-valuation, coupled with over-insurance is most material to the risk which the underwriter takes on himself. It will be contended for the plaintiff that an over-valuation, however excessive, if honest, and done without any fraudulent intent, does not affect the policy, and is not material to the risk, even though the excessive over-valuation is coupled with a corresponding over-insurance. But it is most material to the risk which the underwriter takes upon himself as diminishing the inducement to save the goods in case of danger, and indeed offering a temptation to the insured to neglect using their best endeavours for that purpose. Again it is material on this ground: it is an implied condition in every policy, where nothing is expressed to the contrary, that it is a contract of indemnity—of indemnity against loss of a real interest. If then the assured knowingly makes an extraordinary excessive valuation of the goods insured, is he not obtaining what is in reality a wager policy? [BLACKBURN, J.—He is making evidence of fraud against himself; but the jury here have negatived the instance of fraud.] At any rate, the underwriter is entitled to assume that the valuation is within reasonable limits. Barker v. Janson (17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 473; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 303) was referred to. In that case the over-valuation was in all respects made bonâ fide. In Murgatroyd v. Crawford (3 Dall, 495), Shippen, J., said, "If in the opinion of the jury a knowledge of the circumstances that were suppressed, would have induced the insurer to demand a higher premium, or to refuse altogether to underwrite, it will be sufficient, on commercial principles, to invalidate the policy." [BLACKBURN, J.—That proposition must be qualified in the manner in which Mr. Parsons puts it. The objection must not be a fanciful one on the part of the underwriter; but the facts concealed must have been such as "a rational insurer, governing himself by the principles and calculations commonly applied to policies and risks, would have regarded as bearing on those risks."] The jury in the present case have found that the facts concealed were material to the risk. In New York Bowery Fire Insurance Company v. New York Fire Insurance Company (17 Wend. 359), the judge charged the jury that they should give a verdict for the defendants if they were of opinion that information was wilfully withheld of the fact that the plaintiff had been insured and twice burnt out, and that he was in bad repute at the offices. The jury having returned a verdict for the plaintiffs, a venire de novo was ordered, the court saying, "This question was not properly submitted to the jury. They were instructed in effect, that although they should think the information material, they must still find for the plaintiffs unless they should think it was intentionally withheld. There was no ground for submitting such a question to the jury. It was not raised by the evidence. And, besides, if the facts communicated by Thorne were material, it is enough that they were withheld by Merchant on applying for re-insurance. Whether the omission was the result of mistake or design was not an important inquiry. The assured acts at his peril in withholding information." In Richards v. Murdock (10 B. & C. 527), one of the circumstances in the case, the suppression of which was deemed by the Court of King's Bench to be material, was that the owner of the goods insured had directed his agents in London not to make the insurance until thirty days after the arrival in London of the letter containing the order to insure, the court being of opinion that the concealment was fatal, because the fact of so long a delay after the arrival of the letter before the insurance was effected would surely "have influenced the mind of the underwriter in deciding upon what terms he would accept the risks." Lord Tenterden, C.J. said: "At the trial several witnesses were examined, who stated that they thought the letter material; but it has been contended that no such evidence ought to have been received. I know not how the materiality of any matter is to be ascertained but by the evidence of persons conversant with the subject-matter of the inquiry. If such evidence is rejected the court and jury must decide the point according to their own judgment unassisted by that of others. If they are to decide, all the court agree in thinking that the latter was material, and ought to have been communicated, and that a jury would have been bound to come to that conclusion." They have come to that conclusion as to the concealment of the over-valuation in the present case, though they have stopped short of finding the existence of actual fraud.

IONIDES v. PENDER.

The next question will be whether the jury, under the circumstances of the case, ought not to have found that fraud actually existed. [BLACKBURN, J.—We think it would be better, before entering on this question, to hear the arguments of the other side on the former question, and to determine that first.]

Butt, Q.C., and F. M. White (with them Sir J. B. Karstlake, Q.C.) in support of the rule, commented at length upon the evidence and contended that there was ample evidence to show that the plaintiff might reasonably have expected, under the circumstances, to make profits sufficient to justify his insuring the goods at the valuation actually made, so that there was, in reality, no excessive valuation at all. The valuation cannot be said to be excessive unless it is shown that the anticipated profits could not possibly be received. There is no reason why a man should not insure to the amount of the profits which he might reasonably expect to make. Unless the matter concealed goes to one of the risks covered by the policy, the concealment does not vitiate the policy. It has been frequently held that mere over-valuation of the goods insured does not invalidate the policy; the over-valuation must be extravagantly great which could have such an effect. In fact it would be impossible to draw the line between over-valuation which would, and over-valuation which would not avoid a policy. It may be said that it is a mere question of materiality and that materiality is a question for the jury; but there are some things which it is not for the jury to determine, and this, it is submitted, is one of them.

The argument on the law of the matter which we would urge on behalf of the plaintiff is summed up in 2 Duer, 518, et seq. (Note iii): "If the definition of a concealment that alone has the effect of avoiding the policy, which was given by Lord Mansfield in Carter v. Boehm (ubi sup.) is admitted to be just, it is a necessary consequence that the obligation of the assured is limited to the communication of those facts which are connected with the real nature of the risks. His Lordship said that the concealment 'must be fraudulent, if designed, or, if not designed, must vary materially the object of the policy, and change the risk understood to be run.' It is the risk itself that the concealment must change, not the mere opinion of the underwriter, as to the prudence of assuming it. In Haywood v. Rodgers (4 East, 590) Lord Ellenborough adopted this construction of the language of Lord Mansfield, and it was partly upon this construction that the judgment of the court in that case was founded. The assured had received a letter from the captain, stating that the ship insured, on account of her bad character, had undergone a survey in the West Indies; but that the result of the survey had proved that she was in a good condition to perform the voyage. It appeared, on the trial, that the vessel was in fact seaworthy; but it was insisted that as the letter from the captain was not disclosed to the underwriter, the concealment was fatal, on the ground that a knowledge of the contents of the letter would certainly have enhanced the premium. The judge on the trial adopted and expressed this opinion; but the jury, in opposition to his charge, found a verdict for the plaintiff, and this verdict the Court of King's Bench refused to set aside." That it is not the duty of the assured to communicate everything which might vary the opinion of the underwriters, was clearly stated by Lord Ellenborough in this case. He said: "Is it then to be laid down as a principle that every fact known to the assured, with respect to the condition, quality, and circumstances of the ship, prior to the period of effecting the insurance, which may possibly guide the judgment of the underwriter in undertaking or refusing to undertake the insurance, is to be communicated to him? It certainly would have some weight in guiding the judgment of the underwriter on such a subject to know how old the ship was, where she was built, whether originally British or foreign, what was the form of her construction, &c. But the question is, is it the duty of the assured in the first instance, and as a condition precedent on his part, to inform the underwriter of all these circumstances to the extent of his, the assured's own actual knowledge on the subject? If it be, and it never yet has been, either in theory or in practice assumed to be the case, the assured must before he effects the insurance, collect from all his documents all the materials for the history of his ship from the moment of her being launched down to that of subscribing the policy." Duer says (p. 521) that the observations of Lord Ellenborough were intended "to lay down the general rule that facts not varying the risks, are not requisite to be disclosed, however they might vary the opinion of the underwriter; and I conceive that the very doctrine of Lord Mansfield implies, or more properly is founded on, the same rule, differently expressed, viz., that only those circumstances are necessary to be disclosed that bear a relation to the risks that are, in fact, assumed." In Beckwith v. Sidebotham (1 Camp. 116), Lord Ellenborough decided that the owner of the ship insured was not bound to communicate to the underwriter a letter which he had received from the captain, stating that the vessel would probably be detained in her port of departure a considerable time for the purpose of necessary repairs. The only case which Duer says (p. 522) that he has discovered in the English reports in which the omission to disclose facts apparently not bearing on the actual risks, has been held to be a material concealment, upon the ground that the disclosure would probably have varied the decision of the underwriter, is that of Rickards v. Murdock (ubi sup.). On this case he remarks: "It is, however, to be observed that the suppressed part of the letter was not merely important as showing the fears of the writer. Had the time of the arrival of the letter been known (as it would have been had the whole letter been communicated), it would also have been known that it had arrived by a ship which, having sailed about the same time as the ship insured, had been nearly forty days in port; circumstances plainly material to the risk, and which I am persuaded furnish the true explanation of the decision. Certainly the Court of King's Bench, and Lord Tenterden as their organ, never meant to decide that where the assured communicates all the facts that have a bearing on the risks, he is bound also to disclose his own speculations and fears concerning the event, because the disclosure may influence the decision of the underwriter."

The state of the existing law is thus summed up by Duer: "In the United States, as in England, the judges in many cases have expressed themselves in general terms that, taken literally, imply that the only test of the materiality of a concealment is the probable influence of the facts, if disclosed, upon the mind of the underwriter; but in every decided case that I have examined, in which the concealment has been held to discharge the underwriter, the facts concealed were material to the risks, in the strict and proper sense of the terms. The question, therefore, whether facts extrinsic to the risks, which it is yet highly probable would influence the mind of the underwriter, are for that reason to be deemed material, and therefore necessary to be disclosed, has never become a subject of distinct consideration. . . . As an additional proof that no such rule exists, it may be added that the law is well settled that, where the assured discloses all the facts that are known to him and all the information that he has received, he is not bound to communicate the conclusions of his own mind from the facts disclosed—the fears or the hopes they may suggest. Yet were it known to the underwriter that the opinion entertained of the risk by the assured was more unfavourable than his own, he would be certain to demand a higher premium; he would demand as high a premium as the fears of the interested party would, probably, induce him to pay." [LUSH, J.—It is certainly a very startling proposition that if you have reason to believe that a ship is going to be scuttled, you may put your goods on board of it and get them insured, keeping back from the underwriter the reasons for your belief.] Clason v. Smith (3 Wash. C. C. R. 156), and Ruggles v. Gen. Int. Ins. Co. (4 Mason, 74), were referred to. It is submitted, in conclusion, that the assured was not bound to communicate to the underwriter the fact and the extent of over-valuation. Cur. adv. vult.

May 27.—The judgment of the court (Blackburn, Lush, and Archibald, JJ.) was now delivered, as follows by BLACKBURN, J.—This was an action on three policies of insurance by the ship Da Capo, on a voyage to Wladiwostock, all dated on 1st May 1871. The first was on commissions on goods valued at 14,700*l.*, the commissions being valued at 1500*l.* The second was on profits on charter, valued at 230*l.* The third had originally been on goods, but by an indorsement on the policy it had become on 222 casks of spirits, valued at 2800*l.* The material pleas were that the ship was not lost by the perils insured against, and that there had been a concealment of a material fact. Particulars were given of this last plea. The one on which the question before us turns was that the insured knew and concealed from the defendant that insurances were made by him, and others in concert with him, on interests alleged to be at risk in the vessel on values greatly exceeding the actual value of those interests.

The case came on to be tried before my brother Hannen. (a) It appeared in evidence that Wladiwostock is a harbour south of what, in 1870, was the customs' line of Russia. It was intended by the Russian Government to bring their customs' line lower down, so as to include Wladiwostock within it; and this was, in fact, done in Feb., 1871. Richard Dieckman was the person interested in these policies. He gave, in substance, this account of the transaction: Having learned that this change was in contemplation, and believing it would make shipments to Wladiwostock very profitable, he entered into a speculation with one Wencke, by which Wencke was to purchase a ship and charter her to Dieckman, who was to procure the goods he considered suitable to the market, put them on board, and travel overland to Wladiwostock, where he would meet them and sell them. The Da Capo was accordingly bought by Wencke, through the instrumentality of Dieckman. Dieckman found some persons willing to send out some goods on this adventure. Those persons insured their goods for 1080*l.* The freight on those goods was fixed by bill of lading at a higher rate than the charter freight. This formed the subject of the policy on profits on charter. No evidence was given as to the value of the goods thus insured for 1080*l.*, which, therefore, it may be taken, were fairly valued. Dieckman not being able for want of funds to fill up the whole vessel, Wencke purchased goods similar to those purchased by Dieckman, and filled up the vessel with them. These were to be sold by Dieckman. Under these circumstances Dieckman and Wencke employed brokers at Hamburg to procure insurance, and those Hamburg brokers employed the plaintiffs on the record, Ionides and Chapeaurouge, brokers in London, to procure insurance there. A slip was made out by Ionides and Chapeaurouge on the 29th March 1871 for insurance of 8000*l.* on commission, and goods per Da Capo to Wladiwostock. After making inquiries about the port, which was quite unknown, various underwriters, including the representative of the defendant, initialed this slip at 3½ per cent. Nothing appeared on the face of this slip as to any future declaration or valuation of the subject matter of the insurance; but, from the conduct of all parties, it must have been understood that the interest was to be subsequently declared and valued. The Hamburg broker, towards the end of April, forwarded to Ionides and Chapeaurouge a paper in German declaring the interest to be on spirits with anticipated profit, however high or low, and on other goods, with anticipated profit, at 25 per cent. This valuation was certainly seen by the manager of the North China Company, whose name was on the slip before that of the defendant's representative, for he had initialed it. He stated, however, that he did not understand German, and was not aware what was in it. Whether it was ever seen by the defendant's representative or not was left in doubt; but in summing up the learned judge treated the case as if it had been seen by him also. The policies were then made out and signed. The vessel sailed on the 1st May, and on the 18th May sunk at sea under circumstances making it very difficult to understand how she came to sink unless she was purposely scuttled. It appeared that Wencke had insured the ship and freight at a fair value, but that he and Dieckman had here and abroad insured the goods which they had put on board at values very considerably above their cost price. The price, including costs, charges, and insurance, amounted in the whole to something less than 8000*l.*; the various insurances on the goods, including profits, amounted to about 14,000*l.*, and in addition to these there was the insurance on commissions of 1500*l.*, and a further insurance of 1000*l.* on safe arrival, so that the assured stood to receive a very large profit if their venture was lost. This was used as an argument to induce the jury to draw the inference that the vessel was purposely scuttled by the captain in complicity with the assured; but, besides this, the defendant contended that these high valuations ought to have been disclosed by the assured. The highest valuation was that of the spirits. It appeared in the evidence that the costs, charges, and insurance of the 222 casks of spirits amounted to 973*l.*, and for insurance they were valued at 2800*l.* Dieckman, in his evidence, justified this high valuation by saying that spirits were a very profitable article, and also that he hoped and expected that his spirits would arrive when they could be imported duty free, and that a very heavy Russian duty was about to be imposed immediately afterwards, which would have the effect of raising the value of his spirits to the level of duty paid spirits. The defendant called underwriters, who gave evidence, without any objection being made, that it was material to underwriters to know the extent of the over valuation when it was to such an extent as appeared in this case. They also stated in effect that where the valuation was excessive, the risk was considered a speculative risk, which one class of underwriters would not take at all, and another class would take, but only if a sufficient premium was offered; that 25 per cent. added was not unusual, and that in one case 30 per cent. had been taken by the first class; that beyond this it would be a speculative risk.

On this evidence my brother Hannen proposed to ask the jury seven questions: First, whether the goods were really put on board? Secondly, were the valuations for insurance excessive? Thirdly, if excessive were they so made with a fraudulent intent? Fourthly, whether fraudulent or not was it material to the underwriter to know that the valuation was excessive? Fifthly, was it concealed from the underwriter? Sixthly, was the vessel lost by perils insured against? Lastly, did the assured know or intend that the vessel should be cast away? The counsel for the defendant admitted that the first question must be answered in favour of the plaintiffs. The other six questions were asked of the jury who answered, that the valuations were excessive; that there was not sufficient evidence to show whether they were made with fraudulent intent; but that whether fraudulent or not it was material to the underwriter to know that they were excessive, and that that was concealed; that the vessel was not lost by the perils insured against, but that they had not sufficient evidence to show whether the assured knew or intended that the vessel should be cast away. Some attempts were made to get the jury to express a further opinion on the mode in which the vessel was lost, without success. The verdict was then entered for the defendant on these findings.

In the ensuing term Mr Butt obtained a rule nisi for a new trial, on the grounds of misdirection, as to the concealment, and against evidence. Delays and difficulties came in the way of hearing the argument, but in the three days next after last Term it came on before my brothers Lush, Archibald, and myself. We desired the counsel for the present to confine themselves to the question whether there was any ground for disturbing the verdict on the plea of concealment, supposing the plea had stood alone, or the jury had been discharged on the other issue, leaving it for further discussion, whether that would finally dispose of the rule.

We have come to the conclusion that there is no ground for disturbing the verdict on this issue. My brother Hannen, in summing up, pointed out to the jury that a valuation of goods for the purpose of insurance might fairly and properly be made, taking into account not only the original costs of the goods, but adding an estimate of the anticipated profits of the goods arrived at their destination; and that opinions might vary as to the profit to be made on a particular venture. He advised them not to find the valuation excessive unless they thought the goods were valued with an addition of profit greater than could be expected to be realised under any circumstances which could be reasonably contemplated. This may, perhaps, be too favourable to the assured, as it makes the question whether there is an excessive valuation or not depend on whether the valuation was so high as to amount, in part at least, to a wager; but no objection on that ground can be taken by the plaintiffs. And we think that the evidence here was such as to justify the jury in finding that the valuation of the spirits, at least, was excessive according to this definition; and this finding cannot be considered as against the weight of evidence. The finding that the excessive valuation was concealed from the underwriters was impugned on the ground that the statement in the German valuation, that the spirits were valued with anticipated or imaginary profits, be the same high or low, amounted to a disclosure that the valuation was excessive. As to this, my brother Hannen told the jury, and we think quite rightly, that, in the absence of some active deception, the assured had a right to suppose that an underwriter read and understood the documents laid before him, and that if he did not understand the language in which they were written he would ask for a translation; and he assumed, in his summing up, that the defendant's representative had independent notice that the valuation contained the words, "profits however high." This we have not found in the notes of the evidence, but it probably was so. But then he asked the jury to consider whether that was a disclosure that there was an excessive valuation in the sense which he had previously explained to them, of an estimate of profits formed with knowledge that it had no foundation. The jury must be taken to have found that it was no disclosure, and we cannot say that they were wrong. The finding of the jury that the concealment was material was impeached, both on the ground that it was against evidence, and that of misdirection, as it was contended that the judge ought to have told the jury that the fact of an excessive valuation was not one which the assured was bound to disclose.

It is perfectly well established that the law as to a contract of insurance differs from that as to other contracts, and that a concealment of a material fact, though made without any fraudulent intention, vitiates the policy. In Duer on Insurance, vol. 2, p. 388, it is said: "The terms in which the general rule is usually stated are, that it is the duty of the assured to communicate all facts that are material to the risks, and which are not known or presumed to be known to the underwriter; but these terms are ambiguous, and the first and necessary inquiry is by what criterion the materiality of the facts alleged to have been concealed is proper to be determined. Is the obligation of a disclosure limited to the facts that are material to the risks, considered in their own nature? or does it extend to all that may be deemed material by the insurer, and would probably influence his ultimate decision?" He admits that a knowingly false representation of a matter which, though extraneous to the risks, may affect the judgment of the underwriter, will vitiate, and that the case of Sibbald v. Hill (2 Dow. 263), is an express decision of the House of Lords to that effect. But he lays it down as being the most reasonable opinion that those facts only are necessary to be disclosed which are material to the risks in their own nature, and a prudent and experienced underwriter would deem it proper to consider. The case and proofs in support of his decision are collected at Duer, p. 518, et seq.

It was argued before us that the nature of the risk—i.e., the strength and seaworthy qualities of the Da Capo, and the probability of encountering storms on the voyage, and so forth, were not in the least affected by the amount at which the goods were valued, which is no doubt true. The underwriter is not answerable for any loss occasioned by fraud of the assured, and it was argued that, therefore, the objection which an underwriter might have to take a risk on account of the temptation which the assured might have to make away with the venture, ought not to be taken into account. Whether Duer would have gone so far as this is not clear; but if he would, the courts in America have refused to follow him; (New York Bowers Fire Insurance Company v. New York Fire Insurance Company, 17 Wend. 359). In that case the plaintiffs had insured certain property against fire, and the president of the company heard that the person insuring with them, or at least some one of the same name, had been so unlucky as to have had several fires, in each of which he was heavily insured. The plaintiffs reinsured with the defendants, but did not inform them of this. A fire did take place; the insured came upon the plaintiffs, who came upon the defendants. The judge directed the jury that if this information given to the president of the plaintiffs was intentionally kept back, it would vitiate the policy of reinsurance. The jury found for the plaintiffs, but the court on appeal directed a new trial, on the ground that the concealment was of a material fact, and, whether intentional or not, it vitiated the insurance. It is to be observed that the excessive valuation not only may lead to suspicion of foul play, but that it has a direct tendency to make the assured less careful in selecting the ship and captain, and so diminish the efforts which in case of disaster he ought to make to diminish the loss as far as possible, and cannot, therefore, properly be called altogether extraneous to the risks; but we would scarcely base our judgment on so special a ground. We agree that it would be too much to put on the assured the duty of disclosing everything which might influence the mind of an underwriter. Business could hardly be carried on if this was required. But the rule laid down in Parsons on Insurance (vol. 1, p. 495), that all should be disclosed which would affect the judgment of a rational underwriter governing himself by the principles and considerations on which underwriters do in practice act, seems to us a sound one. We do not think any of the cases cited by Duer are in contravention of it; and, applying it to the present case, there was distinct and uncontradicted evidence that underwriters do in practice act on the principle that it is material to take into consideration whether the overvaluation is so great as to make the risk speculative. It appears to us a rational practice.

We think, therefore, that the judge could not do otherwise than leave this question to the jury, and that their verdict was not against the weight of evidence, and should not be disturbed. It will be for the counsel on both sides to consider what course they will take as to the rest of the rule.

DE WOLF v. ARCHANGEL MARITIME BANK AND INSURANCE COMPANY.

Marine insurance—Policy on a ship “at and from” a port—Alteration of risk by delay in the commencement of the voyage.

Where a policy of marine insurance is entered into insuring a ship or goods thereon “at and from a port,” there is, in the absence of a direct representation, an implied understanding that the vessel shall be at that port within such a time, that the risk shall not be materially varied; otherwise the risk does not attach.

An insurance was effected on the 13th July on a ship for a voyage, “at and from Montreal to Montevideo.” No information was given by the assured, and no question was asked by the underwriters, as to where the ship was at the date of the policy. She did not actually arrive at Montreal until the 30th Aug. The jury found that the delay materially increased the risk:

Held, that it was immaterial whether or not that delay was caused by badness of weather or other causes beyond the control of the assured; that, in the absence of a representation on a policy at and from a port, it is an implied understanding that the vessel shall be there within such a time that the risk shall not be materially varied; and that otherwise the risk does not attach.

THIS was an action upon a policy of insurance against the defendants, an insurance company, to recover 2*l.* 13*s.* 2*d.* for general average and loss of freight. The insurance was an insurance (lost or not lost) at and from Montreal to Montevideo ^{and} ^{or} Buenos Ayres, and was upon chartered freight in the ship called the Florence Chipman. The premium was at the rate of 2*l.* per cent. The fourth plea stated that at the time of the making of the policy the said ship was not, nor did the said ship within a reasonable time thereafter, arrive at Montreal, and great and unreasonable delay occurred before the said ship arrived at Montreal, being a delay which was material to the risk of the said policy, and by reason thereof the said policy, at the commencement of the said risk, had not attached. The cause was tried in the Lord Mayor's Court, before the Common Serjeant. It appeared that nothing had been said at the time when the policy was made as to where the ship then was. The ship did not actually arrive at Montreal until the 30th Aug., seven weeks after the date of the policy. Evidence was given on behalf of the plaintiffs that the delay had arisen from bad weather and other reasonable causes. The Common Serjeant directed the jury that “It is immaterial whether the delay was excused. I hold the question is—Were the defendants ever liable on this policy? The question is whether the seven weeks' delay affected the risk, and the evidence of the underwriters is that the premium would be increased. The question is not affected by the consideration whether the delay was avoidable. It does not matter whether the delay was anyone's fault.” The jury found that the delay did vary the risk, and a verdict was entered for the defendants. Leave was obtained on behalf of the plaintiffs to move for a new trial if the court should disagree with the direction to the jury, that “if from any cause, avoidable or unavoidable, a delay occurred in the arrival of the vessel at the port of departure, which increased the risk, the policy never attached.” A rule was obtained in pursuance of the leave reserved.

C. Bowen for the defendants, now showed cause.—This case is governed by Hull v. Cooper (14 East. 479), where Lord Ellenborough said, “When a broker proposes a policy to an underwriter on a ship, at and from a certain place, it imports either that the ship is there at the time, or shortly will be there; for if she is only to be there at a distant period, that might materially increase the risk.” The cases that may be cited on the other side are to be distinguished upon the ground that in all of them the delay took place after the policy attached. Here the policy never attached at all Hull v. Cooper has been doubted as to the question whether the jury were right that the delay varied the risk, but not as to the correctness of Lord Ellenborough's dictum. It has been accepted in the case of Mount v. Larkins (8 Bing. 108), though it was there incorrectly stated that Hull v. Cooper turned upon the point of concealment; see also the judgment of Parke, B. in Small v. Gibson (16 Q. B. 141), and see Maude and Pollock, 3rd edit., p. 355, and Duer., vol. 2, 489. [BLACKBURN, J. also referred to Phillips on Insurance, sects. 618 and 690.] The reason of the thing is on my side. The underwriter takes the chance of what happens within the scope of the policy, but is in no way liable for what occurs before the policy attaches; he undertakes a risk of a particular kind: if the risk is of a different kind he does not undertake it at all. Here the defendants accepted a premium as for a summer voyage, the voyage did not in fact commence until the summer was over, and the jury found that the risk was materially increased, consequently the policy never attached.

Benjamin, Q. C. and Aspland for the plaintiffs.—If the contention of the defendants is right, no shipowner can insure a vessel on a homeward voyage without giving a warranty that the vessel shall complete her outward voyage within a certain time. But such a warranty cannot be implied in the words “at and from,” which is merely a description of the voyage, and not a statement that the vessel is already at the port. Such a warranty must be expressed, and cannot be implied. The underwriters may, and in fact, often do, exact such a warranty; it is their duty to ask for any information they may require: (see cases cited in Arnould, 554, et seq., and also Beckwith v. Sydebotham (1 Camp. 116). The defendants were aware that the vessel was under charter for her outward voyage, and if they had chosen to look at the charter-party they would have seen when she was likely to arrive at Montreal. Hull v. Cooper is not an authority in this case; it turned entirely upon the question of concealment, the vessel being actually at the date of the policy in the Thames, whereas from the terms the underwriters might have presumed that she was already at Heligoland. The language of the court in Mount v. Larkins is also in our favour, though the actual point, was not decided: see Vallance v. Dewar, 1 Camp. 503, and Ongier v. Jennings, reported in a note to that case; also Grant v. King, 4 Esp. 175; Phillips v. Irving, 7 M. & G. 325, where Tindal, C.J. said: "It may be collected from numerous cases, that delay before or after the commencement of a voyage insured is not equivalent to a deviation, unless it be unreasonable." Cur. adv. vult.

June 8.—The judgment of the court (Cockburn, C. J., Blackburn and Lush, J. J.) was delivered by BLACKBURN, J.: This was an action tried in the Mayor's Court, before the Common Serjeant. The action was on a voyage policy, on ship "at and from Montreal to Monte Video." The fourth plea, on which alone the question before us arises, was that the ship was not at Montreal within a reasonable time, being a delay materially varying the risk.

The facts as to this case were that the policy was effected on the 13th July, at a premium of 2 per cent. No question was asked by the underwriters as to where the ship then was, and no information was offered by the assured; but, in fact, she was then at sea, on a voyage intended to end at Montreal. She did not arrive at Montreal till the 30th August. Evidence was given that the delay in the arrival at Montreal changed the voyage from a summer one to a winter one, which materially affected the risk and the rate of premium. Evidence was offered on the part of the plaintiffs that the delay in arriving at Montreal was not voluntary on their part, but was occasioned by perils of the seas on the voyage out to Montreal. The Common Serjeant rejected this evidence, giving leave to the plaintiff to move in this court for a new trial on this ground. The case was then left to the jury, who found that the delay was unreasonable, and that the risk was thereby materially changed. A rule nisi was obtained for a new trial, which was argued in last term before my Lord, my brother Lush, and myself, when the court took time to consider.

As the evidence was rejected, we must consider the case as if it had been received and had established what it was offered to prove, and as if the jury had found, not only as they have done, that there was unreasonable delay between the making of the policy and the commencement of the risk intended to be insured against, materially altering that risk, but also that the delay was occasioned by matters beyond the control of the assured. And then we have to determine whether that would be a defence or not. Nothing would seem easier than for the parties making a policy to insert a few words preventing all possibility of dispute on such a point. If the insurance had been in this case at 5 per cent. to return 3 per cent. if the ship was at Montreal on or before some named day, there would have been no question but that the underwriters would in this case have been liable and the assured would not have had to pay the winter premium unless the underwriter ran the winter risk. If the underwriters had inserted "warranted to be at Montreal on or before" some named day, there can be no doubt that the risk would not have attached, and in either case by naming a fixed day the controversy as to when the risk became varied would be avoided. But we are informed that in practice there are great if not insuperable difficulties in the way of introducing unusual clauses into policies, and that brokers prefer the risk of causing litigation at the expense of their customers to the risk of frightening away custom by proposing something unusual. We must anticipate that policies will continue to be made as this has been, and the question before us is therefore one of considerable importance.

It is quite clear that the words "at and from a particular place," do not import either a warranty or a representation that the vessel at the time of making the policy is already at the place. In Hull v. Cooper (14 East, 479), decided in 1811, the case was one of an insurance on goods "at and from Heligoland to a port in the Baltic." At the time when the policy was effected, the 13th Aug., the ship was in the Thames, which fact was known to the assured and not communicated. She did not sail from the Thames till 27th Aug., a fortnight later, which latter fact could not have been known to the assured at the time of making the policy, as it had not then happened. The plaintiff having obtained a verdict, a motion for a new trial was refused. It appears from the report as if the counsel who moved treated the case entirely as one of concealment, and not as one of a change of risk, but Lord Ellenborough in his judgment separates the two questions. He says: "When a broker proposes a policy to an underwriter on a ship at and from a certain place, it imports either that the ship is there at the time or shortly will be there, for if she is only to be there at a distant period, that might materially increase the risk. But it had never been understood that the terms of such a policy necessarily imported that the ship was at the place at the very time, so as to make the assured guilty of deception if she were not." So far he is dealing with the non-disclosure of the fact that the ship was in the Thames on the 13th Aug. He then proceeds: "It was a question for the jury whether the intervening period materially varied the risk in this instance, the interval being from the 13th to the 27th Aug., with the additional days which elapsed from the sailing till she reached Heligoland; and the jury were not persuaded that the risk was thereby varied and found for the plaintiff." And Bayley, J., says, "It is a question for the jury whether the delay in reaching Heligoland for so many days after the policy was effected materially varied the risk." The affirmative decision here is that a delay not varying the risk does not discharge the underwriter, but the opinion is expressed that a delay materially varying the risk does discharge the underwriter, though that was not the very point decided. In Driscoll v. Passmore (1 B. & P. 200) in 1798, where an analogous question arose and the plaintiff recovered, it was stated in the report "that it was in evidence that the difference of season arising from this delay did not vary the risk," Brine v. Featherstone (4 Taunt. 869) came before the court on a rule to enter the verdict on a point reserved at the trial, and the court in banc had not to consider whether the delay was such as to discharge the underwriters. The facts, as stated in the report appear to be such as would have afforded evidence that the delay was such as to vary the risk, but if that defence was raised at Nisi Prius, which does not appear to have been the case, there may have been some other evidence not stated in the report which justifies the finding of the jury. Neither of those cases can, as we think, be considered in conflict with Hull v. Cooper.

The case, however, that comes nearest to the present is that of Mount v. Larkins (8 Bing. 108). In that case the facts were found in a special verdict, a part of which only is set forth in the report. The policy was on the ship Aquila, at and from Singapore and Batavia, both or either, to the ship's port of discharge in Europe. In the report it is said that it was found that the policy was entered into on the 28th Feb. 1824, that the ship sailed from England in the beginning of September 1823, on a voyage to the Cape of Good Hope, Van Diemens Land, and Sidney, and thence to Singapore. It is not stated in the report that it was known to the underwriters that she was bound on this preliminary voyage, but it is scarcely possible that it should be otherwise, and in the judgment of the court it is assumed throughout that it was known to them. The jury found that there was "unreasonable and unjustifiable delay between the making of the said policy of assurance and the commencement of the risk intended to be insured against." On this the Court of Common Pleas decided in favour of the defendants, saying, "We must intend that the risk was in fact varied, and consequently the underwriters discharged." This would be precisely in point were it not that it was there expressly found that the delay was unjustifiable, and that in the present case the plaintiffs have not been allowed to give evidence to show that the delay was not from any fault of theirs. The ground on which the judgment delivered by Tindal, C.J., in Mount v. Larkins, is based, is that "the underwriter has as much right to calculate the outward voyage on which the ship is then engaged being performed in a reasonable time and without unnecessary delay, in order that the risk may attach, as he has that the voyage insured shall be commenced within a reasonable time after the risk has attached. In either case the effect is the same as to the underwriter, who has another risk substituted instead of that which he has insured against, and in both cases the alteration is occasioned by the wrongful act of the insured himself." This may be relied on as an expression of opinion that the delay, if necessary, would not discharge the underwriters. It may be so where the fact that the vessel is on a preliminary voyage is known, and communicated to the underwriter, so as to make that the basis of the contract, and it seems to have been understood by Tindal, C.J., that the principle on which the cases of Vallance v. Dewar, and Ongier v. Jennings, was decided, was on the ground of notice. He says, in both those cases, "it is admitted that a delay in the commencement of the risk by the interposition of an intermediate voyage not communicated to the underwriters would discharge the policy, unless such intermediate voyage was one which was made usually and according to the course of the trade in which the ship was then engaged, which would be equivalent to notice to the underwriters."

We need not, in the present case, decide how that is, for there was no communication made to the underwriters as to where the ship was at the time when the policy was made. And we think it, under such circumstances, not material whether the delay which varies the risk was occasioned by the fault or the misfortune of the assured. In either case the risk is equally varied. Where the alteration in the course of the voyage after the risk has attached is justified by necessity, it does not vary the risk. The underwriter has undertaken to insure the vessel during the usual and proper course of the adventure. Now, though under ordinary circumstances the usual and proper course of a voyage is to proceed direct; or if chased by a hostile cruiser, or forced to run before a storm to go out of the direct course, the underwriter takes his chance of the vessel being forced to do so. But the underwriter does not take upon himself any part of the risk of the vessel being delayed so long as to vary the risk by perils of the sea or otherwise on its passage to the port where the risk is to attach. This seems involved in the decision of Hull v. Cooper, that the assured is not bound to communicate to the underwriter the place where the vessel is at the time of insurance. For if the time when the risk is to attach might be indefinitely delayed by perils affecting the passage from the place where the vessel was, it must be material to the underwriter to know what that place is. If, on the other hand, at whatever place the ship then is, the risk is not to attach unless the vessel in fact arrives at the port within a proper time, it is not material to the underwriter at what place the ship then is. The position is laid down in 1 Phillips on Insurance, p. 379, s. 890, "That it is an implied understanding that the risk is to commence within a reasonable time unless the policy contains some express provision on the subject." He elsewhere, vol. 1, 332, s. 602, expresses a hesitating opinion that a representation, though not embodied in the policy, may have the effect of qualifying or rebutting an understanding that is only implied. As already said, we are not now called upon to decide how this may be, as in the present case there was neither representation nor express provision in the policy. We think, at all events, in the absence of a representation, that in a policy "at and from a port," it is an implied understanding that the vessel shall be there within such a time that the risk shall not be materially varied, otherwise the risk does not attach. The rule, therefore, must be discharged.

TAYLOR AND OTHERS v. THE LIVERPOOL AND GREAT WESTERN STEAM COMPANY.

*Bill of lading—Exception against loss by "thieves"
—Goods stolen—Barratry—"Damage capable of being covered by insurance."*

Plaintiffs shipped on board defendant's ship at Liverpool for New York, certain boxes of diamonds, under bills of lading excepting, amongst other things, "robbers, thieves, barratry of masters and mariners," and containing a clause that "the shipowner is not to be liable for any damage to any goods which is capable of being covered by insurance." One of the boxes of diamonds was stolen when on board the ship, either on the voyage or after her arrival in port, before the time for delivery arrived, but there was no evidence to show whether they were stolen by one of the crew, or by a passenger, or, after her arrival, by some person from the shore.

Held (1) that "damage to any goods" in the insurance clause did not apply to the case of a total abstraction of the goods; (2) that the word "thieves" applied, as in policies of insurance, only to thieves external to the ship, and not to a passenger or one of the crew; (3) that the onus of showing that the loss came within one of the exceptions lay upon the shipowners, and not the shipper; and that, as the defendants had failed in showing that, the plaintiffs were entitled to recover.

THIS was an action brought to recover damages for the non-delivery and loss of a certain box of diamonds under the circumstances hereinafter stated, and by consent of the parties and by the order of Mellor, J. according to the Common Law Procedure Act 1852, the following case was stated for the opinion of the court.

1. The plaintiffs are merchants carrying on business in New York. The defendants are the owners of the ship Nevada, one of a line of passenger ships running between Liverpool and New York.

2. On or about the 25th July 1871 the plaintiffs caused to be shipped at Liverpool on board the defendants' said steamship Nevada for New York, five boxes of diamonds, and the defendants accepted and received the same from the plaintiffs to be carried on board the said ship from Liverpool to New York, on the terms of five bills of lading respectively, which were all in the same form, and a fac simile copy of one of which is hereto annexed and is to form part of the special case. The memorandum in the margin "Insurance in London by A. S. P. & Co." was upon the bills of lading when they were delivered to the shippers.

3. Four of the said boxes of diamonds were duly delivered by the defendants to the plaintiffs at New York, but the remaining box was stolen during the said voyage, and has never been delivered to the plaintiffs. The diamonds were stolen when on board the ship either on the voyage or after her arrival in port before the time for delivery arrived, but there is no evidence to show whether they were stolen by one of the crew or by a passenger, or after her arrival, by some person from the shore.

4. At the time of the shipment the diamonds were insured for the voyage by two policies effected at Lloyd's, copies of which are annexed to and are to be taken as part of this case. A claim for the loss in question was made upon the underwriters upon the policies and was paid.

The question for the opinion of the court is whether the plaintiffs are entitled to recover from the defendants the value of the third box of diamonds. If the court should be of opinion in the affirmative, then judgment shall be entered up for the plaintiffs for 95*l.* with costs. If the court shall be of opinion in the negative, then judgment shall be entered up for the defendants with costs.

The exceptions contained in the bill of lading were: "The Act of God, the Queen's enemies, pirates, robbers, thieves, vermin, barratry of masters, and mariners, restraints of princes and rulers or people, sweating, insufficiency of package in size, strength or otherwise, leakage, breakage, pilferage, wastage, rain, &c., and all damage, loss, or injury arising from the perils or things above mentioned, and whether such perils or things arise from the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, the mariners, engineers, stevedores, or other persons in the services of the shipowners, always excepted."

The bill of lading contained also the following clause:—"The shipowner is not to be liable for any damage to any goods which is capable of being covered by insurance, nor for any claim, notice of which is not given before the removal of the goods; nor for claims for damage or detention to goods under through bills of lading, where the damage is done or detention occurs whilst the goods are not in the possession of the shipowner; nor in any case for more than the invoice or declared value of the goods, whichever shall be the least."

Cohen, Q.C. (with him Hollams) for the plaintiff contended that the loss of the diamonds under the circumstances mentioned in the case did not come within any of the exceptions mentioned in the bill of lading and that the defendant, was, therefore, liable for the loss. The exception as to loss by "thieves" does not embrace this case for, borrowed as it clearly is from the similar clauses found in policies of insurance, the word "thieves" must be understood in the same sense as it has in those instruments, and be held applicable only to persons outside the ship, not to members of the crew or to passengers. The theft intended must be held to be as in policies of insurance, not simple theft—furtum—but latrocinium. Arnould (Marine Insurance, vol. 2, p. 704. 4th edit.) says: "The theft that is insured against by name in the policy means that which is accompanied by violence (latrocinium) and not simple theft (furtum); it being an old and elementary rule that furtum non est casus fortuitus, is not one of the fortuitous events against which the owner may seek indemnity by insurance, but one which the law presumes might have been prevented by the exercise of due diligence." To entitle the shipowner to exemption from liability under this clause, he must show that the diamonds were lost not by furtum, but by latrocinium; the onus lies upon him to show this. Now the case distinctly finds that there was "no evidence to show whether they were stolen by one of the crew or by a passenger, or after her arrival, by some person from the shore." The defendants therefore have failed to bring the case within this exception. And the case clearly does not come within the insurance clause against damage which is capable of being covered by insurance; for "damage" cannot mean a total loss of the goods by a bodily abstraction of them, as here. It means an injury to the goods, not a total abstraction of them.

Herschell, Q.C. (with him R. V. Williams) for the defendants.—As a matter of fact, as stated in the fourth paragraph of the special case, the plaintiff has recovered upon his policies of insurance in respect of the loss of these diamonds. The word "damage" must include loss of the goods, otherwise a total loss could not be insured against; and a theft by a passenger or by one of the crew is a loss which could be insured against. However, whether the defendants come within the exemption of the insurance clause or not, it is submitted the case comes clearly within the exemption against loss by "thieves," a word of unrestricted meaning, and applicable to all cases of theft, no matter by whom committed. There is no reason for limiting the general word thieves to the narrower meaning given to it in policies of insurance; the words of this clause are different from those found in policies of insurance, and the word "pilferage" points unmistakably to acts done by passengers or members of the crew. If "thieves" mean persons who act with violence, there would be no need of the word "robbers" which, as decided by De Rothschild v. The Royal Mail Steam Packet Company (7 Ex. 734) means, not thieves, but robbers by violence. Again, the loss of the diamonds under the circumstances of the present case may well come within the exemption as to "barratry of the masters and mariners" as barratry is described in Phillips on Insurance, sect. 1071, where it is said: "Theft, embezzlement and wilful destruction of the property insured are in their nature barratrous acts." Nor is the definition of barratry given in Arnould on Marine Insurance (vol. 2 p. 706) inconsistent with this. Finally it is submitted that the onus is upon the plaintiff to show that the loss was caused by a species of theft which takes the case out of the exemption: (See Phillips v. Clark, 2 C. B., N. S., 156; Czech v. The General Steam Navigation Company, 17 L. T. Rep. N. S. 246.)

LUSH, J.—This case is one which presents considerable difficulty, and during the argument I have felt great doubt as to the construction of this bill of lading, but I have arrived at a conclusion satisfactory to my mind, that the loss of these diamonds does not come within any of the exceptions in the bill of lading, and that the plaintiff is therefore entitled to our judgment. The facts as stated in the case are that the diamonds were stolen when on board the ship either on the voyage or after her arrival in port, but there was no evidence to show whether they were stolen by one of the crew or by a passenger, or, after her arrival, by some person from the shore. We must take that finding in the case as equivalent to an averment that there were passengers on board, and the matter is left in doubt whether the diamonds were stolen by one of them, or by one of the crew, or by some one from the shore after the ship's arrival.

The question then is does such a loss come within any of the exceptions in the bill of lading? The exceptions are "the act of God, the Queen's enemies, pirates, robbers, thieves, vermin, barratry of masters, or mariners, &c." The important question as to this is whether the word "thieves" comprehends all thieves, including any amongst the persons on board, or, as hitherto understood in policies of insurance, whether it is not applicable only to persons outside the ship and not belonging to it. It is a word of ambiguous meaning, and in the case of such a word I think we ought to put such a construction upon it as will be most in favour of the shipowner. The exception is one framed for the benefit of the shipowner and if it were intended to give him the protection contended for he ought to have made that clear. I think therefore that the word "thieves" should receive the ordinary construction which has hitherto been put upon the word in policies of insurance. It is not reasonable to suppose that where nothing is added to qualify this meaning the shipowner was not meant to be liable for theft by one of the crew or one of the passengers. I think we should understand the word "thieves" used in this exception in the ordinary sense which it has hitherto borne, and as not including any of the persons on board. I say nothing as to whether the word "barratry" might not include such a loss as this. For supposing that a theft by one of the crew would be barratry, this theft was not necessarily committed by one of the crew; as there were passengers on board it is enough to say that the theft might have been committed by one of them, and not by one of the crew.

The next question is, whether the loss comes within the insurance clause in the bill of lading. That clause says: "The shipowner is not to be liable for any damage to any goods which is capable of being covered by insurance." I do not agree with Mr. Cohen that the word "damage" is to be limited to damage or injury as opposed to the destruction or total loss of the thing. If goods were damaged to the extent of their utter destruction, that would still be damage within the meaning of this clause. But I do not think that the clause includes the present case, which is not one of damage, but of entire abstraction of the thing itself. I think it must be confined to cases where the goods receive damage from one or other of the perils insured against, and that it does not apply to cases where no damage has been done to the goods but there has been an entire bodily abstraction of them.

The next question is, Does the onus of proof in the matter lie on the plaintiff or on the defendant? I am of opinion that it is for the defendant to bring himself within the exception in the bill of lading. It lies upon him to show that the theft was committed by some person outside the ship; the onus does not lie on the plaintiff of showing the contrary. The case of Czech v. The General Steam Navigation Company (ubi sup.) which has been cited, does not seem to me to have any bearing on the present case. There the shipowner stipulated that he would not be liable for "breakage, leakage, or damage" which, according to the decisions, means breakage, leakage, or damage not caused by or owing to his own negligence; and the court held that it was not sufficient to show that the damage was such as prima facie was caused by one of the perils insured against, but that the plaintiff must go further and show that it was caused by the negligence of the shipowner or one of his servants. I do not think that case at all touches the present. The shipowner here is responsible for the non-delivery of the box of diamonds, unless he can bring himself within one of the protecting clauses. He says, according to the construction we have put on the word thieves, that he will not be responsible if the thing is stolen by some person not belonging to the ship; he fails to show that the box was stolen by some person not belonging to the ship, and therefore he does not bring himself within the exception. The plaintiff therefore is entitled to our judgment.

ARCHIBALD, J.—I am of the same opinion. The first question is what is the proper construction of the bill of lading. The goods were shipped on board the defendant's ship under a bill of lading, and the defendants are responsible for their safe delivery, unless they can bring themselves within any of the exceptions in that bill of lading. I own that during the argument I felt considerable doubt as to the meaning of the document, but I have arrived at the same conclusion as my brother Lush, that the defendants have not brought themselves within any of the exceptions exempting them from liability.

HUDSON AND ANOTHER v. HILL AND ANOTHER.

The clause as to insurance says that the shipowner is not to be liable for any damage to any goods which is capable of being covered by insurance. It has been contended that this clause is so extensive as to exempt from liability for every possible risk that could be insured against, and that the word damage extends not only to a loss by destruction, but also to a loss by theft. If the word damage could be so extended, the clause would exempt the shipowner from liability as to these goods under all circumstances whatever, as the theft might be insured against. But when we come to look at the clause itself we must see, I think, that the word damage is not used in that sense. The present case was one of abstraction of the goods, and I do not think the words of the clause apply to such a case as that. The whole of the insurance clause seems to me to point to some injury done to the goods, the goods themselves remaining in specie. The defendants cannot therefore rely on this exception.

The next question is, have the defendants brought themselves within the exception against loss by thieves? This depends on the construction to be put on the word thieves. No doubt the words of this clause were copied originally from policies of insurance, and in policies of insurance the word thieves refers to theft by violence, to latrocinium as opposed to furtum. As the word is ambiguous I think it is for the shipowner to make out clearly that it was the intention that the word should have the other meaning, and should not bear the ordinary meaning which it had acquired in policies of insurance. As the defendants have failed to do that, I think they have not brought themselves within this exception either; for it is found in the case that the diamonds may have been stolen by one of the crew, or by a passenger, or by some person from the shore after the ship's arrival. The question of barratry, therefore, does not arise.

For these reasons I agree with my brother Lush that there should be judgment for the plaintiff.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Reported by ETHERINGTON SMITH and J. M. LELY, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

May 26 and 27, 1874.

HUDSON AND ANOTHER v. HILL AND ANOTHER.

Charter-party—Outward cargo taken for shipowner's benefit—Ship to proceed "forthwith" to Barbadoes for sugar—Delay of outward voyage by excepted perils—Arrival of ship too late for sugar season at Barbadoes—Refusal of charterer's agent to load—Refusal of captain to take cargo from other island.

On the 28th Dec. 1870, the plaintiffs and the defendants agreed, by charter-party, that the plaintiffs' ship should forthwith proceed to Barbadoes, and there load a sugar cargo of the defendants, taking an outward coal cargo for the benefit of the plaintiffs, "lay-days not to commence before the 1st April 1871."

The ship sailed on the 8th Feb., and having been delayed more than a month by the excepted perils, did not reach Barbadoes till the 28th July, when the defendants' agents, who had expected the ship to arrive at the beginning of the sugar season in April, refused to load, on account of the sugar season having passed, alleging that time was the essence of the contract, but offered to provide another cargo of sugar and molasses from Barbadoes and St. Vincent. The captain refused to take such other cargo, and the ship having sailed away on another enterprise, the plaintiffs sued the defendants for not loading according to charter-party.

Lord Coleridge, C.J., told the jury that the exception of perils of the seas applied to the outward voyage, and that the captain was not bound to take the substituted cargo so offered, and the jury having found that the ship had, in fact, sailed forthwith to Barbadoes, and that the date of the ship's arrival at Barbadoes was not such as to put an end to the commercial speculation of the parties, directed a verdict for the plaintiffs:

Held, no misdirection, and a rule for a new trial, on the ground of misdirection, discharged.

Barker v. McAndrew (2 Mar. Law Cas. O.S. 205; 12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 459; 34 L. J. 191, C. P.), approved and followed.

DECLARATION.—That the plaintiffs and the defendants agreed by charter-party, dated the 28th Dec. 1870, that the plaintiff's ship Winslow should forthwith proceed to Carlisle Bay, Barbadoes, the said vessel being allowed to take a cargo of coals to a port outwards for the owner's benefit, or to the Brazils, and as ordered load afloat a full and complete cargo of sugar or other lawful merchandise, to be shipped according to the custom of the ports of loading, which the said charterers bound themselves to ship; and that the said ship, being so loaded, should therewith proceed to London and deliver the same, on payment of freight, 40s. per ton, and that the defendants should be allowed thirty running days, Sundays excepted, for loading the said ship, and ten days on demurrage at 8l. per day, and the said lay days not to commence before the 1st April 1871, and the penalty for non-performance of the agreement, was to be the estimated amount of freight. Averment of performance of conditions precedent. Breach, that defendants made default in loading the said ship, and refused and wholly neglected to do so, whereby, &c.

Pleas: First, that the ship did not forthwith proceed to Carlisle Bay, within the meaning of the charter, and by reason thereof the object of the said charter, and of the voyage therein mentioned, was wholly frustrated, and the defendants were prevented from deriving any benefit therefrom; secondly, that the master was not ready and willing to accept and load the agreed cargo; thirdly, that the defendant had not reasonable notice of the ship having arrived at Carlisle Bay, within the meaning of the charter, or of her being ready to receive cargo there, wherefore the defendants could not load; fourthly, that the defendants did not make default in loading; fifthly, exoneration and discharge before breach; sixthly, to money count, never indebted; seventhly, after setting out the charter-party (a), that time was an essential and material part of the said contract, as the plaintiffs and the defendants well knew; eighthly, that the said ship was not at the time of making the charter tight, staunch, or strong, or every way fitted for the said voyage, within the meaning of the said charter, but, on the contrary, was in a bad state of repair, of which the defendants had no knowledge; and by reason of her said condition, it would have been impossible for her, and the plaintiffs could not have reasonably expected her to be able to proceed to Carlisle

(a) The charter-party was as follows:

Jamaica.	London, 28th Dec. 1870.
Ship or vessel.....	Charter-party.
Class.....	Winslow.

	In Sunderland.

It is this day mutually agreed between G. W. Hudson, Esquire, owner of the above-named ship, and Messrs. Thomas Daniel and Co., of London, charterers, That the said ship, of which the above general description is warranted to be correct, being tight, staunch and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage classed as above, and guaranteed to be maintained so during present service, shall forthwith proceed to Carlisle Bay, Barbadoes, vessel being allowed to take in cargo of coals to a port outwards, for owners' benefit, or to the Brazils; and as ordered, load afloat a full and complete cargo of sugar or other lawful merchandise, to be shipped according to the custom of the ports of loading (charterers to pay any lighterage for any produce shipped from outside the harbour where the ship lays), which the said charterers bind themselves to ship, not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle (apparel, provisions, and furniture); and being so loaded shall therewith proceed to London to discharge, or so near thereto as she may safely get, and deliver the same in the usual manner, in such dock as charterers may direct, on being paid freight as follows:

Forty shillings for sugar, 150 barrels, or equal thereto, in barrels or tierces, for stowage.....	Per ton of 20 cwt., not delivered at the Queen's beam.

Other goods in fair and customary proportions to sugar. All in full of all port charges and pilotages, as customary (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, restraints of princes and rulers, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature and kind soever, hands striking, frost, floods, or other unavoidable accident which may prevent the loading or delivery of the cargoes during the said voyage always mutually excepted). Vessel to be consigned to charterer's agent in Barbadoes, paying 2½ per cent. at one port only for doing ship's business. Thirty running days (Sundays excepted) are to be allowed the said charterers for loading the said ship at Barbadoes, to begin when the vessel is clear and ready to receive cargo, the master giving charterer's agents written notice to that effect, and to discharge with all customary dispatch. The said charterer to have the option of keeping the said ship ten days in demurrage, over and above the said laying days, at 8l. per day; the master to sign bills of lading at any rate of freight required by charterer's agents, without prejudice to this agreement. Charterer's agents at ports of loading abroad to advance cash for vessel's ordinary disbursements, for the appropriation of which by the captain the charterers are not to be held responsible, free of interest and commission, subject to cost of insurance, the same to be also on account, and the balance on unloading and right delivery of the homeward cargo in cash, at two months, or, under discount at 5 per cent. per annum, at charterer's option. Lay-days not to commence before the 1st April 1871. Penalty for non-performance of the agreement, estimated amount of freight.

Bay forthwith, within the meaning of the said charter-party.

Issue thereon.

The cause was tried before Lord Coleridge, C.J., and a special jury at the London sittings after Hilary term 1873, when the following material facts were proved:

The plaintiffs were shipowners at Sunderland, and the defendants were West India merchants in the city of London, carrying on business as Daniels and Co., and the action was for not loading the ship Winslow according to charter-party.

The practice of the West India sugar trade is, that merchants in London make advances to planters, who consign the crop to them. The crop is then sold in London, and the proceeds, after deducting the expenses are paid over to the planters. The sugar season extends from April to July inclusive, after which period double insurance is paid on vessels leaving Barbadoes, by reason of the hurricane season commencing in August. This being so, and known to be so by the parties, the charter-party already set out in the note was signed when the Winslow was in dock, on the 28th Dec. 1870. (a) Detained by bad weather, she did not sail till the 8th Feb. 1871. Being further delayed by accident, she did not reach Barbadoes till the 28th July, when the consignees having taken the advice of the Attorney-General of that island as to the construction of the charter-party, refused to load the agreed cargo at Barbadoes, but offered to load a similar cargo from the neighbouring island of St. Vincent.

The following correspondence contains such offer, and the refusal thereof.

Letter from the charterer's agents to the captain, dated Bridgetown, Barbadoes, 31st July:

We have perused the charter-party of the Winslow, dated 28th Dec. 1870, by which she was forthwith to proceed to Carlisle Bay, Barbadoes, being allowed, however, to take a cargo of coal to a port outwards for owner's benefit, or to the Brazils, thirty running days to be allowed the charterers for loading the vessel, which were not to commence before the 1st April 1871. The charter-party stipulates that the vessel shall proceed on her voyage forthwith, and had she done so it is probable that she would have been here by the 1st April or soon after, as was evidently contemplated by the parties to the contract. On that day, and for some time afterwards, we were provided with a full cargo of sugar for her. It appears, however, by your own account, that instead of leaving forthwith, the vessel did not quit the port of Sunderland until the 9th March 1871, being ten weeks after the charter-party was executed. Answer of the captain thereto, dated Barbadoes, 1st Aug. 1871:

I am in receipt of your favour of yesterday's date, the 31st ult., the contents duly noted; and in reply I beg leave to state that there is a statement as follows: "It appears however, by your own account, that instead of leaving forthwith the vessel did not quit the port of Sunderland until the 9th March 1871, being ten weeks after the charter-party was executed." That statement I most respectfully beg leave to deny as having emanated from me. My words were in answer to a question put by you that Mr. Daniels evidently contemplated that the ship would arrive here by the 1st April. My reply was, that that was impossible, as I did not leave England until March. In reply to the other portion of your letter, you seem to ignore the fact that my charter-party binds me to load a full and complete cargo here in Barbadoes, and not at two or more ports. I therefore beg leave to confirm my written notice, handed to you yesterday, to the effect that the barque Winslow is at your service, and all ready to take in cargo, and that I count my lay-days (specified in charter) from to-day, the 1st Aug. 1871.

Further negotiations to the same purpose resulted in nothing, and in the end the vessel sailed away to take troops from Demerara to Sierra Leone, and this action was brought for not loading according to the terms of the charter-party.

The learned judge told the jury that the exception as to perils of the sea applied to the outward as well as the homeward voyage, and that the term "forthwith" in the charter-party did not mean at once, but must bear a reasonable construction, and was equivalent to as soon as possible under the circumstances.

With regard to the conduct of the captain, the jury were charged as follows:

The captain is merely the shipowner's agent, he is not a principal; he is there under the charter-party which you have heard read. His contention was, that under the charter-party, the shipowner had a right to have this ship loaded, and he so stated to the charterer's agents. They said, on the other hand, they would not load it, and begged him to go elsewhere and seek a cargo. If he had gone elsewhere to seek a cargo before there was a distinct breach, or that which he chose to accept as a distinct breach on the part of the charterers, he would have discharged the charterers from their engagement, and he would have placed his own employers, the shipowners, I will not say at a greater disadvantage, because it might have turned out, possibly, that he might have got as good a charter as the one he gave up, but he would have relinquished the shipowner's rights upon the charterers and left his masters to the chance of fortune, whether or not he could have got as good an engagement as the one he gave up. It is not for me to say whether he behaved well or ill, but I do not think there is much ground of complaint against him, so far as I may express an opinion. He thought his duty was to hold on to the contract. He knew what would happen if that were broken. He determined, at any rate, to hold to the contract that he had got, and unless the agents would come under an engagement with him which would save his masters at all events, he would hold on to the charter as long as he reasonably could. . . . But on the other hand the captain might fairly say, "Unless you put me in as good a position, with regard to yourself as my owners now stand in with regard to your principals, I cannot give up the hold which my principals have against your principals." They never would give him any encouragement of that kind at all. Their case, from the beginning, was—"You have no claim against us. We will, as a matter of courtesy and good nature, help you to get a freight, either at St. Vincent or St. Thomas; we will do anything we can to help you. You being here, and having no claim upon us, we will do our best for you; but you will distinctly understand we decline in any extent to be bound." They may not have said this in terms, but the captain may have understood them to say, "If you treat us as agents of the charterers, and accept our offer in substitution of the contract, you will have discharged the parties to the original contract, and your remedy against our principals will be gone." The captain might no doubt have said, "I will consider this as a breach, and the matter as at an end, so far as this contract is concerned. Treating you as the principals, I consider the principals have broken their contract, and now I will set to work at once to do the best I can for all parties concerned." He might have done that, and if he had it is not likely that the principals in London would have repudiated the agent's conduct. It is in the highest degree unlikely.

The jury found, in answer to seven specific questions,—First, that the Winslow was so tight, &c., as to be able to proceed to Barbadoes and Brazil; secondly, that she did in fact forthwith proceed thither; thirdly, that there was no delay on the voyage but what was occasioned by the expected accidents; fourthly, that there was no want of reasonable notice to the shipowners to the charterers of the circumstances of the delay; fifthly, that such want of notice, if any, did not prevent loading at Barbadoes; sixthly, that the date of the arrival at Barbadoes was not such as to put an end, in a commercial sense, to the commercial speculations entered upon by the shipowners and the charterers; and, seventhly, that such date was not a date which could have been at the time of making the contract, in the reasonable contemplation of either the charterer or the shipowner.

Upon these findings the learned judge directed a verdict for the plaintiffs, reserving leave to move.

A rule was afterwards granted by Lord Coleridge, C.J., and Keating and Denman, JJ., to set aside the verdict, and for a new trial, on the ground that the judge misdirected the jury as to the effect of the exception of perils of the seas, as to what effect on the charterer's liability, the acceptance under protest by the captain of other employment would have had, and that the sixth and seventh answers were against evidence.

Benjamin, Q.C., Grantham with him, for the plaintiffs, now showed cause.—Barker v. McAndrew (12 L. T. Rep. N. S. 459; 18 C. B., N. S. 759; 34 L. J. 191, C. P.; 2 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 205) is absolutely conclusive upon the first point. In that case it was held that the ordinary exception as to perils of the seas, applied to the preliminary transit from the place where a ship was, when the charter-party was made, to the loading-place, and there is nothing to distinguish that case from this. [Brett, J.—In Potter v. Rankin (18 L. T. Rep. N. S. 712; L. Rep. 3 C. P. 562; 37 L. J. 257, C. P.) the court was of opinion that the chartered voyage included the voyage out.] As to the second point, Sicken v. Irving (7 C. B., N. S., 165) will be found to bear a curious similarity to the present case. "There can be no doubt," said Williams, J., "that an agent appointed to load a cargo at a foreign port has authority to do all that is necessary for the performance of the contract, and also to vary the mode of performance if any exigency arises, provided the contract be substantially maintained. But there is no ground for contending that he has by law any implied authority to substitute a new contract—to substitute one sort of commodity for another, sugar for salt, for instance—or to appoint a different place of loading from that contemplated by the charter-party. It is quite new to me to hear it suggested that there is such an authority; and I cannot but think that it would be very mischievous if the agent's authority could be so extended as thus to vary the contract of his principal." [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J., referred to that portion of the summing up which will be found set out above] They also referred to

Matthews, Q.C. (Murphy, Q.C., with him), for the defendants, supported the rule.—By the terms of this charter-party the rule in Barker v. McAndrew (ubi sup.) is excluded. The plaintiff had the option of taking the coals on the outward journey, and so he takes upon himself, as it is only just that he should, the risk of that journey. At any rate he is not excused the performance of the condition precedent that he should proceed "forthwith." (Croockewit v. Fletcher, 1 H. & N. 893; 26 L. J. 153, Ex.) And forthwith has the same meaning as directly, which latter term has been held to mean speedily: (Duncan v. Topham, 7 C. B. 225.) [Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I explained "forthwith" to the jury to mean as soon as practicable, and they found that the ship sailed in fact "forthwith." GROVE, J.—"Forthwith" is a comparative term; it means that the shipowner, at any rate, will cause no delay.] The damages ought to be merely nominal, as the captain was bound to set about taking other employment: in the last of which cases Brett, J., had asked the jury a question similar to the sixth question in this, but the jury had answered it in the affirmative.

Bradford v. Williams, ante, vol. 1, p. 313; 26 L. T.

Cas. O. S. 339;

BRETT, J.—I am clearly of opinion that the sixth and seventh answers were not against evidence; on the contrary, I think that they would have been against evidence if they had been given otherwise. It has been contended that the object of the voyage was frustrated, within the rule laid down by the majority of this court in Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Company (ubi sup.). But such a contention can be grounded only upon a misapprehension of that decision, which means merely this—that where a delay has been so long as to frustrate, from a commercial point of view, the object of both parties, the contract is inapplicable, and cannot be enforced. Such a delay has not arisen here. In this case the charterers thought to ship a cargo of sugar during the sugar season, but the shipowners thought to employ their ship during the whole year. It was nothing to the shipowners whether the cargo could be shipped at a profit to the charterers or not. The failure to arrive at the particular time wished for by the charterers, therefore, did not terminate the contract. But it is said it was impossible to load. Even if it had been, it would not have been within the rule, but I doubt whether it was impossible. At a profit, perhaps, it was impossible to load, but that is no concern of the shipowners. As to the first ground of misdirection, that the excepted perils included perils on the outward voyage, I am of opinion the clause as to excepted perils began to operate as soon as the outward voyage began. Mr. Matthews argues otherwise, on the ground that the charterers derived no profit from that voyage. But that voyage was, I think, the chartered voyage. At any rate, Barker v. McAndrew (ubi sup.) is a clear authority to that effect, and there is no authority to the contrary. The distinction between that case, and cases apparently conflicting, is shown in the judgments.

As to the second ground of misdirection, that the learned judge ought to have told the jury that the charterers were absolved because the vessel had not sailed "forthwith," I think such a construction of that term would be equivalent to striking out the clause as to excepted perils altogether. "Forthwith" merely means as quickly as possible, unless prevented by excepted perils.

As to the third ground of misdirection, what really occurred was this—it was left to the jury to say whether the captain, by unreasonable conduct, had prevented the lessening of the damage to the charterers, which was, perhaps, a direction too strong in favour of the charterers. It was thus left open to the jury to consider the captain's conduct, both in and after the lay-days. I cannot say whether the captain might not wait till after the lay-days, but even that consideration was not shut off, and the jury had left to them whether the captain's conduct was reasonable on the whole. They were to consider how the offer of a substituted cargo could prevent itself to the mind of the captain, and whether he took a reasonable view of the situation.

I think that there was no misdirection at all, and that the rule should be discharged on all points.

GROVE, J.—I am of the same opinion on both points.

As to the first ground of misdirection, I think the case is not only governed by Barker v. McAndrew (ubi sup.) but is à fortiori to it. In Barker v. McAndrew the distance held to be within the clause as to excepted perils was short—here it is long, so as to be more within the reason of the exception. In this charter-party, too, we have the plural "cargoes," the use of which would seem to contemplate both the outward and the homeward voyage. I agree, too, that if Mr. Matthews be right as to his construction of "forthwith," the clause as to excepted perils will have to be struck out of this charter-party. In the ordinary legal acceptance of the term, "forthwith" means quam primum, as soon as possible under the circumstances.

As to the third ground of misdirection, that the captain was not bound to treat the contract as broken, I think that if this had been a case like Avory v. Bowden (ubi sup.), it would have been a case of res acta, and the captain should have minimised the loss. But the captain did not treat the contract as broken; he might have put his owners into danger by so doing. It is said, however, that he should have accepted the subsequent offer, and so reduced the loss. But the reasonableness of the captain's conduct was left to the jury, and the only possible straw, if I may use the expression, which can now be caught at in support of the rule upon this last point, is the possible meaning of a collateral contingent observation in the course of the learned judge's direction to the jury.

GORRIS AND ANOTHER v. SCOTT.

Lord COLERIDGE, C.J.—I have very little to add. I agree that the sixth and seventh answers would have been against evidence, if given otherwise. I agree also in the view which my brother Brett has taken of the meaning of the decision in Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Company (ubi sup.) It is a most authoritative expression of opinion, for my brother Brett took part in that judgment himself. As to the misdirection, I charged the jury without being aware of Barker v. McAndrew (ubi sup.) The contention as to "forthwith" I do not quite see the importance of. I had, it was admitted, correctly explained the term to mean with all necessary and reasonable dispatch, and the jury found that the vessel did in fact sail "forthwith." Upon the last point, I can only say that before giving the direction complained of, I had referred to Avery v. Bowden and Reed v. Hoskins (6 E. & B. 953; 3 Jur. N. S., 238; 26 L. J. 3, Q. B.); and also to Xenos v. Danube Railway Company (11 C. B., N. S., 152; 13 ib. 825); and in my direction was attempting to follow the law as well as I could estimate it from those cases.

GORRIS AND ANOTHER v. SCOTT.

Statutory duty—Penalties for breach of—Breach of duty—Special damage to plaintiff—Action for—Object and intention of statute—Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 70), ss. 75, 103, 106—Order in council—Transit of animals by sea—Regulations as to violation of by shipowner—Action by owner of animals.

The Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 70), s. 75, empowers the Privy Council, from time to time, to make such orders as they think expedient for, inter alia, "protecting animals brought by sea to ports in Great Britain, from unnecessary suffering during the passage, and on landing. In pursuance of such power, the Privy Council, on the 20th Dec. 1871, made an order (The Animals Order of 1871), that "with respect to places used for animals on board vessels, the following regulations shall have effect: First. Every such place shall be divided into pens by substantial divisions. Secondly. Each pen shall not exceed 9ft. in breadth, or 15ft. in length. Thirdly. The floor of each pen shall have proper battens or other footholds thereon." By sect. 103 a penalty is imposed on any person acting in contravention of, or guilty of any offence against, the Act, or any order or regulation made by the Privy Council, not exceeding 20l. for every such offence.

The plaintiffs shipped a quantity of sheep on board a vessel of the defendant, for transit from Ham-burgh to Newcastle, and in consequence of the defendant failing to provide proper pens and footholds on board the vessel, as directed by the above order, a large number of the sheep were washed overboard in a gale, during the passage, and were drowned; and in an action by the plaintiffs against the defendant to recover damages by reason of his noncompliance with the statutory duty, it was Held on demurrer, by the Court of Exchequer (Kelly, C.B., and Pigott, Pollock, and Amphlett, B.B.), that, as the object of the statute and the Order in Council was, not to benefit the owners of animals by preventing the animals from being drowned, but to prevent the introduction and spreading of contagious diseases amongst cattle in this country, the plaintiffs, although they had sustained damage which would not have occurred if the defendants had performed their statutory duty, could not sue the defendant for the recovery of such damage, and that the action was not maintainable.

Couch v. Steel (3 E. & B. 402; 23 L. J. 125, Q. B.); Stevens v. Jeacocke and others (11 Q. B. 731; 17 L. J. 163, Q. B.); and Atkinson v. The Newcastle and Gateshead Waterworks Company (L. Rep. 6 Ex. 404); discussed and distinguished.

THE plaintiffs in this action were cattle dealers at Hamburg and the defendant was the owner of the screw steam ship Hastings, which, on the 6th March 1873, was lying at Hamburg. On that day the plaintiffs shipped on board the Hastings a number of sheep for delivery at Newcastle, under the following bill of lading.

Shipped in good order and well conditioned by Gorris and upon the good steamship Hastings, Capt. Douglas, now lying in the port of Hamburg, and bound for Newcastle, 100 sheep, being marked and numbered as in the margin, and to be delivered in the like good order and condition at the said port of Newcastle, all and every dangers and accidents of the sea, fire, machinery, boilers, steam, and steam navigation of what nature or kind soever excepted, unto Thomas Maugham, of Newcastle, or assigns, he or they paying freight for the same 1s. sterling per head. In witness, &c.

On deck at shipper's risk. Not answerable for washing or throwing overboard. Free of mortality. To be forwarded at shipper's risk and expense, &c.

Hamburg, 6th March 1873.

The Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 70), which is an Act to consolidate, amend, and make perpetual the Acts for preventing the introduction or spreading of contagious or infectious diseases among cattle in Great Britain, enacts (sect. 75) that "The Privy Council may from time to time make such orders as they think expedient for all or any of (inter alia) the following purposes (1) For insuring for animals brought by sea to ports in Great Britain a proper supply of food and water during the passage and on landing. (2.) For protecting such animals from unnecessary suffering during the passage and on landing."

In pursuance of the powers conferred on them by that section, the Privy Council, on the 20th Dec. 1871, made an order, cited as "The Animals Order of 1871," which contained the following, amongst other, regulations:

TRANSIT OF ANIMALS BY SEA.—With respect to places used for animals on board vessels, the following regulations shall have effect:

(1) Every such place shall be divided into pens by substantial divisions.

[Ex.]

GORRIS AND ANOTHER v. SCOTT.

[Ex.]

(2) Each pen shall not exceed 9ft. in breadth or 15ft. in length.

(3) The floor of each pen shall have proper battens or other footholds thereon.

By sect. 103 a penalty not exceeding £20 is imposed upon any person acting in contravention of or guilty of any offence against the Act or any order or regulation made by the Privy Council or a local authority, in pursuance thereof, for every such offence; and where such offence is committed with respect to more than four animals, a penalty not exceeding £5 for each animal may be imposed instead of 20*l.*, and by sect. 106 one half of the penalty is to be paid to the person who sues or proceeds for the same.

The defendant's vessel was not fitted with proper pens nor provided with proper battens or footholds, as prescribed by the above-mentioned order of council, and in consequence thereof a large number of the plaintiffs' sheep were washed overboard by the sea in a gale which the vessel encountered on the passage from Hamburg to Newcastle, and were drowned. Thereupon the plaintiffs commenced an action against the defendant, as owner of the said vessel, to recover damages from him for the loss of their sheep through his breach of the statutory duty in that respect imposed upon him by the Act.

By the first count of their declaration they complained that heretofore, and after the making and passing of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1869, "The Lords and others of Her Majesty's Hon. Privy Council, under and in exercise of the powers and authority in them by the said Act in that behalf vested, duly and within the true intent and meaning of the said Act, made a certain order therein, called 'The Animals Order of 1871,' with reference to animals brought by sea to ports in Great Britain, and to the places used and occupied by such animals on board any vessel in which the same should be so brought to such ports, and thereby, amongst other items, ordered and made the following regulations, that is to say:—'1. That every such place should be divided into pens by substantial divisions; and secondly that each such pen should not exceed nine feet in breadth and fifteen feet in length.' And the plaintiffs further say that afterwards, and after the making and taking effect of the said order, and whilst the same continued and was in full force and effect, the plaintiffs delivered in and on board of a certain vessel called the Hastings, to the defendant, as and then being the owner of the said vessel, certain sheep of the plaintiffs, to be carried and conveyed by the defendant, for reward to him, in that behalf, in and on board the said vessel by sea from the port of Hamburg to a certain port in Great Britain, called (to wit), to the port of Newcastle, and there delivered for the plaintiffs, and the defendant then, and as being such owner as aforesaid, took and received, and started on the said voyage, with the said sheep in and on board the said vessel, for the purposes and on the terms aforesaid." Avertisments. That the said order and regulations respectively remained and continued in full force and effect before and at and from the time of the said delivery to and receipt by the defendant of the said sheep as aforesaid, up to and until and at the time of the termination of the said voyage; and that all conditions were performed and fulfilled, and all things happened and were done, and all times elapsed necessary to entitle the plaintiffs to maintain this action in respect of the claim in this count made, yet the place in and on board the said vessel, which was used and occupied by the said sheep during the said voyage was not during the said voyage, or any part thereof, divided into pens by substantial or any other divisions, and the defendant wholly neglected and omitted to divide the said place, or to cause the said place to be divided during the said voyage or any part thereof; and by reason thereof divers of the said sheep were during the said voyage, washed and swept away by the sea from and off the said ship, and were drowned and wholly lost to the plaintiffs.

The second count of the declaration was precisely the same as the first, except that in setting out the "Animals Order of 1871," it added besides the two regulations set forth in the said count, the third regulation contained in such order as follows: "Thirdly, that the floor of each such pen should have proper battens or footholds thereon," and they assigned as a breach or neglect of duty on the defendant's part, that "the floor of the place in and on board the said vessel, which was used and occupied by the said sheep during the said voyage, had not during the said voyage or any part thereof, proper or any battens or any other footholds thereon, as required in and by the said order, so made under and in pursuance of the said statute, and by reason thereof divers of the said sheep were during the said voyage washed and swopt away by the sea from off the said ship, and were drowned and wholly lost to the plaintiffs.

The third count charged that the plaintiffs caused to be delivered to the defendant, and the defendant received from the plaintiffs, certain goods, that is to say, certain sheep, to be by him shipped on board of the ship Hastings, and safely and securely carried therein from Hamburg to Newcastle, and there, for freight payable by the plaintiffs to the defendant in that behalf, delivered for the plaintiffs, all and every dangers and accidents of the seas, of fire, machinery, boilers, steam, and of steam navigation of what nature or kind soever excepted; and the defendant was not prevented from so shipping, carrying, or delivering the said goods by any of the perils or casualties aforesaid. And all conditions, things, and times, were fulfilled, &c., necessary to entitle the plaintiffs to have the said goods safely and securely carried and delivered by the defendant as aforesaid; yet the defendant did not, nor would safely and securely carry and deliver the said goods as aforesaid, and the same were during the said voyage lost to the plaintiffs.

The defendant, amongst other things, pleaded thirdly for a third plea to the first and second counts, that the said sheep were delivered in and on board the said vessel to the defendant, and were received by the defendant to be carried, as in the counts mentioned, on the said voyage, upon and subject to the terms following, that is to say, that the said sheep should be delivered in like good order and condition to the order and condition in which they were shipped, all and every the dangers and accidents of the seas, of fire, machinery, boilers, steam and of steam navigation, of what nature or kind soever, excepted, and that the said sheep should be carried on deck of the said ship at the plaintiffs' risk, and that the defendant should not be answerable for washing, or throwing overboard, or for the death of any of the said sheep on board the said vessel; fourthly, by his fourth plea to the said first and second counts the defendant repeated the several allegations in the third plea contained, and in addition thereto said that the said sheep were washed and swept away, as in these counts mentioned, by dangers and accidents of the seas, and steam navigation, within the true intent and meaning of the said terms, and not otherwise; fifthly, by his fifth plea to the same counts, the defendant repeated the third plea, and in addition thereto said that the said sheep were respectively necessarily, and properly thrown overboard, or died on board the said vessel, within the true intent and meaning of the said terms, and that the loss complained of arose and was caused wholly by such throwing overboard and death. Twelfthly, by his twelfth plea, for defence on equitable grounds, the defendant said that the said sheep were delivered on board the said ship at a port beyond the seas, that is to say Hamburg, and that the defendant, when he agreed to accept and receive on board the said vessel the cargo hereinafter mentioned, was in this country, and that the defendant was induced to receive the said cargo on board the said vessel by a statement and allegation then made by the plaintiffs to the defendant in this country, that the plaintiffs were about to deliver a general cargo only, and not sheep or animals, on board the said ship; and the defendant accordingly, at the plaintiff's request, by telegram, ordered the said master to receive the said cargo, and the defendant, by the said master, as his agent in that behalf, received the same accordingly, on the faith and on the terms that the said cargo consisted of a general cargo only, and not of sheep or animals; and that the plaintiffs, in violation of the said terms, and contrary to the said statement, and without the personal knowledge of the defendant, delivered the said sheep and not a general cargo, to the said master, and that the loss and matters complained of arose wholly from the said violating the said terms by the plaintiffs, and by their delivering the said sheep to the said master without the knowledge or consent of the defendant.

GORRIS AND ANOTHER v. SCOTT.

Demurrer and joinder in demurrer to the first and second counts of the declaration, one ground of demurrer being that the breach of the said regulations only render the defendant liable to the penalty imposed by the Act.

Replication secondly to the twelfth plea, that the said sheep so delivered to the said master as in the said twelfth plea mentioned, were accepted and received by him in and on board the said vessel, with his full assent and concurrence, as part of the said cargo, and with full knowledge of all and singular the premises in the said twelfth plea mentioned.

Demurrers and joinder in demurrers to the third, fourth, fifth, and twelfth pleas respectively, the grounds of demurrer respectively being—as to the third plea, that the matter therein alleged affords no answer to the breaches of duty on the defendant's part in the first and second counts respectively mentioned, which are respectively by the said plea admitted to have been the cause of the sheep being washed overboard. As to the fourth plea that the matter therein alleged affords no answer to the said breaches, there being no allegation in the plea of a waiver by the plaintiffs of the defendant's performance of the duties in such counts mentioned. As to the fifth plea, that the matter therein alleged affords no answer to the said breaches, it being consistent with the allegations in the plea that the sheep were so necessarily and properly thrown overboard and died, as therein alleged, by reason and in consequence of such breach of duty respectively. And as to the twelfth plea, that is perfectly consistent with its allegations that the master of the vessel was, at the time when he received the sheep on board, fully aware of the arrangement between the plaintiffs and the defendant, and consented (which he had a general power to do) to vary and alter the terms of such arrangement.

Rejoinder: Demurrer and joinder in demurrer to the plaintiff's second replication to the twelfth plea, a ground of demurrer being that the concurrence of the master stated in the replication is wholly immaterial.

The points of argument on the part of the plaintiffs: As to the first and second counts—First, that the said counts respectively are good, and show on the face of them respectively that the defendant has, to the damage of the plaintiffs, failed to perform a statutory duty arising under and by virtue of an order in council, made under and in pursuance of sect. 75 of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act 1869, which was thereby imposed on the defendant for the benefit of the plaintiffs, as and being the owner of the sheep in the said first and second counts respectively mentioned, and alleged therein respectively to have brought by sea in the defendant's ship to a port in Great Britain; secondly that the provisions of the said section do not actually impose the penalty therein referred to for offences against any order in council, made under its provisions, but merely authorise the Privy Council to impose penalties for such offences, and that it does not appear upon the said pleadings that any penalty was ever actually imposed by the order referred to in the first and second counts respectively; thirdly, that, assuming that any such penalty had been in fact imposed by the said order in council, it would nevertheless be deemed and considered to have been so imposed for the purpose of prevention accordingly, and could not take away the plaintiffs' right to compensation for the damage which they have actually sustained in consequence of the neglect on the defendant's part to comply with the order in council mentioned and referred to in the said first and second counts respectively; fourthly, that independently of the said statutory declaration in the said first and second counts respectively mentioned, these counts respectively show that the defendant omitted to take such necessary and reasonable precaution for the protection of the sheep as he was bound so to do as a carrier for hire of the said sheep.

With regard to the third, fourth, and fifth pleas—(fifthly) that the terms of the said alleged contract, mentioned in the said third, fourth, and fifth pleas respectively, did not (in the absence of any express agreement to that effect), exempt or excuse the defendant from performing the statutory duty imposed upon him, as in the said first and second counts respectively mentioned, and would, in the absence of such express agreement, be deemed to have been made and entered into, subject to such statutory duty; and that it is consistent with the allegations contained in the said third, fourth, and fifth pleas respectively, that the said damage sustained by the plaintiffs, as in these counts respectively mentioned, was primarily occasioned, by reason and in consequence of the neglect of the defendant to perform the said statutory duties which were referred to above.

GORRIS AND ANOTHER v. SCOTT.

[Ex.]

With regard to the twelfth plea—(sixthly) that the matter contained in the said twelfth plea affords no answer to the claim made in the declaration, and that it is perfectly consistent with the allegations contained in that plea, that the master of the said vessel was, when he received the said sheep on board, fully aware of the arrangement alleged in the said twelfth plea to have been made between the plaintiffs and the defendant, and that he, at the same time when he received the said sheep, consented, as he had power to do without any express or direct authority from the defendant in that behalf, to vary and alter the terms of such arrangement by accepting the said sheep in lieu of the said general cargo.

With regard to the second replication, to the twelfth plea.—That the master knowing, as he is admitted to have done, of the original arrangements with the plaintiffs and the defendant, had full power, without any express or direct authority from the defendant in that behalf, to alter the terms of such arrangement by accepting the sheep in lieu of the said general cargo.

The defendants' points of argument.—First, that the order of council mentioned in the first and second counts of the declaration, and the 75th section of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act 1869, under which they were made, were intended solely for the protection of the "animals," and for the prevention of contagious diseases, and not for the benefit of the owners of animals, and that no action lies for the breach of order; secondly, that the only remedy for the breach of the said order is by proceeding for the penalties imposed by the said Act in manner therein pointed out; thirdly, that assuming that an action would lie in respect of the matters declared on in the first and second counts, the defendant is protected by the terms of the bill of lading as pleaded in the third, fourth, and fifth pleas; fourthly, in respect to the fifth plea, that that plea is sufficient without any allegation negating the supposition that the sheep were thrown overboard in consequence of the supposed breach of duty, which should have been replied or new assigned if the plaintiffs rely thereon; fifthly, that the twelfth plea is good in substance; sixthly, that the knowledge and consent of the master as stated in the second replication to the twelfth plea is immaterial, and affords no answer to the matters alleged in the said twelfth plea.

Hugh Shield (with him was C. Russell, Q.C.), argued on behalf of the defendant in support of the demurrer to the declaration.—The declaration shows no cause of action. This statute was passed expressly for a public purpose, namely, the prevention of contagious diseases amongst cattle being introduced into this country by means of animals imported hither from over the sea, and it in no way contemplated or intended to confer any benefit on individuals. The proposition contended for on the part of the defendant is that a statutory regulation, made merely in the performance or furtherance of a public purpose, and not for the benefit of an individual, and more especially where a penalty is inflicted on anyone breaking or contravening such regulation, will not support an action at the suit of an individual who finds himself aggrieved by such breach or contravention. In Couch v. Steel (3 E. & B. 402; 23 L. J. 125, Q. B.), an action by a seaman against a shipowner for neglecting to supply and keep on board a supply of medicine, as required by the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 112, s. 18, whereby the plaintiff's health was injured, was held to be maintainable on the ground that, notwithstanding the Act imposed a penalty for the shipowner's breach of duty in that respect, as to the public, yet sailors sustaining a private injury from the breach of the statutable duty were entitled to maintain an action for damages. In the judgment of the court in that case, delivered by Lord Campbell, C.J., his Lordship explains the ground of the decision in an old case in Rolle, as follows: "In a case cited 1 Rolle Abr. 106, Action sur Case, (M), pl. 16, it appears to have been held that a person having without the king's licence imported cards into England, contrary to statute 3 Edw. 4, he was not liable to an action at the suit of one to whom the king had granted a licence to import cards, paying rent to the king, and who alleged that he was thereby disabled from paying his rent; as the statute provides that the cards unlawfully imported were forfeited, and the remedy given by the statute ought to be pursued. There, however," (says Lord Campbell) "the prohibition does not seem to have been intended for the benefit of the person to whom the licence was granted, and the damage which he sustained may have been considered too remote." That observation of Lord Campbell is strictly applicable here. Again, the case of Stevens v. Jeacocke and others (11 Q. B. 731; 17 L. J. 163, Q. B.) is on all fours with the present case. If by the statutory regulations the plaintiff has any property right, or anything for the benefit of his property, then, for the breach of that right he might have an action. But in Stevens v. Jeacocke no kind of property right was conferred on anybody by the Act of Parliament (4 & 5 Vict. c. lvii). Its effect was simply to restrict the common law right which everybody has to fish. So here there is nothing done to confer a property right on anybody, but only to restrict a right to bring cattle by ship to this country without the observance of certain regulations. So, again, in Atkinson v. The Newcastle and Gateshead Waterworks Company (L. Rep. 6 Ex. 404), the provisions with regard to the defendant's duty with respect to the water pressure were clearly for the benefit of individual householders in case of fire, and so, though a penalty was imposed by their Act of Parliament on the defendants for any breach of such duty, yet this court held that the plaintiff, who had suffered damage from a fire by reason of such breach, was entitled to recover in an action against them. [POLLOCK, B. refers to Blamires v. The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company in the Exchequer Chamber (L. Rep. 8 Ex. 283; 42 L. J. 182, Q. B.). He referred also to Cullen v. Trimble and others (26 L. T. Rep. N.S. 691; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 316; 41 L. J. 132, Mag. Cas.; and 226 Q. B.) as to the implied jurisdiction of justices to convict summarily for offences against the Act.

Herschell, Q.C. (with whom was James Mellor), for the plaintiffs, contra, supported the declaration. Two objections had been taken against the plaintiff's right to maintain this action. First, that the statute created no duty in respect of the breach of which an action would lie; and, secondly, that there can be no action for the breach of a duty, in respect of which breach the statute has provided a specific remedy by the infliction of a penalty. The defendant has admittedly committed a breach of the order, and the result of that breach may have been to inflict loss and damage upon the plaintiffs. Speaking generally, an action may be maintained for the breach of a statutory duty where injury accrues therefrom, as here, to an individual; and so the plaintiffs here can recover. But it is said on the defendant's part that this statute confers no benefit on individuals. Now it is clear that a damage has arisen to the plaintiffs from this breach of duty, whether it be a damage contemplated by the statute or not, and a damage which would not have happened if the statute had been complied with. [POLLOCK, B.—If the Privy Council had made an order that pens should be placed on board in order to prevent animals from being washed overboard, would not that have been ultra vires?] Whatever may have been the object and intention of the Legislature in the matter, the obvious and inevitable result of the prescribed pens being placed on board is to prevent the occurrence of such an accident as that which has happened in this case. No doubt the intention was to prevent "unnecessary suffering" to the animals, and to that end pens of a particular kind are directed to be used, and it is a necessary result of the legislative enactment that such pens are a protection to the animals from being washed overboard. Granted that it is done to benefit the animals, but they cannot be benefited without a benefit accruing therefrom to the owner, and it is a fallacy to say that this is not an enactment for the owner's benefit. It is such, whatever the intention was, and having lost that benefit by reason of the breach of duty the plaintiffs are entitled to their action. Had the sheep been thrown down on board and had their legs broken through the want of these footholds, an action would then have been maintainable, and is it to be said that there is to be no action when they are drowned, and utterly lost through the same default? [PIGOTT, B.—The damage you allege in the declaration is not that the animals were exposed to "unnecessary suffering." AMPHLETT, B.—They are more likely to take disease if they are crowded and huddled together on the passage.] But again, the statutory law is the basis of the contract between the owner of the animals and the shipowner here, and it must be assumed that the latter will perform and observe all the obligations cast by the law upon him. If that be so, then the declaration is good, because it is not the case of a stranger suing for the breach of a statute, but an owner of animals who had made a contract with the shipowner on the faith of the statute being obeyed. That distinguishes this case from Stevens v. Jeacocks and the other cases cited on the other side, in which there was no such contract. But that case is also distinguishable on another ground, namely, that the statute in that case conferred a right and annexed certain specific penalties for its infringement, and the common law right was taken away. The grounds of the decision in that case do not apply to the present case.

GORRIS AND ANOTHER v. SCOTT.

[Ex.]

KELLY, C.B.—It seems to me that the declaration in this case cannot be sustained, and that the action is not maintainable, and that therefore our judgment should be for the defendant. The plaintiff's are cattle dealers at Hamburg, and the defendant is the owner of a steam vessel, which, in March 1873, was lying at Hamburg, and on board which vessel the plaintiffs shipped a quantity of sheep for transport to England. The action is brought by the plaintiffs to recover damages from the defendant by reason of a large number of the sheep having been washed overboard in a heavy gale during the voyage, and drowned, in consequence of the defendant having failed to provide on board his vessel fit and proper pens with proper and sufficient battens or other footholds for the sheep as he was bound and required to do under the provisions of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act 1864 (30 & 33 Vict. c. 70), and the order in council made and passed in pursuance and under the authority of that Act. That act was passed for purely sanitary purposes, its object being the prevention of disease amongst cattle imported into this country, and the consequent spreading of such disease amongst cattle in England; and as a means to that end, certain orders and regulations were made and issued by the Privy Council, and are now in force, "for protecting such animals from unnecessary suffering during the passage, and on landing," and the particular order, which the defendant in this action is charged with violating, provides that "the places used for animals on board vessels, on their transit by sea from any foreign port to this country" shall be "divided into pens by substantial divisions, each pen not to exceed 9ft. in breadth or 15ft. in length," and that "the floor of each pen shall have proper battens or other footholds thereon." The objects of these regulations was really to prevent unnecessary suffering to the animals by their being overcrowded, and tumbling and jostling over and against one another on the passage, and so being brought hither in a condition which should render them more liable to become infected with disease. Now, the defendant has violated these regulations, and as the consequence thereof, the plaintiff's sheep have been washed overboard and drowned, and the answer which is made by the defendant to the claims contained in the declaration is, that the Act which provides all these regulations has imposed a specific pecuniary penalty upon the shipowner for the breach of them, which penalty can be sued for, and that consequently no action for damages, by reason of such breach of duty on the shipowner's part, will lie.

No doubt the general rule in such cases is that where an Act of Parliament prescribes a certain duty, and imposes a penalty upon the breach or non-performance of that duty, the remedy pointed out by the Act must be pursued, and no other. But then it is said that, under certain circumstances, if special damage results to anyone from the breach or violation of the statutory duty, there is then also a remedy for such damage by way of action for such breach of duty, and that is true; but in cases only where, by the Act of Parliament whose provisions are thus violated, a benefit is conferred upon the individual who suffers from the breach of duty. And if the protection or the benefit of the individual owner of the animals were the object and intention of the Act of Parliament, then undoubtedly this action might be maintained; but nothing can be more plain, on looking at the Act, than that such was not the object or intention of the Legislature in passing it, but that the providing these pens and footholds was entirely for the protection of the animals themselves from unnecessary suffering during the voyage, and that any private individual benefit was not within the intention of the Act at all. Although an indictment may lie for the breach of a public duty, yet it by no means follows that a person aggrieved may be able to bring an action. The case of a railway company with a statutory obligation upon them to erect gates at a level crossing on their line, and to keep them closed at certain times when trains are about to pass, has been referred to. If in consequence of the company's breach of this duty in either not erecting the gates, or not keeping them closed, any person in crossing the line is run down by a passing train and injured, no doubt he may maintain an action against the company for such injury; and for this reason that, although there has been a breach of a public statutory duty, for which a penalty is imposed by Act of Parliament, still it was the obvious intention of the Legislature that individuals should be protected, and special damage had resulted to the individual by reason of the breach of duty. And if, in the present case, the intention of the Act of Parliament had been that the owners of animals transmitted by sea from a foreign port to this country should be benefited and protected from damage, by loss of their animals from perils of the sea, then an action might have been maintainable.

But on looking at the Act, it is perfectly clear that it was passed, and these orders were made, with a totally different object in view than that of protecting the cattle owner from such damage. Take the preamble of the Act to begin with. It shows that the whole and sole object of the Act was "to prevent the introduction into Great Britain of contagious or infectious diseases among cattle, sheep, and other animals, by prohibiting or regulating the importation of foreign animals." All the provisions of the Act relate to cases where there may be danger of infection from animals arriving in this country by sea in a state of disease, and are pointed at the prevention of such an occurrence, and the orders in council, with the breach of which the defendant is here charged, are expressly issued with a view to promoting the health and comfort of the animals on the voyage, and so to prevent, as far as possible, the introduction and spread of cattle disease in this country. Had the Privy Council made an order for any other purpose, it would have been ultra vires. It is quite true that the sheep, being washed overboard and drowned, may have endured some "unnecessary suffering," but that is not the suffering intended by the Act of Parliament. No doubt if those sheep, from the want of the proper and necessary pens and battens, had endured unnecessary suffering on the voyage, and so had in consequence thereof arrived in this country in a diseased or deteriorated condition, there would then have been a special damage to the owner of them, for which I do not say he might not have had his action. But the special damage here alleged is, not that the sheep endured unnecessary suffering, but that they were washed overboard and drowned, which is really a matter totally apart and distinct from the purpose and object of the Act, or from anything that it was intended to prevent. There might be other objections suggested to the maintenance of the present action, but it is sufficient to say that, for the reasons which I have mentioned, the declaration is bad, and the action cannot be supported.

FIGOTT, B.—I agree with the Lord Chief Baron entirely, and am of opinion that this declaration discloses no cause of action. I will state shortly my view of the matter. This is a declaration under the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act 1869, and it alleges that the Privy Council made certain orders and regulations under that Act for the transit of cattle by sea from foreign ports to this country, and that by reason of a breach or violation of three of these regulations by the defendant, the plaintiffs' sheep were washed overboard by the sea from the defendants' vessel and drowned. That is made the ground of action, and I do not think it is a good one. Now, what was the object of the Legislature in passing this Act of Parliament? The preamble shows clearly what that was; it recites that "whercoas it is expedient to confer on Her Majesty's most honourable Privy Council power to take such measures as may appear from time to time necessary to prevent the introduction into Great Britain of contagious or infectious diseases among cattle, sheep, and other animals, by prohibiting or regulating the importation of foreign animals;" and then, in furtherance of that object, by sect. 75 power is given to the Privy Council "from time to time to make such orders as they think expedient for all or any of the following purposes" (amongst others), "1, for insuring a proper supply of food and water during the passage and on landing to animals brought by sea to this country; 2, for protecting such animals from unnecessary suffering during the passage and on landing;" and then the following orders or provisions are made by the Privy Council in furtherance of that object, with respect to the "transit of animals by sea: 1. Every place used for animals on board vessels shall be divided into pens by substantial divisions. 2. Each pen shall not exceed 9ft. in breadth or 15ft. in length. 3. The floor of each pen shall have proper battens or footholds."

Now, without doubt, the defendant has been guilty of a breach of these regulations; but the object of them was not to prevent the cattle from being washed overboard, but to keep the cattle in good health and condition during the voyage, and so to protect this country from the introduction into it of animals diseased or rendered by suffering on the passage more liable to become diseased. It was never for a moment contemplated to effect any alteration in the relation between the cattle owner and the carrier, except in so far as the special and particular purpose of the Act is concerned. No power is given to the Privy Council to provide something for the purpose of preventing animals from being washed overboard. It would have been altogether different if the result of the defendant's breach of the statutory duty had been that, instead of their being washed overboard, the cattle had contracted a contagious disease. That would have brought the case within Couch v. Steel (ubi sup.), and would have been a special damage giving the plaintiffs a right of action. But the Legislature were here not legislating for the special jury which the plaintiff complains of, but for an entirely other and different purpose; and the effect of the Act is only to regulate the duty between the carrier and the owner of cattle, not generally, but for the particular purpose of the Act.

EX. CH.] STANTON v. RICHARDSON AND OTHERS; RICHARDSON AND OTHERS v. STANTON. [EX. CH.]

POLLOCK, B.—I also think that this declaration is bad on demurrer. I am inclined to agree with Mr. Herschell with respect to the fact of the present action being founded on contract, or brought by a person with whom there was a contract, and that that distinction removes it from the cases of Stevens v. Jeacocke and Atkinson v. The Newcastle and Gateshead Waterworks Company (ubi sup.). In Blamires v. The Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company (ubi sup.) it was held that a non-compliance with certain statutory regulations, as to providing a means of communication between the passengers and the guard of certain trains, was evidence of negligence in an action by a passenger against the railway company to recover compensation for special injuries, the question there being, whether the defendants were guilty of the negligence pointed at by the Act of Parliament in that case, in which the regulations were intended for the express benefit of the passengers, and as a precautionary measure against accidents. Now it must be taken, in the present case, that the plaintiffs sheep were washed away by reason of the want of certain statutory requirements, but that gives the plaintiffs no cause of action, because the Act was passed alio intuitu. What the Privy Council have power to do under sect. 75 is to make regulations for preserving the health of, and preventing unnecessary suffering during their voyage to "animals brought by sea to ports in Great Britain," but the whole thing is governed by this, that they shall be animals brought into Great Britain,—it is to prevent unnecessary suffering to "such animals," that is animals brought by sea from foreign ports into this country, that the order and regulations are made. The Act was designed not to prevent such an accident as happened to the plaintiff's sheep, but to prevent the spread of contagious diseases amongst cattle in this country. These battens or footholds would no doubt be an advantage to the cattle owner in case of rough weather, but it is most desirable that the Act should not be construed so as to import into it that which was not the intention of the Legislature, and so to create a ground of action which they never contemplated.

AMPHLETT, B.—I am quite of the same opinion, and it is not necessary for me to add anything to that which has been already said.

Monday, May 11, 1874.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

(Before COCKBURN, C.J., MELLOR, J., and BRAMWELL, CLEASBY, POLLOCK, and AMPHLETT, BB.)

STANTON v. RICHARDSON; RICHARDSON v. STANTON.

Charter-party—Ship unfit for cargo—Refusal to provide cargo—Warranty of seaworthiness—Reasonableness of cargo.

The shipowner contracted with the charterer to load a full and complete cargo of sugar in bags, hamp in compressed bales, and (or) measurement goods, always sufficient dead weight to ballast the vessel, at Yloilo, and to sail to Cork for orders, to discharge at some point in the United Kingdom.

The rates of freight for wet sugar were specified in the charter-party as higher than those for dry sugar.

Before taking cargo on board the ship was surveyed, and reported to be a first-class risk, and fit to carry a dry and perishable cargo to any part of the world.

A cargo of wet sugar in bags was then shipped by the charterer, but when the bulk had been put on board, it was discovered that there was such an accumulation of molasses in the hold, the result of drainings from the sugar, that the ship would not be seaworthy in her then state; nor could the pumps, in consequence of being clogged, get rid of the drainage, although they were in every respect sufficient for ordinary purposes; nor could any pumps be obtained sufficient to deal with the drainage in a less time than six or seven months.

The ship was ultimately unloaded, and the cargo sent to Europe in another vessel, when the charterer refused to load another cargo.

Cross actions were brought; the one by the shipowner against the charterer for refusing to load a cargo, and also for loading a cargo in such an unfit condition that the ship could not prosecute her voyage; and the other by the charterer against the shipowner, for not taking proper precautions to keep his ship fit for the voyage, and to recover damages for injury to the cargo.

The jury found at the trial, in answer to the judge, that the cargo was a reasonable cargo to be offered; that the ship was unfit to carry the cargo offered to her, or any cargo of wet sugar; that the damage to the sugar was caused by the ship not being reasonably fit to carry a reasonable cargo of wet sugar, and that the ship would not have been seaworthy without new pumps, having such a cargo of wet sugar on board.

Held (affirming the decision of the Court of Common Pleas), that the shipowner was bound to provide a reasonable ship to carry a reasonable cargo of the kind specified in the charter-party, that the charterer was bound to offer such a cargo, and that by reason of the unfitness of the ship, the charterer was entitled to recover; also that the charterer must be taken to be absolved altogether. (a)

THESE WERE CROSS-ACTIONS between the owner and charterer of a ship called the Isle of Wight upon a charter-party. The facts at the trial, the fourteen questions put to the jury, and the arguments and judgments below are fully reported: (ante, vol. 1, p. 449; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 421; 27 L. T. Rep. N. S. 513) The court below (Bovill, C. J., and Byles and Brett, JJ.) gave judgment for Mr. Richardson, the charterer. From this decision Mr. Stanton, the shipowner, now appealed.

The points set down for argument on the part of the appellant were: That the judgment of the Court of Common Pleas is erroneous; that upon the leave reserved the verdicts should be entered respectively for George Stanton; that Richardson had no right to throw up the charter-party and refuse to load a cargo as he did; that upon the true construction of the charter, and upon the facts found relating thereto, Stanton had performed all things on his part to be performed, and that therefore Richardson could not throw up the charter and refuse to load as he did; that there was no such total frustration of the voyage or adventure as to entitle Richardson to throw up the charter and refuse to load as he did; that the learned judge misdirected the jury in telling them that under the present charter there was a warranty on the part of Stanton that the ship was fit to carry a reasonable cargo of Yloilo wet sugar; that the learned judge misdirected the jury in telling them that there was an obligation on the part of the shipowner and master of the ship to have the ship in a fit state for a reasonable cargo of Yloilo wet sugar; that the learned judge misdirected the jury in directing the jury as to what did or did not constitute a total frustration of the objects of an adventure so as to entitle a charterer to throw up a charter and to refuse to load; that the learned judge misdirected the jury in directing the jury that the master in this case should have possessed the necessary knowledge enabling him to deal with a cargo of Yloilo wet sugar.
