BREACH OF CONTRACT.

1. Contract to build ship—Delivery within specified time — Exceptions — Delay — Force majeure — Vis major — Coal strike — Indirect effect of—Breakdown of machinery.—By an agreement in writing dated the 21st Feb. 1912 the defendants agreed to build a steamer for the plaintiff and deliver her on or before the 28th Feb. 1913. The agreement contained (inter alia) the following clause: "If the said steamer is not delivered entirely ready to purchaser at the above-mentioned time, the builders hereby agree to pay to the purchaser for liquidated damages, and not by way of penalty, the sum of 10*l.* sterling for each day of delay and in reduction of the prices stipulated in this contract, being excepted only the cause of force majeure and (or) strikes of workmen of the building yard where the vessel is being built, or the workshops where the machinery is being made, or at the works where steel is being manufactured for the steamer, or any works of any sub-contractor." The steamer was not delivered till the 22nd Aug. 1913, and in order to get delivery the plaintiff paid under protest the full price without any deduction for delay. Owing to the coal strike of 1912 there was a delay of seventy days and a further delay of seven days on account of a breakdown of machinery and a shipwrights' strike. There was also some delay due to bad weather, to the absence of men attending football matches and attending the funeral of their manager. The plaintiff claimed as damages or money had and received by the defendants to his use 1750*l.*, or 10*l.* per day for every day's delay in delivery after the 28th Feb. 1913. Held, that the words force majeure covered the delay occasioned by the consequential results of the coal strike and also breakdown of machinery, but did not include the other matters claimed. (K.B. Div. Ct.) Matsoukis v. Priestman and Co. 68

CARRIAGE OF GOODS.

1. Charter-party—Sale of vessel after date of charter-party—Tender of vessel—Refusal of charterers to load — Whether charter-party affected by sale.—On the 15th Sept. 1913, a vessel which formerly belonged to the claimants was chartered by the respondents to proceed to Odessa and load wheat or other grain for Rotterdam or Hamburg. While the vessel was discharging, before proceeding to Odessa, she was sold by the claimants, who duly notified the charterers of the sale. She was duly tendered for loading at Odessa, but the respondents, the charterers, refused to provide a cargo. In arbitration proceedings it was found as a fact that the claimants were ready and willing to perform their contract, and that they had duly tendered the vessel. On the case stated: Held, that while a party to a contract cannot so assign it as to make the assignee solely liable, he may arrange for another person to discharge the burden of the contract, provided it does not involve the doing of something which requires special performance by him, and that, inasmuch as the provision of a ship did not require any personal skill on the part of the original owners, they were entitled to sue upon it, although they were only ready to perform it vicariously through the new owners of the vessel. (Atkin, J.) Fratelli Sorrentino v. Buerger. (See No. 12 below.) 1

2. Charter-party—Demurrage—Strike—Charterer's refusal to load.—The terms of a charter-party provided (inter alia) that the charterer should load a cargo within a period of ninety-six running hours after notice of readiness to receive cargo, and to pay demurrage if the ship was delayed beyond her loading time. The parties mutually exempted each other from liability for time lost through strikes preventing or delaying the working, loading, or shipping of the cargo. A strike of engineers was in progress when the steamer arrived at the port of loading and notice of readiness to load was received, and the shipowners refused to sign on engineers at the terms they were demanding. On the day after notice of readiness to load was given, the charterer asked the shipowners to give him an assurance that the engineers would be signed on and that the ship would sail as soon as possible, which the shipowners declined to give. When the shipowners received a full complement of engineers fifteen days after the ship was ready to receive the cargo, the charterer commenced loading. In an action by the shipowners to recover demurrage in respect of the detention of the ship for 413 hours beyond her loading time: Held, that the charterer was liable, as the existence of a strike which might affect the time of sailing did not prevent the cargo from being loaded, nor excuse the charterer from his obligation to load within the period provided by the charter-party. (Bailhache, J.) Ropner and Co. v. Ronnebeck 47

3. Charter-party—"Thirds" or sharing system—Owner and master—Loss of cargo through unseaworthiness of vessel—Liability of owner—Position of master.—A ketch was owned by two co-owners, and worked on the basis that the master took two-thirds of the gross freights, out of which he paid the mate and the crew, the provisions, and expenses of the voyage. The owners took one-third of the gross freights, subject to deductions for port dues. The owners provided for the upkeep and insurance of the vessel. The ketch loaded a cargo under a charter-party made by the master, which cargo was lost, as was alleged by the owners thereof, through the unseaworthiness of the vessel. An action was accordingly brought by the owners of the cargo against one of the co-owners of the ketch. It was decided by Pickford J. (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 501; 110 L. T. Rep. 776) that the allegation of the plaintiffs that the ketch was unseaworthy at the time when she sailed was well-founded; and that the condition of the ketch was not due to the loading berth at which she was moored being defective or dangerous. But Pickford J. decided that the contract of charter-party was made by the master personally; and that the defendant was therefore not liable. The plaintiffs appealed. Held, that the findings of Pickford, J. in favour of the plaintiffs on the issues of unseaworthiness and condition of the vessel were abundantly supported by the evidence, and could not therefore be disturbed by the Court of Appeal. But held, that there was a contract of charter-party between the plaintiffs and the defendant, although there was no reference therein nor in the bill of lading to the "owner" of the vessel; that the master was not bailee of the vessel, but was the agent or servant of the owner; and that the real control of the vessel rested with the defendant, and not with the master. Bernard v. Aaron (9 Jur. N. S. 470) distinguished. Steel v. Lester (37 L. T. Rep. 642; 3 C. P. Div. 121) applied. Decision of Pickford, J. (12 Asp. p. 501) on this point reversed. (Ct. of App.) Associated Portland Cement Manufacturers (1900) Limited v. Ashton 40

4. Freight—Assignment — Disbursements — Legal and equitable assignment—Practice at port of Cardiff.—The plaintiffs, H. and Co., carrying on business at Cardiff as ship's brokers and agents, sued the defendants for 317*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* as freight payable for the carriage of goods from Riga to Cardiff per the steamship C., a German ship, for which the plaintiffs were acting as agents, the defendants being the consignees of a portion of the cargo. The ship arrived at Cardiff on the 20th July 1914. The freight could not be ascertained until the cargo had been measured, and the plaintiffs, following the practice of the port of Cardiff, took the master of the C. a document in the following terms, which was signed by the master: "Cardiff, 20th July 1914.—Dear Sirs,—I hereby authorise Messrs H. and Co., Cardiff, to collect the freight due to my steamer the steamship C. on the cargo of timber from Riga on my steamer." On the strength of that document the plaintiffs made disbursements on behalf of the ship and collected some of the freight, some of which they remitted to Germany, after which a balance was still due to the plaintiffs in respect of disbursements. The plaintiffs gave the defendants due notice of the master's letter, which they relied upon as an assignment. Held, that the document was not an assignment at all; but if it were it was at most an equitable assignment, and, as the assignees had not been joined, the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover. (Bailhache, J.) H. G. Harper and Co. v. John Bland and Co. Limited 49

5. Loss of cargo by fire caused by unseaworthiness—"Actual fault or privity of" owners—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 502.—Parties who invoke the protection of and plead sect. 502 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 must bring themselves within its terms. Thus a limited company can only free themselves from liability under this section if they discharge the onus of proof which is on them by showing that the matter for which they seek protection arose without their actual fault or privity. By sect. 502 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 the owners of a British seagoing ship shall not be liable to make good to any extent whatever "any loss or damage happening without his actual fault or privity" where any goods or merchandise taken in or put on board his ship are lost or damaged by reason of fire on board the ship. A cargo on board a ship was destroyed by fire, the effective cause of the loss being the stranding of the vessel in a gale caused by the unseaworthiness of her boilers which prevented her getting up sufficient pressure of steam to avoid being driven to the leeward. The shipowners claimed to be protected by sect. 502 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. Held, on the facts, that the shipowners were not entitled to the protection of that section inasmuch as they had not discharged the onus of showing that the loss had not happened without their actual fault or privity. Decision of Court of Appeal (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 381; 109 L. T. Rep. 433; 1914 1 K. B. 419) affirmed. (H. of L.) Lennard's Carrying Company Limited v. Asiatic Petroleum Company Limited 81

6. Charter-party — Marine insurance — War risk "for charterer's account"—Charterer's duty to insure.—The plaintiffs were the owners of a Dutch steamship, which was chartered by the defendants under a charter-party which provided (inter alia) that the owners were to pay and provide for insurance, that the charter-party was not to be construed as a demise of the ship, and that the owners were to remain responsible for insurance. The charter-party also contained the following written clause: "War risk, if any required, for the charterers' account. It is understood and agreed that value for war risk at all times to be based on values stated in owners' annual policy." On the 21st Sept. 1914, while on a voyage from Portland, Oregon, to Ireland with a cargo of wheat, the ship was sunk by a German cruiser. In an action by the plaintiffs to recover damages for the defendants' failure to insure the steamer against war risks after having been requested by the plaintiffs to do so: Held, that the defendants were liable, as the business meaning of the words "charterers' account" were that the charterers were bound to provide and pay for a war risk policy. (Bailhache, J.) Holland Gulf Stoomvaart Maatschappij v. Watson, Munro, and Co. Limited. (See No. 17 below.) 92

7. Contract—C.i.f.—Tender of bill of lading with or without policy of insurance after outbreak of war—Buyer not bound to accept.—Certain beans were sold under a c.i.f. contract before the outbreak of war between Germany and England to be shipped in a German bottom from China to Naples. The sellers and buyers were English firms. The price was to include freight as per bill of lading and insurance—payment net cash in London on arrival of goods at port of discharge in exchange for bill of lading and policies; but payment to be made in no case later than three months from date of bill of lading. The beans were shipped before the war, after which the vessel took refuge in a neutral port. The sellers sought to recover (in one case) on a tender of the German bill of lading, and (in another case) on a tender of a German bill of lading and a German policy of insurance. Held, that after the outbreak of war the tender of the above documents was in neither case good tender. (Scrutton, J.) Arnhold, Karberg, and Co. v. Blythe, Greene, Jourdain, and Co. Limited; Theodor Schneider and Co. v. Burgett and Newsam. (See No. 13 below.) 94

8. Bill of lading—Express contract of liability for unseaworthiness — Limitation of time for making claims—Whether limitation applies in case of unseaworthiness — Transhipment of goods.—The indorsees of bills of lading sued shipowners for breach of contract and for damages for injury to goods carried. The goods were shipped upon one ship at one place, and later at another transhipped into another ship. The first ship arrived on the 13th April 1912, and the second on the 23rd April. The goods were damaged by the unseaworthiness of the first ship. Clause 3 of the bill of lading provided for possible transhipment of the goods. Clause 12 provided as follows: "No claim that may arise in respect of goods shipped by this steamer will be recoverable unless made at the port of delivery within seven days from the date of steamer's arrival there." Clause 14 provided contractually for liability for unseaworthiness. No claim was made in respect of the goods shipped within the time limited by clause 12. Bailhache, J. held that as the first ship was unseaworthy the time limitation clause did not apply. Held, by the Court of Appeal, that as there was an express and not an implied contract in the bill of lading for liability for unseaworthiness clause 12 applied, and the shipowner was protected by it as regards the goods arriving by the first ship, which was the steamer indicated in the clause. But held by Pickford and Bankes, L.JJ. that the shipowner had not protected himself by clear and unambiguous words as regards the goods arriving by the second ship, to which ship part of the goods had been transhipped from the first, and there was consequently no answer to the claim of the indorsees in respect of the goods which arrived by the second. Tattersall v. National Steamship Company (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 206; 50 L. T. Rep. 299; 12 Q. B. Div. 297) and Morris v. Oceanic Steam Navigation Company Limited (16 Times L. Rep. 533) discussed. Order of Bailhache, J. varied. (Ct. of App.) Bank of Australasia v. Clan Line Steamers Limited 99

9. Charter-party—Loss of time—Prevention of efficient working—Cesser of hire.—A charter-party contained the following clause: "In the event of loss of time through deficiency of men or stores, repairs, breakdown of machinery, pumps, pipes, or boilers (whether partial or otherwise), collision or stranding, or damage preventing the efficient working of the vessel for more than forty-eight running hours, the payment of hire shall cease until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service." On the construction of the clause: Held, that for losses of time of less than forty-eight hours no claim for cesser of hire could be made; but where, from any of the causes named in the charter-party, there were losses of time exceeding forty-eight hours, the charterer was entitled to cesser of hire for the whole of the time so lost. Decision of Bailhache, J. (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 515; 111 L. T. Rep. 410; (1914) 3 K. B. 156) affirmed. (Ct. of App.) Meade, King, Robinson, and Co. v. Jacobs and Co. and others 105

10. Trading with the enemy—C.i.f. contract—Buyers and sellers carrying on business in England—Tender of documents after outbreak of war—Goods to deliver at Hamburg—Seller not entitled to force acceptance of documents involving trading with the enemy.—The claimants, who were English merchants of Liverpool, in May 1914 sold certain Chilian honey to the respondents who were also English merchants at Liverpool, to be shipped on a German-owned steamer and delivered at Hamburg, terms c.i.f. cash in Liverpool against documents. The honey was shipped on the 28th June and the shipment was declared on the 28th July; but the ship was interned at a neutral port shortly after the outbreak of war. On the 4th Aug. war was declared with Germany, and on the 5th Aug. a proclamation was issued prohibiting trading with the enemy, and on the same day the shipping documents were tendered. The respondents having refused payment on the documents: Held, that the buyers were justified in refusing the tender of the documents on the ground that the delivery of the documents, including the bill of lading, which was the document of title to the goods, and the payment of the price by the buyers, would have been a carrying out of the contract, when a dealing with goods constituting a trading therein forbidden by the proclamation, and that the contract of sale had become dissolved by the war, because its further performance by either party would involve illegal acts. Decision of Atkin, J. (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 591; 112 L. T. Rep. 298; (1915) 1 K. B. 365) affirmed. (Ct. of App.) Duncan Fox and Co. v. Schrempft and Bonke... 131

11. Demurrage—Strike clause, construction and effect of—Delay.—The appellants chartered the steamer G. to carry a cargo of coal, of which they were the consignees, from B. Dock to V. C. in the Argentine. By clause 8 of the charter-party the cargo was to be taken from alongside by the consignees at the port of discharge free of expense and risk to the steamer at the average rate of 200 tons per day, weather permitting, Sundays and holidays excepted, provided the steamer could deliver at that rate. If the steamer were longer detained the consignees were to pay demurrage at the rate therein specified, "time to commence when the steamer is ready to unload and written notice given whether in berth or not. In case of strikes, lock-outs, civil commotions or any other causes or accidents beyond the control of the consignees which prevents or delays the discharging such time is not to count unless the steamer is already on demurrage." The steamer arrived at V. C. and notice of readiness to discharge was given on the 12th Jan. 1912. At the date of her arrival there was a strike of engine drivers and stokers at the port, which continued until the 15th Feb. 1912, but there was a partial resumption of the work of discharging coal-laden steamers at the port between the 27th Jan. and the 15th Feb., and during that period there were discharged from the various steamers in the port delayed by the strike 6269 tons of coal=6¼ normal days' work, the normal rate of discharge from the four berths in the port being 1000 tons per day. The G. did not get into berth till the 1st March, and completed her discharge on the 23rd March. Held, that the words "such time" in clause 8 of the charter-party meant the time for which the discharging was actually prevented or delayed by the strike, and had no application to delay in getting a berth in consequence of a strike having delayed the discharging of other ships; and that the 6¼ could be counted by the owner as lay days. London and Northern Steamship Company Limited v. Central Argentine Railway Limited (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 303; 108 L. T. Rep. 527) approved. Decision of Court of Appeal affirmed. (H. of L.) Central Argentine Railway Limited v. Marwood 153

12. Charter-party—Sale of vessel after date of charter-party—Tender of vessel—Refusal of charterers to load—Effect of sale.—On the 15th Sept. 1913, a vessel which formerly belonged to the claimants was chartered by the respondents to proceed to Odessa and load wheat or other grain for Rotterdam or Hamburg. While the vessel was discharging, before proceeding to Odessa, she was sold by the claimants, who duly notified the charterers of the sale. She was duly tendered for loading at Odessa, but the respondents refused to provide a cargo. In arbitration proceedings it was found as a fact that the claimants were ready and willing to perform their contract, and that they had duly tendered the vessel. On a case stated: Held, that there being a finding that both vendors and purchasers were ready and willing to perform all the obligations under the contract, the original owners were not precluded from carrying out the contract by the mere transfer of the ship with the benefit of the charter-party. Decision of Atkin, J. (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 1; 112 L. T. Rep. 294; (1915) 1 K. B. 307) affirmed. (Ct. of App.) Fratelli Sorrentino v. Buerger 164

13. Contract—C.i.f.—Tender of bill of lading with or without policy of insurance after outbreak of war—Buyers not bound to accept.—Certain goods were sold under a c.i.f. contract before the outbreak of war between Germany and this country to be shipped in a German ship from China to Naples. The sellers and buyers were both English firms. The price was to include freight as per bill of lading and insurance, payment net cash in London on arrival of goods at port of discharge in exchange for bill of lading and policies; but payment to be made in no case later than three months from date of bill of lading. The goods were shipped before the war, after which the vessel took refuge in a neutral port. The sellers sought to recover (in one case) on a tender of a German bill of lading and an English policy of insurance and (in another case) on a tender of a German bill of lading and German policy of insurance. Held, that the documents were not such as the sellers were entitled to tender to obtain payment of the price of the cargoes shipped, the documents at the date of the tender not being valid and effective; and that therefore the sellers were not entitled to recover payment of the goods against the documents. Decision of Scrutton, J. (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 94; 113 L. T. Rep. 185) affirmed. (Ct. of App.) Arnhold Karberg and Co. v. Blythe, Green, Jourdain, and Co. Limited; Theodor Schneider and Co. v. Burgett and Newsam 235

c.i.f. from Eastern ports to Antwerp. There were two ships concerned, the G., an English ship, in respect of which the cargo was declared on the 3rd July, and the U. R., a German vessel, the cargo in which was declared on the 31st July. At the outbreak of war the latter ship became the ship of an alien enemy. The relative bills of lading and insurance policy were never tendered, but the date of their tender was taken to be the 18th Aug. As to the G., she and her cargo were seized by the enemy on the high seas and taken to Hamburg, so that at the time when the documents were tendered to the buyers the contract had become impossible owing to the seizure. Held, that, so far as the cargo on the German vessel was concerned, the tender of documents was bad; that as to the goods on board the English ship the tender of the documents was a good tender inasmuch as the performance of the contract between buyer and seller would not at the time have been illegal. There was no illegality in calling on the buyer to deliver at Antwerp, because if he could have got his ship to Antwerp it would have been perfectly legal. The buyers were therefore liable. (K. B. Div.) Weis and Co. Limited v. Credit Colonial et Commercial 242

15. Charter-party — Time charter — Restraint of princes—Whether charterers relieved from hire —Whether commercial object of voyage frustrated.—The commercial frustration of an adventure by delay means the happening of some unforeseen delay without the fault of either party to a contract of such a character as that by the fulfilment of the contract in the only way in which fulfilment is contemplated and practicable is so ordinately postponed as that its fulfilment when the delay is over will not accomplish the only object or objects which both parties to the contract must have known that each of them had in view at the time when they made the contract, and for the accomplishment of which object or objects the contract was made. In June 1914 a ship was chartered for two Baltic rounds. Having left Hull, laden with coal, she was sub-chartered for a voyage from Finland to Blyth, Northumberland. The hire of the steamship was paid by the charterers to the owners in advance up to the 14th Aug. On the 2nd Aug. the vessel was detained by the Russian Government, war having broken out on the 1st Aug. between Russia and Germany. On the 14th Aug. the owners directed the captain to remain in port at Kotka, and on the 28th Aug. the British Consul at the same place was directed to repatriate the crew, which was done. The charter-party contained a clause providing in what events payment of hire was to cease, but did not include restraint of princes, rulers, and people, although that was in the general exceptions clause. The hire was paid up to but not since the 14th Aug. 1914. Disputes having been referred, arbitrators, by a first award, found that in the circumstances no time hire was due, but subject to the opinion of the court as to the meaning of the words "restraint of princes," &c., in the charter-party. By a second award the arbitrators found that at no time between the 14th Aug. and the 20th Oct. 1914 was there any reasonable probability of the vessel proceeding on her chartered voyage, and that no voyage could have been undertaken between those dates which would not have involved risk of capture, and that the commercial adventure had been frustrated. Held, that the charterers were liable for hire; that the telegram of the owners directing repatriation of the crew did not amount to a withdrawal of the ship; that even if the vessel was detained by "restraint" that did not excuse payment of hire; and that in finding "frustration" as a fact the arbitrators had misdirected themselves, inasmuch as delay due to a cause contemplated and provided for by the charter-party, even though the delay itself is protracted beyond what might have been expected, does not amount to frustration of the adventure. (K. B. Div.) Admiral Shipping Company Limited v. Weidner, Hopkins, and Co. (See No. 49 below.) 246

16. Charter-party—"Penalty for non-performance"—Limitation of liability—Construction.—A charter-party contained the following clause: "Penalty for non-performance of this agreement proved damages, not exceeding the estimated amount of freight." Held, that this constituted a penalty clause and not a limitation of liability. (K. B. Div.) Wall v. Rederiaktiebolaget Luggude 271

17. Charter-party—Marine insurance—War risk "for charterers' account"—Duty to insure.—The plaintiffs were the owners of a steamship that was chartered by the defendants under a charter-party which provided (inter alia) that the owners were to pay and provide for insurance; that the charter-party was not to be construed as a demise of the ship; and that the owners were to remain responsible for insurance. The charter-party also contained the following written clause: "War risk, if any required, for charterers' account. It is understood and agreed that value for war risk at all times to be based on values stated in owners' annual policy." On the 21st Sept. 1914, while on a voyage, the steamship was sunk by a German cruiser. The plaintiffs brought an action to recover damages for the defendants' failure to insure the steamer against war risk after having been requested by the plaintiffs so to do. Held, that on the true construction of the charter-party the charterers were to bear the costs of the insurance; but that the insurance was to be effected by the owners and not by the charterers. Decision of Bailhache, J. (ante, p. 92; 113 L. T. Rep. 178) reversed. (Ct. of App.) Holland Gulf Stoomvaart Mattschappij v. Watson, Munro, and Co. 279

18. Time charter-party—Oil tank steamer—Period of charter unexpired—Ship requisitioned by Government as transport for troops—Structural alterations to adapt her for that purpose—Whether contract determined by act of Government.—By a charter-party dated in May 1912 the owners of a ship designed to carry cargoes of oil in bulk agreed to let and the charterers agreed to hire the ship for the period of sixty calendar months commencing from the day at which the ship should be placed at the disposal of the charterers—which period would expire in Dec. 1917—to be employed in lawful trades for voyages between certain specified ports for the carriage of refined petroleum and (or) crude oil and (or) its products, as the charterers or their agents should direct. The charterers were to pay as freight a fixed sum of 1750*l.* per month. Under certain restrictions the carriage of other suitable cargo than oil was to be allowed. Power was conferred on the charterers to underlet the ship on Admiralty or other service, but without prejudice to the charter-party. There was an exception of (amongst other things) "restraints of princes, rulers, and people." The ship was requisitioned by the Government in Dec. 1914, and was for some time employed in carrying water. In Feb. 1915 she was altered by the Government to adapt her for the transport of troops. The charterers had paid and were willing to continue to pay the stipulated freight. In these circumstances the question arose whether the charterers were entitled to treat the contract as subsisting or whether the owners were right in contending that it was put at an end. Held, that the adventure on the part of the owners was that the ship should earn the freight for the entire term of the charter, the adventure on the part of the charterers being that they should have the use of the ship; that the adventure on the part of the owners had not been frustrated; and that it could not therefore be said that the entire adventure had been frustrated. Held, also, that the event which had happened was within the meaning of the exception "restraint of princes, rulers, and people." Decision of Atkin, J. affirmed. (Ct. of App.) Re Arbitration between F. A. Tamplin Steamship Company Limited and Anglo-Mexican Petroleum Produce Company Limited. (See No. 40 below.) 284

19. Charter-party—Withdrawal by owners before expiration of term—Subsequent issue of writ for hire due—Whether withdrawal waived.—A vessel was chartered in June 1914 for five months, at so much per month, payable in advance. On the 13th Aug., a month's hire being due and unpaid, the owners telegraphed to the charterers, saying that they withdrew the steamer pursuant to a clause in the charter-party. Half an hour later they issued a writ in an action to recover the month's hire. Arbitrators found as a fact that the ship was properly withdrawn, but they reserved for the opinion of the court the question whether the notice of withdrawal, if properly given, was withdrawn or waived by the subsequent conduct of the owners in issuing the writ. Held, that in the circumstances of the case the notice of withdrawal had been properly given, and that it had not been withdrawn by the subsequent conduct of the owners. (K. B. Div.) Wulfsberg and Co. v. Owners of Steamship Weardale. (See No. 29 below.) 296

20. Charter-party—Exception of "restraint of princes"—Reasonable anticipation of restraint—Breach by shipowner—Liability—Measure of damages.—A breach of contract is not excused by reasonable anticipation of the happening of an event which, if it happens, will excuse the performance of the contract. A charter-party excepted "arrests and restraints of princes." The shipowners refused to provide a ship which by the charter-party they had agreed to provide on the ground that there was reasonable apprehension that if they fulfilled the charter the ship would be seized by the King's enemies. Held, that the shipowners were guilty of a breach of the charter-party. The plaintiffs chartered a vessel from the defendants to enable them to fulfil a contract by which they agreed to buy a cargo of sulphate of ammonia from a Belgian firm. The defendants having failed to perform the charter, the plaintiffs were forced to repudiate the contract of sale and purchase, and as a result of arbitration paid the Belgian firm 4500*l.* In an action by the plaintiffs against the defendants for damages for breach of the charter: Held, that the plaintiffs could not recover from the defendants the 4500*l.*, such damage being too remote. The estimated profit of the venture, to carry out which the plaintiffs chartered the defendants' vessel, was 3800*l.* The defendants failed to provide their vessel in breach of the charter-party. In an action by the plaintiffs against the defendants for damages for the breach the defendants contended that, assuming there had been a breach, the plaintiffs had suffered no loss thereby, since, if the defendants had performed their part of the charter and provided a vessel, the vessel with the plaintiffs' cargo on board would inevitably have fallen into the hands of the King's enemies. Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the 3800*l.* from the defendants, since, although the arguments of the defendants might have been true, the vessel and its cargo would have been insured by the plaintiffs for a sum sufficient to cover the cost of the goods, the freight, the cost of insurance, and a reasonable sum for profit (which would not have been less than 3800*l.*), and that they would have had a claim on their underwriters as for a total loss. (K. B. Div.) Mitsui and Co. v. Watts, Watts, and Co. (See Nos. 31 and 52 below.) 300

21. Bill of lading inconsistent with charter-party—Prevalence of bill of lading—"Perils of the sea."—By a charter-party dated the 28th May 1913 the plaintiffs chartered the steamship K., belonging to the defendants, to proceed to Grindstone Island, New Brunswick, and there load a cargo of timber and therewith proceed to certain ports (including Manchester) as ordered. Freight was to be payable on measurement of quantity delivered as ascertained at port of discharge, and all responsibility of the charterers under the charter was to cease as soon as the cargo was alongside. The mutual exceptions included "perils of the sea." The captain or his agent was empowered to sign bills of lading which, it was agreed, should be "conclusive evidence against the owners as establishing the quantity delivered to the ship as stated therein." The plaintiffs gave instructions that the vessel when loaded should proceed to Manchester. The K. was loaded from lighters, the contents of which was checked by surveyors as it left the shore. Owing to rough weather, a quantity of the timber fell between the lighter and the ship and was lost, but despite this the master of the vessel signed a bill of lading in this form: "Shipped in good order and well conditioned on board the steamship Kylestrome" the quantities of timber contained in the surveyors' reports. The result was that on arrival at Manchester the cargo was found to be short. In an action by the plaintiffs for damages for short delivery the defendants contended that the timber was lost through perils of the sea, since by the charter-party, the terms of which must be incorporated in the bill of lading, the responsibility of the charterer ceased as soon as the cargo was alongside, whereby the responsibility of the defendants commenced and the exception of "perils of the sea" came into operation. Held, that the words in the bill of lading, "shipped . . . on board the steamship Kylestrome," were inconsistent with the provisions in the charter-party that the cargo was only to be delivered alongside, and must prevail; that, in consequence, the exception of "perils of the sea" never came into operation, and the plaintiffs were therefore entitled to succeed. (K. B. Div.) Crossfield and Co. v. Kyle Shipping Company. (See No. 28 below.) 327

22. Coaling contract—Exception of "Interference by war"—Necessity of suppliers to procure coal—Increased freights—Scarcity of ships—Refusal by suppliers to supply coal—Breach of contract—Liabilty.—On the 5th Dec. 1914 a coaling contract was entered into between the plaintiffs, the owners of a line of steamships, and the defendants, a coaling company, by which it was agreed that the plaintiffs should take all the bunker coal they wanted at (inter alia) Algiers from the defendants, and that the defendants should supply all the coal normally needed by the plaintiffs at that port. The form of contract utilised was one in use before the outbreak of the war, and contained a clause allowing the defendants to cancel the contract if either Great Britain or France became engaged in war with any other Power. A slip, however, was pasted on the contract, which provided that, "notwithstanding the war clause in the contract, it is understood that the depots will supply during the present hostilities . . . and should circumstances arise to further interfere in any manner with the supply, shipment, carriage, or delivery of the coals, this contract is subject to cancelment by suppliers." In Feb. 1915 the defendants refused to supply one of the plaintiffs' ships with coal at Algiers, and the plaintiffs were thereby put to expense in obtaining coal elsewhere. In an action by the plaintiffs for breach of contract the defendants contended that they were protected from liability by the exception clause in the contract and the added slip. It appeared that between Dec. 1914 and Feb. 1915 there was a great rise in freights between Cardiff and Algiers. The judge held that the word "supply" in the slip meant supply to the defendants at Cardiff, and not to the plaintiffs at Algiers, and was satisfied that if the defendants carried out the contract they would have had difficulty in chartering a vessel between these places at more than double the freights prevalent when the contract was made. Held, that since, to fulfil their contract, the defendants would not only have been put to extra expense, but would have had difficulty in obtaining ships, there was "interference" within the meaning of the slip, and that, therefore, the defendants were excused from liability. (K. B. Div.) Scheepvaart Mattschappij Gylsen v. North African Coaling Company 339

23. Charter-party—Construction of—Cancellation if ship "commandeered."—The plaintiffs were time charterers of a Greek steamer. The charter-party contained the following clause: "32 Should steamer be commandeered by the Greek Government this charter shall be cancelled." Whilst the steamer was at Marseilles discharging a cargo of coal for the charterers, on the 25th Sept. 1915, a notice was served upon her captain by the Greek Consul-General ordering him to proceed immediately to the Piræus, pursuant to an order of the Royal Greek Government. On the 27th Sept. the defendant gave to the plaintiffs formal notice of cancellation of the charter-party pursuant to clause 32. On the 11th Oct., and while the steamer was still at Marseilles, the Greek Government withdrew their notice of the 25th Sept. and released the ship. Held, that the defendant's vessel had been effectively commandeered by the Greek Government, which had taken control of the vessel, and that the charter-party was therefore cancelled. (Ct. of App.) Capel and Co. v. Soulidi 361

24. Charter-party — Lay days — Completion of loading before expiration of lay days—Acceptance of dispatch money—Failure to free ship as soon as possible—Whether charterers liable in damages.—By a charter-party dated the 1st Feb. 1915 a steamer was to be loaded at an Argentine port and to proceed therefrom as ordered by the charterers to a European port as port of discharge. Dispatch money at the rate of 15*l.* per day was payable for all time saved in loading, and the charterers had the right to keep the steamer for twenty-four hours after completion of loading for the purpose of settling accounts. The steamer was loaded nineteen days before the expiration of the lay or loading days, and in respect of the nineteen days the charterers received dispatch money. Owing to delay by the charterers in deciding as to the port of call, the steamer was kept waiting for the bills of lading and orders for three days. The shipowners claimed damages in respect of this delay, and in arbitration proceedings were awarded 300*l.*, being damages at the rate of 150*l.* for two days. Held, that, the loading time granted to the charterers not having been exceeded, the shipowners were not entitled to claim for demurrage or detention, but only to a return of the dispatch money as money paid for a consideration which had failed. 25. Contract — Indemnity—Warehouseman—Issue of clean warrants—Lighterage—Damage to cargo in possession of lighterman—Warehouseman's liability to purchasers under warrants—Right to indemnity.—In Nov. 1914 the defendants, who were grain merchants, had a cargo of wheat in the steamship G., discharging in the S. Dock, London. The plaintiffs, who were wharfingers, carrying on business in the port of London, agreed to store the wheat. A lighterman was employed to lighter the wheat, and the defendants requested the plaintiffs to issue clean warrants for the wheat, making them deliverable to the defendants or their assigns by indorsement, so that they might sell the wheat. The plaintiffs duly made out the warrants, and the defendants sold the wheat to W. and Co., who came to take delivery of the wheat towards the end of Jan. 1915, when it was discovered that, owing to a leaky barge and exposure to the weather, some of the wheat was unsound, having become damaged before the delivery to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs in consequence became liable on their warrants in damages to W. and Co. Scrutton, J. found that the lighterman was the agent of the defendants. In an action by the plaintiffs against the defendants claiming an indemnity: Held, that the plaintiffs having issued the warrants at the request of the defendants, there was an implied contract by the defendants to indemnify the plaintiffs for the loss, and the defendants were therefore liable. Decision of Scrutton, J. affirmed. (Ct. of App.) Groves and Sons v. Webb and Kenward 386

26. Carriage by direct route—Liberty to call at intermediate port—Exception of King's enemies—Deviation to intermediate port not usually visited by owners' ships—Destruction by enemy vessel—Liability of owners.—In Nov. 1914 the defendants, a steamship company, contracted to carry a cargo of wool from New Zealand to London in their steamship. The bills of lading provided for "Direct service between New Zealand and London," and contained these two clauses: "Clause 1. With liberty on the way to London to call and stay at any intermediate port or ports to discharge or take on board passengers, cargo, coal, or other supplies." Clause 3. "The owners are to be at liberty to carry the said goods to their port of destination by the above or other steamer or steamers, ship or ships, either belonging to themselves or to other persons proceeding by any route, and whether directly or indirectly to such port, and in so doing to carry the goods beyond their port of destination, and to tranship or land and store the goods either on shore or afloat and reship and forward the same at the owner's expense, but at merchant's risk." The exception clause excepted the "King's enemies." Besides the wool the steamship carried a quantity of frozen meat for delivery at Havre. The vessel kept a direct course from New Zealand to London until she reached the Casquets, when she turned and made for Havre, which was not one of the usual ports visited by the defendants' steamships. Before reaching Havre she was sunk by a German submarine. The plaintiffs, who were indorsees and holders of the bills of lading under which the wool was shipped, brought an action against the defendants claiming damages for breach of contract. Held (1) that clause 3 of the bills of lading did not avail the defendants, since it only applied when transhipment of the cargo from the T. to another vessel had taken place, and, even if that were not so, the bills of lading would be ambiguous (Elderslie Steamship Company v. Borthwick (10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 24; 92 L. T. Rep. 274; (1905) A. C. 93); (2) that the provisions of clause 1 did not constitute a defence to the plaintiffs' claim, since, assuming that Havre was an intermediate port within the meaning of the clause, when the route and ports of call of a line of steamships had become stereotyped mere general words in the owners' own bill of lading giving liberty to call at intermediate ports would not justify their calling at some entirely fresh intermediate port; (3) that after deviation the defendants were only common carriers and were not protected by the common law exception of the King's enemies, since in deviating they were breaking their contract with the plaintiffs and not fulfilling it; and (4) that it was unnecessary for the plaintiffs in order to substantiate their claim to show that the natural and probable result of deviating to Havre was that the T. would be sunk by hostile craft. The plaintiffs were, therefore, entitled to judgment. (K. B. Div.) James Morrison and Co. Limited v. Shaw, Savill, and Albion Company Limited. (See No. 46 below.) 400

27. Demurrage—Certain rate at port of loading—Restricted liability of charterers—"Same rate to apply at port of discharge"—Liability of charterers not thereby restricted at port of discharge—"Working days of twenty-four hours each."—By a charter-party dated the 13th April 1915 the plaintiffs chartered their vessel, the O., to an American export company to carry a cargo of 6350 tons of grain from Newport News to Avonmouth. By a contract of sale the ownership of the cargo passed to the defendants. The charter-party and the bill of lading (which was to complete and supervene the charter-party) provided that the vessel should "be loaded according to berth terms, and with customary berth dispatch, and if detained longer than five days, Sundays and holidays excepted, charterers to pay demurrage [at a certain rate] . . . provided that such detention shall occur by default of charterers or their agents, and same rate of demurrage to apply at port of discharge," and further, that she should discharge at Avonmouth, "in accordance with the rules of the Bristol Channel and West of England Corn Trade Association." It was also provided that the steamer might discharge at all hours when the customs authorities would allow her to do so, provided that any extra expense in working at night or on Sundays should be borne by the party ordering the work. The rules of the Bristol Channel and West of England Corn Trade Association provided that a steamer carrying a cargo of 6350 tons should be allowed eight "working days of twenty-four hours each" (Sundays excluded) to discharge. The O. arrived off Avonmouth at 8.15 a.m. on Tuesday, the 6th July, and by the terms of the charter-party and bill of lading the lay days began at that time. The discharge was finished at 5 p.m. on the 23rd July. The plaintiffs claimed demurrage in respect of eight days nine hours, alleging that (allowing for exclusion of Sunday, the 11th July) the lay days ended at 8.15 a.m. on the 15th July. Held, (1) that the provision that the same rate of demurrage should apply at the port of discharge as at the port of shipment did not necessarily imply that the liability of the charterers was restricted at the port of discharge as at the port of shipment; and (2) that "a working day of twenty-four hours" meant a period of twenty-four hours commencing at the time when the ship was ready to discharge, excluding Sundays and certain other excepted days. Judgment was therefore entered for the plaintiffs. (Scrutton, J.) Orpheus Steam Shipping Company v. Bovill and Sons 404

28. Bill of lading—Bill of lading "conclusive evidence of quantity delivered to ship as stated therein"—Statement in bill of lading that goods were "shipped on board"—Short delivery—Estoppel—Authority of master—"Perils of the sea."—By a charter-party dated the 28th May 1913 the steamship K., belonging to the defendants, was chartered to proceed to Grindstone Island, New Brunswick, and there load a cargo of timber and therewith proceed to certain ports (including Manchester) as ordered. Freight was to be payable on measurement of quantity delivered as ascertained at port of discharge, and all responsibility of the charterers under the charter was to cease as soon as the cargo was alongside. The exceptions included "perils of the sea." The captain or his agent was empowered to sign bills of lading which, it was agreed, should be "conclusive evidence against the owners as establishing the quantity delivered to the ship as stated therein." The charterers gave instructions that the vessel when loaded should proceed to Manchester. The K. was loaded from lighters, the contents of which was checked by surveyors as they left the shore. Owing to rough weather, a quantity of the timber fell between the lighters and the ship and was lost, but despite this the master of the vessel signed a bill of lading in this form: "Shipped, in good order and well conditioned, on board the steamship Kylestrome" the quantities of timber contained in the surveyors' reports. The result was that on arrival at Manchester the cargo was found to be short. In an action by the plaintiffs, who were indorsees of the bill of lading, for damages for short delivery the defendants contended that the timber was lost through perils of the sea, since by the charter-party, the terms of which must be incorporated in the bill of lading, the responsibility of the charterer ceased as soon as the cargo was alongside, whereby the responsibility of the defendants commenced and the exception of "perils of the sea" came into operation. Held, that the defendants were bound by the statements in the bill of lading that the whole of the timber had been shipped on board, and could not give evidence that certain portions of the timber had been lost after they had been put into lighters, but before they had been received on board. Lishman v. Christie (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 186; 57 L. T. Rep. 552; 19 Q. B. Div. 333) followed. Judgment of Bailhache, J. (ante, p. 327; 114 L. T. Rep. 743) affirmed. (Ct. of App.) Crossfield and Co. v. Kyle Shipping Company 410

29. Charter-party—Withdrawal by owners before expiration of term—Subsequent issue of writ for hire due—Whether withdrawal waived.—A vessel was chartered in June 1914 for five months at so much per month, payable in advance. On the 13th Aug., a month's hire being due and unpaid, the owners telegraphed to the charterers, saying that they withdrew the steamer pursuant to a clause in the charter-party. Half an hour later they issued a writ in an action to recover the month's hire. Arbitrators found as a fact that the ship was properly withdrawn, but they reserved for the opinion of the court the question whether the notice of withdrawal, if properly given, was withdrawn or waived by the subsequent conduct of the owners in issuing the writ. Held, on the facts, that notice of the withdrawal of the steamer from the service of the charterers had been properly given by the owners, and that the subsequent conduct of the owners did not constitute a waiver of that notice. Decision of Bailhache, J. (reported ante, p. 296; 114 L. T. Rep. 371) affirmed. (Ct. of App.) Wulfsberg and Co. v. Owners of Steamship Weardale 416

30. Contract—Provision of ship—Exception of "public enemies and restraint of princes"—Outbreak of war—Failure to provide ship—Liability of contractor.—In 1913 the defendants, steamship owners, contracted to provide a steamship (to be nominated) in Aug.-Sept. 1915 to carry phosphate from Florida to Delfzyl, in

Holland, up the river Ems. The exceptions clause included "public enemies and restraint of princes." In Aug.-Sept. 1915, during the continuance of a state of war between Great Britain and Germany, the Germans had assumed full control of the fairways of the Ems. All vessels bound for Delfzyl were boarded by them and compelled to take a German pilot. The ship's papers were overhauled or liable to be overhauled, and the channel was mined. Feights had risen since 1913 from about 13s. 6d. to three or four times as much. The defendants in these circumstances refused to tender a vessel, maintaining that they need only nominate one of their own vessels and, having done so, to rely upon the exceptions clause in the contract as they were prevented from performing the contract by "public enemies and restraint of princes." The plaintiffs, in an action for breach of the contract, argued that the exceptions clause did not come into operation until a steamer was nominated. Held, that as the defendants contracted not as owners, but as contractors, it was not sufficient for them merely to nominate one of their own vessels and not to try to procure another steamer in the market; but that, on the other hand, it was not necessary that a steamer should have been nominated for the exceptions clause to come into operation, since such a conclusion would leave the defendants without excuse if the operation of the exception were such that it was impossible to procure any steamer which could, or would, undertake the voyage. The German control of the Ems shut out from the market not only the defendants' own steamers, but also the ships of Great Britain and her allies, amounting probably to more than three-quarters of the tonnage available but for the excepted peril. Neutral shipowners would have been very reluctant of getting their ships under German control when proceeding under an English charter-party, and the cargo would probably have been seized by the Germans with the result that no freight would have been earned. The rate of insurance (if insurance had been possible) would have been extremely high. The defendants would have had to prepay the freight, or pay the premium, or run the risk themselves, or to have paid the shipowner such a freight as would have enabled him to cover the risk or induce him to run it. Held, that, even leaving out of consideration the general and enormous rise in freights, it would be wholly unreasonable to expect the defendants to pay large sums of money or to run big risks, or both, in order to deprive themselves of the protection of an exception inserted in the contract on their behalf. Dictum of Esher, M.R. in Crawford and Rowat v. Wilson, Sons, and Co. (1. Com. Cas. 277, at p. 280) applied. (Bailhache, J.) Phosphate Mining Company and Coronet Phosphate Company v. Rankin, Gilmour, and Co. 418

31. Charter-party—Exception of "restraint of princes"—Reasonable anticipation of restraint—Breach by shipowner—Liability—Measure of damages.—The plaintiffs chartered a vessel from the defendants, who were shipowners, to enable them to fulfil a contract by which they agreed to buy a cargo of sulphate of ammonia from a Belgian firm. The charter-party excepted "arrests and restraints of princes," and provided that the penalty for non-performance should be proved damages not exceeding the estimated amount of freight. The defendants refused to provide a ship which by the charter-party they had agreed to provide, upon the ground that there was reasonable apprehension that if they fulfilled the charter the ship would be seized by the King's enemies. In these circumstances the plaintiffs were compelled to repudiate their contract with their sellers, and paid them, as the result of arbitration proceedings, 4500*l.* for so doing. In an action by the plaintiffs against the defendants for damages for breach of the charter: Held, that the defendants were guilty of a breach of the charter-party by not sending a vessel to load, but that as regards the amount of damages the proper amount to fix was the difference between the price which would have been realised by the sale of the goods in Japan at or about the time the vessel should under ordinary circumstances have arrived and the cost of the goods at the port of loading at the time of shipment together with the cost of freight and insurance, and that the penalty clause had no reference to general damages. 32. Charter-party — Restraint of princes — Admiralty requisition—Liability of charterers for hire—Withdrawal of vessel.—A charter-party contained an exception clause which included restraint of princes, and also provided that the owners might withdraw the vessel for non-payment of hire. During the currency of the charter-party the vessel was requisitioned by the Admiralty for a period of about six months, for which period the charterers refused to pay the hire. The owners threatened to withdraw the vessel, whereupon the plaintiffs (the charterers) brought an action claiming an injunction to restrain the defendants from withdrawing the vessel, in which the owners counterclaimed for hire during the period of the requisition. Held, that the owners were not entitled to withdraw the vessel, but the plaintiffs were liable to pay the charter-party hire to the owners during the period of the requisition, they receiving the hire paid by the Admiralty. 33. Contract—Sale—Two buyers purchase two parcels from same cargo—Parcel intended for one buyer delivered to lighter of other buyer—Innocent mistake—Title to goods—Sale of Goods Act 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 71), ss. 16, 18, 62 (4).—From a cargo of oats in bulk while in transit 500 quarters were sold to D. and 500 quarters to S. Both parties instructed the same lighterman to take delivery of their respective parcels of oats on their behalf. The lighterman, intending to take delivery of the parcel sold to S., sent a lighter to the vessel. The lighter was loaded, but, through a misunderstanding, the clerk on the vessel prepared documents which showed that he intended to make delivery of the oats to the lighterman on behalf, not of S., but of D., and believed that he was so doing. Subsequently, another lighter was sent by the lighterman, who now intended to take delivery of the parcel sold to D., and the same misunderstanding occurred, documents being handed over which demonstrated the intention of the clerk to make delivery to S. and not to D. The last lighter became jammed and sunk, and the oats were damaged. The result of these two mistakes was that the unharmed parcel came into the possession of S., although the documents relating thereto showed an intention that they should be delivered to D. In an action for wrongful detention of the oats: Held, that in these circumstances the property in the undamaged goods had passed to the plaintiff D., who was entitled to judgment. owner to proceed—Subsequent agreement for extra hire—Arbitration.—By a charter-party dated the 5th Aug. 1912 a vessel was chartered for five years within the limits of the European trade. By clause 24 it was provided: "That no voyage be undertaken and no goods, documents, or persons shipped that would involve risk of seizure, capture, repatriation, or penalty by rulers of Governments." In June 1915 the vessel was at Leith fixed to load coals for Rouen, but the owner refused to allow her to proceed on the voyage owing to the risk of German submarines. Eventually the vessel was allowed to sail in consideration of extra hire money being paid, and in an arbitration it was decided that the owner was justified in refusing to allow the vessel to proceed. The vessel having completed this voyage and two other voyages upon similar terms, arbitration proceedings took place, and the umpire found that the voyages involved the risk of the vessel being attacked and sunk by German submarines, and he awarded that the owner was justified in refusing to allow the vessel to proceed on the voyages inasmuch as they involved risk of seizure or capture by rulers or Governments. A case having been stated for the opinion of the court: Held, that the risk of being attacked and sunk by German submarines was a risk of "seizure or capture" by rulers or Governments within the meaning of clause 24 of the charter-party, and that the shipowner was justified in refusing to allow his vessel to proceed upon voyages involving that risk. (Scrutton, J.) Re An Arbitration between O. T. Tonnevold and Finn Fris 439

35. Insurance (marine)—"Held covered"—Insurance of motor-car for voyage—Shipment of car on deck—Liability of underwriter.—A motor-car, which it was proposed to ship from England to Italy, was insured against general risks of breakage and damage during the voyage. The policy of insurance contained a "held covered" clause "at a premium to be arranged in case of omission or error in the description of the interest." The motor-car was carried on deck and was found to be badly damaged on arrival. In an action by the owner against the shipping agents for shipping the car in an improper manner and failing to protect it adequately by insurance: Held, that a motor-car carried on the deck of a vessel was outside the insurance policy, and that the defendants were liable. (Rowlatt, J.) Hood v. West End Motor Car Packing Company 441

NOTE.—Since affirmed by C. A.

36. Charter-party—Reference to arbitration of disputes "as to meaning and intentions of the charter"—Extent of clause.—A charter-party provided that "any disputes arising between the owner and the charterers as to the meaning and intentions of the charter should be referred to arbitration." Held, that this phrase did not mean merely that there should be submitted to the arbitrators questions of construction as to the rights of the parties arising upon the words of the charter-party, but included the application of the charter to the facts which had arisen involving the determination of what facts had arisen, but did not entitle the arbitrator to award damages. (Rowlatt, J.) Richards v. John Payne and Co. 446

37. Charter-party—Discharge with customary dispatch—Discharge of certain quantity of cargo per day—Payment of demurrage where delay occasioned through fault of charterers—Fixed time charter-party.—By clause 10 of a charter-party the cargo was to be discharged with the customary steamer dispatch of the port and in the ordinary working hours. By clause 11 demurrage was to be payable at the rate of 90*l.* per day where the delay was occasioned through "any fault of the charterer or merchant." By clause 20, as amended by agreement between the parties, the steamer was to be discharged at the rate of 100 standards of timber per weather working day. Held, that the effect of clause 20 was to quantify by agreement what in its absence would be achieved by the application of clause 10, which resulted in the combination of the two becoming a fixed lay day discharging clause. Held, also, that, where clause 20 operated, the words "through any fault of the charterer or merchant" became inapplicable. (Rowlatt, J.) Baird and Co. v. Price, Walker, and Co. 448

38. Delivery ex ship to railway—Deposit in carriers' warehouse—Destruction by fire—Liability of carriers.—The plaintiffs directed the defendants—the owners of a line of steamships which were carrying certain goods for delivery to the plaintiffs—to "deliver ex ship to the railway company to our order." The contract contained a clause protecting the defendants from liability for damage to goods by fire. On arrival the goods were not taken direct to the railway station, but were placed in the defendants' warehouse adjoining the quay. Here a fire broke out, and the goods were destroyed. The plaintiffs brought an action for breach of contract and duty in handling the goods, contending that, in view of the instructions sent to the defendants, the goods should never have been put into the warehouse, and that, as they had been so dealt with, the defendants were liable for their loss and could not avail themselves of the protection afforded by the terms of the contract. Held, that the expression "ex ship" did not exclude the taking of goods into warehouse for the purpose of dispatching them by cart to a railway, and that in this case, the removal of the goods into the warehouse being justifiable, the defendants were entitled to avail themselves of the protection afforded by the contract. (Rowlatt, J.) Eastern Counties Farmers' Co-operative Association v. Newhouse and Co. 449

39. Principal and agent—Instructions to agent—Warranty of authority—Ambiguity—Hire of ship—Whether principal bound by agent's contract founded on his interpretation of instructions.—The plaintiffs brought an action against the defendants for breach of warranty of authority to charter to the plaintiffs a ship belonging to one A. The authority relied upon was given to the defendants by A., a shipowner at Naples, who sent a telegram to the defendants in the following words: "You authorise fix steamer prompt loading 3000 tons coal Newport Cagliari Mersina or Palermo twenty shillings. If cannot better wire immediately." A. refused to let a ship and repudiated the charter, his reason being that his authority to the defendants was to hire a ship and not to let one. Rowlatt, J. held that if the telegram was ambiguous the defendants had acted bonâ fide and reasonably in interpreting it as they had done; that the shipowner would have been responsible to the plaintiffs for the interpretation which his agents had bonâ fide and reasonably placed upon ambiguous instructions; but that the actual charter-party entered into was outside the authority in whatever way it was read, and that therefore the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment. Ireland v. Livingston (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 389; 27 L. T. Rep. 79; L. Rep. 5 E. & I. App. 395) considered. Loring v. Davis (54 L. T. Rep. 899; 32 Ch. Div. 625, at p. 631) applied. The defendants appealed. Held, that the decision of Rowlatt J. was right. (Ct. of App.) Weigall and Co. v. Runciman and Co. and others 463

Government—Structural alterations to adapt her for use as transport—Restraint of princes—Frustration of adventure—Effect on contract.—By a charter-party, dated in May 1912, the owners of a ship designed to carry cargoes of oil in bulk agreed to let and the charterers agreed to hire the ship for a period of sixty calendar months—which period would expire in Dec. 1917—to be employed in lawful trades for voyages between certain specified ports for the carriage of refined petroleum and (or) crude oil and (or) its products as the charterers or their agents should direct. The charterers were to pay as freight a fixed sum per month. Under certain restrictions the carriage of other suitable cargo than oil was to be allowed. Power was conferred on the charterers to underlet the ship on Admiralty or other service, but without prejudice to the charter-party. The charter also contained the usual exception of restraint of princes. The ship was requisitioned by the Government in Dec. 1914 and again in Feb. 1915, when she was altered to fit her for the transport of troops. The charterers had paid and were willing to continue to pay the stipulated freight. In these circumstances the owners (the appellants) claimed they were entitled to treat the contract as at an end. Held (Viscount Haldane and Lord Atkinson dissenting), that under the circumstances this charter-party was not determined when the steamer was requisitioned, and that the requisition did not suspend it or affect the rights of the owners or charterers under it. Query: Does the doctrine of frustration apply to a time charter? Decision of the Court of Appeal (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 284; 114 L. T. Rep. 259; (1916) 1 K. B. 485) affirmed. (H. of L.) 41. Charter-party—Ship requisitioned by the Admiralty—Restraint of princes—Whether hire payable during requisition — Arbitration — Whether contract subsisting—Nonpayment of hire—Notice to withdraw ship—Whether owners entitled to withdraw vessel—Liability of charterers for hire.—The plaintiffs were time charterers of the steamship D., and their claim was to restrain the defendants, the owners, from withdrawing the ship from their service. The defendants counter-claimed for hire during a period when the ship was requisitioned by the Admiralty. The charter-party contained exception clauses which included restraint of princes, and also provided that the owners might withdraw the ship for nonpayment of hire. There was a cesser clause prescribing the events upon which the hire should cease or be suspended, which did not include requisition by the Admiralty. During the currency of the charter-party the ship was requisitioned by the Admiralty for the period of about six months, for which period the charterers refused to pay the hire. The parties went to arbitration on the question whether the contract was still subsisting; and, during the arbitration proceedings, the defendants gave notice to withdraw the ship. Sankey, J. held that the defendants were not entitled to withdraw the ship, but that the plaintiffs were liable to pay the hire to the defendants during the period of the requisition by the Admiralty. The plaintiffs appealed and the defendants gave notice of cross-appeal. Held, that the appeal of the charterers and the cross-appeal of the shipowners failed. The charterers' contention was that there had been an entire failure of consideration, and that they could not be liable for hire as they had not had the use of the ship, for which alone they were liable to pay hire, during the requisition by the Admiralty. That contention, however, had been disposed of by the decision of the House of

Lords in F. A. Tamplin Steamship Company Limited v. Anglo-Mexican Petroleum Products Company Limited (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 467; 115 L. T. Rep. 315; (1916) 2 A. C. 397), and the charterers in the present case had been rightly held liable to pay the chartered hire for the time during which the ship was under requisition. As regards the cross-appeal, the shipowners were not entitled to ignore the arbitration proceedings and, pending those proceedings, serve notice of withdrawal of the ship. The position was such as to lead the charterers to believe that any right to require payment of the hire or to withdraw the ship was suspended until it had been determined in the arbitration what the respective rights of the parties were—whether the time charter was still subsisting and whether the charterers remained liable to pay the hire. Decisions of Sankey, J. (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 434; 115 L. T. Rep. 265; (1915) 1 K. B. 726) affirmed. *F. A. 42. Charter-party—Employment between "safe ports"—What constitutes a "safe port."—The word "safe" when used in connection with the word "port" in a charter-party implies that the port must be both physically and politically safe, and the action either of nature or war may render a port unsafe. In each case it is a question of fact and a question of degree. (Sankey, J.) Palace Shipping Company Limited v. Gans Steamship Line 494

43. Charter-party — Sub-charter — Sub-charterer's breach—Cancellation—Measure of damages.—A ship was chartered by the plaintiffs for a voyage to a port in Chile under the terms of a charter-party dated the 1st July 1912, which provided (inter alia) that freight should be payable at the rate of 21*s.* per ton, and that the plaintiffs should have the option of cancelling the charter-party if the ship should not be ready for stiffening before the 15th Sept. 1913. The plaintiffs re-chartered the ship to the defendants by a charter-party dated the 2nd May 1913 for a voyage to the same port in Chile, the rate of freight being 28*s.* 6*d.* per ton. The defendants, in breach of their contract, refused to load the ship at a time when the market rate of freight had fallen to 17*s.* per ton. In an action by the plaintiffs to recover the difference between 17*s.* and 28*s.* 6*d.* per ton: Held, that they were only entitled to recover the difference between 21*s.* and 28*s.* 6*d.* (Rowlatt, J.) Andrew Weir and Co. v. Dobell and Co. 496

44. Charter-party—Charter of vessel for an illegal voyage of which the owners are ignorant—Rights of the owners.—The shipment of goods upon an illegal voyage, i.e., a voyage that cannot be performed without violating the law of the flag of the country or the law of the place where the goods are to be carried to, being a voyage which would involve the ship in consequences either of forfeiture or delay, is analogous to the shipment of dangerous goods which may involve the destruction of the ship. The shipper undertakes that he will not ship goods which involve the risk of unusual danger or delay to the ship which the owner does not know of, or might not reasonably know of, without communicating to the owner the facts which are within his knowledge indicating that there is such a risk. belonging to the respondents to carry a cargo of pit-props from the Baltic to Newport, Mon., the cargo "to be loaded at the rate of 125 fathoms daily and discharged at the rate of 125 fathoms daily reversible with customary steamship dispatch as fast as the steamer can receive and deliver during the ordinary working hours of the respective ports, but according to the custom of the respective ports, Sundays, general or local holidays (unless used) in both loading and discharging excepted." The agreed rate was equivalent to thirteen days for loading and discharging respectively. At the port of loading the ship was loaded in nine days and, by arrangement between the master and the shipper, four days' dispatch money was deducted from freight and thirteen days were stated in the bill of lading to have been used. According to the custom of the port at Newport, Monmouth, the discharge of Baltic pit-props is suspended during wet weather and during the half of each Saturday. The ship began discharging on the 19th July, but owing to wet weather did not complete doing so until midday on the 9th Aug., and the shipowners contended that the thirteen days available for discharge expired on the 2nd Aug. and that the ship was on demurrage six and a half days, and to this contention the Court of Session gave effect. Held, that as the intention was to have a fixed number of lay days, and these could not be affected by the custom of the port, the charterers could not except Saturday afternoons or wet days; but the effect of the word "reversible" was to entitle them to add the four days saved in loading to the days available for discharge as the shipper had no authority to "sell" the four days, and that in the circumstances the charterers were not barred from disputing the statement in the bill of lading that thirteen days had been "used for loading." The ship was accordingly only on demurrage for half a day. Decision of the Court of Session (1916, S. C. 223; 53 S. L. R. 28) reversed. 46. Carriage by direct route—Liberty to call at intermediate port—Exception of King's enemies—Deviation to intermediate port not usually visited by owners' ships—Destruction by enemy vessel—Liability of owners.—In Nov. 1914 the defendants, a steamship company, contracted to carry a cargo of wool from New Zealand to London in their steamship the T. The bills of lading provided for "direct service between New Zealand and London," and contained these two clauses: Clause 1. "With liberty on the way to London to call and stay at any intermediate port or ports to discharge or take on passengers, cargo, coal, or other supplies." Clause 3. "The owners are to be at liberty to carry the said goods to their port of destination by the above or other steamer or steamers, ship or ships, either belonging to themselves or to other persons proceeding by any route, and whether directly or indirectly to such port, and in so doing to carry the goods beyond their port of destination, and to tranship or land and store the goods either on shore or afloat and reship and forward the same at the owner's expense, but at merchant's risk." The exception clause excepted the "King's enemies." Besides the wool the T. carried a quantity of frozen meat for delivery at Havre. The vessel kept a direct course from New Zealand to London until she reached the Casquets, when she turned and made for Havre, which was not one of the usual ports visited by the defendants' steamships. When a few miles from Havre she was sunk by a German submarine. The plaintiffs, who were indorsees and holders of the bills of lading under which the wool was shipped, brought an action against the defendants claiming damages for breach of contract. Held, that Havre was not an intermediate port within the meaning of the bills of lading on the voyage of this vessel from New Zealand to London, and that in making for that port she was deviating from her voyage and the defendants thereby lost the benefits of the exceptions in the bill of lading. And, further, that, inasmuch as the defendants by deviating were breaking their contract as carriers, they were liable for the loss occasioned by the King's enemies. Decision of Bailhache, J. (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 400; 114 L. T. Rep. 746; (1916) 1 K. B. 747) affirmed. (Ct. of App.) James Morrison and Co. Limited v. Shaw, Savill, and Albion Company Limited 504

47. Charter-party—Lay days—Completion of loading before expiration of lay days—Acceptance of dispatch money—Failure to free ship as soon as possible—Whether charterers liable in damages.—By a charter-party dated the 1st Feb. 1915 a steamer was to be loaded at an Argentine port and to proceed therefrom as ordered by the charterers to a European port as port of discharge. Dispatch money at the rate of 15*l.* per day was payable for all time saved in loading, and the charterers had the right to keep the steamer for twenty-four hours after completion of loading, for the purpose of settling accounts. The steamer was loaded nineteen days before the expiration of the lay or loading days, and in respect of the nineteen days the charterers received dispatch money. Owing to delay by the charterers in deciding as to the port of call, the steamer was kept waiting for the bills of lading and orders for three days. The shipowners claimed damages in respect of this delay, and in arbitration proceedings were awarded 300*l.*, being damages at the rate of 150*l.* for two days. Held, that the charterers were entitled to dispatch money for the days saved in loading, but that, when the loading was completed, they were not entitled to detain the ship, even if the lay days had not expired, and that the damages for detention, not being provided for by the charter-party, were at large, and the arbitrator had power to award the shipowners 300*l.* as such damages. Decision of Atkin, J. (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 364; 114 L. T. Rep. 850; (1916) 1 K. B. 805) reversed. (Ct. of App.) Owners of Steamship Nolisement v. Bunge and Born 524

48. Indemnity—Implied request by shipowners to charterers to unload cargo—Accident happening to charterers' servant while unloading—Compensation paid by charterers to workman's dependants—Implied undertaking by shipowners to indemnify—Liabilty of shipowners.—The plaintiffs, who were the charterers of a ship from the defendants, the shipowners, gratuitously removed some hatch beams on behalf of and at the implied request of the shipowners. While the beams were being removed by the plaintiffs' servants, one of the plaintiffs' servants engaged in the work was accidentally killed. The plaintiffs paid to his dependants compensation in accordance with the Workmen's Compensation Act 1906. The plaintiffs claimed to recover the sum paid as compensation from the defendants on the ground that the defendants had impliedly undertaken to indemnify the plaintiffs for loss or damage occasioned by the discharge of the cargo. Held, that there was no evidence of an implied undertaking by the defendants to indemnify the plaintiffs. The accident was not the direct or natural consequence of doing the discharging of the cargo, but was a consequence of the manner in which the discharging was done. The proposition of Tindal, C.J. in Toplis v. Grane (5 Bing. N. C. 636), cited by Brett, J. in Dugdale v. Lovering (32 L. T. Rep., at

p. 158; L. Rep. 10 C. P., at p. 200), considered. Decision of Ridley, J. reversed. (Ct. of App.) William Cory and Sons Limited v. Lambton and Hetton Collieries Limited 530

49. Charter-party—"Baltic round"—Outbreak of war—Ship detained indefinitely in Baltic port—Restraint of princes—Whether commercial object of voyage frustrated—Proviso for cessation of hire—Cancellation clause.—In the first-named case shipowners by a charter-party, which was headed "time charter," let the steamship D. to charterers for "one Baltic round," the charterers to pay hire at a certain rate per month in advance until redelivery (unless lost) at a coal port in the United Kingdom. Arrests and restraints of princes were mutually excepted. In the event of Great Britain or other European Power being involved in war affecting the working of the steamer at the commencement or during the currency of the charter-party, there was an option to the charterers to cancel the charter or insure the steamer for full value against war risks. The D. came on hire on the 4th July 1914, and the charterers paid the first month's hire. The D. was loading a cargo for sub-charterers at a Baltic port when the war broke out. She was not allowed by the Russian authorities to leave the Baltic, and was uninsurable against war risks. On the 5th Aug., when the D. was partly loaded and the sub-charterers had received bills of lading from the master, the charterers purported to exercise their option to cancel the charter-party. In Nov. 1914 the shipowners sued to recover the hire of the vessel to the 4th Nov. 1914. In the second-named case the charter-party was the same in form, and the facts were very similar, except that the ship was chartered for two "Baltic rounds," and the charterers did not purport to cancel the charter-party. On an arbitration the arbitrators found that there had been a frustration of the commercial adventure, and that therefore no hire was due from the charterers. Held, that the cancellation clause was not applicable in the circumstances; that the commercial adventure of a Baltic round had been contemplated by both the shipowners and the charterers; that the delay resulting from the outbreak of war being of indefinite duration had frustrated the commercial adventure; and that the contract having been determined the shipowners could not recover the hire. Judgments of Sankey, J. (infra; (1916) 1 K. B. 675) and of Bailhache, J. (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 246; 114 L. T. Rep. 171; (1916) 1 K. B. 429) reversed. (Ct. of App.) Scottish Navigation Company Limited v. W. A. Souter and Co.; Admiral Shipping Company Limited v. Weilner, Hopkins, and Co. 539

50. Bill of lading—General ship—Restowage of cargo at intermediate port—Damage to cargo on quay during restowage—Liability of shipowners.—The plaintiffs were shippers of certain mining machinery on board the defendants' steamship from London to Buenos Aires viâ Newport. A cylinder, part of this machinery, was accidentally injured on the quay at Newport during restowage operations there. The defendants admitted the accident, but relied upon an exception contained in the bill of lading which excepted breakage, even though occasioned by the negligence of the shipowners' servants. The plaintiffs contended that the shipowners had no right, having once stowed their goods in one hold, to remove them from the ship in order to restow them in another hold and to deposit them on the quay for this purpose, and that, as the defendants were acting in breach of their contract of carriage when the accident occurred, they were not protected by the exception. Held, that the defendants were protected by the exception of the bill of lading. Where a general ship loads cargo at various ports which is intended to be discharged at different places, the cargo could not always be taken on board in such order that the last loaded shall be the first to be discharged; the proper stowage of the cargo and the necessary readjustment of weight to preserve the proper trim of the ship may necessitate changes in stowage from time to time, and in the present case these were necessarily incidental to the voyage of the ship. The defendants, therefore, in removing and restowing the cargo were not acting in breach of the contract of carriage. (Ct. of App.) Bruce Marriott and Co. v. Houlder Line Limited 550

51. Contract—Written contract to send rubber entirely by sea route—Goods sent partly by land—Temporary usage—Evidence—Varying written contract—Admissibility of evidence.—By a contract in writing dated March 1916 certain sellers sold to the buyers 25 tons of rubber, to be shipped during March and April 1916 by a vessel or vessels from the East to New York direct and (or) indirect, with liberty to call and (or) tranship at other ports, any question regarding quality to be settled by arbitration, such arbitration to be . . . held within six weeks after the arrival of the vessel. The rubber was sent by the sellers from Singapore by sea to Seattle, and was to be forwarded thence by rail to New York on through bills of lading. The buyers objected to this method of sending the rubber. Arbitrators found that there was at the date of the contract such a course of business established as would make it within the contemplation of the parties that the goods might be sent by the route adopted, and they awarded that the sellers' tender was a good tender. Held, that by the written contract, which was clear and unambiguous in its terms, the rubber was to be carried by sea throughout, and that evidence of a temporary usage in a particular trade to forward the goods partly by sea and partly by land was not admissible to vary the written contract. The tender, therefore, was bad, and the buyers were not bound to accept the goods. (Lush, J.) Sutro and Co. v. Heilbut, Symonds, and Co. 576

NOTE.—Since affirmed by C. A.

52. Charter-party—Exception of "restraint of princes"—Reasonable anticipation of restraint—Actual restraint in existence—Breach by shipowner—Measure of damages—Penalty clause—Limitation of liability.—The plaintiffs chartered a vessel from the defendants, who were shipowners, to proceed to M. and to load and carry to Japan a cargo of sulphate of ammonia which the plaintiffs had bought. The charter-party excepted "arrests and restraints of princes." The defendants refused to provide a ship which by the charter-party they agreed to provide, on the ground that there was reasonable apprehension that if they fulfilled the charter the ship would be seized by the King's enemies. In these circumstances the plaintiffs were compelled to repudiate their contract with their sellers, and paid them, as the result of arbitration proceedings, 4500*l.* for so doing. In an action by the plaintiffs against the defendants for damages for breach of charter, Bailhache, J. held that the shipowners were guilty of a breach of the charter-party, and that the plaintiffs could not recover from them 4500*l.*, such damage being too remote, but that they were entitled to recover 3800*l.*, the amount of profit they would have insured. This amount was the difference between the price at which they had purchased the goods and the market price of the goods in Japan on the date at which the goods might have been expected to arrive. The Court of Appeal were agreed that the defendants were guilty of a breach of charter-party in not sending a vessel to load, but that as regards the amount of damage the proper amount to fix was the difference between the price which would have been realised by the sale of the goods in Japan at or about the time the vessel should, under ordinary circumstances, have arrived, and the cost price of the goods at the port of loading at the time of the shipment, together with the cost of freight and insurance. Held, that the mere apprehension of seizure was insufficient to justify the defendants' failure to supply a steamer, as to make the exception operative there must be such a declaration of war as to cause an actual restraint of princes. But on the main point, the measure of damages, their Lordships were of opinion that Bailhache, J. had proceeded on a right basis, and his order would be restored, subject to correcting the omission to deduct the amount of insurance premium, which, taking the premium to be 6 per cent., would reduce the amount of damages to 800*l*. Decision of the Court of Appeal (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 427; 115 L. T. Rep. 248; (1916) 2 K. B. 816) set aside and judgment of Bailhache, J. (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 300; 114 L. T. Rep. 326) restored with a modification. (H. of L.) Watts, Watts, and Co. Limited v. Mitsui and Co. Limited 580

53. Damage to cargo—Seaworthiness—Fitness to carry cargo—Contract of carriage—Improper stowage—Excepted peril.—Chocolate was put on board a steamship for carriage from Genoa to London. The chocolate was shipped in good condition, but was delivered in a damaged state owing to the chocolate having been stowed in a hold in which cheeses were stowed. The consignees of the chocolate brought an action to recover the damage they had sustained. The shipowners pleaded as a defence an exception in the bill of lading relieving them from liability for negligent stowage. The consignees by their reply alleged that the shipowners could not rely on the exception, as the ship was unfit to carry the chocolate when the ship was loaded or when the voyage began. Held, affirming the decision of Bargrave Deane, J., that the ship was not unseaworthy; that the damage was caused by improper stowage; and that the respondents were protected by the exception in the bill of lading and were entitled to rely on the exception. COLLISION.

1. Collision during salvage—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 29—Appeal on matters of fact—Concurrent findings in courts below—Jurisdiction on appeal to review conclusions resting upon probabilities.—The rule that concurrent findings should not be disturbed on appeal does not apply where on appeal there is tolerably clear evidence which satisfies the court that the findings are erroneous. The principle is especially applicable to a case in which the conclusion sought to be set aside rests upon the consideration of probabilities. A vessel, while rendering assistance to another, was rammed by the latter. She sank and all her hands with one exception were lost. In the court of first instance both vessels were held to blame, but the Court of Appeal reversed that decision and held that the salving vessel was alone to blame. The owners of the salving vessel appealed. Held, that this case was not a true example of concurrent findings in the courts below; that there was jurisdiction to review the concurrent finding in the courts below; and that on the facts the vessel which was being salved, but which sank the salving ship, was alone to blame. Rule laid down by Lords Herschell and Watson in The P. Caland v. Glamorgan Shipping Company (7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 83, 206, 317; 68 L. T. Rep. 469; (1893) A. C. 207), as to concurrent finding, considered. (H. of L.) Owners of the Steamship Hatfield v. Owners of the Steamship Glasgow; The Glasgow 33

2. Defence of compulsory pilotage—Collision without compulsory pilotage area, but where pilot was necessarily on board—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 633.—The appellants, the owners of the steamship B., brought an action of damages against the respondents, the owners of the steamship F., in respect of a collision which occurred near Princes Pier, Greenock. Among other defences, the respondents set up the defence of compulsory pilotage under the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 633, which provides that a shipowner shall not be answerable "for any loss or damage caused by the default or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of that ship within any district where the employment of a qualified pilot is compulsory by law." At the time of the collision the river pilot, although he had not reached the official "river Clyde," was directing the navigation of the F. The appellants' contention was that the part of the river at which the collision occurred was not a part where, by law, the employment of a licensed pilot was compulsory. The sheriff-substitute held that the defence of compulsory pilotage was not open to the respondents, but his decision was reversed by the First Division by a majority (the Lord President and Lord Mackenzie, Lord Skerrington dissenting). Held, that upon the true construction of sect. 633 of the Act of 1894 the word "district" did not cover an area outside the limits of the river as defined by sect. 75 of the Clyde Navigation Act 1858, that the pilotage outside these limits was not rendered compulsory by law by the operation of the by-law, and that there was no legal compulsion at common law so as to prevent the relation of master and servant from being established between the master and the pilot. Decision of the First Division of the Court of Session (reported 52 S. L. R. 244) reversed, and that the defence of compulsory pilotage could not be sustained. General Steam Navigation Company v. British and Colonial Steam Navigation (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 168, 237; 20 L. T. Rep. 581; L. Rep. 4 Ex. 238) and The Charlton (8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 29; 73 L. T. Rep. 49) discussed. 3. Both vessels to blame—Apportionment of damages—Maritime Conventions Act 1911 (1 & 2 Geo. 5, c. 57), s. 1, sub-s. 1.—To judge of the degree of a ship's culpability under sect. 1, sub-sect. 1, of the Maritime Conventions Act 1911: Regard must be had to the relative positions of the two vessels, the view which each had of the other, the signals which passed between them, and the opportunity each had of avoiding the consequences of the other's errors: Faults in navigation which do not contribute to the collision are not to be taken into consideration; Where the evidence does not establish that a clear preponderance of culpability rests upon one ship, the division of damages should be half and half; The word "river" in Tees Conservancy By-laws does not include the buoyed channel outside the river mouth, and there is no analogy between this buoyed channel and certain waterways which have been declared to be narrow channels. Query as to the duty of vessels approaching at a considerable distance to blow whistle signals, and the effect of the omission to do so having regard to the above section. At the hearing of a suit in the Admiralty Court for damages caused by collision the judge found both vessels were to blame, but that one was much more to blame than the other, and he apportioned the liability at four-fifths and one-fifth. The Court of Appeal, in construing sect. 1, sub-sect. 1 of the Maritime Conventions Act 1911, were of opinion that the fault to the degree of which the liability was to be apportioned must be read as meaning fault causing or contributing to the collision, and being of opinion that there was no evidence on which the blame could be with any certainty apportioned, directed that the liability should be apportioned equally. Held, after consideration, that the decision of the Court of Appeal was right. Decision of Court of Appeal affirmed. (H. of L.) The Peter Benoit 203

4. Submarine sunk by liner—Liner alone to blame—Cause of action for loss of life of seaman apart from statute—Pensions and grants to relatives of deceased officers and seamen.—A submarine having been sunk through the negligent navigation of a steamship and all but one of her crew drowned, the Commissioners of the Admiralty brought an action against the steamship owners to recover the damage they had sustained. They included in their claim a number of items, one of which was a sum representing the capitalised amount of pensions and grants paid or payable by them to the relatives of the crew who were drowned. At the reference the assistant registrar disallowed this item of claim on the ground that loss or damage suffered by the plaintiffs due to the loss of life of the crew of the submarine was not recoverable in civil action. This decision of the assistant registrar was upheld by the President and subsequently by the Court of Appeal, who expressed themselves bound to follow the ruling of Lord Ellenborough in Baker v. Bolton (1808, 1 Camp. 493) that "in a civil court the death of a human being could not be complained of as an injury." Held, (1) that, whether or not the common law ought originally to have been differently interpreted than as interpreted by Lord Ellenborough in Baker v. Bolton (sup.), it was too late to disturb it; and (2) that the damages claimed were in no way recoverable, because, being money which the Admiralty Commissioners were not legally required to pay to the relatives of the deceased men, such damage was too remote. Decision of the Court of Appeal (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 536; 111 L. T. Rep. 623; (1914) P. 167) affirmed (H. of L.) The Amerika 558

5. Examination steamer proceeding to speak another steamship—Crossing rule—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1897, arts. 19, 21, 29.—An examination steamer in the Bristol Channel, on a course of N.W., sighted a steamship four points on her port bow and proceeded towards her to speak her. The other steamship was on a course of about E. by N. It was in the ordinary course the duty of the vessel on the E. by N. course to port and pass under the stern of the examination vessel. Instead of doing so, she kept her course and speed as she expected the examination steamer to round to on her starboard side. The examination steamer hard-a-ported and increased her speed to get across the course of the steamship she was approaching. Held, that both vessels were to blame, the steamship on the E. by N. course for not complying with the crossing rule as there was no special circumstance which excused her departure from it, and the examination steamer for altering her course and speed; but that, as the steamship on the E. by N. course was primarily to blame, the loss would be apportioned, the steamship on the E. by N. course to bear three-fourths and the examination steamer one-fourth of it. (Adm. Div.) The Fancy 603

6. Compulsory pilotage—Exempt ship—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 603, 625—Pilotage Act 1913 (2 & 3 Geo. 5, c. 31), ss. 10, 14, 15—Defence of the Realm Consolidation Act 1914 (5 Geo. 5, c. 8)—Defence of the Realm Regulations 1914, No. 39—Notice to mariners, 27th March 1915—Liability of owners of vessel for damage—Vessel being conducted.—In a damage action the owners of a Swedish steamship pleaded that their vessel was in charge of a compulsory pilot, and that if there was any negligence in the navigation of the vessel it was solely that of the pilot, for whose negligence they were not responsible. The pilot was found alone to blame. Under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 the Swedish vessel was an exempt ship, although she was navigating in a compulsory pilotage district. Under the Defence of the Realm Regulations all ships, other than certain British ships, while navigating from Gravesend to London Bridge have to be conducted by pilots licensed by the London Trinity House. Held, that, though the Swedish vessel was an exempt ship under the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, yet the order issued under the Defence of the Realm Regulations 1914 made pilotage for the vessel compulsory; and that the owners were not responsible for the damage caused by the collision. words—Liability of dock owner.—The plaintiffs, owners of a steamship, claimed against the defendants, owners of a graving dock at Hull, damages for the defendants' alleged breach of a contract for reward in and about the dry-docking of the steamship. She suffered damage by reason of the unevenness of the block caps on which she rested. The unevenness was found to be due to the defendants' want of care. There were no statutory provisions relating to the defendants' rights and liabilities as dry-dock owners. The steamship required painting, and the defendants let the dock for that purpose and did not do the painting themselves. She entered the dock under a contract with the defendants, by virtue of which dock dues were charged, and there were also charges for pumping and the use of blocks, shores, &c., which the defendants contracted to supply, the blocks being of the usual kind. Clause 9 of the defendants' regulations was as follows: "The owner of a vessel using the graving dock must do so at his own risk, it being hereby expressly provided that the company are not to be responsible for any accident or damage to a vessel whilst in the graving dock, whatever may be the nature of such accident or damage or howsoever arising." Held, that the defendants were exempted from liability by the terms of the above clause, which were so general that they would cover even a fundamental obligation, and that they were therefore not liable for negligence in providing uneven block caps. Decision of Bailhache, J. (111 L. T. Rep. 41) affirmed. (Ct. of App.) Pyman Steamship Company Limited v. Hull and Barnsley Railway Company 64

FORFEITURE.

1. Right to register a ship as a British ship—Ship owned by a limited company registered in England—Principal place of business of the company—Control of company in Germany—Forfeiture of ship—Position of British shareholders in the company owning the forfeited ship—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 1, 9, 76—Merchant Shipping Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 48), s. 51.—A ship owned by a limited company was registered as a British ship. A doubt having arisen as to whether the ship was rightly registered as a British ship, inquiry was made by the Registrar of Shipping at the port of registry of the ship under sect. 51 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1906 as to whether the ship was rightly registered. It appeared that the business of the company was controlled by a German, who was a naturalised British subject, and who had resided in Hamburg for some considerable time before and after the outbreak of war. Proceedings were then instituted, asking for the forfeiture of the ship. Bargrave Deane, J. declared the ship to be forfeited to the Crown, and subsequently allowed the British shareholders to intervene in the proceedings to protect their interests, but refused to order that when the ship was sold they should be granted an amount out of the sum realised by the sale proportionate to their interest in the company. The company and the British shareholders appealed.

Held, by the Court of Appeal, affirming the decision of Bargrave Deane, J. that the ship was rightly forfeited to the Crown, as the general superintendence of the business was carried on in Hamburg and the company was controlled from Hamburg. Held, further, that the British shareholders were not entitled to intervene in the proceedings, and that the court had no power to order any payment to be made to them when the ship was sold. MARINE INSURANCE.

1. Policy—Insurance against risk of seizure and detention—Actual total loss—Constructive total loss—Particular average loss—Marine Insurance Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 41), ss. 57 (1), 60.—By sect. 60 of the Marine Insurance Act 1906, the test of "unlikelihood of recovery" has been substituted for "uncertainty of recovery" in cases relating to constructive total loss. A neutral ship belonging to the plaintiffs was chartered to carry a cargo of coal from the United Kingdom to Constantinople. She was insured with the defendant against capture, seizure, and detention. While on the voyage war broke out between Greece and Turkey, and the ship was stopped by the Greeks off Tenedos, who took her to Lemnos and removed the cargo. The plaintiffs gave the defendant notice of abandonment, and six weeks after the Greeks released the ship. An action was brought by the plaintiffs on the policy for an actual or a constructive total loss, or, alternatively, damages for a particular average loss. Held, that, while on the date of the commencement of the action the recovery of the ship by the owners was quite uncertain, it could not be shown that the balance of probabilities had been proved so clearly against her recovery that it could be said that there was "unlikelihood of recovery" within the meaning of the Marine Insurance Act 1906; and that this being so the plaintiffs had failed to make out their case. Decision of Pickford, J. (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 449; 109 L. T. Rep. 901) affirmed. (Ct. of App.) Polurrian Steamship Company v. Young 59

2. Reinsurance—Constructive total loss—Compromise between insured and insurers of original policy—Benefit of compromise to reinsurers.—The plaintiffs insured a ship against total and (or) constructive total loss only, and reinsured risk with the defendants, the policy of reinsurance not containing the usual clause "to pay as may be paid thereon." The ship stranded, and notice of abandonment was given by her owner, who alleged that she was a constructive total loss. The plaintiffs refused to accept the notice of abandonment, and the owner brought an action against them which was compromised by the plaintiffs paying the owner 66 per cent. of the loss. The defendants were invited to agree to the compromise, but declined on the ground that there had been no constructive total loss in fact. In an action by the plaintiffs against the defendants on the policy of reinsurance, Bailhache, J. held that there was a constructive total loss in fact; that the defendants were disentitled to the benefit of the compromise, and were liable to the plaintiffs for the full amount of the reinsurance, subject to the benefit of any rights they might have had in respect of the abandonment of the ship if no compromise had been effected. Held, that a contract of reinsurance is a contract of indemnity only, and that the defendants were entitled to the benefit of the compromise made by the plaintiffs with the owners; the plaintiffs therefore could only recover from the defendants the 66 per cent. of the loss which they had paid to the owner, and not the full amount of the reinsurance. The plaintiffs, however, were entitled to add to their claim against the defendants a proper proportion of the expense of obtaining the compromise. Uzielli v. Boston Marine Insurance Company (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 405; 52 L. T. Rep. 787; 15 Q. B. Div. 11) discussed. Judgment of Bailhache, J. (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 575; 111 L. T. Rep. 1079; (1914) 3 K. B. 835) reversed. (Ct. of App.) British Dominions General Insurance Company Limited v. Duder and others 84

3. Marine insurance—Policy—Collision—Damage—Collision caused to third ship by backwash—Liability.—Where there is a clause in a policy of marine insurance providing that "if the ship hereby insured shall come into collision with any other ship or vessel and the assured shall in consequence thereof become liable to pay and shall pay by way of damages to any other person or persons any sum or sums not exceeding in respect of any one such collision the value of the ship hereby insured," this company will pay the assured such proportion of three-fourths of such sum or sums so paid as its subscription hereto bears to the value of the ship insured, and in cases in which the liability of the ship has been contested or proceedings have been taken to limit liability, with the consent in writing of this company, the company will also pay a like proportion of the costs which the assured shall thereby incur or be compelled to pay. . . ." As a matter of law and as a matter of the true construction of the clause, an assured may become liable to pay damages in consequence of a collision between his ship and another ship although the damage is not immediately and directly caused by the impact between the two colliding vessels. A collision occurring between the steamship C. and the steamship R., the impetus thus given to the R., plus the backwash from the C.'s propellor, drove the R. into the steamship G., causing damage which the owners of the C. were held liable to pay. In an action on the policy: Held, that the collision with the G. was in consequence of the collision between the R. and the C., and that the C. by this collision caused the R. to come into contact with the G.; and that the defendants were liable on the policy. Decision of Bailhache, J. (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 544; 111 L. T. Rep. 812; (1914) 3 K. B. 827) affirmed. (Ct. of App.) William France, Fenwick, and Co. Limited v. Merchants' Marine Insurance Company Limited 106

4. Marine insurance — Material fact — Innocent mistake as to materiality—Concealment.—A policy of marine insurance contained the following clause: "In the event of any incorrect definition of the interest insured it is agreed to hold the assured covered at a premium (if any) to be arranged." In an action to recover a loss under the policy: Held, that, if the assured honestly believed that the correct definition was not a material matter for disclosure to underwriters, the fact that the assured knew that the "interest insured," which must be taken to mean "subject-matter insured," was not correctly defined, did not deprive him of the benefit of the clause. Decision of Bailhache, J. (reported 12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 546; 111 L. T. Rep. 839; (1914) 3 K. B. 1131) affirmed. (Ct. of App.) Hewitt Brothers v. Wilson 111

5. Policy—"Restraint of princes"—State of war—Construction—Total loss—Whether "restraint involves use of physical force—Restraint by Government of assured—Marine Insurance Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 41), s. 60.—The words "arrests, restraints, and detainments of kings and princes" imply some interference of a fortuitous character, some interference out of the ordinary course of events by governing authorities who have the force of the State behind them to compel submission to their authoritative decrees. The plaintiffs, who were British merchants, in July 1914 shipped certain linseed on the British steamers A. and O. in the River Plate for carriage to Hamburg. They had sold the linseed to German merchants at a price covering cost, freight, and insurance, but upon terms by which the property was left in the plaintiffs until delivery. They insured the linseed with the defendants, a British company, from ports in the River Plate to Hamburg, and it was agreed that the subject-matter of the policy was linseed valued at 33,000*l.*, and the perils insured against included "arrests, restraints, and detainments of all kings, princes," &c. War was declared by Great Britain on Germany on the 4th Aug., and proclamations forbidding trading with the enemy were issued on the 5th Aug. and the 9th Sept. The A. when in the Channel received a signal from a French cruiser that she should go to Liverpool for security, and the O., on the suggestion of the Admiralty, was diverted by her owners to Glasgow. The plaintiffs having given notice of abandonment and claimed for a total loss: Held (Swinfen Eady, L.J. dissenting), that (1) the word "restraint" in the policy did not necessarily involve the use of physical force; (2) "restraint of princes" included a restraint imposed by the British Government on British subjects, provided it was imposed for a cause other than a violation of law; (3) the inability of the ships to proceed with the voyages after the existence of a state of war had become known was caused by a "restraint of princes" within the meaning of the policy; (4) the rule of law in accordance with the impossibility of goods shipped reaching their destination is to be treated as a constructive total loss of the goods has not been altered by the Marine Insurance Act 1906; (5) there was therefore a constructive total loss of the goods by a peril insured against, and the plaintiffs were entitled to recover on the policy. Decision of Bailhache, J. affirmed. (Ct. of App.) Sanday and Co. v. British and Foreign Marine Insurance Limited. (See No. 12 below.) 116

6. Policy—Valued policy—Total loss—Subrogation.—A ship was insured for an agreed value of 45,000*l.* She was sunk in collision. The underwriters paid as for a total loss. In a collision action both ships were held to blame. The owners of the insured ship were held to be entitled to recover five-twelfths of their loss, the other ship recovering the remaining seven-twelfths. The value of the insured ship was taken at its actual value at the time of the loss, and the shipowners were paid five-twelfths of that value—namely, 65,000*l.* The underwriters claimed to be subrogated to the rights of the assured in respect of the sum recovered. Held, that as the amount recovered by the assured did not exceed the amount paid by the underwriters, the latter were entitled to recover from the assured the whole of the amount recovered by the assured in the collision action, in spite of the fact that it was based upon a higher value than the agreed value. (Scrutton, J.) Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company Limited v. British and Chilian Steamship Company Limited. (See No. 10 below.) 135

7. General average—Collision with pier—Knowledge that collision would take place—Reasonable and prudent act—Contribution.—The owners of a steamship claimed from the cargo owners contribution in general average in respect of two items of alleged general average sacrifice and expenditure. On the 6th Nov. 1912 the ship was bound for certain docks, and on proceeding up the river she grounded within a short distance of the docks. The following morning she floated, and was carried by the tide to about a mile above the entrance to the docks, where she became stranded. She was seriously damaged, and there was imminent danger to both ship and cargo. On the 7th Nov. she was got off by means of tugs. She had no steam available, and only her hand steering gear to work with. There was a pilot on board, and the intention was formed at first to take her down the river to a mud flat for the greater safety of the ship and cargo. When she had been towed about half a mile she was found to be making water, and it was then decided to take her into dock, which necessitated her being taken between two piers. The ebb tide was running very strongly, and it was contemplated by the master and pilot that she would strike the lower pier and do damage. In considering the choice between going to the mud flat and hitting the pier, the master and pilot both formed the opinion that the latter would be the lesser of two evils. She struck the pier with her starboard bow, and damaged herself and the pier. Held, that in the circumstances of the present case what was done was a general average act; and that the plaintiffs were entitled to contribution, not only for damage to the ship, but also for the damage for which she was liable by reason of damage to the pier. Decision of Bailhache, J. affirmed. (Ct. of App.) Austin Friars Steam Shipping Company v. Spillers and Bakers Limited 162

8. Winding-up of company—Total loss—Claim for—Marine or fire policy—Marine Insurance Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 41), ss. 1, 3, 65, 66—Assurance Companies Act 1909 (9 Edw. 7, c. 49), ss. 1 (b), 17, 28, sub-ss. 2, 3, sched. 6.—In April 1912 the applicants insured a steamship for twelve months with an insurance company, and in June 1912 a winding-up order was made against the company. Shortly afterwards the steamship was totally destroyed by fire. The policy of insurance covered risk of loss by fire and general average and salvage charges resulting from fire, the company not purporting to carry on the business of marine insurance. Held, that the policy was a fire insurance policy within sect 1, sub-sect. (b), of the Assurance Companies Act 1909, and was not excluded from the operation of that Act by sect. 28, sub-sect. 3, thereof. Decision of Astbury, J. affirmed. (Ct. of App.) Re United London and Scottish Insurance Company Limited; Newport Navigation Company's Claim 170

9. Time policy—"Perils of the sea"—Institute time clauses—"Inchmaree" clause—Marine Insurance Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 41), sect. 30; sched. 1, r. 12.—The plaintiffs took out a policy of marine insurance with the defendants on their ship which covered (inter alia) perils of the seas. The policy included the conditions of the Institute time clauses as attached, clause 3 of which provided as follows: "In port and at sea, in docks and graving docks, and on ways, gridirons, and pontoons, at all times, in all places, and on all occasions." Clause 7 provided: "This insurance also specially to cover (subject to the free and the average warranty) loss of or damage to hull or machinery through the negligence of the master, mariners, engineers, or pilots, or through explosions, bursting of boilers, breakage of shafts, or through any defect in the machinery or hull . . ." While the ship was lying in the dock a boiler, which was being lifted by a floating crane in order that it might be lifted into a hold, fell, owing to the pin of a shackle breaking, and damaged the ship. In an action under the policy: Held (1) that the loss was not caused by a peril of the sea, and the language of the policy itself showed that the scope of the clause was limited to such perils or perils ejusdem generis, and (2) that neither clause 3 nor clause 7 of the Institute Time Clauses extended the genus of the risk insured against. Decision of the Court of Appeal, reported 12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 555; 111 L. T. Rep. 1027; (1914) 3 K. B. 1262, affirmed. (H. of L.) Stott (Baltic) Steamers Line v. Marten and others 200

10. Policy—Valued policy—Total loss—Subrogation—Right of paying underwriters to be subrogated.—The plantiffs insured the defendants' ship H. for one year from the 20th May 1912 for 45,000*l.* against ordinary sea perils by a policy dated the 6th June 1912 in which the H. was valued at 45,000*l.* During the currency of the policy the H. came into collision with the E. and was totally lost. A collision action was brought by the shipowners, and both vessels were held to blame and the blame was apportioned, the owners of the H. having to pay seven-twelfths and the owners of the E. five-twelfths of the damage. The registrar of the Admiralty Court took the value of the ship as at the 15th Nov. 1912, the end of the current season, and fixed it at 65,000*l.* He took the loss of hire up to the same date and assessed it at 2000*l.* The shipowners appealed, and the President held that the value of the ship should be taken in Nov. 1917, and the hire assessed to that date, which was the date of the expiry of the charter-party under which the H. was chartered, and remitted the report to the registrar for reconsideration of the figures on that basis. On coming before the registrar the parties compromised, and agreed on a lump sum of 67,000*l.* for the two items under consideration, being the same total as the registrar had awarded without apportioning it. The owners of the E. had no interest in the apportionment. Five-twelfths of the 67,000*l.* was accordingly paid, being some 26,900*l.* The underwriters, who had paid for a total loss of the H., then claimed to be subrogated to the payment received for the loss of that ship from the owners of the E. Held, that the underwriters were entitled to recover to the extent to which they had paid in respect of the subject-matter insured any sum which the defendants had received in respect of the loss of the same subject-matter, although that sum was based on a larger value than the insured value. Decision of Scrutton, J. (ante, p. 135; 113 L. T. Rep. 173; (1915) 2 K. B. 214) affirmed. (Ct. of App.) Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company Limited v. British and Chilian Steam ship Company Limited 221

11. Floating policy—Declaration as to interest—Warranty—Commonwealth Marine Insurance Act (No. 11 of 1909), ss. 35, 39.—The respondents effected a contract of marine insurance in Western Australia with the appellants, by which they insured all shipment of goods between a large number of ports against usual marine risks. The contract, which was treated as a floating policy throughout the proceedings, contained this clause: "Declarations of interest to be made to this society's agent at port of shipment where practicable or agent in London or Perth as soon as possible after sailing of vessel to which interest attaches." The respondents sued to recover a total loss of a shipment of goods as to which they had made a declaration of interest, but not as soon as possible after the vessel sailed. There was, however, no suggestion that the delay arose from want of good faith on their part. Held, allowing the appeal, that the condition as to the making of declarations amounted to a promissory warranty within sect. 39 of the Commonwealth Marine Insurance Act 1909 (which is similar in terms to sect. 33 of the Marine Insurance Act 1906), and as it affected the question of reinsurance it constituted a substantive condition of the contract, the failure of the respondents to comply with it disentitled them to recover in respect of the loss. (Priv. Co.) Union Insurance Society of Canton v. George Wills and Co. 233

12. Policy—Constructive total loss of goods—Restraint of princes—State of war—Frustration of contemplated adventure—Restraint by Government of assured—Marine Insurance Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 41), ss. 26, 60, 91 (2).—The plaintiffs, who were British merchants, in July 1914 shipped merchandise for sale in Germany on two British vessels in the River Plate for carriage to Hamburg. They had insured the goods on both vessels by identical voyage policies in the ordinary form, and the perils insured against included restraint of princes. War was declared by Great Britain on Germany on the 4th Aug., and proclamations forbidding trading with the enemy were issued on the 5th Aug. and on the 9th Sept. One of the two vessels, when in the Channel, received a signal from a French cruiser that she should go to Liverpool for safety, and the other, on the suggestion of the Admiralty, was diverted by her owners to Glasgow. The cargo owners warehoused their goods, and gave notice of abandonment, claiming on a constructive total loss. By sect. 60 (1) of the Marine Insurance Act 1906 "there is a constructive total loss when the subject-matter insured is reasonably abandoned on account of the actual total loss appearing to be unavoidable." By rule 10 of the rules for construction of policy in the schedule to the Act "the term 'arrests, &c., of kings, princes, and people' refers to political or executive acts and does not include a loss caused by ordinary judicial process." Held (1) that the old rule that on an insurance of goods under a marine policy at and from the port of loading to the port of destination the frustration of the adventure by an insured peril was a loss recoverable against the underwriters had not been altered by the Marine Insurance Act 1906, and therefore the detention of the goods for an indefinite time in the warehouses still entitled the plaintiffs, on giving notice of abandonment, to recover as for a constructive total loss; and (2) that the destruction of the adventure was directly caused by His Majesty's declaration of war, which was a restraint of kings, princes, and people within the meaning of the policies. Decision of the Court of Appeal (ante, p. 116; 113 L. T. Rep. 407; (1915) 2 K. B. 781) affirmed. (H. of L.) British and Foreign Marine Insurance Company Limited v. Samuel Sanday and Co. 289

13. Perils — "Men-of-war" — "Restraints of princes"—"Enemies"—British goods on enemy vessel—Ship putting into neutral port to avoid capture—Legality of further performance of contract on outbreak of war—Loss of venture—Whether proximately due to perils insured against.—In June 1914 the plaintiffs sold certain goods to a German firm, the property not to pass until the goods arrived at the port of destination. The goods were loaded on the German steamship K. for a voyage from Calcutta to Hamburg. While the K. was on her voyage, war broke out between Great Britain and Germany. The master of the K. thereupon put into Messina. The plaintiffs gave notice of abandonment to the defendants, the insurers, on the 1st Sept. and again on the 15th Dec. Bailhache, J. found that the voyage from Messina to Hamburg could not be continued, that the master had no intention of prosecuting the voyage until after the war, and that the voyage was practically abandoned when the vessel put into Messina. The policy of insurance covered the usual perils, including "men-of-war . . . enemies . . . takings at sea, arrests, restraints, and detainments of all kings, princes, and people . . . and all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the said goods and merchandises." The plaintiffs' claim was for a total loss under the policy. Held, that there was no loss by the perils insured against. The ship was never in peril of capture, for her commander resolved not to incur that risk; the loss was not due to "enemies," for the refusal of the commander to deliver up the goods at the port of refuge was not a peril from "enemies" within the meaning of the policy; nor was there a loss due to "restraints of princes." British and Foreign Marine Insurance Company v. Samuel Sanday and Co. (ante, p. 289; 114 L. T. Rep. 521; (1916) A. C. 650) distinguished. Judgment of Bailhache, J. affirmed. (Ct. of App.) Becker, Gray, and Co. v. London Assurance Corporation 318

NOTE.—Since affirmed by H. of L.

14. Perils of the sea—Exception of "consequences of hostilities"—Vessel torpedoed—Removal into harbour—Transfer to outer berth—Grounding—Loss—Liability of insurer.—The plaintiffs insured their vessel, the I., with the defendants against ordinary marine perils. The policy contained an exception clause by which "consequences of hostilities" were excepted from its scope. The I. was torpedoed near Havre. Although the vessel was badly damaged, the incoming water was kept under by the pumps, and she contrived to get into Havre Harbour. Bad weather during the night caused her to bump, and the harbour authorities, fearing she would sink in the inner berth which she then occupied, directed her removal to an outer berth. When the tide fell the vessel grounded, and the additional strain caused her to make more water. Subsequent tides caused further damage, and the vessel ultimately became a total loss. In an action on the policy: Held, that the vessel was lost as a "consequence of hostilities" and not through ordinary perils of the sea, and that, therefore, the defendants were not liable under the policy. (Rowlatt, J.) Leyland Shipping Company v. Norwich Union Fire Insurance Society 426

NOTE.—Since affirmed by C. A. and H. of L.

15. Insurance of vessel against all perils—Exception of loss as result of hostilities—Unexplained loss of vessel during time of war—Liability of underwriter.—By a policy of insurance a vessel was insured against all perils of the sea for twelve months. Loss in consequence of hostilities and warlike operations was excepted. During the currency of the policy, and during the continuance of a state of war between England and Germany, the vessel in fair weather commenced a voyage from Hull to the Tyne. After leaving the mouth of the Humber she was never seen again. In an action by the assured upon the policy in respect of her total loss: Held, that, in these circumstances, the vessel must be presumed to have been lost by being torpedoed or by striking a floating mine, and not by ordinary perils of the sea, and that the defendant was accordingly entitled to judgment. (Bailhache, J.) Macbeth and Co. v. King 442

16. War risks—Extinction of lights—Loss of vessel—Remoteness of cause—Liability of insurer.—A vessel was insured against war risks, "including extinction of lights." While off the coast of Normandy, on a voyage from Rouen to Bristol, she went on the rocks at the Cap de la Hague, where, owing to war, the light in the lighthouse had been extinguished. The master was not attempting to steer by the light, but said in evidence that had it been alight he would have seen it when he deviated from the course he had set and so managed to save the vessel. The learned judge was not satisfied that the master, in the weather existing at the time of the accident, could have seen the light had it been there. Held, upon these facts, that the owners of the vessel could not recover on the policy as the extinction of the Cap de la Hague light was too remote a cause of the loss of the vessel. PILOTAGE.

1. Compulsory pilotage through mined area—Remuneration of pilot—Liability of shipowner.—In consequence of the war between Great Britain and Germany, certain coast defences became necessary on the east coast of England, among them being the establishment of a mine-field in the Humber. The scheme of this mine-field was confided to certain pilots, and the Admiralty directed that vessels using the Humber should be piloted through the mine-field. The Humber Conservancy Board were requested to provide the pilots, for whose services charges were made. The defendant used the Humber for the passage of his vessels and took pilots aboard in compliance with the Admiralty order, but refused to pay pilotage fees on the ground that the regulation directing him to take pilots on board was ultra vires the Admiralty and void. Held, that, apart from any statutory authority, the Admiralty had power to take the steps which they had taken, and that the defendant must pay for the pilotage services rendered to him. (Atkin, J.) Humber Conservancy Board v. Grant 421

2. Queensland—Compulsory pilotage—Negligence of pilot—Government not liable.—Under the statutes of Queensland relating to navigation and pilotage, a duty is imposed upon the Government of that State to license and appoint duly qualified pilots. A firm of shipowners claimed damages from the defendant as the nominal representative of the Government of Queensland for the stranding of their vessel while compulsorily in charge of a duly licensed and appointed pilot, by whose negligence the stranding was caused. Held, that the defendant was entitled to judgment as the statutes imposed no duty upon the Government to pilot the plaintiffs' ship, and it was not liable for the negligence of such a pilot, who was not alleged to have been improperly licensed. The duty of the Government is merely to provide qualified pilots. Decision of the Full Court of the Supreme Court of Queensland reversed. (Priv. By sect. 13, sub-sect. 5: "For the purpose of this section goods shall not be treated as having been imported or exported coastwise unless imported from or exported to a place seaward of a line drawn from Reculvers Towers to Colne Point." By sect. 9 of the Provisional Order confirmed by the Port of London (Port Rates on Goods) Provisional Order Act 1910: "No port rates shall be charged by the Authority on transhipment of goods, which expression wherever used in this order means and includes goods imported for transhipment only" and "for the purposes of this section the expression 'goods imported for transhipment only' shall mean goods imported from beyond the seas or coastwise for the purpose of being conveyed by sea only to any other port, whether beyond the seas or coastwise." Goods were imported from beyond the seas into the Port of London for transhipment only, and were duly certified by the owners as being for transhipment. They were conveyed by a sailing barge down the Thames to Rochester on the Medway. Held, that the goods were exempted from port rates as they were goods imported for transhipment only within sect. 9 of the Provisional Order. Decision of Court of Appeal (12 Asp. Mar. 1. Foreign principal—Contract—Personal liability of agent—Presumption—Agent's authority to pledge principal's credit.—Where an agent in England contracts on behalf of a foreign principal he is presumed to contract personally unless the contrary intention plainly appears on the evidence or on the documents or in the surrounding circumstances. If there is no such evidence the presumption prevails that the agent has no authority to pledge the credit of the foreign principal in such a way as to establish privity of contract between such principal and the other party, and that he is personally liable on the contract. Held, in the circumstances of this particular case, that the defendants acted as agents and were known to the plaintiffs to be acting as agents, and were therefore not liable. (Sankey, J.) —Two sailing vessels on the high seas at the time of the outbreak of hostilities between Germany and Russia—the 1st Aug. 1914—belonging to a German company and flying the German flag, were offered for sale whilst at sea by the German company to an English company whose shareholders were mainly Germans, the German company itself being the holder of nine-tenths of the shares, and the offer was accepted. On the 5th Aug. 1914, the day after the declaration of war between Great Britain and Germany, both vessels were seized and detained as prizes by the Collectors of Customs in the English ports at which they had arrived. Held, that at the time of seizure the two vessels were entitled to fly the German flag; that the flag determined their nationality; that the alleged transfers in transitu were, under the circumstances, invalid, as purporting to change the ownership of the vessels as against captors, whether imminent or actual belligerents; and that the vessels were therefore subject to detention in accordance with the decision in The Chile (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 598; (1914) P. 212). Quære, whether a registered company nominally British, although consisting entirely of enemy shareholders, is able to be the owner of a British ship. 2. British ship—Enemy cargo—Cargo shipped before outbreak of war—Ship in British port—Cargo transferred to quay—Seizure—Right of condemnation—"In port"—Meaning of term—Charges—Demurrage.—A cargo of petroleum oil in bulk, owned by a German company, was shipped on board a British vessel which sailed from a neutral port for a German destination before the outbreak of hostilities between Great Britain and Germany. Whilst on its voyage the ship was directed to proceed to a British port, where the oil was discharged into the tanks of a British company owning the wharf. When the greater portion of the oil had been discharged, the officer of the Customs gave notice to the master of the vessel that the whole of the cargo of oil was placed under detention, not only that which was still in the vessel, but also that which had already been pumped into the tanks. The Crown claimed the whole as prize and asked for the condemnation of the oil. The cargo owners objected on the ground that the tanks were "on land" and not "in port," and that the matter was not within the jurisdiction of the Prize Court. Held, that the tanks were, in effect, oil warehouses, and that warehouses were included in the definition of a "port"; that the whole of the oil, whether in the tanks or on board the ship, was maritime prize as the property of the enemy; and that the Prize Court had authority to condemn it as such. Held, also, that as the company owning the oil was registered, and had its principal place of business in Germany, it must be treated as an alien enemy even though the majority of the shareholders were the subjects of neutral or allied countries. (Prize Ct.) The Roumanian. (See No. 15 below.) 8

3. British ship—Enemy goods—Interruption of voyage — Seizure of goods — Condemnation—Claim for freight—Allowance of part of freight —Principle to be applied—Calculation of amount to be allowed—Rule to be followed.—Where cargo, the property of an alien enemy, is seized on board a British vessel and condemned as lawful prize, the shipowners are entitled to claim from the Crown such a sum as is fair and reasonable under all the circumstances. This amount is to be ascertained by reference to the registrar and merchants, and in fixing the amount regard must be had to the rate of freight agreed upon, the extent to which the voyage had been made, the costs incurred before the date of the seizure, and the benefit accruing to the cargo from the actual carriage. In the absence of any special circumstances, no sum is to be allowed for delay or inconvenience arising to the ship and the shipowners from any diversion during the contemplated voyage or from any detention for the purposes of the capture. (Prize Ct.) The Juno 15

4. Alien enemy—Right of alien enemy to appear in Prize Court—Practice—Owner of captured vessel—Capture "in port"—Capture on "high seas"—Capture in territorial waters—Condemnation—Detention—Hague Conference 1907 —Convention VI.—The question of the right of an enemy owner of a ship or a cargo to appear in a Prize Court is not a matter of international law, but, under the Prize Court Rules 1914, is to be provided for according to the practice to be settled by the judge of the Prize Court. Accordingly the President sitting in Prize directed that whenever an alien enemy conceives that he is entitled to any protection, privilege, or relief under any of the Hague Conventions of 1907, he shall be entitled to appear as a claimant and to argue his claims before the Prize Court, the grounds of such claim being stated in the affidavit to lead to appearance which is required to be filed under Order III., r. 5, of the Prize Court Rules 1914. A German sailing vessel, owned by her master, was captured in the Firth of Forth shortly after the outbreak of war between Great Britain and Germany. She was taken into Leith. On behalf of the Crown it was contended that the capture took place "at sea." On behalf of the owner it was contended that the capture took place "in port" or in territorial waters, and that therefore she was not liable to condemnation, but only to detention. Held, that the word "port" as used in the Hague Conventions did not mean the "fiscal port," which might cover a considerable area and include several ports, but referred only to a place where ships were in the habit of coming to load or to unload, to embark or disembark, and that as the capture took place in the Firth of Forth it was not a case of capture "in port"; and that it was immaterial whether the capture took place in the territorial waters of Great Britain or not: and that as the vessel was seized upon the high seas, she was properly liable to condemnation as prize and not simply to detention. (Prize Ct.) The Mowe 17

5. British ship—Cargo shipped by neutrals before declaration of war—Cargo consigned to German merchants—War declared whilst cargo at sea—Documents of title not taken up by alien enemies—Money advanced by neutral bankers—Property in goods at time of capture—Right of seizure and condemnation—Principles to be applied.—In June 1914 an American firm contracted to sell a cargo of wheat to a German firm, carrying on business in Germany. The wheat was to be shipped in July 1914 under a c.i.f. contract, and it was, in fact, shipped on a British vessel which left the United States before the declaration of or of imminence of, war between Great Britain and Germany. The bill of lading was given in favour of F., from whom the American firm bought the wheat in order to fulfil their contract with the German firm, and was made out to the order of D. or his assigns. The bill of lading was indorsed generally. The American firm then paid F. and obtained the bill of lading from him, but did not indorse it in favour of the buyers. The sellers afterwards obtained the certificates of insurance, and drew a bill of exchange on the buyers which was discounted with an American bank, with whom were deposited the bill of lading and other documents to be delivered up to the buyers through a Berlin bank on payment of the amount due on the bill of exchange. The buyers were notified of everything that had been done, but after the outbreak of war they refused to accept the bill. Whilst on her voyage the ship was ordered to proceed to a British port instead of to her original destination, and the cargo was eventually seized as enemy property. Held, that although enemy goods on a British ship are liable to seizure in port and to condemnation as prize in time of war, yet where the goods have been shipped during peace without any anticipation of the imminence of the outbreak of war, and where neither the property or the goods has passed to the enemy nor the documents of title representing the same have been taken up by the enemy, and where money has been advanced on the faith of these documents by a neutral banker, the same are not subject to condemnation by the Prize Court. The liability to seizure of enemy goods on British ships discussed. (Prize Ct.) The Miramichi 21

6. Enemy ship—Signalling apparatus fitted to ship—Apparatus the property of neutral company—Part of ship—"Goods"—Declaration of Paris—Limited powers of Prize Court—Discretion of Crown.—Submarine signalling apparatus fitted to a ship is a part of the ship itself, and if the ship is one owned by the enemy the apparatus is liable to be condemned along with the ship. It is immaterial that the apparatus is the property of a neutral, and only leased to the owner of the ship. The neutral owner who desires to put in a claim under such circumstances has no right in the Prize Court, and must rely entirely upon the discretion and the clemency of the Crown. (Prize Ct.) The Schlesien 26

7. Enemy ship—British ship—Enemy cargoes—Neutral bankers—Advances against cargoes—Seizure of ships and cargoes—Claims by bankers as pledgees—Condemnation.—If the legal property in goods captured at sea on a ship, whether British or enemy, is at the time of the capture in an enemy subject, such goods are lawful prize and will be condemned in spite of any claims made by persons who assert that they are pledgees or are otherwise entitled to any rights in them. The Prize Court cannot regard the rights of pledgees in any shape or form. (Prize Ct.) The Odessa; The Cape Corso. (See No. 16 below.) 27

8. Ship—Cargo—Seizure of cargo—Sale—Claim for freight—Proceedings in King's Bench Division—Jurisdiction of Prize Court—Transfer of case—Practice.—Where the cargo of a ship has once been seized as prize, even though the cargo is subsequently released, the jurisdiction to determine as to the rights of the shipowner to receive freight and also the amount of the freight, if he is entitled to receive any at all, is in the Prize Court and not in the common law courts of the country. (Prize Ct.) The Corsican Prince 29

9. Trading with enemy—Goods of ally—Consignment to enemy—Contract of sale at date prior to outbreak of war—Neutral vessel—Dispatch from neutral port—Date of departure after the outbreak of war—Liability to seizure and condemnation—General principles to be applied—Obligations as to trading binding Confederate States.—When war breaks out between States the following rules apply, according to international law, to trading: First, all commercial intercourse between citizens of the belligerents ipso facto becomes illegal, unless it is expressly allowed or licensed by the head of the State. Secondly, where a belligerent State has allies, the cities of all the allied States are under the same obligations to each of the allied States as its own subjects would be to a single belligerent State as regards commercial intercourse with the enemy. Thirdly, where such illegal intercourse is proved between allied citizens and the enemy, their property engaged in such intercourse, whether ship or cargo, is subject to capture by any allied belligerent, and is subject to condemnation in that belligerent's own Prize Courts. Fourthly, when such intercourse in fact takes place, the property of the persons engaged in it is confiscable, whether they were acting honestly and with bona fides or not. Prior to the outbreak of war between Great Britain and her allies and Germany and Austria, a French company contracted to sell certain goods to a German firm. The goods were shipped from a neutral State in a neutral vessel. War broke out whilst the ship was being loaded. She afterwards sailed with the goods on board for Antwerp and Newcastle. The French company later on directed her to Swansea. From certain correspondence it appeared that attempts were made by the English representative of the French company to deliver the cargo to the German company if they accepted delivery in England. The goods were seized as prize at Swansea, and later sold. It was admitted that at the time of seizure the property in the goods was still in the French company. Held, that although the French company had acted honestly and bona fide in the transaction, what they had done constituted trading with the enemy after the outbreak of war, and as they were citizens of a State in alliance with Great Britain the goods were confiscable under the above-named principles of international law in the same manner as those of a British citizen would have been under similar circumstances. (Prize Ct.) The Panariellos. (See No. 39 below.) 52

10. British ship—Cargo—Goods the property of a company domiciled in England—Enemy shareholders and directors—Management of company during war—Status of company—Principles to be applied when cargo claimed as prize.—Certain goods were sent from England to Australia on sale or return before the outbreak of war between Great Britain and Germany, and were sent back from Australia to England after the commencement of hostilities. They were seized in the Port of London as prize. The Crown claimed them as enemy goods. The sellers were a company incorporated in this country in May 1912. All the directors of the company were aliens residing in Germany, and the whole of the shareholders were either alien enemies or persons residing in Germany. On the day before war broke out the secretary of the company, who was a German, left England, having purported to appoint one of the employees as manager. Held, that the goods were at the time of seizure the property of an English company, and that although the company was so constituted that all its directors were enemy subjects resident in Germany and all its shareholders were either enemy subjects or aliens resident in Germany, the goods were not enemy property, and therefore not subject to condemnation as prize. The goods were released to the manager of the English company with a direction that he should not deliver them or their proceeds to any enemy shareholders or use them or apply their proceeds for the benefit of any such shareholders during the war. (Prize Ct.) The Poona 57

11. British ship—Cargo—Consignment to alien enemies—Ship diverted during voyage—Outbreak of hostilities—Seizure of cargo—Sale—Release—Claim for proceeds of sale—Claim for freight—Jurisdiction of common law courts—Jurisdiction of Prize Court—Construction of charter-party and bill of lading—"Blockade and interdicted port" clause—Equitable adjustment.—Certain goods, the property of a Russian bank, were shipped in a British vessel at a Russian port before the outbreak of war between England and Germany, and were consigned to German merchants at Hamburg. Whilst the vessel was on her voyage hostilities began, and by the order of the British authorities she was diverted from her original destination and directed to proceed to a British port, where the goods were seized as prize and afterward sold by order of the court. The proceeds were paid into court. The marshal gave an undertaking to the shipowners to pay to them the proper amount of freight and charges. The cargo was subsequently released to the Russian bank upon their giving an undertaking to indemnify the marshal against all claims for freight and charges in respect of the same. The bank subsequently applied for payment of the proceeds of the cargo in full without any deduction for freight or charges. Held, that although according to the common law the contract of affreightment came to an end immediately it became illegal because of the war to carry the cargo to its original destination, and that in a court of common law no freight can be recovered under such a contract when it has been so determined, the same rule does not apply when the cargo has been seized as prize. The Prize Court, proceeding on the principle of "even and equitable adjustment," will award a certain amount to the shipowners under special circumstances for freight and charges, such amount to be ascertained by the registrar and merchants. (Prize Ct.) The Iolo 141

12. Order in Council—Validity—Binding Effect upon Prize Court—Prize Court Rules—Order XXIX.—By Order XXIX. of the Prize Court Rules, as authorised by an Order in Council, it is provided that: "Where it is made to appear to the judge on the application of the proper officer of the Crown that it is desired to requisition on behalf of His Majesty a ship in respect of which no final decree of condemnation has been made, he shall order that the ship shall be appraised, and that upon an undertaking being given . . . the ship shall be released and delivered to the Crown." By Order I. of the Prize Court Rules: "Unless the contrary intention appears, the provisions of these rules relative to ships shall extend and apply, mutatis mutandis, to goods." A Swedish vessel carrying copper, which was absolute contraband of war, was seized and brought into a British port. A writ was issued that the ship and her cargo should be condemned and confiscated. Before any adjudication as to these claims had taken place, the Procurator-General on behalf of the War Department took out a summons that the Crown should be entitled to requisition the copper, leaving the question of the right to the same, or the proceeds of the sale thereof, to be decided later on. Held, that Order XXIX. was binding upon the Prize Court, that it did not contravene the law of nations, and that it was not ultra vires. (Prize Ct.) The Zamora. (See No. 25 below.) 144

13. Prize—British ship—Goods shipped at foreign port—Shipment prior to outbreak of war—Goods consigned to enemy subject at enemy port—Goods in transitu—Sale by enemy subject to neutral—Sale completed before outbreak of war—Imminence of war—Contemplation of war—Validity of sale—Bona fides—Right of capture of goods.—Where upon the facts of the case it appears that goods consigned to an enemy subject at an enemy port, and shipped before the outbreak of hostilities, are sold bona fide to a neutral purchaser during the period of their transit, neither the vendor nor the purchaser having the war itself in contemplation, the transaction of sale is complete and the goods are not subject to capture at sea by the armed vessels of the country which is at war with the vendor's country. (Prize Ct.) The Southfield ... 150

14. Neutral vessels—Contraband goods—Absolute and conditional contraband—Neutral consignors—Ostensible destination of cargoes—Neutral country—Real destination of cargoes—Enemy country—Goods consigned "to order"—No

SUBJECTS OF CASES.

consignee named — Continuous voyage — Continuous transportation—Goods intended for enemy—Evidence—False papers—Tests for condemnation or release.—Four vessels, the property of neutral owners, under time charters to neutral merchants, started on voyages from New York to Copenhagen in October and November, 1914, laden with large cargoes of lard, hog, and neat products, oil stocks, wheat and other foodstuffs, rubber and hides. They were captured and their cargoes were seized on the ground that they were conditional contraband, alleged to be confiscable under the circumstances, with the exception of one cargo of rubber, which was seized as absolute contraband. On the evidence before the Prize Court, when the Crown asked for the condemnation of the cargoes, it was found that the major portion of the goods were not intended to be incorporated in the common stock of Denmark, but that the same were intended for Germany as their ultimate destination. Held, that as the doctrine of continuous voyage and transportation, both as regards carriage by sea and land, was a part of international law at the time of the commencement of the war in August, 1914, and was applicable to conditional as well as to absolute contraband, all goods which were intended for the use of the German Government, although nominally having Copenhagen as their port of destination, must be condemned as lawful prize. In arriving at its decision in any particular case, the Prize Court is not limited or governed by the strict rules of evidence which bind the municipal courts of the country; it is entitled to rely upon well-known facts which have come to light in other cases, or as matters of public reputation. Strict evidence is often very difficult to obtain, and to require it in many cases would be to defeat the legitimate rights of belligerents. NOTE.—Since affirmed by Priv. Co.

15. British ship—Enemy cargo—Cargo shipped before outbreak of war—Part cargo discharged into oil tanks on wharf—Tanks owned by British company—"In port"—Meaning of term discussed—Liability to seizure of enemy cargo.—A cargo of petroleum oil in bulk owned by a German company was shipped on board a British ship which sailed from a neutral port for a German destination before the outbreak of hostilities between Great Britain and Germany. While on its voyage the ship was ordered to proceed to a British port, where the oil was discharged into tanks of a British company owning the wharf. When the greater portion of the oil had been discharged, the officer of Customs gave notice to the master of the vessel that the whole of the cargo of oil was placed under detention, not only that which was still in the vessel, but also that which had already been pumped into the tanks. The Crown claimed the whole as prize and asked for the condemnation of the oil. The cargo owners objected on the ground that the tanks were "on land" and not "in port," and that the matter was not within the jurisdiction of the Prize Court, and claimed the release of the oil to them, or, alternatively, that it should be sold and the proceeds handed to them at the end of the war. Held, that the whole cargo had rightly been condemned as droits of Admiralty. Decision of Evans, P. (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 8; 112 L. T. Rep. 164; (1915) P. 26) affirmed. (Priv. 16. Enemy cargoes—Cargo shipped in enemy ship—Cargo shipped in British ship—Neutral bankers advance against cargoes—Rights as pledgees under bills of lading—Seizure and condemnation—Bounty of Crown—Civil List Acts.—Enemy goods on board both British ships at the commencement of hostilities are alike the proper subject of maritime prize. If the legal property in goods captured at sea on a ship, whether British or enemy, is at the time of the capture in an enemy subject, such goods are lawful prize and will be condemned in spite of any claim made by persons who assert that they are pledgees or are otherwise entitled to any rights in them. The Prize Court cannot recognise the claim of pledgees in such circumstances in any shape or form. The power of bounty by way of redress or hardship still exists in the Crown, and has not been affected by the Civil List Acts. Decision of Evans, P. (reported in the case of The Odessa, 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 27; 112 L. T. Rep. 473; (1915) P. 52, which decision was followed by the learned judge in the case of The Woolston) affirmed. (Priv. Co.) The Odessa; The Woolston 215

17. Neutral sailing ship—Cargo—Contraband—Order in Council of the 29th Oct. 1914—Property of enemy—Condemnation—Compensation—Art. 43 of Declaration of London—Shipowners' claim for freight—Loss by delay—Contribution to alleged general average loss.—By the Declaration of London Order in Council, No. 2, 1914, dated the 29th Oct. 1914, it was declared that during the present hostilities the convention known as the Declaration of London should, subject to certain additions and modifications therein specified, be adopted and put in force by His Majesty's Government. Art. 43 of the Declaration of London, which provides (inter alia) that if a vessel is encountered at sea while unaware of the declaration of contraband which applies to her cargo, the contraband cannot be condemned except on payment of compensation, which was not excepted by the terms of the Order in Council. By the said order chrome ore was declared to be absolute contraband. Under the terms of a contract entered into in 1913 between an English company and a German company, the former shipped certain chrome ore in June 1914 from a foreign port on a Norwegian sailing vessel chartered by the German company. The bills of lading were made out in favour of the English company, the sellers, or order, the port of delivery being Rotterdam. The buyers paid to the sellers, at the date of sailing, in accordance with the terms of the contract, 50 per cent. of the purchase price of the chrome ore, together with a sum of 1000*l.* advanced by the sellers for the ship. On the voyage the vessel put into Pernambuco, in Sept. 1914, where the master first heard of the outbreak of war, and acting upon instructions received by cable he changed the course of the vessel from Rotterdam to Gothenburg, in Sweden, viâ the North of Scotland. The vessel was captured in Nov. 1914 by a British cruiser, and taken to Glasgow. At the date of the seizure of the vessel the master was unaware of the Order in Council of the 29th Oct. 1914. In the prize proceedings for the condemnation of the cargo, two claims were put in, one by the English company, the sellers, and another by a Swedish company, which alleged that the chrome ore had been purchased by them from the German company. No claim was made on behalf of the German company. The shipowners also put in a claim for freight, for remuneration for the use of the ship or loss by delay, and for contribution from the cargo to alleged general average loss. Held, that, on the facts of the case, the cargo was the property of the German company, the same having passed to them from the English company; that the German company were not the agents of the Swedish company; and that as the German company had put in no claim the question of compensation did not arise. Quære, whether in any case art. 43 of the Declaration of London applies under any circumstances to prevent the condemnation of contraband property of the enemy without compensation. Held, also, that the shipowners were entitled to freight, the amount to be ascertained by a reference to the registrar and merchants, that they were not entitled to any compensation for the use of the ship or loss by delay, and that they were entitled to a contribution from the cargo to general average loss provided they could establish a claim to the same. 18. Neutral commercial domicil—English and German partners—Partnership established in Shanghai—Firm registered at German Consulate—Goods of firm—Consignment to Germany—Seizure at sea—British ship—Claim as prize—Status of firm—Condemnation of share of German partners—Conditions under which share of English partners liable to condemnation.—A partnership firm composed of British and German partners, and registered at the German Consulate at Shanghai, cannot acquire a neutral commercial domicil, but is on the same footing as a German firm established in Germany. The goods of such a firm are liable to condemnation as prize if captured at sea on board a British vessel, but the shares of the English partners in the goods will be released if satisfactory evidence is given showing that the English partners broke off their connection with the partnership business as soon as possible after the outbreak of war. 19. Enemy ship—Private yacht of alien enemy—Outbreak of war—Seizure in port—Hague Convention 1907—Convention VI., art. 1—"Merchant ship"—Non-applicability of Convention to private yacht—Condemnation—Repairs to yacht after seizure—Indulgence of Crown—Position of Germany as to Hague Convention.—Owing to the acts of Germany since the outbreak of war, in violation of the terms of the Hague Convention to which she was a party, it is doubtful whether she can demand their observance by any of her belligerent enemies. By the Hague Convention 1907, No. VI., it is stated (inter alia), in art. 1, that it is desirable that any merchant ship belonging to one of the belligerent Powers which is in an enemy port at the commencement of hostilities should be allowed a certain number of days, if necessary, to depart to its port of destination, or to any other port indicated to it. A racing yacht, the private property of a German subject, was in a British port at the time of the outbreak of the war between England and Germany on the 4th Aug. 1914. It was seized and an order for detention was made. After the seizure, leave was given for certain repairs to be executed upon it to prevent the deterioration in value of the vessel; but it was expressly stipulated that the contractors were to have no lien or claim as against the marshal in respect of the costs of such repairs. The Crown subsequently asked for the condemnation of the yacht, and claims were then put in against the Crown for the sums expended in repairs. Held, that a racing yacht was not a merchant ship so as to be entitled to the privileges accorded by the Hague Convention 1907, No. VI., art. 1, and was therefore lawful prize as having been seized in a British port after the declaration of hostilities. Held, also, that apart from any indulgence on the part of the Crown, there was no legal claim for the sums expended in repairs to the yacht subsequently to the date of seizure. (Prize Ct.) The Germania. (See No. 54 below.) 230

20. Neutral ship—Capture by belligerent—Recapture by other belligerent—Salvage—Right to claim same—Rule as to salvage on recapture of neutral ship—Exception to rule—Conduct and character of captor—Right to destroy—Promise to release—Bona fides—German naval code.—Although it is a general rule of the law of nations that no salvage is due for the recapture of neutral ships, there is an exception to this rule, that is, salvage is payable if the ship when recaptured was practically liable to be confiscated or destroyed by the enemy captor, whether rightfully or wrongfully. The P., a neutral ship laden with coal which was the property of British subjects, was captured by a German cruiser shortly after the outbreak of war in 1914. A large quantity of the coal was taken by the cruiser, the crew of the P. were made prisoners, a German prize crew was put on board, threats were made to destroy the P. by the Germans, and the ship was compelled to accompany the German cruiser wherever required. About five weeks after the date of the capture the P. was recaptured by a British cruiser, and a claim was put in for salvage remuneration by the captain, officers, and crew of the British cruiser. The shipowners resisted the claim on the ground that the P. had never been in presumptive peril. Held, that, having regard to the fact that the commander of the German warship was "entitled" under German law to destroy the captured vessel and the likelihood that he would have done so, the opinion of the court was that the recapture of the ship both saved the ship from condemnation if brought before a Prize Court and from almost certain risk of destruction on the high seas if she was not. Held, consequently, that restitution to her Greek owners on recapture should have been upon payment of reasonable salvage. Award 7333*l.*, or one-sixth of the value of the salved property. (Prize Ct.) The Pontoporos ... 303

21. British ship—Enemy cargo—Cargo shipped before outbreak of war—Discharge in British port before outbreak of war—Storage in bonded warehouse in port—Declaration of war—Seizure of cargo—"In port"—Right of condemnation.—A cargo of goods, the property of a Turkish merchant, were shipped from a Turkish port and landed in London prior to the declaration of war between Great Britain and Turkey. The goods were conveyed in a British ship and, after landing, were stored in a bonded warehouse at the port of London, where they still were at the date of the outbreak of hostilities. Held, that the goods were liable to seizure and condemnation as prize in accordance with the principles laid down in The Roumanian (ante, p. 208; 114 L. T. Rep. 3; (1916) A. C. 124). (Prize Ct.) The Eden Hall 306

22. German ship—Entry into British port prior to outbreak of hostilities—Entry as a place of refuge—Not in furtherance of commercial enterprise—Detention—Subsequent release—Order to leave port—Outbreak of war—Seizure—Condemnation—Hague Convention 1907, No. VI., arts. 1 and 2, and Preamble.—By the preamble of the sixth Hague Convention 1907, the contracting parties stated that they had come to certain agreements on the ground, as therein stated, that they were "anxious to ensure the security of international commerce against the surprise of war, and wishing, in accordance with modern practice, to protect as far as possible operations undertaken in good faith and in process of being carried out before the outbreak of hostilities," and accordingly arts. 1 and 2 of the Convention were drawn up. By the first of these articles it is stipulated (inter alia) that an enemy merchant ship which is in a port of a belligerent at the date of the outbreak should be allowed a reasonable number of days of grace in which to depart, and by the second it is provided that if owing to circumstances beyond her control the vessel cannot depart within that period, she may not be confiscated but merely detained. A German liner bound from Philadelphia to Hamburg, hearing of the outbreak of war between France and Germany, put into F. on the 3rd Aug. 1914, in order to avoid possible capture by French cruisers. On the morning of the 4th Aug. 1914 the master was told that his vessel would be detained, but later in the day she was released and ordered to leave the port. She made no attempt to depart, and on the morning of the 5th Aug., war having broken out between Great Britain and Germany in the meantime, she was seized as prize. Held, even assuming that the Hague Convention was binding upon Great Britain as far as Germany was concerned, that the vessel did not enter and was not in the port of F. in pursuance of a commercial enterprise, that ample opportunity had been given to her to depart, and that arts. 1 and 2 of the Convention did not protect her from condemnation as prize. 23. International law—Reprisals—Neutral ship—Cargo, not contraband, with enemy destination—Ship ordered to British port—Unloading—Detention—Compensation for detention—Order in Council of the 11th March 1915—Validity.—Art. 3 of the Order in Council of the 11th March 1915—reprisals restricting German commerce—is valid by international law, and the owner of a neutral ship which is detained in a British or an allied port, having been ordered thither for the purpose of discharging goods on board other than contraband which are the property of the enemy or intended for an enemy destination, has no legal right to compensation for the detention of the ship through such discharge. The Order in Council does not impose any unreasonable inconvenience on neutrals considering the special circumstances of the case. (Prize Ct.) The Stigstad 310

24. Neutral ship — Contraband cargo — Cargo intended for enemy destination—Enemy agent on board vessel—Question of fact whether neutral ship becomes enemy vessel—Frustration of adventure—Sale of cargo to persons other than enemies—Return voyage—Capture—Right of condemnation.—Whether a neutral vessel is or is not acting in such a manner as to be held to be an enemy vessel is a question to be decided upon the special facts of each case. If a neutral vessel carries contraband goods, even though her papers are false, and the goods are intended for an enemy destination, and the original intention to carry and deliver the contraband goods to the enemy has been frustrated and abandoned, and the goods themselves have been sold and delivered to other buyers before the vessel has been seized, the vessel is freed from any liability to condemnation as prize. 25. Neutral cargo — Contraband — Requisition before condemnation — Order in Council — Validity—Prize Court Rules 1915—Order XXIX., rr. 1, 2, 5.—By Order XXIX. of the Prize Court Rules, as authorised by an Order in Council, it is provided that: "Where it is made to appear to the judge on application of the proper officer of the Crown that it is desirable to requisition on behalf of His Majesty's ship in respect of which no final decree of condemnation has been made, he shall order that the ship shall be appraised, and that upon an undertaking being given . . . the ship shall be released and delivered to the Crown." By Order I. of the Prize Court Rules: "Unless the contrary intention appears, the provisions of these rules relative to ships shall extend and apply mutatis mutandis, to goods. A Swedish vessel carrying copper, which was absolute contraband of war, was seized and brought into a British port. A writ was issued that the ship and her cargo should be condemned and confiscated.

Before any adjudication as to these claims had taken place the Procurator-General, on behalf of the War Department, took out a summons that the Crown should be entitled to requisition the copper, leaving the question of the right to the same, or the proceeds of the sale thereof, to be decided at some later date. Held, that Order XXIX., r. 1, as an imperative direction to the court, is not binding; that there was no inherent power in the Prize Court to sell or realise the property in its custody pending decision in such a case as this; that a belligerent Power has by international law the right to requisition vessels or goods in the custody of its Prize Court pending a decision of the question whether they should be condemned or released, but such right is subject to certain limitations: First, the vessel or goods in question must be urgently required for use in connection with the defence of the realm, the prosecution of the war, or other matters involving national security; secondly, there must be a real question to be tried, so that it would be improper to order an immediate release; and, thirdly, the right must be enforced by application to the Prize Court, which must determine judicially whether, under the particular circumstances of the case, the right is exercisable; and that in the present case there was insufficient evidence before the President to justify his making an order appealed from. The order was therefore set aside. As the copper had been used up by the War Department no order for its restitution could be made, and there must be a declaration instead and leave granted the claimants, in the event of their ultimately succeeding in the proceedings for condemnation, to apply to the court below for damages, if any, as they might have suffered by reason of the order, and what had been done under it. In a proper case both damages and costs can be awarded against the Crown or the officer representing the Crown in the proceedings. Decision of Evans, P. (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 144; 113 L. T. Rep. 649; (1916) P. 27) reversed. (Priv. Co.) The Zamora 330

26. Merchant ship in enemy port—Use of the Suez Canal port as port of refuge—Commencement of hostilities—Permission to leave—No offer of pass—Attitude of Germany—Reciprocal obligations—Detention—Sixth Hague Convention of 1907, art. 1, 2, 5—Form of Order.—By art. 1 of the Sixth Hague Convention 1907: "When a merchant ship belonging to one of the belligerent Powers is at the commencement of hostilities in an enemy port, it is desirable that it should be allowed to depart freely, either immediately or after a reasonable number of days of grace, and to proceed, after being furnished with a pass, direct to the port of destination or any other port indicated to it. The same principle applies in the case of a ship which has left its last port of departure before the commencement of the war, and has entered a port belonging to the enemy whilst still ignorant that hostilities have broken out." By art. 2: "A merchant ship which owing to circumstances beyond its control may have been unable to leave the enemy port within the period contemplated in the preceding article or which was not allowed to leave may not be confiscated. The belligerent may merely detain it on condition of restoring it after the war, without payment of compensation, or he may requisition it on payment of compensation." The G., a German ship, arrived at Port Said on the 5th Aug. 1914 in ignorance that war had been declared between Great Britain and Germany. From her arrival to the 14th Aug. she was not free to leave, but on the latter date she was informed that she was free to proceed if she liked. Matters so remained until the 13th Oct. She never asked for a pass. She was never offered one. On the 13th Oct. the Egyptian Government by arrangement with the British Government put a crew on board her, and on the 16th she was conducted out to sea, where she was seized by a British cruiser as prize. War was not declared between Great Britain and Turkey until the 5th Nov. 1914, and Egypt had not then been declared a British protectorate. The Egyptian Prize Court held that the G. was entitled to detention in lieu of confiscation, and that in accordance with art. 2 (sup.) she should be detained during the war and restored to her owners at the conclusion of hostilities. Held, that Egyptian ports must be treated as enemy ports, and that, assuming the Hague Convention applied and the Order in Council of the 4th Aug. 1914 extended to Egypt and was operative at the time the vessel was taken as prize, the failure of Germany to concur in recognising art. 1 left the question whether art. 2 or any part of it was obligatory, or whether, if the course referred to in art. 1 as "desirable" was not taken, art. 2 had any application to an enemy ship in an enemy port at the outbreak of hostilities, or had subsequently without knowledge of the war entered it, was one of international law involving a reciprocal obligation performable only at the end of the war. The British Government was entitled in such circumstances to seize and detain the ship during the war, and the proper order was one merely for the detention of the ship, leaving the ultimate rights of the parties to be determined after the war. 27. Ship in enemy port at outbreak of hostilities—Refusal of offer of pass—Liability to confiscation—Hague Conference 1907, Convention VI., arts. 1, 2.—If a merchant ship in an enemy port at the outbreak of hostilities rejects the offer of a pass and elects to remain in that port, she is not protected by arts. 1 and 2 of the Hague Conference 1907, Convention VI., from condemnation and confiscation as prize. 28. Enemy merchant ship in enemy port—Outbreak of war—Capture "in port" or "at sea"—Meaning of "port"—Capture in open roadstead—Hague Peace Conference 1907, Convention VI., arts. 1, 2.—By art. 1 of the Sixth Hague Convention 1907: "When a merchant ship belonging to one of the belligerent Powers is at the commencement of hostilities in an enemy port, it is desirable that it should be allowed to depart freely, either immediately or after a reasonable number of days of grace, and to proceed, after being furnished with a pass direct to the port of destination or any other port indicated to it. . . ." By art. 2: "A merchant ship which, owing to circumstances beyond its control, may have been unable to leave the enemy port within the period contemplated in the preceding article, or which was not allowed to leave, may not be confiscated," but may be detained. Held, that these articles applied only to vessels within a "port" in the ordinary mercantile sense of the word, and did not apply to a vessel captured while lying in an open roadstead at the commencement of hostilities, although at a place within the limits of the fiscal port. Decision of Sir S. T. Evans affirmed. (Priv. Co.) The Belgia 350 of the outbreak of hostilities. She was, however, allowed to proceed on her voyage apparently under a misapprehension that some period of grace had been allowed her. She proceeded to the port of Suez, regarding it as a neutral port, with the intention of remaining there. 30. Enemy ship—Port of refuge—Suez Canal port—Rejection of safe conduct pass—Seizure—Suez Canal Convention 1888, arts. 1 and 4—Question of international convention—Right of enemy owners to be heard.—Art. 4 of the Suez Canal Convention of 1888, confirmed by the subsequent Anglo-French Agreement of 1904, contains the following provisions: "The Maritime Canal remaining open in time of war as a free passage even to the ships of war of belligerents, according to the terms of art. 1 of the present treaty, the high contracting parties agree that no right of war, no act of hostility, nor any act having for its object to obstruct the free navigation of the Canal, shall be committed in the Canal and its ports of access, as well as within a radius of three miles from those ports, even though the Ottoman Empire should be one of the belligerent Powers." Held, that the Convention had no application to enemy ships which were using the Canal ports of access, not for the purpose of passing through the Suez Canal, but as a neutral port in which to seclude themselves for an indefinite time in order to defeat belligerents' rights of capture. Held, further, that as the alleged immunity from capture was based on international conventions, the enemy owners were entitled to be heard. Practice laid down in The Möwe (ante, p. 17; 112 L. T. 31. Enemy merchant ship—Offer of pass to neutral port—Conditions—Failure to use—"Force majeure"—Ship detained "owing to circumstances beyond its control"—Hague Conference 1907, Convention VI., arts. 1 and 2.—A merchant ship in an enemy port is not entitled to receive an unconditional pass under art. 1 of the Hague Convention VI., and reasonable conditions attached to the offer of the pass do not invalidate it; and the expression "force majeure" in art. 2 of the same Convention has reference to circumstances which render the ship unable to leave the port within the days of grace allowed her, and cannot be construed to include the circumstance that the master has not been provided with sufficient money by the owners to continue the voyage. Decision of the Supreme Court for Egypt (in Prize) affirmed. (Priv. Co.) The Concadoro ... 355

32. Goods of enemy firm—Goods shipped before the outbreak of war—Rights of neutral partner—Protection of his share—Conditions under which share is protected from confiscation.—A neutral subject was a partner in an enemy firm which had its headquarters in Germany. Goods which were the property of the firm were shipped from America before the outbreak of the war and were consigned to a German port. During the voyage, hostilities having commenced in the meantime, the goods were seized as prize. Upon the Crown claiming condemnation of the goods, the neutral asserted that he was entitled to his share in the same. Held, that a neutral partner does not lose his right to have his share in the partnership property protected from confiscation merely because he allows the delivery of the goods to proceed in the ordinary course, provided that he does nothing actively after the commencement of hostilities to further or to facilitate the delivery of the goods to the enemy house. (Prize Ct.) The Anglo-Mexican 367

33. Practice—Decree condemning cargo—Bonâ fide claims by third parties who had no opportunity of being heard—Rehearing—Jurisdiction of court to set aside its own judgments.—Where substantial injustice would otherwise result, the court has an inherent power to set aside its own judgments of condemnation so as to let in bonâ fide claims by third parties who had not in fact been heard and who had had no opportunity of appearing. But such power is discretionary and should not be exercised except where there would be substantial injustice if the decree were allowed to stand and where the application for relief had been promptly made. So held, remitting the summons to the Prize Court, with leave to the appellants to amend it and to file the proper evidence in support thereof. (Priv. Co.) The Bolivar 369

34. Cargo—Shipment of cargo before outbreak of war—Goods the produce of enemy soil—Neutral claimants — Company domiciled in neutral country—Branch office in enemy country—Domicil—Effect of Turkish Capitulations.—A Greek company, having its head offices at Athens, carried on a branch business in Asia Minor, where it owned certain vineyards. Before the outbreak of hostilities between Great Britain and Turkey a cargo of sultanas, the produce of the vineyards, was shipped by the company in a British vessel, and consigned to the order of the company at Liverpool. At the last-named port the goods were seized as enemy property and claimed as prize by the Crown. Held, that, although the Greek company was neutral, the goods claimed were the produce of land owned or held by the claimants in an enemy country and were liable to confiscation and condemnation, even though the goods were shipped before the outbreak of war, and that the effect of the Turkish Capitulation as to the holding of land in the Turkish Empire by persons of foreign nationality was irrevelant. (Prize Ct.) The Asturian 375

35. Military hospital ship—Evidence pointing to user for other purposes—Claim of protection under the Hague Convention—Appeal involving question of fact only—Practice—Hague Conference 1907, Convention 10, arts. 1 and 8.—By the provisions of Convention 10 of the Hague Convention 1907 it is provided: Art. 1. Military hospital ships—that is to say, ships constructed or adapted by States wholly and solely with a view to aiding the wounded, sick, and shipwrecked, the names of which have been communicated to the belligerent Powers—shall be respected and cannot be captured. Art. 8. The protection to which hospital ships are entitled ceases if they are used to commit acts harmful to the enemy. The presence of wireless telegraphy apparatus on board is not a sufficient reason for withdrawing protection. Held, on the evidence that the German ship O., which claimed to be a military hospital ship, had been made use of to commit acts harmful to the enemy, and therefore had forfeited protection under the Hague Convention and had rightly been condemned as lawful prize. An appeal from a decision of the Prize Court on a question of fact must be treated as a rehearing in the same way as an appeal to the Court of Appeal from a judge sitting without a jury in the High Court. There is jurisdiction to review the findings of the judge, but the Appeal Court attaches great weight to the fact that the judge below has heard the witnesses and practically acts on the opinion of the judge as to the credibility of the witnesses before him and the weight to be attached to their evidence. Without laying down an absolute rule that the mere sending by a hospital ship of a wireless message in secret code will of itself forfeit her right to protection and subject her to capture and condemnation, if such messages are sent a clear and satisfactory record of them should be kept, so that when the right to search is exercised there may be reasonable evidence of the messages and of the necessity—if there can be any on the part of the hospital ship—for sending them in secret code. Semble, that the principle of the Prize Court condemning the spoliation of ships' papers is specially applicable to vessels claiming to be hospital ships. 36. Neutral ship—Capture—Unneutral service—Capture in neutral territorial waters—Validity of capture — Restitution — Right to demand restitution—Hague Conference 1907, Convention XIII.—It is an established rule of international law that a capture within the territoral waters of a neutral is, as between enemy belligerents, rightful for all purposes, and it is only by the neutral State concerned that the legal validity of the capture can be questioned. Neither an enemy, nor a neutral acting the part of an enemy, as, for instance, by being guilty of unneutral service, can demand the restitution of captured property on the sole ground of its capture within neutral waters. This rule of international law has been in no way modified by Convention XIII. of the Hague Conference 1907. (Prize Ct.) The Bangor 397

37. Neutral ship—Cargo—Cargo lawful at commencement of voyage—Cargo declared conditional contraband before voyage completed—Seizure—Consideration—Claim for freight—Claim for demurrage.—A neutral vessel started from a neutral port for a neutral destination after the outbreak of war. Part of her cargo consisted of goods which were declared conditional contraband after her departure. The vessel was stopped on her way and sent into a British port for examination. Later on, but after the date of the order making the particular cargo conditional contraband, the cargo was seized as prize, on the assumption that it was ultimately intended for delivery to the enemy. The vessel was delayed a considerable time, but was ultimately released, and the shipowners put in a claim for freight and demurrage. Held, that the cargo was a proper subject for condemnation, but that the shipowners were entitled to a certain amount for freight, to be settled by the registrar and merchants, though not to anything for demurrage, which was an unfortunate incident of a state of war. (Prize Ct.) The Katwijk 399

Obligations as to trading binding confederate States.—On the outbreak of a war in which a belligerent has allies, the citizens of each of the allied States are under the same obligations to each other allied State as its own subjects would be to a single belligerent State with relation to intercourse with the enemy. Prior to the outbreak of war between Great Britain and her allies and Germany and Austria, a French company contracted to sell certain goods to a German firm. The goods were shipped from a neutral State in a neutral vessel. War broke out while the ship was being loaded. She afterwards sailed with the goods on board for Antwerp and Newcastle. The French company later on directed her to Swansea, where the goods were seized and sold. It was admitted that at the time of seizure the property in the goods was still in the French company. Held, that although the French company had acted honestly and bonâ fide in the transaction, what they had done constituted a trading with the enemy after the outbreak of war. They had failed to discharge the onus of establishing that the transaction had been abandoned before the seizure of the goods, which were therefore confiscable as those of a British citizen would have been under similar circumstances. Decision of Evans, P., reported 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 52; 112 L. T. Rep. 777, affirmed. (Priv. Co.) The Panariellos 484

40. General jurisdiction where there has been a seizure in prize—Cargo—Release—Action for freight in King's Bench Division—Subsequent motion in Prize Court—Order directing payment of a sum in lieu of freight—Order in effect varying contractual relations of parties—Order ultra vires.—The general jurisdiction which attaches in every case where there has been a seizure in prize includes the power to deal with all incidental matters, including questions of freight and compensation in lieu of freight, but does not include power to make an order which in effect varies the contractual relations of the parties. Decision of the President reversed. (Priv. Co.) The St. Helena 488

41. Enemy goods—Enemy pledgor of goods—Default of pledgor—Contract of sale by pledgees—Right of pledgor to redeem—Loss of right—Release to purchaser.—Before the outbreak of war in Aug. 1914, a firm of enemy subjects contracted to sell to a British firm a certain quantity of vegetable tallow. The tallow was shipped in a British steamship at Hankow, and the steamship started for Liverpool before the declaration of hostilities. The vendors of the tallow pledged the same, also before the outbreak of war, to a firm of Japanese bankers, who were indorsees and holders of the bills of lading, both at the time of shipment of the goods and of their arrival at Liverpool. The steamship did not arrive at Liverpool until after the outbreak of the war, and thereupon the consignees declined to take delivery of the tallow, as being the goods of enemy subjects. The Japanese bankers, owing to the refusal of the purchasers to take delivery of the goods, entered into a contract to sell the tallow to a British firm. The tallow was afterwards seized by the Customs officers as being enemy property. Held, that the enemy pledgors had lost their right to redeem the tallow when the contract of sale was made, and that by such contract they had ceased to be owners of the same. The tallow, therefore, was no longer enemy property and was not liable to seizure. (Prize Ct.) The Ningchow 509

42. Austrian goods on German ship—Seizure of ship after declaration of war with Germany, but before declaration of war with Austria—Continuous seizure—Writ issued against goods before outbreak of war—Writ issued after outbreak of war—Crown in possession of goods—Jurisdiction of court—Hague Conference 1907 —Convention VI., arts. 1, 2, 3, 4.—After the outbreak of war between Great Britain and Germany, a German ship, laden with a cargo which was the property of Austrian subjects, was captured on the high seas and brought into a British port. A writ was issued against the cargo on the day before hostilities broke out between Great Britain and Austria. Subsequently, after the outbreak of war between the last-named countries, a second writ was issued, the cargo being all the time in the custody of the Crown authorities. Later on, before the case was heard, the goods were sold and the proceeds paid into court. Held, that the goods or their proceeds were liable to condemnation as enemy property, as Germany had refused to accede to the protective articles of the Sixth Hague Convention. (Prize Ct.) The Schlesien (Claim of Alois Schweiger and Co.) ..... 51[illegible]

43. Cargo—Neutral goods—War risks—Insurance—Seizure of goods before outbreak of hostilities—Transfer of property in goods to enemy—Payment of insurance by enemy underwriters—Condemnation.—A certain cargo was shipped in a British vessel before the war from a neutral country by a neutral firm to their own order, and under an option the same was to be delivered to a German firm at a German port, and this German firm were to act as the shippers' agents for sale. The goods were insured against war risks by enemy underwriters. At the time of the seizure the property in the goods was still in the shippers. The shippers' German agents claimed against the underwriters for a total loss, which claim was paid in full, and the underwriters became the owners of the goods, there thus being a transfer of ownership from neutrals to enemies. The cargo was sold and the proceeds paid into court. In a suit for the condemnation of the cargo or its proceeds as prize and droits of Admiralty, the shippers put in a claim, doing so at the instigation of the German underwriters, that the cargo was at the time of seizure and still remained their property. Held, that the cargo was enemy property and must be condemned. (Prize Ct.) The Palm Branch 512

44. British ship—Registration—Real ownership—Enemy corporation—Control of British company by enemy corporation—Seizure of ship as prize—Seizure in British port—Condemnation or detention—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict., c. 60), s. 1.—In ascertaining whether a vessel is or is not enemy property, the Prize Court must consider the whole of the circumstances connected with its registration, management, and employment. If, therefore, a vessel flying the British flag is registered in the name of a British company, which company is bound to an alien enemy corporation in such a manner as to show that the ownership of the British company is simply nominal, whilst that of the enemy corporation is real, the vessel will be treated as enemy property, and either condemned or ordered to be detained in the same manner as any other enemy vessel. The T. was a steamship, registered as a British ship, and nominally owned by a British company; but in reality the British company was under an agreement entirely controlled by a German corporation, which appointed the directors and found their qualification shares, owned the entire share capital of the company in the person of its nominees, gave all instructions as to the working of the company, and received the whole of the profits earned by the vessel. For some time after the outbreak of war the vessel was used by the Admiralty, but was eventually seized as prize at Southampton.

Held, that, under the whole circumstances of the case, the T. was really owned by the German corporation, and not by the British company in whose name she was registered, and must therefore be held to be a German vessel; but that, as she was in port at Southampton at the outbreak of war, the order to be made against her was one of detention, under the Sixth Convention of the Hague Conference 1907, and not of condemnation. 45. Prize bounty—Enemy warship—Destruction—Number of crew—"On board"—Meaning of phrase—Amount of prize bounty to be divided—Naval Prize Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict., c. 25), s. 42—Order in Council the 2nd March 1915.—By the combined effect of sect. 42 of the Naval Prize Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict., c. 25) and the Order in Council, dated the 2nd March 1915, a prize bounty is payable amongst such of the officers and men of any of His Majesty's warships as are actually present at the taking or the destroying of any of the armed vessels of the enemy, calculated at the rate of 5*l.* for each person on board the enemy's ship at the beginning of the engagement. The Australian cruiser S. encountered and destroyed the enemy cruiser E. at a time when certain members of the crew of the E. were not on the vessel, but were engaged in operations of a warlike character, and in attendance upon the ship. Held, that in calculating the amount of the prize bounty to be distributed the whole ship's complement was to be taken into consideration, and not merely the number actually on the vessel. So long as the members of the crew are engaged on work which is ancillary to the main object of the enemy vessel they are "on board" within the meaning of sect. 42 of the Naval Prize Act 1864. (Prize Ct.) The Sydney 521

46. Neutral vessel—Cargo—Contraband goods—Voyage to neutral port—Ultimate enemy destination of cargo—"Continuous voyage"—Knowledge of shipowner—Whether such knowledge necessary—Liability of vessel to condemnation.—A neutral vessel carrying contraband cargo, which cargo by value, weight, volume, or freight forms more than one-half of the whole, is subject to confiscation and to condemnation as good and lawful prize, even when bound to a neutral port, if such cargo is destined ultimately for an enemy country, either by transhipment or land transit. There is no need for the captors to prove that the shipowner was aware of the ultimate destination of the contraband cargo. The principle laid down in The Hakan (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 479; 115 L. T. Rep. 389; (1916) P. 266) applied and extended. (Prize Ct.) The Maracaibo 522

47. Requisition of goods by Crown—Order of Prize Court—Refusal of special leave to appeal—Reasons for withholding leave.—On the hearing of a petition presented by the claimant for special leave to appeal from an order of the President of the Prize Court in chambers refusing an adjournment and giving leave to requisition for the use of the Crown certain copper: Held, that, as the goods were urgently required for the prosecution of the war and it was impossible to say that there was no reasonable cause for suspicion or that the goods ought to be released without further investigation, special leave would be refused, but, while so deciding, their Lordships desired to express no opinion as to whether the applicant could in the circumstances have appealed as of right. Rule as explained in The Zamora (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 330; 114 L. T. Rep. 626; (1916) 2 A. C. 77) applied. (Priv. Co.) The Canton 565

48. International law—Neutral vessels—Contraband goods—Freight—Claim by neutral shipowners.—By international law the owners of neutral ships are not entitled to any freight in respect of the carriage of contraband goods, except as a matter of grace or as a matter of discretion. (Prize Ct.) The Jeanne, The Vera, The Forsvik, The Albania 567

49. International law—Reprisals—Goods of enemy origin—Ownership—Transfer to neutrals—Passing of property in goods during continuance of war—Goods dispatched by parcel post—Seizure on neutral vessel—Detention—Order in Council of the 11th March 1915—Reprisals Order, art. 4.—Where goods are sent from a belligerent country to a neutral country during the progress of the war, or vice versâ, they are to be regarded, as far as the rights of a belligerent captor are concerned, as enemy property so long as they are in transit. It is immaterial what are the terms of the contract between the vendor and the purchaser as to the passing of the property in the goods, and it makes no difference in the general principle of international law that there is a transit by land through a neutral country at one end or other of the journey. A number of firms in America ordered goods from various firms in Austria and Germany. Some of the goods were ordered before the outbreak of war, and some after hostilities had commenced. A certain portion of the goods had also been paid for before the war. Towards the end of 1915 a number of packages was sent from Germany and Austria to America viâ Copenhagen, the same being forwarded by parcel post on board a Danish vessel. By virtue of the provisions of the Reprisals Order in Council of the 11th March 1915, the vessel was diverted on its journey to a British port, where the parcel packets were seized and the goods detained as being of enemy origin and enemy character. Held, that the goods were of enemy origin and enemy character, and that an order for their detention—or the proceeds of the goods if sold—until the conclusion of peace must be made. (Prize Ct.) The United States 568

50. International law—Reprisals—German Government bonds—Seizure in mails on board neutral ship—"Goods" or "commodities"—Meaning of terms—Order in Council of the 11th March 1915—Reprisals Order, art. 4.—Certain German Government bonds sent by a banking company in Berlin to a firm in Copenhagen were forwarded by registered post by the Copenhagen firm to a bank in Chicago on a Danish ship bound from that port to the United States. The vessel was, during its voyage, ordered to proceed to a British port, where the mail was overhauled and the bonds seized under the Reprisals Order in Council of the 11th March 1915. Held, that the bonds were "goods" or "commodities" and liable to detention under the order, as being of enemy origin, until the conclusion of peace, when they would be dealt with as the court might direct. (Prize Ct.) The Frederik VIII. 570

51. Prize bounty—Distribution—Destruction of enemy warships—Action—Presence of applicants in action—Principles to be applied—Naval Prize Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 25), s. 42—Order in Council of the 2nd March 1915.—By the combined effect of sect. 42 of the Naval Prize Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 25) and the Order in Council dated the 2nd March 1915, a prize bounty is payable amongst such of the officers and men of His Majesty's warships as are actually present at the taking or destroying of any of the armed vessels of the enemy, calculated at the rate of 5*l.* for each person on board the enemy's ships at the beginning of the engagement. It is a question of fact to be decided by the court whether a warship was or was not "actually present" at the taking or destroying of an armed ship, or of armed ships, of the enemy. Upon the finding by the court that H.M.S. Canopus did not in any sense take part in the chase of the enemy or in the subsequent naval engagement of the Falkland Islands, that she was detached for other duties outside the engagement, and that she was not present in any sense when the enemy ships were destroyed: Held, that her commander, officers, and crew were not entitled to any share in the prize bounty awarded under the Naval Prize Act 1864 and the Order in Council of March 1915. 52. International law — Domicil — Commercial domicil—Partnership firm in neutral country—Members of partnership enemy subjects—No partner resident in neutral country—Property in goods shipped by firm in neutral country—Passing of property—Seizure—Condemnation as enemy property.—In order that a person may acquire a commercial domicil in any country, residence in that country is an essential condition of the acquisition of such domicil. Even a subject of a belligerent country may acquire a commercial domicil so as to protect his property at sea during a state of war if he fulfils the above necessary condition. If, however, he is not resident in the neutral country, though he carries on business there through agents, any goods which are his property and are being carried in a British ship during the progress of hostilities are liable to condemnation. A partnership firm which carried on business in A., a neutral country, was composed exclusively of persons of German nationality. None of the members resided in A., and the business was carried on by agents. The firm consigned certain goods to a German house before the outbreak of war on a British ship. During the voyage, and after the declaration of war, the vessel was diverted to an English port and the goods were seized as enemy property. On an application being made by the Crown for their condemnation as prize, the consignors put in a claim on the ground that the goods were the property of a firm which had a commercial domicil in a neutral country, and were therefore not liable to be confiscated. Held, that, as all the partners of the firm were enemy subjects, and as none of the partners resided in the neutral country so as to possess a commercial domicil, the goods were enemy property and must be condemned as such. (Prize Ct.) The Hypatia 574

53. Claim to goods—Security for costs—Prize Court Rules 1914, Order XVIII., r. 2.—Order XVIII., r. 2, of the Prize Court Rules 1914 provides that: "Any person instituting a proceeding, other than a cause for condemnation, and making a claim, and being ordinarily resident outside the jurisdiction of the court, may be ordered to give security for costs, though he may be temporarily resident within the jurisdiction of the court, and the proceedings may be stayed until the order is complied with." Rule 3 of the same order provides that: "In any cause in which security for costs is required, the security shall be of such amount and be given at such times and in such manner or form, as by bond, payment into court, or otherwise, as the judge shall direct." Held, that the discretion of a judge in prize matters conferred by the above rules was a judicial discretion, and that in the case before the board there was no evidence that it had been exercised otherwise. The appeal therefore failed. Principles that should guide the judge's discretion when deciding the question of security for costs considered and explained. (Priv. Co.) The Stanton (Cargo ex) 586

54. Enemy ship—Private yacht of alien enemy—Outbreak of war—Seizure in port—Days of grace Navire de commerce—Sixth Hague Convention 1907, art. 1.—Held, that a racing yacht, the private property of a German subject, which was in a British port at the time of the outbreak of the war between Great Britain and Germany, was not un navire de commerce, and therefore was not entitled to protection in respect of days of grace, &c., conferred on a merchant ship by the Sixth Hague Convention 1907, art. 1. Decision of the President, reported 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 230; 113 L. T. Rep. 1167; (1916) P. 5, affirmed. (Priv. Co.) The Germania 588

55. Cargo—Whether destined for enemy—Onus of proof.—The Commercial Court for Malta (in Prize) found that a cargo of wheat seized as prize was on its way to an enemy destination and made an order that it should be condemned. At the hearing, the captors adduced no evidence in contradiction of the claimants' case, but subjected the whole of the transactions to the closest scrutiny, and suggested that in truth the wheat was on its way to an enemy destination. Held, that, as the documents produced by the claimants were genuine and regular in form, in the absence of evidence to refute them they were deserving of credit. The decision below was based on assumptions that were mere conjectures and were therefore inadmissible, whereas the claimants' evidence discharged such burthen as rested on them and sufficed to establish their claim on the facts so proved. Decision appealed from reversed. (Priv. Co.) The Eleftherios K. Venizelos (Part Cargo ex) ... 589

56. Goods afloat—Shipment prior to outbreak of war—Apprehension of war—Transfer in fraud of belligerent—Capture by allied belligerent—Rights of captor.—Where upon the facts of the case it appears that the transfer of goods at sea was induced by apprehension on the part of the transferor of war being declared between the State to which he owed allegiance and another State, such transfer is deemed to be in fraud of the belligerent rights of the latter State if war is subsequently declared. But there is no such presumption in the case of an allied belligerent State, which State neither the vendor nor purchaser at the time of the transfer contemplated would declare war with the vendor's country. Principles upon which a transfer of goods consigned to an enemy subject at an enemy port, made in apprehension of hostilities, is deemed to be made in fraud of captors considered. Decision in The Southfield (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 150; 113 L. T. Rep. 655) approved and followed. (Priv. Co.) The Daksa (Cargo ex) 591

SALE OF GOODS.

1. Purchase of goods for shipment abroad—Transit—Transit in stages—Stoppage in transitu —Interception of goods by purchaser—Right of unpaid vendors.—Semble, where goods are consigned so as to involve a transit by several stages, and are intercepted at the end of one of the stages by the buyer, the transit may be regarded as ended and the right of the seller to stop lost where the goods cannot be set in motion again without further orders from the buyer. (Bailhache, J.) Reddall v. Union Castle Mail Steamship Company Limited 51

2. Contract—Appropriation of cargo to buyers—Arbitration clause—"All disputes from time to time arising out of this contract"—Award—Finding of arbitrator as to custom of trade—Whether conclusive or conditional—Jurisdiction of arbitrators.—In connection with a contract for the sale of goods a dispute had arisen between the parties as to whether a certain tender was a good tender or not. That question was referred to arbitration under the clause in the contract and an award was duly made. That was carried to the board of appeal and they stated a special case for the opinion of the court. Certain questions were put to the court, and the material one was whether under the terms of a certain contract there could be a valid tender or appropriation of a cargo shipped on board the C. to the buyers at a time when the vessel was wrecked and the cargo had become a total loss. The Divisional Court answered those questions in the negative; (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 570; 111 L. T. Rep. 1107). Thereupon the matter went back to the board of appeal and they made an award in which they stated that, while they "unreservedly accepted the said answers upon the construction of the contract as a matter of law, apart from the custom of the trade," they nevertheless found that there was a long-established and well-recognised custom of the trade by which, in the circumstances of this contract, there was an appropriation of the cargo to the buyers. On a motion to the court by the buyers to set aside the award: Held, that the arbitrators had no jurisdiction to find conclusively the existence of a trade custom. The motion to see aside the award must therefore stand adjourned, both parties to be at liberty to file further affidavits on the question as to the existence of the alleged custom. Decision of the Divisional Court (Horridge and Rowlatt, JJ.) affirmed. Hutcheson v. Eaton (51 L. T. Rep. 846; 13 Q. B. Div. 861) and Re Arbitration, North-Western Rubber Company and Hüttenbach and Co. (99 L. T. Rep. 680; (1908) 2 K. B. 907) discussed and followed. 3. C.i.f. contract — Payment against shipping documents—Moratorium—Effect of—Postponement of Payments Act 1914 (4 & 5 Geo. 5, c. 11). —The moratorium provided by the proclamation under the Postponement of Payments Act 1914 has no application to a c.i.f. contract. (Sankey, J.) Happe v. Manasseh 91

4. Contract of sale—Provision of suspension of deliveries "in case of war"—Rise in freights—Liability of shippers.—Sellers in Spain agreed to deliver iron ore to buyers in Middlesbrough, the contract of sale (which was made after the commencement of the war) containing the provision that: "In case of war . . . the supply of minerals now contracted for may be wholly or partially suspended during the continuation thereof." The sellers possessed a fleet of steamers. Owing to the course of events in the war freights rose very considerably, and the sellers then contended that they were entitled under the above provision in the contract of sale to "suspend wholly or partially" further deliveries. Held, that the sellers were not entitled to suspend, since the sole effect of the contract of sale was to prevent them taking advantage in the rise of freights, but not to prevent them from fulfilling the contract. Per Bailhache, J.: The only prevention of this nature on which the sellers could insist would be such an increased cost of carrying out their contract due to the war as made it commercially impossible. A rise in freights due to an excepted cause can amount to prevention of the fulfilment of a contract to deliver oversea goods if it be indicative of a great scarcity in ships. The extent to which the rise in freights must be indicative of a scarcity in ships before it amounts to a prevention is a question of fact in each particular case. Where sellers would have to give away their goods, and, further, to make a loss on the goods delivered, such a scarcity of tonnage due to the war is indicated as will amount to commercial prevention. (K. B. Div.) Bolckow, Vaughan, and Co. v. Compania Minera de Sierra Menera. (See No. 11 below.) 342

5. Contract—Resale—Custom—Buyers to accept original shipper's appropriation—Reasonableness of custom.—In connection with a contract for the sale of goods a dispute had arisen between the parties as to whether a certain tender was a good tender or not. The question was referred to arbitration under a clause in the contract, and an award was duly made. That was carried to the Board of Appeal, and they stated a special case for the opinion of the court. Certain questions were put to the court, and the material one was whether under the terms of a certain contract there could be a valid tender or appropriation of a cargo shipped on board the C. to the buyers at a time when the vessel was wrecked and the cargo had become a total loss. The Divisional Court answered those questions in the negative: (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 570; 111 L. T. Rep. 1107). Thereupon the matter went back to the Board of Appeal, and they made an award in which they stated that while they "unreservedly accepted the said answers upon the construction of the contract as a matter of law, apart from the custom of the trade," they nevertheless found that by a long-established and well-recognised custom of the trade in cases of resales buyers under the form of contract impliedly agree (1) that they will accept the original shipper's appropriation passed on without delay if valid at the time of being made by the original shipper; and (2) that sellers shall be under no obligation to make any appropriation other than that of passing on a copy of original shipper's appropriation without delay, even though that appropriation at the time of being passed on might, apart from the custom and implied agreement, be invalid; and they found that there was a valid appropriation to the buyers under this contract. On a motion by the buyers to set aside the award on the ground that it was bad on the face of it or wrong in point of law, they contended (1) that the custom was unreasonable, and (2) that it was not applicable to the contract in question, the contract not being a "resale," and the original shipper's appropriation not being valid, as the goods were lost before that appropriation was made. Held (dismissing the motion), that the custom being one which honest and fair-minded men would adopt was reasonable; and that the buyers' other contentions could not be established, the special case, by which alone (if at all) they could be established, not forming part of the award. Olympia Oil and Cake Company Limited v. Produce Brokers Company Limited 393

6. Contract—Sale—No liability if shipment and delivery prevented by war—Increased freights owing to war—Impossibility of profit—Refusal of seller to deliver—Liability.—By a written contract dated Dec. 1914 defendants agreed to sell and the plaintiffs agreed to buy iron pyrites as produced at certain mines in Portugal to the amount of about 6000 tons per year for three years. Delivery was to be c.i.f. at Manchester. The contract contained this clause: "If war, epidemics, quarantine, strikes of men, accidents, diminution of output at the mine, or any other cause over which the sellers have no control should prevent them from shipping or exporting the ore from the river Guadiana, Portugal, or delivering under normal conditions, the obligation to ship and (or) deliver under this contract shall be partially or entirely suspended during the continuance of such impediment, and for a reasonable time afterwards to allow the sellers time to prepare to recommence shipments." Owing to the continuance of the European war freights rose to such an extent that the defendants found that they could no longer carry out the contract except at a loss. They thereupon gave notice to the plaintiffs that the "conditions of delivering pyrites under our contract with you have become abnormal, and therefore we must claim relief," and refused to make any deliveries at the contract price. The plaintiffs therefore brought this action, in which they claimed damages for the breach of contract of sale. The learned judge found that there was never any difficulty in effecting shipment in Portugal, that the words "under normal conditions" in the suspension clause referred to "shipping and delivery," and that "delivery" was "delivery at Manchester." Held, (1) that "prevention" within the meaning of the suspension clause was physical or legal prevention, and not economic unprofitableness; (2) that a provision enabling the defendants to take advantage of a fall in the freight market, but to repudiate the contract if freights rose, must, to avail them, be in clearer language than that used in the suspension clause; (3) that the clause applied to shipping and delivery which were required to be effected under normal conditions, did not apply to the intermediate transit; and (4) that it was doubtful what the term "normal conditions" meant in a contract made during a war. Judgment was therefore entered for the plaintiffs. (Scrutton, J.) Blythe and Co. v. Richards, Turpin, and Co. 407

7. Contract—Shipments—Payment against documents on arrival of steamer—Refusal of buyers to take up documents—Breach of contract—Competency of sellers to recover price of goods—Sale of Goods Act 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 71), ss. 16, 17, 19, 49 (2).—By a contract of sale the defendants agreed to buy from the plaintiffs certain shipments of sheepskins. Payment was to be "net cash against documents on arrival of the steamer." On the arrival of the third shipment the defendants refused to take up the documents. In an action by the plaintiffs for breach of contract, the learned judge was of opinion that the defendants had in these circumstances been guilty of breach of contract. The plaintiffs in the action claimed the price of the goods, and on this point: Held, that the price of the goods was not recoverable since it was not a sum payable to the plaintiffs on a day certain irrespective of delivery, and since the property in the goods had not passed to the defendants. (Atkin, J.) Stein Forbes and Co. v. County Tailoring Company 422

8. Contract — "Subject to safe arrival"—Failure to deliver—Goods never in seller's hands—Liability of seller.—J. contracted to deliver to B. goods at a certain price ex Liverpool "subject to safe arrival." The goods were never delivered because J. never had them to ship. In an action for breach of contract where J. sought to protect himself by the clause "subject to safe arrival" on the ground that the goods had never "arrived" safely or at all: Held, that the clause referred to the danger to which the goods must be subjected in course of transit and protected J. if any accident occurred during transit, but that J. was under an obligation to ship the goods, and judgment must therefore be entered for B. (Bailhache, J.) Barnett and Co. v. Javeri and Co. 424

9. Stoppage in transitu—Liability of unpaid vendor for freight—Sale of Goods Act 1893, ss. 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 61.—A notice of stoppage given during the transit and persisted in upon arrival of the goods involves an obligation upon the vendor to discharge the shipowner's lien for freight. If the vendor repudiates the obligation and so conducts himself as to prevent the shipowner completing his voyage and earning his freight, an action can be maintained by the shipowner against the vendor for damages for the breach of the obligation created by the notice to take actual possession of the goods upon arrival and to discharge the shipowner's lien for the freight in respect of the goods. By a contract of carriage entered into by the plaintiffs, who were shipowners, with the Construction Company, the plaintiffs carried in the autumn of 1913 by their steamers certain parcels of railway material from England to C., a small island owned by the plaintiffs in the Gulf of Tutoya, in Brazil. The ultimate destination of the goods was P., a place which was sixty miles up the river and could only be reached by lighters at certain states of the tide. Tutoya was the end of the ocean transit. The defendants, who were the vendors of the goods to the Construction Company, were not parties to the contract of affreightment with the plaintiffs. The Construction Company being in financial difficulties, the defendants, as unpaid vendors of the goods, exercised their right of stoppage in transitu by giving due notice to the plaintiffs before the steamers arrived at the port of destination. By the contract of carriage freight was payable before the departure of the steamers, and the plaintiffs had a lien upon the goods for unpaid freight. Upon the arrival of the steamers at Tutoya the plaintiffs landed the goods in question upon the island of C. and notified the defendants accordingly, but the defendants repudiated all responsibility in respect of the goods. At the time of the trial the goods were still at C., and no duty had been paid on them, nor had the plaintiffs received their freight. Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to treat the voyage as completed when the goods were landed at C., and to recover as damages for the breach of the obligation the full amount of freight which they would have earned had the voyage been completed. (Ct. of App.) Booth Steamship Company Limited v. Cargo Fleet Iron Company Limited 451

10. C.i.f. contract—Contract made during time of peace—Declaration of war—Obligation of seller to give notice of sea transit to buyer to enable him to insure against war risks—Sale of Goods Act 1893, s. 32 (3).—Sect. 32 (3) of the Sale of Goods Act 1893 provides that: "Unless otherwise agreed, where goods are sent by the seller to the buyer by a route involving sea transit, under circumstances in which it is usual to insure, the seller must give such notice to the buyer as may enable him to insure them during their sea transit, and, if the seller fails to do so, the goods shall be deemed to be at his risk during such sea transit." In May 1914 buyers agreed to buy from sellers goods at a price c.i.f. Smyrna, shipment from Calcutta so as to arrive at Smyrna by Sept. 1914. The sellers took out a f.c. and s. policy insuring the goods. On the 20th July the goods were shipped on board a British ship, the W. On the 4th Aug. war broke out between Great Britain and Germany, and on the 13th Aug. the W. was sunk with her cargo. Advice of the shipment was not sent by the sellers to the buyers in time for them to insure the goods against war risks. Held, that sect. 32 (3) did not apply to the case because it did not apply to a c.i.f. contract in normal circumstances (e.g., in time of peace), since such a contract provided for all the insurance which was customary, and the intervention of new circumstances (e.g., a state of war) did not impose a new obligation on the seller, since the application of the section must be considered as at the time of the making of the contract. (Rowlatt, J.) Law and Bonar Limited v. British American Tobacco Company Limited 499

11. Contract of sale—Provision for suspension of deliveries "in case of war"—War—Rise in freights—"Restraint of princes"—Frustration of adventure—Liability of sellers.—Sellers in Spain agreed to deliver iron ore to buyers in Middlesbrough, the contract of sale (which was made after the outbreak of the war in 1914) providing that: "In case of strikes, combinations of workmen, accidents, war, or any unavoidable total or partial stoppage of works or mines, the supplies of minerals now contracted for may be wholly or partially suspended during the continuance thereof, and the time for delivery extended proportionately. In the case of partial stoppage of works or mines the deliveries to be pro rata with other then existing engagements." Owing to the course of events during the war, freights rose very considerably, and the sellers contended that, the character of the war having largely been changed since the making of the contract, they were entitled under the above provision to "suspend wholly or partially" further deliveries. Held, that the words of the provision should be read as if they were "In case of strikes, combinations of workmen, accidents, war, or any other unavoidable cause occasioning total or partial stoppage of works or mines," and that there was no exception on which the sellers could rely as excusing them from the performance of the contract. Held, further, that a mere rise in the rate of freights was not alone a sufficient excuse for non-delivery, and the doctrine of "frustration of an adventure" had no application to the case. Decision of Bailhache, J. (ante, p. 342; 114 L. T. Rep. 758) affirmed. In the second-named appeal the contract, dated the 14th Dec. 1914, provided that: "In the event of a European war, restraint of princes or Governments, civil commotion, accidents, strikes, imminent hostilities preventing the carrying out of this contract, and all other causes . . . beyond the personal control of the seller, the contract to be suspended during that period at the sellers' option." Held, on similar facts, that the sellers were not prevented from fulfilling their contract by any of the excepted perils. Decision of Bailhache, J. affirmed. (Ct. of App.) *Bolckow, Vaughan, and Co. SALVAGE.

1. Tugowners' claim against cargo owners—Towage contract—Agreement by tugowners with shipowners not to claim salvage—Protection of seamen against abandonment of right to salvage—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 156.—Where salvage services (which must be voluntary) supervene upon towage services (which are under contract), the two kinds of services cannot co-exist during the same space of time. There must be a moment when towage ceases and salvage begins. If the tug remains at her post of duty there may come a moment when salvage would end and towage would be resumed. During the intervening time the towage contract, in so far as the actual work of towing is concerned, is suspended. Tugowners contracted with the owners of a ship carrying cargo for a towage on the terms of "No cure, no pay; no salvage charges." In the course of the towage the tug rendered salvage services to the ship and cargo: Held, by the Court of Appeal, affirming the judgment of the President, that the owners, master, and crew of the tug were not precluded from maintaining an action for salvage remuneration against the owners of the cargo. Query, whether there is any good answer in law to a salvage claim by the master and crew of a tug against a ship and her freight where tugowners are precluded from claiming salvage from ship and freight owing to their contract with the shipowners. The protection afforded to seamen under the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 in respect of their right to salvage considered. (Ct. of App.) The Leon Blum 273

2. Action in rem—Requisitioned ship—Exemption from arrest—Motion by Crown to stay proceedings—Costs—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 557—Proclamation of the 3rd Aug. 1914 (Transport and Auxiliaries).—An action was instituted for salvage services rendered by a tug to a ship requisitioned by the Admiralty and her freight, and the owners of the ship and her freight entered an appearance as defendants and gave the usual undertaking in lieu of bail. Under the powers conferred by the Royal Proclamation (Transports and Auxiliaries) of the 3rd Aug. 1914, the ship had become a ship belonging to His Majesty within the meaning of sect. 557 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. Upon an application by the Crown that the writ and all subsequent proceedings in the action be set aside, or that the proceedings against the ship and her freight be stayed so long as she remained in the service of the Crown. Held, that no proceedings ought to be taken with a view to arresting the ship so long as she was in the service of the Crown and under requisition, and that there would be no order as to costs as the application had been made directly on behalf of the Crown. (Ct. of App.) The Broadmayne 356

3. Services rendered by ship requisitioned by Admiralty—King's ship—Claim by owners of ship—Whether consent of Admiralty necessary—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 557 (1)—Voluntariness.—The plaintiffs were the owners of a steam tug which had been requisitioned by the Admiralty on terms whereby the owners were to pay the wages of the crew, to provide for all stores and necessary equipment of the vessel, and to take marine risks, and the Admiralty were to accept war risks on the vessel and crew and to provide coal. Whilst thus under requisition the tug rendered salvage services to a ship belonging to the defendants, and a claim was made against the defendants by the owners, master, and crew of the tug in respect of these services. Held, that the tug could not be regarded as a King's ship when rendering the salvage services, and was not prevented by sect. 557 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 from claiming ordinary salvage remuneration by the fact that she was hired to the Admiralty, nor did the master and crew require the consent of the Admiralty to the prosecution of their claim. 1. Wages—Outbreak of war—War risks—Agreement for extra remuneration—Right to recover—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 113, 114.—The risks of war not being contemplated by seamen when they undertake a commercial voyage, they are entitled, when there is a reasonable belief of risk from mines or of capture on the voyage home, to refuse to put to sea. A contract, therefore, made by the master of the ship to pay them extra wages to incur such risks is binding on the owners. (Coleridge, J.) Liston and others v. Owners of Steamship Carpathian 70

2. War—Detention in enemy port—Loss of ship—Claim for wages—Internment of crew—Hague Conventions 1907, No. VI.—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 143, 158.—A British ship, owned by the appellant during a voyage, for which the respondent's husband, who was a British seaman, had signed articles, was in a German port when war was declared between the United Kingdom and the German Empire and was detained by the German authorities, but no proceedings for her confiscation were known to have been instituted. Her officers and crew were at first kept prisoners on board, and subsequently, on the 2nd Nov. 1914, were taken ashore as prisoners, and later, from the 8th Nov. 1914, were interned at Ruhleben. The ship and crew were still detained and imprisoned when the respondent brought her action claiming an allotment of wages made her by her husband. Held (Lord Parmoor dissenting), that the shipowner was not liable to pay wages to the crew after the 2nd Nov. 1914, as from that date it was impossible for them to render any services contemplated by the contract of service. Decision of the Court of Appeal reversed. (H. of L.) Horlock v. Beal 250

3. Merchant shipping—Refusal to sail—Disobedience to lawful commands—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s 225, sub-s. 1 (b).—The respondents were nine seamen who signed articles as members of the crew of a steamship. The crew at the time of signing articles consisted of sixteen members, but afterwards the owners transferred the second mate to another ship, and thus reduced the crew to fifteen. On being formally requested by the master, the appellant, to go to sea the respondents refused, giving as the reason that there were not sufficient men to man the lifeboats or to keep a proper look-out. On an information for wilful disobedience to lawful commands within the meaning of sect. 225 (1) (b) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, the magistrate dismissed the information on the ground that the commands of the appellant were unreasonable, as the perils of the voyage were increased by the reduction of the crew. Held, that as the magistrate had found as a fact that the commands of the appellant were unreasonable, the respondents were not guilty of wilful disobedience to a lawful command, and his decision must be affirmed. 4. Agreement—Rate of wages—Special stipulation as to bonus—Nature of bonus—"Wages"—"Emoluments"—Stipulation as to forfeiture of bonus—Legality—Desertion of seaman—Delivery account—Payment of amount due to "proper officer"—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 114, 742—Merchant Shipping Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 48), s. 28.—By sect. 28 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 48) it is provided (inter alia) that the master of a British ship shall, within forty-eight hours of the termination of the voyage at the port where the voyage terminates, deliver to the "proper officer"—as defined by subsect. 11 of the said section—the amount due on account of wages as shown in the delivery account, and subject to any deductions allowed under the section, to any seaman belonging to the ship who has been left behind out of the British Islands during the course of the voyage. The appellant was the master of the British ship O., which started on a voyage to Australia and back in Feb. 1916 and terminated its voyage at T. in June 1916. Among the members of the crew was one F., and it was a special term of the agreement made in accordance with sect. 114 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 that all members of the crew, with the exception of certain classes of the crew to which F. did not belong, were to be paid a 15 per cent. war bonus over and above the rates appearing against their names on the articles for the voyage or during the period of the war, whichever terminated first, but "in cases of desertion and/or being paid off abroad the above bonuses will be forfeited." F. deserted at Sydney, and on the return of the ship to England the appellant paid to the proper officer—namely, the Superintendent of Mercantile Marine at T.—the proportion of the wages due up to the time of desertion, after deductions, but paid no part of the bonus, as it was contended that the bonus was not wages, but consideration for the performances of an entire contract, which contract had been broken by F., and that under the above term F. had forfeited any right to any share in such bonus. An information was laid by the respondent, the proper officer, against the appellant, for failing to comply with the provisions of sect. 28 of the Act of 1906, and the justices held that the sum stipulated for as a bonus in the agreement was "wages" within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Acts of 1894 and 1906, and that as such wages it could not be forfeited by agreement between the master and the seamen. The justices accordingly convicted the appellant. Held, on appeal, that the decision of the justices was correct. (K. B. Div. Ct.) Shelford v. Mosey 554

The night was rough and dark, and while he was on shore the ship was moved away from steps by the pier to another part of the harbour. While endeavouring to return to the ship in the evening, he got to the steps by the pier, and nothing more was known except that his body was found washed up on the beach at a place where, had he fallen into the sea off the steps, it probably would have been taken by the tide. His contract of service was contained in a printed document issued by the Board of Trade, but the Board of Trade scale of provisions was struck out, and the words "Crew to provide their own provisions" substituted. Held, that the accident did not arise out of his employment, as there was no contractual obligation on the deceased to go ashore to buy provisions, and that in going ashore he was not absent from the ship in pursuance of any duty owed to his employer, and in the absence of such duty no liability would arise under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act. (Before ATKIN, J.)

FRATELLI SORRENTINO v. BUERGER. (a)

Charter-party—Sale of vessel after date of charter-party—Tender of vessel—Refusal of charterers to load—Whether charter-party affected by sale.

On the 15th Sept. 1913, a vessel which formerly belonged to the claimants was chartered by the respondents to proceed to Odessa and load wheat or other grain for Rotterdam or Hamburg. While the vessel was discharging, before proceeding to Odessa, she was sold by the claimants, who duly notified the charterers of the sale. She was duly tendered for loading at Odessa, but the respondents, the charterers, refused to provide a cargo. In arbitration proceedings it was found as a fact that the claimants were ready and willing to perform their contract, and that they had duly tendered the vessel. On a case stated: Held, that while a party to a contract cannot so assign it as to make the assignee solely liable, he may arrange for another person to discharge the burden of the contract, provided it does not involve the doing of something which requires special performance by him, and that, inasmuch as the provision of a ship did not require any personal skill on the part of the original owners, they were entitled to sue upon it, although they were only ready to perform it vicariously through the new owners of the vessel.

AWARD in the form of a special case stated by an umpire.

1. Whereas by a berth contract dated the 15th of September, one thousand nine hundred and thirteen, and made between Fratelli Sorrentino (therein described as the owners of the steamship Rosalia) and Elias Buerger and S. Teper (thereinafter and hereinafter described as the charterers), it was agreed that the said steamship Rosalia should proceed as ordered to Odessa, Nicolaiff, Theodosia, or Novorossisk, one port only, and there load as ordered, from one or more shippers, a full and complete cargo of wheat, (and or) grain, (and or) seed, for Rotterdam, Weser, or Hamburg, as ordered on signing bills of lading. Freight was to be paid at the rate mentioned in the berth contract.

2. By clause 4 of the said berth contract it was provided that orders for the loading port were to be given at Constantinople within ten running hours of the dispatch of the captain's telegram notifying the charterers of his arrival, and that if the orders were not given by the charterers within the said ten running hours the steamer was to proceed to Odessa Roads for orders, which were to be given within six running hours of arrival, Sundays only excepted.

3. By clause 5 of the said berth contract it was stipulated that the charterers were not bound to load before the 1st Oct. then next (new style), and that they were to have the option of cancelling the contract if the steamer did not arrive at the port of loading and was not ready as mentioned in the berth contract on or before 6 p.m. on the 25th October then next (new style).

4. By clause 21 of the said berth contract it was agreed that in the event of any dispute arising under the contract such dispute should be referred to two arbitrators in London, one to be appointed by each of the parties to the berth contract with power to the arbitrators in case of disagreement to appoint an umpire whose award should be final.

5. And whereas disputes did arise the said Fratelli Sorrentino duly appointed Mr. C. W. Gordon as their arbitrator, and the charterers duly appointed Mr. F. W. Temperley as arbitrator on their behalf, and the said two arbitrators having been unable to agree duly appointed me, the undersigned Charles Thomas Glanville as umpire.

6. And whereas on the hearing of the said reference both parties applied to me to state a case for the opinion of the court upon certain questions of law arising.

7. Now I, the said Charles Thomas Glanville, having taken upon myself the burden of the said reference, and having duly considered the evidence put before me do hereby make my award in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court as follows:—

8. A true copy of the berth contract above referred to and dated the 15th September 1913 is hereto annexed and may be referred to as part of this award.

9. On the 25th September 1913 whilst the steamship Rosalia was discharging a cargo of coal at Venice the said Fratelli Sorrentino entered into a contract for the sale of the said vessel to the Societa Anonima di Navigazione Adriatica (hereinafter called the Adriatica) an Italian company domiciled in Venice. The said contract contained the following clauses:—"The sellers declare that the steamer is chartered from the Black Sea to Rotterdam at 12*s.* per unit, 12*s.* 3*d.* for Weser, 12*s.* 6*d.* for Hamburg with the 25th Oct. cancelling as per berth contract which will be handed over in a few days. . . ." "The buyers declare that they accept fully the execution of the charter-party for the Black Sea voyage to one of the ports as ordered on signing B/L for their entire risk and advantage, undertaking every obligation relating thereto." The berth contract or charter-party so referred to is the one now in question.

10. The said contract also provided for opening up for examination by the Adriatica of the engines, boilers, and double bottom of the said steamship, and the Adriatica were to declare within twenty-four hours of the opening of the last double bottom cell whether they accepted the steamer or not, and if they did accept her, the steamer thereupon became the absolute property of the buyers.

11. On the 4th Oct. the Rosalia was taken over by the Adriatica after the completion of the discharge of her coal cargo at Venice.

12. At Venice the steamer had her boilers cleaned and repaired, and certain repairs were effected to her engines, which occupied her six and a half days after the completion of the discharge. Such repairs were necessary in order to put the vessel in a seaworthy condition for the intended voyage. I find as a fact if and so far as it may be material that this delay was not more than a reasonable delay for the effecting of ordinary overhaul and repairs to a steamship in the ordinary course of business, and there was no unreasonable delay in the vessel proceeding from Venice to fulfil the said berth contract.

13. On the 11th Oct. the vessel sailed from Venice for Constantinople with a view to fulfilling the berth contract in question, and her departure was duly telegraphed to the charterers.

14. On the 11th Oct. Messrs. Jackson Brothers and Cory, the brokers acting in London on behalf of Fratelli Sorrentino, sent to Messrs. H. L. Wilbourn and Co., the representatives of the charterers in London, a letter, of which the following is a true copy: "Under instructions from Messrs. Fratelli Sorrentino, we hereby beg to inform you that they have sold their steamship Rosalia to Messrs. The Societa Adriatica de Navigazione, and this latter firm will carry out the terms of the charter-party with you dated 15th Sept. 1913, which please note."

15. On the 13th Oct. Messrs. H. L. Wilbourn and Co. wrote to Messrs. Jackson Brothers and Cory a letter in the following terms: "We are duly in receipt of your letter of the 11th inst., and in reply thereto would say it seems to us that Messrs. Fratelli Sorrentino have made no effort so far to perform their contract, and have now put it out of their power so to do, and our friends, Messrs. Buerger and Teper, do not propose to enter into fresh arrangements as to this vessel. Apart from this, perhaps you can inform us the cause of the extraordinary delay of the steamship at Venice. We have been expecting for some time past to hear her reported as passing Constantinople."

16. On the contents of the last-mentioned letter being communicated to Fratelli Sorrentino and the Adriatica, both of these parties protested against the charterers' statements in the letter above set out and insisted on the contract should be fulfilled.

17. On the 15th Oct. the charterers' agents in London wrote to Messrs. Jackson Brothers and Cory that they considered that the contract was at an end, and the charterers claimed damages therefor and for the breach of the contract on the part of the owners to proceed with usual dispatch, and on the same day the charterers offered to load the vessel on the berth contract at a reduction of three shillings per unit in the freight, which amount approximated roughly to the fall that had occurred in the Russian freight market between the date of the berth contract and the 15th Oct.

18. The last-mentioned offer was not accepted, and on the 19th Oct. the vessel arrived at Constantinople, and the master duly cabled to the charterers for orders, and having received no reply within the time allowed by clause 4 of the berth contract, proceeded to Odessa Roads and applied to the charterers' agents for orders there, and receiving no orders within the time limited by the berth contract, the captain made a formal protest against the charterers and informed the Adriatica, who then chartered the vessel for other employment.

19. I find as a fact that the said vessel was duly tendered under the said berth contract; that Fratelli Sorrentino and the Adriatica were always ready and willing to do all things necessary on their part towards the fulfilment of the said contract, and the said vessel was not loaded solely by reason of the charterers' refusal to load her.

20. Subject to the opinion of the court on any question of law, I find that the charterers were guilty of a breach of the berth contract in refusing to load the vessel as above set out.

21. I find that the damages which arose from the said breach of contract amounted to 1012*l.* 14*s.* 3*d.*

22. If and so far as it may be material I find as a fact that apart from any question of responsibility under the sale contract to the Adriatica the said Fratelli Sorrentino have not suffered any pecuniary loss by reason of the breach of contract, the said loss having up to the present fallen on the Adriatica, for whose benefit and by whose sanction and approval the arbitration proceedings were brought by Fratelli Sorrentino.

23. I further find as a fact that the charterers suffered no damages by the delay at Venice by the vessel executing repairs there as above stated.

24. The following points were raised by the charterers before me as raising questions of law on which they desired the opinion of the court should be taken. (i.) That by the sale of the said steamship Fratelli Sorrentino put it out of their power to and were not able to perform the contract. (ii.) That by reason of the alleged assignment by Fratelli Sorrentino to the Adriatica of the berth note, the rights of Fratelli Sorrentino under the berth note ceased. (iii.) That Fratelli Sorrentino did not prove any damage, and that they have suffered none in fact. (iv.) That as to the claim made on the ground that Fratelli Sorrentino may be liable to the Adriatica for damages in consequence of the charterers' refusal to carry out the contract: (a) That under the contract of sale Fratelli Sorrentino are not liable to the Adriatica for damages in this connection; (b) the charterers cannot be held liable in damages for a prospective claim; and (c) that such damages are in any event too remote. (v.) That with regard to the statement that Fratelli Sorrentino were claiming as trustees for and on behalf of the Adriatica, the charterers contended that they could not do this, they contended that the Adriatica had no claim because there was no assignment of the berth contract, and that if there were an assignment no notice was ever given of the assignment, and that if there were an assignment and notice that the berth contract was not assignable so as to bind the charterers without their assent. (vi.) The charterers also denied that any claim could be made by Fratelli Sorrentino as trustees for the Adriatica, because there was no contract between the Adriatica and the charterers, and no submission to arbitrate between them, and that the umpire had no jurisdiction to try any dispute between the Adriatica and the charterers.

25. As desired I have put the whole of these points before the court for the decision of any question of law arising thereon, having stated above my findings of fact.

26. Subject to the opinion of the court on any questions of law that may arise, I award that the said Fratelli Sorrentino recover from the charterers the said sum of 1012*l.* 14*s.* 3*d.* damages as above found, subject to Fratelli Sorrentino producing to the charterers an order by the Adriatica to pay the amount of the said award by the said Adriatica or their agents or a discharge by the Adriatica for the amount.

27. I further award and direct that the charterers do pay the fees and expenses of this reference and award, amounting to 138*l.* 12s. 6d., and that they also pay the costs of the said Fratelli Sorrentino upon the said reference, which I assess at 42*l.* If the said fees, expenses, and costs are paid in the first instance by the said Fratelli Sorrentino, they shall be entitled to recover same from the charterers.

28. If the court should be of the opinion that my award in par. 26 is wrong and that the award should have been in favour of the charterers, then (subject to any direction of the court to the contrary) I direct that the said arbitrators' and umpires' fees and expenses and the costs of the charterers on the reference, which last-mentioned costs I assess at 42*l.*, shall be borne and paid by Fratelli Sorrentino, and, if they shall be paid in the first instance by the charterers, that the charterers shall be entitled to recover the said amount from Fratelli Sorrentino.

As witness my hand this third day of July 1914.

R. A. Wright for the former owners of the vessel.—The main contention put forward by the respondents before the arbitrator was that by selling the vessel the former owners have put it out of their power to complete and fulfil their contract, and that they cannot therefore sue for its breach. The respondents must show that there is a principle of law which invalidates the findings of fact. A party to a contract can perform it vicariously if it is not of an intimate personal character. Consequently the owners were entitled to say that the ship would carry out the work through the Adriatica. [ATKIN, J.—Is it contended that the assignees should perform, or that Fratelli Sorrentino are still the parties to the contract?] The umpire has found that Fratelli Sorrentino were ready and willing to perform and duly tendered the vessel. Hence any claim must be made in their name, but their rights are enforceable for the benefit of the Adriatica. [ATKIN, J.—Do you suggest privity between the Adriatica and the charterers?] No. Only an equitable right. It has never before been suggested that the assignment of a ship did not affect a current charter-party. The death of a shipowner does not affect the charterer. [ATKIN, J.—Is there a contract that the owner will remain owner?] No. Reconstruction of shipping companies is a matter of everyday occurrence, but that does not invalidate the pending charter-parties. In British Waggon Company v. Lea (42 L. T. Rep. 437; 5 Q. B. Div. 149) waggons were let out by the plaintiffs, who covenanted to keep them in repair. The company being wound-up voluntarily, those who bought from the liquidators took over the liabilities. It was held that the purchasers could recover rent. If the shipowner, without selling the ship, has made a contract with a competent captain to run it on the voyage, no objection could have been taken. [ATKIN, J.—That case seems to deal with the liability of the assignor and to establish that he can still sue.] Tolhurst v. Associated Portland Cement Company Limited (87 L. T. Rep. 465; (1902) 2 K. B. 660) and the British Waggon Company case (sup.) raise all the points suggested by the respondents. A contractor who assigns the property and rights does not get rid of his obligations to the original contractor, nor does he abandon his rights and can enforce them in his own name. Readiness and willingness has never been found as a fact. [ATKIN, J.—In a contract affecting a charter-party may not the question of skill come in?] No.

Mackinnon, K.C. (Roche, K.C. with him) for the respondents, the charterers).—To formulate a principle is difficult. Can one who has promised to do certain work perform that work by a servant? Tolhurst v. Associated Portland Cement Company (sup.) is difficult to understand, and it can be explained by saying that there was an implied contract to assent to a novation. That is an extreme case. In par. 9 of the case the owners set out the charter, and declare that they accept it fully. In effect they abrogated their right to effect a novation. He referred to Brandt v. Dunlop, 93 L. T. Rep. 495; (1905) A. C. 461.

The notice to the charterers, taken in conjunction with the contract with the Adriatica amounted to a statement that they were no longer responsible for the contract. The second point is that assignment cannot be allowed because the personal element comes in. Primâ facie, if a man promises to do a thing, he promises to do it himself. He referred to

Anson on Contracts, 13th edit., p. 232;
Kemp v. Baerselman, 47 L. T. Rep. 454; (1906) 2 K. B. 604;
Splidt v. Bowles, 1808, 10 East. 275;
Scrutton on Charter-Parties, art. 17;
Dimech v. Corlett, 12 Moo., P. C. 199.

There are elements in the personality of the shipowner. If the principle of assignment contended for is admitted it would be competent for every owner to sell his steamer against the charterer to a wholly incompetent manager. According to this charter-party the steamer must arrive in a seaworthy condition. Again, the credit of the captain and the owners is to some extent involved. Various payments, too, have to be made by the owners, while advances to the extent of 700*l.*, or thereabouts, may have to be made by the captain. Finally, the personal element is introduced by the penalty clause.

R. A. Wright in reply.—The main proposition has not been controverted. There is no principle of law which says that the umpire was wrong in his finding of fact. He referred to

Wentworth v. Cock, 10 A. & E. 42;
Keith v. Burrows, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 481; 37 L. T. Rep. 291; 2 App. Cas. 646.

ATKIN, J.—In this case a question is raised as to what is the effect upon a charter-party of a sale by the owner of the ship at a date between the date of the charter-party and the date of the completion of the charter-party, the sale being a sale with the benefit of the charter-party to the purchasers. It certainly appears to be a very remarkable fact that there is no direct authority upon the point. I have no doubt that this is so, because I am satisfied, knowing as I do the learned counsel who are before me, that if there were any such authority it would have been cited to me. Therefore I have got to deal with this point upon general principles.

The facts as they appear in the case are that a contract of charter-party, or berth note, was entered into on the 15th Sept. between the claimants in the case, Messrs. Fratelli Sorrentino, and the charterers, Messrs. Buerger and Teper, that the ship Rosalia, which was then at or due at Venice to be discharged, should proceed to Odessa and then load a cargo of wheat for Rotterdam or Hamburg. While the ship was discharging at Venice, Messrs. Fratelli Sorrentino entered into a contract for the sale of the vessel to an Italian company; and it was provided in the contract of sale as follows: "The sellers declare that the steamer is chartered from the Black Sea to Rotterdam at the rates of freight given—with the 25th Oct. cancelling as per charter-party, which will be handed over in a few days, and they also declare that the whole crew is regularly insured with the Italian Maritime Syndicate until the end of this year, and the steamer with the Mutua Marittima Nazionale until the 18th Oct. next. The buyers declare that they accept fully the execution of the charter-party for the Black Sea voyage to one of the ports as ordered on signing bill of lading for their entire risk and advantage, undertaking every obligation relating thereto." It appears that the ship was taken over on the 4th Oct., and on the 11th Oct. she set off on her voyage to Odessa. On the 11th Oct. this notice was given by the brokers, the representatives of the charterers. [His Lordship read the letters set out in pars. 14 and 15 of the case, and continued:] In fact the ship did arrive at Odessa, and the charterers did refuse to take up the vessel, freights having fallen in the meantime.

I have to determine what the effect of that transaction of sale is on the charter-party. It appears to me that the law is clear that, under ordinary circumstances, a contracting party cannot assign a contract so as to relieve himself of the burdens of it. He cannot substitute for himself, against the consent of the other contracting party, a person who is to be under the same obligation to perform the contract. On the other hand, he can in most contracts, or in a great many contracts I will say, enter into an arrangement by which some other person may perform for him as far as he is concerned, the obligations of the contract; and the other party will remain obliged to accept the performance, if it is performance in accordance with the terms of the contract. But he will have the responsibility of his original contracting party for any breach that may happen, and he is not obliged to look to the person who is provided by the first person in any way to perform the obligations to him or be responsible for them.

I think those principles are plainly set out in the judgment of the late Master of the Rolls, then Sir Richard Henn Collins, in the case of Tolhurst v. Associated Portland Cement Manufacturers (sup). There are some contracts which a man has got to perform himself, which he cannot perform through an agent or through any person whom he, by any arrangement he likes to make, chooses to provide for that purpose. Such contracts are contracts which require in some special degree a personal performance by the contracting party. Such typical contracts would be a contract to paint a picture, write a play or a book. There are, of course, other contracts of a similar kind which can be mentioned. Here, as I understand the case, the original owners, Fratelli Sorrentino, do not suggest that there has been a novation, so that the obligation to perform the charter was imposed upon the purchasers. The claim for non-performance of the contract is made by them, and the argument that was adduced to me was adduced to me upon the footing that they remain liable to the charterers for the performance of the contract. At the present moment I am inclined to think that if they had sought to put upon the charterers the obligation to have the charter-party performed by the purchasers and purchasers only, the charterers would be justified in saying that that was a repudiation of the owner's obligation under the charter-party. That view has not been put forward, and is not what I have got to decide.

I have got to decide the question whether, merely by the sale of the vessel, together with the obligation taken by the purchasers that they would undertake every obligation relating thereto, the original owners have precluded themselves from suing upon this contract. In my opinion they have not I do not regard this contract as a contract involving a special personal obligation on the part of the shipowners. Obligations, no doubt, have got to be performed. The contract in fact is a contract that the steamer shall proceed to a port, and shall receive there from the shippers a cargo, and shall convey the cargo at that port on being paid freight at a certain rate. There are certain subsidiary provisions as to adjusting the payments that may arise between the parties, and a provision expressed, or if not expressed would be implied, that the steamer should be a seaworthy steamer. It appears to me that it is not a contract in which it could be said to be of the essence of the contract that the original owners should remain owners until the end of the contract. The cases that have been cited where a person was allowed to assign a contract in the sense that though he had required performance to be given by somebody else the contract was still in existence, are the cases of the British Waggon Company v. Lee (sup.) and Tolhurst v. Associated Portland Cement Manufacturers (sup.). In the British Waggon case, the waggon company, who had let coal merchants' waggons for a lump sum at a yearly rent, had agreed to keep these waggons in repair. The original contracting party had in terms sold that contract to a different company, and had at the same time assigned their repairing stations, their means of repair, to the new company. Nevertheless it was held that that was a clause of the contract which they could perform by somebody with whom they had entered into a contract; and that the original party was still bound by the contract, and bound to accept that performance, and that the original company still remained liable upon the contract. It appears to me that that is a much stronger case than the case of a charter-party. I certainly should be surprised to think that our law was of such a nature that a shipowner, who had once entered into a binding engagement for his ship, whether by a voyage, charter-party, or a time charter-party, was precluded from disposing of that ship, except at the risk of having the engagement declared at an end on the assumption that he had precluded himself from performing the contract. That is not my idea at all of what is in the contemplation of charterers or of shipowners.

I do not think that it is necessary to deal with the case of Tolhurst (sup.) in the House of Lords. It may be that it goes further and suggests that in the cases I have referred to, where the contract is not one that is of a specially personal character, the obligations, as well as the benefits of the contract can be assigned. I myself doubt very much whether that is the decision, but I do not think that the decision in the House of Lords went further than the decision in the Court of Appeal, except in so far as it said as a matter of procedure that the original contracting party who was claiming the benefit in that case need not be joined as party in the action. But in this case, which proceeds upon the footing that the original contracting party is suing, I have no difficulty myself in coming to the conclusion that he is right.

It is said by Mr. Mackinnon that it may very well be in the case where there was an assignment of a ship that the obligations would be performed by someone very much less able to carry out the obligations. Of course that may be so; but it does not appear to me that considerations of that kind are in the contemplation of the parties. One knows that if the obligations are not carried out and if the ship were not sent there, the charterer would have his remedy. In this particular case it is found that all the obligations of the charter-party would have been carried out, in other words, that both the vendor and purchaser were ready and willing to perform the obligations under the contract.

Taking it, therefore, as being a claim by the original shipowner against the charterers, I think that they were not precluded from performing the contract merely by the transfer of the ship with the benefit of the charter-party, and that the award of the arbitrator in this case ought to stand.

(Before the Right Hon. Sir S. T. EVANS, President.)

THE TOMMI; THE ROTHERSAND. (a)

Enemy ships—Transfer on eve of war—Transfer in transitu—German company and English company—English company composed of alien enemy shareholders — Bona fides — No valid transfer—Declaration of London, arts. 55, 56, 57 —Seizure in British ports—Order for detention.

Two sailing vessels on the high seas at the time of the outbreak of hostilities between Germany and Russia—the 1*st Aug.* 1914—belonging to a German company and flying the German flag, were offered for sale whilst at sea by the German company to an English company whose shareholders were mainly Germans, the German company itself being the holder of nine-tenths of the shares, and the offer was accepted. On the 5*th Aug.* 1914, the day after the declaration of war between Great Britain and Germany, both vessels were seized and detained as prizes by the Collectors of Customs in the English ports at which they had arrived.

Held, that at the time of seizure the two vessels were entitled to fly the German flag; that the flag determined their nationality; that the alleged transfers in transitu were, under the circumstances, invalid, as purporting to change the ownership of the vessels as against captors, whether imminent or actual belligerents; and that the vessels were therefore subject to detention in accordance with the decision in The Chile (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 598; (1914) P. 212).

Quære, whether a registered company nominally British, although consisting entirely of enemy shareholders, is able to be the owner of a British ship.

THESE were two cases in which two sailing vessels, alleged to be owned by an English registered company, were seized in British ports, at Gravesend and Kirkcaldy respectively, by the Collectors of Customs on the 5th Aug. 1914, the day after the declaration of war between Great Britain and Germany. Both vessels, which were the property of a German company, left German ports in the month of July 1914, and on the 1st Aug., when war was declared between Germany and Russia, communications took place between the German Company and the Norddeutsche Kraftfutter Gesellschaft, and the English company, the Sugar Fodder Company Limited, purporting to transfer the property in the vessels from the German to the English company. In the English company there was not a single British shareholder, and of the 5001 shares taken up, 4500 were held by the German company.

The facts and the arguments are sufficiently set out in the judgment, and the following cases were cited with respect to the national character of vessels:

The following are the articles of the Declaration of London referred to by the learned President:

55. The transfer of an enemy vessel to a neutral flag, effected before the outbreak of hostilities, is valid, unless it is proved that such transfer was made in order to evade the consequences to which an enemy vessel, as such, is exposed. There is, however, a presumption, if the bill of sale is not on board a vessel which has lost her belligerent nationality less than sixty days before the outbreak of hostilities, that the transfer is void. This presumption may be rebutted. Where the transfer was effected more than thirty days before the outbreak of hostilities, there is an absolute presumption that it is valid if it is unconditional, complete, and in conformity with the laws of the countries concerned, and if its effect is such that neither the control of, nor the profits arising from the employment of, the vessel remain in the same hands as before the transfer. If, however, the vessel lost her belligerent nationality less than sixty days before the outbreak of hostilities and if the bill of sale is not on board, the capture of the vessel gives no right to damages.

56. The transfer of an enemy vessel to a neutral flag, effected after the outbreak of hostilities, is void, unless it is proved that such transfer was not made in order to evade the consequences to which an enemy vessel, as such, is exposed. There, however, is an absolute presumption that a transfer is void—(1) If the transfer has been made during a voyage or in a blockaded port. (2) If a right to repurchase or recover the vessel is reserved to the vendor. (3) If the requirements of the municipal law governing the right to fly the flag under which the vessel is sailing have not been fulfilled.

57. Subject to the provisions respecting transfer to another flag, the neutral or enemy character of a vessel is determined by the flag which she is entitled to fly. The case where a neutral vessel is engaged in a trade which is closed in time of peace remains outside the scope of, and is in nowise affected by, this rule.

Oct. 15.—The PRESIDENT.—In each of these cases a claim is made as to the ownership of the vessels in question by the Sugar Fodder Company Limited, the vessels having been seized in British ports immediately after the outbreak of hostilities between Great Britain and Germany. The ships were owned by a German company, the Norddeutsche Kraftfutter Gesellschaft, and some time in the month of July of the present year they left German ports. Both vessels were on the high seas on the 1st Aug., when war was declared between Germany and Russia, and it was on that date that the alleged transfer took place from the German company to the Sugar Fodder Company. It is said that the ships were sold bonâ fide, and that a sufficient transfer took place from the original owners to the alleged new owners whilst the ships were in transit. It is necessary, therefore, to inquire into the whole of the circumstances of this alleged transfer.

The first thing that the court knows of the negotiations between the parties is derived from the letter of the 31st July, a letter written by the English company to the German company, in which it is stated that "if the Tommi should not arrive in time, we are going to land 100 tons at our wharf so that we may make sure of this 100 tons should there be a European war. . . . If your sailing vessels in case of war should be in this country, we think it would be advisable if the Sugar Fodder Company bought the same so that they should not be captured by any other nation." On the 1st Aug. there is another letter written by the English company to the German company, in which this passage occurs: "The Tommi, we now see, left Cuxhaven on the 28th ult. Should the Tommi arrive here and war have broken out, we will take the Tommi as well as the Rothersand over for our account, but we are not quite certain whether this transaction will stand good, as both vessels are registered at Hamburg." That letter shows very plainly that the writer of it had a very clear appreciation of what the law was or was likely to be. On the same day, after the letter of the 1st Aug. was written, the following telegram was received by the English company from the German company: "Aug. 1, 1914—We sell you Tommi for 30,000 marks and Rothersand for 35,000 marks. Wire acceptance." I do not know whether that is an offer to sell or a direction from a director in Hamburg to the director in this country, saying, "You must take it that this company sells whether you like it or not, and your company buys the Tommi for 30,000 and the Rothersand for 35,000 marks, and you must wire acceptance." Whatever may be the proper reading of that telegram, an acceptance was, in fact, sent immediately on the 1st Aug. by Mr. Gunther, acting on behalf of the English company.

On the 1st Aug., as I have already said, war broke out between Germany and Russia. The transactions between the two companies took place upon that day, and it is obvious that in any event they took place when war was imminent. War was not declared between this country and Germany until the 4th Aug., and therefore on the 1st Aug. Great Britain was a neutral country. I have grave doubts myself whether there was not an apprehension in the mind of Mr. Gunther, and I have graver doubt whether there was not an apprehension in the mind of Mr. Schrader in Hamburg as to the imminence of war between Germany and this country at the time. However, I do not think that it is necessary for the purpose of deciding the matter to show that they had the possibility of war between this country and Germany in their minds. The transfer which is alleged to have taken place was a transfer to defeat the right of an imminent belligerent. Russia, or any other belligerent, would have had the right to capture these vessels at sea if they had remained German. The question is whether such a transfer can be made so as to defeat the right of belligerents at that time, because that is the test which has to be applied. Of course, if England became a belligerent, she had the right to seize these ships in port as belonging to a State at war with her.

There are three heads under which the case can be considered: First, whatever may be the result properly to be attributed to this alleged transfer, it is said that the vessels were sailing under the German flag on the 5th Aug., and that therefore the German flag proves their nationality, and that they must therefore be taken to be German and subject to seizure by this country on the 5th Aug. It is perfectly clear that if a ship does sail under a particular flag, unless there are very special reasons, she enjoys the protection of the country whose flag she flies, and she is regarded as belonging to the State whose flag she carries. Mr. Laing says that there is a distinction to be drawn in considering this part of the case between a capture at sea and seizure in port. It does not matter in the slightest degree whether the flag was actually flying and hoisted at the mast. The question is, what flag the vessel was entitled to fly, and in my view there is no distinction upon this part of the case between a ship captured at sea and a ship seized in port. The law, as it is understood, which says that the nationality of a ship depends upon the flag, was adopted in the Declaration of London by the parties thereto, as is shown by art. 57, to which there is an interesting note written by M. Renault. The flag which these vessels were entitled to fly at the time of their seizure was the German flag, and they could not at that time, if they ever could during the war, supposing the transfer was valid, have the right to fly the British flag. Therefore, if there was no other point in the case, I think the fact that the vessels were flying the German flag is enough to entitle them to be regarded as the subject of capture.

The second question is whether this transfer was valid, and I have come to the conclusion, clearly, for the purpose of the Prize Court, that it was not a valid transfer at all. If it was necessary to decide—and I do not think that it is—that the transfer was incomplete, that is a sufficient answer; but if it was necessary I could not bring myself to believe it was a bonâ fide transfer of the ownership. It was hardly more than this. "We understand you over there, and you understand us over here; our companies are mutually connected. We in Germany own nine-tenths of the shares in the British company; if war breaks out, whoever the belligerent is, let these ships be called British ships." I think that that is the real substance of the transaction. Apart from that, much more is needed to transfer a vessel in transit when war has been declared or even when war is imminent than was done in this particular case. Naturally, these matters have often been considered in Prize Courts, but it is enough for me to say that the principles are fully explained in two cases, one dealing with the cargo and the other with the ship itself—namely, The Jan Frederick (Roscoe's English Prize Cases, vol. 1, 434; 5 Ch. Rob. 128) and The Baltica (Roscoe, vol. 2, 628; 11 Moo. P. C. C. 141).

If I have stated the correct principles which ought to be applied, I need not go into the details of the case to point out that nothing was arranged as to when the purchase money was to be paid, as to when the completion was to take place, or that it is not shown that any satisfactory arrangement was made by the British company that they and not the person who is said to have bought the vessels, namely, Mr. Gunther, should become the purchasers. Apart from the Declaration of London (arts. 55 and 56), and whatever alteration the Declaration may make in the law, it cannot be said that the artificial periods of time for the transfer of vessels agreed upon by the various nations can be found in any decision of any particular Prize Court belonging to any country. They are convenient, but I refer to arts. 55 and 56 to show (1) that the basis of the whole thing must be that the transfer was not made to avoid the consequences to which the enemy vessel supposed to be transferred might be exposed by the action of any belligerent, and (2) that in any event, even after a lapse of time like thirty days, the transaction must have been completed, not merely by letters or telegrams passing, but by the execution of the formal documents necessary to complete the title. In this case there is an absence of any such documents. I have come to the conclusion, therefore, without any doubt that this alleged transfer was not valid, and that these ships remain, for all purposes connected with the Prize Court, German ships.

As the point has been argued by Mr. Laing, I will just notice in passing that the provisions as to when property passes, which are very difficult to determine when dealing with municipal law, are not regarded as being anything like conclusive—indeed, are hardly looked upon at all—when a Prize Court is determining what was the character of a vessel at a particular time. It is quite clear in many cases that both the ships and the cargoes of ships which might very well be said to pass under municipal law would be subject to seizure and capture under prize law. These technicalities have not been allowed to bind decisions in the Prize Courts. They have been treated rather as a gossamer to be brushed aside, and the Prize Court regards the essentials of any transaction and tries to arrive at the realities of the case.

The third branch of the case is this—the two companies, English and German, were most intimately connected. It must not be assumed, even supposing that I was in favour of Mr. Laing on the first two points, that I should decide in this case, even if the English company became the purchasers, that these vessels were immune from seizure. The English company consists of six shareholders only. One of them was Mr. Rudolph Schrader, the director in Germany, who affected to sell the ships. The German company owns 4500 out of the 5001 shares of the English company—that is nine out of every ten shares are owned by the German company, and there is not a single shareholder in the English company of British nationality. In fact they are all citizens of the German Empire. The policy of our municipal law is that no foreign subject may own any share in a British ship. That is provided by the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894. It is no doubt the case that a company registered in this country under the Companies Acts is a separate entity (see Salomon v. Salomon and Co., 75 L. T. Rep. 426; (1897) A. C. 22), and such a company may own a ship. Whether a company consisting entirely of aliens can own a British ship is a question which probably has never arisen and has never, therefore, been decided. I am not sitting here dealing with municipal law, and therefore I am not called upon to decide that question, but I do not want it to be assumed that the Prize Court could not say, looking at the realities of this thing, that even if the transfer had been completed and if the shareholders in the British company became the purchasers, these vessels ought to be regarded as German ships. I am not deciding this question, but as the matter has been discussed I have thought it desirable to say what I have done. In the result the claim of this company must be rejected, and I make an order for the detention of these ships, the Tommi and the Rothersand, as in the case of The Chile (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 598; (1914) P. 212).

British ship—Enemy cargo—Cargo shipped before outbreak of war—Ship in British port—Cargo transferred to quay—Seizure—Right of condemnation—"In port"—Meaning of term—Charges—Demurrage.

A cargo of petroleum oil in bulk, owned by a German company, was shipped on board a British vessel which sailed from a neutral port for a German destination before the outbreak of hostilities between Great Britain and Germany. Whilst on its voyage the ship was directed to proceed to a British port, where the oil was discharged into the tanks of a British company owning the wharf. When the greater portion of the oil had been discharged, the officer of the Customs gave notice to the master of the vessel that the whole of the cargo of oil was placed under detention, not only that which was still in the vessel, but also that which had already been pumped into the tanks. The Crown claimed the whole as prize and asked for the condemnation of the oil. The cargo owners objected on the ground that the tanks were "on land" and not "in port," and that the matter was not within the jurisdiction of the Prize Court.

Held, that the tanks were, in effect, oil warehouses, and that warehouses were included in the definition of a "port"; that the whole of the oil, whether in the tanks or on board the ship, was maritime prize as the property of the enemy; and that the Prize Court had authority to condemn it as such.

Held, also, that as the company owning the oil was registered and had its principal place of business in Germany, it must be treated as an alien enemy even though the majority of the shareholders were the subjects of neutral or allied countries.

THIS was a case in which the Crown asked for the condemnation of the cargo, the property of an alien enemy, carried in the British ship the Roumanian, which was loaded at a neutral port before the outbreak of war between Great Britain and Germany.

The cargo consisted of 6264 tons of petroleum and was shipped in the Roumanian at Port Arthur, Texas, in the United States of America, in July 1914. The oil was the property of the Europäische Petroleum Union of Bremen, in Germany, and but for the outbreak of hostilities it would have been landed at Hamburg. On the 14th Aug., however, the Roumanian called at Dartmouth for orders, and thence she proceeded to Purfleet instead of to Hamburg. On her arrival at Purfleet the oil was pumped into the tanks of the British Petroleum Company as wharfingers, and whilst the pumping process was proceeding and before the whole of the oil had been taken from the vessel, it was seized by the Customs authorities and claimed as lawful prize. The owners resisted the claim on the ground that the seizure was made on land and not either in port or on the high seas. Other claims were put forward by the Petroleum Steamship Company, the owners of the Roumanian, for freight, demurrage, and other matters which are noted in the judgment, and by the British Petroleum Company for their charges as wharfingers.

The Attorney-General (Sir J. Simon, K.C.) and T. Mathew for the Crown.—There was no doubt that this oil was enemy property. The Europäische Petroleum Union was clearly a German company, and it was immaterial that the majority of the shareholders should be the subjects of a neutral country. It was the nationality of the company and not of the individuals composing the same that had to be considered. Then, as enemy property, it was liable to seizure. Whilst the oil was on board the vessel no question could arise as to this point. It was suggested that because the greater portion had been transferred to the shore there was a difference. This was incorrect. The wharf and the quay with the water go to make up the port. To hold otherwise would make it possible for enemy goods, when a vessel was in port, to be thrown on to the quay and thus to escape the jurisdiction of the Prize Court. See Foreman v. Free Fishers of Whitstable, 21 L. T. Rep. 804; L. Rep. 4 H. L. 266.

As to the claims for freight and wharfingers' charges, the Crown would pay those without admitting their legal liability to do so. Almost the whole of the shares in the British Petroleum Company and the Petroleum Steamship Company were held by the Europäische Petroleum Union, but the Crown was prepared to treat both of them as British companies. As to demurrage, although the Roumanian was delayed six days at Dartmouth, it was to her advantage that she called there and received fresh orders instead of endeavouring to proceed direct to Hamburg. This was a claim which the Crown could not admit.

Maurice Hill, K.C., Balloch, and Dunlop for claimants.—The Crown should make some allowance on the ground of demurrage, as what happened was really the usage of the vessel as a warehouse for the captor. Expenses of this character were always allowed. See

As to the claim for condemnation, a very clear distinction was to be made between enemy goods on land and those on water, and a hard-and-fast line should be drawn. Nearly the whole of the oil had passed into the possession of the British Petroleum Company before any action at all was taken by the Customs authorities. The cargo was almost completely on land. The Prize Court, therefore, had no jurisdiction over it. They cited

Dec. 7.—THE PRESIDENT.—The question in this case concerns the cargo of the steamship Roumanian, which consisted of 6264 tons of refined petroleum oil in bulk. It was shipped on the Roumanian at Port Arthur, Texas. The commercial documents are in evidence. Without going into detail, it is sufficient to say that the shipment took place before the outbreak of the war, and that the cargo of oil was destined for Hamburg. At all times material for this decision the oil was the property of a German company. At all material times, therefore, the oil was the property of enemy subjects. As enemy property it is claimed by the Crown as having been seized on behalf of the Crown as lawful prize.

On the other hand, the German company owners claim that it could not lawfully be so seized; and, alternatively, that a portion of the oil which had already been discharged into oil tanks on shore could not lawfully be so seized. There are other claims by the owners of the steamship for freight and other charges and expenses, and also by the proprietors of the tanks for charges and expenses due to them as wharfingers. These latter claims have to some extent been dealt with by consent, and will be disposed of at the end of this judgment.

The main question arises upon the claim put forward by the owners of the oil. Three limited companies come into the history of the case. I will for convenience sake now describe them, and afterwards refer to them by shorter titles. They are:—

(1) The Europäische Petroleum Union Gesellschaft M.B.H. of Bremen. Neutral bodies and subjects are shareholders to a considerable extent in this company. It is a corporate body duly incorporated under the laws of Germany, and as such entered an appearance in these proceedings. There was some discussion in argument as to its constitution, but it was not really denied that it was a German company. It clearly is. This company I shall hereafter refer to as "the German company." They were the owners of the cargo of oil.

(2) The Petroleum Steamship Company Limited. This company was an English company incorporated under the Companies Acts 1908 and 1913. The vast majority of the shares were owned by the German company, but there were also English shareholders and English directors, and its business was carried on in this country. This company I shall hereafter refer to as "the steamship company." They were the owners of the steamship Roumanian.

(3) The British Petroleum Company Limited. The same remarks apply as in the case of the second company. This was also an English company, and is hereafter referred to as "the tank company." They were wharfingers, and the owners of the tanks into which some of the oil had been discharged.

The material facts are substantially undisputed. I will state them shortly. While the Roumanian was on her voyage on the high seas, the secretary of Lloyd's wrote to the managers for the steamship company that the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty had suggested that in the national interest the Roumanian, which, according to Lloyd's records, was then on her way to Hamburg, should be diverted to a port of the United Kingdom. When the vessel had reached the English Channel her master (Mr. Ross), on or about the 14th Aug., received instructions from her owners through Lloyd's signal station at Prawle Point to proceed to Dartmouth for orders. The vessel was accordingly put into Dartmouth, arriving there apparently on the 14th Aug. There she remained for several days, when she was ordered to proceed to London. She arrived at Purfleet on the 21st Aug., and was moored at the tank company's wharf at noon of that day. The discharge of the oil into the tanks of the tank company by means of pumps and connecting pipes was immediately begun.

Information has in such cases to be given, and was in this case given, by the shipbrokers to the Custom House officer of the arrival of the steamship, in order that the oil may be tested for the purpose of ascertaining whether the particular oil is subject to duty or not. The Custom House officer does not release oil cargo until he has tested it and ascertained whether duty is payable on it or not. The officer visited the steamer at Purfleet on the 21st Aug. about 4 p.m. Some of the oil had already been discharged. He tested a sample taken from one of the ship's tanks with the specific gravity instrument. It was somewhere near the dutiable line, so he took away a sample to be tested in the laboratory of the Custom House. He again went to the vessel at 3.30 p.m. on the next day and took another sample, this time from the discharging pipe. He did not receive the test note from the Custom House analyst until the 24th Aug. Meantime, on the 22nd Aug. (about 7 p.m.), a letter was delivered on board the steamer from the Custom House officer at Gravesend, of which the following is a copy: "Custom House, Gravesend, 22.8.14.—To the Master, S.S. Roumanian, Purfleet.—Sir.—I have to inform you that your cargo, consisting of about 6264 tons of refined petroleum oil, is placed under detention.—Your obedient servant, H. BURRELL, senr."

This was the seizure, by one of the special war staff of the Customs on behalf of the Crown, of the cargo as prize. At this time, in round figures, 4800 tons had been discharged from the vessel into the tanks, and 1400 tons still remained in the vessel. To complete the story, the test note afterwards given on the 24th Aug. showed that the oil was of a quality admitted free of duty. The Customs officer first referred to deposed that until the cargo is certified free of duty it is still regarded as being in the charge of the Customs, and an offence against the revenue laws would have been committed if any delivery had taken place before.

As to the quantity of 1400 tons which remained in the ship, it is quite clear that, by international law, it was confiscable as prize on board a ship which arrived in port after the outbreak of hostilities. In the claim the German owners invoke the Hague Convention No. VI. But the Hague Convention is not applicable at all in this case. If the case is regarded as analogous to that of an enemy cargo on board an enemy ship under arts. 3 and 4 of the Convention, in any event German subjects could not found any claim under those articles, because Germany declined to agree to them and is not a party to them.

But the main and important question contested between the Crown and the claimants was whether the 4800 tons already discharged and in the tanks of the tank company were confiscable as prize and droits of Admiralty. The broad foundation of the argument for the German company was that this oil was on land, and that enemy property on land cannot be seized as prize. The tanks were contiguous to the tank company's wharf where the ship was moored, and were used in conjunction with the wharf for dealing with oil cargoes. Their distance from the wharf was between 100 and 150 yards.

This important question may be approached from two aspects. In the first place, was the oil in the tanks on land as this phrase has been used in international law; or was it still in port for the purpose of applying the principles of seizure of enemy property in port? Secondly, even if in strictness it was on land, was it in the circumstances of this case immune from seizure and free from confiscation in a Court of Prize? Before dealing particularly with these two questions, it would be helpful to look at the whole subject more generally. According to the practice of former times and according to the views held by some of the most revered and authoritative international jurists, all enemy property on land as well as on sea and in ports, creeks, and rivers could be captured and confiscated. But from time to time, by special treaties, and subsequently by the mitigation of rules considered to operate harshly on enemy owners of private properties, capture of such properties on land has been avoided and has fallen into desuetude.

The present position is well stated in Hall's International Law (6th edit., p. 435), where it is said: "Upon the whole, although, subject to the qualification made with reference to territorial waters (i.e., excepting property entering territorial waters after the commencement of the war, see p. 431), the seizure by a belligerent of property within his jurisdiction would be entirely opposed to the drift of modern opinion and practice, the contrary usage, so far as personal property is concerned, was until lately too partial in its application, and has covered a larger field for too short a time to enable appropriation to be forbidden on the ground of custom as a matter of strict law; and as it is sanctioned by the general legal rule, a special rule of immunity can be established by custom alone. For the present, therefore, it cannot be said that a belligerent does a distinctly illegal act in confiscating such personal property of his enemies existing within his jurisdiction as is not secured upon the public faith; but the absence of any instance of confiscation in the more recent European wars, no less than the common interests of all nations and present feeling, warrant a confident hope that the dying right will never again be put in force, and that it will soon be wholly extinguished by disuse."

It ought, however, to be borne in mind—which, indeed, is often forgotten—that a potent factor and a beneficent object in the mitigation of the severity of land seizure was the desirability of saving from confiscation the property of citizens of an enemy State which was already in the belligerent country at the outbreak of war. A beginning was made by exempting moneys lent by individuals of an enemy State to a belligerent State. Then real and immovable property was made an exception, at first from absolute confiscation, and later from sequestration of its income. Then came treaties allowing time for the withdrawal of mercantile property from a belligerent country at the outbreak of war.

Hall, in the work to which I have already referred (see p. 434), speaks of this advance and the reasons for it as follows:—"The custom which has become general of allowing the subjects of a hostile State to reside within the territory of a belligerent during good behaviour brings with it as a necessary consequence the security of their property within the jurisdiction, other than that coming into territorial waters, and indirectly therefore it has done much to foster a usage of non-confiscation; but as it is not itself strictly obligatory, it cannot confer an obligatory force, and the treaties which contain stipulations in the matter, though numerous, are far from binding all civilised countries even to allow time for the withdrawal of mercantile property."

I have before had occasion to refer to a note by Mr. Dana in his edition of Wheaton (8th edition, 1866). It not only deals admirably with the distinction between seizure on land and capture at sea, but it also gives prominence to the reasons why "maritime merchandise" and "cargoes" should be differently regarded, without, as I think, making a qualification that the "merchandise" or "cargoes" must be actually afloat at the time of the seizure. However this may be, I make no apology for citing the passage, as containing considerations worthy of being noted in connection with the present case. It is as follows:—"Note 171.—Distinction between Enemy's Property at Sea and on Land.—War is the exercise of force by bodies politic for the purpose of coercion. Modern civilisation has recognised certain modes of coercion as justifiable. Their exercise upon material interests is preferable to acts of force upon the person. Where private property is taken, it is because it is of such a character or so situated as to make its capture a justifiable means of coercing the Power with which we are war. If the hostile Power has an interest in the property which is available to him for the purposes of war, that fact makes it primâ facie a subject of capture. The enemy has such an interest in all convertible and mercantile property within his control, or belonging to persons who are living under his control, whether it be on land or at sea; for it is a subject of taxation, contribution, and confiscation. The humanity and policy of modern times have abstained from the taking of private property, not liable to direct use in war, when on land. Some of the reasons for this are the infinite varieties of the character of such property, from things almost sacred to those purely merchantable; the difficulty of discriminating among these varieties; the need of much of it to support the life of non-combatant persons and of animals; the unlimited range of places and objects that would be open to the military; and the moral dangers attending searches and captures in households and among non-combatants. But, on the high seas, these reasons do not apply. Strictly personal effects are not taken. Cargoes are usually purely merchandise. Merchandise sent to sea is sent voluntarily; embarked by merchants on an enterprise of profit, taking the risks of war; its value is usually capable of compensation in money, and may be protected by insurance; it is in the custody of men trained and paid for the purpose; and the sea, upon which it is sent, is res omnium, the common field of war as well as of commerce. The purpose of maritime commerce is the enriching of the owner by the transit over this common field, and it is the usual object of revenue to the Power under whose Government the owner resides. The matter may then be summed up thus: Merchandise, whether embarked upon the sea or found on land, in which the hostile Power has some interest for purposes of war, is primâ facie a subject of capture. Vessels and their cargoes are usually of that character. Of the infinite varieties of property on shore, some are of this character, and some not. There are very serious objections, of a moral and economical nature, to subjecting all property on land to military seizure. These objections have been thought sufficient to reverse the primâ facie right of capture. To merchandise at sea these objections apply with so little force that the primâ facie right of capture remains": (Dana's Wheaton, p. 451).

We start accordingly in considering the present case with the broad proposition that all enemy property—ships and cargoes—may after the outbreak of war be captured jure belli on the sea or in rivers, ports, and harbours of this country. There are other captures which can be made, but these do not concern the present case. All such captures are tried in the Prize Court, and can only be condemned in this court. In days gone by, constant contests and quarrels were waged between the common law courts and the Court of Admiralty as to the jurisdiction claimed by the latter to deal with causes civil and marine in ports, harbours, rivers, or creeks within the body of a county which the common law courts asserted could only be tried at law. But the jurisdiction and exclusive jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty in Prize was never doubted. "The nature of the ground of the action—prize or not prize—not only authorises the Prize Court, but excludes the common law": (per Lord Mansfield in Lindo v. Rodney, ubi sup.). These functions of the Prize Court have now been allotted to this division of the High Court, and contests between the various divisions can no longer occur.

It was considered, however, that the Judicature Acts did not render unnecessary the commission which had been issued by the Crown at the beginning of each war; and accordingly a commission was issued at the beginning of the present war, in, I think, the same operative terms as the old commissions. By this commission the court is "authorised and required to take cognisance of and judicially to proceed upon all manner of captures, seizures, prizes, and reprisals of all ships, vessels, and goods that are or shall be taken, and to hear and determine the same; and according to the course of Admiralty and the law of nations, and the statutes, rules, and regulations for the time being in force in that behalf, to adjudge and condemn all such ships, vessels, and goods as shall belong to the German Empire or to the citizens or subjects thereof, or to any other persons inhabiting within any of the countries, territories, or dominions of the said German Empire, which shall be brought before you for trial and condemnation." A separate commission was issued in reference to Austria-Hungary.

As Lord Mansfield said in Lindo v. Rodney (ubi sup.), "The commission does not say—upon the sea. It does not say—goods in the ship. 'Reprisals' is the most general word that can be used"; and he proceeded: "In causes civil and marine, to give jurisdiction to the Court of Admiralty (by which he meant the ordinary jurisdiction of the court), the libel must allege the cause of suit to be done upon the high sea, and, therefore, if that had been the intention of the commission, or the rule of law, it would certainly have been so expressed in the commission."

Now, in this case the steamship Roumanian, from the moment of the outbreak of war, carried an enemy cargo. This cargo as such was subject to capture or seizure as prize, either on the high seas, or after the arrival of the vessel in port. The vessel was not bound to come into a port of this country. But she was in a dilemma. Her cargo was destined for and consigned to the port of Hamburg by the joint operation of the charter-party and the bill of lading. To deliver the cargo at Hamburg was forbidden; that would be trading and having intercourse with the enemy. To remain at sea was not practicable. If she proceeded to any other country's port, or, indeed, wherever she proceeded at sea, she was liable to be captured by a German cruiser. If that had happened, she might have been taken to Hamburg, and the German company might have secured their cargo; and the enemy State might capture the vessel herself into the bargain. Of course, those responsible for the vessel were quite right in diverting her into a port of this country.

Now, examine the consequences relating to the cargo and its owners. As the vessel came, and properly came, into a British port she could not help bringing the oil laden in her into the port too, unless she previously pumped it into the sea. She was not bound to do that. Apart from the labour and waste of it, she might have looked forward in hope to securing her freight out of the cargo.

But, if I may personify the cargo for a moment, I would ask, what right of entry had it into this country? What right had it to expect protection in this country at someone's care and expense, for the sake of its owners? Its owners could not have ordered its delivery to anyone here on their behalf; no one could have accepted its delivery for them, as that would be against the law. It may be that the shipowners could have exercised their lien for freight by selling it, or part of it, if it had not been seized, but they do not purport to do so. It was delivered—no, that is an ambiguous term—4800 tons of it were pumped into the tanks; and there it was, subject to some kind of tacit understanding as to the lien for freight. It was a sort of nullius bona.

It came into the port as maritime merchandise of the enemy, subject to seizure, and in my opinion the whole of it remained such until it was actually formally seized on behalf of the Crown on the 22nd Aug. I cannot see how or by what process the portion of it which was at one end of the pipe in the tanks on shore had ceased to be seizable enemy cargo any more than the portion remaining in the ship at the other end had. In my opinion, the view that one part was seized in port and the other on land and not in port would be pedantic and erroneous.

But, in deference to the arguments upon the points raised, I must deal with them, and with the cases cited, to which a few other cases will be added. It was strenuously argued, as to the 4800 tons, that the seizure was on land as distinguished from in port and therefore that this court had no jurisdiction over it as prize. The word "port" may bear different meanings in different connections. In relation to enemy goods—by their nature the subject of naval prize when at sea after the commencement of the war—I think the word "port" has a meaning extended beyond the part of the port covered with water in which a ship carrying the goods would be afloat. Indeed, counsel for the German owners conceded that a wharf alongside would come within the "port" in this sense, although it would be strictly "on land." I fail to see what difference the 100 yards from the edge of the wharf ought to make.

Sir Matthew Hale, in his De Portibus Maris, describes "ports" and "creeks" as follows: "A port is a haven, and somewhat more. First.—It is a place for arriving and unlading of ships or vessels. Second.—It hath a superinduction of a civil signature upon it, somewhat of franchise and privilege, as shall be shown. Third.—It hath a ville or city or borough, that is the caput portus, for the receipt of mariners and merchants, and the securing and vending of their goods and victualling their ships. So that a port is quid aggregatum, consisting of somewhat that is natural, viz., an access of the sea whereby ships may conveniently come, safe situation against winds where they may safely lye, and a good shore where they may well unlade; something that is artificial, as keys and wharfs and cranes and warehouses and houses of common receipt; and something that is civil, viz., privileges and franchises, jus applicandi, jus mercati, and divers other additaments given to it by civil authority. . . . A creek is of two kinds, viz., creeks of the sea, and creeks of ports. The former sort are such little inlets of the sea, whether within the precinct or extent of a port or without, which are narrow little passages and have shore of either side of them. The latter, viz., creeks of ports, are by kind of civil denomination such. They are such, that though possibly for their extent and situation they might be ports, yet they are either members of or dependent upon other ports. And it began thus. The King could not conveniently have a customer and comptroller in every port or haven. But these custom officers were fixed at some eminent port; and the smaller adjacent ports became by that means creeks, or appendants of that where these custom officers were placed": (Hargrave's Law Tracts, pp. 46, 47, 48).

It will be observed that "warehouses" are expressly included in the definition of port. And the tank company's tanks in the present case could not be placed in a category higher than, or different from, warehouses. The tanks are oil warehouses. The Ooster Eems (ubi sup.) and The Two Friends (ubi sup.) were referred to. The facts in this case were quite different. Of The Ooster Eems (ubi sup.) Lord Stowell said in The Two Friends (ubi sup.) "that those goods had never been taken on the high seas, they had only passed in the way of civil bailment on delivery into civil hands, and were afterwards arrested on shore as prize." And in The Two Friends (ubi sup.) Lord Stowell would not accede to the argument that the goods, being on shore, were out of the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty in prize. The concluding paragraph of his judgment is as follows: "But the present case is radically bottomed in prize; and, if so, all the consequences of prize will follow. If the goods are removed before proceedings are commenced, they are still liable to be called in by a monition. A different way has been taken in this case by a personal monition, as more convenient to the parties proceeded against. On the whole, I am of opinion that the English seamen are entitled to redress here; that these goods being matter of prize, even that part which had been landed, are subject to the jurisdiction of this court, and I shall therefore overrule the protest."

That was a case of salvage on recapture when part of the salved cargo had been landed before the suit was instituted. Nothing in these cases, in my opinion, precludes the claim of the Crown in the present case.

Counsel for the German company also cited The Hoffnung (No. 3) (ubi sup.) and The Charlotte, note to the same case (ubi sup.). The former was a case where, before seizure at the outbreak of hostilities, a part of the cargo had already been sold, and had been applied to the reparation of the vessel also before the seizure. The decision was that the captors could not claim average against the ship on account of the cargo so sold and applied. In the latter case the court held that the proceeds of part of the cargo already sold and delivered before it was even subject to seizure were not amenable to the jurisdiction of the Prize Court. It does not seem to me that either of these decisions can assist the claim of the German owners in the present case.

The other authority referred to was the well-known case of Brown v. United States (ubi sup.). In the District Court it was tried before Story, J., and is there reported as The Cargo of the Ship Emulous (1 Gallison, 563). Story, J. also sat in the Supreme Court on the appeal, and was one of the dissenting judges. It is an interesting and illuminating case. The subject-matter was some timber which had been British property carried on an American ship, and which had been landed and put into a salt water creek (which was not navigable, although the tide ebbed and flowed there), some twelve months before the seizure. About five months after it was landed it had been sold to the claimant Brown. It was in that position at the commencement of hostilities between the United States and Great Britain, and was seized afterwards.

The ultimate and actual decision was that the property was on land, and was found on land at the commencement of hostilities, and that therefore it could not be condemned as enemy property without a legislative Act of Congress authorising its confiscation. Of course, the decision is not binding on this court. It would be open to this court, if it deemed fit, to accept the guidance of the judgment of Story, J., who was so great an authority on Prize Law, even in preference to that of the very eminent Chief Justice.

But I refrain from attempting to weigh the judgments. I only desire to emphasise the fact that the ground of the decision was that the property was not only found in fact to be seized on land, but especially that it was found within the territory of the belligerent at the commencement of hostilitities, and, further, to call attention to what Story, J. conceived to be conceded by the Supreme Court if the property in question had been brought to where it was after war had broken out. At p. 151 (8 Cranch) this learned judge said: "The opinion of my brethren seems to admit that the effect of hostilities is to confer all the rights which war confers; and it seems tacitly to concede that by virtue of the declaration of war the executive would have a right to seize enemies' property which should actually come within our territory during the war." And at p. 154 again, he said that he understood the opinion of the court to proceed upon the tacit acknowledgment that the executive might seize and confiscate property (and I think he intended to include the property in question) if it had come into the country since the war.

I have now dealt with the cases which were cited. There are a few others to which I think it well to call attention. One, called "1253 bags of rice, and 103 casks of rice," arising in the course of the American Civil War, was heard in prize in the District Court of New York: (Blatchford's Prize Cases, 1861-1865, p. 211). As I have just been dealing with the case of Brown v. United States (ubi sup.), I will first take from the judgment of Betts, J. a passage to show what he considered to be the effect of that decision: "The declaration upon the merits in Brown v. United States (ubi sup.) went upon the principle that the enemy property there seized was landed in this country before the war commenced between England and the United States, and that it was not liable to capture as prize in the absence of positive law authorising its seizure. The majority of the court who adopted that doctrine did not controvert the declaration of the Circuit Court, declaring the suit to be of a prize character, nor the historical and juridical fact that the practice of the United States courts is governed by the rules of Admiralty law disclosed in the English reports. It is very clear that in England the prize jurisdiction does not depend upon locality, but upon the subject-matter."

The part of the case before Betts, J., which, though not strictly relevant, may help to throw some light upon the case now before me, is that which dealt with the "103 casks of rice." This cargo was not water-borne when seized, but was found stored in a warehouse in the enemy's country, and captured there by launches of a United States vessel. "The question specially presented was whether the seizure on land was in law a maritime capture." It was held in that case, dependent, no doubt, upon its particular facts, that it was.

Another case is The Thalia, in the Supreme Court of Prize in Japan: (Russian and Japanese Prize Cases 1904-1905, vol. 2, p. 116). There a vessel belonging to Russian citizens was in itself a sort of cargo, because it had been laden upon another vessel, and so conveyed to a place near a dry dock in Japan to undergo repairs. It was placed on dry land near the repairing dock, and was there before the outbreak of hostilities. It was held to be, by reason of its character, a maritime prize and subject to capture and confiscation.

I now finally desire to refer to some cases in this country, which are not reported. They are noted in a most valuable and elaborate report in MS., which was drawn up by Mr. Rothery, a former registrar of the Court of Admiralty during the Crimean War, and presented to one of our public departments in 1857. It represents two or three years' labour, and shows scrupulous care and great skill and learning. Its chief object was to ascertain how and to what extent captors had been rewarded for prizes taken. I could wish it were accessible in print to those interested in these subjects. That, also, is the opinion of Mr. Roscoe, the registrar, through whose kindness I have become acquainted with it. In perusing it I have come across the following cases of interest bearing upon the question now before the court.

One related to a seizure effected at Ramsgate. The following is the extract from the MS. Report: "It is that of the French vessel Marie Anne (Warrant No. 97). It appears from the King's Proctor's report in this case bearing date the 26th Feb. 1805 (Treasury No. 1028) that on the breaking out of hostilities with France on the 16th May 1803, John Friend, of Ramsgate, in the county of Kent, shipbuilder, having obtained information that a ship called the Marie Anne (then under repair in his own yard at Ramsgate) and certain parts of the cargo thereof, which had been landed and deposited in warehouses, were French property, seized the said ship and goods, as being the property of His Majesty's enemies, and with great difficulty obtained the papers and documents belonging to the ship and cargo from the merchants, in whose hands the same had been deposited, and took the master and other necessary witnesses to Deal and caused them to undergo their examinations before the proper commissioners there, in order that the said ship and goods might be legally brought to adjudication. The result of these proceedings was that the ship and cargo were condemned as droits of Admiralty, and after payment of all expenses realised the sum of 2667*l.* 1*s.* 8*d.* Upon an application being subsequently made for a grant the King's Proctor reported that a grant of 400*l.* would be a liberal reward to Mr. John Friend for his services." Accordingly a grant to that extent was made, thus giving the seizer somewhat less than one-sixth of the proceeds.

This is a case directly in point, as the cargo seized had been landed and deposited in warehouses.

The next case is The Berlin Johannes (Warrant No. 77). The extract is as follows: "It appears from the warrant in this case that the marshal of the Admiralty had received information that the Berlin Johannes then lying in the River Thames, which had arrived from Rotterdam with a cargo of Geneva, was enemy's property. He accordingly seized her, but at that time the greater part of the cargo had been discharged. Proceedings were commenced in the Court of Admiralty, when it transpired that the ship had formerly belonged to British subjects, and was accordingly restored to them on payment to the marshal of one-sixth part of the value, that being the usual proportion paid to non-combatant persons in case of recapture. The cargo, however, proved to be enemy's property and was accordingly condemned as droits of Admiralty, and on being sold realised the sum of 504*l.* 9*s.* 7*d.* This warrant grants to the marshal one-sixth of the proceeds 'as an encouragement for his vigilance and attention.' "

I have tried, but not yet succeeded, to obtain the original papers in this case in order to see whether the part of the cargo which had been discharged was condemned. I see no reason to doubt that it was, because if any distinction was made between the part discharged and the part not discharged, that would almost certainly have been mentioned in the report.

The next case is that of The Venus (Warrants Nos. 220 and 221). The extract from the report is as follows: "It appears from the warrants in this case that William Davies, the master of the British vessel Venus, whilst bound on a voyage to Hamburg with a cargo, which he had taken on board at Genoa and other ports, received information that war had broken out between France and England, and he accordingly put into the port of Plymouth, not only for the safety of his own vessel, but also to ascertain the nature of the cargo which he had on board, and which he believed to be French. He accordingly communicated his suspicions to George Eastlake, the receiver of Admiralty droits at Plymouth, who ordered the same to be seized. The result was that the ship and a considerable part of the cargo were restored, but the remainder of the cargo, proving to be enemy's property, was condemned as droits of Admiralty, and realised the sum of 531*l.* 18*s.* 8*d.* after payment of all expenses. On an application, the Crown granted fifty guineas as a reward to the master of the Venus in consideration of his conduct in the matter, and 100 guineas to Mr. Eastlake in consideration of his having seized the ship and cargo at his own risk. The two grants together were between a third and a fourth of the net proceeds."

I have set out this case because, in the action of the master in bringing his vessel into a British port, there is a close resemblance to the course of events resulting in the Roumanian being diverted to Dartmouth and Purfleet; and also because it shows that enemy cargoes in British vessels were condemned. Counsel for the claimants intimated that he would have argued that in such a case the goods were not confiscable, but for the fact that I have in previous cases in this court decided the contrary.

There is one other matter to which I wish to refer before stating my conclusions. It may be suggested that even if the oil in the tanks were confiscable as enemy property on land, it is not the subject of prize within the jurisdiction of the Prize Court. While I think it is, I cannot see what advantage would accrue to the German company, especially in these days when all the divisions are parts of one High Court, if the questions arising were admitted (if they could be admitted) to be decided in a common law or other court in this country. To adopt a metaphor employed by Lord Stowell, it would be but to make a change of postures on an uneasy bed.

Applying what appears to me to be the principles of the law of nations to the facts of the present case, I have after full consideration come to the conclusion that the whole of the oil cargo of the Roumanian was maritime prize, subject to seizure as and where it was, both on board and in the tanks; that the case falls within the jurisdiction of this court; that the portion in the tanks was seizable even if they have to be regarded strictly as being on land as distinguished from the port; but also that the tanks were within the port; and that all the oil was seized, and lawfully seized, by the Customs officers on behalf of the Crown, and must be condemned to the Crown as prize in the Crown's rights to droits of Admiralty. I decide, therefore, against the claim of the German company, and decree condemnation of the whole cargo.

There remain the money claims of the shipping company and of the tank company. The legal liability of the captors for freight is not to be decided in this case, but the Attorney-General for the Crown, without admitting liability, has assented to the payment of what is determined to be reasonable.

(1) As to the claim for freight, by consent the Crown will pay what is decided by the registrar and merchants to be the reasonable amount to be determined on the principle of pro rata itineris. The question of amount is accordingly referred to the registrar and merchants.

(2) As to the charges for landing and storing in the tanks, the Crown also assent to payment, either to the shipping company or to the tank company (whichever may be entitled), of the proper sums to be ascertained also by reference to the registrar and merchants.

(3) The claims for demurrage at Dartmouth and for coal consumed are disallowed.

(4) The Port of London dues are to be paid by the captors.

(5) The claim for inspecting cargo is assented to by the Crown and is allowed.

(6) The claim for interest is disallowed.

(7) The claims for insurance stand over. Liberty to the claimants to apply in respect of them.

As to the suggestion made by the Attorney-General that the amount of the claims which are allowed should not be paid over till further order, I see no reason why the amounts when ascertained should not be at once paid to the claimants, upon the understanding, or upon a guaranteed undertaking if applied for by the Crown, that no part of the money should be handed over to enemy subjects. There will be liberty to the Crown to apply as to this.

Leave to appeal to the Privy Council will be granted, but I shall refuse to restrain the Crown from selling the oil pending the hearing of the appeal.

British ship—Enemy goods—Interruption of voyage—Seizure of goods—Condemnation—Claim for freight—Allowance of part of freight—Principle to be applied—Calculation of amount to be allowed—Rule to be followed.

Where cargo, the property of an alien enemy, is seized on board a British vessel and condemned as lawful prize, the shipowners are entitled to claim from the Crown such a sum as is fair and reasonable under all the circumstances. This amount is to be ascertained by reference to the registrar and merchants, and in fixing the amount regard must be had to the rate of freight agreed upon, the extent to which the voyage has been made, the costs incurred before the date of the seizure, and the benefit accruing to the cargo from the actual carriage. In the absence of any special circumstances, no sum is to be allowed for delay or inconvenience arising to the ship and the shipowners from any diversion during the contemplated voyage or from any detention for the purposes of the capture.

THIS was a case in which a claim was made by the Bristol Steam Navigation Company, the owners of the steamship Juno, a British ship, with respect to freight due upon a contract to carry certain goods from Bristol to Amsterdam, the goods being destined ulimately for alien enemies in Germany. The Juno, after leaving Bristol, put in at Swansea and the goods were there seized and afterwards condemned. The company also claimed for other expenses and losses arising out of the seizure.

The learned President condemned the goods as prize, and reserved judgment as to the freight and the other claims raised.

The facts and the arguments sufficiently appear in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 14.—The PRESIDENT.—The steamship Juno is a British vessel. It belongs to the claimants, the Bristol Steam Navigation Company Limited. On the 28th July 1914 certain cargoes consisting of (1) red earth; (2) tin alloy; (3) strontium ore, were shipped on board the Juno at Bristol. The cargoes were destined ultimately for various places in Germany, but the sea voyage destination in each case was Amsterdam. After leaving Bristol the vessel called at Swansea to load other cargo. She finished her loading there on the 1st Aug., and was then ready to proceed on her voyage. Her owners, however, decided to delay her departure owing to fear of complications on the Continent.

While the vessel still lay at Swansea, the cargo of red earth was seized as enemy goods on the 20th Aug., and the cargoes of tin alloy and strontium ore on the 24th Aug. In these proceedings I have already condemned these cargoes as lawful prize. Thereupon the steamship company, as owners of the vessel, claimed the freight due in respect of the goods, and other expenses and losses resulting from the seizure. This claim is the matter remaining for adjudication. The claim as originally put forward has been amended. I accept the final affidavit of Mr. Taylor, the manager of the company (sworn on the 25th Nov. last), in proof of the arrangements and circumstances under which the goods were shipped, and therefore I need not discuss various questions which were argued as to the contracts of affreightment and bills of lading. The claim as amended is set out in par. 10 of the affidavit.

The company claim the full freight as having become due on shipment. Alternatively, they claim the full sum, because, "although the goods were only carried from Bristol to Swansea, the detention of the ship at Swansea, owing to having the goods on board, cost the company more than if the Juno had performed the voyage in the ordinary course." They also claim extra costs of discharging and shifting the goods at Swansea. Various reported cases were referred to in argument which related to claims by captors of ships for freight against owners of cargoes; and to claims by shipowners for freight against captors or seizers of cargoes. These were all cases of neutral vessels. In none of them were British ships concerned, and counsel for the claimants said he had not been able to find any cases relating to British vessels dealing with the same subject. The position of the sea-carrying commerce of this country was very different 100 years and fifty years ago from that of our own day. I have only come across one case reported in the English Prize Court affecting a British vessel in which somewhat similar questions arose; but that was a case between the owners of a ship captured, and afterwards recaptured, and the owners of cargo, and not between shipowners and captors. The case is that of The Friends (Roscoe's English Prize Cases, vol. 2, 48; Edw. 246). I have considered all the other cases. It would be wrong to say that their consideration has not been helpful. Nevertheless, they are not decisions on the points now before me.

The questions which I have to determine in the present case are primæ impressionis; they come before the court for decision for the first time, so far as I am aware. While there are no rules of law or decisions to bind or to guide the court, the problems can, I think, be solved without great difficulty by a rational application of fair and equitable considerations. The Prize Court has always claimed to exercise equitable jurisdiction, using that term in its broadest sense and not in its more technical Chancery meaning.

Counsel for the claimants contended that they were entitled to the full freight for two reasons: (1) because by the contracts the freights were due on shipment; and (2) because, as in the case of neutral ships in former days, capture was said to be regarded as delivery, and full freight was given to neutral shipowners, and so it should now be given to British shipowners.

For the Crown it was contended that no freight should be allowed, or, if any, not the whole freight, because an incapacity attached to the ship in the present case, as she was prevented by law from performing her contract to deliver the goods to the consignees, and because the non-completion of the voyage was not due to the "incapacity of the cargo to proceed."

The short answer to the first contention of the claimants is that there is no contract to which the court can look which is applicable to the existing facts. This court has no concern, touching the matter now in question, with the contracts between the shipowners and the shippers or cargo-owners. Whatever claim the shipowners may have under their contracts is not taken away by the decision of this court. By the very facts of the situation the shipowners could not perform their contract by carrying the enemy goods to their destination.

As to the second contention, a neutral vessel and a British vessel are not in the like case or condition. Even before the Declaration of Paris a neutral vessel had the full right to carry enemy goods into an enemy country, subject to the risk of her detention by a belligerent for the purpose of seizing the goods; and this was the foundation of the principle which, generally speaking, secured to them their full freight.

It is needless to cite the cases in which the doctrine was applied, or in which exceptions were made. But I will quote from two of the latest cases in which Lord Stowell dealt with the matter —his statement of the principle. The first is the case of The Fortuna (Roscoe, vol. 2. 17; Edw. 56): "The general principle has been stated very correctly, that where a neutral vessel is brought in on account of the cargo, the ship is discharged with full freight, because no blame attaches to her; she is ready and able to proceed to the completion of the voyage, and is only stopped by the incapacity of the cargo." The other is the case of The Prosper (Roscoe, vol. 2, 25; Edw. 72): "In this court it is held that where neutral and innocent masters of vessels are brought into the ports of this country on account of their cargoes, and obliged to unliver them, they shall have their freight upon the principle that the non-execution of the contract, arising from the incapacity of the cargo to proceed, ought not to operate to the disadvantage of the ship. This rule was introduced for the benefit of the shipowners, and to prevent the rights of war from pressing with too much severity upon neutral navigation."

Since the Declaration of Paris, and indeed before that, by the practice adopted in the Crimean War, neutral vessels laden with enemy goods could not be prevented from continuing their voyages and so earning their freight, except where the goods were contraband, or where the pursuit of the voyage would amount to a breach of blockade; and in these cases no freight would be allowed. With British vessels it is quite otherwise. They must not carry enemy goods, nor proceed on voyages for which such goods are shipped. In the present case there was accordingly an "incapacity to proceed," attributable not only to the cargo, but also to the ship.

It would not be right, however, in my opinion to withhold from the shipowners all the freight on account of the "incapacity of the ship" where the shipment took place before war and the voyage was partly accomplished. What, then, ought to be the rule? It is possible that even if the cargo is not carried to its destination, it would be just in some cases that the whole amount of the freight should be paid. For instance, suppose an enemy cargo was shipped before the war from Australia to Hamburg; and was seized near British waters and taken to Bristol. It may be that it would be fair to pay the shipowners the full freight.

On the other hand, suppose a cargo of enemy goods had been shipped before the war for Bristol, and destined for Cameroon or Kaio-Chao, and was seized, as in this case, at Swansea. It would be wholly inequitable for the shipowners to claim, or for the captors to be subject to, payment of the full freight, even though by the contract it was due on shipment at Bristol.

In the present case, where only a comparatively small part of the voyage was made, I think the whole freight ought not to be allowed. What part should be allowed I will refer to the registrar and merchants to say, but I must give them some direction or guidance, although no strict rule can be laid down which would be universally applicable. Cases differ greatly. The phrase pro rata itineris has been used in some cases. But this does not import a mere arithmetical calculation of distances or times. The only rule which I propose to state for the guidance of the registrar and merchants is this: Such a sum is to be allowed for freight as is fair and reasonable in all the circumstances, regard being had to the rate of freight originally agreed (although this is not necessarily conclusive in all cases), to the extent to which the voyage has been made, and to the labour and cost expended or any special charges incurred, in respect of the cargo seized before its seizure and unlivery, and to the benefit accruing to the cargo from the carriage on the voyage up to the seizure and unlivery; but no sum is to be allowed in respect of any inconveniences or delay attributable to the state of war or to the consequent detention and seizure. I am conscious that the rule is not precise. I doubt whether any precise rule could be laid down; but, such as it is, I am satisfied that the experience of the registrar and merchants will enable them to apply it so as to bring about a fair and satisfactory result.

As to the items for extra cost of discharging and shifting the goods at Swansea, I think these should go against the cargoes, and should be allowed. I have said that the claimants in the affidavit in support of their claim urged that the detention at Swansea should be taken into account, and that it would amount to the whole freight. In this particular case the fact is that the owners themselves, according to Mr. Taylor's affidavit, on the 1st Aug. "decided, owing to the political situation on the Continent, to keep the Juno at Swansea and to await developments." Apart from this, and as the point will no doubt arise in future cases, I desire to pronounce as my opinion that no sum ought to be allowed, unless there are some special and exceptional circumstances, in respect of any delay or inconvenience which may occur to a ship as the necessary result of her diversion or detention for the purpose of seizing and making unlivery of confiscable enemy cargo. Such things, and their consequent losses, are some of the unfortunate, albeit minor, results of war to which those engaged in shipping have to submit as other citizens must in other capacities and walks of life.

I allow the claim of the claimants to some freight, and to the special items mentioned, and order a reference to the registrar and merchants to ascertain the amount.

THE MÖWE. (a)

Alien enemy—Right of alien enemy to appear in Prize Court—Practice—Owner of captured vessel—Capture "in port"—Capture on "high seas"—Capture in territorial waters—Condemnation—Detention—Hague Conference 1907*—Convention VI.*

The question of the right of an enemy owner of a ship or a cargo to appear in a Prize Court is not a matter of international law, but, under the Prize Court Rules 1914, is to be provided for according to the practice to be settled by the judge of the Prize Court. Accordingly the President sitting in Prize directed that whenever an alien enemy conceives that he is entitled to any protection, privilege, or relief under any of the Hague Conventions of 1907, he shall be entitled to appear as a claimant and to argue his claims before the Prize Court, the grounds of such claim being stated in the affidavit to lead to appearance which is required to be filed under Order III., r. 5, of the Prize Court Rules 1914.

A German sailing vessel, owned by her master, was captured in the Firth of Forth shortly after the outbreak of war between Great Britain and Germany. She was taken into Leith. On behalf of the Crown it was contended that the capture took place "at sea." On behalf of the owner it was contended that the capture took place "in port" or in territorial waters, and that therefore she was not liable to condemnation, but only to detention.

Held, that the word "port" as used in the Hague Conventions did not mean the "fiscal port," which might cover a considerable area and include several ports, but referred only to a place where ships were in the habit of coming to load or to unload, to embark or disembark, and that as the capture took place in the Firth of Forth it was not a case of capture "in port"; that it was immaterial whether the capture took place in the territorial waters of Great Britain or not; and that as the vessel was seized upon the high seas, she was properly liable to condemnation as prize and not simply to detention.

THIS was a case in which the Möwe, a German sailing vessel, of the port of Rhandermoor, in the German Empire, was captured in the Firth of Forth on the 5th Aug. 1914 by H.M.S. Ringdove, and taken into Leith, and the court was asked to condemn both the vessel and her cargo as being an enemy vessel captured on the high seas, and not "in port" in the sense of that term used in Convention VI. of the Hague Conference 1907. The important question of the right of an alien enemy to appear in an English Prize Court was also raised.

The Attorney-General (Sir J. Simon, K.C), T. E. Holland, K.C., and Bentwich for the Crown.

Dunlop for the owner of the vessel.

All the facts and the arguments adduced are sufficiently set out in the judgment. In addition to the cases referred to by the learned President, the following were cited by counsel:

The Fenix (otherwise The Phœnix), Roscoe's English Prize Cases, vol. 2, 238; Spinks, 1;
Robinson and Co. v. Continental Insurance Company of Mannheim, 112 L. T. Rep. 125; (1915) 1 K. B. 155.

Nov. 9.—THE PRESIDENT.—The Möwe was a merchant sailing vessel of the port of Rhandermoor, in Germany. Her master was Harm Schier, a German subject. He was also the sole owner of the vessel. She was captured by His Majesty's ship Ringdove on the 5th Aug. in the Firth of Forth and taken to Leith. Her ship's papers showed that she was a German vessel and had sailed from Norderney, and that her destination was Bo'ness, in the Forth. The master has deposed in his affidavit that he was bound to Morrisonshaven for coal. This statement is incorrect, but I can pass it over as it does not affect any issue in the case. She arrived near Morrisonshaven between seven and nine o'clock p.m. on the 4th Aug. At this time hostilities between this country and Germany had not begun. The declaration of war was made as from eleven p.m. (English time) on that day. She came to anchor about a mile off the Creek of Morrisonshaven. Early in the morning of the 5th Aug. the master weighed anchor and proceeded under way, according to his account, for Granton, a port about eight miles higher up the Firth of Forth. After being under way for about an hour, the vessel was captured as prize by the Ringdove, when, to use the words in the affidavit of her master, "she was in British territorial waters, between Morrisonshaven and Granton." In a subsequent paragraph he said the vessel was "taken at sea." It was not shown that the master knew of the outbreak of war, and for the purposes of this case it is assumed that he did not know. An appearance was entered in these prize proceedings by Harm Schier, "as owner of the vessel."

The first question which arises for decision is whether, in the particular circumstances of this case, Schier, an admitted enemy subject and the owner of an enemy merchant ship, has a right to appear as a claimant in the proceedings; or whether he should be given such a right in order to assert whatever privileges he deems to be conferred upon him by the Sixth Hague Convention of 1907. The second question to be determined is whether this vessel was in an enemy port and not allowed to leave at the commencement of hostilities; or whether she was encountered and captured at sea, within the meaning of the Sixth Hague Convention of 1907. Assuming the question to depend upon the Convention, in the former case the vessel is only to be detained and not confiscated, in accordance with arts. 1 and 2; in the latter she is subject to condemnation, as Germany made a reservation with respect to art. 3, and is not a party to it.

Pending the decision upon the first question, I allowed Mr. Dunlop (who was instructed to appear for the enemy owner) to present his arguments fully as amicus curiæ upon the two questions to be decided.

The question of the right to appear naturally comes first. I have already dealt with this matter in one of its aspects in The Marie Glaeser (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 601; 112 L. T. Rep. 251; (1914) P. 218). In that case an appearance in the proceedings was entered for the enemy owners, but at the hearing no one came forward to represent them. It was obvious that no ground could be shown, either under the Hague Convention or otherwise, against the ship's capture and condemnation; and I ordered the appearance to be struck out, both on the ground of the insufficiency of the affidavit upon which the appearance was founded, and on the ground that there were no substantantial special circumstances which could be put in any other affidavit in support of any valid claim.

In the case now before the court, although the affidavit of the claimant is not very aptly drawn to set forth a claim, it is contended that he is entitled under the said Hague Convention to appear to resist condemnation of his vessel, and to secure that the vessel is subjected only to a decree of detention without compensation, during the war, or requisition upon making compensation. I will assume that the affidavit sufficiently disclosed the special circumstances in which this contention is put forward. I will also assume that the Hague Convention referred to is in force and applicable. Upon this a word will be said later.

I referred in The Marie Glaeser (ubi sup.) to some decisions of Lord Stowell and Dr. Lushington, and I will not repeat them. There are other decisions to the like effect, e.g., in The Falcon (6 C. Rob. 194), where, in the following passages, Lord Stowell deals with the disabilities of citizens of a hostile State in this court, and of citizens of this country in the courts of an enemy:—

"He is, it seems, invested with the character of the American Consul at Bordeaux; and certain it is that an American Consul resident in France is subject to all the difficulties of a French merchant, as to the power of becoming a claimant in this court": (ibid, p. 197). . . .

"But I am to recollect who the persons are from whom the objection comes. They are British subjects, who could have no persona standi there (i.e., in French courts), and could not have been parties to the proceedings either in the court of Leghorn or Paris without stating themselves out of court. It was impossible that the proceedings could be otherwise conducted; and, therefore, I cannot think that the absence of the parties, which is urged as a fundamental defect, is material in such a case. It is nothing more than what takes place here in cases of common condemnations, which do not rest solely on the effect of the monition, but pass on a view of the evidence of the case. The enemy proprietor is necessarily absent by operation of law, and yet the sentence is completely valid, as well against him as against all the world": (ibid., p. 199).

All the forms since the days of Sir Wm. Marriott, Lord Stowell's predecessor, down to the present day accord with the principle and practice promulgated by Lord Stowell in The Hoop (Roscoe's E. P. C., vol. 1, 104; 1 Ch. Rob. 196): (see Marriott's "Formulary," passim).

These are followed in some of the forms appended to the recent Prize Court Rules 1914. See form 13, where this paragraph appears: "There were at the time of such capture no contraband goods on board the said ship, and no subject of (insert the name of Government at war with Great Britain) or enemy of Great Britain had at the time of such capture, or at any other time material to the matters in this cause, any share, right, title, or interest, in the said ship or cargo or any part thereof." Far be it from me to wish to decide on mere matters of form unless compelled thereto by the law: I only cite them to illustrate the principles and practice.

A claimant in a Prize Court is not in a position analogous to that of a defendant, but rather to that of a plaintiff. In the writ the owners of a vessel are not made defendants. But I wish to avoid complicating this case with any discussion of the position or rights of alien enemies in legal proceedings in the King's Bench or our other municipal courts.

The principle on which the Prize Court in the times of Lord Stowell and Dr. Lushington proceeded was that no one who was a subject of the enemy could be a claimant unless under particular circumstances that pro hâc vice discharged him from the character of an enemy, such as his coming in under a flag of truce, a cartel, a pass, or some other act of public authority that puts him in the King's peace pro hâc vice. Otherwise such a person was regarded as totally ex lege. In the words of Story, J., in his authoritative work on Prize Courts, "An enemy cannot interpose a claim unless under the protection of a flag of truce, a cartel, licence, pass, treaty, or some other act of the public authority suspending his hostile character": (Pratt's Story, p. 21). In this passage Story, J. adopted the words of Lord Stowell in The Hoop (ubi sup.). adding by way of illustration the words "licence" and "treaty."

In his argument the Attorney-General submitted two propositions as embodying the result of the authorities in this court, viz:—

(1) Where an owner avowed his enemy character without qualification, he had not a persona standi in judicio, and was not a person who had a right to be heard; and (2) where a person avowed that he was a subject of the enemy State in general, but had ground for urging that pro hâc vice he stood in a position which relieved him from the pure enemy character, he was entitled to appear and to be heard; and that the real question was under which of these two rules a German owner should be regarded when he came before the court. In my opinion, that submission is well founded and accurate.

Practical illustrations of the second proposition were frequently afforded in the time of the Crimean War, when claimants appeared on the ground of the immunity of their ships from capture by reason of the Order in Council dated the 29th March 1854. This Order in Council is set out at p. iii. Appendix D, in Spinks' Prize Cases. That order allowed six weeks to Russian merchant vessels in any ports or places within the British dominions for loading their cargoes and departing from such ports or places, and also gave permission to such Russian vessels if met at sea by any of Her Majesty's ships to continue their voyages if their cargoes had been taken on board before the expiration of six weeks. The order also granted permission to any such Russian vessel which prior to its date should have sailed from any foreign port bound for any port or place in the British dominions to enter and discharge their cargoes, and afterwards forthwith to depart without molestation, and if met at sea to continue their voyage to any port not blockaded. In short, the Order in Council exempted entirely from capture Russian merchant vessels in the special circumstances therein specified.

Claimants whose vessels were within the special terms of the order therefore brought themselves within the category of persons who were within the Queen's peace pro hâc vice, and who were relieved from their enemy character or had their hostile character suspended during the operation of the Order in Council. They were accordingly heard as claimants in the Prize Court.

Reference was made in argument to cases in the American courts arising during the Spanish-American War in 1898. Upon examination it will be found that in almost all the cases where enemy claimants were heard at that time their claims arose in circumstances very similar to those in the class of proceedings already referred to which came before the British Prize Court during the Crimean War.

At the outbreak of the war between the United States of America and Spain the President of the Republic issued on the 26th April 1898 a proclamation exempting Spanish ships from capture in terms practically identical with the Queen's Order in Council exempting Russian ships forty-four years earlier. Arts. 4 and 5 of the President's Proclamation were obviously framed upon the British Order in Council of 1854.

Following upon this proclamation of the President, the cases cited before me came before the United States courts. The Pedro (175 U. S. 354) turned upon arts. 4 and 5 of the proclamation. The Guido (ibid. 382) simply followed The Pedro (ubi sup.). The Buena Ventura (ibid. 484) depended upon the application of art. 5 of the proclamation. The Panama (176 U. S. 535) was also decided upon arts. 4 and 5 of the proclamation. The other case cited—namely, The Paquete Habana and The Lola (175 U. S. 677)—did not depend upon the provisions of the proclamation; but it is to be observed that the claim there put forward and decided was also that the vessel was "exempt from capture." There may be other cases which I have not been able to examine in which enemy claimants were allowed to appear in the United States courts. And there may be regulations touching the matter which I have not seen. But the authorities cited fall short of showing that in the United States any claimant who avowed an enemy character has been allowed generally to appear in their Prize Courts.

In argument before me, Mr. Dunlop also compendiously referred to cases which were heard during the Russo-Japanese War in 1904-5, and reported in the Russian and Japanese Prize Cases, vol. 1, p. 182, and vol. 2, pp. 1, 12, 39, 46, 52, 92, 95, 116, and 354.

Upon examination of these cases again, it appears that they dealt with claims either of neutrals, or of claimants whose contention was that their property was entirely immune from capture and from sentence of condemnation. In most of them the claim was founded (no doubt among other grounds) upon the Japanese Imperial Ordinance No. 20, of the 9th Feb. 1904, which allowed days of grace to certain Russian vessels upon the same lines as the British Order in Council of 1854 and the United States Proclamation of 1898: (see Ordinance Appendix C, vol. 11, of Russian and Japanese Prize Cases p. 445). In The Tetarlos (vol. 1, 166), in the Russian Prize Court, the original claimants were the neutral owners of a German ship which a Russian cruiser captured and sank. It was ultimately held that the ship was wrongfully sunk. Thereupon the liquidator of what was apparently a Japanese company (the Teshio Timber Company, of Otaru), the owners of the cargo which was in the captured ship, and was also wrongfully sunk, made a claim, which was allowed. The other cases reported in the pages referred to in vol. 2 were heard in the Japanese Prize Courts.

In The Ekaterinoslav (vol. 2, 1) the owners of a Russian vessel claimed exemption from capture on grounds (inter alia) coming within the Days of Grace Ordinance (No. 20) already referred to. The Mukden (vol. 2, 12), The Rossia (vol. 2, 39), and The Argun (vol. 2, 46) were also cases in which exemption was claimed (among other grounds) under the same Ordinance. In The Manchuria (vol. 2, 52), and The Lesnik (vol. 2, 92) the Ordinance was relied upon; and in the former case a claim was made on behalf of neutral insurers. The claim in The Kotik (vol. 2, 95) was for exemption as a fishing vessel, and also under Ordinance 20. In The Thalia (vol. 2, 116) the vessel was seized in a repairing dock, and the basis of the claim was that she was property "on land," and therefore exempted from capture. And in The Orel (vol. 2, 354) the capture was said to be wrongful as the vessel was a hospital ship, and therefore immune. But it was held, notwithstanding, that she was guilty of hostile acts, and therefore subject to condemnation.

I have dealt briefly with these cases, because reliance was placed upon the liberty which was said to be given by the Russian and Japanese Prize Courts to enemy claimants, as adding force to the right asserted on behalf of enemy owners in this court. In each of the cases, however, which I have examined complete immunity was claimed, as I have said. As to Russia, I observe that art. 60 of the Regulations Relating to Naval Prizes (1895) deals with "original owners of the captured property" in general terms; but I cannot say how these words would be construed.

All the cases mentioned were, of course, before the Hague Conventions of 1907. Under the Hague Convention (No. VI.) the attitude which the owner in the present case must take may shortly be stated in these terms: "I admit that I am an alien enemy; and therefore that my ship was lawfully captured, or seized, as being enemy property; but I wish to appear to put forward and to argue my claim that in the circumstances of my case the ship is not confiscable, and cannot be condemned; but can only be detained during the war, to be restored to me after the war." Applying the principles laid down by Lord Stowell and Dr. Lushington, I am satisfied that in their day they would not have allowed the enemy owner to appear to assert such a claim. There is here no coming pro hâc vice within the King's peace; there is here no suspension of the hostile character. As to what those eminent judges would have done if they had lived at the present day, I would not hazard a conjecture.

As before indicated, I desire to say a word as to whether the Hague Convention (No. VI.) is operative and applicable. I cannot close my eyes to the provision in art. 6 of the Convention, which reads as follows: "The provisions of the present Convention do not apply except between contracting Powers, and then only if all the belligerents are parties to the Convention." By arts. 7 and 9 the Convention requires to be ratified by the signatory Powers, and by art. 8 non-signatory Powers may accede to the Convention. Similar articles appear in the other Conventions enumerated hereafter. Of the belligerents in the present war at the time of the capture of the vessel, Germany and Austria-Hungary, and Belgium, France, Great Britain, Japan, and Russia had ratified the Convention (Germany and Russia making reservations of art. 3 and part of art. 4). Of the other belligerents, Montenegro and Serbia (whose representatives signed the Convention) have not ratified it. Turkey, who is now also a belligerent, has not ratified it. None of these States were non-signatory Powers, so there has been no accession on the part of any of them. In strictness, therefore (apart entirely from the question whether the enemies of this country are acting under or in accordance with the Convention), it is not clear that the Convention is binding or applicable.

It is not my function or province to do anything more than to declare the law. But I trust that I shall be forgiven for a humble expression of opinion that it would accord with the traditions of this country if such steps were taken as may be necessary to make operative a series of Conventions solemnly agreed upon by the plenipotentiaries of forty-five States or Powers after most careful deliberation, with the most beneficent international objects.

I am not required finally to determine the effect or the binding character of the Conventions. This court is mainly concerned with the 6th, 7th, 10th, and 11th of them as dealing more directly with maritime concerns; although, incidentally, others of them—e.g., the 3rd, 8th, and 13th—might come under consideration in proceedings before it. Of the belligerents, Montenegro has no navy, and, so far as I know, no mercantile marine; it has a coast line, but only of about thirty miles; and Serbia is a purely inland State, having no sea-board at all. It would scarcely seem desirable that the non-ratification by these Powers should prevent the application of the Maritime Conventions; and it may be that the counsellors who have the responsibility of advising the Crown may deem it fit to advise that by proclamation or otherwise this country should declare that it will give effect to the Conventions, whether by the literal terms thereof they are strictly binding or not.

Having premised so much, I will now consider whether the owners of an enemy vessel have a right, or should be given the right, to appear to put forward a claim under the Hague Conventions assuming, as was done during the argument, that they are operative. Under some of the Conventions some degree of protection and relief is given in respect of vessels which are not wholly immune from capture at sea or seizure in ports—e.g., under the Sixth Convention the consequences of seizure or capture are minimised and limited in certain cases, although complete immunity is not afforded. Under others of the Conventions some vessels are entirely exempted from capture. For instance, under the Tenth Convention, hospital ships are free from capture, except in certain specified circumstances; and under the Eleventh Convention certain coast fishing vessels and local trading boats, as well as those employed on religious, scientific, or philanthropic missions, are similarly exempted. With regard to vessels comprised within the Tenth and Eleventh Conventions, the cases which might arise would approach nearly to those of vessels which came within the protection afforded by the Order in Council of 1854.

Dealing with the Hague Conventions as a whole, the court is faced with the problem of deciding whether a uniform rule as to the right of an enemy owner to appear ought to prevail in all cases of claimants who may be entitled to protection or relief, whether partial or otherwise. Mr. Holland argued that this a matter not of international law, but of the practice of this court. That view is correct. I think that this court has the inherent power of regulating and prescribing its own practice unless fettered by enactment. Lord Stowell from time to time made rules of practice, and his power to do so was not questioned. Moreover, by Order XLV. of the Prize Court Rules 1914 it is laid down that "in all cases not provided for by these rules the practice of the late High Court of Admiralty of England in prize proceedings shall be followed, or such other practice as the President may direct." The rules do not provide for the case now arising. I therefore assume as President of this court I can give directions as to the practice in such cases as that with which the court is now dealing.

The practice should conform to sound ideas of what is fair and just. When a sea of passion rises and rages as a natural result of such a calamitous series of wars as the present, it behoves a court of justice to preserve a calm and equable attitude in all controversies which come before it for decision, not only where they concern neutrals, but also where they may affect enemy subjects. In times of peace the Admiralty Courts of this realm are appealed to by people of all nationalities who engage in commerce upon the seas, with a confidence that right will be done. So in the unhappy and dire times of war the Court of Prize as a court of justice will, it is hoped, show that it holds evenly the scales between friend, neutral, and foe.

A merchant who is a citizen of an enemy country would not unnaturally expect that when the State to which he belongs, and other States with which it may unhappily be at war, have bound themselves by formal and solemn conventions dealing with a state of war like those formulated at The Hague in 1907, he should have the benefit of the provisions of such international compacts. He might equally naturally expect that he would be heard in cases where his property or interests were affected as to the effect and results of such compacts upon his individual position. It is to be remembered also that in the international commerce of our day the ramifications of the shipping business are manifold; and others concerned, like underwriters or insurers, would feel a greater sense of fairness and security if, through an owner (though he be an enemy) the case for a seized or captured vessel was permitted to be independently placed before the court.

From the considerations to which I have adverted, and in order to induce and to justify a conviction of fairness, as well as to promote just and right decisions, I deem it fitting, pursuant to powers which I think the court possesses, to direct that the practice of the court shall be that whenever an alien enemy conceives that he is entitled to any protection, privilege, or relief under any of the Hague Conventions of 1907, he shall be entitled to appear as a claimant and to argue his claim before this court. The grounds of his claim should be stated in the affidavit to lead to appearance which is required to be filed by Order III., r. 5, of the Prize Court Rules 1914.

I will now proceed to deal with the substance of the claim of the owner in the present case. He contends that his vessel cannot be condemned as prize. Was his vessel captured at sea, or seized in port? It was argued for him that she was seized in port, and therefore ought only to be detained during the war. For the Crown, on the other hand, it was contended that the vessel was captured at sea, and ought to be condemned. I have sufficiently stated the facts.

It was urged that the vessel was seized within the port of Leith, and, alternatively, that she was taken within territorial waters, and not "on the high seas," and therefore is not confiscable: (see art. 3 of the Sixth Hague Convention 1907, to which Germany did not agree, and under which her citizens cannot benefit). In this Convention I am of opinion that the word "port" must be construed in its usual and limited popular or commercial sense as a place where ships are in the habit of coming for the purpose of loading or unloading, embarking or disembarking. It does not mean the fiscal port. The ports of Morrisonshaven, Granton, and Bo'ness, I was informed, are within the fiscal port of Leith, but they are all separate ports in the ordinary sense. The vessel was not seized in any of such "ports" as the term is so understood, and as it seems to me to be used in the Convention. She was not in a port from which, if days of grace had been arranged, she could be said to "depart" ("Sortir"). Alternatively, it was alleged, but not proved, that she was taken in "territorial waters," and that therefore she was not captured on the high seas. But I will assume that she was within territorial waters when the capture was made. In my view that is wholly immaterial. The Sixth Hague Convention does not refer to "territorial waters." A vessel might be in territorial waters for scores of miles, either innocently or nefariously, and pass numerous ports, without any intention to enter any of them. It it idle to say that on this account she would be free from capture. Where the Hague Conventions intend to deal with territorial waters they are expressly mentioned as distinguished from ports; for example, in Convention XII., arts. 3 and 4, and Convention XIII., arts. 2, 3, 9, 10, &c., the words "les eaux territoriales" are used in contradistinction to "les ports": (cf. also the Declaration of London, art. 37, where territorial waters are described as "les eaux des belligérants". "En mer," which is the phrase used in art. 3 of the Sixth Convention, is altogether inapt to indicate "territorial waters."

Then it was contended that the vessel could not be condemned because she was not captured on "the high seas." The words "encountered on the high seas" in art. 3 are not an accurate rendering of the authoritative French "rencontrés en mer." Where the Conventions intend to describe "upon the high seas," the appropriate phrase "en pleine mer" is used: (see Convention VII. recital). Another phrase, "en haute mer," is used in the Declaration of London, art. 37, to signify the same thing.

To illustrate the meaning of the word "port" in the Convention, I would further observe that the word "ports" is used in various places in conjunction with, but in contradistinction to, roadsteads, and to territorial waters: (see Convention XIII., where the words "les ports, les rades, ou les eaux territoriales" are frequently used). In my view the claimant in his affidavit was accurate when he said his vessel was taken at sea. The words of art. 3, "rencontrés en mer," are exactly applicable to this case, and I have no hesitation in finding that she was captured at sea, and not seized in port. I therefore decree that the vessel be condemned as lawful prize.

THE MIRAMICHI. (a)

British ship—Cargo shipped by neutrals before declaration of war—Cargo consigned to German merchants—War declared whilst cargo at sea—Documents of title not taken up by alien enemies—Money advanced by neutral bankers—Property in goods at time of capture—Right of seizure and condemnation — Principles to be applied.

In June 1914 an American firm contracted to sell a cargo of wheat to a German firm, carrying on business in Germany. The wheat was to be shipped in July 1914 under a c.i.f. contract, and it was, in fact, shipped on a British vessel which left the United States before the declaration of, or of imminence of, war between Great Britain and Germany. The bill of lading was given in favour of F., from whom the American firm bought the wheat in order to fulfil their contract with the German firm, and was made out to the order of D. or his assigns. The bill of lading was indorsed generally. The American firm then paid F. and obtained the bill of lading from him, but did not indorse it in favour of the buyers. The sellers afterwards obtained the certificates of insurance, and drew a bill of exchange on the buyers which was discounted with an American bank, with whom were deposited the bill of lading and other documents to be delivered up to the buyers through a Berlin bank on payment of the amount due on the bill of exchange. The buyers were notified of everything that had been done, but after the outbreak of war they refused to accept the bill. Whilst on her voyage the ship was ordered to proceed to a British port instead of to her original destination, and the cargo was eventually seized as enemy property.

Held, that although enemy goods on a British ship are liable to seizure in port and to condemnation as prize in time of war, yet where the goods have been shipped during peace without any anticipation of the imminence of the outbreak of war, and where neither the property or the goods has passed to the enemy nor the documents of title representing the same have been taken up by the enemy, and where money has been advanced on the faith of these documents by a neutral banker, the same are not subject to condemnation by the Prize Court.

The liability to seizure of enemy goods on British ships discussed.

THIS was a case in which the Crown claimed the condemnation of the cargo shipped in the British steamship Miramichi by neutrals before the outbreak of the war between Great Britain and Germany, and consigned to German merchants who, therefore, became alien enemies after the 4th Aug. 1914, whilst the Miramichi was en route from a neutral port in the United States of America to Europe.

The cargo consisted of 16,000 bushels of wheat, which was shipped at Galveston (Texas) on the 28th July, and consigned to German buyers in Germany. One half of the consignment was sold by Messrs. Muir and Co., American shippers, to George Fries and Co., of Colmar, in Alsace, and the other half to Gebrüder Zimmern, of Mannheim. The contracts were c.i.f. contracts —net cash against documents, insurance free of war risk. Messrs. Muir and Co. arranged with the Guarantee Trust Company of New York for an advance against the cargo, and handed to the company the shipping documents relating to the wheat. They then sent forward a bill of exchange drawn by themselves on Gebrüder Zimmern, but the latter refused acceptance on the ground that it was tendered one month after the due date. In the meantime war had been declared between Great Britain and Germany, and on arrival of the Miramichi at Queenstown, whither she had been sent by her owners for orders, the Trade Board of the Admiralty refused to allow her to continue her voyage to Rotterdam with her cargo, to which port she had been destined when she left Galveston. She then proceeded to Eastham, in the Manchester Ship Canal, where the cargo was seized by the officer of customs.

The Attorney-General (Sir J. Simon, K.C.) and R. A. Wright for the Crown.—The cargo should be condemned as being enemy property. The test to be applied whenever the question of seizure and condemnation arose was this: At whose risk was the property at the time of capture? Although the American claimants had a jus disponendi, and therefore a certain proprietary interest, the general property in the cargo was in the German consignees. Theirs was the risk, and condemnation should follow. They cited

Leslie Scott, K.C. and Balloch for the claimants.—The same principle was not to be applied in the case of goods shipped before the outbreak of war as to those shipped when hostilities had commenced. The rule in The Sally (ubi sup.) that goods which would become the property of an alien enemy upon delivery were subject to condemnation did not apply to those goods which were shipped before the declaration of war. The true test was not that which had been suggested by the Attorney-General, but it was this: In whom was the beneficial ownership? Here the beneficial ownership was in the unpaid vendors. No property had passed to the German buyers, but it remained entirely in the American sellers. The cargo, therefore, was owned by neutrals, and as such could not be condemned. They cited

Nov. 23.—THE PRESIDENT.—The subject-matter of the claim in this case is a part cargo of 16,000 bushels of wheat carried on the steamship Miramichi, which was seized or captured as enemy property on the 1st Sept. 1914, in the circumstances hereinafter mentioned. The Miramichi was a British ship. The cargo of wheat to which the claim relates was shipped at Galveston (Texas), and was stowed, with other wheat, in holds 1, 4, and 6 of the vessel. It was shipped in the month of July 1914, before the commencement of the war, and without any anticipation of war. It was destined for the port of Rotterdam, and was intended to be delivered, as to part to George Fries and Co., of Colmar, as purchasers of 8000 bushels, and as to the other part to Gebrüder Zimmern, of Mannheim, as purchasers of 8000 bushels. Both these firms were German firms, and at the time of the seizure or capture of the cargo they were enemy subjects.

The two transactions were separate, but there is no distinction in substance, or from the legal aspect, between the two. It will therefore be sufficient to deal in this judgment with one of the cases, and I will take the first—namely, the case of the sale by Messrs. Muir and Co. to Fries and Co. The cargo of wheat destined for Fries and Co. was, as I have said, laden on board the British steamship Miramichi. On her voyage towards Rotterdam her owners, by telegraph, directed the vessel to proceed to Queenstown for orders by reason of the outbreak of war. At Queenstown the owners communicated with the British Admiralty, and asked their instructions as to whether the steamship could proceed to Rotterdam, as the cargo was destined for German merchants. Permission to proceed to Rotterdam was refused, and accordingly the vessel proceeded to the port of Eastham, in the Manchester Ship Canal, as the best port for the disposal of the cargo.

A question might have arisen as to whether the cargo was captured at sea, or seized in port. But that makes no material difference in this case; and it is agreed that the cargo was seized in the port of Eastham. The seizure was on the 1st Sept. 1914. The Crown claim the cargo as prize or as droits of Admiralty. The claimants, on the other hand, contend that the cargo was not subject to seizure, as it did not belong to enemy subjects, but to themselves as neutrals, being citizens of the United States of America.

The contest between the Crown and the claimants may be stated shortly as follows: The contention of the Attorney-General for the Crown was that the cargo at the time of seizure was at the risk of subjects of the German State then at war as purchasers, and therefore was subject to seizure on behalf of the Crown. The contention of the claimants, on the contrary, was that the cargo was their property, and therefore could not be lawfully seized.

The facts as to the contracts for sale and purchase of the cargo must now be stated in substance, but briefly. For the details, the documents which were in evidence can be referred to. I will premise that the contract, and all material transactions in relation to it up to the time of seizure of the cargo, were entered into before the war, and in entire innocence of any anticipation of war. In short, all the transactions, so far as concerned the claimants, were carried out in times and conditions of peace. The claimants were the sellers of the goods, and their bankers who discounted the bill of exchange. They have made common cause, and no distinction need be made between them in this judgment. I will describe the claimants, Messrs. Muir and Co., as "the sellers"; and Fries and Co., the German merchants, as "the buyers."

The sellers contracted to sell the cargo to the buyers on the 25th June 1914 for shipment during the month of July 1914 from a port of the United States direct or indirect to Rotterdam at a price to include cost, freight, and insurance; in other words, the contract was what is so well known as a c.i.f. contract. Payment (or, in American terminology, "reimbursement") was to be "by check against documents." The sellers were to furnish policies of insurance or certificates of insurance (free of war risk). A clause of settlement of disputes in London was included, which shows (apart from anything else) that any disputes were to be determined according to English law.

The sellers had bought the wheat to enable them to fulfil their contract with the buyers, from C. B. Fox, a grain merchant, in Galveston. The wheat was shipped by Fox at Galveston on the 23rd July 1914. The bill of lading was given in favour of Fox, the shipper, and was made out to the order of one Davis, or to his or their assigns. It was indorsed generally, and in due course the sellers paid Fox for the wheat and obtained a bill of lading. They did not indorse in favour of the buyers, and it remained a bill of lading only indorsed generally. The necessary insurances were effected, and the certificates of insurance were obtained by the sellers on the 23rd July.

On the 28th July the seller drew a bill of exchange upon the buyers, and, according to the statement of the Attorney-General, discounted it with the bankers (the Guarantee Trust Company, of New York, who have joined them as claimants). On the same date they deposited with the bankers the bill of lading and the certificates of insurance, to be delivered up on payment by the buyers through a Berlin bank of the amount due on the bill of exchange for the cost and insurance, less the freight which was credited, as it was to be paid for by the buyers on delivery.

On the same date, also, the original documents were forwarded to the Berlin bank for credit of the New York bank by the steamship La Savoie, which sailed from New York on the 29th July and arrived at Le Havre on the 5th Aug.; and duplicate documents were forwarded by the steamship Carmania, which sailed from New York on the 29th July and arrived at Liverpool on the 7th Aug. The buyers were duly notified of these matters, and an invoice was forwarded to them by the sellers on the same day (the 28th July) with all the necessary particulars of the shipment, bill of exchange, and documents.

So far as the buyers are concerned, no further information was given to the court except that the documents were tendered to them, and that on the tender they refused to accept the documents, or to pay the sums due under the bill of exchange and indorsed on the bill of lading as follows: "Refused on account of late production, nearly one month after normal due date.—Colmar, Sept. 3, 1914—GEO. FRIES."

That reason was a mere excuse; the real reason, no doubt, was that war had broken out. The sellers, therefore, or their bankers, still hold the bill of lading, and the bill of exchange remains unpaid.

These, I think, are all the material facts. The question of law, as I have already stated, is: Was the cargo on the 1st Sept. subject to seizure or capture by or on behalf of the Crown as droits of Admiralty or as prize?

Before this question is dealt with I desire to point out and to emphasise that nothing which I shall say in this case is applicable to capture or seizure at sea or in port of any property dealt with during the war, or in anticipation of the war. Questions relating to such property are on an entirely different footing from those relating to transactions initiated during the happier times of peace. The former are determined largely or mainly upon considerations of the rights of belligerents, and of attempts to defeat such right. I will refrain from discussing these matters, and will only refer to such authorities as The Sally (ubi sup.), The Paquete de Bilbao (ubi sup.) and The Ariel (11 Moo. P. C. C. 119; Roscoe, vol. 2, 600) for the principles applicable in the Prize Court during a state of war.

In the case now before the court there is no place for any idea of an attempt to defeat the rights of this country as a belligerent; and the case has to be determined in accordance with the principles by which rights of property are ascertained by our law in time of peace. The main contest is as to the right test to apply in these circumstances for determining whether a particular property is subject to seizure or capture. Another point was taken, and argued chiefly by junior counsel for the claimants, that in any event enemy property in a British ship could not be seized in port or captured at sea.

I will state the contention and propositions submitted by the learned Attorney-General. He said: "My first proposition is that the test of the right to capture and sale is the answer to the question, 'On whom is the risk at the moment of capture?' That is to say, who suffers if the goods are captured? Applying that test, the American claimants here would have the jus disponendi, because they are the holders of the bill of lading, which has not been indorsed, and therefore they would have to that extent, of course, a special property, a proprietary interest in the cargo, but they would not have a general property in the cargo; still less would they have the risk. And there is a third proposition, which is really a development of the other proposition, namely, the American sellers had a vested right of payment, whatever happened to the goods on the tender of the documents, and I will add as a point for my third proposition, that for the purpose of determining whether the cargo is good prize (which is quite a separate question from the other), the material question is not the abstract question of property, but whether it is an enemy or a neutral who will suffer if the cargo is condemned—on whom is the risk?" And summing it up, the learned Attorney-General later submitted, "If my main proposition is right, that in a Prize Court one is not concerned with these niceties about the abstract law of property, but the point really is, at the moment of capture, the goods being on the high seas, is it or is it not open to the consignor to compel payment by the consignee? That is the real test. Then plainly I am entitled here to the condemnation of the goods."

As I have intimated, it was subsequently assumed, and for this purpose agreed by the Attorney-General, that the goods were seized when afloat in port; but that makes no material difference.

The contrary contention of Mr. Leslie Scott for the claimants was that "the true criterion to apply where goods are shipped before war is, whose goods are they? In whom is the property, in the sense of a beneficial ownership of the goods, vested?" Very difficult questions often arise at law as to when the property in goods carried by sea is transferred, or vests; and at whose risk goods are at a particular time, or who suffers by their loss. These are the kind of questions which are often brushed aside in the Prize Court when the transactions in which they are involved take place during the war, or were embarked in when war was imminent, or anticipated.

But where, as in the present case, all the material parts of the business transaction took place bonâ fide during peace, and it becomes necessary to decide questions of property, I hold that the law to be applied is the ordinary municipal law governing contracts for the sale and purchase of goods.

Where goods are contracted to be sold and are shipped during peace without any anticipation of imminent war, and are seized or captured afloat after war has supervened, the cardinal principle is, in my opinion, that they are not subject to seizure or capture unless under the contract the property in the goods has by that time passed to the enemy. It may be that the element of risk may legitimately enter into the consideration of the question whether the property has passed or has become transferred. But the incidence of risk or loss is not by any means the determining factor of property or ownership: (see sect. 20 of the Sale of Goods Act 1893). The main determining factor is whether according to the intention of the seller and the buyer the property had passed.

The question which governs this case, therefore, is, Whose property were the goods at the time of seizure? This principle is consonant with good sense and with the notion of what is right in commercial dealings. It is also in accordance with the doctrines adopted by the eminent jurists who have become authorities on the law of nations, and applied in the decisions of our Prize Court: (see The Cousine Marianne, ubi sup.; The Ida, ubi sup.; The Abo, ubi sup.; The Vrow Magaretha, ubi sup.; and The Ariel, ubi sup.).

The learned Attorney-General by the tenor of his argument rendered it almost unnecessary for me to go through the many authorities dealing with the vesting or transfer of property under such contract, or to discuss the question whether the property in this case had on the 1st Sept. passed from the sellers and become vested in the buyers. He did not, as I understood, argue that the property had passed to the enemy buyers. He admitted that the neutral sellers had a jus disponendi, because they held the bill of lading, which was not indorsed, although possibly he may have intended to qualify this admission by saying that "therefore the sellers would have to that extent a special property" in the goods. But, at any rate, as he did not contend that by law the property had passed to the buyers, I think that it is sufficient to deal very briefly with the matter, and to state my conclusions without elaborating the grounds.

In my opinion, the result of the many decisions from Wait v. Baker (2 Ex. 1) up to Ogg v. Shuter (ubi sup.), Mirabita v. Imperial Ottoman Bank (ubi sup.), and thence up to the Sale of Goods Act 1893; and of the provisions of the Sale of Goods Act 1893 itself (following closely on these matters the judgment of Lord Justice Cotton in Mirabita v. Imperial Ottoman Bank, ubi sup.), and of the decisions subsequent to the Act—e.g., Dupont v. British South Africa Company, 18 Times L. Rep. 24; Ryan v. Ridley, ubi sup.; and Clemens Horst Company v. Biddell Brothers, ubi sup.)—is that in the circumstances of the present case the goods had not at the time of seizure passed to the buyers; but that the sellers had reserved a right of disposal or a jus disponendi over them, and that the goods still remained their property, and would so remain until the shipping documents had been tendered to and taken over by the buyers and the bill of exchange for the price had been paid.

It follows that the goods seized were the property of the American claimants and were not subject to seizure. The court decrees accordingly, and orders the goods to be released to the claimants.

The other point referred to remains; and as it was argued and has been foreshadowed in other cases I will deal with it, although, in view of the decision just given, it becomes immaterial. It was that, as the cargo was in a British ship, it could not be seized or captured even if it was enemy property. In my opinion, this proposition is wholly lacking in foundation. No authority was cited for it. Such a contention has never been put forward, because, as I think, no one has thought that it could prevail. Enemy property at sea or in port can be captured or seized except where an express immunity has been created. Abundance of authority exists for this in the acknowledged books of international jurists. I will only cite one—namely, Wheaton; and I will cite from what is regarded as the best edition, that of Mr. Dana, published in 1866. After an exhaustive and most interesting account of the right of capture according to the usage of war on land and on sea, Wheaton wrote as follows:

Sect. 355. The progress of civilisation has slowly, but constantly, tended to soften the extreme severity of the operations of war by land; but it still remains unrelaxed in respect to maritime warfare, in which the private property of the enemy, taken at sea or afloat in port is indiscriminately liable to capture and confiscation. This inequality in the operation of the laws of war by land and sea has been justified by alleging the usage of considering private property, when captured in cities taken by storm, as booty; and the well-known fact that contributions are levied upon territories occupied by a hostile army, in lieu of a general confiscation of the property belonging to the inhabitants; and that the object of wars by land being conquest, or the acquisition of territory to be exchanged as an equivalent for other territory lost, the regard of the victor for those who are to be or have been his subjects, naturally restrains him from the exercise of his extreme rights in this particular; whereas the object of maritime wars is the destruction of the enemy's commerce and navigation, the sources and sinews of his naval power—which object can only be atttained by the capture and confiscation of private property.

I will also cite Mr. Dana's note upon this section, as it was written years after the Declaration of Paris:

Note 171.—Distinction between Enemy's Property at Sea and on Land.—The text does not present the principal argument for the distinction observed in practice between private property on land and at sea; nor, indeed, has this subject been adequately treated upon principle, if that has even been attempted, by most text-writers. War is the exercise of force by bodies politic for the purpose of coercion. Modern civilisation has recognised certain modes of coercion as justifiable. Their exercise upon material interests is preferable to acts of force upon the person. Where private property is taken, it is because it is of such a character or so situated as to make its capture a justifiable means of coercing the power with which we are at war. If the hostile Power has an interest in the property which is available to him for the purposes of war, that fact makes it primâ facie a subject of capture. The enemy has such an interest in all convertible and mercantile property within his control, or belonging to persons who are living under his control, whether it be on land or at sea; for it is a subject of taxation, contribution, and confiscation. The humanity and policy of modern times have abstained from the taking of private property, not liable to direct use in war, when on land. Some of the reasons for this are the infinite varieties of the character of such property from things almost sacred, to those purely merchantable; the difficulty of discriminating among these varieties; the need of much of it to support the life of non-combatant persons and of animals; the unlimited range of places and objects that would be open to the military; and the moral dangers attending searches and captures in household and among non-combatants But, on the high seas, these reasons do not apply. Strictly personal effects are not taken. Cargoes are usually purely merchandise. Merchandise sent to sea is sent voluntarily; embarked by merchants on an enterprise of profit, taking the risks of war; its value is usually capable of compensation in money, and may be protected by insurance; it is in the custody of men trained and paid for the purpose; and the sea, upon which it is sent, is res omnium, the common field of war as well as of commerce. The purpose of maritime commerce is the enriching of the owner by the transit over this common field; and it is the usual object of revenue to the Power under whose Government the owner resides. The matter may, then, be summed up thus: Merchandise, whether embarked upon the sea or found on land, in which the hostile Power has some interest for purposes of war, is primâ facie a subject of capture. Vessels and their cargoes are usually of that character. Of the infinite varieties of property on shore, some are of this character, and some not. There are very serious objections of a moral and economical nature to subjecting all property on land to military seizure. These objections have been thought sufficient to reverse the primâ facie right of capture. To merchandise at sea these objections apply with so little force that the primâ facie right of capture remains.

There is no distinction now to be made between capture at sea or seizure in port, and—apart from the practice introduced by the Declaration of Paris in favour of neutral vessels—it does not matter in what ships the cargoes seized may happen to be. According to the Order made in Council in 1665 as to the rights of the Lord High Admiral in former times, which are now the rights of the King in his office of Admiralty, "all ships and goods coming into ports, creeks, or roads of England or Ireland unless they come in voluntarily on revolt, or are driven by the King's cruisers," belonged to the Lord High Admiral and now belong to the Crown. And according to Lord Stowell: "Usage has construed this to include ships and goods already come into ports, creeks, or roads, and these not only of England and Ireland, but of all the dominions thereunto belonging": (see The Rebeckah, Roscoe, vol. 1, 118; 1 Ch. Rob. 227). It has never been urged that enemy goods are free from capture or seizure if they happen to be in British ships.

This is, no doubt, the reason why there are no reported judgments upon the point; but if decisions of Prize Courts are desired to show that enemy cargoes in British ships have been captured, reference can be made to The Conqueror (2 Ch. Rob. 303) and The Mashona (10 Cape Times Law Report, 163, and the Journal of Comparative Legislation, 1900, p. 326). See also The Cargo ex Emulous (1 Gallison, 562; sub nomine, Brown v. The United States, 8 Cranch, 110) for the opinion of Story, J. in similar cases.

As to the suggestion that the right of seizure or capture of enemy property carried as cargoes in British ships no longer exists after the Declaration of Paris, it is obvious that the Declaration only modified or limited the right in favour of neutrals for the benefit and protection of the commerce of neutrals and in the interest of international comities; and did not in any other respect weaken or destroy the general right.

It is well known that the United States of America refrained from acceding to the Declaration of Paris because they desired that all property of private persons should be exempted from capture at sea, to which other States have always refused to agree. And, in practice, what would become of such cargoes? A British ship could not in times of war carry it or hand it over to the enemy either directly or through any intermediary, as it is not permitted for her to have any intercourse with the enemy. In my view it is abundantly clear that enemy goods carried in British vessels are subject to seizure in port and capture at sea in times of war.

In the present case, since the goods have been sold, there will be an order for the payment out of court of the proceeds of the sale to the claimants. There will be no order as to costs.

On the application of the Attorney-General, a stay of execution for three weeks was granted.

THE SCHLESIEN. (a)

Enemy ship—Signalling apparatus fitted to ship—Apparatus the property of neutral company—Part of ship—"Goods"—Declaration of Paris—Limited powers of Prize Court—Discretion of Crown.

Submarine signalling apparatus fitted to a ship is a part of the ship itself, and if the ship is one owned by the enemy the apparatus is liable to be condemned along with the ship. It is immaterial that the apparatus is the property of a neutral, and only leased to the owner of the ship. The neutral owner who desires to put in a claim under such circumstances has no right in the Prize Court, and must rely entirely upon the discretion and the clemency of the Crown.

THIS was a case in which the Crown claimed the condemnation of the steamship Schlesien, belonging to the Norddeutscher Lloyd Steamship Company. The ship was captured in the Bay of Biscay and taken into Plymouth.

The vessel was fitted with a submarine signalling apparatus which had been supplied by a Bremen agency of an American company, the Submarine Signal Company, and the company asked that the apparatus, although attached to the vessel, should not be condemned as it remained the sole property of the American company and had only been leased to the Norddeutscher Lloyd Company.

Colin Smith (for G. Lawrence, at present serving with His Majesty's Forces) for the Crown.

Leslie Scott, K.C. and Dunlop for the claimants.—The signalling apparatus remained the property of the American company and had only been leased to the German shipping company through their Bremen agency. It was impossible to produce the agreement referring to the matter, as it was at present in Germany. The apparatus ought to be treated as goods. If this was so, the apparatus came under the category of neutral goods on an enemy ship, and was not subject to condemnation under the provisions of the Declaration of Paris. There was no authority upon the subject. The matter was one of the greatest importance, as there was a great number of these apparatus on various ships in different parts of the world. If it was held that the signalling apparatus could be condemned, probably the same rule would have to be applied in the case of the Marconi apparatus. In spirit, at any rate, the Declaration of Paris covered the property of the claimants.

Colin Smith in reply.—The apparatus was a part of the ship and was used in navigating the vessel. It could not be considered as coming in any way under the category of goods.

THE PRESIDENT.—In this case, as far as the vessel is concerned, I condemn her as lawful prize, and there will be an order for her sale. As regards the submarine signalling apparatus which was fixed and fitted in the vessel, it has been said that it is the property of an American company, and in an affidavit which has been put in it is stated that the apparatus was supplied and fixed by an agency of the American company at Bremen. I know nothing whatever about the constitution of this so-called company and agency, and the document which was said to constitute the lease has not been produced. It is quite possible that by the constitution of the agency at Bremen the German people were the real owners of the apparatus and that the American company had ceased to have any rights in it at all. But the evidence before me is altogether insufficient for me to say to which of the two it really belonged in law. There has been a document exhibited to me, and I am willing to assume that the terms of the lease were the same as those contained in the document, and that the ownership was settled by those terms. But that does not affect my judgment in this case. It has been argued on behalf of the claimants that the apparatus, as being the property of a neutral company, ought to be protected under the express terms of the Declaration of Paris. It is true that the terms "neutral goods" and "enemy goods" are to be found in the Declaration; but in every case when the question has arisen up to the present time the word "goods" has invariably been read as applying to cargo, and to cargo only. If reference is made to the French text of the Declaration, it will be seen that the word used is "merchandise," and it is quite clear to my mind that this means, and was intended to mean, merchandise. The submarine signalling apparatus is not merchandise in any sense of the term.

But, says Mr. Leslie Scott, we are at any rate within the spirit of the Declaration. The spirit of the Declaration, however, is to make things during a state of war as easy and as little disturbing as possible to those who are engaged in neutral commerce. It is obvious that in modern ships, especially those belonging to the same class as the Schlesien, there must be many kinds of apparatus installed—like the signalling apparatus—which actually form a part of the ship itself. Far be it from me to say that, if such apparatus could be easily detached from the ship the captors of the vessel ought not, if they thought fit to do so, to hand over the same to the rightful owners. Such things as privately owned chronometers and compasses belonging to the captain and the crew of a vessel have been given up, and I have given general directions to the marshal that such things shall be given up. But it is a totally different matter to assert that claimants like those in the present case have a right to come to the Prize Court and say that a particular piece of apparatus which is attached to the vessel belongs to them and cannot be condemned. The claimants would, in fact, be making a request that the court should adjudicate as to their rights if they could be heard in a matter of this kind. The Prize Court does not exist for that purpose. It exists for the purpose of deciding whether, having regard to the ship as it stands, it is a subject-matter fit for condemnation as prize. I have condemned the ship, and I am not called upon to investigate questions which touch the property in parts of the ship, whether those parts have been leased or whether they remain the property of the original lessors. I am not unmindful of the importance of the point raised, especially as it involves the question of the rights of neutrals. But it seems to me that the matter is one which must be dealt with by the Crown. If the Crown thinks that the apparatus is the property of the American company, no doubt it will be dealt with accordingly. As far as I am concerned, however, I consider that the apparatus forms a part of the ship, and it will be condemned.

Leave to appeal.

THE ODESSA; THE CAPE CORSO. (a)

Enemy ship—British ship—Enemy cargoes—Neutral bankers—Advances against cargoes—Seizure of ships and cargoes—Claims by bankers as pledgees—Condemnation.

If the legal property in goods captured at sea on a ship, whether British or enemy, is at the time of the capture in an enemy subject, such goods are lawful prize and will be condemned in spite of any claims made by persons who assert that they are pledgees or are otherwise entitled to any rights in them. The Prize Court cannot regard the rights of pledgees in any shape or form.

THESE were two cases in which, besides the condemnation of the first-named vessel, a German barque, there arose questions as to the condemnation of the cargoes carried by the two ships, such cargoes being consigned to German merchants. Claims were made in each case by British firms who sought to assert their rights as pledgees. All the materials facts of each case are fully set out in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 21.—The PRESIDENT.—It is quite clear from the ship's papers that the Odessa was a German vessel. She was captured at sea by H.M.S. Caronia on the 19th Aug. last. I therefore condemn the vessel as lawful prize. The other vessel, the Cape Corso, is a British ship. Claims have arisen as to the cargoes in both ships, and as these claims are of a similar nature, I shall deal with the two cases together. There is, in fact, no difference between the claims in any matters essential for my judgment; and the principles applicable must be the same in both.

The subject-matter of the claim in the first case is a large quantity, 51,043 bags, of nitrate of soda laden on board the German barque Odessa, which I have just condemned. The cargo was captured in the vessel at sea on the 19th Aug. last. The claimants are J. Henry Schröder and Co., of Leadenhall-street, London—a firm of which Baron von Schröder, a naturalised subject of this kingdom, and Frank C. Tiarks, a British subject, are the partners. The cargo was purchased from Weber and Co., a firm of Chilian merchants, at Valparaiso, by the Rhederei Aktien Gesellschaft von 1896, a German company carrying on business at Hamburg. By a business arrangement between this German company and Schröder and Co., the latter accepted bills of exchange in favour of the sellers against the cargo, and received the bills of lading as security for the acceptances, and the moneys payable under them. The bill of lading in this instance was dated the 8th May 1914, and was made out in favour of J. Henry Schröder and Co., London, or their assigns. The vessel was stated therein to be "bound for Channel for orders."

Fifteen bills of exchange for various amounts were accepted by Schröder and Co. on the 4th June 1914, and twenty-one others on the 9th June. The due dates of these sets of bills were the 5th and the 10th Sept. 1914 respectively; but, the time of payment having been extended by proclamation, the actual dates for payment were the 19th and the 24th Oct. Therefore when Schröder and Co.'s claim was made the bills had not been met. They have since been paid, and the total sum amounts to 41,153*l.* The claimants claim the cargo "as being the property of British subjects, and (or) as holders for full value of the bills of lading therefor," and "as the persons beneficially interested in the cargo."

The subject-matter of the claim in the second case is a large quantity of valuable wood laden on board the steamship Cape Corso, a British vessel. She was detained for some days at Suez on the 7th Aug., and the cargo was seized on the arrival of the vessel at Brixham on the 26th Aug. The claimants are William Brandt, Sons, and Co., of Fenchurch-avenue, London, a firm of British subjects. The cargo was purchased from one Shütze, of Otaru, in Japan, by one Leo Küpper, of Hamburg, a German subject. The vessel was chartered to Küpper. The goods were shipped in Japan, and the vessel was bound for Rotterdam, or, at the option of the charterer, for Hamburg. By a business arrangement between Küpper and the claimants, the latter gave to Mitsui and Co., in London, on behalf of their house at Otaru, letters of credit authorising them to negotiate drafts of Shütze on the claimants for the cargo purchased from him by Küpper. A certain number of bills of exchange were accepted by the claimants before the war, which fell due after the war, but which have now been paid. The bills of lading were made out to Shütze's order or assigns, and were indorsed generally by Shütze. They were in due course received by the claimants as security against their acceptances. The claimants then forwarded them to their agent at Hamburg to deliver up to Küpper against payment, and some of them were presented before the war. Certain collateral securities were given to the claimants by Küpper, in part by a guarantee of the Rheinische Creditbank Filiale Karlsruhe, and in part by a deposit with the claimants' agent in Hamburg. The transactions were not quite so simple as in the first case. Their effect has been stated, and no further details need be given. The balance of accounts stated by the claimants to remain due from Küpper is 6104*l.* The claim was formulated by the claimants as follows:—

A. (1) A declaration that the goods are their property.

(2) Release to them of the said goods.

Alternatively:—

B. (1) A declaration that they are entitled to possession of the goods.

(2) Release of the goods to the claimants for the purpose of sale and retention by them out of the proceeds of sale of the amount paid by them for the bills of lading and the amount of costs, losses, and expenses (if any).

(3) Alternatively for payment to them out of the proceeds of sale of the goods of the amounts referred to in (2).

In reference to the transactions between them, the claimants in writing to their German customer, Küpper, said, "We shall be pleased to finance the wood shipments from Mr. Carl Shütze for your account on the basis as sketched by you." Just as Brandt and Co. financed the wood shipments for their customer, so did Schröder and Co. finance the nitrate shipments for their customers, the Rhederei Aktien Gesellschaft von 1896.

It was admitted for the claimants in each case (1) that in law the property in the cargoes had been transferred to, and become vested in, the German purchasers, and that the latter were at all material times the legal "owners" of the cargoes; and (2) that the claimants were merely pledgees of the bills of lading representing the cargoes as security for moneys advanced, or agreed to be advanced.

The important questions of law now raised are whether the Prize Court should nevertheless regard the claimants as the real owners of the goods, and should therefore release the goods captured on the ground that they were not "enemy property"; or whether the court should in some way take cognisance of their claims, and direct the captors or the marshal to pay them out of the proceeds. The argument was presented ably and persuasively by Mr. MacKinnon, and the court is indebted to him for his assistance. He admitted that no decisions of this or any other Court of Prize had given effect or even lent countenance to such a claim; but he urged that side by side with the development of commercial dealings, on the lines of those now presented there should be such an extension of the law of prize as would protect people who, like the claimants, lent money on the security of cargoes on their bills of lading.

At the outset two things must be remembered: first, that this is a court of law, and, secondly, that the law to be administered here is the law of nations, i.e., the law which is generally understood and acknowledged to be the existing law applicable between nations by the general body of enlightened international legal opinion. The decisions of a court of law should proceed upon definite principles. Those principles have to be applied to ever-varying sets of facts. But the court has the function and duty not merely of deciding individual cases, but of determining them upon principles which shall be a guide to others as to what their positions and rights are in the eye of the law.

In the domain of international law, in particular, there is room for the extension of old doctrines, or the development of new principles where there is, or is likely to be, a general acceptance of such by civilised nations. Precedents handed down from earlier days should be treated as guides to lead, and not as shackles to bind. But the guides must not be lightly deserted or cast aside. Already, in the course of the present war, I have had to deal with questions not remote from those raised in these proceedings; and in dealing with them I have striven, after careful consideration, to decide them in this spirit, with the guidance of the past, and in the light of later experience.

In The Marie Glaeser (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 601; 112 L. T. Rep. 251; (1914) P. 218) the position of owners of enemy vessels and of other persons, neutral and British subjects, claiming liens or charges upon the vessels, fell to be decided. In The Miramichi (ante, p. 21; 112 L T. Rep. 349; (1915) P. 71) rules for determining the "ownership" of cargoes laden on an innocent ship had to be laid down. In The Marie Glaeser (ubi sup.) the decision was that in cases of capture, no mortgages, liens, or charges upon an enemy ship could be set up in this court against the captors. In The Miramichi (ubi sup.) it was held that in cases of seizure the "ownership" of or "property" in a cargo shipped during peace depends upon the municipal law governing contracts for the sale and purchase of goods. I must adhere to those decisions, unless and until they are corrected by a higher tribunal; and I must apply the principles on which they were founded consistently to the facts of the present claims, unless there is good reason in reference to these cargoes for adopting different tests or doctrines.

As to charges or liens, no doubt a distinct line could be drawn between ships and cargoes laden in them if it were deemed right to make such a distinction. But it has never yet been made, I think, on any occasion by the Prize Court of any nation. The reasons for not allowing any charges or liens against ships are set out in The Marie Glaeser (ubi sup.) and the many authorities therein cited. Some of these authorities related to cargoes, and the same reasons were applied. I will not go over the same ground again, but I will just refer to three instances as examples where cargoes were dealt with upon the same footing, covering the century from the time of Lord Stowell in 1805, through the period of the Crimean War in 1854, up to the Spanish-American War in 1906. There are The Marianna (Roscoe's English Prize Cases, vol. 1, 518; 6 Ch. Rob. 24), The Ida (Roscoe, vol. 2, 268; Spinks, 26), and The Carlos F. Roses (177 U. S. Rep. 655).

It appears to me that it is impossible to distinguish the two last-named cases from those with which I am now dealing. Nor do I see any reason for running counter to them.

In the first case now before the court, that of the Odessa, the vessel and the cargo are both "properties" belonging to enemy subjects. What reason of any validity, or even plausibility, can there be for barring the claims of British or neutral subjects having liens or charges upon the vessel, and at the same time allowing similar claims against the cargoes? I can see none.

Accordingly, upon authority and principle, inasmuch as the claims of Schröder and Co. and Brandts and Co. are founded upon their positions as pledgees, and not legal owners, they cannot, in my judgment, be allowed.

But it was further argued that, although the claimants were not the legal owners of the cargoes, they had such a beneficial interest therein that their claims should be allowed. To accede to this proposition would be to open a door for all sorts of inquiries and calculations which has been consistently and firmly closed by my predecessors and by Courts of Prize. A consideration of the circumstanees in the case of Brandts and Co.'s claim will at once show the difficulties. In the initial stage, how would a captor, who may have had good reason to believe that the cargo seized was enemy property, know how to act if he had to consider before seizure, or knew he might be confronted after seizure with claims from pledgees as moneylenders in various parts of the world, whose advances might be either 5 per cent. or 95 per cent. or any other proportion of the value of the goods? Or if he might be subject to the taking of a general account as between banker or customer or guarantor of customer in order to ascertain the extent of the alleged charge or lien? When a later stage is approached, what would the captors or the marshal have to do? Are they to be parties to the taking of an account between the pledgors and pledgees, or persons possibly claiming under them, an account which ex hypothesi would during the war have to be taken in the absence of some of the parties? Such proceedings would be wholly foreign to the jurisdiction and working of this court. That persons may be losers during war time in pecuniary or commercial transactions with enemy traders is only too obvious. Loss is no test of legal rights. The claimants have rights of action against their customers for their full claims which they can set in motion either during the war or after it. How far these claims might be fruitful is no concern of this court.

In my judgment, the only safe guiding principle is to ascertain who are the legal owners of the cargoes; and, if the goods are found to be the property in law of an enemy, to condemn them, or if they are the property of neutrals or British subjects to release them, as was done in The Miramichi (ubi sup.).

There is one other matter to mention relating to the second case lest it may be thought that it has been overlooked. Counsel for Brandts and Co. contended that in regard to part of the cargo claimed—namely, 2834 logs—both Küpper and, his guarantors, the Rheinische Creditbank Filiale. Karlsruhe, had before the outbreak of hostilities and capture refused to take up the bills of lading and that thereupon the pledgees could have sold Even if the fact of refusal were established, it is clear that until the pledgees did sell, the general property in the goods remained in the owners, who had at any time the right to redeem. I may further note that the facts upon this head were precisely similar in The Carlos F. Roses (ubi sup.) The statement of them which is to be found at p. 679 of the report is as follows:—"The purchase of the goods, the drawing and cashing of the drafts, and indorsement and delivery of the bills of lading, all took place before the sailing of the vessel, and long before the declaration of war, and before there was any reason to anticipate hostilities. The drafts were accepted before the war, and were paid before the seizure of the vessel." Nevertheless it was held that tne claimants had no right to the goods as against the captors.

My judgment, therefore, is that in none of the forms suggested can the claims in either case be allowed; and I must condemn the cargoes in both cases as lawful prize.

Feb. 22.—The PRESIDENT.—This is a summons which came before me in chambers, and which I adjourned into court for argument. It is a summons issued by the Prince Line Limited—the owners of a British vessel, the steamship Corsican Prince—in effect asking for directions for the assessment of the amount of freight and other moneys claimed by the shipowners, and for payment of the amount so assessed out of the proceeds of the cargo now in court in these prize proceedings. Part of the cargo was claimed by the Russian Bank for Foreign Trade (hereinafter referred to as "the Russian Bank"), and a consent order was made for payment out to the bank of part of the proceeds of the sale of the cargo upon the terms, and in the circumstances, which will be referred to later. A caveat against payment out without notice was afterwards entered on behalf of the shipowners in accordance with the Prize Court Rules. Later a writ was issued in the King's Bench Division by the Russian Bank against the shipowners, in which a declaration as to the rights of the parties was claimed; and a summons to stay that action was issued, which at present stands adjourned. The matter which now arises for decision is whether the claim of the shipowners and the questions as to the rights of the shipowners and the cargo owners in respect of the proceeds of the cargo are to be determined in a common law court in the King's Bench Division or in the prize proceedings in this division. I apprehend that the principles and the practice governing this matter are the same since the assignment to this division of the Prize Court jurisdiction of the High Court under the Judicature Act 1891 as in former times, when the jurisdiction in prize was vested in and exercised by the High Court of Admiralty. The subject is one of general importance affecting our judicature, and I propose in the first place to deal with it upon lines applicable to proceedings of this nature generally, and then to state the particular facts of this case, to which the principles and the practice governing such cases have to be applied.

Mr. Maurice Hill has cited many authorities in his argument on behalf of the shipowners that this court, exercising its prize jurisdiction, has the exclusive right to determine such questions as those which are now in issue, and not a common law court, and that such determination should be in accordance with the prize law.

It has been my duty to examine those authorities and also other authorties which deal with these matters in so far as they throw light upon the subject. Having done so, it does not appear to me to be necessary or useful to go through the cases in detail, because the examination of them shows that the results which are summarised in text-books of various authors—themselves authorities of acknowledged renown—are abundantly justified by the decided cases. Story, J., who, as an exponent in treatises and judgments of matters relating to Prize Law, is hardly second to Lord Stowell himself, in his Notes on the Principles and Practice of Prize Courts writes as follows (p. 30): "When once the Prize Court has acquired jurisdiction over the principal cause, it will exert its authority over all the incidents. It will follow, as has been already observed, prize proceeds into the hands of agents or other persons holding them for the captors, or by any other title; and in proper cases will decree the parties to pay over the proceeds, with interest upon the same for the time they have been in their hands. It may also enforce its decrees against persons having the proceeds of prizes in their hands, notwithstanding no stipulation, or an insufficient stipulation, has been taken on a delivery on bail; for it may always proceed in rem where the res can be found, and is not confined to the remedy on the stipulation; and in these cases the court may proceed upon its own authority ex officio, as well as upon the application of parties; nor is the court functus officio after sentence pronounced, for it may proceed to enforce all rights, and issue process therefor, so long as anything remains to be done touching the subject-matter. The Prize Court has also exclusive jurisdiction as to the question who are the captors and joint captors entitled to share in the distribution, and its decree is conclusive upon all parties. It has also exclusive authority as to the allowance of freight, damages, expenses, and costs in all cases of captures, and though a mere maritime tort unconnected with capture jure belli may be cognisable by a court of common law, yet it is clearly established that all captures jure belli, and all torts connected therewith, are exclusively cognisable in the Prize Court." And in a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in which Story, J. delivered judgment, he says: "For if the Admiralty has, as it is conceded on all sides it has, jurisdiction over the incidents, as well as the principal matter of prize, it must be just as much exclusive in the first case as in the last": (Maisonnaire v. Keating, 2 Gallison, 324, at p. 343).

So Chancellor Kent, in his work on International Law, says: "It is a principle perfectly well settled, and constantly conceded, and applied, that Prize Courts have exclusive jurisdiction, and an enlarged discretion, as to the allowance of freight, damages, expenses, and costs, in all cases of captures, and as to all torts, and personal injuries, and ill-treatments, and abuse of power connected with captures jure belli": (12th edition by Holmes, J., p. 400).

This passage was cited with approval in 1868 by the Supreme Court in The Siren (7 Wallace, 152, at p. 161). One more passage may be cited from Halleck's International Law (4th edit, vol. 2, p. 433): "Prize Courts also have exclusive jurisdiction, and an enlarged discretion, as to allowance of freight, damages, expenses, and costs, and as to all torts, personal injuries, ill-treatments, and abuse of power, connected with maritime captures de jure belli, and they frequently award large and liberal damages in such cases. This rule rests upon the ground that where the Prize Court has the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the original matter, it ought also to have such jurisdiction of all its consequences and of everything necessarily incidental thereto. The Courts of Common Law in England have no jurisdiction at all of such incidental questions; and this doctrine has been reaffirmed by the courts of the United States."

In the leading case of Le Caux v. Eden (2 Douglas, 594), Buller, J. in a judgment which deals exhaustively with the subject says (at p. 609): "The principle is that the question prize or no prize, and the consequences of it, are cognisable solely in the Admiralty Court: the true reason of which is that prizes are acquisitions jure belli, and the jus belli is to be determined by the law of nations and not by the particular municipal law of any country."

Lord Mansfield, who was a party to the decision in Le Caux v. Eden (ubi sup.), in the history he gave of the Instance and Prize jurisdictions of the Court of Admiralty in Lindo v. Rodney (2 Douglas, p. 614), said: "The whole system of litigation and jurisprudence in the Prize Court is peculiar to itself; it is no more like the Court of Admiralty than it is to any Court of Westminster Hall." And after describing some of the matters with which the Prize Court had to deal, he added: "These views cannot be answered in any Court of Westminster Hall, and therefore the Courts of Westminster Hall never have attempted to take cognisance of the question 'prize or not prize': not from the locality of being done at sea, as I have said, but from their incompetence to embrace the whole of the subject."

The decision in Le Caux v. Eden (ubi sup.) was that an action for false imprisonment would not lie at common law where the imprisonment was in consequence of taking the ship as prize, although the ship had been acquitted and restored, and the captor had been condemned in costs and damages in the Prize Court. More than thirty years afterwards came the case of Faith v. Pearson (4 Camp. 357), which carried the doctrine of the exclusive jurisdiction of the Prize Court still further, because in that case (which was an action at common law for trespass for seizing ship and cargo) the captor, who found that he had made a mistake in capturing the ship, had given her up without having instituted any proceedings against her in the Court of Admiralty. In deciding that the Common Law Court had no jurisdiction, Gibbs, C.J. said (at p. 358): "The moment it appears that the ship was seized as an enemy, that is an end of this action. Although the defendant had no probable cause for what he did, he is only amenable in the Court of Admiralty. I well remember the case of Le Caux v. Eden (ubi sup.) being decided. The decision was approved of at the time, and has been adhered to ever since. The principle there laid down fully applies to the action we are now trying. If the ship is actually seized as prize, although she is released by the captor without being libelled in the Admiralty Court, the Courts of Common Law have no jurisdiction upon the subject. The inconvenience would be equally great in either case. If trespass lies for seizing the ship, every sailor on board may bring an action for false imprisonment."

We are incompetent here to consider whether the captor was excusable for what he did; and, if he was not, what compensation he ought to make to the parties injured. I conceive that they are by no means without remedy, and that proceedings may be originated in the Admiralty Court on the part of the captured. There the question of prize or not prize will be properly discussed, the existence of probable cause will be proved or negatived, and by a single decree justice will be done to all concerned.

The Prize Court has constantly dealt with claims for freight and damages where ships or cargoes have been captured or seized, not only as between captors and owners, but also as between owners of ships and owners of cargo, and have adjudicated upon such claims whether the ship or cargo has been released, and when both ship and cargo have been released; and apparently no action involving questions in similar cases were brought in any Common Law Court.

And this is obviously for grounds solid in justice and convenient in practice; because the two courts administered two different codes or systems of law; the Prize Courts deal with claims in accordance with the law of nations and upon equitable principles freed from contracts, which almost always cease to have effect upon capture or seizure by reason of the non-appearance or non-completion of the contract of affreightment; whereas Common Law Courts would only determine the consequences of the strictly legal contractual obligations of the parties. The King's Bench Courts would either give the claimants for freight the whole or nothing, according to whether the contract of affreightment had been performed or not. But the Prize Court takes all the circumstances into consideration, and may award, as it has done in decided cases, the whole or a moiety of the freight, or a sum pro rata itineris; or it may discard the contract rate altogether, even as a basis for assessment on calculation (The Twilling Riget, Roscoe's English Prize Cases, vol. 1, 430; 5 Ch. Rob. 82); or it may withhold or diminish the sum by reason of misconduct, as, e.g., resistance to search or spoliation.

And we find that in accordance with the principles, precedents, and practice which have established the exclusive jurisdiction of the old High Court of Admiralty, to which the Admiralty Division of this court has succeeded when sitting as a Prize Court, the Prize Court Rules have been framed for this court, and have been made by the Privy Council under the Prize Court Act 1894, and not by the Rule Committee which frames the rules for the High Court. It is not necessary to refer further to these rules; but attention may be directed to Order XLV., which provides that in the absence of prescribed rules, the practice of the late High Court of Admiralty in prize proceedings shall be followed or such other practice as the President of this division may direct. It may also be noted that the appeal from decisions of this court on all questions, claims for freights included, is to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council; whereas, if similar questions could be tried in the Commercial Court or any court of the King's Bench Division, the appeal would be to the Court of Appeal or to the House of Lords.

The court has also its special officers, like the registrar and merchants and the Admiralty marshal, and its special machinery for dealing with all such matters as may arise in prize proceedings.

I have dealt with the important question of jurisdiction generally. But, in truth, Mr. Aspinall, for the claimants, did not dispute the main propositions which have been stated. He contended, as I understood, that where, as in this case, the captors or the Crown after seizure released the goods, not only had the King's Bench Courts jurisdiction to deal with the claim for freight, but that they alone had the jurisdiction to the exclusion of this court, even when the proceeds of the cargo seized and sold are now in the hands of this court. This contention is, in my view, quite unsound. A somewhat similar argument was put forward in Le Caux v. Eden (ubi sup.) on the ground that the ship had been declared by the sentence of the Prize Court to be no prize, but it did not prevail. As I have before pointed out, the Prize Court exercised jurisdiction and exclusive jurisdiction, where the subject-matter had been acquitted or released, and it had been held that such jurisdiction was vested in it, even when captures had been abandoned without any proceedings having been instituted at all.

When the particular facts of the present case are looked at it is perfectly clear that this court alone has jurisdiction to deal with the claim for freight, and that it would be most inconvenient if it were otherwise. The essential facts very shortly stated are as follows: The ship's cargo consisted of 250,000 poods of barley. It was loaded at Odessa, the loading being completed after war was declared between Russia and Germany. It was all consigned to Hamburg. The Russian authorities raised difficulties about the ship leaving, but afterwards allowed her to sail on an undertaking by the master to call at Malta, Gibraltar, and Falmouth. She arrived at Falmouth, and was ordered by my marshal to Liverpool. She was detained, and afterwards, on the 29th Oct., her cargo was seized. Upon the application of the marshal an order was made by this court for the sale of the cargo to prevent its deterioration and for the payment of the proceeds into court.

A writ was in due course issued by the Procurator-General claiming the condemnation of the cargo or its proceeds as prize. The whole cargo was sold for about 29,800*l.* The net proceeds amount to about 28,600*l.*, and are now in court. Appearances were entered in these proceedings by the Russian Bank claiming as owners of part of the cargo—viz., 51,500 poods; by the Société Générale, claimants as to other parts—viz., 46,280 poods; and by the Prince Line Limited as owners of the vessel. So far as I have been informed, no claims have been made in respect of the rest of the cargo, over 150,000 poods, or its proceeds. After the sale of the cargo, an order was made with the consent of the Procurator-General and of the claimants in these terms: "Upon consent of H.M. Procurator-General, it is ordered that he do pay out to the Russian Bank for Foreign Trade the net proceeds of sale of 51,500 poods of barley ex the above vessel upon production of the copy bills of lading, payment of any charges which may have been incurred in connection with the detention thereof, and subject to any rights as to freight which the shipowners may have had over the goods at the date of the seizure thereof." A similar order was made in favour of the Société Générale in respect of 46,280 poods. The Prince Line Limited, as claimants for freight, demurrage, and charges, entered a caveat against the payment out of court of any of the proceeds without notice to them. After all these steps were taken in these proceedings the Russian Bank issued their writ in the King's Bench Division. The summons to transfer the trial of the action to the Commercial Court is stayed pending this decision. The Société Générale, through their counsel, Mr. Darby, adopted the argument of Mr. Hill, and they desire that the questions affecting them should be heard in this court. Upon these facts I repeat that it is clear beyond dispute that the owners and cargo owners are within the exclusive jurisdiction of this court,

I will only point out further that the Crown has full right to consent to the release of any ship or goods captured or seized on any grounds that the Crown may see fit. Moreover, it does not by any means follow as a necessary consequence of the release that goods were not properly seized as prize as the Crown's droits of Admiralty. In the present case, as the Empire of Russia is our ally in the war, it does not require a very vivid imagination to conceive grounds for giving up to the Russian Bank the proceeds of the portion of the cargo claimed by them quite otherwise than as an acknowledgment of wrongful seizure. And if it is thought material, it would be quite open to anyone interested in these proceedings at any stage to allege and to set out to prove that the seizure of the cargo was lawful. I give directions therefore that the claim of the shipowners and all questions between them and the Russian Bank and the Société Générale be heard in these prize proceedings.

Collision during salvage—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, art. 29—Appeal on matters of fact—Concurrent findings in courts below—Jurisdiction on appeal to review conclusions resting upon probabilities.

The rule that concurrent findings should not be disturbed on appeal does not apply where on appeal there is tolerably clear evidence which satisfies the court that the findings are erroneous. The principle is especially applicable to a case in which the conclusion sought to be set aside rests upon the consideration of probabilities.

A vessel, while rendering assistance to another, was rammed by the latter. She sank and all her hands with one exception were lost.

In the court of first instance both vessels were held to blame, but the Court of Appeal reversed that decision and held that the salving vessel was alone to blame.

The owners of the salving vessel appealed.

Held, that this case was not a true example of concurrent findings in the courts below; that there was jurisdiction to review the concurrent findings in the courts below; and that on the facts the vessel which was being salved, but which sank the salving ship, was alone to blame.

Rule laid down by Lords Herschell and Watson in The P. Caland v. Glamorgan Shipping Company (7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 83, 206, 317; 68 L. T. Rep. 469; (1893) A. C. 207), as to concurrent findings, considered.

APPEAL by the owners of the steamship Hatfield against an order of the Court of Appeal.

In the action the present appellants were plaintiffs and the present respondents defendants.

The collision took place between the two vessels in the North Sea on the 11th Oct. 1911, while the Hatfield, an iron screw steamship of 1753 tons gross and 1086 tons net register, at the request of those in charge of the Glasgow, was attempting to render salvage assistance to the latter. The Glasgow was a steel screw steamship of 1068 tons gross and 492 tons net register.

On the morning of the collision the Glasgow, her steering gear having gone wrong, was drifting not far from the Galloper Lightship, in the North Sea, flying signals of distress. The evidence as to what happened was not very conclusive, but established that the Hatfield came up to take her in tow. She rounded the stern of the disabled vessel and came out on her starboard quarter. A few minutes later the Hatfield was struck on the port bow by the Glasgow's stem, and almost immediately went to the bottom, all her hands, with the exception of one man named Hagar, being lost.

By the decree of the Admiralty Court both vessels were pronounced to blame. Bargrave Deane, J. found that the master of the Hatfield in a heavy sea and wind miscalculated his direction and got too close to the Glasgow. He therefore attributed blame to the Hatfield. He found also those in charge of the Glasgow to blame, because although he did not find that the engines of the Glasgow were set ahead, he found that they were not reversed at the time and at the distance when they were asserted to have been reversed or at any material time. He was advised by the assessors and found that had the engines been so reversed the collision would have been avoided.

From that judgment both parties appealed to the Court of Appeal (Lord Parker, Lord Sumner, and Warrington, J.), who found that the Hatfield was alone to blame. In their opinion the sole cause of the collision was a miscalculation by those in charge of the Hatfield and negligence. The charges of negligence made against those navigating the Hatfield were: (1) That a good look-out was not kept on the Hatfield; (2) that the Hatfield failed to keep clear of the Glasgow; (3) that the Hatfield was in the circumstances manœuvred too close to the Glasgow, and improperly and at an improper distance attempted to cross the Glasgow's bows; (4) the engines of the Hatfield were not stopped or reversed in due time or at all; (5) that those in charge of the Hatfield neglected to comply with art. 29 of the Sea Rules, the only article of such rules material to the case. Its terms are as follows:

> Nothing in these rules shall exonerate any vessel or the owner or master or crew thereof from the consequences of any neglect to carry lights or signals or of any neglect to keep a proper look-out or of the neglect of any precaution which may be required by the ordinary practice of seamen or by the special circumstances of the case.

From the judgment of the Court of Appeal the owners of the Hatfield appealed.

Adair Roche, K.C. and Lewis Noad appeared for the appellants.

Sir Robert Finlay, K.C., A. D. Bateson, K.C., and Raeburn for the respondents.

The House, having taken time for consideration, gave judgment allowing the appeal and holding that the Glasgow was alone to blame.

Earl LOREBURN.—This is a collision case in which Bargrave Deane, J. found both ships to blame—namely, the Hatfield, which was attempting to salve the Glasgow, and the Glasgow, which sank the Hatfield. The Court of Appeal found that the Hatfield alone was to blame. A sad feature of the collision is that all hands were lost in the Hatfield, except one man, Hagar by name. In such a state of things the crew of the surviving ship is especially bound to be careful not to admit any unconscious bias in favour of their own vessel into their evidence, and a court has always to keep in mind that what is said against the ship which has been destroyed is said against those who cannot tell their own story. I must advert to the fact that a scrap log was thrown overboard the morning after the collision because, it is said, it had been wetted by sea water and had been reduced to pulp. This has not, though it might have, affected my judgment, but it was very wrong to throw it overboard under the circumstances.

Some things are common ground. The Glasgow is a steamship of 1068 tons gross. Her steering gear went wrong and she was drifting not far from the Galloper Lightship on the morning of the 1st Oct. 1911, flying signals of distress. About 11 a.m. the Hatfield, a steamship of 1753 tons gross, came up to take her in tow, rounded her stern, and came out on her starboard quarter. What then happened we have to collect from various sources, but in a few minutes the Hatfield was struck on her port bow by the Glasgow's stem, and almost immediately went to the bottom. At the time a gale was blowing from N. or N.E., and there was a rough sea. Everything else that is material we have to find out for ourselves from such evidence and indications as are afforded us. There are three sources of information, in addition to skilled witnesses.

In the first place, the surviving ship, the Glasgow, was inspected when she came into port. The forward fluke of the anchor on her port side was broken off. There was substantially no setting over of the stem, and the rivets can be seen in the photographs, apparently not displaced. In fact, except the anchor on the port side, the bows of the Glasgow were not substantially injured. Now that shows one thing. When the impact took place the Hatfield was not going ahead. It is agreed that the stem of the Glasgow struck the port side of the Hatfield. In fact, it was clear, and hardly disputed at the close of the argument, that the Glasgow struck the Hatfield practically at right angles and when the latter ship was not moving, or hardly moving. One more fact appeared from this inspection. The condition of the Glasgow's bows showed that the blow was not an up-and-down blow. The bows of the Glasgow went clean into the Hatfield.

Our next source of information is the solitary survivor of the Hatfield, namely, Hagar, who came on deck immediately after the collision. Bargrave Deane, J., who saw him, says he was an honest witness, but thought he was too agitated—as well he might be at the time—to be reliable upon detail. Hagar said that the stem of the Glasgow penetrated 6ft. or 7ft. into the Hatfield, at about right angles, and if that is accurate then the experts are satisfied, nor was it disputed that the Glasgow must have had headway on her—in other words, that she rammed the other ship—which, if accepted, would put an end to the case. I will not act upon that because I do not feel absolutely clear about the extent of penetration, and both courts below declined to accept it. It is due to the witness to say that his evidence is decidedly confirmed by the report made by the mate of the Glasgow to the master, and I am by no means sure that this is not true.

The last source of information is the crew of the Glasgow, and before I deal with them I will put together the facts which are either admitted or established, apart from what those present at the collision can prove. I take with me to the consideration of the Glasgow's evidence these facts: "The blow was struck at about right angles; the Hatfield was practically motionless at the time; the blow was severe enough to sink her almost at once, and it was not an up-and-down blow.

Now for the account given by the officers of the Glasgow herself. The master's version was as follows, and the others agreed so far as they went. After describing how he had his steering gear broken and how the Hatfield passed under his stern and came out on the starboard quarter in order to take him in tow, he proceeds: "She appeared stationary there for about five or ten minutes and then she appeared to go on the same course as we were heading ourselves, and steaming slowly ahead; but it appeared to me that she was still edging in towards us all the time. When he had got forward of the beam he seemed to act on a starboard helm then and still edging in, and he got nearly abreast of our forecastle head, still under his starboard helm and still edging in towards us . . . well, he still had headway on him; he still appeared to be attempting to cross the bow, and when he had got nearly at right angles to us and about two ships' lengths off I thought it was dangerous and I put the engines full speed astern." Here the witness was interrupted by the learned judge, but he proceeds a little later: "Just when she was about these two ships' lengths off I rang the engines full speed astern, and I could tell by the vibration of the ship that the engines were going astern, and about a minute after I had rung the engines astern the collision occurred." The witness then described by models how the ships were placed towards each other at the time he thought there was a risk and ordered the engines full speed astern, and this diagram showed the Hatfield on the starboard bow of the Glasgow, not far from right angles, and about 480ft. off. The witness said that "the Hatfield came broadside down on us," and was steaming ahead at the time of the collision about four or five knots.

I know how strange are the views that honest men can take of what they have themselves seen, or even done, especially in times of agitation, and I do not wish to be understood as imputing falsehood, but I decline to accept this version, for the following reasons.

There is nothing to show that the relative positions of the two ships a minute before the accident was inaccurately described by the master of the Glasgow, Captain Turnbull. It rather squares with what others said. Taking it to have been broadly speaking as he described it, the crucial point is—how did these two ships get in a minute's time from that position into the position they were in unquestionably at the moment of collision, namely, the Hatfield right across the bows of the Glasgow, and the Glasgow's stem running into her at about right angles? They could not have drifted together in so short a time. Captain Turnbull says that the Hatfield "had been edging round on this starboard helm," and "as soon as the wind got her on the port quarter that assisted her to get round," and "the Hatfield came broadside down on us." He adds that at the time of the collision the Hatfield was "steaming ahead about four or five knots." That is in substance his explanation of the Hatfield's movements. In regard to the Glasgow he says that he reversed his engines when the ships were in the position described in the diagram, two ships' lengths apart, but the accident nevertheless occurred.

I make all allowances for inexactitude as to distance and time, to which we are all liable. But this is quite clear. If the two ships were in anything like the position described by the master of the Glasgow in his diagram, it was his duty to reverse his engines in time to avoid a collision. The event proves that he did not reverse in time. The Hatfield could not move laterally. The Glasgow could move back, for her engines were in good working order, and there was ample sea room. Now, he says that he did reverse a minute before the collision, when the ships were in the position described. Bargrave Deane, J. did not accept this statement, and his finding is not impaired by reason of the fact that he thought the order was given but not obeyed in the engine room. More than that, there is no statement in any of the logs except the engineer's log that the engines were reversed before the collision, and the engineer's log was written up six or seven days afterwards. More than that, the account given by Captain Turnbull to the owners' agent says nothing about reversing, but that the Glasgow was lying dead in the water, and helpless, at the time of the collision. I will add that the nautical assessors advise us that there could have been no collision if the Glasgow had reversed at the time her master alleges. This being so, I agree with Bargrave Deane, J. I am quite satisfied, on the evidence, that the Glasgow could have avoided the collision by reversing, and ought to have reversed, and did not so reverse. Therefore I hold the Glasgow to blame.

Ought we then to say that the Hatfield also was to blame? The contention of her owners at the trial rested partly on an allegation that the Glasgow rammed her by going ahead, and partly on the contention that the Glasgow ought to have reversed. To my mind it does not much signify what alternative views learned counsel thought it right to rely upon, provided there was no surprise, and that is not suggested. We have to act on the evidence. The only blame imputed to the Hatfield is that she came too near, though it was her business to come somewhat near with a view to taking the Glasgow in tow. The only evidence s the evidence of Captain Turnbull. I have already pointed out that his evidence cannot be accepted as to reversing his engines. Nor can it be accepted when he says that the Hatfield was moving at the speed of four or five knots when the collision occurred, because every witness agrees that she must have been practially motionless, judging from the condition of the Glasgow's bows, almost the only solid material we have in this case. Certainly I will not accept his evidence, under these circumstances, to inculpate another ship, when no one can contradict him. I do not mean to charge him with falsehood, because one knows how much room there is for honest error; but the story he tells of the way in which the one ship drifted on to the other is unsatisfactory in itself, quite apart from the errors I have adverted to already, and I cannot act upon it.

I find, therefore, that, upon his own statement, upon which he must be judged, when corrected by other testimony, the master of the Glasgow was in fault, because he ought in any view to have avoided the collision by reversing. I am not at all satisfied with the evidence he gives of the Hatfield's default, and it is not proved that she was to blame.

I do not feel the difficulty urged by Sir Robert Finlay of accepting Captain Turnbull's evidence when it inculpates himself and rejecting it where it inculpates the Hatfield. It is not a case of founding two mutually contradictory conclusions upon the same basis of facts, though this, too, may be sometimes necessary in a court of law, because a man's own evidence may be conclusive against himself as an admission when it cannot be received, and is no evidence at all against another person. But that is not this case. The master's statement is not an entirety, one and indivisible. Accepting that part of it which is not corrected by other evidence, I think it shows that he was to blame, and does not show that the Hatfield was to blame. I feel at liberty to form my own opinion on the whole of the evidence and the advice we receive, and to pick and choose what I believe to be true. I suspect that the Glasgow was going ahead, perhaps manœuvring to get near enough for a line to be thrown. It is sufficient to say that no fault on the part of the Hatfield has been proved to my satisfaction, and it is upon that ground that I found my opinion.

Lord DUNEDIN.—I agree with the motion made by the noble earl who has preceded me, and I concur with much of what he has said.

But, for myself, I feel constrained to go somewhat further, and to say that I have come to the conclusion that the true cause of the collision was that the Glasgow at the last moment went ahead and not astern.

The fault I have to find with the judgments under appeal is that, with all respect to the learned judges, none of them faces the question: What caused the accident? There was a collision of sufficient force to effect the sinking of the Hatfield in seven minutes after impact.

The question of how that came about is not handled at all by the Court of Appeal, except in an indirect manner in some remarks by Lord Sumner, as to which I shall afterwards say something; and in the court of first instance it is left thus by the learned trial judge: "There was sufficient momentum between the two vessels to cause this serious damage which caused the Hatfield to sink."

Now, "momentum" never did and never will cause a collision. I do not make this remark as a mere verbal criticism on the use of the word without something more.

What I do mean is that you must have motion in a certain direction on the part of one or both bodies in order to make those bodies collide, and before one can approach the question of blame I think it is necessary to make up one's mind on this topic.

Now, the Glasgow, it is admitted on all hands, was lying in the trough of the sea, with the wind on her starboard quarter, and drifting to leeward, and, upon the assumption that no use was made of her engines, was incapable of forward motion.

Therefore, upon this assumption, the impact must have been due to motion on the part of the Hatfield. Inasmuch, however, as the collision, when it took place, was one in which the ships were, according to the description, almost at right angles to each other, the motion must have been, if it existed, caused by a forward movement on the part of the Hatfield.

The idea, however, is to my mind completely negatived by the fact, admitted by all, that if the Hatfield at the moment of collision had had forward way on her the bow of the Glasgow would have been twisted at least to a slight extent to port, which was not the case. Indeed, the expert witnesses for the Glasgow admit that at the moment of collision the Hatfield could not have had any way on her.

The only other theory that remains is, then, that the Hatfield, by her motion, having got into immediate proximity, the actual collision was caused by the effect of a wave lifting up one vessel and, so to speak, dropping it on to the other. But if this had happened the markings on the stem of the Glasgow must have been more or less vertical, whereas in fact they were all horizontal. The matter, however, does not end there.

All the expert witnesses admit that if the penetration was severe it would speak to forward motion on the part of the Glasgow. Now, what was the penetration? It was at least sufficient to cut through the stringer plates, for without doing that you could not knock a hole in the vessel sufficient to make her founder in seven minutes. How much further did it go?

The mate of the Glasgow admitted in cross-examination that the gash extended "to pretty near the coamings of the hatchway," and the sole survivor of the Hatfield said distinctly that he tried to get past the hatchway on that side, and could not because of the knocked up splinters.

I confess I am utterly unable to appreciate the comment of the learned trial judge on the evidence of this witness. I can imagine a great discount would have to be put on computation as to feet.

But trying to get past a certain place and failing is a positive fact which does not rest on calculation, and, unless the witness is to be disbelieved, leaves no room for exaggeration one way or other. The calculation as to feet can be done afterwards on the plan.

What, however, is the view of the expert witnesses on the other side? They have to admit that an ugly hole was knocked in the Hatfield, or she would not have sunk. But they think that the penetration of the stem of the Glasgow cannot have been more than 2ft. Why? Because they found marks on the sides of the stem, and these marks do not extend more than 2ft. from the actual nose of the stem.

To my mind this is absolutely inconclusive, and for a very simple reason. Of course, if you force a V-shaped wedge slowly into a homogeneous substance it may very well be that the marks on the sides of the "V" will register for you the extreme point of penetration. That, however, will only be because in the case supposed there will be lateral pressure on the edges of the wedge.

But when you come to the case of a violent blow effected by the edge of a wedge-shaped object against a substance which is not homogeneous no such result necessarily follows. It becomes a question of chance, as to which no one can accurately predict how far the opposing substance is knocked clean away by the blow of the entering wedge.

This is especially the case when you are dealing with metal. No one can tell where exactly the stringers, which admittedly were burst, would break away. It is, therefore, in my judgment, quite inconclusive as to the amount of penetration finally achieved to find out how far on the side of the stem you find marks of friction.

On the whole matter I therefore come to the conclusion that this collision, with its effects, was impossible except in the view that the Glasgow had forward way. If that is so it settles the whole case, for I entirely concur with the reasoning of the noble earl as to the dearth of any evidence against the Hatfield.

I cannot help thinking that the opinion I have just expressed was really shared by my noble friend, Lord Sumner, and that he over-rated the weight to be put on Bargrave Deane, J.'s comment on the evidence of the survivor and the mate.

I am very far from wishing to depart from the salutary rule as to our not, in this House, interfering with concurrent findings on matters of fact. I cannot, however, look on this case as a true example of concurrent findings.

The learned trial judge and the Court of Appeal do not come to the same result, and their theory of what actually happened is not the same. And, further, neither the trial judge nor the Court of Appeal pronounce any finding on what I consider comes first of all, namely, What caused the collision?

To say that the Hatfield "came too near" is, in the circumstances, not enough. I therefore do not consider that in coming to the conclusion I have come to I in any way do violence to a rule which I should always wish to follow.

Lord ATKINSON.—I concur. This is a most painful and embarrassing case. Every soul on board the Hatfield who could have given evidence as to the movements of his vessel and the cause of the collision has perished. The witnesses for the Glasgow have a free field. They can, if their consciences permit, without fear of contradiction, suppress facts, invent facts, minimise or exaggerate occurrences. One has to decide, in reality, on the story of one side. The story of the other side never can be told, and this demands that the case of the living against the dead should be clearly and satisfactorily established.

The Glasgow called for help. She invited the Hatfield to come to her assistance, and in a high wind and heavy sea endeavour to perform the difficult and dangerous operation of taking her in tow. In such an operation, I think, a duty was cast upon the vessel so asking for assistance to be on the alert, to observe the movements of the vessel coming to salve her, to accommodate her own movements as far as safety would permit to those of the latter vessel, and to render aid, according to the rules of good seamanship, in assisting in the enterprise both desired to accomplish.

The only fault attributed to the Hatfield is that her captain miscalculated his distance and came too close to the ship he was trying to salve. It was not even suggested that any other of his manœuvres were negligent or improper or contrary to good seamanship. But even if it be taken, for the moment, that he did come too close, and was in that respect guilty of negligence, and therefore to blame, the Glasgow would also be to blame if, by the exercise of due care and skill on her part, she could have avoided the consequence of the Hatfield's negligence. It would have been her duty to reverse her engines in time so as to get stern-way on herself and get out of the way of the approaching ship so far as good seamanship in the circumstances would require. I do not think it is enough that the captain of the Glasgow should merely give the order to reverse at the moment he in fact came to the conclusion that the Hatfield was coming too close, if according to good seamanship he should, with his means of knowledge, have reached that conclusion earlier. If the Glasgow was moving ahead, then the reversing of her engines was in the result useless; no stern-way could be got upon her, and it is not even pretended by Captain Turnbull that any stern-way was acquired by her until the very moment of the collision. He said, I think that she (i.e., his ship) just got stern-way on at the moment the collision took place.

Now for the Glasgow, the reversing of her engines became the crucial movement. The first question is, Has it been satisfactorily proved that the engines were reversed at all, and (2) has it been satisfactorily proved that, even if reversed, they were reversed as soon as, according to the requirements of good seamanship, they should have been reversed?

I confess, Bargrave Deane, J.'s way of dealing with this matter somewhat puzzles me. He evidently kept in mind the circumstances that the scrap log in existence at the time of the collision had disappeared; that in only one of the four logs produced is any mention whatever made of this reversing of the engines, though the logs were all written up at leisure; that the only log in which it does appear is written up one week after the arrival of the crew at Dover, and after consultation with the captain; that the entry is merely "Engines working full speed astern at the time"—i.e., the time of collision; that there is any statement whatever as to how soon that operation commenced, and that even this entry is inserted after entries of events occurring some days later than the collision itself.

These, in my mind at all events, are rather damning facts. They throw, I think, grave suspicion on the Glasgow's case. Now, the learned judge deals with them thus. He comes to the conclusion—

(1) That the engines were in fact reversed.
(2) That they were not reversed in time.
(3) That the delay in reversing them was due to the absence of the engineer from the engine room.

This last finding was wholly wrong. Not only was there no evidence to support it, but it was in direct conflict with the only evidence given on the point. The engineer, according to the evidence, was sent down to the engine room by the captain, not one minute before the collision, but five minutes before the order to reverse was alleged to have been given.

And then the judge says: "I do not believe, in the absence of proper books made up at the proper time, that these engines were reversing a minute before the collision, or anything like it. If they had been reversing for a minute, then I cannot believe that the Glasgow, which is a speedy ship, and, according to her engineer, would probably go eight-knots at her full speed when reversing, could not, in a minute, have got away from the Hatfield. He was not reversing for a minute; there was no time to reverse a minute. The whole thing was done late."

He thus rejects the evidence of the captain and engineer, that the latter was ordered to go to the engine room, and went there five minutes before the order to reverse was given. He further rejects their evidence that the engines were reversed one minute before the collision, but he accepts the statement made by them that the engines were in fact reversed, which is the very fact upon which the state of the log books throws most suspicion.

The Court of Appeal, seeing that this third finding was in conflict with the only evidence given on the point, most properly put it aside, and Captain Turnbull having sworn that he gave the signal to reverse the engines as soon as he observed that the Hatfield was approaching too close, held that he was not guilty of any negligence.

It is clear, and is not, I think, seriously disputed, that if the Hatfield was at the time of the collision steaming across the bow of the Glasgow from starboard to port at any considerable rate of speed, the stem of the Glasgow must have been twisted or bent to port. It has not been bent to port. On the contrary, according to the evidence of the two experts, Messrs. Casebourn and Blackett, it has been bent slightly to starboard. The first of these witnesses said that the existence of this twist to starboard involves the theory that the Hatfield was very nearly motionless. If she had been going about four or five knots, the speed her captain fixes, the stem of the Glasgow would have been bent to port. Mr. Blackett agrees with him, and the theory of the collision which the former of these two gentlemen adopts is this, that there was a hatchet blow "from the Glasgow inflicted on the other vessel." If that means that the Glasgow from the crest of a wave fell down upon the Hatfield, cutting into her hull so deeply that she sank in a few minutes, then the unfortunate thing for this theory is that the Glasgow delivered this blow from above downwards without inflicting a single vertical scratch on her own hull. The marks she bore were horizontal. The same consideration would apply if the Hatfield from the crest of a wave had fallen upon the stem of the Glasgow.

It appears to me almost inconceivable that the collision could have occurred in either of these ways without leaving some vertical marks upon the stem and bow of the Glasgow. The fact that the marks are horizontal suggests, I think strongly, that the stem of the Glasgow did not come into collision with the hull of the Hatfield with an ascending or descending motion; but that the blow was, on the contrary, a direct and level blow. I cannot find that Bargrave Deane, J. ever alluded to this important point, or found as a fact, or even indicated what in his opinion, the speed of the Hatfield was as she approached the Glasgow. It is, I think, clear that the speed could not have been as high as that mentioned by her captain, four or five knots. From the evidence of the experts as to the bending the Glasgow's stem to starboard, it could hardly have been half so much.

The captain of the Glasgow must be held bound by the diagram he drew. He said that the Hatfield was distant from him two lengths of his own ship, i.e., 480ft. (160 yards), at right angles to her, when he concluded that the Hatfield was coming too close, and gave the order to reverse. Now a knot is about 2000 yards; 160 yards is something a little more than one-twelfth of this. If the Hatfield was going ahead at the rate of two knots, that would be one knot in thirty minutes, she would steam one-twelfth of a knot in two and a half minutes. If going at three knots it meant a knot in twenty minutes and one-twelfth of a knot in one and two-third minutes. But the captain said that though he kept his engines going astern after the impact, he only kept them going for a minute altogether from first to last. Again he said that he only felt the vibrations of the engine going astern for about half a minute.

The strange thing is, however, that he says that he thought the Hatfield was getting too close five minutes before he gave the order to reverse.

The learned judge put the question to him: 'About five minutes before that you saw the chief engineer on the bridge deck?" Answer "Yes." "And told him what?" Answer: "To be ready, as I thought the ship was getting rather close to us and I might require to go astern or go ahead, whichever I thought fit." He also says when the Hatfield got only 480ft. away he thought it was dangerous.

Captain Turnbull had, therefore, ample warning. He saw and appreciated the threatening danger, yet five precious minutes were by him allowed to elapse before he took action. If he had reversed when the Hatfield was 160 yards away he must, having regard to the rate of progress of the latter vessel, have got stern-way on his own ship in time and kept clear. Bargrave Deane, J. found as a fact that the Glasgow was late in reversing, but gave a bad reason for his conclusion. There are no concurrent findings of fact on this point, and therefore nothing to prevent your Lordships from coming to the conclusion that the Glasgow was too late in reversing, and was therefore to blame.

The remaining question is, was the Hatfield to blame? I confess I have the greatest difficulty in accepting the conclusion that the injuries the Hatfield received were brought about in the manner described by the expert witnesses or by Captain Turnbull. It may well be that Hagar was inaccurate as to the precise number of feet to which his ship was penetrated, but he was found to be an absolutely honest witness, intending to speak the truth. Why, then, should his evidence be rejected when he says he could not pass between the hole in the Hatfield's side and the hatch coamings, the jagged ends of the irons helping to prevent his doing so? He tried to pass in order to see the damage done to his ship, and he says he had to go up to the forecastle deck to discover if the water was coming into her hold—a vital matter for him. He states that his opinion was that the Glasgow must have been going ahead to be able to deliver the blow that she did.

The forming of that opinion tends, I think, to prove Hagar's sagacity rather than his unreliability, but he receives the strongest corroboration of his statement as to the depth of the penetration of his ship from the fact that at the very moment of, or very soon after the collision, the mate of the Glasgow told his captain that his ship had cut into the Hatfield to near the coamings of her hatch. There was little or no time for invention. It was said at once. He repeated it at the Board of Trade inquiry, and though on the trial he tried to wriggle out of this statement, he was ultimately forced to admit that what he had stated at the inquiry was correct.

No doubt that evidence was in conflict with the evidence of the two experts, who from the absence of all signs of injury on the bow of the Glasgow beyond 2ft. from her stem, concluded that she could have only penetrated 4ft. into the hull of the Hatfield.

Well, no doubt it would be somewhat strange that if she had penetrated deeper than 2ft. some more marks or injuries to her hull more aft of her stem than those found should not have been discovered, but not at all more strange than that she should have given or received a descending or ascending blow, and nothing but horizontal marks or scorings been found upon her hull. Nor, indeed, more strange, it would appear to me, than that she should have penetrated even to the depth of 2ft., and, considering what she must have gone through, not been more damaged than she was. For it was, as I take it, proved by Mr. Steel that the stem of the Glasgow must have cut through three stringer plates and for some distance through part of an iron deck, making a V-shaped hole in the side of the Hatfield through which the water rushed in and sank her.

It is not disputed that the stem of the Glasgow made this hole. The mate saw it. The blow must, therefore, have been delivered with considerable force, and must, I should think, have been a level and direct blow. An effort was made at the trial to show that it was not delivered at right angles, but that is contrary to the case made at the earlier stages of the proceedings.

I think that the evidence as to the nature of the Hatfield injuries is not inconsistent with Hagar's opinion that the Glasgow had headway on her when the collision occurred. It is scarcely possible, one would think, that all this injury could have been inflicted if the Glasgow was at the time of the collision a receding vessel. Such is the extremely unsatisfactory position in which the case is left.

It could not, I think, be successfully contended that the case of the Hatfield came within the principle laid down in Skinner v. London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway (5 Ex. 787), and Great Western Railway Company of Canada v. Fawcett (8 L. T. Rep. 31; 1 Moore P.C. N. S. 101) and such like cases, to the effect that the happening of the accident is primâ facie proof of negligence on the part of the persons having control over the thing which caused the accident.

Bargrave Deane, J., though he apparently disbelieved much that Captain Turnbull and his engineer deposed to on other points, believed them when they said they never went ahead, and endeavoured to reconcile this conclusion with the extent of the Hatfield's injury by saying first that the amount of penetration of the Glasgow stem into the Hatfield was not so great as is alleged, and then by saying that "we all know in these collision cases that the damage is most difficult to reconcile with the history of the case."

Well, certainly this is a case to which this last remark is singularly applicable; but he never dealt with the question of the horizontal marks upon the bows of the Glasgow—no more than he dealt with the speed of the Hatfield.

I have no hesitation in saying that in my view the evidence does not, in the peculiar circumstances of this case, establish satisfactorily that the Hatfield was guilty of any negligence causing this collision.

The question is, am I precluded from giving effect to that opinion by the rule as to concurrent findings of fact laid down by Lords Herschell and Watson in the case of Owners of the P. Caland v. Glamorgan Steamship Company (sup.) Lord Watson said he concurred that the findings of fact in the courts below should not be disturbed in this House unless their Lordships should arrive at a tolerably clear conclusion that the findings are erroneous, and added "and the principle is specially applicable to a case in which the conclusion sought to be set aside rests upon considerations of probability."

The question of fact there alluded to was this: whether the red side-light of the ship Caland was invisible to the crew on board the Glamorgan—the ship which collided with her—or whether it was visible but was either unseen by the latter's crew, or seen and disregarded. Both the courts held that on a balance of probability the light was not visible.

There was in that case, as in the case of Gray v. Turnbull (L. Rep. 1870 2 H. L. Sc., 53), abundant evidence on each side. Here there was no conflict of evidence. There could not be. But once Bargrave Deane, J. believed the captain and engineer on this one point, that their ship did not go ahead, the only point on which apparently he did believe them, he concluded that the Hatfield came too close and was to blame.

The Court of Appeal did not feel itself at liberty, notwithstanding the circumstantial evidence, to disagree with the opinion of the judge in the court below as to the credibility of these witnesses, and accordingly accepted his decision as to the culpability of the Hatfield. I think, however, that these two decisions fall far short of such concurrent findings of fact as Lords Herschell and Watson were dealing with in the case above cited.

In my opinion, therefore, your Lordships are not debarred by the rule there laid down from holding that, considering all the evidence, direct and circumstantial, in this case, it has not been satisfactorily established that the Hatfield was to blame. I am therefore of opinion that the appeal of the Hatfield should be allowed, and the Glasgow should be held alone to blame.

I do not think that the case of The Ngapoota (1897) A. C. 391; 66 L. J., P. C. 88) applies to this case, as the captain of the Glasgow, five minutes before he says he ordered the engines to be reversed, thought that the Hatfield was too close.

Lord PARMOOR.—The ship Hatfield, belonging to the appellants, collided with the ship Glasgow in the North Sea on the 1st Oct. 1911. At the time of the collision the Glasgow was disabled by reason of an accident to the steering gear, and the Hatfield had come up in response to signals of distress to endeavour to take the Glasgow in tow for the purpose of salving her. It was during the attempt to carry out this manœuvre that the collision occurred, and the Hatfield sank with the loss of all her crew save one. The only member of the crew saved was called, but the learned judge found that, though this witness was absolutely honest himself, he did not feel inclined to accept his evidence as absolutely trustworthy, having regard to the terrible state of circumstances at the time of the accident. The learned judge found that both vessels were to blame, the Hatfield owing to want of skilful navigation, and the Glasgow owing to the fact that she did not reverse her engines in time before the collision. The Court of Appeal have found the Hatfield alone to blame, and it is against this decision that the appeal is brought.

The main case put forward by the appellants was that, immediately before the collision, the engines of the Glasgow were put ahead and should have been put astern, and that in consequence of this she rammed and sank the Hatfield. The nature and extent of the injury to the Hatfield are not inconsistent with this explanation of the collision, and the marks on the stem of the Glasgow are in a horizontal direction, such as would naturally be found on a ramming ship. Owing to the loss of life it was not possible for the appellants to call direct evidence. They mainly relied on the evidence of experts to prove that the nature of the injuries to the Hatfield was such that they could not have been inflicted unless the Glasgow was steaming ahead at the time.

The learned judge held that the amount of the penetration by the Glasgow's stem in the Hatfield's side was not so deep as alleged, and did not sustain the case of the appellants that the Glasgow must have been steaming ahead at the time of the collision. He found that the engines had not been put ahead immediately prior to the collision. In this finding the Court of Appeal concurred.

Although the evidence on this point appears to me to be of an unsatisfactory and inconclusive character, I am not prepared to differ from the finding of the learned trial judge, indorsed in the decision of the Court of Appeal. The learned trial judge further found that the Glasgow did not reverse her engines in time, and that the whole thing was done too late. He says: "I do not believe, in the absence of proper books made up at the proper time, that these engines were reversing a minute before this collision, or anything like it." I can see no reason for differing from the learned judge's finding under this head, although there is considerable difficulty in dealing with a case in which direct evidence is only available on one side.

An agreed diagram to which I attach great importance shows the direction of the wind and "the position of the vessels when Glasgow's engines were ordered full speed astern, as stated by Captain Turnbull, a witness for the defendant." In this diagram the distance shown between the two vessels is approximately 480ft. Captain Turnbull in his evidence estimates that the Hatfield was steaming ahead at about four or five knots. If this had been accurate the collision would have taken place in about a minute from the time that the Glasgow's engines were said to be ordered "full speed astern." Having regard to the state of the stem of the Glasgow after the collision, I think it is impossible that the Hatfield could have been steaming at this rate, and that her speed was probably not more than two knots. Assuming that the speed of the Hatfield did not exceed two knots, the captain of the Glasgow appreciated the danger and ordered "full speed astern," according to the witness of the diagram, two minutes at least before the collision. If the order was so given and had been promptly carried out there was sufficient interval for the stern-way to be got on the Glasgow before the collision took place, and the accident would have been avoided.

Without attempting to determine the exact cause of the delay, I should draw the same conclusion as the learned trial judge, that, having regard to the time at which the captain of the Glasgow appreciated the risk of a collision, the engines were not reversed in time, and the whole thing was done too late.

I agree with the opinion expressed by Lord Parker, that it is not fair to be too meticulous on the question of time, but it is proved that had the engines been reversed not less than one minute before the collision, an appreciable way astern would have been got on the vessel, sufficient to avoid the collision.

The learned trial judge, in forming his opinion of the time at which the engines of the Glasgow were reversed, comments on the absence of proper books made at the proper time. There is no satisfactory explanation given by the respondents. The statement of the captain of the Glasgow that the scrap log, being reduced to a pulp, was thrown away from the bridge deck, is open to serious adverse comment. Whatever its condition, every document, in a case in which one ship has foundered and the crew is lost, should be carefully safeguarded as a precaution in the interest of truth and good faith. The logs produced, other than the engineer's entry from his scrap log, were written upon the 1st Oct., and contain no reference to a reversing of the engines of the Glasgow. This same criticism applies to the letter of the 2nd Oct., written from Messrs. Hammond to the owners of the Glasgow, and forwarded on information obtained from Captain Turnbull. This letter makes no reference to a reversing of the engines. The entry from the engineer's scrap log contains the entry, "engine full speed astern at the time," but it was not made untill the 9th Oct. and gives no assistance in solving the difficulties which surround the case. I am therefore of opinion that the learned judge was justified in finding that the Glasgow did not reverse her engines in time, and holding that in this respect she was to blame.

On the question whether the Hatfield was solely to blame, I concur with the judgment of my noble friend on the Woolsack, and I do not desire to add anything further.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Dec. 15, 16, and 18, 1914.

(Before Lord COZENS-HARDY, M.R., KENNEDY and SWINFEN EADY, L.JJ.)

ASSOCIATED PORTLAND CEMENT MANUFACTURERS (1900) LIMITED v. ASHTON. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party—"Thirds" or sharing system — Owner and master—Loss of cargo through unseaworthiness of vessel—Liability of owner —Position of master.

A ketch was owned by two co-owners, and worked on the basis that the master took two-thirds of the gross freights, out of which he paid the mate and the crew, the provisions, and expenses of the voyage. The owners took one-third of the gross freights, subject to deductions for port dues. The owners provided for the upkeep and insurance of the vessel. The ketch loaded a cargo under a charter-party made by the master, which cargo was lost, as was alleged by the owners thereof, through the unseaworthiness of the vessel. An action was accordingly brought by the owners of the cargo against one of the co-owners of the ketch.

It was decided by Pickford, J. (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 501; 110 L. T. Rep. 776) that the allegation of the plaintiffs that the ketch was unseaworthy at the time when she sailed was well-founded; and that the condition of the ketch was not due to the loading berth at which she was moored being defective or dangerous. But Pickford, J. decided that the contract of charter-party was made by the master personally; and that the defendant was therefore not liable.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Held, that the findings of Pickford, J. in favour of the plaintiffs on the issues of unseaworthiness and condition of the vessel were abundantly supported by the evidence, and could not therefore be disturbed by the Court of Appeal.

But held, that there was a contract of charter-party between the plaintiffs and the defendant, although there was no reference therein nor in the bill of lading to the "owner" of the vessel; that the master was not bailee of the vessel, but was the agent or servant of the owner; and that the real control of the vessel rested with the defendant, and not with the master.

Compston, K.C. replied on this question.

Dec. 18, 1914.—The following written judgments were delivered:—

Lord Cozens-Hardy, M.R.—This action is brought to recover the amount of the loss of a cargo of cement shipped at a wharf belonging to the plaintiffs to Fowey in a ketch called the Myrtle. The Myrtle sank in calm weather in the Channel. The plaintiffs alleged and the defendant denied that she was unseaworthy when she sailed, and that the loss was due to that. This issue has been found by Pickford, J. in favour of the plaintiffs. It was alleged by the defendant, and denied by the plaintiffs, that the condition of the ketch was due to the berth being defective or dangerous. This issue has also been found by Pickford, J. in favour of the plaintiffs. We have already held that these findings by Pickford, J. are abundantly supported by the evidence, and cannot be disturbed by us.

There was a third issue: The plaintiffs alleged and the defendant denied that there was a contract between the plaintiffs and the defendant. And this issue was found by the learned judge in favour of the defendant, and judgment was entered for the defendant. From this judgment the plaintiffs appeal.

It is admitted that the defendant was the owner of the Myrtle, though at some date, not clearly ascertained, Smith became co-owner. For simplicity I shall treat Ashton as sole owner. It is also admitted that Cole was the master. It is not disputed that the Myrtle was being worked on "the thirds system" and that the master took two-thirds of the gross freights, and thereout paid the mate and the crew and the cost of the provisions and expenses of the voyage. On the other hand, the master handed over to the owner one-third of the gross freights less port dues, the owner providing the ship and paying for her upkeep.

In this state of things, two documents were executed by Cole: (1) A charter-party, dated the 11th June 1913, by which Cole, described only as "of the good ship or vessel called the Myrtle," chartered the Myrtle to the plaintiffs to convey cement from the charterers' wharf to Fowey at certain rates of freight. It is not necessary to refer in detail to the terms of the charter-party. (2) A bill of lading dated the 17th June 1913 in which Cole is described as "master of the said ship." The conditions of the charter-party are incorporated.

In neither document is there any reference to the owner. The defendant contends that the only contract was with Cole, and that there is nothing to show that he was agent for, or servant of, an undisclosed principal. I am unable to accept this view. The observations of Lindley, L.J. in Manchester Trust Limited v. Furness, Withy, and Co. Limited (ubi sup.) are important on this point. [His Lordship read them, and continued:] I think all the facts of the case must be looked at to ascertain whether Cole was really a bailee of the Myrtle or was the agent or servant of the owner. In truth this is a question of fact rather than of law. Unfortunately there is nothing in writing to define the relations between the owner and Cole. The owner did not give evidence, either in court or by commission. We are left to spell out the truth as best we can from admitted facts.

Cole says he usually arranged the freight, as he did in this instance. He speaks of his "wages"—a word to which I do not wish to attribute undue importance, but which certainly is not what a bailee or hirer would be likely to use. He admits that he was appointed by the owner and could be removed at the end of the voyage, though not—except, I presume, on the ground of misconduct—during the course of the voyage.

Pickford, J., contrary, I think, to his real opinion, thought he was bound by Bernard v. Aaron (9 Jur. N. S. 470), decided in 1863, which, as he said, could scarcely be distinguished from the subsequent case of Steel v. Lester (37 L. T. Rep. 642; 3 C. P. Div. 121) decided in 1877. A careful examination of Bernard v. Aaron (ubi sup.) satisfies me that that case does not really assist us. In the first place, the sole question was whether Sharpley, one of two co-owners, who had not appointed the master, was liable for the acts and defaults of the master appointed by Aaron, the other co-owner. It was held that Aaron had hired Sharpley's share. In the second place, it was an action of tort, and this is an action ex contractu. It is worth mentioning that Bernard v. Aaron (ubi sup.) appears never before to have been cited, and certainly it has not been treated as an authority laying down any principle.

On the other hand, Steel v. Lester (ubi sup.) is a direct authority in point. It has been recognised by the text writers: (see Carver's Law of Carriage by Sea, 5th edit., sect. 49). The vessel there was worked on "the thirds system." The facts are in all material points identical with those of the present case, except that the owner took one-third of the net profits, whereas in the present case the defendant Ashton took one-third of the gross profits. That distinction might be of importance if it were necessary for the plaintiffs to establish a partnership between the defendant and Cole, but not otherwise. As was pointed out by Lindley, J., the arrangement did not amount to a demise or anything of the kind. His Lordship said (at pp. 127, 128 of 3 C. P. Div.): "The facts are that for about three months after the defendant had bought this ship, he traded with it on his own account, employing Lilee as skipper at standing wages, before the passing of the Merchant Shipping Act 1873. That arrangement was altered, and the question is the true effect of the alteration. I will first consider what it was. It was this, that instead of Lilee being employed at standing wages, the defendant Lester, still remaining owner, allowed Lilee, who was master, to take management of the ship on the terms that Lilee should pay Lester one-third of the profits. What is the true substance and result of that arrangement? We are asked to say that it amounted and was equivalent to a demise of the ship by the owner to the master, throwing the whole responsibility of the management on the master and taking it off the shoulders of the owner. I do not think such an arrangement amounted to a demise or anything of the kind. I look on it either as a mere mode of paying Lilee for his services—the owner paying him a share of profits instead of fixed wages, and retaining control over the master, but leaving the master to choose his ports and men; or it was this, viz., that the defendant Lester, still remaining owner, became partner with the master for the adventure, sharing the profits with him. I rather think that the latter is the true view. But in either view the result is that the sloop was managed by Lilee for the joint benefit of himself and the owner. That is a consequence from which there is no escape. The true conclusion on the facts is that Lilee was either the partner or agent of the owner, and if partner he was still agent of the owner for the managment of the vessel. I do not think the agreement between them amounted to a demise of the ship, so as to render the master solely responsible." The real control rested with the defendant, not with the master, and that is perhaps the critical test.

The respondent's counsel referred to the decision of this court in Boon v. Quance (102 L. T. Rep. 443) as laying down that there can be no contract of service between the owner and the master of a vessel worked on "the thirds system," and that the relationship must be that of bailment. But in Jones v. Owners of Ship Alice and Eliza (3 B. W. C. C. 495) it was clearly explained that such was not the effect of the decision in Boon v. Quance (ubi sup.). It is a question of fact to be decided upon the evidence in each case: (see also Smith v. Horlock, 109 L. T. Rep. 196).

Moreover the question under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1906 is whether the relationship of master and servant exists, and an answer to that question in the negative would be in no way decisive upon the question whether the owner of a vessel is answerable for the contracts made by the master. As was pointed out in Steel v. Lester (ubi sup.), the question is whether the master was agent of the owner for the management of the vessel. Cases under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1906 are of little assistance.

The result is that in my opinion the appeal must be allowed and judgment entered for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed.

KENNEDY, L.J.—In this case the court has decided to affirm the judgment of Pickford, J. in so far as he held that the defendant's vessel the Myrtle was unseaworthy for the voyage in question. It has also decided that that unseaworthiness was not due to any fault of the plaintiffs in regard to the condition of the berth in which the Myrtle lay at the time she took the cargo on board; and the unseaworthiness unquestionably caused the loss of the plaintiffs' cargo on board the Myrtle.

The only question left for our judgment is whether, in relation to the charter-party, the bill of lading, and carriage of the goods, Cole, the master of the Myrtle, was or was not the servant or agent of the defendant, who was the managing owner of the vessel, the alternative being that the master was the hirer of the vessel from the defendant, and, therefore, to be regarded as an independent contractor solely liable for the unseaworthiness.

The question really which I have so stated may be stated in the terms in which, in the case of Baumwoll Manufactur von Carl Scheibler v. Furness (ubi sup.), Lord Herschell put the question in that case, in which the facts were not an alleged demise to a master, but an alleged demise to a charterer. Using the language as it would be applied to the present case and quoting Lord Herschell, the question is whether there was a demise of this ship, or if not, strictly speaking, a demise, was there an agreement which put the vessel altogether out of the power and control of the then owner, and vested that power and control in the master, so that during the time that the hiring lasted she must be regarded as the vessel of the master and not as the vessel of the owner.

Now, in the present case there is not, as there was in the case from which I have quoted the language of Lord Herschell, a written agreement defining the terms on which the relation between the master and the defendant commenced or continued to exist. There is language used in the evidence, as appearing in the shorthand notes, which leads one to the impression that there probably was a letter, or may have been two letters which related to the arrangement—I shall use a neutral word—between the master and the defendant. But no document has been produced, and we have come to a conclusion upon that which is truly an inference from facts, upon evidence not altogether satisfactory and possibly incomplete, which depends upon the statements of the master himself and also of a person named Smith, who was a co-owner with the defendant, the managing owner, and who was called to give evidence for the defendant. The owner of the ship, the defendant himself, was not called, and the statement in the evidence, which I see no reason at all to disbelieve—I do not think it would be right to do so—is that his absence was due to illness. But whatever the cause, we have to spell out the relations of the parties for oral evidence, and the inferences to be drawn from certain documents, the bill of lading and the charter-party, which are before us.

According to the evidence of Smith, when asked how the vessel was managed, he said that Ashton might have written to Cole saying he wanted Cole to work the vessel. It is, of course, always unwise and very often unjust to press particular words or expressions of a witness who is not a specially skilled witness, upon some matter upon which he may be presumed to have accurate knowledge. But I think the fact that the defendant applied, so to speak, to Cole to work the ship is to some slight extent, at any rate, rather calculated to give the impression that he was applying for a servant or agent rather than the impression of engaging a person who was brought into business relations to contract for the use of the vessel as a hirer.

Again, although in regard to these small vessels it may be—I do not know how it is in the present case—that the parties are not in a high sense business persons, if there was no written agreement considering the change which a hiring of the vessel introduces in the relations of the parties who seek as shippers of goods to do business with the ship, I think it is to some extent more probable that the terms, which nobody sought to reduce accurately into writing, were terms such as not infrequently exist with regard to some vessels in an oral employment of a captain to work them. And more, it appears that this master was on more than one occasion wanted by the defendant to work this ship; and the second engagement it is stated was exactly in the same terms as the first.

What were those terms? The terms were that the master was to take two-thirds of the gross earnings and the owners to receive one-third of the gross profits after certain deductions. Those deductions appear upon the evidence of the master and of Smith to have been of three kinds: Harbour dues, towage dues, and brokerage. As an amount, I daresay those deductions would not often be considerable; they might be very small. But, at any rate, it is a case in which deductions were made by the master from the gross takings before any portion of those takings was payable by him or payable by those over whom he had control to the owners at all. Well, though to some extent the comment is applicable to all, I do think that the deduction of brokerage has some significance, because, assuming it was simply a demise of the ship to the master, it would not seem to be in the ordinary course, at any rate, that the master, who had the responsibility of working the ship, should be relieved of the cost of entering into the mercantile engagements of the vessel, but the defendant for himself and his co-owner was willing that that element should be deducted before he took any profit.

In other words, to some extent I think it points to the engagement of the vessel being made on account of the managing owner and his co-owner, the owner also paying the upkeep and insurance. I think no stress can be laid upon that. If you once have got the fact of a letting or demise, even in the case of house property, of course you may make any special reservations that you like with regard to the upkeep of the structure, and naturally enough the owner would wish to insure the vessel for his own interest; and therefore upon that no inference, I think, can be drawn at all hostile to the inference which the defendant in this case asks us to draw. It also appears from the master's own words in evidence: "I paid the crew their wages, paid my own wages, and kept the crew in food."

Again, I do not lay special stress upon the words "I paid my own wages"; but pro tanto to some extent it is not the phrase that I think even a comparatively illiterate man would have chosen of whom it could be truly said that he had bargained either orally or in writing for a hiring—I will not use the technical word "demise"—by himself for his own benefit, subject to a certain payment of the ship the Myrtle in this case. It is true that he entered into the charter-parties in his own name, and entered into this charter-party in his own name. I will assume, though it would have been more satisfactory to have had definite written evidence, that that is true. I assume it is perfectly true. But he also adds that he usually exercised his own discretion as to what cargo he should take. We have narrowly to scrutinise the somewhat ragged evidence which is given by word of mouth in this case.

One cannot help saying that the word "usually" leads without unfairness to the implication that there were some cases in which to the best of his belief he had consulted the owner with regard to what cargoes he should take. Lastly, with regard to the terms as proved, he could, he says, be dismissed; but only on the termination of the voyage. There is nothing in that to my mind inconsistent with either view. If it had to be considered, I entirely agree with the other members of this court that that does not negative the right of the owner, if he found that there was dishonesty or misuse of the vessel going on, to have summarily dismissed him. What I think is the fair meaning is: "Assuming I have performed my part of my duty properly, whatever that may be, there would be no right to dismiss me until the voyage had ended." Naturally in any view that would be so, because his own remuneration, again to keep to a neutral term, was dependent upon the completion of the voyage, upon which alone, except in the possible case of the payment of advanced freight, would be dependent the right to the possibility of receiving any payment at all for his work.

Turning to the charter-party and the bill of lading in the particular case, it is quite true that Cole is not described as master in the charter-party. The words are "Cole, the ship or vessel Myrtle," which are uncoloured one way or the other. He does not profess to sign as master, nor is there even the expression "for the owner." All that has to be considered in favour of the defendant's contention so far as it goes; but speaking for myself, from such experience as one has gained in the courts, I do not think either the presence or the absence of the words "for the owners" helps us much. It is an indefinite term which leaves it still open to proof who the owners were, whatever words have been used. It is also in my experience, and impressed upon my mind, that it is not uncommon for the person who signs the charter-party, whether as agent or master, to leave the name of those for whom he signs blank. In the bill of lading he certainly executes the document in a form which shows that he was signing as master of the ship. I need not, I think, refer to the document itself, but the last clause is: "Particulars of which"—that is the bills of lading—"affirmed by the master," and so on; and then there is the signature.

What is really and truly the inference to be inferred from these facts as they stand? I think perhaps I should have added to the last remark that which is pointed out by Lindley, L.J. in the case of Manchester Trust Limited v. Furness, Withy, and Co. Limited (8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 57; 73 L. T. Rep. 110; (1895) 2 Q. B. 539, at p. 543) with regard to bills of lading: "The plaintiffs, who are holders of the bills of lading, rely upon the general rule of law that primâ facie at all events a bill of lading signed by the master is signed by the master as the servant or agent of the shipowner." Now, in considering that inference I desire to say a word or two, because it was submitted to us more than once very properly by the learned counsel who argued for the defendant, that no stress must be laid upon the fact that the defendant from the very beginning apparently remained the managing owner of this vessel upon the register. It is quite true, if there is no doubt at all as to there being upon the face of the contract a hiring or letting which, if not expressly so stated in terms is clearly to be inferred the fact that the person who is the person who let out the ship or demised it was the managing owner upon the register, is not a fact of importance.

That was pointed out by Bowen, J., as he then was, in the well-known case of Frazer v. Cuthbertson (6 Q. B. Div. 93), and was pointed also, as counsel was good enough to show us, by Lord Herschell in Baumwoll Manufactur von Carl Scheibler v. Furness (ubi sup.). Still, where you have to spell out the legal nature of the arrangement between the owner and somebody who it is suggested is a hirer of the vessel from the facts, the fact that the person who says he is not liable is the managing owner upon the register is a matter which may legitimately at any rate be borne in mind. Bowen, J., in the case to which I have just referred of Frazer v. Cuthbertson (ubi sup.), in the course of his judgment said: "The registered owner, until the contrary is shown, may be presumed to be the employer of those who have the custody of her"—that is the ship—"and were engaged in her navigation."

We have to see whether, taking that fact into consideration, we ought to be satisfied here that the owner, the defendant, did in fact enter into such a contract of hire or demise as the defendant asserts, the question being, I think, stated with great authority and very clearly by Lord Herschell in the case I have more than once referred to of Baumwoll Manufactur von Carl Scheibler v. Furness (ubi sup.). At p. 18 of (1893) A. C. he refers to the case of Frazer v. Marsh (13 East, 238) dealt with by Lord Ellenborough as far back as the year 1811. He says, and says with approval, that Lord Ellenborough rested his judgment upon the fact that the registered owner has divested himself of all control and possession of the vessel in favour of another, and that that person has all the use and benefit of it; "he puts the question to be determined thus, whether the captain in this instance, who ordered the stores was or was not the servant of the defendant who was sued as the owner. He makes that the test of liability, and he says that if he has so divested himself of the vessel and of its use and benefit as that it is in the possession of another, whose servant the master is, then the owner ceases to be liable in respect of stores ordered by the master."

Having considered as far as I can with the utmost care the facts of the present case, and the legitimate inferences in my opinion to be deduced from them, it is not the case in the present instance that the owner has divested himself of the control and management of this ship, and the interest in this ship, so as to enable him to resist the plaintiffs' claim in this action. In my opinion the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed, because in the contract and in the carriage of the goods the master of this ship ought to be regarded as being the agent or servant of the owner. If you turn from facts to authority, I think that the judgment of Lindley, J., as he then was, in Steel v. Lester (37 L. T. Rep. 642; 3 C. P. Div. 121) is a very important guide. As far as I can see, the only difference, if there be any difference in the two cases, that ought to be deemed material, or that could be put arguendo I should say as material, is the difference which counsel insisted upon between the owner taking a third of gross profits subject to deductions, and the owner taking a share of net profits, as was the case in Steel v. Lester (ubi sup.); but it seems to me that there is really no substantial difference to be drawn on that ground.

I do not say that the sharing of net profits does not make, upon the circumstances of remuneration, an additional argument for a view against the owner's freedom from liability. But it seems to be in no case conclusive where really in a sense there is a deduction, which may be at any rate substantial, from the gross profits in the form of harbour dues and towage—those are both matters relating to the working of the ship—and the brokerage, which, it seems to me, for the reasons I have given, is even more significant than the others, as the taking by the owner of a share of the burden and of the wisdom or unwisdom of the contracts of employers of the vessel into which the master may enter.

In Steel v. Lester (ubi sup.) the particular passage to which I should refer is the one that begins at the bottom of p. 127 and goes on to p. 128 of 3 C. P. Div. The learned judge first considers what the arrangement was: "It was this, that instead of Lilee being employed at standing wages, the defendant Lester, still remaining owner, allowed Lilee, who was master, to take management of the ship on the terms that Lilee should pay Lester one-third of the profits. What is the true substance and result of that arrangement? We are asked to say that it amounted and was equivalent to a demise of the ship by the owner to the master, throwing the whole responsibility of the management on the master and taking it off the shoulders of the owner. I do not think the arrangement amounted to a demise or anything of the kind. I look on it either as a mere mode of paying Lilee for his services—the owner paying him a share of profits instead of fixed wages, and retaining control over the master, but leaving the master to choose his ports and men; or it was this—viz., that the defendant Lester, still remaining owner, became partner with the master for the adventure, sharing the profits with him. I rather think that the latter is the true view. But in either view the result is that the sloop was managed by Lilee for the joint benefit of himself and the owner. That is a consequence from which there is no escape."

It is quite true that both Grove, J. and Lindley, J. speak, as confirmatory of their view of the effect of the contract on certain facts, of the existence of the owner on the register as managing owner. Also at the close of Lindley, J.'s judgment there is a reference to the fact that the master entered into the charter-party there for the owner. But they treated those matters as strong evidence at the most by way of confirmation of a legal view which they base upon the terms of the contract itself. There is a reference there to the fact that the master, as appears from the evidence in the present case, chose his own ports, so far as he was free to do so. He naturally did so incidentally through the charter-parties or other engagements for the carriage of goods into which he entered, and also chose his own crew. I suppose in almost all cases the master is the man who chooses and employs his own crew.

As I have said, so far as the ports are concerned, they would depend generally, or to a very large extent, upon the terms of the contract into which he enters for the carriage of goods from one particular port to another particular port. I did not mention that in the course of my statement of the relations of the parties in the present case, because it seems to me that throws no light on the case in favour of the defendant, because it would be part of the bargain if he is to be regarded as the person who enters into the engagements that ports will follow. And with regard to the choice of men and the payment of men, that is the ordinary duty of the captain. But the ultimate payment rests upon the master, according to the arrangement of which I have already spoken.

My brother Pickford felt himself bound by the case of Bernard v. Aaron (9 Jur. N. S. 470). I say felt himself bound, because I entirely agree with what my Lord has said that, reading his judgment, I am certainly of opinion that he was not satisfied, but for that authority, that he was deciding rightly. He expresses himself in these terms after referring to that case: "I do not express any opinion as to whether the principle of Bernard v. Aaron (ubi sup.) is right or is reconcilable with the other authorities that have been cited. I think it is an authority so much on all fours with the present case that I am bound to act upon it. It is not mentioned at all by Scrutton, J. in his book, and it is only mentioned very casually in Mr. Carver's book, and mentioned in a way that leads me to think that Mr. Carver thought that it was in conflict with the current authorities. But I find it so on all fours with this case that I do not feel myself justified in considering what I should decide apart from it, and upon that ground I think the defendant is entitled to judgment."

I am quoting from a printed report; and it may be different in the shorthand note, as the Master of the Rolls has been kind enough to point out to me. I do not know whether this report was submitted to the learned judge or not. Pickford, J. went on to say: "It would be very satisfactory, I think, if the matter is cleared up by some court which can disregard Bernard v. Aaron (ubi sup.) if it thinks fit. I do not say it ought to do so. I do not think that I am at liberty to do so."

That brings me to Bernard v. Aaron (ubi sup.). I have taken that case, as it is reported in the Jurist Reports, but we are told there is another report, in the Law Journal. To begin with, the question raised in that case was not a question between master and owner. It was a question between two co-owners. As to one of those co-owners, there was no doubt that he had taken upon himself the whole management and control of the ship. The court in substance held that there was a demise, a hiring, by that co-owner, who took the management from his co-owner of the vessel. They drew that inference from the facts of the case. But there was not present, of course, in that case what there is here—the fact that, in entering into shipping contracts for the carriage, there was that which Bowen, J. (as he then was) referred to in Frazer v. Cuthbertson (ubi sup.) as an acting by persons, in the absence of proof to the contrary, who might be presumed to be acting for the owner of the ship. Co-owners are not partners. There must be, as it has been judicially pointed out, an assent by one of several owners in order to make him liable for the acts of a man who may be apparently the registered owner or otherwise working the vessel. In such circumstances there must be an assent; that is elucidated in Frazer v. Cuthbertson (ubi sup.).

With regard to a master there is primâ facie, at any rate, the presumption that he is acting, not for himself, but as employed by those who are in fact the owners of the ship. In the next place, the facts in Bernard v. Aaron (ubi sup.) are meagrely stated. But, so far as reported, it is stated that the vessel was worked by Aaron on a principle, well known amongst shipowners, of thirds, under which Aaron took two-thirds of the total gross earnings of the ship and Sharpley one-third, Aaron taking upon himself, as between himself and Sharpley, all the liabilities and expenses of the ship. There were no deductions, so far as appears from the report. Personally, I do not think, if you barely stated that the master was paid by receiving two-thirds of the gross earnings, it would be sufficient to destroy the liability of the owner who paid him on that principle. But, be that as it may, the court decided upon the particular facts proved in that case. There had been a verdict by the jury at the trial. There was no dispute, said Williams, J.—and, if I may say so with the utmost respect, I agree with him—about what the law of the case was. The only doubt raised was what was the true result of the facts laid before the jury.

Willes, J. said he was of the same opinion. Byles, J. said also, "I am of the same opinion, but not without some degree of doubt." And he specially lays stress, in coming to a conclusion apparently, on the whole, in agreement with the other learned judges, on the fact that this was an action ex delicto, not an action ex contractu.

It was a case very different from the present on the facts, because the thing complained of had nothing to do with the contract. It did not arise out of any arrangements made by the master for the working of the ship, or the conduct of the carriage of the goods under that arrangement. It was a case in which some of the crew had negligently dropped a piece of timber on the plaintiff's horses and injured them. The question was, Was the man, who was one of two co-owners, as well as his co-owner liable for that act of negligence, because the members of the crew who dropped the timber ought to be considered to be his servants? I for myself do not feel called upon to say whether Bernard v. Aaron (ubi sup.) was rightly decided or not, and I do not think I should have any business to do so, without knowing more of the facts which were no doubt before the court and before the jury, but which are reported only in the very brief form in which I have restated them from the report in the Jurist newspaper. But it is, as my Lord has pointed out, remarkable that so far as the learned counsel were able to tell us, and so far as one's own investigation into this case or previous knowledge can justify the conclusion that that case has never been cited as an authority.

I think the explanation is that it is felt to be a case which, like the present, depends upon its own facts and upon the inferences to be drawn, as they were drawn no doubt, from a number of circumstances. I do not know myself, for example, the important question, so far as the report goes, as to whether the contract between Aaron and Sharpley was a written contract or not. If the terms of that written contract negative as well they might do, because things are apt to become more definite when they are reduced to writing between business men, a relation which the learned judges found to exist of actual hiring, the case would no doubt be perfectly right. I do not think in the present case that we are in any way bound by anything that appears in Bernard v. Aaron (ubi sup.).

There was one other case referred to, which is the case of Boon v. Quance (ubi sup.). My Lord (the Master of the Rolls) gave judgment in that case, with which judgment Fletcher Moulton, L.J., as he then was, and Farwell, L.J. agreed. My Lord pointed out very clearly in the judgment upon what grounds it proceeded. He said: "The absence of evidence to justify that which was vital—namely, the proposition that the deceased man was a servant of Mrs. Quance." The deceased man in that case was the master of the ship himself. The widow deposed to that which, if true, was a contract of service. Evidence was given in that case that a letter had been given to Mr. Quance, the owner's husband, thinking that he would be responsible for damages, but the learned Master of the Rolls said: "In this case I think there has been a mistake, and that there is not a scintilla of evidence to justify that which is vital to the present case—namely, the proposition that the deceased man was a servant of Mrs. Quance. I am very anxious not to say anything which may prejudice the subsequent appeals of Boon v. Quance and Cobbledick v. Quance, as to which it is quite clear different considerations may arise."

Then the circumstances of the deceased man, Boon, are referred to and the facts there are stated: "It is for him"—that is, the dead man, the captain—"subject to any directions which may be given to the contrary (none such were given here) to go to what port he likes, to engage what crew he likes, to pay what wages he likes. His only obligation is to pay to Mrs. Quance one-third of the gross freight which may be earned, less 10*s.*, which is something in the nature of a discount." So that there were in fact no deductions for what one may call the working of the ship or for the expenses of getting charter-parties. "Out of the balance he pays his crew, pays any dues, and pays any expenses. In those circumstances, what is there to suggest the relation of master and servant? According to the evidence, I think, of all the witnesses, there was no right even to terminate Captain Boon's possession of the vessel until the voyage was at an end. He was solely in control of the vessel; entitled to take it where he would; entitled to man it as he thought fit, and I cannot see anything which even lends colour to the suggestion that the relation of master and servant existed between Mrs. Quance and Captain Boon. It is not necessary in the present case, and it is not desirable, that I should indicate any opinion as to whether the master and Mrs. Quance could be considered co-adventurers, or whether the whole transaction was simply one of bailment of the vessel, the remuneration for the bailment being one-third of the gross freight. On that I express no opinion."

It seems to me that there again you have a decision upon the facts as proved in the evidence, whether viewed as affirmative or whether considered in its meagreness. The conclusion that was come to in that case was a conclusion which I have no doubt was perfectly right, but in no way binds us on the very different facts of the present case. One may compare that, as was done, I think, by the Master of the Rolls in the course of the argument in the present case, with the case of Jones v. Owners of the ship Alice and Eliza (ubi sup.), to the judgment in which I myself was a party. In that case the owners called no evidence as to the relation between the master and themselves. But the court held that there was, in the special facts of that case, evidence to support the finding of the County Court judge that a contract of service existed between the master and the owners. That was a case in which, as I have said, there was affirmative evidence by the widow that her husband was the servant of the owners. But the counsel for the owners submitted that the master was not a servant.

The case of Boon v. Quance (ubi sup.) was cited, and in my opinion, now, as it was then, the different decision on the different evidence in Boon v. Quance (ubi sup.) lends force to that which strikes me as the thing to be borne in mind above all others in dealing with a case of this kind, namely, that we have got to decide according to the true facts of the particular case. It is not to be lost sight of, also, that that which the court has to bear in mind is that the question of control is perhaps the most important, especially in employer and workman cases. You have to get that particular relationship that the Act of Parliament which gives the right to compensation requires to be proved; and it is somewhat of a different matter to consider whether or not there is a contract with a master for the use of the vessel. And you have the inference, which Bowen, J. says in Frazer v. Cuthbertson (ubi sup.) is the true legal inference in the absence of anything to the contrary, or a presumption at any rate, that he was employed to navigate, and those who navigate a ship are employed by those who are the owners of the vessel to act as masters.

When you bear all that in mind, it seems to me that this case ought to be decided on its facts as not being a case in which the true inference, as shown to us by the evidence, is that the master was acting otherwise than as the agent or servant of Ashton.

SWINFEN EADY, L.J.—It having been established that the ketch the Myrtle was unseaworthy on leaving the Thames and starting on her voyage to Fowey, and it having now been decided that such unseaworthiness was not caused, as alleged, by any act of the plaintiffs in giving her a bad and unsafe loading berth, the question remains whether the defendant as owner of the vessel is liable to the plaintiffs for the loss of their cargo of cement shipped on board.

In my judgment this depends upon the true inference to be drawn from the facts proved. If Cole, the master, hired the ship from the owners, and sailed her on his own account, engaging and paying the crew, and paying as consideration for the hire one-third of the gross freights received, less harbour dues and towage, Cole would be the charterer of the ship and alone liable to the plaintiffs.

If, however, Cole, the master, was sailing the ship as the servant of the owners, being remunerated by a share of the gross earnings, out of which he was to pay the wages of the crew and the cost of their food, then the defendant, the shipowner, will be liable to the plaintiffs for the loss of their cargo.

The law was stated by Lord Tenderden in the House of Lords in 1832 in Colvin v. Newberry (1 Cl. & F. 283, at p. 297); and in Bernard v. Aaron (9 Jur. N. S. 470, at p. 471) Williams, J. stated the law in the same way.

Indeed, these general propositions of law were not disputed. But it was contended by the defendant that where a ship is sailed "on thirds," meaning thereby that the master pays to the owner or owners one-third of the gross freights, and retains for himself the other two-thirds, paying thereout for provisions and the wages of the crew, such an arrangement amounts in law to a bailment of the ship, and the master is not the servant of the owner or owners, but charterer, and alone liable for the goods shipped on board.

In my opinion this proposition cannot be maintained. It is a question of fact in each case whether the transaction amounts to a hiring of the ship, and whether the master is the servant of the owner or owners. The answer depends upon the proper conclusion to be drawn from all the facts proved.

The proper conclusion of fact in the present case is that Cole, the master, managed and sailed the ship for the joint benefit of himself and the owner; and that there was not any demise or bailment of the ship to him. It is quite consistent with such an arrangement that he should be left to choose his own crew, and arrange the charters, which latter he said he usually did, but apparently not always. He was asked: "Did you communicate with Ashton before chartering, or were the instructions from him?" He answered: "I usually used my own discretion that way as to what cargo I should take."

It was pointed out by Lindley, L.J. in Steel v. Lester (37 L. T. Rep. 642; 3 C. P. Div. 121) that where an owner pays a master a share of profits instead of fixed wages, retaining control over the master but leaving him to choose his ports and men, such an arrangement would not amount to a demise or anything of the kind. Nor in my judgment would such an arrangement amount to a demise if the owner received a share of gross freights instead of net profit. By retaining control over the master the owner in such a case retains control over the ship.

In the present case the master was appointed to sail the ship. He could not lay her up, instead of sailing her, as primâ facie a charterer may if it is worth his while to do so. The owner in effect says you must work the ship for my benefit, although also for your own benefit. Again, I cannot doubt that for misconduct the master could have been dismissed, even during a voyage, if he put into a port and misbehaved himself, and the owner became aware of it.

Again, the master himself referred to the remuneration coming to him as his "wages." He was also asked in chief: "Q. Could Mr. Ashton dismiss you, and, if so, when? A. He has not dismissed me during the time I was there. Q. If he wanted to dismiss you, when could you have been dismissed? A. At the end of the voyage." This language is appropriate to the dismissal of a servant, but not to the termination of a charter-party.

In Manchester Trust Limited v. Furness, Withy, and Co. Limited (ubi sup.) Lindley, L.J. said that the general rule of law was that primâ facie at all events a bill of lading signed by the master, is signed by the master as the servant or agent of the shipowner. To determine the question of liability the test in each case is whose servant is the master? Who is his undisclosed principal when he signs the bill of lading. In my opinion the answer to that question in the present case is, that he signed the bill of lading as master and the servant of the owner, and was not himself the charterer of the vessel.

The result is that the appeal ought to be allowed, but in so deciding I do not consider that we are overruling Bernard v. Aaron (ubi sup.), the decision in which case turned upon the particular facts, which are very meagrely reported.

ROPNER AND CO. v. RONNEBECK. (a)

Charter-party — Demurrage—Strike—Charterer's refusal to load.

The terms of a charter-party provided (inter alia) that the charterer should load a cargo within a period of ninety-six running hours after notice of readiness to receive cargo, and to pay demurrage if the ship was delayed beyond her loading time. The parties mutually exempted each other from liability for time lost through strikes preventing or delaying the working, loading, or shipping of the cargo. A strike of engineers was in progress when the steamer arrived at the port of loading and notice of readiness to load was received, and the shipowners refused to sign on engineers at the terms they were demanding.

On the day after notice of readiness to load was given, the charterer asked the shipowners to give him an assurance that their engineers would be signed on and that the ship would sail as soon as possible, which the shipowners declined to give. When the shipowners received a full complement of engineers fifteen days after the ship was ready to receive the cargo, the charterer commenced loading. In an action by the shipowners to recover demurrage in respect of the detention of the ship for 413 hours beyond her loading time:

Held, that the charterer was liable, as the existence of a strike which might affect the time of sailing did not prevent the cargo being loaded, nor excuse the charterer from his obligation to load within the period provided by the charter-party.

COMMERCIAL COURT.

Action tried by Bailhache, J.

The plaintiffs, owners of the steamship Thirlby, sued the defendant, the charterer of the steamer, for 344*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* as demurrage in respect of the detention of the Thirlby at the port of loading.

The Thirlby was chartered by the plaintiffs under the terms of a charter-party dated the 20th June 1914, to carry a cargo of coal from Blyth to Russia. By the terms of the charter-party the charterer engaged "to load the cargo of coal within a period of ninety-six running hours (Sundays, pay Saturdays, cavilling days, colliery and dock holidays excepted), time to count from 6 a.m. on the working day next after receipt of written notice of readiness to receive the entire cargo given to the staithman or colliery agent, or handed to him in his office."

It was also provided that if the ship was detained beyond her loading time the charterer was to pay demurrage at the rate of 16*s.* 8*d.* per running hour, and "the parties hereto mutually exempt each other from all liability (except under the strike rules) arising from or for time lost through riots, strikes, lock-outs of workmen or disputes between master and men . . . and any unavoidable accidents and hindrances beyond their control either preventing or delaying the working, loading or shipping of the said cargo occurring on or after the date of this charter until the expiration of the loading time . . . strikes of seamen, disputes between owners and crew always excepted."

On Saturday, the 20th June, the Thirlby arrived at Blyth, and notice of readiness to load was at once given, the time for loading commencing at 6 a.m. on Monday, the 22nd June.

On the 17th June a strike of engineers had commenced, and on the 23rd June the charterer, who had not commenced to load, asked the shipowners for an assurance that their engineers would be signed on and that the boat would sail as soon as possible. The shipowners refused to give the charterer the required assurances, and declined to sign on engineers on the terms demanded by them, and a full complement of engineers was not secured until the 7th July.

The loading was not completed until the 13th July, the total time occupied from 6 a.m. on the 17th June being 515 hours less six hours for bunkering.

Leslie Scott, K.C. and Dunlop for the defendants.—The charterer was entitled under the circumstances, to delay the loading, as there might have been an indefinite delay after the cargo was loaded before the ship could leave the port. The charterer was not bound to put the cargo on board if there was no reasonable probability of the ship being able to proceed on the voyage whether the delay was occasioned by strike or restraint of princes:

BAILHACHE, J. (after stating the facts) said:—The defendant in this case contends that he was not bound to load the cargo because he had no means of knowing at the time how long a strike would last, nor how soon, if he did load, the Thirlby would be able to get away. It is quite true that sometimes circumstances arise which entitle a charterer to refuse to load a cargo if he thinks she will not be able to proceed with the cargo on board to her destination within a commercially reasonable time. Such cases, however, have hitherto, so far as I know, always arisen in time of war. There were several at the time of the Franco-German War, and also at the time of the recent war between Turkey and Greece. I have, however, never known the principle applied to the case of a strike in this country. I have never heard it suggested before to-day that a charterer is not bound to load a steamer which is ready to take the cargo on board because of the existence of a strike which might affect the time of her sailing. I am not prepared to be the first to apply this principle, which, as I have said, has been applied in cases arising at the time of war, to cases arising through the existence of a strike, and to do so would be a new departure. Strikes, of course, vary in length, and no man can say when a strike begins whether it will be a long or short one. I do not think that a charterer is entitled, merely because a strike is in force, to say that he expects it will be of long duration and will frustrate the commercial object of his venture, and that therefore he is entitled to refuse to load. In my opinion, the doctrine has no application to cases of strikes, and the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed.

H. G. Harper and Co. v. John Bland and Co. Limited. (a)

Freight — Assignment — Disbursements — Legal and equitable assignment—Practice at port of Cardiff.

The plaintiffs, H. and Co., carrying on business at Cardiff as ship's brokers and agents, sued the defendants for 317l. 3s. 4d. as freight payable for the carriage of goods from Riga to Cardiff per the steamship C., a German ship, for which the plaintiffs were acting as agents, the defendants being the consignees of a portion of the cargo. The ship arrived at Cardiff on the 20th July 1914. The freight could not be ascertained until the cargo had been measured, and the plaintiffs, following the practice at the port of Cardiff, took from the master of the C. a document in the following terms, which was signed by the master: "Cardiff, 20th July 1914.—Dear Sirs, —I hereby authorise Messrs. H. and Co., Cardiff, to collect the freight due to my steamer the steamship C. on the cargo of timber from Riga on my steamer."

On the strength of that document the plaintiffs made disbursements on behalf of the ship and collected some of the freight, some of which they remitted to Germany, after which a balance was still due to the plaintiffs in respect of disbursements. The plaintiffs gave the defendants due notice of the master's letter, which they relied upon as an assignment.

Held, that the document was not an assignment at all; but if it were it was at most an equitable assignment, and, as the assignees had not been joined, the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover.

Commercial Court.

Action tried by Bailhache, J.

The plaintiffs' claim was for 317*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.* as freight payable for the carriage of goods from Riga to Cardiff on the steamship Casablanca.

The facts and arguments are sufficiently stated in the judgment.

Mackinnon, K.C. and Gordon Smith for the plaintiffs.

Holman Gregory, K.C., McCardie, and St. J. Field for the defendants.

Bailhache, J.—In this case Messrs. H. G. Harper and Co., who are ship brokers and ship agents at Cardiff, sue Messrs. Bland and Co. Limited to recover the sum of 317*l.* 3*s.* 4*d.*, being the freight payable by Messrs. Bland as receivers of a parcel of timber on the steamship Casablanca, which arrived in Cardiff on or about the 20th July 1914. The cargo was measurement cargo, and the freight could not be ascertained until the cargo was duly measured. As a business arrangement, and to avoid delay, the cargo was delivered to the various consignees, the receivers of the various parcels of cargo on the Casablanca, leaving the question of the amount of freight payable to be ascertained and determined after measurement had taken place. Of course, there are many conveniences in doing that, one of them being that the ship was able to get away, and the master was able to get away, and the merchants were able to get their goods at once. Messrs. Harper and Co. had been appointed by the owners of the Casablanca, a German company, to act as agents for the Casablanca upon her arrival in Cardiff. The practice which was followed in this case was the practice which is apparently very common, if not universal, in Cardiff, and so far as I know, in all other ports in the Kingdom. Where there is an agent appointed by the owners, and where there is any difficulty in immediately ascertaining the freight, and the cargo requires to be either measured or weighed or selected, or something requires to be done to it, and the receivers are persons of good standing, the practice is for the cargo to be delivered to the receivers, a freight account is afterwards made out, and the master, who does not desire to be detained on shore, and who is perhaps going on a foreign voyage, gives an authority to the agent in the particular port in which he happens to be (in this case Cardiff) to collect the freights from the receivers. The agent, being armed with that authority, and because he gets that authority to collect the freight, performs other duties; that is to say, he disburses the ship in his particular port. The master orders the goods that are required for the ship, the stores, and so on, for his outward voyage; he signs the accounts of the various tradesmen, the ship's chandlers, the butchers, bakers, and so on, and they present their accounts with the master's signature to the agent. The agent pays these accounts, relying upon the fact that he will have moneys in hand which he can retain to answer these disbursements. Where the freight is a large sum, and is paid at different times—part at one time and part at another—a very common practice is that the agent, when he receives the first instalment of the freight, and if he thinks that the balance of the freight is likely to be sufficient to cover him for his disbursements, very often at once forwards the first instalment of the freight to the owners, so as not to keep too large a sum in his own hands, and in order that the owners may have the money that belongs to them at the earliest possible moment. In that case, what he does is, he sends the first instalment of the freight on, he waits till he has collected all the accounts, he collects the balance of the freight, and then if there is a balance in his hands, as of course he hopes and expects there will be, and intends that there should be, he sends these accounts to the owners, making out an exact account of all the disbursements he has made on behalf of the ship and on behalf of the master, who by this time is probably far away on his ship, and he remits to the owners the balance that is in his hands after paying these various disbursements. That was the course which Messrs. Harper and Co. intended to pursue in this case. It so happens (I do not know how it came to be so) that they had remitted more freight to the owners of the ship than they were justified on their own behalf in doing, and that left them with more disbursements than there was balance of freight to collect, and even if Messrs. Bland were to pay this sum of 317*l.*, which is the subject-matter of this action, I am satisfied on the evidence that there would still be a balance to recover at some time or another from the owners of the Casablanca. The owners of the Casablanca are Germans, and alien enemies, and Messrs. Bland say that that is the reason why they do not follow the usual practice and pay on the freight authority which Messrs. Harper had in this case. I am very doubtful whether that is the real reason, on two grounds, firstly, because it is clear that the responsibility of sending this money to Germany would be Messrs. Harper's and not theirs; and, secondly, because they have been for a long time, I have no doubt, perfectly satisfied that if they did pay this freight there would be no money to go to Germany, but there would still be a balance owing to Messrs. Harper. However that may be, they take the point, which they are quite entitled to take, that this particular form of document which Messrs. Harper took is not a legal assignment of the freight, that it is not an equitable assignment, and if it is an equitable assignment Messrs. Harper and Co. are not the right parties to sue upon it. What they say is that in truth and in fact it is a mere authority given by the master to Messrs. Harper and Co. to collect the freight instead of the master doing so himself, and that it is not an assignment, and is not intended to be an assignment, and under those circumstances they say Messrs. Harper are not the right parties to sue.

The document upon which this dispute turns is on these lines. It is dated "Cardiff, 20th July 1914," and it is in these terms: "I hereby authorise Messrs. H. G. Harper and Co., Cardiff, to collect the freight due to my steamer, the Casablanca, on the cargo of timber from Riga in my steamer.—Yours faithfully, John Horde." Mr. Horde was the master of the steamer. The document is quite in common form, and it is a form upon which everybody in Cardiff except Messrs. Bland pays as a matter of course. They first of all say that if it is to be treated as an assignment, the master had no authority to make such an assignment. The owners did not take any point of authority at all. They are not in any way objecting to the master having exercised his authority, if he had it, in this particular way. I have come to the conclusion without much hesitation that having regard to the ordinary course of business which is pursued in this trade in Cardiff, and has been pursued in this trade for many years, it must be taken that the master has authority to act in a way so consonant with his owners' interest, which enables him to get away with his ship, to get a further cargo on board, to leave with her, and to leave the duty of collecting the freight to the duly appointed agents in Cardiff; and I have no hesitation in saying that the master undoubtedly has, and I shall assume as a matter of fact that the master in this case undoubtedly had, authority to give this note to the plaintiffs.

The defendants say that the note is not addressed to anybody in particular. That, of course, is quite true. It begins: "I hereby authorise Messrs. Harper and Co. to collect the freight due to my steamer," and it does not begin with the name of any person whatever. Of course, it is quite clear that the note is intended for the various receivers, and I think in this case there were eight of them who were receivers of parcels of cargo in this steamship Casablanca, and I do not think the absence of direction to any particular consignee or receiver is of any consequence.

Then it was said that it did not refer to the particular sum which is to be collected, but I do not think there is anything in that either, because it is an authority to collect the freight due on the cargo of timber from Riga "on my steamer." It is quite clear that when that is delivered to a receiver of cargo the freight which is due from him is the freight which is due on his particular parcel, and so it is a sufficiently clear indication what the amount to be recovered is.

But then it is said that it is not an assignment at all, and to that objection I think I must very reluctantly give effect. The truth of the matter is that what it is intended to be is an authority to Messrs. Harper and Co. to collect freight for the owners, which would, under different circumstances, be effected by the master, but which in this trade, carried on in this way, is practically universally collected by the agent. In my judgment, what this document really does is to substitute the plaintiffs, as the agents for the owners, to collect this freight for the owners instead of the master, who under different circumstances might collect it himself. I do not think, therefore, that it is intended to be an assignment, either legal or equitable. If it is intended to be one or the other I think it must certainly be intended to be an equitable assignment, and if it is an equitable assignment there is the serious difficulty in Messrs. Harper's way that they have not joined the owners of the steamer as plaintiffs in this action. It is quite true that owing to the fact of the war having broken out since this document was signed, and since Messrs. Harper made these disbursements, that it is an impossibility, but not an impossibility that will last (at least, we hope it will not last) for ever. It is an impossibility that will last during the continuance of the war, and will cease when the war is over. The result of it is not that it is impossible for them to join the owners, but that if they have to join the owners there will be considerable delay in bringing this action.

In the result, I come to the conclusion that if Messrs. Bland take this point, as they do, it is legally a good one, and I feel compelled very reluctantly to give effect to it. My decision is that the document, if an assignment at all, is an equitable assignment, but, in my view, it is really not an assignment either legal or equitable, but is a mere appointment of Messrs. Harper and Co., as the agents, to receive certain moneys instead of the master. Under these circumstances there must be judgment for the defendants with costs.

Reddall v. Union Castle Mail Steamship Company Limited. (a)

Sale of goods—Purchase of goods for shipment abroad—Transit—Transit in stages—Stoppage in transitu—Interception of goods by purchaser—Right of unpaid vendors.

Semble, where goods are consigned so as to involve a transit by several stages, and are intercepted at the end of one of the stages by the buyer, the transit may be regarded as ended and the right of the seller to stop lost where the goods cannot be set in motion again without further orders from the buyer.

Action tried by Bailhache, J.

The plaintiff's claim was for delivery up of thirty-nine pieces of cotton tick, value 78*l.* 4*s.* 10*d.*, or, alternatively, for damages for their detention and conversion.

The facts and arguments are sufficiently stated in the written judgment.

MacKinnon, K.C. and Darby for the defendants.

Bailhache, J. read the following judgment:—This action is in form an action for conversion of a bale of goods, but the real question is one of the right of the sellers of the goods to stop in transitu. The plaintiff is a trustee under a deed of assignment, dated the 24th April 1913, to one F. T. Snow, trading as Trew and Snow, the buyers of the goods. The goods were in the defendants' hands on the 26th April 1913, when the defendants, at the request of Messrs. Rutherford, of Glasgow, the unpaid sellers, delivered the goods to them in compliance with the alleged right of stoppage in transitu.

The plaintiff asserts that the sellers' right to stop in transitu had ceased, and that the delivery of the goods to them was wrongful, and this is the question to be decided. The facts are that the buyers were buyers in England for a South African merchant named Ebrahaim, of Johannesburg, and dealt with the sellers as principals. The formal order for the goods was given on the 10th March 1913. The sellers were not informed by the buyers of the name of the South African merchant. They knew who he was from other sources of information. The sellers were informed by the formal order referred to that the goods were for shipment for South Africa.

On the 13th March the buyers sent shipping instructions to the sellers directing them to "forward the goods by the quickest route to the defendants' steamship, Armadale Castle, at the docks, Southampton, forwarding the enclosed shipping note with your consignment note."

Accompanying these instructions was a note on the defendants' own printed form, addressed to the London and South-Western Railway Company, requesting them to receive the goods for shipment per Union-Castle Line. Both these documents gave the marks to be put upon the bale, the description of the goods as one case, and a case piece goods, respectively, and the destination Algoa Bay.

The goods were packed by the sellers in Manchester by Lloyd's Packing Warehouse Company Limited, to whom the sellers on the 15th March sent shipping instructions embodying the instructions they had themselves received, and I gather also the note of the London and South-Western Railway. In pursuance of these instructions the packers handed the goods to the Great Northern Railway, who in turn passed them on to the London and South-Western Railway, who delivered them with other goods of the buyers to the defendants alongside the Armadale Castle, which was then loading in the Southampton Docks.

The buyers on the 17th March sent shipment instructions to the defendants giving the marks, destination Algoa Bay, and description of the goods. The column for name of consignee with forwarding agent at the port of loading was not filled in, but the shipment instructions asked for two bills of lading to order.

On the same day the buyers wrote to defendants asking them to forward documents at their earliest convenience, and again on the same date, in anticipation of insolvency, wrote to the defendants to stop all their shipments per Armadale Castle, promising further instructions later.

The shipping instructions and those letters were received by the defendants by the same post on the 18th March. They wired to the buyers: "Referring to contradictory letters yesterday please wire definite instructions. Some packages already shipped." Afterwards on the same day they wrote the buyers that they were holding all the packages now on hand until they heard from the buyers. On the same day, the 18th March, the sellers sent the invoice to the buyers for the price of the goods, with a note at the end "forwarded to Southampton Docks, care of Union-Castle Line for shipment per steamship Armadale Castle on account of Trew and Snow, London."

If the goods had not been stopped by the buyers they would have been shipped and carried to Algoa Bay, as in effect these packages which had been loaded before the morning of the 18th March were carried. This bale remained in the custody of the defendants, who charged the buyer with warehouse rent for it, until it was handed to the sellers under their claim to stop in transitu as already stated.

I think, on the facts, the transit was to Algoa Bay. The cases upon stoppage in transitu are very numerous, and, where the transit is made in stages, difficult to reconcile. I think, however, it is true to say that where goods are delivered by the seller or his agent to a carrier at each successive stage of the transit from the hands of one carrier to another without the intervention of the forwarding agent to the destination indicated by the buyer to the seller, the transit continues until the destination is reached.

It makes no difference in such a case whether one intermediate carrier receives his instructions direct from the buyer or from the seller, provided that those instructions are given to facilitate the transit of the goods upon a journey originally intended and communicated to the buyer.

The case in its facts most like this case is Kemp v. Ismay and Co. (14 Com. Cas. 202). This does not dispose of the case, because the goods were intercepted at Southampton and the journey to Algoa Bay was stopped. The buyers not having contracted with the sellers that the goods should go to Algoa Bay were within their rights in doing this: (see Whitehead v. Anderson, 9 M. & W. 518).

The defendants, thereafter, held the goods at rent at the buyers' disposal and could not have sent them forward to Algoa Bay or to any other destination without fresh instructions from the buyers. I think, therefore, that although the original transit was to Algoa Bay, that transit had been ended at Southampton, and that under the circumstances the intended stoppage in transitu was too late, and the defendants were wrong in delivering the goods to the sellers. When an original transitus is intercepted by the buyer I think the test is whether the goods will be set in motion again without further orders from the buyers. If not, the transit is ended and the right to stop lost.

There will be judgment therefore for the plaintiff in the case for 78*l.* 4*s.* 10*d.*

Trading with enemy—Goods of ally—Consignment to enemy—Contract of sale at date prior to outbreak of war—Neutral vessel—Dispatch from neutral port—Date of departure after the outbreak of war—Liability to seizure and condemnation—General principles to be applied—Obligations as to trading binding Confederate States.

When war breaks out between States the following rules apply, according to international law, to trading: First, all commercial intercourse between citizens of the belligerents ipso facto becomes illegal, unless it is expressly allowed or licensed by the head of the State. Secondly, where a belligerent State has allies, the citizens of all the allied States are under the same obligations to each of the allied States as its own subjects would be to a single belligerent State as regards commercial intercourse with the enemy. Thirdly, where such illegal intercourse is proved between allied citizens and the enemy, their property engaged in such intercourse, whether ship or cargo, is subject to capture by any allied belligerent, and is subject to condemnation in that belligerent's own Prize Courts. Fourthly, when such intercourse in fact takes place, the property of the persons engaged in it is confiscable, whether they were acting honestly and with bona fides or not.

Prior to the outbreak of war between Great Britain and her allies and Germany and Austria, a French company contracted to sell certain goods to a German firm. The goods were shipped from a neutral State in a neutral vessel. War broke out whilst the ship was being loaded. She afterwards sailed with the goods on board for Antwerp and Newcastle. The French company later on directed her to Swansea. From certain correspondence it appeared that attempts were made by the English representative of the French company to deliver the cargo to the German company if they accepted delivery in England. The goods were seized as prize at Swansea, and later sold. It was admitted that at the time of seizure the property in the goods was still in the French company.

Held, that although the French company had acted honestly and bonâ fide in the transaction, what they had done constituted trading with the enemy after the outbreak of war, and as they were citizens of a State in alliance with Great Britain the goods were confiscable under the above-named principles of international law in the same manner as those of a British citizen would have been under similar circumstances.

THIS was a case in which the Crown claimed the condemnation of the proceeds of sale of 1020 tons of silver lead shipped by the Compagnie Française des Mines de Laurium, a French company, in the steamship Panariellos, a Greek vessel, and consigned to Beer, Sondheimer, and Co., a German firm, carrying on business at Frankfort.

The silver ore was sold by the Laurium Company in July 1914, in pursuance of a contract dated the 9th May 1914, to the German firm of Beer, Sondheimer, and Co, f.o.b. Ergasteria, in Greece. At the request of the purchasers the vendors chartered the Panariellos, under a charter-party dated the 10th July 1914, for a voyage from Ergasteria to Antwerp and Newcastle. The loading of the silver ore began on the 29th July, and the ship sailed from Greece on the 11th Aug., the war between Great Britain and the German Empire having in the meantime broken out—namely, on the 4th Aug. The Panariellos put in at Swansea, where the cargo was seized and afterwards sold. The sale realised 15,507*l.*, and the money was paid into court. A claim originally put forward by the German firm was withdrawn, and it was agreed that the property in the goods at the time of seizure was in the Laurium Company. Evidence was given by the managing director of the Laurium Company that an effort was made to stop the sailing of the ship from Greece, and that, when that was impossible, her voyage was diverted from Antwerp to Swansea. After an interview with the London representative of the German firm, which came to nothing, as he had the bills of lading still in his possession, he sold the silver ore to a firm in London, who in turn resold the same to a firm in Newcastle. Meanwhile, however, the Procurator-General had sold the cargo after its seizure to the same firm at Newcastle.

The Solicitor-General (Sir S. O. Buckmaster, K.C.) and G. W. Ricketts for the Crown.—The facts of the case made it quite clear that there had been trading with the enemy by the Laurium Company. The company should never have allowed the ship to sail from Greece. A contract had been entered into with the enemy, and it was quite enough for the purposes of condemnation of the goods that there was trading with the enemy at the inception of the voyage. The present case went beyond that. There was a clear case of trading until the time of the seizure at Swansea, for negotiations had been going on with the London representative of the German firm. As this was certainly trading with the enemy, the goods, or the proceeds of their sale, were liable to condemnation.

Butler Aspinall, K.C. and R. A. Wright for the claimants, the Laurium Company.—There should be no condemnation. The goods were in a neutral ship, and were consigned from a neutral port by an ally for sale in Newcastle. The company had acted with perfect propriety throughout. Whatever might be said as to trading with the enemy at the time of the commencement of the voyage, it was impossible under the circumstances to say that the trading had continued, or that there was such trading at the time of the seizure. Cur. adv. vult.

March 22.—The PRESIDENT.—In these proceedings the Procurator-General, on behalf of the Crown, asks for the condemnation as prize of a cargo of 1020 tons of silver lead, which was shipped by allied citizens in a neutral vessel. The vessel was a Greek vessel, the steamship Panariellos. The shippers, and the owners of the cargo at all material times, were a French company—La Compagnie Française des Mines du Laurium. The cargo was laden upon the vessel at Ergasteria, in Greece. It was originally shipped and intended to be delivered, pursuant to a contract of sale, to a German company, Beer, Sondheimer, and Co., of Frankfort.

The case raises for the first time during the present war the important question of the liability to capture and confiscation of property of citizens of an ally, who are alleged to have had commercial intercourse with, or to have been trading with, the enemy. Therefore, before I deal with the facts, as the question affects this country and its allies and their respective subjects or citizens in the present complicated hostilities, it seems desirable in the public interest to state the general principles which are applicable to such cases according to the law of nations. The following general propositions can, I think, be established: First, when war breaks out between States, all commercial intercourse between citizens of the belligerents ipso facto becomes illegal, except in so far as it may be expressly allowed or licensed by the head of the State. Where the intercourse is of a commercial nature, it is usually denominated "trading with the enemy." This proposition is true also, I think, in all essentials with regard to intercourse which cannot fitly be described as commercial. Secondly, on the outbreak of war in which a belligerent has allies, the citizens of all allied States are under the same obligations to each of the allied States as its own subjects would be to a single belligerent State, with relation to intercourse with the enemy. Thirdly, where such illegal intercourse is proved between allied citizens and the enemy, their property engaged in such intercourse, whether ship or cargo, is subject to capture by any allied belligerent, and is subject to condemnation in that belligerent's own Prize Courts. Fourthly, when such intercourse in fact takes place, the property of the persons engaged in it is confiscable, whether they were acting honestly and with bona fides or not.

The rule embodied in the proposition first mentioned was authoritatively stated by Lord Stowell in The Hoop (Roscoe, vol. 1, 105; 1 Ch. Rob. 196) as follows: "In my opinion, there exists such a general rule in the maritime jurisprudence of this country, by which all subjects trading with the public enemy, unless with the permission of the Sovereign, is interdicted. It is not a principle peculiar to the maritime law of this country; it is laid down by Bynkershoek as a universal principle of law—Ex naturâ belli commercia inter hostes cessare non est dubitandum. Quamvis nulla specialis sit commerciorum prohibitio, ipso tamen jure belli commercia esse vetita, ipsæ indictiones bellorum satis declarant, &c. . . . In my opinion, no principle ought to be held more sacred than that this intercourse cannot subsist on any other footing than that of the direct permission of the State. Who can be insensible to the consequences that might follow, if every person in time of war had a right to carry on a commercial intercourse with the enemy, and, under colour of that, had the means of carrying on any other species of intercourse he might think fit?" And, after an exhaustive review of numerous authorities, he added: "The cases which I have produced prove that the rule has been rigidly enforced; . . . that it has been enforced where strong claim, not merely of convenience, but almost of necessity, excused it on behalf of the individual; that it has been enforced where cargoes have been laden before the war, but where the parties have not used all possible diligence to countermand the voyage after the first notice of hostilities; and that it has been enforced not only against the subjects of the Crown, but likewise against those of its allies in the war, upon the supposition that the rule was founded on a strong and universal principle, which allied States in war had a right to notice and apply mutually to each other's subjects": (Ibid., p. 216).

And Mr. Justice Story, in his well-known Notes on Prize Courts, writes: "It is a fundamental principle of prize law that all trade with the enemy is prohibited to all persons, whether natives, naturalised citizens, or foreigners domiciled in the country during the time of their residence, under the penalty of confiscation. The same penalty is applied to subjects of allies in the war trading with the common enemy": (Pratt's Story, 69).

These statements of the law affecting commercial intercourse and trading with the enemy are a century old. In the meantime commerce, especially international commerce, has advanced and expanded, and occasionally in times of war there have since been special permission and licences given in relaxation of the rule. But the general rule, in the absence of any such licence, has been adhered to as the years have rolled on and commercial enterprises have developed. It may be well to fortify this by one or two more recent authorities, and reference may be made for this purpose to Dana's Wheaton, 1866 edit.

sects. 309-315; and to the 4th edition of M. Calvo's most valuable and careful work, vol. 4, sects. 1953-1955. There is no doubt that the rule exists in all its force and vigour at the present day. In the view I take of the facts of the present case, as will be hereafter stated, there was a commercial intercourse between the claimants and the enemy which amounted to a "trading with the enemy." But, lest the higher and final tribunal might think otherwise and adopt the argument for the claimants that there was no actual "trading with" the enemy, I will deal further with the more general and fundamental conception of the illegality of intercourse with the enemy, apart from the element of commerce and falling short of the act of trading.

In The Cosmopolite (Roscoe, vol. 1, 326; 4 Ch. Rob. 8) Lord Stowell states the rule in quite general terms thus: "It is perfectly well known that by war all communication between the subjects of the belligerent countries must be suspended, and that no intercourse can legally be carried on between the subjects of the hostile States but by the special licence of their respective Governments." And in Christopher Robinson's note to the case is cited a passage from the Black Book of the Admiralty (the original of which is the most precious possession entrusted to the President for the time being of this Division) as follows: In the ancient practice of the Court of Admiralty (says the editor) we find it laid down: 'Item, soit enquis de tous ceux qui entrecommunent, vendent, ou achatent, avec aucuns des ennemis de Messieur le Roi sans licence especiale du Roi, ou de son Amiral.—Black Book, p. 76.'" No doubt it was with cases of commercial intercourse that Lord Stowell was dealing in The Hoop (ubi sup.) and The Cosmopolite (ubi sup.), but it will be remembered that in the former he enforced the reason for the rule by reference to the possible consequences of allowing persons to carry on a commercial intercourse, and under colour of that to give them the means of carrying on any other intercourse they might think fit: (see 1 Ch. Rob., at p. 200). In the United States of America the Supreme Court has given a very wide range to the "intercourse" which is prohibited by the rule we are dealing with. In The Rapid (8 Cranch, 156), Johnson, J., in delivering the judgment of the Supreme Court (of which be it noted, Marshall, C.J. and Story, J. were two of the members), pronounced upon this subject as follows: "The universal sense of nations has acknowledged the demoralising effects that would result from the admission of individual intercourse. The whole nation are embarked in one common bottom, and must be reconciled to submit to one common fate. Every individual of the one nation must acknowledge every individual of the other nation as his own enemy—because the enemy of his country. It is not necessary to quote the authorities on this subject; they are numerous, explicit, and respectable." And after dealing thus generally with the subject, he proceeded to consider the point urged for the claimant in that case that there was no trading in the eye of the prize law such as would subject the property to capture, because the claimant had only sent a vessel to fetch away his own property acquired before the war from a small island belonging to the enemy, where they had been deposited before the war. He answered this point thus: "The force of the argument on this point depends upon the terms made use of. If by trading, in prize law, was meant that signification of the term which consists in negotiation or contract, this case would certainly not come under the penalties of the rule. But the object, policy, and spirit of the rule is to cut off all communication or actual locomotive intercourse between individuals of the belligerent States. Negotiation of contract has therefore no necessary connection with the offence. Intercourse inconsistent with actual hostility is the offence against which the operation of the rule is directed; and by substituting this definition for that of trading with an enemy, an answer is given to this argument."

On the same day as this judgment was pronounced (the 7th March 1814), Story, J. delivered the judgment of the Supreme Court in another case, The Julia (8 Cranch, 181)'; and he expressly adopted the decision and the reasons and principles of the judge of the Circuit Court.

In various cases intercourse which could not be properly described as commercial or which could not answer the description of "trading" has been declared illegal, and it would not be difficult to enumerate instances of such intercourse in cases of absolute gifts of property to enemy subjects of a comforting, useful, or beneficial character. It remains to note a rule of a correlative nature that whatever intercourse, commercial, trading, or otherwise, is prohibited, the same obligations are laid upon the citizens of an ally as upon the subject of a single belligerent State, and the same penalties of confiscation fall upon allied citizens as upon such subjects on non-observance of the obligations. Statements to this effect are found in the dictum from the judgment in The Hoop (ubi sup.) and in the passage from Pratt's Story, which have already been cited. But in The Neptunus (Roscoe, vol. 1, 595; 6 Ch. Rob. 403) the doctrines as to the position of the allies were material to the decision. Lord Stowell declares them in the following part of his judgment: "If one State only is at war, no injury is committed to any other State (i.e., by allowing particular relaxations). It is of no importance to other nations how much a single belligerent chooses to weaken and dilute his own rights. But it is otherwise when allied nations are pursuing a common cause against a common enemy. Between them it must be taken as an implied, if not an express, contract, that one State shall not do anything to defeat the general object. If one State admits its subjects to carry on an interrupted trade with the enemy the consequences may be that it will supply that aid and comfort to the enemy. . . . It should seem that it is not enough, therefore, to say that the one State has allowed this practice to its own subjects; it should appear to be at least desirable that it could be shown that either the practice is of such a nature as can in no manner interfere with the common operations, or that it has the allowance of the confederate State." Again, this rule is stated in its full force sixty years later in Wheaton (see Dana's Wheaton, 8th edit., 1866, par. 316): "Not only is such intercourse with the enemy, on the part of the subjects of the belligerent State, prohibited and punished with confiscation in the Prize Courts of their own country, but during a conjoint war, no subject of an ally can trade with the common enemy without being liable to the forfeiture, in the Prize Courts of the ally, of his property engaged in in such trade. This rule is a corollary of the other, and is founded upon the principle that such trade is forbidden to the subjects of the co-belligerent by the municipal law of his own country, by the universal law of nations, and by the express or implied terms of the treaty of alliance subsisting between the allied Powers. And, as the former rule can be relaxed only by the permission of the sovereign power of the State, so this can be relaxed only by the permission of the allied nations, according to their mutual agreement. A declaration of hostilities naturally carries with it an interdiction of all commercial intercourse. Where one State only is at war, this interdiction may be relaxed, as to its own subjects, without injuring any other State; but when allied nations are pursuing a common cause against a common enemy there is an implied, if not an express, contract that neither of the co-belligerent States shall do anything to defeat the common object. If one State allows its subjects to carry on an uninterrupted trade with the enemy, the consequence will be that it will supply aid and comfort to the enemy, which may be injurious to the common cause. It should seem that it is not enough, therefore, to satisfy the Prize Court of one of the allied States to say that the other has allowed this practice to its own subjects; it should also be shown, either that the practice is of such a nature as cannot interfere with the common operations, or that it has the allowance of the other confederate State."

And still more recently, M. Calvo, in the edition already referred to (vol. 4, par. 1956), states the rule and the reasons for it: "Sect. 1956. La même règle s'étend aux sujets alliés. Heffter, il est vrai, n'est pas de cet avis: il trouve la question plus délicate pour les alliés que pour les nationaux, parce qu'à l'égard des premiers, le belligérant semble en quelque sorte assumer une autorité juridictionelle que ne lui appartient que quand elle découle pour lui de stipulations conventionnelles expresses. Mais c'est là, suivant nous, une thèse irrationnelle, puisque l'alliance devant avoir pour conséquence logique de placer les co-belligérants exactement sur la même ligne à l'égard de l'ennemi, il n'est pas admissible que la prohibition imposée à l'un ne s'étend pas le plein droit à l'autre. C'est au surplus ce que Wheaton démontre d'une manière irréfutable, quand il dit que pour être justes et sensées, la règle et les exceptions qui y sont apportées doivent s'appliquer également à tous les deux; qu'en défendant la continuation du commerce avec l'ennemi, le belligérant obéit à la fois aux préceptes du droit civil interne, aux principes généraux du droit des gens et à l'esprit ou à la lettre de l'alliance qu'il a contractée. Il faut enfin remarquer que la situation de l'allié par rapport à l'ennemi commun étant la même que celle de son co-belligérant, on ne saurait en ce qui concerne le commerce, établir de distinction entre ceux qui enterprennent une lutte de concert et se sont par là tacitement obligés à ne rien faire de contraire au but général de l'alliances qui lest unit. Dans une de ses sentences, Sir W. Scott déduit de ce principe qu'il ne suffisait pas pour sa justification que l'état allié put alléguer qu'il avait autorisé la continuation du trafic avec son adversaire, mais qu'il fallait encore que son co-belligérant eût donné son assentiment à la mesure."

So intimate and imperative are the neutral duties of allies bound to each other by sacred and solemn bonds to fight a common foe that I believe the true rule to be that, whatever intercourse with an enemy is prohibited by international law, no relaxations whatever can be allowed by one State in favour of its citizens, which can affect the confederate States, unless expressly sanctioned by the latter.

Finally, it is clear that the rule must be enforced and confiscation decreed whether a person engaging in the prohibited intercourse acts innocently, in good faith, and in pursuance of advice honestly believed to be sound, or of licences or permissions honestly believed to be valid. The authorities for this are numerous. The Hoop (ubi sup.) in itself would be sufficient. The fact of actual intercourse is the determining factor. Innocence of intention is no answer. If there has been an infraction of the rule, however innocent, the court must apply the consequences by decreeing confiscation. To borrow the quaint language of a judge of the United States Supreme Court: "It is the unenvied province of this court to be directed by the head, and not by the heart. In deciding on principles that must define the rights and duties of the citizen (and it may be added of allied citizens), and direct the future decisions of justice, no latitude is left for the exercise of feeling."

Having stated the principles, it now remains to set out the material facts in the present case to which the principles have to be applied. The claimants—the French company—had had constant dealings with Beer, Sondheimer, and Co., the German company. The Germany company sold to the French company silver and lead ores; and the French company then carried out in Greece a process of reduction which resulted in a product called silver lead, which they contracted to sell to the German company. The contract was before the war. For the purpose of fulfilling the contract, after the silver lead was manufactured, the French company chartered the Greek steamship Panariellos to carry the lead to the purchasers. The loading of the silver lead upon the steamship began before the war. It was continued for about seven days after the war.

The vessel began her voyage on the 11th Aug., with the cargo on board, which was intended to be delivered pursuant to the contract with the German company. While the loading was proceeding, the following letter was sent, on the 4th Aug. 1914, by the agents of the French company at Ergasteria to the French company's head office in Paris:

> Having received from Frankfort the following telegram: "Send Bill of Lading Ship Panariellos 1000 tons Silver lead direct Beer Sondheimer et Co. London 120 Fenchurch Street and transmit by your Paris Office by Telegram these instructions. Telegraphic communications with Paris stopped. Acknowledge receipt.—'BEERSONDHEIMER,' we wired you this morning:—'Telegraphic communication between Frankfort and Paris stopped; Beersondheimer beg us to ask you send Bills of Lading for 1000 lead Panariellos direct 120 Fenchurch London.'"

Beer, Sondheimer, and Co., of 120, Fenchurch-street, London, was a mere agency for Beer, Sondheimer, and Co., of Frankfort. The work at the agency was carried on by a German subject, who was in Germany at the outbreak of the war, with the aid of a clerk who was an Austrian subject.

On the 12th Aug. 1914, after the voyage commenced, the French company sent the following telegram to the London agency of the buyers:

Panariellos started eleventh with 1020 tons lead. Suppose you have defrayed insurance.—LAURIUM.

It may be stated that the contract was f.o.b. Ergasteria. On the 21st Aug. 1914 the following telegrams were also exchanged between the parties in London and Paris:

Telegram de MM. Beer, Sondheimer et Co., London Agency. London, Aug. 21, 1914, 11 o'clock. To Laurium Company: "Received telegram regarding steamer Panariellos. Where are bills of lading? Telegraph Beer, Sondheimer Company."

Aug. 21, 1914.—Telegram de la Compagnie Française des Mines du Laurium à Beer, Sondheimer Company, 120, Fenchurch-street, London: "Not yet received bill of lading Panariellos.—MINES LAURIUM."

And on the same day the two following letters were written, one from the claimants' post office to the London agency of the German buyers, and the other from the latter to the former:

Paris, the 21st Aug. 1914.—Gentlemen, Panariellos.—We beg to acknowlege receipt of your to-day's telegram as follows: "Received telegram regarding steamer Panariellos. Where are bills of lading? Telegraph Beer, Sondheimer Company"; and to confirm that which we sent you in answer as follows: "Not yet received bill of lading Panariellos." The steamer Panariellos left, indeed, the port of Ergasteria on the 11th of this month, bound to Antwerp and Newcastle, and we have not yet the documents in our possession. But we will send you these as soon as we get them, according to the instructions received from your firm of Frankfort.—We remain, Gentlemen, yours faithfully, S. Ingenieur Secretaire General. (Signed) P. ALBRAND.

P.S.—Don't forget that in the present circumstances letters and packets from Greece are much delayed in reaching us.

Beer, Sondheimer, and Co., London Agency, 120, Fenchurch-street, London, the 21st Aug. 1914.—To Monsieur le Baron J. de Catalin, E.V.—Dear Sir,—I hear by MM. Leopold Walford et Co. that you will be in London to-morrow. I should be very glad to see you about the silver lead loaded on the steamer Panariellos. I will take the liberty of calling you on the telephone to-morrow at about 10.30 in the morning in order to make an appointment with you.—I remain, dear Sir, yours faithfully, for Beer, Sondheimer, and Co., London Agency. Signed (unreadable).

On the next day Baron de Catelin, the managing director of the French company, had an interview in London with Mr. Weissberger, the Austrian subject, who was then in charge of the London agency of the German company. In a statement subsequently sent to the Procurator-General by the Baron he said that at this interview "it had been verbally agreed that if the lot of lead was delivered to the said firm a complete settlement of accounts would follow." The Baron seems to have thought that up to that time the London agency of Beer, Sondheimer, and Co. had a right to continue to carry on their business on behalf of the German company. On the following day, the 23rd Aug. the offices of Beer, Sondheimer, and Co. in London were seized and closed. On the 25th Aug. 1914 a letter was sent from the Paris office of the claimants, apparently without any knowledge of the interview of the 22nd Aug., that already reported, or of the closing of the agency office. The Baron said that it was written without any authority from him or the company, but in these proceedings I have no means of testing that statement, and must assume that it was written in the ordinary course of business, especially as no steps were taken to put an end to any further communications. The following is a translation of the letter:

Gentlemen,—Panariellos.—Confirming our letter St. No. 5863 of the 21st of this month, we beg to send you annexed: 1. A bill of lading indorsed in blank 10,476 pigs or 510 tons of silver lead loaded in holds 1 and 3. 2. A bill of lading indorsed in blank 10,493 pigs or 510 tons silver lead, loaded in holds 2 and 4. We beg you please to acknowledge the receipt of these documents, and we remain, Gentlemen, yours faithfully, l'Ingenieur Secretaire General—(Signed) P. ALBRAND.

The vessel arrived in the Downs about the 28th Aug., and the master refused to proceed to Antwerp, where part of the cargo (viz, some zinc ore) was to have been delivered, and part of it was destined for Germany or for German firms.

The vessel was afterwards sent to Swansea, where there was a market for the zinc ore. The zinc ore, which was stored above the silver lead, was sold. The vessel arrived at Swansea on the 7th Sept. 1914, and on that day the silver lead was formally seized pending further inquiries, and was finally seized as prize subject to confiscation on the 25th Sept. 1914. Meantime, on the 31st Aug., a letter was written by the claimants to their London brokers, of which the following is a translation:—

My dear Walford,—Enclosed I send one bill of lading of the Panariellos indorsed in blank, so you have every right to take delivery of the cargo. I remind you that the 800 tons of calamine No. 1 and the 300 tons of calamine No. 3 are sold through Dixon at Swansea. So far as concerns the lead, you decide with Dixon and Heberlein the best course to adopt with regard to this lot. If Beer, Sondheimer, and Co. or the English Government wish to use the parcel bill of lading which they have in their hands you should explain that this bill of lading was sent them in current account, but that in reality almost the whole, say, four-fifths, belong to us. In fact, I have no time to give you details of this current account, but the balance in favour of Beer, Sondheimer, and Co., without reckoning the Panariellos, comes to 103,648f. 35c. As the value of the 1000 tons of lead in the Panariellos is about 500,000f., the difference should come to us, say, in round figures, 400,000f., and the Government should only be able to seize the balance. As we have another specimen of the general bill of lading, and as this letter might possibly not reach you, I am sending one of our employees to bring it to you and also a copy of this letter. The money coming over from the calamine or from the lead should be paid to the account of our company at the London County and Westminster Bank Limited. Relying on your efforts, and thanking you in advance for all that you will do for us, I remain, dear Sir, yours, &c., (Sd.) J. DE CATELIN.

The Baron de Catelin disavowed with emphasis any intention in these transactions to do anything which would be helpful to the enemy or prejudicial to this country. I accepted willingly his disavowal. He probably thought that he could properly deliver the cargo of silver lead to his customers, Beer, Sondheimer, and Co., if they accepted delivery at Newcastle or elsewhere in England. After these proceedings were instituted

Beer, Sondheimer, and Co., London Agency, caused an appearance to be entered, and put in a claim as the owners of the goods. This claim was subsequently abandoned by an express notice of withdrawal. The above facts are amply sufficient to show that in respect of the cargo of 1020 tons of silver lead there was commercial intercourse and a trading after the war between the present claimants and citizens of the enemy. The cargo was sold by arrangement between the marshal and the claimants, and the proceeds, amounting to about 16,000*l.*, are now in court. Applying the principles deduced to the facts proved, I have no alternative but to declare that the cargo was confiscable, and to decree the condemnation of the proceeds as lawful prize.

THE POONA. (a)

British ship—Cargo—Goods the property of a company domiciled in England—Enemy shareholders and directors—Management of company during war—Status of company—Principles to be applied when cargo claimed as prize.

Certain goods were sent from England to Australia on sale or return before the outbreak of war between Great Britain and Germany, and were sent back from Australia to England after the commencement of hostilities. They were seized in the Port of London as prize. The Crown claimed them as enemy goods. The sellers were a company incorporated in this country in May 1912. All the directors of the company were aliens residing in Germany, and the whole of the shareholders were either alien enemies or persons residing in Germany. On the day before war broke out the secretary of the company, who was a German, left England, having purported to appoint one of the employees as manager.

Held, that the goods were at the time of seizure the property of an English company, and that although the company was so constituted that all its directors were enemy subjects resident in Germany and all its shareholders were either enemy subjects or aliens resident in Germany, the goods were not enemy property, and therefore not subject to condemnation as prize. The goods were released to the manager of the English company with a direction that he should not deliver them or their proceeds to any enemy shareholders or use them or apply their proceeds for the benefit of any such shareholders during the war.

THE Poona was a British ship which carried amongst its cargo a certain number of cases of electric fans. These fans were sent out on board the ship to Australia in May 1914, and as they were not sold they were brought back again in Aug. 1914 and were seized in the port of London on behalf of the Crown. It was proved in evidence that the goods were the property of Isaria Limited, a company established in this country, but composed of directors and shareholders who were either alien enemies or resident in Germany. The Crown claimed the cargo as goods of alien enemies. The claimants, Isaria Limited, denied that the goods were liable to seizure or confiscation. on the ground that they were the property of an English company, and that such company was distinct as an entity from the persons who composed it.

By sect. 3 of Trading with the Enemy Proclamation No. 2, dated the 9th Sept. 1914, it is provided:

> The expression "enemy" in this Proclamation means any person or body of persons of whatever nationality resident or carrying on business in the enemy country, but does not include persons of enemy nationality who are neither resident nor carrying on business in the enemy country. In the case of incorporated bodies, enemy character attaches only to those incorporated in an enemy country.

The facts and the arguments are sufficiently set out in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 3.—The PRESIDENT.—The claimants to the goods seized and claimed in these proceedings (which consisted of five cases of electric fans) are a company named Isaria Limited, which was incorporated in May 1912, and whose registered office at the time of the outbreak of war was No. 208, Tower Bridge road, in the county of London. The company carried on business in this country and abroad. The goods (with others) had been sent out to Australia for sale, and were returned to the company in Aug. 1914. They were seized in the port of London as prize on the 17th Oct. 1914. The Crown claims them as enemy goods. After an investigation of the facts I am satisfied that the goods at the time of the seizure were the property of the company.

The question, therefore, which remains to be decided is whether, having regard to the constitution of the company, the goods were enemy property subject to seizure. At all material times the number of shares in Isaria Limited issued was 1250 shares of 1*l.* each. Of these 1244 were held by Isaria Zahlerwerke, of Munich, a German manufacturing company; one share was held by each of the four directors of Isaria Limited, who were German subjects and resident in Germany; one other share was held by one Schoenmann, the secretary of the company, also a German subject; the remaining share was held by one Vallée who was said to have been a French subject, but who for some time before the war had resided at Munich, and had been employed by the German company, the Isaria Zahlerwerke. Schoenmann left this country on the 3rd Aug. last for Germany, having purported to appoint one of the company's employees, Mr. Frank Morton, to be manager. The date of his departure was one day before the outbreak of war between Great Britain and Germany. Mr. Morton represented the company in these proceedings. After the outbreak of war he was informed by the Board of Trade that they were advised that there was no objection to the sale from stock of the company of goods imported from Germany before the war, and that no licence was required for that purpose.

(a) Reported by J. A. SLATER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Later on, in Nov. 1914, he was informed by the Comptroller of the Companies Department of the Board of Trade that as Isaria Limited was a company incorporated in this country there was nothing (having regard to sect. 3 of the Trading with the Enemy Proclamation No. 2, dated the 9th Sept.) to prevent trading with the company, or the payment to it of money which might be owing to it. So Mr. Morton appears to have carried on the business of the company; and the books and papers of the business have been inspected when required by the official accountant appointed by the Board of Trade.

For the claimants it was contended that the goods belonged to an English company, not to alien enemies, and were not subject to seizure or confiscation. On the other hand, it was argued for the Crown that, as all the directors were enemy subjects and resident in Germany, and all the shareholders were also either enemy subjects or aliens resident in Germany, the goods were in reality the property of alien enemies, and ought to be condemned as such.

I was referred to my decision in this court in The Roumanian (ante, p. 8; 112 L. T. Rep. 464; (1915) P. 26), and, of course, to the judgments pronounced later by the Court of Appeal in Continental Tyre, &c., Company Limited v. Daimler Company Limited and Same v. Thomas Tilling Limited (112 L. T. Rep. 324; (1915) 1 K. B. 893). I will only observe, as to The Roumanian (ubi sup.), that it does not necessarily govern this case. The facts there were different in important and material respects. Moreover, I think that it will be found that in the course of the arguments in The Roumanian (ubi sup.) counsel for the claimants expressly admitted that the Europäische Petroleum-Union Gesellschaft mit beschrankter Haftung was a German company; and the case was dealt with accordingly. The judgments in the Court of Appeal in the Continental Tyre Company cases (ubi sup.), however, bear directly upon the point arising in the present case. What, therefore, ought I to do in this court in view of those decisions?

In matters relating to prize, the Court of Appeal does not bind this court, for the reason that no appeal lies to the Court of Appeal from judgments given in the Prize Court. The only appellate court in such cases is the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. If I was of opinion that different principles applied in the present proceedings in a Court of Prize, or if I held a strong opinion upon the legal aspects, even if the same principles were applicable, I conceive that it would be my duty to give effect to such opinion, even though I differed from that of the Court of Appeal. But I do not think in the present case that different principles ought to be applied.

The matter in controversy appears to me to be one which should be regarded from the point of view of municipal law, and no question of an overruling principle of international law arises. The claimants come forward as a company incorporated in accordance with the law of this country. The claim is not made by the individual shareholders—subjects of a foreign country, enemy or otherwise. The questions turn upon the status of the company in this kingdom. Accordingly, nothing in this case depends upon the bearing of the law of nations upon our municipal law.

In these circumstances, I think that it is more respectful to the Court of Appeal to act in accordance with their judgment, however much I might feel inclined to sympathise with the dissentient views of Buckley, L.J.

In the special facts of this case and of the Continental Tyre Company cases (ubi sup.), a decision in accordance with Buckley, L.J.'s judgment might be easy; but it is fairly obvious that with even a slight variation of facts as to the holding of the shares the adoption of a definite general principle as a foundation for his judgment and its application would give rise to great difficulties. Without dealing with it any further, I may observe that even in Buckley, L.J.'s dissenting judgment this passage is to be found: "The corporation, if it be a British corporation, stands in the same position for most purposes as a British subject. For instance, as regards rights of ownership of property and the right to protection and assistance by the law. But while it stands for most purposes in the position of a British subject, it cannot, I think, be correctly described as a British subject."

The question before me deals with "rights of ownership." For the reasons which I have stated, I am content to accept respectfully the law as laid down by the Court of Appeal, and must leave the ultimate decision to a higher tribunal. If the judgment of the majority of the Court of Appeal is unsound, it must be so pronounced by the House of Lords on appeal from them, or by the Privy Council on appeal from this court. If it is affirmed as good law, but is considered to require alteration as a matter of just policy, then the Legislature must act.

I desire to add one word by way of reservation. The case of the ownership of vessels registered in this country is so special, having regard to our merchant shipping legislation, that I venture to repeat what I said in The Tommi and The Rothersand (ante, p. 5; 112 L. T. Rep 257; (1914) P. 251), and to reserve expressly all questions which might arise if it was contended that a British vessel was the property of a company constituted like that of Isaria Limited.

The judgment of the court is that the goods seized are not enemy property, and I order their release. On their release they will be delivered over to Mr. Morton, the present manager of Isaria Limited, and he, of course, will deal with them as belonging to the English company; but he will not be able to deliver them or their proceeds over to the alien enemy shareholders of the company, or to use them or to apply their proceeds for the benefit of any such shareholders during the existence of the war.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Dec. 11, 14, 15, 1914, and Feb. 5, 1915.

(Before Lord Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Kennedy, L.J., and Warrington, J.)

Polurrian Steamship Company v. Young. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Marine insurance — Policy — Insurance against risk of seizure and detention—Actual total loss —Constructive total loss—Particular average loss—Marine Insurance Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 41), ss. 57 (1), 60.

By sect. 60 of the Marine Insurance Act 1906, the test of "unlikelihood of recovery" has been substituted for "uncertainty of recovery" in cases relating to constructive total loss.

A neutral ship belonging to the plaintiffs was chartered to carry a cargo of coal from the United Kingdom to Constantinople. She was insured with the defendant against capture, seizure, and detention. While on the voyage war broke out between Greece and Turkey, and the ship was stopped by the Greeks off Tenedos, who took her to Lemnos and removed the cargo. The plaintiffs gave the defendant notice of abandonment, and six weeks after the Greeks released the ship. An action was brought by the plaintiffs on the policy for an actual or a constructive total loss, or, alternatively, damages for a particular average loss.

Held, that, while on the date of the commencement of the action the recovery of the ship by her owners was quite uncertain, it could not be shown that the balance of probabilities had been proved so clearly against her recovery that it could be said that there was "unlikelihood of recovery" within the meaning of the Marine Insurance Act 1906; and that this being so the plaintiffs had failed to make out their case.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 5, 1915.—Lord Cozens-Hardy, M.R.—The judgment which Warrington, J. is about to read is the judgment of Kennedy, L.J. The day before his death he told me that he had finished it, and had ordered two copies to be typed for his colleagues to read. These copies were in his room when he died. Warrington, J. and I have carefully read and considered this judgment. We agree with it, and desire that it should be taken as the judgment of the court. To regularise this procedure we propose that the judgment should be dated the 16th Jan., the day before Kennedy, L.J.'s death.

The following written judgment of the court (Lord Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Kennedy, L.J., and Warrington, J.) was accordingly then read by

Warrington, J.—The question for our determination upon the appeal in this case is whether or not on the 26th Oct. 1912, when the plaintiffs, the owners of the steamship Polurrian, gave notice of abandonment of that vessel to the defendant, the insurer, and are by agreement to be taken as having issued the writ in this action, the state of things was such as to entitle the plaintiffs to recover upon the policy of insurance as for a constructive total loss. Pickford, J. has dismissed the plaintiffs' claim, and the plaintiffs have appealed to this court against his decision.

The policy of insurance, so far as its contents are material to the matter in dispute, covered the plaintiffs against the risks of capture, seizure, and detention, and the consequences thereof or any attempt thereat, piracy excepted; and also from all consequences of hostilities or warlike operations, whether before or after declaration of war. The plaintiffs allege, and the defendant denies, that on the 26th Oct. 1912 there was a constructive total loss of the Polurrian by one of the perils thus insured against.

It is indisputable that according to the law of England, in deciding upon the validity of the claims of this nature between the assured and the insurer, the matters must be considered as they stood on the date of the commencement of the action. That is the governing date. If there then existed a right to maintain a claim for a constructive total loss by capture, that right would not be affected by a subsequent recovery or restoration of the insured vessel: (see the judgment of Collins, J. in Ruys v. Royal Exchange Assurance Corporation, 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 294; 77 L. T. Rep. 23; (1897) 2 Q. B. 135), which reviews the history of the law on this point.

In strictness, therefore, in regard to the facts, I might, I think, confine myself for the purpose of this judgment to a statement of them as they stood on the 26th Oct., which, as I have already said, is by agreement to be taken as the date of the issue of the writ in this action, and was also the date of the plaintiffs' notice of abandonment. As, however, the learned judge in the court below has in his judgment included a review of the events which occurred in reference to the Polurrian after she had been taken by the Greek naval forces out of the possession of the plaintiffs on the 25th Oct. 1912 until her release seven weeks later on the 8th Dec., and has drawn therefrom, in support of his conclusions, inferences more favourable to the defendants' case than do I venture with all respect to think the evidence warrants, I do not think it would be proper for me, having to consider that judgment, wholly to confine my reference to the facts to their position on the 26th Oct. But that is the material date, and I shall deal with the later period as briefly as possible.

The Polurrian, laden with a cargo of Welsh coal and bound for Constantinople, was on the 25th Oct. 1912 off the island of Tenedos. Her master, Mr. Jones, had known of the war between Italy and Turkey, which existed when the Polurrian started on her voyage, but had terminated before the 25th Oct. He did not know that Greece was at war with Turkey. Off Tenedos the Polurrian was overhauled by Greek warships and taken by them to Mudros Bay, a harbour in the island of Lemnos, in which a portion of the Greek fleet was lying. The master, in the course of his interview with the Greek officer who had come on board the Polurrian when she was arrested, told the officer that he did not know of the war; and the order to follow the Greek destroyer to Mudros Bay was given after the officer had communicated by wireless telegraphy with the Greek admiral, with the result that he informed the master of the Polurrian "that he had orders to seize us; that he would have to convoy us to Mudros Bay, in the island of Lemnos."

In the evening, after the Polurrian had anchored in the spot designated by an officer from the flagship, the master of the Polurrian was further interrogated as to his cargo and destination, the ship's papers were examined, and the master was told by the Greek officer (I quote the words textually from the shorthand notes) that "his country intended to confiscate the cargo, but they were not quite sure what they would do with the ship; but in the meantime the ship would be deemed a capture, although he personally did not think it could be maintained." The master, either the same evening or the next day—the telegram is dated the 26th—telegraphed to the plaintiffs: "Arrived Mudros Bay, Lemnos Island, convoyed Greek destroyer. Now awaiting admiral's instructions. All well. Please inform families."

The next day the Polurrian was ordered alongside the flagship in order to coal her, and the master of the Polurrian had a conversation with the Greek admiral through an interpreter, the flag lieutenant, who spoke, says Mr. Jones, indifferent English, in the course of which the master of the Polurrian, according to the account, told the admiral, in answer to questions as to his knowledge of hostilities between Greece and Turkey, that he had no knowledge of them; and the conclusion of the interview, so far as regards the fate of the vessel as distinguished from her cargo, appears in the following question and the witness's answer thereto: "(Q.) Did he tell you at all what would ultimately be done with the ship?—(A.) No. With regard to the ship he said he was not quite sure; it was a doubtful question; but that the question could be settled later on. In the meantime the capture of the vessel would be maintained and they would take the cargo."

This is the master's evidence as to facts in regard to the 25th and 26th Oct., and I see no reason to doubt its substantial accuracy. But one important additional fact has to be added. Although the master of the Polurrian no doubt intended in his interview with the Greek Admiral to convey to him through the interpreter his ignorance of the existence of war between Greece and Turkey, it is quite plain that he conveyed in fact a very different impression. It is clear beyond doubt that the admiral understood him to admit that he did know of the war, and that, treating it as a serious admission, the admiral so informed his Government at Athens, and that it was upon this ground that that Government maintained the capture until the 8th Dec.

I say that this is quite clear, because on the 28th Oct. our Foreign Office, whose intervention had been invoked by the plaintiffs and the defendants, telegraphed to the plaintiffs: "H. M. minister at Athens reports Greek Government maintain capture to be lawful. He has demanded reference to prize court," and on the same day Mr. Henderson, the underwriters' agent at Athens, telegraphed to the Salvage Association, acting for the underwriters in London: "Polurrian, Government considers prize, alleging captain admitted was aware declaration war. British minister had informed Greek Government vessel must come Piræus and matter decided by prize court here": (see also the letter from Henderson at Athens to the Salvage Association in London, the 28th Oct.).

I have now stated, and, I hope, accurately stated, the facts as they existed on the material date, the 26th Oct. 1912, the agreed date of the commencement of the present action, and the date on which the plaintiffs, having received from the master of the Polurrian at Mudros Bay the telegram which I have already set out, caused notice of abandonment on the ground of loss by capture to be given to the insurer. As it is, I think, for the reason which I have given, proper that I should deal with the subsequent history of the transaction it will be convenient, for the sake of clearness, that I shall now complete the narrative before considering the legal rights of the parties to this litigation as they stood at that date.

A few days after the 26th Oct., and after the commencement of the discharge of the Polurrian's cargo into the Greek warships in Mudros Bay, the master had an interview with an officer whom he describes as the admiral's secretary. The master asked him as to the ship, and was told that the question of the ship would be settled by the Government, and that he (the secretary) thought it would have to go to the Piræus. On the 28th Nov., when the discharge was completed, the master of the Polurrian was ordered to proceed to the Piræus and there present himself at the general shipping office. He obeyed those orders, sailed to the Piræus, which he reached on the 29th Nov., and was there directed by the captain of the port to await the instructions of the Minister of Marine.

He was informed by the British Minister at Athens that the Greek Admiral stated that he (Captain Jones) had admitted knowledge of the declaration of war before sailing, and that the Greek Government was claiming that the Polurrian was a lawful prize; that a prize court was going to be held, and that he (Captain Jones) would have to give evidence. On the 1st Dec. an armed guard was put on board by the Greek authorities, and by orders of the officer in command of the guard the Polurrian, with the guard on board, was navigated to the naval arsenal at Salamis, and there remained until her release on the 8th Dec.

Meanwhile, from the 28th Oct. onwards, the underwriters and the owners, without prejudice to their respective contentions as to the validity of the notice of abandonment, had continued vigorously and persistently through the Foreign Office in London and the British Minister at Athens, to press the Greek Government for the release of the Polurrian. At one time during the first fortnight of November, it appeared likely that the application would succeed, so far, at any rate, as regards her release after her cargo had been discharged at Lemnos: (see the correspondence of the 1st-14th Nov.). But if the Greek Government ever led our Minister at Athens, as it seems that they did, to suppose that such a course would be adopted, they altered their views on the 15th Nov. The Polurrian, after her cargo had been taken out of her, was brought to the Piræus and thence to Salamis, with the intention that her case should be dealt with by a prize court. And on the 4th Dec. Mr. Henderson, who, as I have already said, represented the interest of the underwriters at Athens, telegraphed to the Salvage Association in London: "Polurrian must go before the prize court on ground that captain made statement alleged knowing state of war. Court will be formed in about two days. Will cable later asking certain instructions."

There is in the correspondence a letter written from Athens on the 5th Dec. by the same gentleman to the like effect. On the 8th Dec. the Greek Government released the Polurrian. It appears from a letter from Messrs. Harris and Dixon Limited to the plaintiffs, dated the 9th Dec., and referring to a communication just received in London from Lloyds' agent at Athens, that the Government did so after submitting the question to the Legal Council of State, "who decided no capture under art. 43 of the Declaration of London." On the 15th Oct. 1913 the Greek Administrative Prize Court rejected the claim put forward on behalf of the owners of the Polurrian for indemnity for her seizure and detention of the Polurrian, holding that the seizure and detention was justifiable, and holding in substance and effect, that whilst in fact he was, whilst carrying the coal cargo, ignorant of the outbreak of the Greco-Turkish War, the master of the Polurrian had used words which might fairly be construed as meaning that he was aware of the war, and "it could well be considered that both the vessel and her cargo were subject to seizure."

On careful consideration of the evidence given by the master of the Polurrian, and of the admitted correspondence and admitted documents, I must confess myself with all respect to my brother Pickford unable to concur in the view which, reading his judgment, I understand him to express—viz., that neither the Greek Admiral nor the Greek Government ever entertained any real doubt as to the right of the owners of the Polurrian to have the ship restored to them; that the Greek authorities knew quite well that they had no grounds for condemning the ship, and meant only to keep her so long as it was convenient for them to keep her to coal their fleet.

In my view, the evidence shows that the Greek Admiral attached serious importance to the admission which he understood the master of the Polurrian to make when examined by him at Lemnos as to his knowledge of the state of war; and so did the Greek Government when he communicated it to them between the 26th and 28th Oct., as shown by the communication to our Foreign Office, which appears in the telegram of the latter from our Foreign Office to the plaintiffs. A few days after the capture, and therefore soon after the discharge of the cargo at Mudros Bay had begun, the master of the Polurrian was informed by the Secretary of the Admiral that the question as to the ship would be settled by the Government, and that he thought the ship would go to the Piræus—for the purpose, as I understand the words, of having the question of the right to condemn her as a prize settled by a Prize Court.

In regard to our own Minister at Athens the inference which I draw from the evidence is that he also treated the question of the release of the Polurrian as a real question. On the arrival of the Polurrian at the Piræus he calls the attention of the master to his alleged admission to the admiral and tells him that he will have to go into court and give evidence. And indeed it was the British Minister who had from the first insisted that the Polurrian ought to come to the Piræus and be dealt with by a Prize Court: "Government considers prize, alleging captain having admitted was aware declaration war. British Minister had informed Greek Government must come Piræus and matter decided by Prize Court here." This is the effect of Henderson's telegram to Salvage Association, 28th Oct. 1912, at p. 43 of Correspondence.

The release of the Polurrian on the 8th Dec. was due, no doubt, mainly, to the fact that the evidence of her master, obtained after the arrival of the Polurrian at the Piræus, had then been shown to the Greek Government, and that the Government, after consulting the Legal Council of State, decided to accept his denial of knowledge of the war, and his denial of having intended in his interview with the Greek admiral to make any admission to the contrary. As to what the master thought at any time as to the prospect of the Polurrian being released, either soon or ultimately, I cannot find in the evidence any satisfactory proof, and I venture to think that the learned judge in the court below was under some misapprehension when he stated in the course of his judgment that the master in his evidence given in court said that practically all the officials that he saw expressed their own personal view that they had no right to touch the ship—that is to say, no right to condemn it—and he certainly did not think that the ship was not going to be restored within a reasonable time. At any rate, I have failed to find such a passage in the shorthand notes of his evidence taken at the trial. It is quité true that in a written statement which he gave to the underwriters' solicitors at Athens, made, as he deposed, "for the benefit of the underwriters in the interest of underwriters" and "against the Greeks," there are words which might have that effect.

The fair result of the evidence in regard to the position of the Polurrian on the 26th Oct., whether viewed apart from subsequent events, as I think it should be, or by the light of those events, was, in my judgment, one in which her ultimate release from capture was a matter of uncertainty. There was, of course, a possibility that she would be released after her cargo had been discharged without her being subjected to adjudication in the Greek Prize Court. There was a good ground for belief that the Greek Government would release the vessel, being a neutral vessel, as in fact they did, without waiting for the decision of a Prize Court, if that Government could be persuaded that the master of the Polurrian was pursuing his voyage in ignorance of the war, and that at all events the Prize Court would be satisfied of this when the evidence of the master was before it.

On the other hand, the Greek admiral believed that he had an admission from the master that he did know of the war, and both he and the Greek Government did take the view which finds expression in the judgment given by the Greek Prize Court as appears by their judgment, published the 29th Oct. 1913, that if this knowledge existed "it could well be considered that both the vessel and the cargo were subject to seizure," or, as Henderson's telegram from Athens of the 28th Oct. puts it, and Harris and Dixon's letter to the plaintiffs of the same date puts it, that the Polurrian might be considered a lawful prize. Even if the Polurrian should be released, either by the Greek Government or by the decision of a Prize Court, the date of such release was obviously uncertain—it might be weeks, or months, or longer before the matter would be settled.

Assuming that this was, as it appears to me to have been, the true position of affairs, I am of opinion that if the present action had come to be decided before the Marine Insurance Act 1906 had come into force the plaintiffs would have been held to have been entitled to recover upon the policy of insurance as for a constructive total loss. The material section of this Act is sect. 60, sub-sects. (1) (2), which are as follows:

(1) Subject to any express provision in the policy, there is a constructive total loss where the subject-matter insured is reasonably abandoned on account of its actual loss appearing to be unavoidable, or because it could not be preserved from actual total loss without an expenditure which would exceed its value when the expenditure had been incurred. (2) In particular there is a constructive total loss—(i.) Where the assured is deprived of the possession of his ship or goods by a peril insured against, and (a) it is unlikely that he can recover the ship or goods, as the case may be, or (b) the cost of recovering the ship or goods, as the case may be, would exceed their value when recovered.

According to the law as it stood before the passing of that Act, the seizure or arrest or detention of a vessel for that which is either avowedly or obviously a temporary purpose, which will end within a period not, from the commercial standpoint, unreasonably long, as in the case cited by Arnould on Marine Insurance (9th edit., vol. ii., s. 1108) from Emerigon, gives no ground of abandonment. But if the taking of the vessel, lawful or unlawful, out of the possession of the owner was, at the date of the commencement of the owner's action to enforce his notice of abandonment, a taking which still continued in operation, and the owner's loss of the use and disposal of the ship, once total, was at that date one which might be permanent and was, at any rate, of uncertain continuance, the owner who had duly given notice of abandonment was held by English law entitled to recover upon his insurance for a constructive total loss.

In giving judgment in Goss v. Withers (2 Burr. 683), Lord Mansfield, in a passage which is quoted by Lord Halsbury in Andersen v. Marten (99 L. T. Rep. 254; (1908) A. C. 334, at p. 340) observed (at p. 694 of 2 Burr.): "The ship is lost by the capture; though she be never condemned at all, nor carried into any port or fleet of the enemy. And the insurer must pay the value." And again (at p. 696 of 2 Burr.) his Lordship said: "The better opinion of the books says 'sufficit semel extitesse conditionem, ad beneficium assecurati, de amissione navis; etiam quod postea sequeretur recuperatio. Nam per talem recuperationem, non poterit præjudicari assecurato.'"

In De Mattos v. Saunders (27 L. T. Rep. 120; L. Rep. 7 C. P. 570, at p. 579), Willes, J., in a passage which is quoted in the judgment of the Privy Council in Cossman v. West (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 233; 58 L. T. Rep. 122; 13 App. Cas.

160, at pp. 179, 180) said: "The cases cited of hostile seizure and condemnation by a Prize Court have no application. In such a case the original seizure is primâ facie a total loss." "A vessel by being captured is certainly lost to its owner; but, as in one case where the question arose, a vessel may be taken and retaken before anyone knows of the loss, and as the contract of insurance is mainly a contract of indemnity, one can see how the courts would struggle against a large profit being made out of such a contract": (per Lord Halsbury, L.C. in Sailing Ship Blairmore Company v. Macredie (8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 429; 79 L. T. Rep. 217; (1898) A. C. 593, at p. 599).

Marshall, in his standard work on the Law of Marine Insurance (4th edit., p. 403), after adverting to the law of France, which then fixed a period of six months before an arrest of a ship in Europe could be treated by the owner as a total loss, proceeds: "In England the rule is more just, for there, from the moment of a capture or arrest, the owners are considered as having lost their power over the ship and cargo, and are deprived of the free disposal of them; because, in the opinion of the merchant, his right of disposal being suspended or rendered uncertain, it is equivalent to a total deprivation. It is therefore unreasonable to oblige the insured to wait the event of a capture, detention, or embargo."

But whilst, if the law to be applied was the law as it stood before the Marine Insurance Act 1906 came into force, I should, as I have said, have held upon the facts as I understand them that the plaintiffs were entitled to succeed in this action, we have now to consider the case as the law has been established by the relevant provisions of that Act. It is an Act, as appears by its title, to codify the law relating to marine insurance, but if the court finds that in plain and unambiguous language it has altered pre-existing law, its duty is to decide in accordance with the change. The section which governs the present case is sect. 60 (1 and 2). So far as it relates to a constructive loss by capture that section runs thus: (1) Subject to any express provision in the policy, there is a constructive total loss where the subject-matter insured is reasonably abandoned on account of its actual total loss appearing to be unavoidable. . . . (2) In particular there is a constructive total loss (i) Where the assured is deprived of the possession of his ship . . . by a peril insured against, and (a) it is unlikely that he can recover the ship."

One may, I think, without disrespect, declare some regret that the two expressions "reasonably abandoned on account of its actual total loss appearing to be unavoidable" and "unlikely that he can recover the ship" should be used apparently to describe the same position of things. For in my view, at any rate, it is one thing to predicate that a total loss of a thing reasonably appears to be "unavoidable," and another to predicate that its recovery is "unlikely." Taking, however, the latter, and, as it seems to me, the less severe test of the right to treat a capture as constituting a constructive total loss, I think that the statute has modified the pre-existing law to the disadvantage of the assured.

One is always properly afraid of incompleteness in attempting a definition, but I venture to say that the test of "unlikelihood of recovery" has now been substituted for "uncertainty of recovery." The assured must now show two things—the first, that he has been deprived of the possession of his ship; the second, that it is unlikely that he can recover it. Whence the statute derived the phrase "unlikely that he can recover" as expressing a necessary condition of the assured's right to recover for a constructive total loss by capture I do not know. I have referred to many of the reported capture cases and have been unable to find it used judicially in any of them. But there it stands in the section of the Act of Parliament; its meaning is quite clear.

Therefore, in the present case, to enable the plaintiffs to succeed they must establish fully (1) that at the date of the commencement of this action they had been deprived of the possession of the Polurrian; (and (2) that it was not merely quite uncertain whether they would recover her within a reasonable time, but that the balance of probability was that they could not do so.

They have, as my brother Pickford has held, and I quite agree with him, made the first point good—the Greek captors did deprive the plaintiffs of the possession of their ship. Have they also shown that there was more likelihood that the plaintiffs would not, than that they would, recover her? The test is, in my humble judgment, one the application of which in this case is, and generally in similar cases of capture would be, very difficult to apply with any sense of satisfaction, because it necessarily involves conjecture and speculation as to what is likely to be the outcome of a number of possible contingencies.

Addressing myself, however, to the best of my ability to the question which this sect. 60 directs me to consider, my conclusion is that whilst I hold that on the 26th Oct.—the crucial date, because the date of the commencement of the plaintiffs' action—the recovery of the Polurrian by her owners was quite uncertain, I do not feel myself justified holding that the balance of probabilities has been proved so clearly against her recovery that I can say that such recovery was "unlikely."

This being so, the plaintiffs must be held to have failed to make out their case, and this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Pyman Steamship Company Limited v. Hull and Barnsley Railway Company. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Dock—Contract for use of—Unfitness of appurtenances at dock—Negligence—Damage to ship—Exemption clause in general words—Liability of dock owner.

The plaintiffs, owners of a steamship, claimed against the defendants, owners of a graving dock at Hull, damages for the defendants' alleged breach of a contract for reward in and about the dry-docking of the steamship. She suffered damage by reason of the unevenness of the block caps on which she rested. The unevenness was found to be due to the defendants' want of care. There were no statutory provisions relating to the defendants' rights and liabilities as dry-dock owners.

The steamship required painting, and the defendants let the dock for that purpose and did not do the painting themselves. She entered the dock under a contract with the defendants, by virtue of which dock dues were charged, and there were also charges for pumping and the use of blocks, shores, &c., which the defendants contracted to supply, the blocks being of the usual kind.

Clause 9 of the defendants' regulations was as follows: "The owner of a vessel using the graving dock must do so at his own risk, it being hereby expressly provided that the company are not to be responsible for any accident or damage to a vessel whilst in the graving dock, whatever may be the nature of such accident or damage or howsoever arising."

Held, that the defendants were exempted from liability by the terms of the above clause, which were so general that they would cover even a fundamental obligation, and that they were therefore not liable for negligence in providing uneven block caps.

Decision of Bailhache, J. (111 L. T. Rep. 41) affirmed.

Plaintiffs' appeal from a judgment of Bailhache, J. reported 12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 511; 111 L. T. Rep. 41; (1914) 2 K. B. 788.

The plaintiffs, owners of the steamship Marmion, claimed against the defendants, who were owners of a graving dock at Hull, damages for alleged breach of contract and duty in and about the dry-docking of the steamship Marmion.

The facts appear sufficiently from the headnote.

Bailhache, J. held that clause 9 of the defendants' regulations applied; that the defendants were negligent, but that the clause covered negligence and rendered the defendants immune from liability for the condition of the blocks.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Adair Roche, K.C. and W. N. Raeburn for the plaintiffs.—It is submitted that the antecedent obligation on the defendants was to provide proper blocks, and that that obligation was absolute, and that, as the defendants admittedly failed to supply proper blocks, they are not protected by clause 9 of their regulations. The defendants were bound to take all possible care, and the highest degree of skill, as, for instance, that care and skill that must be exercised by a person who lets out a carriage for hire. Here the general words of the clause are not sufficient to relieve the defendants from liability, and express words should have been used to secure that result. Bailhache, J. held that the words "however caused" were sufficient to cover negligence on the part of the defendants, and, in view of the recent decision in Joseph Travers and Sons v. Cooper (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 561; 111 L. T. Rep. 1088; (1915) 1 K. B. 73), that holding cannot now be disputed in this court. The obligation of the defendants was fundamental, just as the obligation which is on a shipowner to supply a seaworthy ship, and the cases dealing with the effect of unseaworthiness apply to the present case. They referred to Further, the position of clause 9 in reference to clause 11 is important. Clause 11 deals with the provision of the blocks, and from the position of the clauses the inference should be drawn that clause 9 was not intended to apply to or qualify the defendants' liability under clause 11.

Maurice Hill, K.C. and Burt (for Moss-Blundell, serving with His Majesty's forces), for the defendants, were not called upon to argue.

Feb. 16.—Lord Reading, C.J.—This is an appeal by the plaintiffs from a judgment of Bailhache, J. sitting without a jury, who gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiffs are steamship owners, and the defendants a railway company, who also carry on business as owners of dry docks. The question relates to the defendants' obligation in the capacity of dry-dock owners.

The steamship Marmion owned by the plaintiff company, entered the defendants' dry dock, and in consequence of the set of blocks which were provided for the ship to rest upon in the dock not having been evenly placed by those responsible for the working of the dock, damage was caused to the Marmion's bottom. The amount of that damage measured in money has been estimated by the learned judge at 284*l*.

The question upon which the case has turned is whether or not clause 9 of the defendants' regulations, which are incorporated in the contract between the plaintiffs and the defendants, excludes the defendants from liability for negligence in the performance of their contract to provide blocks, or for failure to provide blocks, as fit and proper as care and skill could possibly make them. No question arises upon this appeal as to the negligence of the defendants, or as to their failure to perform the obligation to provide fit and proper blocks, or to use blocks which were placed in a fit and proper way so as to support the vessel without causing it damage. The learned judge has found that there was such negligence or failure to perform, and that finding of fact has not been challenged.

The learned judge, however, exempted the defendants from liability, and gave judgment in their favour, because he felt bound to give effect to his interpretation and construction of clause 9 of the regulations, and everything in this appeal turns upon the meaning to be attributed to the words of this clause 9.

Now, the contract between the parties is for the use of the defendants' graving dock by the steamer Marmion, and the plaintiffs further "accept, agree to, and undertake to act in conformity with the company's graving dock regulations in force in respect of such user of the dock as per printed copy thereof forming part of this agreement, and engage prior to the vessel leaving the company's dock to pay the graving dock rent pumping, and user of blocks caps at the following rates." Then follow certain rates provided for the pumping, the rent, and the use of the block caps.

The regulations which formed part of the contract are: "The company's graving dock must be used subject to their regulations and to the following conditions." Then clause 9 runs as follows: "The owner of a vessel using the graving dock must do so at his own risk, it being hereby expressly provided that the company are not to be responsible for any accident or damage to a vessel going into or out of or whilst in the graving dock, whatever may be the nature of such accident or damage, or howsoever arising, nor for loss occasioned by delay in getting vessels into or out of the dock; nor shall the company be liable for any injury to persons employed at vessels while using the graving dock."

Looking at the language of this clause, and given its ordinary significance, the words undoubtedly are wide enough to cover an exemption to the dock owners from all liability arising from the user of the graving dock. I think that when one speaks of the user of the graving dock with all its appurtenances for use as a graving dock, that means the graving dock with block caps, pumps, horizontal shores, trestles, and staging planks, which are all requisites of the user of a graving dock. The word "user" certainly goes far enough. In the first instance it is said that the owner of a vessel using the dock must do so at his own risk. Then the company are not to be responsible for any accident or damage, whatever may be the nature of the accident or damage, or howsoever arising. With reference to those last words "or howsoever arising," there has been undoubtedly some difficulty in arriving at the true view, and as to whether those words are to be construed as meaning arising from any cause whatever, and whether they would be sufficient to release the contractors from liability caused by any negligence.

It is sufficient for the purpose of this case to say that, although the point is raised before us as to the meaning of those words for the purpose of saving the point should it be thought desirable to raise it elsewhere, the decision in Joseph Travers and Sons v. Cooper (111 L. T. Rep. 1088; (1915) 1 K. B. 73) is binding upon this court, and therefore we are bound to hold, and do hold, that those words must be construed as having the widest possible application.

The plaintiffs say that, notwithstanding that they must admit for the purpose of this case that Joseph Travers and Sons v. Cooper (111 L. T. Rep. 1088; (1915) 1 K. B. 73) binds this court, and that therefore those words must be read with the very widest meaning to which I have already referred, those words "howsoever arising," looking at the contract as a whole, and bearing in mind its nature, terms, and—they add—the sequence of clauses, this court should come to the conclusion that this clause was intended to have only a limited operation, and that full effect could be given to the words of the agreement, and the language used in that clause, if we so construed it as to limit its operation to accident or damage to the vessel once it has arrived in the graving dock, and for anything that might occur in the graving dock, but that the clause should not apply to the obligations imposed upon the dock owner to provide proper block caps for use in the dock. They said that it is not necessary that the language should be so construed; that, looking at the decisions to which our attention has been called, the courts have construed, not these words, but somewhat similar words, in a limited sense, and therefore we should do the same in this case.

The argument which was addressed to us was that this obligation to provide block caps is, in the language used in the discussion in the case, a fundamental obligation of the contract. Sometimes, it is said, it is a "primary object of the contract," or it is one of the "initial obligations of the contract." I do not propose, in deciding this case, to discuss the exact meaning to be given to those expressions, because it seems to me that their meaning does not arise for our decision in this case. It seems to me that assuming, as I will for the purpose of the argument, that the obligation to provide blocks and block caps is a fundamental or initial obligation of the contract, the language used in clause 9 is such that we must read it as covering failure to perform any such obligation, and covering negligence arising from a want of care in the performance of such obligation. Looking at the clause from the various points of view that have been put forward to us by counsel for the plaintiffs, it seems to me that one must inevitably arrive at the conclusion that what was intended by the parties when they entered into this contract was that the graving dock should be used with all its appurtenances, but it should be used at the owners' risk. The shipowners were to make certain payments for the use of the dock, and for the use of the blocks and other appurtenances, but in no case were they to have any claim against the owners of the dock for any accident or damage which might be caused to their vessel.

This seems to me to dispose entirely of the case, and to make it unnecessary to discuss the various authorities to which our attention has been called. In all these cases there has been considerable difficulty in arriving at a reconciliation of all the authorities and decisions upon the meaning of clauses in contracts of this description. In truth those decisions turned upon the actual words of the clause. The principle which is to be deduced from them is, I think, as Mr. Roche rightly contended, that it may be that by the language employed and the subject-matter of the contract you are able to find that the clause was intended by the parties to be read only in the limited sense, and that when you have an absolute obligation, such as, for example, the warranty of seaworthiness in a ship, and a contract of carriage or affreightment is entered into, you must find from the language of the contract words which indicate that it was intended to exempt the shipowner from liability for breach of that warranty, and that you would not ordinarily read into words of general exemption an extension of the exemption to such an obligation as that. But, even so, it is quite plain that in law the language used may be sufficient to exclude the shipowners even from such an obligation. It may be by express words; it may be by necessary implication to be gathered from the language which has been used in the contract; but in any event you must find in the contract words which would justify the exemption of the shipowner for a breach of that obligation, and, unless you do find them quite clearly, the courts have said that he is to be held liable.

I only wish to add one word upon an argument addressed to us that because this exemption clause is to be found in clause 9 of the regulations and the provisions with regard to the blocks, which are to be found in clauses 11 and 12 of the regulations, that therefore we are to infer that the provisions as to the blocks were not included in the exemption in clause 9, but that we must read that as applying only to the obligations which preceded clause 9.

I think it impossible to give effect to that argument. One clause must succeed the other. If there is to be more than the one clause, there must be some order, and it is impossible to say that because of the numbers that are given to the clauses, or because one clause follows another, therefore you are to eliminate the meaning which you would otherwise give to the words. It seems to me to come back to this: that everything must depend upon the meaning to be given to the words of clause 9, and if they have the wide application which I think they must have, having regard to the language used in the clause, then it must follow, whatever the position in which we may find the clause, that the dock-owners are exempted from this liability.

Therefore, in my judgment, though, perhaps, not for the same reasons, I agree with the decision of Bailhache, J., and think that this appeal must be dismissed.

Swinfen Eady, L.J.—In this case the plaintiffs' ship suffered damage in the defendants' graving dock. It appears that the tops of the blocks on which the ship Marmion rested were uneven in height, and when, after the water was let out of the dock, the ship rested, it rested unevenly on those blocks, whereby the frame sustained some strain, and the forward plates were set up and damaged; and in consequence of that the ship sustained damage to the extent of some 284*l*.

The question which arises in this action is whether the defendants, the dock company, are liable for the amount of that damage.

The ship entered the graving dock under the terms of a contract in writing, and, in my opinion, the rights of the parties depend upon the true construction of the contract. There is no doubt that the vessel sustained this damage whilst in the graving dock. [His Lordship read clause 9 of the defendants' regulations, and continued:] Primâ facie it is obvious the language of that clause covers the events that have happened here. The ship sustained damage whilst in the graving dock, and the provision is that, whatever the nature of the accident or damage or howsoever arising, the dock company are not to be liable, and that the owner of a vessel is to use the dock at his own risk.

But then it is said that although those are general words of wide import, they are not to be construed in this case so as to exclude the liability of the dock owner for damage, because the damage arises in the present case, it is true, while the vessel was in the dock, but in consequence of a neglect of the defendants to provide proper block caps, and that ought to have been done before the vessel entered the dock, and that there was a fundamental obligation, an obligation which went to the whole root of the contract, to provide block caps in proper position on which the vessel could safely rest. Therefore it is like the cases of unseaworthiness, where the obligation of the shipowner is to provide a ship that shall be seaworthy; and reliance was placed upon cases that have arisen, mostly cases with regard to ships, where it has been held that the obligation of the shipowner is such that the exemption from liability for damage occurring by particular clauses in the contract extends only to damage that shall arise after the voyage has commenced, and not to damage arising from the unseaworthy condition of the ship which the shipowner supplied. For instance, one of the cases cited, The West Cock (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 57; 104 L. T. Rep. 736; (1911) P. 208), was a case of towing, and there it was held that the special conditions of exemption for damage related only to defects occurring after the commencement of the voyage and not to a pre-existing defect in the tug. Similarly, Tattersall v. National Steamship Company Limited (5 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 206; 50 L. T. Rep. 299; 12 Q.B. Div. 297) was a case where cattle caught foot-and-mouth disease from being placed on an infected ship which was not seaworthy for that purpose. At the commencement of the voyage the ship was unfit for the purpose, and therefore the terms of the contract relied upon only related to the carriage of the goods upon the voyage, and the damage arose from the unseaworthy condition of the ship before the commencement of the voyage.

Cases of that kind were prayed in aid in support of the argument in the present case. It seems to me they have no application to it.

Here the contract was for the use of a particular dock which is described in the contract. The shipowner was to use that dock at his own risk, and whatever the damage arose from while the vessel was in that dock, in my opinion, it is covered by clause 9, and the dock owner is exempted from liability.

It is not a case of whether the shipowner has or has not to pay for block caps not provided in accordance with the contract. It is not that case at all. It is a case whether the dock company is liable for the damage to the ship by reason of not providing block caps which were suitable and of the requisite height.

In my opinion the exemption from damage is comprised in and entirely covered by clause 9, and on that ground the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover against the owners of the dock, and the appeal should be dismissed.

Bray, J.—I am of the same opinion.

What we have to do here is to construe clause 9 of the regulations having reference to the remaining clauses of the contract.

We have had considerable argument as to what is a fundamental obligation, and as to whether that includes cases where the liability is absolute, or where the liability is only to use reasonable care or all possible care. I think it is unnecessary to go into those considerations.

I will assume for the moment here that there was as to the graving dock, and as to the blocks, the duty, and, if you like, the absolute duty, to provide a fit dock and proper block caps put in proper position. I do not say that it is the construction of the contract, but for the purpose of this case I am willing to assume it. I should, however, like to guard myself especially against saying that there was any absolute contract to provide a fit dock here. There was a warranty of some kind. For the purpose of this case I assume it was as wide as possible.

Then the question which remains is this: Whether clause 9 of the regulations is wide enough to exempt the defendants from a breach of contract in respect of that liability. The clause begins in these words: "The owner of a vessel using the graving dock must do so at his own risk." The words "owner's risk" and the meaning of those words are now well known, particularly in the contracts of railway companies. Railway companies, in carrying goods, are under certain obligations under the Railway and Canal Acts, and they have to give a choice of two rates. One rate is called the ordinary rate, and the other is called the "owner's risk rate"; and the owner's risk rate covers what is meant by "owner's risk." It means what it says. The clause in question begins with the words I have read, and then it follows on explaining the meaning of those words, and making sure that they are to include every possible damage: "Any accident or damage to a vessel going into or out of or whilst in the graving dock, whatever may be the nature of such accident or damage or howsoever arising." It is difficult to use wider words than those, and although undoubtedly we must see that the construction that we are proposing to put upon this clause is a clear construction, because ambiguous words are not sufficient, and the words must be clear in order to exempt from a liability which would otherwise enure, yet it seems to me that these words are quite clear so far as regards the graving dock. Now, it is quite true that we must read the words "graving dock" as meaning something more than the dock itself in order to exempt the company here. I think the remaining words of the section are sufficient to show that, because the words "any accident or damage" follow the words that I have read. There is clause 13, which says: "The owner of any vessel using the graving dock will be held responsible to the company should any person employed in connection with the vessel cut, destroy, or injure the walls, floor, or any of the blocks, machines, pitch boilers, cranes, tackle, or other appendages to the graving dock." In my opinion, the words "graving dock" in clause 9 include the graving dock and all its appendages. I do not think it is material to notice the exact position of these clauses. I cannot think that it could have been the intention of the parties that the defendants should be exempted from all liability for any defect in the dock in carrying on the business of the dock, and that, although they are exempt from that liability with regard to the dock, are yet to be liable in respect of such small things as these block caps.

In my opinion the decision of Bailhache, J. was right.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Feb. 2 and 3, 1915.

(Before BAILHACHE, J.)

MATSOUKIS v. PRIESTMAN AND CO. (a)

Contract to build ship—Delivery within specified time—Exceptions—Delay—Force majeure—Vis major—Coal strike—Indirect effect of—Breakdown of machinery.

By an agreement in writing dated the 21st Feb. 1912 the defendants agreed to build a steamer for the plaintiff and deliver her on or before the 28th Feb. 1913. The agreement contained (inter alia) the following clause: "If the said steamer is not delivered entirely ready to purchaser at the above-mentioned time, the builders hereby agree to pay to the purchaser for liquidated damages, and not by way of penalty, the sum of 10*l. sterling for each day of delay and in reduction of the prices stipulated in this contract, being excepted only the cause of* force majeure and (or) strikes of workmen of the building yard where the vessel is being built, or the workshops where the machinery is being made, or at the works where steel is being manufactured for the steamer, or any works of any sub-contractor."

The steamer was not delivered till the 22nd Aug. 1913, and in order to get delivery the plaintiff paid under protest the full price without any deduction for delay. Owing to the coal strike of 1912 there was a delay of seventy days and a further delay of seven days on account of a breakdown of machinery and a shipwrights' strike. There was also some delay due to bad weather, to the absence of men attending football matches, and attending the funeral of their manager. The plaintiff claimed as damages or money had and received by the defendants to his use 1750*l., or* 10*l. per day for every day's delay in delivery after the 28th Feb.* 1913.

Held, that the words force majeure covered the delay occasioned by the consequential results of the coal strike and also breakdown of machinery, but did not include the other matters claimed.

COMMERCIAL COURT.

Action tried by Bailhache, J.

The plaintiff, Jean Gerassime Matsoukis, of Roumania, claimed damages for delay in the delivery of a steamship built by the defendants at their yard in Sunderland at the request of the plaintiff.

The plaintiff pleaded that by an agreement in writing made between the Bank of Athens, as agents for the plaintiff, and the defendants, the latter agreed to build a steamer and deliver her at Sunderland afloat and ready for sea on or before the 20th Feb. 1913. It was provided that if the steamer was not delivered entirely ready at the time mentioned the defendants were to pay to the plaintiff the sum of 10*l.* for each day of delay and in deduction of the price stipulated in the contract. He said the defendants did not deliver the steamer on the date agreed, and failed to deliver her until the 22nd Aug. 1913. The plaintiff paid the price stipulated for in the contract without deduction in respect of the delay under protest in order to get delivery of the steamer, and he claimed as damages, or as money had and received, 1750*l.*, being 10*l.* per day for every day's delay in delivery after the 28th Feb. 1913, and, in addition, 518*l.* interest at 5 per cent.

By their points of defence the defendants admitted that the steamer was not delivered until the 22nd Aug., but they denied that any breach of the agreement was committed, and that the delay was wholly due to causes within the exception clause of the contract, which was as follows:

> If the steamer is not delivered entirely ready to purchaser on or before the 28th Feb. 1913, the builders hereby agree to pay to the purchaser for liquidated damages, and not by way of penalty, the sum of 10*l.* for each day of delay, and in deduction of the price stipulated in this contract, being excepted only the cause of force majeure, strikes of workmen of the building yard where the vessel is being built, or the workshops where the machinery is being made, or at the works where steel is being manufactured for the steamer, or any works of any sub-contractor. In case of strikes or any cause of delay, as above, the builders are to advise immediately the purchaser, and at the beginning of the strike.

Among the items causing the delay were the following: Bad weather caused sixteen days' delay, shipwrights' strike two days, breakdown of machinery in Sunderland works three and three-quarter days, delay in supply of materials eleven days, football matches and holidays seven days, funeral of a Mr. Knox one day, miners' strike 182 days, making a grand total, according to the defendants, of 222 days.

BAILHACHE, J.—This action was brought by Mr. Matsoukis, who is a Roumanian gentleman, against Messrs. Priestman and Co., who are shipbuilders in this country, on a contract to build a ship, which is dated the 21st Feb. 1912. The action was tried before myself and a City of London special jury, and there was one question of fact left to them. It was this: Assuming that Mr. Priestman was entitled to an allowance for the delay occasioned indirectly by the Welsh coal strike, how much time ought he to be allowed in respect of this?

The jury found in respect of this he should be allowed seventy days. The total amount of the delay was 175 days; seventy from 175 leaves 105. He was to be liable for this in any case, but for the fact that there were two other exceptions, in respect of which I think he is entitled to time. This is in respect of the shipwrights' strike and breakdown of machinery. Allowing seven days for this, this would bring the total amount which was due to 980*l.* A question of interest has been agreed between the parties at 20*l.*, and this is the only question which has been agreed between the parties.

The only question about which I have found a great deal of difficulty in the case is whether the consequential result of the Welsh coal strike, which, according to the verdict of the jury, delayed the vessel by seventy days, can be said to be covered by exceptions in the contract. The contract is to deliver the ship on the 28th Feb. 1913, and unless Mr. Priestman can bring this Welsh coal strike within the exceptions, then he is not entitled to the allowance of the seventy days which the jury by their finding have given him.

The question turns upon the construction of the contract. The contract says that if the steamer is not delivered on the due date, the plaintiff agrees to be paid as liquidated damages 10*l.* a day in deduction of the price stipulated in the contract. Then comes the clause, which is written in English, it is true, but obviously by a gentleman who is not familiar with English idiom, but, still, it is plain enough. It goes on to except the cause of force majeure, strikes of workmen in building yard where the ship is being built, or in the machinery shops, or works of sub-contractors; and the question is, what is the meaning of the words force majeure in the contract.

Mr. Hudson has argued for the plaintiff that the words force majeure can never in any circumstances cover the strike or consequence of a strike, and that in particular they cannot do it in this case because, if I take the whole of the clause and read it together, I ought to find that strikes are a special cause of exception, and that I ought to find these strikes are excluded by the fact that strikes are specifically referred to in the clause.

My own opinion about the matter has fluctuated a great deal in the case, although the clause as it stands seems simple enough. The words force majeure are not words which are appropriate to an English contract, and they are not common in an English contract. They are taken from the Code of Napoleon, and they were inserted in this contract by a Roumanian gentleman or by his advisers, who no doubt were familiar with the words as used in the Code of Napoleon and as used on the Continent. We have had the opinion of a Belgian lawyer, and he says the words as understood in Belgium and on the Continent mean a cause you cannot prevent or avoid and for which you are not responsible.

Mr. Hudson argued that the words practically meant the same as vis major, which in substance means very nearly the same as act of God. In my construction of the words I am influenced to some extent by the fact that they were inserted by this foreign gentleman, who was familiar with the meaning of the words upon the Continent.

But I am not sure that on this account I should be entitled or bound to give them the full meaning they have on the Continent. I am not going to attempt to give any definition of the words force majeure. But I am quite satisfied I ought to give them a meaning which is more extensive than the meaning we give to the words "act of God," or the words vis major. The trouble is how much can I extend the meaning? I think the strike was anticipated in this sense, that it was obvious a strike might take place, although it was common knowledge everybody was expecting that such a disaster as a national strike would be avoided. The strike took place.

The result was that, as far as Mr. Priestman was concerned, the yards from which he had contracted to get his materials for other ships, not this one, got very much behindhand in their supplies. We all know that shipbuilding in shipyards can only be done upon certain ways or berths, and Mr. Priestman had four berths, but had other ships to build besides this, and he had in contemplation to build this ship in berth No. 2, after another ship numbered No. 239.

The result of the coal strike, and his inability to obtain materials and coal, was this: Ship No. 239 occupied the berth for a great deal longer than it otherwise would have done. The result was that the berth was detained, and that the plaintiff's ship could not be laid down in the berth until some time in October. As a matter of fact, it was not laid down until December. Now, could, under such circumstances, the delay be described as coming under the words force majeure if it had been a direct result of the coal strike?

The delay was caused by the general dislocation not only in all of Mr. Priestman's business, but all businesses in the North of England, such as that of makers of steel plates and things of this kind, and a general dislocation of the whole businesses in the North of England. In my opinion—although, as I say, my opinion has fluctuated from time to time during the arguments in the case—I think I should be right in saying, justified in saying, that, under the circumstances, this strike constituted a case of force majeure.

If I were to give the words force majeure the full meaning which the Belgian gentleman said they had on the contract, there would be no doubt about it at all. I think the events which happened, this calamity of a universal coal strike, could completely dislocate all the businesses in the North, and so, by delaying the building of the ship in front of the plaintiff's ship, could come within the reasonable meaning of the words force majeure.

I think, therefore, Mr. Priestman to this extent is absolved from delay. This delay did not operate directly on the plaintiff's ship, and if it had been a case of building a ship which is to be built at a berth in turn, I should have had great doubt whether the words force majeure could be held to apply to a case of this kind. But, having regard to the way in which the ship was built and to the berthing, and to Mr. Priestman's right to carry on his business that way, I think I am justified in holding that the defendants are entitled to be absolved.

Then Mr. Priestman wanted an allowance in respect of bad weather, shipwrights' strike, breakdown in machinery, football, and a funeral. So far as the shipwrights' strike is concerned, this comes within the clause. I think the words force majeure cover breakdowns in the machinery. But when I come to bad weather, football matches, and funerals, then I think the words force majeure cannot in any circumstances be held to cover such things. So far as weather is concerned, I have no doubt that Mr. Priestman, in making the contract, took into account the ordinary weather one experiences in Sunderland, and took care to allow himself some time for this.

The time he stipulated for to build the ship was twelve months and a week, when the actual operation of the building of the ship does not take more than six or seven months.

I shall give effect to the finding of the jury, and allow him seventy days, which they have held was due to the general dislocation of the business in the North of England in consequence of the Welsh coal strike. Then there are seven days for the shipwrights' strike and breakdown in the machinery shop. I am told this leaves the number of days as ninety-eight, and for this the sum of 980*l.* is due. Then Mr. Hudson wants interest in respect of a certain sum, and the parties have sensibly agreed at 20*l.* interest. Add this to 980*l.*, and you have 1000*l.*, and I give judgment for this amount for the plaintiff, with costs.

LISTON AND OTHERS v. OWNERS OF STEAMSHIP CARPATHIAN. (a)

Seaman—Wages—Outbreak of war—War risks—Agreement for extra remuneration — Right to recover—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 113, 114).

The risks of war not being contemplated by seamen when they undertake a commercial voyage, they are entitled, when there is a reasonable belief of risk from mines or of capture on the voyage home, to refuse to put to sea. A contract, therefore, made by the master of the ship to pay them extra wages to incur such risks is binding on the owners.

ACTION tried by Coleridge, J. without a jury.

The plaintiffs were engaged as seamen on the steamship Carpathian, a British ship, on a commercial voyage from Tilbury Dock, London, to Port Arthur, Texas, and to a final port of destination in the United Kingdom, the period of engagement not to exceed one year. While at Port Arthur news arrived of the declaration of a state of war as between England and Germany. The ship's crew were also made aware of the presence in the vicinity of a German cruiser called the Karlsruhe. The plaintiffs thereupon refused to proceed to sea and complete the voyage, on account of the extra risk due to the outbreak of war, unless they received extra remuneration. The master, being unable otherwise to obtain their services, signed an agreement to pay them an extra 12*l.* each to take the ship home. The agreement ran as follows :—

> Steamship Carpathian, Port Arthur, Sunday, Aug. 16, 1914.—The following men having refused to proceed to sea unless I promise to give them twelve pounds each to take the steamer to her final port in the United Kingdom, I hereby promise that amount in order to enable me to proceed to sea.

(a) Reported by L. H. BARNES, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The owners of the ship, on her arrival in England, refusing to pay, the plaintiffs, who were seven in number, brought this action to recover the sum of 84*l.* as wages, being 12*l.* due to each plaintiff under the above-mentioned agreement. By their defence, the defendants contended that the master had no authority to enter into the alleged or any agreement, and that, if any agreement was made, it was made without consideration.

By sect. 113 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60) :

> The master of every ship . . . shall enter into an agreement . . . in accordance with this Act with every seaman whom he carries to sea as one of his crew from any port in the United Kingdom.

By sect. 114 "an agreement with the crew shall be in a form approved by the Board of Trade . . . and shall be signed by the master before a seaman signs the same," and "shall contain" (inter alia) "the amount of wages which each seaman is to receive."

Ivor Bowen, K.C. and S. Duncan for the plaintiffs.—The master is the agent of the owners of the ship for all purposes, and has a general authority. He engages the seamen. War having broken out new risks had arisen which were not contemplated when the plaintiffs undertook the voyage. It is not necessary to show that the risk amounts to danger to life. It is sufficient that a new risk has arisen which is not a commercial risk such as the articles contemplated. See > Palace Shipping Company v. Caine, 97 L. T. Rep. 587 ; (1907) A. C. 386.

Here the ship, being a belligerent vessel, was liable to capture. The plaintiffs were therefore entitled to leave the ship and to refuse to continue the voyage unless they received extra remuneration. See > O'Neil v. Armstrong, Mitchell, and Co., 73 L. T. Rep. 178 ; (1895) 2 Q. B. Div. 418.

The agreement was made for a sufficient consideration and is binding on the owners.

A. Neilson for the defendants.—This agreement is not enforceable against the owners. For more than 100 years it has been held as a principle of law that seamen are not entitled to claim for their services as seamen any sum beyond the wages specified in the articles unless there is evidence that an extra risk has arisen which is a real risk to life. There is no evidence that there was any such risk to life in this case. The master, therefore, had no implied authority to make this agreement on behalf of the owners. He referred to COLERIDGE, J.—This case raises an important point involving questions of both law and fact. The plaintiffs, seven seamen, bring an action for 12*l.* each under an agreement made with the master of the steamship Carpathian at Port Arthur, Texas, on the 16th Aug. 1914. The question which I have to decide is whether these men can upon that contract recover this extra remuneration for their services as seamen against the owners of the ship. It involves the further question whether the master of the ship had implied authority to make such a bargain on behalf the owners. [His Lordship then stated the facts as set out above, and continued:]

The test which I must apply is whether the seamen, under the circumstances, were discharged from their obligation to serve any further on the vessel. If they were so discharged, the cases all go to show that the master could not punish them for not serving, could not enforce their service, and had implied authority from the owners to make such a contract as is sued upon in this action to get them to serve and to incur the war risks, whatever they might be, by the promise of increased remuneration. The question, therefore, is, whether the seamen could have legally remained on shore and declined to join the ship when it sailed. It is quite clear that seamen who engage in service as seamen cannot demand to be released from their contract—for that is what a request for increased remuneration really amounts to—merely because they do not like the conditions, or because there happens to come a storm, or because under certain circumstances, such as illness among the crew, they are asked to do a little more work. They undertake to give their whole time, and they undertake certain risks of navigation which are well known to them all, and all those risks are in the contemplation of the parties when the wages are fixed. But it is quite clear that it is not in the contemplation of the parties when they make a contract that war will break out between the country to which the ship belongs and another country, both being maritime powers, and both having vessels of war which may or may not overrun the very portion of the sea through which the ship has to pass on her voyage. Primâ facie if there is a war risk, it is not necessarily a risk to life. There are circumstances in which a risk to life has been held to be a ground for discharging a contract; it is not necessary, however, for me to discuss them now, as that is not the guiding point of my judgment in this case. The real point is whether there were war risks which, in the reasonable contemplation of the parties, might involve capture at sea, for that is certainly not one of the risks which you undertake on a commercial voyage.

What were the risks which reasonable seamen might contemplate in this case? The Carpathian was bound for Rotterdam, and had, therefore, not only to cross the Atlantic within possible sight of the Karlsruhe, but also to pass up the English Channel, where other German war vessels, as well as mines, might be encountered.

The mere fact that war existed between two powers might not involve any substantial risk, or, indeed, any risk at all, on a voyage at sea, even though the vessel belonged to one of the belligerent powers. In this case, the risk of capture was, in fact, so great that the vessel proceeded across the Atlantic without lights, and, indeed, when she reached the English Channel she was diverted from her course by a British cruiser and told that she could not proceed to Rotterdam, and found her ultimate port of destination in London, the voyage, owing to the war risks, not being able to be carried out.

I must not, however, consider as decisive what happened after these plaintiffs considered themselves free from the contract. The question is, what was the reasonableness of their conduct in seeking to be discharged from their contract?

I think that they might reasonably have taken into consideration not only the risk of the ship being captured by the enemy, but also the risk run throughout the voyage from mines, which, even if everyone obeyed the laws of the Hague Convention, would not be altogether eliminated. Moreover, there were risks not only from the Karlsruhe, but, in their progress up the channel, from other German war vessels.

It seems to me, therefore, that it was perfectly reasonable in the circumstances to consider that, although it did not amount to a certainty, there was not only some risk, but every risk, of the capture of this vessel. Under these circumstances, I am clearly of opinion that the crew were justified in remaining on shore in Texas and refusing to proceed on the voyage. They were therefore discharged from their obligation to sail, and the master, being unable to compel them to serve, was impliedly clothed with authority from the owners to make such reasonable contract with them as he could to obtain their services. That contract is binding on the owners. I therefore give judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount claimed.

Dec. 10, 11, and 12, 1914.

OLYMPIA OIL AND CAKE COMPANY LIMITED v. PRODUCE BROKERS COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Contract—Sale of goods—Appropriation of cargo to buyers—Arbitration clause—"All disputes from time to time arising out of this contract"—Award—Finding of arbitrator as to custom of trade—Whether conclusive or conditional—Jurisdiction of arbitrators.

In connection with a contract for the sale of goods a dispute had arisen between the parties as to whether a certain tender was a good tender or not. That question was referred to arbitration under the clause in the contract and an award was duly made. That was carried to the board of appeal and they stated a special case for the opinion of the court. Certain questions were put to the court, and the material one was whether under the terms of a certain contract there could be a valid tender or appropriation of a cargo shipped on board the C. to the buyers at a time when the vessel was wrecked and the cargo had become a total loss. The Divisional Court answered those questions in the negative: (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 570; 111 L. T. Rep. 1107). Thereupon the matter went back to the board of appeal and they made an award in which they stated that, while they "unreservedly accepted the said answers upon the construction of the contract as a matter of law, apart from the custom of the trade," they nevertheless found that there was a long-established and well-recognised custom of the trade by which, in the circumstances of this contract, there was an appropriation of the cargo to the buyers.

On a motion to the court by the buyers to set aside the award:

Held, that the arbitrators had no jurisdiction to find conclusively the existence of a trade custom. The motion to set aside the award must therefore stand adjourned, both parties to be at liberty to file further affidavits on the question as to the existence of the alleged custom.

Decision of the Divisional Court (Horridge and Rowlatt, JJ.) affirmed.

APPEAL by the Produce Brokers Company Limited from the decision of the Divisional Court (Horridge and Rowlatt, JJ.) upon a motion to set aside an award of arbitrators.

This was a motion by the Olympia Oil and Cake Company Limited (hereinafter called the buyers) to set aside the award of the board of appeal of the Incorporated Oil Seed Association, dated the 25th June 1914, acting in an arbitration between the buyers and the Produce Brokers Company Limited (hereinafter called the sellers).

On the 30th May 1912 the sellers agreed to sell and the buyers agreed to buy 6000 (10 per cent. more or less) tons of 22401b. each Harbin and (or) Dalny Soya beans to be shipped from an Oriental port or ports during Dec. 1912 and (or) Jan. 1913 by steamer direct or indirect viâ Suez Canal or Cape to Hull, at 7*l.* 18*s.* 9*d.* per ton, gross weight, ex ship, usual new bags included. The contract provided: "If shipped as a cargo buyers to have the option of charter-party."

Clause 3 of the contract provided:

Particulars of shipment, with date of bill or bills of lading and approximate weights, marks (if any), and number of bags to be declared by original sellers not later than forty days from the date of last bill of lading. . . . In case of resales copy of original appropriation shall be accepted by buyers and passed on without delay. Buyers shall not object to slight deviations in marks so long as the beans can be identified on arrival as the bonâ fide shipment intended to be delivered on the declaration. . . .

Clause 10 of the contract provided:

This contract is to be void as regards any portion shipped that may not arrive by the ship or ships declared against this contract, and also if shipment or delivery be prevented by embargo, hostilities, prohibition of export, or blockade.

The form of contract used was the printed form of contract issued by the Incorporated Oil Seed Association for adoption by persons engaged in the oil seed trade in sales of cargoes of Manchurian Soya beans with slight variations adopted by the parties.

By a contract dated the 9th Sept. 1912 the sellers purchased from the East Asiatic Company (the shippers of the cargo), under a contract similar to the above-mentioned contract, an identical quantity of 6000 tons, 10 per cent. more or less, Harbin and (or) Dalny Soya beans for shipment in Dec. 1912 and (or) Jan. 1913.

By letter dated the 24th Jan. 1913 the sellers informed the buyers that they had not yet received a tender, but believed that the same would be in the Canterbury.

On the 29th Jan. 1913 the sellers agreed to purchase from the buyers 6000 tons Harbin and (or) Dalny Soya beans, December-January, to Hull, and stated in their letter of this date confirming the purchase: "We shall put this against our sale to you of the 30th May 1912."

On or about the 4th Feb. 1913 the sellers received a notice of appropriation of 6400-6600 tons per Canterbury, stated to have sailed from Vladivostok on the 31st Jan. By letter dated the 4th Feb. the sellers declared and appropriated this shipment to their contract with the buyers, and claimed that the buyers should retender the same in fulfilment of the contract of the 29th Jan. 1913.

The Canterbury sailed from Vladivostok on the evening of the 3rd Feb., and shortly after sailing struck submerged rocks fifteen miles from Karatsu. She was towed off on the 4th Feb, but foundered immediately afterwards. The loss was known in London at about 3 p.m. on the 4th Feb. It was not known to the East Asiatic Company at the time of their tender, but the sellers were aware of it at the time of making their said tender.

The buyers contending that they were not bound to accept the tender per Canterbury, arbitration was claimed under the terms of the contract and the dispute was referred to arbitration in pursuance of the rules indorsed on the contract. The umpire, by his award dated the 7th May 1913, awarded "that the appropriation per Canterbury is a good appropriation in the terms of the contract, and must be accepted by the buyers."

The buyers thereupon appealed from the award to the committee of appeal of the Incorporated Oil Seed Association, and certain members were elected as a board of appeal to hear the appeal, in accordance with the provisions of the contract and the rules and regulations of the association.

The buyers contended before the board:

(1) That, the steamship Canterbury having sunk or been lost with her cargo before the tender by the sellers, the said tender was bad.

(2) Alternatively that the said tender was bad because the sellers knew of the said sinking or loss of the Canterbury and (or) her cargo before they made the said tender.

(3) That there was not a resale within the meaning of clause 3 of the contract, the sale to the buyers having taken place before the sellers purchased the beans under the contract of the 9th Sept. 1912, and that the buyers were not bound to accept the tender as an appropriation passed on by their sellers on a resale.

(4) That the provisions of clause 3 as to resales could not in this case apply, the Canterbury and her cargo being at the bottom of the sea when the sellers made or purported to make the appropriation.

The buyers requested the board to state a case for the opinion of the court on the question of law arising in the reference.

The sellers contended:

(1) That under clause 3 of the contract the buyers as "buyers" from the sellers under a resale were bound to accept as a valid declaration the copy of the original appropriation received by the sellers and handed on by them to the buyers.

(2) Alternatively that by clause 3 the sellers, having passed on without delay to the buyers the copy of the original appropriation received and accepted by them as "buyers," were entitled to call on the buyers to accept such copy as a valid declaration.

(3) That by reason of the loss of the Canterbury with all her cargo the contract became void pursuant to clause 10 of the contract.

The questions of law submitted in the special case stated by the board at the request of the buyers were:

(1) Whether, regard being had to the terms of the contract of the 30th May 1912, a tender or appropriation under clause 3 could validly be made if at the material time, and whether to the knowledge of the sellers or not, the vessel and her cargo had already become a total loss.

(2) Whether there was any difference "in case of resales," and, if so, whether the sentence in clause 3, "In case of resales copy of original appropriation shall be accepted by buyers and passed on without delay," applied to the facts of this case.

(3) Whether under the circumstances above detailed the provisions of clause 10 of the contract applied so as to render the contract void as regards the beans shipped by the Canterbury which had not arrived by that vessel.

(4) (a) and (b) was not relevant to this case.

(5) Whether the sellers were relieved from every obligation to the buyers under the said contract by tendering the cargo shipped per steamship Canterbury.

The court answered questions 1, 2, 3, and 5 in the negative, and sent back these answers to the board of appeal: (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 570; 111 L. T. Rep. 1107; (1915) 1 K. B. 233).

On the 25th June 1914, the board of appeal, having considered the case and the answers of the High Court of Justice to the questions stated in the special case in the matter of the said arbitration, unreservedly accepted the said answers upon the construction of the contract, as a matter of law, apart from the custom of the trade, but it nevertheless found:

(1) That by the long established and well recognised custom of the trade in cases of resales buyers under the form of contract impliedly agree with their sellers (a) that they will accept the original shippers' appropriation passed on without delay, provided that the original shippers' appropriation was valid and in order at the time of being made by the original shipper to his buyer, and (b) that those sellers shall be under no obligation to make any appropriation other than that of passing a copy of original shipper's appropriation without delay, even though the said appropriation at the time of being passed on might, apart from such custom and implied agreement, be invalid and not in order.

(2) That the appropriation by Messrs. the Produce Brokers to the Olympia was made under a resale, to which the said custom of the trade applies, and

(3) That the appropriation of the original shippers, the East Asiatic Company Limited, to their buyers, Messrs. the Produce Brokers, was valid and in order, and they do hereby decide and award that the original award, dated the 19th May 1913, of Berthold Vinner, the umpire appointed in the arbitration, be varied, and award that Messrs. the Olympia are bound to accept as a valid appropriation under the contract of the 30th May 1912 copy of the original shippers' appropriation, passed on to them by Messrs. the Produce Brokers.

HORRIDGE, J.—This is a motion to set aside an award made by the appellate tribunal of the Incorporated Oil Seed Association upon the ground that the award is based, on the face of it, upon an alleged custom of the trade and that the custom of the trade does not exist.

Now, I think that the result of the two cases of Hutcheson and Co. v. Eaton and Son (sup.) and North-Western Rubber Company Limited v. Hüttenbach and Co. (sup.) is correctly expressed in the headnote to the latter case. The headnote to that case says: "Held, that the arbitrators had no jurisdiction to deal conclusively with the question of the existence of the custom for the purpose of making their award; that, as the custom upon which they based their award had been found not to exist in fact, the award compelling the buyers to accept goods not in accordance with the written contract has been and must be set aside." That says that the arbitrators had not jurisdiction to settle conclusively; the meaning of that, in my view, appears from the language which is used by Vaughan Williams, L.J. He says: "The truth of the matter is that, if the custom is not contrary to the terms of the contract, or as Jessel, M.R. says in Southwell v. Bowditch, to the tenor of the contract (which is the better expression), the arbitrators would be acting within their jurisdiction, and would be doing no wrong if, in the first instance, they heard evidence and decided whether there was a custom or not. Of course, if the custom were inconsistent with the tenor of the contract, they would have no right to give effect to it. A conditional finding of arbitrators is not unusual; such a finding happens frequently in the County Court, where the jurisdiction is limited in at least two ways, besides the limitation of the area of the court; first, the judge cannot try a dispute as to land where title comes in question; and, secondly, there is a money limit. On the question of title the County Court judge must hear evidence and consider whether there is a real dispute as to title; and where the High Court is deciding upon a question of mandamus or prohibition in such a case, although they will not readily reverse the decision of the County Court judge, yet his decision is conditional in the sense that it is open to review. The case of Hutcheson v. Eaton seems to have positively decided that arbitrators are not the proper tribunal for dealing with a question of custom, and I should have thought the Divisional Court, on a motion to set aside an award, had jurisdiction to determine whether the custom alleged had an existence in fact."

I think that, subject to the qualification in the passage which I have read from the judgment of Vaughan Williams, L.J., that the custom must not be contrary to the terms of the contract. In this case we are bound by that authority to decide whether or not there is any such custom as the arbitrators have purported to find and act upon in this case. Is it contrary to the terms of the contract? I think that the true test is the one which was suggested by Mr. MacKinnon. If you wrote into the contract the custom, would you be contradicting the terms of the written contract; in other words, if you had clause 3 in this case standing side by side with the contract would you, in order to give effect to the contract, have to strike out any portion of clause 3? In clause 3 it says: "Particulars of shipment with date of bill or bills of lading, approximate weight, marks (if any), and number of bags to be declared by original sellers not later than forty days from the day of the last bill of lading. . . . In case of resales, copy of original appropriation shall be accepted by buyers and passed on without delay." Now, of course, when you insert a custom you naturally add something to the contract, but I do not think that you would have to strike out any words in that clause if you read it in this way: "In case of resales, copy of original appropriation shall be accepted by buyers and passed on without delay, and such notice of appropriation may be given after the vessel has been lost." If the custom does exist, I do not think that it contradicts the written contract in the sense in which Mr. Leslie Scott suggests that it does.

Therefore the position is that we have to ascertain whether or not there is any such custom. Vaughan Williams, L.J., in the passage which I have just read, says that the Divisional Court have power to arrive at a conclusion upon that question. In the case of the North-Western Rubber Company v. Hüttenbach the parties consented to Mr. Justice Walton deciding the issue, and an issue was framed, and he decided upon it that a custom did not exist. What is the regular way to ascertain that on a motion in this court? By conflict of affidavit. But it is said, "This is obviously a matter which cannot be tried satisfactorily by affidavit, because custom, when you cross-examine about it with a witness in the box, very often breaks down, and the witness is shown not to know what he is talking about." That difficulty can be got over in this case by giving both sides liberty to give notice to the people who have made affidavits to attend for the purpose of cross-examination. As to the rest of the matter, we give no decision as to whether the award is to be set aside or not; but we adjourn the rest of this application to be heard before us on affidavits and on notice, if the parties wish to cross-examine the witnesses.

ROWLATT, J.—I should just like to express my views upon the question which has been argued, because no further judgment will be given in this court upon that part of the case, and this is an important matter.

This case has had a curious history because in the first instance a case was stated for the opinion of the court under sect. 19. That was, and must have been, according to the language of the Arbitration Act, a question of law arising in the course of the arbitration; and the question assumed to come under that designation was: "What was the construction of this printed contract according to what appears within the four corners of it?" Upon that question the court, of which I happened to be a member, delivered its judgment; (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 570; 111 L. T. Rep. 1107). Now we get an award which states that the arbitrators treat with great respect that decision, but that they find that there is a custom which makes it wholly irrelevant, because whatever may be the construction of the contract, according to what appears within its four corners, the custom leads to a directly contrary result, as it adds another term to the contract.

The question whether there is a custom or not will have to be decided in the future; but I am bound to say that it is really making a vast draft upon my credulity to ask me to be convinced that these gentlemen, knowing in their own minds, as they do not claim to have heard any further evidence, that there is this custom which decides the thing apart from what is written here ex concessis, still go and take the trouble to ask us the question: "What is the meaning of what is written here?" However, whether there really is such a custom, whether it is not really that they have thought all along that the construction of the contract is different, and having found they have made a mistake, if our decision is right (it may not be), thereupon they say, "Very well, there is a custom to the contrary," I do not know. I hope very much that I shall not have to sit in the inquiry which decides which is correct. That is how the matter comes before us. It is certainly curious enough.

How does the position stand? The first question I think logically is, assuming that there is such a custom, is the custom inconsistent with the written document so as not to be admissible as evidence? I do not think that it is. I think Mr. Leck is right upon that part of the case, because here we have a document which contains the sale of so many tons of these beans, then the particulars of shipment are to be declared, and in case of resales a copy of the original declaration is to be taken and handed on as soon as possible; but nothing at all is said in the contract bearing upon the question whether these people choose to agree or not that a cargo may be declared after it has been lost. I do not think that it is impossible that that should be the meaning of the contract. It may be the intention of the parties; it may be one way or it may be the other way; but it is not expressed on the face of the contract. It has to be collected from what you can gather by looking at what is here and arguing from it. It seems to me that to find that there is such a contract is not to find anything inconsistent with the terms of the contract, because I think that it could be written in either way at the bottom of the contract without altering a single word that exists in it now. Whichever way it might be settled you could write in "Declarations not to be valid if the cargo has been lost"; or, on the other hand, "Declarations to be valid notwithstanding the cargo has been lost." You could read it in either way without affecting what appears there. I think that that is the sort of test that one must apply. Therefore I do not think that there is anything inconsistent with the contract in the alleged custom. I observe that the custom does not go to all declarations. It is only in the case of resales that the declaration is good, although the cargo has been lost, and that comforts me a little, because, apparently, we were, after all, in everybody's view, right in holding that the declaration by the original shipper had to be of a cargo which was still afloat, and what we have decided amounts to this, that we have not been able to find that there is any distinction in the case of a resale because it says that a copy of the original appropriation shall be accepted by the buyers and passed on without delay. I am bound to say that I still think that it is extraordinarily difficult, as a matter of construction of language, to get out of that phrase that a copy of the original appropriation shall be accepted and passed on without delay, an agreement between the parties that, contrary to the case of the original appropriation, the appropriation in the second instance shall be valid although the cargo is lost, merely because they declare that a copy shall be accepted and passed on without delay. However, I am of opinion that there is nothing in this alleged custom which is inconsistent with the terms of the contract.

Now comes the question as to what effect it has upon the arbitration. What is the position of the arbitrator? It seems to me that after the two cases in the Court of Appeal, one in 1884 and the other in 1908, the position is that the question whether a term is to be added by custom to the express terms of a contract is a question going to the jurisdiction of the arbitrator, and therefore, although the arbitrator may, and indeed must, provisionally ascertain whether he is to proceed on the footing that such a custom exists, still he cannot conclusively decide it, and any award on the basis of the existence of the custom is good only if the custom in fact exists—a question to be decided by the court. The position itself is a very familiar one in cases of courts of limited jurisdiction, but the interest of these cases is that they bring within that principle an arbitration upon a contract such as this in connection with which a question as to the existence or non-existence of a custom arises. However, I think that we must deal with the question upon the footing that the arbitrators cannot conclusively decide on such a question because it is a question which goes to their jurisdiction, and under these circumstances the only order which we can make is this: Order the motion to be adjourned, the parties to file further evidence on the alleged custom as set out in the award, and to be at liberty to give notice requiring the attendance of deponents before us for examination; leave to appeal.

The Produce Brokers Company Limited appealed.

Leck, K.C. and MacKinnon, K.C. for the appellants.

Leslie Scott, K.C. and C. R. Dunlop for the respondents.

Buckley, L.J.—I am unable to adduce any reason to show that the decision which I am about to pronounce is right. On the contrary, if I were free to follow my own opinion, my own powers of reasoning, such as they are, I should say that it is wrong. But I am bound by authority, which of course it is my duty to follow, and following authority I feel bound to pronounce the judgment which I am about to deliver.

By a contract bearing date the 30th May 1912, the appellants, the Produce Brokers Company, sold to the respondents, the Olympia Oil and Cake Company, 6000 tons of Soya beans which were to be shipped to Hull. The contract contained a provision, upon which the question arose, in the following words: "3. Particulars of shipment with date of bill or bills of lading, approximate weight, marks (if any), and numbers of bags to be declared by original sellers not later than forty days from the date of last bill of lading. The buyers shall have at least three clear days after appropriation to give the necessary orders for port of destination, at port of call, demurrage (if any) up to three days to be for account of sellers. In case of resales copy of original appropriation shall be accepted by buyers and passed on without delay." On those last words the question arose. The contract also contained an arbitration clause which so far as material was in these words: "All disputes from time to time arising out of this contract . . . shall be referred to arbitration according to the rules endorsed on this contract." Further on it provided that neither buyers nor sellers nor any other persons shall bring any action against the other of them in respect of any such dispute until such dispute has been settled by the arbitrators, umpire or committee, or board of appeal as the case may be, and it is expressly agreed that the obtaining an award from either tribunal, as the case may be, shall be a condition precedent to the right of either contracting party to take any legal proceedings against the other in respect of any claim arising out of this contract. The cargo was to be shipped from an Oriental port or ports during Dec. 1912 and (or) Jan. 1913. That contract having been made on the 30th May 1912, the Produce Brokers Company, the sellers, on the 9th Sept. 1912 made a similar contract for the purchase of a like quantity of Soya beans for the fulfilment of the first contract with the East Asiatic Company. On the 4th Feb. 1913 the East Asiatic Company under their contract declared or tendered to the Produce Brokers Company a shipment by a ship called the Canterbury. The Produce Brokers Company having received that tender passed it on to the Olympia Oil Company, availing themselves of the words "In case of resales," which it is not disputed apply to this case, strange as it may be, "copy of original appropriation shall be accepted by buyers and passed on without delay." At the moment when the East Asiatic Company made the tender to the Producer Brokers Company no one knew that any mischance or misadventure had happened to the Canterbury. When, however, the Produce Brokers Company handed the tender over to the Olympia Oil Company, the facts which I am about to state were known. The Canterbury sailed on the 3rd Feb and had stranded on some rocks. On the 4th Feb. she was towed off and sank. The fact that she had sunk was known in London at 3 p.m. on that day. Therefore on the 4th Feb. 1913, the tender by the East Asiatic Company to the Produce Brokers Company was made without, and the tender by the Produce Brokers Company to the Olympia Oil Company was made with knowledge that the Canterbury had sunk. Under those circumstances a question arose between the Produce Brokers Company and the Olympia Oil Company as to whether or not that tender was a good tender. That question was referred to arbitration under the clause in the contract. In May 1913 an award was made in favour of the Produce Brokers Company. That was carried under the scheme of arbitration which prevails in this trade to the appeal committee. On the 14th Jan. 1914 the appeal committee stated a case for the opinion of the court. That case came before the Divisional Court on the 19th May, when the Divisional Court answered certain questions in the special case in the negative: (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 570; 111 L. T. Rep. 1107).

The first of those questions, which is the only one I need read, was this: "Whether, regard being had to the terms of the contract of the 30th May 1912, a tender or appropriation under clause 3 can validly be made, if at the material time, and whether to the knowledge of the sellers or not, the vessel and her cargo have already become a total loss." The Divisional Court, expressing a consultative opinon only, answered that question in the negative—that is to say, they said it was not a good tender. Rowlatt, J. protected himself by saying, wisely as I think, that he confined himself to answering it in the negative when there was knowledge. The fact was that there was knowledge. Of course it is not material for the present purpose. So consultatively the Divisional Court upon a special case stated by the appeal committee answered that this was not a good tender.

Thereupon the matter went back to the appeal committee, who heard it, and on the 25th June 1914 made this award. Having considered the special case and unreservedly accepting the answers upon the construction of the contract as matter of law apart from the custom of the trade, the appeal committee nevertheless found "that by the long-established and well recognised custom of the trade in case of resales buyers under this form of contract impliedly agree with their sellers (a) that they will accept the original shippers' appropriation." The result therefore was that, having obtained the consultative opinion of the Divisional Court that this was a bad tender, the appeal committee found that it was a good tender, relying upon custom. Thereupon the Olympia Oil Company, against whom the award was made, served notice of motion to set aside the award on the ground that it was bad on the face of it, and for various other reasons. On the 20th Nov. 1914 the Divisional Court made the order now on appeal before us. That order was that the motion to set aside the award "do stand adjourned, and that both parties be at liberty to file further affidavits on the question as to the existence of the alleged custom mentioned in the awards." Of course the operation of that order is that the Divisional Court are going to hear evidence and cross-examination, if necessary, and that the Divisional Court are going to determine whether there is or is not such custom, a matter which has already been decided by the arbitrators if it is competent to the arbitrators to decide it.

The question between the parties is whether or not it is competent for the arbitrators to decide it. The relevant questions in considering that question seem to me to be these. Whenever a party comes into court alleging a contract, of course he must prove it unless it is admitted. The proof of the contract consists in adducing before the tribunal evidence to show what the contract is. Let me suppose, in the first place, that it is an oral contract. What would be the material evidence? The tribunal would hear the evidence of the two parties who were present as to what was said and what passed, and upon the result of that would find what the contract was. But if the parties who were thus summoned before the court were members of a particular trade the tribunal would be bound, in addition to hearing what they respectively said, to learn by evidence what in the mouths of those speakers was the meaning of the words they used; in other words, what was the custom of the trade which must be assumed to be in the minds of the parties speaking in using the words which they uttered. Let me put the case in the concrete. Suppose that it were a case of an oral contract made for the sale of coals, and that the oral evidence was that A. agreed to sell to B. 100 tons of coal, and then evidence was adduced that in the trade a ton meant 21 cwts. The result would be that the tribunal would have to find, if it was satisfied by that evidence, that there was a contract for the sale by A. to B. of 100 times 21 cwts. of coal, although they said tons. That, it seems to me, would be the case if it were an oral contract. Now let us suppose that it is a written contract. Of course, if a contract is in writing, the best evidence—it may be the only evidence, but not necessarily the only evidence—is the written contract, the written words appended to which are found the signatures of the contracting parties. But it does not follow that this is the only evidence. Suppose, for instance, the price being either 15*s.* or 16*s.*, the word, whatever it is, is so written that it is very difficult to say whether it is 15*s.* or 16*s.* I apprehend that under those circumstances the tribunal, upon looking at the document or assisting itself by such evidence as is legally admissible, would have to determine the question whether it was 15*s.* or 16*s.* and adjudicate upon that. In other words, you have to find out what the writing is, in order to ascertain what the contract is. Then further, as in the former case, when you have got the written contract before you, and you know exactly the words used as they are written down there on paper, I cannot see how this case differs from the former case; the tribunal must then receive evidence, if it be a question of custom, to show what those parties meant by their written words, just as in the former case to show what they meant by their spoken words. As a result of that, the evidence proving the contract would be the written document plus such evidence as is legally admissible to show what is the meaning in the mouths of those contracting parties, of the language which they have used, and it is only I should have thought when you have read the written contract, and have added to it the custom, if custom be proved, explaining what the words in the contract mean, it is only when you have done both those that you have heard all the evidence to enable you to determine what the contract is.

Now, I think this is not disputed, that if there be before the arbitrators the duty of determining all disputes arising out of this contract, it must be within the competency of the arbitrators to determine what this contract is, otherwise they cannot get on. Here we come to the cleavage point. It is said by the authorities to which I have referred that it is competent to the arbitrators to determine that de bene esse, provisionally, for the time being, for the purpose of getting along with the arbitration, but they cannot determine it conclusively they may determine it, but ultimately it is for a court to determine it. That seems to me to be directly in conflict with what I have already said. If that is authority, what I have said must be wrong. What happens, therefore, is this: It is said by the authorities to which I am going to refer that the jurisdiction of the arbitrators is only to determine disputes arising out of the contract; if they admit the evidence of the custom and adjudicate upon the custom, according to the words used in these judgments, they are adding to or altering the contract. I cannot see that myself. It seems to me that you cannot ascertain what the contract is until you ascertain and introduce the custom; but that is the language used; and it is said that, if they add to or alter the contract by introducing the custom, giving themselves jurisdiction—because, if custom is read into the contract, then it is for them to decide upon it; if it is not read into the contract, it is not for them to decide upon it—and therefore they are giving themselves jurisdiction by introducing the question of custom.

I am bound to take it that that is so upon these authorities. I will just state what they are: The first was the case of Hutcheson v. Eaton (sup.). That case would not give me so much trouble, for a reason which I will state, as the second case. In that case there was a contract signed by certain persons, "Francis J. Eaton and Son, brokers." The question that arose was not what the contents of the contract were, not what the language of the instrument meant, but who was liable upon the contract, let the contract mean what it would. It was said that, according to the custom in that trade, if Francis J. Eaton and Son signed in that name "brokers," then, so soon as they disclosed the name of their principals, they were discharged, and their principals became liable. That does not trouble me so much. That appears to me to be a case in which it was confessed that the contract bound someone at first, and then by some custom it ceased to be binding upon him and became binding upon somebody else—a sort of novation of contract, which is not the case which we have to deal with, of course. But the reasoning upon which the court proceeded in that case is the reasoning which I was referring to just now, and inasmuch as we are bound by the principle of cases, as the principle seems to be that which I have stated, it may be that if that case stood alone we should have to follow it, as I myself have felt bound to follow it in Re Arbitration, North-Western Rubber Company and Hüttenbach and Co. (sup.), because of the principles laid down in the judgments; but otherwise that case is distinguishable, and it does not govern the present case. The second case was Re Arbitration, North-Western Rubber Company and Hüttenbach and Co. (sup.). That was the case of the sale of a certain quantity of rubber, fair quality, with a description of what it is at so much a ton, and there was an arbitration clause with the words, "any dispute on this contract to be settled by arbitration here in the usual way." When the goods arrived the buyers refused to take delivery on the ground that the goods were not in accordance with the contract.

Then there was an arbitration clause. The arbitrators found that the goods were not in accordance with the contract, but must be accepted by the buyers at an allowance of 10*s.* a ton. In other words, they found that according to the custom of that trade, when goods were sold which were of a defined quality, that meant of that quality or approximately of that quality, and if not exactly of that quality, then at a proper reduction. That was the custom. What was held there was that the arbitrators had no authority to deal conclusively with the question of the existence of a custom. I, myself, in the very short judgment which I gave in that case, expressed the doubts which I have been expressing now. I then was, and I still remain, unable to understand the principles laid down in Hutcheson v. Eaton (sup.), which bind me. I concurred with the majority of the court, who did not feel the difficulty which I did in saying that I was bound by Hutcheson v. Eaton (sup.), not because it was exactly the same case, but because applying the principles in that case it applied to the principles here, and I feel myself in the same condition still. I do not think that I could usefully add anything to my judgment in the North-Western Rubber case as to my views as regards Hutcheson v. Eaton (sup.).

Those being the authorities, the order under appeal stands in this position: The Divisional Court under the order will hear evidence as to whether this custom is good or bad. If they find it good, then they will say: "The contract includes the custom. Therefore the contract upon which the arbitrators had jurisdiction to adjudicate was a contract including the custom. Therefore they did not exceed their jurisdiction in awarding as regards the custom, and the award is good." If, on the other hand, they find the other way, that there was no custom, then they will say, according to those authorities: "That being so, the contract upon which the arbitrators had jurisdiction to arbitrate was a contract which did not include the custom—ergo, in awarding as regards the custom they exceeded their jurisdiction, and the award is bad." That is perfectly logical, and, upon the principles in these cases, I cannot say that it is wrong. I do not understand how it is possible to say that you have arrived at what the contract is until you have determined whether there is a custom or not, for, if there is a custom that contract is one thing, and if there is not a custom it is another thing. Therefore I do not understand the two stages under which the arbitrator is to determine something, but not determine it conclusively.

Those are the grounds upon which I think the decision which I am pronouncing is wrong; but on the authorities it seems to me that I am bound to say that the decision I am pronouncing is right, because upon those authorities the contract is a thing of which it is impossible to say whether it does or does not include the custom until somebody whose function it is not to determine what the contract is has determined whether the custom is applicable or not. That being so, it seems to me that upon those two authorities I am bound to say that this order is right, and I think on these grounds that this appeal must be dismissed.

Phillimore, J.—With reluctance—I might almost say with sorrow—I concur in the view that this appeal must be dismissed. I trust that the case will proceed to the House of Lords. The matter arises in this way: There is a contract for the sale of certain goods, with an arbitration clause which is not merely an arbitration clause in the sense that disputes under the contract are to be settled by arbitrators, but is an arbitration clause in the sense that until there has been an award of arbitrators nobody can proceed to recover damages or debt under this contract. The odd thing is that the people who are putting the difficulty in the way of getting an award, no doubt because the award which they have got is not to their liking, are the people who must get an award in order to recover that which they seek to recover. This being so, and an arbitration having begun, the same respondents applied to the arbitrators to state a case for the consultative opinion of the Divisional Court and got the consultative opinion of the Divisional Court, which expressed pro tanto an opinion on the construction of the contract which was in their favour. With that opinion the matter went back to the arbitrators, which was the appeal committee. That board of appeal stated that it unreservedly accepted the answers of the Divisional Court on the construction of the contract as a matter of law apart from the custom of the trade, but it nevertheless found "that by the long-established and well-recognised custom of the trade in case of resales, buyers under this form of contract impliedly agree with their sellers" certain facts thereupon stated. That being so, they decided and awarded against the present respondents. Thereupon the present respondents applied to the Divisional Court on a notice of motion asking that the awards of the original arbitrators and the appeal committee might be set aside upon certain grounds, the second being "That the appeal committee exceeded their jurisdiction in determining whether the custom mentioned in the award dated the 25th June 1914 had any existence in fact, or in deciding that the Olympia Oil and Cake Company Limited were bound by the alleged custom to accept the appropriation therein referred to, which was invalid under the terms of the contract."

Among the points which they raised, and which they are entitled to raise, was the point that the custom contradicted the contract. That matter is not now before us. I understand that, provisionally, the Divisional Court expressed an opinion unfavourable to them on that, but the Divisional Court were struck by the point that the appeal committee exceeded their jurisdiction in determining whether the custom had any existence in fact, and they came to the conclusion that it was for them, the Divisional Court, to determine whether the custom had any existence in fact. In order that they might be better informed upon this matter, there being some affidavit evidence and some conflict upon the evidence, they selected as the mode to determine it, it being open to them to select the mode, that of affidavit and cross-examination. They might have directed an issue, but that was a matter for their discretion, and on the whole they preferred that mode of deciding it. But by making the order that there should be affidavit evidence and cross-examination they asserted—and that is the real subject matter of this appeal—that it was their duty to determine whether the custom mentioned in the award had any existence in fact. They put it upon the ground which is perhaps not otherwise than neatly expressed, as one would expect to find it neatly expressed, by the late Walton, J. in the case of Re Arbitration, North-Western Rubber Company and Hüttenbach and Co.: "It seems to me impossible to resist the conclusion that in Hutcheson v. Eaton (sup.) the Court of Appeal held that under a submission to arbitration of all disputes under a written contract, the arbitrators have no jurisdiction in arriving at their award to inquire as to the existence of a custom to which no reference is made in the written contract, and to decide that such contract is subject to such a custom. On this ground, and this ground only, we think the award in question is not in itself binding or conclusive between the parties."

It is really difficult to express exactly what that conclusion of law means otherwise than as it is expressed by Walton, J. It seems that the inference to be drawn from Hutcheson v. Eaton (sup.), and strongly confirmed unfortunately by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Arbitration, North-Western Rubber Company and Hüttenbach and Co. (sup.), is this: The arbitrators can construe a contract but they cannot superadd to the contract. No doubt if there is a custom the contract is the written contract as explained by the custom, always assuming that the custom does not contradict the contract, but if there is no custom then the contract is the written contract, and the arbitrators are introducing into the construction of the contract something which is not part of the contract. It is extremely difficult to understand the principle upon which that rests. Custom is a question of fact. The arbitrators are appointed to decide the question of fact, and, indeed, also questions of law, so far as they are not otherwise directed, and why the arbitrators should not determine this question of fact as well as any other question of fact, I do not know. Whether the principle of these cases goes so far as this—that if there is a dispute as to what is the contract, whether it is contained in one piece of paper or two, whether an interlineation is to be read in or not, the arbitrators have not jurisdiction to determine that, I do not know, but the principle which apparently is to be extracted from the opinion of the majority of the judges in both those cases is that the arbitrators may no doubt, must no doubt, at any rate provisionally, decide every point submitted to them, that if they determine that something is to be added to the written contract which in the opinion of the correcting tribunal is not in fact in existence and is not to be added, they have then exceeded their jurisdiction. They have jurisdiction on condition that they decide rightly. One does one's best to express it, one almost fears that one is falling into the grotesque in representing it, but it is no doubt a possible result, a thinkable conclusion. Apparently without principle as it is, it is a conclusion, as I have said, that one can think and that one can express. It is quite possible to say that the decision in Hutcheson v. Eaton (sup.) and the decision in Re Arbitration, North-Western Rubber Company and Hüttenbach and Co. (sup.) were perfectly correct and yet to jettison the reasoning which I have mentioned.

In Hutcheson v. Eaton (sup.) the proceedings were peculiar. There had been one award on the question of the quality of the stuff that was sold, and in order to enforce that award the successful party brought an action upon it. The defendants' point was not that the contract had been misconstrued or anything of that kind, but that by a peculiar custom of the trade, though they had signed it, they were not, in the events which afterwards happened, liable under it, and accordingly they pleaded to the award that by custom they were not bound by it, also pendente lite they procured a second award on this point, and that second award was also in their favour. They also pleaded that second award. At the trial the jury found the custom against them. They had provoked that issue by pleading custom and submitting it to the jury. Notwithstanding that the jury found the custom against them, the learned judge on the trial entered judgment for them because he thought that the award was sufficient protection. Thereupon the plaintiffs came to the Court of Appeal, and the Court of Appeal could not, or would not, or did not, disabuse its mind of the question that the jury had found that there was no such custom. Both the Master of the Rolls and still more pointedly Bowen, L.J. referred to that. "First of all," says Bowen, L.J. "be it observed that no such custom exists at all." Why they began with the verdict of the jury and then went to the award, instead of beginning with the award and then going to the verdict of the jury, one cannot tell; but having begun by the verdict of the jury, they said, "there is no such custom." Ergo, the arbitrators must have exceeded their jurisdiction in importing something which had no bearing upon the question into the contract. They imported extraneous matter into the contract, and it was as if they had said that the contract was not to be enforced because one of the parties was a Hottentot, and therefore they said that the arbitrators had exceeded their jurisdiction. In the particular case it may well be that the arbitrators had exceeded their jurisdiction because it was not a matter to which custom could possibly apply, or the custom might be held to be unreasonable, and many other reasons might have been given why the very peculiar defence which the defendants raised should not have prevailed. One feels practically certain that the decision in Hutcheson v. Eaton (sup.) was just; but the language of the majority of the court goes as far as that which I have said.

As to the North-Western Rubber case, I myself am partly to blame for what has happened. I was sitting in the Divisional Court with the late Walton, J. In that case there was an award which on the face of it looked ridiculous, a finding that there had been a contract to deliver and accept certain goods and only certain goods, but that the buyers must accept inferior goods at a reduction in price which the arbitrators fixed. On the face of it that award looked all wrong, and we should have done very much better, in my humble opinion now, as I see it, to have set it aside without prejudice to another award which the arbitrators might have made; but upon the application to the Divisional Court to set it aside it was suggested in support that there was a custom regulating this market under which that would be a right decision, and it appeared that that contention had been submitted to the arbitrators, or the umpire, or both of them or all of them, and that really that was the ground upon which the decision had been made. On the other hand, there was no finding by the arbitrators in terms of the custom, and we were faced with the difficulty of the decision in Hutcheson v. Eaton (sup.) and a judgment which was prepared by Walton, J., but to which I was an assenting party, was delivered, the last clause of which I recently read. That being so, we felt that there must be some inquiry made as to whether there was such custom, being thereunto the more moved because there was no finding in terms by the arbitrators upon it, and because, apart from the custom, the award was obviously bad. I do not exactly remember all the stages, but I suppose that various ways of determining this question were considered, and ultimately somebody suggested that it would be well that an issue should be tried in the High Court to determine whether or not there was such a custom, and an order was made, which was not appealed against and which therefore stood binding, that Walton, J., if he was good enough to take it, should undertake the trial of that issue. He undertook the trial of that issue and he found, no doubt quite rightly found, and as the Court of Appeal so far as it investigated it said rightly found, that there was no such custom. Therefore, exercising the powers which had been reserved to him, he set aside the award. From that an appeal was brought to the Court of Appeal.

The Court of Appeal were in one respect very much in the same position as in Hutcheson v. Eaton. They had a finding in the High Court that there was no such custom at all, and they had an award which ex facie seemed bad, and which could only be made good by reading into it that there was such a custom. Thereupon they again decided against the award, and no doubt rightly in my humble opinion. Then again the grounds which were given by Vaughan Williams, L.J., and even more pointedly by Fletcher Moulton, L.J., grounds again underlined and made more significant by the fact that Buckley, L.J. expressed grave doubts about them, go so far as saying that that form of exercise of jurisdiction by the tribunal which tries the matter and is prepared, if a custom is found, to read it into the written contract is one which can only be warranted by a correct exercise of it, that it is a preliminary point going to the jurisdiction of the arbitrators that if they introduce the question of custom they decide it rightly. I presume that if they rejected custom, and the court was satisfied that they ought not to have rejected custom, the tables would be turned and the award would be set aside on the other ground. I agree accordingly that this rule of law should be introduced. I conceive that it might lead to questioning nearly 50 per cent. of the arbitrations under these various business forms of sale note, and I also think that it is entirely contrary to the principle, the principle being that if the parties choose to refer their disputes to a domestic forum the arbitrators or the umpires are to decide the questions finally and without appeal, or with only such internal appeal as the submission of the parties grants; but these are the two decisions, and though I think both decisions might stand and should stand, notwithstanding that one thought that the Lords Justices who formed the majority were not so accurate in their reasoning as one would hope to find, still I think we are bound by the principle upon which these judgments were decided, particularly the second, which it is more difficult to avoid, and therefore I think one must agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

Pickford, L.J.—In this case the appellants sold to the respondents a certain quantity of soya beans under a printed contract, one of the terms of which was, "All disputes from time to time arising out of this contract, including any question of law appearing in the proceedings, shall be referred to arbitration," and the obtaining of an award was made a condition precedent to any action by one party against the other. A dispute did arise as to whether a declaration made by the appellants was good, and an award was made. The respondents appealed, as they could under the contract, to the appeal committee of the Incorporated Oil Association, and they, at the request of the respondents, stated a case for the opinion of the King's Bench Division under their consultative jurisdiction. The Divisional Court decided that on the proper interpretation of the contract the declaration was not good because it was made at a time when the goods and the ship carrying them had been lost. The appeal committee then made an award in which they stated that they unreservedly accepted the decision of the court, and proceeded to decide directly contrary to it because they found a custom of the trade under which such a declaration was held good. As they found this custom, not upon the evidence of witnesses, but upon their own expert knowledge, presumably they had as much knowledge of it when they stated the case as afterwards, and therefore the utility of asking the opinion of the court without mentioning the existence of the custom is not very apparent.

The respondents moved to set aside the award on the ground that the arbitrators had exceeded their jurisdiction, and contended that the question of whether there was such a custom or not was one which determined the jurisdiction of the arbitrators, and that therefore the finding by the arbitrators of its existence was not conclusive and ought to be reviewed by the Divisional Court. That court held upon the authority of Hutcheson v. Eaton (sup.) and Re Arbitration, North-Western Rubber Company and Hüttenbach and Co. (sup.), that they had jurisdiction to inquire into the question whether the custom existed. They were, however, of opinion that they had not sufficient material before them upon which to determine it, and adjourned the motion that further evidence might be given. Against that order this appeal was brought.

The appellants on this appeal wished to argue the question whether the decision of the first Divisional Court on the construction of the contract was correct, as they said that if it was wrong the award was good, even assuming that the arbitrators had gone wrong on the question of the custom. I do not think that question was open to them on the appeal. On the question open to them I think the matter is concluded by authority. I think that the two cases cited decide that where there is in a written contract a submission to arbitration of "any dispute arising out of this contract," a finding of the arbitrators that there is a custom affecting the contract is not conclusive, as the question is not one left to the decision of the arbitrators, but goes to their jurisdiction, and that, like any other tribunal of limited jurisdiction, they cannot give themselves jurisdiction by wrongly finding the facts. Sometimes the language used is that they have no jurisdiction to entertain the question, sometimes that they cannot decide it conclusively; but the result is that, as it is a question going to their jurisdiction, the court, if the arbitrators find the existence of the custom, can inquire into the correctness of that finding, and if they find that no such custom exists, they will set the award aside as being made without jurisdiction. In Hutcheson v. Eaton (sup.) Fry, L.J., dissented from this conclusion, holding that where an arbitrator had to decide a "dispute arising out of this contract," he must first ascertain "what is this contract?" and that it is competent for him to ascertain the true interpretation of the contract, having regard (inter alia) to all customs, if any, which affect its construction or alter the terms of the contract.

Buckley, L.J., in Re Arbitration North-Western Rubber Company and Hüttenbach and Co. (sup.), agreed with this view, though he felt bound to follow the decision of the majority of the court in Hutcheson v. Eaton (sup.). Personally, I agree with the view of these two learned judges, but I feel bound to follow the decision of the majority of the court. The circumstances of both the cases mentioned were very peculiar, and in each case there had been a finding in the High Court that the custom did not exist, before the case came before the court. The principle, however, is so clearly laid down that I do not think that the difference of the facts allows me to say that it does not govern this case, It might be possible to distinguish Hutcheson v. Eaton (sup.), as suggested by Buckley, L.J. in Re Arbitration, North-Western Rubber Company and Hüttenbach and Co. (sup.), but the latter case cannot, in my opinion, be distinguished. If the finding of the arbitrators be open to review, I cannot see that it makes any difference at what time the review takes place.

I think, therefore, following these authorities, that it is open to the Divisional Court to inquire whether the circumstances necessary to give the arbitrators jurisdiction, as defined in these cases, existed, and that they were not bound by the finding of the arbitrators. If that be so, it becomes a matter of discretion whether they decide it on the materials before them at the time or adjourn it for further information.

For these reasons I think the appeal should be dismissed.

LENNARD'S CARRYING COMPANY LIMITED v. ASIATIC PETROLEUM COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Cargo—Loss of cargo by fire caused by unseaworthiness—"Actual fault or privity of" owners—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 502.

Parties who invoke the protection of and plead sect. 502 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 must bring themselves within its terms. Thus a limited company can only free themselves from liability under this section if they discharge the onus of proof which is on them by showing that the matter for which they seek protection arose without their actual fault or privity.

By sect. 502 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 the owners of a British sea-going ship shall not be liable to make good to any extent whatever "any loss or damage happening without his actual fault or privity" where any goods or merchandise taken in or put on board his ship are lost or damaged by reason of fire on board the ship.

A cargo on board a ship was destroyed by fire, the effective cause of the loss being the stranding of the vessel in a gale caused by the unseaworthiness of her boilers which prevented her getting up sufficient pressure of steam to avoid being driven to the leeward.

The shipowners claimed to be protected by sect. 502 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894.

Held, on the facts, that the shipowners were not entitled to the protection of that section inasmuch as they had not discharged the onus of showing that the loss had not happened without their actual fault or privity.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Appeal, reported 12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 381; 109 L. T. Rep. 433; (1914) 1 K. B. 419, which affirmed a decision of Bray, J., reported 12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 269; 107 L. T. Rep. 581, in favour of the respondents, the plaintiffs in this action.

The appellants are shipowners, and were at all material times the owners of the oil tank steamship Edward Dawson.

By a charter-party dated the 23rd Feb. 1911 the appellants let the Edward Dawson on time charter to the Anglo-Saxon Petroleum Company Limited for a period of nine to fifteen months. In pursuant to the orders of the time charterers the Edward Dawson in Aug. 1911 proceeded to Novorossisk, and there loaded a cargo of 2011 tons of benzine in bulk for carriage to Rotterdam. Six bills of lading, which were alike in their material terms, were signed by the master of the Edward Dawson. The respondents were indorsees of the bills of lading. On the 1st Oct. 1911, while in the course of her voyage from Novorossisk to Rotterdam, the Edward Dawson on entering the Scheldt grounded owing to it being impossible in the state her boilers were to get up sufficient steam pressure to prevent her being driven to the leeward by a strong head gale that she then encountered. The stranding caused some of the benzine to escape from the tanks, and the vapour from the escaped benzine coming into contact with the combustion chambers of the boilers caused an explosion which resulted in the loss of the ship and cargo. On the 9th Jan. 1912 the respondents brought their action for damages for breach of contract for non-delivery of the benzine.

The respondents alleged by their points of claim that as such indorsees of the bills of lading they had suffered damage by reason of the appellants failure to deliver the benzine at Rotterdam. In the alternative, the respondents alleged that it was an implied condition of the bills of lading that the Edward Dawson on sailing from Novorossisk should be seaworthy, and in the further alternative they said that the conditions of the charter-party of the 23rd Feb. 1911 were incorporated in the bills of lading, and thereby the appellants had guaranteed the Edward Dawson to be seaworthy, and that they would so maintain her during the continuance of the charter; and they alleged that in breach of that implied or alternatively express condition the Edward Dawson, by reason of certain defects in her boilers, was unseaworthy when she sailed from Novorossisk, and that the loss of cargo was occasioned by the breach of these conditions.

The appellants by their points of defence admitted that the respondents were indorsees of the bills of lading, and that the benzine was not delivered at Rotterdam, but said that they were excused for the non-delivery because the benzine was destroyed by fire on the 1st Oct. 1911, and that therefore by virtue of sect. 502 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 they were not liable.

The appellants denied that the Edward Dawson was unseaworthy. Alternatively they said that the loss was due to causes for which they were excused by the exceptions in the charter-party, and in the further alternative they said that if the loss was in any way due to want of steam in the boilers, such want of steam was caused by the bursting of a tube on the 30th Sept. 1911, for which the appellants were excused by the conditions of the charter-party and bills of lading.

Sect. 502 of the Merchant Shipping Act is as follows:

The owner of a British sea-going ship, or any share therein, shall not be liable to make good to any extent

whatever any loss or damage happening without his actual fault or privity in the following cases—namely:—

(1) Where any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever taken in or put on board his ship are lost or damaged by reason of fire on board the ship.

The facts as to the loss of the cargo sufficiently appear from the judgments.

The Lord CHANCELLOR (Viscount Haldane).—In this case the appellants have, at all events, the satisfaction of knowing that their case has been excellently argued by both the learned counsel who have appeared for them at your Lordships' Bar.

The case, which we have now heard fully and as to which we do not think it necessary to trouble the respondents' counsel, is shortly this. The Edward Dawson was a tank steamer designed for the carriage of oil in bulk. She was chartered by her owners, the appellants, on a time charter to a company known as the Anglo-Saxon Petroleum Company, and in the course of her employment she proceeded to Novorossisk in the Black Sea. There she loaded in bulk 2011 tons of benzine, and the bills of lading, six in number, were indorsed by the Anglo-Saxon Petroleum Company to the Asiatic Petroleum Company, who are the respondents in this case. The benzine has been lost, and the respondents have brought an action against the appellants to recover damages for the loss of their cargo.

Now the story of the case is in outline this: The Edward Dawson was built in 1890, as I have said, for the carriage of oil in bulk, and in 1907 she was bought by the appellants, who spent a good deal of money upon her, and proceeded to use her for certain voyages. In Jan. 1911, after she had been for a good while at sea, she was overhauled at Birkenhead, and the Bureau Veritas, a well-known agency which issues certificates and keeps a list for the purpose of showing the condition of ships, gave a certificate through Mr. Viehoff, who was their agent at Birkenhead, to the effect that she would have a satisfactory character for another twelve months, but only on conditions that her boiler pressure was reduced from 160lb. to 130lb. That obviously made a great deal of difference to the energy developing limits of capacity of the ship. Subsequently to that she proceeded on what she has described in the course of the argument as a round voyage. She went to Thames Haven, and at Thames Haven certain repairs were done under the superintendence of a Mr. Clarke to her boilers; she proceeded to New York, and from New York to Barcelona, and after various intermediate voyages she came to Novorossisk in the Black Sea, where she loaded a cargo of benzine of which I have spoken. She left Novorossisk, and the unsatisfactory condition of her boilers soon became manifest. These boilers leaked; they leaked salt water into the central furnaces, the furnaces became silted up with salt, so that their capacity was diminished, and the result was that when the ship on her way back passed the Straits of Dover and came into the North Sea she was not in a condition to develop such power as was desirable in the event of her encountering heavy head weather. She found herself on the 1st Oct. off the Dutch coast near the mouth of the Scheldt. There was a gale blowing, and she hove to and set her head against the gale to prevent herself from being driven on to the lee shore, but she was driven to the leeward and grounded. She first grounded on the Botkill Bank, and after bumping on the bank several times, she got off, but finally grounded in the Scheldt near Flushing. Her port of destination was Rotterdam. She does not appear to have been under adequate control. She had, among other things, burst a tube, which was not unlikely, having regard to wear and tear in excess of the length of life of tubes, which was given in the evidence as only ten years, and to the general condition of her boilers. She burst a tube, she took the ground, she was unable to get off the ground, she bumped, and as the result of bumping the benzine got loose from the tanks, the deck bulged, the tanks were probably cracked, anyhow the benzine began to get into the furnaces, and the result was a conflagration. It was suggested that if the flame had been extinguished by the injection of water, this might have been prevented, but I do not think the evidence upon that point at all satisfactorily established that that could have been secured, or, at any rate, that the operation could have been properly carried out.

In that state of things the loss of the cargo took place, and the case came before Bray, J. who tried it, and Bray, J. found a number of facts. He found these facts after hearing the evidence on both sides, and I think that his findings of fact were justified. They were these: The first was that the ship when she left Novorossisk was unseaworthy by reason of defects in her boilers. The second finding of fact was that the stranding on the Botkill Bank, just off the mouth of the Scheldt, was caused by the want of steam, which in it turn was caused by the unseaworthy condition of the boilers; and he found the same causes as regards the subsequent stranding in the Scheldt itself. Then in the third place he found that the loss was not caused by any negligence or want of precautions on the part of the engineers, because he does not find it proved that anything they could have done could have altered the consequences. He found that the loss of the cargo was caused by the unseaworthiness of the ship due to the condition of the boilers. Then there are other findings which are findings of mixed fact and law. One of these is that the duty of supervision remained with the managing owners, and that the fault of the managing owners was a fault that affected the company itself.

That last question gives rise to the real question of law which occurs in this case. Taking the facts to be as the learned judge has found them, what is the consequence as regards the liability of the appellants? The appellants are a limited company, and the ship was managed by another limited company, Messrs. John M. Lennard and Sons, and Mr. J. M. Lennard, who seems to be the active director in J. M. Lennard and Sons, was also a director of the appellant company, Lennard's Carrying Company Limited. In that state of things, what is the question of law, which arises? I think that it is impossible, in the face of the findings of the learned judge, and of the evidence, to contend successfully that Mr J. M. Lennard has shown that he did not know or can excuse himself for not having known of the defects which manifested themselves in the condition of the ship, amounting to unseaworthiness. Mr. Lennard is the person who is registered in the ship's register and is designated as the person to whom the management of the vessel was entrusted. He appears to have been the active spirit in the joint stock company which managed this ship for the appellants; and under the circumstances the question is whether the company can invoke the protection of sect. 502 of the Merchant Shipping Act to relieve it from liability which the respondents seek to impose on it. That section is in these words: "The owner of a British seagoing ship, or any share therein, shall not be liable to make good to any extent whatever any loss or damage happening without his actual fault or privity in the following cases —namely, (1) Where any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever taken in or put on board his ship are lost or damaged by reason of fire on board the ship."

Now, did what happened take place without the actual fault or privity of the owners of the ship who were the appellants? A corporation is an abstraction. It has no mind of its own any more than it has a body of its own; its active and directing will must consequently be sought in the person of somebody who for some purposes may be called an agent, but who is really the directing mind and will of the corporation, the very ego and centre of the personality of the corporation. That person may be under the direction of the shareholders in general meeting; that person may be the board of directors itself, or it may be, and in some companies it is so, that that person has an authority co-ordinate with the board of directors given to him under the articles of association, and is appointed by the general meeting of the company, and can only be removed by the general meeting of the company. Whatever is not known about Mr. Lennard's position, this is known for certain, Mr. Lennard took the active part in the management of this ship on behalf of the owners, and Mr. Lennard, as I have said, was registered as the person designated for this purpose in the ship's register. Mr. Lennard therefore was the natural person to come on behalf of the owners and give full evidence not only about the events of which I have spoken, and which related to the seaworthiness of the ship, but about his own position and as to whether or not he was the life and soul of the company. For if Mr. Lennard was the directing mind of the company, then his action must, unless a corporation is not to be liable at all, have been an action which was the action of the company itself within the meaning of sect. 502. It has not been contended at the Bar, and it could not have been successfully contended, that sect. 502 is so worded as to exempt a corporation altogether which happened to be the owner of a ship, merely because it happened to be a corporation. It must be upon the true construction of that section in such a case as the present one that the fault or privity is the fault of somebody who is not merely a servant or agent for whom the company is liable upon the footing respondeat superior, but somebody for whom the company is liable because his action is the very action of the company itself. It is not enough that the fault should be the fault of a servant in order to exonerate the owner, the fault must also be one which is not the fault of the owner, or a fault to which the owner is privy; and I take the view that when anybody sets up that section to excuse himself from the normal consequences of the maxim respondeat superior the burden lies upon him to excuse himself.

In that state of the law it is obvious to me that Mr. Lennard ought to have gone into the box and relieved the company of the presumption which arises against it that his action was the company's action. But Mr. Lennard did not go into the box to rebut the presumption of liability, and we have no satisfactory evidence as to what the constitution of the company was or as to what Mr. Lennard's position was. The memorandum and articles of association were not put in. The only evidence was that of the secretary, Mr. Simpson, who told the court that he was secretary not only to the company, but also to the managing company, and the inference to be drawn is that the officials of the two companies were very much the same and transacted very much the same business. Under the circumstances I think that the company and Mr. Lennard have not discharged the burden of proof which was upon them, and that it must be taken that the unseaworthiness, which I hold to have been established as existing at the commencement of the voyage from Novorossisk, was an unseaworthiness which did not exist without the actual fault or privity of his own company. If that is so, then the judgment of the majority of the Court of Appeal and of Bray, J. was right.

There is another point which I have not entered upon, because it was not touched upon in the court below, and that is the question as to whether the terms of the charter-party are such as to exclude the operation of sect. 502 altogether. That question remains intact. It is not necessary to deal with it in this case, and I therefore pass it by.

For the reasons which I have given, I move that this appeal be dismissed, and dismissed with costs.

Lord DUNEDIN.—I concur, and I have but little to add to what the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack has said. It appears clearly from the facts, and indeed eventually was admitted by the appellants' counsel, that the loss which had its final outcome in the fire was really due to a set of defects in the steam power in the boilers which constituted unseaworthiness. In the court below at the trial the principal controversy seems to have turned upon whether the fault in allowing the vessel to be unseaworthy was a fault committed by the captain at Novorossisk or was the fault of J. M. Lennard, the registered manager of the ship. I agree with what my noble and learned friend has said that the true view of the facts is that the fault was the fault of Lennard. But before your Lordships' House the chief argument has been, admitting that it was the fault of J. M. Lennard, whether that was actual fault or privity in the sense of sect. 502 of the Merchant Shipping Act. The real question therefore turns upon what is to be the application of the words there used to a metaphysical conception like an incorporated company who cannot act directly themselves.

I do not know that a case will ever arise in which that will need to be treated as a purely abstract proposition. I do not think it arises in this case, and I certainly incline to the opinion that it will be found always to depend upon the particular facts of the case. If I was bound to decide affirmatively in this case, I should be inclined to think that there was enough known about Lennard to show that, to use the appellants' learned counsel's own phrase, he was the alter ego of the company. He was a director of the company. I can quite conceive that a company may, by entrusting its business to one director, be as truly represented by that one director as in ordinary cases it is represented by the whole board. I am quite sure that you cannot at least put as a general proposition in law that it is true that nothing will ever be the actual fault or privity of an incorporated company unless it is the actual fault of the whole board of directors. But I think the true criterion of the case is that which was found and applied by Hamilton, L.J., that the parties who plead this 502nd section must bring themselves within its terms; and therefore the question is—Have the company freed themselves by showing that this arose without their actual fault or privity? I think they have not. Lennard may have been deputed by the company to do all these things, or, again, there might have been liability upon the ground that Lennard had told the whole body of directors, and that they knew and sent him the money, and so on. Anyway, they have not discharged the onus which was upon them, and I therefore concur in the motion which has been made by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack.

March 16, 17, and 30, 1915.

BRITISH DOMINIONS GENERAL INSURANCE COMPANY LIMITED v. DUDER AND OTHERS. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Marine insurance — Reinsurance — Constructive total loss—Compromise between insured and insurers of original policy—Benefit of compromise to reinsurers.

The plaintiffs insured a ship against total and (or) constructive total loss only, and reinsured the risk with the defendants, the policy of reinsurance not containing the usual clause "to pay as may be paid thereon." The ship stranded, and notice of abandonment was given by her owner, who alleged that she was a constructive total loss. The plaintiffs refused to accept the notice of abandonment, and the owner brought an action against them which was compromised by the plaintiffs paying the owner 66 per cent. of the loss. The defendants were invited to agree to the compromise, but declined on the ground that there had been no constructive total loss in fact. In an action by the plaintiffs against the defendants on the policy of reinsurance, Bailhache, J. held that there was a constructive total loss in fact; that the defendants were disentitled to the benefit of the compromise, and were liable to the plaintiffs for the full amount of the reinsurance, subject to the benefit of any rights they might have had in respect of the abandonment of the ship if no compromise had been effected.

Held, that a contract of reinsurance is a contract of indemnity only, and that the defendants were entitled to the benefit of the compromise made by the plaintiffs with the owners; the plaintiffs therefore could only recover from the defendants the 66 per cent. of the loss which they had paid to the owner, and not the full amount of the reinsurance. The plaintiffs, however, were entitled to add to their claim against the defendants a proper proportion of the expense of obtaining the compromise.

Uzielli v. Boston Marine Insurance Company (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 405; 52 L. T. Rep. 787; 15 Q. B. Div. 11) discussed.

Judgment of Bailhache, J. (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 575; 111 L. T. Rep. 1079; (1914) 3 K. B. 835) reversed.

APPEAL by the defendants from a judgment of Bailhache, J. in the Commercial list, reported 12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 575; 111 L. T. Rep. 1079; (1914) 3 K. B. 835.

The plaintiffs' claim was upon two time policies of reinsurance, dated the 23rd Jan. 1913, upon the hull and machinery of the steamship Katina, valued at 20,500*l.*, one policy being for 850*l.* and the other for 650*l.*, and expressed to be against total and (or) constructive total loss only, warranted free from all average and salvage charges. The plaintiffs were the original insurers to the extent of 1500*l.* under a time policy dated the 31st Dec. 1912, on the hull and machinery of the Katina, valued as in the reinsurance policy. This policy was an f. p. a. policy, but covered collision damage. By clauses attached to the policy the insured value was to be taken as the repaired value. The reinsurance policies contained the same clause.

The Katina stranded on the rocks near Hartland Point on the 23rd May 1913. Notice of abandonment was given on the 26th. It was not accepted, but the underwriters agreed to treat the matter as though a writ had been issued. The Katina came off on the 5th June and was ultimately taken to Swansea. As it was doubtful whether the Katina was a constructive total loss, an agreement was made between the owners and the underwriters other than the plaintiffs by which the owner agreed to accept 66 per cent. of their claim. The defendants were asked by the plaintiffs to agree to this compromise and to pay accordingly, but they refused upon the ground that there was no constructive total loss in fact. The plaintiffs, having at first refused to join the other underwriters in the compromise, were sued by the owner, who claimed for a constructive total loss. The action was settled upon the terms of the compromise, and the plaintiffs paid the owner's costs. The plaintiffs then brought this action against the defendants, claiming payment in full under the reinsurance policies. The defendants denied that the Katina was a constructive total loss, and contended that, if she were, they were liable to the plaintiff only for the amount of the loss which the plaintiffs had paid—namely, 66 per cent., and not 100 per cent. Bailhache, J. held that there was a constructive total loss in fact; that the defendants were disentitled to the benefit of the compromise, and were liable to the plaintiffs for the full amount of the reinsurance, subject to the benefit of any rights they might have had in respect of the abandonment of the Katina, if no compromise had been effected.

The defendants appealed.

Maurice Hill, K.C. and F. D. MacKinnon, K.C. for the defendants.—A contract of marine insurance is a contract of indemnity, and of indemnity only:

Burnand v. Rodocanachi, 4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 576; 47 L. T. Rep. 277; 7 App. Cas. 339;
Castellain v. Preston, 49 L. T. Rep. 29; 11 Q. B. Div. 380.

The decision in Re Eddystone Marine Insurance Company (7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 167; 66 L. T. Rep. 70; (1892) 2 Ch. 423), and Re Law Guarantee Trust and Accident Society (111 L. T. Rep. 423; (1914) 2 Ch. 617), have no application here; they were cases where the original insuring companies were in liquidation and paid at most only a dividend on the original policies, and it was held that they could recover the full amount from their reinsurers. The distinction is that in those cases the liability still remained after the payment of the dividends, and recourse could have been had to any further assets. It is true that in Uzielli v. Boston Marine Insurance Company (sup.) it was held that the plaintiffs, the reassured, were entitled to recover on the reinsurance policy 100 per cent. of the loss, although they had settled the assured's claim for 88 per cent. only, but it is difficult to see on what principle the court there proceeded. In holding that the indemnity afforded by the reinsurance was against the reinsurer's liability and not against the discharge of his liability it is submitted that Bailhache, J. was wrong. [They referred also to Chippendale v. Holt (8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 78; 73 L. T. Rep. 472; 1 Com. Cas. 197); and Arnold on Marine Insurance, 9th edit., s. 866.]

Adair Roche, K.C. and R. A. Wright for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs were liable to the insured for the full amount of the loss, but compromised for 66 per cent. of it. The defendants refused to have anything to do with the compromise, and cannot now have the benefit of it, especially as the cost to the plaintiffs of obtaining the compromise was heavy. A policy of reinsurance is an independent contract, and not one of indemnity: (Nelson v. Empress Assurance Corporation, 10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 68; 93 L. T. Rep. 60; (1905) 2 K. B. 281) and the reassured can recover from the reinsurer the amount insured, if he proves the loss of the subject-matter of the insurance—namely, his interest in the ship. Sects. 67 and 68 of the Marine Insurance Act 1909 are a mere restatement of the law, and go to show that the plaintiffs can recover the full amount. In so far as a contract of reinsurance is one of indemnity it is of indemnity against the liability of the reassured and not against the discharge of liability. Uzielli v. Boston Marine Insurance Company (sup.), a decision of the Court of Appeal, is a clear authority in our favour, and this case is stronger, as the reinsurance policy here did not contain the words "to pay as may be paid thereon." Further, here the plaintiffs' interest in the ship has been valued, and the amount of the plaintiffs' claim is determined by the valuation.

Maurice Hill, K.C. in reply.—The plaintiffs' interest is not valued; it is the ship that is valued. The two sums of 850*l.* and 650*l.* merely represent the maximum liability of the defendants, and must not be taken as the amounts for which the defendants are liable in case of the loss of the ship. The principle of all insurance is of indemnity and of indemnity only. [He referred also to sects. 9, 16, 55, 67, 68, and 91 of the Marine Insurance Act 1909.]

Cur. adv. vult.

March 30.—Buckley, L.J.—On the 31st Dec. 1912 the plaintiffs were original underwriters to the extent of 1500*l.* on the hull and machinery of the steamship Katina valued at 20,500*l.* On the 23rd Jan. 1913 the plaintiffs by two policies of that date, the one for 850*l.* and the other for 650*l.* reinsured against the risk of total and (or) constructive total loss only of her hull and machinery 20,5000*l.* or v.o.p., or (that is) value as in original policy.

The ship stranded on the 23rd May 1913, off Hartland Point, and three days later the owners gave notice of abandonment. The plaintiffs contended that the ship was not a constructive total loss. The owners brought an action against the plaintiffs; and in the result that action was compromised as between those parties on the terms that the plaintiffs paid the owners 66 per cent. of liability upon the footing of a constructive total loss.

The defendants were invited to come into that compromise, but declined to do so. They said that the plaintiffs must act as uninsured, and that they, the defendants, did not admit that the ship was a constructive total loss. On the 12th Feb. 1914 the plaintiffs, by their solicitors, wrote to the defendants a letter in the plainest terms to the effect that they had satisfied themselves that the vessel was in fact a constructive total loss, and that a settlement at 66 per cent. was very beneficial to the underwriters; and asking the defendants to come into the compromise, and stating that, if they did not do so, the plaintiffs would then prosecute their action against the defendants, claiming a constructive total loss on the reinsurance polices strictly in accordance with their full rights on the policies, which they said entitled them to claim 100 per cent. on establishing in fact that there was a constructive total loss. The defendants adhered to the position which they had taken up, and refused to admit that the vessel was a constructive total loss. Thereupon the plaintiffs paid the 66 per cent., and now sue the defendants on the reinsurance policies.

In this action they have proved that there was in fact a constructive total loss: and upon that there is now no dispute. The question is whether the plaintiffs are entitled to 100 per cent. or 66 per cent. against the defendants. The learned judge has decided this in favour of the plaintiffs, holding that they are entitled to recover 100 per cent. The question is whether this is right.

On the one side it is said that a contract of reinsurance is a contract of indemnity, and that it is a contract of indemnity only; that the plaintiffs have in fact only had to pay 66 per cent. and cannot recover more against the defendants. On the other side, it is contended that the defendants were offered an opportunity of coming into the compromise; that they refused to do so, alleging that they were liable for nothing, because (as they contended) there was not a constructive total loss; whereupon (it is contended) they cannot now have the benefit of the compromise, which was obtained not in any way for them, but as a compromise of the question of constructive total loss, which has now been determined against them.

A contract of insurance and a contract of reinsurance are independent of each other. But a contract of reinsurance is a contract which insures the thing originally insured—namely, the ship. The reinsurer has an insurable interest in the ship by virtue of his original contract of insurance. The thing insured, however, is the ship, and not the interest of the reinsurer in the ship by reason of his contract of insurance upon the ship.

In Uzielli and Co. v. Boston Marine Insurance Company (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 405; 52 L. T. Rep. 787; 15 Q. B. Div. 11), a case I find it very difficult to understand, the Court of Appeal affirmed that by reason of the total loss which had occurred, the original underwriter was entitled to recover from the reinsuring underwriter up to 1000*l.*, being 100 per cent. upon the amount named in the policy of reinsurance, notwithstanding that the original underwriter had settled with the owners for 88 per cent. The judgment of Sir Baliol Brett, M.R. goes to, first, a decision that no more than the 1000*l.* could be recovered, because, although the reinsurers had an insurable interest exceeding their share in the value of the ship by reason of the sue and labour clause, yet the policy of reinsurance was only for 1000*l.*, and they could recover no more; and, secondly, that the sue and labour clause was not available for the benefit of the reinsurers. He left the first point at a stage at which he seems to have assumed that up to the 1000*l.* the reinsurers could recover without saying why; and then upon the second point he went on to hold that they could not recover more. I cannot find that he gives any reason why the difference between the 88 per cent. and the 100 per cent. could be recovered. Cotton, L.J. says it is true: "They are liable to this extent"—that is 1000*l.*—"by reason of the total loss which has occurred"; but I cannot find any reasoning which leads to this conclusion. His reasoning seems to be only a summary of that of the Master of the Rolls. Lindley, L.J.'s judgment is rested upon "pay as may be paid thereon." I cannot think that this case is an authority for the proposition that upon a contract of reinsurance there can be recovered more than an indemnity—that the reinsurer can make a profit out of the reinsurance.

In Castellain v. Preston (49 L. T. Rep. 29; 11 Q. B. Div. 380) I find a principle laid down in the following passages: "The contract of insurance contained in a marine or fire policy is a contract of indemnity, and of indemnity only, and this contract means that the assured, in case of a loss against which the policy has been made, shall be fully indemnified, but shall never be more than fully indemnified": per Brett, L.J., at p. 386. "If there is a money or any other benefit received which ought to be taken into account in diminishing the loss, or in ascertaining what the real loss is against which the contract of indemnity is given, the indemnifier ought to be allowed to take advantage of it in order to calculate what the real loss is": (per Cotton, L.J., at p. 395). "Only those can recover who have an insurable interest, and they can recover only to the extent to which that insurable interest is damaged by the loss. In the course of the argument it has been sought to establish a distinction between a fire policy and a marine policy. It has been urged that a fire policy is not quite a contract of indemnity, and that the assured can get something more than what he has lost. It seems to me that there is no justification in authority, and I can see no foundation in reason, for any suggestion of that kind": (per Bowen, L.J., at p. 397).

In Burnand v. Rodocanachi (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 576; 47 L. T. Rep. 277; 7 App. Cas. 333, at p. 339) I find Lord Blackburn saying: "The general rule of law (and it is obvious justice) is that where there is a contract of indemnity (it matters not whether it is a marine policy or a policy against fire or land, or any other contract of indemnity) and a loss happens, anything which reduces or diminishes that loss reduces or diminishes the amount which the indemnifier is bound to pay; and if the indemnifier has already paid it, then, if anything which diminishes the loss comes into the hands of the person to whom he has paid it, it becomes an equity that the person who has already paid the full indemnity is entitled to be recouped by having that amount back."

In these passages I find a principle stated. The use of all authorities is to ascertain from them the legal principles which they affirm. In Uzielli v. Boston Marine Insurance Company (sup.), having read the case more than once, I cannot find a principle. I must guide myself, therefore, by Castellain v. Preston (sup.) rather than by Uzielli v. Boston Marine Insurance Company (sup.). Bailhache, J. rested his judgment upon the proposition that the indemnity afforded by reinsurance is against liability, and not against discharge of liability. I am not able to assent to this proposition, if it means, as by the context it must have meant, that if the liability be discharged by payment of a less amount, the assured by reinsurance can recover against the reinsuring underwriter the amount of the liability, although exceeding the amount paid for its discharge.

There are cases such as Re Eddystone Marine Insurance Company (7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 167; 66 L. T. Rep. 70; (1892) 2 Ch. 423) and Re The Law Guarantee Trust and Accident Society (111 L. T. Rep. 817; (1914) 2 Ch. 617), in which it would seem, until they are further considered, that the assured by way of reinsurance is recovering more than the amount he has to pay on the original insurance. They are cases, however, in which the assured by way of bankruptcy or liquidation seems to discharge his liability by payment of a dividend to the original assured. This, however, is not the fact. Notwithstanding the payment of a dividend, the liability to the full extent remains; and out of further assets, if any, it must in law be discharged. When the estate pays only 10*s.* in the pound, and recovers 20*s.* in the pound, it is not recovering in excess of a sum for which it has compromised its liability. The liability is not compromised at less than 20*s.* in the pound. The liability is still 20*s.* in the pound, and the right to recover a like sum against the reinsuring underwriter is an asset of the estate; and its proceeds must go according to the law of bankruptcy or liquidation to all the creditors in administration.

I regret to have to come to the conclusion that the defendants, who would have nothing to do with the compromise, are nevertheless entitled to the benefit of it. But it seems to me that as matter of legal right the plaintiffs cannot, even in such a state of facts as this, make a profit out of the reinsurance. For these reasons I think that the appeal must be allowed. The plaintiffs are, however, entitled to indemnity, and this is not necessarily confined to the 66 per cent. They are entitled to such further sum, if any, as is required to give them an indemnity. The costs, for instance, of obtaining the compromise at 66 per cent. should be added to the 66 per cent. I shall be prepared to hear anything that may be said as to the proper terms of an inquiry to ascertain what such further sum should be.

Pickford, L.J.—This action was brought on two policies of reinsurance on the steamship Katina, valued at 20,500*l.* The policies were against total or constructive total loss only, and were warranted free from all average and salvage losses. The plaintiffs were original insurers of the Katina to the extent of 1500*l.*, the valuation being the same as in the reinsurance policies. This original policy was an f.p.a. policy, but included collision damage. The reinsurance policies were 850*l.* and 650*l.* on hull and machinery, 20,500*l.* or v.o.p., meaning value original policy, being a reinsurance against the risk of total and (or) constructive total loss only, warranted free from all average and salvage charges. They did not contain the words "to pay as may be paid thereon."

The Katina was stranded and suffered severe damage, and the owners gave notice of abandonment to the underwriters, who did not accept it, but agreed to treat the matter as if a writ had been issued. The Katina was eventually got off and taken to a place of safety. It then appeared that it was a doubtful point whether the vessel was a constructive total loss or not; and, as neither party was clear on the point, they entered into negotiations, the result of which was that an agreement was come to between the owners and the underwriters by which the former agreed to accept 66 per cent. of the total claim. The defendants were asked to agree to this compromise, but they refused to do so on the ground that they considered there was no constructive total loss. The plaintiffs, in consequence of the defendants' action, declined at first to join the other underwriters in the compromise, and the owners sued them. The plaintiffs settled the action upon the terms of paying 66 per cent. and the owners' costs; and they then sued the defendants, claiming, as they had intimated that they would, 100 per cent. of the total loss. The defendants contested the claim on the ground that there was no constructive total loss; and also denied that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover for a total loss, as they were not liable and had not paid on that basis. The question of constructive total loss was decided against the defendants by Bailhache, J., and they accept that part of his decision, but they appeal against so much of it as decides that they are liable to pay 100 per cent. of the loss.

There is no direct authority on the subject, and the question does not often arise, because the reinsurers generally join in the compromise; but in this case they decided to try to escape liability altogether, on the ground of there being no constructive total loss, and if they failed on that ground, to claim the benefit of the compromise in which they refused to join. Bailhache, J. has decided that they cannot claim this benefit, and the question is whether this conclusion is in accordance with the principles of marine insurance.

A contract of marine insurance is a contract of indemnity, and a contract of reinsurance is also a contract of indemnity, though it is a contract independent of the original contract of insurance, and so not within the third party rules relating to indemnity decided in Nelson v. Empress Assurance Corporation (10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 68; 93 L. T. Rep. 60; (1905) 2 K. B. 281). Bailhache, J. accepts the principle that a contract of reinsurance is a contract of indemnity; but he says that it is a contract of indemnity against liability; and that he sees no more reason why a reinsurer should pay less by reason of a compromise made with the assured for the benefit of the original assured and not of the insurer, than in the case where the original underwriter becomes bankrupt and pays a small dividend or none. The reference in these last words is Re Eddystone Marine Insurance Company (sup.); and Re Law Guarantee Trust and Accident Society (sup.). It does not seem to me that those cases stand at all on the same footing as this. They proceed on the ground that the reinsurer has to pay the original insurer his liability, whether he has discharged it or not; and that it is immaterial to him what the original insurer does with the money. But there is no diminution of the liability; the original insurer though bankrupt is still liable for the full amount; if assets were to come in in time he could be made to pay; and even in his insolvent state, if the creditor could get judgment, he could be made to pay this particular creditor, if it were not for the bankruptcy laws, which compel an equal distribution of his assets.

In this case there is an actual diminution of the liability; and the plaintiffs could never be called upon to pay more than 66 per cent. The case of Uzielli v. Boston Marine Insurance Company (sup.) was also relied upon by the plaintiffs. The case is very hard to understand, and does not decide the point in this case. The plaintiffs there had paid 88 per cent. for a total loss, and 24 per cent. for suing and labouring; and Mathew, J. had given judgment against the defendants for 112 per cent. The Court of Appeal held that the suing and labouring clause did not apply to that reinsurance, and gave judgment for 100 per cent. The judgment of the Master of the Rolls does not, in my opinion, touch this point; that of Lindley, L.J. seems to me to proceed upon the words "to pay as may be paid thereon," which are not in this policy; and the only difficulty is caused by the passage in the judgment of Cotton, L.J.: "As to the second point, I agree that the policy is a contract of insurance upon the ship; it is a reinsurance upon the policy issued by the French Company to pay as they shall pay, but to cover a total loss only. The insurance is effected by those who are not owners, but by those who are liable in respect of the ship. That is the extent of the defendants' liabilities? The original insurers are liable in respect of the loss of the ship; but the defendants' liability on the policy is limited to the extent of 1000*l.*, and that is all which they can be properly called upon to pay on the policy. They are liable to this extent by reason of the total loss which has occurred." If this means that on the happening of a total loss the reinsurers are liable irrrespective of whether the original underwriters are liable or not, it is, I think, inconsistent with the doctrine that they only indemnify the original insurers against their liability; and if it only means that they are liable to the extent of the original insurers' liability, it does not deal with the question whether a diminution of that liability enures for the benefit of the reinsurers. It is to be noticed that in that case the original insurers had in fact paid more than the 100 per cent., and the court does not make it very clear why they gave judgment for more than 88 per cent. The judgment of Cotton, L.J. seems rather to treat the policy there as a valued policy, and it was contended before us that the policies in this case were valued policies, valuing the plaintiffs' interest at 850*l.* and 650*l.*, and that, therefore, as soon as a total loss happened, 850*l.* and 650*l.* immediately became payable. I do not think this is so. I think they are insurances of 850*l.* and 650*l.* on the plaintiffs' interest in a ship valued at a certain sum, not insurances on a valuation of the plaintiffs' interest. As the policies are in respect of total loss only on a valued ship, the effect under ordinary circumstances is the same as a valued policy, because the original insurer is liable for the whole amount or none; but this does not seem to me to make them valued so as to exclude a consideration of the real amount of the plaintiffs' liability.

I think these policies are subject to the principles stated in Castellain v. Preston (sup.) where Brett, M.R. says: "I go further and hold that if a right of action in the assured has been satisfied, and the loss has been thereby diminished, then, although there never was nor could be any right of action into which the insurer could be subrogated, it would be contrary to the doctrine of subrogation to say that the loss is not to be diminished as between the assured and the insurer by reason of the satisfaction of that right." And Bowen, L.J. says (ib., at pp. 401, 402): "Then what is the principle which must be applied? It is a corollary of the great law of indemnity, and is to the following effect: That a person who wishes to recover for and is paid by the insurers as for a total loss, cannot take with both hands. If he has a means of diminishing the loss, the result of the use of those means belongs to the underwriters. If he does diminish the loss he must account for the diminution to the underwriters"; and in Burnand v. Rodocanachi (sup.), per Lord Blackburn. It is true that these cases were not concerned with reinsurance, but the principle of indemnity applies to it as much as to original insurance. Here the plaintiffs have obtained a diminution of their liability by compromise, and it seems to me they come within the principles stated by Brett, M.R. and Bowen, L.J. in Castellain v. Preston (sup.), just as much as if some actual thing diminishing the loss had come into their hands, as mentioned by Lord Blackburn.

I think, therefore, that the plaintiffs are not entitled to recover 100 per cent, and that the defendants are entitled to the benefit of the compromise. I do not think it very material whether it be put on the ground that the plaintiffs' liability was reduced by agreement, and that they, therefore, never became liable for more than 66 per cent., or on the ground that their legal liability was 100 per cent., but by virtue of an agreement with the shipowners they only paid 66 per cent., and that the reinsurers by subrogation became entitled to the benefit of that agreement.

I do not, however, think that they are entitled to take the benefit and refuse to contribute to the expense of obtaining it. We were told that there were expenses incurred in obtaining the compromise, but were not told what they were. Nelson v. Empress Assurance Corporation (sup.) shows that they are not to be measured in the same way as costs of a third party under Order XVI., r. 48; and, indeed, in this case it is not clear that the costs of the action brought against the plaintiffs by the shipowners were expenses of obtaining the compromise, as it seems that the plaintiffs might have secured the same terms without an action.

There must, therefore, be an inquiry as to the expenses of obtaining the compromise, unless the parties come to an agreement about them.

Bankes, L.J.—The only question raised by this appeal is whether the respondents are entitled to recover from the appellants the whole, or only portion, of the amounts of two policies of reinsurance both dated the 23rd Jan. 1913.

The only facts which need be stated are as follows: "The respondents were original insurers to the extent of 1500*l.* under a time policy dated the 31st Dec. 1912 on the hull and machinery of the steamship Katina, valued at 20,500*l.* The respondents reinsured the risk with the appellants in so far as it related to total and/or constructive total loss by the two policies above referred to, one being for 850*l.* and the other for 650*l.* In May 1913 the Katina was stranded, and the original assured claimed as against the respondents that she was a constructive total loss. The respondents refused to admit the claim, and ultimately the assured commenced an action. The matter was then compromised, the assured agreeing to accept 66 per cent. of the claim in full discharge of the respondents' liability in respect of a constructive total loss and salvage charges. The respondents had asked the appellants to join in the compromise, or at any rate to be bound by it. This the appellants refused to do, and as they persisted in the view that the vessel was not a constructive total loss, the present action was commenced. Bailhache, J. found that the vessel was a constructive total loss, and he accepted the respondents' contention that they were entitled to the full amount of the policy moneys, and he gave judgment for that amount (less certain allowances with regard to which no question arises). The appellants contended, and now contend, that they are liable only for the amount which the respondents, as a result of the compromise, actually paid to the original assured.

The respondents' counsel complained bitterly of the conduct of the appellants in refusing to come into the compromise; and he pointed out that as a result not only had the respondents to accept the compromise at their own risk, but they had to bring the present action at considerable cost to themselves in order to establish as against the appellants the facts that the vessel was a constructive total loss. It would be most unfair, he contended, that the appellants should be allowed any benefit where they had so unreasonably refused to shoulder any portion of the burden. From a business point of view I quite sympathise with the complaint, but I am unable to give it the legal effect for which the respondents contend, or which Bailhache, J. appears to some extent to have attributed to it.

In my opinion, it is not possible, without losing sight altogether of the root principle of insurance law that the contract of insurance is a contract of indemnity, to accept the respondents' contention that they are entitled to ignore the compromise, and claim the full amount of the reinsurance policies. I find the rule laid down in very plain terms by Lord Blackburn in Burnand v. Rodocanachi (sup.). He says: "The general rule of law (and it is obvious justice) is that where there is a contract of indemnity (it matters not whether it is a marine policy, or a policy against fire on land, or any other contract of indemnity) and a loss happens, anything which reduces or diminishes that loss reduces or diminishes the amount which the indemnifier is bound to pay; and if the indemnifier has already paid it, then if anything which diminishes the loss comes into the hands of the persons to whom he has paid it, it becomes an equity that the person who has already paid the full indemnity is entitled to be recouped by having that amount back."

Bailhache, J. founds his judgment in the present case mainly upon two considerations. First, that the respondents bought the compromise, as he expressed it, and under the circumstances bought it for their own advantage, and not for the joint benefit of themselves and of the appellants, and consequently that the appellants are not entitled to any benefit from it; secondly, that the contract of reinsurance is a contract of indemnity against liability, and not against discharge of liability. There is, no doubt, truth in both propositions, but, with respect to the learned judge, the propositions are only partially true. If the simile of a purchase is employed because a price was paid, it cannot, I think, be denied that it is a kind of purchase which does not put the purchaser into the shoes of the vendor so as to enable him to take advantage of the vendor's contract and to sue on it. In speaking of the contract of reinsurance as an indemnity against liability, and not against the discharge of liability, no account is taken of the fact that in the present case, before the liability was discharged, it was reduced in amount by agreement between the parties. In discussing the rights of these parties, I think that it is useful to consider what the position would be in a case where a reinsurer pays the original underwriter the full amount of his liability, and the latter, by some compromise with the original assured, afterwards reduces his liability to a less sum than he had received from his reinsurer. In such a case, upon the authority of such cases as Castellain v. Preston (sup.), in my opinion the reinsurer would be entitled by the doctrine of subrogation to be paid back the difference between what he had paid to the original underwriter and what the latter paid to his assured, and this because the contract of reinsurance is a contract of indemnity which in the case referred to can only be given effect to by invoking the aid of the doctrine of subrogation. In my opinion, unless there is something special in the present contract excluding the operation of the principle of indemnity, the same result must follow whether the compromise precedes or follows the payment by the reinsurer; and the conduct of the reinsurer, however unreasonable, with reference to the compromise, cannot, in my opinion, alter the character of the contract into which the parties originally entered.

It was contended for the respondents that in the present case the contract was a special one. It was said that the policy was a valued policy, and there having been a constructive total loss of the vessel the subject-matter of the insurance, the appellants must pay their agreed proportion of the agreed value of the vessel. I do not agree with this contention. It is true that as between the respondents and the original assured the value of the subject-matter of the insurance was agreed, and it is also true that as between the respondents and the appellants the latter had agreed to reinsure a certain proportion of the former's liability in respect of that agreed value; but that does not, in my opinion, in the events which happened, exclude the principle of indemnity. The effect of the compromise may be variously stated. It may be said that the claim of the original assured having been compromised, there was no payment by the original assured of any agreed fixed proportion of the agreed value. It may perhaps be said that the result of what happened was that a lower value was substituted for the one originally inserted in the policy, or that the original liability was reduced by agreement. Whatever view is taken of the compromise, the respondents cannot, in my opinion, after the compromise, successfully contend that the reinsurance policies were valued policies in the sense that the respondents' claim was "conclusively quantified," to use Mr. Wright's phrase, in the policies merely because it was established that the vessel, the value of which was agreed, was a constructive total loss. To use the language of Lord Selborne in Burnand v. Rodocanachi (sup.), the law does not justify the use of the estoppel founded upon the valuation for any such purpose.

No case was cited to us which, in my opinion, supported the respondents' contention. Mackenzie v. Whitworth (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 490; 33 L. T. Rep. 655; 1 Ex. Div. 36) was cited to us for the respondents as supporting their contention. I do not so read that case. So far as it has any bearing upon the question, I think that it tells against the respondents. In that case the question was whether in a policy which was really a policy of reinsurance, though not so expressed, the description of the subject-matter of the insurance was sufficient. The description was "on goods" merely, the goods being cotton shipped by a New Orleans firm of Tatman and Co., insured by New York underwriters, and reinsured by them with the defendants. Blackburn, J., as he then was, speaks of the interest of the original insurer in these words. He says: "The assured here had a direct interest in the safe arrival of the cotton. . . . It was, though not a property in the cotton, an interest in the cotton created and evidenced by a binding legal contract between them and the owners of that cotton; and if the mode in which they acquired that interest had been stated in the policy, it would have in no way altered the effect of the defendants' contract, which would still have remained a contract to indemnify against all damage sustained by the cotton in consequence of any of the perils insured against." It is plain, from what the learned judge said, that he was dealing with a case in which the original assured had been called upon to pay the full amount of the damage sustained, and the point which is raised in this appeal was not therefore before the court. The language of the learned judge is, in my opinion, important as indicating the nature of the interest of the respondents, and the character of the contract of reinsurance.

Uzielli v. Boston Marine Insurance Company (sup.) was referred to and relied on. It is generally accepted that this case on some points is very difficult of explanation. So far as it can be regarded as any authority in the present case, I think it is important to consider the arguments presented to the court. The underwriters, who were reinsured by the plaintiffs, compromised the claim of the original assured at 88 per cent., but a considerable sum had been expended in getting the vessel off. The plaintiffs thereupon, as stated in the report, became liable as reinsurers to pay their proportion of the 88 per cent., and a proportion of the expenses, less the proceeds of the sale, which sums altogether amounted to a loss of 112 per cent. Mathew, J. held that there had been a constructive total loss, and that the underwriters had expended more than 100 per cent. in the efforts to save the vessel, and he gave judgment for the full 112 per cent., although the policy was a policy for 1000*l.* only. Upon the appeal the defendants contended that their liability ought to be limited to the 88 per cent., and that they ought not to be held liable under the sue and labour clause. The plaintiffs contended that by the terms of the policy the defendants were liable to pay what the plaintiffs were liable to pay under the sue and labour clause. The point which is taken in the present case was not taken in that case. On the contrary, it appears to me to have been assumed that but for the point under the sue and labour clause the claim would have been limited to the 88 per cent. The Master of the Rolls deals with the question in this way. He says that the interest of the plaintiffs as reinsurers is the loss which they might or would suffer under the policy upon which they themselves were liable. He points out that this loss might be more than the share in the full value of the ship, because of the liability under the sue and labour clause, and though he holds that the claim must be limited to the amount of the policy—viz., 1000*l.*—he apparently treats the 12 per cent., representing the difference between the 88 per cent. and the 100 per cent., as recoverable because of the position of the plaintiffs under the policy upon which they were themselves liable, and the terms of the policy under which the plaintiffs were claiming from the defendants. I share the difficulty experienced by other judges more experienced in these matters than myself, in finding a satisfactory explanation of why the 12 per cent. was allowed: (see per Bigham, J. in Western Assurance Company of Toronto v. Poole, 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 390; 88 L. T. Rep. 362; (1903) 1 K. B. 376, at pp. 386-388). But, on the other hand, I do not find any trace of the point which we have to decide in this appeal having been taken, or of any intention on the part of the court to decide it.

A third case that was relied on was Nelson v. Empress Assurance Corporation (sup.). That case turned upon the question whether the third party procedure should be applied as between an original insurer and his reinsurer. The Court of Appeal decided that it ought not to be applied in the particular case before it, Mathew, L.J. observing that the attempt to apply the third party procedure was quite a novel departure which would lead to great inconvenience owing to the two contracts being independent contracts often covering different risks, and he said that he was not prepared to create a precedent. It is true that he said also that the contract of reinsurance could not be treated as a contract of indemnity within the meaning of Order XVI, r. 48. It seems clear from what immediately follows this statement in the judgment, that the Lord Justice had not the present case in his mind when he made the statement; and even if the statement be accepted as correct in the narrow sense in which it was used, I do not think that it is any authority in support of the respondents' contention. I need not refer in detail to Re Law Guarantee Trust and Accident Society; Liverpool Mortgage Company's case (sup.), which proceeded, in my opinion, upon an entirely different principle, and I see no reason at all to suppose that Scrutton, J. had the point which we are considering in his mind when he used the language to which we have referred.

The conclusion to which I have come is that the present case is covered entirely by the principles laid down in the judgment in Castellain v. Preston (sup.), and that the present appeal should be allowed.

HAPPE v. MANASSEH. (a)

Sale of goods—C.i.f. contract—Payment against shipping documents—Moratorium—Effect of—Postponement of Payments Act, 1914 (4 & 5 Geo. 5, c. 11).

The moratorium provided by the proclamation under the Postponement of Payments Act 1914 has no application to a c.i.f. contract.

COMMERCIAL COURT.

Action tried by Sankey, J.

The plaintiff's claim was for damages for alleged breach of contract.

Maurice Hill, K.C. and Morton Smith appeared for the plaintiff.

Hohler, K.C. and C. M. Pitman appeared for the defendant.

The facts and arguments are sufficiently stated in the judgment.

SANKEY, J.—In this case the plaintiff claims damages for alleged breach of contract, and the amount is not in dispute. The facts are contained in the evidence of Mr. Wright, plaintiff's manager, which I accept as absolutely true, and in certain correspondence between the parties. On the 12th June the defendant wrote the plaintiff a letter which contained the terms of the contract in the following words:

> I confirm the sale to you of five chests of Patna opium at 117*l.* per chest net, shipment from Calcutta during July 1914, payment cash against documents upon arrival of steamer.

The steamer duly sailed from Calcutta, and upon the 14th Aug. defendant wrote to the plaintiff:

> I beg to send you the statement of the five chests of Patna opium ex steamship Nore. I have received information that the steamer expects to arrive in port on Monday afternoon next. Shipping documents will therefore be tendered to you for payment on Monday next.

The reply to that was on the 15th Aug., when the plaintiff wrote:

> In reply to yours of the 14th Aug., we beg to inform you, under the proclamation of moratorium, we desire to postpone payment for one calendar month, or less, at our option.

Nothing further was done till the 20th Oct., when the plaintiff telephoned to the defendant and asked for delivery of two chests of the opium, and in reply a message was received that he must take the lot—the five chests—or none.

The plaintiff followed up that telephone conversation of the 20th Oct. by a letter of the 21st Oct, in which he says to the defendant:

> Please give bearer statement and warrants on delivery order for the five chests of opium; date of contract, June 12, 1914.

To that request the defendant made no reply, and in consequence Mr. Wright went to the defendant's office and asked for the five chests of opium. The defendant at that time refused to deliver, repudiated the contract, and in consequence Mr. Wright went back and informed his employer, who bought two chests, of which he had urgent need, that same afternoon. And he wrote:

> Seeing you have failed to deliver the parcel of opium, payment against same having been legally postponed under the proclamation of moratorium, we hereby give you notice that we shall cover ourselves against this contract in the open market and shall hold you responsible for any loss.

Very soon after that there was another telephone communication between plaintiff and defendant, and defendant wrote later the same afternoon, having received the letter I have just read, in the following terms:

> In reply to yours of even date, I send you per bearer statement for above amounting to 592*l.* 14*s.* 8*d.* Warrants for the five chests are in my office, and will be handed to you in exchange for payment of cash, which please send at once.

Plaintiff wrote a letter in reply saying that that offer was too late, that he had already bought against defendant, and on the 26th Oct. defendant wrote:

> With reference to your claim for delivery of the above and my tender of same within a few hours, I regret you have not paid for and taken delivery of the goods, and I give you notice that unless you do so within twenty-four hours from now I shall dispose of the goods and hold you responsible for all loss and damage suffered.

On those facts Mr. Hohler contends: (1) That the moratorium does not apply to a c.i.f. contract. (2) That the plaintiff having repudiated his agreement by refusing to pay against the documents the defendant became excused from performing his part of the contract.

As to the first point: This is a pure question of law. The nature of such a contract is fully discussed and decided in the judgment of Kennedy, L.J. in Biddell Brothers v. E. Clemens Horst and Co. (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 1; 104 L. T. Rep. 577; (1911) 1 K. B. 934), which received the express approval of the House of Lords. Beyond that the evidence in this particular case satisfies me that it was the duty of the defendant under the contract to tender the documents in question to the plaintiff. The plaintiff, however, is not entitled to have the documents except upon the terms of payment. It would be impossible for him to say that he was entitled to the documents but could postpone the payment. It is the payment which entitles him to the documents.

In my view the moratorium proclamation does not apply to such contracts; it only applies where the payment is a naked one, and not to cases where there is a stipulation that to obtain documents of title the purchaser must perform the condition precedent of payment. To hold otherwise would lead to the most startling results. The duty of the vendor ends upon his tender of the documents, but if the purchaser is entitled to postpone payment the effect would be to place upon the vendor the obligation to pay landing and warehouse charges, which are no part of his contract and cannot, as I think, be placed upon him by the moratorium proclamation.

It was said in the course of argument that the vendor would have a lien on the goods for the landing and warehouse charges. This I doubt, but if the goods were of a perishable nature the value of such a lien might be worthless, and this again shows that such an agreement is not within the moratorium proclamation, which was merely to postpone payments and not to alter contracts.

Further, part of the c.i.f. rate is for maritime freight, which is expressly excluded from the operation of the moratorium, and although I think that the words of the proclamation are very wide, in my view they refer to payments in respect of contracts already performed by one party and not to payments which are conditions precedent to the fulfilment of a contract by the other party. I therefore am of opinion that the moratorium proclamation does not apply to a c.i.f. contract.

I now come to the second point. As already stated, the evidence is that under such an agreement payment would not be due till tender of the documents by the defendant. The defendant never did tender the documents, but, on the contrary, refused to complete on the 23rd Oct. Mr. Hohler asks me to find either: (1) Plaintiff dispensed with such a tender, or (2) announced his intention of repudiating before the defendant had had an opportunity of tendering. For this he relies on the plaintiff's letter of the 1st Aug. I do not so read that letter. It appears to me that so far from being an intimation by the plaintiff that he intends to repudiate, it is just the reverse.

It is at the most a request for postponement or an announcement of plaintiff's desire to rely upon an alleged right under the moratorium proclamation. In any event it is not such an act as entitles the defendant to treat it as a repudiation of the contract, or as an excuse for him not tendering the documents. Nor, indeed, did the defendant so regard it or so treat it, for on the 23rd Oct. he regarded and treated the contract as still existing, and was willing—though too late—to fulfil his part of it.

It is said that the effect of this will be to place the landing and warehouse charges upon the shoulders of the defendant in this case. I do not agree to that. I regard the case set up by the plaintiff not as substituting a fresh contract for the original c.i.f. contract, as suggested by Mr. Pitman, but rather as a request by the plaintiff to postpone the time of payment which the subsequent conduct of the defendant showed he acquiesced in and granted.

Under these circumstances the defendant, in my view, would be entitled, as he has acted upon such request, to recover such charges from the plaintiff. For these reasons I think the claim succeeds and I must give judgment for the plaintiff, with costs.

Charter-party—Marine insurance—War risk "for charterer's account"—Charterer's duty to insure.

The plaintiffs were the owners of a Dutch steamship, which was chartered by the defendants under a charter-party which provided (inter alia) that the owners were to pay and provide for insurance, that the charter-party was not to be construed as a demise of the ship, and that the owners were to remain responsible for insurance. The charter-party also contained the following written clause: "War risk, if any required, for the charterers' account. It is understood and agreed that value for war risk at all times to be based on values stated in owners' annual policy."

On the 21*st Sept.* 1914, while on a voyage from Portland, Oregon, to Ireland with a cargo of wheat, the ship was sunk by a German cruiser.

In an action by the plaintiffs to recover damages for the defendants' failure to insure the steamer against war risks after having been requested by the plaintiffs to do so:

Held, that the defendants were liable, as the business meaning of the words "for charterers' account" were that the charterers were bound to provide and pay for a war risk policy.

COMMERCIAL COURT.

Action tried by Bailhache, J.

The plaintiffs' claim was to recover damages for the defendants' failure to insure a Dutch steamship against war risks under the terms of a charter-party, dated the 17th Sept. 1912.

The facts and arguments are sufficiently stated in the written judgment.

Roche, K.C. and A. Neilson for the defendants.

BAILHACHE, J.—The main question in this action, and the only one raised at the trial before me, was whether the defendants were liable to the plaintiffs in damages for failure to insure the plaintiffs' steamer Maria against war risks under the following circumstances:—

The Maria was sunk at sea by the German cruiser Karlsruhe, on the 21st Sept. 1914, while on a voyage from Portland (Oregon) to Ireland, with a cargo of wheat for merchants at Belfast and Dublin. Her loss was not known until the 24th Oct. The Maria was a Dutch steamer, and was, at the time of her sinking, under a five years' time charter-party made between the parties to this action, and dated the 17th Sept. 1912.

At the end of the charter-party there was this written clause:

War risk, if any required, for charterers' account. It is understood and agreed that value for war risk at all times to be based on values stated in owners' annual policy.

Upon this clause two principal points arose. First, was the obligation to insure against war risks upon the charterers or the owners? Second, if upon the charterers, for what amount? There were other subsidiary points, which I will deal with as I proceed.

The charter-party stated in clause 2 how the disbursements were to be borne as between owner and charterers, and by that clause the owners were to pay and provide for insurance. Clause 23 provided that the charter-party was not to be construed as a demise of the steamship, and that owners were to remain responsible for, among other things, insurance.

It was admitted for the charterers that the premiums payable in respect of war risks fell upon them, but it was argued that the duty of covering the Maria by a war risks policy fell upon the owners. In support of this argument I was referred to clauses 2 and 23, and to the obvious convenience of this course in view of the fact that the war risks policy was to protect the owners and not the charterers, and that the amount to be covered was to be based upon the value stated in owners' annual policy, an amount of which the owners only would be aware.

I do not think this contention is sound. I think the words "War risk, if any required, for charterers' account," mean that the charterers are to provide and pay for the war risks policy.

The words "for charterers' account" are a business form of expressing the fact that the charterers were to provide and pay for a war risks policy, just as by clause 2 the owners are to provide and pay for the ordinary insurance.

The word "policy" does not occur, but it is common ground, and it is indeed obvious from the words "if any required," and from the whole clause, that the charter-party means "war risks policy," and not war risk.

It is not, of course, conclusive, but it is a satisfaction to me to find that the parties understood their obligation in the sense in which I have decided, as witness the whole correspondence between them. Two letters will sufficiently illustrate this. One is dated the 6th Aug. 1914, and is from the plaintiffs to the defendants, and it reads thus:

Considering the actual political situation, we must ask you to satisfy us that the war risk on the steamship Maria is covered, or we must instruct the captain at his coal port to wait the developments. It is, under the circumstance that you are at war, probable that a cargo with destination of Belfast or Dublin will be captured. We await your reply latest in two days, and are in the meantime, dear sirs, yours faithfully,

Signed for the defendants.

The other is dated the 2nd Sept. 1914 and is from the defendants to the plaintiffs, and the material parts read thus:

War risk.—We note your remarks, but as explained to your Mr. Kerdel, as the Maria is a neutral ship at present we cannot see any necessity to insure her against war risks and consequently do not propose doing so at present. As she is bound for Irish ports she will not come into the mine area of the North Sea, which appears to us to constitute her only risk.

Mr. Kerdel mentioned to us that it was within the bounds of possibility that you might transfer this steamer to the English flag, and we shall be glad to know if you propose taking any such steps; furthermore, he was going to advise us the steamer's present insured value, but we have not yet received this information.

In that latter letter, the defendants ask the steamer's insured value. This is required to enable them to effect a policy for the agreed amount. They did not get this information until the 8th or 9th Oct. It was conveyed to them in a letter of the 5th Oct., and was said to be 30,500*l*. The material parts of that letter run thus:

We have further telegraphed you asking to insure the ship for war risk according to the charter. Her insuring value is 30,500*l*. There are rumours here that England may break our neutrality and in that case, of course, Holland would be in war with England, and we are sorry to say that we cannot run this risk.

By the 9th Oct. the Maria was overdue at Las Palmas. She had, in fact, been sunk nearly three weeks before that; but her loss was not known. No evidence was given on either side as to what premium would have been required for a war risks policy on the 9th Oct., but I cannot assume that she would have been uninsurable, in fact or in a business sense.

So far, indeed, as war risks alone were concerned, she was not an undesirable ship to submit to underwriters. She was Dutch, and her cargo was only at worst conditionally contraband. The burden of proving that she was not insurable on the 9th Oct. lies upon the charterers; and they have not discharged it.

If the delay in letting them know the insurable value had increased the premium payable they might have had some claim against the owners. But they did not insure; they made no attempt to insure; and the point does not arise.

It is to be observed that by the 5th Oct. the plaintiffs were asking to be covered against the risks of a war between this country and Holland, and they returned to the point in a further letter of the 9th Oct.

To this they were not, in my opinion, entitled, nor could the defendants have effected such a policy. The fact that they asked for too wide a policy does not, however, justify the defendants in giving them no policy at all, nor did their request affect the matter. The defendants were not minded to insure.

It was somewhat faintly suggested for the charterers that no war risks policy was required. It was said that, the ship being Dutch and the cargo wheat for a private buyer, the Germans had no right to sink her, and in doing so were acting as pirates and not as belligerents. I agree that the clause which says "War risk, if any required" means "if reasonably required"; but I do not think it possible to hold that, as things were in August and September last, the plaintiffs' request to be covered against war risk was unreasonable.

I hold, therefore, that the defendants committed a breach of their charter-party, and must pay damages. The remaining question is how much.

The war risks policy was to be based upon value stated in owners' annual policy. The amount of cover asked for by the plaintiffs was 30,500*l.* They arrived at that amount in this way.

They were insured to the extent of some 20,000*l.* by valued yearly policies on hull and machinery. The value of the Maria, as stated in those policies, was 24,000*l.* They had also a yearly policy on what was described as "excess value," but which was obviously to cover that very elusive subject-matter of insurance called disbursements, for a sum of something over 6400*l.*, and they added this sum to the 24,000*l.*, and so arrived at their figure.

The disbursements policy was an honour policy, and contained the clause "full interest admitted." Mr. Leck argued that where you have a policy for a definite sum, with full interest admitted, you have in effect a valued policy; and that the plaintiffs were entitled to add the amount of the policy to their valued policies on hull and machinery. I do not think this policy can be taken into account.

No doubt for some purposes, as, for instance, over-insurance, an honour policy on disbursements may and will be considered, but not, I think, in such a case as this. I do not agree with Mr. Leck's contention that the policy can be treated as a valued policy.

There is no value stated in the policy, as required by the charter-party. Moreover the owners' annual policy means, I think, the policies on hull and machinery, and not on disbursements.

I do not, however, think the owners' request for a policy for an excessive amount excuses the defendants from effecting a policy against war risks, though if they had done so they might, I think, have called upon the owners to refund the proportion of premium attributable to the excess of insurance covered by the inclusion of this disbursements policy.

The truth of the matter is that the defendants considered the risk to the Maria so small as to be negligible; and they did not anticipate that the Germans would so violate international law as to sink a neutral vessel with an English cargo, not contraband, and they preferred not to insure. Their estimate of the risks run proved, most unfortunately for them, to be wrong; and, while I regret that their quite intelligible breach of contract has led to such a disastrous result, I must give judgment for the plaintiffs for 24,000*l.* and costs.

Contract—C.i.f.—Tender of bill of lading with or without policy of insurance after outbreak of war—Buyer not bound to accept.

Certain beans were sold under a c.i.f. contract before the outbreak of war between Germany and England to be shipped in a German bottom from China to Naples. The sellers and buyers were English firms. The price was to include freight as per bill of lading and insurance—payment net cash in London on arrival of goods at port of discharge in exchange for bill of lading and policies; but payment to be made in no case later than three months from date of bill of lading. The beans were shipped before the war, after which the vessel took refuge in a neutral port. The sellers sought to recover (in one case) on a tender of the German bill of lading, and (in another case) on a tender of a German bill of lading and a German policy of insurance.

Held, that after the outbreak of war the tender of the above documents was in neither case good tender.

Special cases stated by arbitrators for the opinion of the court.

In Arnhold, Karberg, and Co. (sellers) v. Blythe, Green, Jourdain, and Co. (buyers) the facts (as stated in the judgment of the court) were as follows:—

The sellers, a firm carrying on business in England, sold to the buyers, also an English firm, on the form of contract quoted in the judgment of the court (inf.), a quantity of horse beans to be shipped from China to Naples. In July 1914 the beans were shipped on the German steamer Gernis for conveyance to Naples, the bills of lading being dated the 6th and 11th July respectively. At the end of July the buyers insured part of the cargo against war risk, the remainder neither buyers nor sellers were able so to insure. A declaration of one shipment was made on the 29th July, and a provisional invoice was sent to the buyers on the same day. The receipt of the declaration was confirmed by the buyers on the 13th Aug. A declaration of the other part, numbered 871, was made on the 1st Aug., the provisional invoice was sent on the 12th Aug., and receipt of the declaration was confirmed by the buyers on the 13th Aug. On the 11th Oct. the German bill of lading and an English policy of insurance were tendered to the buyers, who refused to pay. The Gernis was in a port of refuge in the Dutch East Indies and is probably there still. The matter went to arbitration and the arbitrators stated a special case on the question whether the sellers were entitled to payment against such documents at the expiration of three months from the date of the bill of lading.

In the case of Theodor Schneider and Co. (sellers) v. Burgett and Newsam (buyers), both English firms, the sellers sold to the buyers on the same form of contract a quantity of horse beans for shipment from China to European ports. In July the sellers shipped beans in accordance with the contract by the German steamer Camilla Rickmers from Shanghai to Rotterdam, the bill of lading being dated the 21st July. Apparently no war insurances were effected. On the 24th Aug. the sellers sent a declaration of the shipment to the buyers, who acknowledged receipt. The court was not told the date of provisional invoice. On the 21st Oct. the sellers tendered to the buyers a German bill of lading and a German policy of insurance. The buyers refused to pay. The Camilla Rickmers was, and probably still is, in a port of refuge in the Philippines. The matter went to arbitration; the arbitrators decided that the documents were a good tender, but stated their award in the form of a special case, in order that the opinion of the court might be taken on the point.

George Wallace, K.C. and Stuart Bevan for the sellers in the first case; Maurice Hill, K.C. and the Hon. Malcolm Macnaghten for the buyers.

SCRUTTON, J. — In these proceedings two special cases stated by arbitrators on the same form of contract raise a question of general importance, whether when, before the outbreak of war, goods have been sold by one English firm to another on a c.i.f. contract and shipped in a German ship to a neutral port, the seller is entitled, after the outbreak of war, to tender in one case the German bill of lading, in the other case the German bill of lading and a German policy of insurance, and to claim the price. The contract in each case is the London Corn Trade Association form for Chinese and Manchurian cereals. Under it there is sold a quantity of grain, with liberty to vary it within limits, to be shipped at a time and place specified, at a price specified, with allowance for foreign substances to be ascertained at port of discharge. The price is to include freight as per bill of lading and insurance. Payment net cash in London on arrival of goods at port of discharge in exchange for bill of lading and policies of insurance, free of war risk, on Lloyd's conditions and including the London Corn Trade Association f.p.a. clause, effected with approved underwriters for whose solvency the seller is not to be responsible. But payment to be made in no case later than three months from date of bill of lading or upon the posting of vessel at Lloyd's as a total loss.

In the event of war, sellers are empowered to cover war risk for and at expense of the buyer, if the buyer does not himself insure. Provisional invoice to be tendered within thirty days from the date of the bill of lading unless the mail is late. The contract appears to be a c.i.f. contract with the variation that the price is ultimately payable only on quantity delivered, unless the vessel is posted as lost or three months have elapsed from date of bill of lading, in which case payment is made on bill of lading weight. [His Lordship stated the facts as above set out, and continued:]

The only differences between the two cases were that in the first case the policy was English and in the second German, and that in the first case two declarations and one provisional invoice were before the outbreak of war, and in the second case neither declaration nor provisional invoice was before the outbreak of war. In each case the acknowledgment of receipt of declaration was after the outbreak of war.

The argument for the buyers, as I understood it, was that the contract of affreightment was rendered void on the outbreak of war, or that if it were not, to become a party to it would involve trading with the enemy, which the buyers could not be required to take upon themselves, and that the tender was therefore bad. For the sellers, in the first case, Mr. Wallace argued that the acceptance of the tender did not involve trading with the enemy or that under the Crown licence of the 25th Sept. 1914, to be referred to hereafter, the buyers might pay freight and charges and get their goods from the ship in Java without trading with the enemy in any punishable way. Mr. R. A. Wright for the sellers in the second case admitted that the contract of affreightment became void on the outbreak of war but said that this was immaterial in a c.i.f. contract. After the goods had been shipped in accordance with the contract the goods and the contract were at buyers' risk. It was immaterial that the goods were lost when the documents were tendered (Groom v. Barber, 12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 594; 112 L. T. Rep. 301; (1915) 1 K. B. 316), and equally immaterial that the parties contracting to carry had become alien enemies or insolvent. The risk was the buyers', and they must insure against war risk. Such were the contentions. To deal with them requires a careful analysis of the position.

As the contract was a sale of unascertained goods by description, no property passed to the buyers at the time of shipment, or at any rate until the goods were unconditionally appropriated to the contract: (Sale of Goods Act 1893, s. 18 (5) (1). In each of the special cases there was an appropriation of the goods to the contract by the sellers, assented to by the buyers, but in neither case was there an unconditional appropriation, as the sellers took the bill of lading to their own order and had not tendered it at the time of the appropriation. The effect of this is discussed by Bramwell and Cotton, L.JJ., in Mirabita v. Imperial Ottoman Bank (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 591; 38 L. T. Rep. 597; 3 Ex. Div. 164). I understand the effect of these judgments to be that where the seller so reserves the power of dealing with the goods, the property does not pass on shipment, but is vested in the seller until he receives payment in exchange for documents of title.

What must be the condition of the goods when the sender (a) appropriates them to the contract, (b) tenders documents and asks for payment, has been the subject of some discussion. In Olympia Oil and Cake Company v. Produce Brokers Limited (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 570; 111 L. T. Rep. 1107; (1915) 1 K. B. 233), where goods which the sellers knew to be lost at the time of appropriation were appropriated to a contract, all three members of the court held it a bad appropriation, Avory, J. going further and holding that it was a bad appropriation if the goods were lost at the time though the sellers did not know of it. I am not sure that Shearman, J. in saying that the goods were not in a deliverable state does not mean the same thing. It is not expressly stated whether the price was c.i.f., or payable against documents, and I do not understand, as reported, the passage in the judgment of Avory, J. which appears to treat a sale of goods to arrive and a sale of goods c.i.f. as the same thing. The case, however, is binding on me on the point it decides, and on that form of contract it appears to treat the existence of ship and goods at the time of appropriation as essential to its validity, at any rate if the destination of the subject-matter is known. On the other hand, in Groom v. Barber (sup.) Atkin, J. on a c.i.f. contract held that on a tender of documents complying with the contract it was immaterial whether the goods represented by them had at the time been lost, whether there had been a prior appropriation to the contract or not. This case was not cited to the Divisional Court in the Olympia case (sup.), and the two lines of reasoning hardly appear consistent. I do not think it is necessary for me in the present case to decide between them, for here the goods were in existence. But I am strongly of opinion that the key to many of the difficulties arising in c.i.f. contracts is to keep firmly in mind the cardinal distinction that a c.i.f. sale is not a sale of goods, but a sale of documents relating to goods. It is not a contract that goods shall arrive, but a contract to ship goods complying with the contract of sale, to obtain, unless the contract otherwise provides, the ordinary contract of carriage to the place of destination, and the ordinary contract of insurance of the goods on the voyage, and to tender these documents against payment of the contract price. The buyer then has the right to claim the fulfilment of the contract of carriage, or if the goods are lost or damaged such indemnity for the loss as he can claim under the contract of insurance. He buys the documents, not the goods, and it may be that under the terms of the contract of insurance and affreightment he buys no indemnity for the damage that has happened to the goods. This depends on what documents he is entitled to under the contract of sale. In my view, therefore, the relevant question will generally be not "what at the time of declaration or tender of documents is the condition of goods"? (and in this I agree with Atkin, J. in Groom v. Barber, sup.), but what at the time of tender of documents was the condition of those documents as to compliance with the contract of sale?

I refer to the careful statement of the effect of such a contract by Hamilton, J. in Biddell v. Clemens Horst (103 L. T. Rep. 661; (1911) 1 K. B., at p. 220). It is true that in the contract in question in this case the goods must usually arrive to fix the price, but they clearly need not when the ship is posted as lost, and I think if they have not arrived by the expiration of three months after the bill of lading date, the price is payable against the tender of proper documents, whether the goods will ever arrive or not. I next address myself to consider, when the documents were tendered in these cases three months after the date of bill of lading and payment demanded against them, what condition and validity of these documents were required to make them a good tender.

On the 4th Aug. war broke out between England and Germany. In the first case, the contract of affreightment obtained was with a German shipowner; in the second case both contract of affreightment and policy were with German subjects. What, in English courts, is the effect of the outbreak of war on these contracts? The contract of affreightment was on the 4th Aug. partly executed, partly executory. No claim had then accrued on the policy of insurance for loss before the war. On this point, I have the authority of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Esposito v. Bowden (7 El. & Bl., at p. 783), where Willes, J. says: "As to the mode of operation of war upon contracts of affreightment made before but which remain unexecuted at the time it is declared, and of which it makes the further execution unlawful or impossible, the authorities establish that the effect is to dissolve the contract, and to absolve both parties from further performance of it." In that case the contract of affreightment was between an Italian shipowner and an English charterer to carry goods from Russia, and war had broken out between England and Russia, and the trading with the enemy involved was an English subjects' purchasing a cargo in Russia, and dealing with the Russian Custom-house and Russian lighterman to get it exported. The illegality here is more direct as the two parties to the contract of affreightment are subjects of countries at war and part of the contract on each side is unperformed. The judgment in Esposito v. Bowden (sup.) is based on the Prize Court decision of The Hoop (1 C. Rob. 196), where Lord Stowell said, at p. 198, "In my opinion there exists such a general rule in the maritime jurisprudence of this country by which all trading with the public enemy, unless with the permission of the Sovereign, is interdicted," and again at p. 216, "The rule has been rigidly enforced . . . where cargoes have been laden before the war, but where the parties have not used all possible diligence to countermand the voyage after the first notice of hostilities." This judgment and statement of the law was adopted by the Common Law courts in 1800 in Potts v. Bell (8 Term Rep. 548), where Lord Kenyon said at p. 561, "It might now be taken for granted that it was a principle of the common law that trading with an enemy without the King's licence was illegal in British subjects," for the reasons given in the judgment in The Hoop (sup.). The same statement was made by Lord Lindley in Janson v. Driefontein Consolidated Mines Limited (87 L. T. Rep. 372; (1902) A. C. 484), where he says at p. 509 in the Law Reports: "War produces a state of things giving rise to well-known special rules. It prohibits all trading with the enemy except with the Royal licence, and dissolves all contracts which involve such trading." When, however, a claim has accrued before the war, under a contract made before the war, as in case of a loss before the war on a policy of insurance, the contract is not dissolved, but the remedy is suspended until the close of the war. This explains Lord Halsbury's apparently general statement at p. 493 of the Driefontein case (sup.), "No contract or other transaction with a native of a country which afterwards goes to war is affected by the war. The remedy is indeed suspended: an alien enemy cannot sue in the courts of either country while the war lasts, but the rights of the contract are unaffected, and when the war is over the remedy in the courts of either is restored." This is true of a right to recover vested before the war, which was the state of things in the Driefontein case (sup.), but was not true on the existing authorities, which Lord Halsbury cannot have meant to overrule without reference to them, in the case of contracts to be executed at the time of the outbreak of war. It follows, therefore, that on the 4th Aug. the contracts of affreightment and the policy of insurance became void except as regards claims then accrued, if any, which, however, could not be enforced during the war. What then was the position of the English owner of goods in a German ship? According to the passage in Lord Tenterden's work on shipping cited with approval by Willes, J. in Esposito v. Bowden (sup.), "If, therefore, before the commencement of a voyage, war or hostilities should take place between the State to which the ship or cargo belongs and that to which they are destined" [and I think the same principles must apply if the war is between the country of the shipowners and the country of the cargo-owner or charterer] ". . . the contract for conveyance is at an end, the merchant must unlade his goods, and the owners find another employment for their ship. And probably the same principles would apply to the same events happening after the commencement and before the completion of the voyage."

Apparently, therefore, on the 4th Aug. the goods owner could not require the German ships at Manila or the Dutch East Indies to proceed on their voyage under the contract, but could require them to deliver his goods, and the ships could not claim freight or charges under the contract, which was void. I mention, to show that I have not overlooked it, that a German ship being German territory questions might arise whether the British subject was not trading with the enemy by removing his own goods from German territory, a state of things discussed in The Hoop (sup.). But on the 25th Sept. 1914, before the three months from the bill of lading date had expired in either case, the Board of Trade granted a licence "that British owners of cargo now lying in a neutral port in a ship owned by the enemy may, for the purpose of obtaining possession of such cargo, pay freight and other necessary charges to the agent of the shipowner at such port." It would follow from this that if for any reason the courts of the neutral State refused to order the enemy ship to deliver the British cargo except upon payment of freight or charges the British subject could do it without trading with the enemy. But it does not appear to me that this licence makes the contract of affreightment valid as to any future execution, or indeed in the past—i.e., since the declaration of war. When, therefore, the seller in these cases tendered documents and demanded the price, he tendered documents which had been contracts, but which were now by considerations of public policy void and unenforceable as regards any obligations of performance which would but for the war have been carried out after the 4th Aug. To carry out their original obligations would involve entering into contractual relations with the King's enemies; and these relations were now impossible either in England or in Germany, the countries of the original contracting parties. I do not suppose that Hamilton, J. in Biddell v. Clemens Horst (sup.) had this point in his mind when he used the phrase, "an insurance which will be available for the benefit of the buyer," but I cannot believe that contracts which are illegal and void can be regarded as good tenders, and available for the benefit of the buyer. It is clearly not essential that if the goods do not arrive the buyer should have a good claim on one of the contracts, but I think it is essential that each contract should be one into which he can legally enter as a contracting party, and when the legal relations of the seller under the contract of affreightment tendered have become void, and it is illegal for the buyer to enter into any similar legal relations with shipowner or insurer, I cannot hold that such documents are good tender, or that the buyer can be required to pay against them.

I add, further (1), that I do not think the argument that a neutral might acquire these documents and sue the German helps the matter. I do not see how void contracts can come to life by transfer to neutrals; but if they can, the buyers are not neutrals, but enemies to Germany. (2) I do not see that the confirmation after war of the declaration helps the seller. A contract involving consequences contrary to public policy cannot be forced on the courts by estopping the purchasers from telling the truth. A man is not estopped from pleading the Gaming Act by recognising or confirming a bet. (3) I think that as valid contracts in documents were never tendered, the property in these goods never passed to the buyers. (4) Like Atkin, J. in Duncan Fox and Co. v. Schrempt (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 591; 112 L. T. Rep. 298; (1915) 1 K. B. 365, 370), I shrink from entering the attractive field of discussion opened by the question whether the indorsement of a German bill of lading passes the contract, if any, contained in it, and, if so, why it does. (5) A point was raised that Arnhold, Karberg, and Co., who had one German partner, were alien enemies and could not claim. This point, if it had been material, could not, in my opinion, be raised on the findings in the special case, but must have been raised on a motion to enforce the award.

It follows from this judgment that in the case of Arnhold, Karberg, and Co. v. Blythe, Green, Jourdain, and Co., I answer the question in the negative, and the arbitrators seem to have saved the court the trouble of dealing with any question of costs.

In Schneider and Co. v. Burgett and Newsam, the court is of opinion that the tender was not a proper tender under the contract, and that the buyers are entitled to reject it, and it orders the sellers to pay the costs of the argument of the special case.

HARPER AND SONS v. KELLER, BRYANT, AND CO. (a)

Principal and agent—Foreign principal—Contract—Personal liability of agent—Presumption—Agent's authority to pledge principal's credit.

Where an agent in England contracts on behalf of a foreign principal he is presumed to contract personally unless the contrary intention plainly appears on the evidence or on the documents or in the surrounding circumstances.

If there is no such evidence the presumption prevails that the agent has no authority to pledge the credit of the foreign principal in such a way as to establish privity of contract between such principal and the other party, and that he is personally liable on the contract.

Held, in the circumstances of this particular case, that the defendants acted as agents and were known to the plaintiffs to be acting as agents, and were therefore not liable.

COMMERCIAL COURT.

Action tried by Sankey, J.

The plaintiffs' claim was for 3457*l.* 8*s.* as the price of goods sold and delivered to the defendants.

By their defence, the defendants pleaded that they had acted solely as agents, and were not personally liable.

Schiller, K.C. and Du Parcq appeared for the plaintiffs.

Roche, K.C. and A. Neilson appeared for the defendants.

The facts and arguments are sufficiently stated in the judgment.

SANKEY, J.—In this case the plaintiffs claim 3457*l.* 8*s.* as the price of goods sold and delivered to the defendants, and it is alleged that on various dates in July 1914 plaintiffs supplied to the order of the defendants 2585 tons of bunker coal for the Kaiser Wilhelm II., a steamship belonging to the North German Lloyd Line, then calling at Southampton. There is no dispute that the coals were so supplied and that the price, 26*s.* 9*d.*, is a proper one, but the defendants say that throughout the transaction they acted solely as agents for the North German Lloyd Line and are not personally liable.

On that the plaintiffs take two points: (1) That there was a direct agreement between them and the defendants; (2) that the defendants were agents for a foreign principal and so were personally liable. In most cases it is advisable to ascertain the facts before discussing the law, but in the present case it is convenient to reverse the process in order to examine the plaintiffs' two contentions.

A number of cases were cited on either side, and in my view the true effect of them is that they lay down the presumption rather than a principle of law which is to be applied, such presumption being that where an agent in England contracts on behalf of a foreign principal he is presumed to contract personally unless the contrary intention plainly appears on the evidence or on the documents or in the surrounding circumstances.

If there is no such evidence the presumption prevails that the agent has no authority to pledge the credit of the foreign principal in such a way as to establish privity of contract between such principal and the other party, and that he is personally liable on the contract. In other words, the rule is one depending on evidence rather than on law, and the question to be determined is one of fact for the judge or jury.

Starting therefore with the presumption in favour of the plaintiffs I proceed to examine the evidence: Mr. Vivian Harper, a partner in the plaintiff firm, described the course of business which had been going on for many years with the defendants. Plaintiffs were in the habit of supplying coal on the defendants' order to a variety of steamship lines. They loaded and trimmed the coal and got the ship's receipt, which they forwarded with an invoice to the defendants, who paid the sum due by their own cheque within a few days.

Coming to the coal supplied to the North German Lloyd Line, the contract for 1912 will be found referred to in a letter of the 29th Dec. 1911, that for 1913 in a letter of the 9th Oct. 1912, and the contract for the coal in question in a letter of the 8th Jan. 1914. It will be noticed in the letter of the 29th Dec. plaintiffs quoted for coal to the North German Lloyd, saying they are giving to the company (that is, the North German Lloyd) a benefit which they trust will prove acceptable to them. In the letter of the 9th Oct. 1912 plaintiffs wrote for a further contract. It is true in respect of this contract, which was concluded in Jan. 1913, the plaintiffs allege that it is the only one of the contracts which were entered into with the North German Lloyd direct, but I do not think that in its inception or fulfilment it really differs from either of the other two contracts.

In the letter of the 8th Jan. 1914 it is the defendants who intimate to the plaintiffs that the North German Lloyd are seeking tenders for the year for the coal they required, and that letter is followed by numerous others in which the plaintiffs ask to be advised whether their quotations are acceptable to the North German Lloyd Company. In July 1914 defendants gave orders for the coal in question to be supplied to the Kaiser Wilhelm II., and in due course of time it was so supplied and loaded, and on the 29th July the chief engineer gave a receipt which was forwarded to the defendants with invoice.

Then followed the outbreak of the war and this action. In their sales book plaintiffs entered the sales as being to specific ships, and in their ledger they generally showed that the sales were to specific ships, Keller, Bryant, and Co. being entered as agents. Moreover the correspondence of the defendants is headed "Norddeutscher Lloyd Line. Keller, Bryant, and Co., agents," or "Keller, Bryant, and Co., general agents for the Norddeutscher Lloyd Line."

In these circumstances I am satisfied that the contract in question was not made by plaintiffs with the defendants direct, and therefore the first contention of the plaintiffs fails.

Coming to the plaintiffs' second contention, in my opinion that also fails. It seems to me that although the defendants were agents for a foreign principal, so that the presumption above referred to arises, it is clear that the contrary intention plainly appears on the terms of the contract and from the surrounding circumstances.

There is, in my opinion, ample evidence that the defendants had authority to, and did in fact establish, privity of contract between the North German Lloyd and the plaintiffs. The letters, the course of dealing, and the plaintiffs' own documents appear to me clearly to establish this fact. I am of opinion that the defendants both acted as agents and were known by the plaintiffs to have so acted.

The plaintiffs' claim therefore fails, and there must be judgment for the defendants.

BANK OF AUSTRALASIA v. CLAN LINE STEAMERS LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Bill of lading—Express contract of liability for unseaworthiness—Limitation of time for making claims—Whether limitation applies in case of unseaworthiness—Transhipment of goods.

The indorsees of bills of lading sued shipowners for breach of contract and for damages for injury to goods carried. The goods were shipped upon one ship at one place, and later at another transhipped into another ship. The first ship arrived on the 13th April 1912, and the second on the 23rd April. The goods were damaged by the unseaworthiness of the first ship. Clause 3 of the bill of lading provided for possible transhipment of the goods. Clause 12 provided as follows: "No claim that may arise in respect of goods shipped by this steamer will be recoverable unless made at the port of delivery within seven days from the date of steamer's arrival there." Clause 14 provided contractually for liability for unseaworthiness. No claim was made in respect of the goods shipped within the time limited by clause 12. Bailhache, J. held that as the first ship was unseaworthy the time limitation clause did not apply. Held, by the Court of Appeal, that as there was an express and not an implied contract in the bill of lading for liability for unseaworthiness, clause 12 applied, and the shipowner was protected by it as regards the goods arriving by the first ship, which was the steamer indicated in the clause But held by Pickford and Bankes, L.JJ. that the shipowner had not protected himself by clear and unambiguous words as regards the goods arriving by the second ship, to which ship part of the goods had been transhipped from the first, and there was consequently no answer to the claim of the indorsees in respect of the goods which arrived by the second.

DEFENDANTS' appeal from a judgment of Bailhache, J. in the commercial list.

The plaintiffs, the indorsees of bills of lading, sued the defendants, the shipowners, for breach of contract and for damages for injury to goods carried.

The following facts are taken from the judgment of Bailhache, J.

The action was brought by the holders of a number of bills of lading for wool which was shipped on board the defendants' steamer, the Clan Maclaren, at Wellington, New Zealand, at the end of Jan. 1912. The bills of lading for the most part were dated the 29th Jan. 1912. Shortly after the Clan Maclaren left Wellington it was discovered that there was a leak, and that water was getting into cargo holds Nos. 2 and 3, and damaging the wool. The causes of the leak were discovered when the ship got into port—namely, the pipe which led into a hold had broken about the bulkhead division between two water tanks, and part of certain tank tops had become so badly corroded that a small hole had burst through the tank top and water entered into a hold. The vessel went on to Port Pirie, where she was to load a part cargo of galena. The whole cargo that was damaged, so far as could then be ascertained, was taken out of the Clan Maclaren, and was reconditioned and sent on later by the steamer Geelong. The Clan Maclaren with the wool that was supposed to be undamaged on board arrived in London on the 13th April 1912, and was followed ten days later by the Geelong. When the wool came to be discharged, it was discovered that there was damage of three different classes. No claim in respect of the damage caused by the unseaworthiness was made until the 10th June 1912—that is, long after the expiry of seven days limited by clause 12 of the bill of lading for making claims.

The bill of lading in respect of the goods shipped on the Clan Maclaren provided that:

Clause 3. The owners are to be at liberty to carry the said goods to their port of destination by the above or other steamer or steamers, ship or ships, either belonging to themselves or to other persons, proceeding by any route, and whether directly or indirectly to such port, and in so doing to carry the goods beyond their port of destination, and to tranship or land and store the goods either on shore or afloat, and reship and forward the same at the owner's expense but at merchant's risk.

Clause 12 provided:

No claim that may arise in respect of goods shipped by this steamer will be recoverable unless made at the port of delivery within seven days from the date of steamer's arrival there.

Clause 14 provided:

The shipowners shall be responsible for loss or damage arising from any unfit state of the vessel to receive the goods, or any unseaworthiness of the vessel when she sails on the voyage. But any latent defect in hull, machinery, equipment, or fittings shall not be considered unfitness or unseaworthiness, provided the same do not result from want of due diligence of the shipowner or of the ship's husband or manager.

Bailhache, J. held that, so far as the damage could be traced to unseaworthiness, clause 12 of the bill of lading was no excuse, and the defendants were liable for so much of the damage to the bales of wool as could be attributed to unseaworthiness—that was to say, to the direct and indirect effects of the incursion of seawater. His judgment was therefore for the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

George Wallace, K.C. and Stuart Bevan for the defendants.—The plaintiffs did not make their claim in time, and therefore clause 12 of the bill of lading, which limits the time for making claims, prevents the plaintiff recovering for damage caused to their goods by the unseaworthiness of the Clan Maclaren. Clause 12 applies as much to damage caused by unseaworthiness as to any other damage. The plaintiffs, claiming as indorsees, only get the bill of lading contract, and their position is not so favourable as that of an indorser:

Leduc v. Ward, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 571; 54 L. T. Rep. 214; 20 Q. B. Div. 475.

Here the warranty of seaworthiness was express; it excludes the implied warranty, and lets in all the conditions of the bill of lading. A contract of affreightment is not put an end to by a breach of the warranty of seaworthiness:

Kish v. Taylor, 12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 217; 106 L. T. Rep. 900; (1912) A. C. 604.

It is not a condition precedent in cases of bills of lading that a ship should be seaworthy, for the bill of lading is not given before the goods are loaded on board. The ordinary warranty of seaworthiness is reduced by the terms of the bill of lading, and if the warranty of seaworthiness is reduced, then the clauses of the bill of lading will all apply. In Tattersall v. National Steamship Company (sup.) there was no express stipulation as regards seaworthiness, and that case is distinguishable on that ground. The present case is like Morris v. Oceanic Steam Navigation Company (sup.), where the implied condition of seaworthiness was qualified by the express condition. Secondly, Bailhache, J. held that the time limitation did not apply either to the Geelong, to which goods were transhipped from the Clan Maclaren, and which arrived later, but clause 3 is wide enough to cover the transhipment and must be read together with clause 12. They referred also to

The Maori King, 73 L. T. Rep. 141; (1895) 2 Q. B. 550.

Adair Roche, K.C. and F. D. MacKinnon, K.C. for the plaintiffs.—On the second point, the time limitation clause does not apply in any case to the goods which arrived by the Geelong. Clause 12 speaks of "steamer's arrival," and that must refer to the Clan Maclaren. The clause is not clear and unambiguous, and should be construed against the shipowner:

James Nelson and Sons v. Nelson Line (Liverpool) Limited, 11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 1; 97 L. T. Rep. 812; (1908) A. C. 16.

As to the first point, there are two contracts here—(1) as to the condition of the ship, and (2) as to the carriage of the goods, of which the first contract may be implied. In the absence of clear words the limitation clause only applies to the contract of carriage. In Bond, Connolly, and Co. v. Federal Steam Navigation Company Limited (21 Times L. Rep. 440) Channell, J. said that "as regards the terms of the bill of lading, the cases show that one ought to approach the exceptions in a bill of lading as exceptions to the liability of a carrier and not as exceptions to the liability of a warrantor." The difficulty here arises from the decision in Morris v. Oceanic Steam Navigation Company (sup.), which is out of line with the other decisions, though attempts have been made to reconcile it. It is not necessary to disapprove it owing to its special clause. To insert an implied condition by using express words has no effect on the implied condition, and nothing limits the fundamental obligation to provide a seaworthy ship. They referred also to

Baxter's Leather Company v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, 11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 98; 99 L. T. Rep. 286; (1908) 2 K. B. 626; Wiener and Co. v. Wilson's and Furness-Leyland Line Limited, 11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 413; 102 L. T. Rep. 716.

George Wallace, K.C. in reply.—Morris' case is not really inconsistent with Tattersall's. There are not two contracts here, the implied and the express, for the express contract takes the place of the implied, and there is no room left for the implied condition of seaworthiness. Clause 3 must be read together with clauses 12 and 14. The words "steamer's arrival" should be read as if they were "this steamer or any other steamer to be substituted under clause 3."

Cur. adv. vult.

BUCKLEY, L.J.—In this action the indorsees of bills of lading sue the shipowner for breach of contract, and for damages for injury to the goods carried by the ship. There are three clauses in the bill of lading which are of importance. The first is clause 3, which provides for possible transhipment of the goods; the second is clause 12, which contains a limitation of time within which claims must be made in respect of goods shipped; and clause 14 is a clause which provides contractually for liability for unseaworthiness. The points for decision really are two: first, whether, if the case of seaworthiness is a case which arises here, the clause of limitation of time for claim applies; and, secondly, if it does apply, what is the true meaning of the clause as to limitation?

The goods were shipped at Wellington upon a ship called the Clan Maclaren. She sailed to Port Pirie. At Port Pirie she transhipped some goods into a ship called the Geelong. The Clan Maclaren arrived with so much of the goods as remained on board that vessel on the 13th April 1912. The Geelong arrived with the rest of the goods upon the 23rd April. The goods were damaged by unseaworthiness of the vessel. Certain tanks were corroded, and water escaped, and the goods were damaged. There was a question raised at the trial as to latent defect. There was not a latent defect, it was well known to the shipowner. There was no question but that the shipowner is liable but for the points which now arise before us for decision.

The first question to be determined is that arising upon clause 14—as to what is the liability of the shipowner for unseaworthiness.

It is well settled that, where goods are shipped on board ship, there is an implied obligation on the part of the shipowner that he will provide a ship proper for the voyage. If there be no provision in the express contract at all with relation to it, there is nevertheless that implied contract.

It is another matter whether, if there be an express contract in the bill of lading, the implied contract survives. That is the question which arises here. But there may, and generally do, arise two contracts, the one arising by implication as a matter of law, that a seaworthy vessel will be provided, and the other, the express contract, as contained in the document.

There are two cases bearing on this matter on which I want to say something: Tattersall v. National Steamship Company (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 206; 50 L. T. Rep. 299; 12 Q. B. Div. 297) and Morris v. Oceanic Steam Navigation Company (16 Times L. Rep. 533). The decision in Tattersall v. National Steamship Company (sup.) was this: The express contract contained a clause limiting liability. The goods shipped were cattle, and the limit of liability was 5*l.* a head. There was a clause limiting liability. There was no express contract as to seaworthiness. The implied contract of seaworthiness, therefore, applied. What was decided in Tattersall's case was that the contractual limit of liability was confined to the terms contained in the express contract, terms as to the carriage of the goods, and that the limitation of liability did not extend to the liability arising under the implied contract as to seaworthiness. That was the whole of the decision in Tattersall's case. I will just read a sentence of Day, J.'s judgment. The goods "were damaged simply because the defendant's servants neglected their preliminary duty of seeing that the ship was in a proper condition to receive them, and received them into a ship that was not fit to receive them. There is nothing in the bill of lading that I can see to restrict or qualify the liability of the defendants in respect of the breach of this obligation, and, therefore, I think our judgment upon the question submitted to us must be for the plaintiff." That was the whole of the decision in Tattersall's case.

It has been supposed that Morris v. Oceanic Steam Navigation Company contains something which is in conflict with Tattersall's case. In Morris v. Oceanic Steam Navigation Company the relevant clause was this: "The carrier shall not be liable for loss or damage occasioned by any latent defect in hull, machinery, or appurtenances, or unseaworthiness of the ship, even existing at time of shipment, or sailing on the voyage, provided the owners have exercised due diligence to make the vessel seaworthy." So there was a clause there, an express contract, as to unseaworthiness in an event—provided they had exercised due diligence. They had not exercised due diligence. There was, therefore, a contract as to unseaworthiness in an event which had not happened. You may say that under these circumstances there was no contract as to unseaworthiness. If you regard the case from that point of view, then it was the same as Tattersall's case, in which there was no contract as to unseaworthiness. In Morris v. Oceanic Steam Navigation Company Mathew, J. held that the clause of limitation of liability did apply, but, of course, if you regard it from that point of view, as Hamilton, J. pointed out in Wiener and Co. v. Wilson and Furness-Leyland Line Limited (11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 413; 102 L. T. Rep. 716), the two cases are in conflict. There is no question about that. But, to my mind, that is not the decision at all. I do not see any conflict between the cases, for the reasons I am going to state. Now, it will be remembered that the provision said that the carrier should not be liable for unseaworthiness in an event. There was no obligation that he should exercise due diligence to make the vessel seaworthy; there was only a provision that if he did not do that act, then a consequence would ensue, but there was no contractual liability to make the vessel seaworthy. If he did it, he was relieved from liability for unseaworthiness. There was no obligation on his part to use due diligence. If he did not use it, the clause did not apply, and he was left to other consequences. But Mathew, J. did not so read the contract, because what he says was this. His language runs thus: "It was not necessary to deal with the present case on the footing of a case"—which he mentions—"because here the bill of lading contains an express provision that the shipowner was to use due diligence to make the vessel seaworthy." As I pointed out, he did not. Then Mathew, J. concludes his judgment thus (16 Times L. Rep. 534): "He felt compelled to come to the conclusion that the clause was intended to limit the liability of the defendants in the event of a breach of their duty to use diligence to make the vessel seaworthy." If the contract was one by which the shipowner was contractually responsible towards the cargo owner to use due diligence to make the ship seaworthy, and he was sued for not performing that obligation, then it would be easy enough. It seems to me that is all the learned judge says. In order to see exactly what was the language which he used, the solicitors have been so kind as to give to me the shorthand notes of the judgment, and I am going to read the two passages in the judgment as delivered, which are those reproduced in the Times L. Rep. The former of them, that in the left hand column of 16 Times L. Rep., p. 534, runs in these words in the transcript of the shorthand notes. The learned judge says: "Because there is here what makes the meaning of the parties perfectly clear independently of the Act"—that is the Harter Act—"express provision that due diligence is to be used in making the vessel seaworthy for the voyage"; so the report seems to be quite right. He found there was an obligation to do it. The later passage at the end of the judgment I will read at length. Before reading it I ought to say that what the report calls clause 1 of the contract is found in the headnote beginning with the words: "It is also mutually agreed that the value," and so on. That is what the judge calls clause 1. "Moreover, it is to be borne in mind that the latter part of the section"—that means this clause 1—"is clearly intended to limit the pecuniary liability of the owners in case of a loss. It was pointed out that any claim against the owners under the terms of the bill of lading was not likely to arise, because they were exonerated from all liability. The answer was, 'Yes, liability would arise in case due diligence was not used to make the ship seaworthy, and that is the only case that probably would arise, and this clause limits the liability in that case.' I am compelled to come to the conclusion that this is the true construction of the clause, and it was to limit the liability in the event of the owners being made liable for a breach of their contract as to due diligence." That is perfectly plain, and the report was quite right. What the learned judge thought —erroneously, I think—was that the contract, the bill of lading, contained an express provision that the shipowner should use due diligence. As I have pointed out, it did not, but of course we must read his decision on the footing of the contract as he read it. He read it as containing a clause imposing the liability to exercise due diligence, and consequently they were liable. There is no difficulty at all in the case. It does not conflict in the remotest degree with the case of Tattersall; it seems to me to have nothing to do with it.

Those being the only authorities I need mention, I now go to clause 14. It seems to me that clause 14 is this: It is an express contract covering the ground which would be the subject of the implied contract if there were nothing more in it. The relevant words are these: "The shipowners shall be responsible for loss or damage arising from any unseaworthiness of the vessel when she sails on the voyage." Now I apprehend, as regards implied contract, the way in which the law proceeds is always this: There are certain contracts entered into under such circumstances as that the law says: "This is not the whole contract between you, because the relations between you are such that the law will imply something which is not here expressed." The familiar instance is where there would be a contract in a trade in which there is a custom of the trade, or some obligation arising in a matter in which there is a custom of the manor. So, in ship cases, a contract in which there is an implied contract to supply a seaworthy vessel. If the express contract contains that which, if there was nothing said about it in the contract, the law would imply, then the implied contract takes effect; but if the express contract deals expressly with that which, in the absence of that which is expressed, would be implied, then the whole thing rests upon the expressed contract, and there is no need to imply anything, because it is already there. It seems to me that in this case clause 14 has expressly introduced that which otherwise would be implied, and that therefore the obligation as regards seaworthiness in this case rests upon express contract, and not upon implied contract. The relevance of that for the present purpose is this. The clause of limit of liability, according to Tattersall's case, would not extend to the implied contract if it were implied, but if it is expressed, then if it was to be included in the contract of limit of liability or limit of time, as regards a matter forming part of the contract, then the clause comes to be applied to that part of the contract as well as to any other part. The result is that Tattersall's case does not apply in this case. There is here an express contract as to unseaworthiness, and consequently clause 12 applies.

It remains to see what clause 12 means, and here there is a matter of very considerable difficulty. It will be remembered that, under clause 3 the goods could be transhipped, and they were transhipped, and the one vessel arrived on the 13th and the other on the 23rd April. Bearing these facts in mind, clause 12 runs thus: "No claim that may arise in respect of goods shipped by this steamer"—that means the Clan Maclaren obviously—"will be recoverable unless made at the port of delivery within seven days from the date of steamer's arrival there." As I said, the Clan Maclaren arrived on the 13th April and the Geelong on the 23rd. No claim was made till June, more than seven days after either arrival. Now the reading of this clause seems to me to mean this. The goods which are the subject-matter of the clause are defined thus: Goods shipped by this steamer, or the goods shipped on the Clan Maclaren. That is the operation of those words; and as regards that class of goods, this bargain is made—that no claim that may arise in respect of them will be recoverable unless made at the port of delivery within seven days from the date of steamer's arrival there. I myself should read that clause as meaning, unless made at the port of delivery within seven days from the date of the arrival of the steamer making the delivery, and, if so, of course that would be as regards the latter goods, the Geelong, and not the Clan Maclaren. On the other side it is said you have this steamer mentioned in the earlier part of the clause plainly meaning the Clan Maclaren, and when you come to "steamer's arrival there," that must mean the same steamer. So that you are to read it: "The date of the Clan Maclaren's arrival there." I myself do not take that view. Of course it is a trifling thing, but it does not talk of "the steamer," or "this steamer," or "the said steamer," but "of steamer's." The conclusion at which I have arrived is based upon this, that the contract is one which contemplates, amongst other things, transhipment, and you would expect that the contract would wish to work out this kind of clause as regards all events which might arise under the contract, including that of transhipment, and therefore you would expect the clause to provide for the case of transhipped goods as well as of other goods, and I can so read the clause, on reading it in the way I have suggested —"unless made at port of delivery within seven days of the delivering steamer's arrival there." On the other hand, it may be, and it is said in the reports, that the shipowner is bound to say exactly what he means. He is going to relieve himself from liability here, and he must do it by plain words. I thought the words did mean what I suggest; but if they do not, if they are ambiguous, no doubt the contract ought to be construed upon the usual footing—namely, against the shipowner. Therefore, if it be ambiguous, the thing must be construed against him, and consequently it must be taken he is not so relieved. That is the view taken by the other members of the court. I myself have arrived at a different conclusion. That may be a sound ground for deciding it, and therefore I do not differ as regards it, although I myself have arrived at a different conclusion. The result, of course, is this: The goods which arrived by the Geelong ought, upon that construction of the clause, to have had a claim made in respect of them within seven days after the arrival of the Clan Maclaren. That would have been the 20th April, which would be six days before the Geelong arrived. That clause will not fit that case. Therefore it is said that case is not within the clause at all, and consequently the shipowner is not relieved. That is a matter which weighed upon me in arriving at the other construction of the clause, but that is the result. If the clause is to be so construed, then the shipowner has not introduced relevant words for the purpose of protecting himself as regards the goods which arrived by the Geelong, because, in reason, the indorsees could not claim them until after they had arrived and had seen that they were damaged; and inasmuch as the seven days expired on the 20th April, and the goods did not arrive until the 26th they never could make a claim. That being so, the cargo owner's claim succeeds as regards the Geelong, and fails as regards the Clan Maclaren. I myself should have allowed the appeal simpliciter, but if the clause be construed in that way, the order must be to discriminate between the two classes of goods.

PICKFORD, L.J.—I agree as to the first point, and I should not add anything at all, but for the fact that we are differing from the learned judge in the court below, who is a judge of very great experience in these matters.

To my mind what you have to do in every one of these cases is to look at what the contract before you means, what the bill of lading upon which the action is brought means. There is nothing in law to prevent a shipowner from putting an exception into his bill of lading which will relieve him from all the consequences of unseaworthiness wherever and whenever it exists. The only question in each case is whether he has done it or not, and in order to see whether he has done it or not you have to look at the particular document before you, and the cases which have been decided are only of assistance so far as they lay down principles, if they do lay down principles, which ought to be applied to the construction of the document. Now the two cases which are always cited on the one side and on the other in these matters are the cases of Tattersall v. National Steamship Company (sup.) and Morris v. Oceanic Steam Navigation Company (sup.). They do not, either of them, seem to me to help very much in the construction of this document. I agree that really what the decision in Tattersall v. National Steamship Company comes to is this, that upon that contract, which the court had before it in that case, the exceptions in the bill of lading only applied to the contract of carriage, to the carriage of goods, and therefore they did not affect the obligation to provide a seaworthy ship, which was different from and antecedent to the obligations of the contract of carriage. The case of Morris v. Oceanic Steam Navigation Company certainly presents difficulties when you take the facts of the contract with the construction which the learned judge seemed to put upon them. There were no express words there which imposed liability for unseaworthiness, and all that there was in the bill of lading which related to unseaworthiness was an exception from liability in respect of unseaworthiness provided due care had been taken to avoid it.

That was an exception and nothing more, and when it was shown that due care had not been taken, and therefore the condition upon which the exception rested was not fulfilled, I should have thought that the result was what was expressed in the words of Moulton, L.J. in the case of James Nelson and Sons v. Nelson Line (Liverpool) Limited (10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas., at p. 394; 96 L. T. Rep. 402; (1907) 1 K. B. 781): "The jury have found"—in the case of Morris v. Oceanic Steam Navigation Company it was not a jury, but a judge—"that in this case all reasonable means to that end had not been taken. The exception therefore disappears, and the obligation of initial seaworthiness remains." And again: "Here the jury have found that the condition was not in fact satisfied, and the case is therefore reduced to one which is subject to the ordinary obligation to supply a seaworthy ship." I should certainly have thought that that was the true view to take of the position of things in Morris v. Oceanic Steam Navigation Company. But it seems to me quite clear that the learned judge who decided it did not take that view. He took the view that there was in that contract an express provision that the shipowners should exercise due diligence to avoid unseaworthiness. I cannot see anything of the kind. There was a provision that they should not escape liability for unseaworthiness unless they exercised due diligence, but I cannot see that that made a contract that they should exercise due diligence. They might not do so. Then they would remain liable. However, the learned judge so construed it, and so construing it, he came to the conclusion that the exception, which was one of value in that case, applied to that express contract which he thought to exist in the bill of lading. That was the explanation given of it by Hamilton, J. in the case which has already been referred to of Wiener and Co. v. Wilson and Furness-Leyland Line Limited (sup.).

I do not think either of those cases really helps materially to construe the contract before us. The contract begins with the usual obligation, of course: "To be delivered subject to all the above liberties to deviate and to the exceptions and conditions at foot hereof in like good order and condition." Then there was a number of other things chiefly providing what the ship would not be liable for, and then we come to clause 14: "The shipowners shall be responsible for loss of damage arising from any unfit state of the vessel to receive the goods, or any unseaworthiness of the vessel when she sails on the vovage. But any latent defect in hull, machinery, equipment, or fittings shall not be considered unfitness or unseaworthiness, provided the same do not result from want of due diligence of the shipowner or ship's husband or manager." The first part of that clause does not seem to me to do more than express in terms what would be the obligation if it were not there, and it may be said, and it has been said with some force, that cannot make any difference. If you write in what otherwise must be taken as impliedly written in, it is exactly the same as if you had not written in it at all. There is great force in that argument; but I do not think it is really sound, because I think the effect of writing it in, instead of leaving it to be implied, is that it makes a term of the bill of lading an express term of the bill of lading, which was not so in either of the cases to which I have referred; and, making it an express term of the bill of lading, it is more likely that the meaning of the bill of lading exception is that it shall apply to the term which is expressly put into the bill of lading. The clause is, as I have read: "The shipowners shall be responsible for loss or damage arising from any unfit state of the vessel to receive the goods, or any unseaworthiness of the vessel when she sails on the voyage." That seems to me to mean responsible in every way, and, amongst other ways, responsible in damages, or, to put it in another phrase, responsible to satisfy any claims which may arise in consequence of unseaworthiness or unfitness. Then, going to clause 12, we find that "no claim that may arise in respect of goods shipped by this steamer will be recoverable unless made at the port of delivery within seven days from the date of steamer's arrival here." Looking at the express terms of clause 14, and looking at the whole of the bill of lading, it seems to me that you must read it as including, in the operation of that exception, the express provision that the shipowner shall be responsible, which is contained in clause 14. The action is upon the condition in clause 14. The action is upon the bill of lading. It is a claim upon the bill of lading, and it is a claim upon the bill of lading in respect of that very expressed condition. Therefore it seems to me that, looking at the whole, you must read clause 12 as operating upon a claim in respect of unseaworthiness. I prefer to put it that looking at the bill of lading you must so read it, rather than, as it is sometimes put, "It must have been in the contemplation of the parties," because that seems to presuppose a meeting of the parties and an agreement of the terms of this particular bill of lading, which we know does not take place. There is a document which is signed by the master and accepted by the holder of the bill of lading, but they neither of them, in fact, look at and discuss the terms of the bill of lading. Therefore when you say it is in the contemplation of the parties, it simply means that, looking at the whole of the bill of lading, that is what it means. For these reasons I think clause 12 does apply.

The question is, what does clause 12 mean? And on this I confess I have very great doubt. I have very great doubt because I think the condition is by no means clear. It says this: "No claim that may arise in respect of goods shipped by this steamer will be recoverable unless made at the port of delivery within seven days from the date of steamer's arrival there." Now, reading that, I think if one asked anybody who was not construing the bill of lading, "Does 'steamer' in the second part mean the same as 'steamer' in the first part? they undoubtedly would say "Yes, it does." "No claim in respect of goods shipped by this steamer shall be recoverable unless made within seven days of the date of the steamer's arrival there," and in order to read it otherwise, it seems to me you must read some other words in. If you read it as my lord says would be the inclination of his mind to read it, you have in effect, I think, to read in "In respect of the date of the steamer or of any other steamer which may be substituted for it under clause 3," or, "This steamer or any other steamer which may be carrying the goods." If you have to read it, as I think is really the right way to read it, you have to put in these words: "No claim that may arise in respect of goods shipped and delivered by this steamer will be recoverable unless made within seven days of the date of the steamer's arrival." If you have to read in any words at all, as this is a document put forward by the shipowner, I think you must read in the words which are against the shipowner, and therefore I think that the second words which I put should be read in. But I think it may also be put on another ground, and that is that if the shipowner is to protect himself, he must do so by words that are perfectly clear, and it seems to me that these words are not clear. They are not clear to show that they mean that if you tranship the goods under clause 3, the protection is to be in respect of the arrival of each ship into which they are transhipped. We have the authority in the House of Lords in the case of James Nelson and Sons Limited v. Nelson Line (Liverpool) Limited (11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 1; 97 L. T. Rep. 812; (1908) A. C. 16) that if a shipowner puts in a clause which he intends for his protection, and which is ambiguous and is not clear, then it does not operate in order to protect him.

I think on either of these grounds that is the proper construction of clause 12. Therefore I think the result is that the goods owners are entitled to claim for the goods which were carried by the Geelong, but are not in respect of the goods which were carried by the Clan Maclaren.

Bankes, L.J.—Every contract for the carriage of goods by sea is, unless it is expressly excluded, subject to the implied condition as to the seaworthiness of the vessel.

The bill of lading may be silent as to this implied condition, or it may refer to it. In cases where it is silent the contract between the shipowners and the holder of the bill of lading consists partly of the implied contract and partly of the express contract.

It is quite true that the implied contract is just as binding as the express contract, and that the written contract must be read as though the implied contract was written into it. The implied contract is, however, free from conditions—consequently if it is written into the express contract it must be written in such a way as to make it plain that the conditions contained in the express contract do not apply to it. Unless this is done the contract which is written in is not the implied contract, but something different.

This, I think, is an explanation of the decisions which hold that where the bill of lading is silent as to the condition of seaworthiness the conditions in the bill of lading are not to be applied to the implied contract. The same train of reasoning is applicable in the case where a provision is made in the bill of lading co-extensive, or practically co-extensive, with the implied contract. In such a case the rule of construction that the express contract excludes any implied contract would apply; but upon the assumption that any implied contract still exists and is written into the express contract, a condition in this case is found in the written contract in terms referring to the subject-matter of the implied contract and controlling it.

In the present case the bill of lading contains an express contract as to seaworthiness. It is for breach of this contract that this action is brought, and in my opinion clause 12 applies. I agree with what Buckley, L.J. has said about the decision in Tattersall v. National Steamship Company and Morris v. Oceanic Steam Navigation Company, and to understand the latter decision it is necessary to bear in mind always that Mathew, J. held that the bill of lading contained an express contract as to seaworthiness.

Upon the question as to the construction of clause 12, I am not prepared to read any words into the contract to enable the shipowner to limit his liability in the event which happened. Mr. Wallace wishes to read into the clause between the word "steamers" and the word "arrival," some such words as "or other the steamers substituted for the said steamer under clause 3."

I read the word "steamer" at the end of the clause as referring to the steamer mentioned in the earlier part of the clause.

If so it would be an absurd construction to read the clause so as to apply it to any other than the original steamer, and, in my opinion, it must therefore be confined to that steamer and to that steamer only. Under these circumstances the clause does not apply to the goods delivered from the Geelong and is no answer to the claim in respect of those goods, and I agree with the order proposed to be made.

BUCKLEY, L.J.—The result will be that the judgment will be altered, and will run thus: Judgment to be entered for the plaintiffs on the question of liability as regards the goods which arrived by the Geelong, but not as regards the goods which arrived by the Clan Maclaren. The plaintiffs will have their costs in the court below, and the appellants will have the costs of this appeal, to be set off.

MEADE, KING, ROBINSON, AND CO. v. JACOBS AND CO. AND OTHERS. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party — Loss of time — Prevention of efficient working—Cesser of hire.

A charter-party contained the following clause: "In the event of loss of time through deficiency of men or stores, repairs, breakdown of machinery, pumps, pipes, or boilers (whether partial or otherwise), collision or stranding, or damage preventing the efficient working of the vessel for more than forty eight running hours, the payment of hire shall cease until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service." On the construction of the clause:

Held, that for losses of time of less than forty-eight hours no claim for cesser of hire could be made; but where, from any of the causes named in the charter party, there were losses of time exceeding forty-eight hours, the charterer was entitled to cesser of hire for the whole of the time so lost.

Decision of Bailhache, J. (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 515; 111 L. T. Rep. 410; (1914) 3 K. B. 156) affirmed.

APPEAL by the defendants from a decision of Bailhache, J. in an action tried by him without a jury.

The plaintiffs' claim was for a declaration that they were entitled to a reduction of hire in respect of time lost under a charter-party dated the 29th Aug. 1910, by which they chartered the tank steamer Batoum from the European Petroleum Company for three years and nine months to carry all lawful merchandise in any part of the world except Baltic and White Sea ports between the 1st Oct. and the 1st April and all ports in British North America. The charter-party provided that the hire of the vessel, which was 1722*l.* per calendar month, should be paid monthly in cash in advance.

Clause 25 of the charter-party provided as follows:

In the event of loss of time through deficiency of men or stores, repairs, breakdown of machinery, pumps, pipes, or boilers (whether partial or otherwise), collision or stranding or damage preventing the efficient working of the vessel for more than forty-eight running hours, the payment of hire shall cease until she again be in an efficient state to resume her service; and should the vessel from any of the aforementioned causes put into any other ports than those to which she is bound under the instructions of the charterers, the port charges, pilotages, and other expenses at those ports, loss of time consequent upon putting in shall be borne by the owners; also should the steamer put back while on voyage, by reason of any accident, the hire shall be suspended from the time of her putting back until she be again in the same position, and the voyage resumed therefrom; but should the vessel be driven into port or to anchorage by stress of weather such detention or loss of time shall be at the charterers' risk and expense. In the event of the nation to which this vessel belongs becoming engaged in hostilities, the hire to cease during the continuance of such hostilities, if the charterers find it impossible to employ the steamer in consequence. It is agreed that all detention or loss of time provided for in this clause and not paid for shall not count as part of the guaranteed time specified under this charter. All graving dock charges to be at owners' expense.

On the 21st Dec. 1910 the defendants gave notice to the plaintiffs that the benefit and burden of the charter-party had been assigned to them. The plaintiffs duly paid in advance monthly hire at the rate specified in the charter-party less certain agreed deductions. Owing to some of the causes mentioned in clause 25, the steamer lost time for a period exceeding forty-eight hours. The defendants having refused to allow the deduction, the plaintiffs brought the present action: claiming (inter alia) a declaration that they were entitled to deduction of hire in respect of the whole time of detention. Bailhache, J. held that for losses of time of less than forty-eight hours no claim for cesser of hire could be made; but where from any of the causes named in the charter-party there were losses of time exceeding forty-eight hours the charterer was entitled to cesser of hire for the whole of the time so lost, and accordingly he gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

Greer, K.C. and MacKinnon, K.C. for the respondents.

Buckley, L.J.—The order under appeal, I think, is right. It raises the shortest possible question of construction upon a few words in clause 25 of the charter-party. I am going to give three reasons, but the most convincing one is, I think, the one suggested by Pickford, L.J. in the course of the argument before us. That reason is this, that the clause should be read thus: "In the event of loss of time through certain things preventing the efficient working of the vessel for forty-eight hours or less, the payment of hire shall not cease; but in the event of loss of time preventing the efficient working of the vessel for more than forty-eight hours the payment of hire shall cease." Of course, in the former of these two alternatives it must speak as from the moment when the vessel ceased to be efficient. Why should it not speak in the same way when the latter portion of the alternative applies? I think that is the true test to apply to the clause.

The second reason I assign is this: I think the clause has to be read as if you put into brackets the words beginning "through deficiency of men" down to "forty-eight running hours." The clause would then read thus: "In the event of loss of time the payment of hire shall cease," and you have to qualify that by saying, in the event of loss of time the payment of hire shall cease if the loss of time is attributable to certain causes, and amongst those, of course, comes in the provision, which is that the efficient working must be prevented for more than forty-eight running hours.

The third reason is this: I think there is considerable light to be obtained from the words "until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service." The word "until" of course predicates a period of time having a terminus a quo and a terminus ad quem, from a time to a time. And the word "again" conveys the idea that she is to be found at the end of that time in the position in which she was at the beginning of that time. So that the words "until she be again in an efficient state" call attention to a period of time commencing with the moment at which she ceased to be and ending at the time when she again became in an efficient state, and it is that period of time which seems to me to be regarded as that for which the payment of hire shall cease. The whole question to be determined is this: Assume that the vessel has been, by the causes here mentioned, prevented from efficiently working for, say, fifty hours, is the loss of time to be taken to be the two hours—i.e., fifty less forty-eight—or is it to be taken to be fifty hours—i.e., the whole time? The learned judge thought it was the latter, and in that I think he was right. I think the clause means that the whole loss of time is to be paid for—that is to say, the whole of the hire ceases during the whole period of time provided that the contingency which is mentioned in the clause has been satisfied—that is to say, that through the causes mentioned the efficient working of the vessel for more than forty-eight hours has been prevented.

For these reasons I think the appeal fails.

Pickford, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and I do not think it necessary to add anything.

Bankes, L.J.—I agree.

William France, Fenwick, and Co. Limited v. Merchants' Marine Insurance Company Limited. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Marine insurance — Policy—Collision—Damage—Collision caused to third ship by backwash—Liability.

Where there is a clause in a policy of marine insurance providing that "if the ship hereby insured shall come into collision with any other ship or vessel and the assured shall in consequence thereof become liable to pay and shall pay by way of damages to any other person or persons any sum or sums not exceeding in respect of any one such collision the value of the ship hereby insured," this company will pay the assured such proportion of three-fourths of such sum or sums so paid as its subscription hereto bears to the value of the ship insured, and in cases in which the liability of the ship has been contested or proceedings have been taken to limit liability, with the consent in writing of this company, the company will also pay a like proportion of the costs which the assured shall thereby incur or be compelled to pay. . . ." As a matter of law and as a matter of the true construction of the clause, an assured may become liable to pay damages in consequence of a collision between his ship and another ship although the damage is not immediately and directly caused by the impact between the two colliding vessels.

A collision occurring between the steamship C. and the steamship R., the impetus thus given to the R., plus the backwash from the C.'s propeller, drove the R. into the steamship G., causing damage which the owners of the C. were held liable to pay. In an action on the policy:

Held, that the collision with the G. was in consequence of the collision between the R. and the C., and that the C. by this collision caused the R. to come into contact with the G.; and that the defendants were liable on the policy.

Decision of Bailhache, J. (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 544; 111 L. T. Rep. 812; (1914) 3 K. B. 827) affirmed.

Appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Bailhache, J. reported 12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 544; 111 L. T. Rep. 812; (1914) 3 K. B. 827 in an action tried by him in the Commercial Court without a jury.

(a) Reported by Edward J. M. Chaplin, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

The plaintiffs, who are the owners of a steamer called the Cornwood, sued the defendants, who were underwriters, in the sum of 1300*l.*, of a policy of marine insurance dated the 8th Sept. 1911 for one year upon the hull and machinery of the Cornwood, valued at 19,000*l.*, in respect of a loss under the policy arising out of two collisions.

The facts and arguments sufficiently appear from the judgments.

Bailhache, J. held that as the forces, set in operation by the Cornwood caused the collisions the defendants were liable.

The defendants appealed.

Sir R. B. Finlay, K.C., Leslie Scott, K.C., and MacKinnon, K.C. for the appellants.

Roche, K.C. and Balloch for the respondents.

Lord Reading, C.J.—The plaintiffs, who are the owners of the steamship Cornwood, brought an action against the underwriters under a policy of insurance, and to that policy of insurance was attached a slip containing the Institute time clauses. It is with regard to the first clause of those clauses that the question now at issue has arisen, the plaintiffs claiming that they are entitled to recover from the underwriters the damages or part of the damages which they have been held liable to pay in consequence of a collision which occurred between the Cornwood and the Rouen and a collision between the Rouen and the Galatee. The plaintiffs contend that on the true view of the facts of the case damage to the Galatee was damage which arose in consequence of the collision between her and the Rouen. The material words of the clause upon which this case depends are: "And it is further agreed that if the ship hereby insured shall come into collision with any other ship or vessel, and the assured shall in consequence thereof become liable to pay, and shall pay by way of damages to any other person or persons any sum or sums not exceeding in respect of any one such collision the value of the ship hereby insured, this company will pay the assured such proportion of three-fourths of such sum or sums so paid as its subscription hereto bears to the value of the ship hereby assured, and in cases in which the liability of the ship has been contested or proceedings have been taken to limit liability, with the consent in writing of this company, the company will also pay a like proportion of three-fourths of the costs which the assured shall thereby incur or be compelled to pay. . . ."

The question in this case is whether the plaintiffs have brought themselves within the words "shall in consequence thereof"—that is, in consequence of a collision with another ship—"become liable to pay and shall pay" the damages. This case has been ably argued before us. The history of the litigation dates back to a case in the Admiralty Court. As a consequence of the events on the particular day upon which this damage was done, an action was brought in the Admiralty Court, and, as a result of it, the Cornwood was held alone to blame. It is desirable to state the facts with some particularity, as the question which this court has to answer depends upon a true view of the facts, the question being whether the damage claimed was a consequence of the collision between the Cornwood, the vessel insured under the policy, and another vessel. The Cornwood and the Rouen were both steamships proceeding up the river Seine to Rouen. They were vessels as they then stood with a displacement of about 5000 tons each. The Rouen was ahead of the Cornwood proceeding up the river when close to the La Riche light, which is on the starboard bank; that is to say, the south bank; the Cornwood gave the signal that she wished to pass the Rouen on the Rouen's port side. The Rouen repeated the signal, which, according to the rules in force on the river Seine, meant that she acceded to the wish of the Cornwood to pass her. As the Cornwood then proceeded to come upon the port side of the Rouen, the latter vessel reduced her speed. The Cornwood then put her helm to port and cut across the bows of the Rouen. Seeing that collision was inevitable, at the moment of the collision, or it may be at an even almost indefinable space of time immediately after the collision, as it is quite impossible in such matters as these to be absolutely precise in point of time, the Rouen reversed her engines and put her helm aport, but, nevertheless, in not sufficient time and not with sufficient effect to prevent a collision between the anchor on her port bow and the starboard quarter of the Cornwood. The Cornwood was steering by a light on the shore, called the Marais Vernier, on the south bank of the river. The Rouen was also steering by the same light, so that both vessels when at a distance apart—again it is not possible to speak with precision, but, according to the finding of the Admiralty Court, of about 10ft.—were on a gradually and slightly converging course. As the Cornwood drew ahead and there was little distance between the two vessels, she, as I have already said, ported across the bows of the Rouen, and in that way, drawing ahead of the Rouen, attempted to get over to the other side of the river, clear of the Rouen, by this manœuvre of porting her helm. The Cornwood was going at a speed of ten knots. At this time the Rouen, after she had acceded to the signal that the Cornwood wished to pass her, at any rate at the material time, was going at something like three or four knots; it may be a little more. As the Cornwood passed in front and ahead of the Rouen the stem of the Rouen was attracted by the Cornwood—that is to say, the Rouen undoubtedly at this moment drew from her course towards the Cornwood. There was a suggestion persisted in in the Court of Admiralty that what had happened was that the Rouen had steered carelessly and had sheered towards the Cornwood, but this view was rejected by Bargrave Deane, J., who tried the case in the Court of Admiralty, as a cause of the deflection of the Rouen's stem. The learned judge took the view that the attraction of the stem of the Rouen to the starboard quarter of the Cornwood was by the interaction of forces or the phenomenon of attraction owing to the displacement of water caused by the Cornwood as she passed across the Rouen. There is no doubt that there is such a phenomenon as this attraction and it is not in one sense in dispute. It is agreed on both sides, as we have heard during the course of the argument, that there would be such an interaction of forces as in those circumstances would cause the stem of the Rouen to be drawn towards the quarter of the Cornwood, which actually did happen. Then a collision took place which undoubtedly was of a very slight character. That seems to be common ground. There has been some discussion before us as to whether it can be said to have been an impact between the one vessel and the other, or only a contact between the two vessels. It does not seem to me that it matters in the slightest degree which it was. The vessels did actually come into contact and therefore into collision. The collision was between the stem of the Rouen and the starboard quarter of the Cornwood at some 30ft. from the stern. The collision, besides being very slight, was momentary only. Again it is impossible to speak with precision of the time, but the witnesses agree, and for that reason I do not propose to spend any time in discussing it at any length because it was agreed that in fact the collision itself—that is, the actual blow or the actual push, it does not matter which you call it—was in itself negligible. No doubt there was a certain amount of damage done to the Cornwood, but the whole matter was of little consequence, one might have said, and one may say here but for what happened after the collision, of practically no consequence. Now after the collision, no doubt, or at the time of the collision, or just immediately before, the Cornwood hard-a-ported her helm, and therefore at the moment of collision or just about after the collision was going straight across, almost at right angles to the Rouen, to the south bank to starboard. As she proceeded in that way, the Rouen, which had been coming to port just before the collision, when disengaged from contact with the Cornwood, again swung or continued her swing or began swinging, whichever may be the true view to take, to port, and apparently whatever she did, whatever steps she took to counteract this swing, would be of no avail. It is said that that again was all the result of the forces that were operating, and it is said by the plaintiffs that it was the result of the collision which had taken place. The conflict of fact in this case, if there really is a definite conflict of fact—perhaps I should say the argument as to the right inference to be drawn from the facts as proved—is by the plaintiffs on the one hand, who say that but for the collision the Rouen never would have swung round to port as she did and thus get into the middle of the stream where she struck the Galatee, which was a vessel coming down the river, amidships almost at right angles to her. That blow caused undoubtedly very serious damage, and it is the damage to the Galatee which has given rise to this litigation. The plaintiffs say, that being the cause, the damage which they have had to pay by reason of the decision of the Court of Admiralty in the Galatee was a consequence of the collision between the Cornwood and the Rouen, and if so, they are entitled to recover under the Institute time clause, under their policy. On the other hand the defendants say that the damage to the Galatee was not caused by the collision, although it is true it arose immediately after the collision; but it would have happened even if there had been no collision, because what is said is that the cause of the damage was the Cornwood porting to go across the bows of the Rouen. It is said that when once that had taken place it was negligent navigation, and the attraction of the stem or the blow or the push from the stem of the Rouen on the starboard quarter of the Cornwood really had no effect. The Cornwood continued her negligent navigation, and having got into that position as she passed the Rouen almost at right angles with her propeller moving—she was going at the rate of ten knots an hour—the wash from her propeller with the ship in that position operated upon the starboard bow of the Rouen, and so forced the head of the Rouen round to port and into the middle of the river and into the Galatee.

The real question in this case is whether the swing of the Rouen to port after the collision arose from the negligent navigation of the Cornwood, and not from the collision between the Rouen and the Cornwood. Of course, if it arose both from the negligent navigation of the Cornwood and from the collision which followed the negligent navigation, then the plaintiffs would be right in saying that it arose in consequence of the collision. The learned judge in the Admiralty Court found that the damage was the result of the collision, or of the proximity of the Cornwood to the Rouen at the particular time. On the facts of the case there can be and is no dispute between the parties up to the particular point which I have just mentioned. The case in the Admiralty Court was taken to the Court of Appeal and to the House of Lords, and Bargrave Deane, J.'s judgment was affirmed. Now it is to be noticed in the language which I have just quoted from Bargrave Deane, J.'s judgment that he did not decide the point which we now have to decide, because he said the damage was the result of the collision or of the proximity of the Cornwood to the Rouen. Whether the plaintiffs succeed in this action or not depends upon whether this court thinks that it was the collision or the proximity that caused the Galatee damage. If it was the result of the collision the plaintiffs must succeed. If on the other hand it was only the proximity by reason of the negligent navigation of the Cornwood, then, in my opinion, the plaintiffs will have failed to establish that the damage arose in consequence of the collision. In that state of facts it seems to me to be unnecessary to discuss in greater detail what the position of these vessels was before the collision, and, indeed, before us these facts are scarcely, if at all, in dispute. But when we approach the events immediately after the collision we find ourselves in an acutely debated area. I desire to say for myself that I am not inclined in this case to attribute too much importance to the scientific evidence as to the immediate results that would follow from this interaction of forces or attraction phenomenon immediately after the collision. The evidence upon this point was summed up by Bailhache, J. in these words, after an answer: "The helm necessary to keep her course increases very rapidly as the side of the vessel is approached." Then says Bailhache, J., who had heard the evidence of Professor Gibson, who had given scientific evidence upon the results which, in his view, must follow upon the position of these vessels: "But that is not because of the collision; it is because the forces which are brought into play by the close proximity of these two vessels are brought more and more strongly into play as proximity increases; and of course they are at their very strongest when there is actual contact." Mr. Leslie Scott agreed that if by "when there is actual contact," you do not mean "whilst they are in actual contact," he would not dissent from that as a true view of what would happen. But he says that does not assist in this case because the actual contact having taken place —assuming that the forces did not operate whilst the contact was actually in operation— there would be a neutralising effect of those forces by reason of the natural tendency of the Rouen to be deflected to starboard on account of the push or blow on the Cornwood. Therefore, he says, so far, whatever the impetus was that was given to the Rouen to port by reason of the attraction was stayed—he says it was actually stopped—by reason of this collision, and that what happened thereafter had really nothing to do with this interaction of forces. The plaintiffs, on the other hand, contend that the close proximity of the vessel made this play of forces very serious the moment the Rouen disengaged herself from the Cornwood; and it began at once to operate, and indeed the plaintiffs say never ceased to operate. The plaintiffs do not agree that the forces are not in actual operation whilst the vessels are in contact. The argument is that the weight of water and the forces were accumulating whilst the two vessels were in contact, because there would be no outlet for the water which otherwise would pass along the quarter and stern of the Cornwood. I do not propose in this case to lay any stress upon this scientific evidence. I am satisfied that there is an attraction in these circumstances, whatever the cause may be, and indeed it is not disputed. I am also satisfied that the moment there was a collision, immediately in point of time—perhaps an immeasurable point of time—the reversing of the engines of the Rouen with the tide as it then was with its effect upon the Rouen, would cause a certain loss of control. I would prefer to say that it would cause a loss of steerage way. The reversal of the engines in these circumstances would have that effect, and would therefore have its operation upon the direction of the head of the Rouen, which is the material point in question in this case. As the result of that it seems to me that when you have two vessels moving as these two vessels were, coming into collision, the Cornwood going across the bows of the Rouen at ten knots an hour, with the other vessel the Rouen going at a speed of something like three to four knots an hour, perhaps slightly more, and then seeing that a collision is inevitable, or at the moment that the collision takes place the Rouen, in order to do all that she could either to minimise the damage and injury, or if possible—it seemed at this moment quite impossible—to prevent the collision, reversed her engines, and did what she could in order certainly to minimise the effects of the collision. She did it with some success, or at any rate, whether with success or not, the damage to the Cornwood was, as I have already said, quite negligible. But in executing this manœuvre, the Rouen was drawn with her head out to the centre of the river further to port, and with a loss of steerage way upon her engines going astern. When one remembers that we are now dealing with matters almost of seconds, certainly of a minute or minutes at the very utmost—I have not calculated exactly what it would be in time, but it is something very, very short in point of time—the fact of the swinging out to port of the Rouen's bow in such circumstances, in consequence of her having to reverse her engines and to take measures to prevent the collision, did result in the damage.

That being so, I then put to myself the question whether, if those are the facts, the collision with the Galatee was the consequence of the first collision? I have come to the conclusion that it was. I think that it is a very finely balanced question, and arguments have been advanced on either side of great force and cogency, but still I have come to the conclusion that the Cornwood did, by this collision, cause the Rouen to come into collision with the Galatee. Therefore, in my opinion, the conclusion at which Bailhache, J. arrived is right, although I do not think that I am arriving at the same conclusion by the same process of reasoning or upon the exact findings of fact, or limited to the findings of fact of Bailhache, J. He seemed to me, in his judgment at the last, just to halt at the precise point which it was necessary to find. I am not sure that the criticism of the language may not be, perhaps, a little too fine when he says this: "I think it is sufficient to find that the forces put into operation by the negligent navigation of the Cornwood did in fact not only cause a collision between herself and the Rouen, but having done that, afterwards sent the Rouen into the Galatee." If the words "having done that" are to be taken literally—and it is right to say that the same words are used both in the shorthand note and in the Law Report—that finding would not be sufficient in my opinion to carry the plaintiffs; but having regard to the evidence and to the facts before us, I have come to the conclusion, not without a good deal of hesitation and doubt during the course of the case, that in the circumstances which happened the collision with the Galatee was brought about by the collision of the Cornwood with the Rouen. For that reason I am of opinion that this appeal must be dismissed.

SWINFEN EADY, L.J.—The question raised by this appeal turns upon the construction and true effect of part of the running down clause in the Institute time clause which is attached to a policy of insurance. By the terms of that clause it was agreed that if the ship insured should come into collision with any other ship or vessel "and the insured shall in consequence thereof become liable to pay, and shall pay by way of damages to any other person or persons any sum or sums not exceeding in respect of any one such collision the value of the ship hereby insured," then the company will pay. The material words that have to be construed and dealt with in this clause are the words "in consequence thereof."

The collision between the Cornwood and the Rouen, and afterwards between the Rouen and the Galatee, has already been the subject-matter of proceedings in the Admiralty Court. The question there, of course, was different from the question which we have to decide, but the facts as found and determined by the Court of Admiralty, and ultimately by the House of Lords, are the basis from which we start in this case. The question there to be determined was whether the Cornwood or the Rouen was the ship to blame for the collision which took place between the Rouen and the Galatee. The collision between the Rouen and the Galatee was the result of the action of one or both the Cornwood and the Rouen, one or both of those vessels being to blame. It was ultimately determined that the Cornwood was to blame for the collision, so that we start with that fact. The collision between the Cornwood and the Rouen was itself very slight and caused very slight damage, not of any material consequence further to consider, but the damage occasioned to the Galatee by the collision with the Rouen was very serious damage, involving we are told something like 15,000*l*. In the litigation in the Admiralty Court it was held that the Cornwood was to blame. The present case raises the question whether that collision for which the Cornwood was to blame was in consequence of the collision between the Cornwood and the Rouen. That is the question which arises in the present case. The learned judge below has held that it was, but the appellants contend that he has misdirected himself in point of law, and that upon the facts as he found them he ought to have decided the other way. That contention is based upon this finding. Bailhache, J. said, and of course it is agreed, that actual contact between the two vessels—that is to say, collision between the ship insured and some other ship or vessel, is essential in order to bring this clause into operation. Then the learned judge said this: "In one sense it is quite true to say that the collision between the Rouen and the Galatee was not due to the collision between the Rouen and the Cornwood—that is to say, it was not due to the actual impact between the two vessels. I do not think it was. The impact, so far as it had any effect at all, was to drive the Rouen away from the Galatee." It is said that that finding of fact goes the whole way, and that as the learned judge found that the collision between the Rouen and the Galatee was not due to the actual impact between the two vessels, the Rouen and the Cornwood, therefore he ought to have said that the plaintiffs were not entitled to succeed. In my opinion, as a matter of law, and as a matter of the true construction of a clause such as the present, an assured may become liable to pay damages in consequence of a collision between his ship and another ship, although the damage is not immediately and directly caused by the impact between the two colliding vessels. The learned judge afterwards goes on to say this: "It does not seem to me to be necessary at all, granted that there is a collision, to find that the actual impact of the two vessels drove the Rouen into the Galatee. I think it is sufficient to find that the forces put into operation by the negligent navigation of the Cornwood did in fact not only cause a collision between herself and the Rouen, but, having done that, afterwards sent the Rouen into the Galatee." That is a part of his judgment which has been much commented upon.

I think that the negligent navigation of the Cornwood might have caused a collision between that vessel and the Rouen, and the negligent navigation of the Cornwood might also and subsequently have caused the Rouen to collide with the Galatee, and yet the collision between the Cornwood and the Rouen would not necessarily have caused the collision between the other two vessels.

It is therefore necessary to consider how the facts of this case stand. In the navigation of these vessels proceeding up the river owing to the improper way in which the Cornwood was navigated she approached too close to the Rouen. There was an attraction between these vessels with actual collision. The effect of the attraction was to cause the bows of the Rouen to be turned to or inclined to port, which action was for the moment arrested during the time the vessels were in contact; but after the Cornwood had proceeded to pass the stern of the Rouen, the port direction of the Rouen proceeded and was accelerated by the wash of the Cornwood on the starboard bow of the Rouen. Moreover, in order to avert a collison, those on board the Rouen, seeing the collision was imminent, had put their helm hard-a-port and had reversed their engines. The consequence was that the Rouen was setting across the river and had lost her steerage way and proceeded directly into the Galatee, striking that ship almost at right angles. I observe that when Mr. Littledale, who is a master mariner, was called he was cross-examined with regard to the actual or direct effect of the impact itself between the Cornwood and the Rouen, and he said that it might be disregarded, that it was a blow and not a push, and that as a blow it might be disregarded. Then, dealing with the Rouen being out of control, he said: "A ship is always out of control in a collision," and then he explained that as meaning "from the mere fact that once in a collision various actions have to be taken, such as putting her engines astern to minimise the effect of the blow." "It is a recognised thing at sea in collisions that your vessel is altogether out of control for the time being. Her speed is reduced. The moment you put your engines astern you have lost control of your ship"—meaning that the ship has lost steerage way. It is therefore the proximity of the vessels which occasioned the collision, and a direct consequence of the incidents of the collision, including the manœuvres necesitated by the collision; that was the cause of the Rouen striking the Galatee. Under these circumstances I am of opinion that the damage, that is to say, the damage occasioned to the Galatee, arose in consequence of the collision between the Cornwood and the Rouen, although not the direct and immediate consequence of the impact, although one ship was not by virtue of the impact driven directly against the other. The collision, with what has to be taken as part of the collision, the attendant incidents of the collision, produced the subsequent effect. For these reasons I think, although not exactly on the same grounds, that the judgment below was right, and that the appeal should be dismissed.

Bray, J.—The question which we have to decide is this, whether the assured was, in consequence of the collision, liable to pay a large sum to the Galatee for the injury done to her by the collision between the Rouen and the Galatee. In order that the plaintiffs may succeed it is necessary first of all to show that there was a collision. There is no question about that. The next thing we have to see is, what were the circumstances in existence; what was the position of the ships and the forces in play at the moment of the collision or perhaps immediately before it; lastly, we have to consider what took place after the collision. At the moment of the collision the vessels were, I think, in the position shown in the diagram. The Rouen was proceeding at a slow speed, probably not exceeding four knots, and if I recollect aright, with the tide. She had been stopped for the purpose of avoiding or minimising the collision very shortly before the collision happened, a very proper and necessary manœuvre on the part of the pilot. Either at the moment of collision, or just before or just after, her engines had been put full speed astern, again a very proper and necessary manœuvre. She was swinging to port owing to the attractive forces which had been brought into play by the proximity of the Cornwood. The last-named vessel was going at a higher speed, probably nearly ten knots, and at the moment of the collision was crossing the bow of the Rouen. Again either at or immediately after the collision she ported her helm for the purpose if possible of avoiding, or at all events minimising, the force of the collision. The Galatee was at a short distance away, certainly under 200 yards, perhaps considerably less than that, and the time between the two collisions could not have much exceeded a minute, and certainly could not have exceeded two minutes. That is the position at the moment of the collision. I should have added that the attractive forces which had been brought into play by the proximity of the Cornwood were at their strongest at that moment. What was the position at the moment that was produced by the collision? It was necessary to put the engines of the Rouen full speed astern. That, if not putting her out of control—if one does not go quite as far as the witness said—would at once, at all events, very seriously diminish his control of her and her steering powers. In consequence of that she continued to swing to port notwithstanding that her helm was put hard-a-port to avoid if possible the consequences of the collision. In my opinion the collision and the manœuvres which were necessarily taken in order to avoid or minimise the collision, were the cause of the Rouen being unable to avoid the Galatee.

There was another point which was dwelt upon very strongly by the defendants and that was that this second collision was caused by the wash from the propeller of the Cornwood. There is no doubt that that prevented the Rouen from being able to avoid the Galatee; there is no doubt that it fell on her starboard bow and sent her to port in the direction of the Galatee. In my opinion that was not a negligent act of the Cornwood at all. The Cornwood could not help it, the position being what it was at the time of the collision. The Cornwood very properly ported her helm in order, as I have said, if possible, to avoid and minimise the collision. The result of that would be that it would bring the two vessels very nearly at right angles through the wash of the propeller of the Cornwood acting upon the bow of the Rouen. If it were shown that that was a negligent act on the part of the Cornwood it might well be said that the causes to which I have referred were too remote. But, in my opinion, it was not a negligent act on the part of the Cornwood. Having regard to the position of the vessels the Cornwood could take no other course than she did. I dare say she did not anticipate what the consequences would be, but there was no negligence on her part. The result, therefore, is that, in my opinion, the collision and the manœuvres which both parties adopted, and rightly adopted, to minimise the collision and the course taken by them after the collision led to the second collision with the Galatee, and consequently the first collision was the cause of the second collision.

That being so the judgment of the court below, in my opinion, was right.

Appeal dismissed.

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Marine insurance — Material fact — Innocent mistake as to materiality—Concealment.

A policy of marine insurance contained the following clause: "In the event of any incorrect definition of the interest insured it is agreed to hold the assured covered at a premium (if any) to be arranged." In an action to recover a loss under the policy:

Held, that, if the assured honestly believed that the correct definition was not a material matter for disclosure to underwriters, the fact that the assured knew that the "interest insured," which must be taken to mean "subject-matter insured," was not correctly defined, did not deprive him of the benefit of the clause.

Decision of Bailhache, J. (reported 12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 546; 111 L. T. Rep. 839; (1914) 3 K. B. 1131) affirmed.

Appeal by the defendants from a decision of Bailhache, J. in an action tried by him in the Commercial Court, reported 12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 546; 111 L. T. Rep. 839; (1914) 3 K. B. 1131.

A policy of marine insurance, dated the 23rd July 1912, was subscribed by the defendants, by which the plaintiffs insured four cases of printing machinery on the steamships Gulf of Suez and Orchis against ordinary marine perils, including risk of breakage, on a voyage from London to Malta. The policy contained the following clauses:—

In the event of claim for particular average or loss or injury to interest, underwriters only to be liable for cost of replacing the parts lost or injured and all charges incidental thereto.

In the event of deviation being made from the voyage hereby insured or of any incorrect definition of the interest insured, it is agreed to hold the assured covered at a premium (if any) to be arranged.

A portion of the machinery was damaged by breakage during the voyage, and the plaintiffs brought the present action to recover the amount of the loss sustained.

By their defence the defendants pleaded that the plaintiffs, when effecting the policy, had omitted to disclose that the machinery was second-hand.

Evidence was called to the effect that the difficulty and cost of replacing lost and injured parts of machinery was greater in the case of second-hand machinery than where the machinery was new; and evidence was called on behalf of the plaintiffs that it was unusual in such cases to disclose whether the machinery was new or old, and that the defendants were accustomed to insure different classes of machinery at one uniform rate.

Bailhache, J. held that if the assured honestly believed that the correct definition was not a material matter for disclosure, the fact that the assured knew that the insured interest was not correctly defined did not deprive him of the benefit of the clause.

Compston, K.C. and MacKinnon, K.C. for the appellants.—The two points to be considered are (1) whether there was concealment of a material fact from the insurers, and (2) whether this loss was occasioned by any peril of the sea insured against. There is no evidence there that this loss was caused by the perils insured against. The goods were landed in Malta on the 16th Aug. and the machinery was not discovered to be broken until the 22nd Aug., so that there was no proof of any damage until some time after the arrival of the goods. It is nowadays common form to have a "held covered" clause inserted in all policies in a slightly varying form, and in such a case where there has been a non-disclosure of a material fact it is open to the assured to say to the underwriter that all he can claim is to have an additional premium paid to him, and the effect of Bailhache, J.'s judgment amounts to a waiver of necessity for disclosure by inserting a deviation clause. Under sects. 5 and 6 of the Marine Insurance Act 1906 "interest" means insurable interest, and not "subject-matter of interest," so that there may be a loss or injury to the subject-matter without there being an injury or loss to the interest insured:

Allison v. The Bristol Marine Insurance Company, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 178; 34 L. T. Rep. 809; 1 App. Cas. 209; Anderson v. Morice, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 290; 31 L. T. Rep. 605; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 609; 35 L. T. Rep. 566; 1 App. Cas. 713.

It is not suggested that there has been any fraud; at the same time the respondents cannot say that the misdescription of the machinery was unintentional. There is no evidence here to show that the damage occurred during the period covered by the insurance or through any of the perils insured against. They also referred to

Maritime Insurance Company v. Stearns (1901) 2 K. B. 912;
Laing v. Union Marine Insurance Company, 1 Com. Cas. 11;
Carter v. Boehm, 3 Burr. 1905, 1909, 1910.

Langdon, K.C. and Dobb for the respondents.—The only point at issue is whether the true construction of the clause is that given by Bailhache, J. in his judgment. What the clause refers to is an unintentional or accidental misdescription of the subject-matter of the insurance which would have affected the premium asked for. In this case the fact that the goods, which were second-hand machinery, were described as machinery pure and simple constitutes a misdescription. The goods ought in the circumstances to have been insured at a higher premium. See Greenock Steamship Company v. Maritime Insurance Company, 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 464; 88 L. T. Rep. 207; (1903) 1 K. B. 367.

There is no reason here for cutting down the words of the clause as has been suggested on behalf of the appellants, and the judgment of Bailhache, J. should be affirmed. [They were stopped by the Court.]

Compston, K.C. in reply.

Lord Reading, C.J.—This is an appeal from the judgment of Bailhache, J. in favour of the plaintiffs in a claim to recover from the defendants, the underwriters, the amount of the loss sustained on some machinery insured by them with the defendants and shipped from London to Malta. The goods were damaged to the extent of 55*l*., as found by the learned judge. The plaintiff's case was that under a policy of marine insurance four cases of machinery were covered by the defendants as underwriters, and the insurance was against loss by injury to the goods, substantially in transit, including risk of breakage, from the time they left till the time they were delivered to the consignees.

The plaintiffs said the damage happened to the goods during that period, and, though I do not find in the evidence the exact cause of the damage, I think it is shown that during the period covered by the policy the goods were damaged. Upon that the learned judge has found that this is sufficient proof to entitle the plaintiffs to recover. The defendants, the underwriters, say this policy is repudiated by us because there has been concealment of a material fact, or, at any rate, a non-disclosure of a material fact by the plaintiffs.

No charge is made of dishonesty or of intentional concealment, or suppression of material facts, but it was said that the omission to disclose a fact which it was material for the underwriters to know when they were negotiating and considering whether they should underwrite this policy, is sufficient to bring the case within sects. 17 and 18 of the Marine Insurance Act 1906, and therefore they were entitled to repudiate the claim. Upon the facts proved in the action, which I accept as found by the learned judge, it appears that of the four cases of machinery shipped three were new and one was old.

They were all shipped from London to Malta under the description in the policy of "four cases of printing machinery, marked H.B.F." There is no doubt that the goods were four cases of printing machinery. But it is said by the defendants that as one of the cases contained second-hand machinery this was an incorrect description or definition of the goods, or, in the words of the policy, an "incorrect definition of the interest insured" within the meaning of the "held covered" clause in the slip attached to the policy. For the plaintiffs it was said: "We have for years shipped old printing machinery under the description of 'machinery' in insurance policies, and among others with the defendants, and we have made claims for loss in such cases against the defendants and no question has ever arisen, and so far as we are concerned we thought the description of new and second-hand machinery as 'machinery' was a correct definition of the interest insured." They called witnesses who were also accustomed to ship new and second-hand machinery to confirm this statement.

For the defendants witnesses were called, and one of the defendants' firm said they did not insure second-hand machinery under this definition.

"If we insure machinery we mean new machinery, and if it is intended to insure second-hand machinery it ought to be so described." One of their witnesses went so far as to say that if he had been asked to insure second-hand machinery in no circumstances would he have contemplated such an insurance.

One must also bear in mind, further, that the insurance of the machinery was at a uniform or flat rate of only 12*s.* 6*d.* per cent. on a value which was put at 100*l.* The insurer, it is true, receives a less sum in premium if he is insuring second-hand goods, which are presumably of less value than new, but equally he is running less risk. But we need not consider what the effect of this condition may be, as the learned judge has found it was a circumstance material to be stated to the underwriters, and that the plaintiffs did not state it, and that their omission to do so was unintentional and quite honest.

Having come to that conclusion, he says: "By reason of the concluding words of the 'held covered 'slip attached to the policy, the defendants are not entitled to repudiate." Notwithstanding that he finds there is a non-disclosure of a material fact. In other words, that means that by reason of a contract entered into between the insurer and the assured, an incorrect definition of the subject-matter is not to avoid the policy. The holder is still to be held covered, but he may nevertheless be bound to pay if circumstances warrant a higher premium.

Bailhache, J. said that clause was sufficient to protect the assured, though he did say that a different conclusion might be arrived at, in his view, if the misdescription or incorrect definition was intentional.

The first point made by the appellants is that the incorrectness referred to in the words "any incorrect definition of the interest insured" was meant to apply to the insured interest of the assured and not to the subject-matter insured.

It is said that "interest" is a well-known term in insurance use and is frequently used in the Marine Insurance Act 1906, and that it has always been held to mean insurable interest, but we have to consider this clause in a mercantile document in a reasonable way, and according to the ordinary and recognised canons of construction, and in my opinion it is not possible to give these words the meaning for which the appellants contend.

Mr. Compston says we must construe the language as we find it, but I have looked through the statute and have asked if counsel could point to anything in it which shows that the use of the phrase "interest insured" in the slip is applicable to the insurable interest. Counsel have been unable to point out anything of the kind. Without doubt I come to the conclusion that the true meaning is that the words "interest insured" refer to the subject-matter insured.

I have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that that is the true meaning of the words used. We must also bear in mind that when we are discussing here what would avoid the contract of insurance because of non-disclosure of material facts, the thing which it is not necessary to disclose is the insurable interest of the person insured. It is the one thing he need not disclose: (see sect. 26, sub-sect. 2). But, of course, in a number of cases, and in this one, there is disclosure of the insurable interest, but if there had been none it would not have avoided the contract, (sect. 6, sub-sect. 1). I agree with Bailhache, J. that the phrase "interest insured" means the subject-matter insured.

It was next said that even if this was so that does not take away from the underwriters the right given them in sects. 17 and 18 of the Act to avoid the policy. Mr. Mackinnon has addressed to the court an argument based on the importance of preserving to the underwriters the right of repudiating a contract of insurance where there has been a failure to disclose a material fact.

For myself I quite appreciate the force of that argument, and I think it is true, unless you find something to the contrary in the contract between the parties or some occasions which would entitle you to hold there was a waiver by the underwriters. But if there is a contract that the assured shall always be held covered even though it may be that he is to pay a higher premium, it would, in my opinion, clearly show that the contract could not be a voided if the event in which he is to be held covered has happened. I am supported in this view by the judgment of Bigham, J. in the case of the Greenock Steamship Company v. Maritime Insurance Company (sup.). The clause there was: "Held covered in case of any breach of warranty, deviation, and (or) any unprovided incidental risk or change of voyage, at a premium to be hereafter arranged." The breach was a breach of warranty of seaworthiness.

There it was held that the shipowner was entitled to require the underwriters to hold him covered as soon as the shipowner discovered that the warranty had been broken. In my opinion, as soon as you come to the conclusion that the "interest insured" means "subject-matter" insured, the case is clear. In this case the incorrect definition was not intentional; but, no doubt, in a case where the misdescription was intentional and intended to induce a person to enter into a policy, the courts would hold that the insurance would not be covered by the clause in this policy, on the point that there was no evidence that the loss was occasioned by any perils of the sea insured against. Here, the goods arrived at Malta on the 16th inst., and apparently inspection took place on the 22nd, when the damage was discovered. Mr. Compston says that being all the evidence, and the goods having been delivered to the consignees before the inspection took place, the plaintiffs have failed to prove that the loss was occasioned by any peril insured against.

I think it is unnecessary to specify the particular peril which caused the loss, as the perils insured against were of the widest possible character during the period of the transit in which the goods were insured, and it is sufficient to prove that there was injury and that it arose from perils covered by the policy.

The last point, that the damage was not caused during that period, is one that has really not been determined, and the point never was raised in the court below. We have heard the shorthand notes read and we come unhesitatingly to the conclusion that words were never used which raised this point, which I understand to mean that the injuries may have been caused between the 16th or 17th Aug., when the policy had come to an end, and the 22nd Aug. when the goods were examined and the damage found. If that point had been raised in the court below an application would have been made for evidence to be called on the subject. That point not having been raised there, it would be against the well-established practice of the court to allow it to be raised here. Under these circumstances I think all the points taken for the appellants fail and that the judgment of Bailhache, J. is correct and must be affirmed.

Swinfen Eady, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. By a policy of marine insurance subscribed by the defendants the plaintiffs insured "four cases of printing machinery" for the voyage from London to Malta "to pay average and including risk of breakage." Three of the cases contained new, and the fourth contained second-hand machinery. One case of new and the case of second-hand machinery were damaged during the voyage. The plaintiffs described all the four cases as containing machinery, and they acted honestly in so doing, believing it to be a proper and sufficient description. They knew the facts and that one of the cases contained second-hand machinery. Bailhache, J. held that the description of the case of second-hand machinery as "machinery" simply, without the addition of the word "second-hand," was not only a concealment of a material fact, but was also an incorrect definition of the interest insured. I take the facts as found by Bailhache, J. After saying that the assured were under no mistake of fact the learned judge added: "They were, however, under a misapprehension as to the necessity of describing the machinery as second-hand, and the mistake arose in this way. First, it is a common practice in this trade to ship all machinery, new or old, as machinery simpliciter. The proportion of second-hand machinery shipped is comparatively small. Secondly, they had done so for years, and had on many previous occasions so insured with these same defendants. Thirdly, although machinery differs largely in its liability to breakage in transit, some kinds being more delicate than others, these underwriters had never inquired, as many underwriters do, as to the class of machinery they were insuring, but had taken it all at a uniform or flat rate of 12*s.* 6*d.* per cent., and that, too, irrespective of the length or nature of the insured voyage. Under these circumstances the plaintiffs say—and I believe them—that they thought these defendants were indifferent on the subject, and were, to use a popular expression, willing to take the rough with the smooth. In short, the plaintiffs, though knowing that this machinery was second-hand, honestly thought that to describe it as machinery was a sufficient and correct definition of the interest insured." So far as the plaintiffs were concerned, there was good faith on their part, but the learned judge held that there had been a misapprehension on their part, and that the description of the interest insured was insufficient and incorrect. The question, and really the only question, we have to consider is, whether that is cured by the clause in the policy that "in the event of any incorrect definition of the interest insured, it is agreed to hold the assured covered at a premium (if any) to be arranged."

I can see no reason for upholding the contention that the words "interest insured" in the "held covered clause" relate to the insurable interest which the assured had in the goods insured under the policy. It is not necessary more particularly to describe or deal with the insurable interest under the policy. It is not necessary that the assured should have an insurable interest in the subject-matter of the insurance at the time when the insurance is effected: (See Marine Insurance Act 1906, s. 6, sub-s. 1.) In my opinion the words "interest insured" do not refer to insurable interest, but only to the subject-matter of the insurance, so that the words "any incorrect definition of the interest insured" mean therefore, "any incorrect definition of the subject-matter of the insurance." That is a small matter which must be specified in the policy by sect. 23 of the Marine Insurance Act 1906.

The effect of this "held covered" clause is that the insurer is to hold the assured covered if there is any slip or mistake in regard to the description of the subject-matter. According to the argument addressed to the court on behalf of the defendants, this clause, assuming that it applies to the subject-matter of the insurance, would only operate in cases in which there had been a misdescription of the subject-matter of the insurance which was immaterial—in which case the clause would not be necessary—or which was not or could not reasonably be known to the assured. In my opinion that clause should not have so limited a construction put upon it. I quite agree that a case in which there had been an intentional misdescription or an intentional concealment of material facts would not be covered by a clause of this kind. But I think that a mistake made honestly and in good faith is covered, and is intended by the parties to be covered, by such a clause. In my opinion this appeal fails, and should be dismissed.

Bray, J.—I agree. The main question raised in this case is as to the true construction of the "held covered" clause. Two points have been urged before us in reference to it. In the first place it is said that the words "interest insured" mean "insurable interest" in the subject-matter of the insurance, and not the subject-matter itself. I agree that we ought to apply the ordinary principles of construction to the words. Under the Marine Insurance Act 1906, and under the ordinary law merchant, it is not necessary to define the interest of the assured at all. Therefore the words "definition of interest" (if "interest" is to be taken as meaning insurable interest) do not describe anything that is usually to be found in policies of insurance. But I can see no reason for giving to these words any such meaning. The term is a good one to use in order to describe the subject-matter of the insurance, and I can see no reason why any artificial meaning should be attributed to it, more especially when it is remembered that in this same policy there is another clause in which the word "interest" is clearly used to mean the subject-matter of the insurance.

The second point which has been urged presents somewhat more difficulty. It is said that the words "incorrect definition of the interest insured" do not cover a case in which there has been non-disclosure of a material fact. I do not think that those words should receive such a limited meaning. I think the clause implies that the incorrect definition is a material matter because it provides for an increased premium to be paid in such a case. If the words are to be considered as not including the non-disclosure of a material fact, we should be limiting their operation to cases which in practice will probably arise very rarely.

I can see no reason for thus limiting these words any more than for limiting the words "breach of warranty" so as to exclude "breach of warranty for seaworthiness." At the same time I quite agree that this clause would not cover a case of fraud, but in saying this I do not in any way suggest any limitation to the meaning of these words. In their ordinary signification they would not include a fraudulent non-disclosure or misdescription. For these reasons this appeal should, in my opinion, be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Re WILHELM HEMSOTH LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

Alien enemy—Internment of ship—Requisition by Crown—Application by creditors to vest ship in custodian trustee — Discretion of court— Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act 1914 (5 Geo. 5, c. 12), s. 4.

Where a German ship was seized as a prize by the Crown after the declaration of war with Germany and was subsequently requisitioned by the Crown and was in the possession of the Admiralty, sect. 4 of the Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act 1914 was held to be inapplicable.

Held, also, that it was not expedient for the purposes of that Act under the circumstances of the case to make an order vesting property of such a nature as a ship in the custodian trustee.

Decision of Warrington, J. affirmed.

THE Villie Steamship Company Limited of Northumberland were owed before the outbreak of the war with Germany a sum of 716*l.* in respect of freight by a German company registered at Emden.

That German company had at the declaration of war a steamship called the Hans Hemsoth, lying at the port of Blyth, in Northumberland. She was then under arrest in the Admiralty Court by certain other creditors.

After the outbreak of the war she was seized as a prize by the Crown, and in due course was brought before the Prize Court, and on the 11th Nov. 1914 the Prize Court made an order for detention of the ship and not for condemnation, in accordance with art. 2 of the Hague Convention.

That article provides as follows:

A merchant ship which, owing to circumstances beyond its control, may have been unable to leave the enemy port . . . may not be confiscated. The belligerent may merely detain it, on condition of restoring it after the war, without payment of compensation, or he may requisition it on condition of paying compensation.

On the 21st Jan. 1915 the Crown exercised its right of requisition of the German steamship which had been so interned.

Thereupon the English steamship company issued a summons under sect. 4 of the Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act 1914, asking in effect that the German steamship should be taken out of the control of the Prize Court and vest in the custodian trustee, subject to the rights of the Crown in the vessel and without prejudice to the jurisdiction of the Prize Court.

The summons came on to be heard before Warrington J., sitting at chambers, who refused in the exercise of his discretion to make any order thereon, on the ground that, owing to the fact that the ship had been requisitioned by the Crown and was in the possession of the Admiralty, sect. 4 of the Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act 1914 was at present inapplicable to the circumstances of the case.

Accordingly his Lordship, without deciding as between the parties whether the application might at any future time be one that could be maintained, ordered the summons to stand over generally, with liberty to restore it.

From that decision the applicants now appealed.

C. Robertson Dunlop, for the appellants, referred to Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act 1914, s. 4.

Sir Stanley Buckmaster (S.G.) (with him Dighton Pollock) for the respondent, the Procurator General.

Austen-Cartmell for the respondent, the Public Trustee, appointed to act as custodian under the Act of 1914.

C. Robertson Dunlop replied.

Lord COZENS-HARDY, M.R.—This is an appeal from an order of Warrington, J., not deciding as between the parties whether the application may at any time be one that could be maintained, but saying that it is not expedient now to make any order and amending the summons and letting it stand over generally, with liberty to restore.

It is an application that a German ship, which was in an English port at the declaration of the war, should be vested in the custodian trustee, and the application is made under sect. 4, subsect. 1, of the Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act 1914, which enables the High Court, or a judge, on the application of any person who appears to the court to be a creditor of an enemy—that is the position of Mr. Dunlop's clients, who are creditors for the balance of freight which is due to them—"or to be interested in any property, real or personal (including any rights, whether legal or equitable, in or arising out of property, real or personal), belonging to or held or managed for or on behalf of an enemy, or on the application of the custodian or any Government department, by order vest in the custodian any such real or personal property as aforesaid, if the court or the judge is satisfied that such vesting is expedient for the purposes of this Act." Then he may make an order conferring upon the custodian "such powers of selling, managing, and otherwise dealing with the property as to the court or judge may seem proper."

This vessel was first of all interned and has now been requisitioned by the Admiralty. That turns upon another provision in the Hague Convention: "The belligerent may merely detain it, on condition of restoring it after the war, without payment of compensation, or he may requisition it on condition of paying compensation." At the present time it has been requisitioned by the Admiralty, and at the present time there is not a penny of compensation on the evidence due or which can become due. Under those circumstances it seems to me that the learned judge was quite right in saying it is not expedient for the purposes of this Act now and under these circumstances to make an order vesting property of such a nature as a ship is in the Custodian Trustee, who strongly objects to this order being made.

In my opinion the learned judge was quite right, and this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs.

Pickford, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

This is, of course, admittedly a discretionary order. The learned judge has exercised his discretion not by absolutely refusing to make an order on the summons, but by making an order which, if there be any property which practically is of any use to the creditor, will enable the creditor to make his application and to get such remedies as he is entitled to. Looking at the nature of the property, the fact that it is in the hands of the Crown and subject to the jurisdiction of the Prize Court, and to all the circumstances, I certainly can see no reason for saying that the learned judge exercised his discretion wrongly. But I should like to go further than that and say that, in my opinion, he exercised it quite rightly and his method of exercising his discretion was, at any rate, not too unfavourable to the applicants.

Sanday and Co. v. British and Foreign Marine Insurance Limited. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Marine insurance—Policy—"Restraint of princes" — State of war — Construction — Total loss — Whether "restraint" involves use of physical force — Restraint by Government of assured— Marine Insurance Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 41), s. 60.

The words "arrests, restraints, and detainments of kings and princes" imply some interference of a fortuitous character, some interference out of the ordinary course of events by governing authorities who have the force of the State behind them to compel submission to their authoritative decrees.

The plaintiffs, who were British merchants, in July 1914 shipped certain linseed on the British steamers A. and O. in the River Plate for carriage to Hamburg. They had sold the linseed to German merchants at a price covering cost, freight, and insurance, but upon terms by which the property was left in the plaintiffs until delivery. They insured the linseed with the defendants, a British company, from ports in the River Plate to Hamburg, and it was agreed that the subject-matter of the policy was linseed valued at 33,000*l.*, and the perils insured against included "arrests, restraints, and detainments of all kings, princes," &c. War was declared by Great Britain on Germany on the 4th Aug., and proclamations forbidding trading with the enemy were issued on the 5th Aug. and the 9th Sept. The A. when in the Channel received a signal from a French cruiser that she should go to Liverpool for security, and the O., on the suggestion of the Admiralty, was diverted by her owners to Glasgow.

The plaintiffs having given notice of abandonment and claimed for a total loss:

Held (Swinfen Eady, L.J. dissenting), that (1) the word "restraint" in the policy did not necessarily involve the use of physical force; (2) "restraint of princes" included a restraint imposed by the British Government on British subjects, provided it was imposed for a cause other than a violation of law; (3) the inability of the ships to proceed with the voyages after the existence of a state of war had become known was caused by a "restraint of princes" within the meaning of the policy; (4) the rule of law in accordance with which the impossibility of goods shipped reaching their destination is to be treated as a constructive total loss of the goods has not been altered by the Marine Insurance Act 1906; (5) there was therefore a constructive total loss of the goods by a peril insured against, and the plaintiffs were entitled to recover on the policy.

Decision of Bailhache, J. affirmed.

Appeal by the defendants from a judgment of Bailhache, J. in the Commercial Court.

The plaintiffs in this action were the owners of two parcels of linseed shipped on the steamship St. Andrew and Orthia at Buenos Aires ports, in the months of June and July 1914, for carriage to Hamburg. The defendants were the underwriters on the cargo. The case came before the court without pleadings upon admitted facts, and the question to be determined was whether upon those facts there had been a constructive total loss of the linseed, so as to render the underwriters liable upon their policies.

The linseed was sold to German buyers at a price which covered c.f. and i., but upon terms which left the linseed the property of the plaintiffs until delivery. The plaintiffs and defendants were British subjects, and the steamers were British. There were two policies, both dated the 31st July 1914, for 32,000*l.* and 11,000*l.* respectively, and, except as to amounts, in identical terms. The policies originally contained the usual free of capture and seizure clause, but on payment of an extra premium the clause was deleted. They were free of particular average except in circumstances which had not arisen, and among the perils insured against were: Takings at sea, restraint and detainments of all kings, princes, and people of what nature or quality soever.

War was declared on the 4th Aug. 1914. On the 9th Aug., as the St. Andrew was approaching the Lizard, she was stopped by a French cruiser and told to go to Falmouth. She went into Falmouth and there her master received orders from some naval officer in authority to proceed to Liverpool and discharge, which he actually did. The master of the St. Andrew knew that war had been declared, and if he had not been stopped by the French cruiser he would have signalled for orders at some Channel signalling station, probably the Lizard or the Start.

The Orthia was diverted to Glasgow, where she discharged. Her owner on the 3rd Aug. received a telegram from the Admiralty in these terms: "Admiralty suggest in the interests of the nation that your Orthia, now bound for Hamburg with grain, be diverted to a British port, any further information is available at Trade Branch, War Staff, Admiralty." On the 5th Aug. they sent a cable to St. Vincent, which the master received on the 7th, directing the Orthia to proceed to Glasgow. Trading with the enemy was prohibited by proclamations, the first of which was issued on the 5th Aug.

The St. Andrew arrived at Liverpool on the 11th Aug., and the Orthia at Glasgow on the 20th Aug. On the 7th Sept. the plaintiffs gave notice of abandonment, which the defendants declined to accept. No point was made as to the lateness of the notice. The linseed depreciated in value to the extent of some 25 per cent. It is obvious that neither of the steamers could lawfully complete her voyage to Hamburg, and that there was in August 1914 no prospect of the linseed being sent forward to Hamburg within any reasonable time.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 1.—Bailhache, J. (after stating the facts).—Upon these facts the plaintiffs submitted that there was a total loss of the linseed due to a peril insured against, viz., restraint of princes, and that the defendants were liable.

The defendants denied liability on six grounds, which may be summarised thus:

(a) No loss, or if a loss, not by a peril insured against;

(b) The peril insured against was not the proximate cause of the loss;

(c) If loss is alleged by takings at sea, arrests or detention by the British authorities, the policy does not insure against loss by such a cause; and

(d) After the 4th Aug. the adventure became illegal and the policy was therefore avoided.

There are two questions falling for decision in this case. First, was there a constructive total loss within the meaning of the policy; second, if so, was such loss due to a peril insured against or its proximate cause? I shall try in answering these questions to cover the points raised by the defendants.

As to the first question, it was conceded that in the case of a marine policy on goods the insurance is on the venture, and the loss of the venture constitutes a constructive total loss of the goods: (see Rodocanachi v. Elliott, 31 L. T. Rep. 239; 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 399; L. Rep. 9 C. P., p. 518). This is not one of the instances of constructive total loss given in the Marine Insurance Act 1906, but I think it still remains the law. The venture in this case was clearly destroyed, for this point clearly seems covered by the authority to which I have referred. There was a constructive total loss of the linseed.

Next, was such loss due to a peril insured against as the proximate cause of the loss?

It will be convenient to divide this question into two parts, and to discuss first whether the loss was in any sense due to a peril insured against. There is a slight difference between the incidents which led to the St. Andrew going first to Falmouth and then to Liverpool, and those which led to the Orphia going to Glasgow, but it was not suggested that this difference makes any distinction in principle between the two cases, and in my opinion the two cargoes stand on the same footing.

The voyage in both cases was lost because by English law and by proclamations modifying the law the further prosecution of the voyage became illegal and the owners in both cases obeyed the law. Do these facts bring the case within the "restraint of princes" clause in the policies? No force was used, but "restraint of princes" does not necessarily involve the use of force; any authoritative prohibition on the part of a governing power or the operation of municipal law is sufficient: (see Miller v. Law Accident Insurance Company, 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 386; 88 L. T. Rep. 370; (1903) 1 K. B. 712).

In my judgment the loss of the venture in both cases was due to "restraint of princes." The defendants say, however, that even if this is so yet as the restraint was by the operation of British municipal law or by the authoritative act of the British Government in issuing their proclamations, it matters not whether such restraint is not covered by the policy.

The reason they give is that in a British policy upon the goods of a British subject restraint by the British Government must always be taken to be excepted however wide-reaching the terms of the restraint clause may be. They say the clause should be construed as though after the words "of what nature, condition or quality soever" there were added the words "other than British."

This point is of importance, and as it is not, I think, covered by any decided case which can be said to be conclusive, I propose to criticise it at some length.

The grounds of the restraint clause are admittedly wide enough to cover acts of the British Government, and if they were not to have full effect given to them it must be because they have acquired some more limited meaning by custom, or because there is some ground of public policy which should prevent the court giving them their full effect. No customary meaning was proved, and I have failed to discover any ground of public policy.

The question was discussed as long ago as 1702, in Green v. Young (2 Lord Raymond, 840), where an embargo was laid by the British Government upon a vessel at Jamaica insured on a voyage from Jamaica to London. The vessel was seized and converted into a fireship. The point was not actually decided but Lord Holt, who tried the case, expressed the opinion that such an embargo and seizure were covered by the restraint of princes clause.

In 1802, in Tonting v. Hubbard (3 Bos. & P. 291), which was an action by a Swedish owner for freight due under a charter-party, Lord Alvanley, in the course of his judgment, quoted Marshal as saying on p. 437: "If a British ship be arrested or seized by the authority of the British Government from State necessity, this shall be a detention within the meaning of the policy for which the insurer is liable." Lord Alvanley discusses the point, but expresses no decided opinion of his own.

In the last edition of Arnould, p. 803, the law is thus stated: "There are two classes of cases in which loss may be occasioned by the public authoritative acts of the Government by the assured, those, namely, in which the assured and the underwriter are both subjects of the same State, and those in which they are subjects of different States. In the former class of cases it may now be taken as settled law that the underwriter is liable for all loss occasioned by the public acts of the Home Government in detaining, arresting, or laying embargo on the ship, either in the home or foreign port." And in the fourth edition of Phillips, sect. 10, par. 1109, under the head "Capture, Arrests, Restraints, and Detention," the restraints clause in these policies is set out, and the author says: "The policy extends to captures, arrests, and detention by public enemies, by belligerents where the property insured is neutral, or by the Government of which the assured is a subject for any other cause than a violation of law." These last words are very material; they do not appear in par. 803 of Arnould, who possibly takes the qualification for granted.

Incidentally they bring me to a further point taken by the defendants, and supply the answer to it. They put their point in this way: "Even if the restraint clause in this way does cover authoritative acts of the British Government at all, we deny it only covers those acts if they were illegal or mistaken," and for this I was referred to the case of Lozano v. Jansen (2 E. & E 160).

In that case the British ship Newport, with a cargo on board belonging to a Brazilian subject, while on her voyage to Ambriz, and when near Ambriz, was seized by a Queen's ship under the statute 5 Geo. 4, c. 113, s. 4, as being illegally engaged in the slave trade. She was condemned by the local court at St. Helena, and the shippers of the cargo, who were merchants in London and agents for the Brazilian consignee, were condemned in penalties amounting to double the value of the goods, and in costs. The ship and certain perishable goods were sold under order of the court. The rest of the goods were detained by order of the court at St. Helena.

The cargo was insured at Lloyd's under a policy containing a restraint clause in the present form. On hearing of the proceedings at St. Helena, notice of abandonment was given in due time The Privy Council, on appeal, reversed the order of the St. Helena court, and ordered restitution of ship and goods. Upon these facts it was held in an action against the defendant, the underwriter, that the seizure being wrongful there was a loss of the goods by a peril insured against.

It is to be noted that had the seizure been legal the owners of the Newport would have been guilty of a breach of English statute law, and the policy would not have covered them. It was, therefore, necessary to hold that the seizure by the Queen's ship was illegal if the assured were to recover. This case is, in my view, no authority at all for the defendants' proposition, but merely illustrates the correctness of the statement by Phillips that the policy extends to captures by the Government of which the assured is a subject, for any cause other than a violation of the law.

I may note, in passing, that I find that in the article on insurance in the Laws of England, on p. 443, it is submitted by the late Mr. Arthur Cohen that the case of Lozano v. Jansen (sup.) only means that if the property insured is liable to arrest or detention by the British Government on account of some illegal act of the assured, and is for that reason arrested or detained, the assured cannot recover. I am glad to have such high authority in support of my own view.

In my judgment, therefore, the restraint clause, in the form in which it occurs in the policies before me, does cover the municipal law of this country and the authoritative acts of the British Government. I adopt the statement of the law by Phillips in the paragraph quoted above.

Another point taken by the defendants was that after the declaration of war the voyage became illegal and the policy ceased to be effective.

Now, there is no doubt that a British policy of insurance upon a venture illegal according to English law at the time the policy is issued is of no effect. No authority is now needed for this proposition. When, however, the venture is legal according to English law when the policy is issued, but becomes illegal during the currency of the policy by some municipal law or authoritative act of the Government, one must distinguish.

If the assured persists in the venture after it has so become illegal, and as a consequence his goods are seized, he is uninsured. The seizure is due to his violation of English law. If, however, he, in consequence of such supervening illegality, abandons the venture and thereby suffers loss, that loss, if I am right in my judgment, so far falls within the restraint of princes clause, and, apart from any possible question of causa proxima, the assured is covered.

If it were not so, an assured would indeed be in a sorry plight, for whether he obeyed or disobeyed the law, he would equally be uninsured. In my opinion he is not in this position, and I take the law to be that a British subject does under a restraint clause in the present form insure himself against loss caused by a compliance with the law of his country or the commands of his Government, although he cannot and does not insure himself against a loss caused by a defiance of such law or commands.

One last point remains: Was the restraint of princes a proximate cause of the loss? The defendants say no, and refer me to a line of cases of which Hadkinson v. Robinson (3 Bos. & P. 388) is an early example, and Kacianoff v. China Traders' Insurance Company (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 524; 111 L. T. Rep. 404; (1914) 3 K. B. 112) is, I think, the latest.

The defendants, on the other hand, refer me to Miller v. Law Accident Insurance Company (sup.) It is, I think, correct to say that the Hadkinson v. Robinson line of cases proceed upon the principle that a loss which arises from steps taken to avoid a peril cannot be said to be due to the peril so avoided.

In deciding within which set of authorities a given case falls, it must always be borne in mind that much depends upon the character and description of the particular peril which has to be relied upon as to the cause of the loss. In this case the restraint took the form of the Corn Law, which upon the outbreak of war sprang automatically into force, and of the command issued by proclamation. One of these was an injunction to shipowners "not to permit any British ship to leave or enter or communicate with any port or place of the German Empire."

When once it is admitted that force is not necessary to constitute restraint of princes, it is clear that a shipowner who keeps his vessel at home or directs her to a home port in obedience to such a proclamation, is not taking steps to avoid that particular peril, but is submitting to its operation.

In such a case restraint of princes is the proximate cause of loss. If, on the other hand, he acted in precisely the same way in order to avoid capture, and if the only peril insured against of which he could avail himself against his indemniter was seizure or capture, then Hadkinson v. Robinson and cases of that class decide that as his vessel has not in fact been captured he cannot rely upon capture as the cause of loss. In my opinion this case falls within the principle of Miller's case and restraint of princes was the proximate cause of the loss.

The defendants appealed.

Sir Robert Finlay, K.C., Leslie Scott, K.C., and F. D. MacKinnon, K.C. for the appellants.

Adair Roche, K.C. and Dunlop for the respondents.

The nature of the arguments appears sufficiently from the judgments.

Cur. adv. vult.

The following written judgments were delivered:—

April 23.—Lord Reading, C.J.—The plaintiffs bring this action to recover the value of two cargoes owned by them and shipped at ports in the River Plate in the steamships Orthia and St. Andrew for carriage to Hamburg. The cargoes were insured by the plaintiffs with the defendants under two policies of marine insurance subscribed by the defendants, and the question is whether the plaintiffs are entitled in the circumstances of this case to recover from the defendants the values named in the policies. Bailhache, J. tried the action and decided in favour of the plaintiffs, and the defendants appeal from this judgment.

The plaintiffs are corn merchants carrying on business in this country, and had contracted to sell and deliver to German merchants resident in Hamburg, in the German Empire, two parcels of linseed; the price covered cost, freight, and insurance, but the property was not to pass until the goods were delivered at Hamburg. The linseed was shipped in the month of July on the steamships Orthia and St. Andrew for carriage from the River Plate to Hamburg. A small parcel of wheat was also shipped in the St. Andrew which the plaintiffs intended to sell to German firms at Hamburg. War was declared on the 4th Aug. 1914, at 11 p.m., by His Majesty the King against the German Emperor. On the 3rd Aug. the owners of the Orthia received a telegram from the Admiralty suggesting that in the interests of the nation the vessel should be diverted to a British port. On the 5th Aug. the owners cabled to St. Vincent directing the Orthia to proceed to Glasgow. On the 7th Aug. the Orthia called at St. Vincent for orders, received the message from the owners, and in consequence proceeded to Glasgow, where she arrived on the 20th Aug. and duly discharged the linseed.

On the 9th Aug. the St. Andrew was forty miles S.S.W. of the Lizard, proceeding on her voyage to Hamburg, when a French cruiser signalled her to stop and asked whither she was going. The master replied "To the Lizard." At that time he did not know that we were at war with Germany, although he was aware that France and Germany were at war. The cruiser signalled her "For security go into Port Liverpool." This was an obvious mistake, as Port Liverpool is in Canada, and the cruiser then signalled her to go into Falmouth. The St. Andrew then proceeded to Falmouth, and, when there, learnt that this country was at war with Germany. About an hour or two after dropping anchor at Falmouth the master received orders through the examining officer at Falmouth from the chief naval transport officer at Devonport to go to Liverpool, whither he proceeded, and upon arrival on the 11th Aug. duly discharged the linseed and the wheat. Both the plaintiffs and the defendants are British subjects, and the Orthia and the St. Andrew are British steamships.

By the policies of insurance, the shipments of linseed and wheat were insured upon a voyage "at or from port or ports in the River Plate and tributaries to Hamburg" against loss by perils, including the peril of "takings at sea, arrests, restraints, and detainments of all kings, princes, and people of what nation, condition, or quality soever." The printed form of the policy contained the common form of the f.c.s. clause, "Warranted free of capture, seizure, and detention and the consequences thereof or any attempt thereat, piracy excepted, and also from all consequences of hostilities or warlike operations whether before or after declaration of war." This clause was deleted on payment of an extra premium. The policies were warranted free from particular average, except in circumstances which have not arisen. The value of the cargoes was depreciated to the extent at most of some 25 per cent. On the 7th Sept. the plaintiffs gave notice of abandonment to the defendants, who refused to accept abandonment, whereupon the plaintiffs brought this action. It is agreed that no point should be made as to the date of the notice. By reason of the war the vessels could not lawfully continue the voyage to Germany, and, so far as the human mind could foretell, the linseed could not be forwarded to Germany within reasonable time. On these facts, which were not in dispute, Bailhache, J. held that the linseed had been lost owing to restraint of kings and princes, and that the underwriters were liable for a total loss under the terms of the policies. The learned judge drew no distinction between the shipments of the Orthia and the St. Andrew, and held that "the voyage in both cases was lost because by English law and by proclamations notifying the law the further prosecution of the voyage became illegal, and the owners in both cases obeyed the law." There is no doubt that the Orthia proceeded to Glasgow instead of continuing her voyage to Hamburg because of the orders received from the owners of the vessel, who were aware of the existence of a state of war between this country and Germany. The case of the St. Andrew is not quite so simple. She was advised by the French cruiser to run into Falmouth for security. The action of the French cruiser was not a hostile intervention, and there was no exercise of force or threat to exercise it. The master of the vessel knew that the voyage to Germany had become illegal and must be abandoned before he received the orders of the Admiralty to proceed to Liverpool. Upon these facts I agree with the learned judge that the shipment in the two vessels stand, for the purpose of the decision in this case, in the same position.

The question to be determined is whether the abandonment of the voyage, in consequence of its having become illegal, was an abandonment caused by "restraint of kings and princes" within the meaning of the policy. The defendants contend, first, that there was no act of restraint, and, secondly, that the restraint did not cause the loss. On the first point they argue that the word "restraint" implies an act of intervention by force, manu forti, and that, as no force or violence had been exerted to prevent the continuance of the voyage, there was no restraint. Must force be actually exerted before there can be a "restraint of kings and princes"? There is no special meaning attributable to these words either by custom or usage among merchants, and they must be construed according to their natural and ordinary meaning. They find a place in this policy at the end of a long series of enumerated perils, all of which contemplate a loss by the intervention of some fortuitous occurrence. By rule 7 of the Rules for Construction of Policies in the first schedule of the Marine Insurance Act 1906, "The term 'perils of the seas' refers only to fortuitous accidents or casualties of the seas. It does not include the ordinary action of wind and waves." The words "arrests, restraints, and detainments of kings and princes" to my mind also imply some intervention of a fortuitous character, some interference out of the ordinary course of events by the governing authorities who have the force of the State behind them to compel submission to their authoritative decrees. In Rodocanachi v. Elliott (sup.) Brett, J., in construing the words "restraints and detainments of all kings, princes, and people," said: "Now, I apprehend that goods are restrained or detained where they are, by the application of a hostile force, prevented from being carried to their destination. That that applies to embargo there seems to me to be no doubt; and there is equally, in my opinion, no doubt that it applies to blockade; in both it is intended that the ship or goods shall not be removed." In that case the court had only to consider restraint or detainment by a hostile force. The conclusion is that there was restraint or detainment because by the action of the German army, then besieging and investing Paris, the goods were prevented leaving Paris and reaching their destination. In that case it was argued that there was no loss of goods by restraint of princes because there had been no action on the goods themselves, but Bramwell, B., in delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, rejected that argument and observed that the word "restraint" is "more properly applicable to persons than to goods, so that a restraint of goods means a restraint of those having the custody of goods," and held that the goods, having been effectually prevented from coming out of Paris by reason of the siege and investment of Paris by the Germans, were lost by restraint of princes. The same words are to be found in the exception clauses of charter-parties and bills of lading, and, although the points decided are not the same as in the present case, the construction of the words must be the same whether they are found in charter-parties or bills of lading or in policies of marine insurance. In Geipel v. Smith (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 268; 26 L. T. Rep. 361; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 404) the question was whether the defendant was justified in determining the contract by reason of the blockade at the port of discharge; Cockburn, C.J. thus answered it at p. 410: "Is a blockade a restraint of princes? I think it is. It is an act of a Sovereign, State, or prince; and it is a restraint, provided the blockade is effective; and in the eye of the law a blockade is effective if the enemies' ships are in such numbers and position as to render the running of the blockade a matter of danger, although some vessels may succeed in getting through. In such a case the obstacle arises from an act of State of one of the belligerent Sovereigns, and consequently constitutes a restraint of princes. The case, therefore, is brought within the exception of the charter-party." Rule 10 of the Rules for Construction of Policies in the first schedule of the Marine Insurance Act 1906 confirms the view I have expressed as to the meaning of "restraint." The rule is in the following words: "The term 'arrests, &c, of kings and princes and people' refers to political or executive acts and does not include a loss caused by riot or by ordinary judicial process." Acts of State are clearly included; a declaration of war by the Sovereign is an act of State and is a political or executive act. "The force of a declaration of war is equal to that of an Act of Parliament prohibiting intercourse with the enemy except by the Queen's licence. As an act of State, done by virtue of the prerogative exclusively belonging to the Crown, such a declaration carries with it all the force of law": (Esposito v. Bowden, 7 E. & B. 763, at p. 781). Whether war is declared by or against the Sovereign or at all is immaterial for the purpose under consideration. It is equally an act of State if the forces of the Crown are used by order of the Crown against the enemy. A political or executive act may, however, be an act of interference and of forcible interference notwithstanding that force is not actually exerted. The executive has the power of compelling obedience to its orders by the exercise of force if necessary; the force need not be actually physically present when the master of the vessel submits to an order of the executive. The master acts in obedience to such an order without requiring the exertion of force to coerce him into submission, because it would be useless to refuse to submit.

In my opinion it is not necessary that an actual exertion of force should be made to constitute a restraint. Such judicial authority as exists supports this view and is against the defendants' contention that actual force must be used. They relied upon the dictum of Martin, B. in Finlay v. Liverpool and Great Western Steamship Company (23 L. T. Rep. 254). There it was held that an order by a court of competent jurisdiction in New York to the defendants to deliver up goods was no answer to a claim for non-delivery of goods in accordance with the terms of the bill of lading, and was not an act within the exception in the bill of lading of "restraint of princes." Martin, B. said that these words "have reference to the forcible interference of a State or of a Government of a country taking possession of the goods manu forti, and do not extend to the legal proceedings which, it is alleged in the plea, afterwards took place in the courts of New York." It is to be observed that Martin, B. did not express the view that there must be actual physical exertion of force. This dictum came under review in Miller v. Law Accident Insurance Company (sup.), where the question arose whether the operation of the municipal law of a country which prevented the delivery of goods at their port of destination was a restraint of princes within the meaning of the policy. As the plaintiffs maintain that the decision of the Court of Appeal in that case covers the present case it is necessary closely to examine the facts and judgments. The plaintiff had shipped a number of bulls in the steamship Bellevue to be carried from Liverpool to Buenos Aires, and then effected a policy of insurance on the animals. Months before the date of the shipment the Argentine Government had passed a decree forbidding the entry of animals suffering from contagious diseases. By art. 5 of the decree it was provided that animals suspected of being affected with diseases should be slaughtered. The Bellevue arrived on the 10th Sept. 1900, and after inspection of the animals by Argentine officials the Ministry of Agriculture ordered the vessel to leave the port, but gave leave to tranship the cattle to another vessel outside the limits of the port. On the 11th Sept. 1900 a general order was issued by the Ministry forbidding the discharge of cattle from the United Kingdom. The Bellevue left the port and transhipped the cattle. The plaintiffs demanded to recover against the underwriters on the ground that there had been a restraint of princes. Bigham, J. decided that the mere operation of an ordinary municipal law was not a restraint within the meaning of the policy. He quoted the dictum of Martin, B. in Finlay v. Liverpool and Great Western Steamship Company (sup.) and said: "So in the present case the words do not in my opinion cover the operation of the ordinary law of the land but relate only to some violent departure from the ordinary course of things." He held that Rodoconachi v. Elliott (sup.) was distinguishable because in that case, although there was neither actual seizure nor arrest of the goods, nor a specific order preventing the goods leaving the besieged city, the goods were as effectually prevented leaving the city as if they had been actually seized by the German army; whereas in the case before him no force of any kind was used, the captain was only required to obey the ordinary law existing in the country at the time when the goods arrived, and he obeyed it. The Court of Appeal (88 L. T. Rep. 370; (1903) 1 K. B. 712) differed from Bigham, J. and held that there was an active intervention of the Government which came within the "restraint of princes." They dissented from the view that direct force must be applied to bring the peril of restraint of princes into operation. Stirling, L.J. said: "There was an active intervention of the Government of the Argentine Republic, which was none the less an exercise of superior force because no officer of the army or the police force intervened." Mathew, L.J. pointed out that Finlay v. Liverpool and Great Western Steamship Company (sup.) was not an authority for the proposition that there must be an exercise of direct force to constitute restraint. He treated the acts of the executive authorities at Buenos Aires as acts of restraint of princes and said: "If actual force was not used it was because there was no opposition. The master submitted to the orders of the administration. The result to the assured was the same as if force had been used." I think the decree of the 11th Sept. was in itself sufficient ground for the decision. There was a definite act of intervention by the State, it was an act done by a superior authority supported by the force of the State; it mattered not whether it was a legal or an illegal act, the captain was bound to obey the decree and therefore was acting under the restraint of the rulers of the country notwithstanding that no direct force was exerted. This case is an authority tending to support the plaintiffs' main contention, and in any event decides that direct force need not be used to constitute restraint: (see also Mansell v. Hoade, 20 Times L. Rep. 150, per Walton, J.). In the present case the plaintiffs contend that the declaration of war is an act of State which immediately and automatically forbade trading with the enemy and made the master, and all those who became responsible for the continuance of the voyage to the enemy country, amenable to the criminal law. The masters and owners of the vessels, being subjects of the King, were bound to conform to the law which sprang into operation at the moment we became engaged in war with Germany. The Royal Proclamation of the 5th Aug. did not make the law; it notified it to the public and warned them against breach of the law. Is the loss of the voyage by submission to the municipal law the direct consequence of the Act of State and therefore a loss by restraint of kings and princes? Such a loss of voyage is not, in my judgment, a loss by "ordinary judicial process." That phrase is used to denote proceedings in a court of law such as arose, for example, in Finlay v. Liverpool and Great Western Steamship Company (sup.), and rule 10 is so expressed as to give effect to the distinction drawn in that case between acts of intervention by a governing authority and acts under ordinary judicial process of the courts. I have no doubt that the state of war is a political or executive act, but for the plaintiffs to succeed the loss must be not only the consequence, but the direct consequence, of that act; in other words, the restraint must be the proximate cause of the loss.

For the defendants reliance was placed upon a line of cases of which Hadkinson v. Robinson (sup.) is the leading authority. That action was brought on a policy of insurance upon a cargo of pilchards at or from a port in Cornwall to Naples. After the vessel had proceeded on her voyage with the pilchards on board it was ascertained that the port of Naples was shut against all British ships. The vessel was sailing under convoy and was ordered by the commodore to make a port in Minorca, where she duly arrived and the cargo was sold. The plaintiff gave notice of abandonment and demanded payment for a total loss. The vessel could not have proceeded to the port of Naples without running the risk of confiscation by the Government of Naples. Lord Alvanley, C.J., delivering the judgment of the court, said: "It has appeared to me that where underwriters have insured against capture and restraint of princes, and the captain, learning that if he enter the port of his destination the vessel will be lost by confiscation, avoids that port, whereby the object of the voyage is defeated, such circumstances do not amount to a peril operating to the total destruction of the thing insured. . . . The doctrine" (that the assured might abandon in respect of a loss of voyage) "is only applicable to cases in which the loss is occasioned by a peril insured against; which, as it appears to me, must be a peril acting on a subject insured immediately, and not circuitously, as in the present case." This case was decided upon the principle that the peril insured against must be the proximate cause of the loss, and that if the master diverted the voyage or stayed in port to avoid coming under the operation of the peril, the vessel cannot have suffered loss by the peril: (see also Kacianoff v. China Traders' Insurance Company, sup.). A similar point arose before Lord Ellenborough in Lubbock v. Rowcroft (5 Esp. 49). This was an action on a policy of insurance on goods from London to Messina; the ship arrived at Minorca and then found that Messina was in the hands of or blockaded by the French. The plaintiffs claimed for a total loss. It is to be observed that in the statement of facts it is not clear whether Messina was only blockaded by the French or was temporarily in the occupation of the French. According to the argument of Erskine as reported, he distinguished occupation from blockade and contended that the French having taken Messina was a restraint by the enemies of the country, which created an incapacity in the ship to perform the voyage intended to be guarded by the policy. Lord Ellenborough said that the abandonment of the voyage "was from an apprehension of an enemy's capture, and not from any loss within the terms of the policy," and he added that "if such was allowed, every ship about to sail from the port of London for a port which had fallen into the hands of the French might be abandoned," just as Lord Alvanley said in Hadkinson v. Robinson (sup.) that if the plaintiffs had succeeded the same principle would have applied in case information had been received that the ship could not safely proceed to Naples. In reference to these cases Sir Robert Finlay called attention to the passage in the second edition of Arnould on Marine Insurance at p. 109. The learned author says: "In this country, however, it has been repeatedly decided, and must now be taken as clear insurance law, that neither interdiction of trade at the port of destination after the risk commenced, nor interception of the voyage by blockade, or by the imminent and palpable danger of capture or seizure, amount to a risk for which English underwriters are answerable under the common form of policy, either as an arrest, restraint, and detention, or in any way whatever. The principle on which these decisions rest, is the maxim Causa proxima non remota spectatur; the cause of loss must be a peril acting upon the subject insured, immediately and not circuitously, as is held to be the case where the loss arises from the ship's being prevented from completing her voyage by the impossibility of entering her port of destination without being captured": (see also Phillips on Marine Insurance, 4th edit., vol. 1, par. 1115, p. 667.

Sir Robert Finlay lays great stress not only upon the absence of judicial authority, but also upon the absence of any statement in either of these or any other text-books on marine insurance law to support the proposition affirmed by Bailhache, J. Mr. Roche in answer points to Miller v. Law Accident Insurance Company (sup.), and moreover comments on the absence of all authority against his contention. Certainly it is remarkable that the present should be the first case in which there is any record of the point having been taken or decided when one recalls the cases on marine insurance law which arose out of the Napoleonic and Crimean Wars, but these reflections do not by themselves assist one to arrive at a conclusion. So far as they have any value they tend in my view in favour of the underwriters, as it may be said that it is inconceivable, if the assured ever thought such a loss came within the perils insured against, that there should be no record of any attempt made to enforce the claim, and equally inconceivable that the underwriters should have submitted to such a claim without a decision of the courts to that effect. Nevertheless I think the decision of the Court of Appeal in Miller v. Law Accident Insurance Society (sup.) tends distinctly in favour of the plaintiffs and the principles of law for which they are contending. The principle of Hadkinson v. Robinson (sup.) was again discussed in the case of Miller v. Law Accident Insurance Company (sup.). It was there held that it did not apply in that case as the master went as far as he could towards the completion of the venture and only desisted when the Government intervened. That seems to me very close to the present case. Both the Orthia and St. Andrew were proceeding on the voyage and were compelled to abandon it because the Government intervened by the declaration of war. That act of the Sovereign was in itself, by the operation of the common law, a prohibition to trade with the enemy; the voyage to Germany immediately became illegal and if persisted in would doubtless have been prevented by force. Indeed, if the master had continued the voyage and loss had arisen the underwriters could have pleaded in answer to the claim on the policy that the loss was caused by his unlawful act. Hadkinson v. Robinson (sup.) differs from the present case in that the abandonment of the voyage because of the blockade or for fear of capture was a voluntary act of the master of the vessel. He elected not to run the risk of capture; the voyage had not become illegal. He could have proceeded on the voyage although it was fraught with danger, but he abstained from attempting to enter the blockaded port. In the present case simultaneously with the outbreak of hostilities the voyage became illegal and impossible of performance for a British subject in a British ship. The abandonment of the voyage was not a voluntary act on the master's part, there was no other course open to him in consequence of the war.

The defendants further contend that the restraint if any was an act of the British Executive and that such a restraint is not covered by the policy notwithstanding that the words are "restraints and detainments of all kings, princes, and people of what nation, condition, and quality soever." It is obvious that the language of the clause embraces the authoritative acts of British as well as all other Governments, and the natural and ordinary meaning of the words must prevail unless there is some custom or usage attributing special meaning to them. No such customary meaning is even suggested. The argument is that on the ground of public policy the court ought to read the clause as if it excepted acts of restraint by the British Government. I am at a loss to understand why an insurance against loss by acts of restraint by the British Government should necessarily be against public policy. I think the following passage in Phillips on Insurance, sect. 10, par. 1109, accurately expresses the law in this respect: "The policy extends to captures, arrests, and detentions by public enemies, by belligerents where the property insured is neutral, or by the Government of which the assured is a subject for any other cause than a violation of law." Lord Holt in Green v. Young (sup.) and Lord Alvanley in Tonting v. Hubbard (sup.) express opinions to this effect. Bailhache, J. in his judgment closely examines the authorities and I do not think I can usefully add anything to his observations. I agree with him that the point fails.

Lastly the defendants contend that there was no constructive total loss of the goods. The law before the passing of the Marine Insurance Act 1906 was well established that when goods were insured to be carried to their port of destination the owner of the goods could recover as for a total loss, if it became impossible to perform the voyage, that is, if there was a destruction of the contemplated adventure by reason of a peril insured against. The object of the policy is to obtain an indemnity for any loss that the assured may sustain by the goods being prevented by any of the perils insured against from arriving in safety at the port of their destination: (see Roux v. Salvador, 3 Bing. N. C., per Lord Abinger at p. 278). The total loss of the cargo may be effected by a total incapacity indefinitely prolonged in the ship to perform the voyage, for that is a loss of the voyage and therefore a destruction of the adventure: (per Lord Ellenborough in Barker v. Blakes, 9 East, 283; and Anderson v. Wallis, 2 M. & S. 240). In Rodoconachi v. Elliott (sup.), in the Exchequer Chamber, Bramwell B. says: "The result of this state of things undoubtedly was that the goods were prevented from leaving Paris, and that the whole adventure was broken up, and so continued at the time when the notice of abandonment was given and up to the commencement of the action. We are of opinion that this amounts to a constructive total loss of the goods by restraint of kings and princes within the terms of the policy. This is not a mere temporary retardation of the voyage, but the breaking up of the whole adventure. It is well established that there may be a loss of the goods by a loss of the voyage in which the goods are being transported, if it amounts, to use the words of Lord Ellenborough, 'to a destruction of the contemplated adventure.'" Has the law been changed in this respect by the Marine Insurance Act 1906? This statute is "an Act to codify the law relating to Marine Insurance," but by sect. 91, sub-sect. 2, "The rules of the common law, including the law merchant, save in so far as they are inconsistent with the express provisions of this Act, shall continue to apply to contracts of marine insurance." That the language of the statute has altered the theretofore prevailing law in some respects is shown by the decisions in Hall v. Hayman (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 158; 106 L. T. Rep. 142; (1912) 2 K. B. 5) and Polurrian Steamship Company v. Young (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 449; 109 L. T. Rep. 901), since affirmed by the Court of Appeal (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 59). By sect. 56, sub-sect. 1, "A loss may be either total or partial. Any loss other than a total loss, as hereinafter defined, is a partial loss." By sect. 56, sub-sect. 2, "A total loss may be either an actual total loss, or a constructive total loss." By sect. 56, sub-sect. 3, "Unless a different intention appears from the terms of the policy, an insurance against total loss includes a constructive, as well as an actual, total loss." What is an actual total loss? That is defined by sect. 57, sub-sect. 1: "Where the subject-matter insured is destroyed or so damaged as to cease to be a thing of the kind insured, or where the assured is irretrievably deprived thereof, there is an actual total loss." What is a constructive total loss? That is defined by sect. 60, sub-sect. 1: "Subject to any express provision in the policy, there is a constructive total loss where the subject-matter insured is reasonably abandoned on account of its actual total loss appearing to be unavoidable, or because it could not be preserved from actual total loss without an expenditure which would exceed its value when the expenditure had been incurred." Sub-sect. 2: "In particular there is a constructive total loss—(i.) Where the assured is deprived of the possession of his ship or goods by a peril insured against, and (a) it is unlikely that he can recover the ship or goods as the case may be, or (b) the costs of recovering the ship or goods as the case may be would exceed their value when recovered." In my opinion the definition is exhaustive, but it must be read, as indeed must every section of the statue, subject to sect. 91, sub-sect. 2. The law in my opinion before the passing of this Act was well settled that constructive total loss of the goods could be proved by establishing the destruction of the contemplated adventure. It is contended by the defendants that by this statute the Legislature has now abolished the distinction in this respect between a constructive total loss of a ship and a constructive total loss of goods, and has placed both on the same basis by enacting for both ships and goods the law hitherto prevailing only in respect of the ship, and has taken away the right of the owner of goods to claim for a total loss where there is a destruction of the adventure. "There is a constructive total loss when the subject-matter insured is reasonably abandoned on account of its actual total loss appearing to be unavoidable" are the words of the statute on which the decision must turn. The defendants say "subject-matter insured" is the goods and nothing but the goods, and cannot include the contemplated voyage of the goods. They point to the words of the policy: "And it is also agreed and declared that the subject-matter of this policy . . . shall be and is as follows—Upon linseed valued at 11,000*l.*" in the case of the Orthia, "Upon linseed and wheat valued at 33,800*l.*" in the case of the St. Andrew. But it is not only the goods that are the subject-matter of the insurance, but the goods on a voyage at and from ports in the River Plate to Hamburg. The insurance on the goods is a contract by the underwriters to indemnify the assured for any loss he may sustain by the goods not arriving in safety at their destination as an immediate consequence of a peril insured against. The term "subject-matter" occurs in many of the sections, but is nowhere defined. According to the common law which must still prevail unless inconsistent with the express provisions of the statute, the loss of the voyage was, in regard to goods, treated as a loss of the goods notwithstanding that they were in specie and even uninjured. The loss of the venture by a peril insured against was treated as conclusive evidence of the loss of the goods if the owner of the goods gave due notice of abandonment. I cannot find any provision in the statute which are inconsistent with this rule of the common law, and I come to the conclusion that the law as it existed before the Act of 1906 has not been altered in this respect by the statute. I am therefore of opinion that there was a constructive total loss of the goods.

In my opinion the judgment of Bailhache, J. is right and the appeal should be dismissed.

Swinfen Eady, L.J.—In July 1914 the plaintiffs shipped at Rosario, on the British steamship Orthia, for carriage to Hamburg, certain bags of linseed, which they had contracted to sell to German merchants delivered cost, freight, and insurance Hamburg. but the property in the goods had not passed. The plaintiffs insured the goods with the defendants for the sum of 11,000*l.* A state of war existed between Germany and Great Britain at and from 11 p.m. on the 4th Aug. 1914. On the 5th Aug. the owners of the steamship cabled to St. Vincent directing the Orthia to proceed to Glasgow; this cablegram was sent in consequence of a suggestion by the British Admiralty that the ship should be diverted to a British port. On the 7th Aug. the Orthia while on the voyage to Hamburg called at St. Vincent for bunker coal, became aware of the existence of a state of war, and received the owners' cable, and accordingly proceeded to Glasgow, where she arrived on the 30th Aug., and the owners discharged her cargo. On the 7th Sept. the plaintiffs gave to the defendants notice of abandonment of the goods to them as a total loss, and on the 9th Sept. the defendants refused to accept abandonment. Bailhache, J. decided that there was a loss due to a peril insured against, as its proximate cause, being covered by the words "arrests, restraints, and detainments of all kings, princes, and people of what nation, condition, or quality soever," and that such loss was a constructive total loss. The defendants appeal, and contend that there was not any loss due to any peril insured against, and in any case that there was not a constructive total loss.

The facts not being in dispute, the question is whether the occurrence of a state of war between this country and Germany, whereby the further continuance of the voyage to Hamburg of the Orthia became illegal, is a "restraint of kings, princes," &c., within the meaning of the policy. There was not in this case any actual interference with the ship or cargo. The owners themselves diverted the ship's course, and discharged her cargo, at Glasgow. Their possession and control of both ship and cargo were never actually disturbed. They were constrained to act as they did by the existence of the state of war; they were precluded by that alone from continuing the voyage to Hamburg, which had become illegal. Was the loss occasioned by the abandonment of the voyage, in consequence of the existence of a state of war, a loss by reason of one of the perils insured against? Does the fact that, after the commencement of a voyage, a state of war supervened which rendered the further prosecution of the voyage illegal, and therefore impossible, amount to a "restraint of kings, princes," &c., within the meaning of those words, as used in the policy of marine insurance in question? A policy of marine insurance must be construed like other instruments, and is not subject to any peculiar rules of construction. In Robertson v. French (1803, 4 East, 130, at p. 135) Lord Ellenborough, C.J., in delivering the judgment of the Court of King's Bench, thus stated the law: "In the course of the argument it seems to have been assumed that some peculiar rules of construction apply to the terms of a policy of assurance which are not equally applicable to the terms of other instruments and in all other cases. It is therefore proper to state upon this head that the same rule of construction which applies to all other instruments applies equally to this instrument of a policy of insurance—viz, that it is to be construed according to its sense and meaning, as collected in the first place from the terms used in it, which terms are themselves to be understood in their plain, ordinary, and popular sense, unless they have generally in respect to the subject-matter, as by the known usage of trade, or the like, acquired a peculiar sense, distinct from the popular sense of the same words; or unless the context evidently points out that they must in the particular instance, and in order to effectuate the immediate intention of the parties to that contract, be understood in some other special and peculiar sense." Bowen, L.J., when citing this passage in Hart v. Standard Marine Insurance Company (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 368; 60 L. T. Rep. 649; 22 Q. B. Div. 499), stated that he thought that no better exposition had been given of the broad rules of construction applicable to all commercial documents; and in the recent case in the House of Lords of Glynn v. Margetson and Co. (7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 148, 366; 69 L. T. Rep. 1; (1893) A. C. 351) Lord Halsbury referred to this judgment as stating the law with great precision. It is therefore necessary to consider whether the abandonment of the voyage in the present case was caused by an "arrest, restraint, or detainment," &c, within the plain and ordinary meaning of those words of the policy, or within some known and definite meaning which the usage of trade has attached to them, some special and peculiar sense distinct from the popular sense of the words, and to which effect must be given in order to effectuate the intention of both parties to the contract, and with reference to which both parties must be presumed to have contracted. The language used in a Lloyd's policy, which was introduced into England more than three centuries ago, is often not intelligible without the aid of usage and judicial decisions. The assured in the present case has been compelled to abandon a voyage which, although lawful at its commencement, had become unlawful by the common law of the country, owing to the occurrence of a state of war. By abandoning the voyage and altering the destination of the ship and cargo, the assured acted in obedience to the general law of the country, which forbids trading with the enemy. Although in this case he obeyed the law voluntarily, there lies behind the law the sanction of force, which compels obedience to it; but the force of any country which compels obedience to its ordinary municipal law is not a "restraint of kings, princes," &c, in the plain, ordinary, and popular sense of those words occurring in a marine policy to describe perils insured against. Each of the words used, "arrest," "restraint," "detainment," implies the presence of force; if not physically exerted (otherwise than by its mere presence), yet actually present, and ready to be immediately exerted, if obedience to the force is not yielded without its being exercised; as in Rodocanachi v. Elliott (sup.), where, although there was no actual seizure or arrest of the goods, the city in which the goods were (Paris) was besieged and completely invested, all commerce was stopped, and the goods were as effectually prevented from coming out as if they were actually seized by the German army. Similarly ships are "detained" by force in a blockaded port and "restrained" from coming out, where the port is completely invested, and the cordon of the blockading squadron sufficient to prevent any vessel from passing through it, although no ship is seized or arrested or in the actual possession of the blockading force. Lord Stowell defined a blockade as "a sort of circumvallation round a place, by which all foreign connection and correspondence is, as far as human force can effect it, to be entirely cut off": (The Vrouw Judith, 1 C. Rob. 150). But it is essential that this human force should be actually present. The words "arrest," "restraint," "detainment," all naturally imply the presence and exertion of force in the same sense, and I am not aware of any instance in which an event has been held by judicial decision to constitute an arrest, restraint, or detainment where no force has been used, unless it has been present, and ready to be immediately exercised, if obedience be not accorded without it being actually exerted.

In Goss v. Withers (2 Burr. 696) Lord Mansfield laid down that by the general law the assured may abandon in the case merely of an arrest or an embargo by a prince not an enemy; and in Rotch v. Edie (6 T. R. 413) that principle was applied to an embargo laid on by the Government of the country of the port of loading. But in these instances of arrest, restraint, or detainment force was present. In Finlay v. Liverpool and Great Western Steamship Company (sup.) the defendants pleaded, by way of answer to a claim for not delivering goods in accordance with the bill of lading, that they were prevented by "acts or restraints of princes," an exception contained in the bill of lading, and then set out in the plea that they had been sued in New York by the true owner of the goods, and had been ordered by a court of competent jurisdiction to give up the goods to him. This was adjudged a bad plea. Martin, B. said: "The 'acts and restraints of princes and rulers' mentioned and provided against in the bill of lading have reference to the forcible interference of a State or of the Government of a country taking possession of the goods manu forti, and do not extend to the legal proceedings which, it is alleged in the plea, afterwards took place in the courts at New York." In Rodocanachi v. Elliott (sup.) goods in transit from Marseilles to London had to pass through Paris, and on their way they came within the lines of the German army, by which Paris was then completely invested. This was held to constitute a restraint of princes. Bramwell, B., in delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, in the passage from which I have already quoted, says: "But it is said that there has been no loss of the goods by restraint of kings and princes in this case, because there has been no specific action on the goods themselves. It is true that there was no actual seizure or arrest of the goods, nor was there any specific or published order prohibiting the transport of goods from the besieged city; but the city in which the goods were was besieged and completely invested, all commerce was stopped, and the goods were as effectually prevented from coming out as if they were actually seized by the German army." This shows that the court was of opinion that the goods were, for all effective purposes, seized by the German army, and taken out of the control and disposition of the owners; they were in an area inclosed by German soldiers, and by them physically prevented from leaving that area. It was by the forcible and therefore by the violent act of the German army that the goods were prevented from reaching their destination. No other view of the facts in that case could have been taken, and having regard to that view, no other conclusion could be arrived at than that the plaintiffs had lost their goods by a restraint of princes: (see per Bigham, J. in Miller v. Law Accident Insurance Company, (1902) 2 K. B., at pp. 699, 700). In that case it was decided by Bigham, J. as a judge of first instance that the mere operation of an ordinary municipal law affecting or preventing the delivery of the insured goods at their destination is not a "restraint of princes or people" within the meaning of a Lloyd's policy of marine insurance, that the words of the policy do not cover the operation of the ordinary law of the land, but relate only to some violent departure from the ordinary course of things. On appeal (1903) 1 K. B. 712) the court took a different view, holding that what had actually taken place did amount to a "restraint of princes," Stirling, L.J. (at p. 719) stating that on the day following the arrival of the steamer Bellevue at Buenos Aires there was a decree of the President, which stated the arrival of cattle by that steamer, and decreed that the discharge of all cattle from the United Kingdom was stopped until further notice. "The captain accordingly took the ship outside the port, and, with the view to minimise the loss, transhipped the cattle into another vessel, and they were carried to Monte Video and there sold at a great loss. It seems to me that there was an active intervention of the Government of the Argentine Republic, which was none the less an exercise of superior force because no officer of the army or of the police force intervened." And Mathew, L.J. said: "If actual force was not used it was because there was no opposition. The master submitted to the orders of the administration." The case was thus dealt with as one of active intervention and restraint by a foreign Government under a special decree made after the arrival of the vessel in the port, the Government having there available the force to compel obedience to its orders if necessary. Stirling, L.J. points out that if the master, when about to enter the port, had been informed of the existence of a law restricting the right to land cattle, and that the Government were likely to put that law into force, and he had then gone on his voyage and not entered the port, the case would have been like Hadkinson v. Robinson (sup.) and similar authorities. That is to say, if the proceedings of the Government had been the same, but the shipowner had acted differently and not entered the port, there would have been no loss within the meaning of the policy. In Hadkinson v. Robinson (sup.) the insurance was on a cargo of pilchards at and from Mounts Bay to Naples. The vessel sailed under convoy. In the course of the voyage the master received notice that the port of Naples was absolutely closed to British ships by the Government in the kingdom of Naples, and she put into Minorca by order of the commodore of the convoy, where the cargo was sold. The merchant gave notice of abandonment, and claimed for a constructive total loss. It was argued on his behalf that it was impossible to contend that the ship was not as much prevented from proceeding to Naples by "the restraint of princes" as if she had been actually detained by the Government of an intermediate port, since she could not sail into Naples without rendering herself liable to immediate confiscation. The judgment of the Court of Common Pleas was delivered by Lord Alvanley, C.J., who said: "I think that the detention of the cargo on board the ship at a neutral port, in consequence of the danger of entering the port of destination, cannot create a total loss within the meaning of the policy, because it does not arise from a peril insured against. This is an insurance upon an article from England and Naples, warranted free from particular average. The plaintiff, therefore, cannot recover unless the article be totally lost by a peril within the policy; and such peril must, as I think, act directly and not collaterally upon the thing insured." Lubbock v. Rowcroft (sup.) was an action on a policy on goods London to Naples, Leghorn, or Messina, with liberty to touch at Gibraltar or any other port in the Mediterranean. When the ship arrived at Minorca it was found that Messina was in the hands of the French, and the merchant gave notice of abandonment and claimed as for a total loss. It was urged on his behalf that it was not merely a case of great probability of the ship being captured, but that the port was in the possession of the enemy, so that her capture was certain. Lord Ellenborough, however, said "that he still retained his first opinion, that the abandonment was from an apprehension of an enemy's capture; and not from any loss within the terms of the policy. That if such was allowed, every ship about to sail from the port of London for a port which had fallen into the hands of the French might be abandoned." The case afterwards went off on other grounds, but it shows that in the opinion of Lord Ellenborough the fact that if during the course of a voyage the port of destination became the port of an enemy the cargo did not thereupon become a constructive total loss. That indeed is the present case.

It is conceded that there is not any reported case, down to the present time, in which it has ever been determined that the mere occurrence of a state of war, rendering the further prosecution of a voyage to an enemy port illegal, and of which the master of the ship has notice, of itself occasions a loss by restraint of kings, princes, &c., although this is an event which in the course of English history must have happened many times. Nor is there any statement in any text-books of authority that such an occurrence is deemed to occasion a loss, as a restraint of kings, princes, &c., by the general usage or custom of merchants and underwriters. In my opinion the outbreak of war, whereby the further continuance of a voyage to a port, which has become an enemy port, has become impossible, is not an arrest, restraint, or detainment, either within the ordinary meaning of those words or within any meaning which the custom of merchants or the usages of trade have affixed to those words when used in a policy of marine insurance. If a contrary view were to prevail the further point would arise whether the assured could claim for a constructive total loss, although the actual possession and control of both ship and goods have not in any way been interfered with.

What is a "constructive total loss" is defined by the Marine Insurance Act 1906. By sect. 91, subsect. 2, the rules of the common law, including the law merchant, are to continue to apply to contracts of marine insurance, save in so far as they are inconsistent with the express provisions of the Act. There is, however, an express provision in sect. 56, sub-sect. 1, that "any loss other than a total loss, as hereinafter defined, is a partial loss." The definition of a total loss is therefore exhaustive, and any loss not coming within that definition is expressly declared to be a partial loss. The judge below proceeded on the ground that in the case of a marine policy on goods the insurance is on the venture, and the loss of the venture constitutes a constructive total loss of the goods. He added that this is not one of the instances of constructive total loss given in the Marine Insurance Act 1906, but he thought that it was still the law, and that the point was covered by Rodocanachi v. Elliott (sup.). The learned judge thus considers what the law was, apart from the Act, and decides that the Act has not altered the law in this respect. But this is not the true point of view from which to approach the construction of the statute. The canon of construction applicable to a codifying Act has been in several cases laid down in the following manner: "The proper course is in the first instance to examine the language of the statute, and to ask what is its natural meaning, uninfluenced by any considerations derived from the previous state of the law, and not to start with inquiring how the law previously stood, and then, assuming that it was probably intended to leave it unaltered, to see if the words of the enactment will bear an interpretation in conformity with this view": (Bank of England v. Vagliano Brothers, 64 L. T. Rep. 353; (1891) A. C. 107, per Lord Herschell at p. 144; Robinson v. Canadian Pacific Railway Company, 67 L. T. Rep. 505; (1892) A. C. 481; Bristol Tramways Company v. Fiat Motors Limited, 103 L. T. Rep. 443; (1910) 2 K. B. 831).

Now to apply this canon of construction to the statute. By sect. 56, sub-sect. 1, a loss is a partial loss unless it is a total loss "as hereinafter defined." By sect. 56, sub-sect. 2, "A total loss may be either an actual loss or a constructive loss." By sect. 57, sub-sect. 1, there is an actual total loss "where the subject-matter insured is destroyed, or so damaged as to cease to be a thing of the kind insured, or where the assured is irretrievably deprived thereof." It is not suggested in the present case that there was any actual total loss. By sect. 60 constructive total loss is defined. "There is a constructive total loss where the subject-matter insured is reasonably abandoned on account of its actual total loss appearing to be unavoidable." What is the "subject-matter insured" in the present case? The policy says "that the subject-matter of this policy . . . is . . . upon linseed valued at 11,000*l*." The linseed was not destroyed or damaged, nor was the assured irretrievably deprived of it, nor was it abandoned on account of its actual total loss appearing to be unavoidable. I agree with Bailhache, J. that there was not any constructive total loss as defined by the Act, but as in my opinion that definition is exhaustive, there was not any constructive total loss. It was contended that the subject-matter of the insurance was not the linseed, but the venture, and that the loss of the venture constituted a constructive total loss of the goods. But if "the subject-matter insured" was the venture, there was an actual total loss as defined by sect. 57, sub-sect. 1, because sect. 57, sect. 1, says: "Where the subject-matter insured"—I treat that as the venture—"is destroyed or so damaged," and so on, "there is an actual total loss." By sect. 23 of the Act, "A marine policy must specify" (inter alia) "(2) The subject-matter insured and the risk insured against; (3) The voyage, or period of time, or both as the case may be, covered by the insurance." Many other sections of the Act might be referred to, including sect. 60, sub-sect. 2, as showing that where there is an insurance on goods (as in the present case) the subject-matter mentioned in sect. 60, sub-sect. 1, means, as I hold that it does mean, the goods insured. It was urged that if this construction be right, the Act has altered the law on this point. This may be, but it is the duty of the court to give effect to plain and unambiguous language, notwithstanding that it may have altered the previous law. The statute has already been held to have altered the previous law, in favour of underwriters, in other respects: (see Hall v. Hayman, sup.; Polurrian Steamship Company v. Young, sup).

It follows that on both points the appellants are entitled in my opinion to succeed. Thus far I have dealt only with the steamship Orthia.

The steamship St. Andrew sailed from the River Plate with a cargo, mostly of wheat, for Hamburg, the property not having passed to the intended German buyers. On the 9th Aug. when approaching the Lizard, she was stopped and interrogated by a French cruiser. The cruiser signalled: "For security, go into Port Liverpool"; there was some error in the signal letters, as Port Liverpool is in Canada; the cruiser was told of the error, and then signalled: "Go into Falmouth, English Channel." On arriving at Falmouth, if not before, the captain learnt of the war between this country and Germany, and thus knew that the further prosecution of the voyage to Hamburg had become impossible. He was then instructed, through the examining officer at Falmouth, by the chief naval transport officer at Devonport to proceed to Liverpool, where the cargo was discharged. These circumstances do not enable me to draw any distinction between the two ships. The communication by the French cruiser was only a friendly act, a message for the ship's own protection, "for security," as the cruiser's captain said. That was not a hostile act, and was not an arrest, restraint, or detainment. On arrival of the ship at Falmouth, the voyage was no longer possible, and any instructions given by the transport officer did not affect that question. Liverpool was probably a much more convenient port of discharge than Falmouth.

The result is that the decision in the case of the steamship St. Andrew must be the same as the steamship Orthia.

In my judgment the appeal should be allowed.

Bray, J.—In this case the defendants appeal from the judgment of Bailhache, J., who held that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the full amount payable by the defendants under two policies of insurance, one in respect of a parcel of linseed and a parcel of wheat on board the steamship St. Andrew, and another in respect of a parcel of linseed on board the steamship Orthia, in each case as for a constructive total loss.

The facts were not in dispute and may be shortly stated thus: The plaintiffs are merchants in England and British subjects. They shipped in July 1914, on board the St. Andrew, a British ship, at two ports in South America, the parcel of linseed and the parcel of wheat under bills of lading dated the 3rd, 6th, and 11th July for carriage to Hamburg. The linseed had been sold by the plaintiffs to German merchants, but the property had not passed, and they intended to sell the wheat in Germany. In the same month, by bills of lading dated the 1st July, they had shipped at a port in South America the second parcel of linseed on board the Orthia, also a British ship, for carriage to Hamburg. This linseed had also been sold to German merchants, but the property had not passed. The parcels by the St. Andrew and the parcel by the Orthia had been insured with the defendants by two separate policies, each dated the 31st July. The perils insured against included "takings at sea, arrests, restraints, and detainments of all kings, princes, and people of what nation, condition, or quality soever," and on payment of an extra premium the usual f.c. and s. clause was deleted. In both cases they were free of particular average except in circumstances which did not arise, and the voyage was "at and from port or ports in River Plate to Hamburg with leave to call for orders at Las Palmas and (or) St. Vincent and (or)" elsewhere. War was declared by the British Government against Germany on the 4th Aug., and on the 5th Aug. the proclamation forbidding commercial intercourse with the enemy was published. On the 9th Aug., as the St. Andrew was approaching the Lizard, she received a signal from a French cruiser to stop instantly. She stopped and the cruiser came alongside and signalled to her to go into Falmouth, English Channel, emphasising such signal. In consequence of this she proceeded to Falmouth, when the captain was informed that there was war between England and Germany, and received orders through the "examining officer" from the chief naval transport officer at Devonport to proceed to Liverpool. In consequence of these orders she proceeded to Liverpool and there discharged the linseed and the wheat. But for the signals from the French cruiser the captain would have stopped at the next signal station and communicated with his owners, but if the weather had been foggy he would have proceeded direct to Hamburg. On calling at Las Palmas on his way to the Lizard the captain had learnt that there was war between France and Germany, but not that there was war between England and Germany. As regards the Orthia her owners on the 3rd Aug. received a telegram from the Admiralty in these words: "Admiralty suggests in the interests of the nation that your Orthia now bound for Hamburg with grain be directed to a British port. Any further information is available at Trade Branch, War Staff, Admiralty." On the 5th Aug. the owners, having become aware of the declaration of war and the proclamation, sent a cable to St. Vincent, which the captain received on the 7th, directing the Orthia to proceed to Glasgow, and in consequence the Orthia proceeded to Glasgow and there discharged. The linseed in each case depreciated to the extent of some 25 per cent. Due notice of abandonment was given to the defendants in each case, but was declined. The action was tried before Bailhache, J. without a jury, with the result I have already mentioned.

The points raised by the defendants on the appeal were these: (1) That a declaration of war by the British Government with its consequence, namely, that the further prosecution of the voyage became illegal, was not a restraint of princes. (2) That a restraint by the British Government, the owners of the goods and the ships being British subjects and the underwriters also, must be taken to be excepted from the perils insured against. (3) That the restraint, if any, was not the proximate cause of the loss. (4) That there was no constructive total loss.

The first point seems to me to be a very important and very difficult point. It may be divided into two heads: (a) That there was no political or executive act, and that it was merely the bringing into operation of the ordinary law. (b) That a restraint of princes must be by force, and there was no force. As to (a) the tenth rule in the schedule to the Marine Insurance Act is this: "The term 'arrests, &c., of kings, princes, and people' refers to political or executive acts, and does not include a loss caused by riot or by ordinary judicial process." A clear distinction is thus drawn between restraints caused by political or executive acts and a restraint caused by ordinary judicial process. Which is this? The restraint here is caused and brought into operation by the declaration of war. I think it is clear that a declaration of war is an act of State, a political act. In Esposito v. Bowden (sup.) Willes, J. said: "The force of a declaration of war is equal to that of an Act of Parliament prohibiting intercourse with the enemy except by the Queen's licence. As an act of State, done by virtue of the prerogative exclusively belonging to the Crown, such a declaration carries with it all the force of law." It is not true, in my opinion, to say that the restraint which forbids intercourse with the enemy is "ordinary judicial process." It is to be observed that the tenth rule does not use the words "ordinary law." It speaks of "ordinary judicial process," meaning the act of an ordinary court of justice in relation to the goods. This is in accordance with and is no doubt based on the judgment in Finlay v. Liverpool and Great Western Steamship Company (sup.). There is no ordinary judicial process here, or any process, nor could there be except in the event of the ship being brought into port by a British cruiser and the goods condemned in a Prize Court. But even then I do not think the powers of a Prize Court could be said to be "ordinary judicial process." The restraint which forbids intercourse with the enemy is neither judicial process nor ordinary judicial process. Ordinary judicial process and ordinary law involve no fortuitous act or event. A declaration of war does. It is not an ordinary event. It is exceptional and fortuitous. There is a violent departure from the ordinary course of events. It was asked what if there be no declaration of war, but a state of war without a declaration? There is still a political act. A state of war cannot exist without the act of the State either in commencing hostilities or in using the naval or military forces to resist acts of violence committed by the enemy. The above reasoning, however, only gets rid of the exception. It remains to be considered whether there is a restraint. I do not think there is to be found anywhere an exhaustive definition of this word though there are cases where certain acts have been decided to constitute a restraint, and other cases where acts have been held not to constitute a restraint. The word "restraint" appears in charter-parties and bills of lading as well as in policies of marine insurance, and it has been held to have the same meaning in all these documents. The decided cases are, of course, a help in arriving at the meaning of this word, but there is nothing in them to prevent one giving the ordinary meaning to this word. Now "restraint" is a word more properly applicable to persons than to goods. Lord Bramwell so held in giving the considered judgment of the court in Rodocanachi v. Elliott (sup.), where he said: "And as a verbal matter we may observe that 'restraint' is a word more properly applicable to persons than to goods, so that a restraint of goods means a restraint of those having the custody of goods." The word is used in the same way every day in these courts. An injunction is granted "restraining" the defendant from doing certain acts. This is of some importance because the effect of the declaration of war is to restrain persons, in this case the owners of the ships and the owners of the goods from prosecuting the voyage to Hamburg. It restrains and destroys the adventure. And it is a restraint of princes because it is a restraint imposed by or consequent upon an act of State. Restraint does not necessarily involve any actual seizure, nor actual physical force. This is clearly decided in charter-party and bills of lading cases. In Arnould on Marine Insurance, 9th edit., sect. 832, it is said: "A 'restraint' does not necessarily involve the use of actual physical force. An authoritative prohibition on the part of the governing power is sufficient." Reference is made to Miller v. Law Accident Insurance Company (sup.), which I shall deal with presently. The charter-party cases are Geipel v. Smith (sup.) and Nobel's Explosives v. Jenkins (1896) 2 Q. B. 326) In the latter case we find this passage: "It was said that the fear of seizure, however well founded, is not a restraint, and that something in the nature of a seizure was necessary. But this argument is disposed of by the cases of Geipel v. Smith (sup.) and Rodocanachi v. Elliott (sup.). I will deal with this further when I come to (b). It is to be observed further that the ordinary Lloyd's policy now contains, and has for some years contained, what is called the "f.c. and s. clause," which uses the words "and all consequences of hostilities or warlike operations whether before or after declaration of war." This affords some indication that but for these perils being excepted by this clause they would fall within the perils insured against. I do not place much reliance on this, but so far as it goes it throws some light not only on the words "restraint of princes," but on the very general and comprehensive words which follow. These general words are not without importance: (see the judgment of Mathew, L J. in Miller v. Law Accident Insurance Company, sup.). The defendants strongly relied on the fact that no such case as the present could be found in any of the decided cases. That is true, but on the other hand there is no suggestion to be found in the text books that such a case is not covered by the words "restraint of princes," and the definition of those words in the tenth rule in the schedule to the Marine Insurance Act does not exclude it unless it falls within the words "ordinary judicial process," which, in the opinion I have already expressed, do not include it. It is not unfair to look at it from the view of the ordinary business man, whether the owner of goods or the underwriter. Who would say that the owner of the goods was restrained from prosecuting this voyage by the operation of the ordinary law? The owner of the goods would say: "What did I pay the extra premium for? Was it not that I might be insured against all the perils excepted by the clause which I stipulated should be deleted? I anticipated a declaration of war and hostilities, and I wanted to be protected against the consequences of hostilities, and this is one of the consequences, so I had the f.c. and s. clause struck out." It is the absence of authority alone that makes me hesitate, but that in my opinion is not sufficient reason to justify me in refusing to construe the words "restraint of princes" in their ordinary signification, and so read I cannot hold that the restraint put upon the plaintiffs which prevented them from prosecuting the voyage is other than a restraint of princes.

I must, however, deal with the other contentions. I come, therefore to point (b), that a restraint of princes must be a restraint by force. I have already dealt partly with this point. Much reliance was placed on what was said by Martin, B. in Finlay v. Liverpool and Great Western Steamship Company (sup.). At most that was a dictum, and I think it is disposed of by what Mathew, L.J. said in Miller v. Law Accident Insurance Company (sup.) in his considered judgment. He said: "The words, it was contended, implied the use of direct force, and none had been employed. The case of Finlay v. Liverpool and Great Western Steamship Company (sup.), upon which reliance was placed by the defendants' counsel, affords no ground for this position, and no other satisfactory authority was referred to." Probably it may be necessary that the restraint should be capable of being enforced by force if necessary, but that consideration is fulfilled here, because if the owner or master had persisted in prosecuting the voyage, not only could the ship and goods have been confiscated, but the owner or master could have been prosecuted and sent to prison. In my opinion the proposition contended for by the defendants that restraint must be by force—that is to say, by direct force—is not established. It would certainly lead to a curious result here, because if the master had not submitted, but insisted upon the prosecution of the voyage, and the goods had been confiscated, the defendants could have contended, and in my opinion rightly contended, that the loss was caused by the illegal act of the master or owner. As regards the facts on this point, I think in the case of the St. Andrew there was some force. I I think it is to be inferred from the evidence that if the captain had not submitted to the orders of the French cruiser and the naval transport officer actual force would have been exercised. In the case of the Orthia, I do not think it can be said that any actual force was exercised, because the owners submitted, as they were bound to submit, to the law brought into operation by the declaration of war, but as I have expressed the opinion that force is not necessary, I draw no distinction between the two cases. I see nothing in this contention to make me alter my opinion that there was a restraint of princes.

I come now to the second point, that a restraint by the British Government is excepted. The words of the policy are "of all kings, princes, and people of what nation, condition, or quality soever." Why are these words to be limited? If the particular insurance is against the public policy of this country it is illegal and therefore not enforceable, not because there is a limitation to the words, but because it is illegal. There is very little, if any, anthority upon the point. What there is seems to me to be against the defendants' contention, but this point and the authorities on it are so clearly examined and dealt with by Bailhache, J. that it is sufficient for me to say that I agree entirely with his decision upon the point and the reasons he gives.

The next point is that if there was a restraint it was not the proximate cause of the loss. No doubt the plaintiffs have to show that it was the proximate cause. In support of their contention the defendants relied on a line of cases of which Hadkinson v. Robinson (sup.) is a type. In that case Lord Alvanley, C.J. said: "But it has appeared to me that where underwriters have insured against capture and restraint of princes and the captain learning that if he enters the port of destination the vessel will be lost by confiscation avoids that port, whereby the object of the voyage is defeated, such circumstances do not amount to a peril operating to the total destruction of the thing insured. . . . The plaintiffs therefore cannot recover unless the articles be totally lost by a peril within the policy, and such peril must, as I think, act directly and not collaterally upon the thing insured." I think this and the other cases are clearly distinguishable. The existence of a blockade does not make the continuation of a voyage illegal. The blockade may not be in force when the vessel arrives at the port, or it may be so ineffective as not to prevent a prudent captain from trying to enter the port. He is not breaking any law of his country in running the blockade. Here the restraint acted directly upon the owner the moment war had been declared. From that moment it was illegal for him to prosecute the voyage at all. It acted directly and not collaterally. I think the defendants' contention on this point also fails.

I will now deal with the last question, whether, if there be a loss from the perils insured against, there is a constructive total loss. This question divides itself into two: (a) Whether there would be a constructive total loss according to the law prevailing before the passing of the Marine Insurance Act 1906; (b) whether that law has been altered by that Act. The answer to the first seems to me to be quite clear. When war was declared it became illegal both for the cargo owner and the shipowner to prosecute the voyage to Hamburg. The arrival of the goods at Hamburg was postponed for a considerable and indefinite time. It was not a mere temporary retardation of the voyage. In my opinion the authorities up to the passing of the Marine Insurance Act show that in that case if due notice of abandonment be given the loss of the voyage constitutes a constructive total loss of the goods. It is unnecessary to refer to many of the authorities. In Barker v. Blakes (sup.) Lord Ellenborough laid down the law thus: "In order to entitle himself to recover as for a total loss the plaintiff must establish two things—First, that a loss of the voyage (the only description of loss which can be contended for in this case as the goods themselves have been ordered to be restored and are capable of being so) was occasioned by the detention in question. . . . And thinking, as we do, that the impossibility of prosecuting the voyage to the place of destination, which arose during and in consequence of the prolonged detention of the ship and cargo, may be properly considered as a loss of the voyage; and such loss of voyage, upon received principles of insurance law, is a total loss of the goods which were to have been transported in the course of such voyage; provided such loss had been followed by a sufficiently prompt and immediate notice of abandonment." In Anderson v. Wallis (2 M. & S. 240) Lord Ellenborough said: "In like manner a total loss of cargo may be effected not merely by the destruction of that cargo, but by a total permanent incapacity of the ship to perform the voyage. That is a destruction of the contemplated voyage." In Rodocanachi v. Elliott (reported in the court below) (sup.) Grove, J. says: "What greater loss can an assured sustain than the detention of the thing insured for a considerable and indefinite time by a hostile power?" And in the Exchequer Chamber Lord Bramwell, then Bramwell, B., in a considered judgment of the court of five judges, says: "It is well established that there may be a loss of the goods by a loss of the voyage in which the goods are being transported, if it amounts, to use the words of Lord Ellenborough, to a destruction of the contemplated adventure." In that case it appeared that the goods did ultimately and within six months arrive at their destination, and the purchaser accepted them and gave the full contract price, but it was held nevertheless that there had been a constructive total loss, and the plaintiff recovered on the footing that the loss was 15,000*l.*, the amount at which the goods were valued in the policy, although the price paid by the purchaser at their destination was under 10,000*l.* In Arnould on Marine Insurance, in the 1907 edition, after stating the law as laid down by Lord Ellenborough (see art. 1142), the author, in art. 1151, says: "So far the law may be considered as established." It appears therefore from the authorities I have quoted that according to the law merchant prevailing before the Act of 1906 if there was a loss the loss was a constructive total loss.

I now come to the consideration of the second question (b). Has that law been altered? Sect. 91, sub-sect. 2, of the Act provides that the rules of the common law, including the law merchant, save in so far as they are inconsistent with the express provisions of that Act, should continue to apply to contracts of marine insurance. Are the express provisions of the Act inconsistent with the law merchant so established? It seems almost impossible to suppose that it could have been intended to alter the law merchant on such a vital point of marine insurance when that law had been established for over a hundred years. Still we have to look at the Act, and if there be an express provision in clear and unambiguous terms altering that law effect must be given to it, but it must be an express provision which is inconsistent with the law merchant. Sect. 56, sub-sect. 1, provides that: "Any loss other than a total loss as hereinafter defined is a partial loss"; and sub-sect. 2: "A total loss may be either an actual total loss or a constructive total loss." Then sect. 60 defines what is to be considered a constructive total loss, and it must, I think, be taken as giving an exhaustive definition of a constructive total loss. If the present case does not fall within that definition I think it must be taken that the law has been altered. The words relied on by the plaintiffs are in sub-sect. 1 of sect. 60: "Subject to any express provision in the policy there is a constructive total loss where the subject-matter insured is reasonably abandoned on account of its actual total loss appearing to be unavoidable." That makes it necessary to see what is the "subject-matter" and what is an "actual total loss." Actual total loss is defined in sect. 57, sub-sect. 1: "Where the subject-matter insured is destroyed or so damaged as to cease to be a thing of the kind insured, or where the assured is irretrievably deprived thereof, there is an actual total loss." Having regard to the words in sect. 56, sub-sect. 1, "total loss as hereinafter defined," I think this must also be treated as an exhaustive definition. This brings us again to the consideration of the words "subject-matter insured." Now there is no express provision in the Act defining "subject-matter." It is referred to in many sections of the Act. Sect. 26 is, perhaps, the most important section to be considered, but that certainly contains no definition, and it contains no express provision inconsistent with the law as laid down by Lord Ellenborough, that a loss of the voyage upon received principles of law is considered as a total loss of the goods which were to have been transported in the course of such voyage, or, as Lord Bramwell put it, a destruction of the contemplated adventure. The subject-matter insured according to sect. 5 may be an adventure or property. It is not true that in a policy of this kind the goods only are insured. Their safe transportation to and arrival at the port of destination is also insured. It was argued that in this policy the subject-matter was stated to be goods. That is the common form, and apparently was the form of the policy in Rodocanachi v. Elliott (sup.), and yet it was held that it was an insurance of the venture. The word "subject-matter" occurs in many sections of the Act. It may be that in some the word is used as representing the property; but if it was intended in sect. 57 that subject-matter should mean property, and property only, why was not that word used? Two cases were referred to where the court held that the law was altered by the Act, Hall v. Hayman (sup) and Polurrian Steamship Company v. Young (sup.); but in both those cases the court relied on an express provision in the Act which they held to be clear and unambiguous. On the whole, after a careful consideration of the Act, I cannot come to the conclusion that there is any express provision inconsistent with the law on this point as it existed before the Act. I have dealt with this point by ascertaining first what was the law before the Act, but I should have arrived at the same conclusion if I had considered the construction of the Act first. The subject-matter, in my opinion, in this policy was not the goods only, but the whole venture, and the whole venture was destroyed. In my opinion, therefore, all the defendants' contentions fail and the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

DUNCAN FOX AND CO. v. SCHREMPFT AND BONKE. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Trading with the enemy—C.i.f. contract—Buyers and sellers carrying on business in England—Tender of documents after outbreak of war—Goods to deliver at Hamburg—Seller not entitled to force acceptance of documents involving trading with the enemy.

The claimants, who were English merchants of Liverpool, in May 1914 sold certain Chilian honey to the respondents, who were also English merchants at Liverpool, to be shipped on a German-owned steamer and delivered at Hamburg, terms c.i.f. cash in Liverpool against documents. The honey was shipped on the 28*th June and the shipment was declared on the* 28*th July; but the ship was interned at a neutral port shortly after the outbreak of war.*

On the 4*th Aug. war was declared with Germany, and on the* 5*th Aug. a proclamation was issued prohibiting trading with the enemy, and on the same day the shipping documents were tendered. The respondents having refused payment on the documents:*

Held, that the buyers were justified in refusing the tender of the documents on the ground that the delivery of the documents, including the bill of lading, which was the document of title to the goods, and the payment of the price by the buyers, would have been a carrying out of the contract, and a dealing with goods constituting a trading therein forbidden by the proclamation, and that the contract of sale had become dissolved by the war, because its further performance by either party would involve illegal acts.

Decision of Atkin, J. (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 591; 112 L. T. Rep. 298; (1915) 1 K. B. 365) affirmed.

APPEAL by the claimants, the sellers, from a decision of Atkin, J. on a special case stated by arbitrators.

The special case was as follows:—

Differences having arisen between Duncan Fox and Co. (hereinafter referred to as the claimants), who are an English firm of general merchants carrying on business at No. 31, James-street, Liverpool, and Schrempft and Bonke (hereinafter referred to as the respondents), who are an English firm of merchants carrying on business at the Old Hall, Old Hall-street, Liverpool, as to the liability of the respondents in respect of a claim made against them by the claimants under a contract of sale, dated the 11th May 1914, such differences were referred to two of us—namely, Frederick Pyemont Pyemont and Arthur Edward Pattinson—as arbitrators appointed by the claimants and respondents, respectively, on or before the 21st Aug. 1914, under clause 20 of the Conditions of Sale of the Liverpool General Brokers' Association Limited, which said clause is incorporated in the said contract; and we, the said Frederick Pyemont Pyemon and Arthur Edward Pattinson, on or before the said 21st Aug. 1914, under the powers conferred upon us by the said clause, called in the other of us—namely, Edmond Gladstone Brownbill, a member of the said association—as third arbitrator.

2. By contract of sale contained in two letters, both dated the 11th May 1914, the claimants sold to the respondents, through Messrs. Hale and Paterson, brokers, acting for both parties inter alia, "about 300 barrels June and (or) July shipment Chilian honey per steamer and (or) steamers direct or indirect, with or without transhipment, at 20*s.* 6*d.* per hundredweight, cost freight and insurance (f.p.a.) to Hamburg, delivered weights, tare, 12 per cent., no draft . . . Payment net cash in Liverpool in exchange for shipping documents on presentation of same and sellers to give buyers policy or policies of insurance covering 2 per cent. over the net invoice amount."

3. On or about the 28th June 1915 the claimants shipped on board the German steamship Menes at Penco 300 barrels of honey, and they received a bill of lading dated the 28th June 1914 for carriage of the said goods by the said steamship from Penco to Hamburg, there to be delivered to the claimants or their assigns. By art. 16 of the conditions indorsed on the said bill of lading it is provided that if the entering of any port should be considered unsafe by reason of war the master was to have an option of landing the goods at any port more or less near to the port of destination at the shipper's risk and expense. By art. 24 all questions arising under the bill of lading were to be governed by the law of the German Empire and to be decided in Hamburg. The said bill of lading is hereto annexed and marked B.

4. On the 28th July 1914 the said Hale and Paterson sent to the respondents a written notice which, omitting formal parts, was as follows: "Under date the 27th inst. and subject to correct transmission and translation of cable advice sellers declare shipment of 300 barrels honey per Menes (s.) in completion of contract dated the 11th May 1914, which kindly note." The said notice was received by the respondents on the 28th July 1914, or the day following.

5. On the evening of the 4th Aug. 1914 war was declared by Great Britain on Germany. On the 5th Aug. 1914 a Royal Proclamation relating to trading with the enemy was issued. By the said proclamation all persons resident, carrying on business, or being in the British dominions were warned not to supply to or obtain from the German Empire any goods, wares, or merchandise, or to supply to or to obtain the same from any person resident, carrying on business, or being therein, nor to supply to or obtain from any person any goods, wares, merchandise, for, or by way of transmission to or from the said empire, or to or from any person resident, carrying on business, or being therein, nor to trade in or carry any goods, wares, or merchandise destined for or coming from the said empire, or for or from any person resident carrying on business or being therein on pain of penalties.

6. On the same date (5th Aug.) the said Hale and Paterson received from the claimants a provisional invoice for the said goods, and on the same day the said Hale and Paterson sent the said provisional invoice to the respondents, with a covering letter of that date, which stated that the shipping documents for the parcel were ready and awaited the disposal of the respondents on the terms of said contract. The said letter and invoice were received by the respondents. No other tender of documents was made than is contained in the said letter. No question has been raised as to the sufficiency of the form of tender. We find as a fact that the respondents waived the necessity of any further or other tender.

7. The documents thus tendered included the said bill of lading and a policy of insurance on the said goods. No question has been raised with regard to any of the documents except the said bill of lading, and the respondents agree that the other documents are in order.

8. The respondents refused to accept the documents. On the 7th Aug. 1914 the respondents stated on the telephone to the said Hale and Paterson that they could not take up the documents as there was no valid bill of lading, and on the same day they wrote a letter to the said Hale and Paterson confirming the said statement. The said steamship Menes had not arrived at Hamburg at the date of the said tender of documents.

9. The claimants maintain that the documents tendered were in order and claim payment. The respondents maintain that in the circumstances hereinbefore stated the said bill of lading was not valid, and they also dispute their liability to pay against the documents so tendered on the ground that payment is not due until after the said goods shall have arrived and been weighed.

10. We have been asked by the parties to state our award in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court.

11. In addition to the foregoing facts we find that the said bill of lading was received by the claimants as agents for the respondents, and that the property in the said goods passed to the respondents at shipment. If we had not so found we should have been prepared to find that the property passed to the respondents on receipt by them of the said provisional invoice.

12. We find also that the expression "delivered weights" contained in the said contract has a well-known meaning in the trade in reference to contracts such as this, that it refers to the adjustment of the price and not to the time of payment, and that if on weighing the goods at the port of landing it be found that the invoice of the goods is incorrect, an adjustment of the purchase money is made if it has been already paid, and that this effect is to be given to the words "delivered weights" in the contract.

13. We find also that, by the custom of the trade, interest is payable at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum on the purchase price from the date of tender of documents until payment.

14. The following are the questions for the opinion of the court: (a) Whether in the circumstances hereinbefore stated the tender of the said bill of lading (with the other documents) was a good tender of documents under the said contract, and if the court should answer this question in the affirmative; (b) Whether the claimants were entitled to payment on tender of the documents.

Atkin, J. held that the buyers were justified in refusing the tender of the documents on the ground that if they accepted them they would be offending against the provisions of the proclamation of the 5th Aug., inasmuch as it would involve trading with the enemy.

The claimants appealed.

Maurice Hill, K.C. and Barrington Ward for the claimants.—A seller under a c.i.f. contract has (1) to ship at the port of shipment goods of the description contained in the contract; (2) to produce a contract of affreightment under which the goods will be delivered at the destination contemplated by the contract; (3) to arrange for an insurance upon the terms current in the trade which will be available for the benefit of the buyer; (4) to make out an invoice in the proper form; and (5) to tender these documents to the buyer so that he may know what freight he has to pay, and obtain delivery of the goods, if they arrive, or recover for their loss if they are lost on the voyage:

> Biddell Brothers v. E. Clemens Horst Company, 12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 1; 105 L. T. Rep. 563; (1911) 1 K. B., per Hamilton, J.

Here the claimants have complied with all these conditions. The position at the date of the making of the contract has alone to be regarded, for the seller cannot warrant that the goods shipped will reach the port of delivery, or that the contract of affreightment will continue valid until the cargo has reached port. When the goods are once put on board, the property and the risk pass to the buyer, and when the war broke out the property and the risk had passed. There is no illegality in carrying out the contract, and the enemy is unaffected by the contract. What is forbidden is engaging in trade with the enemy, but one British merchant is not forbidden to sell to another. The mere substitution of one British subject for another as the owner of goods is not trading with the enemy, nor was it any concern of the seller what the buyer would do with the goods, the seller's duty being merely to hand over the documents to the buyer. The tender of the bill of lading was good, even if it gave no remedy to the buyer. All the buyer got was a cause of action; and he can sue on the policy of insurance. They referred to Greer, K.C. and Greaves Lord for the respondents.—First, the contract of sale was dissolved, for further performance would have involved illegality under the proclamation and at common law. Secondly, even if it is assumed that the contract of sale is still binding, the sellers cannot complain, for they cannot tender an effective contract of carriage to which we are entitled. They have given us no effective rights by which we can compel the ship to go to its destination. By reason of the proclamation it became illegal to do the acts remaining to be done under the contract. The contract of affreightment is no longer alive, and any loss must lie where it falls. By the contract of sale the buyers got nothing, for there were still acts to be done which would probably involve trading with the enemy. The object of the proclamation was to prevent goods getting into Germany. It is immaterial whether the completion of the contract between sellers and buyers is of advantage to the enemy; what is forbidden is the passing of the property in goods destined for the enemy. Even if the sale is good, we were not tendered a good document, and the decision of Scrutton, J. in Arnhold Karberg and Co. v. Blythe, Green, Jourdain, and Co. (sup.) was right.

Barrington Ward in reply.

June 15.—SWINFEN EADY, L.J.—This is an appeal from a judgment of Atkin, J. upon a special case stated by arbitrators.

Messrs. Duncan Fox and Co. are referred to as the claimants; they were the sellers under the contract in question, and Messrs. Schrempft and Bonke were the buyers. Both firms consist of British subjects.

The contract upon which the disputes have arisen was dated the 11th May 1914, and made at Liverpool through brokers acting for the parties, whereby the sellers sold and the purchasers purchased "about 300 barrels May shipment" —we have nothing to do with that—"about 300 barrels June and (or) July shipment New Crop Chillian Honey per steamer and (or) steamers direct or indirect, with or without transhipment, at 20*s.* 6*d.* per cwt. cost freight and insurance f.p.a. to Hamburg, delivered weights, tare 12 per cent., no draft. Cost of landing and weighing to be borne by buyers." Then there is a provision with regard to the quality: "Payment net cash in Liverpool in exchange for shipping documents on presentation of same, and sellers to give buyers policy or policies of insurance covering 2 per cent. over the net invoice amount. Force majeure clause." Then there is this provision: "All disputes on this contract to be settled by arbitration in Liverpool per the rules of the Liverpool General Brokers' Association Limited."

The goods in question were shipped on the West Coast, Chili, by a ship called the Menes, of the Cosmos Line, which was a German line of steamers, under a bill of lading which is set out in the special case. It was a shipment of these goods to Hamburg, freight was payable on the weight delivered, and the charges for weighing were to be paid by the consignees. The bill of lading provided for the freight being paid immediately on arrival of the steamer, without any allowance of credit or discount, in Hamburg at the quoted highest rate of exchange for sight bills on London on the day of ship's entry at custom house. Then the bill of lading provided in the last condition: It is mutually agreed that all questions arising under this bill of lading are to be governed by the law of the German Empire and to be decided in Hamburg." It is under that bill of lading that the honey in question was shipped on the good ship Menes, of the Cosmos Line.

On the 28th July the sellers gave notice to the buyers of appropriation of this consignment to meet this contract. On the 4th Aug. 1914 war was declared between Great Britain and Germany. On the 5th Aug. there was a communication that the shipping documents had arrived in this country, and were at the disposal of the buyers in exchange for the cash. That communication was received by letter by the buyers on the 5th Aug. They considered the matter until the 7th, and on the 7th they raised an objection, and declined to proceed further with the contract, and declined to pay against the delivery of the shipping documents. Both on the 5th and 7th Aug., for anything that we know, the ship was in some position in the South Atlantic. We were told that ultimately she arrived at Las Palmas, a neutral port, and put in there as a port of refuge, and that she is there still, but as regards the position at the material date, whether it was the 5th or 7th Aug., so far as there is any information before us, this German ship was on the high seas somewhere between the port of loading, the port from which she sailed, and Las Palmas where she ultimately put in as a port of refuge.

The first objection is as to the buyers refusing to pay, and is this: that the terms of the contract of the 11th May, if they were carried out, would involve illegal acts on the part of the buyers or sellers, or both of them, and treating the contract of the 11th May, as we must do, as being in existence for the purpose of determining what the position of the respective parties would have been thereunder, we must see what the position was. It appears to me to be obvious that the goods were at this date on the high seas and destined for the German Empire. They had been shipped in a German ship under a bill of lading which was their contract of affreightment to carry the goods to Hamburg, and at this time they were destined for Hamburg. By the proclamation of the 5th Aug., British subjects are warned, amongst other things, "not to supply to or obtain from any person any goods, wares, or merchandise for or by way of transmission to the German Empire," and they are further warned "not to trade in any goods, wares, or merchandise destined for the said empire." It is clear that, apart from the contract of affreightment becoming dissolved or determined by the outbreak of war, these goods were goods which were then being in course of transmission to the German Empire, and dealing in the goods involved "trading in goods, wares, or merchandise destined for the said empire."

It was conceded by Mr. Maurice Hill that this contract of the 11th May, having regard to its nature and contents, could not have been lawfully entered into after the outbreak of war. I think that was properly conceded, and in my opinion it was incompetent to either of the parties to proceed to carry out this contract after the outbreak of war, because it involved trading with the German Empire, and it involved a breach of the terms of the proclamation. There is a statement in the special case to which our attention was drawn, that the arbitrators found that the property in the goods had already passed, that is to say, they found first that the property in the goods passed to the buyers on shipment, and if not so, they found or would have been prepared to find that the property passed to the buyers on receipt by them of the provisional invoice; but those points were not pressed by Mr. Hill, and he conceded for the purpose of the case that the property in the goods would not pass in this case until the delivery of the endorsed bill of lading. That being so, the further carrying out of the contract after the outbreak of war, that is, the delivery of the documents, including the bill of lading, which is the document of title to the goods and the payment of the price by the buyers, would have been a carrying out of the contract, and a dealing with the goods constituting a trading therein, which is forbidden by the proclamation and in my opinion this contract of sale of the 11th May, the c.i.f. contract, had become dissolved by the outbreak of the war, because the further performance of it by the buyers or sellers involved or would involve illegal acts.

There is a further point which was raised. and which no doubt is of general importance, but it would perhaps not be right to deal with the second point because the first point is sufficient to dispose of this case. The first point was the ground upon which the case was decided by Atkin, J. in the court below, and it really is sufficient to dispose of the appeal without considering the numerous other points which have been raised during the appeal.

In my opinion, on that short ground, the appeal fails and should be dismissed, and the judgment below was right and now stands affirmed.

PHILLIMORE, L.J.—I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

If we look at the contract of the 11th May, the further performance of that contract became impossible on the 4th Aug., and, if we look at it in that way simply, the vendors could not here insist upon the purchasers taking any further steps towards continuing the contract. If we look at it in another way, and accept the position which I am quite prepared to accept, that in a c.i.f. contract the vendor fulfils his obligations when he has secured the cargo of the ship and has handed over the property in the shipping documents, we only remove the difficulty one stage, because this ship being destined for a port in the German Empire, the documents which he tenders are documents which only get their fulfilment if the ship proceeds to a port in the German Empire. Therefore, in either way, the further performance of the contract becomes impossible as being forbidden by the proclamation of the 5th Aug., which has statutory force, and which may or may not add to the common law in regard to these matters.

This leaves unanswered the second question which would arise if this cargo, being on a German ship, was for a neutral destination. I am not particularly anxious to rest this case upon one point only, and in some ways I should have liked the court to have dealt with the second point also, but the first point, which is the broad reason on which Atkin, J. proceeded, is quite sufficient for the support of his decision, and it may be wise to let the other matter wait till it is necessarily brought before us in some future case.

This contract, whether it be considered simply as a contract for the sale of honey to be delivered at Hamburg, or a contract for the sale of honey to be delivered at Hamburg to be performed by transferring documents which would involve delivery at Hamburg, in either case involves a breach of the proclamation of the 5th Aug., and upon that ground I think that the buyers were right in refusing to proceed further with the matter, and were entitled to resist taking delivery of the documents, and therefore I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

BANKES, L.J.—I agree.

The matter comes before us in the following way: The parties entered into a contract of the 11th May 1914 for the purchase and sale of a certain quantity of honey under a c.i.f. contract, under which the honey was deliverable at Hamburg. War was declared between this country and Germany on the 4th Aug. 1914. On the 5th Aug. the shipping documents were tendered by the sellers to the purchasers, and on the 7th Aug. the purchasers refused to take up the documents or to pay the purchase price. Under those circumstances the parties went to arbitration, the dispute being whether the purchasers were under an obligation to take up the documents and to pay the price.

The matter came before Atkin, J., and two points were urged before him. First of all, that under a c.i.f. contract the sellers' only duty was to procure the necessary shipping documents, the bill of lading, and the policy, and, if those documents were valid and good documents at the time that they were procured, the sellers were entitled to tender them to the purchasers, and the purchasers were bound to accept them even though something eventually intervened which rendered the contract unenforceable, and an interesting argument was addressed to us upon that point. But Atkin, J. did not consider it necessary to decide that point, and it appears to me that it is not necessary for us to decide it, having regard to the view of the court upon the other point.

The other point was that, owing to the declaration of war, it became an illegal act to do anything in further performance of this contract of the 11th May, and Atkin, J. so decided, and I think his decision was right, and on this short ground: The contract was a contract for the delivery of these goods at Hamburg, and, so long as that was a subsisting contract, it seems to me that it cannot be denied that it was a contract for a trading in goods destined for the enemy—that is to say, for trading in goods destined for the enemy in respect of any portion of that contract which was unfulfilled at the date of the declaration of war. It is because it was a contract for that time that, so far as it was unfulfilled on the 4th Aug., it became impossible of performance, and whether you say that it became impossible to perform or that it was discharged or that it was dissolved seems to me immaterial. The fact is that neither party could call upon the other to perform any act under that contract after the declaration of war. What acts were there which had to be performed under the contract? There was the tender of documents and the payment of the price, and it seems to me immaterial whether the buyers had called upon the sellers to tender the documents or whether the sellers had called upon the buyers to pay for the goods. In either case the one was entitled to say to the other: "At the moment that you are requiring me to do this act, the further performance of this contract has become impossible, and I am no longer under a legal obligation to perform the acts which you call upon me to do."

On those grounds it seems to me that Atkin, J.'s judgment was right, and that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

(Before SCRUTTON, J.)

THAMES AND MERSEY MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY LIMITED v. BRITISH AND CHILIAN STEAMSHIP COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

Marine insurance—Policy—Valued policy—Total loss—Subrogation.

A ship was insured for an agreed value of 45,000*l. She was sunk in collision. The underwriters paid as for a total loss.*

In a collision action both ships were held to blame.

The owners of the insured ship were held to be entitled to recover five-twelfths of their loss, the other ship recovering the remaining seven-twelfths. The value of the insured ship was taken at its actual value at the time of the loss, and the shipowners were paid five-twelfths of that value—namely, 65,000*l. The underwriters claimed to be subrogated to the rights of the assured in respect of the sum recovered.*

Held, that as the amount recovered by the assured did not exceed the amount paid by the underwriters, the latter were entitled to recover from the assured the whole of the amount recovered by the assured in the collision action, in spite of the fact that it was based upon a value higher than the agreed value.

COMMERCIAL COURT.

Action tried by Scrutton, J.

The plaintiffs' claim was for a sum of money which they alleged was due to them by virtue of a right of subrogation to the defendants in respect of what the defendants had received in respect of the loss of a vessel.

The facts and arguments are sufficiently stated in the judgment.

SCRUTTON, J. delivered the following written judgment:—The Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company, whom I will call "the underwriters," sue the British and Chilian Steamship Company, whom I will call "the shipowners," for a small sum of money under the following circumstances:—

By a policy dated the 6th June 1912 the underwriters insured to the extent of 1800*l.* the shipowners' ship Helvetia, valued at 45,000*l.*, against the ordinary sea perils, with the ordinary running down clause against sums the shipowners became liable to pay by reason of collision. Other underwriters insured the rest of the 45,000*l.*, so that the insured value was wholly covered by insurance. During the currency of the policy, the Helvetia came into collision with the Empress of Britain, and was totally lost.

The consequent collision action was, as is somewhat unusual, fought by the shipowners and not by their underwriters. Both ships were held to blame, and the blame was apportioned, the owners of the Helvetia having to pay seven-twelfths of the damage, and the owners of the Empress af Britain five-twelfths of the damage. The next thing was to assess the value of the shipowners' loss. The Helvetia was at the time of the collision under a charter dated the 17th Nov. 1909, commencing in the spring of 1911, to run through seven consecutive St. Lawrence seasons, which would expire in the autumn of 1917. The shipowners claimed 75,000*l.* as the value of their ship and 24,320*l.* as the value of the charter.

The registrar, purporting to follow the decision in The Racine (95 L. T. Rep. 597; 10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 300; (1906) P. 273), took the value of the ship as at the 15th Nov. 1912, the end of the current season, and fixed it at 65,000*l.* He took the loss of hire up to the same date and assessed it at 2000*l.* The shipowners appealed, and the President held that on the true construction of the judgments in The Racine the value of the ship should be taken in Nov. 1917 and the hire assessed to that date, and remitted the report to the registrar for reconsideration of the figures on that basis.

When the parties came before the registrar they compromised and agreed on a lump sum of 67,000*l.* for the two items under consideration, being the same total as the registrar had awarded, without apportioning it. The owners of the Empress of Britain had, indeed, no interest in apportionment; the shipowners, who were under-insured as to ship and uninsured as to freight, may have thought the apportionment would affect their insurance prospects, or they may have thought nothing about it. Five-twelfths of 67,000*l.* was accordingly paid, being 26,000*l.* odd.

The underwriters, who had paid for a total loss of the ship Helvetia, then claimed to be subrogated to the payment received for the loss of that ship from the Empress of Britain. The shipowners replied that this payment was based on a value not the insured value, and that the underwriters could only recover five-twelfths of the insured value (45,000*l*), which, when set off against the sums due from the underwriters under the running-down clause, left nothing payable. The question, which involves difficult problems both of law and fact, therefore was: On what principles and to what sums were the underwriters entitled to claim subrogation?

The subject of the relation of an agreed insured value to claims for sums fixed on the basis of another value gives rise to considerable difficulties, and has been the subject of several decisions. In all the disputes each side vehemently accuses the other of seeking to reopen the value in the policy. In settling whether a vessel is a constructive total loss, in the absence of special provision only the real value is looked at, while when the vessel is found to be a constructive total loss only the insured and agreed value is paid.

In Balmoral Steamship Company v. Marten (87 L. T. Rep. 247; 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 321; (1902) App. Cas., p. 511), under a policy on ship valued at 33,000*l.*, claims for general average and salvage based on a value of 40,000*l.* were made on underwriters. The House of Lords held, partly on evidence of a rule of adjustment of British adjusters, partly on principle, that the underwriters were only liable to pay thirty-three-fortieths of these claims, giving rough effect to the valuation of 33,000*l.* as between shipowners and underwriters.

In The Commonwealth (97 L. T. Rep. 625; 10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 538; (1907) P. 216) underwriters had insured a schooner valued at 1350*l.* for 1000*l.* She was sunk, and in the collision action the wrongdoer was held liable to pay her value, assessed in that action at 1000*l.* The underwriters, who had paid their 1000*l.* for a total loss, claimed to be subrogated to the 1000*l.* paid, but the Court of Appeal held that the 1000*l.* paid by the wrongdoer was in respect of the whole interest in the ship, which was in the policy valued at 1350*l.*, of which 1000*l.* was at the risk of the underwriters and 350*l.* uninsured at the risk of the owners, and that the 1000*l.* salvage must therefore be divided among underwriters and owners in the proportions of 1000*l.* and 350*l.* respectively, thus dealing with the whole agreed value and no more. Here part of the insured value was not covered by insurance; in the present case the whole of the insured value is covered by insurance.

Lastly, in North of England Steamship Insurance Association v. Armstrong (21 L. T. Rep. 822; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 244), in 1870, underwriters insured the Hetton, valued at 6000*l.*, for the whole amount. The Hetton was sunk by the Uhlenhirst, and in the collision action the value of the Hetton was proved to be 9000*l.* The Uhlenhirst limited her liability, and only paid some 5500*l.* for damage to ship, freight, and cargo.

The underwriters claimed the part of the 5500*l.* which represented ship; the shipowners alleged that the underwriters were only entitled to two-thirds of it, the shipowners being treated as uninsured in respect of 3000*l.*, the difference between the collision value of 9000*l.* and the insured value of 6000*l.* and the 5500*l.* being distributed between the 6000*l.* and the 3000*l.* in the same proportions.

The Court of Queen's Bench rejected this contention, holding that it was not open to the shipowners, who had agreed that the insured value was 6000*l.*, to allege the real value was 9000*l.* Some expressions in the judgment suggest that the underwriters, who had only paid 6000*l.*, might have recovered the whole 9000*l.* if paid. They have been the subject of much criticism, and may be contrary to the principle that subrogation is to give an indemnity only, as expressed in Castellain v. Preston (49 L. T. Rep. 29; L. Rep. 11 Q. B. 380); they may result from failure to distinguish between abandonment and subrogation. But they were not necessary to the decision.

The decision itself is to the effect that an underwriter who has paid a total loss is not prevented from recovering up to the extent of his payment sums received by the shipowner in respect of the subject-matter insured by the fact that those sums are based upon, or part of, a larger sum fixed by reference to a value other than the insured value, where no part of that insured value is at the risk of the shipowner. In other words, under Armstrong's case, one underwriter of the Helvetia for 45,000*l.* on ship valued at 45,000*l.*, on payment of a total loss, would recover at any rate up to 45,000*l.*, sums received from the wrongdoing ship, though based on and part of a collision value of 65,000*l.*

If so, it appears to me to make no difference under Armstrong's case that instead of receiving the whole collision loss of 65,000*l.* he only receives half, 32,500*l.*, or five-twelfths. He has received a sum in respect of the subject-matter insured less than the underwriter's payment and is not allowed to say that it is based on a value of the subject-matter different from that agreed in the policy. He will have to hand over not five-twelfths of the insured value, but the sum he has received in respect of the subject-matter insured being less than the insured value which the underwriter has paid.

This appears to me to be the logical result of Armstrong's case, and, though it is possible that the principles on which it is based are not easy to reconcile with those on which the House of Lords decided the case of the Balmoral, the Law Lords do not mention in their judgments, still less disapprove of, Armstrong's case, although it was cited to them.

I am therefore, as a judge of first instance, bound by it, and in my view it compels me to hold that the underwriters here are entitled to recover to the extent to which they have paid in respect of the subject-matter insured any sum which the shipowners have received as a right in respect of the loss of the same subject-matter, though that sum is based on a larger value than the insured value. This result seems to me to be expressed in sect. 79 of the Marine Insurance Act. The underwriter here is asking to have all the right and remedy of the assured in respect of the subject-matter, not part of it.

The next question is, what sum have the shipowners received as a right in respect of the subject-matter insured? Now the shipowner in the collision action received a sum based on 67,000*l.* in respect of ship and the value given to the ship by the charter. It is by his doing that these two heads of damage have been mixed up so that it is not easy to apportion them, and I am not sure that it is not an answer to say that as he has mixed them up the whole sum must be taken against him as the value of the ship.

But the registrar, if he had separated the 67,000*l.*, would under the President's judgment have had to divide it into the value of the ship in Nov. 1917—five years after the collision—and the value of the charter from 1912 to 1917. I am unable to see what the underwriter has to do with this. His insurance of ship is from the 20th May 1912 to the 20th May 1913; if he had no valuation the subject-matter to be valued under sect. 16 of the Act is the value at the commencement of the risk of the ship, including outfit, stores, disbursements, and insurance.

It is this subject-matter that is valued by the policy. The open policy on freight for a year under the same section would be the gross amount of freight at risk, plus insurance. The value of the ship in 1917 would have nothing to do with such a policy on ship; the value of the net freight under a five years' charter would have nothing to do with such a policy on freight. But the addition of the two sums, ship and freight, by either method of calculation, is supposed to represent the value of ship and freight at the time of the loss. Taking, then, 67,000*l.* as representing the value of ship and freight at the time of the loss, the shipowner gave evidence that the value of the ship without engagements at the time of the loss was 75,000*l.*, but with the charter was 60,000*l.*—in other words, that the charter was detrimental to the value of the ship, and did not increase it.

Forming my own judgment, I fix 65,000*l.* as the value of the subject-matter insured at the time of the loss. In respect of that subject-matter the underwriter has paid a total loss, agreed at 45,000*l.* In respect of that subject-matter the assured has received at least 26,900*l.* The underwriter is entitled to be subrogated to that amount, which is less than the sum he has paid, and, after giving credit for the sum due from him under the running-down clause, to recover his proportion of the excess, which I understand on this basis is admitted to be 289*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.*, and I give judgment for him for that amount, with costs.

(Before Earl LOREBURN, Lords PARKER OF WADDINGTON, SUMNER, PARMOOR, and WRENBURY.)

PARKER v. OWNERS OF SHIP BLACK ROCK. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Employer and workman—Compensation—"Accident arising out of and in the course of the employment"—No agreement by master to provide food in articles—Seaman returning to ship at night after purchasing food on shore—Workmen's Compensation Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 58) s. 1, sub-s. 1.

A fireman of a coasting vessel went ashore, with leave, to buy provisions for himself. The night was rough and dark, and while he was on shore the ship was moved away from steps by the pier to another part of the harbour. While endeavouring to return to the ship in the evening, he got to the steps by the pier, and nothing more was known except that his body was found washed up on the beach at a place where, had he fallen into the sea off the steps, it probably would have been taken by the tide. His contract of service was contained in a printed document issued by the Board of Trade, but the Board of Trade scale of provisions was struck out, and the words "Crew to provide their own provisions" substituted.

Held, that the accident did not arise out of his employment, as there was no contractual obligation on the deceased to go ashore to buy provisions, and that in going ashore he was not absent from the ship in pursuance of any duty owed to his employer, and in the absence of such duty no liability would arise under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (31 C. C. C. Rep. 455; 110 L. T. Rep. 520; (1914) 2 K. B. 39) affirmed.

(a) Reported by W. E. REID, Esq., Barrister at Law.

APPEAL by the widow of a fireman from an order of the majority of the Court of Appeal (Lord Cozens-Hardy, M.R. and Eve, J., Evans, P. dissentiente), affirming an award of His Honour Judge A. P. Thomas sitting as arbitrator under the Workmen's Compensation Act 1906 at the County Court, Liverpool.

The appellant, who was the widow of Christopher Parker, a fireman on board the respondents' coasting steamer Black Rock, claimed compensation in respect of her husband's death.

On the 7th Jan. 1913 Parker signed an agreement for a round coasting voyage in the Black Rock. The contract of service was contained in a printed document issued by the Board of Trade, but before Parker signed it the scale of provisions required by sect. 25 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1906 to be served out to the crew during the voyage (where the crew do not furnish their own provisions) was struck out and in lieu thereof were inserted in writing the words: "Crew to provide their own provisions."

On the 14th Jan. 1913 the Black Rock was moored alongside the North Pier at Newlyn. Parker went ashore in the afternoon with another man for the purpose of buying provisions for himself for the ensuing voyage. His going ashore for this purpose was with the knowledge and tacit consent of his employers. There was an entry in the ship's log-book that Parker and his companion had gone ashore to buy provisions, and the evidence was that they had purchased articles to the value of 7*s.* after having drinks together. The night of the 14th Jan. 1913 was dark and rainy, and a gale was blowing. The wind and rain would have been almost directly in the face of anyone walking down to the pierhead, which was badly lighted.

During the time that Parker was ashore the vessel had been moved from the North to the South Pier, but this fact could not have been known to him. After parting with his companion, nothing more was known about Parker's movements until the next day, when his body was found on the shore at a place where it was likely to have been washed up had the man fallen off the pierhead into the water.

The widow in these circumstances claimed compensation on the ground that at the time of the accident the deceased was fulfilling the duty he owed his employers to go ashore for the purchase of provisions, and therefore was on ship's business when the accident happened to him.

The County Court judge inferred from such facts as could be proved that Parker met with an accident while endeavouring to return to the ship after buying provisions, but thought that he was precluded by Mitchell v. Owners of Steamship Saxon (1912, 5 B. W. C. C. 623) from holding that the accident arose out of the deceased's employment, and therefore made his award in favour of the employers.

The Court of Appeal (Evans, P. dissenting) affirmed the award.

The widow appealed to this House in formâ pauperis.

Howard Jones and Elliot Gorst for the appellant.—The question is whether the deceased met with his death by accident arising out of his employment. The County Court judge answered that question in the negative because he felt himself bound to do so by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Mitchell v. Owners of Steamship Saxon (1912, 5 B. W. C. C. 623). But that case is not conclusive against the appellant, because the point in this case was not present to the mind of the court when considering Mitchell's case. Here the Court of Appeal has to decide the scope of the duty Parker owed his employer to go ashore to buy provisions as defined by words in the articles of contract: "Crew to provide their own provisions." This point was not suggested in the County Court, and objection was taken against it being raised by the respondents in the Court of Appeal. In the County Court only secondary evidence could be given of the terms of the articles, but in the Court of Appeal the articles themselves were produced and were admitted in evidence. Although the articles carried the question no farther than the parol evidence of the document did, it is submitted that the objection taken should have been sustained by the court. But, at any rate, before the accident happened, Parker had returned within the ambit of his employment; for the North Pier was the only means of access to the ship, and by having to return there on a dark and squally night he had exposed himself to a danger specially due to the nature of his employment:

Moore v. Manchester Liners Limited, 29 C. C. C. Rep. 612; 103 L. T. Rep. 226; (1910) A. C. 498.

For the reasons given in the dissenting judgment of Evans, P. this appeal should be allowed.

Alexander Neilson and W. Greaves Lord, for the respondents, were not heard.

Earl LOREBURN.—I think your Lordships will all agree that this case has been presented to us with great ability and with singular fairness, and that the argument which we have heard has assisted us in coming to our conclusion, but I do not think we need to call upon learned counsel for the respondents. We cannot say in this case that this unfortunate man promised his employers that he would feed himself. If that is the case, and if we cannot so construe the contract between them, what did it matter whether he went ashore to buy his provisions because he had contracted that his employers should not be obliged to feed him, or because he was obliged to go or to starve? In either case the necessity was there to get food, but that is not, I think, enough to entitle the appellant to succeed. In either case the question seems to me to be the same—namely, do those circumstances make the accident one that arises out of the employment? Did this injury arise out of this man's employment as a seaman on board this ship; did his employment involve as one of the things belonging to the employment that he should come ashore to get food and then return the same evening? I cannot think that the case can be regarded as one in which it was his duty for that purpose to come ashore and to be ashore and return to the ship. However much one may have sympathy, and we all must have sympathy with the widow, we ought not to allow our feelings to lead us beyond our duty. I have read the judgment of the learned County Court judge, and I take his facts as found and his inferences from the facts as found, and I cannot see that upon those facts the accident arose out of the employment. It arose from this man needing to have food, which, of course, is a necessity common to all mankind.

Lord PARKER OF WADDINGTON.—The accident in this case took place during the absence of the employee from the vessel upon which he was engaged. He came on shore, and I think that under the circumstances it must be presumed that he came on shore with the leave of his employer, and it was during that absence from the ship that the accident occurred.

It is not sufficient in order to make this an accident arising out of the employment that the accident happened during a period when the man was lawfully absent from the vessel. In order to make it an accident arising out of the employment, the absence from the vessel must be in pursuance of a duty owed to the employer. It appears to me that that is, shortly stated, the result of the decided cases. This would appear to be the outcome of a line of decisions which lays down a distinctly workable rule upon the construction of an Act the obscurity of which is exceedingly great, and I should be unwilling in any way to interfere with it.

It is desired in the present case to show that the absence from the ship was pursuant to a duty owed to the employer, but I think that the effort to do so breaks down. It is said that the man was on shore to purchase provisions, that he was under a contractual obligation to his employer to purchase provisions and to feed himself, and that consequently he was absent from the ship pursuant to a duty owed to the employer. Now, the facts of the case are, shortly, these: Under the statutes the employer, if the workman does not provide his own provisions (as he did in this case), is bound to supply them, and the statutory form is a form whereby the employer contracts to supply provisions to seamen in accordance with a scale specified in a schedule. As a matter of fact when they came to contract, the employer and the seaman in this case agreed that the statutory provision should not apply, and, of course, the consequence was that the workman had to supply his own provisions so far as he required them, and he would require them in the normal course of nature. It was proved before the County Court judge that the form which that contract took was "crew to supply their own provisions," and I have no doubt whatever on the point that according to the proper contruction of those words the seaman did not come under any contractual obligation which the master could enforce. It merely means that the master is freed from an obligation which he might otherwise be subject to.

That being the case, I do not think that I need enter in any way into the question as to whether the Court of Appeal were justified or otherwise in looking at the original contract, the contract before the County Court judge having been proved by secondary evidence.

That appears to me entirely to dispose of the case. I cannot in the state of the authorities assent to the further proposition that was made to the effect that if a man goes on shore lawfully for a purpose which must have been contemplated as one of the purposes for which he would go on shore, that makes him on shore upon the ship's business or pursuant to any duty owed to his employer. The only possible way, as it appears to me, of putting the facts of the case in a light favourable to the seaman is that which has been suggested in the course of the argument—namely, that it being an extraordinarily dark, stormy night, and the proper and usual method of regaining the ship being by way of the North Pier, and the accident having evidently happened during transit from the land along the North Pier to the place where the ship was supposed to be, that may be considered as the access to the ship, and that an accident happening during the course of using that access might be, within the cases, an accident in the course of the employment. But, after all, that was a matter for the County Court judge, and there is no finding in the judgment of the County Court judge from which I think we in this House are justified in drawing any inference.

I conclude, therefore, by saying that the appeal fails.

Lord SUMNER.—I agree. It is enough, I think, to take the evidence that was before His Honour and his own findings upon that evidence, and thereupon the only question becomes one of construction. He signed the articles, says the master, the only witness on the point. The Board of Trade scale of provisions was crossed out and "Crew to provide their own provisions" was inserted, and His Honour Judge Thomas accepts that. Instead of provisioning the ship themselves, in which case they would have had to provide for the crew according to a scale as set up by the Board of Trade, the owners of the Black Rock struck this scale out of the articles and inserted a term whereby the members of the crew were to find their own provisions. Upon the secondary evidence of the written agreement it becomes a question of construction to decide what is meant by the erasure and the insertion of "Crew to provide their own provisions." I think it is quite clear that that does not constitute any promise by the seamen severally to the master of the vessel that they would as a duty towards him provide themselves with their own provisions. Testing it by the remedy, could he have recovered damages if any one of them had provided no provisions or not enough? Could he have dismissed one of them because for reasons of his own he preferred to be unduly abstemious instead of providing himself amply with food? The answer in each case must be no.

That being so, there is no contractual obligation which made the deceased's errand on shore part of his employment in itself. It is suggested that as, in fact, he fed himself on board, his going ashore at a convenient port to get provisions constituted such a moral necessity to do so, not arising generally but arising specially from the terms upon which he was on board, that that places him on his errand on the same footing as though he had gone to discharge a duty to the ship—either to buy provisions, to perform an errand, or otherwise. No authority is stated for that proposition, and I do not think it can be accepted.

That being so, little need be said about what was suggested as the admission of a new fact in the Court of Appeal. I am unable to appreciate why it is that it would be a new fact—that is to say, an attempt to decide the case upon materials other than those which were before His Honour Judge Thomas—when the Court of Appeal looks at the best evidence of a written agreement, namely, the agreement itself, which by that time had come back from sea, and was forthcoming, instead of simply looking at the secondary evidence which was given in the County Court, especially as the two together seem to amount to precisely the same thing. The copy has been produced to us. There is a statutory provision that an erasure must be attested by the superintendent, and on the face of the copy produced it seems to me to be quite consistent with its appearance that it has been so attested, and I do not think we need go behind its appearance.

The remaining point that was made (and I am sure that no other point could have been made) was that under the circumstances the accident could be brought within those cases in which a man, having gone on shore for his own lawful purposes, but still his own purposes, is returning to his ship in order to take up again the active discharge of his employment, which has never ceased as an employment; and, although he has not actually regained the ship, he has been held to be so far approaching it and so far within the ambit of the means of access to the ship as to make it reasonable to hold that he has returned to that sphere in which his employment operates, and therefore that the accident arises out of the employment. I do not think that that has ever been physically extended for any great distance. All that we know of this man's death is that it took place by his falling off the North Pier somewhere between the grocer's shop and the end of the pier where the ship was not, though he thought that she was there. The pier is a quarter of a mile long, and whether or not under those circumstances, on the finding of fact by the County Court judge, that long pier was all one means of access to an absent ship I will not say, but I think it is quite clear, as the County Court judge has found nothing about it, that the argument is unsustainable before your Lordships.

I agree that the appeal fails.

Lord PARMOOR.—I concur. I think that there was no such contractual obligation as was contended for by the learned counsel for the appellant, and for my own part I do not see any difference between the evidence of the contract which was before the learned County Court judge and the actual document when it was produced before the Court of Appeal. I think it is clear that Christopher Parker, on whose behalf the claim is made, was not absent from the ship in pursuance of any duty owed to the employer, and in the absence of such duty no liability would arise under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act.

As regards the second point, I think that that is concluded by the finding of the learned County Court judge on p. 21. There are only a few words which I wish to read, because I think that the facts are conclusive against any claim under this second heading. "The facts of the case do not bring the applicant within the Act, because, beyond drawing the inference that he met with an accident while endeavouring to return to the ship after buying the provisions, I am unable to draw any further inference as to the point of the accident except that it was somewhere on the North Pier."

I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Lord WRENBURY.—The question in this case is whether the accident was one arising out of the employment. The accident in question was that the man, in returning from a lawful outing upon shore to his ship, unfortunately fell into the water and was drowned. In order to succeed it is not sufficient that he should show that but for his employment he would not have been at the scene of the accident. He must do more than that; he must show that it was the employment which took him to the place of accident. Now, he has sought to do that in either one of two ways. In the first place his counsel has said that he was contractually bound towards his employer to do the act for the purpose of doing which he went on shore; that he was contractually bound to supply himself with provisions; that he went on shore to get provisions; that he was discharging his duty to his employer when he fell into the sea, and therefore he is entitled to recover. If the premises were granted, I agree that the conclusion would follow, but the premises seem to me to be wrong. Under the Board of Trade form, in the absence of anything to the contrary, it would be for the master to supply the crew with provisions. The only effect of that which was put into the agreement—namely, "Crew to provide their own provisions"—was, I think, this: that, the clause having been struck out which threw the obligation upon the master to supply the provisions by reason of the fact that the crew were going to provide their own, there was no contractual obligation on the part of the man to supply his own provisions, and the effect was only to discharge the master from the obligation which otherwise would have rested upon him. It appears to me, therefore, that there was no such contract.

But then it was said that, contract or no contract, at any rate under the circumstances the man was bound to get provisions in order to sustain himself during the next journey of the vessel, that that was a duty which he owed, and he was performing that duty. It seems to me that from the stipulation that he was to get his own provisions this consequence ensued, that the master was bound to give him reasonable facilities from time to time for going to buy them, but it does not follow that when he was buying them he was discharging any duty towards his employer. The man was doing an act which, under the circumstances, he had to do, but he was not doing an act which he owed to his employer the duty to do, and between those two things it appears to me rests the ground upon which this case is to be decided. It appears to me that this accident did not arise out of his employment—that it did not result from any contingency which had to be satisfied in order for him satisfactorily to perform the duties of his employment.

I agree that the appeal fails and should be dismissed.

THE IOLO. (a)

British ship — Cargo — Consignment to alien enemies—Ship diverted during voyage—Outbreak of hostilities—Seizure of cargo—Sale—Release—Claim for proceeds of sale—Claim for freight—Jurisdiction of common law courts—Jurisdiction of Prize Court—Construction of charter-party and bill of lading—"Blockade and interdicted port" clause—Equitable adjustment.

Certain goods, the property of a Russian bank, were shipped in a British vessel at a Russian port before the outbreak of war between England and Germany, and were consigned to German merchants at Hamburg. Whilst the vessel was on her voyage hostilities began, and by the order of the British authorities she was diverted from her original destination and directed to proceed to a British port, where the goods were seized as prize and afterwards sold by order of the court. The proceeds were paid into court. The marshal gave an undertaking to the shipowners to pay to them the proper amount of freight and charges. The cargo was subsequently released to the Russian Bank upon their giving an undertaking to indemnify the marshal against all claims for freight and charges in respect of the same. The bank subsequently applied for payment of the proceeds of the cargo in full without any deduction for freight or charges.

Held, that although according to the common law the contract of affreightment came to an end immediately it became illegal because of the war to carry the cargo to its original destination, and that in a court of common law no freight can be recovered under such a contract when it has been so determined, the same rule does not apply when the cargo has been seized as prize. The Prize Court, proceeding on the principle of "even and equitable adjustment," will award a certain amount to the shipowners under special circumstances for freight and charges, such amount to be ascertained by the registrar and merchants.

SUMMONS adjourned into court for argument as to the right of the Russian Bank for Foreign Trade to claim the proceeds of the sale of certain barley shipped in the Iolo, a British ship owned by the Iolo Morganwig Steamship Company Limited, from Nicolaieff, a Russian port, before the outbreak of war between England and Germany, and consigned to German merchants at Hamburg, Whilst the ship was on her voyage hostilities began, and she was directed to proceed to a British port instead of to Hamburg. Upon her arrival at the British port the barley was seized as prize and subsequently sold by the Admiralty marshal, the proceeds being paid into court. Afterwards the cargo was released to the Russian Bank, which gave an undertaking to the Admiralty marshal in respect of all payments arising out of the seizure of the goods, and the marshal in turn had given an undertaking to the shipowners to pay to them the ascertained freight and charges on out-turn in terms of the charter-party and bills of lading. The Russian Bank claimed that there should have been no seizure of the barley at all, and that, as it had been released, they were entitled to the entire proceeds of the sale without any deduction for freight or charges. The shipowners, on the other hand, contended that they were entitled to be paid for freight and charges out of the proceeds, and relied (inter alia) on the "blockade and interdicted port" clause of the charter-party and the bill of lading.

June 7.—The PRESIDENT.—The substantial question to be determined upon the application which is now before the court is whether the Russian Bank for Foreign Trade is entitled to the whole of the proceeds of the sale of certain cargo, originally seized as prize, without any deduction in respect of freight or other charges claimed by the shipowners. The form in which the question comes before the court can be disregarded in order to avoid unnecessary complication.

The steamship Iolo is a British vessel which started before the war from the port of Nicolaieff upon a voyage to Hamburg laden with various cargoes destined for Hamburg, and for German consignees. Part of the cargo consisted of two parcels of barley, one of 30,280 poods, and the other of 156,580 poods (making a total of 186,860 poods), which, or the proceeds of sale of which, were claimed in these proceedings by the Russian Bank for Foreign Trade, to which I shall hereinafter refer as the "Russian Bank." The Russian Bank was a bank incorporated under the laws of the Empire of Russia with its head office at Petrograd, and with branches elsewhere in the Russian Empire, and in other European countries, including England, but not in Germany or Austria. While the ship was on her voyage war was declared. The shipowners apprised the British Admiralty of her movements and asked for instructions. The Admiralty advised that the ship should proceed to Falmouth. This was communicated to the ship as she was passing Gibraltar. Before she reached the Lizard she was directed to proceed to Barry Dock, and she arrived there on the 19th Aug. 1914. On her arrival there her cargo was seized as prize by the Customs authorities acting for the Procurator-General of the Crown. On the 31st Aug. the writ in these prize proceedings was issued against the owners of the goods laden in the vessel, including the portion subsequently claimed by the Russian Bank. On the 2nd Sept., by the order of this court, the marshal was authorised to sell the cargo. It was sold accordingly, and the proceeds of the sale were paid into court in these proceedings. On the 4th Sept. an appearance was entered on behalf of the Russian Bank claiming as owners of the 186,860 poods. The ship was directed by the marshal to proceed from Barry to Portishead to discharge the cargo for delivery to the purchasers. On the 7th Oct. the shipowners entered a caveat against the payment out of the proceeds of the sale without notice to them. The object of entering the caveat was to secure payment of the freight and other expenses claimed by the shipowners.

Shortly after the seizure the marshal had given to the shipowners an undertaking in the following terms: "I undertake to pay you on the completion of the discharge of the cargo the amount of the ascertained freight and charges on the out-turn in the terms of the charter-party and bills of lading." In accordance with this undertaking the marshal has already paid to the shipowners 1750*l.* on account. Later, the shipowners delivered particulars of their claim in respect of the whole cargo, which, summarised, was as follows: (1) Freight as per charter-party, 2118*l.* 6*s.* 9*d.*; (2) charges at Barry, 119*l.* 14*s.* 4*d.*; and (3) claim for detention or loss of time, 1080*l.* Roughly speaking, rather more than half of this claim, if allowed, would fall upon the portion of the cargo claimed by the Russian Bank.

After entering appearance in the proceedings the Russian Bank instituted an action in the King's Bench Division of the High Court asking for a declaration as to their rights. This action was subsequently abandoned, and I need not further advert to it.

Certain communications passed between the Russian Bank and the Procurator-General, the result of which was that the Procurator-General consented to release to the bank the net proceeds of part of the cargo to which they laid claim, upon the bank giving an idemnity in writing on or about the 19th Nov. The document evidencing this arrangement was in the following terms:

In Prize.—Steamship Iolo.—Whereas the undermentioned goods have been seized as prize, and whereas the Russian Bank for Foreign Trade claims to be entitled to the goods hereinafter described and has requested the Procurator-General to consent to an order for the release to them of the said goods, and whereas the Procurator-General is willing upon receiving the following indemnity (and subject to such other conditions, if any, as may have been arranged between the parties) to consent to such an order: Now, in consideration of the Procurator-General agreeing to give such consent, the said Russian Bank for Foreign Trade undertakes to indemnify the Procurator-General, whether on his own behalf or on behalf of the Crown or on behalf of the Admiralty marshal or of any officer or official of the Crown or of the Prize Court or of any person acting under the authority or instructions of the same or of any one or more of them, against all petitions (including petitions of rights), claims, proceedings, actions, or demands for or in respect or on account of the goods or any part thereof or any proceeds thereof or arising directly or indirectly out of or connected with the seizure, detention, or release of the goods or any part thereof, and against all costs, damages, and expenses in respect of the premises. And the bank undertakes to refund to the Procurator-General any sum or sums of money which may hereafter be found to have been paid or may be paid for the said parcels or of any of them by an alien enemy.

Then follows a description of the goods by reference to the numbers of the bills of lading and the numbers of the poods, amounting in all to 156,580 poods. I assume that a similar indemnity was given in respect of the 30,280 poods, or, at any rate, that the same conditions applied to the release of the proceeds of this parcel.

Later in the proceedings, by consent of the Procurator-General, orders were made authorising the marshal to pay out to the solicitors for the Russian Bank the net proceeds of sale of the 30,280 and 156,580 poods of barley, less certain sums which were retained until the question of freight and expenses was decided. Pursuant to such orders two sums of 2500*l.* and 11,000*l.* (making 13,500*l.*) were paid out to the Russian Bank out of the proceeds of the sale of the cargo, leaving in court about 1500*l.* (the balance of the proceeds) until the questions now in dispute were determined.

It has been necessary to set out the above facts in order that the circumstances in which the Russian Bank made the present application may be understood. Mr. Wright, counsel for the bank, contended that the bank was entitled to be paid out the balance of the proceeds of the sale of the barley in full, without any deduction for freight or any other charges. The foundation of this contention was that in law the contract between the shipowners and the bank, as owners of cargo, had come to an end, because the goods were not delivered at the port of Hamburg in accordance with the contract contained in the bill of lading; and that the shipowners were not legally entitled to recover the freight or any part thereof, or to any lien therefor, or to any allowance in respect of it.

But before proceeding to say anything about the legal questions which were argued, I must point out that, in the view that I take of the facts, there are difficulties in the way of the bank's claim which appear to me to be insuperable.

In the first place, counsel for the bank assumed that his clients were in the position of absolute owners of the cargo entitled to say that the seizure was wrongful; and that their claim must be considered without any reference to the seizure as prize, or to the sale, or to the prize proceedings, or to the terms on which the consent to the release of the proceeds of the sale was given. The argument was directed as if the question was merely one between the bank and the shipowners, and depended only upon the contract contained in the charter-party. This same bank was interested in a cargo shipped and seized under very similar circumstances in the case of The Corsican Prince (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 29; 112 L. T. Rep. 475), which came before this court in February last, and I venture to repeat what I said in that case upon the question of release by the Crown as follows: "The Crown has full right to consent to the release of any ship or goods captured or seized on any grounds that to the Crown may seem fit. Moreover, it does not by any means follow as a necessary consequence of the release that the goods were not properly seized as prize as the Crown's droits of Admiralty. In the present case, as the Empire of Russia is our ally in the war, it does not require a very vivid imagination to conceive grounds for giving up to the Russian Bank the proceeds of the portion of the cargo claimed by them quite otherwise than as an acknowledgment of wrongful seizure. And if it is thought material, it would be quite open to anyone interested in these proceedings at any stage to allege and to set out to prove that the seizure of the cargo was lawful."

I will add that if it had been thought material in the interest of the bank in the present case, it would have been quite open to them to allege and to set out to prove, if they could, that the seizure of the cargo was unlawful, and that they were absolutely entitled according to prize law to have the cargo released with or without costs and expenses. That task they did not undertake. The course which they were advised to take, and which they may have taken with much prudence, was to accept the release of the net proceeds of the sale of the goods upon the terms of the indemnity hereinafter set out. These terms show clearly that the arrangement was a compromise, and that it was by no means admitted that the Russian Bank was entitled as of right to the cargo or its proceeds.

I need hardly say that according to the rules and practice of this court, the marshal rightly acted when he undertook to pay to the shipowners the ascertained freight and charges, by which I think was meant the proper amount of freight and charges to be ascertained by a reference to the registrar and merchants, in accordance with the principles which have been laid down for that purpose. These payments have in part been made, and will at the end be made in full out of the proceeds in court; and are covered by the wide words of the indemnity. Upon these facts I am of opinion that the Russian Bank is not entitled to be paid in full without any reduction for freight and expenses.

But lest my view of the result of the facts may be considered to be erroneous, and as the legal aspect of the case, and of cases similar to it, is of general importance, I will deal also with the law applicable to such cases. I can do this the more briefly because I have already had occasion to deal with the subject in some of its aspects in The Juno (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 15; 112 L. T. Rep. 471) and The Corsican Prince (ubi sup.). The former dealt with the freight claimed by the owners of a British ship in respect of goods which were laden upon her and which were condemned as prize, as against the captors, and the respective positions of British and neutral ships in relation to their rights to freight in such cases were compared. In the latter I considered the general question of the jurisdiction of the Prize Court to award freight to owners of British ships where the cargo was seized as prize, and where it or its proceeds had been released as in the present case.

In order to avoid repetition I would refer to the authorities cited in these two decisions. From them I deduced certain results and venture to lay down the following propositions:

"The Prize Courts have constantly dealt with claims for freight and damages where ships or cargoes have been captured or seized, not only as between captors and owners, but also as between owners of ships and owners of cargo, and have adjudicated upon such claims whether the ship or cargo has been released, and when both ship and cargo have been released; and apparently no action involving those questions in similar cases was brought in any Common Law Court. And this is obviously for grounds solid in justice and convenient in practice; because the two courts administered two different codes or systems of law; the Prize Courts deal with claims in accordance with the law of nations and upon equitable principles freed from contracts, which almost always cease to have effect upon capture or seizure by reason of the non-performance or non-completion of the contract of affreightment; whereas Common Law Courts would only determine the consequences of the strictly legal contractual obligations of the parties. The King's Bench Courts would either give the claimants for freight the whole or nothing, according to whether the contract of affreightment had been performed or not. But the Prize Court takes all the circumstances into consideration, and may award, as it has done in decided cases, the whole or a moiety of the freight, or a sum pro rata itineris; or it may discard the contract rate altogether, even as a basis for assessment on calculation (The Twilling Riget, Roscoe's English Prize Cases, vol. 1, 430; 5 Ch. Rob. 82); or it may withhold or diminish the sum by reason of misconduct, as, e.g., resistance to search or spoliation or non-disclosure of papers."

A passing reference was made in the judgment given in The Juno (ubi sup.) to the case of The Friends (Roscoe's English Prize Cases, vol. 2, 48; Edw. 246). It was not dealt with at length, because, as was pointed out, it was between shipowners and cargo owners, and not between shipowners and captors, as was that of The Juno (ubi sup.). That very circumstance renders the decision in The Friends (ubi sup.) of great importance in the consideration of the matter now before the court. It is right, therefore, to refer to it more fully. That was the case of a British vessel which had been chartered to deliver a cargo at Lisbon. The ship had prosecuted her voyage to the entrance of the Tagus, when she was warned off by the blockading squadron. A gale of wind afterwards blew her out to sea, and she was captured by a Spanish privateer, but was soon afterwards recaptured by a British cruiser and taken to Madeira, where the ship and cargo were sold by the recaptors to pay salvage. The ship and the cargo were afterwards decreed to be restored. The question which the court had to decide was what freight was due under the circumstances. On the part of the owner of the ship it was contended that the whole of the freight was due, as the ship had actually gone up to the mouth of the port to which she was destined. On the part of the owner of the cargo it was contended that no freight was due as the cargo was not delivered according to the terms of the charter-party. Referring to certain cases of American ships bound to France or Holland, and which were brought into this country under the prohibitory law, Lord Stowell said: "In those cases the court gave the master the full benefit of the freight, not by virtue of his contract, because, looking at the charter-party in the same point of view as the Court of Common Law, it could not say that the delivery at a port in England was a specific performance of its terms; but there being no contract which applied to the existing state of facts, the court found itself under an obligation to discover what was the relative equity between the parties. This court sits no more than the Courts of Common Law do to make contracts between parties; but as a court exercising an equitable jurisdiction it considers itself bound to provide as well as it can for that relation of interests which has unexpectedly taken place under a state of facts out of the contemplation of the contracting parties in the course of the transaction." And in pronouncing his decision, he delivered himself as follows: "The present case is marked with peculiar misfortune, because here after the ship had been stopped by the blockading force she was blown out to sea, and, being subsequently taken out of the hands of the master, she was carried by the recaptors to a distant port, and there sold, together with her cargo, at a great loss. In this case, therefore, loss is unavoidable, and the only question is, upon whom the weight of it shall fall. Now, if the incapacity of completing the voyage could be exclusively attributed to one of the parties, it would be proper that the loss should fall there; but the fact is that the calamity is common to both, for both ship and cargo were equally affected by the blockade. The ship could not have entered the interdicted port in ballast, any more than the cargo could have entered it in any other vehicle. The loss arises from the common incapacity of the one and of the other; I think, therefore, that what equity would suggest is that the loss should be divided; and under these circumstances I shall direct a moiety of the freight to be paid."

In the case which now calls for decision in this court the cargo in question was seized as prize. It was subsequently sold, and its proceeds were paid into court to be dealt with in the prize proceedings. I have pointed out that, according to the authorities and practice of the Court of Prize, the jurisdiction of the court to deal with freight is not affected by the release of the cargo—even if it had been released upon the decision of the court that it had been wrongfully seized, which was not the case in relation to this cargo.

According to the Common Law the contract of affreightment came to an end immediately it became illegal because of the war to proceed to carry the goods to their German destination; and in a Court of Common Law no freight could be recovered under the contract which had so come to an end. An illustration of this is afforded by the recent judgment of Rowlatt, J. in St. Enoch Shipping Company Limited v. Phosphate Mining Company (139 L. T. Jour. 94; (1915) W. N. 197), where the learned judge decided that no freight could be recovered by the shipowners for the carriage of cargoes of cotton, copper, phosphate, and wheat from South America, which were destined for Hamburg, but which were diverted to Manchester. It must be noted, in connection with this decision, that, although the cargoes were in some way detained by the Customs authorities, no proceedings in prize were taken. The cargoes were given back as if they never had been interfered with by the Customs authorities, and the case was dealt with upon the footing that no seizure as prize was ever effected. I may be allowed to point out that the decision in that case, although I doubt not that it was given in accordance with the law of contract, might fairly be considered commercially as producing a hardship to the shipowners. On the other hand, it is satisfactory to note that if my view of the doctrines to be applied in such cases when they come before the Prize Court is correct, a more even and equitable adjustment can be made, which balances fairly the rights of the parties where the contract which has been ended no longer regulates them.

Upon the grounds on which my decision is based, it becomes unnecessary for me to decide the various questions which were argued upon the construction of the bill of lading, and the effect of the "blockade and interdicted port" clause.

In my judgment the application of the Russian Bank for payment of the proceeds in full without any deduction for freight or charges fails, and I dismiss their summons with costs.

Counsel for the shipowners did not contend in these proceedings that they were entitled to the full freight as the contract freight. In one sense it was not necessary upon this application to argue that point. But I do not apprehend that it is desired to argue it further. And so it may be convenient now to order that it be referred to the registrar and merchants to ascertain the amount due for freight or charges in respect of all the cargoes upon the principles laid down in the judgment of this court in The Juno (ubi sup.).

THE ZAMORA. (a)

Prize Court—Order in Council—Validity—Binding effect upon Prize Court—Prize Court Rules—Order XXIX.

By Order XXIX of the Prize Court Rules, as authorised by an Order in Council, it is provided that: "Where it is made to appear to the judge on the application of the proper officer of the Crown that it is desired to requisition on behalf of His Majesty a ship in respect of which no final decree of condemnation has been made, he shall order that the ship shall be appraised, and that upon an undertaking being given . . . the ship shall be released and delivered to the Crown."

By Order I of the Prize Court Rules: "Unless the contrary intention appears, the provisions of these rules relative to ships shall extend and apply, mutatis mutandis, to goods."

A Swedish vessel carrying copper, which was absolute contraband of war, was seized and brought into a British port. A writ was issued that the ship and her cargo should be condemned and confiscated. Before any adjudication as to these claims had taken place, the Procurator-General on behalf of the War Department took out a summons that the Crown should be entitled to requisition the copper, leaving the question of the right to the same, or the proceeds of the sale thereof, to be decided later on.

(a) Reported by J. A. SLATER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that Order XXIX was binding upon the Prize Court, that it did not contravene the law of nations, and that it was not ultra vires.

SUMMONS adjourned into court for argument as to the right of the Crown to requisition goods alleged to be the property of neutrals.

The Zamora was a Swedish steamship, belonging to the port of Stockholm, and on the 19th March 1915 she sailed from New York with a cargo which included a quantity of copper, about 400 tons. This copper was shipped by the American Smelting and Refining Company of New York, and was consigned to the Swedish Trading Company of Stockholm. Copper was absolutely contraband of war, and whilst the Zamora was on her way from the United States to Sweden she was stopped and afterwards sent to a British port, as the Crown alleged that the copper which she carried was really intended for Germany. The ship and her cargo were then seized, and proceedings were commenced that the ship might be condemned and confiscated as lawful prize on the ground that the cargo which she was carrying was as to more than one-half thereof contraband of war, and that the cargo should be condemned and confiscated as contraband. Alternatively the Crown asked that an order might be made authorising the detention and sale of the cargo, on the ground that the vessel left a port other than a German port after the 1st March 1915, having on board the contraband cargo, the same having an enemy destination or being enemy property. No adjudication had taken place as to these claims, but in the meantime a summons was taken out by the Procurator-General on behalf of the War Department that the Crown should be at liberty to requisition the copper, leaving the question of the right to the same, or the proceeds of the sale thereof, to be decided later on. The summons was taken out under Order XXIX of the Prize Court Rules. The right to requisition was resisted by the claimants, the Swedish Trading Company of Stockholm.

By Order I., r. 2, of the Prize Court Rules 1914:

> Unless the contrary intention appears, the provisions of these rules relative to ships shall extend and apply, mutatis mutandis, to goods.

By Order XXIX of the Prize Court Rules, as amended by Order in Council dated the 23rd March 1915, it is provided:

> Rule 1. Where it is made to appear to the judge on the application of the proper officer of the Crown that it is desired to requisition on behalf of His Majesty a ship in respect of which no final decree of condemnation has been made, he shall order that the ship shall be appraised, and that upon an undertaking being given in accordance with rule 5 of this order the ship shall be released and delivered to the Crown.
> Rule 4. In any case where a ship has been requisitioned under the provisions of this order, and whether or not an appraisement has been made, the court may, on the application of any party, fix the amount to be paid by the Crown in respect of the value of the ship.
> Rule 5. In every case of requisition under this order an undertaking in writing shall be filed by the proper officer of the court on behalf of the Crown of the appraised value of the ship, or of the amount fixed under rule 4 of this order, as the case may be, at such a time or times as the court shall declare by order that the same or any part thereof is required for the purpose of payment out of court.

The Attorney-General (Sir E. Carson, K.C.) and Branson for the Crown.—The copper was requisitioned on behalf of the Crown under the terms of the new Order XXIX of the Prize Court Rules. The Crown was quite within its rights in making such requisition. It might be suggested that the Order in Council authorising the new order was ultra vires. It was submitted that no act on the part of the executive could be so designated when it was done in defence of the realm. No harm could happen to the claimants in any case. They were fully protected by the undertaking given in accordance with rule 5 of the order. Moreover, it was not a case of the seizure of neutral goods on the high seas. The cargo was actually in the possession of the Prize Court. The court had full powers to make the order asked for by the Procurator-General.

Leslie Scott, K.C., Roche, K.C., Balloch, and Baty for the claimants.—The submission of the claimants was that under the law which bound the Prize Court the judicial act which his Lordship was asked to perform was beyond his jurisdiction. It was contrary to the law of the court, and contrary to all rules of justice and equity. The order was not binding upon the Prize Court. It constituted a change in the substantive law regulating the rights of neutrals and their property when no charge of carrying contraband goods had been established. The Prize Court sat to administer the law of nations, and the right of requisition was unknown to such law. A right to seize neutral goods was claimed by military leaders in the field on certain occasions, when there was urgent military necessity. Here no such necessity had been shown. They cited

The Attorney-General in reply.—This was the first occasion in which an Order in Council had been questioned in a Prize Court. To succeed in their contention the claimants must go to the length of saying that the Crown could never, under any circumstances, requisition the goods of a neutral. That was an impossible proposition. He cited

Cur. adv. vult.

June 21.—The PRESIDENT.—By a summons issued in an action in prize relating to the steamship Zamora and her cargo, an application was made by the Procurator-General for an interlocutory order that part of the cargo laden on the vessel, namely, about 400 tons of copper, should be released and delivered up to the Crown under Order XXIX of the Prize Court Rules, upon an undertaking to be given by the proper officer of the Crown to pay into court the appraised value of the copper in accordance with rule 5 of the order. The claim in the writ in the prize proceedings was "for a decree that the said steamship Zamora be condemned and confiscated as good and lawful prize on the ground that the cargo which she was carrying at the time of her capture and seizure was as to more than one-half thereof contraband of war, and for a decree that the said cargo be condemned as good and lawful prize as contraband of war; or in the alternative for an order for the detention and (or) for the sale of the said cargo on the ground that the said steamship sailed from a port other than a German port after the 1st March 1915, having on board the said cargo, which had an enemy destination or was enemy property."

The Zamora was a Swedish vessel registered of Stockholm. She sailed from New York, U.S.A., on the 20th March 1915, bound for Stockholm. On the 8th April, when between the Faroes and the Shetlands, she was stopped and captured by His Majesty's ship Alsatian, and a prize crew was put on board. She was taken to the Orkney Islands and was, with the cargo, finally handed over to the marshal of this court on the 19th April. Thenceforth the ship and the cargo remained in the custody of the marshal of the Prize Court awaiting the hearing of the cause upon the judgment in which their condemnation or release depended.

In support of the present application for the release and delivery of the cargo to the Crown, a sufficient affidavit of the Director of Army Contracts was filed. The application was strenuously resisted on behalf of a Swedish firm who claim to be the owners of the cargo.

The summons came before me in chambers, and at the request of counsel for the claimants I ordered that it should be adjourned into court for argument. Upon the hearing it was contended that the provisions of Order XXIX material to the present question violated the law of nations; that they were not binding upon this court; and that this court owed no obedience to them, and ought not to act upon them. The argument spread over a wide field. In the expanse of the outlook the matter really in issue was so dwarfed as to vanish almost out of sight.

Before entering upon a survey of the extended area which was opened out in the argument, I propose to deal with the more restricted position in relation to which the decision of the question in issue depends.

The position is that prize proceedings resulting from the capture of the vessel and cargo are pending; and that the present application is for an interlocutory order in respect of the copper which was part of the captured property. Any order made upon the interlocutory application will not prejudice the case for the claimants upon the final hearing. It may be that their cargo will be decided to be confiscable and will be decreed to be condemned, or it may happen, on the other hand, that the decision will be the other way, in which case the claimants will have the value of the cargo decreed to be paid to them, and possibly, in addition, they may be awarded sums for damages and costs. The order made upon the present application will not affect their rights, which will fall to be determined at the hearing of the cause.

At the outset the capture or seizure as prize vests the possession of the property captured or seized in the Crown, and when the property comes into the custody of the marshal of this court it is subjected fully to the jurisdiction of this court. The court has inherent powers to deal with the property brought within its jurisdiction as it may deem fit in the exercise of its discretion. It has, in my opinion, such a power, apart from any rules of practice made under the Prize Acts of 1864 or 1894. It could, without any such rules, order a sale of perishable goods before condemnation; or order a sale of goods in order to avoid difficulties or expense of warehousing, or removing, or for any other reason which appeared sufficient to the court. In my view, persons who lay claim to property captured or seized have no right by any rule of international law to demand that the property should be preserved in specie until the final decree determines whether it is to be released or to be condemned. Prize Courts have always acted upon the principle that the capture is lawful, until the claimants establish the contrary. All that it is necessary for the captors to allege in prize proceedings is that the capture was made, and that the property captured is claimed as prize; thereupon the claimants must establish their claim to release. If their claim to release is sustained they may have the property delivered up, if it has been kept intact; or they will receive its value if it has been sold or otherwise disposed of, with or without costs and damages against the captors as the circumstances may require.

The argument of counsel for the claimants was, or necessarily involved, that the goods captured must in any circumstances be preserved to be delivered up in the same character if release is ordered; and that they cannot, except with the consent of the claimants, be sold or converted into a fund; or, in other words, that the claimants, in case their claim is allowed, must be put in possession of the property itself, and not of its value. I know of no principle or rule of international law to that effect. If the claimants have no such legal right to have the property delivered up in specie, it matters not whether the property is sold for good reasons and so converted into money, or is requisitioned by the Crown (instead of going through the form of sale) upon an undertaking to pay into court the appraised value.

But apart from any inherent power of the court, the order referred to in the Prize Court Rules, Order XXIX, deals expressly with the matter and prescribes the practice to be pursued. I will consider hereafter the larger question whether this order violates an acknowledged and settled principle of the law of nations; and whether, if it does, it nevertheless, as an order made by His Majesty in Council, must be observed and obeyed by this court. Before approaching that wide and important subject, however, I must declare that in my view Order XXIX deals only with a matter affecting the procedure and the practice of the court—a domestic affair in which no foreign neutral or enemy has any voice or right to interfere. It deals only with interlocutory steps which may be taken in this court after prize proceedings have been instituted. Matters of practice in proceedings such as sale of property or delivery up on bail, or upon appraisement, are not of international concern, and are not, and cannot be, regulated by uniform international principles or procedure to be applied in the courts of all countries. As an example, a reference to the prize regulations of Russia and of Japan during the war of 1904-5 will show that they differ as to the rules regulating sale of captured vessels and goods before or after the institution of prize proceedings.

If Order XXIX deals, as I think it does, merely with the regulation of the practice and procedure of this Prize Court, it has the force of an Act of Parliament, as it has been made under statutory powers. But if it goes beyond procedure and practice, it has nevertheless the force properly attributable to an Order in Council. This appears by the order itself, and in the Naval Prize Act 1864 there is an express saving of the right, power, or prerogative of the Crown, as there is also of the jurisdiction or authority of or exercisable by the Prize Court. If it is regarded as an Order in Council, it is, in my opinion, within the power and prerogative of the Crown to make an order giving the right to requisition neutral property which may be of use to the Crown as a belligerent, subject to making compensation therefor. For instance, where, in former wars, such things as planks, sailcloths, pitch, hemp, and copper sheets belonging to neutrals were ordered before condemnation to be handed over to the Government pursuant to an order or declaration of the Crown: (see the following cases gathered from Hay and Marriott's reports: The Vrow Antoinette, p. 142; De Jonge Joslers, p. 148; Concordia Affinitatis, p. 169; Sarah and Bernhardus, p. 174; The Hoppet, p. 217; Jonge Gertruyda, p. 246; Concordia Sophia, p. 267; Drie Gebroeders, p. 270; The Jonge Juffers, p. 272; and also the cases mentioned at pp. 287 and 288).

As to the law relating to foodstuffs, reference may be made to The Haabet (Roscoe's English Prize Cases, vol. 1, 212; 2 Ch. Rob. 174). Lord Stowell deals with this question as follows: "The right of taking possession of cargoes of this description, commeatus or provisions, going to the enemy's ports, is no peculiar claim of this country; it belongs generally to belligerent nations; the ancient practice of Europe, or, at least, of several maritime States of Europe, was to confiscate them entirely; a century has not elapsed since this claim has been asserted by some of them. A more mitigated practice has prevailed in later times of holding such cargoes subject only to a right of pre-emption, that is, to a right of purchase upon a reasonable compensation, to the individual whose property is thus diverted. I have never understood that on the side of the belligerent this claim goes beyond the case of cargoes avowedly bound to the enemy's port, or suspected on just grounds to have a concealed destination of that kind; or that on the side of the neutral the same exact compensation is to be expected which he might have demanded from the enemy in his own port. The enemy may be distressed by famine, and may be driven by his necessities to pay a famine price for the commodity if it gets there; it does not follow that acting upon my rights of war in intercepting such supplies I am under the obligation of paying that price of distress. It is a mitigated exercise of war on which my purchase is made, and no rule has established that such a purchase shall be regulated exactly upon the same terms of profit which would have followed the adventure if no such exercise of war had intervened; it is a reasonable indemnification and a fair profit of the commodity that is due, reference being had to the original price actually paid by the exporter, and the expenses which he has incurred. As to what is to be deemed a reasonable indemnification and profit, I hope and trust that this country will never be found backward in giving a liberal interpretation to those terms; but certainly the capturing nation does not always take these cargoes on the same terms on which an enemy would be content to purchase them; much less are cases of this kind to be considered as cases of costs and damages, on which all loss of possible profit is to be laid upon unjust captors; for these are not unjust captures, but authorised exercises of the rights of war."

As to interlocutory orders dealing with seized cargoes in prize proceedings from early times in this country up to more recent times in the United States of America, numbers of instances will be found of orders for sale before condemnation, and also for delivery to the State of goods not already condemned upon their value being paid into court or secured, in some cases where on the final hearing it was decided that the goods were not confiscable, and in some even before legal proceedings in prize had been commenced.

As it was contended that to give effect to Order XXIX by allowing the State to requisition would be to act in violation of the law of nations, it would appear to be more useful for the purpose of inducing conviction to extract instances from the practice of other countries. Accordingly I will refer to some cases from the United States of America, the courts of which, next, possibly, to our own, have done most for the elucidation and the development of the law of nations applicable to the law of prize. In The St. Lawrence and cargo (2 Gall. 19) Story, J. states (at p. 22) that in that case the property was sold under an interlocutory order before final condemnation, and the proceeds were brought into the registry to abide the final decision of the Appellate Court. In The Avery and cargo (2 Gall. 308) the same learned judge dealt on appeal with an application by the captors relating to the proceeds of sale of goods made under an interlocutory order pending the proceedings in the court below, whereof restoration was afterwards decreed; and in the course of his judgment (at p. 310) he said: "It is very clear that the terms of this Act (cited) apply only to sales after a final condemnation, and not to sales made pendente lite under interlocutory decrees of court. Nor can it be admitted that the intention of the Legislature requires a more enlarged construction. Interlocutory sales are often ordered under a perishable monition and survey, or for other good cause in the discretion of the court."

I will cite a few later instances decided in 1862-3 which arose during the American Civil War. In The Sarah and Caroline and cargo (Blatchford, Pr. Cas. 123) a neutral vessel was captured on the ground that she was trying to break a blockade. The cargo was sold before condemnation, as appears from the following passage in the judgment of Betts, J.: "No appearance having been entered in the suit on due return of the warrant of arrest of the cargo, and the capture having vested jurisdiction in the Prize Court over the property seized, it is ordered that an interlocutory order for the sale of the cargo arrested in the cause be made, and that the proceeds thereof be deposited in the cause on the registry of the court, to abide the further order of the court." Another significant case, when the vessel and cargo were delivered over to the public use by order made even before the libel in prize was filed and without notice to any claimant, was the steamer Memphis and cargo (Blatchford, Pr. Cas. 202). The vessel was British, and the cargo also belonged to British subjects. The headnote is as follows: "This vessel having been sent into court as a prize, the court, on the application of the District Attorney, before libel filed, and before any appearance by any claimant, and without notice to any claimant, made an order appointing appraisers to value the prize, with the view to her being taken for the use of the Government. After the libel was filed the claimant appeared in the suit and moved to vacate the order because it was made without notice to him. Held, the motion could not be granted. Property captured as prize is under the control of the court from the time it is delivered to the court by the Prize Master until it is finally disposed of, and the filing of a libel is not necessary to give the court cognisance of the property." I may observe that the order for appraisement and delivery embraced the cargo as well as the ship. I will cite one passage from the judgment, as it appears to me to be important:—

"The point most strenuously urged by the several counsel was that the Prize Court acquires no cognisance of a prize case except by means of a libel, which causes an arrest, in law, of the property captured and subjects it thereafter to judicial jurisdiction. This, it appears to me, is a manifest misapprehension of the state of the matter under the jurisprudence of the United States. The prize vessel and all her cargo and papers are in the first instance transmitted by the officer making the capture to the charge of the judge of the district to which such prize is ordered to proceed: (2 U.S. Statutes at Large, Act 7). These standing prize rules, fully confirmed by the fiat of Congress 'relative to judicial proceedings upon captured property and the administration of the law of prize' which appeared the 25th March 1862, place the property captured under the control of the court and its officers until the final adjudication and disposal of it by the court. The notion, therefore, that the prerogative powers of the Government can be exercised only directly by the United States in its military capacity, and not at all through the courts, cannot be supported under our laws. Those high functions are legitimately put in force by the instrumentality of the judiciary in obtaining through its agency the active use of the possession of prize property, which first vests in this department. Accordingly an order for the appraisal of captured property and the surrender or transfer of it to Government uses, under precautionary provisions to secure individual interests vesting in it, is palpably a judicial power, to be performed at the instance of the Government, and need not, if indeed it can, be superseded or dispensed with by a direct and summary act of appropriation of the property by the executive authority."

In the case of the steamer Ella Warley and cargo (Blatchford, Pr. Cas. 204), the method to be adopted for ascertaining the value of property handed over to the use of the captors was the matter chiefly discussed; but in the judgment Betts, J. dealt with the right of the captors thus: "The prerogative right of the captors to take the property seized to their own use is modified only in subserviency to the modern law of war, that in case a judicial confiscation of it is not secured, the captors are responsible over for its value to the lawful proprietor. That responsibility may be secured to the claimant by bail in court for its worth, or other equivalent protection to such contingent right. The usage of this court is to place the value in deposit in the registry of the court to be restored and paid to the claimant in case of the acquittal of the property in place of relying upon individual undertakings or responsibilities therefor"; and he proceeds (at p. 206): "But all the decisions must rest on the same principle—that it is competent to the Government, through the agency of the courts, to take immediate possession and use of the captured property, on guaranteeing by bail or deposit, at its worth, the restoration of its value to its lawful claimants." At a later stage in dealing with the same vessel and her cargo, the learned judge said: "I retain the conviction that the Government possesses the legal right of claiming a direct appropriation to public use of captured property, and that the courts are bound to carry such demand into execution, according to the usual course of procedure before it: (see The Ella Warley and cargo, Blatchford, Pr. Cas., at p. 209). The cases of The Memphis (ubi sup.) and The Ella Warley (ubi sup.) afterwards came on appeal before Nelson, J., Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the U.S.A., who was no mean authority upon questions of prize law; and none of the principles enunciated by Betts, J. in that case were disapproved.

Finally, I would refer to the case of the schooner Stephen Hart and cargo (Blatchford, Pr. Cas. 387). The case was finally determined on the 10th July 1863. Meantime by interlocutory orders, some made before the libel in prize, and others after proceedings were taken, but all made before final decree, parts of the cargo were delivered to the Navy Department for the use of the United States; other parts to the War Department, the Ordnance Department, and the Sanitary Department of the States; and the schooner herself and the remainder of her cargo were sold by public auction; and all the proceeds of the vessel and her cargo delivered and sold as aforesaid were paid into the registry of the court to await the final determination and decree of the court.

In view of the cases to which reference has now been made, it cannot in my opinion be possible to maintain that the requisition by the State of captured property which is provided for by Order XXIX of the Prize Court Rules is a violation of an acknowledged or settled principle or rule of the law of nations. If the view just expressed is correct, it is not necessary to discuss the question whether this court is bound to obey an Order in Council which may run contrary to the acknowledged law of nations. If that question should arise, I am humbly and fully content to assume the standpoint of Lord Stowell in the case of The Fox (ubi sup.), in which he had to deal with the Orders in Council which were made by way of reprisal after the celebrated Berlin and Milan decrees of Napoleon. He expressed his view of the duty of the Prize Court, with reference to the law of nations, and to Orders in Council by the State in and under which the court exercised jurisdiction, in the following classical passages:—

"In the course of the discussion a question has been started, what would be the duty of the court under Orders in Council that were repugnant to the law of nations? It has been contended on one side, that the court would at all events be bound to enforce the Orders in Council; on the other, that the court would be bound to apply the rule of the law of nations adapted to the particular case, in disregard of the Orders in Council. I have not observed, however, that these Orders in Council, in their retaliatory character, have been described in the argument as at all repugnant to the law of nations, however liable to be so described if merely original and abstract. And, therefore, it is rather to correct possible misapprehension on the subject than from the sense of any obligation which the present discussion imposes upon me that I observe that this court is bound to administer the law of nations to the subjects of other countries in the different relations in which they may be placed towards this country and its Government. This is what other countries have a right to demand for their subjects and to complain if they receive it not. This is its unwritten law evidenced in the course of its decisions, and collected from the common usage of civilised States. At the same time it is strictly true, that by the constitution of this country, the King in Council possesses legislative rights over this court, and has power to issue orders and instructions which it is bound to obey and enforce; and these constitute the written law of this court. These two propositions, that the court is bound to administer the law of nations, and that it is bound to enforce the King's Orders in Council, are not at all inconsistent with each other; because these orders and instructions are presumed to conform themselves, under the given circumstances, to the principles of its unwritten law. They are either directory applications of those principles to the cases indicated in them—cases which, with all the facts and circumstances belonging to them, and which constitute their legal character, could be but imperfectly known to the court itself; or they are positive regulations, consistent with those principles, applying to matters which require more exact and definite rules than those general principles are capable of furnishing.

"The constitution of this court, relatively to the legislative power of the King in Council, is analogous to that of the Courts of Common Law relatively to that of the Parliament of this kingdom. Those courts have their unwritten law, the approved principles of natural reason and justice—they have likewise the written and statute law in Acts of Parliament, which are directory applications of the same principles to particular subjects, or positive regulations consistent with them, upon matters which would remain too much at large if they were left to the imperfect information which the courts could extract from mere general speculations. What would be the duty of the individuals who preside in these courts if required to enforce an Act of Parliament which contradicted those principles, is a question which I presume they would not entertain a priori, because they will not entertain a priori the supposition that any such will arise. In like manner, this court will not let itself loose into speculations as to what would be its duty under such an emergency, because it cannot, without extreme indecency, presume that any such emergency will happen; and it is the less disposed to entertain them, because its own observations and experience attest the general conformity of such orders and instructions to the principles of unwritten law. In the particular case of the orders and instructions which give rise to the present question, the court has not heard it at all maintained in argument that as retaliatory orders they are not conformable to such principles—for retaliatory orders they are. They are so declared in their own language, and in the uniform language of the Government which has established them. I have no hesitation in saying that they would cease to be just if they ceased to be retaliatory; and they would cease to be retaliatory from the moment the enemy retracts in a sincere manner those measures of his which they were intended to retaliate."

Judges and jurists have pronounced upon this subject after the judgment of Lord Stowell in The Fox (ubi sup.) In Maisonnaire v. Keating (2 Gall. 325), Story, J. expressed his view as follows (at p. 334): "The legality of the conduct of the captors may, under circumstances, exclusively depend upon the ordinances of their own Government. If, for instance, the Sovereign should, by a special order, authorise the capture of a neutral property for a cause manifestly unfounded in the law of nations, there can be no doubt that it would afford a complete justification of the captors in all tribunals of prize. The acts of subjects, lawfully done under the orders of their Sovereign, are not cognisable by foreign courts. If such acts be a violation of neutral rights, the only remedy lies by an appeal to the Sovereign, or by a resort to arms. A capture, therefore, under the Berlin and Milan decrees, or the celebrated Orders in Council, although they might be violations of neutral rights, must still have been deemed, as to the captors, a rightful capture, and have authorised the exercise of all the usual rights of war."

Upon this subject I may again cite the following passage from the judgment of an American judge a generation later: "The general argument against the expediency of subjecting property to peremptory sale before condemnation or trial must yield to the provisions of positive law": (per Best, J. in The Nassau, Blatchford, Pr. Cas. 198).

Our text-writers acknowledge the binding force of Orders in Council of the State in which the court exercises jurisdiction. I will only cite the opinion of one of them—the late Dr. Westlake. In dealing with coast fishing vessels he writes: "But if the captures were made in pursuance of a Government order, the Prize Court, in the absence of anything to the contrary in the constitution of the country, will be bound by such an order emanating from the authority under which it sits" (see vol. 2, p. 155); and, in dealing more generally with the subject, this learned and esteemed author writes: "Question of prize have always been matters of the domestic jurisdiction of the captor's country, commonly called the Admiralty jurisdiction from its original form, by whatever name the branch exercising it may be known in any modern system of procedure. It is open to all those of any nationality whose interests may be affected by its decisions, and it is the duty of its judges—a duty in which they have seldom failed in any civilised country—to do justice to them all with strict impartiality. In that sense a Court of Admiralty is an international one, but in that sense only, for the law which it administers cannot help bearing the impress of its own nationality.

"A court must take its law from the authority under which it sits, and for a Court of Admiralty that authority has never been any other than that of its own country. It must apply any rules on international questions which it finds to be generally agreed on—a condition which involves the agreement of its own country with them. Where there is no general agreement, and the supreme authority of its own country has not taken a decided line, the court must take that line which justice appears to it to require, whether favourable or not to a fellow subject being a party before it, or to what it may conceive to be the interest of its country. But where the supreme authority under which it sits has taken a decided line, a Court of Admiralty, like any other court, can only obey. Thus we have seen the English Parliament and Privy Council determining from time to time whether neutral goods in enemy ships should be deemed lawful prize, and the English Admiralty deciding one way in 1357 and the other way two centuries and a half afterwards. When the famous Orders in Council laid down rules as to neutral shipping for the then naval war which were certainly not justifiable otherwise than by way of retorsion against the Berlin and Milan decrees, the British Admiralty did not and could not presume either to refuse execution to the orders, or to exercise an independent judgment as to their justification" (vol. 2, pp. 317, 318).

I am not called upon to declare what this court would, or ought to, do in an extreme case if an Order in Council directed something to be done which was clearly repugnant to and subversive of an acknowledged principle of the law of nations. I make bold to express the hope and belief that the nations of the world need not be apprehensive that Orders in Council will emanate from the Government of this country in such violation of the acknowledged law of nations that it is conceivable that our prize tribunals, holding the law of nations in reverence, would feel called upon to disregard and refuse obedience to the provisions of such orders.

For the reasons, historical and other, which I have endeavoured to set forth, I am of opinion that nothing contained in the provisions of Order XXIX of the Prize Court Rules is repugnant to international law, and that the powers intrusted to, and to be exercised by, the court under the order are in accordance with the inherent powers of the court itself and are well within the rights of the Crown under the statutory provisions referred to, no less than under its prerogative authority.

I therefore order the copper to be delivered up to the Crown as prayed by the summons.

Prize—British ship—Goods shipped at foreign port—Shipment prior to outbreak of war—Goods consigned to enemy subject at enemy port—Goods in transitu—Sale by enemy subject to neutral—Sale completed before outbreak of war—Imminence of war—Contemplation of war—Validity of sale—Bona fides—Right of capture of goods.

Where upon the facts of the case it appears that goods consigned to an enemy subject at an enemy port, and shipped before the outbreak of hostilities, are sold bonâ fide to a neutral purchaser during the period of their transit, neither the vendor nor the purchaser having the war itself in contemplation, the transaction of sale is complete and the goods are not subject to capture at sea by the armed vessels of the country which is at war with the vendor's country.

IN this case the Crown claimed the condemnation of two consignments of barley on board the British steamship Southfield. The vessel sailed from a Russian Black Sea port in the month of July 1914, and the barley on board was the property of German merchants, on whose account it was consigned to a German port. Whilst the vessel was on its voyage the barley was sold, in two parts, to neutral subjects. The vessel was captured and brought into a British port, and the barley was subsequently sold. The neutrals claimed to be entitled to the proceeds of the sale.

July 15. — The PRESIDENT. — The question which arises for decision in the case of each of the two consignments of barley depends upon the effect of the intervention of a state of war upon the rights of capture of a belligerent in respect of goods sold by an enemy subject to a neutral whilst the goods and the ship in which they are laden are in transitu.

The goods consisted of quantities of barley shipped before the outbreak of war at a Russian port in the British steamship Southfield. The barley was the property of German subjects, and it was consigned to a German port. During the voyage from Russia to Germany the barley was sold in two different lots to two Dutch merchants, Henkers and Berghoorn, both carrying on business at Groningen, in Holland. The transactions connected with the sale to the former took place between the 20th and the 28th July 1914, whilst those connected with the sale to the latter took place during the last week of July of last year. Apart from any question depending upon the intervention of a state of war, there is no dispute whatever that the property in the goods had passed to the neutral purchasers prior to the date of the capture of the vessel—namely, the 8th Aug.

On the part of the Crown it is contended that when war broke out between Great Britain and Germany, on the 4th Aug. 1914, the goods which were still in transitu became subject to confiscation by the Crown, and were still confiscable at the date of the capture, in spite of the prior sale to neutral subjects. The claim of the Crown is based upon the ground that at the time when the sales were carried out war was imminent between Great Britain and Germany, or that it was in the contemplation of the enemy vendors. It is, therefore, important to examine very closely and carefully the principle which governs the right of capture of goods when they have been transferred in transitu, and to ascertain its limits accurately, because of the loose manner in which it is sometimes stated.

In order to deduce the rule, it will be sufficient, I think, for me to refer to two leading cases, and to a statement contained in an authoritative textbook. I shall take them in order of date. First, in the case of The Vrow Margaretha (Roscoe's English Prize Cases, vol. 1, 149; 1 Ch. Rob. 338), Lord Stowell in the course of his judgment refers to the subject as follows: "In the ordinary course of things in time of peace—for it is not to be denied that such a contract may be made, and effectually made (according to the usage of merchants)—such a transfer in transitu might certainly be made. It has even been contended that a mere delivering of the bill of lading is a transfer of the property. But it might be more correctly expressed, perhaps, if said that it transfers only the right of delivery; but that a transfer of the bill of lading, with a contract of sale accompanying it, may transfer the property in the ordinary course of things, so as effectually to bind the parties, and all others, cannot well be doubted. When war intervenes, another rule is set up by Courts of Admiralty which interferes with the ordinary practice. In a state of war, existing or imminent, it is held that the property shall be deemed to continue as it was at the time of shipment till the actual delivery. This arises out of the state of war, which gives a belligerent a right to stop the goods of his enemy. If such a rule did not exist, all goods shipped in an enemy's country would be protected by transfers which it would be impossible to detect. It is on that principle held, I believe, as a general rule, that property cannot be converted in transitu, and in that sense I recognise it as the rule of this court. But this arises, as I have said, out of a state of war, which creates new rights in other parties, and cannot be applied to transactions originating, like this, in a time of peace."

Secondly, in the work of Story, J. on the Principles and Practice of Prize Courts, that celebrated jurist states the rule in the following passage (Pratt's Story, pp. 64-65): "In respect of the proprietary interests in cargoes, though, in general, the rules of the common law apply, yet there are many peculiar principles of prize law to be considered; it is a general rule that, during hostilities, or imminent and impending danger of hostilities, the property of parties belligerent cannot change its national character during the voyage, or, as it is commonly expressed, in transitu. This rule equally applies to ships and cargoes; and it is so inflexible that it is not relaxed, even in owners who become subjects by capitulation after the shipment and before the capture. But if the ship sails before hostilities, when there is a decided state of amity between the two countries, and before the capture the owner again becomes a friend, and at the time of the capture, and also at the time of adjudication, he is in a capacity to claim, the Prize Courts will then give him the benefit of the principle, that the national character cannot be altered in transitu, and will restore to him. The same distinction is applied to purchases made by neutrals of property in transitu, if purchased during a state of war, existing or imminent, and impending danger of war, the contract is held invalid, and the property is deemed to continue as it was at the time of shipment until the actual delivery. It is otherwise, however, if a contract be made during a state of peace, and without contemplation of war; for, under such circumstances, the Prize Courts will recognise the contract and enforce the title acquired under it. And property is still considered in transitu, if it be ultimately destined to the hostile country, notwithstanding it has arrived at a neutral port, and the ship is there changed. The reason why Courts of Admiralty have established this rule as to transfers in transitu during a state of war, or expected war, is asserted to be that if such a rule did not exist all goods shipped in the enemy's country would be protected by transfers, which it would be impossible to detect."

The last of the authorities which I shall quote is The Baltica (Roscoe, vol. 2, 628; 11 Moo. P. C. 141). In the judgment of the Lords of the Privy Council sitting to hear appeals in prize, Lord Kingsdown (then Mr. Pemberton Leigh) deals with the rule as applicable to ships and goods in the following passages: "The general rule is open to no doubt. A neutral, while a war is imminent, or after it has commenced, is at liberty to purchase either goods or ships (not being ships of war) from either belligerent, and the purchase is valid, whether the subject of it be lying in a neutral port or in an enemy's port. During a time of peace, without prospect of war, any transfer which is sufficient to transfer the property between the vendor and vendee is good also against a captor if war afterwards unexpectedly break out. But, in case of war, either actual or imminent, this rule is subject to qualification, and it is settled that in such case a mere transfer by documents, which would be sufficient to bind the parties, is not sufficient to change the property as against captors, as long as the ship or goods remain in transitu. With respect to these principles, their Lordships are not aware that it is possible to raise any controversy; they are the familiar rules of the English Prize Courts, established by all the authorities, and are collected and stated, principally from the decisions of Lord Stowell, by Story, J. in his Notes on the Principles and Practice of Prize Courts, a work which has been selected by the British Government for the use of its naval officers as the best code of instruction in the prize law. The passages referred to are to be found in pp. 63-64 of that work. . . . In order to determine the question, it is necessary to consider upon what principle the rule rests, and why it is that a sale which would be perfectly good if made while the property was in a neutral port, or while it was in an enemy's port, is ineffectual if made while the ship is on her voyage from one port to the other. There seem to be but two possible grounds of distinction. The one is, that while the ship is on the seas, the title of the vendee cannot be completed by actual delivery of the vessel or goods; the other is that the ship and goods, having incurred the risk of capture by putting to sea, shall not be permitted to defeat the inchoate right of capture by the belligerent Powers until the voyage is at an end. The former, however, appears to be the true ground on which the rule rests. Such transactions during war, or in contemplation of war, are as likely to be merely colourable, to be set up for the purpose of misleading, or defrauding captors, the difficulty of detecting such frauds, if mere paper transfers are held sufficient, is so great that the courts have laid down as a general rule that such transfers, without actual delivery, shall be insufficient; that in order to defeat the captors the possession, as well as the property, must be changed before the seizure. It is true that, in one sense, the ship and goods may be said to be in transitu till they have reached their original port of destination; but their Lordships have found no case where the transfer was held to be inoperative after the actual delivery of the property to the owner."

It might be argued that, according to these authorities, transfers in transitu are invalid against belligerent captors upon the intervention of a state of war unless there is an actual delivery before capture; or, in other words, that if a state of war has intervened no transfer by documents alone can defeat the right of capture. But, in my opinion, that proposition is much too wide, and is not an accurate delimitation of the true rule.

In the passages cited, Lord Stowell speaks of "a state of war existing or imminent"; Story, J. of "a state of peace, without contemplation of war," and of "a state of war, existing or imminent, and impending danger of war"; and Lord Kingsdown of "war, either actual or imminent," of "war unexpectedly breaking out" (contrasting it with "a time of peace, without prospect of war"), and of "transactions during war, or in contemplation of war." It is important to note the reasons for the rule, which are elaborated by Lord Kingsdown in the latter part of the portion of his judgment which I have quoted.

In my view, the element that the vendor contemplates war, and has the design of making the transfer in order to secure himself and to attempt to defeat the rights of belligerent captors, is necessarily involved in the rule which invalidates such transfers. Sales of goods upon ships which are afloat are now of such common occurrence in commerce that it would be too harsh a rule to treat such transfers as invalid, unless such an element actually exists at the time of the transfer.

I have been considering the rule so far as it applies to the sale or transfer of goods; but it is as well to note that special and highly artificial rules as to the transfer of vessels during or preceding a state of war are now laid down in the Declaration of London of 1908, as agreed to by the representatives of the Powers, and as applied by the Orders in Council in this country. But these rules have no application to goods or merchandise.

As to the facts connected with these two cases of sale, it is abundantly clear that the neutral purchasers acted with complete bona fides throughout the respective transactions. They paid for the goods, and re-sold them to neutral customers of their own before war was declared, and I am satisfied that whilst the negotiations were proceeding they never contemplated the outbreak of hostilities between this country and Germany. This would not necessarily conclude the matter. But I am also satisfied that the vendors did not have the war between Germany and this country (to which the ship carrying the goods belonged) in contemplation when they sold the goods. They acted in good faith just as much as the purchasers did. The imminence of war between Germany and Russia has no materiality in considering these cases.

In the light of after events, the war between this country and Germany may be spoken of as having been imminent, regarded from the point of view of time, in the last two weeks of July; but there is no evidence that it was regarded as imminent in its proper meaning of "threatening or about to occur" by them at that time; not only so, but I find, after investigation in various directions, and on grounds which I deem satisfactory, that it was not in fact so regarded by them. What the hidden anticipation of the Government of the German Empire may have been upon the subject it is not for me to speculate; but I may express my humble opinion that our intervention in the war upon the invasion of Belgium in defence of treaty obligations against the breach of such obligations by the invaders was a complete surprise even to their own Government.

On the grounds that the German vendors had no thought of the imminence of war between Germany and this country, and did not have such a war in contemplation at any time while the transactions of sale were taking place, or before they were completed, I hold that the sales to the two Dutch merchants were valid, and that the goods were not confiscable. I therefore decree the release to them respectively of the net proceeds of the sale of their respective goods which are now in court.

CENTRAL ARGENTINE RAILWAY LIMITED v. MARWOOD. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Charter-party — Demurrage — Strike clause, construction and effect of—Delay.

The appellants chartered the steamer G. to carry a cargo of coal, of which they were the conignees, from B. Dock to V. C. in the Argentine.

By clause 8 of the charter-party the cargo was to be taken from alongside by the consignees at the port of discharge free of expense and risk to the steamer at the average rate of 200 tons per day, weather permitting, Sundays and holidays excepted, provided the steamer could deliver at that rate. If the steamer were longer detained the consignees were to pay demurrage at the rate therein specified, "time to commence when the steamer is ready to unload and written notice given whether in berth or not. In case of strikes, lock-outs, civil commotions or any other causes or accidents beyond the control of the consignees which prevents or delays the discharging, such time is not to count unless the steamer is already on demurrage."

The steamer arrived at V. C. and notice of readiness to discharge was given on the 12*th Jan.*, 1912. At the date of her arrival there was a strike of engine drivers and stokers at the port, which continued until the 15*th Feb.*, 1912, but there was a partial resumption of the work of discharging coal-laden steamers at the port between the 27*th Jan. and the* 15*th Feb., and during that period there were discharged from the various steamers in the port delayed by the strike* 6269 tons of coal = 6¼ normal days' work, the normal rate of discharge from the four berths in the port being 1000 tons per day. The G. did not get into berth till the 1*st March, and completed her discharge on the* 23*rd March.*

Held, that the words "such time" in clause 8 of the charter-party meant the time for which the discharging was actually prevented or delayed by the strike, and had no application to delay in getting a berth in consequence of a strike having delayed the discharging of other ships; and that the 6¼ could be counted by the owner as lay days.

London and Northern Steamship Company Limited v. Central Argentine Railway Limited (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 303; 108 L. T. Rep. 527) approved.

Decision of Court of Appeal affirmed.

APPEAL by the charterers from an order of the Court of Appeal (Lord Reading, C.J. and Lush, J.—Phillimore, L.J., dissentiente), which reversed a judgment of Pickford, J.

The writ in the action was issued on the 5th May, 1913, the plaintiff thereby claiming as managing owner and part owner of the steamship Goathland on behalf of himself and co-owners in the vessel the sum of 238*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.* for demurrage of the Goathland in discharging a cargo of coal at Villa Constitucion.

No pleadings were delivered in the action, as the parties agreed that the issue should be tried and decided upon a statement of agreed facts which were as follow:

1. The plaintiff is the managing owner and part owner of the steamship Goathland and is suing in this action on behalf of himself and his co-owners.

2. The Goathland was chartered under a charter-party dated the 11th Nov. 1911 to carry a cargo of coal from Barry Dock to Villa Constitucion.

3. The defendants were the charterers and also the receivers of the cargo carried in the Goathland.

4. The Goathland carried 4169 tons of cargo on the voyage in question. On a calculation of the time allowed by the charter party the vessel had 20 days 20 hours for discharging, subject to the exceptions specified in the charter-party.

5. The Goathland arrived at Villa Constitucion, and notice of readiness to discharge was given at 4.30 p.m. on Friday, the 12th Jan. 1912, and she was then ready to discharge.

6. At the time of the arrival of the Goathland at Villa Constitucion there was a strike of railway engine drivers and stokers in existence at the port, which strike began 6th Jan. 1912.

7. The said strike continued until the 15th Feb. 1912 on which day it officially terminated under a Decree o the Government of the Argentine Republic. No work of discharging coal-laden steamers took place in the port from the date of the Goathland's arrival until the 27th Jan. 1912, and it is admitted by the plaintiff that the work of discharging coal-laden steamers in the port was impossible during that time owing to the said strike.

8. Between the 27th Jan. 1912 (when there was a partial resumption of the work of discharging) and the 15th Feb. 1912 there were discharged from the various steamers in the port 6269 tons of coal, which is equal to 6¼ normal days' work. This work the defendants were able to do in spite of the strike, but the defendants were prevented by the said strike from discharging any further quantity of coal between the said dates.

9. Under ordinary circumstances the discharge of coal from all steamers in the Port of Villa Constitucion is 1000 tons per day, there being four berths in the port at which discharging can take place and the normal amount discharged being 250 tons for each steamer. The said 6269 tons were all discharged from steamers occupying the said four berths, and the said steamers were all delayed by the said strike and not by any congestion or unusual number of steamers arriving at Villa Constitucion.

10. The Goathland did not get into berth until 11.30 a.m. on Friday, 1st March, 1912, and she did not complete her discharge until 10 a.m. of Saturday, the 23rd March 1912.

11. The defendants admit although work was not fully resumed on the 16th Feb. 1912, or for some time thereafter, that the steamer's lay time began to count as and from midnight of the 15th Feb. 1912, and calculating on this basis (excluding Sundays and holidays) they admit 30 days and 10 hours as having been occupied up to the time of the discharge of the cargo and they admit and have paid to the plaintiff 9 days and 14 hours' demurrage.

12. The dispute between the parties relates solely to the period between the 27th Jan. 1912 and the 15th Feb. 1912, both days inclusive. During this time the Goathland was, though ready to discharge, not in berth, and could not be berthed or discharged, because the said four berths were occupied by other steamers which had arrived at Villa Constitucion before the Goathland, and which had been delayed in discharging and remained occupying the said four berths by reason of the said strike.

13. The plaintiff claims that he is entitled to count 6¼ days during the said period, whilst the defendants contend that he is not entitled to count anything in respect of the said time.

14. Assuming that the plaintiff's contention is correct, then the vessel's discharging time of 20 days 20 hours expired at 2 p.m. of the 6th March 1912, and 16 days 20 hours' demurrage is due, against which the defendants have paid 9 days 14 hours, leaving still due 7 days 6 hours amounting to 238*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.*

15. Assuming that the defendants' contention is correct then the plaintiff has been paid the whole of the demurrage due to him.

The question in dispute turned mainly upon the construction of clause 8 of the charter-party as applied to the agreed facts.

Clause 8 of the charter-party was and is as follows:—

8. The cargo to be taken from alongside by consignees at port of discharge, free of expense, and risk to the steamer, at the average rate of 200 tons per day, weather permitting, Sundays and holidays excepted, provided steamer can deliver it at this rate; if longer detained consignees to pay steamer demurrage at the rate of fourpence per net register ton per running day (or pro rata for part thereof). Time to commence when steamer is ready to unload and written notice given, whether in berth or not. In case of strikes, lock-outs, civil commotions, or any other causes or accidents beyond the control of the consignees which prevents or delays the discharging, such time is not to count, unless the steamer is already on demurrage. Consignees to effect the discharge of the cargo, steamer paying one shilling per ton of 20 cwt., or 1,015 kilos, and providing only steam, steam-winches, winchmen, gins, and falls.

The action was tried before Pickford, J, sitting as judge in the Commercial Court, who decided the question in favour of the defendant company, but on appeal his decision was reversed by the majority of the Court of Appeal.

The defendant company appealed.

Sir Robert Finlay, K.C., D. C. Leck, K.C., and A. M. Bremner, for the appellants.

Adair Roche, K.C. and Raeburn for the respondent.

Leck, K.C. in reply.

Lord PARKER OF WADDINGTON. — The first question your Lordships have to determine in this case concerns the construction of clause 8 of the charter party of the 11th Nov. 1911, whereby the appellants chartered the Goathland to carry a cargo of coal from Barry Docks to Villa Constitucion, the appellants being themselves the receivers of the cargo at the port of discharge. The eighth clause provides that the cargo is to be taken from alongside by the consignees at the port of discharge free of expense and risk to the steamer at the average rate of 200 tons per day, weather permitting, Sundays and holidays excepted, provided the steamer can deliver at this rate. If the steamer be longer detained, the consignees are to pay demurrage at the rate therein specified. Time is to commence when the steamer is ready to unload and written notice given, whether in berth or not. Then came the words, "in case of strikes, lock-outs, civil commotions, or any other causes or accidents beyond the control of the consignees which prevents or delays the discharging, such time is not to count unless the steamer is already on demurrage." This clause cannot be said to be happily framed. There is no antecedent to which "such time" can be referred so as to give any reasonable meaning to the words. It appears to me therefore, that "such time" must mean either (1) the time during which any of the matters enumerated is operating to prevent or delay the discharge of the steamer, or (2) the time for which the discharging is actually prevented or delayed. The appellants contend that the former construction is the true one. Scrutton, J. decided in an action of London and Northern Steamship Company Limited v. Central Argentine Railway Limited (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 303; 108 L. T. Rep. 527) in favour of the latter construction, and the Court of Appeal have adopted the same view. In my opinion the Court of Appeal were right. If the former construction were adopted, it might lead to anomalous results. Suppose, for example, that, notwithstanding a delay caused by a strike, the consignees succeeded in discharging 90 per cent. of the cargo. In such a case the lay days could not have commenced to run at all, and the consignees would have the whole of them to discharge the remaining 10 per cent. of the cargo, and might be as dilatory as they chose during this period. The latter construction is open to no such criticism. According to it, only the time lost would be excluded from the computation of the lay days, a perfectly reasonable arrangement, fair to both parties. A charter party is a business document and must be construed, at any rate where its terms are ambiguous, with some regard to business principles. It cannot, I think, be inferred from the second clause of the charter party, where the expression "the time lost" is actually used, that the parties must have meant something different by "such time," as used in clause 8. A charter party is not generally prepared with meticulous attention to consistency in the use of language. It may well embody clauses taken from a variety of precedents, and found by experience to be sufficient for working purposes.

The second question for decision arises in the following manner. The Goathland arrived at its port of destination on the 12th Jan. 1912, and on the same day at 4.30 p.m. gave notice that she was ready to discharge. At this time there was a strike of railway engine-drivers and stokers in existence at the port, and between the 12th Jan. and the 27th Jan. 1912, no work of discharging coal-laden steamers took place, such work being rendered impossible by reason of the strike. The respondent admits that the whole of this period is excluded by virtue of clause 8 in the computation of the lay days. On the 27th Jan. work at the port was partially resumed, and between that date and the 15th Feb. 1912, when the strike ended, 6,269 tons of coal were discharged from four steamers which had arrived in the port prior to the Goathland, and occupied the only available berths. The normal discharging capacity of the port is 1000 tons a day, 250 tons per vessel; the 6269 tons discharged between the 27th Jan. and the 15th Feb. represent, therefore, 6¼ normal days working. It follows that the delay due to the strike during this latter period is the difference between the whole period and 6¼ days. The respondent admits that this difference ought to be excluded by virtue of clause 8 in computing the lay days. The appellant contends that the 6¼ days ought similarly to be excluded. This is the only dispute between the parties.

The appellant bases this contention on the following reasoning. It is admitted, he says, that the Goathland could not get a berth because all the berths were occupied by the other four vessels. It is further admitted that between the 27th Jan. and the 15th Feb. 1912 these vessels had been delayed in discharging and remained occupying the four berths because of the strike. Therefore it was because of the strike that the Goathland could not get to berth.

If your Lordships be of opinion that the construction of clause 8 for which the appellants contended is the true construction, this reasoning is obviously correct. But if "such time" in clause 8 means the time lost by reason of the strike, the reasoning is, in my opinion, fallacious. On this construction the only question is whether the 6¼ days is time lost by reason of the strike, and to state that the question in this way is, in fact, to answer it. The 6¼ days represent, in fact, time gained, notwithstanding the strike, during every moment of which the difficulty in the way of the berthing of the Goathland was being removed. It appears to me that the appellants, having already had all the benefit to which they are entitled under clause 8 by the exclusion in the computation of the lay days of all time lost by reason of the strike, are endeavouring, to the extent of 6¼ days, to secure that benefit a second time, and that the syllogism on which they base their contention pays less regard to the substance of the matter than to the verbal expressions contained in the agreed statement of facts. It must be remembered that according to the express terms of the charter party the lay days commence to run whether the vessel is or is not berthed. It follows, that the mere fact of the four available berths being already occupied when the vessel arrives is no reason for excluding any period of time from the computation of the lay days. Any hardship on the charterers in this respect is probably intended to be obviated by the fact that the lay days are calculated with reference to an average discharge of 200 tons per day only, though the normal rate of discharge at the port is 250 tons a day. The period of delay due to the occupancy of the four berths would in any case be counted in reckoning the lay days, and there is nothing in the statement of facts to show that this period was increased by reason of the strike beyond the period which the respondent has already allowed between the 12th Jan. and the 15th Feb. We are not told when the four vessels respectively went into berth or what was the tonnage of their respective cargoes.

In my opinion therefore the appeal should be dismissed with costs, and I move accordingly.

Lord SUMNER.—I think that clause 8 of this charter-party was rightly construed in London and Northern Steamship Company v. Central Argentine Railway Limited (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 303; 108 L. T. Rep. 527). Its effect is thus stated by Pickford, J. in the present case, "for so much time as the discharging is prevented or delayed by the excepted causes, for so much time an allowance is to be made out of the lay-days." Scrutton, J. in the former case and the Court of Appeal in the present one gave illustrations which show how unreasonable the contrary interpretation would be.

The charter party is in a general form adapted to all sorts of vessels. The clause begins by showing how to calculate the number of lay-days to be allowed to the particular ship as her discharging time. Then it states when that time so calculated is to begin; then how and when it may be suspended. In my opinion, "such time" means the discharging time of the ship in question, and it is to be suspended and is not to count in case of strikes preventing or delaying the discharging of the ship. Sundays and holidays, which, as such, are not to count in the computation of lay-days, are separately excepted. Strike time is only excepted when the strike delays the ship in question, not when it simply occurs or even simply delays other ships.

The suggestion was made that the parties meant to suspend discharging time in the bare event of a strike operating upon the discharge of shipping generally, because in some ports the actual effect of strikes on a particular ship is so uncertain as to be unascertainable, at any rate with precision. If so, the clause involves the ship's unconditional surrender to the charterer, merely in order to avoid putting him to the expense of proving his right to come within the exemption, a stretch of complaisance that I think improbable.

I do not construe the agreed statement of facts as warranting the inference drawn at the trial, that "had it not been for the strike the four steamers would have been discharged and the berths would have been free, and therefore the Goathland would have been discharged in ordinary course." I think that the statement is consistent and is meant to be consistent with the arrival of some or all of these vessels so short a time before the Goathland's arrival, that considerable delay, or even delay as long as that now in question, might have happened to her in ordinary course.

Be this as it may, I do not think the charterers can succeed. It is to be remembered that when notice of readiness has been given, the ship being then ready to unload, the shipowner's part is done and the risk of delay, including the risk of want of a berth, falls on the charterer, subject to his right to bring himself within the strike clause in question, if he can. The words are express, "whether in berth or not." I think the words "which prevents or delays the discharging" mean strikes which in themselves prevent or delay the discharging of the chartered ship herself, and do not extend to the case of strikes which only prevent the chartered ship from getting into a berth because they prevent some other ship from getting out of that berth. Further, the Goathland was not delayed by the fact that partial discharging went on during the 75 hours in question, but by the total absence of any discharging during the earlier days. The fact that more work was not done during the 75 hours, may, in a sense, have delayed her, though even so, not for the 75 hours, but in truth the work actually done during that time advanced instead of delaying her discharging, because pro tanto it brought her nearer to the point at which she could berth and begin her discharge.

I am of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Lord PARMOOR.—The appellants chartered the steamship Goathland to carry a cargo of coal, of which they were the consignees, from Barry Dock to Villa Constitucion. The respondent, as managing owner and part owner of the said steamship, brought an action against the appellants for the sum of 238*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.* for demurrage. The Goathland arrived at Villa Constitucion and notice of readiness to discharge was given on the 12th Jan. 1912, and she was then ready to discharge. When the Goathland arrived at Villa Constitucion, there was a strike of railway engine-drivers and stokers, which had begun on 6th Jan. and continued until the 15th Feb. Between the 27th Jan., when there was a partial resumption of the work of discharging, and the 15th Feb., there were discharged from the various steamers in the port 6,269 tons of coal, which is equal to 6¼ normal days' work. The Goathland did not get into berth until Friday, the 1st March, and did not complete her discharge until Saturday, 23rd March. The dispute between the parties relates solely to the period between the 27th Jan. and the 15th Feb. The respondent claims that he is entitled to count 6¼ days during the said period, while the appellants contend that the respondent is not entitled to count any days during this period.

The case depends upon the construction of clause 8 of the charter-party. Under this clause the appellants undertook to discharge at the average rate of 200 tons per day, weather permitting, Sundays and holidays excepted, provided steamer can deliver at this rate. The time commences when the steamer is ready to unload and written notice given, whether in berth or not, so that the risk of finding a vacant berth was on the appellants.

The important words of the clause are as follows: "In case of strikes, lock-outs, civil commotions, or any other causes or accidents beyond the control of the consignees which prevents or delays the discharging, such time is not to count, unless the steamer is already on demurrage." It was argued on behalf of the appellants that so long as the strike continued the time did not count, and that since the strike did not terminate until the 15th Feb., the respondent is not entitled to count any days or parts of days between that date and the 27th Jan. I do not think that this is the natural meaning of the words used. Such time means time wasted, either by prevention or delay, in discharging a steamer from strike, lock-out, civil commotion, or any other cause or accident beyond the control of the consignees, and in this respect I agree with the contention of the respondent and the judgment in the Court of Appeal. It necessarily follows that the 6¼ days not wasted during the period between the 27th Jan. and the 15th Feb. should be counted in the discharging time.

One of the effects of the strike was that the Goathland could not be berthed because the four berths at Villa Constitucion were occupied by other steamers which had arrived before the Goathland. These steamers had been delayed in discharging, and remained occupying the four berths by reason of the strike. In my opinion the occupation of the four berths makes no difference. There was an obligation upon the appellants to discharge whether or not there were vacant berths, so soon as the Goathland was ready to unload, and written notice had been given.

In my opinion, the appeal fails.

Lord WRENBURY.—On the question of construction, I am of opinion that the words "such time" mean the time for which the strike prevents or delays the discharging. The time which has commenced is not to count as running during the period over which discharge is prevented or delayed by a strike. The English is not good, but the meaning, I think, is plain.

I learn from the agreed statement of facts that during the period from the 27th Jan. to the 15th Feb. the Goathland could not be berthed or discharged, because the four berths were occupied by other steamers, and that those steamers remained occupying the berths by reason of the strike. These statements may be compressed into the single statement that the Goathland failed to get a berth by reason of the strike. But under the charter time is to commence when steamer is ready to unload and notice given whether in berth or not. The charterer took the risk of being unable to get a berth. The Goathland was prevented from discharging, not by the strike, but by a consequence of the strike, namely, that the berths were occupied by other vessels longer than they otherwise would have been. From the 12th Jan. to the 27th Jan. she was also unable to get a berth. She has, however, rightly or wrongly, been allowed this time, because there was a strike. She is really seeking to be allowed this time over again. There is nothing to show that if there had been no strike she would have been able to get a berth at once upon arrival on the 12th Jan. Neither is there anything to show that if the four ships had arrived just before her, say, on the 11th Jan., they would have discharged and left the berths free in time to allow her to escape demurrage. There are not, I think, facts to support the charterer's contention.

I think the appeal fails, and must be dismissed.

Order accordingly.

PORT OF LONDON AUTHORITY v BRITISH OIL AND CAKE MILLS LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Port — London—Port rates — Exemption—Goods imported for transhipment only — Goods imported for conveyance by sea to any other port coastwise—Transhipment of goods in Port of London for Rochester—Port of London Act 1908 (8 Edw. 7, c. 68), s. 13—Port of London (Port Rates on Goods) Provisional Order Act 1910 (10 Edw. 7 & 1 Geo. 5, c. c.), schedule, s. 9.

By sect. 13, sub-sect. 1, of the Port of London Act 1908: "All goods imported from ports beyond the sea or coastwise into the Port of London or exported to parts beyond the seas or coastwise from that port" shall be liable to port rates.

from or exported to a place seaward of a line drawn from Reculvers Towers to Colne Point."

By sect. 9 of the Provisional Order confirmed by the Port of London (Port Rates on Goods) Provisional Order Act 1910: "No port rates shall be charged by the Authority on transhipment of goods, which expression wherever used in this order means and includes goods imported for transhipment only" and "for the purposes of this section the expression 'goods imported for transhipment only' shall mean goods imported from beyond the seas or coastwise for the purpose of being conveyed by sea only to any other port, whether beyond the seas or coastwise."

Goods were imported from beyond the seas into the Port of London for transhipment only, and were duly certified by the owners as being for transhipment. They were conveyed by a sailing barge down the Thames to Rochester on the Medway.

Held, that the goods were exempted from port rates as they were goods imported for transhipment only within sect. 9 of the Provisional Order.

DEFENDANTS' APPEAL from an order of the majority of the Court of Appeal (Buckley, L J. dissentiente), 12 Asp. Mar Law Cas. 548; 111 L. T. Rep. 1019; (1914) 3 K. B. 1201, which affirmed a judgment of Pickford, J., 12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 417; 109 L. T. Rep. 859; (1914) 1 K. B. 5, who tried the case as a commercial cause without a jury.

The plaintiff's claim was for 1*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* as money paid to the defendants under duress to obtain the release of 100 tons of linseed, the amount in question being claimed as port dues. They claimed a declaration that the levying of such port dues was illegal. The question arose on the following facts: The steamship Assyria arrived from Calcutta at the Victoria Docks on the 12th June, 1912. She discharged 100 tons of linseed consigned to the plaintiffs by putting them overside into a sailing barge which took them to Rochester, on the Medway, The Port Authority claimed 1*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* rates on these goods, on the ground that the Port of Rochester was inside the Reculvers line. The plaintiffs paid the rates under protest and brought the action claiming the return of the money and a declaration as above stated.

Pickford, J. decided against the defendants.

At the hearing of the appeal counsel for the appellants were alone heard.

The House, having taken time for consideration, dismissed the appeal.

Lord ATKINSON.—This is an appeal from an Order of the Court of Appeal, dated the 18th July 1914, upholding the judgment of Pickford, J. (as he then was) pronounced by him in the Commercial Court on the 17th Oct., 1913, in favour of the respondents in an action brought by the latter against the former to recover the sum of 1*l.* 13*s.* 4*d*, money paid under protest for foreign inwards port rates on 100 tons of linseed at 4*d* per ton.

The facts are undisputed. A ship named the Assyria arrived from Calcutta in the Victoria Docks, in the Port of London, on the 12th June, to be there discharged. She had on board 100 tons of linseed consigned to the respondents, who carry on their business at Rochester. This linseed was discharged by putting it over the side of the Assyria into a sailing barge. This barge sailed with her cargo down the Thames to the mouth of the river Medway, crossed the imaginary line which marks the northern boundary of the Port of Rochester, proceeded up the river Medway to the place within this port where the goods were delivered to the respondents.

The appellants claimed payment of the above-mentioned rates upon these goods solely on the ground that the Port of Rochester was inside an imaginary line which extends from Colne Point to Reculvers, two points on opposite sides of the river Thames, in argument referred to, for convenience sake, as the Reculvers line. The respondents paid these rates under protest.

It is admitted that this Reculvers line lies considerably to the eastward of the seaward boundary of the Port of London. This latter is an imaginary line drawn from Warden Point on the south side of the Thames to Havengrove Creek on the north. Within the zone between these two imaginary lines lie on the southern shore of the Thames Whitstable and Herne Bay, and to seaward of the Reculvers line on the same shore Westgate and Margate, so that according to the right claimed by the appellants at the time they exacted these rates they could not have exacted them at all if the sailing barge had been bound for Westgate or Margate, though to arrive at either of these destinations she should have traversed more of the waters of the Port of London than if she had gone to Rochester, and would in addition have traversed the waters within the zone, and the waters seaward of the Reculvers line, the accommodation received in the Victoria Docks being in each case precisely the same.

It is further admitted that if the Assyria had sailed direct from Calcutta through part of the waters of the Port of London into the Port of Rochester none of these rates could have been exacted. Nay, more; it is also admitted that according to the right claimed, if the Assyria had unloaded in the Victoria Docks all the cargo she carried, except this linseed, she could have delivered it at Rochester, Whitstable, or Ramsgate free of this rate.

These appear to me to be grotesque results, without any principle of reason or common sense to support them.

The question for the decision of this House then really is whether the construction of the Port of London Act 1908 and the Port of London (Port Rates on Goods) Provisional Order Act 1910, contended for by the appellants, from which these results necessarily follow, or the construction of them adopted by the Court of Appeal from which these results do not follow, is their true construction. The material portions to be considered of the two statutes are the thirteenth section of the first and the ninth section of the second.

First as to sub-sect. 1 of sect. 3: This section has been styled. in argument, a charging enactment. It might much more correctly be styled an empowering enactment. It enables the Port Authority, subject to the provisions of the section, to impose certain rates on all goods imported from parts beyond the seas or coastwise into the Port of London, or exported to parts beyond the seas or coastwise from that port. The class of goods which is liable to the rate exacted in this case is thus defined or ascertained.

The section further provides for exemptions, or rebates being made either by Provisional Order or by the Local Authority, and enacts that the port rates charged by the Local Authority shall be charged equally to all persons in respect of the same description of goods under the like circumstance.

Now, it is quite clear that goods merely carried from one part of the Port of London to another part of the Port of London are not, as to that particular voyage, either imported into the Port of London or exported from the Port of London.

By proviso (b) of this section, it is enacted that the Provisional Order dealing with exemptions shall provide for exempting two classes of goods, namely, (1) goods imported for transhipment, (2) goods which remain on board the ship in which they were imported for conveyance therein to another port. These latter may, for convenience, be styled undisturbed goods. Stopping there for the moment, it will be observed that these undisturbed goods are to be exempted, to whatever port they may ultimately be conveyed. The words are simply "another port." No matter how long the ship may lie in the docks, or what portions of the waters of the Port of London it may traverse, these goods apparently escape, but not more completely, as far as this portion of proviso (b) is concerned, than do goods imported for transhipment only.

Proviso (b) is equally imperative as to the exemption of each. Both classes are placed on an absolute equality. The last clause of proviso (b), however, enacts that the Provisional Order may determine what goods are to be treated as goods imported for "transhipment only" for the purposes of exemption.

By sect. 9 of the Provisional Order of 1910 it is proposed to put in force the powers indicated in this clause. It provides that no port rate shall be charged upon "transhipment goods." That is its first provision, and as subordinate to this it then enacts that the expression "transhipment goods" shall, in the Order, mean and include goods imported for transhipment only, and also the goods which I have styled "undisturbed goods." The equality of treatment of the two classes of goods, made imperative by proviso (b), is thus preserved.

But now comes the provision contained in the same section which, according to the appellants, destroys that equality of treatment altogether—and enables the second class of goods, namely, undisturbed goods, though still "transhipment goods," to escape, if they be carried out by the Port of London to any port whatever, while the other kind of "transhipment goods" are not to escape unless they be carried to a port beyond the Reculvers line. The words relied upon to establish this strange and, apparently, senseless anomaly are contained in the definition in section 9 of the phrase, "goods imported for transhipment only." The definition runs thus: "For the purposes of this section the expression 'goods imported for transhipment only' shall mean goods imported from beyond the seas or coastwise for the purpose of being conveyed by sea only to another port."

If the definition had stopped there the equality of treatment of the transhipped goods and the goods left undisturbed would, subject to the point as to the meaning of the word "sea," have been preserved. But other words are added to the definition upon which the whole argument turned. These words are, "Whether beyond the seas or coastwise." The effect, it is urged, of these added words is that while undisturbed goods may be conveyed to any port without being rateable, transhipped goods will be rateable unless carried to a port beyond the Reculvers line. This definition is only given for the purposes of sect. 9. That is stated expressly, but the primary purpose of the section is stated in its first clause, to be to exempt equally from these rates all "transhipment goods," including in that term both undisturbed goods and transhipped goods properly so called.

The words, beyond the seas or coastwise, are here used to denote the situation of the port which is the ultimate destination of the goods, and just as the undisturbed goods which must be carried by water to their destination, inasmuch as they are to be carried in the ship in which they were brought to London, so must the transhipped goods be conveyed by sea only, as contradistinct from being conveyed for any part of the transit by land. It was urged indeed that the goods in this case were not carried by "sea only," since they were carried over the waters of the Thames, within the Port of London, and that the Thames, though a tidal and navigable river for many miles above the Victoria Docks, is still a river and not a sea.

It is but fair, I think, to the Port Authority to say that they never put forward this point when they levied their rate. If it were a good point, then goods transhipped in the Port of London and carried to Edinburgh, Hull, Liverpool, or Calcutta, would not have been carried by "sea only," since part of the voyage would necessarily have been over the waters of a river, and the whole object of the statute introduced for the very purpose of exempting goods transhipped in the Port of London and carried out of it in ships would be defeated. In my view it is a plainly bad point.

The main argument was rested, however, on the words, "another port whether beyond the seas or coastwise." It was urged that by sect. 3 of the Provisional Order it is provided that expressions defined in the Port of London Act 1908 shall, unless the context otherwise requires, have the same meaning in this Order; that sect. 13, sub-sect. 5, contains a definition of the word "coastwise," and that that word must therefore bear the meaning thus given to it wherever it occurs.

The words of sect. 13, sub-sect. 5, run thus: "For the purpose of this section goods shall not be treated as having been imported or exported coastwise unless imported from or exported to a place seaward of a line drawn from Reculvers Towers to Colne Point."

These words are used in this thirteenth section for the purpose of indicating the places from which goods must be imported into the Port of London, or to which they must be exported from the Port of London in order to become goods liable to rates.

But the purpose of sect. 9 is wholly different. Its purpose and object is to determine what goods, in order to be exempted from rates, are to be treated as "goods imported for transhipment only." The words, "Goods imported from beyond the seas or coastwise," where they first occur in section 9 are really otiose, because the whole section purports to deal with goods which but for the exemption would have been rateable, yet no imported goods are rateable which are not imported into the Port of London from "beyond the seas or coastwise." So that these words are merely used to indicate that the goods imported for transhipment belong primâ facie to the class of rateable goods. And, of course, the words must for that purpose have the same meaning as they have in sect. 13, but where the words "beyond the sea or coastwise," are subsequently used in the section merely to indicate the ultimate destination of the goods after transhipment if they are to escape rateability, it by no means follows that the words are to bear the same meaning in this part of the section as they bear in the portion in which they first appear. In my view they are simply used in the second portion as equivalent to the word, "anywhere."

That construction restores and establishes on a sure basis that equality of treatment between goods "transhipped" and goods "undisturbed" which it is plainly the object of both Acts to secure. As the latter may be taken to "any port," wherever situate, so may the former.

Sect. 43 of the Act of 1908 has no application whatever to the case of undisturbed goods brought from the Port of London to any other port, and in no way explains what is the particular vice in a barge into which goods have been transhipped and brought to Rochester, which makes those goods liable to these rates, which they would not have been liable to at all if they had been carried to Rochester in the ship which brought them into London.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the judgment appealed from was right, and should be affirmed, and this appeal be dismissed with costs. I beg to move accordingly.

[Lord Atkinson then read the judgment of Lord Dunedin.]

Lord DUNEDIN.—In this case I began to prepare a judgment in accordance with the view which I held at the conclusion of the argument, but in doing so, and on carefully re-reading the judgment of Kennedy, L.J., in the court below, I came to the conclusion that that learned and lamented judge had so exactly expressed the arguments that weighed with me that I should really be guilty of plagiarism if I repeated what he had already said. I shall therefore only say that I agree with his judgment in toto.

Lord PARKER of WADDINGTON.—I agree that this appeal fails. The question to be determined arises on the construction of sect. 13 of the Port of London Act 1908 and the Provisional Order of the Board of Trade, made thereunder, and confirmed by the Port of London (Port Rates on Goods) Provisional Order Act 1910. The thirteenth section of the Act of 1908 provides, subsect. 1, that all goods imported from parts beyond the seas or coastwise into the Port of London, or exported to parts beyond the seas or coastwise from that port, shall, subject to any exemptions or rebates to be contained in a Provisional Order to be made under this section, be liable to the port rates therein mentioned: Provided (b) that the Provisional Order under the section shall provide for exempting from such rates goods imported for transhipment only or which remain on board the ships in which they were imported for conveyance therein to another port, and may determine what goods are for the purposes of such exemption to be treated as goods imported for transhipment only.

The expression "imported or exported coastwise" is obviously here used in contradistinction to the expression "imported or exported from or to parts beyond the seas." Goods imported or exported from or to Newcastle would clearly be imported or exported coastwise, notwithstanding that the first part and the last part of their transit would be up or down tidal and navigable rivers. I think, therefore, that the term "coastwise" must include transit by tidal and navigable rivers as well as transit along the sea coast, and this is confirmed by sub-sect. 5, which provides that for the purpose of the section goods shall not be treated as having been imported or exported coastwise unless imported from or to a place seaward or what his been called "the Reculvers-Colne line." This provision is not a definition clause as to the meaning of the word coastwise, but a clause withdrawing from the operation of the section a particular class of goods which would otherwise be subject to such operation.

Passing to the Provisional Order, your Lordships will find the Board of Trade, pursuant to the duty imposed on them by sect. 13 (1) (b) of the Act of 1908, provided (clause 9) that no port rates should be charged on transhipment goods, which expression was to include as well goods imported for transhipment only as goods remaining on board the vessel in which they were imported for conveyance therein to another port. The clause then proceeds to provide that the expression "goods imported for transhipment only" shall mean goods imported from beyond the seas or coastwise for the purpose of being conveyed by sea only to any other port, whether beyond the seas or coastwise, as to which certain things therein mentioned are specified and proved. Here it seems to me that the expression "goods imported from beyond the seas or coastwise" has the same meaning as in sub-sect. 1 of the thirteenth section of the Act of 1908, but clause 9 contains no provision such as that contained in sub-sect. 5 of sect. 13, limiting the application of the clause to a particular class or particular classes of such goods. It would, I think, be contrary to all proper principles of construction to import such a clause by inference. I do not think that the words, "for the purpose of this section," in sub-sect. 5 of the thirteenth section of the Act of 1908 can be read as including all the purposes of the Provisional Order to be made by the Board of Trade under the thirteenth section. So to read it would, in my opinion, be to limit unduly the powers conferred on the Board of Trade, and, in fact, preclude such Board from exempting from port dues any goods imported for transhipment only where the transhipment is for the purpose of conveyance to a place landward of the Reculvers-Colne line. I do not think that this would be in accordance with the Legislature's intention. It would be an anomaly if a vessel coming to the Port of London with goods destined for places in the Medway had herself to proceed to the Medway in order to obtain exemption for such goods from port rates, although from every point of view it might be more convenient to tranship such goods into lighters for conveyance to their destination.

Some stress was laid in argument on the expression "for the purpose of being conveyed by sea only" as used in the ninth clause. It is to be observed that this expression is used in reference not only to conveyance coastwise, but to conveyance to parts beyond the seas. It appears to me, therefore, that the expression is used in contradistinction to conveyance by land, and would exclude goods put overboard into lighters to be landed and sent by rail to Liverpool for exportation to America, but not goods transhipped for conveyance by water to Newcastle as their ultimate destination, although the first and last part of their transit might be said to be by river rather than by sea.

I think, therefore, the appeal should be dismissed.

Lord SUMNER.—Sect. 13 (1) of the Port of London Act, 1908, charges "all goods imported from parts beyond the seas or coastwise into the Port of London." "Imported" into the port means, in my opinion, brought in by water and not by land, and "coastwise" means from parts not beyond the seas. Sub-sect. 5, pursuant to the initial words of sub-sect. 1, qualifies the by excluding from charge goods coming from landward of the Reculvers Towers-Colne Point line, for it prescribes that they are not to be "treated" as having been "imported coastwise," that is, not to be treated as the subject of charge within sub-sect. 1. There the effect of sub-sect. 5 ends.

The rates to be charged and exemption from all charge are not dealt with by the Act of 1908 at all. They are wholly left to subsequent legislation, none the less that the Board of Trade is required to prepare a Provisional Order, so as to facilitate the passing of a further Act, whenever the Legislature should be minded to do so. For the rates resort must be had to the Schedule to the Port of London (Port Rates on Goods) Provisional Order Act, 1910, clause 9. This contains an exemption of certain goods from charge, namely, goods which are styled "transhipment goods."

These are defined as falling into two classes, which so far appear to be equally entitled to exemption. The first class is further defined by two terms, one dealing with the provenance of the goods, the other with their qualification for exemption. The first necessarily imports reference to the charging section of the Act of 1908 the goods is such as to make them subjects and its sub-sections, for unless the provenance of charge they need no exemption at all. Accordingly here "coastwise" is used as it is used in sect. 13 of the Act of 1908, reading sub-sects. 1 and 5 together, and so far restricting the area to which the word "coastwise" applies. When the term, which states the qualification of the goods for exemption is reached, we are dealing with new matter—namely, with rates of charge and exemption from charge—which the former Act did not prescribe at all. Hence there is no need here to import any reference to the language of sect. 13 of the Act of 1908, and though the same term "coastwise" recurs it must be read in its ordinary meaning. Indeed, sect. 13 of the Act of 1908 did not, strictly speaking, give that word a special meaning, but by sub-sect. 5 restricted, by an express geographical limitation, the area to which its ordinary meaning would have otherwise applied. In the Act of 1910 that limitation neither recurs nor is involved; accordingly, there is nothing to interfere with the full effect of the ordinary meaning of "coastwise."

Two grounds are urged to the contrary: the first, that the word must be used with the same meaning in both of the two consecutive lines, in which it occurs in clause 9; the second, that it is used in nineteen other places in the schedule and always in the same sense as when it first occurs in clause 9. This latter consideration does not really advance matters. It is used over and over again in that particular sense, because the context is the same over and over again and is one which imports a reference to the incidence of the charge in the first instance. Hence its repeated use in this sense is no weightier than its use in that sense once; but, in my opinion, there is no difference in the sense of the word itself between its first and its second occurrence in clause 9. The real difference is that when allusion is made to the charge, the context of the charging words given to sect. 13, sub-sect. 1, by sub-sect. 5 is necessarily drawn in, and so restricts the application of the word, but, when it is exemption only that is dealt with, that context has no place and so does not operate upon or restrict the natural meaning of the word. If the definition words in clause 9 be written out in full, this at once appears—"for the purposes of this section the expression 'goods imported for transhipment only' shall mean goods imported from beyond the seas into the Port of London and goods imported coastwise into the Port of London, provided they be goods imported thither from a place seaward of a line drawn from Reculvers Towers to Colne Point, which goods have been so imported for the purpose of being conveyed by sea only to any other port whether beyond the seas or coastwise, etc." I am unable to see why "coastwise" may not be an adjectival expression descriptive of the word port as one speaks of "coastwise navigation" or of a "coastwise voyage," just as the expression "beyond the seas" in the same clause is a descriptive adjectival expression. "Coastwise" is not a word of technical meaning: (Battersby v. Kirk, 2 Bing. N. C. 584). To refer both to "conveyed" is to rearrange this section, for which the reason that "coastwise" implies motion rather than situation seems to me to be insufficient. The whole subject is importation and conveyance, and in that connection the terminus ad quem may, not inappropriately if perhaps inelegantly, be called "coastwise," as well as the process of getting there.

The other point is this. It is said that these goods, even though imported for the purpose of being conveyed to any other port whether beyond the seas or coastwise, were not imported for the purpose of being conveyed by sea only, for they were to go down one river nearly to its statutory mouth and then turn up another river on reaching its statutory mouth, where it joins the former, and so never were to go to sea at all. In my opinion, here the natural antithesis to "by sea" is "by land," and is not "by river." If these words mean "for the purpose of being conveyed wholly by sea and never by river," transhipment goods going in another bottom to half the ports in Great Britain get no benefit from the exemption at all. For this the Act shows no reason and would conflict with the undoubted grant of exemption where they go in the same bottom. If they mean "partly by sea though partly by river," the word "only" is falsified. I see no adequate justification for resorting to any non-natural meaning of "by sea." What is being dealt with is "navigation" which is not "inland navigation." I think the appeal fails.

Lord PARMOOR. — The steamship Assyria arrived from Calcutta for discharge at the Victoria Docks, in the Port of London, in June 1912. She discharged 100 tons of linseed, part of her cargo, belonging to the respondents, within the Port of London by putting them overside into a sailing barge, which took them to the port of Rochester on the Medway. The appellants contend that the 100 tons of linseed are not "transhipment goods," or "goods imported for transhipment only," and therefore not free from port rates under sect. 9 of the Port of London (Port Rates on Goods) Provisional Order Act 1910. The question is whether this contention is well founded. I agree with the judgment of Pickford, J., and of the majority in the Court of Appeal. In my opinion the appeal fails.

Sect. 13 of the Port of London Act 1908 provides for the payment of port rates upon goods imported from the ports beyond the seas or coastwise into the Port of London, or exported to ports beyond the seas or coastwise from that port. In ordinary language, port rates are charged on all goods from whatever port they come and to whatever port they go. Goods imported or exported coastwise mean goods imported or exported as between the Port of London and some other port in the United Kingdom. Goods imported or exported from or to ports beyond the seas mean goods imported or exported between the Port of London and some port outside the United Kingdom. The contrast arises in the position of the port of origin or the port of destination. In subsect. 5 of the section, a limitation is placed on the ordinary meaning of goods imported or exported coastwise for the purpose of the section. It is provided that goods shall not be treated as having been imported or exported coastwise unless imported from or exported to a place seaward of a line drawn from Reculvers Towers to Colne Point. The object of this limitation is to exempt from port rates goods which have not been carried across the line drawn from Reculvers Towers to Colne Point,. But for this limitation, goods, not being goods for transhipment only, passing between the ports within the line and the Port of London would be subject to the same charges as goods passing coastwise between the Port of London and any other port in the United Kingdom.

Sect. 13 of the Act enacts that the Provisional Order to be made under the section shall provide for exempting from rates goods imported for transhipment only, or which remain on board the ship in which they were imported for conveyance thereon to another port, and may determine what goods are for the purposes of such exemption to be treated as goods imported for transhipment only. This Provisional Order was made in 1910, and contains a definition of goods imported for transhipment only. For the purposes of exemption from port rates, goods imported for transhipment only mean goods imported from beyond the seas or coastwise for the purpose of being conveyed by sea only to any other port, whether beyond the seas or coastwise. It is admitted that the respondents complied with all the conditions entitling them to exemption if the 100 tons of linseed were imported for transhipment only. It is noticeable that the exemption applies to all goods, whether imported from beyond the seas or coastwise.

The main argument advanced on behalf of the appellants was that the 100 tons of linseed had not been conveyed coastwise from the Port of London to the Port of Rochester, because they had not crossed the line from Reculvers Towers to Colne Point. In other words, that the limitation introduced into sub-sect. (5) of sect. 13 of the Act of 1908 should be read into the definition of goods for transhipment only in the Provisional Order for 1910. This contention is, in my opinion, untenable. There is no reason for construing the expression "coastwise," in the definition of goods imported for transhipment only in any other than its ordinary natural meaning, or for excluding from the exemption goods imported from Calcutta for the purpose of being conveyed by sea only from the Port of London to the Port of Rochester.

It was said that the area of exemption in the Provisional Order should be the same as the area of charge under the Act of 1908. The effect of the limitation of the expression "coastwise" in the Act is to exclude from the liability to port rates goods not carried outside a definite area, but the Provisional Order deals with a different subject-matter. The exemption is general, and the test is in the purpose for which the goods are imported, if the other conditions are satisfied. If goods are imported for the purpose of transhipment only to any port, whether beyond the seas or coastwise, the exemption attaches. There is no exception of certain ports because they are situate within the line from Reculvers Towers to Colne Point. The exemption applies to goods imported for the purpose of being transhipped from the Port of London to the Port of Rochester. It was further argued, on behalf of the appellants, that the goods of the respondents were conveyed along the Thames from the Port of London and along the Medway to the Port of Rochester, and, therefore, were not conveyed by "sea only." In one sense, as was pointed out in argument, no goods transhipped at the Port of London are conveyed to any other port by sea only, since the Port of London is situate within the River Thames. I think, however, that the meaning of the words is clear. The contrast is necessarily between goods conveyed seaward from the Port of London to any other port, and goods conveyed inland by rail, road, or inland navigation. It makes no difference that the Port of Rochester is approached by a river navigation. There are many ports both in the United Kingdom and beyond the seas approached by river or some form of artificial waterway, but the exemption depends on conveyance seawards from the Port of London and not on the nature of the approach to the port to which the goods are conveyed.

I think the appeal fails. Appeal dismissed.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Wednesday, June 30, 1915.

(Before Lord Cozens-Hardy, M.R., Pickford and Warrington, L.JJ.)

Austin Friars Steam Shipping Company v. Spillers and Bakers Limited (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Marine insurance — General average — Collision with pier — Knowledge that collision would take place — Reasonable and prudent act — Contribution.

The owners of a steamship claimed from the cargo owners contribution in general average in respect of two items of alleged general average sacrifice and expenditure. On the 6th Nov. 1912 the ship was bound for certain docks, and on proceeding up the river she grounded within a short distance of the docks. The following morning she floated, and was carried by the tide to about a mile above the entrance to the docks, where she became stranded. She was seriously damaged, and there was imminent danger to both ship and cargo. On the 7th Nov. she was got off by means of tugs. She had no steam available, and only her hand steering gear to work with. There was a pilot on board, and the intention was formed at first to take her down the river to a mud flat for the greater safety of the ship and cargo. When she had been towed about half a mile she was found to be making water, and it was then decided to take her into dock, which necessitated her being taken between two piers. The ebb tide was running very strongly, and it was contemplated by the master and pilot that she would strike the lower pier and do damage. In considering the choice between going to the mud flat and hitting the pier, the master and pilot both formed the opinion that the latter would be the lesser of two evils. She struck the pier with her starboard bow, and damaged herself and the pier.

Held, that in the circumstances of the present case what was done was a general average act; and that the plaintiffs were entitled to contribution, not only for damage to the ship, but also for the damage for which she was liable by reason of damage to the pier.

Decision of Bailhache, J. affirmed.

Appeal by the defendants from the decision of Bailhache, J.

The facts of the case and the arguments of counsel sufficiently appear from the judgments.

On the 21st Dec. 1914 the following written judgment was delivered by Bailhache, J.—In this case the plaintiffs, the owners of the steamship Winchester, claim from the defendants, the owners of the cargo, contribution in general average in respect of two items of alleged general average sacrifice and expenditure. The defendants deny their liability upon the ground that the items in question are neither general average sacrifice nor expenditure.

The facts are not in dispute and are as follows: The steamship Winchester was, on the 6th Nov. 1912, bound for Sharpness Docks, with a cargo of maize. As she was proceeding up the Severn, and a little way short of the docks, she grounded. She floated next morning on the flood tide and was carried by the tide further up the Severn to a point about a mile above the entrance to the docks, where she was stranded. She became very seriously damaged and both ship and cargo were in imminent danger. On the morning of the 7th Nov. she was got off the ebb tide with the assistance of tugs. She had no steam of her own, and only her hand-steering gear was available.

She had a pilot on board, and the intention at first was to take her down the river to a place called Ackthorn, and there put her on the ground for the greater safety of ship and cargo. After she had been towed about half a mile, the carpenter reported that she was making water, and the master and pilot thereupon consulted and decided to take her into dock. To get there she had to be taken between two piers. The ebb tide was running strongly, as it does in the Severn, and both master and pilot contemplated her striking the lower pier and doing damage.

The pilot, in fact, intended that she should touch the lower pier, as he said, to take the reach off her, and he remarked that it was not the time to trouble about another thousand pounds' worth of damage. The master and pilot both considered that as between going to Ackthorn and hitting the pier, the latter was the lesser of two evils, and took action accordingly. As was anticipated, she struck the pier with her starboard bow, and struck it twice, in fact. She struck harder than the pilot intended, and damaged herself to the extent of about 1600*l.*, and the pier to the extent of about 5000*l.* These are the two items in question. I find as a fact that to put into Sharpness with the knowledge that in doing so the steamship would strike the pier was a reasonable and prudent thing to do in the interests of ship and cargo.

Now the operation of getting the Winchester off and taking her either to Ackthorn or into Sharpness was, under the circumstances, a general average act, and a general average loss is defined in the Marine Insurance Act 1906, s. 66, as being "a loss caused by, or directly consequential on, a general average act. It includes a general expenditure as well as a general average sacrifice."

Lawrence, J. in Birkley v. Presgrave (1 East, 220) defines general average loss in terms which have become classical. He says: "All loss which arises in consequence of extraordinary sacrifices made or expenses incurred for the preservation of the ship and cargo come within general average, and must be borne proportionately by all who are interested."

(a) Reported by L. C. Thomas and E. A. Scratchley, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law

There is probably no real difference between the two definitions. If there is, the statutory definition must prevail.

I only quote the well-known definition from Lawrence, J.'s judgment because I want to refer to a passage in Mr. Lowndes' work on general average which is extremely pertinent to the question I have to decide. It was written, of course, before the Act of 1906, and if I am to rely upon it, it is necessary to see that the law was the same then as now.

Mr. Lowndes, in his book on general average, 4th edit., p. 36, says, in respect of what constitutes a general average loss: "We have to determine quod pro omnibus datum est? and, since giving must always imply an intention to give, what we have here to ascertain must be, what loss at once has, in fact, occurred, and likewise must be regarded as the natural and reasonable result of sacrifice. Or, in other words, what the shipmaster would naturally, or might reasonably, have intended to give for all when he resolved upon the act. Mr. Lowndes cites a passage from Ulrich on General Average, which is worth repeating here. He says: "General average not only comprises the damage purposely done to ship and cargo, but also (1) all damage or expense which was to be foreseen as the natural (immediate) consequence of the first sacrifice, since this unmistakably forms part of that which was given for the common safety; (2) all damage or expense which, though not to be foreseen, stands to the sacrifice in the relation of effect to cause, or, in other words, was its necessary consequence. Not so, however, those losses or expenses which, though they would not have occurred but for the sacrifice, yet, likewise would not have occurred but for some subsequent accident."

Both these passages are quoted with approval by Bigham, J. in the Anglo-Argentine Live Stock and Produce Agency Limited v. Temperley Steam Shipping Company Limited (8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 595; 81 L. T. Rep. 296; (1899) 2 Q. B. 403). I cite them again because they seem admirable guides to me in the decision of this case.

Following these guides it is quite clear upon the facts stated by me that the damage to the steamship and to the pier both fall within the statutory definition of general average loss. This disposes of the right to contribution in respect of the damage to the steamship, and would dispose of the right to contribution in respect of the damage to the pier, but, strangely enough, there is no decision to be found upon the point whether general average expenditure includes the making good of damage done to the property of some third person.

In principle, in such a case as this, it clearly does. If I ask Mr. Lowndes' question, Quod pro omnibus datum est? I answer, the damage to the steamship plus the liability to indemnify the dock authorities for the damage to their pier; and if I now turn to Ulrich, the collision with the pier was a foreseen result, and not the result of a subsequent accident. So far as text writers are concerned, there is authority in favour of such expenditure being treated as a general average expenditure. Phillips on Insurance, 5th edit., vol. 2, par. 1311, says so, and refers to Casarigis for his authority; Sir Joseph Arnould in his work, the last edition edited by himself, the second edition, vol. 2, p. 912, sect. 331, is to the same effect.

Mr. Leslie Scott urged that the law of general average has long since become crystallised, and that no further extension of it is possible, except, of course, by legislation. The answer is that it is not an extension of the law to apply old principles to new instances.

It was also suggested by Mr. Leslie Scott that as to run into a pier was vis-à-vis the dock authorities a tort, and as there is by English common law no contribution between joint tort feasors, there is no right to contribution in general average. This assumes that the dock company could have sued the cargo owner for the damage done by the ship to the pier, an interesting point which I should not be prepared to decide without argument and consideration.

I do not, however, think that the common law rule applies in any sense to general average. In my judgment the position is this: The master has implied authority when occasion arises for a general average act to do whatever is necessary and prudent for the preservation of ship and cargo, even if this involves committing a trespass, and that there is the further implied obligation, on the part of the cargo-owner and ship-owner, to bear between them in their respective proportions the consequences of every such necessary or prudent act.

This implied obligation may perhaps be said to be contractual as between shipowner and cargo-owner, but I rather incline to the view expressed by Brett, J. in Burton v. English (49 L. T. Rep. 768; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 187; 12 Q. B. Div. 220) that it comes from the old Rhodian Laws, and is incorporated into English law as the law of the ocean. It is scarcely necessary to say that maritime law as administered in this country, although part of the law of England, is not necessarily the same as our common law. The every-day instance of this is the difference in result in collision cases on land and on sea, where both parties are in fault.

My judgment, therefore, is for the plaintiffs in this case, with costs.

From that decision the defendants now appealed.

Pickford, L.J.—This is an appeal from the decision of Bailhache, J., who gave judgment for the plaintiffs in an action for a certain contribution in general average. I do not think that it is necessary to state the case at any length because the facts are admitted, and they are accurately stated in that judgment.

Put shortly, the facts amount to these: The vessel, which was chartered under a charter whereby average was to be paid according to the York-Antwerp rules, on her voyage to Sharpness Docks grounded on what I think was a rocky beach not very far from Sharpness. Whilst she lay there the whole adventure (ship, cargo, and freight) was in very considerable danger. It was decided, in order to minimise that danger, to take her down the river and run her upon a mud flat called Ackthorn. It was known to the captain and pilot who decided to do that, that that would in all human probability cause damage to her. That mud-flat was lower down in the river than the entrance to Sharpness Docks. I forget whether or not it was an ebb tide, but at the state of the tide as it then was there was a certain danger in going into Sharpness Docks between the piers.

Whilst she was going down the river, in consequence of certain matters discovered by the master and pilot, it was decided that it would be more dangerous to take her to Ackthorn and ground her there than it would be to take her into Sharpness Docks. But it was known to both the master and the pilot that it was practically certain, at that state of the tide, that going into Sharpness Docks the vessel would suffer damage. It was realised that she might or might not damage the pier. I do not know whether they considered that or not. But they certainly considered and said that in the state of things that existed a thousand pounds or so more damage would make no difference to anyone, They clearly contemplated that there would be damage and loss in all probability if they took her into Sharpness Docks. They took her in and there was damage to the ship and to the pier. There was damage to the ship, and there was a liability arising on the part of the ship to pay the Harbour Authority compensation for the injury done to the pier.

On that two questions are raised: It is said that this is not a general average act and therefore there can be no general average loss, and therefore there can be no contribution. It does not seem to me to be disputed that under the York-Antwerp rules, if she had been voluntarily stranded, where there was certainty of damage, on the mud-flat at Ackthorn, in order to avoid greater damage, that would have been a general average act. It was said that that was not so under the circumstances that existed. I confess that I am unable to follow that argument. It is said to be part of the whole consequences of the particular average, the particular average being the loss that was occasioned by the first stranding upon the bank above Sharpness Docks. It seems to me that if she were there in a position which produced danger to the whole adventure, and in order to minimise that danger a voluntary act was done which occasioned damage to one of the elements of the adventure—namely, the ship—that is a general average act. It does not seem to me to make any difference that there were two things that might have been done: that she might have been stranded voluntarily upon the Ackthorn mud-bank, or that she might have been taken into dock.

Nor does it seem to me to matter that that was her port of discharge. She would never have gone into her port of discharge under the circumstances that she did but for the purpose of avoiding greater damage to the whole adventure. It seems to me in that case it is just as much an act done in the sacrifice of one of the elements of the adventure for the safety of the whole as if it were a port of refuge. I cannot see the difference between the port of refuge and port of discharge. Upon that point, which was really the main point, it seems to me clear that this was a general average act.

I do not think it is necessary to lay down any principles as to what is a general average act in the case of voluntary stranding, but it seems to me in the circumstances of this case that this was a general average act.

Then the only other question is whether, if that be so, the plaintiffs were entitled to contribution not only for damage to the ship, but also for the damage for which the ship is liable by reason of damage to the pier. Mr. Leslie Scott very fairly said that he could not see any reason in principle why the one should not be on the same footing as the other, and I agree with him because I can see no reason either. The artificial doctrine of tort feasor established by Merryweather v. Nixan (8 T. R. 186) is not applicable to the present case, and it is not a doctrine which one is anxious to take further than it should go.

I think that Bailhache, J.'s judgment is right, and I do not think it is necessary to do more than say that I agree with what he said on that matter and with his reasoning.

Therefore I think that this appeal should be dismissed.

Charter-party—Sale of vessel after date of charter-party—Tender of vessel—Refusal of charterers to load—Effect of sale.

On the 15th Sept. 1913, a vessel which formerly belonged to the claimants was chartered by the respondents to proceed to Odessa and load wheat or other grain for Rotterdam or Hamburg. While the vessel was discharging, before proceeding to Odessa, she was sold by the claimants, who duly notified the charterers of the sale. She was duly tendered for loading at Odessa, but the respondents refused to provide a cargo. In arbitration proceedings it was found as a fact that the claimants were ready and willing to perform their contract, and that they had duly tendered the vessel. On a case stated:

form all the obligations under the contract, the original owners were not precluded from carrying out the contract by the mere transfer of the ship with the benefit of the charter-party.

Decision of Atkin, J. (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 1; 112 L. T. Rep. 294; (1915) 1 K. B. 307) affirmed.

APPEAL by the charterers from a decision of Atkin, J. on a case stated as follows:—

1. Whereas by a berth contract dated the 15th of September, one thousand nine hundred and thirteen, and made between Fratelli Sorrentino (therein described as the owners of the steamship Rosalia) and Elias Buerger and S. Teper (thereinafter and hereinafter described as the charterers), it was agreed that the said steamship Rosalia should proceed as ordered to Odessa, Nicolaieff, Theodosia, or Novorossisk, one port only, and there load as ordered, from one or more shippers, a full and complete cargo of wheat, (and or) grain, (and or) seed, for Rotterdam, Weser, or Hamburg, as ordered on signing bills of lading. Freight was to be paid at the rate mentioned in the berth contract.

2. By clause 4 of the said berth contract it was provided that orders for the loading port were to be given at Constantinople within ten running hours of the dispatch of the captain's telegram notifying the charterers of his arrival, and that if the orders were not given by the charterers within the said ten running hours the steamer was to proceed to Odessa Roads for orders, which were to be given within six running hours of arrival, Sundays only excepted.

3. By clause 5 of the said berth contract it was stipulated that the charterers were not bound to load before the 1st Oct. then next (new style), and that they were to have the option of cancelling the contract if the steamer did not arrive at the port of loading and was not ready as mentioned in the berth contract on or before 6 p.m. on the 25th October then next (new style).

4. By clause 21 of the said berth contract it was agreed that in the event of any dispute arising under the contract such dispute should be referred to two arbitrators in London, one to be appointed by each of the parties to the berth contract with power to the arbitrators in case of disagreement to appoint an umpire whose award should be final.

5. And whereas disputes did arise the said Fratelli Sorrentino duly appointed Mr. C. W. Gordon as their arbitrator, and the charterers duly appointed Mr. F. W. Temperley as arbitrator on their behalf, and the said two arbitrators having been unable to agree duly appointed me, the undersigned Charles Thomas Glanville as umpire.

6. And whereas on the hearing of the said reference both parties applied to me to state a case for the opinion of the court upon certain questions of law arising.

7. Now I, the said Charles Thomas Glanville, having taken upon myself the burden of the said reference, and having duly considered the evidence put before me do hereby make my award in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court as follows:—

8. A true copy of the berth contract above referred to and dated the 15th Sept. 1913 is hereto annexed and may be referred to as part of this award.

9. On the 25th Sept. 1913 whilst the steamship Rosalia was discharging a cargo of coal at Venice the said Fratelli Sorrentino entered into a contract for the sale of the said vessel to the Societa Anonima di Navigazione Adriatica (hereinafter called the Adriatica), an Italian company domiciled in Venice. The said contract contained the following clauses: "The sellers declare that the steamer is chartered from the Black Sea to Rotterdam at 12*s.* per unit, 12*s.* 3*d.* for Weser, 12*s.* 6*d.* for Hamburg with the 25th Oct. cancelling as per berth contract which will be handed over in a few days. . . ." "The buyers declare that they accept fully the execution of the charter-party for the Black Sea voyage to one of the ports as ordered on signing B/L for their entire risk and advantage, undertaking every obligation relating thereto." The berth contract or charter-party so referred to is the one now in question.

10. The said contract also provided for opening up for examination by the Adriatica of the engines, boilers, and double bottom of the said steamship, and the Adriatica were to declare within twenty-four hours of the opening of the last double bottom cell whether they accepted the steamer or not, and if they did accept her, the steamer thereupon became the absolute property of the buyers.

11. On the 4th Oct. the Rosalia was taken over by the Adriatica after the completion of the discharge of her coal cargo at Venice.

12. At Venice the steamer had her boilers cleaned and repaired, and certain repairs were effected to her engines, which occupied her six and a half days after the completion of the discharge. Such repairs were necessary in order to put the vessel in a seaworthy condition for the intended voyage. I find as a fact if and so far as it may be material that this delay was not more than a reasonable delay for the effecting of ordinary overhaul and repairs to a steamship in the ordinary course of business, and there was no unreasonable delay in the vessel proceeding from Venice to fulfil the said berth contract.

13. On the 11th Oct. the vessel sailed from Venice for Constantinople with a view to fulfilling her berth contract in question, and her departure was duly telegraphed to the charterers.

14. On the 11th Oct. Messrs. Jackson Brothers and Cory, the brokers acting in London on behalf of Fratelli Sorrentino, sent to Messrs. H. L. Milbourn and Co., the representatives of the charterers in London, a letter, of which the following is a true copy: "Under instructions from Messrs. Fratelli Sorrentino, we hereby beg to inform you that they have sold their steamship Rosalia to Messrs. The Societa Adriatica di Navigazione, and this latter firm will carry out the terms of the charter-party with you dated 15th Sept. 1913, which please note."

15. On the 13th Oct. Messrs. H. L. Milbourn and Co. wrote to Messrs. Jackson Brothers and Cory a letter in the following terms: "We are duly in receipt of your letter of the 11th inst., and in reply thereto would say it seems to us that Messrs. Fratelli Sorrentino have made no effort so far to perform their contract, and have now put it out of their power so to do, and our friends, Messrs. Buerger and Teper, do not propose to enter into fresh arrangements as to this vessel. Apart from this, perhaps you can inform us the cause of the extraordinary delay of the steamship at Venice. We have been expecting for some time past to hear her reported as passing Constantinopole."

16. On the contents of the last-mentioned letter being communicated to Fratelli Sorrentino and the Adriatica, both of these parties protested against the charterers' statements in the letter above set out and insisted that the contract should be fulfilled.

17. On the 15th Oct. the charterers' agents in London wrote to Messrs. Jackson Brothers and Cory that they considered that the contract was at an end, and the charterers claimed damages therefor and for the breach of the contract on the part of the owners to proceed with usual dispatch, and on the same day the charterers offered to load the vessel on the berth contract at a reduction of three shillings per unit in the freight, which amount approximated roughly to the fall that had occurred in the Russian freight market between the date of the berth contract and the 15th Oct.

18. The last-mentioned offer was not accepted, and on the 19th Oct. the vessel arrived at Constantinople, and the master duly cabled to the charterers for orders, and having received no reply within the time allowed by clause 4 of the berth contract, proceeded to Odessa Roads and applied to the charterers' agents for orders there, and receiving no orders within the time limited by the berth contract, the captain made a formal protest against the charterers and informed the Adriatica, who then chartered the vessel for other employment.

19. I find as a fact that the said vessel was duly tendered under the said berth contract; that Fratelli Sorrentino and the Adriatica were always ready and willing to do all things necessary on their part towards the fulfilment of the said contract, and the said vessel was not loaded solely by reason of the charterers' refusal to load her.

20. Subject to the opinion of the court on any question of law, I find that the charterers were guilty of a breach of the berth contract in refusing to load the vessel as above set out.

21. I find that the damages which arose from the said breach of contract amounted to 1012*l.* 14*s.* 3*d.*

22. If and so far as it may be material I find as a fact that apart from any question of responsibility under the sale contract to the Adriatica the said Fratelli Sorrentino have not suffered any pecuniary loss by reason of the breach of contract, the said loss having up to the present fallen on the Adriatica, for whose benefit and by whose sanction and approval the arbitration proceedings were brought by Fratelli Sorrentino

23. I further find as a fact that the charterers suffered no damages by the delay at Venice by the vessel executing repairs there as above stated.

24. The following points were raised by the charterers before me as raising questions of law on which they desired the opinion of the court should be taken. (i.) That by the sale of the said steamship Fratelli Sorrentino put it out of their power to and were not able to perform the contract. (ii.) That by reason of the alleged assignment by Fratelli Sorrentino to the Adriatica of the berth note, the rights of Fratelli Sorrentino under the berth note ceased. (iii.) That Fratelli Sorrentino did not prove any damage, and that they have suffered none in fact. (iv.) That as to the claim made on the ground that Fratelli Sorrentino may be liable to the Adriatica for damages in consequence of the charterers' refusal to carry out the contract. (a) That under the contract of sale Fratelli Sorrentino are not liable to the Adriatica for damages in this connection; (b) the charterers cannot be held liable in damages for a prospective claim; and (c) that such damages are n any event too remote. (v.) That with regard to the statement that Fratelli Sorrentino were claiming as trustees for and on behalf of the Adriatica, the charterers contended that they could not do this, they contended that the Adriatica had no claim because there was no assignment of the berth contract, and that if there were an assignment no notice was ever given of the assignment, and that if there were an assignment and notice that the berth contract was not assignable so as to bind the charterers without their assent. (vi.) The charterers also denied that any claim could be made by Fratelli Sorrentino as trustees for the Adriatica, because there was no contract between the Adriatica and the charterers, and no submission to arbitrate between them, and that the umpire had no jurisdiction to try any dispute between the Adriatica and the charterers.

25. As desired I have put the whole of these points before the court for the decision of any question of law arising thereon, having stated above my findings of fact.

26. Subject to the opinion of the court on any questions of law that may arise, I award that the said Fratelli Sorrentino recover from the charterers the said sum of 1012*l.* 14*s.* 3*d.* damages as above found, subject to Fratelli Sorrentino producing to the charterers an order by the Adriatica to pay the amount of the said award by the said Adriatica or their agents or a discharge by the Adriatica for the amount.

27. I further award and direct that the charterers do pay the fees and expenses of this reference and award, amounting to 138*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*, and that they also pay the costs of the said Fratelli Sorrentino upon the said reference, which I assess at 42*l.* If the said fees, expenses, and costs are paid in the first instance by the said Fratelli Sorrentino, they shall be entitled to recover same from the charterers.

28. If the court should be of the opinion that my award in par. 26 is wrong, and that the award should have been in favour of the charterers, then (subject to any direction of the court to the contrary) I direct that the said arbitrator's and umpire's fees and expenses and the costs of the charterers on the reference, which last-mentioned costs I assess at 42*l*, shall be borne and paid by Fratelli Sorrentino, and, if they shall be paid in the first instance by the charterers, that the charterers shall be entitled to recover the said amount from Fratelli Sorrentino.

As witness my hand this third day of July 1914.

Atkin, J. held that while a party to a contract cannot so assign it as to make the assignee solely liable, he may arrange for another person to discharge the burden of the contract in the first instance, provided it does not involve the doing of something which requires special performance by him, and that, inasmuch as the provision of a ship did not require any personal skill on the part of the owners, they were entitled to sue upon it, although they were only ready to perform it vicariously.

Judgment having been given for the claimants the charterers appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 28.—SWINFEN EADY, L.J. read the following judgment:—This is an appeal from the judgment of Atkin, J. upon a special case stated by an umpire, who made his award in that form. By a berth contract dated the 15th Sept. 1913, and made between Fratelli Sorrentino, therein described as the owners of the steamship Rosalia, of a maximum cargo capacity of 7000 tons, Italian flag, then at or due at Venice to discharge, of the one part and Elias Buerger and S. Teper, of Nicolaieff, charterers, of the other part it was agreed that the steamer should proceed as ordered to Odessa, or to one of three other named Black Sea ports, and there load as ordered from one or more shippers, a full and complete cargo of wheat, and (or) grain, and (or) seed for Rotterdam, Weser, or Hamburg, as ordered on signing bills of lading, on being paid freight at the rate of 12*s.* per unit Rotterdam, 12*s.* 3*d.* Weser, and 12*s.* 6*d.* Hamburg, with a reduction of 3*d.* per unit to be allowed on barley shipped. By the contract it was further provided that orders for the loading port were to be given at Constantinople within ten running hours from the time of dispatch of the captain's telegram notifying charterers of his arrival; and if orders were not given by the charterers within that time, the steamer was to proceed to Odessa Roads for orders, which were to be given within six running hours of arrival, Sundays only excepted. It was further provided that the charterers were not bound to load before the 1st Oct. (new style) and were to have the option of cancelling the contract if the steamer did not arrive at the port of loading on or before the 25th Oct. By clause 11 it was provided that the captain should sign bills of lading at not less than chartered rate, unless the difference between the above-named rates of freight and that payable under such bills of lading should be paid at port of loading before signing bills of lading, in cash, less 1 per cent. to cover insurance and all other charges. By clause 18, cash at port of loading for disbursements, not exceeding 700*l.*, was to be advanced to the captain if required by him, such advance to be indorsed by him on the bill of lading and to be deducted from freight at port of discharge, or to be repaid by captain's draft on his owners. By clause 20 it was provided that the charterers' liability under the contract was to cease when the cargo was shipped and the difference in freight, dead freight and demurrage at loading port had been paid. Any dispute arising under the contract was to be referred to arbitration.

The Rosalia, after discharging at Venice and executing certain repairs there, sailed for Constantinople on the 11th Oct. with a view to fulfilling the berth contract, and her departure was duly notified to the charterers. The umpire found that the repairs, which occupied six and a half days after the completion of the discharge, were necessary in order to put the vessel into a seaworthy condition for the intended voyage; and he found as a fact, if and so far as it might be material, that such delay was not more than a reasonable delay for the effecting of ordinary overhaul and repairs to a steamship in the ordinary course of business; and that there was no unreasonable delay in the vessel proceeding from Venice to fulfil the berth contract. On the 19th Oct. the vessel arrived at Constantinople, and the master duly cabled to the charterers for orders, and, not receiving any reply within the time allowed by clause 4 of the berth contract, the ship proceeded to Odessa Roads, and applied to the charterers' agents there for orders; and, not receiving any orders within the time limited by the berth contract, the captain made a formal protest against the charterers; and the vessel was then chartered for other employment. Between the date of the berth contract and the middle of October, the fall in the Russian freight market was approximately 3*s.* per ton.

It is now necessary to refer to the circumstances which occurred, which the charterers contend entitled them to treat the berth contract as at an end. On the 25th Sept. 1913, whilst the Rosalia was discharging a cargo of coal at Venice, the said Fratelli Sorrentino entered into a contract for the sale of the vessel to the Società Anonima di Navigazione Adriatica—hereinafter called "the Adriatica"—an Italian company domiciled in Venice. The contract for sale contained the following clause: "The sellers declare that the steamer is chartered from the Black Sea to Rotterdam at 12*s.* per unit, 12*s.* 3*d.* for Weser, 12*s.* 6*d.* for Hamburg, with the 25th Oct. cancelling as per berth contract, which will be handed over in a few days. The buyers declare that they accept duly the execution of the charter-party for the Black Sea voyage to one of the ports as ordered on signing bill of lading for their entire risk and advantage, undertaking every obligation relating thereto." The berth contract or charter-party so referred to is the one now in question. On the 4th Oct. the Rosalia was taken over by the Adriatica after the completion of the discharge of her coal cargo at Venice. On the 11th Oct. the brokers in London for Fratelli Sorrentino sent to H. L. Milbourn and Co., the charterers' representatives in London, a letter as follows: "Under instructions from Messrs. Fratelli Sorrentino we hereby beg to inform you that they have sold their steamship Rosalia to Messrs. the Società Adriatica di Navigazione, and that this latter firm will carry out the terms of the charter-party with you dated the 15th Sept. 1913, which, please note"; and on the 13th Oct. Messrs. H. L. Milbourn and Co. replied as follows: "We are duly in receipt of your letter of the 11th inst., and in reply thereto would say it seems to us that Messrs. Fratelli Sorrentino have made no effort so far to perform their contract, and have now put it out of their power so to do; and our friends, Messrs. Buerger and Teper, do not propose to enter into fresh arrangements as to this vessel. Apart from this, perhaps you can inform us the cause of the extraordinary delay of the steamship at Venice. We have been expecting for some time past to hear her reported as passing Constantinople."

On the contents of the last-mentioned letter being communicated to Fratelli Sorrentino and the Adriatica, both of those parties protested against the charterers' statements in this letter and insisted that the contract should be fulfilled. On the 15th Oct. the charterers' agents in London wrote to Messrs. Jackson Brothers and Cory, the brokers for Fratelli Sorrentino, that they considered the contract was at an end, and the charterers went so far as to claim damages therefor and for breach of contract by the owners to proceed with usual dispatch, but on the same day they offered to load the vessel on the berth contract at a reduction in freight of 3*s.* per unit. This offer was not accepted. The umpire awarded that, subject to the opinion of the court upon the points of law raised, the shipowners, Fratelli Sorrentino, recover from the charterers 1012*l.* 14*s.* 3*d.* for damages for breach of the berth contract.

Atkin, J. upon the questions of law decided in favour of the shipowners, and upheld the award for 1012*l.* 14*s.* 3*d.*, and from his judgment the charterers now appeal.

The first point raised by the charterers, and submitted by the umpire as a question of law, is that, by the sale of the steamship, Fratelli Sorrentino put it out of their power and were not able to perform the contract. Counsel for the charterers conceded that a shipowner might sell the ship during the currency of a charter-party, but he contended that he could not give possession of it as thereby he prevented himself from carrying out the contract. But the arbitrator has negatived the fact that Fratelli Sorrentino put it out of their power to carry out the contract. On the contrary, he finds that the vessel was duly tendered to the charterers under the berth contract, and that both Fratelli Sorrentino and the Adriatica were always ready and willing to do all things necessary on their part towards the fulfilment of the contract, and that the sole reason why the vessel was not loaded was that the charterers refused to load her. It is clear from the terms of the contract of sale that the Adriatica had notice of the current berth contract when they agreed to buy the vessel, and as it was a beneficial contract they were desirous of carrying it out and Fratelli Sorrentino were also desirous of carrying it out and between them they could have arranged to carry it out in any manner that the charterers desired, and the umpire finds that they were ready and willing to do so, and when the vessel was tendered there was ample time to make any necessary arrangements by the contract being carried out by Fratelli Sorrentino as the date for cancellation was not until the 25th Oct.

The charterers next contended that the letter of the 11th Oct. from Messrs. Jackson Brothers and Cory amounted to a renunciation of the contract by Fratelli Sorrentino, and that the letter meant that these owners would not carry out the contract, but that the charterers must accept the liability of Adriatica in substitution for that of Fratelli Sorrentino under the contract. I am of opinion that that is not the true meaning and effect of the letter, and that it certainly does not amount to a renunciation by Fratelli Sorrentino. It merely informs the charterers of the sale of the ship, and that the purchasers are willing to carry out the berth contract. This was true. It is an affirmance that the contract will be carried out. There is no ground for the contention that Fratelli Sorrentino by this letter repudiated in any way their own obligation to the charterers, and the latter were not entitled to treat it as a renunciation absolving them from the performance of the contract on their part.

It is true that Fratelli Sorrentino could not have substituted the liability of the Adriatica for their own without the consent of the charterers, for substitution which must be tripartite would have amounted to novation, but there has never been any claim by Fratelli Sorrentino that the Adriatica were substituted for them.

It was urged by the appellants that the finding by the umpire that Fratelli Sorrentino and the Adriatica were always ready and willing to do all things necessary on their part towards the fulfilment of the contract merely meant that so far as Fratelli Sorrentino were concerned they were willing to perform their contract through the Adriatica. I see no ground for thus restricting the finding of the umpire. I read his award as meaning that Fratelli Sorrentino were willing to carry out the contract personally, if the charterers so desired, and not merely vicariously—indeed, that both Fratelli Sorrentino and the Adriatica were each ready and willing to carry out the contract and were desirous of doing so, and that the reason why the vessel was not loaded was not in consequence of any unwillingness or inability of either Fratelli Sorrentino or the Adriatica to carry out the berth contract in any proper manner which charterers might desire, but solely by reason of the charterers' refusal to load her, the fall in freights affording a sufficient explanation of the attitude which they took up. The berth contract had become an onerous one in October, and the charterers by their agents' letter of the 13th Oct. relied not upon any renunciation by Fratelli Sorrentino, or refusal to carry out the contract, but contended that the mere sale of the vessel had put it out of their power to do so.

It has not been contended in this court that the mere sale of the vessel put an end to the berth contract. It is possible that at all material times the legal ownership of the vessel remained in Fratelli Sorrentino, as it appears that a notarial document was necessary to transfer this, and there is no mention of any such document having been executed. However that may be the charterers' defence to the action was that the shipowners had put it out of their power to perform the contract at the date when they refused or omitted to load, and the umpire finds the contrary in fact and decides that the vessel was duly tendered under the berth contract.

The grounds on which the learned judge below decided this case were stated by him as follows: "I have the finding that both vendors and purchasers were ready and willing to perform all the obligations under the contract. It seems to me therefore that the original owners are not precluded from carrying out the contract by the mere transfer of the ship with the benefit of the charter-party."

I agree with this view, and am of opinion that the appeals fails and should be dismissed.

PHILLIMORE, L.J. read the following judgment:—In this case the facts have been fully stated by the Lord Justice. It seems to me that the berth contract into which the brothers Sorrentino entered with Buerger and Teper was one the obligations of which they had to discharge and could not transfer to others. It further seems to me that they could not claim as against the will of the charterers to perform it by somebody else, and that they must retain at all material times the capacity to perform it. If it were a question whether their contract was one which fell within the view of the Divisional Court in British Waggon Company v. Lea (sup.), or which fell within the language of the Privy Council in Dimech v. Gorlett (sup., at p. 223), I think it falls within the latter category. But if, as I think, Atkin, J. meant to decide otherwise, I must disagree with him.

One has then to consider whether the acts of the brothers Sorrentino amounted to a repudiation or renunciation of the contract. It is suggested in the case that the sale of the steamship amounted to a repudiation of the contract. I do not think this necessarily follows. A sale coupled with the parting with the possession of the ship would.

But, notwithstanding the sale, the vendor might by arrangement retain sufficient possession to carry out the berth contract, or there might be a redemise of the ship to him.

The second suggestion is that the alleged assignment of the berth note caused the right under it to cease. If the communication made on behalf of the brothers Sorrentino to the charterers by the letter of the 11th Oct. 1913 amounted to a repudiation or renunciation of the contract, the charterers might treat it as a breach within the decision of Hochster v. De La Tour (2 E. & B. 693). And, if they did so treat it, any subsequent proceedings by the brothers Sorrentino would not deprive the charterers of their right to treat the contract as at an end and claim damages for the breach, a right which they asserted as stated in par. 17 of the special case.

If, however, the letter of the 11th Oct. 1913 did not amount to a repudiation of the contract, then the subsequent proceedings by or on behalf of the Brothers Sorrentino came under par. 19 and have been found by the umpire to be duly taken. This leaves for consideration the question whether the letter amounted to a repudiation. The mere announcement of the sale of the ship did not amount to a repudiation. Whether the rest of the letter amounted to a repudiation is a further question, and primâ facie one for the umpire. If it were for me, I might have thought that the language might amount to a repudiation. But I could understand that the expression, "This latter firm will carry out the terms of the charter-party with you," might be treated by the umpire rather as a proposal or suggestion, or at any rate not a positive assertion, that it would be done against the will of the charterers, and that he might look to further correspondence and proceedings, which he may not have set out in full.

The other members of the court think that the finding of the umpire that the Brothers Sorrentino and the Adriatica were always ready and willing to perform their contract amounts to a finding that there was no repudiation; and on the whole I agree. I could have wished that the umpire had set out the documents in full, and more documents. It appears from the shorthand notes of the judgment of Atkin, J. that the whole contract for sale, though not stated in the special case, was by agreement between the parties brought to the judge's attention, and I should like to have seen the protests referred to in par. 16 and to have been informed whether they were communicated, and how, to the charterers. But, if we are left to the special case as it stands, I do not see that we can disagree with the umpire's finding. And I may add that I think that the point which was really insisted upon at the arbitration was that the mere sale of the ship, plus the communication of this sale to the charterers, amounted to a repudiation of renunciation, and this, as I have said, is to lay too great a stress on the bare sale.

On the whole, I agree that the appeal fails.

BANKES, L.J. read the following judgment: — This is an appeal from a decision of Atkin, J. upon a special case stated by an arbitrator.

The respondents were owners of the steamship Rosalia. They entered into a berth contract with the appellants whereby they agreed that the said steamer should proceed to a Black Sea port as ordered and there load as ordered a cargo of grain for Rotterdam, Weser, or Hamburg. It is not necessary to consider this contract in detail. It is sufficient for the purpose of my judgment to say that it contained provisions some of which could only be performed by the respondents themselves unless the appellants consented to their being performed by some substitute. At the time the berth contract was entered into the vessel either was at Venice or was expected to arrive there shortly, to discharge. On the 25th Sept. 1913, while the vessel was still discharging, the respondents entered into a contract with an Italian company for the sale of the vessel to that company. The contract is not set out in full in the special case. Extracts only are given. From those extracts it appears that the vessel was sold with the benefit of the berth contract, and that the purchasers undertook "every obligation relating thereto." It also appeared that the vessel was to be opened up to give the purchasers an opportunity of inspection, and that after inspection the purchasers were to declare whether they accepted her or not, and, if they did, "the steamer thereupon became the absolute property of the buyers." The special case finds that the steamer was taken over by the purchasers on the 4th Oct. 1913, after the completion of the discharge of her cargo at Venice. At this time freights were falling and the berth contract was likely to prove a disadvantageous one to the appellants. On the 11th Oct. the respondents' brokers wrote a letter to the appellants' representatives in the following terms: "Under instructions from Messrs. Fratelli Sorrentino we hereby beg to inform you that they have sold their steamship Rosalia to Messrs. the Societa Adriatica di Navigazione, and that this latter firm will carry out the terms of the charter-party with you, dated the 15th September 1913, which please note." To this letter the appellants' representatives replied on the 13th Oct. to the effect that they considered that the respondents had put it out of their power to perform the contract, and that the appellants did not propose to enter into fresh arrangements as to the vessel. The cancelling date in the berth contract was not until the 25th Oct. In spite of this letter the vessel was sent to the places indicated in the contract for orders, and the arbitrator has found that she was duly tendered under the berth contract, by which I understand him to mean that she was tendered in due time. The appellants refused to load the vessel, and a claim was made by the respondents for damages for such refusal. Before the arbitrator the appellants contended as a matter of law that by the sale of the steamship the respondents had put it out of their power to perform, and were not able to perform, the contract. The same point was argued before this court. It was said that the obligations undertaken by a shipowner under a charter-party of his ship are in their nature personal obligations and non-assignable, and that a shipowner cannot substitute any other person to fulfil the obligations he has undertaken under the charter-party and that any sale of a vessel by a shipowner while she is under charter by which the shipowner parts with the possession and control of the vessel is a breach of the charter-party entitling the charterer to rescind. It was further said that the sale of the vessel by the respondents in the present case was a sale of this character.

I do not think that any general rule can be laid down applicable to all charter-parties. Each case must depend upon the language of the charter-party and its own particular circumstances. It can, however, I think, be stated as a general rule that where a charter-party contains obligations which can from their nature only be performed by the party himself who entered into the contract, that party cannot, by parting with the ship or otherwise, do anything which puts it out of his power to fulfil the obligations personally. He has no right to substitute any other person to perform those obligations in his place. It is not, however, every parting with a ship, whether by sale or otherwise, while she is under charter which puts it out of the power of the vendor to perform the obligations (if any) which he has undertaken to perform personally. For instance, possession may not have to be given under the contract of sale until after the charter is performed, or the vendor may by express terms reserve the right to perform personally the obligation of the charter, or the vendor and the purchaser may agree, without precisely defining how it is to be done, that the vendor shall retain the right, in spite of the sale of the vessel, of satisfying any requirement of the charterer as to personal performance by the vendor of any of the obligations of the charter-party.

In my view of what has happened in this case, I do not think that the point taken by the appellants is open to them. The case is peculiar on the facts, because the appellants elected to rescind the contract upon the mere information contained in the letter of the 11th Oct. This letter intimated (as no doubt the intention was) that the purchasers would carry out the charter-party, but it contained no statement to the effect that the respondents would not do so if required, or that they had put it out of their power to do so. It was in the interest both of the vendors and of the purchasers that nothing should be done to jeopardise the berth contract; and there was plenty of time for these parties, had they received an intimation that the appellants objected to the purchasers performing the contract, to have put matters right. What the arbitrator finds in the case is (par. 16) that, on the contents of the letter of the 13th Oct. being communicated to the respondents and to the purchasers, both of these parties protested against the charterers' statements in the letter and insisted that the contract should be fulfilled; and the arbitrator in par. 19 finds that both the respondents and the purchasers were always ready and willing to do all things necessary on their part towards the fulfilment of the said contract, and that the said vessel was not loaded solely by reason of the charterers' refusal to load her. It was argued that these findings only meant that the respondents were ready and willing to perform the contract by the purchasers as their substitutes. I cannot so read the findings, and I do not think that Atkin, J. so read them. The argument in the court below was not confined to the questions which I have so far dealt with. It was no doubt argued that the contract was one of the class that could be performed by deputy. With that argument, so far as it relates to all the obligations in this particular berth contract, I am not prepared to agree, but I do not propose to discuss it because it seems to me to be immaterial. I find Atkin, J. saying (1915) 1 K. B., at p. 313): "If they had sought to put upon the charterers the obligation to have the charter-party performed by the purchasers and by them only, I am inclined to think that the charterers would have been justified in saying that there had been a repudiation of the owners' obligations under the contract. That view, however, is not put forward, and I have not to decide it"; and again later, ibid., at p. 315, the learned judge refers to and relies on the finding of the arbitrator as set out in par. 19. I think that the learned judge only dealt with the argument which was founded on the case cited to him for the purpose of indicating his view that it was not of the essence of the contract that the original owners of a vessel under charter should remain owners until the end of the contract. I read the learned judge's judgment as deciding what I have already indicated—namely, that on the facts of this particular case the point of law taken by the appellants does not arise.

Application was made by the appellants' counsel that we should send the case back to the arbitrator in order that he might state the facts upon which he arrived at his conclusion as set out in par. 19. I think that no case has been made out why this should be done, and, in my opinion, the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Re United London and Scottish Insurance Company Limited; Newport Navigation Company's Claim. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

Marine insurance—Winding-up of company—Total loss—Claim for—Marine or fire policy—Marine Insurance Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 41), ss. 1, 3, 65, 66—Assurance Companies Act 1909 (9 Edw. 7, c. 49), ss. 1 (b), 17, 28, sub ss. 2, 3, sched. 6.

In April 1912 the applicants insured a steamship for twelve months with an insurance company, and in June 1912 a winding-up order was made against the company. Shortly afterwards the steamship was totally destroyed by fire. The policy of insurance covered risk of loss by fire and general average and salvage charges resulting from fire, the company not purporting to carry on the business of marine insurance.

Held, that the policy was a fire insurance policy within sect. 1, sub-sect. (b), of the Assurance Companies Act 1909, and was not excluded from the operation of that Act by sect. 28, sub-sect. 3, thereof.

Decision of Astbury, J. affirmed.

THE United London, &c., Company, by a policy dated the 11th April 1912, insured the steamer S. C. McLouth, belonging to the Newport Navigation Company of Marine City, Michigan, U.S.A., while upon the great lakes of America, against the risks of fire and general average and salvage charges arising from fire, for twelve months from the 15th March 1912, for 10,000 dollars. On the 27th June 1912 the steamer was totally destroyed by fire. The United London &c. Company had, however, been ordered to be wound up by the court on the 18th June 1912, and by an order dated the 27th June 1912 a liquidator was appointed in the winding-up.

On the 15th Oct. 1912 insurance brokers in London received instructions from the agents for the Newport Navigation Company to collect on behalf of that company from the United London &c. Company a total loss on the policy by reason of the destruction of the steamer; and in accordance with such instructions on the 30th Oct. 1912 a proof of debt in the liquidation was lodged.

On the 11th June 1914 notice was sent by the liquidator rejecting the claim against the United London &c. Company on the ground "that the loss occurred after the date of the winding-up order."

The policy and the written slip or form attached to it so far as material were as follows:

The United London and Scottish Insurance Company Limited in consideration of the stipulations therein named and of 71*s.* 7*s.* 1*d.* premium does insure the Newport Navigation Company for the term of twelve months from the 15th March 1912 at noon to the 15th March 1913 at noon against all direct loss or damage by fire except as thereinafter provided, to an amount not exceeding 2053*l.* (10,000 dollars) to the following described property while located and contained as described herein and not elsewhere—to wit: 2053*l.* (10,000 dollars) on the hull, machinery, boilers, and everything connected therewith of the steamer S. C. McLouth, valued at 30,000 dollars as per form attached which is to be taken and read as forming part of this policy. . . . This policy covers against the risk of fire only, including general average and salvage charges arising therefrom.

These words were written in red ink.

The following clause was in large print:

This company shall not be liable beyond the actual cash value of the property at the time any loss or damage occurs, and the loss or damage shall be ascertained or estimated according to such actual cash value, with proper deduction for depreciation however caused, and shall in no event exceed what it would then cost the insured to repair or replace the same with material of like kind and quality; said ascertainment or estimate shall be made by the insured and this company, or if they differ then by appraisers, as hereinafter provided; and, the amount of loss or damage having been thus determined, the sum for which this company is liable pursuant to this policy should be payable sixty days after due notice, ascertainment, estimate, and satisfactory proof of the loss have been received by this company in accordance with the terms of this policy. It shall be optional, however, with this company to take all, or any part, of the articles at such ascertained or appraised value, and also to repair, rebuild, and replace the property lost or damaged with other of like kind and quality within a reasonable time on giving notice, within thirty days after receipt of the proof herein required, of its intention so to do; but there can be no abandonment to this company of the property described.

The form attached was headed "Fire policy on vessels."

And clause 5 was as follows:

Warranted by the assured that the vessel shall be equipped and navigated according to law; that no open lights shall be used on board except customary torches in engine and boiler rooms, signal lights, and candles when trimming cargo; that coal only shall be used as fuel, except when kindling fires, without special permission from this company; and that when the vessel is laid up it shall be moored free from specially hazardous exposure.

Then followed a lightning clause, namely:

This policy shall cover any direct loss or damage caused by lightning (meaning thereby the commonly accepted use of the term lightning, and in no case to include loss or damage by cyclone, tornado, or windstorm) not exceeding the sum insured nor the interest of the assured in the property. . . .

By another clause, headed "Dynamo clause," loss or damage to dynamos or other apparatus for generating or regulating electricity caused by electric current whether artificial or natural was excluded.

A further clause 9, headed "General average and salvage clause," was as follows:

It is understood and agreed that this policy also covers salvage claims and general average charges when caused by or arising from fire and for which the vessel insured hereunder shall be legally liable.

The port of repair clause provided that:

In the event of damage by fire occurring at a place where repairs cannot be made, this policy shall cover the expense of removal to a port of repair, in proportion as the amount insured bears to the valuation expressed herein, provided, however, that the cost of such removal has been approved by the representative of this company.

This policy of insurance was stamped with a penny stamp only, the usual stamp on fire policies, marine policies requiring a stamp of a higher value; but there was evidence that for many years the practice had been to stamp policies on ships navigating inland waters such as the great lakes of America with a penny stamp only, whatever the perils insured against and irrespective of the amount of the policy.

The United London and Scottish Insurance Company had no books, papers, or forms of policies relating to marine business, and it appeared from their books that they did no business which was considered to be marine business, and the policy in question was classed and entered in all the proper books of the company as a policy of (foreign) fire insurance, and was in the usual form of such policies as issued by the company.

The following sections and sub-sections of the Assurance Companies Act 1909 are material:—

Sect. 1 provided shortly that the Act should apply to assurance companies whether established before or after the commencement of the Act, and whether established within or without the United Kingdom, who carry on within the United Kingdom assurance business of all or any of the following classes: (b) Fire insurance business; that is to say, the issue of, or the undertaking of liability under, policies of insurance against loss by, or incidental to, fire.

There were included four other classes of insurance—namely, life assurance, accident insurance, employers' liability insurance, and bond investment business, but marine insurance was not included.

Sect. 17, sub-sect. 1:

Where an assurance company is being wound-up by the court, or subject to the supervision of the court, or voluntarily, the value of a policy of any class or of a liability under such a policy requiring to be valued in such winding-up shall be estimated in manner applicable to policies and liabilities of that class provided by the sixth schedule to this Act.

The sixth schedule (b) was headed:

As respects fire policies.—Rule for Valuing a Policy.—The value of a current policy shall be such portion of the last premium paid as is proportionate to the unexpired portion of the period in respect of which the premium was paid.

Sect. 28, sub-sect. 2:

This Act shall not apply to a member of Lloyd's, or of any other association of underwriters approved by the Board of Trade, who carries on assurance business of any class, provided that he complies with the requirements set forth in the eighth schedule to this Act and applicable to business of that class. Sub-sect. 3: Save as otherwise expressly provided by this Act, nothing in this Act shall apply to assurance business of any class other than one of the classes specified in sect. 1 of this Act, and a policy shall not be deemed a policy of fire insurance by reason only that loss by fire is one of the various risks covered by the policy.

The eighth schedule, after setting out certain requirements to be complied with by underwriters, defines for the purpose of those requirements "non-marine insurance business" as the business of issuing policies upon subject-matters of insurance other than the following—namely:—

Vessels of any description, including barges and dredgers, cargoes, freights, and other interests which may be legally insured by, in, or in relation to, vessels, cargoes, and freights, goods, wares, merchandise, and property of whatever description insured for any transit by land or water, or both, and whether or not including warehouse risks or similar risks in addition or as incidental to such transit.

The following are the material sections and sub-sections of the Marine Insurance Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 41):—

Sect. 1. A contract of marine insurance is a contract whereby the insurer undertakes to indemnify the assured, in manner and to the extent thereby agreed, against marine losses; that is to say, the losses incident to marine adventure.

Sect. 3, sub-sect. 1: Subject to the provisions of this Act, every lawful marine adventure may be the subject of a contract of marine insurance. Sub-sect. 2: In particular, there is a marine adventure where (a) any ship, goods, or other movables are exposed to maritime perils. . . . "Maritime perils" means the perils consequent on, or incidental to, the navigation of the sea; that is to say, perils of the seas, fire, war perils, pirates, rovers, thieves, captures, seizures, restraints, and detainments of princes and peoples, jettisons, barratry, and any other perils, either of the like kind or which may be designated by the policy.

The applicants relied on sect. 28, sub-sect. 3 of the Assurance Companies Act 1909, set out above, as excluding this policy of insurance from the operation of the Act, alleging it was such a marine insurance as was there referred to; also, on sect. 28, sub-sect. 2, and sched. 8 of that Act, by which "non-marine insurance business" was defined for the purpose of certain requirements therein set out to be complied with by members of Lloyd's or of any other association of underwriters approved by the Board of Trade as the business of issuing policies upon subject-matters of insurance other than vessels of any description, including barges and dredges, &c., as clearly excluding this policy from "non-marine insurance business." And, further, that this was a marine insurance as defined by the Marine Insurance Act 1906 as set out above.

Under these circumstances the Newport Navigation Company issued this summons on the 31st July 1914, asking that (inter alia) the decision of the liquidator be reversed and the claim of the appellant allowed.

On the 17th Feb. 1915 the case came on to be heard before Astbury, J.

MacKinnon, K.C. and L. C. F. Darby for the applicants.—The liquidator has rejected our claim for a total loss on the ground that this is a fire policy, and therefore the value in the winding up of the company must be estimated in accordance with the provisions of sect. 17 and par. B. of sched. 6 of the Assurance Companies Act 1909. Prior to that Act and at the present time if the policy is not within its terms under sect. 206 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act 1908 (8 Edw. 7, c. 69), and the decision in Re Northern Counties of England Fire Insurance Company; Macfarlane's Claim (44 L. T. Rep. 299; (1880) 17 Ch. Div. 337), a good claim can clearly be made for a total loss. This Act does not apply to marine insurance; this policy is a policy of marine insurance, and therefore the claim is for a total loss as decided in Macfarlane's claim (ubi sup.). There are two questions in this case to be decided, one whether the Assurance Companies Act of 1909 applies to marine insurance, and, secondly, is this policy a marine or fire insurance policy? It is clear the Act does not apply to marine insurance; all reference to marine insurance is omitted in sect. 1. Sect. 28, sub sect. 3 excludes from the operation of the Act such a marine insurance as this policy constitutes. That sub-section is intended to make sure of excluding marine insurance from the operation of the Act, and provides that a policy shall not be deemed a policy of fire insurance by reason only that loss by fire is one of the various risks covered by the policy. That clearly aims at preventing such a policy as this from being considered within the Act. In sched. 8 (b) and (c), which sets out the requirements with which members of Lloyd's must comply if the Act under sect. 28, sub-sect. 2 is not to apply to them. "Non-marine insurance business" is defined as the business of issuing policies upon subject-matters of insurance other than the following—namely, "Vessels of any description, &c.—and from this it is clear this policy is not "non-marine insurance business." The liquidator says we are only entitled under sect. 17 and par. B of sched. 6 of the Act to prove for a proportionate part of the premium, a very different amount to what we claim, namely, 2053*l*. Sect. 1 and sect. 3, sub-sect. 1 and 2, of the Marine Insurance Act 1906 define marine insurance, and this policy clearly comes within that definition; sects. 65 and 66 deal with general average claims and salvage charges which are included in this policy and are incidents of marine as distinct from fire policies, in fact they would mean nothing in a fire policy and are risks which cannot be other than marine risks. Reading the whole of this Marine Insurance Act of 1906 which codified the law of marine insurance, and especially the sections already referred to and sects. 2, 4, sub-sects. 2, 23, sub-sect. 2, and sect. 30, it becomes abundantly plain that this policy is a marine insurance under that Act, and as such is not covered by the Assurance Companies Act 1909. Fire is included in the Act of 1906 as a maritime peril; therefore this is a marine insurance, and though limited to fire only can still remain a marine insurance. See

Woodside v. Globe Marine Insurance Company, 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 118; 73 L. T. Rep. 626; (1896) 1 Q. B. 105;

Imperial Marine Insurance Company v. Fire Insurance Corporation, 40 L. T. Rep. 166; (1879) 4 C. P. Div. 166.

On the second point this is a marine policy. The effective form of the policy is contained solely in the beginning part and the yellow slip, the whole of the 108 lines of the printed matter are not an effective part of the policy at all, they are obviously concerned with ordinary fire insurance on land. The yellow clauses prevail. See:

Cunard Steamship Company v. Marten, 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 342, 452; 87 L. T. Rep. 400, 403; (1902) 2 K. B. 624, 626, 627.

[For the manner in which a general average claim can arise, Whitecross Wire and Iron Company v. Savill (46 L. T. Rep. 643; (1882) 8 Q. B. Div. 653) was referred to.] This policy is an insurance of a steamer, and by express terms covers general average and salvage charges, which would mean nothing in a fire policy and are risks which cannot be other than marine risks. [Astbury, J.—Do you say the insurance of a vessel is a marine insurance?] Yes, my Lord, I do. It is said in one of the affidavits that this is a fire policy because it has a 1*d.* stamp only on it; but since a certain correspondence with the Board of Inland Revenue which took place in 1884, the practice of the commissioners and the custom of insurance brokers has been to stamp all these lake risks with 1*d.* only, but not because they are insurances against fire. In conclusion I say that this being a policy insuring a vessel against fire and general average and salvage charges is a marine policy.

Leslie Scott, K.C. and H. E. Wright for the liquidator.—In this court we cannot say Mcfarlane's claim (ubi sup.), which was decided by the Court of Appeal, is wrong, therefore my contention is that this policy ought to be construed as marine insurance, yet for the purposes of the Assurance Companies Act 1909 it is a fire policy, because that is the main business, and the Act of 1909 says that policies of fire insurance in that sense are to be valued in the winding-up in the way provided for by sched. 6, and therefore a total loss is not recoverable and the liquidator rightly objected to the claim. Further this is a policy of fire insurance proper—i.e., one to be interpreted in its incidence according to the rules of law applying to fire insurance, and the proviso for including general average and salvage charges are added as incidents to a fire policy. A policy of marine insurance against fire only would be loss by or incidental to fire within the Assurance Companies Act 1909. Sect. 28, sub-sect. 3 was inserted to prevent ordinary marine policies being brought within the Act. A policy may be both a marine insurance and fire insurance, though the applicant's case is they are mutually exclusive. See

Grant v. Astua Insurance Company, 6 L. T. Rep. 735; 1862, 15 Moo. P. C. 516;

Pearson v. Commercial Union Assurance Company, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 275; 35 L. T. Rep. 445; (1876) 1 App. Cas. 498.

We consider that the expressions "general average charges" and "salvage charges" are marine insurance terms, but they are not risks but consequential losses due to the operation of the peril insured against. A marine policy may be limited to fire only; but this is not a marine policy, but a fire policy with a marine incident included in special terms as was necessary, because the subject-matter insured is a vessel. General average and salvage are implied in a marine policy, but here they are specially contracted for. In a fire policy there is no such doctrine as notice of abandonment, in a marine insurance abandonment is a usual incident, and as this was a fire policy on a ship the applicant might possibly have claimed a right to abandon. This is, therefore, expressly negatived, and in a marine policy it would not have been negatived, which shows that this was intended to be and is a fire policy. The Assurance Companies Act, s. 28, sub-s. 3, excludes policies by reference only to the nature of the risk, and not by reference to the subject-matter of the insurance. An ordinary marine policy, including fire as one of the risks, would be a fire policy within sect. 1 (b), but it would be excluded by sect. 28, sub-sect. 3; but this exclusion does not apply to such a policy as this is where fire is the only risk covered. Sched. 8, though no doubt part of the Act, refers solely to members of Lloyd's, and was put in for enabling members to exclude themselves from the operation of the Act by complying with certain requirements there set out, and is complete in itself and should not be allowed to assist in the construction of the main provisions of the Act itself.

MacKinnon, K.C. in reply.—According to the argument for the liquidator, if there had been a pure marine policy, as in Woodside v. Globe Marine Insurance Company (ubi sup.), still that would be a fire insurance to which sect. 17 would apply; but that would have singular results, as the insured could go and effect another policy immediately on winding-up. [Astbury, J.—Apart from definitions, sect. 17 and sect. 1 (b) are the only relevant sections, except the exclusions under sect. 28, sub-sect. 3. It is difficult to know what exactly sect. 17 means, but if this Act applies to this policy, it is clear only a proportion of the premium is recoverable in the winding-up under the decision in Re Law Car and General Insurance Corporation; J. J. King and Sons Limited's case (108 L. T. Rep. 862; (1913) 2 Ch. 113).] Policies which cover all risks come within Mcfarlane's Claim (ubi sup.), those against fire only within Re Law Car and General Insurance Corporation; J. J. King and Sons Limited's case (ubi sup.). When a ship is insured against loss by fire the policy is not a fire policy, but that constitutes a marine risk and insurance. [Astbury, J.—You then go so far as to claim that all insurance of ships from fire are marine insurance.] Yes, my Lord, I do. A fire insurance means an insurance which is subject to well-known laws applicable to fire insurance policies, and marine insurance has its own peculiar laws applicable to it.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 23.—Astbury, J.—This is an application by the Newport Navigation Company of America that a decision of the liquidator in the winding-up of the United London and Scottish Insurance Company, rejecting the applicants' proof of 2053*l.* on a policy of insurance, may be reversed. On the 11th April 1912 the applicants insured with the insurance company the steamship S. C. McLouth against loss or damage by fire while on the great lakes of America for 2053*l.*, upon the terms of a policy to which I will refer. The insurance company was ordered to be wound-up on the 18th June 1912, and nine days later the vessel was totally destroyed by fire. The applicants claimed to prove in the winding-up for a total loss. The liquidator has rejected that proof, and this summons has been issued to review his decision. The insurance company did not purport to carry on or transact the business of marine insurance, and the policy in the present case is in the form used by the insurance company in its fire insurance business, with a yellow printed slip attached. The material portions of the policy and slip are as follows: The company insured is the Newport Navigation Company, U.S.A., and it insured against all direct loss or damage by fire except as hereinafter provided to an amount not exceeding 2053*l.* on the hull, machinery, boilers, and everything connected therewith of the steamer S. C. McLouth as per form attached thereto, which is to be taken and read as forming part of the policy, and the policy covers against the risk of fire only, including general average and salvage charges resulting therefrom. The yellow slip attached to the policy is headed "Fire policy on vessels." It provided that the policy is to cover the vessel while on the great lakes, and it provides that the policy also covers salvage claims and general average charges when caused by or arising from fire, and for which the vessel insured hereunder shall be legally liable; and in the event of damage by fire occurring at a place where repairs cannot be made, the policy is to cover the expense of removal to a port of repair as therein provided. Nothing turns in this case upon the inconsistency, if any, between the printed conditions of the policy and the contents of the attached slip, the latter clearly prevailing: (Cunard Steamship Company v. Marten, 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 342, 452; 87 L. T. Rep. 400, 403; (1902) 2 K. B. 624, 626, 627). Sect. 206 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act 1908 provides for the proof of contingent claims in winding-up. In Re Northern Counties of England Fire Insurance Company; MacFarlane's Claim (44 L. T. Rep. 299; (1880) 17 Ch. Div. 337) Macfarlane held a policy of fire insurance of the Northern Counties of England Fire Insurance Company for a sum of 500*l.* upon certain buildings. On the 26th Nov. 1879 a winding-up petition was presented, and on the 13th Dec. 1879 a winding-up order was made. Subsequent to that winding-up order—namely, on the 22nd Jan. 1880—the insured premises were burnt down, and Macfarlane thereby suffered loss to the full amount of the policy. It was held that he was entitled to prove in the winding-up for the full amount of loss covered by the policy and sustained by him through the fire, notwithstanding the fact that it occurred after the date of the winding-up order.

If the matter rested here, the applicants would, in this court at all events, be entitled to succeed; but the question I have to decide depends upon whether the provisions of the Assurance Companies Act 1909 apply to the present case. By sect. 1 of that Act it was provided that the Act should apply to all assurance companies carrying on assurance business in the United Kingdom of all or any of the following classes, five of which are specified, one of which is: "(b) Fire insurance business—that is to say, the issue of, or the undertaking of liability under, policies of insurance against loss by or incidental to fire." By sect. 17, sub-sect. 1, "Where an assurance company is being wound up by the court, or subject to the supervision of the court, or voluntarily, the value of a policy of any class or of a liability under such a policy requiring to be valued in such winding-up shall be estimated in a manner applicable to policies and liabilities of that class provided by the sixth schedule to this Act." And sched. 6 (B)—which is headed "As respects Fire Policies. Rule for valuing a Policy"—provides that "The value of a current policy shall be such portion of the last premium paid as is proportionate to the unexpired portion of the period in respect of which the premium was paid." Sect. 28, sub sect. 3, provides that: "Save as otherwise expressly provided by this Act, nothing in this Act shall apply to assurance business of any class other than one of the classes specified in section one of this Act, and a policy shall not be deemed a policy of fire insurance by reason only that loss by fire is one of the various risks covered by the policy." Under this sub-section it is clear that ordinary marine insurance, though not referred to as such, is excluded. Sect. 28, sub-sect. 2, provides that: "This Act shall not apply to a member of Lloyd's, or of any other association of underwriters approved by the Board of Trade, who carries on assurance business of any class, provided that he complies with the requirements set forth in the eighth schedule." Under this schedule, B and C (d), there are special provisions relating only to Lloyd's, one being that "non-marine insurance business" does not include any insurance upon "vessels of any description, including barges or dredges." But the term "non-marine insurance business" does not appear in the Act itself, and the special terms provided in the case of Lloyd's do not, in my opinion, assist in the construction of the main provisions of the Act in this respect. Under the Marine Insurance Act 1906 sect. 1 provides that: "A contract of marine insurance is a contract whereby the insurer undertakes to indemnify the assured, in manner and to the extent thereby agreed, against marine losses—that is to say, the losses incident to marine adventure. Sect. 3, sub-sect. 1, provides that: "Subject to the provisions of this Act, every lawful marine adventure may be the subject of a contract of marine insurance." Sub-sect. 2 provides that: "In particular, there is a marine adventure where—(a) Any ship, goods, or other movables are exposed to maritime perils"; and in that section "maritime perils" are defined as meaning "the perils consequent on, or incidental to, the navigation of the sea—that is to say, perils of the seas, fire, war perils, pirates, rovers, thieves, captures, seizures, restraints, and detainments of princes and peoples, jettisons, barratry, and any other perils either of the like kind or which may be designated by the policy"; and under sects. 65 and 66 salvage charges and general average loss are dealt with. It is not disputed that all marine perils except one may be struck out of the usual form of a marine policy and the same still remain a "marine policy" within the meaning of this statute: (see Woodside v. Globe Marine Insurance Company (73 L. T. Rep. 626; (1896) Q.B. 105). The present policy is stamped with a penny stamp only, whereas a marine policy, covering a period of time, requires a stamp of a higher value. The practice under and the interpretation of sect. 92 of the Stamp Act 1891 have been by no means uniform, but the Board of Inland Revenue in 1884 took the view that policies on vessels on rivers, lakes, canals, and other inland waters were chargeable with a stamp duty of 1*d.* only. This matter has been referred to in argument, but is not, in my judgment, very relevant to the decision of the present dispute.

The question I have to determine is whether, although this is a ship insurance, it is an insurance against loss by or incidental to fire, within the meaning of the Assurance Companies Act 1909, in which case the proof must be limited to the amount ascertainable in accordance with sched. 6, which is the liquidator's view, or whether, on the other hand, it is such a marine insurance as is excluded from the operations of the Act by sect. 28, sub-sect. 3. The applicant contends first, that all ship insurances covering transit, even if limited to fire risks, are so excluded; and, secondly, that this is specially the case when the policy covers salvage claims and general average charges, although limited to those caused by or arising from fire, which he says, and truly says, are incidents of "marine" as distinct from "fire" insurance in the ordinary acceptation of those terms. The Assurance Companies Act 1909 raises, no doubt, many difficulties in its application to particular cases, but I cannot think that the mere fact that an insurance is or may be a marine insurance within the definition of the Marine Insurance Act 1906 determines the question at issue in this case. If an ordinary marine insurance form were adopted, with all the usual marine risks except fire excluded, I see no reason for holding that this would not be an insurance against loss by or incidental to fire, or that it would be excluded from the operation of the Assurance Companies Act 1909 by sect. 28, sub-sect. 3, which certainly does not provide that a policy shall not be deemed to be a policy of fire insurance if loss by fire is the only risk covered by it; nor does it exclude policies by reference to the "subject-matter" of the insurance, but only by reference to the nature of the risk. Sect. 28, sub-sect. 3, was required (inter alia) to exclude marine policies generally; otherwise they might have been included in, or have been construed as "fire policies" under sect. 1 (b). But sect. 28, sub-sect. 3 does not, in my opinion, directly or by inference exclude marine policies limited to fire risks as defined by sect. 1 (b). Further, the evidence and the authorities appear to show that ordinary fire insurances of ships are not uncommon or unknown. The remaining point to be considered is whether the fact that the policy covers salvage claims and general average charges, when caused by or arising from fire, is sufficient to exclude the operation of the Assurance Companies Act 1909. In my opinion it is not. The only risk insured against is loss by or incidental to fire, but the subject-matter of the insurance being a vessel the assured is contractually covered for special claims and charges caused by or arising from the occurrence of the risk or event insured against, which would not otherwise form part of the loss covered by the policy. One reason for excluding general marine insurance from the Act of 1909 may well be that in case of vessels at sea and goods carried by them, notice of the winding-up of the insurance company, if it occurs, may not be obtained in time to effect a re-insurance, and notice cannot be given to the company of the occurrence of many of the events insured against within any limited or specified time, as is usually provided for in fire policies; but if the policy in question is in fact a fire policy and that only, as in this case I think it is, the mere fact that the subject-matter is a ship, and subject to inconveniences accordingly, does not, in my judgment, bring it within any of the exceptions in the Act of 1909. For these reasons the application, in my opinion, fails, and must be dismissed.

From that decision the claimants now appealed.

MacKinnon, K.C. and L. F. C. Darby for the appellants.

Leslie Scott, K.C. (with him H. E. Wright) for the respondent, the liquidator.

He was stopped by the court.

MacKinnon, K.C. replied.

The arguments adduced in the court below were substantially repeated and the authorities there cited were again referred to.

Lord Cozens Hardy, M.R.—I do not see my way in this case to differ from the view which was taken by Astbury, J.

The case arises upon the construction of the Assurance Companies Act 1909. That is a very difficult Act to construe. I had occasion to consider that Act in the case of Re Law, Car, and General Insurance Corporation Limited (108 L. T. Rep. 862; (1913) 2 Ch. 103). But I am bound to say that the present case does not seem to me to give rise to any serious difficulty. Fire insurance business is defined by sect. 1, sub-sect. (b), of the Act as follows: "The issue of, or the undertaking of liability under, policies of insurance against loss by or incidental to fire." We have a policy here which undoubtedly falls within that definition. It is an insurance against loss by fire of a vessel while on the great lakes in America or in dry dock where it might be temporarily put for repairs; the loss is by or incidental to fire. This policy also includes salvage claims or losses by reason of general average. Unless there was something else in the Act it seems to me that every Lloyd's policy would, or certainly might, come within the meaning of fire insurance business, because every Lloyd's policy really includes, amongst other risks insured against, that of fire. But it is taken out of the Act, as is made quite clear by sect, 28, sub-sect. 3, which enacts as follows: "Save as otherwise expressly provided by this Act, nothing in this Act shall apply to assurance business of any class other than one of the classes specified in sect. 1 of this Act, and a policy shall not be deemed to be a policy of fire insurance by reason only that loss by fire is one of the various risks covered by the policy."

That being so, it seems to me that the present case is not within the saving clause of sub-sect. 3. This is not really a policy of insurance of which fire is only, one of the various risks, but is a policy which is solely against loss by or incidental to fire, and the operative and effective clause is therefore sect. 1, sub-sect. (b). If that be so, the provisions for the granting of the policy, which are novel and inconsistent with the case of Re Northern Counties of England Fire Insurance Company; Macfarlane's Claim (44 L. T. Rep. 299; 17 Ch. Div. 337), must apply to the valuation that takes place. It is not necessary to go through that case. It has not been disputed before us, and could not have been disputed, that if it is a policy of fire insurance within the meaning of the Act, the principle of the case of Re Northern Counties of England Fire Insurance Company; Macfarlane's Claim (ubi sup.) does not apply and the express provisions of the schedule do apply.

For these reasons, which are substantially those given by Astbury, J., I think that this appeal fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Pickford, L.J.—I agree.

A great part of the argument in this case has been directed to whether this in ordinary parlance would be a fire insurance policy or a marine policy. If it were necessary to decide that, which I do not think it is, I should be inclined to agree with the appellants that this was a marine policy especially looking at the definition of non-marine business in sched. 8 of this Act. But it does not seem to me that that matters at all. We have to see what is the kind of business which is subject to the provisions of this Act, and then see whether this policy does or does not come within these provisions. It is an insurance upon a ship navigating on the great lakes in America, and it is to this effect, so far as it is necessary to read the very long provisions of it: "This policy covers the risk of fire only, including general average and salvage charges resulting therefrom."

The question is whether that comes within the description of fire insurance business in the Act of 1909. The Act says that: "This Act shall apply to all persons or bodies of persons, whether corporate or unincorporate, not being registered under the Acts relating to friendly societies or to trade unions (which persons and bodies of persons are hereinafter referred to as assurance companies), whether established before or after the commencement of this Act, and whether established within or without the United Kingdom, who carry on within the United Kingdom assurance business of all or any of the following classes":

The only class which relates to and is of importance in the present case is fire insurance business. If it stopped there I suppose we should have had to inquire what in ordinary parlance most insurance people call "fire insurance business." But the section does not stop there. It goes on to define what is meant by that for the purposes of the Act—"that is to say, the issue of, or the undertaking of liability under, policies of insurance against loss by or incidental to fire."

It does not seem to me possible to look at this policy and say that it does not come within those words. It is the undertaking of liability under a policy which "covers the risk of fire only, including general average and salvage charges resulting therefrom." Therefore it is exactly within the words "the undertaking of liability under policies of insurance against loss by"—that is the direct clause—"or incidental to a fire"—that is the salvage and general average on fire. That being so, it seems to me that what we have to look for in this Act is something that says in effect—if it said it in words there would be nothing to discuss—that this Act shall not apply to policies of marine insurance or to marine insurance business. I cannot find anything of the kind in the Act. The only thing that I find is sect. 28, sub-sect. 3, which says that: "A policy shall not be deemed to be a policy of fire insurance by reason only that loss by fire is one of the various risks covered by the policy."

But for that it seems to me that an ordinary policy of insurance would come within the words of sect. 1. It is not, however, intended that it should, or that any other policy of which fire was one of the risks, and only one of the things insured against, should come within the section. Therefore there is that provision. But that provision has nothing to do with this policy at all, because this policy is a policy against fire only, except in so far as it is an insurance against certain claims which are incidental to the fire having taken place.

The only other matter that I need refer to, and it is a matter upon which the greatest stress was laid, is with regard to the words in the eighth schedule. Of course it is always very difficult to know exactly what an Act of Parliament means when the schedules are of greater length than the Act, and do not specially refer to one another or to the provisions of the Act. I need not read the whole of the provision in the eighth schedule. It is a provision relating to "Requirements to be complied with by underwriters being members of Lloyd's or of any other association of underwriters approved by the Board of Trade." It really is a provision introduced for the protection of Lloyd's, who, as we know, are a very powerful body. It provides by (b) and (c) (2) as follows: "An underwriter who carries on fire insurance or accident insurance business may, in lieu of complying with the above requirements, elect to comply with the undermentioned provisions":

Then there follow certain things that he has to do: "(a) All premiums received by or on behalf of the underwriter in respect of fire and accident insurance or re-insurance business carried on by him, either alone or in conjunction with any other insurance business for which special requirements are not laid down in this schedule, shall without any apportionment be placed in a trust fund in accordance with the provisions of a trust deed approved by the Board of Trade: (b) he shall also furnish security to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade (or, if the board so direct, to the satisfaction of the committee of the association), which shall be available solely to meet claims under policies issued by him in connection with fire and accident business, and any other non-marine business carried on by him. . . ." Then there follows a definition of non-marine business.

I think that definition would exclude this policy from non-marine business, and therefore would make it marine business within the meaning of this schedule. But I cannot see that that schedule has anything like the effect contended for, which is this, that it takes all marine business out of the purview of sect. 1. It does not seem to me to have anything to do with that. They are provisions for the benefit of Lloyd's underwriters dealing with non-marine business, and dispensing with their having to comply with requirements which they would otherwise have to comply with.

I think it is of importance, as Mr. Leslie Scott pointed out, to see what is introduced by sect. 28, sub-sect. 2: "This Act shall not apply to a member of Lloyd's, or any other association of underwriters approved by the Board of Trade, who carries on assurance business of any class, provided that he complies with the requirements set forth in the eighth schedule to this Act, and applicable to business of that class." So that the eighth schedule is introduced simply as supplementary to sect. 28, sub-sect. 2, and really is not of general application at all.

For these reasons it seems to me that there is nothing in this Act of Parliament or in the schedule which is equivalent to saying, as I mentioned before: "This Act shall not apply to any business which is marine." I think that this policy comes within the exact words of sect. 1, sub-sect. 3, and that therefore this Act of Parliament applies to it, and Astbury, J.'s judgment was right.

WARRINGTON, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

The concrete question which has to be determined is for what amount is the assured entitled to prove in the winding-up of the respondent company in respect of a claim upon a policy effected prior to the winding-up, the claim maturing subsequently to the winding-up.

That question turns upon the right decision of another question, namely, Is the policy in question a fire policy subject to the provisions of the Assurance Companies Act 1909, and in particular to the provisions of sect. 17, sub-sect. 1, and those of the sixth schedule as to the mode of valuation of such a policy?

The Act by sect. 1 defines the class of persons and companies to which it is to be applicable, and amongst others it is to be applicable to those "who carry on within the United Kingdom assurance business of all or any of the following classes." Amongst other classes that which is called fire insurance business is included. Fire insurance business is also included in these terms: "That is to say, the issue of, or the undertaking of liability under, policies of insurance against loss by or incidental to fire."

The policy in the present case is a policy of insurance against loss by fire exclusively, and against certain other claims or losses resulting from fire, and which I think come fairly within the expression "incidental to fire." The policy, therefore, so far undoubtedly comes within the class of policies issued by people who are said by the Act to be carrying on fire insurance business. The contention on the part of the appellants is that if a policy of insurance against loss by or incidental to fire is a policy of that nature on a vessel or cargo, which may be stated shortly to be the usual subject of marine insurance, then it is not to be treated as fire insurance for the purposes of this Act. In my opinion it is impossible to find anything in the Act to justify that contention.

The only provision which I can refer to for that purpose is the provision in sect. 28, sub-sect. 3: "Save as otherwise expressly provided by this Act, nothing in this Act shall apply to assurance business of any class other than one of the classes specified in sect. 1 of this Act." I pause there for one moment. Marine insurance may be said to be assurance business of a class other than one of the classes specified in sect. 1 of this Act. But it has occurred to the framers of the Act that if you were to leave it there the ordinary policy of marine insurance might be subject to the provisions of the Act, because the risk of fire is one of the risks insured against. Therefore they have placed on the statute the second sentence of that sub-section: "And a policy shall not be deemed to be a policy of fire insurance by reason only that loss by fire is one of the various risks covered by the policy."

In the present case loss by fire is the only risk, and short of saying that any policy insuring against fire which is a policy on a vessel or cargo or otherwise, usually the subject of marine insurance, is excluded from this Act, I do not see how it is possible to exclude this particular policy. The provisions of the eighth schedule do not, in my opinion, help the appellants, because they merely enact certain regulations which are to be complied with by the particular class of persons who are referred to in sub-sect. 2 of sect. 28, namely, "a member of Lloyd's, or of any other association of underwriters approved by the Board of Trade."

On the whole, therefore, I think that the judgment of Astbury, J. was right, and that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

Neutral vessels—Contraband goods—Absolute and conditional contraband—Neutral consignors—Ostensible destination of cargoes — Neutral country—Real destination of cargoes—Enemy country—Goods consigned "to order" — No consignee named — Continuous voyage — Continuous transportation — Goods intended for enemy—Evidence—False papers—Tests for condemnation or release.

Four vessels, the property of neutral owners, under time charters to neutral merchants, started on voyages from New York to Copenhagen in October and November 1914, laden with large cargoes of lard, hog and neat products, oil stocks, wheat and other foodstuffs, rubber, and hides. They were captured and their cargoes were seized on the ground that they were conditional contraband, alleged to be confiscable under the circumstances, with the exception of one cargo of rubber, which was seized as absolute contraband. On the evidence before the Prize Court, when the Crown asked for the condemnation of the cargoes, it was found that the major portion of the goods were not intended to be incorporated in the common stock of Denmark, but that the same were intended for Germany as their ultimate destination.

Held, that as the doctrine of continuous voyage and transportation, both as regards carriage by sea and land, was a part of international law at the time of the commencement of the war in August 1914, and was applicable to conditional as well as to absolute contraband, all goods which were intended for the use of the German Government, although nominally having Copenhagen as their port of destination, must be condemned as lawful prize.

In arriving at its decision in any particular case, the Prize Court is not limited or governed by the strict rules of evidence which bind the municipal courts of the country; it is entitled to rely upon well known facts which have come to light in other cases, or as matters of public reputation. Strict evidence is often very difficult to obtain, and to require it in many cases would be to defeat the legitimate rights of belligerents.

THESE were four actions in which the Crown claimed the condemnation of the above-named Scandinavian vessels and their cargoes on the ground that the cargoes consisted largely of contraband goods, absolute and conditional, and also that two of the vessels were carrying false papers, certain consignments of rubber being manifested as gum. The four vessels sailed from New York on various dates in October and November 1914, their ostensible port of destination being Copenhagen, and they were all seized on the high seas during the month of November 1914. The cargoes were made up of very large consignments of lard, hog and meat products, oil stocks, wheat, and other foodstuffs. Two of the vessels had also cargoes of rubber, and one of hides. Most of the goods were consigned from Chicago, and it was alleged on the part of the Crown that the real destination of the cargoes was not Copenhagen, but Germany, where they were to be utilised for the benefit of the armed forces of the German Government whilst that country was at war with Great Britain. The various claimants —the American consignors and the alleged Scandinavian vendees—resisted condemnation on the ground that there was no absolute evidence showing that the goods were intended for the armed forces of the enemy. The judgment in the present instance was confined to the question of the condemnation or the release of the cargoes, the question of the capture and confiscation of the vessels being left over to be dealt with at a later date.

The following articles of the Declaration of London were referred to:—

Art. 30. Absolute contraband is liable to capture if it is shown to be destined to territory belonging to or occupied by the enemy, or to the armed forces of the enemy. It is immaterial whether the carriage of the goods is direct or entails transhipment or a subsequent transport by land.

Art. 31. Proof of the destination specified in art. 30 is complete in the following cases:

(1) When the goods are documented for discharge in an enemy port, or for delivery to the armed forces of the enemy.

(2) When the vessel is to call at enemy ports only, or when she is to touch at an enemy port or meet the armed forces of the enemy before reaching the neutral port for which the goods in question are documented.

Art. 32. Where a vessel is carrying absolute contraband, her papers are conclusive proof as to the voyage on which she is engaged, unless she is found clearly out of the course indicated by her papers and unable to give adequate reasons to justify such deviation.

Art. 33. Conditional contraband is liable to capture if it is shown to be destined for the use of the armed forces or of a Government department of the enemy State, unless in the latter case the circumstances show that the goods cannot in fact be used for the purpose of the war in progress. This latter exception does not apply to a consignment coming under art. 24 (4) (i.e., gold and silver in coin or bullion and paper money).

Art. 34. The destination referred to in art. 33 is presumed to exist if the goods are consigned to enemy authorities, or to a contractor established in the enemy country who, as a matter of common knowledge, supplies articles of this kind to the enemy. A similar presumption arises if the goods are consigned to a fortified place belonging to the enemy, or other place serving as a base for the armed forces of the enemy. No such presumption, however, arises in the case of a merchant vessel bound for one of these places if it is sought to prove that she herself is contraband.

In cases where the above presumptions do not arise, the destination is presumed to be innocent.

The presumption set up by this article may be rebutted.

Art. 35. Conditional contraband is not liable to capture, except where found on board a vessel bound for territory belonging to or occupied by the enemy, or for the armed forces of the enemy, and when it is not to be discharged in an intervening neutral port.

The ship's papers are conclusive proof both as to the voyage on which the vessel is engaged and as to the port of discharge of the goods, unless she is found clearly out of the course indicated by her papers, and unable to give adequate reasons to justify such deviation.

Art. 36. Notwithstanding the provisions of art. 35, conditional contraband, if shown to have the destination referred to in art. 33, is liable to capture in cases where the enemy country has no seaboard.

Art. 37. A vessel carrying goods liable to capture as absolute or conditional contraband may be captured on the high seas or in the territorial waters of the belligerents throughout the whole of her voyage, even if she is to touch at a port of call before reaching the hostile destination.

Art. 38. A vessel may not be captured on the ground that she has carried contraband on a previous occasion if such carriage is in point of fact at an end.

Art. 39. Contraband goods are liable to condemnation.

Art. 40. A vessel carrying contraband may be condemned if the contraband, reckoned either by value, weight, volume, or freight, forms more than half the cargo.

Art. 41. If a vessel carrying contraband is released, she may be condemned to pay the costs and expenses incurred by the captor in respect of the proceedings in the National Prize Court and the custody of the ship and cargo during the proceedings.

Art. 42. Goods which belong to the owner of the contraband and are on board the same vessel are liable to condemnation.

By the Order in Council, dated the 20th Aug. 1914, it is provided (inter alia) :—

During the present hostilities the Convention known as the Declaration of London shall, subject to the following additions and modifications, be adopted and put in force by His Majesty's Government as if the same had been ratified by His Majesty.

The additions and modifications are as follows :—

(1) The lists of absolute and conditional contraband contained in the proclamation dated the 4th Aug. 1914 shall be substituted for the lists contained in arts. 22 and 24 of the said Declaration.

(3) The destination referred to in art. 33 may be inferred from any sufficient evidence, and (in addition to the presumption laid down in art. 34) shall be presumed to exist if the goods are consigned to or for an agent of the enemy State or to or for a merchant or other person under the control of the authorities of the enemy State.

(5) Notwithstanding the provisions of art. 35 of the said Declaration, conditional contraband, if shown to have the destination referred to in art. 33, is liable at capture to whatever port the vessel is bound and at whatever port the cargo is to be discharged.

By the Order in Council, dated the 29th Oct. 1914, it is provided (inter alia) :—

1. During the present hostilities the provisions of the Convention known as the Declaration of London shall, subject to the exclusion of the lists of contraband and non-contraband, and to the modifications hereinafter set out, be adopted and put in force by His Majesty's Government.

The modifications are as follows :—

(1) A neutral vessel, with papers indicating a neutral destination, which, notwithstanding the destination shown on the papers, proceeds to an enemy port, shall be liable to capture and condemnation if she is encountered before the end of her next voyage.

(2) The destination referred to in art. 33 of the said Declaration shall (in addition to the presumptions laid down in art. 34) be presumed to exist if the goods are consigned to or for an agent of the enemy State.

(3) Notwithstanding the provisions of art. 35 of the said Declaration, conditional contraband shall be liable to capture on board a vessel bound for a neutral port if the goods are consigned "to order" or if the ship's papers do not show who is the consignee of the goods in territory belonging to or occupied by the enemy.

(4) In the cases covered by the preceding paragraph (3) it shall lie upon the owners of the goods to prove that their destination was innocent.

2. When it is shown to the satisfaction of one of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State that the enemy Government is drawing supplies for its armed forces from or through a neutral country, he may direct that in respect of ships bound for a port in that country art. 35 of the said Declaration shall not apply. Such direction shall be notified in the London Gazette and shall operate until the same is withdrawn. So long as such direction is in force, a vessel which is carrying conditional contraband to a port in that country shall not be immune from capture.

3. The Order in Council of the 20th Aug. 1914, directing the adoption and enforcement during the present hostilities of the Convention known as the Declaration of London, subject to the additions and modifications therein specified, is hereby repealed.

All the goods claimed in the present cases, other than rubber and hides, were declared conditional contraband by the proclamation of the 4th Aug. 1914. Rubber was declared conditional contraband on the 21st Sept., and absolute contraband on the 29th Oct. Hides were declared conditional contraband on the 21st Sept.

Cur. adv. vult.

Sept. 16.—The PRESIDENT.—The cargoes which have been seized and which are claimed in these proceedings were laden on four steamships belonging to neutral owners, but under time charters to an American Corporation, the Gans Steamship Line. Mr. John H. Gans, the president of the company, is a German. He has resided in America for some years, but he has not been naturalised. The general agent of the company in Europe was one Wolenburg, of Hamburg.

The four ships were the Alfred Nobel (Norwegian), the Björnstjerne Björnson (Norwegian), the Fridland (Swedish), and the Kim (Norwegian). They all started within a period of three weeks, in October and November 1914, on voyages from New York to Copenhagen with very large cargoes of lard, hog and meat products, oil stocks, wheat, and other foodstuffs. Two of the vessels had cargoes of rubber, and one of hides. They were captured on the high seas, and their cargoes were seized on the ground that they were conditional contraband, alleged to be confiscable in the circumstances, with the exception of one cargo of rubber which was seized as absolute contraband.

The court is now asked to deal only with the cargoes. All questions relating to the capture and the confiscability of the ships are left over to be argued and dealt with hereafter.

It is necessary to note the various dates of sailing and capture. They are as follows:—

	Date of Sailing. 1914.	Date of Capture. 1914.
Alfred Nobel ...	20th Oct.	... 5th Nov.
Björnstjerne Björnson	27th „	... 11th „
Fridland	28th „	... 10th „
Kim	11th Nov.	... 28th „

Upon some of those dates may depend questions touching what Orders in Council are applicable. One Order in Council adopting with modifications the provisions of the Convention known as the Declaration of London was promulgated on the 20th Aug. 1914, and another on the 29th Oct. 1914. Proclamations as to contraband, absolute and conditional, were issued on the 4th Aug., 21st Sept., and 29th Oct. 1914. It is useful to note here, in order to avoid any possible misconception or confusion, that the later Order in Council of the 11th March 1915 (sometimes called the "Reprisals Order") does not affect the present cases in any way.

Before proceeding to state the result of the examination of the facts relative to the respective cargoes and claims, a general review may be made of the situation which led up to the dispatch of the four ships with their cargoes to a Danish port. Notwithstanding the state of war, there was no difficulty in the way of neutral ships trading to German ports in the North Sea other than the perils which Germany herself had created by the indiscriminate laying and scattering of mines of all descriptions, unanchored and floating, outside territorial waters in the open sea in the way of the routes of maritime trade, in defiance of international law and the rules of conduct of naval warfare, and in flagrant violation of the Hague Convention to which Germany was a party. Apart from these dangers neutral vessels could have, in the exercise of their international rights, voyaged with their goods to and from Hamburg, Bremen, Emden, and any other ports of the German Empire. There was no blockade involving risk of confiscation of vessels running or attempting to run it. Neutral vessels might have carried conditional and absolute contraband into those ports, acting again within their rights under international law, subject only to the risk of capture by vigilant warships of this country and its allies.

But the trade of neutrals—other than the Scandinavian countries and Holland—with German ports in the North Sea having been rendered so difficult as to become to all intents impossible, it is not surprising that a great part of it should be deflected to Scandinavian ports from which access to the German ports in the Baltic and to inland Germany by overland routes was available. And that this deflection resulted, the facts universally known strongly testify. The neutral trade concerned in the present cases is that of the United States of America; and the transactions which have to be scrutinised arose from a trading, either real and bonâ fide or pretended and ostensible only, with Denmark, in the course of which these vessels' sea voyages were made between New York and Copenhagen.

Denmark is a country with a small population of less than three million inhabitants, and it is, of course, as regards foodstuffs, an exporting and not an importing country. Its situation, however, renders it convenient to transport goods from its territory to German ports and to places like Hamburg, Altona, Lübeck, Stettin, and Berlin. The total cargoes in the four captured ships bound for Copenhagen within a period of three weeks amounted to about 73,237,000lb. in weight. (These weights and other weights which will be given are gross weights according to the ships' manifests.) Portions of these cargoes have been released and other portions remain unclaimed. The quantity of goods claimed in these proceedings is very large. Altogether the claims cover about 32,312,000lb., exclusive of the rubber and the hides. The claimants have not furnished the court with any information as to the quantities of similar products which they had supplied or consigned to Denmark previous to the outbreak of the present war. Some illustrative statistics were given by the Crown with regard to lard of various qualities, which are not without significance, and which form a fair criterion of the imports of these and like substances into Denmark before the war; and they give a measure for comparison with the imports of lard consigned to Copenhagen, after the outbreak of war, upon the four vessels now before the court.

The average annual quantity of lard imported into Denmark during the three years 1911 to 1913 from all sources was 1,459,000lb. The quantity of lard consigned to Copenhagen on these four ships alone was 19,252,000lb. Comparing these quantities, the result is that these vessels were carrying towards Copenhagen within less than a month more than thirteen times the quantity of lard which had been imported annually into Denmark for each of the three years before the war. To illustrate further the change effected by the war, it was given in evidence that the imports of lard from the United States of America to Scandinavia (or, more accurately, to parts of Europe other than the United Kingdom, France, Belgium, Germany, the Netherlands, and Italy) during the months of October and November 1914 amounted to 50,647,849lb. as compared with 854,856lb. for the same months in 1913, showing an increase for the two months of 49,792,993lb.; or, in other words, the imports during those two months in 1914 were nearly sixty times those for the corresponding months of 1913. One more illustration may be supplied from statistics which were given in evidence on behalf of one of the claimants (Hammonds and Swifts). In the five months, August to December 1913, the exports of lard from the United States of America to Germany were 68,664,975lb. During the same five months in 1914 they had fallen to a mere nominal quantity, 23,800lb. On the other hand, during these periods similar exports from the United States of America to Scandinavian countries and to Malta and Gibraltar (which last two places would not materially affect the comparison) rose from 2,125,579lb. to 59,694,447lb. These facts give practical certainty to the inference that an overwhelming proportion—so overwhelming as to amount to almost the whole—of the consignments of lard in the four vessels I am dealing with was intended for or would find its way into Germany.

These, however, are general considerations, important to be borne in mind in their appropriate place, but not in any sense conclusive upon the serious questions of continuous voyages, of hostile quality, and of hostile destination, which are involved before it can be determined whether the goods seized are confiscable as prize.

The dates of sailing and capture have been given with an intimation that they may have a bearing upon the law applicable to the cases. The Alfred Nobel, the Björnstjerne Björnson, and the Fridland started on their voyages in the interval between the making of the two Orders in Council of the 20th Aug. and the 29th Oct. 1914. The Kim commenced her voyage after the latter order came into force. By the proclamation of the 4th Aug. all the goods now claimed (other than the rubber and the hides) were declared to be conditional contraband. The cargoes of rubber seized were laden on the Fridland and the Kim. Rubber was declared conditional contraband on the 21st Sept. 1914, and absolute contraband on the 29th Oct. Accordingly the rubber on the Fridland was conditional contraband and that on the Kim was absolute contraband. The hides were laden on the Kim. Hides were declared conditional contraband on the 21st Sept. 1914. No contention was made on behalf of the claimants that the goods were not to be regarded as conditional or absolute contraband in accordance with the respective proclamations affecting them. That is to say, it was admitted that the goods partook of the character of conditional or absolute contraband under the proclamations, and were to be dealt with accordingly.

The law can be best discussed and can only be applied after ascertaining the facts. The details relating to the ships and their cargoes which it has been necessary to examine are very voluminous. I must try to summarise them for the purpose of this judgment, in order to make it intelligible in principle and in the results. To attempt to give even a moderate proportion of the details would tend to bewildering confusion.

The number of separate bills of lading covering the cargoes on the four vessels is about 625. Four large American firms were consignors of goods on each of the four vessels, and a fifth on two of them. According to the figures given to the court by the law officers of the Crown, these five American firms were consignors of lard and meat products to the following extent:—

Armour and Co.	9,677,978
Morris and Co. (with Stern and Co.)	6,868,213
Hammond and Co. (with Swift and Co.) ...	3,397,005
Sulzberger and Sons Company	2,602,009
Cudahy and Co.	729,379
Total ...	23,274,584

These figures I accept as substantially correct.

Those portions of the cargoes which have been released, and those which have not been claimed, will be dealt with in a separate judgment. There is some overlapping, as some parts of the cargoes have been claimed by the consignors, and also by some alleged vendees. For these and other reasons some corrections in the figures which follow may become necessary; but they are substantially correct as they stand in the various documents, and as they were dealt with at the hearing, and certainly sufficiently accurate for the purpose of determining all questions relating to the rights of the Crown to condemnation or of the various claimants to relief.

[The learned President then proceeded to analyse the claims put forward by the American consignors and the alleged Scandinavian purchasers. He afterwards dealt with each of the claims in detail, setting out with great minuteness the course of trading before the war and after the outbreak of hostilities, the nature and the volume of the transactions in every instance, and stating the conclusion at which he had arrived upon the evidence adduced as to whether the various cargoes were really intended for an enemy destination or whether their bonâ fide destination was Denmark, it being the intention of the purchasers to incorporate the goods on their arrival at Copenhagen into the common stock of the country. In the course of his consideration of the claim of one of the American shippers, his Lordship made the following remarks upon the nature of some of the evidence adduced:]

I have now stated the separate facts affecting the cases of the American shippers, and, before proceeding to the cases of the alleged Scandinavian purchasers, I will refer shortly to what I called the "Ascher" correspondence, which will be found in Exhibit J.P.M. 10 to the affidavit of the Procurator-General. This was a series of intercepted letters written from Hamburg by Ascher and Co. to the last-named claimants, Cudahy and Co., some before the seizures and others afterwards. I read them for general information as to the circumstances in which it was known that the trade in conditional contraband was carried on; and I find in them cogent corroboration of many facts and inferences which are, I think, already sufficiently established without them. They sound almost like a talk between merchants "on 'Change" relating to a trade rendered interesting through the commercial risks which its manipulation involved. If the correspondence could have been completed by the inclusion of the letters from America in reply, it would have been still more elucidating. The letters show an intimate knowledge of what was being done by the various shippers in reference to consignments of foodstuffs to Copenhagen, with the diffculty of exportation from Denmark to Germany, and with the probable fate of some of the cargoes now before the court.

It was objected that they could not be evidence against any persons other then Ascher and Co. and Cudahy and Co., and that they ought not to be read in any of the other cases. If they stood alone I should not act upon them as affecting those cases. But it must be remembered that Prize Courts are not governed or limited by the strict rules of evidence which bind, and sometimes unduly fetter, our municipal courts. Such strict evidence would often be very difficult to obtain; and to require it in many cases would be to defeat the legitimate rights of belligerents. Prize Courts have always deemed it right to rely upon well-known facts which have come to light in other cases, or as matters of public reputation. In the case of The Rosalie and Betty (2 Ch. Rob. 343) Lord Stowell discussed the subject generally and said: "In considering this case, I am told that I am to set off without any prejudice against the parties from anything that may have appeared in former cases; that I am not to consider former circumstances, but to suppose every case a true one till the fraud is actually apparent. This is undoubtedly the duty, in a general sense, of all who are in a judicial situation, but at the same time they are not to shut their eyes to what is generally passing in the world." Then he refers to well-known facts and expedients relating to illegal trades and fraudulent practices during war, and adds: "Not to know these facts as matters of frequent and not unfamiliar occurrence would be not to know the general nature of the subject upon which the court is to decide; not to consider them at all would not be to do justice."

I will pause only to give one illustration from the American authorities. In the judgment in The Stephen Hart (Blatch. Prize Cases, 387, at p. 403) the court read from a statement made by the Solicitor-General (Sir Roundell Palmer) in the House of Commons, relating to the contraband trade between England and America by way of Nassau, the following passage:—

"The then Solicitor-General of England (Sir Roundell Palmer) stated in the House of Commons on the 29th June last, referring to the case of the Dolphin and the Pearl, decided by the District Court for the southern division of Florida . . . that it was well known to everybody that there was a large contraband trade between England and America by way of Nassau; that it was absurd to pretend to shut their eyes to it; and that the trade with Nassau and Matamoras had become what it was in consequence of the war." And the learned judge in another passage, at p. 404, said: "The cases of the Stephen Hart, the Springbok, the Peterhoff, and the Gertrude illustrate a course of trade which has sprung up during the present war, and of which this court will take judicial cognisance, as it appears from its own records and those of other courts of the United States as well as from public reputation."

The Ascher letters having been written, as it appears to me, of the big shipping companies about and with intimate knowledge of this trading, and being obviously genuine, and, indeed, never intended to see the light in this court, I consider that on general principles the court was entitled to read them, and so to inform itself as to this trade generally, without, of course, allowing any statements in them to affect any claimant injuriously, especially if there was no opportunity for him to deal with them. It is right to add that if I had not been made acquainted with their contents my decision in every case would have been the same. But they do give a sense of mental satisfaction in regard to inferences which have been drawn. [At the conclusion of the investigation of the various claims, his Lordship proceeded:]

The details of all the claims have now been set out. With regard to the general character of the cargoes, evidence was given by persons of experience that all the foodstuffs were suitable for the use of troops in the field; that some—e.g., the smoked meat or smoked bacon—were similar in kind, wrapping, and packing to what was supplied in large quantities to the British troops, and were not ordinarily supplied for civilian use; that others—e.g., canned or boiled beef in tins—were of the same brand and class as had been offered by Armour and Co. for the use of the British forces in the field; and that the packages sent by these ships could only have been made up for the use of troops in the field. As against this, there was evidence that goods of the same class had been ordinarily supplied to and for civilians. As to the lard, proof was given that glycerine (which is in great demand for the manufacture of nitro-glycerine for high explosives) is readily obtainable from lard. Although this use is possible, there was no evidence before me that any lard had been so used in Germany; and I am of opinion that the lard comprised ought to be treated upon the footing of foodstuffs only. It is largely used in German army rations. As to the fat-backs, of which large quantities were shipped, there was also proof that they could be used for the production of glycerine. Mr. Perkin in his affidavit in answer to that of Mr. George Stubbs, of the British Government laboratory (which dealt with lard and fat-backs as materials out of which glycerine was producible), confines his observations to lard and passes by entirely what had been deposed as to fat-backs. In fact, no evidence as against that of Mr. Stubbs was offered for the shippers of fat-backs. Mr. Nuttall, a deponent for one of them (Sulzberger and Sons Company), says the fat-backs shipped by them were not in a condition which was suitable for eating. But he may have meant only that they required further treatment before they became edible. There was no market for these fat-backs in Denmark. The Procurator-General deposed, as a result of inquiries, that the Germans were very anxious to obtain fat-backs merely for the glycerine they contain. In these circumstances it is not by any means clear that fat-backs should be regarded merely as foodstuffs in these cases, and, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, it is fair to treat them as materials which might either be required as food or for the production of glycerine.

The convenience of Copenhagen for transporting goods to Germany need hardly be mentioned. It was in evidence that the chief trade between Copenhagen and Germany since the war has been through Lübeck, Stettin, and Hamburg. The sea-borne trade of Lübeck increased very largely after the declaration of war. It was also in evidence that Lübeck was a German naval base. Stettin is a garrison town, and is the headquarters of a German army corps. It has also shipbuilding yards, where warships are constructed and repaired. It is Berlin's nearest seaport. It will be remembered that one of the big shipping companies asked a Danish firm to become nominal consignees for goods destined for Stettin. Hamburg and Altona had ceased to be the commercial ports dealing with commerce coming through the North Sea. They were the headquarters of various German regiments. Copenhagen is also a convenient port for communication with the German naval arsenal and fortress of Kiel and its canal, and for all places reached through the canal. These ports may properly be regarded, in my opinion, as bases of supply for the enemy, and the cargoes destined for them might upon that short ground be condemned as prize. But I prefer, especially as no particular cargo can definitely be said to have been sent to a particular port, to deal with the cases on broader grounds.

Before stating the inferences and conclusions of fact, it will be convenient to investigate and to ascertain the legal principles, which are to be applied according to international law, in view of the state of things as they were in the year 1914. While the guiding principles of the law must be followed, it is a truism to say that international law, in order to be adequate, as well as just, must have regard to the circumstances of the times, including the circumstances arising out of the particular situation of the war, or the condition of the parties engaged in it: (see The Jonge Margaretha, Roscoe's English Prize Cases, vol. 1, 100; 1 Ch. Rob. 189; and Chancellor Kent's Commentaries, p. 139).

Two important doctrines familiar to international law come prominently forward for consideration; the one is embodied in the rule as to "continuous voyage" or "continuous transportation"; the other relates to the ultimate hostile destination of conditional and absolute contraband respectively.

The doctrine of "continuous voyage" was first applied by the English Prize Courts to unlawful trading. There is no reported case in our courts where the doctrine is applied in terms to the carriage of contraband. But it was so applied and extended by the United States Courts against this country in the time of the American Civil War, and its application was acceded to by the British Government of the day, and was, moreover, acted upon by the International Commission which sat under the treaty between this country and made at Washington on the 8th May 1871, when the commission, composed of an Italian, an American, and a British delegate, unanimously disallowed the claims in The Peterhoff (5 Wall. 28), which was the leading case upon the subject of continuous transportation in relation to contraband goods. The other well-known American cases, The Stephen Hart (Blatch. Prize Cases, 387), The Bermuda (3 Wall. 514), and The Springbok (5 Wall. 1), considered and applied the doctrine in relation to attempted breaches of blockade.

The doctrine was asserted by Lord Salisbury at the time of the South African War with reference to German vessels carrying goods to Delagoa Bay, and, as he was dealing with Germany, he fortified himself by referring to the view of Bluntschli as the true view, as follows: "If the ships or goods are sent to the destination of a neutral port only the better to come to the aid of the enemy, there will be contraband of war, and confiscation will be justified": (Droit International Codifié, par. 813).

It is essential to appreciate that the foundation of the law of contraband, and the reason for the doctrine of continuous voyage which has been grafted into it, is the right of a belligerent to prevent certain goods from reaching the country of the enemy for his military use. Neutral traders, in their own interest, set limits to the exercise of this right as far as they can. These conflicting interests of neutrals and belligerents are the causes of the contests which have taken place upon the subject of contraband and continuous voyages.

A compromise was attempted by the London Conference in the unratified Declaration of London. The doctrine of continuous voyage or continuous transportation was conceded to the full by the conference in the case of absolute contraband, and it was expressly declared that "it is immaterial whether the carriage of the goods is direct or entails transhipment, or a subsequent transport by land": (art. 30). As to conditional contraband, the attempted compromise was that the doctrine was excluded in the case of conditional contraband, except where the enemy country had no seaboard: (art. 36). As is usual in compromises, there seems to be an absence of logical reason for the exclusion. If it is right that a belligerent should be permitted to capture absolute contraband proceeding by various voyages, or transport with an ultimate destination for the enemy territory, why should he not be allowed to capture goods which, though not absolutely contraband, become contraband by reason of a further destination to the enemy Government or its armed forces? And with the facilities of transportation by sea and by land which now exist, the right of a belligerent to capture conditional contraband would be of a very shadowy value if a mere consignment to a neutral port was sufficient to protect the goods. It appears also to be obvious that in these days of easy transit, if the doctrine of continuous voyage or continuous transportation is to hold at all, it must cover not only voyages from port to port at sea, but also transport by land until the real, as distinguished from the merely ostensible, destination of the goods is reached.

In connection with this subject, note may be taken of the communication of the 20th Jan. 1915 from Mr. Bryan, as Secretary of State for the United States Government, to Mr. Stone, of the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate. It is, indeed, a State document. In it the Secretary of State, dealing with absolute and conditional contraband, puts on record the following as the views of the United States Government:—

"The rights and interests of belligerents and neutrals are opposed in respect of contraband articles and trade. . . . The record of the United States in the past is not free from criticism. When neutral, this Government has stood for a restricted list of absolute and conditional contraband. As a belligerent we have contended for a liberal list, according to our conception of the necessities of the case. The United States has made earnest representations to Great Britain in regard to the seizure and detention of all American ships or cargoes bonâ fide destined to neutral ports. . . . It will be recalled, however, that American courts have established various rules bearing on these matters. The rule of 'continuous voyage' has been not only asserted by American tribunals, but extended by them. They have exercised the right to determine from the circumstances whether the ostensible was the real destination. They have held that the shipment of articles of contraband to a neutral port 'to order,' from which, as a matter of fact, cargoes had been transhipped to the enemy, is corroborative evidence that the cargo is really destined to the enemy instead of to the neutral port of delivery. It is thus seen that some of the doctrines which appear to bear harshly upon neutrals at the present time are analogous to or outgrowths from policies adopted by the United States when it was a belligerent. The Government therefore cannot consistently protest against the application of rules which it has followed in the past, unless they have not been practised as heretofore. . . . The fact that the commerce of the United States is interrupted by Great Britain is consequent upon the superiority of her navy on the high seas. History shows that whenever a country has possessed the superiority our trade has been interrupted, and that few articles essential to the prosecution of the war have been allowed to reach its enemy from this country."

It is not necessary to dilate further upon the history of the doctrine in question. I have no hesitation in pronouncing that, in my view, the doctrine of continuous voyage or transportation, both in relation to carriage of contraband, absolute and conditional, by sea and over land, had become part of the law of nations at the commencement of the present war, in accordance with the principles of recognised legal decisions, and with the view of the great body of modern jurists, and also with the practice of nations in recent maritime warfare.

The result is that the court is not restricted in its vision to the primary consignment of the goods in these cases to the neutral port of Copenhagen, but is entitled and is bound to take a more extended outlook, in order to ascertain whether this neutral destination was merely ostensible, and, if so, what the real ultimate destination was. As to the real destination of a cargo, one of the chief tests is whether it is consigned to the neutral port to be there delivered for the purpose of being incorporated into the common stock of the country. This test was applied over a century ago by Sir William Grant in the Court of Appeal in Prize Cases, in the case of The William (Roscoe, vol. 1, 505 ; 5 Ch. Rob. 385). It was adopted by the United States Supreme Court in their unanimous judgment in The Bermuda (ubi sup.), where Chase, C.J., in delivering judgment, at p. 551, said : " Neutrals may convey in neutral ships from one neutral port to another any goods, whether contraband of war or not, if intended for actual delivery at the port of destination, and to become part of the common stock of the country, or of the port."

Another circumstance which has been regarded as important in determining the question of real or ostensible destination at the neutral port is the consignment " to order or assigns " without naming any consignee. In the celebrated case of The Springbok (ubi sup.) the Supreme Court of the United States acted upon inferences as to destination (in the case of blockade) on this very ground. The part of the judgment dealing with the matter is as follows : " That some other destination than Nassau was intended may be inferred from the fact that the consignment, shown by the bills of lading and the manifest, was to order or assign. Under the circumstances of this trade, such a consignment must be taken as a negation that any such sale was intended to be made there ; for, had such sale been intended, it is most likely that the goods would have been consigned for that purpose to some established house named in the bills of lading." The same circumstance was also similarly dealt with in The Bermuda (ubi sup.) and in The Peterhoff (ubi sup.).

I am not unmindful of the argument that consignment " to order " is common in these days. But a similar argument was used in the Springbok case (ubi sup.), supported by the testimony of some of the principal brokers in London to the effect that a consignment " to order or assigns " was the usual and regular form of consignment to an agent for sale at such a port as Nassau. The British Government was petitioned to intervene on behalf of the shippers ; but upon this point the British Foreign Office said that " no doubt the form was usual in time of peace, but that a practice which might be perfectly regular in time of peace under the municipal regulations of a particular State would not always satisfy the law of nations in time of war, more particularly when the voyage might expose the ship to the visit of belligerent cruisers," and added that " having regard to the very doubtful character of all trade ostensibly carried on at Nassau during the war in the United States, and to many other circumstances of suspicion before the court, Her Majesty's Government are not disposed to consider the argument of the court upon this point as otherwise than tenable."

The argument still remains good that if shippers, after the outbreak of war, consign goods of the nature of contraband to their own order, without naming a consignee, it may be a circumstance of suspicion in considering the question whether the goods were really intended for the neutral destination, and to become part of the common stock of the neutral country, or whether they had another ultimate destination. Of course, it is not conclusive. The suspicion arising from this form of consignment during war might be dispelled by evidence produced by the shippers. It may be here observed that some point was made that in many of the consignments the bills of lading were not made out " to order " simpliciter, but to branches or agents of the shippers. That circumstance does not, in my opinion, make any material difference. Other matters relating to destination will be discussed under the second branch of the case—namely, whether the goods were destined for Government or military use.

Wherever destination comes in question, certainty as to it is seldom possible, in such cases as these ; " highly probable destination " is enough in the absence of satisfactory evidence for the shippers : (see per Lord Stowell in The Jonge Margaretha, ubi sup.). Upon this branch of the case, for reasons which have been given when dealing with the consignments generally, and when stating the circumstances with respect to each claim, I have no hesitation in stating my conclusion that the cargoes (other than the small portions acquired by persons in Scandinavia whose claim are allowed) were not destined for consumption or use in Denmark, nor intended to be incorporated into the general stock of that country by sale or otherwise; that Copenhagen was not the real bonâ fide destination, but that the cargoes were on their way, at the time of capture, to German territory as their actual and real ultimate destination.

The second branch of the case raises the question whether the goods which I have decided were on their way to German territory were destined further for the use of the German Government or departments or for military use by the troops, or other persons actually engaged in warlike operations, or should be presumed to be so destined in the circumstances.

As a preliminary, it becomes necessary to consider the two Orders in Council of the 20th Aug. and the 29th Oct. 1914. It was contended on behalf of the claimants that before the seizure of the cargoes on the first three vessels, and while they were still on their respective voyages, the Order in Council of the 20th Aug. (even if it was binding on the court) had been rendered inoperative by the repeal contained in the order of the 29th Oct. It was further contended that the two Orders in Council purporting to give effect with certain additions and modifications to the unratified Declaration of London had no binding effect upon this court, and ought to be disregarded.

As to the first of these two contentions, no doubt if the first order had affected the substantive rights of the neutral—e.g., if it had declared an article as absolute contraband which by the repealing order had been removed from the list of contraband before capture—it could not be said that the order had remained operative so as to justify the seizure of the article. But in reality the only change material to these cases which the order purported to make was in the nature of an alteration of practice as to evidence—namely, by adding certain presumptions to those contained in art. 34 of the Declaration of London; and all these presumptions, whether set up in the interest of the captor or against him, are rebuttable: (see M. Renault's Report on the Declaration). The order had proclaimed to the neutral owners of the cargoes before the voyages commenced how in practice, as matter of evidence and proof, cargoes seized would be dealt with, and it might fairly be argued that they could not complain if their cases were treated in accordance with the order. But it is not necessary for me to pronounce any decision upon the point. I will for the purpose of this case assume that the order of the 20th Aug. had ceased to have any effect upon the promulgation of the subsequent order. The result is that cases relating to the Alfred Nobel, Björnstjerne Björnson, and the Fridland must be decided in accordance with the rules of international law. But the order of the 29th Oct. applies to all the cargoes on the Kim.

As to the contention that the order is not binding on this court, I expressed my views on the general question of the binding character of Orders in Council upon the Prize Court in the the case of The Zamora (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 144; 113 L. T. Rep. 649). I do not wish to detract anything from what I then said, nor do I deem it necessary at present to add anything as to the general principles. But as to this order, so far as it affects questions arising in these proceedings, it is right to point out that no provision in it can possibly be said to be in violation of any rule or principle of international law. It is true that in a matter of real substance it alters the proposed compromise incorporated in art. 35 of the Declaration of London, whereby if the Declaration had been ratified, the doctrine of continuous voyage would have been excluded for conditional contraband. The provision in art. 35 was described by Sir Robert Finlay as "an innovation in international law as hitherto recognised in the United States, and by Great Britain and other States, introducing an innovation of the first importance by excluding the doctrine of continuous voyage in the case of conditional contraband." What the Order in Council did, therefore, was to prevent the innovation. In this regard, it therefore proceeded not in violation of, but upon the basis of the existing international law upon the subject. It may be well to note, and to record, that at the London Conference which produced the Declaration all the allied Powers engaged in this war, and also the United States, had been in favour of continuing to apply the doctrine of continuous voyage, or continuous transportation, to conditional as well as to absolute contraband—a doctrine which, as we have seen, was nurtured and specially favoured by the courts of the United States. As to the modifications regarding presumptions and onus of proof—as, for instance, where goods are consigned "to order" without naming a consignee—these are matters really affecting rules of evidence and methods of proof in this court, and I fail to see how it is possible to contend that they are violations of any rule of international law.

The effect of the Order in Council is that, in addition to the presumptions laid down in art. 34 of the Declaration of London, a presumption of enemy destination as defined by art. 33 shall be presumed to exist if the goods are consigned to or for an agent of the enemy State, or to a person in the enemy territory, or if they are consigned "to order," or if the ship's papers do not show who the consignee is; but in the latter cases the owners may, if they are able, prove that the destination is innocent.

All the goods claimed by the shippers in the Kim were consigned to their own order or to the order of their agents (which is the same thing) and not to any independent consignee; and they have all entirely failed to discharge the onus which lies upon them to prove that their destination was innocent. There was some suggestion that liability to capture in the Declaration of London and Order in Council did not mean liability to confiscation or condemnation. On reference to the various provisions as to absolute and conditional contraband, it is clear that it is used in that sense. I am of opinion that under the Order in Council the goods claimed by all the shippers on the Kim were confiscable as lawful prize.

I now proceed to consider the confiscability of the cargoes on all the four vessels apart entirely from the operation of the Order in Council upon the Kim cargoes. Having decided that the cargoes, though ostensibly destined for Copenhagen, were in reality destined for Germany, the question remains whether their real ultimate destination was for the use of the German Government or its naval or military forces. If the goods were destined for Germany, what are the facts and the law bearing upon the question whether they had the further hostile destination for the German Government for military use? In the first place, as has already been pointed out, they were goods adapted for such use, and, further, in part adapted for immediate warlike purposes in the sense that some of them could be employed for the production of explosives. They were destined, too, for some of the nearest German ports, like Hamburg, Lübeck, and Stettin, where some of the German forces were quartered, and whose connection with the operations of war has been stated. It is by no means necessary that the court should be able to fix the exact port: (see The Dolphin, 7 Fed. Cas. 868; The Pearl, 19 Fed. Cas. 54; 5 Wall. 574; and The Peterhoff, ubi sup.). Regard must also be had to the state of things in Germany during this war in relation to the military forces and to the civil population, and to the method, described in evidence, which was adopted by the Government in order to procure supplies for the forces.

The general situation was described by the British Foreign Secretary in his Note to the American Government on the 10th Feb. 1915 as follows:—

"The reason for drawing a distinction between foodstuffs intended for the civil population and those for the armed forces or enemy Government disappears when the distinction between the civil population and the armed forces itself disappears. In any country in which there exists such a tremendous organisation for war as now obtains in Germany, there is no clear division between those whom the Government is responsible for feeding and those whom it is not. Experience shows that the power to requisition will be used to the fullest extent in order to make sure that the wants of the military are supplied, and, however much goods may be imported for civil use, it is by the military that they will be consumed if military exigencies require it, especially now that the German Government have taken control of all the foodstuffs in the country. . . . In the peculiar circumstances of the present struggle, where the forces of the enemy comprise so large a proportion of the population, and where there is so little evidence of shipments on private as distinguished from Government account, it is most reasonable that the burden of proof should rest upon claimants."

It was given in evidence that about 10,000,000 of men were either serving in the German army or dependent upon or under the control of the military authorities of the German Government out of a population of between 65,000,000 and 70,000,000 of men, women, and children. Of the food required for the population it would not be extravagant to estimate that at least one-fourth would be consumed by these 10,000,000 adults. Apart altogether from the special adaptability of these cargoes for the armed forces, and the highly probable inference that they were destined for the forces—even assuming that they were indiscriminately distributed between the military and civilian population—a very large proportion would necessarily be used by the military forces.

So much as to the probable ultimate destination in fact of the cargoes. Now as to the question of the proof of intention on the part of the shippers of the cargoes. It was argued that the Crown as captors ought to show that there was an original intention by the shippers to supply the goods to the enemy Government or the armed forces at the inception of the voyage as one complete commercial transaction evidenced by a contract of sale or something equivalent to it. It is obvious from a consideration of the whole scheme of conduct of the shippers that if they had expressly arranged to consign the cargoes to the German Government for the armed forces this would have been done in such a way as to make it as difficult as possible for belligerents to detect it. If the captors had to prove such an arrangement affirmatively and absolutely in order to justify capture and condemnation, the rights of belligerents to stop articles of conditional contraband from reaching the hostile destination would become nugatory. It is not a crime to dispatch contraband to belligerents. It can be quite legitimately sent, subject to the risk of capture. But the argument proceeded as if it was essential for the captors to prove the intention as strictly as would be necessary in a criminal trial; and as if all the shippers need do was to be silent, to offer no explanation, and to adopt the attitude towards the Crown, "Prove our hostile intention if you can."

In the first place, it may be observed that it is not necessary that an intention at the commencement of the voyage should be established by the captors either absolutely or by inference. In The Bermuda (ubi sup.) the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, in referring to the decision of Sir William Grant in The William (ubi sup.), said: "If there be an intention, either formed at the time of the original shipment or afterwards, to send the goods forward to an unlawful destination, the continuity of the voyage will not be broken, as to the cargo, by any transactions at the intermediate port." It is, no doubt, incumbent upon the captors, in the first instance, to prove facts from which a reasonable inference of hostile destination can be drawn, subject to rebuttal by the claimants. Lord Granville, as Foreign Secretary, in 1885, in a note to M. Waddington (the French Ambassador), which had reference to the question of rice being declared contraband by the French Government in relation to China, said: "There must be circumstances relative to any particular cargo, or its destination, to displace the presumption that articles of food are intended for the ordinary use of life, and to show primâ facie, at all events, that they are destined for military use, before they could be treated as contraband." And Lord Lansdowne, as Foreign Secretary, in 1904, in a note to the British Ambassador at St. Petersburg, stated the British view thus: "The true test appears to be whether there are circumstances relating to any particular cargo to show that it is destined for military or naval use." These statements, so qualified, it will be noted, were made when this country was making representations against the action of foreign Governments concerning conditional contraband. So far as it is necessary to establish intention on the part of the shippers, it appears to me to be beyond question that it can be shown by inferences from surrounding circumstances relating to the shipment of and dealings with the goods. Cargoes are inanimate things, and they must be sent on their way to persons. If that is all that was meant by counsel for the claimants when they argued that "intention" must be proved, their contention may be conceded. But it need not be an "intention" proved strictly to have existed at the beginning of the voyage, or as an obligation under a definite commercial bargain. If at the time of the seizure the goods were in fact on their way to the enemy Government or its forces as their real ultimate destination by the action of the shippers, whenever their project was conceived, or however it was to be carried out; if, in truth, it is reasonably certain that the shippers must have known that that was the real destination of the goods (apart, of course, from any genuine sale to be made at some intermediate place), the belligerent had a right to stop the goods on their way and to seize them as confiscable goods.

In the circumstances of these cases, especially in view of the opportunity given to the claimants, who possessed the best and fullest knowledge of the facts, to answer the charges made against them, any fair tribunal like a jury or an arbitrator, whose duty it was to judge facts, not only might, but almost certainly would, come to the conclusion that at the time of the seizure the goods, which remained the property of the shippers, were, if not as to the whole, at any rate as to a substantial proportion of them, at the time of seizure on their way to the enemy for his hostile uses. The facts in these cases, in my opinion, more than amply satisfy the "highly probable destination" spoken of by Lord Stowell.

Before I conclude I will make reference to an opinion expressed towards the end of last year by a body of men eminent as students and expositors of international law in America, in the Editorial Comment in the American Journal of International Law, to which my attention was called by the law officers. Amongst them I need only name Mr. Chandler Anderson, Mr. Robert Lansing, Mr. John Bassett Moore, Mr. Theodore Woolsey, and Mr. James Brown Scott. It is as follows: "In a war in which the nation is in arms, where every able-bodied man is under arms and is performing military duty, and where the non-combatant population is organised so as to support the soldiers in the field, it seems likely that belligerents will be inclined to consider destination to the enemy country as sufficient, even if the Government of the enemy possesses and exercises the right of confiscating or appropriating to naval or military uses the property of its citizens or subjects of service to the armies in the field." I cite this, not, of course, as having any authority, but as showing how these eminent American jurists acknowledge that international law must have regard to the actual circumstances of the times. I have not in this judgment followed the course thus indicated by them as a likely and reasonable one in the present state of affairs. I have preferred to proceed on the lines of the old recognised authorities.

I wish also to note the opinion recently expressed by the Hamburg Prize Court in the case of the Maria, decided in April 1915, where goods consigned from the United States to Irish ports were laden upon a neutral (Dutch) vessel. I refer to it, not because I look upon it as profitable or helpful (on the contrary, I agree with Sir Robert Finlay that it should rather be regarded as "a shocking example"), but because it is not uninteresting as an example of the ease with which a Prize Court in Germany "hacks its way through" bonâ fide commercial transactions when dealing with foodstuffs carried by neutral vessels. It is to be remembered, too, that the Hamburg Prize Court was dealing with wheat which was shipped from America before the outbreak of war, and which had also before the war been sold in the ordinary course of business to well-known British merchants, Messrs. R. and H. Hall Limited. This is what the Hamburg court said:

"There is no means of ascertaining with the least certainty what use the wheat would have been put to on the arrival of the vessel in Belfast, and whether the British Government would not have come upon the scene as purchaser even at a very high price, and in this connection it must also be borne in mind that the bills of lading were made out 'to order,' which greatly facilitated the free disposal of the cargo. That at the time of the conclusion of the contract concerning the acquisition of the wheat on the part of R. and H. Hall Limited the possibility of using the same for war purposes had, perhaps, not been contemplated does not affect the question what actual use would have been made of the cargo of wheat after the outbreak of war in August 1914."

For the many reasons which I have given in the course of this judgment, and which do not require recapitulation, or even summary, I have come to the clear conclusion from the facts proved, and the reasonable and, indeed, irresistible inferences from them, that the cargoes claimed by the shippers as belonging to them at the time of seizure were not on their way to Denmark to be incorporated into the common stock of that country by consumption or bonâ fide sale, or otherwise; but, on the contrary, that they were on their way not only to German territory, but also to the German Government and their forces for naval and military use as their real ultimate destination. To hold the contrary would be to allow one's eyes to be filled by the dust of theories and technicalities and to be blinded to the realities of the case. Even if this conclusion were only accurate as to a substantial proportion of the goods, the whole would be affected because "Contraband articles are said to be of an infectious nature, and they contaminate the whole cargo belonging to the same owners. The innocence of any particular article is not usually admitted to exempt it from the general confiscation": (Kent's Commentaries, 12th edit., p. 142). The cases of The Springbok (ubi sup.) and The Peterhoff (ubi sup.) are to the same effect, as is also art. 42 of the Declaration of London, upon which M. Renault's Report is as follows: "The owner of the contraband is punished in the first place by the condemnation of his contraband property, and in the second by that of the goods, even if innocent, which he may possess on board the same vessel."

It only remains, in order to conclude these long and troublesome cases, to state the results as applied to each of the claims.

[The learned President then condemned or released the various cargoes according to his findings that they were or were not intended for an enemy destination.]

Steamship Beechgrove Company Limited v. Aktieselskabet Fjord of Kristiana. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE FIRST DIVISION OF THE COURT OF SESSION IN SCOTLAND.

Collision — Defence of compulsory pilotage — Collision without compulsory pilotage area, but where pilot was necessarily on board—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 633.

The appellants, the owners of the steamship B., brought an action of damages against the respondents, the owners of the steamship F., in respect of a collision which occurred near Princes Pier, Greenock. Among other defences, the respondents set up the defence of compulsory pilotage under the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 633, which provides that a shipowner shall not be answerable "for any loss or damage caused by the default or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of that ship within any district where the employment of a qualified pilot is compulsory by law."

At the time of the collision the river pilot, although he had not reached the official "river Clyde," was directing the navigation of the F. The appellants' contention was that the part of the river at which the collision occurred was not a part where, by law, the employment of a licensed pilot was compulsory.

The sheriff-substitute held that the defence of compulsory pilotage was not open to the respondents, but his decision was reversed by the First Division by a majority (the Lord President and Lord Mackenzie, Lord Skerrington dissenting).

Held, that upon the true construction of sect. 633 of the Act of 1894 the word "district" did not cover an area outside the limits of the river as defined by sect. 75 of the Clyde Navigation Act 1858, that the pilotage outside these limits was not rendered compulsory by law by the operation of the by-law, and that there was no legal compulsion at common law so as to prevent the relation of master and servant from being established between the master and the pilot.

General Steam Navigation Company v. British and Colonial Steam Navigation (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 168, 237; 20 L. T. Rep. 581; L. Rep. 4 Ex. 238) and The Charlton (8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 29; 73 L. T. Rep. 49) discussed.

Appeal from an interlocutor of the First Division of the Court of Session in Scotland, reported 52 S. L. T. 244, which reversed an interlocutor of the Sheriff-Substitute of Lanarkshire.

The appellants, the owners of the steamship Blaenavon, claimed damages from the respondents, the owners of the steamship Fjord, in respect of a collision which occurred on the 2nd July 1914 near Princes' Pier, Greenock, and the question in the appeal was whether at the time of the collision the pilot in charge of the Fjord was so in charge by compulsion of law as to relieve the liability for the consequences of the collision.

The Fjord was inward bound for Glasgow, and at the time of the collision was in charge of a pilot who had come on board at Greenock, which was the only place at which a river pilot for Glasgow could be obtained. The collision occurred some four miles below the limits of compulsory pilotage as defined by sects. 75 and 136 of the Clyde Navigation Consolidation Act 1858.

By sect. 128 of that Act a pilot board was erected for licensing pilots for navigating ships plying in the river at Firth of Clyde up to the Isle of Little Cumbrae, which was some twenty miles below the western limits of the river, and by sect. 139 the board was empowered to make by-laws for the navigation of all vessels between the western limits of the river and the island of Little Cumbrae. Under these by-laws pilots were to consist of two classes—river pilots between Glasgow and Greenock, and deep sea pilots between Greenock and Cumbrae; and by by-law 37 the pilot when on board was to have sole charge of the vessel.

The appellants contended that so far as compulsory pilotage was required by the Clyde Navigation Consolidation Act 1858, the respondent vessel was not required at the point of collision, nor for four miles further on, to have a pilot on board.

The respondents contended that they were compelled by statute to have a pilot on board when crossing the imaginary line which defined the western limit of the Clyde Trust jurisdiction, and were therefore compelled to approach that line after leaving Greenock with a pilot in charge, and the master was bound to allow the pilot to carry out the obligation put upon him by the by-laws.

The sheriff-substitute held that the defence of compulsory pilotage was not open to the respondents, but his decision was reversed by the First Division by a majority, Lord Skerrington dissenting.

The owners of the steamship Blaenavon appealed.

Horne, K.C. and James B. Paton (both of the Scottish Bar) for the appellants.

Laing, K.C. and Raeburn for the respondents.

(a) Reported by W. E. Reid, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The House, having taken time for consideration, allowed the appeal.

The Lord Chancellor (Lord Buckmaster). —On the 2nd Feb. 1914, the steamship Blaenavon left the port of Glasgow and sailed down the river Clyde on an outward voyage. She reached Greenock, which is outside the statutory limits of the river, at about 6 p.m. At the same time the steamship Fjord was sailing up the Firth of Clyde to Glasgow, and a collision occurred between the two vessels outside Princes Pier. The owners of the Blaenavon blamed the Fjord for the accident, and instituted the proceedings out of which this appeal has arisen, for the purpose of recovering compensation for the damage that they suffered.

The actual question of who was to blame for this misadventure is not before your Lordships' House, for, in answer to the condescendence for the pursuers, the defenders raised certain pleas in law, of which for the present purpose the second is alone material. It is in the following terms:

(2) The navigation of defenders' vessel having been in charge of a pilot whose employment was compulsory within a pilotage district in the sense of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, the defenders are free from liability in respect of said collision under sect. 633 of the said Act, and should be assoilzied, with expenses.

The record being closed, the parties were heard on the points of law so raised; and on the 11th July 1914, the sheriff-substitute, by an interlocutor of that date, repelled the second plea to which I have referred. On appeal from this decision, their Lordships of the First Division recalled the interlocutor of the sheriff-substitute and remitted the cause to him to allow proof. From this interlocutor the present appeal has been brought before your Lordships' House.

There is no point for your Lordships' decision except the bare question of law raised by the second plea of the defenders, but this is of some difficulty, and in order to make plain the exact circumstances under which it has arisen, it is necessary to state at some length the provisions of the various Acts of Parliament, the interpretation of which is the main subject for your Lordships' consideration.

By the Clyde Navigation Act of 1858 provisions were established to secure the proper navigation of the river and the Firth of Clyde. By sect. 75 the limits of the river were defined as including the whole channel or waterway of the said river down to a straight line drawn from the eastern end at Newark Castle, on the south shore of the said river, to the mouth of Cardross Burn, on the north shore. By sect. 128 a pilot board was appointed for licensing pilots in both the river and the Firth, within a straight line, drawn due east and west from the southernmost point of the island of Little Cumbrae, this island being some twenty miles further down the river than the western limits fixed by sect. 75. By sect. 134 the pilot board established for licensing pilots, was declared to have the exclusive right of granting such licences to pilots for the navigation of vessels in the river and the Firth within the said limits. It should be observed that by these sections there is no distinction established between the pilotage for the river and the pilotage outside the river, for the whole of the pilots are equally under the same jurisdiction throughout the whole length of the river and the Firth up to the island of Little Cumbrae. By sect. 136, however, the statute imposes certain definite restrictions upon the navigation of vessels; and, as much of the present dispute depends upon the effect of this section, it is as well to state its actual terms.

They are as follows:

It shall not be lawful for any person to navigate without a pilot, nor for any person, except the pilots licensed by the existing pilotage authorities or by the pilot board, as hereinbefore provided, to act in piloting any vessel exceeding sixty tons burden in any part of the river as defined by this Act, and every person navigating or piloting or attempting to navigate or pilot any vessel exceeding the said burden in any part of the river without being so licensed shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding five pounds.

Sect. 139 of the Act proceeded further, and granted powers to the pilot board, and, indeed, required them to make by-laws and regulations for the proper navigation of all vessels between the western limits of the river and the island of Little Cumbrae, and also for regulating the conduct of the master, pilots, and crews of such vessels. By-laws were accordingly enacted, and by these by-laws the pilots were divided into two classes—the river pilots, who were licensed to pilot vessels between Glasgow and Greenock, and the deep-sea pilots, who were licensed to pilot them between Greenock and the island of Little Cumbrae. It should be observed that the dividing line which separated the one class from the other was not the same as that which divided the river from the Firth of Clyde, Greenock, but was some four miles on the western side of the river boundary. By-law 19 prohibited any person from navigating any ship on any part of the river other than the river pilots; this is the only by-law which imposes a penalty for not using the services of a pilot, and it is in the following terms: "No person shall presume to navigate or to act in piloting any ship or vessel whatever exceeding sixty tons register on any part of the river Clyde other than the river pilots duly licensed by the board under a penalty not exceeding five pounds for each offence besides all damages and expenses." By-law 31 compelled the pilots to reside at Glasgow or Greenock. And by-law 37 enacted that pilots, when on board, should have sole charge of the vessel. Rates were also fixed by these by-laws, and these rates were arranged between Glasgow and Greenock, and were in no way regulated by the river boundary.

In the present case the Fjord, being bound for Glasgow, picked up her pilot at Greenock. It was the only place where the pilot could be obtained, and the pilot, when he came on board, took charge of the vessel, and was, in fact, navigating her at the time of the accident.

The Blaenavon, on the other hand, had taken her pilot on board at Glasgow and had not exchanged him at Greenock for a deep-sea pilot at the time of the accident. It might be that the pilot held both licences, in which case it would not be necessary that he should be changed.

The position of the vessels, therefore, was this: They were outside the limits of the river, and outside the area within which it was not lawful, according to the terms of the statute, to navigate without a pilot. The Fjord had had no opportunity of obtaining a pilot anywhere except at the spot where he had been taken on board, and, being on board, the by-laws provided that he was bound to have charge of the vessel.

Now, by sect. 633 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894 it is enacted that the owner or master of a ship shall not be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of that ship, within any district where the employment of a qualified pilot is compulsory by law.

The first question, therefore, is: Was the spot where the accident occurred, although outside the western limits of the river, a spot where pilotage was compulsory by law? So far as the terms of the statute of 1858 are concerned, I am clearly of opinion that it was not. That Act gave a perfectly plain definition of the area within which it was unlawful to navigate without a pilot, and the only way of escaping from that difficulty is by deciding that the word "district" in the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894 covers an area wider than that defined by the statute of 1858, and includes at least a convenient place for taking up and discharging a pilot outside the limits of the river, and possibly also the whole area down to Little Cumbrae.

I am unable to accede to this contention, I cannot think that the word "district" in the Act of Parliament was intended to mean neighbourhood or to possess so vague and indefinite a meaning as must necessarily be attributed to it if once the actual statutory and defined limits are exceeded.

Several authorities, however, were quoted to your Lordships to support an extended meaning of the word, and they need careful examination. It is, of course, possible to avoid their effect by saying that this case has arisen in Scotland, and these decisions are all decisions of the English courts. In my opinion, your Lordships ought not to take that course. The Act of Parliament which is the subject of construction applies to Scotland as well as to England. There is nothing in any of the circumstances of this case which requires the application of local custom or local law; and it seems to me unconvincing to decide this question on any considerations that would not be just as applicable to a collision that had taken place under similar conditions in the mouth of the river Thames. I realise that this imposes upon your Lordships the duty, if your view of the section be the same as that which I have expressed, of destroying the authority of two at least of the English cases which were the subject of decision by numerous and eminent judges. I feel the full force of this objection, but I am unable myself to follow the reasoning on which those judgments were based, and it is my view that they reached a wrong conclusion.

The first case to which reference was made was the case of Lucey and Ingram (6 M. & W. 302). In that case a vessel in charge of a licensed pilot caused a collision as she was in course of removal from the St. Katharine Dock, in the Port of London. It was alleged that the owners of the vessel were not liable by reason of sect. 55 of the Pilot Act (6 Geo. 4, c. 125), which exempted the owner or master of a vessel from liability for loss or damage occurring from the negligent act of any licensed pilot in the charge of any such ship or vessel, under or in pursuance of any of the provisions of the statute. The statute by its second section provided that all ships and vessels within certain limits there mentioned should be conducted by pilots to be appointed by the Corporation of the Trinity House, and by no other pilots or persons whatever. At the place where the accident happened it was not necessary under the statute that a pilot should be in charge of the vessel, but none the less it was held that the owner of the vessel was not liable for the damage, because the pilot was bound to take charge of the vessel if called on, and he was in charge of the ship under the provisions of the Act. The case depended upon the construction of sect. 55 of the Act of 1823, but the provisions of that section are quite different from those which regulate the liability in the present case, and I see no reason to doubt that this case was correctly decided.

The next case was that of The Stettin (6 L. T. Rep. 613; B. & L. 199). That decision, however, is of little assistance, since it was held that in no part of the area where the collision occurred was pilotage compulsory, and consequently the vessel responsible for the accident was not exempted from liability for damage. The two cases which follow are, however, more nearly in point. The first is General Steam Navigation Company v. British and Colonial Steam Navigation Company (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 168, 237; 20 L. T. Rep. 581; L. Rep. 4 Ex. 238). The statute applicable in that case was the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, sect. 388 of which is to the same effect as sect. 633 of the Act of 1894, although its language differs in certain immaterial respects. In that case it was held as a fact that the vessel was navigating at a spot where pilotage was compulsory, and that the master and owner of the vessel were consequently exempt; but the learned judges further dealt with the case upon the hypothesis that this assumption of fact was not well founded, and on this view they expressed their opinion on two points. The first was that as the pilot had been taken on board in an area where pilotage was undoubtedly compulsory, and was still in charge of the vessel when the accident occurred, the original relationship between the pilot and the master still continued, and no fresh contract of service had supervened.

The second point dealt directly with the meaning of the word "district," and upon this they said that the 388th section of the Act of 1854 "does not require that the pilot should be compulsorily employed where the accident happened, but only that he should have been compulsorily employed within the district where it happened." Although this latter statement was not necessary for the decision of the case, it was treated as an authority, and was followed in the later case of The Charlton (8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 29; 73 L. T. Rep. 49). This was a decision of the Court of Appeal, who were bound by a decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, but they were not necessarily bound by the expressions of opinion of the judges, which were not essential to the case. Notwithstanding this fact, the Court of Appeal, and notably Kay, L.J., treated them as binding, and expressed his own personal concurrence with the underlying principles on which these statements were based. In this case also the pilot had been taken on at a place where pilotage was compulsory, and the accident had happened outside the compulsory area.

It might be possible to distinguish these cases by reference to this circumstance. It is, indeed, a distinction between the facts of those cases and the facts of the present; but it is a distinction too fine for me to follow. If the liability is to be measured by considering the meaning of the word "district" in sect. 388 of the Act of 1854 or in sect. 633 of the Act of 1894, that meaning must be the same whether the pilot is taken on board within the compulsory area or without.

The learned judges appear to have been much influenced in their view by the inconvenience of holding that a pilot's duties ended immediately the actual boundary was crossed. It seems to me that this is true, there may be great inconvenience, there may even be danger in compelling a pilot actually to assume his duties at a moment when the ship is traversing an intangible and notional line. So far as the Act of Parliament is concerned, however, there can be no exemption, by virtue of its provisions, unless the accident is actually within the district (which I interpret as meaning the defined and fixed area) within which pilotage is compulsory.

It is, however, urged that the pilotage was in fact compulsory although outside the statutory limits, owing to the operations of the by-laws to which I have referred.

Acceptance of this view might result in extending the area of the river Clyde, for the purposes mentioned in sect. 136 of the Act of 1858, to the area bounded on its western limits by the line drawn from the island of Little Cumbrae—a further distance of some twenty-four miles. I cannot think that the by-laws have made or could make pilotage "compulsory by law" throughout the whole of this area, since, if that were so, there was no need for the careful definition of the area where pilotage is made compulsory by sect. 136, and no need for the distinction which the by-laws draw between the area of river within which omission to use a pilot is visited by penalties, and the area outside the river which is not subject to any such penalties.

There remains an argument that is independent of the Act of 1894, and it is this—that even if the point where the accident occurred was not within the district where pilotage was compulsory by the statute or the by-laws, yet, nevertheless, the captain of the ship had no choice but to accept the pilot at Greenock, on terms which compelled him to resign the navigation of the vessel into his hands, that accordingly the rôle of master and servant was never established between the owner of the vessel and the pilot, and that consequently he could not be rendered liable for the pilot's act.

It is, I think, open to doubt if this point is raised by the second of the defender's pleas, but it has been fully argued and no objection taken on that ground.

The fallacy of the argument is to be found in the assumption that the captain of the ship was compelled to resign the navigation into the hands of the pilot. There was, in my opinion, no such legal compulsion placed upon him. It is true that the by-laws provide by by-law 37 that the pilot should take charge, but there was no penalty of any kind imposed upon the master if the vessel was not surrendered into the pilot's hands before the boundaries of the river Clyde were reached, nor upon the pilot if he did not assume charge. This omission is significant when it is observed that obedience is enforced to the earlier provision of the same by-law by the imposition of a penalty, and that performance of nearly all the other duties of the pilot is ensured by similar penalties, see, for example, by-laws 30, 32, 33, 35, and 36.

This conclusion takes the present case out of the influence of any of the several authorities to which reference has been made; for, upon examination, they will be found to depend upon whether, having regard to the special provisions applicable in each case, there was in fact compulsion upon the owner to allow the pilot to have charge. The principle which they illustrate is stated at p. 103 of the report of the Maria in 1 Rob. Ad. Rep. 95; 1839, M. & Rol. 95, in an extract from Lord Tenterden's work upon shipping, in these words: "Where the master is bound by Act of Parliament under a penalty to place his ship in the charge of a pilot and he does so in compliance with the provisions of such Act, the ship is not to be considered as under the management of the owners or their servants."

Accepting this principle as accurate, the learned judge in the case of the Maria examined whether or no the pilotage in that case was in fact compulsory, and found that it was, because the local statute which was applicable provided that the owners of foreign ships or vessels resorting, coming into or departing from the port of Newcastle were "obliged and required" to receive, take on board and employ in the piloting licensed pilots, and in case of their refusal they were none the less compelled to pay the pilotage fees. The learned judge in terms considers that this made the pilotage compulsory, and he so states at p. 108 in these words: "I am most clearly of opinion that the section referred to is compulsory. If it had been enacted simply that a pilot should be taken without providing that in case a pilot was not taken the pilotage should be paid, the master would clearly have been liable to be indicted for a misdemeanour in refusing to take him, for every breach of an Act of Parliament within British jurisdiction is an indictable offence." And he then considers the argument that the provision as to payment of fees might take away the compulsory effect of the clause, and this argument he rejects, he consequently held that the master of the vessel was free from blame.

In the present case there is nothing in the statute to compel the pilot to be taken on board outside the limits of the river, nor is there anything in the by-laws which in terms imposes on the master of the vessel any duty to use his services outside the area, for the only provision of a compulsory character relating to the use of pilots is that contained in by-law 19, to which reference has already been made.

The case of The Halley (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 556; 18 L. T. Rep. 879; L. Rep. 2 P. C. 193) was also a case where the employment of the pilot was compulsory, and the statement of the common law, which is contained at p. 201, is made in relation to this fact. There is a considerable difference between a boat being in charge of a pilot properly provided for according to the by-laws made in pursuance of an Act of Parliament and the necessity for compulsory pilotage within a limited area, and the contrast of the provisions of the Acts of 1854 and 1894, with those of the earlier statute of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, shows, to my mind, that the later statutes were intended to confine exemption from liability within the narrower and take it out of the wider class.

In my view, therefore, the by-laws did not make pilotage outside the area of the river compulsory within the meaning either of the Act of Parliament or the principle of the common law, and for these reasons I think that the appeal should succeed, that the interlocutor of the First Division should be recalled, and that of the sheriff-substitute should be restored.

Lord Dunedin.—I have found this case, to my mind, attended with difficulty and doubt—but that on one point only.

So far as the exemption craved is rested on the statutory words, I am clear that on a just construction of sect. 633 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894 there was not here, in view of the circumstances, a fault or incapacity of a qualified pilot acting in charge of the ship within any district where the employment of a pilot is compulsory by law.

I need not develop the subject, for I concur in all that the noble Lord on the Woolsack has said upon it, and I associate myself with the view he has taken of the decided cases.

Now, if I could take the view of Lord Skerrington, that the statutory exemption forms a code and displaces the common law, there would be an end of the matter. But it is not said in the statute that the common law is to be displaced; and hitherto, at least, it has been said again and again by judges and writers of textbooks that the statutory exemption is only declaratory of a result to which, under the circumstances of compulsion, the common law would arrive.

Now, this is not an action against the ship; it is a personal action against the owners, who personally committed no fault. It can, therefore, only be supported upon the ground of respondeat superior, or, in other words, of the relationship of master and servant between the owners and the person actually in charge of the ship who commits the fault.

Your lordships are prepared to hold that, though de facto the shipowner can only obtain a pilot on the terms that the pilot is to be supreme, yet de jure that pilot is the servant of the owners. It is here that I hesitate, and I candidly confess that, if left to myself, I should have come to the same conclusion as the majority of the First Division. But, in face of the unanimity among your Lordships, I do not feel justified in dissenting from the proposed judgment.

Lord Atkinson.—This is an appeal from an interlocutor pronounced on the 18th Dec. 1914 by the First Division of the Court of Session, recalling an interlocutor of the Sheriff-Substitute of Lanarkshire.

The facts and legislative provisions necessary to be considered for the decision of the preliminary question which the parties have raised by their second plea in law, and desire to have determined in the first instance, have been clearly stated by the Lord Chancellor.

The river Clyde, so defined by these enactments, may for convenience' sake be styled in this case the "compulsory area."

The plea in law of the defenders raising the question which it is desired to have first decided runs thus

"The navigation of the defenders' vessel having been in charge of a pilot whose employment was compulsory within a pilotage district in the sense of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894, the defenders are free from any liability in respect of the collision under sect. 633 of the said Act, and should be assoilzied with expenses."

The question accordingly for decision of this House is whether this is a good plea in law, having regard to the provisions of the Act of 1894, the local Acts dealing with the river Clyde and the by-laws made under these latter.

It is not pretended that pilotage is directly made compulsory on any portion of the waters of the Clyde or its estuary outside the river Clyde as defined, but it is contended on behalf of the respondents that the Clyde Pilot Board have power to frame by-laws having the force of law providing that all river pilots shall board inward-bound vessels at Greenock, and shall on going on board take command of the vessel. Apart from this point upon the by-laws to be hereafter dealt with, the respondents, as I understand, base their claim to immunity from the damage caused on two grounds. They contend (1) that sect. 633 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894 should, according to the authorities, be construed as if for the word "where" occurring in the last line but one of the section were substituted the words "in any part of which," so that the section would run thus: "An owner or master of a ship shall not be answerable to any person whatsoever for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of that ship within any district 'in any part of which' the employment of a qualified pilot is compulsory by law." And (2) that the word "district" in the section so construed means any district for which the pilot in charge may happen to be licensed by the proper licensing authority, however extensive that district may be, and however distant the place of collision from the nearest port of the compulsory area.

The respondent next relied upon the principle stated more broadly, and most recently in the case of The Charlton (8 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 29; 73 L. T. Rep. 49), decided in the year 1893—namely this, that a pilot who navigates a ship through an area in which his employment is compulsory by law, ceases to be a compulsory pilot as soon as he passes outside that area, but may, nevertheless, if he be treated as if he had continued to be that which in fact he is not, secure to the owners of the vessel he pilots continued immunity from any claim for damages caused by his own negligence.

It was held in The Maria (1839, M. & Rol. 95) that sect. 55 of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, which is somewhat similar to sect. 633 of the Act of 1894, embodied this principle of the common law, that the doctrine of respondeat superior cannot apply where the law compels an owner to put and keep in charge of his ship for the purpose of navigating her a person he cannot himself select, and of whose skill and competence he may know nothing. As long as the statutory compulsion operates, the person in charge of the ship is not the owner's servant, and the owner is therefore not responsible for his acts. Thus at common law the basis of the owner's immunity is the legal compulsion upon him. These two must synchronise in their operation, and are conterminous in their reach. When and where compulsion ceases, immunity ceases, and no agreement, express or implied, which the owner, or his agent, the master, may make with the pilot can, I think, at common law, prolong or renew as regard third parties the one or the other. If the owner or his agent the master should request or permit the pilot to continue in command of the ship beyond the time he is bound by law to permit him so to do, then the relation between the owner and pilot becomes at common law a contractual relation of service, to which the maxim of respondeat superior directly applies. In the case of Clyde Navigation v. Barclay (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 390; 36 L. T. Rep. 379; 1 A. C. 790), Lord Hatherley, at p. 795, lays down the rule as to the burden of proof in cases such as the present, in the words following: "In order to exempt yourself by virtue of the provisions of the statute (i.e., the Act of 1854) from that which is a general common law liability, you who desire the exemption must bring yourself within the provisions of the statute, and the burden is therefore thrown upon you to prove that the mischief was occasioned by the pilot. But the other side may prove that although the mischief was occasioned in one sense by the bad management of the pilot, yet there was a default on the part of the owners of the ship, which default conduced to the accident." And Lord Selborne, at p. 796, said: "Your Lordships will observe that there are three things necessary to be proved: first, that a qualified pilot was acting in charge of the ship; secondly, that the charge was compulsory; and, thirdly, that it was his fault or incapacity which occasioned the damage. I apprehend that if a defendant proves all these things, then the burden of proof is on the pursuer." I fancy that in these passages both these noble Lords had in their minds actual not fictional or notional compulsion. As I understood, it was not disputed—it could not, I think, be successfully disputed—that the compulsion which secures immunity from the claims of third parties must be imposed in the first instance by statute, or by by-laws made intra vires having the force of a statute. No obligation springing from any agreement, express or implied, entered into between a pilot and the owners of a vessel, either directly or through their agent their master, touching the control or navigation of that vessel, however binding on the parties to it, can, I think, per se prejudice in the way suggested the rights of third parties. The main questions in controversy are whether under any, and if so what, circumstances the operation of the compulsion imposed in the first instance in respect of the compulsory area can be extended beyond that area so as to secure continued immunity for the owners; and, second, whether those circumstances exist in the present case. The two authorities most strongly relied upon by the respondents on this point are the Charlton case, already referred to, and the case of British Steam Navigation Company v. General Steam Navigation Company (ubi sup.), upon which the decision in the Charlton case was based.

Lest if I stated in a condensed form what appears to me to be the result and bearing of the judgments of the distinguished judges who decided that case I might do them an injustice, I venture to quote at length the relevant portions of their judgments. Lord Esher, in the Charlton case, at p. 51, expressed himself thus: "A Bristol pilot was compulsory where he (i.e., the master of the ship) took him. When he had come through the port (i.e., the port of Bristol) into the compulsory area outside the port, I have no doubt, myself, that he was no longer a compulsory pilot. Therefore, when the accident happened, he was no longer a compulsory pilot. But when he was taken on board this ship and put in charge he was a compulsory pilot. And although he has passed out of the limits where he was a compulsory pilot, he was still in charge as pilot, and in charge without any alteration of the relations between him and the master of the ship. He was still the pilot. He was still in charge of the ship, for he had not gone to such a place as he was no longer a licensed pilot. He was in the district where he was a licensed pilot, and although he had gone beyond the port where he was a compulsory pilot, it was under such circumstances that the master could not be properly called upon to determine if the compulsion had ceased or not. Then the necessities of the case require that you should not make him a servant of the owners when they had no real opportunity of determining that the relation put upon them had ceased. I have no doubt that it was on that ground—that to decide that the master of the ship was to take charge of the ship under such circumstances would put upon him a dangerous liability and responsibility—that the decision in General Steam Navigation Company v. British and Colonial Steam Navigation Company Limited (supra) was come to. It does not signify where the spot is at which the compulsion has ceased. The mode of treating him by the master as a compulsory pilot had not ceased, and therefore we are to treat the master and the owners of the ship as still having this ship in charge of a pilot, whom they took by compulsion. If so, he was not the servant of the owners, and if so the owners were not liable for the negligence which was solely his negligence. I cannot help thinking that this is the decision of the Court of Exchequer." Kay and A. L. Smith, L.JJ. concurred in and approved of this judgment. The former added: "I cannot think it would be the convenient or proper construction to put upon this section of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854, and it seems to be reasonable to say that where a pilot has been taken under compulsion to take a ship to a point in the Bristol Channel within the limits of his licence, although the point is somewhat beyond the limits of the Port of Bristol, yet if the pilot goes on taking the ship beyond that limit and the collision happens he should be treated for this purpose as a compulsory pilot, and the master and owners should not be liable for the collision which happened by his fault." And the latter said that, in his opinion, the remarks of the Court of Exchequer in the above-mentioned case upon this point were not obiter.

In fact the district for which the pilot was licensed in that case extended down to Lundy Island, many miles below the Port of Bristol. It was not disputed that over this great reach of the estuary of the Bristol Channel from the Port of Bristol to Lundy Island any ship was free to sail without any pilot, or, again, that if she never had entered into the compulsory area she would not be protected from liability by reason of the presence of a licensed pilot on board and in charge of her; but it appears to have been considered that the mere fact that the pilot she was compelled to take on board while traversing the compulsory area was permitted to remain in charge in effect extended the area of immunity down to the open sea. I own I have considerable difficulty in following Lord Esher's reasoning. I don't quite appreciate what he means by saying that "the owners had no real opportunity of determining when the relation put upon them" had ceased. Surely he cannot have supposed that the owners who might live in Australia or South America should be communicated with by their agent, the master, to ascertain whether the latter would depose the pilot, and himself take command as his ship passed out of the compulsory area. The master is the agent of the owners, with full power on their behalf to employ, hire, or drop pilots.

Again, I am unable to understand how as regard third parties and their common law rights the mode in which the master "treated" the pilot is to determine anything. In my view, if the master had made a specific agreement with the pilot that the latter should navigate the ship to Lundy Island and have absolute control over her till she reached that point, the rights of third parties would not be affected, because it is statutory compulsion, not contractual obligations of service, which deprives them of their rights. The master might, of course, continue the pilot in charge if he desired his assistance. The appellants do not suggest that he should not be entitled to do so, but they do insist, reasonably enough, I think, that the pilot does not carry compulsion with him, and that, if he were continued in charge beyond the compulsory area, he was in precisely the same position as if he had been taken on board at Lundy Island and employed to pilot the ship up to the seaward limit of the Port of Bristol.

I find nothing in the decision to the effect that the master might not have deposed the pilot and have himself taken command of his ship as she passed out of the compulsory area. The very fact that his continued treatment of the pilot as a pilot is regarded as a determining factor would imply that he might have altered the situation by treating him otherwise. There is no such maxim of the mercantile laws as "once a compulsory pilot always a compulsory pilot," and I am quite unable to see how the mere omission by the master to take the command out of the hands of the pilot amounted to treating him as a compulsory pilot, resulting in the forfeiture of the rights of innocent third parties.

The case of General Steam Navigation Company v. British and Colonial Steam Navigation Company (L. Rep. 3 Ex. 330; L. Rep. 4 Ex. 238), upon which the decision of the Charlton is expressly based, and upon which the respondents so much relied, is somewhat different in character. There the defendants' vessel, registered in and belonging to the Port of London, through the fault of a pilot taken on board at Dungeness, who had actual control of the ship, came into collision with and damaged the plaintiffs' vessel at a point between Yantlett Creek and Gravesend. If the Port of London extended to Yantlett Creek the defendants' vessel was at the time of the collision in her own port; if, on the contrary, it only extended to Gravesend, she was not at that time in her own port. It was admitted that pilotage was compulsory under the Mercantile Marine Act 1854, within the London district, which extended from Dungeness to London Bridge. A pilot taken on board at Dungeness would, in the ordinary course of things, navigate the ship to Gravesend and there be put on shore, receiving for that service a fee fixed by the regulations. By the 59th section of the General Pilot Act (6 Geo. 4, c. 125) it is enacted that the master of any vessel, not being a passenger vessel, may pilot his ship while she is in the waters of the port to which she belongs. The contention of the defendants was that the London district was one entire and indivisible thing, though in practice and for convenience sake licences were never given to the same pilot to pilot ships above and below Gravesend; that Gravesend was the place to which the master was bound to carry the pilot before dropping him; that even if the limit of the Port of London lay seaward of Gravesend, the whole course to Gravesend was one indivisible thing, and that the pilotage having been compulsory when originally commenced at Dungeness, continued so to be up to the point where the pilot was to be dropped.

The question for decision, therefore, was not, as in the Charlton case, and as in the present case, the extension of the operation of compulsion beyond the limits of the compulsory area, but the suspension of compulsion within a compulsory area, and it was insisted that the master by taking on board the pilot to carry him to Gravesend, and paying him for piloting the ship to that place, contracted himself and his principals the owners out of, as it were, the statutory exception. The decision turned to some extent on the meaning of the words used in the 59th section of the Pilot Act of 1825. Baron Martin inclined to the opinion that these words only applied to vessels navigating from place to place within the port to which the vessel belongs; but bowed to the existing decisions. He was clear, however, that if the master of the defendants' ship, though signalling all the way from Dungeness for a pilot, had failed to get one before his ship passed into the waters of the Port of London he would not then, though in a compulsory area, be obliged to take a pilot, but he held, nevertheless, that even if Yantlett Creek was the boundary of the Port of London, "as the pilot was taken on board at Dungeness and employed to navigate the ship to Gravesend, the ship did not when she arrived at Yantlett Creek become a ship navigated within the limits of the port to which she belonged so as to constitute the pilot the servant of the owners and render them liable for his default." He was further of opinion that under the provisions of the Acts of Parliament the pilot was entitled if not bound to pilot the ship to Gravesend, and that no liability was cast upon the defendants by the mere circumstance that the ship had arrived at Yantlett Creek. He refused to recognise the case of The Stettin (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 229; 6 L. T. Rep. 613; B. & L. 199) as an authority in the case, because Lucey v. Ingram (5 M. & W. 6) had not been cited in it.

Channell, B. concurred in this judgment, and Bramwell, B., who only heard part of the argument, concurred so far as he had heard it. Kelly, C.B., dissented, holding on the facts that Yantlett Creek was the limit of the Port of London, that it was distinctly so decided in The Stettin (sup.), that it was not compulsory on the master of a ship belonging to the Port of London to employ a pilot at a point within that port, that the case of Lucey v. Ingram was decided upon the special provisions of the 55 and 72 sects. of the General Pilot Act (6 Geo. 4, c. 123), and not on the Act of 1854 the wording of which was altogether different (in which statement he was perfectly accurate). The case came on Appeal before the Exchequer Chamber (L. Rep. 4 Ex. 238). The court was a very strong one. It was composed of Byles, Keating, Montague, Smith, and Hannen, JJ. The unanimous judgment of the court was on the 4th May 1869 delivered by Byles, J. They held that the Port of London did not extend beyond Gravesend. Consequently, as the collision occurred at a spot further down the river than Gravesend it did not occur in the Port of London, and there was an end of the case. At p. 244 of the report Byles, J. is reported to have expressed himself thus: "Two questions arise: First, whether the accident happened at a spot within the Port of London, for if it did not, then the defendants' captain was bound to have on board a pilot, and the defendants are not responsible for the pilot's want of skill and care. Secondly, whether, assuming the spot where the accident happened to be within the Port of London, the defendants would, they thought, be nevertheless protected from liability, although the vessel belonged to that port, the pilot having been compulsorily taken on board at Dungeness to pilot the vessel to Gravesend." At p. 246 he distinctly states, however, that even if the Port of London extended to Yantlett Creek the court thought the defendants would not be liable. And he gives as his reasons—First, that by the Act of 1854 pilots engaged at Dungeness may be taken first to the Nore or Sheerness and next to Gravesend, but cannot be engaged for any intermediate distances. Secondly, that it was compulsory upon masters to take a pilot for that distance; that the pilot could insist on being paid for all the way to Gravesend, and to be carried there; that there had been, in effect, a contract between the captain and the pilot that the pilot should go to Gravesend, should be paid to Gravesend, and should act as pilot to Gravesend; that during the first part of the transit the relation of master and servant did not exist between the owners of the defendant's vessel and the pilot, and that the court could not see any indication of a fresh contract as to the latter portion of the transit. And the learned judge proceeded to say that "the 388th section of the Act of 1854 does not require that the pilot should be compulsorily employed where the accident happened, but only that he should be compulsorily employed within the district where it happened. That is not only the grammatical literal interpretation of the statute, but it obviates all the mischief which might be apprehended from captains unnecessarily and improperly employing pilots to escape the responsibilities of navigation while it preserves the sole responsibility of the pilot in the whole of the district for which he was employed."

It must be remembered that the court was, as I have said, dealing with a case of exemption from compulsion in a compulsory area, and the judgment should be read secundum subjectam materiam. I find nothing, however, in the earlier part of it inconsistent with the right of a master to take from a pilot, originally employed in a compulsory area, the command of his ship as soon as she passes beyond that area. It is possible he might be liable to the pilot under such a contract as was made in that case for breach of contract, but nothing more. Nor do I find anything inconsistent with the conclusion that in such a case, from the time the ship passed out of the compulsory area the pilot was no longer a compulsory pilot, but stood to the master and the owners of the ship merely in the relation in which a pilot hired in a non-compulsory area stands to them.

With reference to the construction of the 388th section of the Act of 1854, I am unable, with the most profound respect for the learned and distinguished judges who decided this case, to find anything in reason or justice to sustain their construction of this section. A pilotage district may be very vast. In the Charlton case it extended many miles down the Bristol Channel beyond the compulsory area, the Port of Bristol. In the present case it extends at least four miles, perhaps more, beyond the compulsory area. I am quite unable to discover upon what principle the fact that the pilot was originally employed in the compulsory area is to secure to him the privilege of negligently running down or injuring in every part of the district for which he is licensed, the vessels of third parties, without any risk of loss to the owners he serves. In my view, this construction disregards the common law rights of third parties, and ignores the principle upon which the immunity of the owner of the ship in fault is based. I think the construction is erroneous, and I respectfully decline to adopt it. Within one month and two days after the delivery of this judgment, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, composed of the then Master of the Rolls, Lord Romilly, Sir William Earl, Sir James Colville, and Sir Joseph Napier, decided the case of Owners of the Steamship Lion v. Owners of the Yorktown (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 266; 21 L. T. Rep. 41; L. Rep. 2 P. C. 525), in which was cited not only the decision of the Court of Exchequer, but possibly that of the Exchequer chamber in the last-mentioned case. The collision in that case took place on the river Thames, and was due to the negligence of a licensed pilot in charge of the steamship Lion at the time. The owners of this ship were sued for damages. The preliminary question raised was whether the Lion was at the time of the collision a passenger ship or not. If she was a passenger ship, then, under the 397th section of the Act of 1854, the employment of a pilot was compulsory; if not, it was admittedly optional. It was held that the Lion was not, at the time of the collision, a passenger ship, and therefore that the employment of the pilot was optional. The cases of The Stettin (B. & L. 199) and Lucey v. Ingram (6 M. & W. 65) were cited. The decision in the former was approved of and followed, and it was pointed out, as it already had been done by Kelly, C.B., that Lucey v. Ingram was no authority whatever upon the point in dispute, since it was decided upon the special wording of the 72nd section of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, which are wholly different from those of the 389th section of the Act of 1854. The latter section is identical with the 633rd section of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894.

Lord Romilly, after criticising at length these several cases and others, at p. 534 says: "According to the principle of these decisions, the owners are exonerated from responsibility for the default of the pilot whom they have selected and placed in charge of their ship, when by law there is no obligation imposed upon them to take such pilot and put him in charge" . . . "and, secondly, that having taken a pilot, even assuming that the pilot was bound to act, this does not in such circumstance exonerate the owners from responsibility for the errors committed by the pilot in a case where they were not compellable to take a pilot and put him in charge."

This last paragraph meets much of the argument that was addressed to your Lordships on behalf of the respondent, based on the following words occurring in the 27th by-law: "And the pilot when on board shall have sole charge of the vessel." These words are of no avail, however, when the act of taking the pilot on board is a voluntary act. No provision such as this was made by the body licensing the pilot, and no stipulation made by the pilot himself when he is being hired, as to his having complete control over the ship, will secure immunity for the owners if the taking of the pilot was not compulsory by law, because compulsion by law is the true basis of immunity, and cessat ratio cessat lex.

As the master was not compelled by law to keep on the pilot after the ship passed from the Port of Bristol, I think the decision of Lord Esher on this point is in conflict with the law as laid down by Lord Romilly.

The case of The Stettin (B. & L. 199) was decided on 6 Geo. 4, c. 125.

The vessel belonged to the Port of London, and was inward bound from Bordeaux to London. She took on board a Trinity House pilot, by whose negligence she came into collision near Regent's Canal in the river Thames with another ship or barge. By the 59th section of 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, she was relieved from the obligation to take compulsorily a pilot while she was navigating the port to which she belonged. Dr. Lushington held that as she was not bound to have the pilot on board, her owners were not protected, and the Judicial Committee, consisting of Lords Kingsdown and Chelmsford, Sir Edward Ryan, and Sir L. Peel, upheld that decision thinking it was right. Sir Robert Phillimore refers to the case of the Stettin in the case of The Hankow (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 97; 40 L. T. Rep. 335; 4 P. Div. 197; L. Rep. 4 P. 197), the decision in which, however, turned upon the 59th section of the Pilotage Act 1825 (6 Geo. 4, c. 125). He does not, I think, disapprove of the decision in the Stettin case. He also deals with the decision in General Steam Navigation Company v. British Colonial Steam Navigation Company in these words. He said, "I am unable to extract any assistance from that case, and I find myself rather perplexed in reading the judgment." I confess I share in that perplexity.

Your Lordships' House is not bound by the decision of the Court of Exchequer Chamber or that of the Court of Appeal. In view of this conflict of authority one must rely upon the principle upon which immunity is based. In my view the immunity of the owners of ships for injuries caused by those ships through the negligence of the pilot in charge of them rests upon this, that they are compelled by law to have that pilot in charge at the time and place the collision occurs, that because of that compulsion the pilot is not the servant of the owners, and they are therefore not responsible for his acts. I further think, with all respect for the great judges who decided these cases, that these decisions are unsound in principle and are in conflict with decisions almost, if not altogether, as authoritative as themselves, and I decline to follow them.

It is not contended that these by-laws are ultra vires. I concur with Lord Skerrington in thinking that they do not purport to extend the area of compulsory pilotage as fixed by sect. 136 of the Act authorising the making of them. If they did, they would be ultra vires. By by-law 31 river pilots are required to reside at Greenock and Glasgow, where they may be picked up and discharged respectively. These arrangements may be very convenient. That, however, is beside the point, and, of course, a master may with great prudence leave the control of his ship to a pilot, both in the river and Firth of Clyde. Nobody contends that he should be deprived of that advantage.

I further concur with Lord Skerrington in thinking that there is nothing in these by-laws to prevent the master of an incoming ship, who picks up a pilot at Greenock, from keeping control of his ship till he reaches the compulsory area. Nor to prevent the master of an outward bound vessel, who has taken a pilot on board at Glasgow, from putting the pilot aside and taking the command of his own ship as soon as she passes out of the compulsory area.

I see none of the dangers to which Lord Esher alludes on the Charlton case in enabling him so to do.

Mr. Laing urged that these statutes and by-laws should be reasonably construed and enforced, and it would be very difficult for masters to know precisely when they passed into or out of the compulsory area, or to be prepared for a change of control.

The first difficulty could be got over by buoying or in some other way easily ascertainable marking the boundary of the river. The second is, I think, fanciful.

On the whole I am of opinion that the decision appealed from was wrong and should be reversed, that the decision of the sheriff-substitute was right and should be restored, and this appeal should be allowed, with costs here and below.

Lord SHAW.—The appellants are owners of the British steamship Blaenavon, and the respondents of the Norwegian steamship Fjord. At a point on the estuary of the river Clyde, nearly opposite Princes Pier, Greenock, these two vessels collided. The present proceedings ensued. The appellants sue for 5500*l*. The respondents counter-claim for 600*l*. Each ship blames the other. The present appeal, however, has arisen in connection with the defence set up by the owners of the Fjord, the respondents. Their defence was repelled by the learned Sheriff-Substitute Fyfe, but has been upheld by the majority of the First Division of the Court of Session. I am humbly of opinion that the dissent from that judgment by the learned Lord Skerrington was on all points correct, both in reasoning and result, and that the judgment appealed from should be reversed.

The appellants defenders' plea is as follows: "The navigation of defenders' vessel having been in charge of a pilot whose employment was compulsory within the pilotage district in the sense of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, the defenders are free from liability in respect of said collision under sect. 633 of the said Act." This is not a common law defence; it is a defence founded upon the statute, and it is that defence which has been upheld.

There has been so much reference to decided cases, both in the courts below and in the argument on this appeal, that it appears to me advisable again to quote sect. 633, which is the groundwork of this plea. It is, as your Lordships are aware, truly a temporary provision. In a few years' time such an exemption from liability will have disappeared from the Merchant Shipping Code.

The section is as follows:

> An owner or master of a ship shall not be answerable to any person whatever for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of that ship within any district where the employment of a qualified pilot is compulsory by law.

Geographically the position of the matter is this: a straight line drawn from the eastern end of Newark Castle, on the south shore of the Clyde, to the mouth of Cardross Burn, on the north shore, divides, by sect. 75 of the Clyde Navigation Act of 1858, the river Clyde from the estuary, the "river" being to the eastward of that line up to Glasgow, and the "firth" being to the west of that line down to Little Cumbrae. By the Act a pilot board was created. It had certain powers over the whole of this area, and in particular, under sects. 127 and 134, powers to license pilots for both river and firth. The section dealing with compulsory pilotage applies solely to "any part of the river as defined by this Act." Within that area it is not lawful for any person to navigate without a pilot any vessel exceeding sixty tons burden; to that area—the river—compulsory pilotage extends. Outside of that, as far as the Cumbraes, the pilotage is not compulsory. Geographically the language of the Act of Parliament is as plain and incontrovertible as this.

There is power given for the pilot board to make by-laws quoad the river (119) for "regulating the conduct of the owners, masters, pilots, and crews of vessels," and quoad the firth or estuary (139), "the good government, police, and proper navigation of all vessels." With regard to the point for decision in this case, there the statutory provisions end. I am humbly of opinion that these sections are not in conflict, but that, upon the contrary, the power of making by-laws was for the purpose of carrying out and in no respect whatsoever of limiting, restricting, or controverting the other provisions of this statute. Sect. 139, defining the geographical limits of the river, stands, and must stand, exactly as the Act has defined them. To the east of the Newark-Cardross line compulsory pilotage is prescribed, and the area so defined could not, without violation of this statute, be extended in any direction by by-law, or apart from statutory amendment, alteration, or repeal.

When sect. 633 of the 1894 Act accordingly speaks of a "qualified pilot acting in charge of that ship within any district where the employment of a qualified pilot is compulsory by law," it can, in my humble judgment, not extend, so far as the Clyde is concerned, to any district west of the Newark-Cardross line. To the east of the line and up to Glasgow "the employment of a qualified pilot is compulsory by law"; to the west of that line it is not. With every respect to the English judges who have come to the decisions analysed by your Lordships, I think that this case depends upon statute, and that it ends at this point.

The actual place of collision was at the tail of the bank opposite the Princes Pier at Greenock, four miles west of the Newark-Cardross line, and well within the voluntary pilotage area. The scheme of the by-laws appears to have been to have two sets of licensed pilots—one for the river and the other for the firth. According to the practice which, however, prevails, one man obtains a licence for both districts; and in working out this plan it has been found for the convenience of all parties expedient that pilots should reside in Greenock and be available for call at that port. By-laws appropriate to these topics are made, and one of these by-laws says that when the pilot boards the vessel he should be in charge of the vessel. He might be taken on at Greenock or he might have been taken on as far west as the Cumbraes, but the argument presented to your Lordships' House is that he, being on the the ship and in charge of it, the by-law operates ipso jure as an extension of "the district where the employment of a qualified pilot is compulsory by law."

It is fortunately highly inexpedient to elaborate this point, for, in the view which I take, it would be totally incompetent for a pilot board so to act as to extend the district where the employment of a qualified pilot is compulsory by law. And if any by-law has purported to do that it would not be carrying out, but controverting, the express provisions and geographical limitations of the 1858 statute.

There is no Scottish case which gives sanction for doing this, and with regard to the English cases I do not, speaking with respect and for myself, find that (dealing as they do with different statutes and different circumstances) they illustrate this particular Act of 1858 in such a way as to permit me to construe it apart from these geographical limitations to which I have referred. The statutory provision is not affected, or controlled by, and it makes no stipulation on the subject of the point where the employment of the qualified pilot took place, or the tract of water (a great part of which may lie outside the district in which pilotage is compulsory) for which a pilot's services are engaged. But what the statute has to do with is, I repeat, "the district where the employment of a qualified pilot is compulsory by law."

I put this case during the argument, and I cannot say that I received any satisfactory answer to it:—Assume a vessel outward-bound from Glasgow, and therefore under the charge of a pilot, to reach the Newark-Cardross-line, and to pass, that is to say, from the river, in which the employment of a qualified pilot is compulsory by law, into the firth, where it is not. Assume this vessel to meet an inward-bound steamer, and the inward-bound steamer having sailed to that limit which it can do without any contravention of either statute or by-law without a pilot. Then, being about to enter the river, she requires a pilot, and the pilot from the outward-bound vessel is thereupon transferred to it. He takes charge on or near the actual line which is the western boundary of the river by law.

Is there anything contrary to law in that? Is there anything in any by-law which would compel the vessel in such circumstances to go back to Greenock and go through the form of taking up the pilot there? I humbly do not think there is. The illustration is not fantastic. It would apply to-day in the same way to any vessel sailing from Port Glasgow to Glasgow, a pilot being picked up at the former port. At a point actually three or four miles to the west of that, and down the firth, this collision occurred. It humbly appears to me to have no bearing upon the case to say that the vessel had to pick up the pilot opposite that point—namely, at Greenock. If the meaning of that is that it was an excellent or convenient arrangement and in accord with the by-law, good and well. That cannot affect the statutory limitations. But if the meaning of it is that it so far affected them as to produce a result equivalent to extending the river four miles to the west of its specified boundary, I cannot hold this to be in accordance with law. The respondents' case necessarily involves that the same reason would apply if the pilot was picked up at the Cumbraes. He would be a duly licensed pilot; his district would include a large tract of water within which pilotage was voluntary, and a smaller tract of the river within which it was compulsory. The illustration is merely given to show how strange would be the results of leaving the plain geographical limits set forth by the statute.

With regard to the English decisions, I agree with the analysis and reasoning upon those given in the judgment read by my noble and learned friends who have preceded and are to follow me. I only presume to add to these judgments these two points: First, without differing in any way from Lord Wrenbury's view as to the case of Lucey v. Ingram (6 M. & W. 302), I must say that the statute there under construction was couched in language very different from the 75th section of the Clyde Act of 1858. In the second place, I think, if I may respectfully say so, that confusion has been introduced into this department of the law by the expression "compulsory pilot." What the statute deals with is a place, area, or district where pilotage is compulsory. But if the word "compulsory" is to be applied to the man, the pilot, then once the licensed pilot is on board of a vessel he carries this adjective or quality with him (such is apparently the inference) in such a way as to put the ship itself under compulsory pilotage and to convert the area into a compulsory area, although with regard to the latter the point of collision was out of bounds, and with regard to the former compulsory pilotage was not prescribed. All this, in my opinion, is concluded adversely by the consideration that the place of employment or the place to which the employment can be extended either before the compulsory pilotage area is reached or after it is left, is truly an irrelevant consideration in view of the clear and very plain language of the Merchant Shipping Acts.

I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Lord Parmoor.—I concur in the judgment about to be delivered by Lord Wrenbury.

Lord Wrenbury. — The question here is whether at the time of the collision the Fjord was in charge of a pilot whose employment was compulsory, with the result that her owners are free from liability. The question has been argued under two heads, (1) whether the owners are within sect. 633 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, and (2) whether at common law the relation of master and servant ever arose between the owner and the pilot so as to render the former liable for the negligence of the latter.

Having regard to sects. 136 and 75 of the Clyde Navigation Consolidation Act 1858, the Fjord at the moment of the collision was not at a place where she was bound to navigate with a pilot. She was entitled at that place to navigate by her own officers. She had taken a pilot on board at Greenock, which was, under the regulations, a proper place to take him, but she was in waters in which, so far as the Clyde Act of 1858 was concerned, she was entitled to keep charge of the navigation by her own officers, and not to give charge to the pilot.

The Pilotage Board constituted by sect. 128, however, had made (as by sect. 139 they were entitled to make) by-laws for the proper navigation of vessels at places which included the place where the collision occurred, and had by by-law 37 provided that "the pilot when on board shall have sole charge of the vessel." They had also by by-law 17 provided that pilots should be licensed in two classes—namely, river pilots licensed to pilot between Glasgow and Greenock (which was the present case) and deep sea pilots licensed to pilot between Greenock and Little Cumbrae.

The question to be determined upon the Acts and by-laws is whether, for the purposes of sect. 633 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, the pilot was in these facts acting in charge of the ship within a district where the employment of a qualified pilot is required by law. Two questions arise—the one on the word "district," the other on the words "required by law."

As regards the latter, in my judgment the employment of a qualified pilot was not, under the circumstances of this case, "required by law." My reasons for this opinion are as follows: First, the law required a pilot in the circumstances mentioned in sect. 138 of the Clyde Act. The power to make by-laws did not extend to allow of an extension of sect. 138. It empowered only by-laws for the proper navigation of vessels having regard to sect. 138. The Ruby (6 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 577) is not an authority that the area of compulsory pilotage can be enlarged by by-law under such a power to make by-laws as is contained in the Act of 1858. The decision in the Ruby is based upon the fact that the local Act 53 Geo. 3, c. clxxxiii., by its preamble and by sect. 17, contemplated acts and gave power to the commissioners to do acts for establishing and regulating the pilotage of ships, and that the subsequent Act of 1845 gave, by sect. 158, power to make by-laws for regulating the pilotage, and that, having regard to the Act of 1813, this meant establishing pilotage. Under these provisions it was held that a by-law could make pilotage compulsory. That is not this case. The definition of the area of compulsory pilotage is the definition of an area within which third parties will, in case of collision, be deprived of a right which otherwise they would have against the owners. The Clyde Act of 1858 had defined what that area was. The by-laws could not extend it.

Secondly, the provisions in the by-laws by which it is said that they extended the area is found in by-law 37: "The pilot when on board shall have sole charge of the vessel." In my opinion this provision was contractual only, and not compulsory.

Inasmuch as the ship was, under the circumstances mentioned in sect. 138, bound to have a pilot, the pilotage board was, I think, bound reasonably to supply one. They could not attach any conditions they liked to supplying one; they could, I think, attach reasonable conditions. I doubt whether it would be a reasonable condition which they could lawfully impose that the master should give over the charge of his vessel to another, when he was not in law bound to do so. But assuming the condition to be reasonable, its acceptance by the ship created a contractual and not a compulsory obligation. If the pilotage authority says I will give you a pilot if you will give him charge from the time he comes on board, and the ship consents, the result is that a contractual and not a compulsory obligation is imposed upon the ship. Compulsory for the present purpose does not mean the compulsion of necessity, which leads the ship to acquiesce, but the compulsion of law which prevails whether the ship assents or not.

As to the latter point it is contended that sect. 633 is operative not only at the point where the employment of a pilot is compulsory, but in "any district where the employment of a qualified pilot is compulsory by law," and it is argued that "district" means "pilotage district," and that the words mean "within any pilotage district in any part of which the employment" is compulsory. The pilotage district here, it is said, is Greenock to Glasgow, for the pilot's licence was to pilot between those places, and in some part (although not this part) of that district pilotage was compulsory.

To my mind the contention does violence to the language. The rights of third parties are not to be taken away by words which as they stand and without altering "where" into "in any part of which" do not affect them. In the present case, if the contention is right, the whole voyage from Little Cumbrae to Glasgow could have been made the subject of compulsory pilotage, if the pilotage board had elected (as they might) to license a pilot for the whole of that distance, with the result of making it one pilotage district.

Upon the question of sect. 633 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 I think the appellants are right.

As regards the common law I am far from clear that there is any separate question. But I will assume that apart from sect. 633 there may be an arguable point. The point, if it exists, is this: When the pilot was taken on board at Greenock, and, in fact, took charge of the vessel, did he take charge by the request or with the assent of the master so as to constitute the pilot the servant of the owner, or did he take charge adversely to the master and because he had the right so to do? This vessel was going from free waters into compulsory waters. As a subsidiary question would the result be different if she had been coming from compulsory waters into free waters?

In my judgment there is no difference between the two cases. In each case it seems to me that at the moment when the vessel is in free waters the pilot can only take or keep charge, and by implication he did take or keep charge by the request of the master. Take the present case; the pilot came on board on the terms (see by-law 37) that he should have sole charge. I have stated my reasons for thinking that that was a contractual term. The pilot takes charge by the contractual consent of the ship. The owners have adopted him as their servant. Take the case of the pilot who had been shipped, say, at Glasgow, had come down the river, had crossed the arbitrary line, and was no longer in the river but in the Firth. When she crossed the line the master (but for the contractual term) could have said, "I shall now take charge," and the pilot could not have said him nay. He did not do so. Why? Because by contract, after the line was crossed, he was to leave the pilot in charge. He was there from that moment by contract, and the relation of master and servant existed.

So far I have abstained from all reference to authorities. I go on to consider what the authorities are.

In Lucey v. Ingram (6 M. & W. 302) it was held that the owner need not have employed a pilot at all. But he did so. The ship was held to be within sect. 72 of the Pilot Act (6 Geo. 4, c. 125) a ship "wanting a pilot" because she wished for a pilot. Under these circumstances the court held that the pilot was "acting in the charge of such ship under" the provisions of the Act within sect. 55, because under sect. 72 he was bound to take charge. I am unable to agree. The obligation of the pilot to serve arose under the provisions of the Act. But his acting in the charge of the ship arose, not under any of the provisions of the Act, but by reason of the ship's asking him to act, from which it resulted that under the provisions of the Act he was bound to comply. Lucey v. Ingram, I think, was wrongly decided.

The Stettin (1 B. & L. 199) in the Privy Council was a case in which the vessel inward bound to the Port of London came into collision within her own port, but was at the time being navigated by a duly licensed pilot. She had passed from an area of compulsory pilotage—had entered an area in which she was not compelled to have a pilot—but remained, in fact, in charge of the pilot. The ship was held liable for damage. This decision concurs with my own opinion. It is applicable to the present case unless a distinction is to be drawn (and I have said that, in my opinion, it is not) between the case of a ship passing from compulsory into free waters and that of a ship passing from free into compulsory waters.

In General Steam Navigation Company v. British and Colonial Steam Navigation Company (L. Rep. 3 Ex. 330; 4 Ex. 238), the Court of first instance followed Lucey v. Ingram and not The Stettin (ubi sup.). In the Exchequer Chamber it was held that the ship was not at the time of the collision within her own port and that pilotage was therefore compulsory. The point, therefore, did not arise, and what was said upon it was but dictum. I am bound, however, to say that I do not agree with the dictum. The grounds relied upon are two: First, that up to Gravesend pilotage was compulsory and that "we cannot see any indication of a fresh contract as to the latter portion of the transit." Fresh contract there could be none, for the previous relation was not contractual, but compulsory. A contract (not a fresh contract), as I have already said, was, I think, to be inferred so soon as the compulsory relation terminated. Secondly, that the words of the Act are "within the district." I have already expressed my opinion upon the effect of these words. Lastly, the court distinguished The Stettin (ubi sup.) on the ground with which I have already dealt—namely, that in The Stettin (ubi sup.) the vessel was passing from compulsory waters into free waters. General Steam Navigation Company v. British and Colonial Steam Navigation Company (L. Rep. 3 Ex. 330; 4 Ex. 238) is upon the point before the House dictum only and not decision—and with the dictum I cannot agree.

In The Charlton (73 L. T. Rep. 49; 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 29), however, the case was by inadvertence treated by the Court of Appeal as a decision binding upon that court. The Charlton was proceeding from compulsory to free waters. Lord Esher, M.R. decides the case on the ground that the pilot was no longer a compulsory pilot, but that he was still "in charge without any alteration of the relations between himself and the master of the ship." I cannot follow this. The original relation was that the pilot was dominus; it mattered nothing whether the master wished him to have charge or not, he was compelled to let him have charge. The subsequent relation was that the pilot was not dominus at all. The master could have told him to go below and could, adversely to the pilot, have taken charge himself. Secondly, the Master of the Rolls decides on the word "district." This is the point upon the statute with which I have already dealt. Lastly, he decides it on the ground of expediency, of the difficulty which would arise in determining when the terminus of compulsory pilotage had been reached. The rights of third parties cannot, I think, be taken away on grounds of expediency. Kay, L.J. adds no further ground. A. L. Smith, L.J. decides upon the General Steam Navigation case (ubi sup.) in the Exchequer Chamber.

In The Lion (21 L. T. Rep. 41; L. Rep. 2 P. C. 525) it was held that the vessel was not carrying passengers, and was therefore not bound to take a pilot. The board followed The Stettin (ubi sup.) and not Lucey v. Ingram.

These are the authorities. Upon authority the balance is, I think, in favour of the view which I expressed in the earlier part of this opinion. However this may be, I submit to your Lordships that when this collision occurred the ship was in charge of the pilot, not compulsorily against the master, but contractually by the implied request and consent of the master, and that as towards third parties the owners cannot protect themselves from liability upon the ground of compulsory pilotage.

It results that, in my judgment, this appeal succeeds.

STOTT (BALTIC) STEAMERS LINE v. MARTEN AND OTHERS. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Insurance (Marine)—Time policy—"Perils of the sea"—Institute time clauses—"Inchmaree" clause—Marine Insurance Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 41), sect. 30; sched. 1, r. 12.

The plaintiffs took out a policy of marine insurance with the defendants on their ship which covered (inter alia) perils of the seas. The policy included the conditions of the Institute time clauses as attached, clause 3 of which provided as follows:—"In port and at sea, in docks and graving docks, and on ways, gridirons, and pontoons, at all times, in all places, and on all occasions." Clause 7 provided: "This insurance also specially to cover (subject to the free and the average warranty) loss of or damage to hull or machinery through the negligence of the master, mariners, engineers, or pilots, or through explosions, burstings of boilers, breakage of shafts, or through any defect in the machinery or hull . . ."

While the ship was lying in the dock a boiler, which was being lifted by a floating crane in order that it might be lifted into a hold, fell, owing to the pin of a shackle breaking, and damaged the ship.

In an action under the policy

Held, (1) that the loss was not caused by a peril of the sea, and the language of the policy itself showed that the scope of the clause was limited to such perils or perils ejusdem generis and (2) that neither clause 3 nor clause 7 of the Institute

(a) Reported by W. E. REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Time Clauses extended the genus of the risk insured against.

APPEAL from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Buckley, L.J., Kennedy, L.J., and Phillimore, L.J.) reported 12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 555; 111 L. T. Rep. 1027; (1914) 3 K. B. 1262, which affirmed a decision of Pickford J. reported 12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 414; 109 L. T. Rep. 899; (1914) 1 K. B. 442.

The action, which was tried as a commercial cause, was brought by the appellants against the respondents, who were underwriters, on a policy of marine insurance on the steamship Ussa dated the 16th March 1911, which included the conditions of the Institute Time Clauses as attached.

Leslie Scott, K.C. and L. F. C. Darby for the appellants.

The facts and arguments sufficiently appear from the judgments which after consideration were delivered dismissing the appeal.

Viscount HALDANE.—I think that the decision of the Court of Appeal was right.

Turning first of all to the well-known language of the policy itself, I am of opinion that it is now settled law that the words of the clause describing the adventures and perils insured against indicate that the scope of this clause is confined to the genus of adventures and perils of the seas, and that the reference to other perils, losses, and misfortunes, with which the clause concludes, is limited to those that are of this genus. Since the judgment of this House in Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company v. Hamilton, Fraser, and Co. (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 200; 57 L. T. Rep. 695; 12 App. Cas. 484) I conceive that this point has become a settled one.

Turning next to the Institute time clauses incorporated in the policy, I am of opinion that clause 3 makes it clear that the risks in question extend, among other things, to risks in port, but does not extend the character or genus of the risks. I am further of opinion that clause 7, known as the "Inchmaree" clause, is not to be read as inserted into or as expanding the description of risks contained in the policy, but is to be regarded simply as a supplemental and independent clause, adding to the risks covered loss or damage to hull or machinery arising out of the negligence of those managing the ship, or from, among other things, breakage of shafts or latent defects. Clause 7 does not in this view enlarge the genus, but simply provides that if this kind of accident happens it is to be covered independently as an addition to the perils described in the policy. The words of clause 7 do not, as I shall presently point out, of themselves cover the case which has occurred, and if I am right, they do not alter the construction of the general clause in the policy.

Now what actually happened was that the Ussa, the steamer the subject of the policy, was in course of having three boilers loaded into her hold as part of her cargo. These boilers were brought alongside her by means of a steam crane mounted on a mobile floating structure called the Atlas, belonging to the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, and itself a vessel propelled by steam. The boiler which caused the damage was lifted and swung over the Ussa's side, and it had to be tilted in order to get it into her hold. As the boiler was being lowered it caught on the hatch coamings, and the weight being thus taken off the jib of the steam crane, a water counterbalance on the other side of the Atlas caused her to list away. The result was that the end of the jib of the crane was lifted. The chain fall became taut, the pin of the shackle holding the sling gave, and the boiler fell and damaged the Ussa.

Notwithstanding what was said in argument, I think that the Atlas was simply a machine independent of the Ussa. It was essentially a crane, and for all that appears to the contrary it might have been used for loading trucks by the riverside as well as for loading ships. It therefore did not, for the purposes of the question before us, differ from a crane on the quay, and it was not under the control of the Ussa's crew. What happened while it was being used on the face of it does not fall within the words of clause 7 of the Institute Clauses, and the only question is whether the accident comes under the genus of the other perils described in the policy. Now, this genus is limited, as I have already said, to perils of the seas. No doubt under this policy these include perils of the seas maturing in port. But the accident which occurred was one which might happen in loading a railway truck just as much as in loading a ship, so far as its general character was concerned. I am unable to attach any importance to the nature of the Atlas, or to the fact that she sailed about the river and was liable to list by reason of her water-balance. For the present purpose she was, as I have said, a mere machine for loading, and I am of opinion that there is no real analogy between what happened and the infliction of damage by collision or otherwise by one vessel on another at sea. I do not think that the accident which occurred arose out of a peril of the seas within the meaning of the policy.

I therefore move that the appeal be dismissed.

Lord DUNEDIN (read by Lord SUMNER).—I concur. I think this case is practically settled by what was decided by this House in the case of Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company v. Hamilton Fraser and Company (ubi sup.).

I need not quote the words of the policy which, apart from the Institute time clauses, in that case and in this are in common form. In both cases it was admitted that what had happened did not fall under the words which enumerate certain specific perils, but reliance was placed on the general words—all other perils, losses, and misfortunes.

The Thames case decided first that these general words must be restricted to meaning perils and losses ejusdem generis of perils of the sea or the other enumerated perils, and second that it did not make a peril ejusdem generis because it was in connection with something which was being done and was necessarily being done for the prosecution of a voyage.

In that case the donkey engine, which had been split, was being used to fill the boilers. Without filled boilers the vessel could not proceed on her voyage, and Lord Halsbury put the point quite plainly when he says (12 App. Cas., at p. 490):

"On the one side it is said that filling the boiler was necessary to enable the ship to prosecute her voyage; on the other it is said that the accident, peril, or misfortune had nothing to do with the sea, and was in no sense of the like kind with any of the perils enumerated."

That seems to me to dispose of what the learned counsel called his wider proposition, namely, that all accidents in loading are covered. Loading is a necessary preliminary to the voyage of a freighted ship; but so is the filling of the boiler. In both cases you have to look further and see whether the accident itself had, as Lord Halsbury put it, "anything to do with the sea."

The accident here was that a heavy thing was dropped by a loading crane, partly owing to the pin of a shackle being insufficiently strong, and partly because, owing to the load catching on the coamings of the hatchway, a strain was relaxed and then suddenly put on again with a jerk. As to the pin, obviously no point could be made, but the learned counsel rested what he called his narrower proposition upon the idea that you imparted what one may call a marine character to the accident by saying that hatchways are narrow. Now an aperture is small or not, according as to whether the thing you want to put into it is big or not; and precisely the same difficulty as arose here might and does arise with putting any unwieldy and heavy object into a railway truck. I cannot therefore accede to the smaller proposition; and the fact that the crane itself was water-borne can have nothing to do with it, because that fact had nothing to do with the cause of the accident.

There remains an argument which was founded on clause 7 of the Institute time clauses. That clause adds certain specific causes of loss or accident for which the underwriters make themselves responsible. They may be generally described as causes of loss or accident which are to be found in defects of the ship itself or machinery therein. This clause has no general words attached. To make it available the appellant has first to say that as it is an addition to the enumerated perils clause, it must be read as embodied in that clause, and thus get the benefit of the general words attached to that clause; and secondly, that the cause of loss here is ejusdem generis with the causes of loss described therein. I think this argument fails in both branches. I think the new clause comes in its own place, and must have had general words attached to it if such general words were intended to be added; and, further, I think that the breakage of machinery belonging to and introduced by other people is not ejusdem generis with the breakage of machinery forming part of the ship.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed.

Lord ATKINSON.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Appeal, dated the 29th July 1914, dismissing an appeal from the judgment of Pickford, J., dated the 13th Nov. 1913, in favour of the respondents, the defendants in an action brought by the appellants against them to recover, in respect of a loss under a certain time policy effected on the steamship Ussa, for twelve months from the 16th March 1911.

The appellants are the owners of the steamship Ussa. The respondents are underwriters at Lloyds. During the currency of the policy the Ussa was being loaded in dock at Liverpool. Part of her cargo was a large boiler longer than her hatchways. This boiler was carried alongside the Ussa by a vessel called the Atlas. The two vessels were placed alongside each other starboard to starboard. By means of a crane erected on the Atlas the boiler was lifted, swung over the side of the Ussa, and was being lowered into her hold through one of her hatchways. The chain, or fall as it is called, of the crane was fixed, and prevented from running out by a pin fixed in a shackle of this chain. The boiler caught in the hatch coamings. The strain on the chain being thus lessened, the movement of the water in the automatic counter-balance caused the Atlas to list to port, away from the Ussa. The boiler came free with a jerk, the pin of the shackle was carried away, and the boiler fell into the hold, injuring the ship. It was found as a fact that the water in the dock was not agitated.

The clause in the policy was of the usual kind, insuring the ship against perils of the seas, men of war, fire, enemies, pirates, rovers, thieves, &c., &c., and "all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the goods, merchandise, or ship." And there was a provision that the policy should include the conditions of the Institute time clauses attached. The seventh of these latter is the only one of importance. It runs thus:—

> 7. This insurance also specially to cover (subject to the free of average warranty), loss of, or damage to hull or machinery through the negligence of master, mariners, engineers, or pilots, or through explosion, bursting of boilers, breakage of shafts, or through any latent defect in the machinery or hull, provided such loss or damage has not resulted from want of due diligence by the owners of the ship, or any of them, or by the manager, masters, mates, engineers, pilots, or crew not to be considered as part owners within the meaning of this clause should they hold shares in the steamer.

This condition is styled the Inchmaree clause or condition. It was admittedly specially introduced after the decision of this House in the case of Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company Limited v. Hamilton, Fraser, and Co. (ubi sup.) to cover injuries not caused by perils of the sea, properly so called, or covered by the general words of such policies covering perils akin to, or resembling, or of the same kind as perils of the sea. Mr. Leslie Scott contended that the policy of insurance should be read and construed as if this seventh condition had been inserted in the body of the policy before the general words, so that in effect the policy should be held to cover not only the risks ejusdem generis with those specifically mentioned in the body of the policy itself, but also risks ejusdem generis with those mentioned in the seventh condition.

In my view that is wholly illegitimate. This seventh clause is merely an addendum to the policy covering risks not covered by the policy as it stood, and cannot by adding to it general words such as are found in the policy itself expand it. Putting the seventh clause aside, there remains the question, Is the accident which caused injury to the ship a peril of the seas or a peril ejusdem generis as a peril of the seas? That it is not a peril of the seas properly so called is admitted

So, then, the question is thus, Is it one of the same genus of perils of which true perils of the seas are species. A peril whose only connection with the sea is that it arises on board ship is not necessarily a peril of the seas nor a peril ejusdem generis as a peril of the sea. The breaking of the chain of a crane, or of a shackle of that chain, if overloaded or subjected to too severe a strain, is not more maritime in character when it occurs on board a ship than when it occurs on land. Nor is the catching the ends of a lengthy boiler on the coamings when being lowered into the hold of a ship through a hatchway more maritime in its character than would be the catching on land of any piece of machinery on the sides of an opening shorter than itself through which it was being lowered. Neither the winds nor the waves contributed to this accident. Nor did the fact that the ship on which it occcurred was waterborne. The listing of the Atlas to port tended to take up the slack of the chain, and to diminish the extent of the drop, and, therefore, of the strain when the boiler got free, rather than the contrary. The statement of Lord Ellenborough in Cullen v. Butler (5 M. & S. 461), as to the proper construction of general words, such as those used in the present case, in a policy of marine insurance, has been many times approved of. He said due effect would be given to them by "allowing them to comprehend and cover other cases of maritime damage of a like kind to those which are enumerated, and occasioned by similar causes." By the words "maritime damage" Lord Herschell, in the Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company v. Hamilton, Fraser, and Co., took Lord Ellenborough to have meant not only damage caused by the sea, but damages of a character to which a marine adventure is subject.

In my view the present case is covered by this last-mentioned case. The operation which the working of the donkey engine in that case was designed to effect was, do doubt, a preparation for the sailing of the ship—namely, the filling of her boilers with water—but the accident arose from the outlet for the water pumped up by the pump which the engine worked being closed, with the result that the air chamber of the pump gave way under the excessive pressure of the water which could not escape, and it was held, on the principle laid down by Lord Ellenborough, that it was impossible to say that this damage, the bursting of the air chamber, was occasioned by a "cause" similar to perils of the sea. The loading of a ship with her cargo is no doubt in one sense a preparation for her sailing. It is certainly not so directly connected with her sailing as was the pumping of water into the boilers of a steamship, but unless the accident which occurs in the course of those preparatory operations be occasioned by a cause similar to perils of the sea it is not covered by such a policy as this. Well, it seems to me quite as impossible in this case to say that the breaking of the crane chain or the pin of one of its shackles was occasioned by a cause similar to the perils of the sea, as it was in the last cited authority to say that the bursting of the air chamber of the donkey engine-pump was occasioned by a cause similar to a peril of the sea. The two cases are really in principle on all fours. I am, therefere, of opinion, that the judgment appealed from was right and should be affirmed, and this appeal be dismissed with costs here and below.

Order accordingly.

THE PETER BENOIT. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Shipping—Collision—Both vessels to blame—Apportionment of damages—Maritime Conventions Act 1911 (1 & 2 Geo. 5, c. 57) s. 1, sub-s. 1.

To judge of the degree of a ship's culpability under sect. 1, sub-sect. 1, of the Maritime Conventions Act 1911:—

Regard must be had to the relative positions of the two vessels, the view which each had of the other, the signals which passed between them, and the opportunity each had of avoiding the consequences of the other's errors;

Faults in navigation which do not contribute to the collision are not to be taken into consideration;

Where the evidence does not establish that a clear preponderance of culpability rests upon one ship, the division of damages should be half and half;

The word "river" in Tees Conservancy By-laws does not include the buoyed channel outside the river mouth, and there is no analogy between this buoyed channel and certain waterways which have been declared to be narrow channels.

Query as to the duty of vessels approaching at a considerable distance to blow whistle signals, and the effect of the omission to do so having regard to the above section.

At the hearing of a suit in the Admiralty Court for damages caused by collision the judge found both vessels were to blame, but that one was much more to blame than the other, and he apportioned the liability at four-fifths and one-fifth.

The Court of Appeal, in construing sect. 1, sub-sect. 1 of the Maritime Conventions Act 1911, were of opinion that the fault to the degree of which the liability was to be apportioned must be read as meaning fault causing or contributing to the collision, and being of opinion that there was no evidence on which the blame could be with any certainty apportioned, directed that the liability should be apportioned equally.

Held, after consideration, that the decision of the Court of Appeal was right.

Decision of Court of Appeal affirmed.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Court of Appeal (Buckley, L.J., Pickford, L.J., and Bankes, L.J.), with Nautical Assessors, dated the 11th Feb. 1915, allowing an appeal from a judgment of Bargrave Deane, J.

A collision occurred on the evening of the 18th Oct. 1913 at the entrance of the river Tees between the Belgian owned ship Peter Benoit and the Spanish ship Aurrera. Both vessels sustained damage.

The owners of the Aurrera sued in the Admiralty Court to recover for the damage which their ship had sustained, and the owners of the Peter Benoit counter-claimed.

Bargrave Deane, J. held that both vessels were to blame, but that the Aurrera was the more in fault, and accordingly under sect. 1, sub-sect. 1, of the Maritime Conventions Act 1911 he apportioned the liability at four-fifths and one-fifth.

The Court of Appeal were of opinion that there was no evidence on which the blame could be with any certainty apportioned and directed that the liability should be apportioned equally.

The owners of the Peter Benoit appealed.

Aspinall, K.C. and D. Stephens for the appellants.

Bateson, K.C. and Dumas for the respondents.

The House, having taken time for consideration, gave judgment dismissing the appeal.

Lord ATKINSON.—The appeal in this case arises out of a collision which took place at about six o'clock p.m. on the 18th Oct. 1913 off the mouth of the river Tees, between a Spanish steamship named the Aurrera, inward bound into the Tees, and a Belgian steamship, the Peter Benoit, outward bound from that river. The case was tried before Bargrave Deane, J., who found both ships to blame, but was of opinion that the culpability of the Aurrera so much exceeded that of the Peter Benoit that he, in exercise of the jurisdiction conferred upon him by sect. 1 of the Maritime Conventions Act 1911, by his decree of the 26th Jan. 1914 directed that the owners of the Aurrera should pay four-fifths of the damage done to each vessel by the collision, and those of the Peter Benoit one-fifth.

Both the parties concerned, the plaintiffs, the owners of the Aurrera, and the defendants, the owners of the Peter Benoit, appealed from this decree to the Court of Appeal, and that court by its decree of the 10th Feb. 1915 varied the decree of Bargrave Deane, J. by directing that the damages arising from the collision, the subject-matter of the action, should be borne equally by the respective owners of the two vessels. This decree was based on the conclusion at which the court arrived that on the evidence it was impossible to ascertain with accuracy what were precisely the relative proportions of culpability of the two vessels, and on the opinion that in such circumstances this statute directed that the damages should be borne equally.

The first section of the statute runs as follows:

> Where by the fault of two or more vessels damage is caused, the liability to make good the damage or loss shall be in proportion to the degree in which each vessel was in fault, provided that if, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, it is not possible to establish different degrees of fault, the liability shall be apportioned equally.

The Court of Appeal in effect held that having regard to the evidence, the present case fell within this proviso.

The owners of the Peter Benoit appealed from so much of the decree as apportioned the damage equally. They do not appeal from that portion of it upholding in other respects the decree of Bargarve Deane, J.

The owners of the Aurrera have not lodged any cross-appeal against the decree of the Court of Appeal. Hence it must, on this appeal, be taken that both vessels were rightly held to blame, and that the only matter for decision by this House is the apportionment of the damages.

The appellants contend that the culpability of the Aurrera so preponderates over that of the Peter Benoit that the apportionment made by Bargrave Deane should be restored. The respondents are contented with the apportionment made by the Court of Appeal.

The evidence given by both sides at the trial is vague and in many respects unreliable. The story told by the witnesses for the Aurrera was not accepted by the judge at the trial, and the most that could be contended for by the able counsel for the appellants was that the story told by his witnesses was accepted, not in its entirety, but in its material parts.

The navigation of the River Tees is under the control of the Tees Conservancy Commissioners. Their jurisdiction extends to a buoy called the Fairway Buoy, situated over one mile seaward of the South Gare Lighthouse.

The place of collision, though not fixed with accuracy by the evidence, was undoubtedly within the jurisdiction of this body. They had made rules with regard to the navigation, lighting and buoying of the river, Nos. 21 and 23 of which are said to apply to the present case, but the river itself is not defined, nor its seaward limit fixed, in any way. Between the Fairway Buoy and the South Gare Lighthouse is situated a shoal called the Bar, or Middle Ground, and two buoys, one of which, situate near this Bar, is called the Bar Buoy. The other is nearer to the South Gare Lighthouse, and both lie on the eastern or south-eastern side of the middle line of the river prolonged seaward. Buoys are also placed upon the western or north-western side of this middle line, and it is contended by the appellants that these two lines of buoys mark out a narrow channel within the meaning of the by-laws.

According to the physical features of the coast the South Gare Lighthouse would appear to mark the mouth of the river at its south-eastern side. The Aurrera, coming up from a southerly or south-easterly direction, designed and attempted to enter this so-called narrow channel by rounding the Bar Buoy. That is not disputed. As she was bound to proceed up the river on the side of the middle line of the channel lying to her own starboard hand, she would be obliged after rounding the Bar Buoy to cross the channel from its southern or south-eastern to its northern or north-western side. She did not attempt to round the Fairway Buoy, and by that means, at a considerable distance seaward of the place of collision, get upon her proper side of the so-called narrow channel. For this omission Bargrave Deane, J. found her gravely to blame. He considered it a distinct breach of the twenty-third by-law made by the Tees Conservancy Board. That by-law is to the following effect:—

> Every steam or other vessel, and whether being towed or towing another vessel, must so approach the river from sea as to enter on that side of the channel reserved for her navigation.

This latter side is, according to the twenty-first of the by-laws,

The starboard side of the river so that the port helm may always be applied to clear vessels proceeding in the opposite direction.

These two rules amount, he held, to this:—

That in the river extending out as far as the Fairway Buoy a vessel coming in must keep to her starboard side, and a vessel going out must keep to her starboard, and under twenty-three rule the incoming vessel, in order to get on this starboard side of the river, must do so before she enters the river.

That is to say, she must approach the river on that side. He censured the pilots for being in the habit of neglecting this rule, and decided that no custom or practice could relieve the owners from the consequence of violating it as the Aurrera had done.

It is obvious that in so deciding the learned judge proceeded upon the assumption that the River Tees extended to the Fairway Buoy, a mile to the seaward of what upon the charts used at the trial, at all events, would appear to be the river's mouth. He so held apparently because the jurisdiction of the Commissioners extended down to the Fairway Buoy.

The Court of Appeal most properly, in my opinion, held that there was no evidence whatever in the case to warrant this assumption. Mr. Aspinall contended, however, as I understood him, that though the river might not extend to the Fairway Buoy, or even to the Bar Buoy, yet the channel marked out by the Fairway Buoy, the Bar Buoy, and a third buoy on the south-eastern side called the Chequers Buoy, and certain other buoys on the north-western side, was a narrow channel. And that according to the principle established by certain authorities which he cited, ships were in effect bound to enter such a channel on the same side as if it were a river. These authorities are The Harvest (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 5; 55 L. T. Rep. 202; 11 P. Div. pp. 14 and 90), The Winstanley (8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 154, 170; 75 L. T. Rep. 133; (1896) P. 297), The Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse (10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 361, 504; 97 L. T. Rep. 366; (1907) P. 36), and the Knaresborough, reported in a note to the last-mentioned case at p. 38 in (1907) P. I do not know whether these cases were cited in the Court of Appeal. They are certainly not referred to in any of the judgments of the Lords Justices.

The answer to his contention is, I think, this, that in these cases the local conditions were entirely different from those existing in the present case, that in two of them, the first and second, the local by-laws were different in their terms from by-laws 21 and 23 of the Tees Commissioners, and that in the last two cases the twenty-fifth of the Rules for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1897 was held to require that as a matter of good seamanship the waterway between two opposite points, as, for example, the ends of a breakwater together with so much of the adjacent water as is necessary for the navigation of the passage, should be treated as a narrow channel within the meaning of this article.

In the present case, although the place of collision is not fixed with accuracy by the evidence, yet both sides put it outside the line of buoys on the south-eastern side of the channel marked by the two lines of buoys, and, therefore, not as in the cases cited within the so-called narrow channel itself. It does not appear to me, therefore, that these authorities are applicable to the present case. The distance between the Bar Buoy and the Fairway Buoy is about half a mile, and our assessors advise us that there was nothing contrary to good seamanship in the Aurrera, when coming from the south, attempting, as she undoubtedly did attempt, in accordance with the common practice, to enter this buoyed channel by rounding the Bar Buoy on a starboard helm preparatory to passing over to the opposite side of the channel, which lay on her starboard hand. Her fault does not consist in that, but in continuing to proceed on that starboard helm at a speed of about eight knots—over-starboarding as it has been styled—so that she came round in a curve so sharp that she struck the Peter Benoit at an angle more obtuse than a right angle.

In this she was undoubtedly in fault—Mr. Aspinall contends grossly in fault, having regard to the position in which she placed herself when she attempted to enter the buoyed channel by rounding the Bar Buoy. To judge of the degree of her culpability, regard must be had to the relative position of the two vessels, the view which each had of the other, the signals which passed between them, and the opportunity each had of avoiding the consequences of the other's errors.

The Aurrera came up from the south on a north-westerly course, heading directly for the Fairway Buoy till, having it about north-west of her and about half a mile distant, she began to starboord her helm in order to get it into the channel and proceed up the river. She got round on that helm to a south-westerly course. She did not keep that course, however, but continued on a starboard helm. The Peter Benoit was at that time coming down the channel on its south-western side. That was her proper place. The pilot of the Aurrera fixes the place of collision as about two of his own ship's lengths south-west of the Bar Buoy, and states that the Aurrera commenced to turn, and while she was still heading north-west he saw the Peter Benoit somewhere between the Bar Buoy and the Gare Lighthouse, on her course down the channel, from a mile to a mile and a half distant, and bearing five to six points on the port bow of his ship; that he then commenced to turn on a starboard helm till he got on a south-westerly course, when he steadied his vessel on that course, and got the green light of the Peter Benoit, then half a mile off, about two or three points on his starboard bow; that the two ships were then relatively to each other in quite safe positions—green to green, and all clear—that the green light of the Peter Benoit continued to broaden on his starboard bow till, when the vessel was about a quarter of a mile distant, it bore three points on that bow, and that the Peter Benoit then blew one short blast and ported her helm.

Now, Bargreave Deane, J. rejected absolutely this story as to the bearings of the two vessels. He finds that they never bore green-to-green at all, and that at the time the pilot heard the first one short blast given by the Peter Benoit the latter vessel was on her starboard side of the channel coming out (her proper place), and the Aurrera was still coming round on her starboard helm. The Aurrera answered this signal by giving two short blasts to signify that she was starboarding her helm. This was the first signal she gave. She did not blow her whistle when she first began to starboard to round the Bar Buoy.

Mr. Bateson contends (rightly, we are advised), that as the Aurrera was then in the open sea and the Peter Benoit one mile and a half away, she was not bound to blow her whistle, yet Bargrave Deane, J. treats the omission to whistle at this point as a fault. It would appear to me, therefore, that the learned judge somewhat exaggerates the culpability of the Aurrera. He said "she was badly navigated from start to finish." That conclusion rests upon the assumption that she ought to have gone round the Fairway Buoy, and ought to have whistled when she commenced to starboard; but neither of these matters, even if they amounted to instances of defective navigation, was the proxima causa of the collision, and I quite concur with the Court of Appeal in thinking the faults with which the statute is conversant are faults in some way contributing to the collision.

Faults in navigation which do not contribute to the collision are not to be taken into consideration. So that, even if the Aurrera in attempting to come into the channel on a starboard helm course in the half-mile space intervening between the Fairway and the Bar Buoys was in fault, she had ample time, as the Peter Benoit was one and a half miles away from her, to cross to the north side of the channel and pass the Peter Benoit red to red. The fault on her side which contributed to the collision was her continuous starboarding, which brought her round either close to the line of buoys on the southern side of the channel or absolutely outside the channel. She may have expected or assumed that the Peter Benoit would starboard her helm and pass her green to green, but there was no reasonable ground for such an expectation, seeing that the only signal given by the Belgian vessel was a port-helm signal. No doubt just before the collision the Aurrera gave three short blasts and put her engines full speed astern; but her fault consisted, to use Buckley's, L.J. words, in chasing, as it were, the Peter Benoit in the way she did. It was a grievous fault which cannot be excused.

I now turn to the consideration of the navigation of the Peter Benoit, and just as Bargrave Deane, J. seems to me to have somewhat exaggerated the culpability of the Aurrera, so I think he rather minimises the culpability of the Peter Benoit. I think Mr. Bateson was perfectly justified in pressing against the Peter Benoit the entries in the log-book to the extent he did. Those entries represent that the vessel steamed down the river at 4.55 p.m., dropped his pilot at 5.25, was abeam of the South Gare Lighthouse at 5.30 on a course N.E. ½ E., abeam of the Bar Bouy at 5.33, when he altered his course (it is not stated how), and was in collision with the Aurrera seven minutes later, at 5.40. Mr. Bateson urges that though it might not be reasonable to hold the ship bound to the precise number of minutes stated, yet as the ships were not approaching each other end-on there was ample time for the Peter Benoit, after those in charge of her had seen, or if they had kept a proper look-out would have seen, the eccentric course the Aurrera was taking, to have starboarded her helm, gone towards the north side of the channel, and so avoided the consequences of the Aurrera's negligent navigation.

Jacques Verschueren, the master of the Peter Benoit, deposed that, after dropping his pilot, he came down the starboard side of the buoyed channel, that as he was going southward, the proper way to navigate was to turn away on a port helm as soon as the ship cleared the Bar Buoy. that he first saw the lights of the Aurrera a little after he passed the South Gare Light, that she was coming in with two masthead lights, wide open broadside, and a red light, and a third light in the port rigging, carried there by incoming vessels, apparently for Customs purposes, that he continued down the channel at a speed of six or seven miles an hour on a course of N.E. ½ E. till he came abreast of the Bar Buoy, that then he gave one short blast on his whistle and gave the man at the wheel an order to port his helm, which was obeyed, and that he kept on at full speed. The Aurrera at that time showed the same light, he said, as at first. The ships never were green to green. His ship's green light was to the Aurrera's red light. He heard the two short blasts of the Aurrera given in answer to his first short blast, informing him she was starboarding. He, in reply, then gave a second short blast and had his helm put hard aport and still kept on his speed. The Aurrera replied again with two short blasts. Her light then closed in and she bore upon him. He then saw a collision was imminent. He, however, kept on full speed, thinking to pass under the bows of the Aurrera. Three short blasts were then given by the Aurrera when only a ship's length away. Before the third of these blasts was sounded the collision occurred. At that moment he was travelling at six or seven miles an hour. He fixes the place of collision about a little over a cable's length from the Bar Buoy, which was then bearing W.S.W. from the Peter Benoit.

On cross-examination, however, he stated that when he heard the two short blasts in answer to his first one short blast he thought there must have been some mistake, so he repeated it, that when he first saw the Aurrera she was nearly two miles away, that when he was at the Bar Buoy the Aurrera was two or three points on his starboard bow and about three-quarters of a mile distant, that he was still on his N.E. and ½ E. course. The Aurrera was still this distance away when he ported his helm, and on her original course of N.W. by W.

This is a clear admission that the Peter Benoit had the Aurrera on her starboard bow from the time he first saw the latter's lights, one-and-a-half miles distant, till she came within three-quarters of a mile of him; that while the Aurrera was still keeping her original course, the Peter Benoit ported her helm and changed her course to starboard, and that she persisted in doing that, and going at full speed ahead, notwithstanding that she had received two signals from the Aurrera—that she, the Aurrera, was going to port under a starboard helm. Their courses thus became crossing courses, necessarily involving, if continued, risk of collision. Under 19th and 21st of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, the Peter Benoit was the ship which ought to have given way. She did not do so. She did the very opposite. She still ported, and persisted in going full speed on a port helm, notwithstanding the signals she had received, intending, as her captain said, to cross the bows of the Aurrera.

In my opinion, her culpability, therefore, cannot be confined, as Bargrave Deane, J. has confined it, to the mere omission on hearing the starboard helm signal given in reply to her port helm signal to "ease her engines and either stop or reverse." She ought, in my view, on first hearing the starboard helm signal, to have kept out of the way of the incoming steamer then bearing on her starboard bow. That consideration tends somewhat to equalise the culpability of the two vessels.

I concur with the Court of Appeal in the conclusion at which, as I understand, they have arrived—namely, that where, as in this case, the evidence does not establish that a clear preponderance of culpability rests upon one ship, the division of the damages should be half and half. There is not, in my opinion, any such preponderance proved in this case. Both vessels were to blame; and, in my view, the evidence leaves it very uncertain which was most to blame.

I am therefore of opinion that the judgment appealed from was right and should be affirmed, and this appeal be dismissed with costs.

Lord PARKER.—This is the case of a collision off the mouth of the River Tees, between the Spanish ship Aurrera, bound inward from the south, and the Belgian ship Peter Benoit, bound outward for the south. Both ships were admittedly to blame, and the only question is whether it be possible under all the circumstances to establish different degrees of blame between the two vessels so as to make the damages apportionable under the first section of the Maritime Conventions Act 1911.

Bargrave Deane, J. thought that it was possible, and accordingly directed that the damages should be borne in the proportion of one-fifth by the Belgian and four-fifths by the Spanish ship. In arriving at this conclusion he was at any rate largely influenced by the construction he placed upon the by-laws made by the Tees Conservancy. He held that according to these by-laws every ship approaching the mouth of the River Tees from the south ought to pass seaward of the Fairway Buoy and could not properly pass between the Fairway Buoy and the Bar Buoy. I agree with the Court of Appeal that this construction of the by-laws is inadmissible. It is quite true that the jurisdiction of the Tees Conservancy extends up to and beyond the Fairway Buoy, but this is no reason for construing the word "river" as used in the by-laws so as to include the buoyed channel outside the river mouth or otherwise than in its ordinary sense. It was argued that the Aurrera was precluded, if not by the by-laws, at any rate by considerations of good seamanship, from approaching the river otherwise than round the Fairway Buoy, but having regard to the evidence and the opinions expressed by your assessors, it is, I think, impossible for your Lordships to lay down any such general rule. I fail to find any analogy between the buoyed channel at the mouth of the Tees and the narrow channels which were the subject of the decisions cited in argument. I think it must be taken that in ordinary circumstances it is quite consistent with good seamanship for vessels approaching the river from the south and leaving the river for the south to pass between the buoys in question.

The evidence as to what really happened is very unsatisfactory, but I desire to direct your Lordships' attention to the moment of time when the Belgian vessel, on her outward course, was coming abreast of the Bar Buoy. I think this is the earliest moment which need be considered. No doubt for some time previously each vessel ought to have been aware of the other's position, but before the Belgian vessel came abreast of the Bar Buoy I can hardly think that there was any necessity for either to take action with regard to the other. At this moment of time it appears that the Belgian ship had the Spanish ship two or three points on her starboard bow, and that the Spanish vessel was, and must have been for some little time, under a starboard helm, apparently shaping its course so as to approach the river between the Fairway Buoy and the Bar Buoy. Under these circumstances it was the duty of the Belgian vessel to keep out of the way, and the duty of the Spanish vessel to maintain her course and speed. It seems to me that the Spanish vessel would have been fulfilling her duty by continuing to shape her course for the river mouth, and that she was not bound to continue, or justified in continuing, under a starboard helm more than was necessary for that purpose.

Under these circumstances I do not think the Belgian ship was to blame in porting her helm when abreast of the Bar Buoy. Had the Spanish vessel continued her course for the river's mouth this would have been a perfectly safe manœuvre. When, however, her one-blast signal informing the Spanish vessel that she was porting round the Bar Buoy was answered by a two-blast signal on the part of the Spanish vessel signifying that the latter was still under a starboard helm, it ought to have been obvious that a dangerous situation was in course of development, and she should, I think, have at once slowed down. Instead of doing so she continued full speed under a port helm and again gave a one-blast signal, which was again answered by a two-blast signal on the part of the Spanish ship. Upon receiving this second two-blast signal she ought, undoubtedly, to have stopped and reversed her engines. She failed to do so, and, though the Spanish ship stopped and reversed her engines, it was too late to avoid a collision; the Spanish vessel struck her on the port side just forward of the bridge. At the moment of collision the Spanish vessel had come round under a starboard helm far more than was necessary in shaping a course for the river's mouth. She was, in fact, heading away from the mouth of the river, and, to use Lord Justice Buckley's expression, chasing the Belgian ship.

Under these circumstances it is, I think, impossible to say that one vessel was more to blame than the other. It is a case of two vessels in full view of each other, and with ample time to manœuvre for each other, each taking and persisting in its own course, irrespective of what the other was doing. If under such circumstances a collision is brought about, I do not think that the resulting damage is capable of apportionment under the Maritime Conventions Act. The appeal, in my opinion, fails.

Lord SUMNER.—I agree with the Court of Appeal that the apportionment by Deane, J. of the damage practically rested on a wrong finding that the River Tees extended outwards to the Fairway Buoy. Hence his apportionment should be laid aside, and the Court of Appeal's becomes the first apportionment based on a correct foundation of fact.

The Maritime Conventions Act 1911 enacts that the liability shall be equally divided, if it is not possible to establish different degrees of fault. As the Court of Appeal decided that it was not possible to establish such different degrees, it is for the appellants to prove the possibility by establishing it upon the evidence to the satisfaction of your Lordships.

If the apportionment of Deane, J. be laid aside, there is to-day as much assumption in favour of the Court of Appeal's apportionment as there would otherwise have been in the Court of Appeal in favour of the decision of the trial judge with this added consideration, that the appellant must take the facts (other than that as to the Fairway Buoy) as Bargrave Deane, J. found them, unless he can show very clearly on the evidence that the findings ought to be amended or supplemented. This attempt was made before the Court of Appeal and failed. The evidence must be cogent indeed to constrain your Lordships to fresh conclusions on questions of fact already twice decided adversely to the appellant.

The conclusion that it is possible to establish different degrees of fault must be a conclusion proved by evidence, judicially arrived at, and sufficiently made out. Conjecture will not do: a general leaning in favour of one ship rather than of the other will not do: sympathy for one of the wrongdoers, too indefinite to be supported by a reasoned judgment, will not do. The question is not answered by deciding who was the first wrongdoer, nor even of necessity who was the last. The Act says, "having regard to all the circumstances of the case." Attention must be paid not only to the actual time of the collision and the manœuvres of the ships when about to collide, but to their prior movements and opportunities, their acts, and omissions. Matters which are only introductory, even though they preceded the collision by but a short time, are not really circumstances of the case but only its antecedents, and they should not directly affect the result. As Pickford, L.J. observes: "'The liability to make good the damage or loss shall be in proportion to the degree in which each vessel was in fault.' That must be in fault as regards the collision. If she was in fault in other ways, which had no effect on the collision, that is not a matter to be taken into consideration."

I shall not analyse in detail the facts after what has been already said by your Lordships. The actual and relative positions of the two ships have not been precisely found, nor does the evidence, largely untrustworthy as it was, suffice to determine them. The night was clear, and unmistakably sound signals were exchanged. The Aurrera's attempt to enter the channel without first rounding the Fairway Buoy has been attacked. I express no opinion on it. Right or wrong, her manœuvres and intention ought to have been known to those in charge of the Peter Benoit long enough before the collision to have enabled them, as was their duty, to keep out of the way. The suggestion that the course of the Aurrera would rightly suggest an intention to cease starboarding almost immediately and to straighten up on her right side of the channel so as to make it unnecessary for the Peter Benoit to manœuvre, depends on positions for the two steamers, which have not been, and in my opinion cannot now be, determined. I cannot eke out the appellants' case by conjecture. I cannot satisfy myself that it is possible within the meaning of the proviso to establish different degrees of fault. Both ships did wrong, in different particulars and by different steps, but that is all. I agree that the appeal fails.

THE ROUMANIAN. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (IN PRIZE).

Prize Court—British ship—Enemy cargo—Cargo shipped before outbreak of war—Part cargo discharged into oil tanks on wharf—Tanks owned by British company—"In port"—Meaning of term discussed—Liability to seizure of enemy cargo.

A cargo of petroleum oil in bulk owned by a German company was shipped on board a British ship which sailed from a neutral port for a German destination before the outbreak of hostilities between Great Britain and Germany. While on its voyage the ship was ordered to proceed to a British port, where the oil was discharged into tanks of a British company owning the wharf. When the greater portion of the oil had been discharged, the officer of Customs gave notice to the master of the vessel that the whole of the cargo of oil was placed under detention, not only that which was still in the vessel, but also that which had already been pumped into the tanks. The Crown claimed the whole as prize and asked for the condemnation of the oil. The cargo owners objected on the ground that the tanks were "on land" and not "in port," and that the matter was not within the jurisdiction of the Prize Court, and claimed the release of the oil to them, or, alternatively, that it should be sold and the proceeds handed to them at the end of the war.

Held, that the whole cargo had rightly been condemned as droits of Admiralty.

Decision of Evans, P. (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 8; 112 L. T. Rep. 464; (1915) P. 26) affirmed.

APPEAL by the Europaische Petroleum Union and the holders of about nine-tenths of the shares in that union, as the owners of, or the parties beneficially interested in, about 6264 tons of petroleum lately laden on board the British steamship Roumanian, from a decree of Evans, P. dated the 7th Dec. 1914 condemning the petroleum as prize or droits in Admiralty.

The Europaische Petroleum Union is a combination of a number of oil-producing companies in Europe, and these companies hold all the shares in the union. The business of the union is controlled by a board or committee composed for the most part of the principal directors of the various shareholding companies. As Germany was a convenient central meeting place for the representatives of the Russian, Roumanian, and Belgian interests, the union was registered in Bremen.

On the 24th July 1914 the Gulf Refining Company, a company incorporated and carrying on business in the United States, shipped on behalf of the union, on board the British tank steamer Roumanian at Port Arthur, Texas, a cargo of about 6264 tons of refined petroleum in bulk for carriage to Hamburg. The cargo was intended to be sold in Europe for use as lamp oil, and was shipped without any anticipation of war. The Roumanian sailed from Port Arthur on the 24th July 1914.

On the day of the outbreak of the war, Admiral Inglefield, the secretary of Lloyds, wrote to Messrs. Lane and Macandrew, of Great St. Helens, E.C., the manager of the Roumanian, the following letter, dated from Lloyds the 4th Aug. 1914:

Dear Sirs,—I beg to inform you that the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty have suggested that in the national interests your steamers Terek, Danubian, and Roumanian, which according to our records are now on passage to Copenhagen, Amsterdam, and Hamburg, should be diverted to a United Kingdom port.—(Signed) Yours faithfully, E. F. INGLEFIELD, Secretary.

The master was accordingly instructed by the owners of the Roumanian to proceed to Dartmouth for orders, where he arrived on the 14th Aug.

On the 15th Aug. a notice was issued by the Board of Trade containing recommendations with regard to the treatment of cargoes of ships which had deviated from their original ports of destination. In the notice it was stated that in the case of a British or friendly belligerent or neutral ship in a British port with cargo belonging to an enemy the cargo should be landed at a dock, legal quay, or sufferance wharf, either in the port at which the steamer had arrived or in some other safe port, and warehoused, subject to shipowners' and other charges, until sale or disposal could be arranged for. If sold, the proceeds should be held for subsequent distribution to those entitled to the cargo, subject to shipowners' and other charges which might at law have priority to the claims of the persons entitled to the cargo or its proceeds.

On the 20th Aug. the Roumanian proceeded to London, arrangements being made with the British Petroleum Company Limited, of London, for the oil to be warehoused in their tanks at Purfleet.

At noon on the 21st Aug. the Roumanian arrived at the British Petroleum Company's wharf at Purfleet and began to discharge her cargo of oil into the tanks of that company by means of pumps and connecting pipes. The Customs officer visited the ship and tested samples of the oil to see if its specific gravity rendered it liable to duty. The specific gravity was near the dutiable line, and the officer therefore sent the samples to the laboratory to be tested, and the oil was certified as duty free There was some delay before the test note from the analyst was received, and meanwhile the master of the Roumanian received a letter from the Customs house at Gravesend which ran: "I have to inform you that your cargo, consisting of about 6,264 tons of refined petroleum oil, is placed under detention." There was nothing in this letter to indicate that the cargo was detained as prize. As no one from the Customs or any other authority came to stop the discharge of the remainder of the oil then left in the steamer, the work of discharging into the tanks went on and was completed at 4 p.m. on the 23rd Aug.

On the 19th Sept. a writ was issued by the Procurator-General and attached to the tanks addressed "to the owners and parties interested in the goods laden on board the Roumanian seized and taken as prize by the officers of Customs of the Port of London," and commanded them to enter an appearance.

The suit was heard before the president (Sir Samuel Evans), who, on the 7th Dec. 1914, rejected the claims put forward by the present appellants and condemned the whole cargo as droits of Admiralty.

From that judgment the claimants appealed.

Maurice Hill, K.C., R. H. Balloch, and Dunlop for the appellants.

Sir Edward Carson, A.G., Sir Erle Richards, K.C., and Theobald Mathew for the respondent.

The cases and the authorities cited sufficiently appear from the considered judgment of the committee, which was delivered by Lord PARKER.—This appeal relates to the cargo ex steamship Roumanian. The relevant facts are quite simple and are not in dispute.

The Roumanian is a British ship, and on the 4th Aug. 1914, the day on which war broke out between this country and Germany, was on a voyage from Port Arthur, Texas, to Hamburg with a cargo of some 6264 tons of petroleum belonging to the Europaische Petroleum Union, a German company. On the same day the Admiralty, through the secretary of Lloyds, suggested to the owners that the ship should be diverted to some port in the United Kingdom, and the owners accordingly instructed the master to proceed to Dartmouth for orders. The ship arrived at Dartmouth on the 14th Aug. 1914.

On the 15th Aug. the Board of Trade issued a notice containing recommendations with regard to the treatment of cargoes belonging to an enemy in ships diverted from their original ports of destination. These recommendations appear to their Lordships to be so conceived as in no way to prejudice the liability (if any) of such cargoes to be seized as prize. It was recommended that the cargo should be landed at a dock, legal quay, or sufferance wharf, either in the port at which the steamer had arrived or in some other safe port, and warehoused subject to shipowners' and other charges until sale or disposal could be arranged for. If sold, the proceeds should be held for subsequent distribution to those entitled to the cargo, subject to shipowners' and other charges which might at law have priority to the claims of the persons entitled to the cargo or its proceeds. Obviously, if the cargo were liable to seizure as prize, seizure followed by condemnation in the Prize Court would entitle the Crown either to the cargo itself or the proceeds thereof, subject to such shipowners' or other charges as might by law take precedence of the Crown's interest.

On the 20th Aug. the Roumanian proceeded to London, arriving at Purfleet at noon on the 21st Aug. Before her arrival arrangements had been made to warehouse the petroleum in the tanks of the British Petroleum Company Limited at Purfleet, and permission had been obtained from the Custom-house authorities for its discharge into these tanks. When so discharged the petroleum would be in the custody of the Custom-house authorities in the sense that it could not be removed therefrom without their sanction.

The work of discharge accordingly commenced at 12.15 p.m. on the 21st Aug., the petroleum being pumped into the tanks, which were situated some 100 to 150 yards from the wharf at which the vessel lay. Meanwhile the Custom House authorities took samples in order to test the specific gravity of the oil and ascertain whether or not it was dutiable.

About 7 p.m. on the 22nd Aug. a letter from the Custom-House at Gravesend was delivered on board the Roumanian, addressed to the master, stating that the cargo of about 6264 tons of petroleum was placed under detention. This letter was not received by the master till 11 p.m. Roughly speaking about 1140 tons of oil remained undischarged at 7 p.m. and 570 tons at 11 p.m. on the 22nd Aug. Notwithstanding the letter above referred to, the work of discharging the oil continued. It was completed long before the writ in these proceedings, which did not issue until the 19th Sept., and was served by affixing the same to the tanks in which the petroleum was then warehoused.

It will be observed the letter giving notice of the detention of the cargo did not refer to its detention as prize, and it was accordingly argued on behalf of the appellants that there was no effectual seizure as prize until the writ in these proceedings was affixed to the tanks containing the petroleum. It is clear, however, that the Custom House is the proper authority to seize or detain, with a view to its condemnation as prize, any enemy property found in a British port. It is equally clear that the letter in question was intended to operate, and must have been understood by all concerned as intended to operate, as such a seizure. No other possible intention was suggested. Under these circumstances their Lordships are of opinion that the cargo was effectually seized as prize upon the delivery of the letter. The point, however, is of little importance in the view their Lordships take of the points of law, which will be dealt with presently, for if there was no seizure by delivery of the letter, there was admittedly a good seizure when the writ was served.

Under these circumstances three points were raised by counsel for the appellants.

They contended, first, that so far as the petroleum was not afloat at the date of seizure, the Prize Court had no jurisdiction; secondly, that even if the Prize Court had jurisdiction, it ought not to have condemned the petroleum so far as at the date of seizure it was warehoused in the tanks of the British Petroleum Company Limited and no longer on board the Roumanian; and, thirdly, that enemy goods on British ships at the commencement of hostilities either never were or, at any rate, have long ceased to be liable to seizure at all.

Obviously, if the last point is correct, it is unnecessary to decide the first two points. Their Lordships, therefore, think it desirable to deal with it at once.

The contention that enemy goods on British ships at the commencement of hostilities are not the subject of maritime prize was not argued before the President in the present case. It had already been decided by him in the Miramichi (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 21; 112 L. T. Rep. 349; (1915) P. 71). Their Lordships have carefully considered the judgment of the President in the last-mentioned case, and entirely agree with it. The appellants' counsel based their contention on three arguments. First, they relied on the dearth of reported cases in which enemy goods on British ships at the commencement of hostilities have been condemned as prize, emphasizing the fact that in the case of The Juno (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 15; 112 L. T. Rep. 471) no authority could be found for the right of the master of a British ship on which enemy goods were seized as prize to compensation in lieu of freight, though if such goods were properly the subject of prize, the question must constantly have arisen. Secondly, they laid stress on certain general statements contained in text-books on international law as to what enemy goods can now be seized as prize. Thirdly, they called in aid that part of the Declaration of Paris which affords protection to enemy goods other than contraband on neutral ships and the principle underlying or supposed to underlie such declaration.

With regard to the dearth of reported decisions, it is to be observed that the plainer a proposition of law, the more difficult it sometimes is to find a decision actually in point. Counsel are not in the habit of advancing arguments which they think untenable, nor as a general rule do cases in which no point of law is raised and decided find their way into law reports. If, on the one hand, it be difficult to find a case in which enemy goods on British ships at the commencement of hostilities have been condemned as prize, it is, on the other hand, quite certain that no case can be found in which such goods have been held immune from seizure. Further, inasmuch as by international comity British Prize Courts have in general extended to neutrals the privileges enjoyed by British subjects, we should, if this contention be correct, expect to find that enemy goods on neutral ships at the commencement of hostilities were alike immune from seizure. Their Lordships have been unable to find any authority which gives colour to this suggestion. There appears, indeed, to be no case in which for this purpose any distinction has been drawn between goods on board a neutral vessel at the outbreak of hostilities and goods embarked on a neutral vessel during the course of a war.

Their Lordships, therefore, are not impressed by the argument based on the dearth of actual decisions on the point. Moreover, the decisions, such as they are, certainly do not support, but, indeed, contradict the appellants' contention. It is clear, from the cases cited in the Miramichi, that enemy goods embarked on British ships during the hostilities are the subject of prize. See, in particular, The Conqueror (2 C. Rob. 303). In these cases the sole question decided has been the enemy character of the goods, and no stress has been laid on the time at which they were embarked, or on whether any person concerned had or had not been guilty of the common law offence of trading with the enemy. Further, there is the case of the Venus, referred to in Rothery's Prize Droits, at p. 129.

Their Lordships have thought it desirable to examine the papers preserved in the Record Office in connection with this case, the facts of which are as follows: The Venus was a British ship which at the outbreak of hostilities was on a voyage to Hamburg. Its cargo had been shipped at Genoa, Ancona, and Mentone. The master, hearing of the outbreak of war and desiring to avoid the risk of his ship being captured by the enemy, put into Plymouth. The receiver of Admiralty droits at Plymouth, suspecting upon information given by the master that part of the cargo belonged to enemy subjects, seized both ship and cargo. The shipowners put in a claim for the release of the ship on the ground that it was British and also for freight expenses and demurrage. The ship was ordered to be released. The claim for freight and expenses was allowed, there being a reference to the proctor to ascertain the proper amount, which was declared a charge on the cargo. The claim for demurrage was disallowed. The amount to be allowed for freight and expenses was in due course certified by the proctor, and apparently paid out of the proceeds of the cargo which had been appraised and sold under the direction of the court. Parts of the cargo or its proceeds were subsequently claimed by and released in favour of neutrals. The residue of the cargo was condemned as the property of enemy subjects.

The case of the Venus appears, therefore, to be an authority against the appellants' contention. They say, truly, that the point does not seem to have been raised, but it is far more likely that the point was not raised because it was thought to be untenable than that the court overlooked what, according to the appellants' contention, must have been a well-known principle of prize law. Further, the Venus is certainly an authority in support of the President's decision in The Juno (sup.). Curiously enough, the master of the Venus, though a British subject, is in the proctor's report in the last-mentioned case referred to as the "neutral master," a fact which is only consistent with the practice of the court in allowing freight being the same whether the enemy goods were seized on neutral or on British ships.

With regard to the general statements contained in text-books on international law, it is to be observed that none of those cited in support of the appellants' contention appears to have been based on any discussion of the point in issue. On the contrary, they are for the most part based on a discussion of the effect of the Declaration of Paris. Their Lordships do not think that any useful purpose would be served by examining these statements in detail. They will take one example only, that cited from Westlake's International Law, Part 2, p. 145. The author has been discussing the effect of the Declaration of Paris, and sums up as follows: "We may therefore conclude that enemy ships and enemy goods on board them are now by international law the only enemy property which as such is capturable at sea."

In their Lordships' opinion the meaning of such statements must be judged by the context. They cannot be taken apart from the context as intended to be an exhaustive definition of what is or is not now the subject of maritime prize. It might just as well be argued that because the writer in the present case uses the expression "capturable at sea," he must have thought that enemy goods in neutral ships lying in British ports or harbours were, notwithstanding the Declaration of Paris, still subject to capture.

Such statements are in any case more than counterbalanced by statements contained in other well-recognised authorities. Thus, in addition to the passages quoted in The Miramichi (sup.) from Dana's edition of Wheaton's International Law, it will be found that Halleck (International Law, vol. 3, p. 126) states that whatever bears the character of enemy property (with a few exceptions not material for the purpose of this case), if found upon the ocean or afloat in port, is liable to capture as a lawful prize by the opposite belligerent. It is the enemy character of the goods and not the nationality of the ship on which they are embarked or the date of embarkation which is the criterion of lawful prize. This is in full accordance with Lord Stowell's statement in The Rebeckah (1 C. Rob. 227), of the manner in which the order of 1665 defining Admiralty droits has been construed by usage.

Passing to the appellants' third argument, that based on the Declaration of Paris or the principle supposed to underlie such Declaration, it may be stated more fully as follows: Enemy goods on neutral territory were never the legitimate subject of maritime prize. Such goods could not be seized without an infringement of the rights of neutrals. The rights of neutrals are similarly infringed if enemy goods be seized on neutral ships, but the law of prize having for the most part been formulated and laid down by nations capable of exercising and able to exercise the pressure of sea power, the rights of neutrals have been ignored to this extent, that the capture of enemy goods in neutral vessels on the high seas or in ports or harbours of the realm has been deemed lawful capture. The Declaration of Paris is in fuller accordance with principle; it recognises that no distinction can be drawn between neutral territory and neutral ships. To use Westlake's expression (p. 145, Int. Law, Part 2), it assimilates neutral ships to neutral territory, recognising that on both the authority of the neutral State ought (except possibly in the case of contraband) to be exclusive. So far, the argument proceeds logically, but its next step is, in their Lordships' opinion, open to considerable criticism. If, say the appellants, neutral ships are assimilated, as on principle they should be, to neutral territory, British ships ought to be in like manner assimilated to British territory. Whatever may have been the case in earlier times, no one will now contend that the private property of enemy subjects found within the realm at the commencement of a war can be seized and appropriated by the Crown. The same ought, therefore, to hold of enemy goods found in British ships at the commencement of the war. This part of the argument is, in their Lordships' opinion, quite fallacious. The Declaration of Paris, in effect, modified the rules of our Prize Courts for the benefit of neutrals. It was based on international comity, and was not intended to modify the law applicable to British ships or British subjects in cases where neutrals were not concerned. Its effect may possibly be summed up by saying that it assimilates neutral ships to neutral territory, but it is impossible to base on this assimilation any argument for the immunity of enemy goods in British ships.

The cases are not in pari materia. If the Crown has ceased to exercise its ancient rights to seize and appropriate the goods of enemy subjects on land, it is because the advantage to be thus gained has been small compared with the injury thereby entailed on private individuals, or in order to insure similar treatment of British goods on enemy territory. But one of the greatest advantages of sea power is the ability to cripple an enemy's external trade, and for this reason the Crown's right to seize and appropriate enemy goods on the high seas or in territorial waters or the ports or harbours of the realm has never been allowed to fall into desuetude. In order in the fullest degree to attain this advantage of sea power our courts have always upheld the right of seizing such goods even when in neutral bottoms, and neutrals have always admitted or acquiesced in the exercise of that right, either because it was deemed to be a legitimate exercise of sea power in time of war or because on some future occasion they themselves might be belligerents and desire to exercise a similar right on their own behalf. Those who were responsible for the Declaration of Paris had not to weigh the advantage to be gained by the seizure of enemy goods on neutral ships against the injury thereby inflicted on private owners, but against the demands of international comity. The fact that we sacrificed on the altar of international comity a considerable part of the advantages incident to power at sea is no legitimate reason for making a further sacrifice where no question of international comity can possibly arise.

Their Lordships hold therefore, on this part of the case, that enemy goods on British ships, whether on board at the commencement of the hostilities or embarked during the hostilities, always were, and still are, liable to be seized as prize, either on the high seas or in the ports or harbours of the realm. It follows that the petroleum seized on board the Roumanian was properly condemned as prize.

The next point to be considered is the jurisdiction of the Prize Court so far as the petroleum in question was, when seized as prize, warehoused in the tanks of the British Petroleum Company, Limited, and no longer on board the Roumanian. The appellants contended that it is the local situation of the goods seized as prize which determines the jurisdiction of the Prize Court. If such goods be, at the time of seizure, on land and not afloat, it is not, they contended, the Prize Court but some court of Common Law which has jurisdiction to determine the rights of all parties interested. In their Lordships' opinion, this contention also fails. The chief function of a Court of Prize is to determine the question, "prize or no prize," in other words whether the goods seized as prize were lawfully so seized, so as to raise a title in the Crown. In determining this question, the local situation of the goods at the time of seizure may be of importance, but it is the seizure as prize and not the local situation of the goods seized which confers jurisdiction. If authority be needed for this proposition, it may be found in Lord Mansfield's judgment in the case of Lindo v. Rodney, reported in a note to Le Caux v. Eden in 2 Douglas at p. 612. It must be remembered that the jurisdiction of the Prize Court is based in every case upon a commission under the Great Seal. Lord Mansfield pointed out that in the case before him, the commission under which the court derived jurisdiction conferred jurisdiction in all cases of prize whether the goods sought to be condemned were taken on land or afloat. The same may be said of the commission in the present case. In his opinion, however, it was necessary to draw a distinction in this connection between the jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty as a Court of Prize and its jurisdiction apart from the commission which constitutes it a Court of Prize. To give the Court of Admiralty as such jurisdiction, the matter complained of must have occurred on the high seas, but in all matters of prize it was not the Court of Admiralty as such, but the Court of Admiralty by virtue of the commission which had jurisdiction, and this jurisdiction was exclusive, whether the goods seized as prize were on land or afloat. The only authority which, at first sight, appears to be in conflict with Lord Mansfield's decision is the case of the Ooster Ems (1784, 1 Ch. Rob 284n.), to which, for the reasons hereinbefore mentioned, no great weight can be given.

Their Lordships will now proceed to consider the appellants' contention that, even if the Prize Court had jurisdiction it ought nevertheless to have decided against the condemnation of the petroleum in question so far as it was not actually afloat on board the Roumanian at the time of the seizure. They admitted that during the war no order for restitution or release could properly be made in favour of the German owners, but they suggested that the proper course was to hand the petroleum over to the public trustee or some other official for safe custody until the restoration of peace. No case where any such course has been pursued was cited.

The real question is whether the petroleum in question is, according to law administered by prize courts in this country, properly the subject of maritime prize, although locally situated on shore. All enemy ships and cargoes which may, after the outbreak of the war, be found afloat on the high seas or in territorial waters or in the ports or harbours of the realm are liable to seizure as maritime prize. The petroleum in question was undoubtedly enemy property. It was undoubtedly on the high seas at and after the declaration of war. It became liable to seizure as prize as soon as war was declared. It did not cease to be so liable by being carried into Dartmouth or thence to Purfleet. It clearly remained so liable while still afloat. Did it cease to be so liable when pumped into the tanks of the British Petroleum Company Limited? In the course of the argument counsel were asked to suggest some intelligible reason why it should cease to be so liable. No satisfactory reason was suggested, and their Lordships have been unable to discover one for themselves. The argument of counsel was based on the assumption that no enemy goods not actually afloat at the time of seizure could be lawfully seized as prize, unless possibly they could be considered as locally situate within a port or harbour, and that the tanks of the British Petroleum Company Limited could not be considered as part of the Port of London. There is, in their Lordships' opinion, no ground for this assumption. The test of ashore or afloat is no infallible test as to whether goods can or can not be lawfully seized as maritime prize. It is perfectly clear, for instance, that enemy goods seized on enemy territory by the naval forces of the Crown may lawfully be condemned as prize.

The same is true of goods seized by persons holding letters of marque, and even of goods seized by persons having no authority whatever on behalf of the Crown, when the Crown subsequently ratifies the seizure. This is clear from the case of Brown and Burton v. Franklyn, quoted in Lord Mansfield's judgment above referred to. Brown and Burton, the masters of a vessel belonging to the East India Company, seized enemy goods on land. They had no letters of marque. The King's Proctor instituted proceedings in the Prize Court, and having obtained a condemnation of the property as prize, proceeded against Brown and Burton for an account. The latter instituted proceedings at common law for a prohibition on the ground that the goods taken were on land, but relief was refused. Moreover, Lord Mansfield, in Lindo v. Rodney (supra), expressly approves an admission made by counsel in that case to the effect that it would be "spinning very nicely" to contend that if the enemy left their ship and got on shore with money and were followed on land and stripped of their money this would not be a lawful maritime prize. If this be, as it seems to their Lordships to be, good law, the present is an a fortiori case. In the case put by counsel the landing of the goods was made by the enemy with the object of escaping capture afloat. In the present case such landing was by British subjects who had the enemy goods in their possession and did not know what else to do with them, and were pursuing a course recommended by the Board of Trade, and in no way intended to prejudice the Crown's rights.

With regard to the authorities quoted in this connection they have, in their Lordships' opinion, with one possible exception, no real bearing on the point. In The Hoffnung (No. 3), 1 Eng. Prize Cases, 585) the cargo seized on shore had been landed and sold prior to the declaration of war. These goods, therefore, even if enemy goods at all, were never liable to seizure as prize. They were not, in fact, seized, nor was any proceeding taken against them, but an attempt was made to recover against the ship which had brought them the value of the goods so sold, the ship itself belonging to a neutral. This claim was rejected by the court. It was held that unless it could be shown that the hand of capture had been employed on these goods in quality of cargo the court could not go back to affect them in any other character. The same principle was recognised in The Charlotte (1 Eng. Prize Cases 585 n.), in which it was held that the proceeds of goods landed and sold prior to the seizure of the ship, and never themselves seized, were not amenable to the jurisdiction of the court.

In Brown v. The United States (8 Cranch, 110) it was decided on the facts that the goods in question were in the position of enemy goods found on American soil at the commencement of hostilities, and not, therefore, the subject of maritime prize. That case, therefore, is clearly distinguishable from the present.

The only case which raises any difficulty is that of The Ooster Eems (sup.). There is no satisfactory report of this case. It is mentioned in the note on p. 284 of 1 C. Rob. and in the preface to Hay and Marriott's Decisions, p. 27. Their Lordships have, however, examined the papers relating to it preserved in the Record Office. The Ooster Eems was a Prussian and therefore a neutral vessel. It was stranded on the Goodwin Sands on a voyage from Texel to the East Indies. Before it broke up, part of its cargo was sent ashore, including some boxes of silver coin. The latter were deposited by the master with the Prussian Consul at Deal. One Jeremiah Hartley, an officer of the Court of Cinque Ports, acting under an order of attachment issued by such court sitting as an Admiralty Court, seized and obtained possession of the goods so landed, including the boxes of silver, on behalf of the Warden of the Cinque Ports. The seizure may have been intended to be a seizure of enemy goods as maritime prize, though their Lordships have been unable to ascertain that the Court of Cinque Ports had any jurisdiction in prize. The warden took no proceedings either in his own or any other court with a view to having the goods lawfully condemned. The master, therefore, obtained from the High Court of Admiralty in England a monition requiring Jeremiah Hartley and the warden and all others whom it might concern to appear and proceed to the legal adjudication in that court whether the goods seized were lawful prize or not. The King's Proctor subsequently intervened. Certain depositions were filed which appear to raise some suspicion that the goods were Dutch and therefore enemy goods, but there was no real evidence to that effect. The master deposed that he did not know to whom the goods belonged, and under these circumstances one would have expected that the court would have acted on the presumption arising from the fact that the ship was a neutral ship. The court, however, made an interlocutory decree condemning the goods on the ground that the goods which apparently were assumed to be enemy goods were not at the time of seizure "in a privileged vehicle or on neutral territory."

All questions between the Crown and the warden were reserved. The master appealed to the Lords Commissioners of Appeal in Prize, and on such appeal the order for condemnation was discharged, not on the merits, but, in the words of the Privy Council Journals, on the ground that "the High Court of Admiralty in England, the court appealed from, had not a jurisdiction over the goods seized and proceeded against in this cause."

The records of the Privy Council do not contain any note of the reasons which led to this decision. It would appear, however, from the case of the Two Friends (Roscoe, vol. 1, 130

1 Ch. Rob. 271) that Lord Stowell had before him some note of these reasons, for he represents Lord Thurlow as saying that "the goods in question had never been taken on the high seas, but had only passed in the way of civil bailment into civil hands, and were afterwards arrested as prize."

If this be correct, it may mean that in the opinion of the Lords Commissioners it is the local situation of the goods seized as prize, and not the seizure as prize which determines the jurisdiction of the Prize Court, a decision diametrically opposed to the judgment of Lord Mansfield in Lindo v. Rodney (sup.), which had been pronounced only three years previously. On the other hand, it may mean that the goods in question were not liable to seizure as prize because they were not on the high seas but on land, in which case Lord Thurlow was deciding the very point which he held the Court of Admiralty had no jurisdiction to decide, and he ought to have ordered the restitution of the goods to the master instead of leaving that somewhat hardly-used individual to his remedies at common law, in the assertion of which he would have in some way or other to get over Lord Mansfield's judgment to the effect that prize or no prize could only be determined in a Prize Court.

Moreover, it is almost impossible to suppose, in the then state of the authorities, that Lord Thurlow thought that to constitute lawful prize, the seizure must have been on the high seas. It was already well settled that enemy ships and goods in the ports or harbours of the realm were the subject of maritime prize. It was equally well settled that enemy goods on enemy territory seized by the maritime forces of the Crown, or persons having letters of marque, could properly be condemned as prize. If, therefore, he used the expressions attributed to him by Lord Stowell, some other explanation must be found.

In their Lordships' opinion a reasonable explanation of the case and of Lord Thurlow's words may be found in the following consideration. It appears that the Court of the Cinque Ports in its capacity as an Admiralty Court had taken possession of the goods at the instance of the Lord Warden. There was, therefore, a matter pending in the Cinque Ports which, so far as their Lordships can discover, was not a Court of Prize. The effect of the monition was to remove this matter to the High Court of Admiralty for trial there. In so trying it the High Court would be exercising an Admiralty and not a prize jurisdiction. As appears by Lord Mansfield's judgment in Lindo v. Rodney (supra), in order to found an Admiralty jurisdiction the complaint must be made of something done on the high seas. This explanation would fully account for the words used by Lord Thurlow, though it must be admitted that Lord Stowell took a different view as to what he meant.

In any event their Lordships do not consider that the Ooster Eems has any value as an authority. It has never been followed, and, apparently, has been cited twice only, and in each case distinguished. It is so cited and distinguished in the Two Friends above referred to and also in the Progress (Edwards's Admiralty Reports 210).

In the last-mentioned case certain British ships with their cargoes had been captured by the French. It is not clear whether they were captured at sea and taken into Oporto after the French occupation, or whether the French found them in the harbour of Oporto when they took possession of it. The French appear to have landed part of the cargoes, which was warehoused on shore at the time when the military forces of the Crown took Oporto. It was, however, held upon the facts that there had been a capture by the French and a recapture by the military forces of the Crown of both ships and cargoes.

Lord Stowell allowed a claim for salvage on the part of the military authorities in respect of that portion of the cargoes which had been landed as well as of the ships and that portion of the cargoes remaining on board. He distinguished the Ooster Eems on the ground, as their Lordships understand the decision, that the master of the Ooster Eems, in landing the goods, was acting within his authority derived from the owners of the goods, whereas the landing in the case he was considering had been effected by persons acting without authority from and contrary to the interests of the owners. The same ground of distinction would appear to be applicable to the case their Lordships are considering. The petroleum was not warehoused pursuant to any authority given by the owners, but in breach of the contract for its carriage to Hamburg, and so far as the owners were concerned this was as much a hostile act as the landing of the goods by the enemy captors in the case of the Progress (supra). In neither case, to use Lord Stowell's expression, was the continuity of the character of the goods landed as cargo in any way interrupted.

There are only two other cases which need to be referred to in this connection. The first is that of the Marie Anne, cited in Rothery's Prize Droits at p. 126. In this case, at the outbreak of the war with France on the 16th May 1803, the Marie Anne, a French ship, was under repair at Ramsgate, and certain parts of her cargo had been landed and were warehoused. Both the ship and the goods so landed were seized as prize, and in due course condemned as such. There is no record of the reasons which influenced the court. It may be that the warehouses in which the goods were deposited were considered as part of a harbour or port of the realm, so as to bring the case within the ordinary definition of goods liable to seizure as prize. It may be that the goods having been temporarily landed while the vessel was repaired, were still considered as part of the cargo though not actually on board. The case, however, is clearly inconsistent with the proposition that goods seized on land cannot be lawful prize. The same may be said of the case of the Berlin Johannes (Rothery, p. 125), if, as would appear to be the case, the goods already landed were seized and condemned as prize.

If these decisions turned on the question whether the goods so landed were still in port they are authorities against the appellants, for no valid distinction can be suggested between a warehouse for the receipt of goods brought into harbour by sea and the tanks in which, in the present case, the petroleum was stored.

Their Lordships, therefore, have come to the conclusion that the petroleum on board the Roumanian, having from the time of the declaration of the war onwards been liable to seizure as prize, did not cease to be so liable merely because the owners of the vessel, not being able to fulfil their contract for delivery at Hamburg, pumped it into the tanks of the British Petroleum Company, Limited, for safe custody, and that therefore its seizure as prize was lawful. They see no reason to dissent from the judgment of the President to the effect that these tanks constituted part of the Port of London for the purpose of applying the rule relating to the liability to seizure of enemy's goods in the ports and harbours of the realm, but it is unnecessary to decide this point.

For the reasons hereinbefore appearing their Lordships are of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed, and they will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

THE ODESSA.

THE WOOLSTON. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (IN PRIZE) ENGLAND.

Prize Court—Enemy cargoes—Cargo shipped in enemy ship—Cargo shipped in British ship—Neutral bankers advance against cargoes—Rights as pledgees under bills of lading—Seizure and condemnation—Bounty of Crown—Civil List Acts.

Enemy goods on board both British ships at the commencement of hostilities are alike the proper subject of maritime prize.

If the legal property in goods captured at sea on a ship, whether British or enemy, is at the time of the capture in an enemy subject, such goods are lawful prize and will be condemned in spite of any claim made by persons who assert that they are pledgees or are otherwise entitled to any rights in them. The Prize Court cannot recognise the claim of pledgees in such circumstances in any shape or form.

The power of bounty by way of redress of hardships still exists in the Crown, and has not been affected by the Civil Lists Acts.

Decision of Evans, P. (reported in the case of The Odessa, 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 27; 112 L. T. Rep. 473; (1915) P. 52, which decision was followed by the learned judge in the case of the Woolston) affirmed.

CONSOLIDATED appeals from two decrees of the President (Sir Samuel Evans) sitting as judge of the Prize Court, that as to the Odessa being reported 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 27; 112 L. T. Rep. 473; (1915) P. 52.

Cargoes of nitrate of soda were sold by neutrals in Chili to a German company carrying on business at Hamburg. They were shipped before the outbreak of the war at Valparaiso in the German vessel Odessa and in the British vessel Woolston.

(a) Reported by W. E. REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The appellants, J. Henry Schroeder and Co., of Leadenhall-street, London, a firm of which Baron von Schröder, a naturalised subject of this kingdom, and Frank C. Tiarks, a British born subject, were partners, accepted bills of lading in favour of the sellers against the cargoes respectively, and at the date of their claim had paid or were liable to pay large sums thereunder.

In the case of each vessel the bill of lading made the cargo deliverable to the appellants or their assigns. By the respective bills of lading the Odessa was "bound for Channel for orders" and the Woolston for "Las Palmas for orders."

After the outbreak of war the Odessa and her cargo were captured at sea, and the cargo on the Woolston was seized at Liverpool, to which port she had been directed to go by the appellants. The claimants in both cases sought to assert their rights to the cargoes as pledgees.

The learned President in his considered judgment, dated the 21st Dec. 1914, rejected the claims of the claimants and condemned the cargo ex Odessa as lawful prize, and following that decision he on the 16th March 1915 condemned the cargo ex Woolston.

The claimants appealed.

Sir Robert Finlay, K.C., Mackinnon, K.C., and Dunlop for the appellants.

Sir Edward Carson (A.-G.), Maurice Hill, K.C., Theobald Mathew, and T. H. T. Case for the respondent.

The considered opinion of the committee, in which all the material facts are fully set out, was delivered by Lord MERSEY.—These are appeals from two judgments of the President of the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice sitting in Prize.

There is very much in common in the points arising in both cases, but, as the facts and arguments are not identical, it is desirable to consider each case separately.

THE CARGO ex ODESSA.

The facts in this case are as follows: The appellants, Messrs. J. H. Schroeder and Co., are bankers carrying on business in London. The partners are Baron Bruno von Schroeder, a naturalised British subject, and Frank Tiarks, a natural-born British subject. In the ordinary course of their business, the appellants had in March 1914 agreed with a German Company in Hamburg called the Rhederei Actien Gesellschaft von 1896 to accept the drafts of Weber and Co., a firm carrying on its business in Chili, for the price of a quantity of nitrate of soda to be sold and shipped by Weber and Co., to the German Company.

The drafts were to be drawn at ninety days' sight, and the appellants, upon acceptance of them, were to receive by way of security the bill of lading for the cargo, together with a policy of marine insurance. The consideration for this accommodation was to be a commission of one quarter per cent. payable by the German company to the appellants. In due course Weber and Co. shipped a cargo of nitrate on board a sailing ship called the Odessa, belonging to the German company, and took from the captain a bill of lading dated the 8th May 1914, in which the voyage was described as from Mejillones (the port of shipment in Chili) to the "Channel for orders," and by which the cargo was made deliverable to the appellants or their assigns. This bill of lading incorporated the terms of a charter-party (of which there is no copy), and made the chartered freight payable by the consignees upon delivery of the cargo. Drafts for a total amount of 41,153*l.* 1*s.* 5*d.* (said to be the full price of the cargo) were drawn by Weber and Co. upon the appellants, and accepted by them on the 9th June 1914, they receiving in exchange the bill of lading. War broke out between Great Britain and Germany on the 4th Aug. 1914, the Odessa being then on her voyage to the Channel. On the 19th the ship was captured on the high seas by H.M.S. Caronia and brought into Bantry Bay, and on the 31st a writ was issued against ship and cargo at the suit of the Procurator-General claiming condemnation of both as lawful prize. On the 10th Sept. the drafts of Weber & Co. fell due, and were paid by the appellants. The ship was duly condemned, and no question arises with reference to her condemnation, but in respect of the cargo the appellants intervened, and by their claim alleged it to be their property as holders, for full value of the bill of lading therefor and as British property not liable to condemnation. The case was heard by the learned President on the 7th and 14th Dec. 1914, with the result that he condemned the cargo on the ground that the general property was in the German company at the date of the seizure, and that the appellants were merely pledgees, and as such not entitled to any precedence over the Crown.

Their Lordships are of opinion that the learned president was right in the inferences which he drew from the facts—namely, that the general property in the cargo was in the German company, and that the appellants were merely pledgees thereof at the date of the seizure. This indeed is hardly disputable, having regard to the case of Sewell v. Burdick (52 L. T. Rep. 445; 10 App. Cas. 74). The property vested in the company upon the ascertainment of the goods at Mejillones, and the pledge was perfected when the appellants accepted the drafts and received the bill of lading.

The appellants indeed did not dispute the correctness of these inferences, but what they say is this, though correct, they do not justify a decree which has the effect of forfeiting their rights as pledgees. Thus the question in the appeal is whether in case of a pledge such as existed here a Court of Prize ought to condemn the cargo, and, if so, whether it should direct the appellants' claim to be paid out of the proceeds to arise from the sale thereof.

It is worth while to recall generally the principles which have hitherto guided British Courts of Prize in dealing with a claim by a captor for condemnation. All civilised nations up to the present time have recognised the right of a belligerent to seize with a view to condemnation by a competent Court of Prize enemy ships found on the high seas or in the belligerents' territorial waters and enemy cargoes. But such seizure does not, according to British prize law, affect the ownership of the thing seized. Before that can happen the thing seized, be it ship or goods, must be brought into the possession of a lawfully constituted Court of Prize, and the captor must then ask for and obtain its condemnation as prize. The suit may be initiated by the representative of the capturing State, in this country by the Procurator-General. It is a suit in rem, and the function of the court is to inquire into the national character of the thing seized. If it is found to be of enemy character the duty of the court is to condemn it, if not, then to restore it to those entitled to its possession. The question of national character is made to depend upon the ownership at the date of seizure, and is to be determined by evidence. The effect of a condemnation is to divest the enemy subject of his ownership as from the date of the seizure, and to transfer it as from that date to the Sovereign or to his grantees. The thing—the res—is then his for him to deal with as he thinks fit, and the proceeding is at an end.

As the right to seize is universally recognised so also is the title which the judgment of the court creates. The judgment is of international force, and it is because of this circumstance that Courts of Prize have always been guided by general principles of law capable of universal acceptance rather than by considerations of special rules of municipal law. Thus it has come about that in determining the national character of the thing seized, the courts in this country have taken ownership as the criterion, meaning by ownership the property or dominium as opposed to any special rights created by contracts or dealings between individuals, without considering whether these special rights are or are not, according to the municipal law applicable to the case, proprietary rights or otherwise. The rule by which ownership is taken as the criterion is not a mere rule of practice or convenience; it is not a rule of thumb. It lays down a test capable of universal application, and therefore peculiarly appropriate to questions with which a Court of Prize has to deal. It is a rule not complicated by considerations of the effect of the numerous interests which under different systems of jurisprudence may be acquired by individuals either in or in relation to chattels. All the world knows what ownership is, and that it is not lost by the creation of a security upon the thing owned. If in each case the Court of Prize had to investigate the municipal law of a foreign country in order to ascertain the various rights and interests of everyone who might claim to be directly or indirectly interested in the vessel or goods seized, and if in addition it had to investigate the particular facts of each case (as to which it would have few, if any, means of learning the truth), the court would be subject to a burthen which it could not well discharge.

There is a further reason for the adoption of the rule. If special rights of property created by the enemy owner were recognised in a Court of Prize, it would be easy for such owner to protect his own interests upon shipment of the goods to or from the ports of his own country. He might, for example, in every case borrow on the security of the goods an amount approximating to their value from a neutral lender and create in favour of such lender a charge or lien or mortgage on the goods in question. He would thus stand to lose nothing in the transaction, for the proceeds of the goods if captured would, if recovered by the lender, have to be applied by him in discharge of his debt. Again, if a neutral pledgee were allowed to use the Prize Court as a means of obtaining payment of his debt instead of being left to recover it in the enemy's courts the door would be opened to the enemy for obtaining fresh banking credit for his trade, to the great injury of the captor belligerent.

Acting upon the principle of this rule Courts of Prize in this country have from before the days of Lord Stowell refused to recognise or give effect to any right in the nature of a "special" property or interest or any mortgage or contractual lien created by the enemy whose vessel or goods have been seized. Liens arising otherwise than by contract stand on a different footing and involve different considerations; but even as to these it is doubtful whether the court will give effect to them. Where the goods have been increased in value by the services which give rise to the possessory lien, it appears to have been the practice of the court to make an equitable allowance to the national or neutral lienholder in respect of such services. In the judgment in The Frances (8 Cranch, at p. 419), speaking of freight, it is said: "On the one hand the captor by stepping into the shoes of the enemy owner of the goods is personally benefited by the labour of a friend and ought in justice to make him proper compensation, and on the other, the shipowner by not having carried the goods to the place of their destination, and this in consequence of the act of the captor, would be totally without remedy to recover his freight against the owner of the goods."

It is, however, unnecessary to deal with the question of liens arising apart from contract, the present case being one of pledge founded on a contract made with the enemy.

When the authorities are examined it will be found that they bear out the view that enemy ownership is the true criterion of the liability to condemnation. The case of The Tobago (Roscoe, vol. 1, 456; 5 Ch. Rob. 218) is in point. There the claimant was a British subject. In time of peace he had honestly advanced money to a French shipowner to enable the latter to repair his ship which was disabled, and by way of security he had taken from the owner a bottomry bond. Afterwards war broke out with France and the vessel was captured. In the proceedings in the Prize Court for condemnation, the holder of the bottomry bond asked that his security might be protected, but Lord Stowell (then Sir William Scott), after observing that the contract of bottomry was one which the Admiralty Court regarded with great attention and tenderness, went on to ask: "But can the court recognise bonds of this kind as titles of property so as to give persons a right to stand in judgment and demand restitution of such interests in a Court of Prize?" and he states that it had never been the practice to do so. He points out that a bottomry bond works no change of property in the vessel, and says: "If there is no change of property there can be no change of national character. Those lending money on such security take this security subject to all the chances incident to it, and, amongst the rest, the chances of war."

The decision in The Mary (9 Cranch, 147) is to the same effect. Similarly in The Aina (1 Spink's Prize Cases, 8) the court refused to recognise or give effect to a mortgage on the ship captured, and the same point arose and was similarly decided in The Hampton (5 Wall. 372). Again, in The Battle (6 Wall. 498) the court refused to recognise a maritime lien for necessaries, a decision which was followed in The Rossia (2 Russian and Japanese Prize Cases, 43). The Ariel (11 Moo. P. C., cap. 119) was the converse case of an attempt to obtain condemnation, not of enemy goods, but an enemy lien on goods; it failed on the same principle. In that case Sir John Patteson said: "Liens, whether in favour of a neutral on an enemy's ship, or in favour of an enemy on a neutral ship, are equally to be disregarded in a Court of Prize."

All these cases were fully discussed by the President in The Marie Glaeser (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 601; 112 L. T. Rep. 251; (1914) P. 218).

Passing to cases which in their circumstances more resemble the present case, there is The Marianna (6 C. Rob. 24), in which the court refused to give effect to a contract of pledge on goods consigned to the agent of the pledgee. Sir W. Scott in that case says: "Captors are supposed to lay their hands on the gross tangible property on which there may be many just claims outstanding between other parties which can have no operation as to them. If such a rule did not exist it would be quite impossible for captors to know upon what grounds they were proceeding to make seizure. . . . The doctrine of liens depends very much on the particular rules of jurisprudence which prevail in different countries. To decide judicially on such claims would require of the court a perfect knowledge of the law of covenant and the application of that law in all countries under all the diversities in which that law exists. From necessity, therefore, the court would be obliged to shut the door against such discussions and to decide on the simple title of property with scarcely any exceptions."

There is The Frances (8 Cranch, 418), in which the Court refused to recognise or give effect to the rights of a consignee under the bill of lading for advances against the goods to which the bill of lading related. In that case the court laid it down that "in cases of liens created by the mere private contract of individuals, depending upon the different laws of different countries, the difficulties which an examination of such claims would impose upon the captors and even upon the Prize Courts in deciding upon them and the door which such a doctrine would open to collusion between the enemy owners of the property and neutral claimants have excluded such cases from the consideration of those courts.

There is another American case, The Carlos F. Roses (177 U. S. Rep. 655) in, which the claim put forward by a neutral who had advanced money upon a cargo on a captured ship and who had received bills of lading covering the shipment was rejected.

It is difficult to distinguish the facts in any of the three cases last mentioned from the facts of the present claim by Messrs. Schroeder and Co. Some stress was laid by the appellants upon the dissenting judgments in The Carlos F. Roses, but a perusal of these judgments will show that they proceeded upon the assumption that in the circumstances the general property in the goods had passed to the holder of the bills of lading. The case was decided before the judgment in Sewell v. Burdick (sup.). Finally, The Hampton (5 Wallace, p. 372) is a case in which the claim of a mortgagee on a ship was rejected.

Before adverting to the arguments by which the appellants seek to displace this weight of authority it is necessary to deal with a contention put forward by them to the effect that by their title as pledgees they are clothed with a sufficient ownership to bring their case within the rule. This contention is based upon the right of sale accorded to a pledgee by the law of England by which in the event of default by the pledgor in payment of his debt, the pledgee can sell the pledge without first having recourse to a court of law for authority to do so. This right it is said creates a "special" property in the pledge in favour of the pledgee and is a right in re constituting or equivalent to ownership and distinguishable in character from the mere right in rem possessed by a lien holder. It is first to be observed of this right to sell without recourse to a court of law that it is peculiar to the English law of pledge. It is thus precisely one of those matters which a Prize Court should leave out of consideration when applying to its decision general principles common to all systems of law to the exclusion of principles of municipal law.

The subject was very fully examined by Chancellor Kent in Lord Stowell's time in 1805, in a learned judgment declaring the decision of the Supreme Court of the State of New York (Cortelyou v. Lansing, 2 Cairnes' Cases in Error, p. 202). He said: "I believe that there is no country at present, unless it be England, that allows a pledge to be sold but in pursuance of a judicial sentence."

And secondly it is to be observed that if the right clothes the pledgees with ownership it precludes the court from making any decree at all of condemnation.

The ownership by which a Court of Prize is guided cannot subsist both in the pledgees and in the pledgors.

If it exists in the appellants in the present case no decree can be made against them, for they are British subjects, and the interest left in the enemy subject cannot be condemned for ex hypothesi it is not an interest which includes ownership. See The Ariel (11 Moo. P. C. 119), in which it was laid down that as a Court of Prize ignores a lien in favour of a neutral on an enemy's ship, so will it ignore a lien in favour of an enemy on a neutral ship.

But when the nature of the right of a pledgee to sell is examined it will be seen that the so-called "special" property which it is said to create is in truth no property at all. This has been recognised by many judges who have used the expression "special interest" as a substitute for "special property": (see Moses v. Conham, Owen 123, 7 Jac. 1, and Donald v. Suckling, 14 L. T. Rep. 772; L. Rep. 1 Q. B., at p. 613).

If it were not for the somewhat unfortunate peculiarity of English terminology involved in the established use of the words "special property" when "special interest" would seem better, it is difficult to see how an argument could be maintained which would effectively distinguish pledge from lien for present purposes.

The very expression "special property" seems to exclude the notion of that general property which is the badge of ownership. If the pledgee sells he does so by virtue and to the extent of the pledgor's ownership, and not with a new title of his own. He must appropriate the proceeds of the sale to the payment of the pledgor's debt, for the money resulting from the sale is the pledgor's money to be so applied. The pledgee must account to the pledgor for any surplus after paying the debt. He must take care that the sale is a provident sale, and if the goods are in bulk he must not sell more than is reasonably sufficient to pay off the debt, for he only holds possession for the purpose of securing himself the advance which he has made. He cannot use the goods as his own. These considerations show that the right of sale is exerciseable by virtue of an implied authority from the pledgor and for the benefit of both parties. It creates no jus in re in favour of the pledgee; it gives him no more than a jus in rem such as a lien holder possesses, but with this added incident that he can sell the property motu proprio and without any assistance from the court.

Returning to the authorities the appellants attempt to displace them in the following way. They say, in the first place, that Lord Stowell in The Tobago was referring only to "secret" liens, which they interpret to mean liens not appearing on the ship's papers, and they contend that theirs was not secret, for that it appears on the ship's papers—namely, on the face of the bills of lading. But when the judgment in The Tobago is examined it will be found that Lord Stowell used the term "secret liens" as equivalent to liens created by the act of the parties as opposed to those arising under the general law merchant. Further, it cannot in the present case be said with any truth that Messrs. Schroeder's lien is disclosed on the ship's papers. It is true that the bill of lading was made out in favour of them or their assigns, but this is quite consistent with their having no charge at all, and the consignment having been made to them merely as the factors or agents of the enemy owner. The contract of pledge under which alone their claim arises, however probable in the ordinary course of commerce, is nowhere disclosed in the ship's papers. Again, such as it was, the disclosure was certainly no more than existed in the cases of The Marianna, The Frances, and The Carlos F. Roses.

Secondly, the appellants contend that being by virtue of the bill of lading in possession of the goods in question there can be no reason in principle why the court should not recognise an interest arising out of such possession just as it recognises the carrier's possessory lien for freight. But such possession as the appellants had is not an actual possession such as forms the basis of a possessory lien at common law, but merely such possession as according to the law relating to pledge arises out of constructive or symbolical delivery. There is not, to use the words of Lord Stowell in The Tobago (sup.), that "interest directly and visibly residing in the substance of the thing itself" which is to be found in the actual possession held by a carrier. Further, it will be found that a possession, similar in character to that which Messrs. Schroeder had, existed in several of the cases already referred to on the part of lien holders whose claims were rejected by the court.

Thirdly, the court was asked to accept the suggestion that the practice of making advances on the security of bills of lading had arisen after the decisions referred to had been pronounced and that in the interest of commerce the adverse decisions should now be disregarded. With regard to this argument, it is to be observed that at any rate The Carlos F. Roses was decided at a time when the practice referred to was well known, and although the decision cannot bind an English court, still the considered judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States is entitled to the greatest possible weight. Further, it is difficult to see how any change—if there has been any change—in commercial practice—invalidates the reasons which led to the decisions in question.

Lastly, the appellants urged that if the court now applies the principles illustrated by the cases above referred to very serious injustice will be done to and serious loss incurred by neutrals or subjects who, before the commencement of the war and in the normal course of business, have made advances against bills of lading. It is to be observed that similar injustice and loss, though possibly on a less extensive scale, must have been occasioned by the application of the same rules in the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, and similar arguments were in fact addressed to Lord Stowell as a reason why they should not be applied in individual cases. The reason why such arguments cannot be sustained is fairly obvious. War must in its very nature work hardship to individuals, and in laying down rules to be applied internationally to circumstances arising out of a state of war it would be impossible to avoid it. All that can be done is to lay down rules which, if applied generally by civilised nations, will, without interfering with the belligerent right of capture, avoid as far as may be any loss to innocent parties. It is precisely because the recognition of liens or other rights arising out of private contracts would so seriously interfere with the belligerent right of capture that the courts have refused to recognise such liens or rights in spite of the hardship which might be occasioned to individuals from such want of recognition. It is said that in Lord Stowell's time there was a possibility of redressing any individual hardship which might be caused to neutral or subject by an appeal to the bounty of the Crown, and that in some way or other the Crown has lost its power of bounty in the matter. It is true that Lord Stowell, when pressed with the individual hardship of decisions he was about to pronounce, sometimes referred to the fact that any apparent injustice might be met by an exercise of the Crown's bounty. See The Belvidere (1 Dods. 353) and The Constantia Harlessen (Edward's Adm. 232).

Whether his judgments were in any way based on that consideration or whether they would not have been the same if the possibility of the exercise of the Crown's bounty had not existed is an arguable point.

In their Lordships opinion, however, it is unnecessary to decide this point, for after hearing the Attorney-General they have come to the conclusion not only that the Crown had and was accustomed to exercise a power of bounty by way of redress of hardships, but that such power still exists unimpaired.

Perhaps the most notable instance of the exercise of such power was the Order in Council made at the commencement of the war with Denmark in 1807. It was thereby ordered that in case any advances should have been made before the then late embargo (viz., the 2nd Sept. then last passed) by any British subject upon the credit and security of any ship, freight, or goods belonging to Danish subjects which might be condemned as prize to His Majesty, the amount of such advances so actually made (but without further compensation) should be paid to the British subjects out of the proceeds of the property so condemned upon the credit of which the advances were respectively made upon due proof thereof to the satisfaction of the High Court of Admiralty.

If the Crown could order this generally, it must also have had the power to order it in particular instances. Further, if it could make such an order in favour of British subjects, it must also have had the power to make it in favour of neutrals, and circumstances can easily be imagined in which the exercise of such a power in favour of neutrals might as a matter of policy be deemed desirable.

If the Crown had and was accustomed to exercise the power of redressing hardship by way of bounty such right must still exist unless taken away by Act of Parliament, and it must be remembered that the Crown's prerogative can only be abridged by express words or necessary implication. The argument of the Attorney-General to the effect that the power in question has ceased to exist is solely based on the effect to be given to the statutes which have been from time to time passed in reference to the Civil List. The first Civil List Act which affects droits of Admiralty and droits of the Crown is the Act of 1 Geo. 4, c. 1. By sect. 2 of this Act the produce of certain Crown revenues (which did not include droits of Admiralty or droits of the Crown or other small casual revenues) were for the life of King George IV. carried to the Consolidated Fund. It was provided that an account of all moneys to be received in respect of the casual revenues of the Crown including droits of Admiralty and droits of the Crown and of the application thereof should annually be laid before Parliament. By sect. 2 of 1 Will. 4, c. 25, the casual revenues of the Crown including droits of Admiralty and droits of the Crown were treated in the same way as the other hereditary revenues and carried during the life of King William IV. to the Consolidated Fund, it being provided that all such revenues should after his death be payable to his heirs and successors. The 12th section of this Act provides that nothing therein contained should impair or prejudice any rights or powers of control, management, or direction relative to (inter alia) the granting of any droits of Admiralty or any droits of the Crown as a reward or remuneration to any officer or officers or other person or persons seizing or taking the same or giving any information relating thereto, it being the true intent and meaning of the Act that the said rights and powers should not in any degree be prejudiced in any manner but only that the moneys accruing to the Crown after the full and free exercise and enjoyment of the said rights and powers should during His Majesty's life be carried to the Consolidated Fund. It was obviously the intention of this clause that the Crown's right of making grants out of droits of Admiralty and droits of the Crown in favour of captors or persons giving information leading to the capture should be preserved, but nothing being expressly said as to making grants in order to redress hardships, it is arguable that on the principle of expressio unius est exclusio alterius the Crown's right in this respect was intended to be taken away. Further, the same argument is open upon the construction of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 2, which in effect re-enacts the Act of 1 Will. 4, c. 25 during the reign of Queen Victoria. It is unnecessary actually to decide the point and their Lordships will assume for the purpose of this case that during the reigns of King William IV. and Queen Victoria the right of the Crown in respect of Admiralty droits and droits of the Crown was confined to rewarding captors and persons giving information leading to the capture. It seems clear, however, that on the death of Queen Victoria her successor, King Edward VII., became entitled to droits of Admiralty and droits of the Crown to the same extent as if there had never been a surrender in favour of the Consolidated Fund. In other words, any restriction created during the lives of King William IV. and Queen Victoria ceased to apply. If, therefore, the ancient right of the Crown to dispose of these droits is now curtailed it must be by virtue of some statute passed subsequently to the death of Queen Victoria. In other words, it must be by virtue of the Civil Lists Acts 1 Edw. 7, c. 4, and 1 Geo. 5, c. 28.

By 1 Edw. 7, c. 4, s. 1, it is provided that the hereditary revenues which were by sect. 2 of 1 & 2 Vict. c. 2 directed to be carried to and made part of the Consolidated Fund should, during the life of King Edward VII. and six months afterwards, be paid into the Exchequer and made part of the Consolidated Fund. By sect. 9 (2) it is provided that nothing in the Act contained should affect any rights or powers for the time being exercisable with respect to any of the hereditary revenues which were by the Act directed to be paid into the Exchequer, and by sub-sect. 3 of the same section the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 2 was with immaterial exceptions repealed. The Act of 1 Geo. 5, c. 23 re-enacts in the same terms the Act of 1 Edw. 7, c. 4, for the life of his present Majesty and six months afterwards.

The question therefore is as to the meaning and effect of the reservation contained in the two last-mentioned Acts of the rights and powers of the Crown for the time being exercisable. It should be noticed, in contrast to the Acts of 1 Wil. 4, c. 25 and 1 & 2 Vict. c. 2, that the reservation is not specific but general in its terms. It should be noticed also that it is not a reservation of rights and powers which were or might have been exercised by some former Sovereign or Sovereigns (the form of reservation in some of the earlier Civil Lists Acts), but a reservation of rights and powers "for the time being" exercisable. This must mean powers which have not at the date of their proposed exercise been taken away by Act of Parliament. To acertain the nature of the rights and powers intended to be reserved it is permissible to consider the object for which the Acts themselves and the earlier Acts hereinbefore mentioned were passed.

The objects of each of these Acts is a surrender by the Crown of its hereditary revenues in consideration of a fixed grant from Parliament. Each Act has been intended to carry to the Consolidated Fund revenue which would otherwise have gone to the Sovereign, and not revenue which because of the exercise of some right or power in the Crown would never have gone to the Sovereign at all. This object was in the Acts of George IV., William IV. and Victoria sought to be obtained by a specific enumeration of the rights reserved. In the Acts of Edward VII. and George V. it is sought to be attained by a general reservation of all rights. It could hardly be contended that the rights and powers expressly reserved in the earlier Acts are not included in the general reservation contained in the latter Acts. If such a contention were well founded, the Crown would have lost many rights, the existence of which is of great importance in the public interest. It would have lost, for instance, the right to make grants to the natural children of a bastard intestate or to reward captors or persons giving information leading to the capture of enemy goods. It is of equal importance in the public interest, and indeed of friendly relations with neutral powers, that the Crown should retain the power of making in the interests either of British subjects or of neutrals such an Order in Council as was done at the outbreak of the Danish war in 1807. The only distinction is that no such power was expressly reserved in the earlier Civil List Acts. It is in their Lordships' opinion much more reasonable to suppose that the general words were used to cover such a case than to confine the words themselves, in spite of their generality, to rights and powers expressly reserved by the earlier Acts. If the words of reservation now in force are sufficient to cover a right of so important and useful a nature, it would, in their Lordships' opinion, be wrong to hold that it had been destroyed merely because it had ceased to be exercisable during the reigns of King William IV. and Queen Victoria. Their Lordships therefore hold that the power in question still exists. They desire, however, to state that they express no opinion as to whether the present case is one in which the power ought to be exercised.

There were two other points suggested in argument which deserve some consideration. First it was said that the difficulty of recognising liens on captured enemy goods might be less in the case of a lien holder being a subject than in the case of his being a neutral. In the case of a neutral it is obvious that the payment of the lien out of the proceeds of a sale of the goods would enure directly to the benefit of the enemy. The enemy debt would thus be paid at the expense of the captors instead of the neutral being left to recover it in the enemy courts. A right of capture at sea would thus be deprived of its national advantage. On the other hand, if the lien holder be a subject his right of proceeding in the enemy courts is, if not lost, at any rate suspended by the existence of a state of war. If the right be lost the recognition of the lien would not, it is said, enure to the advantage of the alien enemy but merely to one of His Majesty's subjects. If the right be merely suspended it could not enure to the advantage of the alien enemy, at any rate until after the war, and the court it is said should only consider the existing state of war and not be guided by what will happen when the war is over. There may be some force in these considerations, but, on the other hand, it is to be remembered that by international comity the Courts of Prize in this country have, in general, extended to neutrals the same advantages as they afford to His Majesty's subjects, and it would be difficult to make an exception. Moreover, both in the case of a neutral and of a subject the lien holder may have in his hands assets belonging to the enemy to which he can have recourse for the payment of his debt; and into such a matter the courts have no means of inquiring.

The second suggestion does not involve the same difficulty. It is that the rules laid down in the cases referred to should be confined to transactions originating during the war, and that liens created bonâ fide before the war began might well be recognised whether held by subjects or neutrals. There is, however, no authority for such a distinction; indeed, authority is the other way: (see The Tobago, ubi sup.).

Neither of the above suggestions was seriously pressed on their Lordships, nor could either of them be accepted.

For the foregoing reasons their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed.

THE CARGO ex WOOLSTON.

The above judgment in the case of the cargo ex Odessa applies equally in the case of the cargo ex Woolston. The only difference between the two cases is that the Odessa was an enemy ship and the Woolston was a British ship. Their Lordships are of opinion that enemy goods on board both British ships at the commencement of hostilities are alike the proper subject of maritime prize. The point has been more fully dealt with in the judgment in the case of The Roumanian (ante, p. 208). The fact that the Woolston was a British ship can therefore have no importance unless it be necessary for the court to act upon some presumption arising from the character of the ship. It is unnecessary to act on any such presumption where, as in the present case, the whole facts are in evidence and the enemy character of the cargo is fully established.

In this case, also, their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Nov. 4 and 5, 1915.

(Before SWINFEN EADY, PHILLIMORE, and PICKFORD, L.JJ.)

THAMES AND MERSEY MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY LIMITED v. BRITISH AND CHILIAN STEAMSHIP COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Marine insurance — Policy — Valued policy — Total loss—Subrogation—Right of paying underwriters to be subrogated.

The plaintiffs insured the defendants' ship H. for one year from the 20th May 1912 for 45,000*l. against ordinary sea perils by a policy dated the 6th June* 1912 in which the H. was valued at 45,000*l. During the currency of the policy the* H. came into collision with the E. and was totally lost. A collision action was brought by the shipowners, and both vessels were held to blame and the blame was apportioned, the owners of the H. having to pay seven-twelfths and the owners of the E. five-twelfths of the damage. The registrar of the Admiralty Court took the value of the ship as at the 15th Nov. 1912, the end of the current season, and fixed it at 65,000*l. He took the loss of hire up to the same date and assessed it at* 2000*l.*

The shipowners appealed, and the President held that the value of the ship should be taken in Nov. 1917, and the hire assessed to that date, which was the date of the expiry of the charter-party under which the H. was chartered, and remitted the report to the registrar for reconsideration of the figures on that basis.

On coming before the registrar the parties compromised, and agreed on a lump sum of 67,000*l. for the two items under consideration, being the same total as the registrar had awarded without apportioning it. The owners of the* E. had no interest in the apportionment. Five-twelfths of the 67,000*l. was accordingly paid, being some* 26,900*l. The underwriters, who had paid for a total loss of the* H., then claimed to be subrogated to the payment received for the loss of that ship from the owners of the E.

Held, that the underwriters were entitled to recover to the extent to which they had paid in respect of the subject-matter insured any sum which the defendants had received in respect of the loss of the same subject-matter, although that sum was based on a larger value than the insured value.

Decision of Scrutton, J. (113 L. T. Rep. 173; (1915) 2 K. B. 214) affirmed.

APPEAL by the defendants from a decision of Scrutton, J. in an action tried by him without a jury, reported 113 L. T. Rep. 173; (1915) 2 K. B. 214. The plaintiffs' claim was for a sum of money which they alleged was due to them by virtue of a right of subrogation to the defendants in respect of what the defendants had received in respect of the loss of a vessel.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the judgments.

(a) Reported by EDWARD J. M. CHAPLIN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Scrutton, J. held (1) that the underwriters were entitled to recover to the extent to which they had paid in respect of the subject-matter insured any sums which the defendants had received in respect of the loss of the same subject-matter, although that sum was based on a larger value than the insured value; and (2) that, as the underwriters only insured the ship for one year, they were not concerned with the value of the ship in 1917, and that, as on the evidence the value of the ship at the time of the loss must be taken to be 65,000*l.*, in respect of which the defendants had received from the owners of the E. 26,900*l.*, the underwriters were entitled to be subrogated to the defendants to the full amount of 26,900*l.*, and to recover from the defendants the difference between that sum and the amount payable under the running-down clause, and judgment was accordingly given for the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

Leslie Scott, K.C. and Raeburn for the appellants.

Maurice Hill, K.C. and D. Stephens for the respondents.

Swinfen Eady, L.J.—This is an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Scrutton, J. at the trial of an action in which the Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company were plaintiffs and the British and Chilian Steamship Company Limited were the defendants. The facts out of which the present action arises are shortly these: The plaintiffs under a valued policy insured the ship for the sum of 45,000*l.* The ship was under charter to the Dominion Coal Company for a period of seven St. Lawrence seasons, commencing with the spring of 1911 and expiring, therefore, in 1917.

There was a collision between the steamship Helvetia, the subject of the insurance, and the Empress of Britain, with the result that the Helvetia was sunk, and the plaintiffs have paid as for a total loss 45,000*l.* Proceedings were taken in the Admiralty Court to determine the responsibility for the collision, and the result of the proceedings was that both vessels were pronounced to blame, and the share of the loss to be paid by the Empress of Britain was fixed at five twelfths. Under the collision clause the plaintiffs are liable in respect of the loss and damage arising from the collision to pay a sum of 19,660*l.* In the proceedings taken to ascertain the amount payable by the Empress of Britain an inquiry was directed, and in the first instance the registrar reported purporting to follow the case of The Racine (95 L. T. Rep. 597; 10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 300; (1906) P. 273), and he took the value of the ship as at the 15th Nov. 1912, which was not the date of the collision, but the end of the current season, and he fixed it at 65,000*l.*, and he took the loss of hire up to the same date and assessed that at 2000*l.* There was an appeal from that. The shipowners appealed, and the matter came before the President, and he held that on the true effect of the Racine the value of the ship should be taken as at November, when the charter would expire, and that the hire should be assessed to that date, and accordingly he remitted the report to the registrar to reconsider the matter upon that basis. The parties then went again before the registrar, and the result was that the parties, then being the Helvetia on the one side and the Empress of Britain on the other, agreed upon a lump sum of 67,000*l.* without dividing the amount as between ship and charter. For five-twelfths of that sum the Empress of Britain was held to be liable, and she has paid a sum of, roughly, 26,900*l.* The present action is brought by the underwriters claiming to be subrogated to the position of the shipowners in regard to the sum recovered in respect of the ship and to obtain payment of the amount.

The first question which was raised in the action and which has been raised before us on this appeal is, what is the right of the underwriters, the plaintiffs, to recover in respect of that amount? The whole of the insured value being covered by insurance, the claim of the plaintiffs is to recover from the defendants the whole of the amount recovered by them in the collision action up to 45,000*l.*, the amount of the policy; on the other hand, the defendants have contended that by the decree of the Admiralty Division they were held entitled to recover in the collision action five-twelfths of their loss, and they say that as between the plaintiffs and the defendants that loss must be treated as 45,000*l.*, and that it is to their rights in that respect that the plaintiffs are subrogated, and that they are consequently entitled only to recover five-twelfths of 45,000*l.* Scrutton, J. decided in favour of the plaintiffs on that point. He held that the underwriters were entitled to recover to the extent to which they paid in respect of the subject-matter insured any sum which the shipowners had received in respect of the loss, although that sum was based on a larger value than the insured value. By sect. 27 of the Marine Insurance Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 41) it is provided that: "(1) A policy may be either valued or unvalued. (2) A valued policy is a policy which specifies the agreed value of the subject-matter insured. (3) Subject to the provisions of this Act, and in the absence of fraud, the value fixed by the policy is, as between the insurer and the assured, conclusive of the insurable value of the subject intended to be insured, whether the loss be total or partial." By sect. 79 it is provided: "(1) Where the insurer pays for a total loss, either of the whole, or, in the case of goods, of any apportionable part, of the subject-matter insured" (here the insurer has paid for a total loss of the ship) "he thereupon becomes entitled to take over the interest of the assured in whatever may remain of the subject-matter so paid for, and he is thereby subrogated to all the rights and remedies of the assured in and in respect of that subject-matter as from the time of the casualty causing the loss." Now, what the underwriters here are really saying is this: that, according to the true construction of the statute, they are entitled to be subrogated to all the rights and remedies of the assured in and in respect of the subject-matter of the ship, and not to part of it only. In my opinion the Act embodies the law as laid down in North of England Steamship Insurance Association v. Armstrong (3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 330; 21 L. T. Rep. 822; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 244) and the judgment below was right on this point, and the plaintiffs are entitled to recover from the shipowners all the sums which the shipowners received in respect of the ship up to the 45,000*l.*, the amount of the insurance.

The second point is a different one. The appellants contend that in apportioning the sum recovered in the collision action the learned judge was wrong in fixing 65,000*l.* as the value of the subject-matter insured at the time of the loss—that is to say, as the value of the ship. Now, the sum recovered was recovered as a lump sum and there was no apportionment, and there has as yet been, apart from the learned judge's judgment, no apportionment of this sum as between ship and charter. It was a compromise, and the parties agreed to a lump sum. The President laid down in his judgment on appeal from the registrar the basis upon which the figures were to be arrived at. [His Lordship then dealt with this point and concluded.] In my opinion the proper way to deal with the matter is to refer it back, having decided that the underwriters are entitled to recover the whole amount recovered by the shipowners in respect of the ship, and to direct an inquiry how the sum of about 26,000*l.*, the larger sum, ought to be apportioned as between the ship and the charter upon the basis of the President's judgment.

PHILLIMORE, L.J.—I agree. I think that the learned judge's decision on the first point was right, and I have nothing to add to what the Lord Justice has said.

PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

PRIZE COURT.

Oct. 28, 29, and Nov. 8, 1915.

(Before Sir S. T. EVANS, President.)

THE SORFAREREN. (a)

Neutral sailing ship—Cargo—Contraband—Order in Council of the 29th Oct. 1914*—Property of enemy—Condemnation—Compensation—Art.* 43 of Declaration of London—Shipowners' claim for freight—Loss by delay—Contribution to alleged general salvage loss.

By the Declaration of London Order in Council, No. 2, 1914, dated the 29th Oct. 1914, it was declared that during the present hostilities the convention known as the Declaration of London should, subject to certain additions and modifications therein specified, be adopted and put in force by His Majesty's Government. Art. 43 of the Declaration of London, which provides (inter alia) that if a vessel is encountered at sea while unaware of the declaration of contraband which applies to her cargo, the contraband cannot be condemned except on payment of compensation, was not excepted by the terms of the Order in Council. By the said order chrome ore was declared to be absolute contraband.

Under the terms of a contract entered into in 1913 between an English company and a German company, the former shipped certain chrome ore in June 1914 from a foreign port on a Norwegian sailing vessel chartered by the German company. The bills of lading were made out in favour of the English company, the sellers, or order, the port of delivery being Rotterdam. The buyers paid to the sellers, at the date of sailing, in accordance with the terms of the contract, 50 per cent. of the purchase price of the chrome ore, together with a sum of 1000*l. advanced by the sellers for the ship. On the voyage the vessel put into Pernambuco, in Sept.* 1914, where the master first heard of the outbreak of war, and acting upon instructions received by cable he changed the course of the vessel from Rotterdam to Gothenburg, in Sweden, via the North of Scotland. The vessel was captured in Nov. 1914 by a British cruiser, and taken to Glasgow. At the date of the seizure of the vessel the master was unaware of the Order in Council of the 29th Oct. 1914.

In the prize proceedings for the condemnation of the cargo, two claims were put in, one by the English company, the sellers, and another by a Swedish company, which alleged that the chrome ore had been purchased by them from the German company. No claim was made on behalf of the German company. The shipowners also put in a claim for freight, for remuneration for the use of the ship or loss by delay, and for contribution from the cargo to alleged general average loss.

Held, that, on the facts of the case, the cargo was the property of the German company, the same having passed to them from the English company; that the German company were not the agents of the Swedish company; and that as the German company had put in no claim the question of compensation did not arise.

Quære, whether in any case art. 43 of the Declaration of London applies under any circumstances to prevent the condemnation of contraband property of the enemy without compensation.

Held, also, that the shipowners were entitled to freight, the amount to be ascertained by a reference to the registrar and merchants, that they were not entitled to any compensation for the use of the ship or loss by delay, and that they were entitled to a contribution from the cargo to general average loss provided they could establish a claim to the same.

IN this case the Crown claimed the condemnation of a cargo of chrome ore laden in the Norwegian sailing ship Sorfareren, which sailed from Pagonmene, New Caledonia, in June 1914, before the outbreak of the war between Great Britain and Germany.

The facts of the case and the arguments adduced are sufficiently set out in the headnote and in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 8, 1915.—The PRESIDENT.—This is a case of considerable importance, both on account of the quantity and the character of the cargo seized, and also on account of one of the legal questions which are involved in it. The Sorfareren was a Norwegian sailing vessel which was chartered by a German company, the Gesellschaft für Electrometallurgie, of Nürnberg. Her cargo consisted of about 3,850 tons of chrome ore, and she started on her voyage to Europe from Pagoumene, New Caledonia, in the month of June 1914. The bill of lading was made out in favour of the Chrome Ore Company Limited, of St. Swithin's-lane, in the City of London, or order, for delivery at Rotterdam. Chrome ore is used for the manufacture of ferro-chrome, an essential ingredient in the making of armour plates and armour-piercing projectiles. For many years past vast quantities of chrome ore have been imported for Krupp's works at Essen, and the usual place of entry for the ore which is intended for these works has been Rotterdam. The cargo in the present case was shipped in pursuance of a contract entered into on the 13th Dec. 1913, made between the Chrome Ore Company Limited as sellers and the German company as buyers. The contract was for a certain quantity, which was dependent upon whether the buyers chartered a sailing vessel or a steamship for the purpose of carrying the ore. The price was a fixed price of so much per ton, f.o.b. at Pagoumene, upon certain bases of analysis, with pro rata variations, depending again upon whether the buyers chartered a sailing vessel or a steamship upon which the cargo was to be shipped.

Under the contract the ore was to be discharged at one, two, or three ports, provided that no additional expense to the sellers was incurred beyond the analysis. The bills of lading were to be made out by the shippers to the order of the sellers. Payment of 50 per cent. of the value of the ore at a certain standard was to be made immediately on shipment, and the balance immediately after arrival at the port of discharge. Insurance of the goods was to be effected by the buyers at a value of 6*s.* 6*d.* per ton over the purchase price. The buyers were to pay the premium and to hand over the policies to the sellers at Pagoumene. Any necessary advances to the ship were to be made by the sellers at the port of loading, but the buyers were to reimburse to the sellers in New Caledonia such advances on cable advice of the amounts advanced. For other items it is sufficient to refer to the contract. The buyers paid to the sellers in the month of June 1914 the sum of 3987*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*, made up of 2987*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*, the 50 per cent. of the purchase price of ore, in accordance with the terms of the contract, and 1000*l.*, being the amount advanced by the sellers for the ship at New Caledonia.

The vessel put into Pernambuco, on her voyage, on the 6th Sept. 1914. It was at that port that the master first heard of the outbreak of the war. He cabled at once to the agents for the shipowners for instructions, and in reply received orders to proceed to Gothenburg instead of to Rotterdam, the voyage to be made by the north of Scotland. According to the affidavit of the secretary of the Chrome Ore Company Limited, the order to proceed to Gothenburg instead of to Rotterdam was given by the buyers—that is, by the German company.

On the 29th Oct. 1914, by an Order in Council, chrome ore was declared to be absolute contraband. About eight o'clock p.m. on the 2nd Nov. 1914 the vessel was boarded by British naval officers, and the vessel and cargo were taken by a prize crew into the port of Glasgow. It appears that the vessel had been boarded by the German cruiser Karlsruhe on the 15th Sept., and that the boarding officer of the German cruiser had ordered the master not to make any entry as to this visit in his log. At the time of the capture by the British cruiser the vessel had sailed about 14,700 miles, and had a further distance of about 530 miles to cover before arriving at Gothenburg.

In due course the writ in prize was issued, claiming condemnation of the cargo as prize, as enemy property or as contraband of war. In the prize proceedings the cargo was sold and realised over 16,000*l.* Two claims were made to the cargo. One was made on the 18th Jan. 1915 by the Chrome Ore Company Limited. The other was made on the 28th Jan. 1915 by the Atkiebolaget Ferrolegeringer, of Stockholm, a Swedish company, hereinafter referred to as the Swedish company. No claim has been made by or on behalf of the buyers, the German company. These claims are, of course, mutually destructive. Broadly speaking the ground of the claim of the Chrome Ore Company Limited is that at the time of the capture they were the owners, because, according to their contention they had reserved the right of disposal of the goods. They alleged a further ground, which I confess I find it difficult to understand, which they state in their claim as follows: "The claimants further say that by reason of the outbreak of war on the 4th Aug. 1914 between Great Britain and Germany the contract for the sale of the goods became and was annulled; and further that by reason of the Royal Proclamation against trading with the enemy it became and was illegal and impossible for the claimants to deliver the goods to the German purchasers."

As to this, the goods at the time of capture were on their way to the port of discharge for delivery, and no steps were taken by the sellers to try to prevent or to put an end to the voyage. I conceive that the real question upon their claim is whether under the contract the property in the goods had passed from them to the buyers.

The ground of the claim of the Swedish company, again broadly speaking, was that the goods were their property, having been bought for them by the German company as their agents. An essential ingredient in this claim is that the property had, at any rate, passed from the sellers.

I will deal in the first place with the claim of the British company. They contracted only with the German company and knew nothing whatever of the Swedish company in relation to this transaction. I cannot find that they knew even of the existence of the latter company before the date of the capture. The terms of the contract between the British company and the German company, and the dealings between them, have been sufficiently set out to enable the question of the transfer of the ownership to be determined, and there is, therefore, no necessity to repeat them.

I deem it to be quite clear that the property passed to the German company on the shipment and part payment, and that there was no reservation whatsoever by the sellers of the right of disposal of the goods. Their whole conduct showed that there was no intention upon their part to reserve such a right. The result, in fact, of giving effect to their claim would be strange indeed. It would mean that in addition to 2987*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* already paid to them by the buyers in part payment of the purchase price, a sum of over 16,000*l.* (the proceeds of the sale of the goods) would also be released and paid over to them, and they would thus be receiving nearly 19,000*l.* instead of the unpaid balance which they estimate at some figure between 3000*l.* and 4000*l.* If the strict application of the law involved this result, the court could not and would not prevent it. But, as I have said, in my opinion, according to law the Chrome Ore Company Limited had transferred their property in the goods to the German buyers, and the extraordinary result above described does not ensue. Their holding of the bill of lading, and of the policies of insurance, did not preserve the property in them in the circumstances. Their object in obtaining and holding these documents was simply to secure greater protection for themselves for the payment of the balance.

It is a source of satisfaction to the court, and may possibly be some consolation to the claimants in the face of an adverse decision, to find that this view appears to have been entertained by themselves before the prize proceedings were instituted, as is shown by the following letter, which was written for them by their secretary to the Lords of the Admiralty:

Chrome Ore Company Limited, Sept. 23, 1914. —My Lords,—s.v. Sorfareren. In view of the present situation, the directors of this company deem it their duty to disclose to you the following particulars in regard to the cargo of chrome ore on the above vessel, such cargo being undoubtedly intended for an alien enemy, and chrome ore being used in the manufacture of armour-plates. The vessel, which is a Norwegian sailing vessel, was tendered to us at Pangoumene, New Caledonia, by the Gesellschaft für Elektrometallurgique m.b.H., Nürnberg Knauerstrasse 10, Nürnberg (Germany), in fulfilment of a contract we entered into with them in Dec. 1913 to supply 3000/6000 tons of chrome ore f.o.b. Pagoumene. The quantity loaded is said to be 3855 tons, and the vessel left Pagoumene on the 9th June 1914 for Rotterdam. Under the terms of the contract, the price of the ore was payable as to half (approximately) on shipment and the balance on arrival at port of discharge in Europe, the exact value of the cargo being dependent on the chromium contents of the ore as ascertained by analysis on this side and its actual weight on arrival, exclusive of moisture. The provisional payment—amounting to 2987*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*—was duly made on shipment, and, for our protection, pending receipt of the balance, the bills of lading were in the terms of the contract made out to our order and are now, together with the marine insurance policy, in our possession. Being interested in the cargo to the extent of the unpaid balance, which we estimate to be about 3700*l.*, we made inquiries from time to time as to the movements of the vessel, with a view to obtaining possession of the ore, and only recently heard that she arrived at Pernambuco on the 8th Sept., and was there ordered to proceed direct to Gothenburg, although the bills of lading are made out for Rotterdam. The charter-party, dated the 5th March 1914, stipulates, it is true, Rotterdam, Hamburg, or Gothenburg as the destination. So far as we know, however, there is no other cargo on board necessitating her calling at Gothenburg. In the event of your Lordships taking steps to seize the vessel and cargo as prize, and the cargo being condemned as contraband of war, we may lose the above-mentioned 3700*l.* My directors therefore beg that you will take into consideration our interest as above set forth and regard in a favourable light our efforts to prevent the ore falling into the hands of the enemy, and we should be glad to hear whether your Lordships could see your way to pay us out of the proceeds of the sale what would be due to us under normal circumstances and to give us the preferential right of buying the cargo. We hear, unofficially and incidentally, that the orders to the captain of the vessel are to proceed to Gothenburg by way of the North of Scotland. I would add that the vessel left Pagoumene on the 9th June 1914, so that she has taken about three months to get from there to Pernambuco, whither she went direct, so far as we know. If any further information is desired, I shall be happy to call at the Admiralty by appointment.—I have the honour to be your Lordships' obedient servant, (signed) H. W. C. DERMER, Secretary.—The Lords Commissioners, H.M. Admiralty, Whitehall, S.W.

The claim of the Chrome Ore Company Limited must be disallowed.

The other claimants to the cargo are the Swedish company, the Aktiebolaget Ferrolegeringer. Appearance was entered on their behalf on the 21st Dec. 1914. So far as the court has been informed, nothing was heard of the Swedish company in connection with the transaction, or with the German company until a couple of days before. The solicitors for the Swedish company wrote a letter on the 19th Dec. 1914 to the solicitors for the Chrome Ore Company Limited, in which they said: "Your clients were the vendors of certain chrome ore, of which our clients are the derivative purchasers."

According to their formal claim, which was made on the 28th Jan. 1915, the ground of their claim was that the German company acted in the purchase as the agents of the Swedish company. It was alleged in the claim that "by an instrument in writing dated the 29th Sept. 1914, the German company formally and solemnly placed on record the fact that the said cargo of chrome ore was bought by them at the request of and as agents for and on behalf of these claimants (the Swedish company) under an agreement made between them as early as the month of Oct. 1913, or thereabouts."

A copy of this document was produced. It purports to be a contract or agreement. It contains various terms (to which it is not necessary to refer in detail) which are entirely inconsistent with the agreement of the 13th Dec. 1913, for the purchase by the German company from the sellers. I doubt whether this contract or agreement was made on the date or dates given. The arrangement, whatever it was, is suspicious; it savours greatly of a scheme set afoot to try and show that the goods belonged to neutrals and not to enemy subjects. It purports to give effect to some agreement between the two companies of a year earlier, when, according to the account given by the managing director of the Swedish company, the two companies "were in very intimate connection with each other," in consequence of which no arrangement was made with the German company with reference to the price and the terms, "leaving it to the German company to act in the best possible way, and, the purchase being made, afterwards to settle our mutual transaction."

An extraordinary document purporting to be dated the 31st Oct. 1914 was referred to as having passed between the German company and the Swedish company. I refrain from attempting to state its contents or its operation, and will accordingly set it out, in translation, in full:—

Nürnberg, Oct. 31, 1914.—Transfer.—Aktiebolaget Ferrolegeringer, Stockholm. According to the receipt issued by the firm of Chalas and Sons, Finsbury Pavement House, Finsbury-pavement, London, E.C., dated the 19th June 1914, we have against this firm a claim of 3987*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.* The above-mentioned claim we hereby transfer to you unconditionally and with full title. We have accordingly debited your account with the same amount.—Yours truly, Gesellschaft für Elektrometallurgie mit beschrankter Haftung.—Max Loewi, Dr. Forchheimer.

As already stated this amount consisted of a part payment of the purchase price to the sellers, and of a repayment of an advance made by the sellers to the ship. It is difficult to understand how it could be regarded as a claim against the sellers or their agents, Chalas and Sons, which could be transferred to the Swedish company.

No correspondence or accounts between the Swedish and the German companies relating to this or any similar business dealings have been produced. No satisfactory explanation has been given as to why the Swedish company wanted its goods shipped to Rotterdam, or as to why the destination was afterwards, and during the course of the voyage, changed to Gothenburg. In forming my judgment upon the facts I cannot come to any other conclusion than that the alleged agency was an invention, and that the pretended arrangement was made merely in order to attempt to cover up enemy goods by a transfer in transitu to neutrals.

As I intimated during the course of the trial, I accordingly disallow the claim of the Swedish company. I find that at the time of the capture the goods were enemy property belonging to the German company and destined for Germany.

It remains to be considered how they should be dealt with by this court. Art. 43 of the Declaration of London was referred to. As an article of the declaration it has no force, but it will be remembered that it was not excepted when the Order in Council adopted and applied with modifications and alterations some of the terms of the declaration. The article is as follows:

If a vessel is encountered at sea while unaware of the outbreak of hostilities or of the declaration of contraband which applies to her cargo, the contraband cannot be condemned except on payment of compensation; the vessel herself and the remainder of the cargo are not liable to condemnation or to the costs and expenses referred to in art. 41. The same rule applies if the master, after becoming aware of the outbreak of hostilities, or of the declaration of contraband, has had no opportunity of discharging the contraband. A vessel is deemed to be aware of the existence of a state of war, or of a declaration of contraband, if she left a neutral port subsequently to the notification to the Power to which such port belongs of the outbreak of hostilities, or of the declaration of contraband respectively, provided that such notification was made in sufficient time. A vessel is also deemed to be aware of the existence of a state of war if she left an enemy port after the outbreak of hostilities.

It will be observed that the vessel is personified, and the knowledge under consideration is that of the vessel. The Sorfareren, when encountered at sea, was aware of the outbreak of hostilities, but was not aware, or, at any rate, there was no evidence that she was aware, of the declaration of contraband affecting her cargo. The declaration of contraband was made on the 29th Oct. 1914. What is the meaning of the provision that the contraband in such a case cannot be condemned except on payment of compensation? Who has the right to claim compensation, or to resist condemnation without compensation? Of course, contraband may be not only carried on neutral vessels, but may also be the property of neutrals. The Declaration of Paris excepted contraband of war from the protection agreed to be afforded to enemy goods on neutral vessels, and to neutral goods on enemy vessels, even when the contraband goods were neutral property. The aim and object of these articles of the Declaration of Paris were the safeguarding in favour of neutrals of their shipping and their property. In my opinion art. 43 of the Declaration of London was not intended to save from condemnation contraband belonging to the enemy. If the article was construed strictly, it might be contended with some force that the only protection intended was in favour of neutral vessels against the consequences to them of the condemnation of the cargo or certain proportions of it. It is silent as to the effect of knowledge or want of knowledge of the contraband nature of the goods on the part of the owners of the goods.

I express no final opinion upon this point. But at the most I think that the article was only intended to give, and only does give, protection to neutrals whose goods were being carried at sea when their owners were unaware of the declaration of contraband, by awarding to them compensation on condemnation of their goods which were, in fact, although not with their knowledge, contraband at the time of capture. This is an intelligible extension in favour of neutrals of the provisions in their favour in the Declaration of Paris.

Having given the matter my best consideration, I decide that contraband belonging to the enemy remains liable to condemnation without compensation. It will be remembered that the report of the Drafting Committee to the Naval Conference, which consisted of representatives of Germany, the United States of America, Austria-Hungary, Spain, France, Great Britain, Italy, Japan, the Netherlands, and Russia—which is generally known as Monsieur Renault's report—is declared by the Order in Council already mentioned to be an authoritative report, to which this court is directed to have regard. That report says as to art. 43: "This provision is intended to spare neutrals who might, in fact, be carrying contraband, but against whom no charge could be made."

This confirms me in the opinion that I have expressed, which, indeed, I should have formed, and did form, without reference to the report. If this opinion should not obtain the approval of the appellate tribunal, there are other grounds which I will state briefly, why in any event in this case the contraband should be condemned without compensation. The first is, that compensation could only be given to the owners of the goods, and the owners, according to my decision, are not before the court to ask for it. And no claim having been made by the true owners within six months of the capture, the goods are subject to condemnation according to the Prize Rules. The other ground is, that even if the owners were before the court, their conduct would preclude them from obtaining an award for compensation from the court. I am prepared to decide that compensation should only be given to owners who acted not only in ignorance, but innocently and honestly, both in relation to the shipment and to the presentation of their claim and their case before the court. Here there has been, as I find, a dishonest attempt, in which the German company acquiesced and took part, to persuade the court that the German company only acted in the purchase as agents of a neutral company. This is not a case of honest mistake on their part. There is no place for error in such a simple business transaction and on such a pure question of fact. In thus deciding I conceive that I am acting in accordance with the old established principles of the court, which has consistently and effectively set its face against attempts to impose upon it—I shall not elaborate the principle by discussing the authorities. It is sufficient for me to refer in illustration of it to such cases as The Odin (1 Ch. Rob. 249), The Eenrom (2 Ch. Rob. 1), The Rosalie and Betty (2 Ch. Rob. 343), and The Richmond (6 Ch. Rob. 126).

For the reasons stated I pronounce judgment of condemnation against the cargo as lawful prize.

The shipowners have made a claim for freight for remuneration for the use of the ship or loss by delay, and for contribution from the cargo to alleged general average loss. As to the first head of claim I order a reference to the registrar and merchants to ascertain what ought to be paid in lieu of freight, according to the rule laid down in the case of The Juno (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 15; 112 L. T. Rep. 471). As to the second head, as I intimated at the trial, there are no circumstances in this case upon the principles which the court applies to justify any part of the claim. Until a late date, according to the evidence, the shipowners' agents refused to allow the cargo to be discharged. It was not suggested that there had been any misconduct or unnecessary delay on the part of any of the authorities. As to the third head, the claim raises a question of principle which this court has not heretofore been called upon to decide. It is whether captors of cargo take it with the burden of a proportionate contribution to general average loss incurred before the capture.

Counsel for the shipowners stated that there was a general average loss arising from the vessel putting into Pernambuco. There are not sufficient facts before me to justify my expressing any definite opinion upon that point, but I entertain considerable doubt upon it. I do not, by dealing with the legal aspect of the claim in these prize proceedings, wish to encourage the shipowners to proceed with it. If they are advised to do so it will be at their peril as to costs, which would be deducted from any sum allowed in respect of freight. But assuming a general average loss to exist, and as the position of shipowners in such a case raises a question of general importance in regard to captures of cargo as prize, I will pronounce my opinion upon the principle of law involved.

I have dealt in other cases—e.g., The Marie Glaeser (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas 601; 112 L. T. Rep. 251; (1914) P. 218) and The Odessa (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 27; 112 L. T. Rep. 473; (1915) P. 52)—with the general question affecting liens on ships and cargoes captured, and with the authorities relating to them in this and in other countries. I refrain from again traversing the same ground. The main distinction is between liens imposed by the general law of the mercantile world independent of any contract, and those which arise from private engagements or contractual relations between parties: (see The Tobago, Roscoe's English Prize Cases, vol 1, 456; 5 Ch. Rob. 218, The Frances, 8 Cranch. 418, and The Carlos F. Roses, 177 U. S. Rep. 655).

The nature of a claim for general average was described clearly by the Privy Council in the case of Cleary v. McAndrew; cargo ex Galam (2 Moo P. C. New Series 216) as follows: "On principle the claim for general average seems to stand on the same reason as freight. It is a loss incurred for the general benefit of the ship and cargo, to which those who have received the benefit are by law liable to contribute rateably. And for this claim the master who has incurred the expenses has a lien on the goods. It is a possessory lien at common law, by virtue of which he is entitled to hold the goods till his lien be satisfied." And the Privy Council decided that the claim for freight and general average stood upon the same footing and had the first right against the funds in court.

There is also a statement by Lord Stowell in a case of prize in The Hoffnung (Roscoe, vol. 1, 583; 6 Ch. Rob. 383) to the effect that cases of average on the part of the ship against the cargo were not infrequent in his time.

On principle it appears to me to be right that where a claim of general average by the ship against the cargo exists before the cargo is captured, the captors take cum onere of the cargo's contribution to the general average loss. On the assumption that the shipowners can establish a case of general average loss I order a reference to the registrar and merchants to assess the portion to be borne by the captured cargo, and order payment of the sum assessed, if any, out of the proceeds of the prize.

THE EUMÆUS. (a)

Prize—Neutral commercial domicil—English and German partners—Partnership established in Shanghai—Firm registered at German Consulate—Goods of firm—Consignment to Germany—Seizure at sea—British ship—Claim as prize—Status of firm—Condemnation of share of German partners—Conditions under which share of English partners liable to condemnation.

A partnership firm composed of British and German partners, and registered at the German Consulate at Shanghai, cannot acquire a neutral commercial domicil, but is on the same footing as a German firm established in Germany. The goods of such a firm are liable to condemnation as prize if captured at sea on board a British vessel, but the shares of the English partners in the goods will be released if satisfactory evidence is given showing that the English partners broke off their connection with the partnership business as soon as possible after the outbreak of war

THIS was a claim by the Crown for the condemnation as prize of a certain cargo of feathers, consigned by the firm of Arnhold, Karberg, and Co., of Shanghai, in the British steamship Eumæus to Bremen, in Germany. The firm was composed of four persons, two British and two German, and the partnership was registered at the German Consulate at Shanghai as a German firm, in accordance with the treaty stipulations between Germany and China. The two British partners lived at Shanghai, one of the German partners was resident in London, and the other was settled in Berlin. In the proceedings in the Prize Court the firm claimed the goods on the ground that they were the goods of neutrals, the partnership having acquired a neutral commercial domicil, and that there was no right to condemn them. There was also an alternative claim, on the ground that the shares of the respective partners were the property of British and neutral subjects respectively.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 22, 1915.—The PRESIDENT.—In this case the claimants describe themselves as Arnhold, Karberg, and Co., of Shanghai, in the republic of China, importers and exporters. Up to the time of the outbreak of the war between Great Britain and Germany they were a firm consisting of four partners—Harry Edward Arnhold, Charles Herbert Arnhold, Ernst Goetz, and Max Niclassen. The first two of these four are British subjects, the other two are Germans. The shares of the British subjects were 43 per cent., and those of the German subjects 57 per cent. in the partnership. The two British subjects had lived at Shanghai for a number of years. Goetz lived in London and various other places, and according to the terms of the deed of partnership he was to reside abroad at such places as Harry Edward Arnhold should direct. After the war he was interned in this country as a German. Niclassen lived in Berlin, and up to the date of the outbreak of war he attended to the business of the firm there. The claim was made on the footing that the business of the firm was carried on from Shanghai as the head office. The firm was registered at Shanghai in the German Consulate as a German firm. It was admitted that at the time of the seizure the goods seized, and now claimed, were the property of the firm at Shanghai.

The goods were claimed: (1) As the property of the Shanghai firm in a character of neutral subjects, and (2), alternatively, the shares of the respective partners were claimed as the property of neutrals and British subjects respectively.

As to claim (1), it was contended that the firm had a neutral domicil at Shanghai. As to claim (2), apart from the alleged commercial domicils, it was admitted that the two German partners were subjects of the German Empire, and that the other two partners were subjects of this country.

The claim has to be considered both from the point of view of the firm and of its constituent partners in reference to the law of prize.

As to the firm, it was contended that its trade was carried on in neutral territory, and that it ought therefore to be treated as a neutral house of trade, and that in consequence its property was exempt from confiscation by capture at sea or seizure in port. Assuming only for the purpose of dealing with this argument that the firm could be treated as a separate entity apart from its four members, it is conceded that it was a firm registered at the German Consulate in accordance with German law, and that so far as the business and assets or any of the partners were within the jurisdiction or control of the German Consular authorities in China, the firm was liable to be treated in all respects as subject to German law. The firm itself after the war broke out took up the position in reference to some British merchants that it was registered as a German firm, and that as such it was prohibited by the German authorities in Shanghai from carrying out its contracts with a British customer.

Shanghai is a treaty port in the East, and German merchants are, like the merchants of Great Britain and other countries, governed by the law of their own country in their commercial business carried on in that locality. I shall refer more particularly to the relationship of Europeans trading or resident in Oriental countries hereafter, when considering the question of the commercial domicil of subjects of Western States carrying on business at the present day in Eastern countries. Having regard to the establishment of registration of the firm of Arnhold, Karberg, and Co., in Shanghai, as a German firm subject to German laws under treaty with China, and with ex-territorial rights and privileges, I am of opinion that the firm should be treated in all matters relating to the jurisdiction of a Prize Court in time of war as if it was established in Germany itself. In other words, the business at Shanghai must be regarded as enemy business carried on in an enemy house of trade.

A similar result must, in my view, follow from a consideration of the position of the firm, not as a separate entity, as was contended, but from the more accurate position of a partnership of the four individual partners. They, although subjects of different States, agreed to carry on the business in co-partnership in Shanghai, and as such were the joint owners, in varying shares or proportions, of the goods now claimed.

What were their individual national characters in relation to this business? Had such of them as were enemy subjects acquired commercial domicils in a neutral country, so as to give exemption to their property from confiscation jure belli? Had such of them as were British subjects acquired such a domicil as would protect them if engaged in business with enemy partners? Had the partners only joined in a house of trade entitled to be regarded as a neutral house of trade? Or were the British subjects partners in an enemy house of trade, with the obligations of withdrawing, and subject to the penalties of not withdrawing, in proper course on the outbreak of war?

The case of The Indian Chief (3 Ch. Rob. 12) was referred to as the great authority upon the doctrine of the immiscible character of merchants of western countries residing and carrying on trade in Oriental lands. For the spirit of the doctrine, discussed with such felicity, dignity, and wealth of language, that classical judgment will always be referred to. But it must be remembered that the case dealt with what was known as the "factory" system, which has long since passed away. The "factory" (to use the words of Sir Francis Piggott, ex-Chief Justice of Hong Kong) "was an establishment tolerated by the State in which it was set up, which, apparently for the convenience of all parties, was withdrawn, as well as all persons therein residing, from the operation of local laws." The law applicable to this archaic and obsolete system is that which was laid down by Lord Stowell in The Indian Chief (ubi sup.), and it is sufficiently stated in this passage from his judgment, at p. 28: "It is to be remembered that wherever even a mere factory is founded in the Eastern parts of the world, European persons trading under the shelter and protection of those establishments are conceived to take their national character from that association under which they live and carry on this commerce. It is a rule of the law of nations applying particularly to those countries. . . . In China, and I may say generally throughout the East, persons admitted into a factory are not known in their own peculiar national character; and, being not admitted to assume the character of the country, they are considered only in the character of that association or factory."

Since the days of The Indian Chief (ubi sup.) a vast change has come over the conditions of commerce between Western and Eastern States. Sir William Scott quoted the line Doris amara suam non inter-miscuit undam. But the sea, never changing, and yet ever changing within the limits set to the waters, has ceased to be a separating influence between distant lands in times of peace, especially since the advent and with the development of steam transit. It has rather become a means of union than of separation in the world of commerce. And Eastern nations have long grown out of the state of necessity for the factory system. Commerce has been fostered and the great States of the East have been willing to grant to subjects and citizens of the European nations exterritorial privileges of an extensive kind under treaties and otherwise, which relieve those to whom they are granted from obedience to the laws of the Oriental States in which they reside and carry on business; and permit them to be governed, more especially in relation to their commerce, by the laws of their own States.

Under treaty, China has accorded the rights and privileges of exterritoriality to the chief European States. In Shanghai there is a British Supreme Court. In other parts of China there are the usual Consular Courts. It is not necessary to give any details of the privileges. The British communities are now regulated by the China and Korea Order in Council of 1904. Similar regulations exist for other European countries, including Germany; and it may be stated shortly that the effect of these is that not only are the respective European communities governed by their own national laws among themselves, but that the Chinese authorities are precluded from exercising any authority in any disputes between the subjects or citizens of the European States respectively, and other foreigners. Every British subject is required to register himself annually in the prescribed Consulate (see China Order in Council, s. 163). The subjects of other States have to do likewise. As one writer has said: "The register is essential in order that the protecting duties of the Minister may be properly exercised; it would be essential even if there were only the national and the British communities; it is ten times more important when the foreign community is composed of many nationalities. If the sheep upon the mountains are not marked, how shall the shepherds know their sheep?"

In the present case the two British subjects registered themselves in the British Consulate. They appear, however, to have been prevailed upon to allow the firm to be registered in the German Consulate as a German firm. This has been explicitly stated in the affidavits in the present case. The fact and the results were more fully stated in an affidavit by the chief partner, Mr. Harry E. Arnhold, in certain prize proceedings in the Colonial Prize Court of Alexandria in the s.s. Derfflinger (cargo ex) as follows:

> The firm of Arnhold, Karberg, and Co., for the purposes of its business in China, has been and remains registered at the German Consulate General at Shanghai, in accordance with German law, as a German firm, and, so far as the business and assets or any of the partners in the said firm are within the jurisdiction or control of the German consular authorities in China, the said firm is liable to be treated in all respects as subject to German law. In particular, the said German consular authorities will not, so far as their jurisdiction extends, permit the said firm to be dissolved, or wound up, or its property or assets to be dealt with in derogation of the rights of the German partners in the firm, and will not permit the British partners to take over the property and assets of the said firm, or to carry on its business otherwise than for the benefit of all partners in the firm.

That was the character which the partners, by their action, gave to the firm. In this case I am not called upon to express any opinion upon the question whether at the present day a British subject can acquire a civil domicil in an Oriental country like China. In Re Tootal's Trusts (48 L. T. Rep. 816; 23 Ch. Div. 532) may or may not be good law. It has been much criticised by jurists and has recently been dissented from in a judgment of the Supreme Judicial Court of Maine in Mather v. Cunningham (105 Maine Reports 326; 74 Atlantic Reporter 809). The decision in the case now before the court does not involve that question. Neither of the British partners claim to have acquired such domicil. They assert their British citizenship. The two German partners likewise do not seek to renounce their German domicil.

Nor is it necessary to pronounce a decision upon the general question whether for purposes of the law of prize a commercial domicil can be acquired by Europeans in Eastern countries. I think it must depend upon circumstances. For instance, it is difficult to find any good reason why a British subject might not have a commercial domicil in a country like Japan, where consular jurisdiction and exterritorial privileges have been abolished for some years. Domicil is a term which eludes scientific definition. But the definition of Profes or Dicey of commercial domicil as "such a residence in a country for the purpose of trading there as makes a person's trade or business contribute to or form part of the resources of such country, and renders it therefore reasonable that his hostile, friendly, or neutral character should be determined by reference to the character of such country" (Dicey's Conflict of Laws, 2nd edit., p. 742) is sufficiently clear and accurate for practical purposes.

Neither of the German partners was resident in Shanghai. One of them had his residence in Berlin. The latter's share of the goods claimed would therefore be liable to capture and confiscation as prize in any event, even if the partnership constituted a neutral house of trade. The former's share is also confiscable as belonging to an enemy, as he did not reside where it is suggested he might have acquired a commercial domicil. In any event, having regard to the exterritorial conditions of European traders in Shanghai, I am of opinion that neither of the partners, British or German, did acquire, or could have acquired, a neutral commercial domicil in Shanghai in the circumstances of the present case.

I have already stated that the partnership, which was registered as a German firm under the exterritorial privileges granted to Germany, cannot be said to be a neutral house of trade in Shanghai. I fail to see how the business can be regarded except as an enemy concern. It is in my view to be treated as an enemy house of trade, just as much as if the German authorities and community under and among which it was established were within a German colony or within the precincts of Germany itself.

This being so, I condemn the 57/100 shares of Goetz and Niclassen in the goods as enemy property to be forfeited to the Crown as droits of Admiralty.

Whether the 43/100 shares of H. E. Arnhold and C. H. Arnhold should be condemned depends upon whether they took proper steps in due time to dissociate themselves from the business. Unfortunately, the facts placed before the court as to what part, if any, they took in the firm's business since the war are meagre, and the matter is left in doubt even upon their own showing. The second affidavit of C. H. Arnhold states that he and his brother "in the month of May 1915 both ceased to have anything to do with or to take any part in the affairs of the business of Arnhold, Karberg, and Co. at Shanghai or elsewhere in China." It is explained that they started a business of their own in Jan. 1915, and that from January they only collected assets and paid the liabilities of the old firm's business. They appear to have been in some communication with the British Board of Trade. The period from the 4th Aug. 1914, the date of the outbreak of war, to Jan. 1915 is not illuminated by any evidence.

The Procurator-General relied upon a letter of the 25th Sept. 1914, written in the name of the firm to Weis and Co. I ascertained that the letter was written by Goetz. I do not think that that letter is sufficient to show that the British partners continued to take part in the business. Mr. Bevan, for the claimants, said he would tender Mr. C. H. Arnhold as a witness, but he was not called.

In this state of the evidence I do not propose to pass final judgment as to the shares of the British partners. If on further investigation by the Procurator-General he is satisfied that they did not continue to carry on the business in conjunction with their German partners after the war in such a way as to subject their shares to risk of confiscation, an application can be made to the court to release the shares to them. If otherwise, then H. E. Arnhold and C. H. Arnhold must produce evidence before the court within a reasonable time to explain what they did to break off their connection with the business after war began.

I accordingly give the Procurator-General and Messrs. H. E. and C. H. Arnhold liberty to apply as to the separate shares of the latter.

THE GERMANIA. (a)

Enemy ship—Private yacht of alien enemy—Outbreak of war—Seizure in port—Hague Convention 1907—Convention VI., art. 1—"Merchant ship"—Non-applicability of Convention to private yacht—Condemnation—Repairs to yacht after seizure—Indulgence of Crown—Position of Germany as to Hague Convention.

By the Hague Convention 1907, No. VI., it is stated (inter alia), in art. 1, that it is desirable that any merchant ship belonging to one of the belligerent Powers which is in an enemy port at the commencement of hostilities should be allowed a certain number of days, if necessary, to depart to its port of destination, or to any other port indicated to it.

A racing yacht, the private property of a German subject, was in a British port at the time of the outbreak of the war between England and Germany on the 4th Aug. 1914. It was seized and an order for detention was made. After the seizure, leave was given for certain repairs to be executed upon it to prevent the deterioration in value of the vessel; but it was expressly stipulated that the contractors were to have no lien or claim as against the marshal in respect of the costs of such repairs. The Crown subsequently asked for the condemnation of the yacht, and claims were then put in against the Crown for the sums expended in repairs.

Held, that a racing yacht was not a merchant ship so as to be entitled to the privileges accorded by the Hague Convention 1907, No. VI., art. 1, and was therefore lawful prize as having been seized in a British port after the declaration of hostilities.

Held, also, that apart from any indulgence on the part of the Crown, there was no legal claim for the sums expended in repairs to the yacht subsequently to the date of seizure.

Owing to the acts of Germany since the outbreak of war, in violation of the terms of the Hague Convention to which she was a party, it is doubtful whether she can demand their observance by any of her belligerent enemies.

THIS was a case in which the Crown asked for the condemnation of the yacht Germania.

The Germania was a steel racing yacht of the estimated value of 45,000*l*., the property of a German subject, Herr Gustav Krupp von Bohlen, and arrived at Cowes, in the Isle of Wight, on the 27th July 1914, with the idea of taking part in the Cowes Regatta. War broke out between Great Britain and Germany on the 4th Aug. 1914, and two days later the yacht was seized. A writ was issued on the 26th Aug., and on the 24th Sept. an order was made by the Prize Court for the detention of the vessel, pending an inquiry as to its status under the Hague Convention. The Crown now asked that the order for detention should be superseded by an order for condemnation.

Between the date of seizure and the date of the detention order, an application had been made by the agent of the owner, Baron von Bulow, at present interned in England, that certain repairs should be executed in order to prevent a deterioration in value of the vessel, and permission was given to dry-dock and paint the yacht. When the permission was granted, however, there was an express stipulation that the work to be done was to be at the expense of the claimant, and that the contractors were to have no lien or claim of any kind as against the Admiralty marshal.

By the Hague Convention 1907, No. VI., it is provided:

Art. 1. When a merchant ship belonging to one of the belligerent Powers is, at the commencement of hostilities in an enemy port, it is desirable that it should be allowed to depart freely, either immediately, or after a reasonable number of days of grace, and to proceed, after being furnished with a pass, direct to its port of destination or any other port indicated to it.

The same principle applies in the case of a ship which has left its last port of departure before the commencement of the war, and has entered a port belonging to the enemy while still ignorant that hostilities have broken out.

The Solicitor-General (Sir F. E. Smith, K.C.) and A. B. Marten (for G. T. Simonds, at present serving with His Majesty's forces) for the Crown. —There was no ground for contending that the Germania was protected by the terms of the Hague Convention. The Convention dealt and was intended to deal solely with merchant vessels —navires de commerce. The yacht should therefore be condemned as lawful prize. As to the claims put forward by Messrs. Ratsey and Lapthorn Limited and Messrs. Pascall, Atkey, and Son Limited, these were in respect of work done and materials supplied before the outbreak of war. The Crown did not admit any liability as to these, but was prepared, as an indulgence, to allow that the claims should be referred to the registrar and merchants for assessment. As to the claim of Messrs. Summers and Payne Limited, this was in respect of necessaries supplied and moneys advanced. The claimants by their affidavit had contended that they had a lien on the yacht for the amounts expended, on the ground that what had been done was necessary for the preservation and maintenance of the Germania. Such a claim had been entirely disposed of by the judgment of the court in the case of The Marie Glaeser (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 601; 112 L. T. Rep. 251; (1914) P. 218), in which it was laid down that liens, whether in favour of a neutral on an enemy's ship or in favour of an enemy on a neutral ship, were equally to be disregarded in a Prize Court.

Raeburn, for the claimants, Messrs. Ratsey and Lapthorn Limited and Messrs. Pascall, Atkey, and Son Limited, assented to the course proposed by the Solicitor-General.

Bateson, K.C. and Dunlop for Messrs. Summers and Payne Limited and for Baron von Bulow. —The yacht ought not to be condemned. It was true that it did not fall within the category of merchant vessels; but as being a racing yacht it could not be contended that it possessed any naval or military value. Vessels of this kind had not been specially mentioned in the Hague Convention, but it was certainly a principle underlying the Convention that pleasure vessels like the Germania should be allowed to depart without molestation on the outbreak of hostilities: (see Westlake's International Law. Part 2, War, 2nd edit., pp. 42 and 43; and Pitt Cobbett's International Law, Part 2, War, p. 167). If the yacht was condemned, Messrs. Summers and Payne Limited ran the risk of losing all the money which they had expended. Before the outbreak of war they had done work to the extent of about 176*l*., and had advanced 400*l*. for the payment of wages. And since the seizure of the yacht a further sum of about 252*l*. had been expended on dry-docking, painting, &c. [THE PRESIDENT.—You are basing your claim upon the Hague Convention. I am not sure that a serious question may not arise some day as to the alleged violation of the Hague Convention. Germany was a party to the Convention. But when there is a contract between States, as between individuals, its terms must be observed by both sides, and someone may have one day to consider whether or not Germany, on account of her conduct during the war, has placed herself in such a position that she will be disentitled to complain of any violation of it.] The claimants had a lien upon the yacht for the work done, which ought to be allowed.

The Solicitor-General in reply.—Any claim for a possessory lien was disposed of by the judgment in The Marie Glaeser (ubi sup.). Without admitting any liability, the Crown was prepared to agree to a reference to the registrar and merchants as to the 176*l.* in respect of the work executed before the outbreak of war, and as to the 252*l.* for dry docking and painting subsequently to the seizure.

The PRESIDENT.—In this case the Crown asks for the condemnation of the German yacht Germania, which was, at the outbreak of hostilities between this country and the German Empire, the property of a German subject, Herr Gustav Krupp von Bohlen. The yacht arrived at Cowes in the month of July 1914, and when war broke out on the 4th Aug. 1914 it was seized by the Customs authorities on behalf of the Crown as a droit of Admiralty. A writ was issued in prize on the 26th Aug., and a month later, on the 24th Sept., an order was made by this court for its detention. That order was not a final one, and the present application is that the order then made should be extended by another order—namely, that the yacht should be condemned as enemy property.

The yacht is a racing yacht, and it is quite clear that it does not come within the terms of the Hague Convention, No. VI., which, according to the preamble, is a Convention dealing only with matters relating to commerce, and is intended to protect those vessels only which are engaged in commerce. The words used in describing the vessels to which the Convention applies are, in the authoritative French language, navires de commerce, and Mr. Bateson has not suggested—indeed, no one could suggest—that the yacht comes under these terms. It is perfectly clear, therefore, that there can be no defence whatever to the application for the condemnation of the vessel on the ground of the Hague Convention. It has been urged that according to the spirit of the Hague Convention this yacht ought not to be regarded as liable to confiscation, and ought not, therefore, to be condemned. I do not see how I can deal with the matter otherwise than according to the principles of ordinary law, and according to ordinary law this vessel, the property of a German subject, being in port at the time of the outbreak of hostilities, is clearly liable to be confiscated. I therefore condemn it as a droit of Admiralty as belonging to an enemy subject and as being enemy property.

There is a claim put forward by Messrs. Summers and Payne Limited on account of certain work executed upon the yacht before the date of seizure—that is, towards the end of July 1914. Their claim amounted to about 176*l.* There had also been other work done by them to the yacht subsequently, and they have housed some of its fittings. It was expressly arranged, however, as to the later work that the claimants should not look to the marshal for any reimbursement of the sums expended in keeping the yacht from deterioration, but that the work must be done at their own risk, and that if any claim was to be made it must be against the owner of the yacht at some future time. In other words, it was made perfectly clear that whatever sums were expended were not to be the foundation of any claim either against the marshal or against the Crown. So far as the housing of the yacht is concerned and the protection of the various parts of the yacht, the suggestion that this should be done came from Messrs. Summers and Payne, in their letter of the 9th Oct. 1914 to the Customs authorities of Southampton: "Will you permit us to suggest that the topsails, rigging, and blocks of this yacht, main gaff, spinnaker boom, and boats be brought on shore and housed with other gear which we have belonging to this yacht? The Germania is a very high-class racing yacht, and if neglected will very quickly deteriorate. We already have an account against the yacht. The owner is an old and esteemed customer, and we should be prepared to do this work, as we feel sure we should receive the cost from him, when, at the end of the war, matters of ownership are settled." Subsequently the suggestion was acceded to by the marshal, but upon the distinct understanding that there was to be no liability on his part. There were also certain other sums expended. I should have been prepared on legal grounds to decide against the claim which Messrs. Summers and Payne have put forward, but I am not sorry that the legal advisers of the Crown have met Messrs. Summers and Payne, and that an arrangement has been arrived at between them that a reference shall be had by consent, without raising any question of legal obligation at all, to the registrar to ascertain what sum ought to be allowed in respect of the claims for 176*l.* and 252*l.* respectively, which have been put in by Messrs. Summers and Payne. This will dispose of their claim against the captors and against any other person connected with this court; but of course it does not prevent them from prosecuting any claim which they may have against the owner of the yacht. I venture to express a hope that at some future time whatever money has been expended by the claimants they may recover, but, so far as this court is concerned, no assistance can be given beyond what is granted to them by the consent order.

The order of the court is that the yacht be condemned as enemy property, and that it be sold by the marshal.

UNION INSURANCE SOCIETY OF CANTON v. GEORGE WILLS AND CO. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF WESTERN AUSTRALIA.

Western Australia—Marine insurance—Floating policy—Declaration as to interest—Warranty—Commonwealth Marine Insurance Act (No. 11 of 1909), ss. 35 & 39.

The respondents effected a contract of marine insurance in Western Australia with the appellants, by which they insured all shipments of goods between a large number of ports against usual marine risks. The contract, which was treated as a floating policy throughout the proceedings, contained this clause: Declarations of interest to be made to this society's agent at port of shipment where practicable or agent in London or Perth as soon as possible after sailing of vessel to which interest attaches."

The respondents sued to recover a total loss of a shipment of goods as to which they had made a declaration of interest, but not as soon as possible after the vessel sailed. There was, however, no suggestion that the delay arose from want of good faith on their part.

Held, allowing the appeal, that the condition as to the making of declarations amounted to a promissory warranty within sect. 39 of the Commonwealth Marine Insurance Act 1909 (which is similar in terms to sect. 33 of the Marine Insurance Act 1906), and as it affected the question of reinsurance it constituted a substantive condition of the contract, the failure of the respondents to comply with it disentitled them to recover in respect of the loss.

APPEAL from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Western Australia dated the 13th July 1914, affirming a decision of McMillan, C.J. in an action raised by the present respondents against the appellants which raised the question whether a promise to make a declaration of interest as soon as possible after the sailing of the vessel to which interest attached was a warranty in the marine insurance policy.

The facts are fully stated in the judgment.

(a) Reported by W. E. REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The considered judgment of their Lordships was delivered by Lord PARMOOR.—On the 28th Feb. 1911 the respondents effected a contract of marine insurance with the appellants, which was issued by their office at Perth in Western Australia. This contract has been treated throughout the proceedings as a policy, and it covered all shipments of merchandise of every description commencing to load at first port of loading, on or before the 28th Feb. 1912, with the exception of full cargoes, at and from certain specified ports. There are differing rates of premium, but the rate applicable in the present instance was 10*s.* per cent. The policy contains a clause:

> Declarations of interest to be made to this society's agent at port of shipment where practicable or agent in London or Perth as soon as possible after sailing of vessel to which interest attaches.

The ship Papanui sailed from ports Liverpool, Glasgow, Avonmouth, and London, leaving London on the 21st Aug. 1911. The respondents loaded cargo at each of these ports. On or about the 12th Sept. 1911 the Papanui was destroyed by fire at or near St. Helena, and all the respondents' goods were totally lost. The respondents did not forward a declaration of interest as soon as possible after sailing of the vessel, but there is no suggestion of any want of good faith on their part, or that the reasons assigned by them for the delay are not genuine. The declaration of interest was forwarded on the 13th Sept. 1911, the day after the loss of the vessel.

By their writ issued on the 12th Feb. 1912 the respondents claim the sum of 5225*l.* for a loss under the policy. In their defence the appellants plead that the policy contained a condition or promissory warranty that a declaration of interest should be made, and that such declaration was not made as soon as possible after the sailing of the steamship Papanui. Alternatively they counterclaimed for damages, but this point was not argued before their Lordships, and it is unnecessary to refer further to it. The Acting Chief Justice of Western Australia gave judgment in favour of the respondents, and this judgment was affirmed by the Full Court of the Supreme Court of Western Australia on the 13th July 1914.

The question to be determined in this appeal is, whether the promise by the assured to make a declaration of interest as soon as possible after sailing of the vessel is a warranty, as that word is used and understood in the law of marine insurance, or a collateral stipulation, the breach of which would not avoid the contract, but would only found a right to bring a cross-action, or to counter-claim, for damages. If the promise amounts to a warranty it is immaterial for what purpose the warranty is introduced. The parties had a right to determine for themselves if they desired to introduce a warranty clause as a term of the policy. It has long been established in the common law of England that there is no liability on the insurer unless a warranty is exactly complied with. This principle is made statutory by sect. 39 of the Commonwealth Marine Insurance Act, No. 11, 1909, which corresponds with sect. 33 of the English Act 1906. This section enacts that a warranty, as therein defined, is a condition which must be exactly complied with, whether it be material to the risk or not, and that if it be not so complied with, then, subject to any express provision in the policy, the insurer is discharged from his liability as from the date of the breach of warranty, but without prejudice to any liability incurred by him before that date. Sub-sects. (1) and (2) of the same section enact that a warranty, in the following sections, means a promissory warranty, that is to say, a warranty by which the assured undertakes that some particular thing shall or shall not be done, or that some condition shall be fulfilled, or whereby he affirms or negatives the existence of a particular state of facts, and that it may be expressed or implied. This provision does not operate to bring within the category of warranty, promises which in the construction of the contract are not intended by the parties to amount to warranties. In the present policy the assured undertakes to do a particular thing—namely, to make a declaration as soon as possible after the sailing of a vessel, and the question is whether this undertaking amounts to a warranty. An express warranty may be in any form of words from which the intention to warrant can be inferred.

The policy is an open or floating policy under which the liability of the insurers in the first instance attaches before the sailing of the vessel, and therefore at a time before the declaration of interest is due to be made. It was referred to as "a warehouse to warehouse policy," but in any case it is clear that the declaration of interest is not a condition precedent in the sense that a non-compliance therewith vitiates the whole policy ab initio. If, for instance, the merchandise insured had been destroyed by fire in port before the sailing of the vessel, the promise to make a declaration after the sailing of the vessel would not avoid the policy, and the insurers would be liable, if in other respects the conditions of the policy had been complied with. A condition, however, is not the less a warranty because it is a condition subsequent, and, unless such a subsequent condition is complied with at the time when its performance is due under the contract, the insurer is discharged from liability as from the date of the breach. Their Lordships have already referred to sect. 39 (3) of the Commonwealth Marine Insurance Act, No. 11, 1909, which affirms the common law principle that this discharge is without prejudice to any liability incurred by the insurer before that date. This provision does not apply in the present case, since no liability had been incurred before the date at which the declaration of interest was due to be made.

In the present policy the word "warranty" is not used, but their Lordships are of opinion that, on the construction of the contract as a whole, the parties did intend that the promise to make a declaration as soon as possible after sailing of the vessel should be a warranty, and that, in the events that have happened, there is no liability upon the insurers. There is no difficulty in construing the terms of the promise which the assured have made, and there is no question that this promise has not been complied with. The object of the promise is to protect the interests of the insurer. The question arises whether this object is so material to the risk, and has such a material bearing on the bargain, that it forms a substantive condition of the contract as contrasted with a collateral stipulation for the breach of which damages—if they could be proved—might be claimed by cross-action or by way of counterclaim. If evidence is necessary, the underwriter of the appellants in London, whose evidence was taken on commission, states that the insurers can only arrive at their line of insurances if the declarations of interest are promptly made, and that this information is required to enable insurers to regulate what line they wish to keep, and what amount they may desire to reinsure, and that the amount of line varies very much by particular vessels. It is true that insurers are automatically protected by handing on to other people the excess of liability beyond a certain amount by a class of steamers; but this does not affect their practice of further reducing the amount of their liability in respect of special vessels by effecting special reinsurances. It was suggested that the business might be carried on in some different way which would render the promise to make prompt declarations of less materiality, but the witness denied that the suggestion was practical, and there is no reason for thinking that the business is not carried on according to business experience, so as to avoid, as far as possible, unnecessary risks. It is immaterial to the construction of the contract to consider subsequent events. The intention of the parties must be gathered from the language of the contract, the subject-matter and the circumstances in existence at the time it was made. It appears to their Lordships that the declaration did directly affect the question of reinsurance, and in this respect was clearly material to the risk and constituted a substantive condition of the contract. It follows that the non-fulfilment of the warranty discharges the insurer from liability as from the date of the breach, and that the insurer is not relegated to such remedy as might be open to him by way of cross-action or counterclaim.

A number of cases were referred to in the course of the argument before their Lordships, but it is only necessary to refer to three of them. It is unnecessary to analyse them in detail, since they mainly depend on the terms of the particular policy on which the litigation has arisen. In Thomson v. Weems and others (9 App. Cas. 671) the question arose, on a life policy, whether the policy was void on a warranty. Lord Blackburn, in giving his opinion, makes the following general statement of law: "It is competent to the contracting parties, if both agree to it and sufficiently express their intention so to agree, to make the actual existence of anything a condition precedent to the inception of any contract; and if they do so the non-existence of that thing is a good defence. And it is not of any importance whether the existence of that thing was or was not material; the parties would not have made it a part of the contract if they had not thought it material, and they have a right to determine for themselves what they shall deem material. In policies of marine insurance I think it is settled by authority that any statement of a fact bearing upon the risk introduced into the written policy is, by whatever words and in whatever place, to be construed as a warranty, and, primâ facie, at least that the compliance with that warranty is a condition precedent to the attaching of the risk."

There is no difference in principle in this respect between a statement of fact and an undertaking that some particular thing shall be done. Their Lordships have already stated their opinion that the promise to make a declaration as soon as possible after sailing of a vessel is a matter bearing upon the risk, and therefore a warranty within the opinion expressed by Lord Blackburn.

Counsel for the respondents referred at some length to the case of Davies and another v. National Fire and Marine Insurance Company of New Zealand (65 L. T. Rep. 560; (1891) A. C. 485). In this case it was held that under the terms of the contract two declarations were necessary, and their Lordships cannot find that it supports in any way the contention put forward on behalf of the respondents.

In the case of Stephens v. Australasian Insurance Company (27 L. T. Rep. 585; L. Rep. 8 C. P. 18), it was held that in accordance with the custom therein stated, and according to the usage of merchants and underwriters as recognised by the courts without formal proof in each case, a declaration of interest, which it is the right of the assured to make without the consent of the underwriters, may be altered even after the loss is known, if it be altered at a time, when it can be, and is, altered innocently and without fraud. This principle is now recognised by statute in sect. 35 (3) of the Commonwealth Marine Insurance Act, No. 11, 1909, and in the corresponding sect. 29 (3) of the English Act:

> Unless the policy otherwise provides, the declarations must be made in order of despatch or shipment. They must, in the case of goods, comprise all consignments within the terms of the policy, and the value of the goods or other property must be honestly stated, but an omission or erroneous declaration may be rectified even after loss or arrival, provided the omission or declaration was made in good faith.

The provision that an omission or erroneous declaration may be rectified even after loss or arrival, provided the omission or declaration has been made in good faith, does not apply to the circumstances which exist in the present appeal. It is not a case of omission or error in a declaration which may be rectified even after loss or arrival if there is good faith, but a case in which no declaration has been made within the terms of the contract. To extend the provision to a case like the present would be in effect to deprive the insurers of the benefits of an express warranty in such cases and to abrogate the principle that the insurers are not liable unless the warranty has been exactly complied with.

Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty to allow the appeal with costs here and in the courts below, and that judgment be entered for the appellants.

APPEALS FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Contract—C.i.f.—Tender of bill of lading with or without policy of insurance after outbreak of war—Buyers not bound to accept.

Certain goods were sold under a c.i.f. contract before the outbreak of war between Germany and this country to be shipped in a German ship from China to Naples. The sellers and buyers were both English firms. The price was to include freight as per bill of lading and insurance, payment net cash in London on arrival of goods at port of discharge in exchange for bill of lading and policies; but payment to be made in no case later than three months from date of bill of lading. The goods were shipped before the war, after which the vessel took refuge in a neutral port. The sellers sought to recover (in one case) on a tender of a German bill of lading and an English policy of insurance and (in another case) on a tender of a German bill of lading and German policy of insurance.

Held, that the documents were not such as the sellers were entitled to tender to obtain payment of the price of the cargoes shipped, the documents at the date of the tender not being valid and effective; and that therefore the sellers were not entitled to recover payment of the goods against the documents.

Decision of Scrutton, J. (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 94; 113 L. T. Rep. 185) affirmed.

ARNHOLD KARBERG AND CO. (sellers) v. BLYTHE, GREEN, JOURDAIN, AND CO. LIMITED (buyers).

BOTH sellers and buyers were English firms.

The sellers sold to the buyers on a c.i.f. contract a quantity of horse beans to be shipped from China to Naples.

In July 1914 the beans were shipped on the German steamer Gernis for conveyance to Naples, the bills of lading being dated the 6th and 11th July respectively.

At the end of July the buyers insured part of the cargo against war risk; the remainder neither buyers nor sellers were able so to insure.

A declaration of one shipment was made on the 29th July and a provisional invoice was sent to the buyers on the same day.

The receipt of the declaration was confirmed by the buyers on the 13th Aug.

A declaration of the other part was made on the 1st Aug.; the provisional invoice was sent on the 12th Aug.; and receipt of the declaration was confirmed by the buyers on the 13th Aug.

On the 11th Oct. the German bills of lading and an English policy of insurance were tendered to the buyers, who refused to pay.

(a) Reported by E. A. SCRATCHLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The Gernis was in a port of refuge in the Dutch East Indies.

The question arose whether the sellers were entitled to payment against such documents at the expiration of three months from the date of the bills of lading.

Theodor Schneider and Co. (sellers) v. Burgett and Newsam (buyers).

Both sellers and buyers were English firms.

The sellers sold to the buyers on a c.i.f. contract a quantity of horse beans for shipment from China to European ports.

In July the sellers shipped beans in accordance with the contract by the German steamer Camilla Rickmers from Shanghai to Rotterdam, the bill of lading being dated the 21st July 1914.

Apparently no war insurances was effected.

On the 24th Aug. the sellers sent a declaration of the shipment to the buyers, who acknowledged receipt.

The court was not informed as to the date of provisional invoice.

On the 21st Oct. the sellers tendered to the buyers a German bill of lading and a German policy of insurance.

The buyers refused to pay.

The Camilla Rickmers was in a port of refuge in the Philippines.

The only differences between the two cases were that in Karberg's case the policy was English, while in Schneider's case it was German, and that in the former case two declarations and one provisional invoice were before the outbreak of the war, while in the latter case neither declaration nor provisional invoice was before the outbreak of the war. In both cases the acknowledgment of receipt of declaration was after the outbreak of the war.

It was decided by Scrutton, J. (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 94; 113 L. T. Rep. 185) that after the outbreak of war the sellers in both cases were not entitled to tender either the German bill of lading or the German bill of lading and the policy of insurance and to recover the price of the goods.

From that decision the sellers in both cases respectively now appealed.

George Wallace, K.C. and Stuart Bevan for the sellers in the first case; Maurice Hill, K.C. and Hon. Malcolm Macnaghten for the buyers.

R. A. Wright for the sellers in the second case; Raeburn for the buyers.

Swinfen Eady, L.J.—In these cases there are two appeals from the judgment of Scrutton, J. upon cases stated by arbitrators. There was an arbitration between sellers and buyers, and the learned judge decided in favour of the buyers that they were not obliged to pay against the documents tendered, and from that judgment the sellers now appeal.

The two cases before us closely resemble each other. But there are one or two points of difference. I think perhaps that it will be convenient to deal first with the case of Arnhold Karberg and Co. v. Blythe, Green, Jourdain, and Co., and then to mention the respects in which the second case differs from the first.

In the case of Arnhold Karberg and Co. v. Blythe, Green, Jourdain, and Co. the question arises upon two contracts made for the sale of 200 tons of China horse beans. They are c.i.f. contracts in the form approved by the London Corn Trade Association for use in Chinese and Manchurian cereal transactions. One is a contract in a printed form whereby the sellers, Arnhold Karberg and Co., of China, agreed to sell to Blythe, Green, Jourdain, and Co., of London, about 100 tons, of 2240lbs. English, of China horse beans. The two contracts related to 100 tons each, but they are both in the same form.

Then there is a provision for a small deficiency or a small excess. Then follow certain stipulations with regard to the quality, admixture of dirt, and so on, which are immaterial. Then as to shipment, it is provided that: "Shipment, to be shipped . . . from Hankow, and (or) port or ports on the Yangtse River . . . and bill or bills of lading to be dated . . . July 1914," —I should have said that the contract was made in May 1914—at the price of 6*l.* 6*s.* per ton gross weight delivered "shipped in good merchantable bags, gross weight"—bags included—"including freight, as per bill or bills of lading, and insurance" to Naples. So that the goods are to be shipped from Hankow to Naples at the price of 6*l.* 6*s.* per ton, cost, freight, and insurance.

Then comes "Payment, net cash in London, on arrival of the goods at the port of discharge, in exchange for bill or bills of lading and policies of insurance (free of war risk) on Lloyds' conditions, and including the London Corn Trade Association, F.P.A. clause, effected with approved underwriters, for whose solvency seller is not to be responsible. But payment to be made in no case later than three months from date of bill of lading, or upon the posting of the vessel at Lloyds as a total loss." Then follows this clause, upon which the appellants laid much stress: "In the event of war, should sellers not have received from buyers approved underwriters' policies and (or) certificates (with losses payable in England) for approximate invoice amount covering war risk three days prior to time of shipment, sellers shall have the right, if they think fit, and are able, to cover war risk for account and risk of buyers. If war risk is incurred during time of shipment sellers are empowered to insure same at the buyers' cost, if the latter fail to do so within twenty-four hours of the sellers' request for this to be done."

What happened was that the goods in question were shipped on a German ship, the Gernis, at Hankow, the bills of lading being dated the 6th and 11th July 1914. The ship after leaving Hankow, and after the outbreak of hostilities, took refuge in some Dutch East Indian port, where she remains. The next thing that happened, or that is treated as having happened, is that on the 11th Oct., being three months from the date of the bills of lading, there was a tender of the bills of lading and policy of insurance to the buyers, who refused to pay, and thereupon the sellers proceeded with this arbitration.

In the court below the date was fixed as being the 11th Oct., when there was a tender of the shipping documents. It does not appear whether the tender was ever actually made or not. It does not appear in the special case that such tender was made. I only mention the point to pass it by, because the parties are agreed that whether there was or was not a tender the tender was dispensed with. I mention it therefore in order to show that the point has been noticed. But nothing turns upon it, because it is treated as if there were a tender on the 11th Oct. whether there was an actual tender of these documents or not.

A second point which I should mention is this: According to the award of the arbitrators, it is adjudged that in the one case the sellers are to receive the whole price. Again, after the buyers had refused to pay, and refused to take up the documents, the cargo was at the disposal of the sellers, who have apparently dealt with it, and that would be a matter of adjustment of figures. If the sellers were wrong, they would be liable in damages. Again, I only mention that point in order to put it out of the question, because the parties are agreed that the sellers cannot recover the whole price, and that if they are entitled to recover they are quite able to adjust the figure themselves out of court, and they have not come here upon any dispute as to those figures. That, again, I only mention so that it may be put on one side.

The real contest between the parties is this: The sellers insist that first, according to the true construction of the particular contract with which we have to deal, the contract of May 1914, the buyers took upon themselves all risks of what might happen in the event of an outbreak of war. That is if the effect of the outbreak of war was to terminate the contract of affreightment it was at buyers' risk. If the contract of insurance should be with a foreign underwriter it was at buyers' risk whether it was valid or not. The point is that, according to the true construction of the clause, war and any consequences of war were at buyers' risk, and it was the duty of the buyers to take up and pay for the documents when tendered, because the events that have happened consequent upon the war were at their risk, and that was the contract between the parties. That is their first point, and that first point is dependent entirely upon the true construction of this particular contract.

The second point is of more general importance because it is independent of the construction of the particular contract. That second point is that in contracts c.i.f. all that the seller has to do is to ship goods in accordance with the contract, obtain proper bills of lading, effect proper insurances pursuant to the contract, and having done that, having once acquired documents that are proper and in order, thenceforward those documents are at the risk of buyers, and buyers must pay against tender of those documents. If before tender on the happening of any event those shipping documents become inoperative in any way that is at buyers' risk. And it is said that that is the ordinary consequence of a c.i.f. contract quite irrespective of the particular terms of any individual contract. Those are the two points that arose for discussion.

Before construing the clause upon which the first point turns, beginning "In the event of war," it will be observed that the previous clause providing for payment provides for the nature of the insurance which sellers are to effect. This is the insurance which is part of the terms of the contract included in the price: "In exchange for . . . policies of insurance (free of war risk) on Lloyd's conditions, . . . effected with approved underwriters, for whose solvency seller is not to be responsible." That means that the insurance for which the sellers are to pay, and which is included in the lump sum price, is to be an insurance on ordinary Lloyd's conditions, but with a warranty free of capture and seizure.

Those words there, "free of war risk," mean that it will be a sufficient compliance with this provision as to insurance if the sellers effect a policy in the ordinary Lloyd's form, the capture and seizure being an accepted peril. That is as if the policy contained the warranty in the settled form: "Warranted free of capture, seizure, and detention, and the consequences thereof, or any attempt thereat (piracy excepted), and also free from all consequences of hostilities or warlike operations, whether before or after declaration of war."

In my opinion that is the meaning of the phrase there, "free of war risk." That throws light upon what follows, because the next clause is, in my opinion, directed solely to the excepted perils: "In the event of war, should sellers not have received from buyers approved underwriters' policies," and so on, "for approximate invoice amount covering war risk"—now that means covering the risk that is excepted in the previous insurance—"sellers shall have the right, if they think fit and are able, to cover war risk for account and risk of buyers." That means that on the happening of that event it is open to the sellers, who themselves, of course, would run some risk in the matter because their buyers may not be in a position to accept and take up the shipping documents, to protect themselves by effecting an insurance against war risk at the cost of the buyers. Then "If war risk is incurred during time of shipment, sellers are empowered to insure same at the buyer's cost, if the latter fails to do so."

In my opinion the true construction of this clause, upon which so much reliance is placed by the appellants, is that it provides only for the war risk, that it is an excepted peril from the previous insurance, and that it provides that sellers may effect that insurance at the cost of buyers. But it has no further or other effect, and it does not, as the appellants contend, extend to throwing the risk of all consequences of the war and what may happen to any of the documents upon the buyers. In my opinion that point made by the appellants fails.

Then the larger and wider point remains, as to whether, quite apart from the special terms of the contract in the present case, it is sufficient for sellers, having once obtained documents which were valid shipping documents at the time when they were obtained, to tender those documents at the proper time and insist upon payment of the price. I say "to tender them at the proper time," but in my opinion no question really turns here upon what is the proper time, because by the terms of the contract the time is provided. Payment is to be made net cash in London, that is, payment against shipping documents, first, on arrival of the goods at the port of discharge (and that event has not happened); then, upon the posting of the vessel at Lloyd's as a total loss (and that has not happened); and then "in no case later than three months from the date of the bill of lading," or bills of lading. As the bills of lading are dated the 6th and 11th July the three months would expire on the 11th Oct., and that was the date at which, according to the contract, if everything else had been in order, the sellers were entitled to tender the documents and ask for payment. So that no question arises with regard to the proper date at which the sellers were entitled to require payment.

The real point is upon whom the loss is to fall where documents which were originally valid have become invalid before they were tendered. In my opinion, although there is no direct authority on the point, the decisions which have been given as to the effect of c.i.f. contracts and the language which is used in those cases, make it reasonably clear what the obligation of the seller is. In Ireland v. Livingston (27 L. T. Rep. 79; L. Rep. 5 E. & I. App. 395, at p. 406) Lord Blackburn—Blackburn, J. as he then was—in giving his opinion to the House of Lords, put it in this way: "The terms at a price 'to cover cost, freight, and insurance, payment by acceptance on receiving shipping documents,' are very usual, and are perfectly well understood in practice." Then after dealing with certain details which I need not read, he says: "Should the ship arrive with the goods on board he will have to pay the freight, which will make up the amount he has engaged to pay. Should the goods not be delivered in consequence of a peril of the sea, he is not called on to pay the freight, and he will recover the amount of his interest in the goods under the policy. If the non-delivery is in consequence of some misconduct on the part of the master or mariners, not covered by the policy, he will recover it from the shipowner. In substance, therefore, the consignee pays, though in a different manner, the same price as if the goods had been bought and shipped to him in the ordinary way." He deals with it as if in consequence of non-delivery through some misconduct of the master or mariners not covered by the policy there would be a right of action in the purchaser against the shipowner.

In considering what the actual position of the parties here was, there can be no doubt that the effect of the war upon the bills of lading was this, that as from the outbreak of war the contract with the German shipowners became dissolved. In the case of Esposito v. Bowden (7 Ell. & Bl. 763, at p. 783) the point was expressly dealt with. In that case Willes, J., in giving judgment in the Exchequer Chamber, said: "As to the mode of operation of war upon contracts of affreightment made before but which remain unexecuted at the time it is declared, and of which it makes this further execution unlawful or impossible, the authorities establish that the effect is to dissolve the contract, and to absolve both parties from further performance of it."

So that the effect was that as from the outbreak of war the owner of the German ship Gernis was absolved from the further performance of the contract evidenced by the bills of lading to carry the goods in question from Hankow to Naples. When he had put into the port in the Dutch East Indies he was under no further continuing liability to proceed with the voyage to Naples. The buyers would not obtain by delivery of the shipping documents to them a valid contract or undertaking to carry goods to Naples; that contract was at an end.

Willes, J. proceeds as follows: "Lord Tenterden also, in his work on shipping, states the law thus: 'Another general rule of law furnishes a dissolution of these contracts' (that is, for the carriage of goods in merchant ships) 'by matter extrinsic. If an agreement be made to do an act lawful at the time of such agreement, but afterwards, and before the performance of the act, the performance be rendered unlawful by the Government of the country, the agreement is absolutely dissolved. If, therefore, before the commencement of a voyage, war or hostilities should take place between the State to which the ship or cargo belongs and that to which they are destined, or commerce between them be wholly prohibited, the contract for conveyance is at an end, the merchant must unlade his goods, and the owners find another employment for their ship. And probably the same principles would apply to the same events happening after the commencement and before the completion of the voyage.'"

A little later on he says (at p. 787 of 7 Ell. & Bl.): "The argument which was again urged in this case, that, apart from any considerations affecting the shipowner only, the defence was valid by reason of the law also forbidding the charterer to load a cargo, and, as a consequence of that prohibition, dissolving the charter-party and absolving both parties from further performance, remains to be considered."

In the case of Janson v. Driefontein Consolidated Mines Limited (87 L. T. Rep. 372; (1902) A. C. 484) Lord Lindley said (at p. 509 of (1902) A. C.): "War produces a state of things giving rise to well-known special rules. It prohibits all trading with the enemy except with the Royal licence, and dissolves all contracts which involve such trading." Therefore the effect of the war was that at the time of the tender there was no subsisting contract for the carriage of the goods to Naples, and no subsisting contract upon which the buyers would have been able to maintain an action, seeing that the shipowner was a German subject.

In my opinion the cases which have had to deal with c.i.f. contracts have all proceeded upon the footing that upon delivery of the shipping documents the purchaser will obtain a right either to the goods or, if the goods are lost or damaged, to such claims in respect of the goods as the shipping documents may entitle him, not necessarily covering every loss or damage, but they were to be effective documents. And I think that the language used by the judges in dealing with c.i.f. contracts is only consistent with the view that the documents tendered are to be effective shipping documents, and that where the bill of lading becomes avoided by war it is not a sufficient compliance with the contract to tender it.

For instance, in Biddell Brothers v. E. Clemens Horst Company (104 L. T. Rep. 577; (1911) 1 K. B. 934) it was put in this way by Kennedy, L.J. (at p. 956 of (1911) 1 K. B.), whose judgment was approved in the House of Lords (105 L. T. Rep. 563; (1912) A. C. 18). "But the vendor, in the absence of special agreement, is not yet in a position to demand payment from the purchaser; his delivery of the goods to the carrier is, according to the express terms of sect. 32"—that is, of the Sale of Goods Act 1893—"only 'primâ facie deemed to be a delivery of the goods to the buyer'; and under sect. 28 of the Sale of Goods Act, as under the common law (an exposition of which will be found in the judgments of the members of the Exchequer Chamber in the old case of Startup v. Macdonald (6 M. & G. 593), a tender of delivery entitling the vendor to payment of the price must, in the absence of contractual stipulation to the contrary be a tender of possession."

How could the endorsement and delivery of a bill of lading which has become ineffective and which is at an end as evidencing a contract of affreightment be a tender of possession? Then the learned judge proceeds as follows: "How is such a tender to be made of goods afloat under a c.i.f. contract? By tender of the bill of lading, accompanied, in case the goods have been lost in transit, by the policy of insurance. The bill of lading in law and in fact represents the goods. Possession of the bill of lading places the goods at the disposal of the purchaser." He is dealing there obviously with a bill of lading which in law and in fact does represent the goods. That is not so in this case. He says: "Possession of the bill of lading places the goods at the disposal of the purchaser."

It does not do so in this case. The goods here are in the hands of the German shipowner. Then a little later the learned judge cites with approval a well-known passage from Bowen, L.J.'s judgment in Sanders Brothers v. Maclean and Co. (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 160; 49 L. T. Rep. 462; 11 Q. B. Div. 327) where Bowen, L.J. said (at p. 341 of 11 Q. B. Div.): "And for the purpose of passing such property in the goods and completing the title of the indorsee to full possession thereof, the bill of lading, until complete delivery of the cargo has been made on shore to someone rightfully claiming under it, remains in force as a symbol, and carries with it not only the full ownership of the goods, but also all rights created by the contract of carriage between the shipper and the shipowner. It is a key which in the hands of a rightful owner is intended to unlock the door of the warehouse, floating or fixed, in which the goods may chance to be."

How can that language be applied to a bill of lading which has ceased to be effective, and where the contract evidenced by it has become dissolved? How does it carry with it all rights created by the contract of carriage between the shipper and the shipowner? The contract is at an end. The contract itself is dissolved. In my opinion the language used in dealing with these c.i.f. contracts points to the fact that at the date of the tender the documents must be valid and effective documents.

In addition to that there is this further point, that the effect of requiring the buyers to accept the bill of lading in the present case might involve their entering into a contract with an alien enemy, and having to make payments to an alien enemy. If the endorsement of the bill of ladings were effective under the circumstances to make a valid transfer, it might make the buyers directly liable to the German owners for freight under the bill of lading.

Another point was urged. It was said that at all events no trading with the enemy not permitted by the proclamation would exist in the present case having regard to the terms of the proclamation of the 25th Sept. 1914. I really do not think that that proclamation touches the point. That proclamation of the 25th Sept. 1914 merely enables the owners of cargoes then lying in a neutral port in a ship owned by the enemy to pay the freight and other charges to the agent of the shipowner at that port to obtain possession of the cargo. In other words, the then holders of the bill of lading at the time of this proclamation—the shippers in this case—could have availed themselves of this proclamation to obtain delivery of the cargo at the port in the Dutch East Indies where the vessel was, by paying whatever charges had to be paid to obtain possession of the cargo without incurring the penalties of trading with the enemy. That is the only effect of that proclamation.

In my opinion the judgment below was right that the documents were not such documents as the sellers were bound to tender to obtain payment of the price; they had become ineffective, and the buyers were entitled to refuse to pay against them.

In the second case there is little difference. Certainly there is no difference in favour of the appellants, the difference is the other way. The cargoes are similar, but the dates are a little different. In the second case, the ship, the Camilla Rickmers, took refuge in the port of Manilla. But the main difference is that in that case there is an additional objection to the appellants succeeding, because the policy of insurance was effected with German underwriters, so that not only was there a German bill of lading, which was avoided by the war, but a German policy of insurance, which was also avoided by the war, and at the date of the tender the contracts evidenced by both of those documents were dissolved, and they were not subsisting contracts at the date of the tender.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the judgment below was right in both of the cases before us, and that the sellers were not bound to pay against the documents, and that accordingly the decision of Scrutton, J. ought to be affirmed.

Bankes, L.J.—We have had in these two cases a very full and interesting discussion on the question of the effect of the outbreak of war upon certain c.i.f. contracts entered into before the outbreak of war. I need not refer to the facts of the cases, which have been dealt with by Swinfen Eady, L.J. In my opinion the answer to the question which the court has to decide is to be found on the face of the contract in each case, and upon consideration of what the terms of that contract provides.

The contract on the part of the sellers is a contract for the sale of goods whereby the sellers also undertake (inter alia) to enter into a contract of affreightment to the appointed destination, which contract will be evidenced by the bill of lading; and secondly, to take out a policy or policies of insurance upon the terms current in the trade, but which policy or policies were not in this case to include war risks. On the buyers' part they undertook to pay net cash in London in exchange for the bill or bills of lading and policies of insurance, either on arrival of the goods at the port of discharge, or at the expiration of three months from the date of the bills of lading should the goods not sooner arrive, or on the posting of the vessel at Lloyd's as a total loss. In any case, however, the payment is to be in exchange for the bill or bills of lading and policy or policies of insurance.

What is the meaning of the buyers' contract thus expressed, that he is to pay in exchange for a bill of lading? In my opinion it means what it says, that in exchange for the price he is to receive a bill of lading which is still a subsisting contract of affreightment of the goods to the port of destination, and a policy or policies of insurance which is, or are, still, a subsisting contract, or subsisting contracts, of insurance. It is said that this construction, which seems to me so obviously the natural construction, ignores the fact that in a contract of this kind certain risks fall upon the buyer. I quite accept the contention that certain risks do fall upon the buyer. For instance, in the present cases all war risks fell on the buyers as the parties have agreed that the sellers shall be under no obligation to obtain policies covering war risks. I agree also that the condition of the goods at the time of the tender of the shipping documents is not material, nor is the value of the documents at the time of tender material. In all such matters the risk is on the buyer. He may be obliged to pay for goods although they may be at the bottom of the sea, or although through some unforeseen circumstance they may never arrive, or although they may have been lost owing to some cause not covered by the agreed form of policy. All these risks, however, are risks affecting the goods.

In effect the contention of the appellants appears to me to be a contention that one of the risks undertaken by the buyers is a risk affecting their contract and not the goods the subject-matter of the contract. I cannot agree with this view. It appears to me that the question of the construction of the contract must depend upon the language used, and not upon any such considerations as these. In the present case it is not disputed that the outbreak of war dissolved the contract of affreightment, and that so far as any further prosecution of the voyage was concerned the bill of lading was no longer an effective document. Under those circumstances, in my opinion, that bill of lading was not a bill of lading within the meaning of the contract in respect of which the sellers were under an obligation to pay cash in exchange.

Scrutton, J., in his judgment has used one expression with which I do not agree. The expression is the one in which he says that "the key to many of the difficulties arising in c.i.f. contracts is to keep firmly in mind the cardinal distinction that a c.i.f. sale is not a sale of goods, but a sale of documents relating to goods." I am not able to agree with that view of the contract, that it is a sale of documents relating to goods. I prefer to look upon it as a contract for the sale of goods to be performed by the delivery of documents, and what those documents are must depend upon the terms of the contract itself. The conclusion at which Scrutton, J. arrives he expresses in this way. He says, "It is clearly not essential that if the goods do not arrive the buyer should have a good claim on one of the contracts"—I have already dealt with that, and with that I fully agree—"but I think it is essential that each contract should be one into which he can legally enter as a contracting party, and when the legal relations of the seller under the contract of affreightment tendered have become void, and it is illegal for the buyer to enter into any similar legal relations with shipowner or insurer, I cannot hold that such documents are good tender."

He puts there two grounds upon which he bases his decision, and in so far as the first ground depends upon the construction of the contract I entirely agree with him. But the second ground he bases upon the contention apparently that it was illegal for the buyers to enter into any similar legal relation with the shipowner or the insurer, and upon that point we have had an extremely interesting discussion. Mr. Wright has contended that the taking of the bill of lading by the buyers in this particular case would not have involved him in any illegal contract, and he based it upon this ground that the bill of lading has ceased to be an operative contract of affreightment at all, and that the taking of it would not involve the buyers in any legal relations with the shipowner at all, and that it really remains a document of title in respect of the goods, which may or may not at some time or another be a valid one.

But Mr. Wright's answer to the contention that if the buyers took the bill of lading in this particular case it would involve them in an illegal contract with the shipowner seems to me to be a very strong ground for arriving at the conclusion that the contract is not a contract to take a perfectly valueless document, but it is a contract to take a bill of lading—an effective document. A document if it were really a bill of lading would involve the entering into of a contract with the German shipowner, and the fact that it is not that, and the fact that in consequence Mr. Wright's client could escape the consequences indicated here by Scrutton, J. seems to me to be a strong and conclusive argument against his contention that it satisfied the contract, and that this document, which no longer constituted a contract of affreightment, could be a good tender.

Mr. Wright further contended that it is not true to say that it is a piece of waste paper, because in so far as it covered the period from the time of shipment until the time this vessel took refuge it was an effective document, and some rights may still exist in respect of that period which may be evidenced by this bill of lading. How that may be I am not prepared to say. The contract has come to an end. It has not come to an end in the sense that Mr. Wright refers to where the goods are lost; it has not come to an end in the sense that although it is a perfectly good and enforceable contract it is valueless; but it has come to an end in the sense indicated by Willes, J. in Esposito v. Bowden (7 Ell. & Bl. 763). He says the contract is dissolved, which seems to me to be an entirely different thing and to involve entirely different consequences.

In my opinion this appeal fails, and the judgment of Scrutton, J., subject to the point which I have indicated, was correct.

WARRINGTON, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, and but for the extreme general importance of the question that we have to determine, I should have added nothing to what has been said by my learned brethren.

The question arises between the sellers and the buyers of goods under a c.i.f. contract, the question being whether in the events which have happened the sellers are by virtue of the contract entitled to be paid the contractual price for the goods. Scrutton, J. has held that they are not so entitled.

The first thing in dealing with a question of such a nature is to ascertain what is the true meaning and effect of the contract. The contract in the present case is an ordinary c.i.f. contract, that is to say, it is a bargain made by sellers of goods abroad for their shipment, for providing for their carriage to the port of destination, and for insuring the goods during the voyage, the buyers having to pay the cost of the goods, the freight, and the cost of the insurance. The provisions in the particular contract with which we have to deal with reference to the payment of the purchase money are that payment is to be: "Net cash in London, on arrival of the goods at port of discharge, in exchange for bill or bills of lading and policies of insurance (free of war risk) on Lloyd's condition . . . but payment to be made in no case later than three months from date of bill of lading or upon the posting of the vessel at Lloyd's as a total loss."

The effect of that provision is that the purchase money is to be paid in exchange for the shipping documents, to use a short expression, on the happening of the earliest of three events: either the arrival at the port of discharge, or the posting of the vessel at Lloyd's as a total loss, or the expiration of three months from the date of the bill of lading. In the present case the event which happened was the expiration of three months from the date of the bill of lading. On the happening of that event the payment was to be made in exchange for bill or bills of lading and policies of insurance. The sellers—I am dealing at present with Karberg's case only—tendered a policy of insurance with English underwriters, and so far there is no question. But they tendered a bill of lading signed on behalf of German shipowners, the goods having been laden on board a German ship prior to the outbreak of war, which ship on the outbreak of war or shortly afterwards took refuge in some port of the Dutch East Indies, and of course never arrived at her destination, which was Naples.

Was the tender of the bill of lading under those circumstances sufficient to entitle the sellers to receive payment of the goods? It is conceded, and it is undeniable that the effect of the outbreak of war was to dissolve the contract of affreightment. It is stated in terms in the judgment of Willes, J. in Esposito v. Bowden (7 Ell. & Bl. 763, at p. 783) in this way: "As to the mode of operation of war upon contracts of affreightment made before, but which remain unexecuted at the time it is declared, and of which it makes the further execution unlawful and impossible, the authorities establish that the effect is to dissolve the contract and to absolve both parties from further performance of it."

So far there is no question. But it is contended that the tender of a bill of lading which was properly obtained by the sellers at the time when it was obtained, notwithstanding that the contract of affreightment which is evidenced by it is dissolved, is a sufficient tender to entitle the sellers to the purchase money. The effect of such a contract, or rather the obligation of the seller under such a contract, is expressed by Hamilton, J. (as he then was) in Biddell Brothers v. E. Clemens Horst Company (103 L. T. Rep. 661; (1911) 1 K. B. 214) in the following terms; and that judgment of Hamilton, J. was ultimately affirmed by the House of Lords (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 80; 105 L. T. Rep. 563; (1912) A. C. 18), adopting the minority judgment of Kennedy, L.J. in the Court of Appeal.

Hamilton, J. said this, at p. 220 of (1911) 1 K.B: "A seller under a contract of sale containing such terms"—that is, a c.i.f. contract—"has firstly to ship at the port of shipment goods of the description contained in the contract; secondly, to procure a contract of affreightment, under which the goods will be delivered at the destination contemplated by the contract; thirdly, to arrange for an insurance upon the terms current in the trade, which will be available for the benefit of the buyer; fourthly, to make out an invoice as described by Blackburn, J. in Ireland v. Livingston (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 389; 27 L. T. Rep. 79; L. Rep. 5 E. & I. App. 395, at p. 406) or in some similar form; and, finally, to tender these documents to the buyer so that he may know what freight he has to pay and obtain delivery of the goods, if they arrive, or recover for their loss if they are lost on the voyage. Such terms constitute an agreement that the delivery of the goods, provided they are in conformity with the contract, shall be delivery on board ship at the port of shipment. It follows that against tender of these documents, the bill of lading, invoice, and policy of insurance, which completes delivery in accordance with that agreement, the buyer must be ready and willing to pay the price."

Incidentally I desire to say that I entirely agree with Bankes, L.J. in the remarks he has uttered about the statements made by Scrutton, J. that such a contract as this is a contract for the sale of documents. I need not say that it is with much deference that I express my disagreement with a statement of that sort made by a judge with such extensive knowledge of commercial matters as Scrutton, J. But it seems to me that it is not in accordance with the facts relating to these contracts. The contracts are contracts for the sale and purchase of goods. But they are contracts which may be performed in the particular manner indicated by that passage from the judgment of Hamilton, J. which I have just read; in particular that the delivery of the goods may be effected first by placing them on board ship; and, secondly, by transferring to the purchaser the shipping documents.

Is the obligation of the sellers which they have to fulfil performed by delivering what they have purported to do in the present case; a document which does not entitle the buyers to obtain delivery of the goods because it has ceased to be an effective contract of affreightment? In my opinion quite plainly not. In order truly to perform his contract he has to deliver documents by virtue of which the buyer may, if the goods are in existence, obtain delivery of the goods, and by virtue of which, if the shipowner has not fulfilled his obligation imposed by the contract of affreightment, he, the buyer, may have such remedies as the contract of affreightment would give him. Neither of those conditions is fulfilled by the delivery of a document evidencing a contract which has been dissolved by the outbreak of war, and the further performance of which has become impossible.

But then it is said that, however, that may be in the case of an ordinary c.i.f. contract, one not containing such provisions, it does not apply to the present case because this contains a special provision throwing upon the buyers all risks arising from the outbreak of war. In my opinion that is not the case on the true construction of this contract. The obligation of the sellers is to effect a marine insurance for the ordinary risks—that is to say, excluding war risks. The reference to the further policy against war risks is inserted for the further protection of the sellers, so that if they please, and if the event falls within the specification in the contract, at the buyers' risk, they may further protect themselves by effecting a policy against war risks; but that is all. It does not affect in any way the true construction and effect of the contract as to what is the sellers' obligation in order effectively to transfer to the buyers the goods if they are in existence, or an effective policy of insurance should the goods be lost by any of the events covered by this policy. In my opinion in Karberg's case the bill of lading not being an effective contract of affreightment at the time of the tender, the delivery of that, or the tender of that, was not a sufficient tender of a bill of lading to entitle the sellers to recover the price of the goods.

In Schneider's case, the second of the two cases, it is unnecessary to add anything, because that case is less favourable to the sellers than Karberg's case, inasmuch as not only was the bill of lading a contract with a German, but the policy of insurance was a contract with a German.

There is only one other point, and that is the point that under the licence of the Board of Trade of the 25th Sept. 1914, the buyers were released from all illegality there might otherwise be in any possible dealings they might have with the shipowner. In my opinion that is not the true effect of the Board of Trade licence. The Board of Trade licence in my judgment only effects this, that it enables the owner of the goods, whoever he may be, without infringing the law against trading with the enemy to go to the neutral port where the ships are, and there make such bargain as he can with the owner of the ship in which the goods are placed in order to obtain possession of his goods or payment of freight and other necessary charges.

But more than that, I think it is established by Esposito v. Bowden (7 Ell. & Bl. 763), both by the judgment of the Court of King's Bench and by the judgment of the Court of Exchequer Chamber, that such a licence of the Board of Trade could not set up again a contract which had become dissolved according to the well settled principles of law by the outbreak of the war.

On the whole, in my judgment, the present appeals ought to be dismissed. Appeals dismissed.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Thursday, Dec. 9, 1915.

(Before Bailhache, J.)

Weis and Co. Limited v. Credit Colonial et Commercial. (a)

Contract—Charter-party—Delivery of documents after outbreak of war—Goods in English ship captured by enemy—Whether documents properly tendered.

The question of the validity of documents tendered depends upon their validity at the date of tender and not upon the question whether or not they comply with the contract and declaration.

By a contract dated the 23rd June 1914 the plaintiffs sold to the defendants certain Manchurian Soya bean oil c.i.f from Eastern ports to Antwerp. There were two ships concerned, the G., an English ship, in respect of which the cargo was declared on the 3rd July, and the U. R., a German vessel, the cargo in which was declared on the 31st July. At the outbreak of war the latter ship became the ship of an alien enemy. The relative bills of lading and insurance policy were never tendered, but the date of their tender was taken to be at the 18th Aug. As to the G., she and her cargo were seized by the enemy on the high seas and taken to Hamburg, so that at the time when the documents were tendered to the buyers the contract had become impossible owing to the seizure.

Held, that, so far as the cargo on the German vessel was concerned, the tender of documents was bad; that as to the goods on board the English ship the tender of the documents was a good tender inasmuch as the performance of the contract as between buyer and seller would not at the time have been illegal. There was no illegality in calling on the buyer to deliver at Antwerp, because if he could have got his ship to Antwerp it would have been perfectly legal. The buyers were therefore liable.

Award stated in the form of a special case:—

1. By a contract dated the 23rd June 1914, Messrs. Charles Weis and Co. Limited, hereinafter called the "sellers," sold to Messrs. Credit Colonial et Commercial, Antwerp, hereinafter called the "buyers," about 10,000 cases Manchurian and Japanese bean oil of fair average quality in cases containing two tins of about 37lb. each, shipped afloat from an Oriental port by steamer or steamers direct or indirect and with or without transhipment at the price therein named, cost, freight, and insurance, to Antwerp.

2. By clause 2, particulars of shipment, with date of bill or bills of lading, marks, and numbers of cases, if any, were to be duly declared by the original seller in writing with due dispatch, and under no circumstances later than the arrival of the steamer. Should the vessel arrive before receipt of appropriation and extra expenses be incurred, such expenses were to be paid by sellers. . . . In case of resale, copy of original appropriation should be accepted by the buyers if passed on without delay. . . . Provisional invoice to be computed on net shipping weights. Each shipment to stand as a separate contract.

3. By clause 4, buyers were to pay the full amount of provisional invoice made out on net shipping weights by cash without discount against shipping documents on or before arrival of steamer and (or) steamers in Antwerp, or three months after notice of arrival of documents in London, whichever may happen first.

4. By clause 10, any dispute on the contract was to be settled by arbitration in London as soon as it might arise in accordance with the rules endorsed on the contract, such arbitration to be claimed within fourteen days from the final date of discharge.

5. By rule 1, endorsed on the said contract, any dispute arising out of the contract should be referred to arbitration in London, each party appointing one arbitrator, to be a person engaged in the oil and (or) tallow trades, and such arbitrators should have the power to appoint an umpire, to be a person engaged in the oil and (or) tallow trades, whose decision in case of disagreement was to be final in the absence of appeal. A true copy of the said contract with the rules endorsed and of the acceptance by the buyers of the said contract are annexed hereto, and can be referred to as part of this award and special case.

6. Prior to the shipment herein mentioned the said contract had to be fulfilled to the extent of 4500 cases, and no question arises in respect of them.

7. On or about the 3rd and 10th days of July 1914 the sellers declared to the buyers 1000 and 2000 cases respectively of bean oil (which had been shipped on or about the 11th May 1914 on the steamship Glenearn, a British vessel, for Antwerp), in part further fulfilment of the said contract, and also rendered to the buyers provisional invoices showing the amount due computed in accordance with the contract.

8. On or about the 31st day of July 1914 the sellers declared to the buyers 2000 cases and 500 cases respectively of bean oil (which had been shipped on or about the 1st May 1914 on the steamship Ursula Rickmers, a German vessel, for Antwerp) in further fulfilment of the said contract, and also rendered to the buyers provisional invoices showing the amount due computed in accordance with the said contract. Three copies of the said declaration and invoices are annexed hereto and can be referred to as part of this award and special case.

8a. On the 31st July 1914 war broke out between Belgium and Germany, and on the 4th Aug. 1914 between this country and Germany.

9. On or about the 5th Aug. 1914 the sellers notified the buyers in writing that the documents relating to 3000 c/s bean oil per steamship Glenearn c/d 23rd June No. 4532 had arrived in London on the 27th May, and asking for payment on the 27th Aug. in accordance with the contract, and on the 18th Aug. the sellers asked the buyers if they claimed moratorium, in which case interest would be claimed at 6 per cent. per annum, and on or about the 5th Aug. the sellers notified the buyers in writing that documents relating to 2500 c/s bean oil per steamship Ursula Rickmers c/d 23rd June No. 4532 had arrived in London on the 18th May, and asking for payment on the 19th Aug., in accordance with the said contract, and on the 18th Aug. they asked the buyers if they claimed moratorium, in which case interest would be charged at 6 per cent. per annum.

10. On the 27th Aug. the buyers replied to both communications of the 18th Aug. that they claimed moratorium, and agreed the rate of interest at 6 per cent. per annum. . . .

11. On the 25th Aug. the sellers informed the buyers that with respect to the 2500 c/s bean oil per steamship Ursula Rickmers, they granted the buyers one month's extension according to the moratorium then prevailing, and enclosing debit note for one month's interest.

12. On the 28th Aug. the sellers wrote to the buyers a similar letter with respect to the 3000 c/s bean oil per steamship Glenearn, and enclosed debit note for interest.

13. On the 16th Sept. 1914 the sellers, referring to the shipment by the steamship Ursula Rickmers, wrote to the buyers stating that as they had heard nothing from them they presumed they wished to have the moratorium extended for another month, and inclosed debit note for interest thereon up to the 18th Oct. 1914, and on the 4th Nov. the sellers wrote to the buyers inclosing further debit note for interest up to that date with respect to the shipments both by the Glenearn and the Ursula Rickmers, and calling upon them, as the moratorium expired on that date, to take up the documents for all the above goods. Some further correspondence took place between the parties, a copy of which, together with a copy of the letters hereinafter mentioned, is attached hereto, and can be referred to as part of this award and special case.

13a. The Glenearn has since war broke out been seized and taken to Hamburg. The Ursula Rickmers was in Hamburg at the outbreak of war.

14. The buyers did not take up the said documents in accordance with the said letter of the 4th Nov. 1914.

15. A dispute has arisen between the sellers and the buyers, the buyers claiming that the documents were not a good tender, and did not comply with the provisions of the contract that in any event they were entitled to avail themselves of the moratorium declared in Belgium and to postpone payment for the said bean oil until the end of that moratorium, the sellers on the other hand claiming that the tender was good and that payment became due on the expiration of the British moratorium.

The said dispute was referred to arbitration in accordance with the terms of the said contract, and Mr. Alexander Knight, of 4, St. Mary Axe, E.C., was appointed arbitrator on behalf of the buyers, and Mr. C. Knight, of Exchange Chambers, St. Mary Axe, E.C., was appointed arbitrator on behalf of the sellers, and the said arbitrators having failed to agree appointed me, the undersigned John Westall Pearson, of 29, Great St. Helens, in the City of London, umpire.

Subject to the opinion of the court on the case hereinafter stated, I do hereby award and determine that the tenders made by the sellers were good, and that the buyers were only entitled to claim the benefit of the British moratorium, and not the Belgian; and I further award that the buyers do forthwith take up the said documents and pay to the sellers the sum of 2374*l.* 7*s.* 5*d.* in respect of the bean oil shipped on board the steamship Glenearn with interest thereon at the rate of 6*l.* per cent. per annum from the 27th day of August 1914 to the 4th day of November, and at the rate of 5*l.* per cent. per annum from that day until payment, and the sum of 1293*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.* in respect of the bean oil shipped on board the steamship Ursula Rickmers, with interest thereon at the rate of 6*l.* per cent. per annum from the 18th day of November, and at the rate of 5*l.* per cent per annum from that date until payment.

I further award and determine that the costs of this award, which I hereby assess at 70*l.*, shall be borne and paid by the buyers, and if the sellers should in the first instance pay the same, the amount so paid shall be forthwith repaid by the buyers to the sellers.

The parties requested me to state my award in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court, and I accordingly stated the following case:—

Case.

The sellers contended on the reference:—

(a) That the contract was an English contract made in London, and the parties intended thereby to submit themselves to English law. (b) That by the contract the place at which the shipping documents were to be taken up was London, where payment was to be made up in British sterling. (c) That in the alternative, by the usage of the trade, the shipping documents are always taken up in London against payment in London in sterling cash, and are then transmitted to agents in Antwerp to enable the Antwerp buyer to obtain delivery of the goods from the ship on her arrival without delay. (d) That an agreement was entered into as appears by the said correspondence that the British moratorium was to be the moratorium to be applied to this contract.

The buyers contended on the reference: (a) That at the time the contract was entered into they carried on business only in Antwerp. (b) That by the terms of the contract payment was to be made by cash against shipping documents, which in every case were tendered in Antwerp, and payment was made, therefore, in that city. (c) That they were entitled to claim the benefit of the Belgian moratorium, which was still in force, and that therefore the time for payment had not arrived. (d) That, the Ursula Rickmers being a German ship, the documents tendered were void at the date of tender by reason of the war. (e) That the declaration of the Ursula Rickmers was not made within forty-two days of the date of the bill of lading. (f) That the provisional invoice in the case of the Glenearn did not contain the date of the bill of lading and was therefore defective. (g) That there was no evidence to support the alleged usage of trade, that it was contrary to the whole course of dealing between the parties. (h) That the sellers' claim for interest after the 4th Nov. 1914 was only consistent with the Belgian moratorium being alone applicable. (i) That the contract was signed by the buyers in Antwerp. (j) That by reason of the seizure of the Glenearn by the Germans the buyers are discharged from taking up the documents, as otherwise trading with the enemy would be involved.

I find as facts: (a) That the cases of bean oil were duly shipped in accordance with the contract, and were afloat at the time the contract was made. (b) That all the particulars of the respective shipments required by the contract, including the date of the bill of lading in the case of the Glenearn (although the said date was not given in the said particulars), were given with due despatch. That proper insurances were effected and that provisional invoices were rendered in accordance with the terms of the said contract. (c) That the tender in the case of the Glenearn did not contain the date of the bill of lading. That, the contract being for the sale of goods afloat, the omission of the date of the bill of lading was a matter of importance. That the buyers made no objection to the said tender or to the omission of the date of the bill of lading until May 1915. I find that the buyers waived their right (if any) to make any objection to the tender on the ground aforesaid or at all. (d) That according to the usages of the trade the original Oriental shippers' draft is attached to the shipping documents; that such documents are then taken up in London or before the arrival of the steamer at destination by the English merchant (who appears on the contract as seller) and paid for by him in London in cash, and which documents are then transmitted by him through his bank to Antwerp, when they are handed over to the Antwerp buyer in exchange for payment in equivalent Belgian currency. (e) That the British moratorium which fixed the rate of interest at 6*l.* per cent. per annum expired on the 4th day of November 1914, and the buyers agreed to pay interest at the rate of 6*l.* per cent. per annum. (f) That the Belgian moratorium is still in existence, having been established on the second day of August 1914, modified on the 6th day of August 1914, and renewed thereafter from time to time. The rate of interest provided by the said moratorium was fixed at the legal rate in Belgium, which is 5½ per cent. in all commercial matters. (g) That the original contract was signed by the sellers in London, and that the acknowledgment thereof was signed by the buyers in Antwerp. (h) That the Ursula Rickmers was a German vessel.

The questions of law for the opinion of the court on the facts found by me are: (1) Whether the tender of the documents in the case of the Ursula Rickmers was void at the date of the tender by reason of the war. (2) Whether the buyers were discharged from taking up the documents in the case of the Glenearn by reason of her seizure by the Germans. (3) Whether the buyers were entitled to claim the benefit of the Belgian moratorium.

If the court should answer the first question in the affirmative, then my award so far as it relates to the said sum of 1923*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.* is to be set aside, and I award in the event that nothing is due from the buyers to the sellers in respect of the shipment by the Ursula Rickmers, but otherwise my award is to stand. If the court should answer the second question in the affirmative, then my award so far as it relates to the said sum of 2374*l.* 7*s.* 5*d.* and interest thereon is to be set aside, and I award in that event that nothing is due from the buyers to the sellers in respect of the shipment by the Glenearn, but otherwise my said award is to stand.

If the court should answer the first two questions in the negative and should answer the third question in the affirmative, then any award so far as it relates to the times at which the said documents should be taken up and payment made is to be set aside, and in that event I award and determine that the said buyers do take up the said documents and pay the said sums of 1923*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.* and 2374*l.* 7*s.* 5*d.* respectively on the termination of the said Belgian moratorium with interest thereon in the meantime after the rate of 6*l.* per cent. per annum until the 4th Nov. 1914, and thereafter at the rate fixed by the Belgian moratorium, but otherwise my said award is to stand.

Bailhache, J.—This is an arbitration between the buyer and the seller of certain parcels of soya bean oil, some barrels of which were shipped on board an English ship called the Glenearn and some other barrels of which were shipped on a German ship called the Ursula Rickmers. Both shipments were made before the declaration of war, and they were made pursuant to a contract between the parties dated the 23rd June 1914. The contract was a c.i.f. contract, and the port of delivery was Antwerp. Declarations were made in due course of these barrels of oil, the one on board the Glenearn being made on the 3rd July and the one on board the Ursula Rickmers rather later, on the 31st July. These declarations were accompanied by the provisional invoices. So far everything was in order, and everything would have been in order but for the outbreak of war on the 4th Aug. The result of the outbreak of war was that the Ursula Rickmers became a ship of an alien enemy. The documents, the relative bills of lading and policies of insurance, were not tendered, perhaps never tendered at all, but the date of tender must be taken to be the 18th Aug. 1914. It seems to be settled law that the question of the validity of the documents tendered depends on their validity at the date of the tender, and not upon the question whether or not they comply with the contract and declaration. The result of that was that by the 18th Aug. the documents, so far as they related to the German ship, were documents which it was not permissible to tender. The matter is covered by authority (see Arnhold Karberg and Co. v. Blythe, Green, Jourdain, and Co. Limited, 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 94; 113 L. T. Rep. 185; 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 235; 114 L. T. Rep. 152); and, as the cases stand at present, I am governed by authority. Therefore, without applying my own mind to the matter at all, I hold that, as far as the tender of the documents relating to the oil on board the German ship is concerned, the tender was bad. That answers the first question put to me by the arbitrators in the affirmative: "Whether the tender of the documents in the case of the Ursula Rickmers was void at the date of the tender by reason of the war." To that I say, "Yes."

The next question they ask relates to the documents in the case of the Glenearn, the English ship seized by the Germans. So far as that vessel is concerned, the matter stands on a different footing. The Glenearn was and, of course, after the war, continued to be an English ship. Unfortunately, before the documents were tendered, she was seized somewhere on the high seas and brought to Hamburg. Therefore at the time the documents were tendered to the buyers the contract between buyer and seller had become impossible of performance by reason of seizure of the Glenearn with the barrels of oil on board. The question is as to whether that made the tender of the documents by the Glenearn a bad tender. It has been argued by Mr. Maurice Hill on behalf of the buyers that the tender was bad on the ground that it involved a trading with the enemy, the trading with the enemy being a transhipment from Hamburg to Antwerp of these barrels of oil; but upon the whole I have come to the conclusion that the tender of these documents was a good tender notwithstanding the fact that the Glenearn had been seized and taken to Hamburg. It is quite true that at the time of the tender the contract had become impossible of performance by reason of the seizure of the Glenearn, but in considering whether there was any illegality in the contract I have to consider, I think, whether there was any illegality as between the two parties thereto. As between the buyer and the seller clearly there was no illegality in tendering the documents which called for delivery at Antwerp. Antwerp at the time had not fallen; it was still in the possession of the Belgians. There was no illegality in calling upon the shipowner to deliver at Antwerp either, because if he could have got his ship to Antwerp it would have been a legal thing to do. The trouble was that there was an impossibility of performance. I do not think the impossibility of performance prevents the tender of the documents from being a valid tender. The real truth of the matter is that the trouble about the tender was that the policy of insurance which the sellers had to offer was a policy which contained the usual f. c. & s. clause, and of course such a policy gave the buyers no opportunity of recovering their money from anybody. They were not in the least likely to get delivery, and they had no policy under which they could recover from the underwriters. That is the real explanation of the trouble. But when one comes to consider the position as regards the policy of insurance, it appears that this is a matter which really does not help the buyers in the present case. It is most unfortunate for them; but it gives them no right to decline to pay. It is quite obvious that in the case of a ship sailing before the war broke out, as the Glenearn did, that a policy with the f. c. and s. clause was a sufficient policy for the sellers to procure. If the buyers desire to have protection against war risk, they might have taken out a war risk policy. Had they done so this trouble would never have arisen. I should long hesitate to say that the buyers ought to take such a precaution in a case where they are unaware of the ship on which their goods are loaded, or unaware of the position of that ship. In this particular case, however, the buyers well knew and had notice early in July that the particular vessel which was carrying their oil was the Glenearn, and they had the opportunity to cover themselves against war risk had they been so minded. In my judgment the mere fact that the goods had in the meantime been seized by the Germans is no answer to the liability of the buyers in this case; it is a liability against which they could, if they liked, have provided and protected themselves by insurance. So far as the Glenearn is concerned, I think the arbitrator's decision is right, and I therefore answer the question as to the Glenearn by saying that the buyers were not discharged from taking up the documents in the case of the Glenearn by reason of her seizure by the Germans.

There is a third question put to me—namely, whether the buyers were entitled to claim the benefit of the Belgian moratorium. That depends upon the construction of two letters—one from the sellers to the buyers dated the 18th Aug. 1914, and the reply from the buyers to the sellers dated the 27th Aug. 1914. I have no hesitation in saying that the moratorium of which the buyers were desirous of obtaining the protection was the British and not the Belgian moratorium. I therefore answer the question by saying that the buyers were not entitled to claim the benefit of the Belgian moratorium. I do not mean to say that they would not, under any circumstances, have been entitled to claim it, but here they did not claim it in fact, and they agreed with the sellers that the moratorium of which they did claim the benefit should be the British one. Mr. Leslie Scott asked me to say that these two letters constituted a contract between the buyer and the seller by which the buyer undertook to take the documents both in the case of the German ship and in the case of the Glenearn, and to pay what was due upon those documents at the expiration of the moratorium. It is quite possible, of course, that such a contract might be made, and it is quite possible that such a contract might be made by both parties in ignorance of the law as to the German ship: but I should myself require very plain words in letters passing between buyer and seller to induce me to hold that such a contract was in fact made. When those letters were written neither party had his mind directed the least bit in the world to the validity of the document; and the whole point that they had in view when they wrote these letters was the question of the delay in payment on the assumption that the documents were valid documents when tendered. I am quite clear that the buyers did not by those letters enter into a contract to render themselves liable to pay in respect of the documents relating to the oil on board the German ship. The result is that the sellers lose so far as the German ship is concerned, and the buyers lose so far as the English ship is concerned.

Order accordingly.

Charter-party—Time charter—Restraint of princes—Whether charterers relieved from hire—Whether commercial object of voyage frustrated.

The commercial frustration of an adventure by delay means the happening of some unforeseen delay without the fault of either party to a contract of such a character as that by the fulfilment of the contract in the only way in which fulfilment is contemplated and practicable is so inordinately postponed as that its fulfilment when the delay is over will not accomplish the only object or objects which both parties to the contract must have known that each of them had in view at the time when they made the contract, and for the accomplishment of which object or objects the contract was made.

In June 1914 a ship was chartered for two Baltic rounds. Having left Hull, laden with coal, she was sub-chartered for a voyage from Finland to Blyth, Northumberland. The hire of the steamship was paid by the charterers to the owners in advance up to the 14*th Aug. On the* 2*nd Aug. the vessel was detained by the Russian Government, war having broken out on the* 1*st Aug. between Russia and Germany. On the* 14*th Aug the owners directed the captain to remain in port at Kotka, and on the* 28*th Aug. the British Consul at the same place was directed to repatriate the crew, which was done. The charter-party contained a clause providing in what events payment of hire was to cease, but did not include restraint of princes, rulers, and people, although that was in the general exceptions clause. The hire was paid up to but not since the* 14*th Aug.* 1914.

Disputes having been referred, arbitrators, by a first award, found that in the circumstances no time hire was due, but subject to the opinion of the court as to the meaning of the words "restraint of princes," &c., in the charter-party. By a second award the arbitrators found that at no time between the 14*th Aug. and the* 20*th Oct.* 1914 was there any reasonable probability of the vessel proceeding on her chartered voyage, and that no voyage could have been undertaken between those dates which would not have involved risk of capture, and that the commercial adventure had been frustrated.

Held, that the charterers were liable for hire; that the telegram of the owners directing repatriation of the crew did not amount to a withdrawal of the ship; that even if the vessel was detained by "restraint" that did not excuse payment of hire; and that in finding "frustration" as a fact the arbitrators had misdirected themselves, inasmuch as delay due to a cause contemplated and provided for by the charter-party, even though the delay itself is protracted beyond what might have been expected, does not amount to frustration of the adventure.

AWARD stated in the form of a special case:—

1. Differences having arisen between the Admiral Shipping Company Limited (hereinafter called "the owners") and Weidner, Hopkins, and Company of Newcastle-upon-Tyne (hereinafter called "the charterers") under a contract of affreightment dated the 2nd June 1914, for the hire of the steamship Auldmuir, as to whether any time hire is due by the charterers to the owners during the time the said vessel has been and is stopped at the port of Kotka in the Gulf of Finland, such differences and any other matters incidental thereto were by agreement dated the 25th Sept. 1914, and made between the owners of the one part and the charterers of the other part, referred to the arbitrament, &c., of Thomas Walter Purchas and George Morrel Stamp, and an umpire, if necessary, appointed by the said arbitrators, whose decision, or the decision of any two of them, should be final and binding upon all parties.

2. [Reciting disagreement of arbitrators and appointment of umpire.]

3. And whereas Thomas Walter Purchas, George Morrel Stamp, and William Robertson Heatley, having on the 21st Oct. 1914 heard and considered the evidence and arguments of both parties, find that the following facts were proved or admitted: (a) By the said charter-party dated the 22nd June 1914 the owners agree to let and the charterers to hire the said steamship Auldmuir for two Baltic rounds, commencing as therein mentioned. The said charter-party and the copy bills of lading which were put in evidence at the said hearing are fastened together and appended hereto and are to be deemed part of this case. (b) The said steamship was delivered to the charterers on the 29th June 1914. She left Hull on the 4th July for Cronstadt with a cargo of coals. (c) By a charter-party dated the 9th July 1914, and made between the charterers as time-chartered owners of the said steamship and Pyman, Bell, and Co. as charterers, the said steamship was chartered for a voyage from Sorfs, in Finland, to, amongst other places, Blyth, in Northumberland. (d) On the 17th July, having discharged her cargo of coals at Cronstadt, the said steamship left for Viborg and Kotka to load a cargo of wood goods for Blyth. (e) The said steamship arrived at Viborg on the 18th July and there loaded part of her cargo. She left Viborg on the 25th July and arrived at Kotka on the 26th July for the purpose of receiving the balance of her cargo. (f) On the 30th July 1914 the agents of the owners, by telegram addressed to the said steamship at Kotka, instructed the captain of the said steamship to hurry departure from Kotka. (g) On the 1st Aug. the loading of the said steamship was completed at Kotka, and bills of lading in respect of the cargo were duly signed, and the said steamship was on that day ready to sail for Blyth. (h) On the 1st Aug. the customs authorities at Kotka refused to allow the said steamship to be cleared or to authorise her to leave Kotka. On the same day a state of war came into existence between Russia and Germany. (i) Notwithstanding the said refusal of the said customs authorities, the captain of the said steamship sailed with the said steamship from Kotka on the 1st Aug. (j) When the said steamship arrived in the neighbourhood of Revel (in the Gulf of Finland) she was stopped by the Russian naval authorities and ordered back to Kotka, where she returned on or about the 2nd Aug. (k) The hire for the said steamship had been paid by the charterers to the owners in advance up to and including the 14th Aug. 1914, and no hire has since been paid. (l) On the 14th Aug. the agents of the owners, by telegram addressed to the said steamship at Kotka, instructed the captain of the said steamship to remain in port and await further orders, and on the 19th Aug. the said agents telegraphed to the British Consul at Kotka that the said steamship must remain in port. (m) On the 25th Aug. the said agents of the owners by telegram instructed the British Consul at Kotka to repatriate the crew of the said steamship (other than the captain and chief engineer). (n) The said steamship has been detained at Kotka by or in consequence of the Russian naval authorities as aforesaid, and at the date of the hearing of the evidence herein—namely, the 20th Oct.—the said steamship was still so detained.

4. A copy of the correspondence put in evidence is appended hereto for the purpose of reference in the event of the point of law being argued before the court and for the purpose of identification is marked "b" and initialled by the undersigned William Robertson Heatly.

5. On behalf of the owners it was contended that the words "restraints of princes, rulers, and people" contained in the charter-party of the 22nd June did not under the circumstances above mentioned relieve the charterers from the obligation to pay hire, and that they continued liable for the hire of the said steamship notwithstanding the detention of the said steamship at Kotka. They further contended that the charter-party contained a clause providing in what events payment of hire was to cease, and, "restraints of princes, of rulers, and people" not being one of such events, the exception of "restraints of princes, rulers, and people" contained in the general exceptions clause must be disregarded in connection with the cessation of hire. They also contended that as the said steamship was burdened with obligations to third parties by reason of the presence of cargo on board shipped under the charter-party of the 9th July, and in respect of which bills of lading had been signed, the charterers were liable for the hire of the said steamship. It was further contended on behalf of the owners that the owners by communicating with the captain of the said steamship did not commit a breach of the charter-party, but that they were justified in so communicating, having regard to the circumstances, and that though the crew, with the exception of the captain and chief engineer, had been repatriated, the said steamship was still efficient and efficiently manned for the purpose required of her—viz., lying at Kotka. Further, that repatriation of the crew as aforesaid took place after the initial breach of the charter-party by the charterers in failing to pay the hire due on the 14th Aug. 1914.

6. On behalf of the charterers it was contended that the meaning and intention of the parties to the charter-party of the 22nd June 1914 must be ascertained at the time the charter-party was entered into. That both parties at the time meant and intended by the expression "restraints of princes, rulers, and people . . . always mutually excepted" that this had relation to the use and hire of the said steamship, and that in the event of the use of the said steamship being restrained by princes, rulers, or people, no hire was due from the charterers during such restraint. They further contended that the owners had committed breaches of the said charter-party of the 22nd June: (a) By instructing the captain by the telegram of the 13th July to hurry his departure from Kotka. (b) In ordering by the telegram of the 14th Aug. the captain to remain in port. (c) By removing the crew from the said steamship, and that under no circumstances could hire be due on and after the 14th Aug.

7. Now we, the undersigned arbitrators and umpire, find and award (subject to the opinion of the court if either of the parties should decide to take it upon the question of law hereinafter mentioned) that no time hire is due by the charterers to the owners during the time the said vessel has been at the said port of Kotka under the circumstances aforesaid.

8. (Provision as to costs.)

9. If either of the parties should decide to take the opinion of the court then the question for the court is whether upon the facts herein stated and the true construction of the charter-party of the 22nd June, we are right in finding an award or whether the charterers are liable to pay any hire to the owners during the time the said vessel has been and is stopped at the said port of Kotka under the circumstances aforesaid.

10. If the court should hold that the charterers are liable to pay hire to the owners during the time the said vessel has been stopped at the said port of Kotka under the circumstances aforesaid then we find the amount hereof to be the sum of 1897*l.* 8*s.* 4*d.* up to and including the 20th Oct. 1914 (being the date of the hearing of the said arbitration), and we award that the charterers do pay that sum to the owners with interest at 5*l.* per cent. per annum from the date of this award until payment.

11. If the court should hold that the charterers are liable to pay hire to the owners during the time the said vessel has been and is stopped at the said port of Kotka under the circumstances aforesaid then we award and direct that the owners and the charterers shall bear and pay their own costs and expenses of and incidental to the reference, and that the charterers do pay the costs, amounting to 74*l.*, relating to this award, including our fees as arbitrators and umpire respectively.

12. In any event we leave to the court the costs of all proceedings subsequent to this award.

By a supplementary award dated the 21st Sept. 1915 the arbitrators found—

(a) That at no time between the 14th Aug. and the 20th Oct. was there any reasonable probability of the steamship Auldmuir proceeding with the chartered voyage in such a time as that the commercial adventure would not have been frustrated; (b) that no voyage could have been taken from Kotka between the 14th Aug. and the 20th Oct. 1914 which would not have involved risk of seizure or capture by a foreign ruler;

(c) that neither the charterers nor their agents had been given any information as to or were aware of the facts contained in the telegram of the 30th July 1914 (referred to in clause 3 (f) of the special case), in the telegrams of the 14th and 19th Aug. 1914 (referred to in clause 3 (l) of the special case), and in that of the 28th Aug. 1914 (referred to in clause 3 (m) of the special case) before the 19th Oct., the day previous to the day on which the matter first came before the arbitrators.

Leck, K.C. (Raeburn with him) for the owners:—Under a time charter such as this, the charterers are entitled to the vessel for the time. Here they have sub-charterered, and while they or their sub-contractors continue to use the ship the adventure is not frustrated. The ship is merely detained. [BAILHACHE, J.—Delay may cause very effective frustration.] The case of Hadley v. Clark (8 T. R. 259) is in point. There there was a delay of two years. The delay was caused by an embargo which, it was held, did not dissolve but only suspended the contract. [BAILHACHE, J.—Why is not "restraint of princes" an answer to your claim? Such a restraint may excuse payment of hire if the adventure is frustrated.] They referred to:

Brown v. Turner, Breitman, and Co., 12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 79; 105 L. T. Rep. 562; (1912) A. C. 12;
Hough v. Head, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 447, 505; 53 L. T. Rep. 809;
Aktieselskabet Loria v. Turnhill and Co., 1907, Sess. Cas. 507;
The Santora, 152 Fed. Rep. 517.

Mackinnon, K.C. (R. A. Wright with him) for the charterers.—Jackson v. Union Marine (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 435; 31 L. T. Rep. 789) must be overruled if the charterers are wrong. This is really a voyage charter-party, inasmuch as it was for two Baltic rounds. The freight is paid according to a computation of the time. [BAILHACHE, J.—Such charters are usually described as time charters.] In Brown v. Turner, Breitman, and Co. (sup.) the charterers might have selected the voyage. Here the adventure is described as a voyage out and home. Under a time charter the charterers may lay the ship up. It is doubtful whether they could do so under this charter-party, because the owners might have an interest in getting the adventure over as soon as possible. In Embiricos v. Sydney Reid and Co. (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 513; 19 Com. Cas. 263) it was contended that the doctrine of "frustration" by unreasonable delay laid down in Jackson v. Union Marine Company (sup.) did not apply if the shipowner had cargo on board, so that the contract was part executed. Scrutton, J. points out (at p. 270 of 19 Com. Cas) that this argument was untenable, having regard to Bensaude v. Thames and Mersey Marine Insurance Company (8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 179, 204, 315; 77 L. T. Rep. 282), where the vessel had a cargo on board, and yet the charter was held by the House of Lords to be avoided and the freight lost by such delay as frustrated the adventure. [BAILHACHE, J.—If it was "restraint of princes" which kept you at Scandinavia you are wrong. Aliter if it was frustration of the commercial adventure.] It was a set of circumstances which involves delay. In Brown v. Turner, Breitman (sup.) there was no question raised as to commercial frustration, because it was decided that delay was due to the act, although not the default, of the charterers. It is also suggested that the charterers were keeping the cargo on board. One talks of the re-delivery of the ship, but that in point of fact never happened. The charterers were in ignorance of what was going on in the Baltic, and the owners were keeping them in the dark. Had the charterers been told that the voyage had been temporarily suspended, they might have insisted upon the sub-charterers unloading and taking delivery. Moreover, the owners treated the charter-party as at an end. Without any communication to the charterers they have sent out and brought home the whole crew, and that step, having regard to the terms of the charter-party, can only have been taken on the basis that the charter-party was at an end. Hadley v. Clark (sup.) is overruled. In Jackson v. Union Marine (sup.) there was a dissenting judgment based upon Hadley v. Clark (sup.), but that was distinguished by the other judges who pointed out that there was there no finding that the objects of the parties were frustrated. The difficulty of deciding between "restraint of princes" and "frustration of the commercial object" of the voyage is got over by this, that there was an exception clause in Jackson's case. [BAILHACHE, J.—As between the charterers and the sub-charterers there is no doubt there was frustration.] The point is found as a fact in my favour.

Raeburn in reply.—The essential difference between a time and a voyage charter is payment of hire. The "adventure" was the payment of 1700*l.* a month. There was no adventure there in the contemplation of both parties which was frustrated. He referred to Braemount Steamship Company v. Andrew Weir, 1910, 11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 345.

As to the return of the sailors the vessel has only to be efficient for the purposes for which she is required. The sailors were not wanted when the vessel was lying up in Scandinavia. Moreover the crew was withdrawn after the charterers had intimated that the hire was suspended. There cannot be frustration of an adventure which is mapped out by a time charter. [BAILHACHE, J.—It is difficult to see how the owners could more effectually terminate the hire than by taking away the crew.] Hadley v. Clark (sup.) is bad law. In the days of Hadley v. Clark wages depended on freight.

Cur. adv. vult.

BAILHACHE, J.—This case comes before me on an award of lay arbitrators stated in the form of a special case. The dispute arises under a time charter-party, and is whether the charterers are or are not liable to pay for the charter-party hire.

The facts and the contentions of both sides before the arbitrators are set out in the case, and I cannot detail them better than by reading the case. The case, after certain preliminary recitals, says: [His Lordship read the first case as above set out, and continued:]

Then the arbitrators find, subject to the opinion of the court: "That no time hire is due by the charterers to the owners during the time the said vessel has been and is stopped at the said port of Kotka under the circumstances aforesaid," and the question for me to determine is whether that finding is right or wrong."

The matter, in this form, came before Scrutton, J., who remitted the award to the arbitrators to find whether under the circumstances there had been a commercial frustration of the adventure, and by a second award they so found. It does not appear from the first award why the arbitrators decided in favour of the charterers, nor did the learned judge express any opinion on that award, or as to what his judgment would be if commercial frustration were found. I have therefore to give my judgment as best I can, both on the case as presented in the original award and upon the subsequent finding of commercial frustration.

In order to do this, it is necessary to examine with some minuteness the provisions of the charter-party under which the dispute arises.

It is upon a time charter-party form, and although it is expressed to be for two Baltic rounds it is in fact a time charter-party, the period not being measured by months but by the indefinite standard of two Baltic rounds. Under the charter-party the charterers could if they pleased lay the Auldmuir up or never send her to the Baltic at all, but employ her in trading between safe ports in the United Kingdom and the Continent of Europe, with certain exceptions as appears from lines 13 to 16 of the charter-party. The hire was payable half-monthly in advance and was to continue payable until the steamship was re-delivered to her owners (unless lost) at a coal port in the United Kingdom.

The charter-party provided for cessation of hire in the event of loss of time from deficiency of men or stores, breakdown of machinery, or damage preventing the working of the vessel for more than twenty-four running hours (lines 49 to 53). There was a mutual exception clause (lines 58 to 62), the only exception material to the case being restraints of princes. The carriage of contraband and the undertaking of any voyage involving risk of seizure or capture were forbidden, and the charterers had the option of cancellation in the event of Great Britain or other European Powers being involved in war affecting the working of the steamship at the commencement or during the currency of the charter-party, excluding civil war with Ireland (lines 71 to 75).

It appears to me that under a charter-party in this form and upon the facts as found in the original award the charterers are liable for hire. The telegrams of the owners referred to in the case did not amount to a withdrawal of the steamship, nor did the repatriation of the crew other than the captain and the chief engineer cause any time to be lost through deficiency of men. The Auldmuir has been detained at Kotka, not for want of a crew, but because either of restraint of princes, or because she cannot undertake the voyage for which she is sub-chartered without risk of capture, or for both reasons, and, inasmuch as the liability for hire is the same whichever is the cause of her detention at Kotka, it is not necessary to distinguish, and for brevity and convenience I will treat her detention there as due to restraint of princes, or, shortly, restraint.

Now restraint is not one of the enumerated reasons for cessation of hire, and I take it to be settled law that in the absence of conduct amounting to withdrawal of the steamship or of her actual loss, and apart from any question of commercial frustration, where a charter-party specifies the causes which are to excuse payment of hire, no other cause can be relied upon by the charterers. (See Hough v. Head, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 447; 52 L. T. Rep. 861; 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 505; 53 L. T. Rep. 809; Braemount Steamship Company v. Weir, sup.; and Brown v. Turner, Breitman, and Co., sup.).

It remains to consider the effect of the second award, that the detention of the Auldmuir at Kotka has frustrated the commercial object of the venture, and that therefore no hire is payable.

Frustration is doubtless a question of fact, and the finding of the arbitrators is primâ facie binding upon me. I fear, however, that I cannot shift the responsibility of considering the point quite so easily. It may be that the arbitrators have misdirected themselves either from a misunderstanding of what frustration means, or from a misconception of the applicability of the doctrine to the contract in this case. In order to see whether this is so, it is desirable to state what the doctrine of frustration is.

The commercial frustration of an adventure by delay means, as I understand it, the happening of some unforeseen delay without the fault of either party to a contract of such a character as that by it the fulfilment of the contract in the only way in which fulfilment is contemplated and practicable is so inordinately postponed as that its fulfilment when the delay is over will not accomplish the only object or objects which both parties to the contract must have known that each of them had in view at the time they made the contract, and for the accomplishment of which object or objects the contract was made. Now if this definition is at all accurate, as I trust it is, I doubt whether delay due to a cause contemplated and provided for by the charter-party, even though the delay itself is protracted beyond what might have been expected, ever amounts to frustration of the adventure. If it were so one would have to hold in this case that restraint of princes does or does not absolve the charterer from payment of hire according to its duration, and this would be to make a new contract for the parties, which the court must not do, and would be contrary, I think, to the reasoning of the House of Lords in Brown v. Turner, Breitman, and Co. (sup.). Again, delay to amount to frustration, must prevent the fulfilment of the only objects for which both parties must have known that each of them entered into the contract. It is easy to see how this applies in a voyage charter-party for the carriage of goods by a named ship from one place to another. The charterer's only object must be to have his goods carried within a reasonable time, and the owner's only object is to earn his freight by this carriage in the like time. Undue delay defeats the charterer's only object and the owner's contract, and the owner's offer to carry the goods at some undefined and distant date is in effect an offer to perform a different contract, and the charterer may refuse it. The extent of the delay which so changes the character of the contract will naturally depend upon the circumstances of each particular case. In a time charter-party the position is quite different. In this case, for example, the charterers might if they pleased have laid up the Auldmuir, and if it is said that that is unlikely, they might have sent her to continental ports, in neither of which circumstances would any difficulty have arisen. There was in fact no object in common contemplation between the parties except that the charterers should have the services of the steamship for some legitimate purpose within the terms of the charter-party. Those services they have; if in a restricted and unremunerative way, the reason is that unfortunately they sent her to the Baltic instead of to the Mediterranean, as they might have done. The owners are in truth giving the charterers all that they contracted to give—namely, such services of the Auldmuir as she was capable of rendering, subject to the excepted peril of restraint of princes. It seems to me impossible to apply the doctrine of frustration to a case where one of the parties to the contract is fulfilling his part of the contract according to its terms.

Once more in this case the charter-party makes provision for war affecting the working of the steamer at the commencement or during the currency of the charter-party. This is precisely what has happened in this case, and where the contract makes provision for a given contingency, it is not for the court to import into the contract some other and different provision for the same contingency called by a different name. The provision in this charter-party is an option to the charterers to cancel, and this must remain their only remedy. If this option is not open to them it is because the Auldmuir is lying at Kotka under sub-charter from the charterers with a cargo on board. I express no opinion as to whether these facts prevent the exercise of the charterers option to cancel, but if they do the fact that the charterers have put it out of their power to exercise the option does not entitle them to claim some other remedy which the contract does not give them, and it certainly makes it difficult for the charterers to say that they are not in fact receiving the services of the steamship.

I observe with some interest that the arbitrator whose award came before Bray, J. in Braemount Steamship Company v. Weir (sup.) was of opinion that the doctrine of frustration could have no application in a time charter-party. I think he was probably right, and is supported by the House of Lords decision in Brown v. Turner, Breitman (sup.), but it is sufficient for me to say that it cannot be successfully invoked under the circumstances of this case and under this charter-party.

I think the arbitrators have misapprehended or misapplied the legal doctrine of frustration by delay, and that I ought to disregard their finding in their second award, and I hold that the charterers are liable for the hire.

Before I part with this case and to prevent any misconception in the unlikely event of this judgment being referred to on any subsequent occasion, I desire to point out that nothing I have said has any application to or bearing upon a case in which the chartered vessel is either lost actually or taken out of the possession and control of the owners by one of the excepted perils so that the owners are unable to give the charterers the use of their vessel for any purpose whatever.

The result is that the award will be set aside.

HORLOCK v. BEAL. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Seaman—War—Detention in enemy port—"Loss" of ship—Claim for wages—Internment of crew—Hague Conventions 1907, No. VI.—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 143, 158.

A British ship, owned by the appellant, during a voyage, for which the respondent's husband, who was a British seaman, had signed articles, was in a German port when war was declared between the United Kingdom and the German Empire and was detained by the German authorities, but no proceedings for her confiscation were known to have been instituted. Her officers and crew were at first kept prisoners on board, and subsequently, on the 2nd Nov. 1914, were taken ashore as prisoners, and later, from the 8th Nov. 1914, were interned at Ruhleben.

The ship and crew were still detained and imprisoned when the respondent brought her action claiming an allotment of wages made her by her husband.

Held (Lord Parmoor dissenting), that the shipowner was not liable to pay wages to the crew after the 2nd Nov. 1914, as from that date it was impossible for them to render any services contemplated by the contract of service.

Decision of the Court of Appeal reversed.

APPEAL by the shipowner from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Swinfen Eady and Bankes, L.JJ., Phillimore, L.J. dissenting) which affirmed a judgment of Rowlatt, J.

The action was brought by the wife of an interned seaman upon an allotment note.

The material facts appear from the judgments.

Neilson for the plaintiff.

Raeburn for the defendant.

June 4, 1915.—ROWLATT, J. delivered the following considered judgment:—This was an action by the wife of a seaman, second mate of a British ship, who was the holder of an allotment note properly issued in every way entitling her during the period of his service to be paid a certain sum, the amount of which is immaterial for the purpose, out of his wages. By sect. 143 of the Merchant Shipping Act it is provided that "the person in whose favour an allotment note under this Act is made may, unless the seaman is shown, in a manner in this Act specified, to have forfeited or ceased to be entitled to the wages out of which the allotment is to be paid, recover the sums allotted, when, and as, the same are made payable, with costs from the owner," and so on, with other provisions that are not necessary to read.

The plaintiff was paid under her allotment note up till the 14th Aug., and has not been paid since.

(a) Reported in the King's Bench Division by L. O. THOMAS, Esq., in the Court of Appeal by EDWARD J. M. CHAPLIN, Esq., and in the House of Lords by W. E. REID, Esq., Barristers-at-Law.

The ship on which her husband was serving, on, I think, the 2nd Aug., or some such date, had the misfortune to put into the port of Hamburg, where the ship was detained, and plaintiff's husband was imprisoned, first on, I think, the ship at Hamburg, and afterwards, in the month of November, I think, at a prison a long way from there—Ruhleben, near Berlin.

There is a convention applicable to belligerent ships which are in an enemy port at the outbreak of war called The Hague Convention No. VI. of 1907 the first and second articles of which are as follow:

(1) When a merchant ship belonging to one of the belligerent Powers is at the commencement of hostilities in an enemy port, it is desirable that it should be allowed to depart freely, either immediately, or after a reasonable number of days of grace, and to proceed, after being furnished with a pass, direct to its port of destination, or any other port indicated to it. The same principle applies in the case of a ship which has left its last port of departure before the commencement of the war and has entered a port belonging to the enemy while still ignorant that hostilities have broken out.

The first article only points out that it is desirable that the ship should be treated in this way. Then comes the second article—

(2) A merchant ship which, owing to circumstances beyond its control, may have been unable to leave the enemy port within the period contemplated in the preceding article, or which was not allowed to leave may not be confiscated. The belligerent may merely detain it, on condition of restoring it after the war, without payment of compensation, or he may requisition it on condition of paying compensation.

This second article seems to me to contemplate the case where, notwithstanding that it is, as it is stated to be, not desirable it should take place, where in point of fact the ship has been prevented from departing from the port, when she has been prevented and not allowed to leave, the article provides that she may not be confiscated.

The belligerent may detain it, restoring it at the end of the war without paying compensation, or requisition it on paying compensation. There is no evidence before me that this ship has been requisitioned. Therefore I must take it that she is merely detained, and not confiscated or requisitioned at present. I think I am bound to assume that the Convention is being applied to the ship. I am not at liberty to conjecture that the Convention is torn up or thrown to the winds; I must assume it is being applied to the ship, and under these circumstances the ship is still the property of her owners; the destination to which she is looking at the present moment is release at at the close of the war. In the meantime she is immobilised at the port of Hamburg.

Under these circumstances it was first argued on behalf of the defendant, the owner of the ship—who, I should mention in passing, raised this point for the purpose of getting a legal decision upon a question which is of great importance, because it is essential to see what the legal position is, and he must be absolutely acquitted of taking it up in any spirit of meanness at all against his employee or his wife—that within the meaning of sect. 158 of the Merchant Shipping Act the services of the seaman had terminated before the date contemplated in the agreement by reason of the loss of the ship, so that under this section his title to wages ceased at the time of such termination. What I have stated in regard to the ship at Hamburg under The Hague Convention, if it is right, negatives any question of the loss of the ship. She is there. The property in her is not changed; she is simply detained, and, apart altogether from what was stated in the case of Sivewright v. Allen (10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 251; 94 L. T. Rep. 778; (1906) 2 K. B. 81), it is impossible to hold that the ship is lost.

Then it was stated that sect. 158 was not exhaustive in regard to the causes which may put an end to the engagement of seamen. I think the contention on this section is correct. When this section is looked at it is not a section which declares that in a certain event the seaman's agreement is terminated—all it does is to say that when the agreement is terminated from the causes mentioned in the section, then certain results shall follow.

So far I agree with the argument for the defendant when he says that the agreement may be terminated from causes other than those mentioned in sect. 158. It is not very difficult to see causes which might terminate the agreement. For instance, the death of the seaman clearly terminates the agreement. Death is not mentioned in the section though there are other sections which point out cases of death. But there are other circumstances which terminate the agreement analogous to it.

As was shown in the case of The Friends (4 C. Rob. 143) a seaman may be taken out of a ship by a belligerent ship. The ship might be a neutral, and the seaman might be a subject of the nation to which the visiting ship belonged, or a subject of a neutral to which the belligerent ship belonged. and taken out either as the enemy of the visiting warship or impressed by the visiting warship. I do not think that in that case I can say that his services were not terminated. Or again, his services might be terminated under circumstances which were mentioned in the case of Melville v. De Wolf (4 E. & B. 844) where he was sent home by the act of the British Government for a court-martial

So I think we must consider that the services of a seaman can be terminated clearly by causes which are not mentioned in sect. 158. Whether they are terminated in that way, or if they are terminated under circumstances as in the present case, whether within the meaning of sect. 143, as applicable to an allotment note, it can be shown, "in manner in this Act specified," to have terminated, is perhaps rather a difficult matter. I do not know whether the Act contains machinery for showing a termination of that kind to satisfy the requirements of sect. 143, but I do not think it necessary to go into that point.

It seems to me that the service is not on any ground terminated at all as yet by what has happened in regard to this ship. It is not merely that it cannot be shown "in manner specified in this Act" to have been determined. It is not only that it cannot be shown in the manner specified in the Act that the seaman has ceased to be entitled to wages, but I do not think he has in fact or law ceased to be entitled to wages.

The position with regard to this ship at the present moment and of the husband of the plaintiff is exactly what it was during the detention of the ship and the imprisonment of the plaintiff in the case of Beale v. Thompson (4 East, 546). At the time when this decision was given the question whether the engagement had determined could not be tried in an action for wages during the period of the detention, because no such action could then be brought until the voyage had been completed. But sect. 143 of the Merchant Shipping Act now compels me to decide that to-day we are to assume that the seaman has been entitled to wages without waiting for an after event. The seaman's engagement point was referred to by Kennedy, L.J. in The Olympic (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 318; 108 L. T. Rep. 592; (1913) P. 92). In the present state of affairs I must hold that the engagement of the plaintiff's husband is not at any rate yet at an end.

Under these circumstances I must give judgment for the plaintiff for the amount of the allotment note up to the date of the writ. I shall not make any declaration, because it would be troublesome to frame, and circumstances may alter at any moment, and I have only decided on the facts before me at the moment. The defendant will appreciate that the reason for which I give judgment for the plaintiff up to the date of the writ obliges him to pay until circumstances alter. I give, therefore, judgment for the plaintiff.

From that decision the defendant appealed.

Wallace, K.C. and Raeburn for the appellant.

Greer, K.C. and Neilson for the respondent.

The arguments sufficiently appear from the judgments.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 30, 1915.—SWINFEN EADY, L.J. read the following judgment:—This is an appeal from the judgment of Rowlatt, J. in an action brought by the wife of a seaman upon an allotment note. She obtained judgment for the amount due to her up to the issue of the writ, and from this judgment the defendant appeals.

No question is raised as to the regularity of the allotment note, but the action has been brought to determine the liability of a shipowner whose ship has been detained in Germany, for the payment of the wages of the crew who have been removed from their ship and are now interned in Germany.

The plaintiff's husband, Tom Rea Beal, signed articles as second mate on board the Coralie Horlock on the 21st May 1914 at Hull. The articles were for a voyage of not exceeding two years' duration, to any ports or places within the limits of 75deg. north and 60deg. south latitude, commencing at Hull, proceeding thence to Alexandria, and (or) any other ports within the above limits, trading in any rotation, and to end at such port in the United Kingdom or Continent of Europe (within home trade limits) as might be required by the master. His wages were 9*l.* 10*s.* a month, and he stipulated for an allotment note of 4*l.* 15*s.* monthly, which was issued and is payable to the plaintiff.

The vessel sailed from Hull at the end of May 1914 and proceeded to Alexandria and thence to other ports, arriving at Hamburg on the 2nd Aug. 1914. At the outbreak of war on the 4th Aug. 1914 the vessel was still at Hamburg. She has ever since been detained by the German Government. The crew remained on board as prisoners until the 2nd Nov., when they were transferred with the crews of other vessels in a like position to three lodging ships; they were removed thence to Ruhleben, near Berlin, on the 8th Nov., and have since remained there.

The plaintiff contends that she is entitled to recover upon the allotment note, and that the wages of her husband are payable under the articles until he shall be discharged in accordance therewith and pursuant to the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts. The defendant contends that he is not liable for the payment of any wages after the 4th Aug. 1914, on which date he contends the loss of the ship occurred.

Arts. 1 and 2 of The Hague Convention, No. VI., of 1907 are applicable to the ships of belligerents which are in an enemy port at the outbreak of war. They are as follows:

Art. 1. When a merchant ship belonging to one of the belligerent Powers is at the commencement of hostilities in an enemy port, it is desirable that it should be allowed to depart freely, either immediately, or after a reasonable number of days of grace, and to proceed, after being furnished with a pass, direct to its port of destination or any other port indicated to it. The same principle applies in the case of a ship which has left its last port of departure before the commencement of the war and has entered a port belonging to the enemy while still ignorant that hostilities have broken out.

Then art. 2:

A merchant ship which, owing to circumstances beyond its control, may have been unable to leave the enemy port within the period contemplated in the preceding article, or which was not allowed to leave may not be confiscated. The belligerent may merely detain it, on condition of restoring it after the war, without payment of compensation, or he may requisition it on condition of paying compensation.

Thus art. 2 provides that a ship in the position of the Coralie Horlock may not be confiscated. In the absence of any evidence to the contrary, it must be presumed that she is merely detained on condition of being restored after the war. There is no evidence of any proceedings against the ship, in prize, in the German courts.

The provisions with regard to the advance and allotment of seamen's wages are contained in sects. 140 to 143 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, and sect. 62 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1906. The plaintiff has proved, pursuant to sect. 143 (2), that she is the person mentioned in the note, and that the note was given by the owner or by the master or some other authorised agent. Her husband, therefore, is to be presumed to be duly earning his wages, unless the contrary is shown to the court, as provided for by sub-sect. 2. The only clause of sub-sect. 2 alleged to be applicable is clause (d):

By such other evidence as the court in their absolute discretion consider sufficient to show satisfactorily that the seaman has ceased to be entitled to the wages out of which the allotment is to be paid.

The question, therefore, is: Has it been shown satisfactorily that the seaman has ceased to be entitled to his wages?

A seaman may be discharged abroad, pursuant to sect. 30 and following sections of the Merchant Shipping Act 1906, but it is not suggested that such discharge has taken place in the present case.

The discharge of seamen in the United Kingdom is provided for by sects. 127 to 130 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, but it is not suggested that the seaman has been discharged in manner provided by these sections. The time of payment of wages in the case of foreign-going ships is provided for by the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 134, and by clause (c):

In the event of the seaman's wages or any part thereof not being paid or settled as in this section mentioned, then, unless the delay is due to the act or default of the seaman, or to any reasonable dispute as to liability, or to any other cause not being the wrongful act or default of the owner or master, the seaman's wages shall continue to run and be payable until the time of the final settlement thereof.

The defendant does not even allege that the seaman's wages have been paid or settled, in manner mentioned in the section, or indeed at all, even for the period expiring on the 4th Aug. 1914. The right to wages has not been suspended under sects. 159 and 160, nor has the court been asked to exercise the power of rescinding contracts conferred by sect. 168. It has been contended that the service of the seaman has terminated, by the "loss of the ship," as provided for by sect. 158, and that the seaman was only entitled to wages up to the time of such termination. It is urged that there was a "loss of the ship," either when it was first detained, with the crew on board as prisoners, or, if not, when the crew were removed to the lodging ships, or, if not, when the crew were removed to Ruhleben. There has been a detention of the ship, but there is no evidence of confiscation or attempted confiscation, and it would be directly contrary to art. 2 of The Hague Convention, No. VI. of 1907, for the ship to be dealt with. In the case of a German ship, detained under similar circumstances in England, The Chile (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 598; 112 L. T. Rep. 248; (1914) P. 212), the President made an order for "detention," but abstained from adjudging that the vessel "be condemned and sold," and until it is known what course is being taken by the German Government with regard to ships detained, it cannot be decided whether the Coralie Horlock is lost or not. It is well settled that when a ship is detained under an embargo, although for a lengthened period, the contract with the seaman is not at an end. The ship, although detained, cannot be treated as lost. In Hadley v. Clarke (sup.) the shipper was held entitled to recover damages against the shipowner for non-performance of his contract to carry goods from Liverpool to Leghorn, on the ground that the embargo placed on the vessel only suspended, and did not dissolve or put an end to, the contract between the parties. The ship was detained at Falmouth by an Order of His Majesty in Council of the 27th July 1796, placing an embargo on all ships bound for Leghorn, until the further order of the Board of Privy Council. It was not until the 24th Oct. 1798 that the embargo was wholly taken off so far as related to ships bound to Leghorn, so the embargo lasted about two years and three months. Lord Kenyon said: "It would be attended with the most mischievous consequences if a temporary embargo would put an end to such a contract as this; because if it were to have that effect, it must also have the effect of putting an end to all contracts for freight and for wages." Lord Kenyon also referred to other events which might occasion a long interruption of a voyage, but which would not put an end to the contract, and the language used by him both at the commencement and the end of his judgment is applicable to the present case. At the commencement of his judgment he said: "Whenever a case comes before us that is likely to be attended with hardship to the parties, a struggle naturally arises in our minds to find out, if possible, some way of extricating all the parties from it. In the present case both parties are innocent, and whatever may be our decision, one party or the other must suffer. In such a situation we must explore our way as well as we can; but we must determine according to the principles of law." At the end of his judgment he says: "I cannot feel myself justified by any principle of law to say, that the contract was put an end to by this temporary embargo; but I am of opinion that, however hard or inconvenient it may be to the defendants, the plaintiff is entitled to recover." And Grose, J. said: "If the embargo dissolved the contract, when did the dissolution take place? The mere stating of the question puts an end to all further inquiry; and the defendants' counsel could not show at what precise time the contract was dissolved; and if this contract were dissolved by the embargo, it would be followed by the very alarming consequence stated at the Bar, that all the contracts between the owners and the mariners would also be put an end to."

Again, Beale v. Thompson (sup.) (affirmed in the House of Lords (sup)) shows that, although a vessel be detained for a long period under an embargo, on ultimate release and return home the seamen are entitled to their wages. In this case the men had been taken from their ship by the Russian Government and interned for upwards of six months, but established their right to wages for the whole period they were so detained.

Again, in Delamainer v. Winteringham (sup.) the same point was raised. The ship had been detained in Russia under the Emperor Paul's embargo, and the men interned in the country. On the release of the ship and crew, the crew returned with the ship to this country, and a seaman sued for his wages, the declaration containing counts for work and labour. It was urged that the plaintiff could not recover the wages under counts for work and labour, as during the whole of the time in question he had been at a distance from the ship, and had done no service as a mariner. Lord Ellenborough, however, decided that the plaintiff's return to the ship and completion of the voyage removed all difficulty. He said: "The action is maintainable on the ground that there was no severance of his services; and therefore in contemplation of law, he was working and labouring for the defendant, from the commencement to the conclusion of the voyage."

It is true that these cases were determined when the rule of maritime law that "freight is the mother of wages" was the law of this country, and by statute it is now provided that the right to wages shall not depend on the earning of freight; but the alteration of the law is in favour of the seaman.

In the case of the Olympic (sup.), which was a claim by the crew for wages, although Kennedy, L.J. differed from the other members of the court upon the question of fact, whether the damage occasioned to the Olympic was sufficient to amount to "the wreck of the ship" within sect. 158, his judgment contains a careful statement of the law with regard to the effect of an embargo. He said: "The embargo which prevents a laden ship from proceeding from port on her voyage does not dissolve the mariner's engagement, any more than it dissolves the contract between the shipowner and the merchant whose cargo has been loaded." He then refers to a passage in Lord Tenterden's Law of Merchant Ships and Seamen, and adds: "In this sentence one of the greatest of judicial authorities on matters of shipping clearly indicates his opinion even in the case of the embargo on a laden ship—i.e., in the case of an obstacle to the prosecution of the voyage imposed by the Government, an obstacle of indefinite and unascertainable duration (which the detention for repairs is not)—that, while, in his own interest and in order to save himself the risk of expense, it may be a reasonable and indeed very prudent step on the part of the shipowner to discharge the greater part of the crew, yet, if that step is taken, the shipowner must compensate those whom he so discharges for the loss of the wages during the unfulfilled residue of the contract period, unless, as is likely enough, they find equally remunerative employment in another ship." He then continues: "And I may add that what is true of an embargo by the Government to which the ship belongs is true also of seizure for a temporary purpose by a hostile Power." The present detention more resembles an embargo, or a seizure for a temporary purpose, than a capture and condemnation. In the case of The Friends (sup.) where the seaman failed to maintain his claim to wages, the ship in which he had been serving was captured by the French, and Sir William Scott said: "Nothing can be better settled than that the act of capture defeats all rights and interests." But that was a capture at sea, as prize, by an enemy ship.

In the recent case of the Polurrian Steamship Company v. Young (sup.) the steamship Polurrian was captured by Greek men-of-war, her cargo removed from her and used for coaling the Greek Fleet, and the ship was detained from the 25th Oct. 1912 until the 8th Dec. 1912, when she was released without having been brought before a Prize Court. The shipowners failed in their claim upon the policy for a constructive total loss, based upon "the capture," and certainly the mariners' wages did not cease to be payable.

In the present case, the defendant has in my judgment failed to establish the loss of the ship.

It was then contended that there had been a "wreck or loss" of the ship within sect. 158 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, and that the word "loss" ought to bear a meaning somewhat similar to that of the word "wreck," and for the purpose of showing the meaning of the word "wreck" in the section, reliance was placed upon a passage in the judgment of Buckley, L.J. in the case of The Olympic (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 318; 108 L. T. Rep. 592; (1913) P., at p. 107). He there said: "The wreck of the ship in this context, I think, is anything happening to the ship which renders her incapable of carrying out the maritime adventure in respect of which the seaman's contract was entered into." It was urged that by the detention of the ship for nearly twelve months there was a loss of the adventure. But in this passage Buckley, L.J. is obviously referring to something physical happening to the ship which injures and damages her, so as to make the ship unseaworthy for so long a time as to make a continuance of her voyage useless as a commercial adventure. In my judgment there has not been any loss of the ship within sect. 158 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894.

Nor was the contract with the seamen at an end and dissolved by law on the ground that the further prosecution of the venture could not proceed without trading with the enemy. If the ship were released, it would be the duty of the seaman to assist in bringing her home. And it is manifest that the occurrence of a state of war, whereby the further prosecution of a voyage becomes illegal, cannot at once determine the contract of the seaman. In many, probably most of, such cases the vessels engaged in the voyage would, at the outbreak of war, be on the high seas, where the services of the mariners could not possibly be dispensed with. The mere detention of the ship, without its confiscation, does not in my opinion ipso facto determine the engagement of the mariners.

For these reasons I am of opinion that it has not been shown that the plaintiff's husband has ceased to be entitled to the wages out of which the allotment is to be paid, and that the judgment of Rowlatt, J. was right, and that this appeal should be dismissed.

PHILLIMORE, L.J. read the following judgment:—The plaintiff is the wife of a seaman who was serving as second mate on board the Coralie Horlock, and she is the holder of an allotment note covering half his wages. The defendant is the shipowner.

The facts have been agreed between the parties.

We are told that it is a test case and a friendly action.

On the 21st May 1914 the husband signed articles for a voyage not exceeding two years from Hull to Alexandria and other ports within certain limits, trading in rotation, and to end at such port in the United Kingdom or on the Continent within home trade limits as might be required by the master.

The vessel sailed from Hull, went to Alexandria and thence to other ports, arriving at Hamburg on the 2nd Aug. On the 4th Aug. war broke out between Great Britain and Germany. What followed is thus stated in pars. 8 and 9 of the agreed statement of facts.

(8) The said vessel was then and still is in the port of Hamburg, and is unable to leave the said port by reason of detention by the German authorities. The defendant has been since the 4th Aug. 1914 and still is deprived of the possession of this said vessel, and the said Tom Rea Beal with the officers and other members of the crew were on or about the 2nd Nov. removed from the said vessel to a lodging ship in Hamburg, and on or about the 8th Nov. were interned at Ruhleben, near Berlin. (9) The defendant has paid to the plaintiff under the said allotment note 4*l.* 15*s.* on the 23rd June, 4*l.* 15*s.* on the 22nd July, and 1*l.* 13*s.* 8*d.* on the 2nd Aug. 1914 and no more.

The husband's wages and the plaintiff's allotment were both payable monthly. The plaintiff has been paid up to the 2nd Aug., and the defendant contends that he is not liable to pay wages to the husband or any allotment to the plaintiff after the 4th Aug.

The plaintiff as an allottee has the same rights as her husband; she has even certain advantages in the matter of proof if her claim is disputed. Under sect. 143 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 she is to recover, "unless the seaman is shown, in manner in this Act specified, to have forfeited or ceased to be entitled to the wages out of which the allotment is to be paid" . . . "and the seaman shall be presumed to be duly earning his wages, unless the contrary is shown to the satisfaction of the court. . . ."

On the other hand, the section goes on to provide certain modes of proof available to the shipowner. Sect. 144, which provides for the times of payment, has been repealed by the Merchant Shipping Act 1906, and a new provision was made by sect. 62 of that Act; but the alterations are not, I think, material.

We have, therefore, to inquire whether the plaintiff's husband has forfeited or ceased to be entitled to his wages. It is contended on behalf of the plaintiff that if special cases provided for in sects. 159, 160, and 161 are put aside and they have no application to this case, the only instance in which a seaman forfeits or ceases to get his wages are those provided in sect. 158: "Where the service of a seaman terminates before the date contemplated in the agreement by reason of the wreck or loss of the ship, or of his being left on shore at any place abroad under a certificate granted as provided by this Act of his unfitness or inability to proceed on the voyage, he shall be entitled to wages up to the time of such termination, but not for any longer period."

It is, I think, clear that this section is not exhaustive. Rowlatt, J. in his judgment points out several cases in which a seaman would cease to get his wages and which are not covered by this section. It may be a section only dealing with the case of ceasing to be entitled, but, even so, some of Rowlatt's, J. instances would show it not to be exhaustive.

As to forfeiture, it has been held by the Court of Appeal in a case which I cannot find reported, but which I remember arguing, that the common law power of dismissal for insubordination—such dismissal working a forfeiture—was not excluded by the earlier Act of 1862, and it is known that the Act of 1894 was intended to be a codification Act only.

But I am not sure that these observations carry the case for the shipowner much further. If, indeed, the word "loss" meant some form of physical destruction so that the word "wreck" would be confined to the case where the ship struck ground, and the word "loss" applied to foundering, burning, or crushing by ice, then it would be necessary to invoke the doctrine that the section was not exhaustive. For loss to the owner by reason of capture and condemnation by a Power at war with Great Britain would certainly cause the seaman to cease to be entitled, as was stated by Kennedy, L.J. in the Olympic (sup.), at p. 117, on his own authority and that of Dr. Lushington in The Florence (16 Jur., 572). I may add that several cases, English and American, are cited in Pritchard's Admiralty Digest, 2nd ed., pp. 2158 to 2305, to the same effect.

I should be prepared to hold that seizure by pirates was a loss either within sect. 158 or by the common law, as indeed Dr. Lushington thought.

This leaves us to determine whether this ship has been so lost, or to such an extent lost to her owner that the seaman has ceased to be entitled to his wages either on the 4th Aug., or, if it be of importance to consider it, at some later period.

In the Olympic, to which I have referred, the majority of the court construing the word "wreck" gave it an extended meaning. They looked at the consequences to the shipowner and held that the vessel had, by reason of her injuries, ceased to be seaworthy for so long a time "as to make the continuance of the voyage useless as a commercial venture"—those are the words of Vaughan Williams, L.J.; or that she ceased to be "a ship of service for the purpose of the adventure"—those are the words of Buckley, L.J It may be that in considering the word "loss" we ought to import similar considerations. What has happened to this ship? The agreed statement is that she is unable to leave port by reason of detention by the German authorities, and that the shipowner has been deprived of his possession of her. Rowlatt, J. has taken it that she was detained in accordance with the provisions of The Hague Convention, No. 6, of 1907.

The material clauses of this convention relative to the status of enemy merchant ships at the outbreak of hostilities are as follows: [His Lordship read arts. 1 and 2 and continued:]

If it is to be taken that it is not a detention within Article 2 of The Hague Convention just set forth, then it is an extremely hostile act, because it is contrary to what is expressed to be desirable by Article 1, and to the international practice which before The Hague Convention had been established for at least fifty years. (Pearce-Higgins, The Hague Peace Conferences, pp. 300-304).

If it is to be taken, as Rowlatt, J. has held, that the detention was under article 2 of the Convention, it opens a wholly new question.

It has been suggested in argument that this detention might be likened to an embargo which, according to the decided cases, if afterwards removed so that the voyage is ultimately accomplished, does not work a forfeiture of wages and indeed further entitles the seaman, if paid by time, to his monthly wages during the period of the embargo even if he is taken away from the ship and imprisoned: (see Pratt v. Cuff, cited in 4 East, p. 43; Delamainer v. Winteringham (sup); and the most authoritative case of all, Beale v. Thompson (sup.) affirmed in the House of Lords (sup.). But the embargo cases are not, I think, in point.

First, as it was observed by Sir William Scott in the Boedes Lust (sup.) and by Sir Robert Phillimore in The Teutonia (sup.) (at p. 412) and in his Commentaries on International Law (vol. iii., pt. 9, ch. 3), an embargo is distinct from an act of war. It is, to use Sir William Scott's language, an equivocal act, and if the two nations come to terms without going to war, the ships and crews are restored and it is treated, as he says, as a mere civil embargo: whereas, if the end of the controversy is war, the original seizure for embargo purposes may be turned into a capture and result in condemnation.

Secondly, during the operation of the old law that freight was the mother of wages, which prevailed till the General Merchant Seamen's Act (7 & 8 Vict., c. 112, sect. 17), made the first inroad on the old law, and till the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 finally abrogated it, no action for wages could be begun till the voyage was finished, and therefore the point never arose except in cases where the embargo had been raised, the ship restored and brought back, and the claimant restored to her, so that he contributed to finishing the voyage. That this last condition is a necessary one is shown by the case of The Friends (sup.). The only difficulty the courts had in these circumstances was to determine whether the seaman should get his pay during the period of embargo and imprisonment.

There have been cases where vessels were seized before the declaration of war, and where ultimately on the conclusion of peace there was mutual restoration. This would be much more like the present case, but I am not aware that there are any decisions as to seamen's claims in such cases. In the present case there is a seizure operating after war has been declared, "War the end of which cannot be foreseen," per Willes, J., delivering judgment of the Exchequer Chamber in Esposito v. Bowden (sup.). This phrase is repeated by Sir Robert Phillimore in the Teutonia. In Geipel v. Smith (sup.) Lush, J. expresses himself as follows: "If the impediment had been in its nature temporary I should have thought the plea bad, but a state of war must be presumed to be likely to continue so long, and so to disturb the commerce of merchants, as to defeat and destroy the object of a commercial adventure like this."

During the argument I thought that some light might be thrown upon the meaning of The Hague Convention by the decisions of our own Prize Court on German vessels in a similar position in this country. There is a reported case of The Chile (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 598; 112 L. T. Rep. 248; (1914) P. 212), where the form of the sentence of the court is set out. There is an important distinction between this form of sentence and the form where the ship is condemned as prize out-and-out and ordered to be sold. I have obtained a copy of the sentence in the following case of The Marie Glaeser (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 601; 112 L. T. Rep. 251; (1914) P. 218), and there is a great difference. In fact, the prize rules provide for two different forms of sentence—Form 53, Nos. 1 and 2.

This argument, it must be admitted, makes so far in favour of the seaman.

The sentence of the Prize Court, however, puts the ship at the disposition of the Crown. As we know, and as the article of The Hague Conference provides, ships so sentenced are subject to requisition and have been taken. Anyhow, they are detained till "after the war."

The consequences of holding that the seaman's engagement remains are very serious. If the war, which is approaching the end of its first year, were to last many years—which God forbid!—the shipowner might be ruined by the payment of pensions for many years and the payment of the accumulated balance at the end.

A contrary conclusion is hard upon the allottees, but we may reasonably hope that some provision may be made for them out of public funds.

On the whole, I think that this detention, whether it is to be taken as being under The Hague Convention or otherwise, is of the nature of a hostile capture and not only puts an end to the voyage but further creates a loss of the ship; and if it is necessary so to decide, a loss under sect. 158. I am fortified in this conclusion by the way in which the majority of the court in the case of the Olympic dealt with the parallel word "wreck."

An argument for the respondent was based upon sect. 134. This supposes that the engagement has come to an end, and that the seaman has not been paid. Whether an allottee of wages could claim a portion of the "sharp penalty" provided by this section may be doubtful. It is enough to say that the non-payment of wages, if it has occurred, has not been "the wrongful act or default of the owner or master."

I think that the appeal should succeed.

BANKES, L.J. read the following judgment:—This is the defendant's appeal from a judgment of Rowlatt, J.

The plaintiff is a person in whose favour an allotment note was given by the master or owner of the steamship Coralie Horlock at the instance of the plaintiff's husband, who was engaged as second mate on that vessel.

The vessel was unfortunately in the port of Hamburg at the time of the declaration of war with Germany. All the information given to the court as to what has since happened to the vessel, and her crew, is that contained in an agreed statement of facts, in which it is stated (par. 8) that the vessel is unable to leave the port "by reason of detention by the German authorities, and that the defendant has been, since the 4th Aug. 1914, and still is deprived of the possession of the said vessel," and further that the plaintiff's husband "with the officers and other members of the crew was, on or about the 2nd Nov., removed from the said vessel to a lodging ship in Hamburg, and on or about the 8th Nov. was interned at Ruhleben, near Berlin." Upon this state of facts the defendant contends that he is under no obligation to pay to the plaintiff any moneys under the allotment note after the 4th Aug. 1914 upon the ground that he was not liable to pay the plaintiff's husband any wages after that date.

The position of a person in whose favour an allotment note has been made is a statutory one. Sect. 143 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 provides that such a person may, unless the seaman is shown, in manner in this Act specified, to have forfeited or ceased to be entitled to the wages out of which the allotment is to be paid, recover the sums allotted when and as the same are made payable. The section further provides that in any proceeding for such recovery on proof of certain facts (which facts are admitted in the present case) the seaman shall be presumed to be duly earning his wages unless the contrary is shown to the satisfaction of the court in certain ways set out in detail in the sub-paragraphs to the section.

The defendant rests his case entirely on sub-paragraph (d) which provides for the case where satisfactory proof is given that the seaman has ceased to be entitled to the wages out of which the allotment is to be paid. If this can be made out it affords an answer to this action. In my opinion the evidence before the court is wholly insufficient to establish it. Long periods of detention of a vessel under orders of embargo, even when accompanied by imprisonment of her crew, have been held insufficient to deprive a seaman of his right to payment of his wages for the full period of detention where the voyage is ultimately resumed and completed: (see Beale v. Thompson (sup.); Hadley v. Clarke (sup.). In Beale v. Thompson (sup.) and similar cases the question did not arise until after the voyage had been resumed, and in that respect they differ from the present case. They establish the principle, however, that mere detention is not sufficient to deprive a seaman of his wages where the voyage has ultimately been resumed and completed, and it seems to follow that in a case of mere detention it is no answer to a claim for wages to say that it seems uncertain whether the voyage will be resumed.

In the present case the plaintiff issued her writ in the month of April last, and the learned judge has directed payment of the amount of the allotment note up to the date of the issue of the writ. The circumstances which it is material to consider, therefore, are the circumstances existing at that date. The agreed statement of facts affords the very minimum of information. It does not even state whether the vessel is detained under the terms of The Hague Convention. The case was argued on the footing that she was so detained, and if she was I agree with that part of the judgment of Rowlatt, J. in which he says that he is not at liberty to conjecture that the convention is torn up or thrown to the winds, and that consequently he must come to the conclusion that the vessel is merely detained, and is not confiscated or requisitioned at present. I am prepared to go further in the same direction as the learned judge, and to say that we are not at liberty to conjecture on any of the points on which the defendant relies. It is said on the defendant's behalf that the vessel has been lost, and that the adventure has come to an end in a commercial sense, and that on one or other of these grounds the plaintiff's husband has ceased to be entitled to his wages. The mere fact that the vessel is detained owing to a state of war, and that the crew are interned in Germany, is not, in my opinion, sufficient proof that either event had occurred at the date of the writ, or indeed has yet occurred. There is at present, in my opinion, no evidence before the court which would justify a conclusion in the defendant's favour. It may eventually turn out that he is in the right in his contention, but he cannot, in my opinion, establish it on the present evidence. The result is that, under these circumstances, the seaman must, under the provision of the statute, be presumed to be duly earning his wages.

Mr. Greer has contended that unless and until the defendant can satisfy the court that the engagement of the plaintiff's husband has either terminated under sect. 158 of the Merchant Shipping Act, or that he has been discharged in the manner indicated by sect. 127 and the following sections, the amount payable under the allotment note must continue to be paid. In the view I take of the evidence in this case it is not necessary to express any opinion on these points. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

The shipowner appealed.

George Wallace, K.C. and Raeburn for the appellants.

F. A. Greer, K.C. and Neilson for the respondent.

The House, having taken time for consideration, allowed the appeal.

Jan. 21, 1916.—Earl LOREBURN.—This is a case of great importance at the present time. A seaman had the misfortune to be serving on a British ship which entered the port of Hamburg on the 2nd Aug. 1914. The ship was detained by the German authorities when, on the 4th Aug., war broke out.

Ever since that date the ship and the crew have been detained in Germany. We do not know whether the ship has been condemned or not, but we know that she has been kept and her crew imprisoned. From the 4th Aug. till the 2nd Nov. they were kept as prisoners on their own ship, and on the 2nd Nov. were removed to other places of confinement.

In these circumstances this seaman's wife sues on an allotment note. Her right to recover admittedly depends on the question, Was the seaman entitled to his wages for the period from the 2nd Aug. to the 10th April 1915? His contract of service required him to serve on the ship Coralie Horlock for a voyage not exceeding two years in duration. These articles were signed on the 21st May 1914. An allotment note was issued in favour of the present plaintiff for a monthly payment of 4*l.* 15*s.*

In my view the first question to be decided is whether or not, and at what date, the performance of this contract of service became impossible, which means impracticable in a commercial sense. It was at first possible that she might be released in accordance with a practice which has been common in former wars and is recommended, though not required, by The Hague Convention.

But the removal of the crew from their ship and their imprisonment elsewhere, and the lapse of time, made it clear that whatever hope there may have been of restoration could no longer be entertained. Looking back upon what happened, we may think that there was never any hope. Or we may think that there was a period of suspense during which it was not determined whether there should be, in accordance with common practice, a release on both sides of ships so situated. There is hardly anything to help us, except the fact that the men were detained on their own ship until the 2nd Nov. On the whole, it seems to me that there was a period of suspense, and, judging as best I can, I take the 2nd Nov. as the date. It is a surmise, but the opposite view also is a surmise on what is a question of fact.

Assuming this to be so, does that impossibility of performance dissolve the contract of service and disentitle the seaman to wages from that time onwards? The law, both as it is found in the Statute Book and as it has been administered in Admiralty courts, has always been in some respects peculiarly tender and benevolent towards seamen in regard to their contracts of service, though in earlier days with a notable exception embodied in the maxim that freight is the mother of wages. That was a cruel exception, which has been removed now by Act of Parliament. Yet it has always to be remembered in scrutinising the older decisions, because what prevented freight from being earned might prevent wages from being recoverable.

Is there, then, either in any Act of Parliament or in Admiralty law, any rule which prescribes the effect of such a detention by the enemy as makes the performance of a contract of service impossible? There is no proof of condemnation by a court.

We were referred to sect. 158 of the Merchant Shipping Act. That section tells us what is to be done in regard to wages if there is a wreck or loss of the ship. In my opinion these words refer to physical loss. It is true that a ship is lost to her owner in a real sense when she has been captured and condemned by a competent court. It was argued that she may be equally lost to her owner by a prolonged detention. I should be disposed to say that where the property remains his, and ultimate recovery is to be expected, she is not lost even to him. But if I am right in thinking that both the words used in this section —namely, "wreck" and "loss"—refer to the ship herself and to her physical condition, then they have no bearing on this case. I will merely add that the Court of Appeal in the Olympic did not decide anything inconsistent with this view. They merely used the frustration of the voyage as a test by which to determine whether or not the physical injury inflicted amounted to "wreck."

Coming to the law as administered in Admiralty, three cases were cited with a view of showing that prolonged detention of a ship and its crew by a foreign Power did not dissolve a seaman's contract of service. Two of these authorities are in 4 East—namely, Beale v. Thompson and Pratt v. Cuff—the former of which was affirmed in this House more than 100 years ago, but there is no record to show on what grounds. The third is a case at Nisi Prius. Delamainer v. Wintringham, in 4 Camp. Rep. 186. All of them are cases in which ships and crews were confined for a long time but were ultimately released, and the interrupted voyage completed so as to earn freight, and therefore wages. It was held that wages continued to be payable throughout. This could be supported, and was supported in the judgments, on the ground that both employers and employed treated the service as not terminated by the tempoary interruption, though there are passages in the judgments which admit of a broader interpretation. There is no distinct authority for the proposition that if a seaman is willing to fulfil his contract he is still entitled to wages, though the performance of it has been made impracticable on both sides by a prolonged captivity.

Accordingly neither statute nor Admiralty law provides special guidance, and I must recur to common law. The contract was for service on a ship for a voyage within a period of two years. Both ship and crew were forcibly detained, the contemplated service became impracticable, so far as I can judge, on the 2nd Nov. 1914. Had the ship and crew been released on the 2nd Nov. I do not think common law would have treated the contract of service as ended, and I do not think the chance of her release was ended before the 2nd Nov.

In my opinion, neither party was any longer bound by that contract from that date. If they were bound it must mean that wages were to be paid, without any service in return, for the entire duration of this war, or, in the present case, till the expiry of two years from the commencement of the service. The Napoleonic war after the rupture of the Peace of Amiens lasted for eleven years. I think it was an implied term of this service, subject to any special law affecting seamen, that it should be practicable for the ship to sail on this voyage, in that sense which disregards minor interruptions and takes notice only of what substantially ends the possibility of the service contemplated being fulfilled. Both employer and employed made their bargain on the footing that whatever temporary interruption might supervene, the ship and crew would be available to carry out the adventure.

Accordingly I think that the appeal should be allowed in respect of the period after the 2nd Nov. I learned with satisfaction that provision is to be made for cases of this kind from public funds. It cannot, of course, affect the decision of a court of law, but it is in accordance with the spirit which has always influenced both courts of law and the Legislature in dealing with a deserving class of men. The shipowners in this case have brought it before the courts in order to settle the law, which has been in doubt, and are not open to any reflection.

Lord ATKINSON.—The main facts have been already stated by my noble and learned friend who has preceded me. The Coralie Horlock sailed from Hull at the end of May 1914 on the contemplated voyage to Alexandria, and from thence to other ports, and arrived at Hamburg, a port within the limits, on the 2nd Aug. 1914. War having broken out between Great Britain and the German Empire on the 4th Aug. 1914, this ship has from that date up to the present time been detained in Hamburg by the German Government. The appellants have entirely lost the use of her. Her officers and crew were upon the 2nd Nov. removed to a lodging ship in Hamburg, and on the 8th Nov. were interned at Ruhleben, near Berlin, where they still remain.

The Hague Convention makes certain provisions touching the fate of a ship belonging to one of the belligerents found at the commencement of hostilities in the port of another belligerent. If Germany should observe these provisions the ship will not be confiscated. I utterly refuse to assume that she will do so. The respondent has failed to prove that the ship has been confiscated. What has happened to her since her detention began has not been proved. She may have been destroyed, or sent elsewhere, or devoted to some particular use. The only thing certain about her fate is that the appellants have been absolutely deprived of the use of her since the 4th Aug. 1914, and that her crew have been interned as prisoners of war.

The sole question for decision on this appeal is whether the admitted facts establish satisfactorily that the respondent's husband, Thomas Beal, ceased to be entitled to 9*l.* 10*s.* per month on the 4th Aug. 1914, or if not then at what later date if at all.

The ancient doctrine that freight was, as it was said, the mother of wages, that the crew and the owners of the ship were co-adventurers in the enterprise of earning freight out of which the seaman was to be paid, has been abolished by sect. 157 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, and the seaman is now entitled to be paid his wages whether freight be earned or not. Still his contract is a contract to render his service for the achievement of the adventure or adventures upon which it is contemplated by both parties to his contract the ship is to embark, and though, undoubtedly, many provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act are framed to protect sailors from the result of their well-known improvidence, still there is no reason whatever why a rule of law applicable to contracts in general should not be applied to the contracts of seamen, where these latter are not expressly or impliedly excluded from its operation. The rule I refer to is laid down by Lord Blackburn in the case of Taylor v. Caldwell (8 L. T. Rep. 356; 3 B. & S. 826) in these words: "Where there is a positive contract to do a thing, not in itself unlawful, the contractor must perform it or pay damages for not doing it, although in consequence of unforeseen accidents, the performance of his contract may become unexpectedly burdensome or even impossible. . . . But this rule is only applicable where the contract is positive and absolute, and not subject to any condition express or implied; and there are authorities which, as we think, establish the principle, that where from the nature of the contract, it appears the parties must from the beginning have known that it could not be fulfilled unless when the time for the fulfilment of the contract arrived some particular specified thing continued to exist, so that, when entering into the contract they must have contemplated such continuing existence as the foundation of what there was to be done; there, in the absence of any express or implied warranty that the thing shall exist, the contract is not to be construed as a positive contract, but as subject to an implied condition that the parties shall be excused in case, before breach, performance becomes impossible by the perishing of the thing without default of the contractor." This principle applies not only to contracts in their executory stage, but when they have been in part performed.

In Appleby v. Meyers (16 L. T. Rep. 669; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 651) the rule was, by the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, applied to the case where the plaintiff contracted to erect certain machinery on the defendant's premises, and to keep it in repair for two years, the price to be paid on the completion of the work. After some portions of the work had been finished, and others were in the course of completion, the premises and all the machinery and materials were destroyed by an accidental fire.

It was held that both parties were excused from the further performance of the contract, and that the provision as to the payment of the price only after completion, disabled the plaintiff from recovering anything in respect of the work done by him.

In Howell v. Coupland (33 L. T. Rep. 832; 1 Q. B. Div. 258) it was applied to a case where a crop which was sold perished by disease.

In Baily v. De Crespigny (19 L. T. Rep. 681; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 180) the performance of a covenant was rendered impossible by an Act of Parliament, and the covenantor was held to be discharged.

In Krell v. Henry (89 L. T. Rep. 328; (1903) 2 K. B. 740) it was applied to a case where a flat in Pall Mall was hired in order to see the contemplated procession on the occasion of the coronation of his late Majesty King Edward the Seventh, which ceremony was postponed. The contract of hiring did not contain any express reference to the procession, but it was held that the proper inference to be drawn from the surrounding circumstances was that both parties to the contract contemplated the taking place of the procession along the proclaimed route as the foundation of the contract.

In Melville v. De Wolf (4 E. & B. 844) the impossibility arose from an act of State as the primary cause. The plaintiff in the action was a seaman who had signed articles to serve on a voyage to the Pacific and back to a port in the United Kingdom for a term of three years at 7*l.* per month. The captain was sent home from Monte Video by a naval court, constituted under the Mercantile Marine Act of 1850, to be tried for shooting one of the crew. The plaintiff was sent home by the same court as a witness against him, and he attended the trial in this country in that capacity. When the trial was over the ship was in the Pacific, and it was practically impossible for him to return to her. The plaintiff claimed wages at the above rate up to the time the trial terminated. The defendant paid into court a sum sufficient to cover the plaintiff's wages up to the time he left his ship. It was held that he was not entitled to any wages after he left the ship. Lord Campbell, on delivering judgment, said: "After he was sent home from Monte Video to England he neither served under the articles actively or constructively, and as from that time the relation of employer and employed could not be renewed within the scope of the original hiring, we think that the contract must be considered to be dissolved by the supreme authority of the State, which is binding on both parties."

It will be observed that the contract so dissolved was not a mere executory contract, but a contract in part performed.

In the case of The Friends (4 C. Rob. 143) the impossibility was the result of the act of a hostile State. The plaintiffs' ship, a British ship, manned by a British crew, was, in the course of a voyage from London to Newcastle and back, captured by a French privateer. The plaintiff and some members of the crew were taken, as prisoners of war, to France, not because of their special connection with this particular ship, but because they were British subjects. While they were in custody the ship was recaptured, which as far as possible, according to law, restored the antecedent condition of things; but a new hand had been hired to fill the plaintiff's place. The ship continued her homeward voyage and reached the port of London.

The plaintiff sued for the wages which would have been due to him had he served on the homeward journey. Sir William Scott (as he then was), in giving judgment, said: "Nothing can be better settled than that the Act of Capture defeats all rights and interests, but it is contended that the former interests revive on recapture The claimant was not on board at the time of recapture, and the owners were obliged to hire another to fill his place. Under these circumstances the utmost that could be demanded, with any show of reason, would be, that the small portion of his wages earned prior to the capture, two days' service, subject to salvage, were due. Beyond that it is impossible to advance a pretension; for what right can a person in captivity have to demand the benefit of the labour of those who carried the ship to London, and still more of those who were hired in his place for the return journey?"

The contract in this case also was in part performed, but the service in aid of the adventure which the parties to the contract contemplated the seaman should render in return for his wages was made impossible by his incarceration, and each party to the contract was held, therefore, to be relieved of the obligation it imposed.

In my opinion the provision contained in the 158th section of the Merchant Shpping Act of 1894 to the effect that the service of a seaman and his title to wages cease when his ship is lost is but a statutory application of this same principle.

I think that the loss referred to in this section does not mean merely the loss of the use of the ship, but physical loss. Physical loss, however, is not to be confined to the foundering of the ship, or such like, but physical loss as defined in the judgment of Maule, J., in Moss v. Smith (9 C. B. 94, 103), applicable generally to mercantile contracts, and approved of by Lord Blackburn in Dahl v. Nelson (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 392; 44 L. T. Rep. 381; 6 App. Cas. 38, at p. 52). Maule, J. said: "It may possibly be physically possible to repair the ship, but at an enormous cost, and then also the loss would be total; for in matters of business a thing is said to be impossible when it is not practicable, and a thing is impracticable when it can only be done at an excessive or unreasonable cost. If a ship sustains such extensive damage that it would not be reasonably practicable to repair her, seeing that the expense of repair would be such that no man of common sense would incur the outlay, the ship is said to be totally lost." Lord Blackburn points out that, though these words were used in the case of a policy of insurance, they were spoken generally of mercantile contracts, and that it was on the principle thus laid down that Geipel v. Smith (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 268; 26 L. T. Rep. 361; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 404, and Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Company (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 435; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 125) were decided. It was contended that this sect. 158 is exhaustive, and that no loss other than the physical loss there referred to can terminate the seaman's contract, or his right to wages. In my opinion that is wholly erroneous. It leaves out of consideration effective capture by a belligerent which transfers the property in the ship from its owners to the captor and enables that captor to give an effective title to his vendee, and it also leaves out capture by pirates, which transfers the possession and custody of the ship, though not her ownership.

The above-mentioned cases are clearly distinguishable from Beale v. Thompson (4 East, 546) as was pointed out by Lord Campbell in Melville v. De Wolf (4 E. & B. 844). In the former case the ship went out in ballast from England to St. Petersburg to bring cargo from thence to London, and was to be paid freight by the ton. The Emperor Paul of Russia, though at peace with England, had this ship, with others, seized and her crew imprisoned. On his death, in six months, the ship and crew were released. They were taken back on board of their ship, got her cargo, navigated her back to England, and earned the proper freight. Lord Ellenborough, in delivering judgment, approved of, and relied upon the doctrine laid down in different words by Lord Hardwick in The King v. Castle Church (1 Bur. 5, c. 70), and in The King v. Eaton (p. 40 of same report), respectively, to the effect in the first place, "that where a servant returns and the master receives him, it is always esteemed a dispensation of the master, and helps the discontinuance, and works in the nature of a remitter," and in the next: "the absence of the servant for three weeks was purged by the master's receiving him again, which ought to be received in that case as a dispensation, and in strictness of law, he still continues in the service of the master, notwithstanding such absence."

Lord Ellenborough held that owing to the terms upon which the ship was released, and the property belonging to the ship and the crew restored or compensated for, under the order of the Russian Government (551), there was no capture, notwithstanding the hostile nature of the seizure, and laid it down that the right of a mariner to wages depends, first, on his earning freight for his owners on that voyage for which he was hired, and secondly, upon the performance by the mariner of the service he has agreed to perform, in respect of his owners during the voyage.

The jury found that the plaintiff had performed his services properly, and the freight was admittedly earned. And taking these three facts into consideration, the reception back of the plaintiff by the owners into their service. the earning of the freight, and the proper performance by the plaintiff of his service it was held that he was entitled to his wages during the time of his captivity and until he reached London on the return voyage. Delamaine v. Winteringham (4 Camp. 186) is to the same effect.

In the present case the owners have not taken back the seaman Beal into their service. On the contrary they insist that the contract with him is at an end, and that his right to wages has been determined.

In Wiggins v. Ingleton (2 Ld. Raym. 1211), a seaman, after serving three months on a voyage from Carolina to London, was impressed, under the Queen's authority, before reaching the delivery port. It was held that even though the ship reached that port he was only entitled to wages pro tanto for the time he actually served.

In Dahl v. Neilson (ubi sup.), Lord Blackburn at p. 53 said that it was "held in Geipel v. Smith by the whole court, and in Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Company by the majority in the Common Pleas, and in the same case in error by a majority of the Court of Exchequer Chamber that a delay in carrying out a charter-party caused by something for which neither party are responsible, if so great and long as to make it unreasonable to require the parties to go on with the adventure, entitled either of them, at least while the contract was executory, to consider it at an end." Lord Watson, on pp. 61 and 62, analysed these two cases at length, and approved of the decisions in them, and Lord Selborne stated he had read the judgments of his two colleagues and concurred in them.

In the first of these cases the defendant vessel had been chartered by the plaintiff to load at a particular place a cargo of coals to be taken to Hamburg. Before any breach of the agreement the port of Hamburg had been blockaded by the French fleet, and the Queen of England had by proclamation enjoined her subjects to strict neutrality and not to commit any violation of the Law of Nations. Thereupon the voyage to Hamburg became illegal. The defendant refused to load his ship, and it was held he was justified in so doing, as the charter-party was for a single adventure to commence at once, and the contract being executory the further performance of it within a reasonable time was prevented by an excepted cause—the blockade, which was a restraint of princes. Lush, J. in giving judgment put the pith of the case thus. He said: "If the impediment had been in its nature temporary I should have thought the plea bad, but a state of war must be presumed to be likely to continue long, and so to disturb the commerce of merchants as to defeat and destroy the object of a commercial adventure like this." It is not necessary, therefore, in such a case to wait till the delay has occurred. It is legitimate to come to the conclusion that the delay caused by war will be long, and so disturbing to commerce as to defeat the adventure and to act accordingly at once.

In the second case, the plaintiff, a shipowner, entered into a charter-party dated in Nov. 1871, by which his ship was to proceed with all despatch from Liverpool to Newport and there load a cargo of iron rails for San Francisco. The plaintiff effected an insurance on the chartered freight. The ship sailed from Liverpool on the 2nd Jan. and ran aground on the following day in Carnarvon Bay. On the 15th Feb., while she was aground, the charterers threw up the charter-party and chartered another ship. On the 18th she was floated, but the necessary repairs could not be effected till Aug. The plaintiff sued on the policy for the chartered freight. The jury found that the time necessary for getting the ship off, and repairing her, was so long as to put an end to the adventure in a commercial sense.

This, according to Bramwell, B., as he then was, amounted to finding that the voyage the parties contemplated had become impossible, and that a voyage undertaken after the ship had been repaired would have been a different voyage, a different adventure, and held that there was an implied condition precedent in the contract that the ship should arrive at the port of loading in a reasonable time, the non-performance of which not only gave the charterer a cause of action, but released him from the contract, that he was not bound to load the ship, and that there was therefore a loss of the charterer's freight by perils of the sea.

The charterer did not wait till a reasonable time had elapsed before he repudiated the contract. He did that at once when a long delay in the process of repairing was reasonably probable.

In a case tried before Sir William Scott, as he then was, he practically applied, many years earlier, the same principle to an executed contract, namely, the case of The Elizabeth (2 Dods. 403). This vessel sailed from London to St. Petersburg, took in cargo there, and started on her return voyage. She grounded on a reef of rocks at Gothland, was floated, and brought to Ostergman, where she was beached in order to examine her injuries. She was so damaged that she could not be repaired within the Baltic season—i. e., when the Baltic was sufficiently free from ice to be navigable. Though it is a general rule that a captain cannot discharge his crew in a foreign port, it was held that, under these circumstances, and having regard to the anticipated delay, he was clothed with authority in this case to do so. He did discharge them against their will (as it was taken to be), at once, making provision for their passage home to England. The ship returned to England in the month of April following, manned by a new crew. The plaintiff sued for wages up to the time of the return of the ship to the home port. It was held that he was only entitled to wages up to the date of his discharge. At p. 408 of the report, the learned judge, Lord Stowell, said: "The ship proceeded on the original voyage under the expectation entertained on both sides that she would return in the ordinary course of such voyage. A total loss by wreck happens. This operates as a total loss of wages. There may be cases much short of this semi-naufragium which were not occasioned by the default of either party, but where it has originated from vis major, the act of God, which neither party had in contemplation at the time of the contract. . . . I am, therefore, clearly of opinion that they have no right to claim, as they have done, wages up to the time of the return of the Elizabeth. If they had obstinately stayed with the ship they would have done wrong, both with respect to the owners and to themselves. I think the master had a right to dismiss them under this extreme pressure."

Here the contract of the seamen was not executory; it was in part performed. The time necessary to make the repairs had not elapsed. The delay had only been anticipated when the dismissal took place. It was the prospect that a long time must elapse before the ship was rendered fit for use, not the actual lapse of that time, which justified the captain in treating the adventure for which the crew contracted to serve as at an end, and their contracts as terminated.

This case was cited in the case of The Olympic (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 318; 108 L. T. Rep. 592; (1913) P. 92), and commented upon by Buckley, L.J., as he then was. In that case, as in the case of the Elizabeth and as in the present case, the contract of the seamen was in part performed. The Olympic, though very seriously injured, was well worth repairing, but it was the prospect of the delay necessary to effect the repairs required to render her seaworthy which in the opinion of the court rendered her a wreck within the meaning of this sect. 158 of the Act of 1894 and justified her owners in treating the particular adventure for which the crew contracted to serve as ended, and justified their dismissal.

In my view the provision touching wreck contained in the 158th section of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894 is merely a statutory application of the principle first laid down in the case of the Elizabeth to cases when the ship sustains physical injury, not so grave as to amount to loss, yet sufficiently serious to render her unseaworthy until repairs, requiring a substantial time to effect, are carried out upon her.

In the present case it does not appear that the ship is physically injured. Once interned by this enemy power, the prospect of being interned for a length of time to which nobody can place a limit opened up to her owners. Moreover, any day something may be done which would transfer the property in the ship from them to her captors.

In Beale v. Thompson (4 East, at p. 561) Lord Ellenborough said: "Seizure, even hostile, is not necessarily capture, though such is its usual and probable result. The ultimate act or adjudication of the State by which the seizure has been made assigns its proper and conclusive quality and denomination to its own original proceeding. If it condemns in such case it is a capture ab initio. If it awards restitution as an act of justice as the Order of the 5th June 1801 expressly does, it pronounces upon its own act as not being a valid act of capture, but as a temporary seizure and detention upon grounds not warranting the condemnation of the property or the dealing with it as captured. It seems to make no material difference for this purpose whether the restitution were awarded by the government of the country as an act of State, as in this case it was, or by any of the ordinary courts of civil judicature to which the administration of justice on these subjects is usually dedicated." The meaning of that passage I take to be this, that seizure per se is an equivocal act that whether it shall amount to capture or not depends upon the intention of the captor in making it, that this intention may be shown by acts subsequent, namely, either the condemnation in the proper judicial tribunals of the State of the property taken as lawful prize, or by an act of the government of the country of the captors as an act of State, and that when that intention is shown it operates by relation back to the original seizure, turning it either into a capture ab initio, or into a temporary detention ab initio not amounting to capture. Thus the circular of the 5th June 1801 was held to determine the character and purpose of the seizure made over six months previously.

In Goss v. Withers (2 Bur. 683), Lord Mansfield, at pp. 693-695, deals with the principles adopted and practices followed by different European countries on this question of prize. He leaves the matter, in many respects, quite undecided. And consistently with everything that has been laid down in these two authorities, it may well be that any act of the Government of a belligerent Power indicating that they have treated a seized ship as their own property, such as the sale of it, for instance, would be sufficient to determine the character and purpose of the original act of seizure so as to make it either a capture proper with all its consequences or mere detention.

We are deciding this case without knowing whether anything of the kind has occurred in this instance. The fact, however, that it might occur at any moment after seizure, renders it all the more reasonable, just, and natural for the owners to have come to the conclusion on the 4th Aug. 1914 that the adventure upon which their ship was embarked was put an end to, and the contracts of the crew, and their right to wages determined. They acted upon that conclusion in the only way, and to the only extent possible under the circumstances, by refusing to pay the allotment. In reference to Hadley v. Clarke (8 T.R., 263), it has been already pointed out that the embargo imposed by the Order in Council appeared only to contemplate a temporary detention, as it was made till "further order." And the point was never made that an embargo, even if originally intended to be temporary, might not put an end to the contract of affreightment if it were prolonged (see Lord Kenyon, 265). All that was, in fact, decided was the abstract point that a temporary interruption of a voyage by an embargo does not put an end to such a contract.

Moreover, the judgments of Grove, J. and Laurence, J., especially that of the latter, rather indicate that they treated the contract to carry the goods to Leghorn as a positive and absolute contract to do so within a reasonable time—the dangers of the seas only excepted. The latter learned judge says, p. 267, they—"absolutely engaged to carry the goods, the dangers of the seas only excepted; that, therefore, is the only excuse which they can make for not performing the contract. If they had intended that they should be excused for any other cause they should have introduced such an exception into the contract."

Of course, if the contract of the parties be thus positive and absolute, they are bound by it, however impossible the performance of it may become.

The contract with the crew in this case was not a positive and absolute contract, and the above case does not appear to me to touch the present case.

Sect. 134 of the Act of 1894 does not, I think, touch this case. It obviously does not refer to the forcible act of an enemy.

No point was raised as to the two days which elapsed between the 2nd Aug, the day of arrival, and the 4th Aug., the day of the outbreak of war.

In my opinion, therefore, the judgment of the Court of Appeal, as well as that of Rowlatt, J. was erroneous and should be reversed.

Lord SHAW.—The respondent is the wife of a seaman who signed articles as second mate on board the Coralie Horlock on the 21st May 1914. He agreed to serve "on a voyage of not exceeding two years' duration," within certain limits, "trading in any rotation and to end at such port in the United Kingdom or Continent of Europe (within home trade limits) as may be required by the master."

His wife, the respondent, was duly made allottee of one-half of his monthly wages. The papers are in order, and there is no question of her right to be paid the one-half of the wages which her husband has earned or to which he is entitled. She founds upon sect. 143 of the Act of 1894, conferring the right to sue and recover on allotment notes. By sub-sect. 2 it is provided that the seaman shall be presumed to be duly earning his wages unless the contrary is shown inter alia by such "evidence as the court in their absolute discretion consider sufficient to show satisfactorily that the seaman has ceased to be entitled to the wages."

The question in the case, accordingly, is whether Beal has become entitled to wages from and after the time when a state of war existed between Great Britain and Germany.

The declaration of war took effect as from 11 p.m. on the 4th Aug. 1914. The Coralie Horlock was then in the port of Hamburg, where she had arrived on the 2nd. The ship still remains there. Apart from exceptional or provisional rules or directions agreed to by the belligerent States, for her owners or master to trade with the enemy was, of course, illegal; for her crew it was equally illegal to assist in trading with the enemy; to attempt an escape, whether with or without cargo, may have been physically impossible; in any case it would have exposed the ship to risk of destruction.

In Esposito v. Bowden (29 L. T. Rep. O. S. 295; 7 E. & B., p. 779), Willes, J., reviewing the case law and referring especially to Potts v. Bell (8 T. Rep. 548), and to the judgment of Lord Stowell in the Hoop, stated the law in terms which have never since been doubted: "It is now fully established that, the presumed object of war being as much to cripple the enemy's commerce as to capture his property, a declaration of war imports a prohibition of commercial intercourse and correspondence with the inhabitants of the enemy's country, and that such intercourse, except with the licence of the Crown, is illegal."

Without fault on the part of either party to the contract of service, law and force combined to stop the prosecution of this voyage; and the adventure was consequently lost. In my humble opinion that stoppage and loss, having arisen from a declaration of war, must be considered to have been caused for a period of indefinite duration, and so to have effected a solution of the contract arrangements for and dependent upon the completion or further continuance of the adventure.

I say this advisedly, in consequence of the argument presented to the House, and founded on the possiblity that after a declaration of war peace may be concluded within a short time, ships may be released and voyages and shipping adventures be resumed. As the cases show, such resumption does of consent take place, and courts of law pay respect to the terms upon which the resumption was made. But apart from the private arrangements of parties, the contracts are, in my opinion (and subject to the point as to a period of grace hereafter dealt with), brought to an end by a declaration of war, and all interested are entitled to have affairs settled upon that footing. And I am further of opinion that the contract of service between owners and crews is also terminated in the same way, because it is a contract whose incident stand or fall with the adventure with which it was bound up.

I do not think that any other rule would be in accord with law or would work. When a ship is put under detention by a declaration of war, I cannot see room for a condition of affairs which would leave parties in suspense, feeling that they are bound if the war be short but free if the war be long. In the case of a vessel in an enemy port, the war descends upon master and crew alike, taking no regard of either contract rights or obligations, but putting all alike on the common footing of British citizens, and as such placing their liberty completely at the disposal of the enemy Power. Germany made no lesser claim in the present case. From the 4th Aug. the owners "were deprived of the possession of this said vessel, and the said Tom Rea Beal, with the officers and other members of the crew, were on or about the 2nd Nov. removed from the said vessel to a lodging ship in Hamburg, and on or about the 8th Nov. were interned at Ruhleben, near Berlin," where they still remain.

While the general question as to the effect of a declaration of war should, in my opinion, be resolved as stated, I should also feel entirely free to hold that the circumstances of the present case leave no doubt as to disruption of the contract relations of parties and the loss of the adventure.

Germany allowed no period of grace for loading or unloading, or for departure with freedom from capture on transit. The practice of nations in this particular has greatly varied. I refer with much satisfaction to the treatment of this subject in Mr. Higgins' valuable work on The Hague Peace Conferences. On the outbreak of the Crimean War in 1854, enemy trading ships were allowed a period of six weeks, by Russia on the one hand and Britain and France on the other. In 1866 Prussia made the same allowance to Austria.

Very liberal concessions on this head were made by the United States of America to the ships of Spain on the outbreak of war between those countries in 1898. Since that time the instances show less indulgence to peaceful commerce. On the occurrence of the Russo-Japanese War in 1904, Japan allowed a week, Russia forty-eight hours. In the present instance no allowance was made. The circumstances are specially notable. Great Britain was manifestly willing that the spirit of The Hague Convention should be obeyed and that days of grace should be allowed. On the day of the declaration of war—namely, the 4th Aug. 1914—an Order in Council was issued referring to the practice in the past and to the terms of the Convention. It provided that a period of grace for loading, unloading, and departure should be allowed to all German vessels in British ports—namely, until midnight of the 14th Aug. This was subject to information being received not later than the 7th, that "the treatment accorded to British merchant ships and their cargoes which, at the date of the outbreak of hostilities, were in the ports of the enemy, or which subsequently entered them, is not less favourable than the treatment accorded to enemy merchant ships" by the Order in Council. Germany did not accept this overture.

The uncertainties and hesitations of nations upon the question are reflected in art. 1 of The Hague Convention of 1907, in which the international consent was reduced to the mere proposition that "it is desirable" that a merchant ship in an enemy port should "be allowed to depart freely, either immediately or after a reasonable number of days' grace." As applied to the case of the Coralie Horlock at Hamburg the enunciation of this sentiment has proved worthless.

I observe, however, that sect. 2 of the Convention is also founded on in the courts below. It provides that such a ship "may not be confiscated. The belligerent may detain it, on condition of restoring it after the war, without payment of compensation, or he may requisition it on condition of paying compensation."

I am not in a position to say whether this head of The Hague Convention will be respected by the Government of Germany. That learned judge Swinfen Eady, L.J. says that "in the absence of any evidence to the contrary it must be presumed that she is merely detained on condition of being restored after the war."

It is not necessary, in the view which I take, to discuss the point at length. I have already referred to the action of Germany in regard to the subject of days of grace. Other circumstances might also have to be considered on the point of whether The Hague Convention afforded any presumptive aid in the construction of rights or obligations, or in regard to the action of the present belligerents. Whether even—conventions having been disregarded—rights would have to be determined as in pre-convention days—the days, according to Lord Mansfield (2 Douglas, 614*a*), of confiscation "if no reciprocal agreement is made"—on such points no opinion need be indicated. But they do bear on the question of presumption from the terms of The Hague Convention, which is referred to in the courts below.

I must express the gravest doubt whether any such presumption is in place in the present case. Speaking for myself I should not feel justified upon the terms of this international convention in allowing my mind to be swayed by such presumptions as would be appropriate to an inviolate document or to one which is backed by the sanctions of municipal law. What, in short, during the course of the war or under the stress of circumstances, may happen to this ship, no one can foresee: destruction, confiscation, or return—any of these things may occur; and all are involved in the overwhelming uncertainty both as to time and circumstance which follows from the present state of war. With regard to the effect of a declaration of war there is certainly, however, one presumption. It has been expressed in various decisions, but was clearly stated by Lush J. in Geipel v. Smith (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 268; 26 L. T. Rep. 361): "A state of war must be presumed to be likely to continue so long, and so to disturb the commerce of merchants, as to defeat and destroy the object of a commercial adventure like this."

The judgments of the courts below proceed upon the two propositions—(1) that the ship is in esse—she is neither wrecked nor lost, and (2) she is temporarily detained, and therefore that the principle of the old embargo cases applies. I again take leave to refer to this second point. I think an analysis of the embargo cases shows that they depended largely if not altogether on these considerations. In the first place, in the working of the old rule that freight is the mother of wages, the question as to whether wages were due could not be adjusted until after the voyage was over and the freight was earned. Accordingly, in the leading case of Beale v. Thompson (4 E. 546), the essential fact founded on was this, that after an embargo laid on by the the Tsar Paul had been taken off by that erratic Sovereign the voyage was resumed, the same ship and the same men employed, and all the men taken on to complete the same voyage, under circumstances which showed "a recognition on the part of the master that he and the sailors then stood in their original relative situation to each other under the articles by which that relation was constituted": (4 East, 565). The rule as to the dependency of wages on freight has long ago been abolished by statute; and while, of course, it might be possible under special bargain to continue or resume contract relations upon special terms, I have great doubt whether the embargo cases to which I have referred can be now relied upon in support of any part of the modern law of seaman's wages. These observations apply in terms to other cases cited —e.g., to Delamainer v. Winteringham (4 Camp. 186).

Upon, however, the proposition that the ship is neither wrecked nor lost, I argree with the learned judges in the courts below. Upon the other hand, I cannot see my way to hold that there is therefore an indefeasible right to recover, under sect. 158 of the Act, unless and until such wreck or loss occurs. I venture respectfully upon that subject to adopt the judgment of my noble and learned friend, Lord Wrenbury.

I now come, accordingly, to what is by far the most important point in the case. Granted that a state of war exists, with consequences which include the stoppage of the voyage and the internment of officers and crew, are wages due for a period subsequent to the declaration of war, the ship itself having been neither wrecked nor lost, and being still in the port of Hamburg?

It may be conceded that the continued existence of the subject-matter of the contract has formed a large part in the consideration of such a question. Under the law of Rome the illustration of the solution of a contract obligation was frequently given from the case of a promise with regard to a slave. In such a case, if the slave died or was manumitted before being handed over, the contract was at an end. The vendor, however, remained, of course, answerable if he was responsible for what had occurred—if he had himself killed the slave or set him free. In all cases, however, where no fault attached, the failure of the corpus certum released the contracting parties.

Several of the citations from the Digest on this subject are made by Lord Blackburn in the leading case of Taylor v. Caldwell (8 L. T. Rep. 356; 3 B. & S. 826), and one can entirely assent to that very learned judge's view that the principle is adopted in the civil law as applicable to every obligation of which the subject is a thing certain. He cites Pothier in support of a definition of much precision as follows: "The debtor corporis certi is freed from his obligation when the thing has perished neither by his act nor his neglect, and before he is in default, unless by some stipulation he has taken on himself the risk of the particular misfortune which has occurred."

In another passage of this judgment Lord Blackburn remarks: "In none of these cases is the promise in words other than positive, nor is there any express stipulation that the destruction of the person or thing shall excuse the performance: but that excuse is by law implied, because from the nature of the contract it is apparent that the parties contracted on the basis of the continued existence of the particular person or chattel."

In the course of laying down these principles the cases which had occurred in the English courts were referred to, and that of Williams v. Lloyd, reported in W. Jones, Rep. 179, was especially founded on.

It is manifest that the principle last adumbrated was capable of a wider practical and logical application than to the failure of a certum corpus. The underlying ratio is the failure of something which was at the basis of the contract, in the mind and intention of the contracting parties.

This ratio has, I am humbly of opinion, been properly developed in recent years. I do not go through all the decisions, but I think it right to mention that of Krell v. Henry (89 L. T. Rep. 328; (1903) 2 K. B. 740), in which I desire to attach my respectful and pointed concurrence in the opinion delivered by Vaughan Williams, L.J. in these passages: "Whatever may have been the limits of the Roman law, the case of Nickoll v. Ashton (84 L. T. Rep. 804; (1901) 2 K. B. 126) makes it plain that the English law applies the principle not only to cases where the performance of the contract becomes impossible by the cessation of existence of the thing which is the subject-matter of the contract, but also to cases where the event which renders the contract incapable of performance is the cessation or non-existence of an express condition or state of things going to the root of the contract." This view is fully discussed by the learned judge. I think it to be in entire accord with that doctrine of frustration of voyage which has become fully accepted since the case of Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Company (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 435; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 125), with the doctrine underlying Taylor v. Caldwell (sup.), and with sound legal principle.

Lord Blackburn, in discussing the civil law, only cited Digest 45, 1, 33 and Digest 45, 1, 23, and confined his survey of that law to the failure of a corpus certum, developing the doctrine, as it were from that point. And Vaughan Williams, L.J. reasons upon the same limited premises, stating that "the Roman law dealt with obligations de certo corpore." The passages cited are from the book "de verborum obligationibus." The subject is too large for treatment here, but it may be said that the same principle appears in book 18, "de contrahendue emptione." Even in regard to book 45, however, another text shows that the development and wider application of the principle was not unknown to Roman jurists and was approved. It is Digest 45, 1, 91. After dealing with the case of a slave, the ordinary illustration of a certum corpus, and of his death, the review of the principle is broadened thus: "Si sit quidem res in rebus humanis, sed dari non possit, ut fundus religiosus (puta) vel sacer factus, vel servus manumissus, vel etiam ab hostibus si capiatur"—then in each of these instances liability under the obligation flies off, if the occurrences do not arise from the promissor's fault. Mr. Hunter in his invaluable work thus paraphrases the dictum as to the sale of a piece of land: "Sempronius promises to give a small plot of ground to Maevius. After doing so he buries a dead body in the place and thus makes the land extra-commercium. Sempronius must pay its value. If the land had belonged to another who had buried a body in it, he would have been released." The illustration is not inapt even to the present case, for it shows that it was no answer to say "the land, the certum corpus, is there," for the land having through no fault of the promissor become extra-commercium, by burial of the dead, then the basis of the transaction, the root of the contract as that had been contemplated by the parties, had gone, or had suffered such an alteration as to release them from the obligation itself. This was a case analogous to that of the slave who was still alive but had been manumitted or had been captured by the enemy. It is thus not without interest to observe that not only had the principle been laid down, but its modern development had been foreshadowed in Roman times.

The application of the principle in the present case can, in my opinion, lead to only one result, namely, that a dissolution of the relation of master and servant occurred in the case of the Coralie Horlock upon the declaration of war between Germany and Britain. The vessel being then in the port of Hamburg, remains there; her master, officers, and crew are interned as prisoners; the voyage and adventure contemplated have been brought to an end. No light is thrown upon the question by illustrations of contracts of service which have been terminated, say, by a bankruptcy or a cessation of business; in such cases the servant, having lost his employment, is able to say, "I am here, willing and able, to render the service contracted for." In the present case these ideas would be fictional; the ship cannot be navigated, no orders in that regard by the master could be obeyed, and the crew, unhappily, is prevented by hostile force from rendering the ship any service whatsoever. In such circumstances I do not see my way to hold the seaman to be entitled in law to wages which, through no fault of the owners, he is entirely unable to earn by service. Such cases, no doubt, will take their rank among the many desolating circumstances which demand remedial attention at the hand of Parliament or the executive power.

I think that the appeal should succeed.

Lord PARMOOR.—In this appeal, involving a question of great general importance, I agree with the decision of Rowlatt, J. and of the majority in the Court of Appeal.

The plaintiff in the action and the respondent in the appeal is the wife of Tom Rea Beal, who signed articles as second mate on board the Coralie Horlock on the 21st May 1914. On the same day an allotment note was duly signed in favour of the respondent, for the sum of 4*l*. 15*s*. to be paid monthly by the appellant during the period of the articles. On the 4th Aug. 1914, at the outbreak of the war, the Coralie Horlock was in the port of Hamburg, and was then, and still is, unable to leave by reason of detention by the German authorities. The appellant paid to the respondent, under the allotment note, certain sums up to the 2nd Aug. 1914, but contends that he is not liable to pay to Tom Rea Beal any wages after the 4th Aug. 1914, and in consequence is not liable to make any further payment to the respondent.

The case was tried on an agreed statement of facts. The contract of service as a mariner by Beal was, "on a voyage of not exceeding two years' duration to any ports or places within the limits of 75 degrees north and 60 degrees south latitude, commencing at Hull, proceeding thence to Alexandria, and (or) any other ports within the above limits; trading in any rotation and to end at such port in the United Kingdom or continent of Europe (within home trade limits) as may be required by the master." The decision of the appeal depends upon the construction of this contract.

The material facts are contained in paras. 7 and 8 of the statement:

> On and after the 4th Aug. 1914, a state of war existed between the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and the Empire of Germany. The said vessel was then and still is in the port of Hamburg, and is unable to leave the said port by reason of detention by the German authorities. The appellant has been since the 4th Aug. 1914, and still is, deprived of the possession of his said vessel, and the said Tom Rea Beal, with the officers and other members of the crew, were on or about the 2nd Nov. removed from the said vessel to a lodging ship in Hamburg, and on or about the 8th Nov. were interned at Ruhleben, near Berlin.

It is not allowable to make conjectures in favour of the appellant outside the facts contained in the statement and any inferences deducible therefrom. I agree in this respect with the views expressed in the judgments of Rowlatt, J. and Bankes, L.J.

In the course of the argument arts. 1 and 2 of The Hague Convention, No. 6 of 1907, were referred to. They are as follows:
