> When a merchant ship belonging to one of the belligerent Powers is at the commencement of hostilities in an enemy port, it is desirable that it should be allowed to depart freely, either immediately or after a number of days' grace, and to proceed, after being furnished with a pass, direct to its port of destination or any port indicated to it. The same principle applied in the case of a ship which has left its last port of departure before the commencement of the war and has entered a port belonging to the enemy while still ignorant that hostilities have broken out.

Then art. 2:

> A merchant ship which, owing to circumstances beyond its control, may have been unable to leave the enemy port within the period contemplated in the preceding article, or which was not allowed to leave, may not be confiscated. The belligerent may merely detain it on condition of restoring it after the war without payment of compensation, or he may requisition it on condition of paying of compensation.

The case appears to have been argued on the footing that the vessel was detained in accordance with the conditions of these articles. These articles could not be referred to if they contained provisions inconsistent with the agreed statement of facts, but I think that they are in accord with the said statement, and that there is no objection to the reference which has been made to them in the judgments of the courts below.

The respondent has proved, pursuant to sect. 143 (2) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, that she is the person mentioned in the allotment note, and that the note was given by the owner or by the master or some other authorised agent. Her husband, therefore, is to be presumed to be duly earning his wages, unless the contrary is shown under sub-sect. 2 (d): "by such other evidence as the court in their absolute discretion consider sufficient to show satisfactorily that the seaman has ceased to be entitled to the wages out of which the allotment is to be paid." The question is whether this onus has been discharged. The writ was issued on the 10th April 1915, and judgment has been given in favour of the respondent for the amount of the allotment note up to the date of the writ. It is important that this limitation should be observed. My opinion is based on the conditions as they then existed—namely, a detention which had operated from the 4th Aug. 1914 to the 10th April 1915, and of which the subsequent length was indeterminate and not capable of exact definition.

The first question to be decided is whether under the conditions stated in the agreed statement of facts, the matter is determined by statutory enactment. It is not suggested that Tom Rea Beal has been discharged abroad under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1906 or that his right to wages has been suspended under the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894. The relevant section is sect. 158, which enacts that where the services of a seaman terminate before the date comtemplated in the agreement by reason of the wreck or loss of the ship, or of his being left on shore at any place abroad under a certificate granted as provided by that Act of his unfitness or inability to proceed on the voyage, the seaman shall be entitled to wages up to the time of such termination, but not for any longer period. If there has been a loss of the ship within the meaning of this section the appellant is not liable.

It is not necessary to attempt to define exhaustively all the cases which might be included within the term "loss of the ship," but, in my opinion, it does not include such a case as that of the Coralie Horlock, of the possession of which the appellant has been deprived since the 4th Aug. 1914 by reason of its detention in the port of Hamburg. The ship has not been lost by any physical accident, such as might have caused a wreck, and there is no evidence that it has been requisitioned by the German authorities, or that there has been any confiscation of ownership. The use of the vessel has been lost for an indeterminate time. I doubt whether the loss of the use of a vessel comes in any sense within the words "loss of the ship" in sect. 158 of the Act of 1894. It is not necessary to decide this point. There is no finding in the agreed statement of facts which could justify the inference that, owing to its detention, the ship has no longer a commercial value, or that the expense incurred, or to be incurred, in not abandoning her, is such that no man as a matter of business would incur the outlay.

I am in agreement with Rowlatt, J. when he said: "Now, what I have stated with regard to the position of the ship in Hamburg under The Hague Convention, if it is right, negatives any question as to the loss of the ship. She is there; the property in her has not changed; she is simply detained, and apart altogether from what was said in the case of Sievright v. Allen, which was cited to me, it is impossible to hold that the ship is lost." It was argued on behalf of the appellant that, although sect. 158 was not exhaustive of the cases in which a seaman was entitled to wages up to a given time, but not for any longer period, yet that the section did cover and was intended to cover, a case such as the present, in which if the seaman is no longer entitled to his wages it is by reason of the alleged loss of the ship. I think that there is good reason for this contention, but I prefer to place my opinion on wider grounds. Assuming that sect. 158 has no application, Tom Rea Beal was, in my opinion, entitled to the payment of his wages up to the date of the issue of the writ on the construction of the contract of service, and the respondent succeeds in her claim as allottee.

The articles, which contain the contract of service, make no express reference to the contingency which has happened, and which is said to have dissolved the contract and to have defeated any claim to wages.

The detention of the vessel, and the imprisonment of the mariners, did render it impossible in fact for Tom Rea Beal to be in a position to perform the duties of his service as a mariner, but this condition was not brought about by any default on his part, and there is no suggestion of disobedience to any command or to any refusal on his part to do his duty. Whether under such circumstances the contract is dissolved, or a claim to wages under the contract is defeated, depends on the bargain of the parties as expressed or implied in the contract which they have made. If the events which have happened subsequent to the date of the contract, and which operate to make its performance no longer possible, are of such a nature and character that they can reasonably be supposed to have been within the contemplation of the contracting parties at the time when the contract was made, then the subsequent contingency does not dissolve the contract, or release either party from a continuing liability under the contract. Even though the general liability under the contract continues, the claim of a plaintiff may be defeated by proof of non-compliance with any one or more of the special contract stipulations. An illustration arises in the leading case of Beale v. Thompson (4 East, 456). One of the arguments urged on behalf of the defendant in that case was that the articles contained a special stipulation against mariners going on shore, under any pretence, before the voyage was ended, without the leave of the commanding officer on board, and that the plaintiff had gone on shore in contravention of this stipulation. Lord Ellenborough having found that the freight had been earned, and that the contract had not been dissolved, says "that the only remaining question necessary to be decided in order to perfect the plaintiff's claim to have his wages paid out of that fund (i.e., freight) is: Has his service under the articles been duly performed by him?" The special verdict of the jury had found that the plaintiff did his duty as a seaman during the voyage, but it was said that the facts stated in the special verdict showed that during a considerable period of the time, for which the wages are claimed, the master was out of possession of the vessel, and the crew were all marched up the country and detained as prisoners.

Lord Ellenborough held that the stipulation in the articles that the plaintiff should not be on shore under any pretence, before the voyage was ended, without the leave of his commanding officer on board, did not apply to a case of imprisonment, and must be understood as being on shore by the party's own unauthorised act. In the present case there is no question of the breach of a special stipulation in the articles, such as would defeat the claim to wages, if the contract is not dissolved. It was further held in Beale v. Thompson (sup.) that if the imprisonment on shore could be considered as a breach of the stipulations in the articles, such breach had been remedied by the subsequent action of the master, but this alternative finding does not affect the principle of the decision, and is not applicable in the present case.

The question, therefore, to be determined is whether the detention of the vessel and the imprisonment of the mariners have dissolved the contract of service. The general rule of the common law is that a contract is not dissolved, or the parties excused from their obligations, in cases in which the performance has become impossible, owing to conditions which have only become operative subsequent to the contract date. The object of this rule of construction is to give effect to the intention of the contracting parties as expressed in their contract, and it is not applicable if a contrary intention is expressed or implied in a particular contract. In a mariner's contract for wages it has been held in a decision confirmed in this House (Beale v. Thompson, sup.) that the hostile detention of the vessel and the internment of the crew do not of themselves dissolve the contract of service, and this decision appears to have been uniformly recognised.

In Beale v. Thompson (sup.) the vessel was detained by hostile seizure for a period of about six months and then released. The voyage was continued, and the freight had been specifically earned and received by the owners of the vessel. At this date the doctrine that freight was the mother of wages prevailed, and it was necessary that freight should be earned before a claim to wages could be made good. This condition having been fulfilled, it became necessary to decide whether the detention of the vessel and the imprisonment of the mariners dissolved the contract of service on which the seaman relied for his claim. Lord Ellenborough, in his judgment, draws a distinction between detention and capture, and holds that detention, as distinguished from capture, did not defeat the plaintiff's claim to wages. It should be noted that this decision was given in reference to a detention which had lasted for a period of about six months and had terminated; but if the detention of the vessel and the imprisonment of the mariners had of themselves operated to dissolve the contract, such contract would have been dissolved as at the date of the commencement of the detention and imprisonment, and there would have been a severance between such contract and any contract subsequently entered into by the master when the vessel was released. This decision was brought before this House by writ of error, and confirmed. The Journals of this House contain the Order made: "That the said judgment be in all things affirmed, and that it stand in full force and virtue notwithstanding the causes and matters aforesaid as above assigned in error."

I am unable to draw any material distinction between the relevant facts in the case of Beale v. Thompson and the agreed facts of this case. In Beale v. Thompson the vessel was unable to leave the port and continue her voyage by reason of hostile detention by the Russian authorities, and in this case by reason of hostile detention by the German authorities. In each case there is a hostile seizure, which Lord Ellenborough distinguishes from capture. In Beale v. Thompson the mariners were removed from the ship and imprisoned on land; in the present case the crew were first removed to a lodging ship at Hamburg, and subsequently, on or about the 8th Nov., were interned at Ruhleben, near Berlin.

The earlier case of Pratt v. Cuff is referred to in Thompson v. Rowcroft (4 East, 43). In this case a vessel was captured by the Dutch and carried to Delfziel. The plaintiff was confined on board ship for seven months and subsequently in Haerlingen prison until the 23rd Jan. in the following year, when the vessel and plaintiff were released. The jury found in favour of the plaintiff for wages during the period of his imprisonment, subject to the opinion of the court. At a subsequent trial the jury found that the freight had been received by the defendant. Lord Kenyon is said to have expressed so strong an opinion for the plaintiff that the case was never afterwards pressed by the defendant.

In Hadley v. Clarke (8 Durn. & East. 259) the defendants had contracted to carry goods from Liverpool to Leghorn. On the arrival of the vessel at Falmouth an embargo was laid on her for an indeterminate period, "until the further Order of Council." It was held that even after two years, when the embargo was taken off, the defendants were answerable in damages for the non-performance of the contract. The report shows that it was argued on behalf of the defendant that the case fell within the rule that when a contract which was possible and legal at the time of making it becomes afterwards impossible by the act of God, or illegal by an instrument of the State, the obligation is discharged. This argument was not accepted by the court as referable to a contract of this character, and Lord Kenyon bases his judgment on the general proposition "that a temporary interruption of a voyage by an embargo does not put an end to such a contract as this." Lord Kenyon further expresses the opinion that no line can be drawn dependent on the duration of the embargo; but it is not necessary to indorse so wide a proposition in the present instance. This decision was given on a contract of carriage, and not on a contract of service, but the principle and reasoning are equally applicable to a contract of service.

This case was referred to both in the judgment of Bramwell, B. and in the dissentient judgment of Cleasby, B. in the case of Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Company (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 435; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 125), but its authority is not impugned. In the judgment of Bramwell, B. it is said: "It may safely be said that there the question was wholly different from the present." Cleasby, B. quotes with approval a passage from the judgment of Bovill, C.J. in the court below: "I have no difficulty in subscribing to the doctrine laid down in Hadley v. Clarke that a common embargo does not put an end to any contract between the parties, but is to be considered as a temporary suspension of the contract only, and that the parties must submit to whatever inconvenience may arise thereon, unless they have provided against it by the terms of their contract. . . . The principle of Hadley v. Clarke is that an embargo is a circumstance against which it is equally competent for the parties to provide as against dangers of the sea, and, therefore, if they do not provide against it, they must abide by the consequences of their contract."

In the case of Delamainer v. Winteringham (4 Camp. 186), the plaintiff claimed to receive wages during a hostile embargo in a foreign port, while he was imprisoned on shore on proof—which was then necessary—that the voyage had been completed and the freight earned. Objection was taken that the nature of the embargo had not been proved. Lord Ellenborough, however, gave judgment for the plaintiff, presuming the fact that the embargo was not of such a nature as to put an end to the contract between the master and owners of the ship and the mariner, and finding that there was no severance of service.

I am unable to find any case in conflict with the principle laid down by Lord Ellenborough and confirmed in this House in the case of Beale v. Thompson, but I have not overlooked the cases quoted in the argument before your Lordships.

In the case of Melville v. De Wolfe (4 Ell. & Bl., 844), it was held that where a seamen had been sent home as a witness against his captain on a trial for shooting one of the crew, there was a complete dissolution of the contract of service, and no claim for wages could be maintained. In this case, however, a distinction was drawn between such a dissolution of the contract of service and a temporary detention. Lord Campbell, in his judgment, expressly approves Beale v. Thompson: "We are certainly bound by the case of Beale v. Thompson . . . we entirely approve of that decision; for there nothing had occurred to dissolve the contract; and the relation constituted between the parties when the ship's articles were signed might well be considered as enduring till the return of the ship to England. The ship was only detained under an embargo, which in its nature is only a temporary act, and it might have been removed at any time from day to day."

In the case of The Friends (4 Rob. 143), Sir W. Scott says in his judgment, "Nothing can be better settled than that the act of capture defeats all rights and interests: but it is contended that the former interest revives on recapture." In the case of the Governor Raffles (2 Dods. 17), Sir W. Scott says: "The moment the capture is effected by an enemy the crew are discharged from their duty to their employers." It is not necessary, however, to refer to further cases of a similar character, since, whatever may be the result of a hostile capture, Lord Ellenborough in Beale v. Thompson draws the distinction between the case of capture and the case of detention.

The opinion above expressed finds strong confirmation in a passage from the judgment of Kennedy, L.J. in The Olympic case (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 318; 108 L. T. Rep. 592; (1913) P. 92), which is quoted in the judgment of Swinfen Eady, L.J.: "The embargo which prevents a laden ship from proceeding from port on her voyage does not dissolve the mariner's engagement, any more than it dissolves the contract between the shipowner and the merchant whose cargo has been loaded." Kennedy, L.J. then refers to a passage in Lord Tenterden's Law of Merchant Ships and Seamen, and says: "In this sentence one of the greatest of judicial authorities, on matters of shipping, clearly indicates his opinion, even in the case of the embargo of a laden ship, i.e., in the case of an obstacle to the prosecution of the voyage imposed by the Government, an obstacle of indefinite and unascertainable duration (which the detention for repairs is not), that, while in his own interest, and in order to save himself the risk of expense, it may be a reasonable and, indeed, a very prudent step on the part of the shipowner, to discharge the greater part of the crew, yet, if that step is taken, the shipowner must compensate those whom he so discharges for the loss of the wages during the unfulfilled residue of the contract period, unless, as is likely enough, they find equally remunerative employment in another ship," and adds, "that what is true of an embargo by the Government to which the ship belongs is true also of the seizure for a temporary purpose by a hostile Power."

I think that the claim of the allottee is good, and that, up to the date of issue of the writ, there was no severance of service under the contract, and that the judgment of the Court of Appeal should be affirmed.

Lord WRENBURY.—The respondent is entitled to one-half her husband's wages if any. The question for decision is whether after the 4th Aug. 1914, or some later date, the husband is entitled to wages. The appellant denies that he is entitled to wages after the 4th Aug. 1914. He founds himself upon either sect. 158 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 or upon the common law or the law merchant as applicable to the case of a seaman if, as he contends, the statute has not rendered that law inapplicable.

I may dispose of the question upon sect. 158 in few words. It was decided in The Olympic (sup.) that there is a "wreck of the ship" within the section where the vessel has suffered such physical damage by a casualty in the nature of wreck as that she has ceased to be in a seaworthy condition to continue within a reasonable time the adventure as a commercial adventure. The same, I think, is true of the word "loss" in the section. If there have been such a loss as that the adventure has failed as a commercial adventure the section, I think, applies.

But it remains to determine the meaning of the word "loss." It is confined, I think, to physical loss. The wreck and the loss referred to in the section I understand to be a physical injury if it be a wreck and a physical loss if it be a loss. Upon the evidence in this case the ship was at Hamburg on the 4th Aug. She was still there on the 2nd Nov; there is no evidence as to what has happened to her since. She may be there, she may not. She may be in existence, she may not. She has not, so far as appears, been confiscated. If Germany has obeyed The Hague Convention she will not have been confiscated. I make no assumption that Germany will have obeyed The Hague Convention. It suffices to say that the appellant has not proved confiscation. The result is that the appellant has proved not that the ship has been physically destroyed, or injured, or that the property in the ship has been taken from him, but only that from the 4th Aug. 1914 to the present time he has been deprived of the use of her.

In my judgment detention or deprivation of use is not loss within sect. 158. It follows that in my opinion sect. 158 does not apply. So far I think the respondent is right.

The respondent next began by contending that sect. 158 is exhaustive; that if that section offers no defence the seaman is entitled to his wages. This seems to me an impossible contention. When a statute provides that in certain events a certain result shall ensue, it is plainly not enacting what is to result in other events. The contention was then modified, and was that the section is exhaustive in the cases with which it deals. This may be, and I think is true, but it leaves the matter where it was. Upon my view of the word "loss" the section does not deal with the case before the House. It follows that the section does not exclude the common law or the law merchant in the case of seamen.

Where a contract has been entered into, and by a supervening cause beyond the control of either party its performance has become impossible, I take the law to be as follows: If a party has expressly contracted to do a lawful act, come what will—if, in other words, he has taken upon himself the risk of such a supervening cause he is liable if it occurs, because by the very hypothesis he has contracted to be liable. But if he has not expressly so contracted, and from the nature of the contract it appears that the parties from the first must have known that its fulfilment would become impossible if such a supervening cause occurred, then upon such a cause occurring both parties are excused from performance. In that case a condition is implied that if performance becomes impossible the contract shall not remain binding. The leading case on the subject is Taylor v. Caldwell (3 B. & Sm. 826). Krell v. Henry (89 L. T. Rep. 328; (1903) 2 K. B. 740) is an illustration of the application of the principle.

On the 4th Aug. 1914 there occurred, in the case of this ship, a supervening cause which resulted in the impossibility of continuing that adventure which was the subject of the seaman's contract of the 21st May 1914, and that impossibility has continued for such a time as that its character, which might have proved to be temporary, is now known to be for a time so indefinite and so long that the adventure which was the whole basis of the contract has failed. The case falls, I think, within the principle of Taylor v. Caldwell (sup.). Melville v. De Wolf (4 Ell. & Bl. 844) is a like case. The plaintiff there was taken from his employment and sent home by the order of a court, and, as Lord Campbell, C.J. put it, the contract was "dissolved by the supreme authority of the State." The plaintiff was not entitled to wages from the date when he was taken away from the ship and his services closed.

The respondent's counsel was, I think, not prepared to contend that if this had been the case, not of a mariner but of a commercial traveller, subsequent wages could have been claimed. But the case of the mariner, he contends, stands in a different position. Chandler v. Grieves (2 H. Bl. 606n.) was a case of a seaman disabled by accident while on board, who was held entitled nevertheless to payment of his wages for the whole voyage. The case establishes very little for the present purpose. Sect. 160 of the Act 1894 seems to assume—and, I think, to assume rightly—that a seaman incapable by illness to perform his duty is nevertheless entitled to his wages during the continuance of the adventure in which, by the terms of the employment, he took part.

On the other hand The Friends (4 C. Rob. 143) is authority that when the ship is captured and the seaman taken from the vessel his wages cease, and that even if the ship be recaptured his case is not bettered if he has been taken from the vessel and renders no service after the recapture. Wiggins v. Ingleton (2 Ld. Raym. 1211), which was the case of a seaman taken by the press gang, and The Governor Raffles (2 Dods. 14), where the ship had been taken by mutineers, are authorities to the same effect, although the latter is in point only for the dictum of Sir Wm. Scott that "the moment capture is effected the crew are discharged from their duty to their employers, and the contract between the parties is at an end."

Reverting to the statute, the respondent relies on sect. 134. I fail to see that the section helps her. Sect. 134 (a) speaks of the event that the seaman "lawfully leaves the ship at the end of his engagement." These words do not cover the event of the seaman being forcibly removed by the enemy from his employment and from the ship. Sect. 134 (c) provides that the seaman's wages shall continue to run unless the delay to make payment of his wages is due "to any other cause not being the wrongful act or default of the owner or master." The cause here was an extraneous and supervening cause, and was not any wrongful act or default of the owner or master.

Then sect. 143 is cited. By that section it is provided in favour of the allottee of wages that "the seaman shall be presumed to be duly earning his wages unless the contrary is shown to the satisfaction of the court either . . . (d) by such other evidence as the court in their absolute discretion consider sufficient to show satisfactorily that the seaman has ceased to be entitled to the wages out of which the allotment is to be paid." This simply throws the onus of proof on the employer.

Beale v. Thompson (4 East, 546; 1 Dow. 299) was a case decided when the doctrine prevailed that "freight is the mother of wages," a doctrine which has been brought to an end by statute (see 7 & 8 Vict. c. 112, s. 17; Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 183; and now sect. 157 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894), and it was a case in which the seaman—after the detention of the vessel was over—took part in her voyage home. The decision involves no more than this, that if the adventure is ultimately carried to a conclusion the seaman is entitled to his wages for the whole period. Delamainer v. Winteringham (4 Camp. 186) is similar.

In Hadley v. Clarke (8 T. R. 259) there was no finding that the adventure had been frustrated. For the purpose of the decision I may take it that the plaintiff did not care when his goods reached Leghorn so long as they got there. The defendants contracted to take them there and failed to do so. The plaintiff, therefore, recovered damages. In Jackson v. Union Insurance Company (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 435; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 125, 146) Bramwell, B. points out the grounds upon which the decision can be supported. It is, I think, no authority for the general proposition, that a contract of marine adventure remains binding when a supervening cause has rendered it impossible to perform it within such a time as that the adventure can be fulfilled as a commercial adventure.

When this vessel was detained at Hamburg on the 4th Aug. the owner was deprived, and he has ever since remained deprived, of the use of her. On the 5th Aug., if her current charter had been at an end, he could not have offered her to a new charterer for he could not have ensured that he could deliver possession of her under the charter, and events have shown that in fact he could not have done so. The contract with the seaman for employment on the ship for not exceeding two years from the 21st May 1914 was a contract which the owner from no fault of his own was unable to fulfil. As from the 4th Aug. the adventure had become impossible and the contract, in my judgment, ceased to be binding. It is unnecessary, therefore, to consider the latter date of the 2nd Nov., when the seaman was removed from the vessel to another vessel for detention or that of the 8th Nov., when he was removed to Ruhleben. If anything more was wanted, I think it clear that the seaman (for no fault of his own it is true) was at those dates taken by superior authority from the place of his employment and from the possibility of performing his service. Melville v. De Wolf (4 E. & B. 844) is authority against his claim as from those dates.

From what I have said it follows that I cannot agree with the learned judge who tried the case or with the majority in the Court of Appeal. In my judgment this appeal must be allowed.

KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

June 9 and 11, 1915.

(Before BAILHACHE, J.)

WALL v. REDERIAKTIEBOLAGET LUGGUDE. (a)

Charter-party—"Penalty for non-performance"—Limitation of liability—Construction.

A charter-party contained the following clause:—"Penalty for non-performance of this agreement proved damages, not exceeding the estimated amount of freight."

Held, that this constituted a penalty clause and not a limitation of liability.

COMMERCIAL COURT.

Action tried by Bailhache, J.

The plaintiffs claimed to recover damages for a loss in consequence of the defendants' refusal to carry out a contract of charter-party.

Mackinnon, K.C. and R. A. Wright for the plaintiffs.

Roche, K.C. and A. Neilson for the defendants.

The facts and arguments are sufficiently stated in the written judgment.

BAILHACHE, J.—This is an action by charterers against shipowners for damages for the admittedly wrongful refusal of the owners to perform their part of a charter-party dated the 5th June 1914. The charter-party was one for three consecutive voyages of the steamship Atos, with coal from Goole to Oporto, the first voyage to begin in Jan. 1915. The owners in January declined, upon a ground they do not now support, to make any of the voyages, and have paid into Court, in satisfaction of the charterers' damages, 1125*l.* It is admitted that the actual damages suffered by the charterers amount to 3000*l.*, but the owners claim that they are not liable for more than the sum paid in by them, and for this they rely on clause 15 of the charter-party, which runs thus: "Penalty for non-performance of this agreement proved damages, not exceeding the estimated amount of freight."

The owners contend that this clause is a limitation of liability clause, and is effective to limit their liability to the estimated amount of the freight which would have become payable to them had the charter-party been performed. If this construction is right, the owners have paid enough into court.

The charterers contend that clause 15 is a penalty clause which they may disregard. If this construction is right the sum claimed by the charterers is due to them. I have to decide between these two constructions.

Voyage charter-parties have in countless instances, and for very many years, contained a clause which has always been called a penalty clause. The commonest form of that clause has been: "Penalty for non-performance of this agreement estimated amount of freight." The clause in this form is obviously and admittedly a penal clause.

Many charter-parties have in recent years contained a limitation of liability clause. The form of this clause varies considerably, but is substantially like the clause in Baxter's Leather Company v. Royal Mail Steam Packet Company (11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 98; 99 L. T. Rep. 286; (1908) 2 K. B. 626), as to owners or agents not to be accountable for any goods of whatever description beyond 2*l.* per cubic foot for any one package unless shipment be made upon a special order containing a declaration of value, and extra freight as may be agreed upon to be paid.

Clause 15 of the present charter-party is in point of form very like the common penalty clause, and unlike the limitation of liability clause, but the owners say that as the effect of it is that the charterers can only recover proved damages, and further to limit liability to the estimated amount of freight when the damages exceed that sum, I must treat clause 15 as a limitation and not as a penalty clause.

Where a contract contains a clause which is in form indisputably a penalty clause the position of the parties is thus described by Lord Mansfield in Lowe v. Peers (4 Burr., at p. 2228): "There is a difference between covenants in general and covenants secured by a penalty or forfeiture. In the latter case the obligee has his election. He may either bring an action of covenant for the penalty and recover the penalty (after such recovery of the penalty he cannot resort to the covenant because the penalty is to be a satisfaction for the whole), or if he does not choose to go for the penalty he may proceed upon the covenant and recover more or less than the penalty toties quoties."

This as a general statement of the law is no doubt correct, but when one goes into the matter more closely, one must qualify it by reference to the Act of Will. 3, 8 and 9 Will. 3, c. 11, the effect of which statute is that in an action upon a bond (and this includes a penalty clause in a contract), conditional for the performance of a contract, the plaintiff must assign a breach, or as many breaches as he thinks fit, of the condition, and although he is entitled, on proving a breach, to judgment for the full amount of the penalty, he can only recover by execution the amount of the damage proved to have been sustained by the breach or breaches assigned. The result of suing for the penalty is therefore that the plaintiff recovers proved damages, but never more than the final sum fixed: (see Hardy v. Bern, 5 T. R. 636; Branscombe v. Scarbrough, 6 Q. B. 13, and Dimech v. Corlett, 12 Moo. P. C. 199).

(a) Reported by LEONARD C. THOMAS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The right to sue, either for the penalty or damages, for breach of contract, disregarding the penalty, or, in archaic phraseology, to sue in debt or in assumpsit is again expressly asserted by Lord Ellenborough in Harrison v. Wright (13 East 343). That was an action in assumpsit on a charter-party containing the clause, "Penalty for non-performance 1300*l*."—a clause not distinguishable in legal effect from the clause, "Penalty for non-performance, estimated amount of freight." Lord Ellenborough says at p. 348: "The penalty therefore is auxiliary to the enforcing performance of the contract, and the party aggrieved may either take the penalty as his debt at law and assign his breach, under the statute of William, or he may bring his action for damages upon the breach of the contract." And he adds the important words: "Though to be sure the advantage of taking judgment for the penalty as the debt at law is very much cut down by the statute of King William." The operation of that statute I have already described.

This being the state of the law as I understand it, one easily sees why—in charter-party cases—no one sues on the penalty clause now. You cannot under it recover more than proved damages, and if the proved damages exceed the penalty sum you are restricted to the lower amount. As the penalty clause may be disregarded, it always is disregarded, and has become a dead letter, or, from another point of view, a brutum fulmen, as Blackburn, J. called it in Godard v. Gray (24 L. T. Rep. 89; L. Rep. 6 Q. B., at p. 148). At p. 147 he cites a passage from the fifth edition of Abbott on Shipping, who says quite clearly and shortly what I have been expressing at great length.

There is just one possible exception to the rule, that where a plaintiff sues in debt for a penal sum he must prove his damages, and that is when the breach relied upon is complete failure to perform any part of the contract. See Dimech and Corlett (sup.) I am not at all clear, however, that there is such an exception, and I rather think that in that case it was common ground that the damages actually suffered were at least equal to the amount claimed.

Having got so far, I ask myself: If I desired to perform the task of inserting a penalty clause into a charter-party and at the same time desired to express in words the true legal effect of such a clause instead of leaving the legal effect to be supplied by the parties themselves from their no doubt intimate knowledge of the statute of William; if at the same time I desired to conciliate the conservativeness with which commercial men always regard their familiar commercial documents, how could it be done? Well, I must obviously take the common form and work upon that. I must add something—as little as possible—to it. And the common form, then, very naturally takes this shape: "Penalty for non-performance of this agreement proved damages, not exceeding the estimated amount of freight"—that is clause 15 of the charter-party. Clause 15, therefore, is nothing more than the common form writ larger. This seems to me to solve the question I have to decide, and to solve it in favour of the plaintiffs. Clause 15 is a penal clause and not a limitation of liability clause, and the plaintiffs are right in disregarding it.

There are additional reasons why the estimated amount of freight in clause 15 should be regarded as a penalty. One excellent reason is that it is so called, a reason which I am aware is not conclusive, but is certainly weighty.

Another reason is the entire dissimilarity between clause 15 and the ordinary limitation of liability clause. Upon this I should like to observe that I should require the strongest arguments to move me to hold that a clause so like the common or undoubted penalty clause has been transformed by the addition of a few words into a limitation of liability clause to which in form it has no resemblance. It would be unfair to the charterers, in this or any similar case, to do so unless the few additional words were of compelling force.

Business men are familiar with usual charter-party clauses. They do not read, apparently, common form clauses carefully. They know the penalty clause is of no effect, and when they see a clause beginning "penalty for non-performance" they assume it is their familiar negligible penalty clause, and they pass on. It would never strike them that a clause beginning in that way was a limitation of liability clause, the very appearance of which is usually totally different, and one to which they know they must pay attention or put up with the consequences. I am not at all sure that a shipowner who desires to limit his liability must not bring that desire home to the charterer in some clearer way than by a slight change in the phraseology of a clause which is so well known as the common penalty clause is.

Again, clause 15, though not the commonest form, is by no means unusual, and counsel did not refer me to any case, nor was I, from my own limited experience, able to remember any case in which the clause in this form had been relied upon for any such purpose as is put forward in this case.

I decide this case, however, upon the ground stated in the earlier part of this judgment, and not upon the additional reasons which I have indicated.

The charterers took a further point, based upon the decision of Jureidini v. National and Irish Millers' Assurance Company (112 L. T. Rep. 531; (1915) A. C. 499), where the House of Lords held that the defendants, having repudiated the contract, cannot rely on a submission to arbitration contained in the contract. It is not necessary for me to decide the point, but I do not think that case can be treated as going the length of saying that a shipowner who erroneously supposes a charter-party to be not binding upon him, and who therefore refuses to perform it, could not rely upon a limitation of liability clause in the charter-party.

My judgment is for the plaintiffs for 3000*l*., to include the money in court and costs.

THE LEON BLUM. (a)

Salvage—Tugowners' claim against cargo owners—Towage contract—Agreement by tugowners with shipowners not to claim salvage—Protection of seamen against abandonment of right to salvage—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 156.

Where salvage services (which must be voluntary) supervene upon towage services (which are under contract), the two kinds of services cannot coexist during the same space of time. There must be a moment when towage ceases and salvage begins. If the tug remains at her post of duty there may come a moment when salvage would end and towage would be resumed. During the intervening time the towage contract, in so far as the actual work of towing is concerned, is suspended.

Tugowners contracted with the owners of a ship carrying cargo for a towage on the terms of "No cure, no pay; no salvage charges." In the course of the towage the tug rendered salvage services to the ship and cargo:

Held, by the Court of Appeal, affirming the judgment of the President, that the owners, master, and crew of the tug were not precluded from maintaining an action for salvage remuneration against the owners of the cargo.

Query, whether there is any good answer in law to a salvage claim by the master and crew of a tug against a ship and her freight where tugowners are precluded from claiming salvage from ship and freight owing to their contract with the shipowners.

The protection afforded to seamen under the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 in respect of their right to salvage considered.

ACTION OF SALVAGE.

The plaintiffs were the owners, master, and crew of the steam tug Vanquisher; the defendants were the owners of the cargo lately taken on board the sailing ship Leon Blum, the owners of the Leon Blum being subsequently added by order of the court.

The Leon Blum, a full-rigged ship of 2733 tons register, belonging to the port of Nantes, was on the 9th Dec. 1913 being towed from Falmouth to Liverpool by the tug Vanquisher, in the course of a voyage from Pisagua to Liverpool with a cargo of nitrate. The plaintiffs alleged that in the course of the towage, and when off the Formby lightship the Leon Blum found herself in a position of great danger, owing to her port anchor suddenly and without warning dropping and the chain running out; that the tug Vanquisher thereupon at great risk succeeded in holding the Leon Blum while the anchor was hove up, and thereby saved her from grounding; and that the tug subsequently prevented the ship from going ashore while proceeding up the dredged channel to Liverpool and saved the cargo from being lost.

The plaintiffs having issued a writ claiming salvage from the owners of the cargo, the owners of the ship, La Société Nouvelle d'Armément, applied for an order that all further proceedings be stayed on the ground that the tug owners had contracted with the shipowners to tow the Leon Blum and her cargo from Falmouth to Liverpool upon the terms that no claim for salvage should be made in respect of any salvage services which the tug might render during the towage to the Leon Blum, her cargo, or freight.

On the 7th April 1914 the motion to stay came before Bargrave Deane, J., who directed that, upon an undertaking being given on their behalf to find security for costs, the owners of the Leon Blum be added as defendants to the action and furnish their defence within fourteen days, and that the action be placed in the list for argument on the point of law arising on the construction and effect of the towage contract.

On the 9th May 1914 the Court of Appeal (Buckley, J. and Kennedy, L.J.) dismissed, with costs, the plaintiffs' appeal from this order.

On the 28th May two witnesses were examined before the President with reference to the alleged agreement to make no claim for salvage services, and on the 9th June 1914 the preliminary point of law was argued before the President.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 31, 1914.—Sir SAMUEL EVANS (the President).—The matter for decision upon this hearing of the point of law is an important one. Shortly stated, the question is whether, when a vessel containing cargo is being towed under a towage contract made between the owners of the tug and the owners of the vessel in tow, on the terms of "no cure, no pay; no salvage charges," and when before the towage has come to an end the vessel is in danger and salvage services are rendered by the tug to ship and cargo, a claim for such salvage services can be recovered against the owners of the cargo. The towage contract must be more fully stated later. The question arises in a salvage action originally brought by the owners, master, and crew of the steam tug Vanquisher against the owners of the cargo on the Leon Blum. In the defence it was pleaded (inter alia) that "the plaintiffs contracted to tow the Leon Blum and her cargo from Falmouth to Liverpool for reward upon terms that the plaintiffs should make no claim for salvage reward in respect of any salvage services rendered by their tug to the Leon Blum her cargo or freight," and, further, that "the owners of the Leon Blum in entering into the said towage contract were acting as well for the defendants as for themselves, and by the said towage contract the plaintiffs impliedly contracted with the defendants to make no claim against the defendants for salvage services, and/or the defendants are entitled to the benefit of the said contract, and the defendants object that the plaintiffs cannot maintain this action."

(a) Reported by L. F. C. DARBY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

This defence having been delivered, La Société Nouvelle d'Armément, the owners of the vessel, moved the court to stay all further proceedings in the action, and an order was made, upon certain terms, that the latter owners be added as defendants to the action, and that the action be first heard for argument on the point of law only. Thereupon these added defendants delivered their defence, and pleaded that it was a term and condition of the said towage contract that no claim should be made for salvage reward for any salvage services which might be rendered to the vessel, cargo, or freight. The plaintiffs in their reply traversed this allegation, and pleaded that the first defendants were not parties to the contract, and that they were not entitled to any benefit therefrom.

It is necessary first of all to ascertain the facts before entering upon a consideration of the principles which are applicable. The towage contract is dated the 2nd Dec. 1913. It is partly in writing and partly printed. It reads as follows:

London, Dec. 2, 1913.—To Messrs. Société Nouvelle d'Armément, Nantes.—We beg to confirm arrangement for towage of ship Leon Blum, of 2316 tons register, by one tug from Falmouth to Liverpool, including use of tug's hawser, for the sum of 65*l.* (sixty-five pounds). Notice of readiness must be given . . . days before vessel leaves the docks. The owners do not hold themselves responsible for any damage occurring or occasioned by vessels while in tow of steam tug.—For the Elliott Steam Tug Company Limited, (signed) Jno. Page, Jun. See conditions on other side.

On the other side, as indicated, various conditions are set out in print. Fifteen lines of printed form usually adopted by the tugowners, commencing, "The acceptance," &c., and ending "total loss" were deleted. The deletion was made pursuant to an arrangement come to in the previous months of June and July, which was to be applicable to towing contracts generally between the tug-owners and these shipowners. The arrangement was the result of correspondence, which was produced in evidence, and an interview had between M. Jouteau and Mr. Page, jun., on the 17th July 1913. The result of the interview is embodied in a letter dated the 17th July 1913, which reads as follows:

Messrs. Société Nouvelle d'Armément, Nantes.—Dear Sirs,—We have to-day had the pleasure of a visit from M. Jouteau and we confirm the verbal arrangement which we came to, whereby it is agreed whenever our tugs are engaged to tow any of your vessels, whether the contract be made by your good selves or by one of your masters, it shall be on the basis of "No cure, no pay; no salvage charges." Trusting this may lead to a good business between the two companies. Yours faithfully, for the Elliott Steam Tug Company Limited (Signed) Jno. Page, jun.

Verbal evidence of this interview was given by the persons referred to. In my view the result did not, and ought not to be taken to, modify the contract further than is stated in the letter of the 17th July 1913. The contract which was entered into with reference to the Leon Blum I find is that contained in the document of the 2nd Dec. already referred to, with the addition to the contract of the words "No cure, no pay; no salvage charges," or, as I prefer to put it, the contract for towing the Leon Blum was that contained in the said document, with the collateral contract embodied in the words "No cure, no pay; no salvage charges." The parties to the contract were the tugowners and the shipowners, and no others. The shipowners acted only for themselves, and not as agents for the owners of the cargo. The ships of the shipowners which were towed by the tugowners were apparently often in ballast. At any rate, there was no reference to the Leon Blum carrying any cargo in the negotiations leading up to the contract of the 2nd Dec. 1913; and there was no evidence and no suggestion that the tugowners were aware that the vessel was laden with cargo. Further, the cargo owners had no knowledge of the terms of the contract or collateral contract. Again, there was no evidence, or suggestion, that the tugowners in entering into the contract, or at any time, gave any intimation to the shipowners that the business of the tugowners was carried on, or that their charges were made, upon the basis that in cases of towage they had provided for "No cure, no pay; no salvage charges." For the purposes of this argument it is admitted that before the towage was completed the tug Vanquisher, her master and crew, rendered salvage services to the vessel, cargo, and freight, in respect of which, apart from any towage contract, they would be entitled to salvage remuneration.

What are the legal principles to be applied to these facts? In order to clear the ground, I note that Mr. Laing, counsel for the cargo owners, did not contend (or, if at one time he appeared to do, he gave up the contention) that the contract was entered into by the tugowners as agents on behalf of the cargo owners in any sense. But he did put forward the contention that the contract with the shipowners nevertheless inured for the benefit of the cargo; and that under the contract the tugowner had to transport the ship and its contents, the cargo. He also argued that the shipowners were bailees of the cargo, and were therefore entitled either to contract for the cargo owners or for themselves for the carriage of the cargo. No evidence was given as to the contract for carriage between the shipowners and the cargo owners. If the services for which remuneration is claimed were rendered to the cargo in the process of the execution of the towage contract, and while the tug was towing the ship under the contract, there could not, in my opinion, be any valid claim for salvage remuneration against the cargo owners. Voluntariness is of the very essence of salvage services. In The Neptune (1824, 1 Hag. Adm. 227, at p. 236) Lord Stowell said: "What is a salvor? A person who, without any particular relation to a ship in distress, proffers useful service, and gives it as a volunteer adventurer, without any pre-existing covenant that connected him with the duty of employing himself for the preservation of that ship."

And Kennedy, L.J., in his work on "The Law of Civil Salvage" (2nd ed. 1907) at p. 2, describes a service as a salvage service "if and so far as the rendering of such service is voluntary, and attributable neither to legal obligation nor to the interest of self-preservation, nor to the stress of official duty."

The services in respect of which the claim is now made were, ex concessis, salvage services. But they were rendered in the course of events which occurred at a time when the tug was towing under the towage contract. Can they be separated from what was done in pursuance and performance of the obligations of the tug under the contract? If they cannot, then no salvage can be recovered against the cargo: (see The Solway Prince, 74 L. T. Rep. 32; (1896) P. 120). If they can, and if they are services outside and beyond those required under the contract, salvage is recoverable: (Sappho, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 65; 23 L. T. Rep. 711; L. Rep. 3 P. C. 690). What are the obligations of a tug towards a tow under a towage contract? Tugs which have been engaged to tow have certain duties to remain by the tow in circumstances of danger, and to render such assistance as they can, or perhaps such as it would be fair and reasonable to expect them to render without running undue risks to themselves and their crew. Apart from such duties arising from the contract they would have others of a moral kind, which must be distinguished from the former. Thus the duties of tugs may be only of such a character as are common to all honest seafaring persons, apart from any legal obligations: such moral duties as were in the mind of Lord Stowell when he said: "It is the duty of all ships to give succour to others in distress; none but a free-booter would withhold it (vide The Waterloo, 2 Dod. 437), or they may be such duties as are obligatory by law on persons who have contracted to tow. The line between these may be difficult to draw, and the use of the word "duties" as common to both classes must not be allowed to confuse them.

As to the duties of the legal kind, the language employed in the decisions seems to raise some difficulties and to cause some perplexity. It is necessary to examine these decisions, and the language used in the judgments, with some particularity. In the well-known and leading case of The Minnehaha (1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 111; 1861, 4 L. T. Rep. 810; 1 Lush. 335) Lord Kingsdown, in the Privy Council, speaks of the "supersession" of the towage contract; of its being "implied in the contract that the tug shall be paid at such higher rate"; and of the towage contract "being so far suspended as to entitle her to a larger remuneration." See the following passages in the Privy Council, per Lord Kingsdown (4 L. T. Rep. 811; Lush 347): "But if in the discharge of this task by sudden violence of wind or waves or other accidents the ship in tow is placed in danger and the towing vessel incurs risks and performs duties which were not within the scope of her original engagement, she is entitled to additional remuneration for additional services if the ship be saved, and may claim as a salvor, instead of being restricted to the sum stipulated to be paid for mere towage whether this larger remuneration is to be considered as in addition to, or in substitution for the price of towage, is of little consequence practically. The measure of the sum to be allowed as salvage would, of course, be increased or diminished according as the price of towage was or was not included in it. In the cases on this subject the towage contract is generally spoken of as superseded by the right to salvage." And (4 L. T. Rep. 811-12; 1 Lush. 347-8): "The tug is relieved from the performance of her contract by the impossibility of performing it; but if the performance of it be possible, but in the course of it a ship in her charge is exposed, by unavoidable accident, to dangers which require from the tug services of a different class and bearing a higher rate of payment, it is held to be implied in the contract that she shall be paid at such higher rate. To hold on the one hand that a tug, having contracted to tow, is bound, whatever happens after the contract, though not in the contemplation of the parties, and at all hazards to herself to take the ship to her destination; or, on the other hand, that the moment the performance of the contract is interrupted, or its completion in the mode originally intended becomes impossible, the tug is relieved from all further duty, and at liberty to abandon the ship in her charge to her fate, would be alike inconsistent with the public interests. The rule as it is established guards against both inconveniences, and provides at the same time for the safety of the ship, and the just remuneration of the tug. The rule has been long settled; parties enter into towage contracts on the faith of it; and we should be extremely sorry that any doubt should be supposed to exist upon it."

And (4 L. T. Rep. 813; 1 Lush. 353): "We are satisfied that the breaking of the ship's hawser placed the ship in danger; that when she drifted over the shoal, and as long as she lay there, such danger continued; that she was rescued from such danger by the exertions of the steam tugs; that as to the United Kingdom, the towage contract was so far suspended as to entitle her to a larger remuneration under the head of salvage."

When The Minnehaha came before Dr. Lushington in the Admiralty Court, he spoke of the towage agreement being "vacated" when superior danger and service superior to towing supervened. In The Annapolis (1 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 127; 5 L. T. Rep. 37; 1 Lush. 355), decided in the Privy Council on the same day as the Minnehaha, Lord Kingsdown says (5 L. T. Rep. 39; Lush. 373): "She (the tug) was justified in looking to her own safety in the first instance, but that consideration did not exonerate her from the obligation of following the vessel in tow to complete her engagement, and from doing what she could to prevent the mischief which might arise from the temporary interruption of her service."

When the same case was in the Court of Admiralty Dr. Lushington (1 Lush., at p. 361) said: "A contract for mere towing does not include the rendering of any salvage service whatever. If it happens by reason of unforeseen occurrences in the performance of the contract to tow, that new and special services are necessary, the contract is not at once rendered void, nor is the tug at liberty to abandon the vessel, for that would be most detrimental; nor, on the other hand, is the tug bound to perform the new service for the stipulated reward agreed for the original service; but the law requires performance of the service, and allows salvage reward. There is no such thing as salvage on land; and we must look at things done on the sea with a very different eye to those which are done on land. It was therefore the duty of the tug, after the collision took place, to render every sort of assistance she could to the vessel in order to rescue her from the danger immediately arising in consequence of the collision."

Within a week before delivering this judgment, Dr. Lushington decided the case of The Saratoga

(1 Lush. 318), and there expressed himself (at p. 321) as follows: "The law I have laid down in more than one instance upon this point is, that if, in the performance of a contract of towage, an unforeseen and extraordinary peril arise to the vessel towed, the steamer is not at liberty to abandon the vessel, but is bound to render to her the necessary assistance; and thereupon is entitled to salvage reward. I am of opinion that these rights and obligations incident to a contract of towage are implied by law, and that the law thereby secures equity to both parties, and the true interest of the owners of ships."

In The White Star (1886, L. Rep. 1 A. & E. 68) Dr. Lushington again dealt with this subject, and in the course of his judgment said: "The question is, Whether the agreement (i.e., the towing contract) was rendered invalid by anything which afterwards happened. No doubt the principles laid down by the Privy Council in The Minnehaha (sup.) are the true ones, and those which I have endeavoured to act upon for nearly thirty years. When I first came to the bench I found considerable difficulty in determining whether a vessel engaged to tow another was bound, notwithstanding change of weather, to adhere to her, and perform services—not the service she originally engaged for—but a service which happened by accident to be superadded; and the doctrine I then held was, that she was bound to adhere to the vessel, and do all in her power to rescue her from danger, and she was to receive something additional, and not merely the remuneration originally agreed upon . . . that the contract must be adhered to, and is not to be broken hastily, unless it be shown that circumstances have occurred which could not have been within the contemplation of the parties, and that such is the state of circumstances that to insist upon the contract and to hold it binding would be contrary to all principles of justice and equity. It would be utterly impossible to define all such circumstances, but I think we should never have any doubt in saying in any particular case what they were which would give a right to abandon the contract."

Sir Robert Phillimore, in The J. C. Potter (3 Mar. Law Cas. O. S. 506; 23 L. T. Rep. 603; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 292), speaks of the supervening circumstances justifying the tug in "abandoning" her contract. The following are his words: "It is not disputed that circumstances may supervene which engraft upon an original towage agreement the character of a salvage service; and to this proposition of law I must add another, which has an important bearing on my decision, viz.: That when the supervening circumstances, from stress of weather or otherwise, are such as to justify the towing vessel in abandoning her contract, it is still her duty to remain by the towed vessel for the purpose of rendering her assistance, but that for such assistance she is entitled to salvage reward." And: "Counsel for the ship contended that the principle underlying all the cases in which salvage services have been engrafted upon a towing engagement has been that the new service was of a different class, and the original service interrupted; and it is urged that in this case the service was not of a different class, but remained towage, and was not interrupted, as by the breaking of a hawser or other circumstances. But I cannot assent to this opinion. I think the true criterion by which it is to be ascertained whether the towing vessel has become a salvor is whether the supervening circumstances were such as to justify her in abandoning her contract."

In the case of The Five Steel Barges (6 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 580; [1890, 63 L. T. Rep. 499; 15 Prob. Div. 142) Sir James Hannen stated his conclusion from an examination of the authorities, thus: "The first question in this case is whether . . . the services which were rendered by the tug were of such a character, and were rendered under such circumstances, as to take them out of the towage contract? From the examination I have given to the decisions in point, it appears to me that it is not necessary, in order to become entitled to salvage, that the supervening danger should be of such a character as to actually put an end to the towage contract. It is sufficient if the services rendered are beyond what can be reasonably supposed to have been contemplated by the parties entering into such a contract. It depends on the circumstances of each case whether or not the services are advanced in this way to a higher degree, so as to establish a right to salvage. The character of the contract is, of course, to be looked at and the circumstances to which it related before we arrive at the point from which we have to start in estimating the value of the higher class of services."

I will only cite one other judgment, which was delivered by Sir Gorell Barnes. It is not in the authorised reports, and the language accordingly was not revised, but it has the ring of an accurate transcription. It was in the case of The Thalatta (Shipping Gazette, the 26th May 1905): "The law is perfectly well known: A tug is entitled to recover salvage if the services are outside the scope of the contract, but at the same time the fact that there is a contract cannot be left out of consideration altogether, because the vessel is entitled to have the assistance of the tug; in other words, the tug cannot desert the vessel. The tug is liable to render some assistance when the services cease to be salvage."

I have now cited the chief authorities upon the subject. The right conclusion to draw from the authorities, I think, is that where salvage services (which must be voluntary) supervene upon towage services (which are under contract) the two kinds of services cannot co-exist during the same space of time. There must be a moment when the towage service ceases and the salvage service begins; but if the tug remains at her post of duty there may come a moment when the special and unexpected danger is over, and then the salvage service would end, and the towage service would be resumed. These moments of time may be difficult to fix, but have to be and are fixed in practice. During the intervening time the towage contract, in so far as the actual work of towing is concerned, is suspended. I prefer the word "suspended" to some of the other words which have been used, such as "superseded," "vacated," "abandoned," &c. If this conclusion be correct, then it follows, from the concession that salvage services were rendered in this case, that the work of which those services consisted was not done under the towage contract.

It also follows, in my opinion, that although the tugowners have by the collateral agreement referred to agreed not to make any salvage charges against the ship and freight, they are not precluded from claiming and recovering salvage remuneration in respect of the cargo against the cargo owners who were not in any way parties to the towage contract. This argument might be enforced, and the fallacy of the argument that there could be no salvage of the cargo because what was done was done to the ship in which it lay might be shown by an illustration: Assume that the cargo had been jettisoned, and, while still in the sea, had been salved by the tug, could it be said that no salvage would be payable by the owners? Could the agreement not to claim salvage against the shipowners—the other parties to the contract—absolve the owners of the jettisoned cargo salved in the case supposed from liability to remunerate the salvors? The conclusion above stated appears to me to be in harmony with the general policy of our law in regard to salvage services. It has been said with authority that "salvage is a mixed question of private right and public policy." For obvious reasons of public policy salvors are looked upon with favour and are encouraged by our maritime law; and the whole history of the subject, and the authorities, attest that a clear case must be made out before salvors can be deprived of remuneration for salvage services.

There are also other aspects of this case to which I think it well to advert. It has been argued that the shipowners could make a contract as to salvage with the tugowners by which the cargo owners are entitled to benefit, although the shipowners did not purport to act, and were in no sense acting, as agents for the cargo owners. So far as liability is concerned, it has been held that in regard to the owners of the cargo on board a salved ship neither the owners of the ship, nor the master, have authority to bind the cargo or its owners by any salvage contract (Anderson, Tritton, and Co. v. Ocean Steamship Company (1884, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 401; 52 L. T. Rep. 441; 10 App. Cas. 107). If the cargo owners would not be bound, can it be said that the other party, viz., the tugowners, are bound? Are the cargo owners to have the benefit, and not to be subject to the obligations of such a contract? There is another difficulty in the way of the defence of the shipowners and cargo owners to some parts of the plaintiffs' claim. The claim in the action is made not only by the tugowners who entered into the towage contract, but also by the master and crew of the tug. There is no evidence whatever that the agreement, "no salvage charges," was entered into by the tugowners with the assent or knowledge of the master or crew. It is clear that the owners, in the circumstances in which such an agreement was made (viz., in anticipation of future contracts of towage of the defendants' ships) had no authority to bind the master and crew by any agreement fixing the amount of salvage; certainly not by an agreement depriving them of salvage remuneration altogether (The Margery, 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas 304; 86 L. T. Rep. 863; (1902) P. 157).

In any event, therefore, the master and crew are entitled to recover salvage from the cargo owners, and, although it is not necessary to decide it, I do not see that there is any good answer in law to a claim by them against the ship and freight. It has been settled that the master and crew of a salvage ship may recover salvage against cargo, although the owners of the salving ship, by reason of their relation to the salved ship or cargo, may not: (The Agamemnon, 1883, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 92; 48 L. T. Rep. 880; The Sappho, 23 L. T. Rep. 711; L. Rep. 3 P. C. 690); and The Glenfruin, 1885, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 413; 52 L. T. Rep. 769; 10 P. Div. 103).

There is a still further point with regard to the rights of the crew. Seamen—always the favourites of the Legislature—have protection under sect. 156 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. In accordance with the policy of the law in casting its protection over seamen, and stimulating them to put forth efforts and to face risks to save life and property, the section provides, as to salvage, as follows: "156. (1) A seaman shall not . . . by any agreement abandon any right that he may have or obtain in the nature of salvage; and every stipulation in any agreement inconsistent with any provision of this Act shall be void." Therefore, even if the seamen had been persuaded to join in the agreement by which it is said they abandoned or precluded themselves from claiming salvage reward, such an agreement would be wholly inoperative. On this ground also the seamen have a right to salvage against the cargo owners.

I am accordingly of opinion that upon the preliminary point of law as to the validity of the claims of the plaintiffs against the owners of the cargo for salvage services rendered (if any) in respect of the cargo, the plaintiffs succeed and the defendants fail. The amount of the salvage remuneration would, of course, be in proportion to the value of the salved cargo when compared with the value of the ship, freight, and cargo. I order the defendants to pay to the plaintiffs the costs of and incidental to the motion to add the second defendants, and of and incidental to the addition of the defendants, and to the hearing of the point of law.

Leave to appeal.

July 16, 1915.—Swinfen Eady, L.J.—This is an appeal from a judgment of the President on a point of law which was directed to be set down and put in the list for hearing. The proceedings were taken in Admiralty by the owners, master, and crew of the steam-tug Vanquisher against the owners of the cargo of the sailing ship Leon Blum, to whom by order the owners of the latter ship were afterwards added, claiming salvage. Originally the action was brought against the owners of the cargo only. Then a motion was made to stay the action on the ground that the plaintiffs, the owners of the tug, had entered into a contract with the owners of the sailing ship before the towage began that the plaintiffs should make no claim against the owners of the cargo on the ship for salvage services by the tug to the ship, her cargo, or freight during the towage. On that motion an order was made that the owners of the ship should be added as defendants, and that the action should be put in the list for argument only on the point of law as to the construction and effect of the contract. The point of law has not been otherwise defined than by the motion to stay. The point of law was not formulated in terms, but only raised in the manner I have mentioned. After the order on the motion to stay the owners of the ship were made parties to the action and put in their defence, and thereupon the point of law came on for hearing before the judge. The only point of law would therefore appear to be whether, having regard to the terms of the contract, the claim against the cargo on the ship, first, by the owners of the tug, and, secondly, by the master and crew of the tug, is excluded. That is the point of law. Although the action was directed to be heard on this point of law, evidence was gone into and witnesses were examined and cross-examined, but I pass that evidence by because our attention has not been directed to it and because it is inadmissible on the point of law raised.

The contract in question is contained in two documents, which have to be read together. In July 1913 correspondence took place between the owners of the ship and the owners of the tug as to the terms upon which the towage contract was to be entered into. On the 17th July 1913 the owners of the tug wrote a letter containing the words on which the defendants rely: "We have to-day had the pleasure of a visit from M. Jouteau, and we confirm the verbal arrangement which we came to, whereby it is agreed whenever our tugs are engaged to tow any of your vessels, whether the contract be made by your good selves or by one of your masters, it shall be on the basis of 'No cure, no pay; no salvage charges.' Trusting this my lead to a good business between the two companies, yours faithfully . . ." The effect of that was to import these last words into the subsequent towage contract. More than four months afterwards, on the 1st and 2nd Dec. 1913. the contract was made as to this particular ship, the Leon Blum. An arrangement was made for the towage of the ship from Falmouth to Liverpool by one tug for 65*l*.; and then follow the conditions of the contract. It is conceded that on the voyage circumstances arose which, but for some special terms of the contract, would have entitled the tug to be paid for salvage services. The details of the occurrence are not material. The President stated in his judgment that: "For the purposes of this argument it is admitted that, before the towage was completed, the tug Vanquisher, her master, and crew, rendered salvage services to the vessel, cargo, and freight in respect of which, apart from any towage contract, they would be entitled to salvage remuneration." A little later he said: "The services in respect of which the claim is now made were, ex concessis, salvage services." So that the details of the service are not material, and the only question we have to consider is: Whatever these services were, does the contract exclude liability to the owners, master, and crew of the tug in respect of a claim against the cargo?

The defence set up, and the notice of motion to stay, in effect stated that the plaintiffs contracted to tow the ship and her cargo upon the terms that "the plaintiffs should make no claim for salvage reward in respect of any salvage services rendered by their tug to the Leon Blum, her cargo, or freight." That is not the language of the contract. The words of the contract upon which the pleader relies are the words "no salvage charges," and he expands them to mean that neither against the ship nor her cargo shall any claim be made by the tug for salvage. It is not suggested that the owners of the tug had any special authority to bind the master or crew in respect of any claim they might have for salvage.

As regards the crew, the appellants have conceded that they have no right to abandon any claim they may have for salvage, having regard to the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 156, of which sub-sect. 1 provides that: "A seaman shall not by any agreement . . . abandon any right that he may have or obtain in the nature of salvage, and every stipulation in any agreement inconsistent with any provision of this Act shall be void"; and sub-sect. 2 provides that: "Nothing in this section shall apply to a stipulation made by the seamen belonging to any ship, which, according to the terms of the agreement is to be employed on salvage service, with respect to the remuneration to be paid to them for salvage services to be rendered by that ship to any other ship." It was not contended by the appellants that there was any agreement binding the crew not to claim salvage.

Then, as regards the master, there was no evidence that the contract was entered into with his assent or knowledge. The original contract was entered into in July 1913, and the language "No cure, no pay; no salvage charges" was employed without reference to this particular towage contract.

There was thus no authority in the owners to bind either the master or the crew, not as to the amount of the salvage remuneration, but that they should not receive any such remuneration. As regards the master and crew, therefore, there is nothing to disentitle them to sue the owners of the cargo.

The next question is: Can the owners of the tug sue the owners of the cargo? It is not suggested that there was any authority from the owners of the cargo to the shipowners to enter into the contract on their behalf. The President said as to that: "The cargo owners had no knowledge of the terms of the contract or collateral contract. Again there was no evidence or suggestion that the tug owners in entering into the contract or at any time gave any intimation to the shipowners that the business of the tug owners was carried on, or that their charges were made, upon the basis that in cases of towage they had provided for 'no cure, no pay; no salvage charges.'" There has been no contention here that the shipowners entered into this contract as agents of the cargo owners. It was contended, however, that the cargo is on the ship, and that the agreement enures for the benefit of the cargo. The references to the cargo in the printed towage contract do not assist the appellants on this point. The first reference to the cargo in the conditions of that contract occurs in a stipulation that the plaintiffs are not to be responsible for loss. A subsequent reference to the cargo is in a stipulation that the owners of the cargo shall indemnify the plaintiffs against liability for certain matters therein mentioned. Whatever may be the form and effect of that provision, it has no bearing upon the point which we have to decide. Except for that provision there is no reference to cargo in the contract. The mere fact that the shipowner stipulates in a towage contract for "no cure, no pay; no salvage charges" does not import that, if the tug renders salvage services to the cargo, the cargo shall be under no liability to pay for them. It is a stipulation entirely outside this contract. The determination of these two points is sufficient to dispose of the case.

No question has been raised as to the effect of this clause on the liability of the ship to the tug, and therefore I do not refer to it. I deal only with the two points that were material for our decision—namely, the claim by the owners of the tug against the cargo, and the claim by the master and crew of the tug against the cargo. There is, I think, nothing in the contract to exclude either of these claims.

On these grounds I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed.

Phillimore, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. It is somewhat difficult to extract the point of law which is raised by the defence, and which has been set down for argument. I take it to be that, given that the services alleged by the plaintiffs, the owners of the tug, in their statement of claim were in fact rendered by the tug to the ship and to the cargo loaded upon her, yet the plaintiffs cannot recover, inasmuch as the action is either barred by the contract originally made between the plaintiffs and the owners of the ship, or was brought in breach of that contract.

The first question that arises is whether the contract can be regarded as having been entered into by the owners of the ship as agents for and on behalf of the defendants, the owners of the cargo. As appears from the circumstances, it cannot have been entered into either by the express authority of the cargo owners or by their implied authority. Can it be said to arise incidentally from the relationship between the cargo owners and the shipowners who had in fact entered into it, by virtue of which relationship the shipowners became the bailees of the cargo for the cargo owners? I very much doubt it. It is unnecessary, however, to decide the point, because even if the contract be treated as that of the cargo owners, it does not as against them bar any of the plaintiffs, either the tug owners or the master or crew of the tug, from claiming salvage, if the services alleged were rendered by them. Take first the case of the master and crew of the tug. As to the crew, it seems impossible, having regard to the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 156, sub-sect. 1, that a member of the crew could make a contract binding him to give up his right to salvage. As to the master, it was not impossible for him to make such a contract, but there is here no evidence that he authorised the tug owners to make it on his behalf. So far, therefore, as the master and crew are concerned the action must proceed.

Then consider the case of the tug owners. The shipowners might have contracted in terms with the tug owners that the latter should not claim against the cargo owners for salvage, but they have not so contracted. Counsel for the defendants contended that there was here no salvage, the ground of his contention being that salvage must be the voluntary act of the salvor, while a tug is bound to do what the tug did in this case. Why was the tug bound to do that? Not because it was so provided in the towage contract, but because of the rule of law laid down in the cases of The Minnehaha (4 L. T. Rep. 811; Lush. 335), The White Star (L. Rep. 1 A. & E. 68), and The J. C. Potter (23 L. T. Rep. 603; L. Rep. 3 A. & E. 292)—namely, that even if the circumstances be such that the tug would be justified in abandoning the contract of towage, it is still under the further duty of standing by the towed vessel to render assistance. These same cases, however, lay down that if in such circumstances the tug does render assistance, she is entitled to claim for her services. Therefore, whether in the present case the tug rendered the salvage services voluntarily, or because she was bound to do so in accordance with the rule laid down in the cases, she is equally entitled to claim salvage reward.

The contention of counsel for the defendants that the plaintiffs are not, as against the defendants, entitled to salvage fails, and the appeal should be dismissed.

Bankes, L.J.—I agree. The towage contract is a contract between two classes of persons—on the one hand the plaintiffs, the tugowners, and on the other hand the defendants, the shipowners. So far as the terms of that contract are concerned there is nothing in it to prevent the plaintiffs from making a claim for salvage services against the cargo owners. The original contract of a general character which was entered into between the tugowners and the shipowners did, however, contain a stipulation that any future towage contract should be upon the basis of no salvage charges. Primâ facie that earlier contract would refer only to the rights and duties of the parties to it—namely, the tugowners and the shipowners—and I can see nothing in it to extend it beyond its primâ facie meaning. It refers to the tugowners and the shipowners only. If this view is sound, it is conclusive of the point of law which we have to decide, for it means that it does not lie in the mouth of the cargo owners to say that the tugowners cannot as against them claim salvage, but only towage.

Holland Gulf Stoomvaart Mattschappij v. Watson, Munro, and Co. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party — Marine insurance — War risk "for charterers' account—Duty to insure.

The plaintiffs were the owners of a steamship that was chartered by the defendants under a charter-party which provided (inter alia) that the owners were to pay and provide for insurance; that the charter-party was not to be construed as a demise of the ship; and that the owners were to remain responsible for insurance. The charter-party also contained the following written clause: "War risk, if any required, for charterers' account. It is understood and agreed that value for war risk at all times to be based on values stated in owners' annual policy."

On the 21st Sept. 1914, while on a voyage the steamship was sunk by a German cruiser. The plaintiffs brought an action to recover damages for the defendants' failure to insure the steamer against war risk after having been requested by the plaintiffs so to do.

Held, that on the true construction of the charter-party the charterers were to bear the costs of the insurance; but that the insurance was to be effected by the owners and not by the charterers.

Decision of Bailhache, J. (ante, p. 92; 113 L. T. Rep. 178) reversed.

Appeal by the defendants and cross-appeal by the plaintiffs from the decision of Bailhache, J. (ubi sup.).

Swinfen Eady, L.J.—This is an appeal by the defendants, Watson, Munro, and Co., against a judgment of Bailhache, J. at the trial of the action in Middlesex without a jury whereby the plaintiffs recovered against the defendants judgment for a sum of 24,000*l.*

It is an action upon a charter-party and the contest turns upon the true construction and meaning of a very short clause in that charter-party. The charter-party is dated the 17th Sept. 1912. It was a time charter for five years on the steamship Maria, which belonged to the plaintiffs, the Holland Gulf Stoomvaart Maatschappij. The Maria was a Dutch ship and she sailed before the beginning of the present war from Portland in Oregon with a cargo of wheat consigned to British merchants at Belfast. The cargo was therefore occasional contraband. On or about the 21st Sept. 1914 the ship was stopped by the German cruiser Karlsruhe and sunk in the Atlantic.

The first question in the action is based upon this, that there was a contract, as the plaintiffs allege, contained in the charter-party whereby it was the duty of the defendants to insure the ship against war risk. The defendants have failed in that, and the damage arising thereon to the plaintiffs as they contend is the sum of 24,000*l.*, and that is the sum which the plaintiffs have recovered in the court below.

According to the terms of the charter-party which I have said is for five years, the first material clause is clause 2 and by that clause the owners were to provide and pay for certain matters and they were to pay and provide for the insurance on the vessel, such insurance to cover ship's proportion in all general average; and then they were to pay for certain stores and so on. Then the charterers were to provide and pay for other things such as bunker coal and so on. Then by clause 23 it is provided that: "Nothing herein named is to be construed as a demise of the steamer to the time charterers. The owners remain responsible for the navigation of the steamer, insurance, crew, and all other matters, same as when trading for their own account."

At the end is this clause written in: "War risk, if any required, for charterers' account. It is understood and agreed that value for war risk at all times to be based on values stated in owners' annual policy." Almost immediately after the breaking out of war, the plaintiffs intimated to the defendants that the war risk ought to be covered by insurance. There is a letter of the 6th Aug. 1914 from the owners to the charterers in which they said: "Considering the actual political situation, we must ask you to satisfy us that the war risk on the steamship Maria is covered, or we must instruct the captain at his coal port to wait the developments. It is, under the circumstance that you are at war, probable that a cargo with destination of Belfast or Dublin will be captured." That was the first demand for a war risk. The defendants do not see any need for any such insurance. It is pointed out that the vessel is a neutral vessel.

There is correspondence between the parties throughout August and September. The plaintiffs, in their correspondence, refer on several occasions to the risk of war between this country and Holland, and that seems to trouble them. In fact, if one can judge from the correspondence, that appears to be the risk against which they are specifically desirous of being covered. But it includes also the general war risk. The correspondence went on in October and on the 5th Oct. the plaintiffs still claiming to be covered, the defendants say that in their view there is no need to insure against war risk. Then they raise this point by their letter of the 5th Oct.: "The Maria being a neutral ship, we cannot see any necessity to insure her against war risk. Apart from this we would remind you that you have not put us in a position to insure if the necessity did arise, by your not giving us the necessary information regarding your valuation."

On the same day, the 5th Oct., there is a letter from the plaintiffs, apparently crossing that giving or purporting to give particulars. On that date the plaintiffs wrote to the defendants: "We have further telegraphed you asking you to insure the ship for war risk according to the charter." That is only a telegram asking for insurance, and not mentioning any figures. The letter mentions: "Her insuring value is 30,500*l.*" That letter of the 5th Oct. was apparently received by the defendants in England on the 9th Oct. and they acknowledge the receipt of the letter of the 5th Oct. on the 9th. Oct. They say: "Messrs. Howard Houlder have sent us a copy of your letter to them dated 5th instant"—that is another letter—"and we note that you require the ship insured against risk of war between Holland and England. We think that this risk is a very remote one. In the meantime, we are very sorry to observe that the steamer is considerably overdue at St. Vincent, so much so that we are beginning to fear that she has been lost in the gale which was reported to be raging down the Argentine and Patagonian coasts about the beginning of September."

So that on the 9th Oct., when they received the figure of 30,500*l.*, they feared that the ship had been lost.

The correspondence goes on and on the 16th Oct. it is suggested as follows: "It is scarcely worth while discussing this matter at present, and the steamer is so hopelessly overdue that we fear she has gone to the bottom." The truth was that she had been sunk many weeks before this letter was written and it was not known.

That being so the plaintiffs claim that, the ship being lost, the defendants are liable for, first, they say, 30,500*l.*, and in the alternative 24 000*l.* because according to the true construction of the charter-party it was the duty of the defendants to effect an insurance from the perils excepted by the clause in the original insurance. That depends upon what is the true construction of this contract. "War risk, if any required, for charterers' account."

"War risk" is an elliptical phrase which obviously refers to insurance. It is an insurance against war risk. "War risk, if any required." Both sides adopt the view that that means if, under the circumstances, any war risk insurance is reasonably requisite. What does "for charterers' account" mean? Does that mean that the cost of the insurance—the premium payable—is to be borne by the charterers or does it mean that the charterers are to provide and pay; that they are to effect the insurance and pay for it? In my opinion, having regard to the construction of the charter-party as a whole, and especially having regard to clauses 2 and 23, the true construction of those words is that the charterers have to bear the cost of the insurance, but the insurance is be effected by the owners and not by the charterers. Under clause 2 the insurance is to be paid and provided for by the owners. Under clause 23, the owners remain responsible for, amongst other things, insurance "same as when trading for their own account."

If that were all, it is obvious that if the owners wished to insure against war risk, they would have to do so themselves and bear the cost. But the effect of the subsequent clause is to throw the cost upon the charterers. The words are: "War risk, if any required, for charterers' account." That is to say, although the owners must provide for the insurance, the cost must be borne by the charterers. I think that the words "for charterers' account" rather point to the work being done by someone else, the insurance being effected by the owners, but for the account of the charterers.

The view that the learned judge in the court below took of the matter was this: He said: "I think the words 'war risk, if any required, for charterers' account,' mean that the charterers are to provide and pay for the war risk policy. The words 'for charterers' account' are a business form of expressing the fact that the charterers were to provide and pay for a war risk policy, just as by clause 2 the owners are to provide and pay for the ordinary insurance."

In my opinion that view is erroneous, as the construction of this charter-party and the language "for charterers' account" means only that the cost has to be borne by the charterers, and does not affect the liability of the owners to provide the insurance. I am confirmed in that view by the remaining portion of this last clause: "It is understood and agreed that value for war risk at all times to be based on values stated in owners' annual policy."

The value stated in the owners' annual policy was a matter within the knowledge of the shipowners, but not within the cognisance of the charterers. Apart from the war risk they had nothing to do with any insurance. They had nothing to do with any annual policy. It was the owners' annual policy, and the information as to value remained with the owners alone. In fact it was not until the letter of the 5th Oct., received by the defendants on the 9th Oct., that any information was given at all with regard to the amount for which the owners had taken out a policy of insurance. As a matter of construction, I am of opinion, contrary to the view taken by the learned judge in the court below, that the insurance had to be provided and effected by the owners at the charterers' charge, and therefore the defendants were not in default in not effecting the insurance.

Reference was made to the subsequent correspondence between the parties, but the correspondence after the date of this charter-party cannot be referred to in order to construe the true meaning of it. It is not suggested that there was any conduct on behalf of the defendants to estop them in any way from contending that it is the duty of the owners to effect the insurance. It is not suggested that the effect of the correspondence was to raise any new contract between the parties. Therefore, in my opinion, the correspondence is irrelevant with a view of showing what is the true construction of the charter-party.

A further point raised by the defendants was this. Even assuming that their obligation was to effect the insurance, they never were supplied with the information which was necessary in accordance with the contract, and their contention was that it was a condition precedent to their being bound to effect the insurance that they should be informed as to the value stated in the owners' annual policy; and they contend that they never were in fact so informed. The only time when any figure is given is in the letter to which I have already referred of the 5th Oct., which was received by the defendants on the 9th Oct That is the letter in which the plaintiffs say that "Her insuring value is 30,500*l.*" That is an ambiguous expression. "Her insuring value"—the language of the contract is "values stated in owners' annual policy."

It appears that the position of the insurance was this: The owners had effected policies in the usual and proper form—part in England and part in Holland—upon the hull and machinery; policies amounting altogether to a little over 20,000*l.*—12,000*l.* in this country, and a little over 8000*l.* in Holland; roughly, as I say, over 20,000*l.* The policies were value policies, in which the value of the ship hull and machinery were given as 24,000*l.* The effect of that would be, treating the insured value as 20,000*l.*, that the owners were their own insurers with respect to the difference between 20,000*l.* and 24,000*l.* But in addition the owners had effected policies amounting in English money to 6530*l.* Those were P.P.I. polices; they were not policies on disbursements, but the terms used in the policies are "on excess value." In neither of those two policies was any sum mentioned as being the value of the ship.

In my opinion, according to the true construction of this charter-party, the insurance "based on values stated in owners' annual policy, means in the value policy of 24,000*l.* That was the value stated in the owners' annual policy, and that figure was never supplied by the plaintiffs to the defendants. In my judgment even if the defendants were liable to effect the insurance, it was a condition precedent that the plaintiffs should supply them with the true amount for which the policy was to be effected—that is to say, they should supply them with the true amount; should give them the true value. That they never did; so the plaintiffs, if they were right in other respects, had not complied with the conditions precedent under which the defendants would have been bound to effect the insurance.

On this ground alone, without considering the other matters, I am of opinion that the judgment in the court below was wrong, and ought to be reversed, and that judgment should be entered accordingly.

Bankes, L.J.—I agree.

This was an action which was brought by the owners of the vessel against the time charterers, claiming damages for breach of the charter-party in not having effected a policy against war risk, and the damages claimed were the amount which would have been recovered under some war risk policies if the defendants had, in pursuance of their said obligation, duly effected the same, and which came to a considerable amount.

The defence was twofold: The defendants said, first of all, that they were under no obligation to effect a policy at all, although they were under an obligation to pay for it if it had been effected. Secondly, they said that, even if the obligation to effect the policy had been upon them, the plaintiffs did not give them the required note of the amount for which they were under an obligation to insure. The learned judge in the court below decided against the defendants on both grounds.

The ground upon which he gave judgment on the first point against the defendants was stated in his own words in these terms: "The words for charterers' account' are a business form of expressing the fact that the charterers were to provide and pay for the war risk policy, just as by clause 2 the owners are to provide and pay for the ordinary insurance. I do not agree, with respect to the learned judge, with that statement, generally stated in that way. If in a contract two parties agree that a particular thing is to be on account or for the account of one of them, in my opinion, primâ facie, that has reference to who is to pay for the particular thing.

But of course if a contract be silent as to who is to do a certain thing, and you infer from all the surrounding circumstances and from the silence of the document that the parties intended or contemplated that the thing must be done by the persons who have to pay for it, then I should take the same view as the learned judge in the court below did. In this contract, however, in my opinion, the paying for the particular thing in question—which is the insurance—and the doing of the particular thing—that is to say, the effecting of the insurance—has been clearly dealt with in the charter-party, and dealt with as two separate matters, and possibly two separate obligations. I think this also must be borne in mind, that the insurance had reference to the owners' property, the ship, in which of course the charterers had no direct concern, although they had a concern in the charter.

Clause 2 expressly deals with the double question. First of all, who is to pay for the thing and who is to provide the thing? And with regard to the insurance, as one would expect, both the provision of the insurance—that is to say, the effecting of it on the vessel—and the paying for it, are the obligations of the owners. And when you come to clause 23, that only emphasises it, because with regard to insurance, in my opinion, it adds nothing to what the charterers have already said in clause 2.

But, in order to make assurance doubly sure, there is a provision that: "Nothing herein named is to be construed as a demise of the steamer," which means that not only she belongs to the owners, but the possession remains in the owners, and the owners remain responsible for, amongst other things, insurance, as when trading for their own account. If the charter had stopped there, it is plain that any insurance against war risk, not only the paying for it but the effecting of it, was the obligation of the shipowners.

In addition to the printed form there is the written clause which was inserted for the express purpose of dealing with the question of the war risk, and there were two things to be provided for. It is quite plain that the parties understood it and contemplated it. Those two things were the effecting of the war risk and the paying for it; and words were used which, in my opinion, having regard to the earlier part of the charter-party, are quite plain to show that the obligation to insure was upon the owners, and the obligation to pay was to be upon the charterers; and those are the words that were used. They are not very clear; they are a short way of expressing what was in the minds of the persons who prepared the charter-party, and it was put quite shortly. They speak of "war risk" of course meaning war risk so far as it affected the vessel.

Then they say, "if any required." That has been treated as if those words meant if any, under the circumstances, is reasonably necessary. I am not at all sure myself that that is the true construction of those words. It seems to me rather to point to "if required by the owners." But however that may be, I do not think that it makes any material difference to the construction of the charter-party. Then comes "for charterers' account"—no indication so far as I can see, having reference to what has already been done in the document, that it is to be for anything else than the charterers' account—that is to say, the charterers are to pay for it. Then comes the last part of the clause: "It is understood and agreed that value for war risk at all times to be based on values stated in owners' annual policy."

The object of that clause, in my opinion, was this, that there should be no dispute as to whether the amount for which the vessel was insured was the correct amount or not, after it had been done. It was a provision as to the amount for which the person, whoever it was, was under an obligation to insure, or had a right to insure, might insure the vessel and so that there should be no dispute as to whether the amount was right or not right. It is not necessary to decide what is meant by "to be based on values stated." No question arises about that, but it is quite plain that it cannot be more than the value stated in owners' annual policy.

Assuming that the view that I have taken about the construction on the question of the obligation to insure is wrong, the question would arise whether in the events which happened allowing the obligation to be upon the charterers, the charterers were, under the circumstances, guilty of a breach of the contract in not having effected the insurance. That depends, first of all, upon the construction of this last clause, and, in my opinion, this is one of that class of cases in which the knowledge of what is required to be done being entirely in the possession of one party, it is obligatory upon that party to give notice to the other of what it is he requires to be done, before the other party comes under an obligation to perform his part of the contract. The rule is well stated in Vyse v. Wakefield (6 M. & W. 442 at p. 452) where Lord Abinger says this: "The rule to be collected from the cases seems to be this, that where a party stipulates to do a certain thing in a certain specific event which may become known to him, or with which he can make himself acquainted, he is not entitled to any notice, unless he stipulates for it; but when it is to do a thing which lies within the peculiar knowledge of the opposite party, then notice ought to be given him."

Here the matter which was material to be known was the value stated in the owners' annual policy, and that knowledge was in the possession of the owners and the owners alone. Therefore in my opinion, even assuming the obligation to insure was upon the charterers, it was a condition precedent to the performance of the obligation on their part that the ship owners should tell them, and tell them truly (because it is not telling at all unless it is told truly) the amount for which they had to insure.

The learned judge in the court below has treated apparently as a sufficient statement of what the amount was, a statement which appears in the letter of the 5th Oct. that the insuring value was 30,500*l*. I cannot agree with the learned judge on that point either. The correspondence when looked at as a whole, clearly shows that the charterers never did refuse to insure this vessel. Of course, if they had definitely taken up the position "Never mind what you say, or what you do, we do not and shall not insure the vessel," it may be that would have excused the shipowners from furnishing the necessary information about the value stated in their policy; but upon the correspondence it is plain that the charterers never took up that position. They did say they did not think it was necessary to insure her, but the letters which have been referred to, and relied upon, as assisting the construction of the contract which the learned judge in the court below has adopted, are letters in which they do not dispute their liability, but they say that the occasion has not arisen for the performance of it, and those two letters are the letter of the 2nd Sept. and the letter of the 5th Oct.

Never having taken up the position that they were under no obligation to insure under any circumstances, but rather indicating that if the conditions were different they might possibly be under an obligation, but without admitting it, what happened? What happened was that the owners supplied information which was wrong information as to what the amount stated in their annual policy was, and in those circumstances, in my opinion, we are compelled to take a different view from the learned judge in the court below on this second point, and say, even if the obligation were upon the charterers, the shipowners had not fulfilled the condition precedent which rested upon them, and that the charterers are on that ground also entitled to judgment.

In the circumstances, I think the appeal succeeds.

Warrington, L.J.—The first question, the answer to which disposes of the plaintiffs' claim, is whether the charter-party creates a liability on thepart of the charterers themselves to effect an insurance of the ship against war risk. The charterers contend that though if an insurance were properly effected by the owners they would have to pay the premium, this is a full extent of their liability.

In my opinion, the contention of the charterers on this point is correct. There is in clause 2 a general provision as to several matters which are to be provided and paid for by the owners and the charterers respectively. Amongst these which are to be provided and paid for by the owners is the insurance of the vessel. This provision, it is stated, extends only to the ordinary marine insurance, but, of course, the owners might, if they had pleased, insure against war-risk, and if they had done so, and there had been nothing more in the contract, they would have had to bear the expense themselves. The ship was their property, and the loss, if it occurred, would be their loss.

Passing over clause 23 in the charter-party which, in my opinion, carries the matter no further, we come to the clause in question, which is appended at the end of the printed document, and is in these terms: "War risk, if any required, for charterers' account. It is understood and agreed that value for war risk at all times to be based on values stated in owners' annual policy." The effect of this clause it seems to me is this, that it alters what I have said would have been the result of the provision in clause 2 if there had been no special provision in the contract. The option of insuring against war risk would remain with the owners. If the owners exercised that option and properly effected a war risk insurance, then they are not, as they would have been if there had been no provision to the contrary, to bear the expense themselves, but it is to be charged to the charterers.

So far I have said what, in my opinion, would have been the true construction of this clause if it had turned only on the words "for charterers' account," but it seems to me that that is the true construction is abundantly clear by the additional words. Those words are intended to limit, and have the effect of limiting the liability of the charterers. The owners are not to insure against war risk for any amount they may choose and charge the charterers with the expense, but the latter are to be charged only with the expense of a policy for a limited sum, and the facts which enable the amount of that limited sum to be ascertained are in the knowledge not of the charterers but of the owners of the ship, and the clause contains no provision that the owners, for the purpose of enabling the charterers to effect the policy, if that were to be their liability should communicate to them the value stated in their (the owners') annual policy.

If the construction is that put upon those words by the learned judge in the court below, some such provision must be implied. But if the construction is that which I have said I think it is, then nothing need be implied at all. It seems to me that construction confirms the view that the true construction is that the option of insuring—it is not an obligation but an option—against war risk is with the owners, but the liability to bear the expense, if that option is exercised, is on the charterers.

On the other point I agree with my brethren, and do not desire to add anything.

Re Arbitration between F. A. Tamplin Steamship Company Limited and Anglo-Mexican Petroleum Produce Company Limited. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Time charter-party—Oil tank steamer—Period of charter unexpired—Ship requisitioned by Government as transport for troops—Structural alterations to adapt her for that purpose—Whether contract determined by act of Government.

By a charter-party dated in May 1912 the owners of a ship designed to carry cargoes of oil in bulk agreed to let and the charterers agreed to hire the ship for the period of sixty calendar months commencing from the day at which the ship should be placed at the disposal of the charterers—which period would expire in Dec. 1917*—to be employed in lawful trades for voyages between certain specified ports for the carriage of refined petroleum and (or) crude oil and (or) its products, as the charterers or their agents should direct.*

The charterers were to pay as freight a fixed sum of 1750*l. per month. Under certain restrictions the carriage of other suitable cargo than oil was to be allowed. Power was conferred on the charterers to underlet the ship on Admiralty or other service, but without prejudice to the charter-party. There was an exception of (amongst other things) "restraints of princes, rulers, and people."*

The ship was requisitioned by the Government in Dec. 1914*, and was for some time employed in carrying water. In Feb.* 1915 she was altered by the Government to adapt her for the transport of troops. The charterers had paid and were willing to continue to pay the stipulated freight.

In these circumstances the question arose whether the charterers were entitled to treat the contract as subsisting or whether the owners were right in contending that it was put at an end.

Held, that the adventure on the part of the owners was that the ship should earn the freight for the entire term of the charter, the adventure on the part of the charterers being that they should have the use of the ship; that the adventure on the part of the owners had not been frustrated; and that it could not therefore be said that the entire adventure had been frustrated.

Held, also, that the event which had happened was within the meaning of the exception "restraints of princes, rulers, and people."

Decision of Atkin, J. affirmed.

Award stated in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court.

On the 18th May 1912 S. Pearson and Son Limited, by a time charter of that date, chartered a British tank steamer, the F. A. Tamplin, which was then building for the F. A. Tamplin Steamship Company Limited.

On the 4th Dec. 1912 the vessel was at the disposal of the charterers, the charter period to run for sixty months from that date, expiring, therefore, on the 4th Dec. 1917.

According to the charter-party, the steamship was "to be employed in such lawful trades for voyages between any safe port in the United Kingdom and (or) the Continent of Europe, and (or) any safe port or ports in the United States of America, and (or) Mexico, and (or) North and South America, and (or) Africa, and (or) Asia, and (or) Australasia, and back finally to a coal port in the United Kingdom, for the carriage of refined petroleum and (or) crude oil and (or) its products, but warranted no B.N.A. on Atlantic, except for coaling, warranted no Baltic between the 1st Oct. and the 1st April, warranted no White Sea between the 1st Oct. and the 1st April, as charterer or his agents shall direct, on the following (inter alia) conditions:—

1. That the owners shall provide and pay for all the provisions and wages of the captain, officers, engineers, firemen, and crew. Shall pay for the insurance of the vessel, also for all stores (excluding fresh boiler water, which is to be paid for by charterers), and maintain her in a thoroughly efficient state in hull, machinery, and equipment for and during the service; but owners not to be responsible for leakage of oils from any cause, but they are to make good any defects in compartments as soon as practicable on receiving notice thereof."

3. That the charterers shall pay for the use and hire of the said vessel at the rate of 1750*l.* per calendar month (which was at the expiration of the first twelve months to be reduced to 1700*l* a month).

20. The act of God, perils of the sea, fire, barratry of the master and crew, enemies, pirates, and thieves, arrests and restraints of princes, rulers and people, collisions, stranding, and other accidents of navigation always excepted, even when occasioned by negligence, default or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowner.

22. No goods contraband of war to be shipped, and the steamer not to be required to enter any port that is in a state of blockade or where hostilities are in progress. In the event of a country to which steamer trades being at war with any other country, charterers agree to insure (for owner's benefit) the steamer against all war risks.

25. No voyage to be undertaken or goods or cargoes loaded that would involve risk of seizure, capture, or penalty by British or foreign rules or Government; and no acids or cargoes injurious to the steamer to be shipped.

26. Charterers to have the option of shipping in all tanks and in "'tween decks, and (or) any other suitable space available, such quantity of turpentine or naphtha in cans, cases and (or) barrels and (or) drums or other suitable cargo, but quantity to be at the discretion of the master."

(a) Reported by W. V. Ball and E. A. Scratchley, Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Clause 34 provided that the charterers should have the liberty of sub-letting the steamer on Admiralty or other service without prejudice to the charter-party, but the charterers remaining responsible.

Early in Feb. 1915 notice was given to the Anglo-Mexican Petroleum Company Limited (who by agreement had taken the place and thereafter stood in the shoes of the charterers) by the director of transports that the F. A. Tamplin was requisitioned by the Admiralty "from the time she arrives, has discharged, and is ready."

On the 10th Feb. she arrived at Cardiff, and on the 15th Feb., in obedience to the requisition she proceeded to Liverpool. At the instance of certain transport officers in the employment of the Government she then under went certain structural alterations and was fitted for transport of troops. She was afterwards used as a transport.

Disputes which arose between owners and charterers as to the effect of this upon the charter-party were referred to arbitration.

The owners contended that the fact that the vessel had been requisitioned by the Government made it impossible for them to continue to allow the vessel to be user under the charter-party, and that that agreement was put an end to or suspended by "restraints of princes." The requisitioning of a vessel in such circumstances was not and could not be treated as a sub-letting, because the terms of the charter-party did not permit of the vessel being structurally altered.

On behalf of the charterers it was contended before the arbitrator that in the events which had happened the charter-party had not been determined or put an end to, and that the requisition should be treated as a sub-letting. Structural alterations made by the British Government did not amount to a breach of contract by the charterers. Finally, they contended that inasmuch as they contract to accept the terms offered by the Government, this was, in effect, a sub-letting by them.

The arbitrator awarded that the charter-party had come to an end on Feb. 1915, but subject to the opinion of the court.

In July 1915 the special case came on to be heard before Atkin, J.

MacKinnon, K.C. and R. A. Wright for the charterers.—Clause 34 of the charter-party (sup.) is relied on. The requisition led to an involved something which was a sub-letting. The clause which mentions "restraints of princes" is for the protection of the owners, but they cannot use it as a weapon of offence against the charterers. The charterers are entitled to receive the hire paid by the Government and to continue to pay the sums due under the charter-party. No breach of contract by the shipowners is complained of.

George Wallace, K.C. (with him Raeburn) for the shipowners.—As soon as the vessel ceased to be fit for carrying oil the charter-party came to an end, as it was an implied condition that she should remain in that condition. This was not a charter for general purposes. He referred to

Krell v. Henry, 89 L. T. Rep. 328; (1908) 3 K. B. 740, 748;

The alterations having been made, the vessel ceased to be a tank steamer, and as those alterations were made by virtue of the Royal prerogative the contract was terminated.

MacKinnon, K.C., in reply, referred to

Brown v. Turner, Brightman, and Co., 12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 79; 105 L. T. Rep. 562; (1912) A. C. 12.

ATKIN, J. stated the facts and continued:—No question arises before me as to the complete power of the Admiralty to require the use of the vessel to be given up to them. The dispute between the parties appears to have risen some time after Feb. 1915 in consequence of the owners claiming that the contract was suspended during the time the vessel was requisitioned by the Admiralty, and that they were the persons who were entitled to deal with the Admiralty in respect of her, and to have, therefore, the rate of freight which the Admiralty were paying. That contention was not accepted by the charterers, and in that way the dispute originally seems to have come before the arbitrator. The learned arbitrator, who has dealt with the case as a pure question of law, has awarded that the charter-party came to an end in Feb. 1915, and the question as he states it is whether he is right in so awarding or not. I have great respect for the opinion of the arbitrator. He is a very well known legal gentleman whose opinion is entitled to the very greatest weight on questions of this kind, but I do not agree with his opinion. There is no doubt that there was a contract in existence for five years, and if the shipowners wish to put an end to it, or to successfully contend that it is at an end, they must show some legal principle upon which it is put an end to. It was not argued before me that there has been any breach of contract by the charterers, and it could not be so contended. In my judgment the requisitioning by the Admiralty is an act which is altogether independent of the charterers, and, further, even if it were an act of the charterers or anything which could be said to be a breach of contract by them, I think there is very little doubt that they would be protected by the exceptions if those exceptions were available in their favour. Indeed, it was not contended on behalf of the shipowners that there was any breach of contract by the charterers. There has therefore been no breach going to the root of the contract which would entitle the shipowners to put an end to it.

In those circumstances, what ground is there for saying that the contract is put an end to? It was said that an implied condition in the contract had not been fulfilled, and that the contract was therefore at an end. This was based upon the principle which had been laid down in various authorities and formulated by Vaughan Williams, L.J. in Krell v. Henry (ubi sup.) in language which, although perhaps somewhat vague, I think, in the terms in which it is couched, expresses the principle of law. He said: "I think that you first have to ascertain, not necessarily from the terms of the contract, but, if required, from the necessary inferences, drawn from surrounding circumstances recognised by both contracting parties, what is the substance of the contract, and then to ask the question whether that substantial contract needs for its foundation the assumption of the existence of a particular state of things.

If it does, this will limit the operation of the general words, and in such case, if the contract became impossible of performance by reason of the non-existence of the state of things assumed by both contracting parties as the foundation of the contract, there will be no breach of the contract thus limited."

On behalf of the shipowners, Mr. Wallace contended that it is an implied term of this charter-party that the ship shall always continue to be fit to carry oil, and that if she does not continue to be fit to carry oil—that being a state of things the assumption of which is the foundation of this contract—the contract is thereupon at an end. It is a little difficult to conceive that state of things as being necessarily that which both parties were contemplating. It is not, and I do not think it could be, suggested that if in fact the ship became unfit to carry oil by reason of the default of either of the parties, the contract would be at an end. Either the charterers might be in default in not exercising reasonable care, or the shipowners might be responsible and have to make good the default if the charterers were not to blame for it, and in those circumstances the condition of things would be due to the default of either one or the other of the parties. Therefore the contention of the shipowner is necessarily limited to the suggestion that it is only when the ship continues to be unfit for the carriage of oil, without the default of either of the parties, that the contract is to be deemed to be brought to an end.

I see no reason for assuming that to be a necessary condition of this contract. What the charterers have to do is to pay the freight. They need not use the ship for the carriage of oil. Under the charter-party, if the carriage of oil became unremunerative, they could (using reasonable care to preserve the ship so as to be able to hand her over in a reasonable condition at the time when the charter-party comes to an end) lay the ship up, and, moreover, they have the power under it of carrying cargo other than oil, subject to certain conditions. So far as the owners are concerned, the main obligation of the charterers is to pay the freight, and I therefore see no ground for suggesting that there is a condition of the contract that, when without default of either party the ship ceases to be fit for the carriage of oil, the contract is to be treated as at an end. If that is not a condition of the contract, and there is no breach by either party, I cannot see upon what ground the contract can be said to be at an end. The charterers having the use for five years of that which is of value to the Government, the Government have taken it away and are using it for national purposes. During that period (the Government having the right to do what they have done) there is no breach of the contract by the charterers, and it appears to me that there is nothing in respect of which the owners can complain. They cannot say to the Admiralty: "Pay to us the money for the use of the ship for which you have, in fact, deprived the charterers. As I cannot see any legal ground upon which this contract has come to an end, I am unable to answer the question except by saying that, in my opinion, the arbitrator was not right in holding that the charter-party came to an end or was suspended. The charterers should have the costs of the references and award and the costs of the hearing before me.

From that decision the Steamship Company now appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 15. 1915.—The following written judgments were delivered:—

BANKES, L.J.—The Master of the Rolls has desired me to state that he has perused and that he agrees entirely with the judgments which are about to be delivered in this case by myself and Warrington, L.J.

The question in dispute between the parties in this case is whether a time charter of the steamship F. A. Tamplin has been determined owing to the vessel having been requisitioned by the Government.

The matter was referred to arbitration. The arbitrator, who stated his award in the form of a special case, decided in favour of the shipowners, the present appellants, that it had been determined. Atkin, J. before whom the special case was argued took the opposite view.

In the special case the arbitrator sets out the facts and the contentions of the parties, and he states what his decision is. But he does not state the grounds of his decision or whether he draws any particular inference of fact from the facts stated. No application was made to this court that the case should be remitted to the arbitrator. And from this I assume that the parties desire that the proper inference to be drawn from the facts should be treated as a question of law and dealt with accordingly.

The material facts can be quite shortly stated. The charter-party is dated the 18th May, 1912, at which time the F. A. Tamplin was in course of building. She was constructed as a tank steamer designed to carry cargoes of oil in bulk. The charter was for the long period of sixty calender months from the day at which the vessel was placed at the disposal of the charterers. This period does not expire till the 4th Dec. 1917.

The charty-party is not a demise of the ship, but it places the ship at the disposal of the charterers for the purposes, and with the limitations, indicated in the charter-party. These may be briefly stated as follows: The vessel was to be employed in such lawful trades for voyages between any safe port or ports in the United Kingdom and (or) Continent of Europe, and (or) any safe port or ports in the United States of America and (or) Mexico, and (or)

North and South America and (or) Africa, and (or) Asia and (or) Australasia and back finally to a coal port in the United Kingdom for the carriage of refined petroleum and (or) crude oil and (or) its products as the charterers should direct but warranted no B. N. A. or Atlantic except for coaling, and warranted no Baltic between the 1st Oct. and the 1st April; warranteed no White Sea between the 1st Oct. and the 1st April.

Though this class of trading was the one which was mainly in the contemplation of the parties, the charterers had the right to ship other suitable cargo to a certain extent; and had also the right to sublet the vessel on Admiralty or other service, but without prejudice to the charter-party. One or the express conditions of the charter-party was that no voyage should be undertaken, or goods, or cargoes, loaded that would involve risk of seizure, capture, or penalty by British or foreign rulers or Governments. The charter-party also contained an exemption clause which included "restraint of princes."

The hire payable was at the rate of 1750*l.* sterling per calendar month, the owners had to provide and pay for all the provisions and wages of the captain, officers, engineers, firemen, and crew. The captain, though appointed by the owners, was to be under the orders and direction of the charterers.

On the 15th Feb. of this year the Government requisitioned the vessel for the purpose of carrying troops, and they caused certain alterations to be made in order to adapt her for that purpose. The Government also required certain members of the crew who were foreigners to be replaced by Englishmen, and this appears to have been done or assented to by the owners. No serious question was raised by the appellants in relation to this dealing with the crew. The respondents appear to receive from the Government a substantially increased hire over and beyond what they pay to the appellants, and they not unnaturally claim to be entitled to receive this, and retain it, as they were not allowed to employ the vessel for their own trade, which they were anxious to do.

The shipowners contend that in the events which have happened the charter-party has been determined, and that they are entitled to withdraw the vessel from the charterers; or in other words to receive the Government hire themselves. There is no doubt that if the charterers had themselves done what the Government have done, their action would have constituted such a breach, or a series of breaches, going to the root of the contract as would have entitled the shipowners to rescind the contract and withdraw the ship.

That, however, is not the question which has to be decided. In the events which have happened the charterers have done nothing. It is the Government who have stepped in and requisitioned the ship, and have caused her to be altered and employed her on work not authorised by the charter-party. What has been done has been done by "restraint of princes" within the meaning of the exception, which is in my opinion an exception in its nature mutual, and of which either party is therefore entitled to the benefit. It is not, I think, contended that what was done by the Government was not a "restraint of princes." But if authority is wanted it will be found I think in the recent case of Sanday and Co. v. British and Foreign Marine Insurance Company Limited (ante, p. 116; 113 L. T. Rep. 407; (1915) 2 K. B. 781).

The real point in the present case is whether what the Government have done has rendered the commercial enterprise, entered into by the parties, and evidenced by the charter-party, impossible. It it has, then each of the parties has the right to say that the contract cannot be carried out, and to treat it as at an end: (see Geipel v. Smith, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 268; 26 L. T. Rep. 361; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 404, per Blackburn, J. at p. 413; and Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Company Limited, 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 435; 31 L. T. Rep. 789; L. Rep. 10 C. The arbitrator decided that the contract came to an end directly the Government requisitioned the vessel—that is to say, on the 15th Feb. 1915, and that is the position now contended for by the appellants. So far as the alterations of the vessel are concerned, I attach no importance to these. If done by the charterers they would no doubt have amounted to serious breaches of contract, justifying rescission by the shipowners. But in their nature they did not and do not render the commercial enterprise impossible. At the time they were carried out the charter had about two years and nine months still to run. The vessel can easily be restored to her former condition as a tank steamer, though possibly her value may have been somewhat diminished by what the Government have done.

The fact that so long a period of the time for which the vessel was chartered was still unexpired when the vessel was requisitioned by the Government is to my mind an all important feature in this case; and one which distinguishes it at once from the series of decisions in which the fulfilment of some condition precedent has been held to be destructive of the commercial enterprise. This point was referred to in the judgment of Blackburn, J. in Geipel v. Smith (ubi sup.) (at p. 414 of L. Rep. 7 Q. B.).

In the present case the commercial enterprise as contemplated by the parties has undoubtedly been interrupted, and seriously interrupted by the action of the Government. The interruption, however, is of a nature which was contemplated by the parties and provided for by the introduction of the exception relating to restraint of princes. That mere interruption of a commercial enterprise, though long prolonged, is not necessarily a determination of the contract under which the enterprise was undertaken is shown by the embargo cases of which I may refer to Hadley v. Clarke (8 T. R. 259), and the other cases cited in the recent judgment of Swinfen Eady, L.J. in Beal v. Horlock (ante, p. 250; 114 L. T. Rep. 193).

Looking at the commercial enterprise in the present case from the point of view of each of the parties to the contract, as was done by Brett, J., in Hudson v. Hill (ubi sup.) (at p. 279 of 43 L. J. C. P.), what is the position? From the point of view of the shipowners, the commercial enterprise was mainly the earning of the hire of the vessel. This the shipowners have not lost, as the charterers either have paid, or are willing to pay the hire. The obligations of the charterers remain untouched, and the rights of the shipowners in reference to any breach of the charter-party by the charterers are undiminished.

From the point of view of the charterers, the commercial enterprise was the earning of profit by the use of the vessel or by sub-letting her. This the charterers have not lost. It is quite true that the intervening act of the Government has displaced for the time being the control of either party over the vessel, but meanwhile each party is deriving in substance—though not in form—the benefit, or a substantial part of the benefit, which each contemplated getting out of the enterprise, and there is nothing to prevent the charterers resuming control of the vessel and completing the time charter if and when the Government restore the vessel to them.

Under these circumstances the true inference, in my opinion, to be drawn from the facts is that the requisitioning by the Government of the vessel has not destroyed the foundation of the commercial enterprise, and has not, therefore, determined the time charter.

The appeal, in my opinion, fails and must be dismissed with costs.

Warrington, L.J.—The question in this case is whether a time charter the period of which is still unexpired has been determined by the act of the Government in requisitioning the ship as a transport and making certain structural alterations necessary to fit her for that purpose. The question was referred to arbitration, the owners contending that the charter is determined, the charterers that it is still in force.

The arbitrator has made his award in the form of a special case expressing his own opinion in favour of the owners. This view has been overruled by Atkin, J., and the owners appeal.

The charter is dated the 18th May 1912. By it the owners agreed to let and the charterers agreed to hire the ship in question described as a tank steamer then building for sixty months commencing from the day at which she should be placed at the disposal of the charterers—this day was in fact the 5th Dec. 1912—to be employed in lawful trades for voyages between the ports specified for the carriage of refined petroleum and (or) crude oil and (or) its products, warranted no B.N.A. or Atlantic except for coaling and warranted no Baltic and no White Sea between certain dates as the charterers or their agents should direct on the conditions specified.

It is unnecessary to mention these in detail. It is sufficient to say that the only direct obligation on the part of the charterers was to pay the freight—a fixed sum of 1750*l.* per month. The other conditions either imposed obligations on the owners or regulated the extent of the charterers' right to the services of the ship. They allowed under certain restrictions the carriage of other cargo than oil. They gave power to underlet without prejudice to the charter-party and they contained an exception of (amongst other things) restraints of princes, rulers, and people.

The steamer was originally requisitioned by the Admiralty in Dec. 1914 and was for some time employed in carrying water. In Feb. 1915 on arriving at Cardiff she was ordered by the Admiralty to Liverpool, where she was altered to fit her for the transport of troops. On the 30th March 1915 she left Liverpool on Government service and she is still employed thereon. The term of the charter expires on the 4th Dec. 1917. The charterers have paid and are willing to continue to pay the freight of 1750*l.* a month.

The charter-party was plainly not a demise of the ship. Its true effect appears to me to be to entitle the charterers during the specified term to enjoy the use of the ship for the particular purposes, and the benefit of the specified services to be performed by the owners, the charterers being under an obligation to pay the agreed freight whether they actually used the ship or not.

The effect of the action of the Government is to deprive them for the time being of the actual services of the ship. They contend that they are nevertheless entitled to treat the contract as subsisting. It is the owners who insist that it is not.

It was contended before the learned judge in the court below and before us that the contract was subject to the implied condition that the ship should at all times be and remain a tank steamer and that the alterations had occasioned the non-fulfilment of that condition. I can only say as to this that I agree with Atkin, J. that there is no ground for implying such a condition.

It was further contended before us that the mercantile adventure at first contemplated by both parties was entirely frustrated by the events which have happened and that therefore the contract is determined and cannot be enforced by either party, reliance being placed on the judgment of Bramwell, B. speaking for the majority of the court in Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Company Limited (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 435; 31 L. T. Rep. 789; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 125). But in order to determine what is the mercantile adventure contemplated it must be looked at from the point of view of both parties to the contract: (see per Brett, J. in Hudson v. Hill, 30 L. T. Rep. 555; 43 L. J. 273, C. P., at p. 279).

In the present case the adventure on the part of the owners was that the ship should earn the freight for the entire term of the charter; that of the charterers that they should have the use of the ship. The adventure on the part of the owners has not been frustrated, and it cannot therefore be said that the entire adventure has been frustrated. Jackson's case (ubi sup.) is plainly distinguishable on the grounds that in that case the court held that the commercial adventure—a single voyage—had wholly failed.

It is true that the action of the Government has imposed upon the owners obligations as to the equipment voyages and use of the ship during its present employment different from and more onerous than those imposed by the charter. This circumstance may give them a claim to the generous consideration of the Government, but does not, in my opinion, enable them to say that as between themselves and the charterers the object of this long time charter is entirely defeated.

So far I have said nothing about the exception of "restraint of princes," and I should have been of the same opinion had it been absent. But if, as at present advised I think is the case, the event which has happened is within the meaning of that expression, the exception assists the view I have expressed above, inasmuch as it shows that the event was one contemplated by the parties in the inception of the contract.

For these reasons I am of opinion that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

British and Foreign Marine Insurance Company Limited v. Samuel Sanday and Co (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Marine insurance — Policy — Constructive total loss of goods—Restraint of princes—State of war—Frustration of contemplated adventure—Restraint by Government of assured—Marine Insurance Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 41), ss. 26, 60, 91 (2).

The plaintiffs, who were British merchants, in July 1914 shipped merchandise for sale in Germany on two British vessels in the River Plate for carriage to Hamburg. They had insured the goods on both vessels by identical voyage policies in the ordinary form, and the perils insured against included restraint of princes. War was declared by Great Britain on Germany on the 4th Aug., and proclamations forbidding trading with the enemy were issued on the 5th Aug. and the 9th Sept. One of the two vessels, when in the Channel, received a signal from a French cruiser that she should go to Liverpool for safety, and the other, on the suggestion of the Admiralty, was diverted by her owners to Glasgow. The cargo owners warehoused their goods, and gave notice of abandonment, claiming on a constructive total loss.

By sect. 60 (1) of the Marine Insurance Act 1906 "there is a constructive total loss when the subject-matter insured is reasonably abandoned on account of the actual total loss appearing to be unavoidable."

By rule 10 of the rules for construction of policy in the schedule to the Act, "the term 'arrests, &c., of kings, princes, and people' refers to political or executive acts and does not include a loss caused by ordinary judicial process."

Held, (1) that the old rule that on an insurance of goods under a marine policy at and from the port of loading to the port of destination the frustration of the adventure by an insured peril was a loss recoverable against the underwriters had not been altered by the Marine Insurance Act 1906, and therefore the detention of the goods for an indefinite time in the warehouses still entitled the plaintiffs, on giving notice of abandonment, to recover as for a constructive total loss; and

(2) that the destruction of the adventure was directly caused by His Majesty's declaration of war, which was a restraint of kings, princes, and people within the meaning of the policies.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (ante, p. 116; 113 L. T. Rep. 407; (1915) 2 K. B. 781) affirmed.

Appeal by the defendants from an order of the Court of Appeal affirming a judgment of Bailhache, J. in the Commercial Court.

The facts fully appear from the considered judgments of their Lordships.

The question was whether under the circumstances as outlined in the headnote the plaintiffs were entitled, as they claimed to be, to recover the sum of 44,800*l.* under policies of marine insurance, dated the 31st July 1914, with the defendants on linseed and wheat per the steamships St. Andrew and Orthia. The action was tried on an agreed statement of facts as a commercial cause.

Bailhache, J. held that there was a constructive total loss of the goods, and gave judgment for the amount claimed, and the Court of Appeal by a majority (Lord Reading, C.J. and Bray, J., Swinfen Eady, L.J. dissenting) affirmed his decision.

(a) Reported by W. E. Reid, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The House took time for consideration.

The following written judgments were read :—

Earl Loreburn.—When the present war commenced the St. Andrew and the Orthia, both of them British ships, were on a voyage from the Argentine to Hamburg, a German port, laden with merchandise. On learning that war had broken out between Great Britain and Germany, whereby the taking of these goods to Hamburg had become unlawful, the masters properly desisted from the voyages, and the cargo owners warehoused their merchandise, and gave notice of abandonment to their underwriters, claiming on a constructive total loss. These notices were not accepted, and this action is brought to enforce the claim. There is no distinction between the two ships, and both policies are of a like tenor.

Two questions have been argued before your Lordships. Other contentions, raised in the courts below, have not been raised here. The first question is whether the old rule still prevails, that upon an insurance on goods, substantially in the words of these policies, the frustration of the adventure by an insured peril is a loss recoverable against underwriters. though the goods themselves are safe and sound. The second question is whether, under the circumstances, there was here a loss by restraint of kings, princes, and people, which is one of the perils insured against in these policies.

In 1906 it was well settled that when goods are insured in a policy worded as these policies are, at and from the port of loading to the port of destination, there is a loss if the adventure is frustrated by a peril insured. It is not merely an insurance of the actual merchandise from injury, but also an insurance of its safe arrival. There is no doubt that this was the rule which had been acted upon for very many years. Was it altered by the Marine Insurance Act 1906? Swinfen Eady, L.J. thought it was, and he cited instances in which this Act, though a Consolidation Act, had in his opinion altered the law in other respects. I will not pursue that subject, because it has no bearing on the question whether or not there has been an alteration in this respect, but I do not think it will appear, on an examination of the cases to which he refers, that the Act has altered what, at the time of its passage, was the highest judicial interpretation of the law. Howbeit, I do not think the Act altered the law in the particular now under consideration, namely, in regard to the old rule I have mentioned.

Sect. 60 of the Act says, "there is a constructive total loss where the subject-matter insured is reasonably abandoned on account of its actual total loss appearing to be unavoidable." Sect. 57 (1) says, "where the assured is irretrievably deprived" of the subject-matter assured there is an actual total loss. Now here the subject-matter assured, as the law stood in 1906, included the adventure and not merely the goods, and the assured was irretrievably deprived of it because all prospect of safe arrival on the voyage to Germany was hopelessly frustrated by the outbreak of war. Therefore the assured reasonably abandoned because actual total loss appeared to be unavoidable. So far I see nothing in the Act to alter the law, but I do see that under the old decisions there is a constructive total loss.

The argument, however, is that the "subject-matter insured" on such a policy no longer included the adventure. There is not a line in the Act which says so, and, if it were relevant, many reasons might be urged against the probability of so inconvenient a change being made. But it is conclusive to point out that sect. 66 says: "The subject-matter must be designated in a marine policy with reasonable certainty," and further, "In the application of this section regard shall be had to any usage regulating the designation of the subject-matter assured." There are many things that may be at risk, and in respect of which insurance may be effected—ship, goods, freight, profits, and so on. There are also familiar, even antique, expressions constantly used from long ago in marine policies, and continued because they are well understood in the business, or have been interpretated by judges. This section says that regard is to be had to any usage regulating the designation of the subject-matter assured. The words of this policy have for generations been understood and held by judges to designate not merely the goods but also the adventure. So far from abrogating this designation of subject-matter I should have thought the Act took pains to preserve it and others like it.

I will merely in a sentence refer to sect. 91 (2) of the Act which preserves the rules of the common law, including the law merchant, save in so far as they are inconsistent with the express provisions of this Act. It seems to me that Parliament has triply guarded against the danger that the Act should be construed in the sense urged upon us by Sir Robert Finlay. It has refrained from saying that the old rule shall be altered, which of itself would suffice. It has twice warned us that we are to regard and preserve rules and usages in terms that are applicable to this rule.

Accordingly, I take with me the conclusion that the adventure was a subject-matter insured, when I proceed to inquire whether or not the loss of it is to be compensated under the clause protecting the assured against restraint by kings or princes.

We were told that this question has never been judicially determined. It is a difficult question, and I have been much struck by the cogent reasoning of Swinfen Eady, L.J., but the argument has in the end satisfied me that the decision of the Court of Appeal ought to be affirmed.

A declaration by His Majesty that there was a state of war was issued on the 4th Aug. 1914, and thereupon a number of things theretofore lawful became unlawful. Among other things, trading to German ports became unlawful, and an instant duty arose for these two ships to discontinue their voyage to Hamburg. The adventure of carrying this merchandise to its destination became in law a serious offence, and, in fact, impracticable. That the declaration was an act of State cannot be doubted. The real point made by the underwriters was that the declaration of war did not directly restrain the ships from proceeding to Hamburg, or the owners of goods from taking them there. They argued that the declaration set up a state of war, and the general law applicable to that state thereupon came into force, and it was not the declaration but the consequence of it which destroyed their enterprise.

To hold otherwise, they said, would be to throw upon underwriters an insurance against the consequences of war. In their contention, though the actual exercise of force might not be necessary, yet the fear of its being used must be present if there is to be a loss by restraint of princes, and here there was neither force nor the fear of it, for the voyage was abandoned simply because it had become unlawful, and the assured obeyed the law. Tho proximate or direct cause of the loss was, they said, simply the law of the land.

I am not pressed by the circumstance that force was neither exerted nor present, for force is in reserve behind every State command. And it would be a strange law which deprived the assured, if otherwise entitled to his indemnity, upon the ground that he had not resisted, till the hand of power was laid upon him, an order which it was his duty to obey. If it were an order which he was not bound to obey, and which he might have successfully resisted either by violence or by process of law, a question might arise whether or not there had been in fact a restraint. But that is outside the present case, and I say nothing of it. What has given me some anxiety is the argument that His Majesty's declaration was not the direct cause of these adventures being destroyed. The maxim causa proxima non remota spectativi has been strictly applied in marine insurance cases. And properly so, for there are a variety of perils that may lead to a loss either partial or total, some of them it may be covered and others not covered by a policy, and a variety of events or causes that may contribute to a loss, so that without straining language it will be possible to treat it as due either to an insured or to an excepted peril.

That, I take it, is the reason why this maxim is pushed to considerable lengths in marine insurance law. In view of that, ought we to say that His Majesty's declaration was the direct cause of these adventures being frustrated, or ought we to say that it merely created a state of war which brought into activity a new set of duties and prohibitions, and that one of them, the prohibition against trading with the enemy, necessitated the adventure being wholly given up. Did the interruption directly come from the declaration or from the law which it awakened? In a sense it came from both, but we must choose which was the proximate cause, for one is the subject of insurance and the other is not.

I can see how far-reaching a decision in the former of these senses may prove, but I think it is the right decision. I do not see my way to separating the act of State from its sequel, and treating the advent of war conditions as a last distinct link in the chain of causes which brought these voyages to an end. No new law or ordinance was made after the risk commenced. No event occurred to impede the adventure except the declaration of war.

In my opinion the clause insuring these goods insures their safe arrival at Hamburg, and the destruction of that adventure was directly caused by His Majesty's declaration. It was therefore a loss within the clause which insures these goods at and from losses against restraint by kings, princes, or peoples.

In my opinion the order appealed from ought to be affirmed with costs.

Lord Atkinson.—I concur.

The question in this case is novel and important. It is, I think, in effect this: Whether British merchants who have insured goods with British underwriters against the usual perils in a marine policy (including restraints of princes) upon a British ship for a voyage to the port of Hamburg can, upon war being declared by His Majesty the King of England, whereby the further prosecution of the insured voyage to that port becomes illegal, give notice to the underwriters of abandonment, and recover as for a constructive total loss of the goods by restraint of princes, though the goods themselves remain unharmed and in the actual possession of the assured. The facts have been sufficiently stated by my noble and learned friend who has preceded me. It is unnecessary to recapitulate them.

The respondents were insured against loss arising from "takings at sea, arrests, restraints, and detainments of all kings, princes, and people of what nation, condition, or quality soever."

The appellants contend that the law as to the constructive loss of goods on a voyage, as distinguished from the ship which carried them, is entirely altered by the Marine Assurance Act of 1906. And the ships and the cargo are, by that statute, impliedly placed upon the same level.

The first question I desire to deal with, then, is whether this contention is right, but to determine it one must first consider what was the state of the law on the subject before the passing of this statute, and then examine how far, if at all, the provisions of the statute conflict with that law. It is only necessary to refer to three cases upon the point, namely, Anderson v. Wallis (9 East, 283), Baker v. Blakes (2 M. & S. 240), and Rodoconachi v. Elliott (2 Asp. Mar. Cas. 399; 31 L. T. Rep. 239; L. Rep. 9 C. P. 518).

In the first, decided in 1808, Lord Ellenborough, at pp. 293-294 of 9 East, laid it down that the impossibility of prosecuting the voyage to the place of destination, which arose during and in consequence of the prolonged detention of the ship and cargo, may properly be considered a loss of the voyage, and such a loss of voyage upon received principles of insurance law, as a total loss of the goods which were to have been transported in the course of that voyage, provided the loss be followed by a sufficiently prompt and immediate notice of abandonment.

In the second case the same learned judge said: "I am well aware that an insurance upon a cargo for a particular voyage contemplates that the voyage shall be performed with that cargo, and any risk which renders the cargo permanently lost to the assured may be a cause of abandonment. In like manner, a total loss of cargo may be effected not merely by the destruction of that cargo, but by a total permanent incapacity of the ship to perform the voyage. That is a destruction of the contemplated adventure. But the case of an interruption of the voyage does not warrant the assured in totally disengaging himself from the adventure and throwing the burden on the underwriters. It is unnecessary to pursue the subject further, as there is not any case or principle which authorises an abandonment, unless where the loss has been actually a total loss or in the highest degree probable at the time of abandonment."

In the third case Bramwell, B., as he then was, in delivering the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber, said: "It is well established that there may be a loss of the goods by a loss of the voyage on which the goods are being transported, if it amounts, to use the words of Lord Ellenborough, to a destruction of the contemplated adventure."

For this he cites the two cases above mentioned.

Mr. Roche has suggested that this loss of voyage means a loss of market for the goods. Not a loss of profit, but a loss of market. And that what the assured insures against is not merely the loss sustained by injury to or destruction of the goods, but in addition the loss resulting from a failure to transport the goods to their destination, that failure being established by a detention of them through one of the perils insured against, so prolonged as to amount to a destruction of the contemplated adventure. This may be so. It is a rational explanation. I think none other was given.

The next matter to consider is whether there is any provision to be found in the statute 1906, either expressly or implied, inconsistent with the law as settled by the above-mentioned authorities.

First, the statute of 1906 purports to be an Act merely to codify the law relating to marine insurance; sect. 91 provides that the rules of the common law, including the law merchant, save so far as they are inconsistent with the provisions of the Act, shall continue to apply to contracts of marine insurance. A comparison between sub-sects. 2 and 3 of sect. 60 shows that, in the case of the insurance of goods, the cost of bringing the goods to their destination is to be taken into account in estimating whether or not a constructive total loss of them has occurred. Thus the old rule of law has been preserved: (Rosetto v. Gurney, 11 C. B. 176).

Constructive total loss is, subject to any express provision in the policy, defined to occur when the subject-matter insured is reasonably abandoned on account of actual loss appearing to be unavoidable, or because it could not be preserved from actual total loss without an expenditure which would exceed its value when the expenditure had been incurred.

By sect. 57 it is provided that actual total loss occurs where the subject-matter insured is destroyed, or so damaged, as to cease to be a thing of the kind insured, or where the assured is irretrievably deprived thereof. Those provisions make it necessary to determine what is the subject-matter insured in these policies. There is no definition of the word subject-matter. Sect. 26 (1) provides that the subject-matter insured must be designated in a marine policy with reasonable certainty, and sub-sect. 4 that in the application to this section regard shall be had to any usage regulating the designation of the subject-matter. By the word designation is, I think, meant identification or description.

The subject-matter in the case of the Orthia is stated in the policy to be linseed, valued at 11,000*l*. That, however, is only part of its description or designation or identification. Its full description, as shown by the policy itself, is, linseed, valued at 11,000*l*., shipped on board this vessel to be transported on a voyage at or from a port on the River Plate to Hamburg. Such a description in such a policy connotes rights and characteristics attached by the insurance law to goods so placed, one of which is this, that they may be treated as constructively totally lost if by one of the perils insured against, as the proximate cause, the adventure of taking them to their destination be destroyed.

If that be so, as I think it is, then if the loss of the voyage, the loss of the chance of arriving at the port of destination, and the consequent loss of the market appears to be unavoidable, there would be a constructive total loss of the subject-matter. I am, therefore, of opinion that, in the insurance of goods, the law as it stood before the Act of 1906, in reference to the subject of constructive total loss, remains unchanged.

Two questions remain. First, were these vessels diverted from the contemplated voyage by "the restraint of kings or princes"? And, second, if they were, was this restraint in each case the proximate cause of the diversion within the meaning of sect. 55?

It was contended that the declaration of war merely altered the status of the inhabitants of the German Empire, changing them from friends to enemies, and that it was the common law acting on that condition of things, not anything done by the Sovereign, which prevented the voyages of the ships to their respective destinations, owing to the obligation felt by their masters, as good citizens, to obey the common law of the country. That the vessels were, therefore, not subject to any restraint of kings or princes, and that, even if they were, that restraint was not the proximate cause of the loss of the voyage.

In the case of Rodoconachi v. Elliott (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 399; 31 L. T. Rep. 239; L. Rep. 9 C. P. 518), Bramwell, B., said that the court considered that these words, "restraints and detainments of all kings and princes and people of what nation, condition, or quality whatsoever," are wider and more comprehensive than the words which immediately precede them—i.e., the words "taking at sea, arrest"; that the word "restraint" as applied to goods must mean a restraint of those having the custody of the goods; that it was not necessary that there should be any specific action on the goods themselves, and that as the effect of the Siege of Paris (at which city the goods had arrived) was to cut off all foreign connection and correspondence, the goods were restrained and prevented from leaving Paris by the operation of that siege, and therefore restrained and "detained by kings and princes" within the terms of the policy. It was accordingly held that the "contemplated venture" was destroyed, and that there was a constructive total loss of the goods.

In this case the trading with Germany was lawful up to the 4th Aug. 1914. On that day, by the act of the Sovereign, it became unlawful. No executive, person, or body, no moral or physical agency, intervened between the act of the Sovereign, proclaimed in his declaration of war, and the abandonment of the intended voyage.

As soon as information was conveyed to the captain of the St. Andrew he sailed for Liverpool. On the 5th Aug. the owners of the Orthia telegraphed to her to St. Vincent to return. The common law which made it illegal to go to Hamburg was brought into immediate operation by the act of the Sovereign. By the warning he gave it must be taken that he meant to have that law enforced against those who neglected his warning.

I do not think, therefore, that the operation of the common law can be separated from the act of the Sovereign which called it into action, and treated as an intervenement between that act and the abandonment of the voyage. The act of the Sovereign in declaring war and the calling of the common law into operation formed, I think, two parts of one act—one single exercise of the Royal prerogative.

This was the proximate cause of the diversion of the respective courses of the two ships and their ultimate abandonment of the original voyage.

The question remains, Did the exercise by the Sovereign of his Royal prerogative in this respect impose upon each of these ships a restraint of a king and prince within the meaning of the policies?

By the 10th rule in the first schedule to the Act it is provided that the term "arrest, &c., of kings and princes," refers to political or executive acts, and does not include a loss caused by riot or ordinary judicial process.

Well, the act of the Sovereign in making war and by his proclamation declaring it, and thus calling common law into operation, was clearly an executive act—an act of State done by virtue of the Royal prerogative. The declaration carries with it all the force of a law prohibiting intercourse with the enemy save with licence of the Sovereign. It has the executive forces of the Crown behind it to enforce obedience to it: (Esposito v. Bowden, 7 E. & B. 781).

Every subject must be taken to be aware that if he attempts to send or bring a ship and cargo to an enemy port, the ship can be prevented from entering that port by His Majesty's ships of war, and he himself be liable to be prosecuted for trading, or attempting to trade, with the enemy. If the possible infliction of those penalties deters him from making the attempt, is he not restrained from making it? And if not, must the restraint be physical either of the persons in possesion of the goods, or of the goods themselves, by the taking of the custody of them?

According to Lord Bramwell's judgment in Rodoconachi v. Elliott (sup.) this latter is not necessary. And Miller v. Law Accident Insurance Company (9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 386; 88 L. T. Rep. 370; (1903) 1 K. B. 712) is a direct authority that potential as distinguished from actual physical force is sufficient to constitute a "restraint."

The cases of Hadkinson v. Robinson (3 Bos. & P. 388) and Lubbock v. Rawcroft (7 Esp. 50) are distinguishable from the present. In each of these cases the only deterrent was the risk of ultimate capture if the ships proceeded to their destination. The vessels prudently resolved not to incur that risk. In the present case the deterrent were the penalties incurred by the violation of the criminal law. This was present and immediate, if the ship proceeded at all towards her destination with a view of trading with the enemy.

Actual capture was in these cases the peril insured against. The apprehension of capture is an entirely different thing and was not insured against. Well, it is clear that the war is of uncertain duration. Nobody could with any confidence conjecture when it would terminate A long delay appeared most probable before the voyage could be resumed.

On the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that the judgment appealed from was right, and that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Lord Shaw.—So completely do I agree with the judgment of Bailhache, J. that I desire respectfully to adopt in its entirety the opinion delivered by that learned judge. I think the law laid down by him so plainly sound, and his statements and reasoning so unanswerably cogent, that, seeing that I also approach and view the case from the same standpoint, I gladly feel free to indorse and adopt his judgment.

I think that the appeal should fail.

Lord Parmoor.—Two questions arise for decision in the present appeal. The first is, whether there has been a constructive total loss of the subject-matter insured. The second, whether the loss (if incurred) is proximately due to the restraints of kings, princes, and people, of what nation, condition, or quality soever, which is one of the perils insured against.

The facts are agreed. The respondents are a British firm of corn merchants. They contracted to sell to German merchants at Hamburg certain linseed and wheat, shipped in July 1914 on board the British steamship St. Andrew, at the ports of Rosario, St. Nicholas, and Buenos Ayres, to be carried to Hamburg. In the same month they contracted to sell to German merchants certain linseed, shipped at Rosario on the British steamship Orthia, to be carried to Hamburg. For the purpose of this case there is no distinction between the two shipments.

By a policy of marine insurance dated the 31st July 1914 the respondents insured the said linseed and wheat shipped on the St. Andrew at and from port or ports, of the River Plate, and (or) tributaries or Hamburg. On the 4th Aug. 1914 a declaration was made that a state of war existed between this country and Germany. The effect of the outbreak of war was to interdict and render illegal all trading with the enemy without the permission of the Sovereign. On the 5th Aug. a proclamation was issued warning all persons not to permit any British ship to leave for, enter, or communicate with any port or place in the German Empire without the permission of the Sovereign, and that any person acting in contravention of the proclamation would be liable to such penalties as the law allows. The penalty for trading with the enemy after the declaration of the 4th Aug. and the proclamation of the 5th Aug. would include the imprisonment of the master and the confiscation of goods and ship. On the 9th Aug, as the St. Andrew was approaching the Lizard, a French cruiser signalled her to stop and to go to Falmouth. The master at Falmouth received orders through the examining officer at Falmouth from the chief naval transport officer at Devonport to go to Liverpool, and upon arrival the linseed and wheat were duly discharged.

The policy, on which the claim is made, is in the common form of a Lloyd's policy, and the frustration of the contemplated adventure would constitute a total constructive loss of the goods insured in transit, unless an alteration of law has been introduced by the Marine Insurance Act 1906. A notice of abandonment of the goods insured was made on the 7th Sept. 1914, and the appellants do not raise any question that the notice was not valid or out of time.

On the first question I think that the Act of 1906 has not introduced any alteration in the law, and that there has been a total constructive loss of the goods insured. The Act of 1906 is an Act to codify the law relating to marine insurance. There is, however, no difference in the canons of construction applicable to a codifying Act or to any other Act of Parliament. It is said that in certain respects the Act of 1906 has altered the law. I give no opinion upon this point, and it has no relevance whatever to the question before your Lordships in this appeal.

By sect. 60 (1) a constructive total loss is defined: "Subject to any provisions in the policy, there is a constructive total loss where the subject-matter insured is reasonably abandoned on account of its actual loss appearing to be unavoidable or because it could not be preserved from actual total loss without an expenditure which would exceed its value when the expenditure has been incurred." If the subject-matter insured in the present case includes the contemplated adventure, it was no doubt reasonably abandoned on account of its actual loss appearing to be unavoidable, and a case of constructive total loss arises. Sect. 26 deals with subject-matter and sect. 26 (4) enacts that "In the application of the section regard should be had to any usage regulating the designation of the subject-matter insured."

When the Act was passed the common form Lloyd's policy of marine insurance on goods in transit from one port to another designated by usage that the contemplated adventure was part of the subject-matter, so that if the contemplated adventure was frustrated by a peril insured against, the insurers became liable to pay the insured the amount due under the policy. This position is not altered but preserved by sub-sect. 4. The usage of the law merchant that a policy in the present form did designate that the subject-matter included the contemplated adventure is applicable now in the same way as it was before the Act was passed.

In addition to the sections above referred to, reference may be made to sect. 91 (2), which provides that the rules of the common law, including the law of merchants, saving so far as they are inconsistent with the express provisions of the Act, shall continue to apply to contracts of marine insurance.

If there has been a constructive total loss, the second question arises whether the restraint of "kings, princes, &c.," was the proximate cause of such loss. The Marine Insurance Act 1906 contains in the schedule "rules for construction of policy," which apply, subject to the provisions of the Act, and where the context does not otherwise require. These rules are said to record the interpretation which by law or usage has been placed on some of the more important terms in a common Lloyd's policy. Rule 10 states that the term "arrests, &c., of kings, princes, and people" refers to political or executive acts, and does not include a loss caused by riot or by ordinary judicial process. It could not be suggested in the present case that the loss was caused by ordinary judicial process, and there is no question of riot.

The case of Finlay v. Liverpool and Great Western Steamship Company (23 L. T. Rep. 251) sufficiently illustrates what is meant by the words "ordinary judicial process." It was adjudged a bad plea by way of answer to a claim for not delivering goods in accordance with the bill of lading that the defendants were prevented by acts or restraints of princes "that they had been sued in New York by the true owner of the goods and had been ordered by a court of competent jurisdiction to give up the goods to him."

It was argued that "restraint," coming in a context between the words "arrest" and "detainment," implied that this term in the policy did not attach and render the insurers liable unless force was either used or threatened. A similar argument was urged in the case of Miller v. Law Accident Insurance Company (9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 386; 88 L. T. Rep. 370; (1903) 1 K. B. 712). In that case, in consequence of a decree of the President stopping the discharge of all cattle from the United Kingdom until further notice, the captain took the vessel outside the port and transhipped the cattle. It was held in the Court of Appeal that there had been a restraint of princes, and Stirling, L.J. says: "It seems to me that there was an active intervention of the Government of the Argentine Republic, which was none the less an exercise of superior force because no officer of the army or of the police force intervened."

I agree in the opinion expressed by Stirling, L.J. If the restraint in the present case has been imposed by political or executive acts, it is not the less a restraint, within the terms of the policy, because the master submits without opposition and without the presence of either actual or threatened force. I cannot doubt that the declaration of war on the 4th Aug. 1914, and the proclamation "relating to trading with the enemy" on the 5th Aug. 1914, are in the ordinary sense acts of the executive, or, in the words of the rule, executive acts. The declaration of war by the Sovereign has equal force to an Act of Parliament prohibiting intercourse with the enemy except with the King's licence: (Esposito v. Bowden, 7 E. & B., p. 781). The proclamation of the 5th Aug. stands on the same footing and has the same authority. It follows that all the conditions necessary to establish a restraint of kings, princes, &c., are operative in the present case, but the question has still to be determined whether the restraint was the proximate or immediate cause of the frustration of the contemplated adventure, and of the consequent constructive total loss.

After the declaration of war, and in accordance with the terms of the subsequent proclamation, all trading of British ships with the enemy was interdicted, and it became illegal to prosecute the voyage to Hamburg unless with the permission of the Sovereign. When, therefore, the French cruiser signalled the St. Andrew to go to Falmouth, the master could not have proceeded to Hamburg without rendering himself liable to all the consequent penalties. On receiving the signal the master submitted to the restraint which the conditions had imposed upon him, and took his vessel to a home port. He did not deviate from his course in order to avoid a future peril to which he might become liable, but because the peril was actually present and operative at the time when he turned his vessel from Hamburg to the home port.

I agree in the reasoning and conclusion of Bailhache, J., "when once it is admitted that force is not necessary to constitute restraint of princes it is clear that, when a shipowner keeps his vessel at home or directs her to a home port in obedience to such a declaration, he is not taking steps to avoid that particular peril, but is submitting to its operation, and that in such a case restraint of princes is a proximate cause of loss." I have not overlooked the case of Hadkinson v. Robinson (3 Bos. & P. 388), and similar cases, but they appear to me to have no application. There is a clear distinction between a deviation to avoid a peril and a deviation due to its presence and immediate operation.

In my opinion the decision on appeal is right, and the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

Lord WRENBURY.—There arise here two questions for decision. The first is whether His Majesty's declaration of war against Germany operated as a restraint falling within the words in the policy "restraints of all kings, princes, and people." The second is whether the consequent detention for an indefinite time of the goods insured amounted to a constructive total loss. The two questions are wholly distinct, and each is, no doubt, of great importance.

On the 4th Aug. 1914 His Majesty declared war against Germany. The insured goods were then at sea on voyages, the one from the River Plate and the other from Rosario, to be delivered at Hamburg. The one vessel, being off the Lizard, was signalled by a French cruiser to put to put into Falmouth, and obeyed. The other vessel, on calling at St. Vincent, was directed by her owner, at the suggestion of the Admiralty, to go to Glasgow, and did so. The order in each case was due to the existence of a state of war. The owners gave notice of abandonment. Was there "restraint of kings, princes, and people" within the meaning of the policy? In my opinion there was.

A declaration of war by the Sovereign is a political or executive act, done by virtue of his prerogative, which creates a state of war. A state of war is a lawful state, and is one in which every subject of His Majesty becomes an enemy of the nation against which war is declared. The declaration of war amounts to an order to every subject of the Crown to conduct himself in such way as he is bound to conduct himself in a state of war. It is an order to every militant subject to fight as he shall be directed, and an order to every civilian subject to cease to trade with the enemy. There is "a general rule in the maritime jurisprudence of this country by which all subjects trading with the public enemy, unless with the permission of the Sovereign, is forbidden": (The Hoop, 1 C. Rob. 198). A declaration of war imports a prohibition of commercial intercourse and correspondence with the inhabitants of the enemy's country, and such intercourse, except with the licence of the Crown, is illegal": (Esposito v. Bowden, 7 E. & B. 779). We have heard considerable argument to the effect that war is not unilateral—which, no doubt, is true—that you must have at least two nations engaged in hostilities, and so on. All this to my mind is beside the mark. Immediately the Royal prerogative is exercised and war is declared against another nation every subject of His Majesty is bound to regard every subject of that nation as an enemy, and the consequences ensue which I have mentioned.

If I ask myself what stopped the voyage to Hamburg? What made the adventure illegal? What destroyed the venture? The answer is—the declaration of war. That executive act ipso facto made the venture illegal. If the master had continued his voyage in defiance of the law the ship and goods could have been confiscated, and the master himself prosecuted and sent to prison. It is argued that the illegality, and not the declaration of war, was the causa proxima of the destruction of the adventure. This is not so. The common law was not a new actor which came into action when war was declared. The law was always one and the same, namely, that in one state of circumstances (namely, peace) the adventure was, and in another state of circumstances (namely, war) the adventure was not, legal. Hadkinson v. Robinson (3 Bos. & P. 388) and Kacianoff v. China Traders' Insurance Company (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 524; 111 L. T. Rep. 404; (1914) 3 K. B. 407; (1914) 3 K. B. 1121) are not in point. The adventure there remained legal. All that happened was that, in pursuit of a lawful adventure, the master did not go into a position of peril. He never was restrained. His own country did not restrain him, and he took care not to put himself in danger of being restrained by another country. Illegality according to the law of another country does not affect the merchant. In the present case the adventure was illegal according to the law of the country of the owner of the goods. And it was the declaration of war that made it illegal.

It is not necessary that force should be employed, or even that force should be immediately available for employment. Every State ultimately enforces obedience to its laws by force. Restraint is equally imposed when obedience is given by reason of the existence of force in reserve as when it is given by reason of force employed. Neither is it necessary that there should be any specific action upon the goods themselves. The master was restrained, and the adventure was restrained, by the fact that illegality supervened as the immediate result of the declaration of war. In my opinion there was in this case restraint falling within the words "restraint of kings, princes, and people."

Upon the second question the matter stands thus: Before the Marine Insurance Act 1906 authority is uniform that where goods are insured at or from one port to another port the insurance is not confined to an indemnity to be paid in case the goods are injured or destroyed, but extends to an indemnity to be paid in case the goods do not reach their destination. This may be variously described as an insurance of the venture, or an insurance of the voyage, or an insurance of the market, as distinguished from an insurance of the goods simply and solely. Goods delivered at the port of destination may be of value very different from their value at the port of loading. The underwriter's obligation is to pay money in the event of the goods failing to arrive at their destination uninjured by any of the perils insured against. Bramwell, B. in Rodoconachi v. Elliott (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 399; 31 L. T. Rep. 239; L. Rep. 9 C. P., at p. 522) says: "It is well established that there may be a loss of the goods by a loss of the voyage in which the goods are being transported if it amounts, in the words of Lord Ellenborough, 'to a destruction of the contemplated adventure.'" The insurance is on the venture, and the loss of the venture is a constructive total loss of the goods.

I cannot find that the Act of 1906 has in any way altered this. On the contrary, it seems to me to have preserved it. The Act is expressed by its title to be an Act to codify the law relating to marine insurance. Attention has been called to certain particulars in which nevertheless the Act alters the law. That is true. But it remains that the Act is a codifying Act. That being so, I should look more carefully in a codifying Act to see whether any existing law is altered by express words, and should not hold that the Act is going beyond codification unless it puts the matter beyond dispute.

I can find nothing which upon this matter has any such effect. On the contrary, sects. 5, 26, 60, and 91 seems to me plain the other way. Sect. 5 (2) contemplates that an assured "may benefit by the safety or due arrival of insurable property." Sect. 26 (4), which relates to subject-matter, enacts sub-sect. 1, that the subject-matter insured must be designated with reasonable certainty. "Designated" must here plainly mean described or identified. Sub-sect 4 then enacts that "in the application of this section regard shall be had to any usage regulating the designation of the subject-matter insured." By usage regulating the designation must be meant a customary nomenclature of identification. Such, for instance, as that in the trade of a livery-stable keeper the word "carriage" by usage means "carriage and horses." If then, in marine insurance, a policy on goods means by usage a policy on the safe arrival of goods, that meaning is by sect. 26 preserved. Sect. 60 is as to constructive total loss, and sub-sect. 2 (iii.) provides that in the case of damage to goods there is a constructive total loss when the cost of repairing the damage and forwarding the goods to their destination would exceed their value on arrival. Lastly, sect. 91 (2) enacts that the rules of the common law, including the law merchant, save in so far as they are inconsistent with the express provisions of this Act, shall continue to apply to contracts of marine insurance.

These provisions seem to me ample to support the conclusion at which I have arrived, that the Act of 1906 has not altered but has preserved the law upon this point as it stood before 1906, and that law was that under a policy on goods at and from a port to a port, the venture and not the goods merely was the subject-matter insured.

For the foregoing reasons the decision under appeal is, in my judgment, right on both points. It follows that this appeal should, in my opinion, be dismissed with costs.

(Before BAILHACHE, J.)

WULFSBERG AND CO. v. OWNERS OF STEAMSHIP WEARDALE. (a)

Charter-party — Withdrawal by owners before expiration of term—Subsequent issue of writ for hire due—Whether withdrawal waived.

A vessel was chartered in June 1914 for five months at so much per month, payable in advance. On the 13*th Aug., a month's hire being due and unpaid, the owners telegraphed to the charterers, saying that they withdrew the steamer pursuant to a clause in the charter-party. Half an hour later they issued a writ in an action to recover the month's hire. Arbitrators found as a fact that the ship was properly withdrawn, but they reserved for the opinion of the court the question whether the notice of withdrawal, if properly given, was withdrawn or waived by the subsequent conduct of the owners in issuing the writ.*

Held, that in the circumstances of the case the notice of withdrawal had been properly given, and that it had not been withdrawn by the subsequent conduct of the owners.

AWARD stated in the form of a special case.

By a time charter, dated the 19th May 1914, Messrs. Wulfsberg and Co. (hereinafter referred to as the charterers) chartered the steamship Weardale to be employed in, amongst other places, the Baltic, at the rate of 690*l.* per calendar month, for a period of about five months as from the 1st June 1914.

On the 3rd July the vessel was sub-chartered for a voyage to Archangel with a cargo of wood pulp, and on the 23rd July she sailed on this voyage, losing a propeller blade by the way.

On the 3rd Aug. loading was commenced.

On the 4th Aug. war broke out between the United Kingdom and Germany, the loading being stopped on that day by order of the harbour master.

On the 5th Aug. the owners wired to the master not to sail, but loading was resumed on the 6th Aug., and again stopped on the 8th Aug., on which day a month's hire in advance became due.

Loading was continued for a short time on the 10th Aug., stopped, resumed again on the 15th Aug., and, after various interruptions, was finally completed on the 26th Aug.

On the 27th Aug. the vessel sailed for home, and was injured in the North Sea, arriving in tow at Aberdeen in September, and at Hartlepool on the 30th Sept.

On the 13th Aug., the hire being still unpaid, the owners telegraphed to say that in consequence they withdrew the steamer under a power so enabling them in clause 5 of the charter-party. Half an hour after the telegram was received they issued a writ in an action to recover the month's hire, which was payable in advance.

On the 25th Aug. the charterers paid the hire claimed in the action.

Arbitrators, to whom questions in dispute were referred, found that the owners did in fact withdraw the steamer from the service of the charterers as from the date of the notice of the 13th Aug., and reserved for the opinion of the court the question whether the notice of withdrawal, if properly given on the 13th Aug., was withdrawn or waived by the subsequent conduct of the owners in issuing a writ.

The following findings of the arbitrators are material to this report:

We find as follows . . . (d) that the owners did in fact withdraw the steamer from the service of the charterers from the date of their said notice of the 13th Aug. 1914. (e) That the steamer completed her voyage from Archangel and West Hartlepool and delivered the sub-charterer's cargo at the last-named ports and the owners collected the freights thereon, and that while not admitting that they were liable to account to the charterers for the amount of the said freight, the owners have in fact accounted to the charterers for the same without prejudice to their rights and to the charter-party. (f) That the owners have not in issuing the said writ or by receiving payment of the hire money thereunder or by completing the said voyage and collecting the freight thereunder or by accounting for the said freight in the circumstances aforesaid to the charterers or otherwise waived or abandoned their notice of withdrawal of the said steamer.

By clause 26 of the award the arbitrators found as a fact that the solicitor's telegram of the 13th Aug., which reached the owners before the writ in the action was issued, was in fact a withdrawal of the steamer.

Leck, K.C. (R. A. Wright with him) for the owners read the special case and submitted that the owners were entitled to withdraw the vessel.

Roche, K.C. (Whitehead with him) for the charterers.—The withdrawal of the vessel has been waived by the subsequent conduct of the owners. Waiver is a question of law, not a question of fact. He referred to:

Clough v. London and North-Western Railway, 25 L. T. Rep. 708.

An election can be changed by agreement or abandoned and the abandonment acquiesced in:

Jones v. Carter, 15 M. and W. 718.

As a result of the writ the charterers paid the hire and the costs. It is true that there was hire due on the 13th Aug. unless the owners were wrong in withdrawing. Hire is not apportionable; but there was hire enough due to justify withdrawal. If the owners withdrew on the 13th Aug. the sum due up to the 8th Aug. ceased to be due. An owner must withdraw at once. If there was a withdrawal hire ceased to be due, because the owners ceased to give possession of the vessel which was the consideration for the hire. They got a month's hire and costs from the charterers by legal process. They cannot now turn round and merely bring that into account:

Croft v. Lumley, 857 L. Rep. 6; H. L. 672.

If a landlord takes rent and there is a dispute as to the terms upon which it is paid, it must be taken to have been paid on the payer's terms. If a party insists by process of law on the payment of something similar to rent, he is estopped from saying that it is not rent. Davenport v. The King (37 L. T. Rep. 727) shows that where money is received as rent no protest will avail the payee. He referred to

Langford v. Canadian Forwarding and Export Company, 96 L. T. Rep. 559;
Tyrer and Co. v. Hessler, 6 Com. Cas. 143.

Leck, K.C. in reply.—Waiver is always a question of fact. In Croft v. Lumley (sup.) the House of Lords came to the conclusion that there had been no breach of covenant, and therefore there could be no waiver. That is clear from the judgment of Lord Bramwell. The arbitrators have found as a fact that the steamer was withdrawn on the 13th Aug.

R. A. Wright followed.—The facts were fully gone into before the arbitrator, and they cannot be questioned.

Cur. adv. vult.

BAILHACHE, J.—This case comes before me upon an award stated by arbitrators in the form of a special case.

The dispute arises under a time-charter dated the 19th May 1914, and relates to the steamship Weardale. The question in the case is whether the steamer was rightly withdrawn by the owners from the time-charterers in the month of Aug. 1914.

That turns upon whether the notice of withdrawal to the charterers which the owners gave on the 13th Aug. 1914 was waived first of all by the fact that on the same day, but an hour or two after the time-charterers had received the notice, the owners issued a writ for a month's hire, and also by the subsequent conduct and action of the parties.

The facts appear shortly and quite sufficiently for my purpose from the case itself. It appears that the hire under this charter-party was payable monthly in advance, and that on the 8th Aug. 1914 there was a month's hire due. The steamer had been on hire to the time-charterers for some time, and on the 3rd July 1914 the claimants had sub-chartered the steamer to John Flemming and Co. Limited, of Aberdeen, for a voyage from Archangel to Aberdeen and West Hartlepool with a cargo of pulp wood and props. On the 23rd July 1914 the steamer sailed from Archangel for Aberdeen under the charter-party and sub-charter. On the 27th Aug. she sailed from Archangel for Aberdeen, and on the 4th Sept., while the vessel was in the North Sea on that voyage she struck some submerged obstacle and lost the three remaining blades of her propeller. She was taken in tow by H.M.S. Bellona, and arrived on the 5th Sept. at Lerwick, and was subsequently towed to Aberdeen, where she arrived at her discharging berth on Tuesday, the 15th Sept., and she ultimately arrived at West Hartlepool on the 30th Sept. Then the case proceeds: "In consequence of the nonpayment of the month's hire which became due on the 8th Aug. 1914, correspondence took place between the parties and their solicitors, and on the 13th Aug. 1914, the said hire being still unpaid, the owners' solicitors telegraphed to the charterers as follows: 'Instructed by owners of steamship Weardale to intimate that, in consequence of nonpayment of hire due under charter dated the 19th May 1914, they now withdraw the steamer under the power contained in clause 5 of the charter.'

"On the same day the owners issued a writ against the charterers claiming 690*l.* hire due under the time-charter dated the 19th May 1914, and then unpaid." That sum of 690*l.* was for the hire payable in advance. As I have said, it was ascertained in the course of the argument before me that this notice of the 13th Aug 1914 reached the charterers about an hour or so before the writ in action was issued. On the next day, the 14th Aug, the owners telegraphed to the British Consul at St. Petersburg: "Kindly wire British Consul, Archangel, asking him instruct master steamer Weardale as follows: Telegraph position fully immediately if loading not commenced sail Barry Roads forthwith if only partially loaded sail destination when finished and wire prospects completion ship withdrawn time-charter account non-payment hire." That telegram was received by the captain on the 19th Aug.

The substantial dispute before the arbitrators between the parties was whether the owners were entitled on the 13th Aug. to withdraw the steamer from the service of the charterers under clause 5 of the charter which they purported to do by their solicitors' telegram of that date; and whether if the owners were entitled to give such notice of withdrawal, the withdrawal was in fact made, and whether by the subsequent conduct of the parties it was withdrawn or waived.

On the 25th Aug. 1914 the charterers paid the hire claimed. Then the arbitrators say [his Lordship read the findings of the arbitrators as above set out, and continued:] There are some other findings which do not affect the matter as it was argued before me, and the question upon those findings is whether the arbitrators were right or wrong in holding that there was no waiver of the notice of withdrawal.

I have come to the conclusion that the arbitrators were right, and that there was no waiver of the withdrawal.

I come to the conclusion on two grounds: first of all, the arbitrators find as a fact (and that fact is binding upon me) that the solicitors' telegram of the 13th Aug. which reached the owners before the writ in the action was issued was in fact a withdrawal of the steamer. The subsequent conduct of the parties, apart from the issue of the writ, clearly, in my opinion, was no waiver at all. All those acts were done by agreement between the parties, and by that agreement it was arranged that those acts should be done without prejudice to the legal position, whatever that was. Those acts, therefore, do not affect the matter one way or the other. I have already said that one reason why I find there was no waiver was that the arbitrators found that the withdrawal was complete before the writ was issued. The reason is this: by the terms of the charter-party the hire was payable in advance, and there was, before the notice of withdrawal, one month's hire due and payable.

It seems to me that under those circumstances it was no waiver of the notice of withdrawal for the owners to issue their writ in respect of hire which had become due and payable before notice of withdrawal was given. Whether in that action they would have recovered more than the five or six days that were actually due I do not stop to inquire, because it is not necessary for me to express any opinion upon it. I have come to the conclusion for the two reasons I have given that the finding of the arbitrators is right, and that their award must be upheld.

The question which they put to me in par. 24 of their award must be answered in the affirmative. That question is: "Whether our findings of law stated in par. 26 hereof are correct?" I find that those findings are correct, and that the award must stand. The owners will have the costs of this argument before me, and of the proceedings subsequent to the award.

Award in favour of the owners.

Merchant Shipping—Seamen—Refusal to sail—Disobedience to lawful commands—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 225, sub-s. 1 (b).

The respondents were nine seamen who signed articles as members of the crew of a steamship.

The crew at the time of signing the articles consisted of sixteen members, but afterwards the owners transferred the second mate to another ship, and thus reduced the crew to fifteen.

On being formally requested by the master, the appellant, to go to sea the respondents refused, giving as the reason that there were not sufficient men to man the lifeboats or to keep a proper look-out.

On an information for wilful disobedience to lawful commands within the meaning of sect. 225 (1) (b) of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, the magistrate dismissed the information on the ground that the commands of the appellant were unreasonable, as the perils of the voyage were increased by the reduction of the crew.

Held, that as the magistrate had found as a fact that the commands of the appellant were unreasonable, the respondents were not guilty of wilful disobedience to a lawful command, and his decision must be affirmed.

Case stated by a metropolitan magistrate sitting at the Thames Police Court.

1. An information was preferred on the 3rd May 1915 by the appellant J. J. O'Reilly, as master of the steamship Starling, under sect. 225 (b) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, against the respondents, for that they being seamen lawfully engaged on the said steamship Starling were guilty of wilful disobedience to lawful commands. The information was dismissed by the magistrate.

2. The following facts were proved or admitted:

(a) On the 20th April 1915 the nine respondents had signed articles as members of the crew of the steamship Starling.

(b) At the time of signing the articles the crew consisted of sixteen members, but on the

(a) Reported by W. W. Orr, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

30th April 1915 the second mate was transferred to another ship by the owners and the crew were thereby reduced to fifteen.

(c) On the 1st May 1915 the appellant tried to get another hand, but could not do so, and he tried again on the morning of the 2nd May, but without success.

(d) In the ordinary course of events the Starling would have started to Holland at an early hour on the 2nd May, but on the morning of the 1st May and again at midnight the respondents through their spokesman refused to go on the voyage with one man short.

(e) On the afternoon of the 2nd May the respondents were formally requested to go to sea, but they refused to do so, saying, "We are only fifteen men instead of sixteen, and there are not sufficient men properly to man the lifeboats, and not sufficient to keep a proper look-out."

(f) At the time of the aforesaid refusal a voyage to Holland was perilous, and a full complement was more desirable than at ordinary times.

3. The magistrate dismissed the information, being of opinion that in the circumstances the respondents were not guilty of wilful disobedience to lawful commands within the meaning of sect. 225 (1) (b) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, and that the commands of the appellant were unreasonable in fact, because the perils of the voyage were increased by the crew being one man short.

By the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, s. 225, sub-s. 1, it is provided that:

> If a seaman lawfully engaged or an apprentice to the sea service commits any of the following offences, in this Act referred to as offences against discipline, he shall be liable to be punished summarily as follows (that is to say): . . . (b) If he is guilty of wilful disobedience to any lawful command, he shall be liable to imprisonment for a period not exceeding four weeks, and also, at the discretion of the court, to forfeit out of his wages a sum not exceeding two days pay. . . ."

Stuart Bevan for the appellant. — If the magistrate were right in dismissing the information on the ground that the commands of the appellant were unreasonable, there was still no evidence on which such a finding can be supported. On the other hand, assuming there was such evidence, the finding does not excuse the respondents for disobeying the appellant's commands. If it be urged for the respondents that each of the crew only signed on the implied term that he would perform the voyage if the others performed it, the articles do not bear that construction. If it were so the owner could not substitute another man for one who wished to be transferred to another ship. The only ground of justification for a seaman who has signed articles not performing his contract is, that something has happened which has rendered the voyage dangerous to life:

Hartley v. Ponsonby, 1857, 7 El. & Bl.; 26 L. J. 322, Q. B.;
Harris v. Carter, 1854, 3 El. & Bl. 559; 23 L. J. 295, Q. B.;

Listor v. Owners of Steamship Carpathian, ante, p. 70; 112 L. T. Rep. 994; (1915) 2 K. B. 42.

A decrease in the number of the crew will only justify a refusal to perform the contract if the number has been reduced so as to make the contemplated voyage dangerous for the rest.

D. O. Evans (with him Clement Edwards) for the respondents. — Whether the command was reasonable was a question of fact for the magistrate. To constitute an offence the disobedience must be wilful:

Caroe v. Bayless, 1908, 72 J. P. 525; 25 Times L. Rep. 22.

[He was stopped by the Court.]

Ridley, J.—This is a case stated on the hearing of an information against nine members of the crew of a steamship. The information was preferred under sect. 225 (1) (b) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, and it charged them with having been guilty of wilful disobedience to lawful commands. There were sixteen of a crew and two mates and a captain, and the second mate was transferred to another ship, and when the respondents were ordered to go to sea they said that there were only fifteen men instead of sixteen, and that there were not sufficient men properly to man the lifeboats and keep a proper look-out. In some cases it has been held that orders to go to sea were not lawful because the circumstances had altered or the voyage had been changed or the crew had had their strength or competence diminished. It may be doubtful in this case whether there had been a serious alteration in the terms on which the voyage was undertaken, but I am inclined to think that the absence of one of the mates was a more important matter than the absence of one of the ordinary members of the crew would have been. It was surely desirable that there should be two mates, as they have to take turns on watch. What we have to consider is whether it was so clearly wrong on the part of the magistrate to dismiss the summons that we ought to interfere. We are not in a position to say that he was wrong in the conclusion at which he arrived. The person objecting to his decision must show that it was wrong. The appeal must therefore be dismissed.

Avory, J.—I am of the same opinion. I only wish to make it clear that the court is not deciding that in all circumstances the members of a crew are justified in refusing to go to sea because the crew is one man short. In this case it must be taken that the magistrate has accepted the reason given by the respondents as being well founded, and has found that with only fifteen men there were not enough to man the lifeboats properly or to keep a proper look-out. Having come to this conclusion he was entitled to hold that in the circumstances the command was unreasonable, and if it was unreasonable on the ground that the ship was not seaworthy with a crew of fifteen only, the command was not lawful, and the men were not guilty of wilful disobedience to a lawful command.

Lush, J.—Before arriving at a conviction the magistrate must have been satisfied that there was wilful, i.e., intentional, disobedience to a lawful command. The magistrate has not in terms found that the command was not lawful, but he has found that it was not reasonable, and he has given his reason—namely, that the men had signed on at a time when there were sixteen hands, but the number had subsequently been reduced to fifteen. If the objection of the men had been capricious there would have been a lawful command and intentional disobedience, but the magistrate has said that the refusal of the men was justified because the command was unreasonable. I do not see how we can interfere with his decision.

Appeal dismissed.

Charter-party—Exception of "restraint of princes" — Reasonable anticipation of restraint — Breach by shipowner—Liability—Measure of damages.

A breach of contract is not excused by reasonable anticipation of the happening of an event which, if it happens, will excuse the performance of the contract.

A charter-party excepted "arrests and restraints of princes." The shipowners refused to provide a ship which by the charter-party they had agreed to provide on the ground that there was reasonable apprehension that if they fulfilled the charter the ship would be seized by the King's enemies.

Held, that the shipowners were guilty of a breach of the charter-party.

The plaintiffs chartered a vessel from the defendants to enable them to fulfil a contract by which they agreed to buy a cargo of sulphate of ammonia from a Belgian firm. The defendants having failed to perform the charter, the plaintiffs were forced to repudiate the contract of sale and purchase, and as a result of arbitration paid the Belgian firm 4500l. In an action by the plaintiffs against the defendants for damages for breach of the charter:

Held, that the plaintiffs could not recover from the defendants the 4500l., such damage being too remote.

The estimated profit of a venture, to carry out which the plaintiffs chartered the defendants' vessel, was 3800l. The defendants failed to provide their vessel in breach of the charter-party. In an action by the plaintiffs against the defendants for damages for the breach the defendants contended that, assuming there had been a breach, the plaintiffs had suffered no loss thereby, since, if the defendants had performed their part of the charter and provided a vessel, the vessel with the plaintiffs' cargo on board would inevitably have fallen into the hands of the King's enemies.

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the 3800l. from the defendants, since, although the arguments of the defendants might have been true, the vessel and its cargo would have been insured by the plaintiffs for a sum sufficient to cover the cost of the goods, the freight, the cost of insurance, and a reasonable sum for profit (which would not have been less than 3800l.), and that they would have had a claim on their underwriters as for a total loss.

(a) Reported by L. C. THOMAS Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ACTION.

By a contract dated the 23rd April 1914 between the sellers, Evence Coppée and Co., of Brussels, and the buyers, Mitsui and Co., of Lime-street, in the City of London, the sellers, sold to the buyers 3500 tons of Russian sulphate of ammonia. The ammonia was to be delivered in bulk by the sellers free on board at Mariupol at the rate of 125 tons (minimum) per hatchway, with a maximum of 500 tons per weather working day, Sundays and holidays excepted. It was provided that any dispute or difference whatsoever at any time arising under the contract should be referred to arbitration.

By a charter-party dated the 5th June, 1914, between Watts, Watts, and Co. as owners and Mitsui and Co. as charterers, it was agreed that a steamer, whose name was to be declared at least twenty one days before expected date of readiness, should with all possible despatch proceed to Mariupol and there load, always afloat, a full and complete cargo of the 3500 tons of sulphate of ammonia in bulk specified in the contract of sale, and being so loaded should therewith proceed to Japan and there deliver the same. Freight at the rate of 20*s.* per ton delivered. The cargo to be loaded at rate of 125 tons per hatch, but not exceeding in all 500 tons per weather working day, Sundays and holidays excepted. Loading time not to commence before the 1st Sept. except by consent of the charterers, who had also the option of cancelling the charter if the steamer was not ready to receive cargo before noon on the 20th Sept. 1914.

"Arrests and restraints of princes" were included in the exception clause, and it was provided that the penalty for non-performance of the agreement should be proved damages not exceeding the estimated amount of freight.

Early in Aug. 1914 war was declared by Germany and Austria on the one hand and Great Britain, France, and Russia on the other. On the 1st Sept. the plaintiffs wrote asking the defendants to declare a steamship to load under the charterparty, as they had not done so. The defendants declined to comply with this request, giving as their excuse the prevailing state of war. The plaintiffs attempted to recharter, but were unsuccessful. There was some suggestion of a possible steamer at 60*s.* a ton, and had the plaintiffs secured the vessel at that price their loss would have been 7000*l.* The plaintiffs thereupon repudiated their contract with the sellers and paid them, as the result of arbitration proceedings, 4500*l.* The plaintiffs then commenced this action claiming damages. They alleged:

1. By a charter-party, dated the 5th June 1914, between the plaintiffs as charterers and the defendants as owners or deponents, the defendants agreed that a steamer to be named twenty-one days before expected date of readiness should with all possible despatch proceed to Mariupol and there load a full and complete cargo of sulphate of ammonia, not more than 3500 tons nor less than 3500 tons, and so loaded proceed viâ Suez Canal to one port south side Middle Islands or South Island, Japan, and deliver the same on being paid freight at the rate of 20*s.* per ton. Loading time was not to commence before the 1st Sept. 1914, and the plaintiffs were to have the option of cancelling if steamer should not be ready to load before the 20th Sept. 1914.

2. The defendants have wholly failed to perform the said charter-party. By letter dated the 3rd Sept. 1914 the plaintiffs gave notice that they would hold the defendants liable for the loss resulting from their repudiation of the contract.

3. As the defendants knew at the date of the said contract, the plaintiffs made the said charter for the purpose of taking delivery of a cargo of sulphate of ammonia purchased by them, under a contract in writing dated the 23rd April 1914, from Evence Coppée et Cie., by reason of the defendants' said breach of contract the plaintiffs failed to take up the said sulphate of ammonia and have reasonably compromised the consequent claim against them by the said sellers by paying 4500*l.* and 30*l.* for costs. The plaintiffs have also lost the enhanced value (or profit) on the said goods had they been delivered at Japan in accordance with the said charter-party, and have incurred legal charges in connection with the claim of the said Evence Coppée amounting to 97*l.* 11*s.* 2*d.*

The defendants by their defence said:

1. The said charter-party is admitted and referred to for its terms, which included an exception of arrests and restraints of princes, rulers, and people.

2. The defendants admit that they did not send a vessel to load at Mariupol under the said charter-party, but say that, owing to piratical seizures of cargoes by the Turkish Government and reasonable apprehension of Turkey becoming involved in the European war and of the Dardanelles being thereupon closed, they were justified, by reason of the exception of arrests and restraints of princes, in not sending a vessel to load.

3. None of the allegations in par. 3 of the points of claim is admitted. In any event the defendants will contend that the damages therein specified are too remote and are not recoverable from the defendants.

4. The defendants will further, if necessary, rely upon clause 13 of the said charter-party and will contend that the damages (if any) recoverable by the plaintiffs are limited to the estimated amount of freight.

Leslie Scott, K.C. and R. A. Wright for the plaintiffs.

Leck, K.C. and Raeburn for the defendants.

The arguments appear sufficiently in the judgment.

Feb. 1.—BAILHACHE, J. read the following judgment:—This is an action by charterers against shipowners for damages for breach of a charter-party dated the 5th June 1914.

By this charter-party the defendants were to provide a steamer (name to be declared at least twenty-one days before expected date of readiness) to proceed to Mariupol, a port in the Sea of Azov, and there load a cargo of 3500 tons of sulphate of ammonia and to carry the cargo to Japan. The cargo was to be loaded at the average rate of 500 tons per weather working day, Sundays and holidays excepted, loading time not to commence before the 1st Sept., and the cancelling date was noon on the 20th Sept. 1914. The exceptions clause included restraints of princes, and clause 13 ran: "Penalty for non-performance of this agreement proved damages not exceeding the estimated amount of freight." The freight was 20*s.* per ton.

The plaintiffs had bought the sulphate of ammonia under a contract dated the 23rd April 1914, and under the sale contract the sellers were to deliver f.o.b. a maximum quantity of 500 tons per weather working day, Sundays and holidays excepted. As the defendants had not declared a steamship to load under the charter-party, the plaintiffs wrote asking for the name of the steamship on the 1st Sept. 1914. The defendants replied on the same day declining to name any steamship, and giving as a reason that the British Government had prohibited steamers going to the Black Sea to load. The Government had, in fact, issued no such prohibition. The plaintiffs accepted the defendants' refusal as a repudiation of the charter-party and such refusal is the breach complained of.

It appears that the defendants had at one time intended to perform the charter-party by their steamship Henley, and she was at the end of August discharging a cargo at Garston. She is a slow boat, making eight knots in ballast and seven and a half knots loaded. The Dardanelles were closed by the Turks on the 26th or 27th Sept. 1914, and have remained closed ever since.

The defendants, in answer to the claim for damages, make three points. First, no breach; second, no damage; third, if damage, their liability limited to estimated amount of freight. This last point was not argued before me, as I had already decided in another case that a clause in the same form as clause 13 of the charter-party is a penalty clause and not a limitation of liability clause; but the point was taken to keep it open to the defendants in the event of my deciding the other points against them, and it is sufficient to say that as to this third point I adhere to my former opinion.

Turning now to the other points, the defendants contend there was no breach of charter-party by them upon the grounds set out in paragraph 2 of their points of defence, except that they did not rely upon the allegation of piratical seizure of cargoes by the Turkish Government. The paragraph reads thus:

> The defendants admit that they did not send a vessel to load at Mariupol under the said charter-party, but say that, owing to piratical seizures of cargoes by the Turkish Government, and reasonable apprehension of Turkey becoming involved in the European war, and of the Dardanelles being thereupon closed, they were justified, by reason of the exception of arrests and restraints of princes, in not sending a vessel to load.

No authority was cited to me in support of the defendants' proposition that a breach of contract is excused by reasonable anticipation of the happening of an event which, if it happens, will excuse the performance of the contract, and, in my opinion, such a proposition will not bear examination. The closing of the Dardanelles was too late for the defendants, whether one treats their refusal to send the Henley as a repudiation of this contract accepted by the plaintiffs, or whether one regards the contract as still open down to Sept. 20. The defendants were entirely without excuse, and the breach alleged is proved.

The defendants' next point, and the only one now left to be dealt with, is that the breach caused no damage. What in fact happened was that the plaintiffs, through their brokers, tried the market with a view to chartering against the defendants. No tonnage was available. There was some suggestion of a possible steamer at 60*s.* a ton, but nothing came of this, and after the 26th Sept. chartering for Mariupol was hopeless. Had the plaintiffs secured a boat at 60*s.* a ton, their loss would have been 7000*l.* As they failed to recharter, the plaintiffs, in their turn, repudiated their contract with their sellers, and paid them, as the result of arbitration proceedings, 4500*l.* for so doing. The plaintiffs satisfied me that if they could have got the sulphate of ammonia to Japan they would have sold it on the market there at a profit to themselves of some 3800*l.*

The plaintiffs say the normal measure of damages against a shipowner who fails to load a cargo is the extra cost of chartering against him, and, where that is impossible, the cost of replacing the goods at their destination at about their own date of arrival, less the value of the goods at their loading port and the cost of transport, including insurance, and they say the price they would have got for the goods in Japan, selling them in the market, is a fair criterion of the price they would have had to pay to replace them—or, putting the matter in a rather different form, is the fair criterion of the value of the goods to them in Japan. I agree that this measure of damage, whichever way it is expressed, is a sound alternative to the extra cost of rechartering, and is, I think, well within the reasoning, and indeed the decision, of the House of Lords in Ströms Bruks Aktie Bolag v. Hutchison (93 L. T. Rep. 562; (1905) A. C. 515).

The plaintiffs further say as they did not and could not charter against the defendants, and as the extra cost of so doing, had it been possible, would have been 7000*l.*, they are entitled to all the damages they actually suffered up to that sum, even though some of the damages may be in law too remote, and they seek to add to the sum of 3800*l.* the 4000*l.* they paid their sellers as damages for their breach of contract, but admit that they cannot recover more than 7000*l.* in respect of those two amounts. The point tempts one to discussion, but as I have by no means done with the case I refrain and content myself with saying I cannot accept it. The damages the plaintiffs paid for breaking their contract with their sellers were and must remain too remote.

The plaintiffs' claim for damages is thus reduced to 3800*l.* The defendants do not object to this claim as being in theory the wrong measure of damages, nor do they challenge its accuracy in amount, but they say those damages do not in this particular case flow from their breach of contract. They say if they had performed their contract to the letter the plaintiffs would be no better off. They put their case in this way: The defendants would have performed their contract by having the Henley at Mariupol on the 20th Sept. The cargo was 3500 tons to be loaded at 500 tons per weather working day (Sundays and holidays expected). Assuming fine weather, that gave her at least eight days for loading. For a boat of the Henley's speed, it is from four to five days' sail from Mariupol to the Dardanelles. The Henley would, therefore, without any breach of contract, have arrived at the Dardanelles on, say, the 2nd Oct., only to find that the Dardanelles had been shut for a week, and the only result of sending the Henley to Mariupol would have been that the Henley, with the plaintiffs' cargo on board, would still be in the Black Sea, if not at the bottom of it.

It was suggested by the plaintiffs that the matter must be considered from the point of view of the Henley's position when the defendants repudiated the charter-party and that if she would have been at Mariupol before the 20th Sept. calculations as to time must be based upon such earlier date. I am satisfied, however, that the Henley, even if sent straight from Garston, would not have done more than keep her cancelling date. I am prepared to assume in the plaintiffs' favour that there might possibly have been by a judicious expenditure of money some acceleration of the loading time, but I cannot bring myself to believe that had the Henley arrived and begun to load at Mariupol by noon on the 20th Sept. she could have got down to the Dardanelles in time to get through.

The suggestion of acceleration by "backsheesh" is indeed irrelevant, when the question is, as here, what would have been the position if the defendants had fulfilled their contract to the letter. Nor, I think, can the plaintiffs say that if longer notice of refusal to send the Henley had been given they could have secured an earlier boat. The defendants were only bound to declare their steamship twenty-one days before the 20th Sept. Their refusal was on the 1st Sept., and I am satisfied that had it been on the 29th or 30th Aug. the plaintiffs' position would have been no better. It must further be borne in mind that if the defendants had kept the Henley's cancelling date and taken the cargo on board, her failure to reach the Dardanelles on her outward voyage to Japan, before the passage was closed, would have been no breach of contract, as the charter-party contains the usual exceptions of restraint of princes.

If one pauses at this point, it looks as though the defendants had made out their answer, and as if the damages suffered by the plaintiffs did not flow from the defendants' breach of contract, but from the closing of the Dardanelles, an event for which the defendants are in no way responsible. In arriving at this interim conclusion, I have not forgotten that the burden of proving that this breach caused no damage lies upon the defendants, who must prove it, not as a matter of possibility or even of probability, but as a practical certainty. The plaintiffs say, however, that the matter does not stop here. They contend that the damages ought to be assessed at the date of the breach, without regard to subsequent events.

I see great difficulties in accepting this proposition in a case of this kind. It seems to me that when the plaintiffs ask for substantial, as opposed to nominal, damages they must show that the damages they claim did in fact result from the defendants' breach of contract, and that if before those damages are ascertained, in some process of litigation, it can be shown that they did not so result, the defendants are entitled so to do. The plaintiffs make one last point, and say that if subsequent circumstances are to be taken into account all the circumstances must be looked at, and that insurance has been so far forgotten. They point out that, even assuming their cargo would still be on the wrong side of the Dardanelles, it would be there in the defendants' steamship, and would be covered by insurance, that the closing of the Dardanelles for so long a period would have operated to defeat the adventure, and that they would have had a claim, on their underwriters, as for a total loss. See the recent case of British and Foreign Marine Insurance Company v. Sanday (ante, p. 289; 114

L. T. Rep. 521; (1916) A. C. 650) in the House of Lords.

The plaintiffs proved that the venture was insurable, and I am satisfied that it would have been insured for a sum sufficient to cover the cost of the goods, the freight, the cost of insurance, and a reasonable sum for profit. The plaintiffs would have taken and paid for the goods if the Henley had duly arrived at Mariupol, and would have recovered in full under their policy, less, of course, the freight.

I am further satisfied that the profit insured would not have been less than 3800*l*. The value of the cargo was somewhere about 40,000*l*. This right of recovery under their insurance policy they have lost by the defendants' failure to provide a steamship to load the cargo, nor can this loss, in my opinion, be said to be too remote. Insurance is now a universal accompaniment and an important part of every trading venture involving carriage by sea.

The plaintiffs have not paid for the goods, nor have they paid freight or insurance, and I shall therefore put them in the same position as if the Henley had arrived in due course if I give them 3800*l*. This is just what the courts endeavour to do when awarding damages in a commercial case to a person whose contract has been broken without excuse.

I may add that I should have been prepared to go further if the plaintiffs had taken the goods and paid for them. I should have favourably considered a claim for storage charges and loss of interest.

As this has not been done, my judgment is for the plaintiffs for 3800*l*., with costs.

THE PONTOPOROS. (a)

Neutral ship—Capture by belligerent—Recapture by other belligerent—Salvage—Right to claim same—Rule as to salvage on recapture of neutral ship—Exception to rule—Conduct and character of captor—Right to destroy—Promise to release—Bona fides—German naval code.

Although it is a general rule of the law of nations that no salvage is due for the recapture of neutral ships, there is an exception to this rule, that is, salvage is payable if the ship when recaptured was practically liable to be confiscated or destroyed by the enemy captor, whether rightfully or wrongfully.

The P., a neutral ship laden with coal which was the property of British subjects, was captured by a German cruiser shortly after the outbreak of war in 1914. A large quantity of the coal was taken by the cruiser, the crew of the P. were made prisoners, a German prize crew was put on board, threats were made to destroy the P. by the Germans, and the ship was compelled to accompany the German cruiser wherever required. About five weeks after the date of the capture the P. was recaptured by a British cruiser, and a claim was put in for salvage remuneration by the captain, officers, and crew of the British cruiser. The shipowners resisted the claim on the ground that the P. had never been in presumptive peril.

Held, that, having regard to the fact that the commander of the German warship was "entitled" under German law to destroy the captured vessel and the likelihood that he would have done so, the opinion of the court was that the recapture of the ship both saved the ship from condemnation if brought before a Prize Court and from almost certain risk of destruction on the high seas if she was not.

Held, consequently, that restitution to her Greek owners on recapture should have been upon payment of reasonable salvage. Award 7333*l*., or one-sixth of the value of the salved property.

THIS was a claim made by Captain Henry Lake Cochrane, of H.M.S. Yarmouth, and the officers and crew of the said ship, for salvage remuneration in connection with the recapture of the Greek steamship Pontoporos, after she had been captured by the German cruiser Emden. The case was contested as an ordinary Admiralty action, but, by the direction of the President, it was treated as a matter of prize. The full details as to the voyage of the Pontoporos are set out in the judgment of the President. On behalf of the plaintiff it was contended that, by reason of the salvage and recapture of the vessel, the Pontoporos had been rescued from total loss to her owners. On behalf of the shipowners it was contended that, in accordance with the terms of a promise made by the captain of the Emden, the Pontoporos was never in danger of destruction, but would have been released as soon as all the coal required by the German cruiser had been taken out of her.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 3.—The PRESIDENT.—This is a claim for prize salvage on the recapture of a neutral ship from an enemy captor. The claim is made by the captain and the crew of H.M.S. Yarmouth, and it is made with the approval of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty. The ship which was recaptured was the Pontoporos, a steamship, registered at the port of Andros, in the kingdom of Greece, and the property of a Greek company. The value of the ship is 44,000*l.* This is the first case in which proceedings for prize salvage have been taken during the present war. The claim is made only against the owners of the vessel, and not against the owners of the cargo.

By the law of nations it is a general rule that no salvage is due for the recapture of neutral ships. This rule is founded on the principle that the liberation of a bonâ fide neutral from the hands of the enemy is no beneficial service to the neutral, inasmuch as the same enemy would be compelled by the tribunals of his own country to make restitution of the property thus unlawfully seized. (See Wheaton's International Law, Dana's edition, par. 364.) To this general rule, however, there is an important exception, which has been in force for more than a century, in the case of a ship recaptured when that ship was practically liable to be confiscated by the enemy, whether rightfully or wrongfully. Lord Stowell explains the foundation of the rule and the ground of the exception in his judgment in the case of the Sansom (6 Ch. Rob. 410), where he says: "The general practice of this court is not to decree salvage on neutral ships recaptured, upon the presumption that no peril had been incurred, but that, on being carried into the courts of the original captor, they would have been restored. This is a presumption which is to be entertained in favour of every State, which has not sullied its character by a gross violation of the law of nations. But the contrary presumption takes place if States hold out decrees of condemnation, however unjust, and decrees on which the tribunals of the country are enjoined to act and of which there is every reason to suppose that they will be carried into execution. The reasoning on which the general rule has been founded is then done away with; the peril is obvious, and the case becomes simply that of meritorious rescue from the danger of condemnation." This exception has been stated by Lord Stowell in earlier cases, and has been generally recognised since that time: (see Wheaton, par. 366, and Wildman's International Law, vol. 2, 286).

It appears to me that other circumstances may be conceived as creating other exceptions to the general rule. I only state this lest it might be supposed that the court would only have regard to the exception above mentioned. But this latter is the only one which need be considered in the present case.

Does the general rule, or the exceptional rule, apply to the facts of this recapture? The recaptured ship started from Calcutta on the 5th Sept. 1914 on a voyage to Karachi, laden with about 6000 tons of coal, consigned by British merchants at Calcutta to British merchants at Karachi. On the morning of the 10th Sept. the Pontoporos was captured by the German cruiser Emden in the Bay of Bengal. A German prize crew was put on board. An entry recording the search and capture was made in the logbook by the prize officer. It reads as follows:

Sept. 10, 1914, 2.30 a.m., Gulf of Bengal, 10′ 22″ N. lat., 84° east long.—The Greek steamer Pontoporos has been seized by order of the commander of the German cruiser S.M.S. Emden, because in accordance with her charter-party she was to convey contraband of war (coal) for the British Empire from Calcutta to Bombay or Karachi. No manifest or (indecipherable word) were found on board. The captain was aware of the war between Germany and England. The captain offered no objection to seizure and search.—F. LAUTERBACH, 1st Lieutenant, Prize Officer, S.M.S. Emden.

After some conversation with the captain, the prize officer proceeded to placard in various places in the ship a notice in German, English, and French.

The English and the French versions were as follows:

Notice.—During the occupation of this ship by a detachment from a German man-of-war, the ship's crew and passengers are subject to German martial law. Whosoever forwards the interests of Germany's enemies or harms the German navy during the occupation incurs death. During this time every offence and every neglect of orders and directions issued on this ship will be punished according to the penal law of the German Empire. Moreover, every hostile movement or even the attempt of such an action by any of the crew or passengers may have the most serious consequences for the whole ship, crew and passengers. All arms and ammunition must be handed over immediately. Whosoever will be found to be in possession of arms or ammunition in the course of half-an-hour will be arrested and punished according to the law. Everybody of the ship's crew is obliged to attend to his usual work until he is dismissed or expressly released therefrom.

Avis.—Pendant l'occupation de ce navire par un détachement d'un vaisseau de guerre allemand l'équipage et les voyageurs sont soumis aux lois martiales allemandes. Celui qui pendant cette occupation favorise les ennemies d'allemagne ou qui fait dommage aux forces navales allemandes a à attendre la peine de mort. Toute action punisable et chaque contravention aux ordres et décrets émis à bord de ce temps sera punie selon les lois pénales de l'Empire allemand. En outre une action hostile ou l'essai de la commettre pourrait avoir les conséquences les plus graves pour le vaisseau, son équipage et les voyageurs. Les armes et la munition doivent être délivrées sur le champ. Celui qui aura encore une arme ou de la munition après une demi-heure, sera arresté et puni selon la loi. Chacun de l'équipage doit remplir ses fonctions jusqu'à sa démission ou jusqu'à ce qu'il soit acquitté exprès.

It is as well to give the account of these and of subsequent events in the words of the captain of the Pontoporos himself. On the 3rd Dec. 1914 he wrote from Singapore to his owners as follows:

Dear Sirs,—As you are doubtless aware, five days after our departure from Calcutta, and on the 10th Sept., 2.30 a.m., we were seized by the German warship Emden, lat. 10.25 N. and long. almost 84 E. As soon as the Germans came on board, about twenty-five to thirty of them, that is two officers, one engineer, and the others sailors, all fully armed with Mannlicher fusils and revolvers, carrying in the same time five or six cases of cartridges and different explosives, and after they took and examined all the documents on board, declared to us that the cargo belonging to British merchants, and in view of the state of war existing between Germany and England, same is considered as contraband of war, and consequently it will be seized and be used by the warship. I have protested repeatedly to them saying that the steamer belongs to a neutral nationality and that she was fixed before the declaration of war, &c., but to no avail. Seeing after all that any further resistance on my part would be fruitless and very probably dangerous, I was obliged to yield. They proposed, whether I agreed to stay on board our steamer with the crew and continue to perform the usual work on the steamer well, otherwise they (the Germans) would be obliged to remove us on board the warship and bring on board our steamer their own crew, and finally, when they would have taken all that they need out of the cargo of the steamer, they would sink her necessarily, having no port where to bring her for safety, and consequently save her from the necessary sinking. I have considered it my duty therefore, and in accordance with my crew accepted to stay on board our steamer until her release and salvage. Their first steps after our acceptance was to declare the German martial law, which they placarded in the steamer, to take all the steamer's documents generally, weapons, and money, which amounted to 50*l*. When I told them it was my own money they returned same to me. German officers armed have taken command of the ship afterwards, and a detachment of fifteen to twenty armed men have been settled on the lower bridge, and who guarded the steamer alternatively, especially the engine and boiler rooms, up to the end of our capture. We followed the warship up to the 16th of the same month, and in the meantime she had sunk many British steamers, and in the morning of the 16th she came alongside and bunkered out of our cargo 500-600 tons, and then she left us. The Germans on board our steamer conducted her towards the island of Simolo, where, apparently, the warship would have come later. We stayed there under steam up to the 6th Oct., when the German cargo boat Markomannia came, in order to take as much as she could from our cargo up to the 13th same month, when she would have released us, as, as we understood, the warship met an English steamer laden with Welsh coal, and which she captured in preference, and kept her in order to bunker from her. I cannot describe how I suffered all this time through oppression, sorrow, famine, brutal treatment of the Germans, and the daily rioting among the crew for food, as the provisions which the Germans had in their possession had been nearly exhausted, and all the time I was fearing that the crew, exasperated, would by force try to take a little food. This terrible state of affairs lasted up to the 12th Oct., the eve of our release from the Germans, when suddenly appeared the British warship Yarmouth, which, after she had sunk the Markomannia, took us to Penang, and thence to Singapore. This is all about our capture by the Emden.

As to what happened on and after the approach of H.M.S. Yarmouth, the following facts were admitted by the defendants in their pleadings:

At about 6.10 a.m. on the 12th Oct. 1914 those on board His Majesty's ship Yarmouth, being in about lat. 2 53½ N. and long. 96 6 E., while patrolling the north coast of Sumatra, sighted the Pontoporos, lashed alongside the German steamship Markomannia. The Yarmouth at once bore down upon the vessel, and it was seen that the Markomannia, which vessel was acting as supply ship to the German cruiser Emden, was taking in coal from the Pontoporos. As the Yarmouth approached the Markomannia cast off and attempted to escape to territorial waters, but was stopped by a shot fired across her bows by His Majesty's ship Yarmouth. At 7.5 a.m. the Markomannia was boarded, and after her officers and crew had been removed she was sunk. Meanwhile officers from His Majesty's ship Yarmouth proceeded on board the Pontoporos, where they found a prize crew consisting of Sub-Lieutenant Mayer, Imperial German Navy, Sub-Engineer Freund, Imperial German Navy, together with nine German seamen and three German stokers, all belonging to the German cruiser Emden, as well as an officer belonging to the Markomannia. The aforenamed German officers and crew were thereupon made prisoners of war and sent on board His Majesty's ship Yarmouth. The Pontoporos was searched, and her master, who had for some time been a prisoner in his berth, but had afterwards been released by the German prize crew, was interviewed by Captain Cochrane, who was informed that the Pontoporos at the time of her capture was on a voyage from Calcutta to Bombay or Karachi laden with coal, that the vessel had been captured by the Emden on the 10th Sept. off the coast of Ceylon, that after the capture of the Pontoporos by the Emden the prize crew had not only confined the captain to his cabin as aforesaid, but threatened the Greek crew with revolvers when work was required of them.

It will be observed that from her capture on the 10th Sept. the Pontoporos was kept in attendance upon the Emden or her supply ship, the Markomannia, until the 12th Oct., a period of nearly five weeks. During a part of this time, for ten or twelve days or more, the captain had been imprisoned or confined in his cabin, according to his statement to Lieutenant Edelston. He and his crew had been in turn threatened, bribed, or cajoled into working according to the orders of the prize crew.

On the 12th Oct., when sighted by H.M.S. Yarmouth, the Pontoporos was lashed alongside the Emden's supply ship Markomannia, to which some of the cargo of coal was being transhipped.

On the approach of the Yarmouth the German officer threw overboard cyphers, confidential documents, and their own and their crew's arms. The German prize crew were transferred to H.M.S. Yarmouth. The Yarmouth remained in the vicinity, anticipating the arrival of the Emden, until about 6 p.m. on the 12th Oct. She then put to sea with the Pontoporos. On the 14th Oct., as the orders of the Yarmouth necessitated her proceeding at a greater speed than the Pontoporos was capable of, the Pontoporos was transferred to the charge of the French cruiser D'Iberville for conveyance to Penang, the vessels being then in lat. 5 30 N. and long. 100 E. (approximately). The Pontoporos was subsequently brought safely into port and restored to her owners.

Upon these facts the defendants contended that the proper conclusions were:

1. That the Emden would have released the Pontoporos on or about the 13th Oct., and that she was therefore in no presumptive peril.

2. That if the vessel had been taken before a German Prize Court she would not have been condemned.

3. That if she was not taken to such a court she would not have been sunk, or appropriated by the German cruiser.

The consequential contention was that she should be restored to the owners without payment of salvage.

On the 12th Oct. (the day before the master of the vessel was said to have expected a release) she had been a captured vessel in charge of a prize crew for over a month. She had thus lost in freight a very substantial sum. She had between 4000 and 5000 tons of coal still on board, consigned to British merchants. If a promise to release was made, it was for some ulterior purpose of quieting the crew, or compelling them to work for the German cruiser and the supply ship. The court declines to believe that any such promise was honestly made, or was intended to be kept. There had already been threats to sink the ship; and if it had suited those in charge of the German cruiser, after taking away all the cargo, and after making any further use they wished of the vessel and her crew, the ship would have been sunk.

As to the rest, the German cruiser never intended to take or to send the neutral ship to a German Prize Court for a judicial determination as to whether she ought to be condemned. If otherwise, by some remote fortuity, her case had ever come to be adjudicated upon before such a court, enough has come to the knowledge of this court from the cases cited in argument, and from other cases, to satisfy the court that the chances of her owners of obtaining restitution would be as nothing. The "presumption which is to be entertained in favour of every State which has not sullied its character by gross violations of the law of nations"—to quote the words of Lord Stowell in the judgment of The Sansom (ubi sup.) to which I have referred—can no longer be expected to avail the State of the original captors.

If the vessel would not have been taken before any Prize Court in Germany, or belonging to the German Empire, what, then, would have happened? This is more than indicated by art. 113 of the German Prize Code. It has been noted that on the capture the cause given was that the neutral vessel was carrying contraband. However that may have been in fact or in law, the officer of the capturing cruiser would no doubt deal with her accordingly.

Under art. 113 the commander of the cruiser would be entitled to destroy the neutral vessel if he considered it subject to condemnation for carrying contraband, and if bringing the vessel into port would subject the cruiser to danger or be liable to impede the success of its operations; and this would be assumed if the captured vessel could not follow the war vessel and was therefore liable to recapture; or if the proximity of the enemy forces gave ground for a fear of recapture or if the war vessel was not in a position to furnish an adequate prize crew to take the vessel to a German port.

If the commander of the cruiser was "entitled" under German law to take the course of destroying the captured vessel, I prefer to express the opinion that he would have taken that course rather than to speculate as to what would have been said to him by his State if he had not.

The opinion of the court is that the recapture of the Pontoporos in these circumstances saved the ship for its owners from condemnation in any prize proceedings, and from the almost certain risk of destruction if she were dealt with upon the high seas without even the opportunity of placing its case before any judicial tribunal. Upon the strictest legal grounds, as well as upon every ground of equitable dealing, I decide that restitution to the Greek owners on recapture should have been upon payment of reasonable salvage. For such salvage I award one-sixth of the value, which is 7333*l.*

THE EDEN HALL. (a)

Prize Court—British ship—Enemy cargo—Cargo shipped before outbreak of war—Discharge in British port before outbreak of war—Storage in bonded warehouse in port—Declaration of war—Seizure of cargo—"In port"—Right of condemnation.

A cargo of goods, the property of a Turkish merchant, were shipped from a Turkish port and landed in London prior to the declaration of war between Great Britain and Turkey. The goods were conveyed in a British ship and, after landing, were stored in a bonded warehouse at the port of London, where they still were at the date of the outbreak of hostilities.

Held, that the goods were liable to seizure and condemnation as prize in accordance with the principles laid down in The Roumanian (ante, p. 208; 114 L. T. Rep. 3; (1916) A. C. 124).

THIS was an application on the part of the Crown for the condemnation of a quantity of tobacco as prize and droits of Admiralty.

The Eden Hall was a British steamship, which sailed from Smyrna on the 3rd Oct. 1914. Included in her cargo were twelve bales of tobacco consigned to London by a Smyrna house, and six cases of eight bales consigned from another firm. There were other goods on board which had since been released, and as to which no question arose. There was no appearance entered as to the six cases of eight bales, and the whole question in the case was as to the twelve bales, which were shipped by one Platon Macri, a Turkish merchant at Smyrna, the same being consigned to his order at London, which was the destination of the Eden Hall. The steamship arrived at the port of London on the 23rd Oct. 1914. Five days later, on the 28th Oct., the tobacco was discharged at the Victoria Docks, and was stored in a bonded warehouse within the port of London under the control of the Commissioners of Customs.

On the 5th Nov. 1914 war broke out between Great Britain and Turkey. On the 10th Nov. the goods were placed under detention, and on the 11th Dec. they were formally seized as prize. On the 7th Jan. 1915 an appearance was entered on behalf of Platon Macri, who was described as of Athens, but no affidavit was then sworn. At a later date, the 27th March 1915, a claim to the tobacco was filed, and Platon Macri was then properly described as a Turkish merchant of Smyrna.

The claimant contended that the tobacco could not be legally seized as prize, on the ground that it had been discharged on the 28th Oct. 1914, before the outbreak of war between Great Britain and Turkey, and was therefore not the subject of confiscation, although it was still in port.

The Solicitor-General (Sir George Cave, K.C.) and Maxwell Anderson for the Procurator-General.—The goods were rightly seized as enemy cargo in a port of this country and found there after the outbreak of hostilities. The case was similar to that of The Marie Anne (Rothery's Prize Droits, 126), and the right to seizure and condemnation in a case like the present had been established by the judgment of Lord Parker in The Roumanian (ante, p. 208; 114 L. T. Rep. 3; (1916) A. C. 124).

Neilson for the claimant.—The goods ought not to be condemned and were not the subject of maritime prize. There was a distinction between the present case and that of The Roumanian (ubi sup.). Here the goods were landed prior to the outbreak of war between Great Britain and Turkey, and as being in the territory of a belligerent they were not the subject of prize. This was clearly borne out by the case of Brown v. United States (8 Cranch, 110). If the principle of the right of seizure was applied in a case like the present, it might lead to a startling result, because goods which had been warehoused for a considerable time might be condemned—for instance, tobacco which had been in a bonded warehouse for years. To hold that goods could be condemned under such circumstances was an extension of the doctrines laid down in The Roumanian (ubi sup.), for which there was no authority.

The Solicitor-General in reply.—The warehouse was a part of the port, and the goods were therefore liable to seizure and condemnation, as in the case of the oil in The Roumanian (ubi sup.). They could not be removed until the duty had been paid, and the voyage was incomplete. There had been no delivery of the goods so as to present the right of the Crown to claim their condemnation as prize.

THE PRESIDENT.—In this case there is an application by the Crown as to two parcels of tobacco. With regard to one parcel—namely, six cases of eight bales—there is no appearance. This parcel was shipped from Smyrna to the order of the shippers. The matter is now about twelve months old, and I have no doubt whatever concerning it; the goods must be condemned.

As to the other part of the cargo—namely, twelve bales of tobacco shipped by Platon Macri, of Smyrna, to his own order—a claim has been put forward by a person who claims to be entitled to have the goods restored to him on the ground that they were seized on land and in a bonded warehouse, to which they had been removed prior to the outbreak of war between Great Britain and Turkey.

As to the facts of the case there is no dispute. The tobacco was put on board the steamship Eden Hall, which sailed from Smyrna on the 3rd Oct. 1914, and arrived in London on the 23rd Oct. 1914. On the 28th Oct. the goods were discharged and put into a bonded warehouse in the port of London. It is admitted that the warehouse was a bonded warehouse approved by and under the control of the Customs authorities, and situated within the port of London. The goods remained in the bonded warehouse until the outbreak of war between Great Britain and Turkey on the 5th Nov. 1914. Five days later the goods were seized and were detained by the Customs authorities on behalf of the Crown. Notification to that effect was given some time afterwards, and on the 11th Dec. 1914 there was a more formal seizure of the goods as prize. An appearance was entered on behalf of Platon Macri, of Athens, which was and is a neutral city; but although Platon Macri is described as of Athens, he appears to be a Turkish merchant of Smyrna, and the claim now made on his behalf is put forward honestly as the claim of a person who was an enemy at the date of the seizure. The only question, therefore, which I have to decide is whether this case can be distinguished in any way from that of The Roumanian (ubi sup.). Some of the facts are different, but applying the principles which have been explained and declared by the Privy Council in The Roumanian (ubi sup.) to the present case, I fail to see that there is really any distinction between them. Upon the broad ground that these goods were in port—in a warehouse belonging to the port—at the time of the outbreak of hostilities, I think it follows that they were goods which were the proper subject of maritime prize. In fact, I am of opinion that the present case is entirely governed by the case of The Roumanian (ubi sup.).

Of course, if the tobacco had been dealt with in the ordinary way of commerce, by bills of lading assigned to some other person, or had been warehoused for some other person as purchaser, the case might have been different. These goods, however, were put into a warehouse and remained there up to the date of seizure as the goods of the Turkish merchant, that is, of an enemy subject. They must, therefore, be condemned as prize and droits of Admiralty.

Prize Court—German ship—Entry into British port prior to outbreak of hostilities—Entry as a place of refuge—Not in furtherance of commercial enterprise — Detention — Subsequent release—Order to leave port—Outbreak of war—Seizure — Condemnation — Hague Convention 1907, No. VI., arts. 1 and 2, and Preamble.

By the preamble of the sixth Hague Convention 1907, the contracting parties stated that they had come to certain agreements on the ground, as therein stated, that they were "anxious to ensure the security of international commerce against the surprise of war, and wishing, in accordance with modern practice, to protect as far as possible operations undertaken in good faith and in process of being carried out before the outbreak of hostilities," and accordingly arts. 1 and 2 of the Convention were drawn up. By the first of these articles it is stipulated (inter alia) that an enemy merchant ship which is in a port of a belligerent at the date of the outbreak should be allowed a reasonable number of days of grace in which to depart, and by the second it is provided that if owing to circumstances beyond her control the vessel cannot depart within that period, she may not be confiscated but merely detained.

A German liner bound from Philadelphia to Hamburg, hearing of the outbreak of war between France and Germany, put into F. on the 3rd Aug. 1914, in order to avoid possible capture by French cruisers. On the morning of the 4th Aug. 1914 the master was told that his vessel would be detained, but later in the day she was released and ordered to leave the port. She made no attempt to depart, and on the morning of the 5th Aug., war having broken out between Great Britain and Germany in the meantime, she was seized as prize.

(a) Reported by J. A. SLATER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, even assuming that the Hague Convention was binding upon Great Britain as far as Germany was concerned, that the vessel did not enter and was not in the port of F. in pursuance of a commercial enterprise, that ample opportunity had been given to her to depart, and that arts. 1 and 2 of the Convention did not protect her from condemnation as prize.

IN these cases the Crown asked for the condemnation of two German liners which were seized at Falmouth on the 5th Aug. 1914. The facts were similar in the two cases, and for the sake of convenience the first alone was fully gone into by the court.

The Prinz Adalbert was a German screw steamship, belonging to the Hamburg-Amerika line, of 3769 tons register, and prior to the outbreak of war between the Allies and the Powers of Central Europe she was on a voyage with cargo and passengers from Philadelphia to Hamburg. On the 3rd Aug. 1914 the captain of the vessel, who was then entering the English Channel, heard of the declaration of war between France and Germany, and instead of proceeding on his course he decided to put into Falmouth Harbour for orders. He entered the harbour shortly after midnight. Early on the morning of the 4th Aug. an officer of Customs went on board the Prinz Adalbert, ordered the master to dismantle his wireless apparatus, and informed him that if he attempted to leave the harbour he would be stopped. Later in the day, however, acting upon Admiralty instructions, the master was informed that his vessel was unconditionally released, and that he was free to leave. No effort was made to depart, and in the early morning of the 5th Aug., war having been meanwhile declared between Great Britain and Germany, the vessel was seized as prize.

The case first came before the court on the 6th Dec. 1915, when an adjournment was granted in order that further evidence might be obtained. At the hearing in March 1916 the master was called as a witness, and he then stated that he did not enter the harbour of Falmouth for the purpose of refuge, but as a result of an appeal by a number of American and German passengers, who expressed a desire to be landed in England owing to the outbreak of war between France and Germany.

The question involved was whether under the circumstances arts. 1 and 2 of the sixth Hague Convention 1907 applied, which are as follows:—

1. When a merchant ship belonging to one of the belligerent Powers is at the commencement of hostilities in an enemy port, it is desirable that it should be allowed to depart freely, either immediately, or after a reasonable number of days of grace, and to proceed, after being furnished with a pass, direct to its port of destination, or any other port indicated to it. The same principle applies in the case of a ship which has left its last port of departure before the commencement of the war and has entered a port belonging to the enemy while still ignorant that hostilities have broken out.

2. A merchant ship which, owing to circumstances beyond its control, may have been unable to leave the enemy port within the period contemplated in the preceding article, or which was not allowed to leave, may not be confiscated. The belligerent may merely detain it, on condition of restoring it after the war, without payment of compensation, or he may requisition it on condition of paying compensation.

The Attorney-General (Sir F. E. Smith, K.C.), Pearce Higgins, and Murphy for the Crown.—The Prinz Adalbert was not within the protection contemplated by the sixth Hague Convention. This was not a case of ensuring the security of international commerce against the surprise of war, which was what was contemplated and was shown by the wording of the preamble of the Convention. The vessel came into Falmouth as a place of refuge, and, as she remained there after the date of the declaration of war, in spite of her having been ordered to depart, the seizure was quite regular. It was true that an order for detention was made on the morning of the 4th Aug.; but, if there was any illegality in that, a remedy would have been found by way of action after the termination of the war.

Aspinall, K.C. and Dunlop for the shipowners, the claimants.—The vessel was within the protection of the Hague Convention and should be restored to the owners. She was engaged in a commercial enterprise before the outbreak of war, and there was nothing irregular in her entering the harbour of Falmouth. There had been an irregularity in the order for detention in the first place, and that had led in part to her not departing before war broke out. It would be contrary to the principles acted upon by the Prize Court if advantage was taken of an irregularity. It could not be said that the vessel had ever had a real opportunity of departing.

The Attorney-General in reply.—It was contrary to fact to assert that the Prinz Adalbert had not been treated with the utmost consideration. The treatment afforded by this country had been very much better than that afforded by Germans to British ships.

The PRESIDENT.—The steamship Prinz Adalbert was a ship belonging to the Hamburg-Amerika line, and, at the end of July and in the beginning of Aug. 1914 was on a voyage from Philadelphia to Hamburg with a cargo of general goods. She was seized in Falmouth Harbour. The claim made on behalf of the owners of the vessel is that she should be released absolutely from seizure, which was made on the morning of the 5th Aug. 1914, or, in the alternative, as I gather from counsel for the claimants, that at any rate she should not be subject to confiscation, but only to an order for detention during the war, on the condition of being delivered up at the end of the war, or that compensation should be paid if the vessel was not delivered up.

For the purpose of this case, and for the purpose of this case only, I assume that the sixth Convention of The Hague Conference of 1907 is binding. That has been done in other cases, though there has not been a final decision upon the matter in this country as yet. The matter has been elaborately argued recently before the Privy Council, but no decision has been given. Assuming that the sixth Hague Convention is binding, the question arises, therefore, whether the vessel entered the port of Falmouth under the circumstances contemplated by the Convention, and in circumstances the existence of which would give her the privileges of arts. 1 and 2 of the Convention.

The facts are not to any very great extent in dispute, and therefore the statement that I shall make as to them need only be short. On the 3rd Aug. 1914, the day before war was declared between Great Britain and Germany, the Prinz Adalbert was approaching the English Channel. As I understand, the master, soon after the ship had passed the Scilly Isles, learned that a state of war existed between France and Germany. Having heard of this, the master, according to the affidavit which he has made and according to the protest which he made on the 8th Aug., decided to proceed to a neutral port. In the one he says that he decided to do this for orders, and in the other he says that he did it so that his ship might be in a port of refuge. This case came before me on the 6th Dec. 1915, and was then part heard, being adjourned in order that further evidence might be given as to what had taken place. Now, as the Attorney-General has pointed out, it is the fact that on the 6th Dec. nothing was said by or on behalf of any claimant, either verbally or in writing, that the reason—or, indeed, a reason—for the ship's proceeding to Falmouth was a desire to comply with the wishes of the passengers.. Yesterday the court heard, for the first time, from the vivâ voce evidence given by the master, that a deputation from the passengers, consisting chiefly of Americans and Germans, waited upon the master and requested him to take the vessel carrying them to an English port, so that they, Americans and, strange to say, Germans too, might not proceed on their voyage to Hamburg, but might return from England to American soil. I do not know what took place, but the master cannot blame the court for coming to the conclusion that the statement as to the deputation of passengers, and particularly the statement that he only went into Falmouth by reason of the request of that deputation, is an afterthought. I do not forget that in the postscript to the letter to the senior naval officer at Falmouth there is reference to a desire to land passengers and take in coal. That is perfectly consistent with the original story of the master, which was that he went into Falmouth himself, having decided for himself, for orders, and having got there I daresay there was naturally a request from the passengers, or some of them at any rate, that they might be allowed to land, and there may have been a request by the master to take coal on board, because he might decide, having received orders, to proceed to Hamburg, not through the English Channel in the ordinary way, but through the Irish Channel and round the North of Scotland.

On the 4th Aug. the vessel was told that she must not leave the port. That might be regarded as an embargo, and I think that the authorities were quite within their rights, if there was a war or a prospect of war, in telling the vessel that she must not leave. If nothing else had been done, when a state of war came to exist, the vessel would have had to remain in the port as if she had been under an embargo. Another circumstance, however, intervened, which I think makes that unimportant, and that is, that after the detention by the Customs officer, permission was given on the 4th Aug. by the commander-in-chief, acting upon instructions received from the Admiralty, for the vessel to leave. I think that the steps taken by the commander-in-chief, which were communicated to the German Consul and afterwards to the vessel, were something more than a mere permission to depart. They were, in effect, an intimation that the ship had no right to use the port, and that there was an opportunity for her to go and that she must do so. In spite, however, of this intimation, the ship remained where she was until after the outbreak of hostilities between Great Britain and Germany, at 11 p.m. on the night of the 4th Aug. 1914.

The Prinz Adalbert was arrested on the morning of the 5th Aug. 1914. If the vessel was allowed to leave, or if it was intimated to her that she must leave about 4 p.m. on the 4th Aug., I do not think that she would have a right to rely in any event upon the Hague Convention. She had no right to call upon the authorities at Falmouth to allow her to remain there in order to see what might happen. They had a perfect right to tell her that she must leave the port.

Now, what was done by the master? I find no indication whatever in the evidence or in the affidavits that he ever intended to avail himself of the opportunity of leaving, or to obey the order to take his vessel out of the port. He says in his affidavit that it would take twelve hours to raise steam. Perhaps that is quite true, but if he had intended to go he could have raised steam in the time at his disposal. But nothing whatever was done on the vessel to show that there was any intention of leaving the port. On the contrary, I am satisfied beyond all doubt in my own mind that the master never intended to avail himself of the permission. What would have been the result if he had? I find that he went into port in order to avoid the risk of being captured by French cruisers. If he had left on the afternoon of the 4th Aug., or if he had left on the morning of the 5th Aug., the risk would still have been staring him in the face. Indeed, there would have been a further risk after eleven o'clock on the night of the 4th Aug. that in proceeding from Falmouth to his home port he might have been captured also by a British cruiser.

Having intended from the first to avoid the first of these risks by entering Falmouth, he further intended to remain in this port, to avail himself of it as a port of refuge, and to try to avail himself of the protection which he thought he would have under the Hague Convention. No doubt the time was short, as we know the facts now—from four o'clock until the declaration of war at eleven o'clock—but, as I put it to the master in the box, he did not know that war was to be declared as from eleven o'clock that night. Moreover, I have no hesitation in saying that if the master had shown any signs or expressed any wish to leave the port after the permission had been given, and had so told the authorities, even at eleven o'clock when war was declared, saying that he had not had sufficient time, and would like more time, I have no doubt the authorities would have said that it was only fair that he should have had a reasonable time for getting his vessel ready.

Nothing was done, for the reason that, as I have stated, the master of the vessel never intended to leave Falmouth.

The preamble of the sixth Hague Convention shows clearly what its object was, and I have already had occasion to make some remarks upon it. The words of the preamble are as follows: "Anxious to ensure the security of international commerce against the surprise of war, and wishing, in accordance with modern practice, to protect, as far as possible, operations undertaken in good faith and in process of being carried out before the outbreak of hostilities," the contracting parties "have resolved to conclude a convention to this effect." There is no doubt that this provision was made in the interest of commerce. Now the Prinz Adalbert was not in the port of Falmouth pursuant to any commercial undertaking at all. The object was not to take part in a commercial undertaking, but the ship was in port for a totally different purpose, and one which was not contemplated by the signatories of the sixth Hague Convention. The Convention was never intended, in my opinion, to afford protection for a vessel using a port either as a place of refuge from capture by a belligerent or for obtaining orders from any other belligerent or its subjects.

Under the circumstances, therefore, I have come to the conclusion that I ought to condemn this vessel as enemy property in favour of the Crown. I understand that the vessel has already been requisitioned. She will be handed over to the Crown as prize, and there will be no necessity for the marshal to proceed to the sale.

It is apparently agreed that there is no distinction between the case of the Prinz Adalbert and that of the Kronprinzessin Cecilie. I therefore make a similar order with regard to the latter vessel and condemn her as enemy property.

THE STIGSTAD. (a)

Prize Court — International law — Reprisals — Neutral ship — Cargo, not contraband, with enemy destination—Ship ordered to British port — Unloading — Detention — Compensation for detention—Order in Council of the 11*th March* 1915*—Validity.*

Art. 3 of the Order in Council of the 11*th March* 1915*—reprisals restricting German commerce—is valid by international law, and the owner of a neutral ship which is detained in a British or an allied port, having been ordered thither for the purpose of discharging goods on board other than contraband which are the property of the enemy or intended for an enemy destination, has no legal right to compensation for the detention of the ship through such discharge.*

The Order in Council does not impose any unreasonable inconvenience on neutrals considering the special circumstances of the case.

(a) Reported by J. A. SLATER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

THIS case was before the Prize Court in Aug. 1915 with respect to the cargo, but the sole question which now arose was as to the validity of the Order in Council of the 11th March 1915, the shipowners having made a claim for expenses and for damages for the ship's detention during the period that the cargo was being discharged at the port of Middlesbrough.

The facts are sufficiently set out in the judgment of the learned President.

MacKinnon, K.C. and Hull for the Procurator-General.

Dawson Miller, K.C. and R. A. Wright for the shipowners.

The PRESIDENT.—In this case a very important question has been raised, which affects the validity of the Order in Council of the 11th March 1915, the order which has become commonly known as the Retaliatory Order. The argument upon it has not been very full, and if it had been more exhaustive on both sides I think that it would have been of the greatest assistance to me; but inasmuch as a doubt has been thrown upon the validity of this particular Order in Council of the 11th March, it seems to me to be only right and proper that I should express my opinion upon it now, so as to put an end, once for all, to that doubt as far, at least, as this court is concerned. Should there be a desire on either side to appeal, I think it would be only right for me to put the reasons for my decision more fully into writing; but having regard to the nature and to the importance of the point raised, I must at once proceed to pronounce my opinion upon it.

The Stigstad is a Norwegian steamship, and she set sail from a Norwegian port on the 10th April 1915. She was bound for Rotterdam. She had a cargo on board which consisted of metallic ore, and it is quite clear from what has been stated that even if the shipowners did not in fact know that the ore was destined for Germany, they would have been able to discover that such was the case if they had made any inquiries. It is admitted that the cargo was of the description to which art. 3 of the Order in Council of the 11th March 1915 applied. That article is as follows:

> Every merchant vessel which sailed from her port of departure after the 1st March 1915 on her way to a port other than a German port, carrying goods with an enemy destination, or which are enemy property, may be required to discharge such goods in a British or allied port. Any goods so discharged in a British port shall be placed in the custody of the marshal of the Prize Court, and, unless they are contraband of war, shall, if not requisitioned for the use of His Majesty, be restored by order of the court, upon such terms as the court may in the circumstances deem to be just, to the person entitled thereto.

Although no question arises in the present case under art. 5 of the order, I should like to read it here in order to point out that the latter deals only with claims in respect of goods which are required to be discharged under the provisions of the other articles of the order in question. Art. 5 is as follows:

> (1) Any person claiming to be interested in or to have any claim in respect of any goods (not being contraband of war) placed in the custody of the marshal of the Prize Court under this order, or in the proceeds of such goods, may forthwith issue a writ to the Prize Court against the proper officer of the Crown, and apply for an order that the goods shall be restored to him, or that their proceeds should be paid to him, or for such other order as the circumstances of the case may require. (2) The practice and procedure of the Prize Court shall, so far as applicable, be followed mutatis mutandis in any proceedings consequential upon this order.

The question which is now before me is whether or not, as a matter of law, the owners of this vessel, the Stigstad, are entitled to damages for detention, or to be compensated by a payment in money for the detention of the vessel following upon the demand made upon her that she should enter a British port and remain there until her cargo was discharged. There is no need for me to go through the dates, because it has been expressly admitted by counsel on behalf of the shipowners that there was no further or other delay and no inconvenience caused to the shipowners than was inevitable and necessary in carrying out in proper fashion the rights which are conferred by art. 3 of the Order in Council. According to my view of the whole matter, it appears to me that I do not possess any right in law to compensate neutrals for any loss which they may sustain if the provisions of the Order in Council are properly carried out. If there should be any undue delay or any unnecessary expenses caused, I think that the probability is that I should have the right, in accordance with the principle applied in days past against the captors, to say that where there has been undue delay or unnecessary expense compensation should be awarded.

The Order in Council is issued, as is shown by the preamble, as a reprisal order, and, according to the decision recently given by the Privy Council in the case of The Zamora (see post; 114 L. T. Rep. 626; (1916) 2 A. C. 77), any Order in Council authorising reprisals will be conclusive as to the facts which are recited as showing that cause for reprisals exists. There is no need to read the preamble. It is enough for me to say that the preamble states that cause has arisen for reprisals, and the facts recited therein are conclusive according to the decision of the Privy Council as showing that a cause for reprisals exists.

It has been argued on behalf of the shipowners that the Order in Council of the 11th March 1915 is unlawful because it entails upon neutrals undue inconvenience. Any interference with the trade of a belligerent, in so far as that trade is carried on by the ships of neutrals, must necessarily cause inconvenience. In the case of contraband and particularly in the case of a breach of blockade, the inconvenience to neutrals is bound to be very great. It has been pointed out already in public that the Order in Council, if it is a lawful order, deals very gently with neutrals who are engaged in trade which this country thinks it has a right to try to put a stop to, because, whereas in the case of a breach of blockade or of an attempted breach of blockade there is a complete confiscation of the vessel, nothing of the kind results from the operation of the present Order in Council. All that is done is to take the enemy property to be dealt with in accordance with the terms of the Order in Council and the ship is at once set free. The judgment already given in the case of The Zamora (ubi sup.) is that, although the recitals as to the case for reprisals are conclusive, the court is not actually bound to hold that the means of meeting an emergency by way of reprisals are the best or the only means. The Privy Council further declare that no party aggrieved is precluded from contending that these means are unlawful "as entailing on neutrals a degree of inconvenience unreasonable considering all the circumstances of the case." If I have to express an opinion as to that, I express it without doubt, that the means adopted in this Order in Council do not entail upon neutrals a degree of inconvenience unreasonable considering all the circumstances of the case, and that therefore it cannot be said by reason of the means which have been adopted that the Order in Council is in itself unlawful.

In the result I am of opinion that the Order in Council is lawful and that I must obey it. If the Order in Council is lawful, as an order permitting reprisals is lawful, and is lawful, therefore, in accordance with international law, the result of it, in my opinion, is further this—that whatever delay or inconvenience may inevitably or necessarily be caused, as in this case, the neutrals must suffer that delay and that inconvenience because it is the result of the exercise of legitimate belligerent rights on the part of this country.

I repeat that I should have been glad to have had fuller arguments, and to have had time to put my reasons into better form by reference to cases of authority; but, as the matter is very important, I think that it is right that I should express my opinion now, as I hope that I have done very clearly, that there is nothing invalid in this Order in Council, and that it is an order to which this court ought to give effect.

The claim of the shipowners will be disallowed.

THE ALWINA. (a)

Prize Court—Neutral ship—Contraband cargo—Cargo intended for enemy destination—Enemy agent on board vessel—Question of fact whether neutral ship becomes enemy vessel—Frustration of adventure—Sale of cargo to persons other than enemies—Return voyage—Capture—Right of condemnation.

Whether a neutral vessel is or is not acting in such a manner as to be held to be an enemy vessel is a question to be decided upon the special facts of each case.

If a neutral vessel carries contraband goods, even though her papers are false, and the goods are intended for an enemy destination, and the original intention to carry and deliver the contraband goods to the enemy has been frustrated and abandoned, and the goods themselves have been sold and delivered to other buyers before the vessel has been seized, the vessel is freed from any liability to condemnation as prize.

(a) Reported by J. A. SLATER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

THIS was a case in which the Crown claimed the condemnation as prize of the Dutch steamship Alwina, on the ground, as was alleged, that at the time of her seizure she was "on her return passage from taking a direct part in hostilities and supplying, or attempting to supply, coals to warships or to the naval forces of the enemies of the Crown in violation of her neutrality."

The Alwina was a Dutch steamship, belonging to the Holland Gulf Stoomvaart Maatschappij, of Rotterdam, and her managing owner was Mr. Joseph de Poorter, a Dutch subject, who resisted the claim put forward by the Crown. Mr. de Poorter was a gentleman who had very close connections with Germany, trading and otherwise, and he possessed an estate on the Rhine. Moreover he had at one time been the owner of a vessel which had been condemned as prize by the Prize Court of the Falkland Isles. In the middle of the month of Oct. 1914 the Alwina, which had been mainly engaged in trading between Holland and South Wales, left Rotterdam and proceeded to Newport (Mon.), where she shipped a cargo of steam coal, purchased by Mr. de Poorter, and ostensibly consigned to Messrs. A. M. Delfino y Hermano, of Buenos Ayres, Argentina. The vessel purported to be under charter to the firm of Buenos Ayres, yet there was no documentary evidence in existence to this effect. The Alwina cleared from Newport on the 27th Oct. 1914, having on board a person named Van Dongan, who was at first described as a "steward," and subsequently as a "passenger," but who was in fact a supercargo of either German or Dutch nationality. The vessel arrived at Teneriffe, on her alleged voyage to Buenos Ayres, on the 6th Nov. 1914, and there the supercargo left her. Owing to the inability of the master of the vessel to obtain bunker coal, and also owing to the fact of there being an unwillingness for some reason or other to use any of the coal which formed a part of the cargo for the navigation of the vessel, she remained at Teneriffe until the end of Dec. 1914 During this period the battle of the Falkland Islands, which resulted in the destruction of the German cruisers, had been fought. Whilst the Alwina was at Teneriffe, suspicions were aroused that the cargo of coal was really intended for the German cruisers which were then at large in the Atlantic Ocean, and under the circumstances, which are fully detailed in the judgment of the learned President, the major portion of the cargo of coal was eventually sold to a firm of British merchants. Later on, acting under naval orders, the Alwina put into Gibraltar on her return journey, then called at Huelva to take in a cargo of sulphur ore, and finally arrived at Falmouth, where she was seized.

Art. 46 of the Declaration of London, as adopted by the British Orders in Council, is as follows :—

A neutral vessel will be condemned and, in a general way, receive the same treatment as would be applicable to her if she were an enemy merchant vessel :

1. If she takes a direct part in the hostilities.

2. If she is under the orders or control of an agent placed on board by the enemy Government.

3. If she is in the exclusive employment of the enemy Government.

4. If she is exclusively engaged at the time either in the transport of enemy troops or in the transmission of intelligence in the interests of the enemy.

In the cases covered by the present article, goods belonging to the owner of the vessel are likewise liable to condemnation.

Bateson, K.C. and H. L. Murphy for the Procurator-General.—Upon the facts of the case it was clear that the Alwina was an enemy ship with an enemy cargo. It was not the case of a neutral ship carrying contraband. The vessel was simply wearing the mask of neutrality, and was to all intents and purposes a German ship. A ship which lent itself to a belligerent lost its neutral character. That principle was laid down by Lord Stowell in the case of The Caroline (Roscoe's English Prize Cases, vol. 1, 385; 4 Ch. Rob. 256). In addition the shipowner under the circumstances was acting as an enemy. It was true that the intention of the shipowner had been frustrated by the vigilance of the British fleet, but that fact did not relieve Mr. de Poorter from the consequences of his act. If a neutral allowed his ship to be used for the purpose of assisting the enemy, he was to be considered as an enemy. In the present case there were the suspicious circumstances connected with the presence of Van Dongan on board. There was no doubt that he was a German agent. Everything connected with him pointed to it—his appearance, his description, and his action after arriving at Teneriffe. The Alwina, therefore, fell within the first two sub-sections of art. 46 of the Declaration of London, if not within the third. There were grave doubts as to the firm of Buenos Ayres. The very papers of the vessel were false. Everything pointed to the coal being intended for the use of the German cruisers, and if that was so, some contract must have been entered into for the supply. There was nothing in existence. The Alwina could not, therefore, be treated as a neutral carrying contraband with the risk of capture attached. She was a vessel actively associated with the enemy. She ought to be treated, therefore, as an enemy ship; and she was liable to seizure on her return and to condemnation as prize, in spite of the fact that the original intention of the shipowner had been frustrated.

Maurice Hill, K.C. and Bisschop for the shipowner.—At the time of the seizure of the Alwina she was not liable to condemnation. Whatever suspicious circumstances were connected with the ship on her outward voyage, even though she had carried false papers, and whatever her liability to capture on the ground that she carried contraband whilst proceeding to Teneriffe, the offence was over when she started on her homeward journey. There was no doctrine of international law which made a neutral ship the subject of capture as prize when there was no offence being committed. The facts did not in any way show that she was an enemy ship as contended for by the Crown. The true principle was that a neutral ship could not be condemned unless taken in delicto. As the Alwina had disposed of practically the whole of her cargo —it was not material in any case how she had disposed of it—she was perfectly free on her return journey.

Bateson, K.C. in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 5.—The PRESIDENT.—The steamship Alwina is a neutral vessel of Rotterdam, and the property of a Dutch company. She was seized at Falmouth. The claim of the Crown, as it appears by the writ, is that the ship should be condemned as prize on the ground or grounds that at the time of seizure she was on her return passage from taking a direct part in hostilities and supplying or attempting to supply coals to warships, or to the naval forces of the enemies of the Crown, or otherwise being in the employment of the enemies of the Crown in violation of the neutrality of the ship. Before considering and applying the law by which the case must be governed, it is essential to find what are the facts and to determine the nature of the conduct of the vessel and her owner and master in relation to the voyage which it is alleged rendered her subject to seizure and confiscation on her "return passage."

The Alwina belonged to the Holland Gulf Stoomvaart Maatschappij, of Rotterdam. The managing directors were the firm of Jos. de Poorter, of Rotterdam, of which Mr. Joseph de Poorter, a Dutch subject, was the sole partner. Mr. de Poorter acted throughout as her owner, and he will hereinafter be so described and treated. The vessel was a steamship of a tonnage of 1115 tons gross and 660 tons net. Her speed was 8-9 knots, with a consumption of fuel of about 9 tons a day. She carried a crew of about seventeen hands. She was a cargo vessel and had no accommodation for passengers. Until the outward voyage to be referred to she had been employed in a Western European trade, chiefly between Holland, England, and France. But suddenly, and without any previous negotiations of which the court has been given any information, on the 16th Oct. 1914 her owner entered into, or purported to enter into, a time charter with a firm described as Messrs. A. M. Delfino y Hermano, of Buenos Ayres, at 700*l.* per month, under which the vessel was "to be employed in such lawful trades between any port or ports in the United Kingdom and (or) the continent of Europe and America (not West) and back finally to a neutral and safe port of America (not West) or Europe as charterers or their agents shall direct."

Apparently the charter-party was signed at Rotterdam. It was signed by Mr. de Poorter, and it was also subscribed with the name of the firm of Messrs. A. M. Delfino y Hermano, the charterers. By whom the name of the latter was signed is not known. There appears to be a firm of the name of Messrs. A. M. Delfino y Hermano who carry on business at Buenos Ayres as shipping agents, and they have acted for (among other shipowners) the Hamburg-South America and the Norddeutscher Lloyd Lines. But it may be stated at once that in the transactions relating to this vessel and her charter and voyages there is no trace in the evidence, except in name only, of any such firm, or of anything done by it, or of any person representing it from first to last.

The charter-party was in evidence, and can be referred to. Under clause 3 the charterers were to provide and to pay for coals, port charges, pilotages, and loading and unloading expenses. Under other clauses of the charter-party they were to pay for the hire in cash every two months in advance, to furnish the master with all requisite instructions and sailing directions from time to time, and they agreed to insure the steamer against all war risks for 17,000*l.* The steamer left Rotterdam on the 19th Oct. 1914, bound for Newport (Mon.). On the same day Mr. de Poorter was apparently in this country. He bought a cargo of Welsh steam coal (about 1500 tons) on that date from Messrs. E. T. Agius and Co., coal merchants, at Newport, to be shipped on the vessel f.o.b.

In his answer to interrogatories, Mr. de Poorter deposed that payment for the coal was received from Messrs. A. M. Delfino y Hermano on or about the same day. This was a bare statement without any particulars. There was no evidence or trace of any such payment. On the 21st Oct. Mr. de Poorter made a declaration before a commissioner in London that he had made all necessary inquiries as to the ultimate destination of the coal shipped by him on the vessel, and that it was not intended for consumption "in any State at present at war with His Majesty." On the next day, the 22nd Oct., the vessel arrived at Newport.

In due course she loaded 1606 tons of steam coal. She also took on board 43 tons of bunker coal to add to the 100 tons already in her bunkers. This was only a comparatively small portion of the fuel required for a voyage to Buenos Ayres. The bill of lading was given on the 26th Oct. The port of delivery was Buenos Ayres, and the consignees were Messrs. A. M. Delfino y Hermano or their assigns, who were to pay freight "as per arrangement." There were three bills of lading in the set. None was produced except the captain's copy. The vessel was cleared from Newport as for Buenos Ayres, and sailed on the 27th Oct. In the crew list from Newport a person named L. A. van Dongan appeared as "steward." In the crew list from Rotterdam this man's name does not appear at all, although he shipped there. In the wage and provision list later he is entered as a "passenger." This man, it was suggested, was on board as supercargo, and there was evidence of this which was not contradicted.

On the 6th Nov. the vessel arrived at Teneriffe on the alleged voyage towards Buenos Ayres. She could not get to her alleged destination, of course, without replenishing her bunkers. The master found it impossible to get coal for that purpose. He tried through Mr. de Poorter. The charterers, whose duty it was to supply the coal, do not appear to have been disturbed by any appeals to provide it. For some reason (unexplained because no evidence was forthcoming for the owner, charterers or master) the master did not venture to deplete his cargo even to the extent of giving his steamer the necessary fuel for the rest of her voyage, although the cargo coal was supposed then to have been the property of the steamer's charterers.

The vessel remained at Teneriffe (Santa Cruz) until the end of December 1914. Almost immediately after her arrival there the master discovered that he was suspected of having on board coal for German cruisers. According to a statement he made to Admiral de Robeck, he and the crew also after they reached Teneriffe had come to the conclusion that the probable object of the voyage was to coal a German warship or German warships. Mr. de Poorter wrote to the British Consul-General at Rotterdam later that the con-signees (Messrs. A. M. Delfino y Hermano) gave instructions direct to the master. No evidence of any such instructions was given to the court. Probably by reason of the failure to obtain bunker coal, Mr. de Poorter instructed the master by cable about the 25th Nov. that the hire had not been paid, that the charter had therefore been cancelled, and that he should sell the coal. Various attempts were made to sell it. A contract seems to have been made through Van Dongan to sell to a Spaniard.

The log of the vessel has two pages, namely, 55 and 56, missing, which would have contained entries from the 23rd Nov. to the 11th Dec. Ultimately the coal was sold on the 19th Dec. to British merchants, Messrs. Hamilton and Co. Terms were made that a certain quantity should be left for bunkering purposes. It is unnecessary to point out in detail the inconsistent and uncorroborated accounts given in the correspondence and the answers to interrogatories of alleged arrangements made between Mr. de Poorter and Messrs. A. M. Delfino y Hermano about the voyage, the payment of the hire, the cancellation of the charter-party, the sale of the coal, and so forth. They are worthless and wholly unreliable. Van Dongan left the vessel at Teneriffe. The court has not been informed what became of him. While still on the ship he appears to have advanced the master some money for expenses. The latter described him in a letter written in Dutch as "old charterer's agent" (in English and in inverted commas), and in others as the "passenger we have on board" and "our time charterer." Whether he was a Dutchman or a German has been left in doubt. Whether he was acting for Mr. de Poorter or Messrs. A. M. Delfino y Hermano, or both, can only be a matter of conjecture; but that his part in the transaction was not an honest commercial one is obvious.

The cargo was delivered in due course by the master to Messrs. Hamilton and Co., and was paid for by them. It was declared by the master at the time of the sale to have been the property of Mr. de Poorter.

The vessel left Teneriffe on the 30th Dec. for Madeira for orders. She was boarded by British naval officers off Funchal on the 2nd Jan. 1915, and her papers were examined. The admiral ordered her to go to Gibraltar for further examination, accepting the undertaking of the master to take her there, as there was no accommodation for a prize crew. She arrived at Gibraltar on the 6th Jan. 1915, and was again boarded by British naval officers. Her master and the papers were further examined. The boarding officer signed a certificate as follows on the 7th Jan.:

> I hereby certify that I have examined the papers and questioned the master of the ship about his cargo, he having been sent into this port by H.M.S. Argonaut for further examination. I have reported to the senior naval officer all details, and I have given the said master permission to proceed to sea.

The ship accordingly proceeded to sea on a voyage to Huelva, pursuant to orders from her owner to load a cargo of sulphur ore, shipped by the Rio Tinto Company Limited, and consigned to the Netherlands Government on behalf of the purchasers, the Centrale Guano Fabrieken, at Rotterdam. The charter-party had been arranged by Mr. de Poorter at Rotterdam. It was dated the 31st Dec. 1914, and it was made between his company and the Centrale Guano Fabrieken. The bill of lading was dated the 10th Jan. 1915. The ship called at Falmouth, arriving on the 20th Jan. The authorities at the port seem at first to have suspected the cargo of sulphur, but on the 23rd Jan. the seizure was made on the grounds already referred to and set out in the writ. I may briefly state that another ship of the same type belonging to the same owner, the Josephina, carrying coal from Cardiff to Buenos Ayres under a similar charter-party between Mr. de Poorter and Messrs. A. M. Delfino y Hermano, started a few days before the Alwina, and got to various places on the South American coast, and was finally captured and condemned by the Prize Court of the Falkland Islands for carrying contraband, namely, coal, with the object of coaling German war vessels. Neither Mr. de Poorter nor Messrs. A. M. Delfino y Hermano, nor the ship's master, appeared in those proceedings.

The material question of fact which I have to decide is what was the character of the outward voyage on which the Alwina was engaged up to the time when she discharged the coal at Teneriffe. On behalf of the Crown it is claimed that the evidence established that the vessel was taking a direct part in the hostilities, or that she was under the orders or control of an agent placed on board by the enemy Government, or was in the exclusive employment of the enemy Government, and that she should be regarded and treated on these grounds as an enemy vessel under art. 46 of the Declaration of London as adopted by the British Orders in Council. In any event, it is claimed that if she was to be regarded as a vessel engaged in carrying contraband to the enemy she could be captured on her return voyage and subjected to condemnation for her offence on the outward voyage. In my view, there is no evidence which would warrant the court in finding that she came within either of the categories specified in art. 46. It may be noted that the words "in the exclusive employment of the enemy Government" in head 3 are in the official French "affrété en totalité par le Gouvernement ennemi." The correct finding, in my view, is that the vessel, being a neutral vessel, was carrying contraband—namely, coal—intended to be delivered to enemy agents, or enemy vessels of war encountered on the voyage, and that she was so carrying the contraband with false papers, with a suspicious super-cargo, with a false destination, and in circumstances amounting to fraud in regard to belligerents. It matters not for the purpose of this decision who acted for Messrs. A. M. Delfino y Hermano, the alleged charterers and consignees and purchasers, if any one did. Their name may have been used with their consent by Mr. de Poorter for his own purposes and for his sole profit, or for the joint profit of both. What is clear is that Mr. de Poorter, the shipowner himself, was an active party in the attempt to convey the contraband to the enemy by the false and fraudulent tricks and devices which were adopted.

Upon this finding the matter of law for decision is whether the Alwina was subject to confiscation at the time of her seizure at Falmouth on the 23rd Jan. 1915. The general rule which has been acted upon is that when a neutral vessel carries contraband goods they are confiscable if captured in delicto; and that the vessel also, if it belongs to the same owner, or if the owner has been implicated in a transaction veiled over with false papers or other deceitful devices, is subject to the same penalty. But when the goods have been deposited at the port or place of destination, the ship and cargo upon the return voyage are exempt from the penalty: (The Imina, Roscoe's English Prize Cases, vol. 1, 289; 3 Ch. Rob. 167). But exceptions were made at the beginning of the last century where the outward voyage was made under false papers or with a false destination, or in circumstances where the voyage has been conceived and contrived so as to deceive and to practise a fraud upon a belligerent. In these latter cases the vessel and cargo have been held to be affected upon the return voyage also.

It was, however, strenuously argued before me that, according to the Law of Nations as now understood, the vessel and her cargo upon the return voyage are free from the risk of capture in respect of the carriage of contraband goods on the outward voyage, however that voyage was conceived or carried out. In one aspect of the present case, no question relating to the law applicable to the return voyage would arise. In the other it would; and I will therefore consider the question later.

The aspect first referred to is this: The original intention of the owner was to carry contraband goods to and to deliver them to the enemy. That intention continued until the vessel failed to obtain bunker coal at Teneriffe, and possibly until the sale to Messrs. Hamilton and Co. But, in fact, the goods were never carried or delivered to the enemy at all; on the contrary, they were sold and delivered to a British firm. This course was no doubt forced upon the vendor. But in these circumstances could any penalty afterwards attach to the ship, arising out of the original intention and its attempted performance?

The terms "offence" and "penalty" have often been used in reference to the carriage of contraband goods, and their use does no harm as long as it does not produce confusion of thought. But it must be borne in mind that neutral merchants have the right to supply the enemy with such goods, subject only to the risk of losing their property. Using the word "offence" in this way, it is clearly committed from the beginning of the voyage, and continues as long as it is in process of being carried out. But, according to the principles of prize law, if the intention and voyage have been clearly abandoned before seizure or capture, the offence is dissipated and purged, and neither the goods nor the carrying instrument are subject to the penalty of confiscation, the delictum being over. This is the reason, I think, why no authority can be produced to the contrary. A similar principle applies where vessels have intended to run a blockade.

Two cases may be referred to in illustration of the application of the doctrine in reference to blockade and contraband respectively, even where the voyage had been abandoned, or its character changed by force of circumstances outside the voluntary intention of those responsible for the vessel and goods. Both were decided by Sir William Scott in 1807. They are The Lisette (Roscoe, vol. 1, 587; 6 Ch. Rob. 387) and The Twende Sostre (ibid., in a note at p. 390).

In the latter case the vessel was carrying contraband goods to the Cape of Good Hope while it was Dutch, but was not captured as prize until after it had been surrendered and became a British possession. Sir William Scott in his judgment said: "If the port had continued Dutch, a person could not, I think, have been at liberty to carry thither articles of a contraband nature under an intention of selling other innocent commodities only, and of proceeding with the contraband articles to a port of ulterior destination; but before the ship arrives a circumstance takes place which completely discharges the whole guilt, because, from the moment when the Cape became a British possession the goods lost their nature of contraband. They were going into the possession of a British settlement, and the consequence of any pre-emption that could be put upon them would be British pre-emption. It has been said that this is a principle which the court has not applied to cases of contraband, and that the court, in applying it to cases of blockade, did it only in consideration of the particular hardships consequent on that class of cases. But I am not aware of any material distinction, because the principle on which the court proceeded was that there must be a delictum existing at the moment of seizure to sustain the penalty. It is said that the offence was consummated by the act of sailing, and so it might be with respect to the design of the party, and if the seizure had been made while the offence continued, the property would have been subject to condemnation. But when the character of the goods is altered, and they are no longer to be considered as contraband, going to the port of an enemy, it is not enough to say that they were going under an illegal intention. There may be the mens rea, not accompanied by the act of going to an enemy's port. I am of opinion, therefore, that the same rule does apply to cases of contraband, and upon the same principle on which it has been applied in those of blockade. I am not aware of any cases in which the penalty of contraband has been inflicted on goods not in delicto, except in the recent class of cases respecting the proceeds of contraband carried outward with false papers. But on what principle have those decisions been founded? On this, that the right of capture having been defrauded in the original voyage, the opportunity should be extended to the return voyage. Here the opportunity has been afforded till the character of the port of destination became British. Till that time the liability attached; after that, though the intention is consummated, there is a material defect in the body and substance of the offence, in the fact though not in the intent. I am of opinion that it is a discharge, and a complete acquittal, that long before the time of seizure these goods had lost their noxious character of going as contraband to an enemy's port."

The same principle has been adopted and acted upon in the most recent wars by the Prize Courts of other countries. In the case of the Lydia, tried in 1906 in the course of the Russo-Japanese War, the decision of the Prize Court of Sasebo, and of the Higher Prize Court of Japan on Appeal, proceeded upon the ground that a ship transporting contraband of war to an enemy port was liable to confiscation so long only as her intention to proceed to such a port had not been abandoned at the time of the capture: (Takahashi's International Law, 674-683). In the case of The Lincluden or Rincluden (1905) the Prize Court at Sasebo found that the ship had intended to take contraband goods to Vladivostock — an enemy naval base—and also that her papers were false. Nevertheless, as the result of the court's investigation was that the ship had actually abandoned her first object of going to Vladivostock at the time of capture, and was steaming for a Japanese port to deliver the goods there, the court released the ship and cargo: (Takahashi, 741). The Sishan is also an instance where a similar principle was applied in the case of an original intention—which was abandoned before capture—of running a blockade and delivering contraband goods at a blockaded port: (Takahashi, 742).

It will be observed also from the authorities and from the provisions of the Declaration of London as modified and adopted, which will be cited and considered hereafter in reference to the outward voyage of contraband cargo, and the effect upon the ship's homeward voyage if false papers were carried on the outward voyage, that the assumption has always been that the contraband goods have been captured in delicto while upon the intended voyage to the enemy destination, or, in case of a capture of a vessel on her return or homeward voyage, that the contraband goods had actually been delivered to the enemy, or carried to the enemy destination.

Upon this aspect of the present case, I am of opinion that the result, according to the principles and rules of international law, is that inasmuch as the original intention to carry and deliver the contraband goods to the enemy had been frustrated and abandoned, and the goods themselves had been sold and delivered to other buyers when the vessel was seized, she had become freed from any liability to confiscation.

If this conclusion should be brought to the examination of the Tribunal of Appeal, and should not meet with approval, it may be necessary to consider the case in its other aspect. The question argued is of substantial practical importance. It is whether, according to international law as now understood, and as it should be administered in this court, a vessel which may have been subject to capture and confiscation for carrying contraband goods on an outward voyage remains subject to capture and confiscation upon the return voyage, if on the outward voyage the ship carried false papers or had a false destination, or was otherwise engaged in a deceptive and fraudulent transaction for the purpose of defeating legitimate belligerent rights.

It will be remembered that in his judgment in The Tvende Sostre (ubi sup.) Sir William Scott referred to "the recent class of cases repecting the proceeds of contraband carried outward with false papers." The reported cases of that class commence about 1800 with The Nancy (3 Ch. Rob. 122). A couple of years later (1802) the Lords Commissioners of Appeal in Prize Cases lent their high authority to the legal proposition that the carriage of contraband outward with false papers would affect the ship as well as the return cargo with condemnation: (see the Rosalia and Elizabeth mentioned in a note to the Table of Cases in front of vol. 4 of Ch. Rob.). On reference to the record it will be seen that the Rosalia had sailed outward from Hamburg in June 1798 with contraband under a fraudulent destination to Tranquebar, but being actually destined to the Isle of France, where she delivered it. The vessel was captured on the 25th May 1799 on a return voyage from the Isle of France to Hamburg. Both the vessel and the cargo (said to have been the proceeds of the outward voyage) were condemned.

As to The Elizabeth (ubi sup.), the record shows similarly that she sailed outward from Hamburg in May 1798, and carried contraband cargo to the Isle of France, where it was delivered, whereas her papers falsely showed a destination to Tranquebar. She was captured on the 30th March 1799 on the return voyage from the Isle of France to Hamburg. In this case also both the vessel and the cargo were condemned. Subsequently the Lords of Appeal in The Baltic in 1809 (1 Acton, 25) and in The Margaret in 1814 (1 Acton, 333) regarded the matter as settled, even if the return cargo did not represent the proceeds of the outward contraband. Sir William Grant, who presided and delivered the judgment in the Margaret, said: "The principle upon which this and other Prize Courts have generally proceeded to adjudication in cases of this nature (that is where there were false papers) appears simply to be this: that if a vessel carried contraband on the outward voyage she is liable to condemnation on the homeward voyage. It is by no means necessary that the cargo should have been purchased by the proceeds of this contraband. Hence we must pronounce against this appeal; the sentence of the court below (which was one of condemnation of both ship and cargo) being perfectly valid, and consistent with the acknowledged principles of general law."

It is worth noting that in that case the outward voyage had taken place over three years before the capture, the vessel being engaged in various parts from 1804 to 1807.

The doctrine of these decisions has been criticised by jurists. The criticism began early by Wheaton in 1815. He called it an innovation not founded upon principle, and argued that to subject the property to confiscation while the offence no longer continued would be to extend it indefinitely, not only on the return voyage but to all future voyages of the same vessel, which could never be purified from the contagion communicated by the contraband articles: (see Wheaton's Maritime Captures, 183). This criticism has been repeated literally by many since—but it does not appear to be sound, nor does the conclusion drawn seem to be warranted.

Quite the opposite view was taken and expressed by the Supreme Court of Mr. Wheaton's own country many years later, when Marshall, C.J. and Story, J. were members of the court. The Supreme Court passed under review the cases already referred to (with others) in 1834 in Carrington v. Merchants' Insurance Company (8 Peters, 518). Of them Story, J., in delivering the judgment of the court, said: "We cannot but consider these decisions as very high evidence of the law of nations, as actually administered; and in their actual application to the circumstances of the present case they are not, in our judgment, controlled by any opposing authority. Upon principle, too, we trust that there is great soundness in the doctrine as a reasonable interpretation of the law of nations. The belligerent has a right to require a frank and bonâ fide conduct on the part of neutrals in the course of their commerce in times of war, and if the latter will make use of fraud and false papers to elude the just rights of the belligerents and to cloak their own illegal purposes, there is no injustice in applying to them the penalty of confiscation. The taint of the fraud travels with the party and his offending instrument during the whole course of the voyage, and until the enterprise has, in the understanding of the party himself, completely terminated."

This country in practice has certainly never given up in such cases the right of capture on the return voyage. In Wildman's International Law (1854) and in his Plain Directions to Naval Officers as to the Law of Search, Capture, and Prize (1854) after the outbreak of the Crimean War, the doctrine is maintained.

In Godfrey Lushington's Manual of Naval Prize Law, published with the authority of the British Admiralty in 1866, the paragraph relating to the matter is as follows: "A vessel which carried contraband goods becomes liable to detention from the moment of quitting port with the goods on board and continues to be so liable until she has deposited them. After depositing them, the vessel, in ordinary cases, ceases to be liable; and therefore, as a general rule, a commander should not detain a vessel for carrying contraband goods unless he finds them actually on board. But simulated papers are an aggravation of the offence. If, therefore, a commander meets with a vessel on her return voyage, and ascertains that on her outward voyage she carried contraband goods with simulated papers, he should detain her; and the fact that the return cargo has not been purchased by the proceeds of the outward contraband cargo makes no difference." The paragraph in the manual edited by Mr. Holland in 1888 (par. 80) is in identical terms. It is right in passing to mention the cases of The Allanton (Russian Cases in Russo-Japanese War, 1) and The Eastry (Takahashi, 739). These decisions, however, proceeded in accordance with the written code of prize regulations of Russia and Japan respectively, made for that war.

In 1908 the memorandum issued by the British Foreign Office by way of instructions to the British delegates to the London International Naval Conference of that year deals with the matter as follows:

(6) A ship carrying contraband as defined in sect. 1 may be seized at any moment throughout the whole course of her voyage, so long as she is on the high seas or in belligerent waters. The liability to seizure is not affected by the fact that the vessel is intending to touch at some neutral point of call before reaching the hostile destination. When the contraband goods have been discharged the liability to seizure is at an end. In exceptional cases it has been held that a ship which has carried contraband to the enemy on her outward voyage under circumstances aggravated by fraud and simulated papers is still liable to capture and condemnation on her return voyage.

I may finally mention that, according to the present German code, if the vessel carried contraband to the enemy contrary to the indications of the ship's papers, she is liable to capture and condemnation until the end of the war.

In these circumstances, whatever may have been written by jurists, I am not prepared to pronounce that the rule of international law upon the subject, which has been declared and acted upon in this country by the highest Prize Courts, as also in those of America, has ceased to be in force. The ease with which in the circumstances of modern maritime trade papers and destination can be falsified and frauds can be carried out, in no way minimises the obligations of neutrals engaged in such trade in time of war to act with frankness, straightforwardness, and good faith.

I accordingly should hold that a vessel which had been used by its owner by means of false papers, with false destination, and any deceitful practices intended to elude the right of capture by belligerents, to carry contraband goods to the enemy, and which had delivered such goods on an outward voyage, remains confiscable upon the return voyage also. What would constitute the return voyage would depend upon all the circumstances of the particular case.

I have stated my view of the law at this stage before considering the effect of the Orders in Council in reference to the provisions of the Declaration of London, by reason of the doctrines as to the force of the Orders in Council which were declared by the Privy Council in the recent case of The Zamora (see post; 114 L. T. Rep. 626; (1916) 2 A. C. 77).

I will deal shortly with these Orders in Council. That of the 28th Aug. 1914 affected the voyage of the Alwina when it began. That of the 29th Oct. came into force while the voyage was still in progress, and the offence in the sense mentioned was continuing.

Art. 38 of the Declaration said:

A vessel is liable to capture for carrying contraband, but not for having done so.

That provision was not ratified. It was modified by the Order in Council of the 30th Aug. by the following:

A neutral vessel which succeeded in carrying contraband to the enemy with false papers may be detained for having carried such contraband, if she is encountered before she has completed her return voyage.

For this the Order in Council of the 29th Oct. substituted the following provision:

A neutral vessel, with papers indicating a neutral destination, which notwithstanding the destination shown on the papers, proceeds to an enemy port, she is liable to capture and condemnation if she is encountered before the end of her next voyage.

If the law was as I have stated, these provisions do not operate in extension of it, but, if anything, as a mitigation of the captors' rights. Therefore, according to The Zamora (ubi sup.), they are not invalid. It is not necessary in the present case to decide which is applicable. It is only if the vessel succeeded in carrying contraband to the enemy in the one case, or if she proceeded to an enemy port in the other, that the penalty on the return, or next voyage, would attach.

For the reasons given, in any view of the present case, as the goods were never delivered to the enemy, the vessel was immune when she was captured, and an order must be made that the owner was entitled to her restitution. By reason of his conduct, however, I order that he do bear and pay the costs and expenses of and incident to the capture and detention, and also of and incident to these prize proceedings.

As it appears that the vessel was delivered up on bail, the form of the judgment will be a declaration of the right to restitution on payment of such costs and expenses, and an order that the bail be released upon such costs and expenses being paid into court.

Becker, Gray, and Co. v. London Assurance Corporation. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Marine insurance — Perils — "Men-of-war" — "Restraints of princes"—"Enemies"—British goods on enemy vessel—Ship putting into neutral port to avoid capture—Legality of further performance of contract on outbreak of war—Loss of venture—Whether proximately due to perils insured against.

In June 1914 the plaintiffs sold certain goods to a German firm, the property not to pass until the goods arrived at the port of destination. The goods were loaded on the German steamship K. for a voyage from Calcutta to Hamburg.

While the K. was on her voyage, war broke out between Great Britain and Germany. The master of the K. thereupon put into Messina. The plaintiffs gave notice of abandonment to the defendants, the insurers, on the 1st Sept. and again on the 15th Dec. Bailhache, J. found that the voyage from Messina to Hamburg could not be continued, that the master had no intention of prosecuting the voyage until after the war, and that the voyage was practically abandoned when the vessel put into Messina. The policy of insurance covered the usual perils, including "men-of-war . . . enemies . . . takings at sea, arrests, restraints, and detainments of all kings, princes, and people . . . and all other perils, losses, and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage of the said goods and merchandises." The plaintiffs' claim was for a total loss under the policy.

Held, that there was no loss by the perils insured against. The ship was never in peril of capture, for her commander resolved not to incur that risk; the loss was not due to "enemies," for the refusal of the commander to deliver up the goods at the port of refuge was not a peril from "enemies" within the meaning of the policy; nor was there a loss due to "restraints of princes."

July 5, 1915.—Bailhache, J.—This is an action against underwriters on goods, the goods being a part cargo of jute under a policy which is dated the 28th June 1914 and on a voyage from Calcutta to Hamburg in a German steamer, the Kattenturm. This particular part of the cargo, the portion with which I am concerned, was sold on the 11th June 1914 to a German firm, but it is conceded that on the material dates the property in the goods remained in the plaintiffs in this case, the sellers. The Kattenturm left Calcutta in July. Finding that war had broken out, the master on the 5th or 6th Aug. put into the Italian port of Messina, and afterwards shifted from Messina to Syracuse, and was in Syracuse from the 4th Sept. onwards. The shifting from Messina to Syracuse is of no importance so far as the point which I have to decide in this case is concerned. When the ship put into Messina, and afterwards again while she was at Syracuse, the plaintiffs gave notice of abandonment. They gave their first notice on the 1st Sept., they gave the second notice on the 16th Dec., and they issued their writ on the 17th Dec. The underwriters declined to accept either notice of abandonment, but in both cases stated that they would treat the matter as though a writ had been issued in this case. I have to consider, therefore, what the state of affairs between these parties was at the beginning of September in the year 1914. On that date the Kattenturm was with this jute on board in Messina or in Syracuse. The master put into Messina because he thought that was a prudent thing to do. His was a German ship; the French and English fleets were watching the seas, and he felt, and quite rightly felt, that if he had proceeded on his voyage the ship was in grievous danger of capture. A letter has been put in, and is to be treated by me as evidence in this case, from the Admiralty, in which they say; "I am commanded to inform you that any German steamer proceeding on or after the 5th Aug. last through the Mediterranean on a voyage to Hamburg would, in their Lordships' opinion, have been in peril of capture by British or allied warships when outside neutral territorial waters"; and I have no doubt that the master, from his point of view, did a very prudent and the most prudent thing that he could do when he put into Messina. The plaintiffs made many attempts to get possession of this portion of the cargo which belonged to them. The master was willing to give it up, but he was only willing to give it up on certain terms, the most material of which was that he demanded the payment of his freight in full. In the result, and after many efforts and threats of legal proceedings, the master was induced to give the cargo up, and the cargo was ultimately sold by the plaintiffs to an Italian buyer, for a sum of a little over 1000*l*. I am not concerned with that matter very much, because the question which I have to determine is not what happened to the cargo afterwards, but what was the position of affairs in September; and, moreover, it was agreed, and quite rightly agreed, between the cargo owners and underwriters that the efforts which the cargo owners made to secure possession of the cargo and to realise it for the best price that they could obtain for it should not in any way prejudice their rights if they had any under the notice of abandonment which they had long before that given. It is, of course, abundantly clear that the voyage from Messina to Hamburg could not in fact be continued. A letter has been read to me in which the agents of the Hansa Line, who are the owners of the steamer, say that the master had not given up all thoughts of prosecuting the voyage, but I have no doubt myself that the master had no thought of prosecuting the voyage at all until the termination of the war. When the termination of the war will be nobody knows, and at any rate it is certain to be so long and indefinite a period that the voyage was taken to be abandoned, and was no doubt for all practical purposes abandoned, when the master put into Messina.

The policy contained the usual restraints of rulers and princes clause, and Mr. Butler Aspinall has argued that the loss of the venture—not the loss of the goods, because the goods were not themselves lost; they were sold for a considerable sum of money, but the loss on the venture—which, as the law now stands, constitutes a constructive total loss of the goods, is due to one of the risks insured against; and he refers more particularly to the words "men-of-war." He refers, of course, to the whole of the clause, but the words which he most particularly relies on are the words "men-of-war." The plaintiffs put their case in two alternative ways. They say in addition that after the vessel put into Messina to have allowed this cargo to go on would have been trading with the enemy contrary to English law and contrary to the proclamations which were in force at the time; and then they say that the goods were further lost because they were in possession and the control of alien enemies, namely, the master and owners of the Kattenturm, and that the alien enemies declined to give the goods up. So far as the last alternative is concerned, it is sufficient to say that that was not pressed by Mr. Butler Aspinall; it was not withdrawn by him, but so far as I can see there is nothing at all in that point. As to the trading with the enemy point, I do not think that really arises in this case because if there was any loss at all it must be put that there was a loss of the venture, and a complete loss and destruction of the venture, when the Kattenturm put into Messina. I find as a fact that the master, notwithstanding his owners' letters or his agent's letters, had no intention of prosecuting the voyage further than Messina within a time which would have been commercially practicable at all, and that the voyage was there and then abandoned. The loss of goods, so far as they were lost, was due to the fact that the voyage was abandoned at Messina, and that there was a destruction of the commercial adventure there. I do not think, therefore, that the second alternative upon which Mr. Butler Aspinall relied, but not strongly, is a matter which I need seriously consider.

What I have seriously to consider is whether the goods were lost within any of the words of the restraints of princes clause in the policy, and in particular whether they were lost owing to men-of-war. The position was that, when the master arrived at Messina, if he had prosecuted his voyage he would have been in serious danger of capture, and it is quite likely, and I anticipate, that if he had in fact prosecuted his voyage and gone much further he would have been captured either by the French or the British fleets. He put into Messina because he was afraid of that event happening. Does that bring him within the words of the policy? Whether the avoidance of a peril, or an attempt to avoid a peril, is in substance the same thing as a loss by the peril depends very much on what the nature of the peril is, and it seems to me quite clear upon the cases that an attempt to avoid capture is not the same as a loss by capture. I do not think it is absolutely necessary that there should be a de facto capture; I think that appears from the case of Butler v. Wildman (3 B. & Ald. 398), the case of the Spanish dollars. On the other hand, it is quite clear that the avoidance of a peril under most circumstances is not the same as loss by the peril itself. That appears from a number of cases; it appears from the case of Hadkinson v. Robinson (3 Bos. & P. 388) and from the case of Kacianoff v. China Traders' Insurance Company Limited (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 524; 111 L. T. Rep. 404; (1914) 3 K. B. 1121), and also from an intermediate case between those two, Nickels and Co. v. London and Provincial Marine and General Insurance Company, a decision of Mathew, J. (6 Com. Cas. 15).

That being the state of the authorities, and bearing in mind that actual capture or actual seizure by men-of-war is not necessary, bearing in mind that the peril must have begun to operate, to use the expression in the Kacianoff case (sup.), and, to use another expression which is in Hadkinson v. Robinson (sup.), that the peril must be operating directly and not circuitously, what one has to consider is, What is the true view to be taken upon the facts in this case? It is quite obvious to me that is a question of degree, and, that being so, the dividing line between one case and another must often be very thin and very subtle. It appears from the Kacianoff case that if the Kattenturm had been chased into Messina the peril of capture would have begun to operate, and I think in that case it might be said that the abandonment of the voyage, the constructive total loss of the goods by the destruction of the venture, was caused by a peril within the policy. If one looks at Butler v. Wildman (sup.) precisely the same thing happened there, only in an accentuated degree. In that case there not only was the ship chased by a hostile man-of-war, but the chase was so hot that the master of the ship preferred to throw the valuable cargo that he had, the Spanish dollars, into the sea rather than that they should fall into the hands of the enemy. Therefore the dollars were not actually captured by the enemy, but there was clearly a loss by capture and the courts so held. In this case there was no chasing by a hostile man-of-war at all. There was no sighting of a hostile man-of-war. The Kattenturm was not driven by either the chasing or the sighting or the intelligence of a particular man-of-war into Messina. The master went into Messina because he feared, and rightly feared, that if he prosecuted his voyage the ship would be captured. The truth of the matter is that he went into Messina to avoid the peril of capture. To use the words upon which Mr. Butler Aspinall most relied, he went into Messina to avoid the peril from "men-of-war" which he would have incurred if he had proceeded upon his voyage.

Those being the considerations on one side and the other, which was it? Had the peril of capture, the peril of "men-of-war," begun to operate, or was this a case where the master had in time gone into a port to avoid the commencement of the operation of that peril? Of course, obviously, that is a point about which different people will have different views. My own view about it, and I entertain quite a clear view, is that the master went into Messina to avoid the peril of men-of-war and to avoid the peril of capture. He went in, not that the peril was not a very real one, but he went in time to avoid the beginning of the peril of capture. The peril of "men-of-war," to use the words of the Lords Justices in the Kacianoff case (sup.), had not begun to operate, and the master very prudently went into Messina. It may very well be that the assured would have desired to insure himself against that very event. So far as he was concerned, except that he got considerable salvage out of it—apart from that—the goods were lost to him, and were equally lost to him as they would have been if the ship had been captured. I am reminded that in this case the goods were English goods, and that if the ship had been captured by a British or French ship there would have been no loss of the goods; but in the ordinary case except for salvage the goods would be just as much lost where a ship puts into port to avoid the commencement of the peril as if they are lost by the peril itself. But I have to construe the words in this policy, and I have to say whether the risks which are mentioned in the policy were risks which in fact caused the loss. In view of the decisions in those cases, I am unable to say that the goods were lost, that the venture was destroyed, by any risk insured against. There was a case of very considerable importance which came first of all before me and afterwards before the Court of Appeal. The name of it is Sanday and Co. v. British and Foreign Marine Insurance Company (sup.). There was a division of opinion in the Court of Appeal, but my judgment was affirmed by a majority. I discussed this very point in that case, and although I am reluctant to refer to any decision of my own, yet it does express the view that I entertained at that time, and the view which I still entertain, of the law applicable to this case. I say on p. 788 (1915) 2 K. B.: "One last point remains: Was the restraint of princes the proximate cause of the loss? The defendants say no, and refer me to a line of cases of which Hadkinson v. Robinson (sup.) is an early example, and Kacianoff v. China Traders' Insurance Company (sup.) is, I think, the latest. The plaintiffs, on the other hand, refer me to Miller v. Law Accident Insurance Company (9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 386; 88 L. T. Rep. 370; (1903) 1 K. B. 712). It is, I think, correct to say that the Hadkinson v. Robinson line of cases proceeds upon the principle that a loss which arises from steps taken to avoid a peril cannot be said to be due to the peril so avoided. In deciding within which set of authorities a given case falls it must always be borne in mind that much depends upon the character and description of the particular peril which has to be alleged and relied upon as the cause of the loss." Notwithstanding that it is my own expression of the law, I think that is sound, and being of the same opinion, and applying the same test to the facts of this case, I have come to the conclusion that this case is not like but is the opposite of Sanday's case, and that these goods were not lost by a peril insured against.

The result must be that my judgment is for the defendants with costs.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Sir John Simon, K.C., Leck, K.C. (Butler Aspinall, K.C. and R. A. Wright with them) for the plaintiffs.—The adventure was frustrated by the perils insured against—namely, (1) "men-of-war," (2) "restraints of princes," and (3) "enemies." In British and Foreign Marine Insurance Company Limited v. Samuel Sanday and Co. (ante, p. 289; 114 L. T. Rep. 521; (1916) A. C. 650) British goods were on a British ship, while here they were on an enemy ship, but the principle of that case applies. The declaration of war put an end to the subject-matter of the adventure assured, as British subjects were forbidden to be concerned with the adventure for an indefinite period. The declaration of war therefore amounted to a restraint of princes, the adventure was destroyed, and there was a constructive total loss. Secondly, the German master of the Kattenturm was in immediate peril of capture when he put into Messina. Whether a loss is due to capture or fear of capture is a question of degree. Here the peril operated directly, causing the loss. It was not a case of a ship remaining in port from fear, but of putting into port. Thirdly, the goods were on an enemy ship in control of an enemy master, who, by order of his Government, was debarred from dealing with the assured or delivering up the goods, and that is a peril of "enemies," a loss by the restraint of an enemy prince. As to "restraint of princes," this case depends on British and Foreign Marine Insurance Company v. Samuel Sanday and Co. (sup.) and falls within that decision. The British owners of the goods were prevented from further pursuing the adventure. The contract of affreightment was automatically terminated by the outbreak of war. Even if that were not so, it was impossible to tender the goods to German purchasers as that would have involved dealing with the enemy. The fact that the ship here was German does not distinguish this from Sanday's case. The duty of the owners of the goods was to prevent the adventure being carried through, and he could not tender the shipping documents. The adventure was that of the plaintiffs' goods to Hamburg and not that of the ship, and by a peril insured against the goods could go no further. When the war broke out there was a destruction of the owners' adventure entitling them to give the defendants notice of abandonment, and there was a constructive total loss. If the goods had reached Hamburg, even then there would have been a loss, because they would have been seized by the enemy. If the jute had belonged to a neutral, the adventure would not have been destroyed, which shows that the loss was by "restraint." They referred to

Kurberg (Arnhold) and Co. v. Blythe, Green, Jourdain, and Co., ante, p. 235; 114 L. T. Rep. 152; (1916) 1 K. B. 495;

Arnould on Marine Insurance, vol. 2, sect. 1142.

As to "capture," Rodocanachi v. Elliott (31 L. T. Rep. 239; L. Rep. 9 C. P. 518) is closely analogous. The peril of "men-of-war" operates here directly, not circuitously. In these days of steamships and wireless telegraphy, capture may be regarded as certain, while in the days of sailing ships there was no certainty of capture. They referred to

Kacianoff v. China Traders' Insurance Company, 12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 524; 111 L. T. Rep. 404; (1914) 3 K. B. 1121;

Phillips on Insurance, 3rd edit., sect. 1115, p. 657.

Sir Robert Finlay, K.C. and T. Mathew Leslie Scott, K.C. and Adair Roche, K.C. with them) for the defendants.—The contention of illegality in the further performance of the contract fails, for it is contrary to the findings of Bailhache, J., who found that the venture became impracticable on account of the fear of capture. What was insured was the transit of goods to Hamburg and of the goods for fifteen days after, but not the commercial venture of selling the goods. The "restraint" in any case was not the proximate cause of the loss, but the desire of the German master not to lose his ship. The plaintiffs are not entitled to take advantage of what might have been a good reason for abandoning the venture if they had acted upon it. If the jute had belonged to a neutral owner, he would have acted just as the plaintiffs did. [They referred to the judgment of Bailhache, J. (sup.) and Sanday's case (sup.).] As to "capture," Hadkinson v. Robinson (sup.) and Kacianoff v. China Traders' Insurance Company (sup.) are perfectly sound law, and Bailhache, J. was right when he said the ship was not driven in port by peril of capture, but went into port before the peril was incurred. To avoid danger is not to incur loss through that danger. In sect. 1115 of Phillips on Insurance, the learned author was trying to overthrow the decisions in Hadkinson v. Robinson and similar cases, but since the date of his book (1854) such cases have been recognised here as good law, and sect. 1115 is in opposition to English law. His contention is also contrary to Kacianoff v. China Traders' Insurance Company (sup.), which case is a conclusive answer to Phillips. Rodocanachi v. Elliott (sup.), though in point in Sanday's case, has little bearing on the present case. As to the peril of "enemies," there is no evidence of any prohibition by the German Government against giving up the goods to a British subject, nor is there any need to assume that the German law in this respect is like the English. It is clear that the plaintiffs did not found their claim on any illegality, but on the refusal of the German captain to deliver up the goods to British subjects. They referred also to Nobel's Explosive Company Limited v. Jenkins, 8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 181; 75 L. T. Rep. 163; (1896) 2 Q. B. 326; 1 Com. Cas. 436.

Sir John Simon, K.C. in reply.—The facts here are practically the same as in Rodocanachi v. Elliott (sup.). In Kacianoff's case (sup.) Lord Reading, C.J. says at p. 1127 of the Law Reports: "The fact of the vessel remaining in port and discharging the cargo there and then was preventing the peril from operating; it was making it impossible that the peril should operate. It would have been a totally different state of things if the vessel had left, and then, outside, had been met and threatened, or if approaching Nagasaki she had been in some danger." That passage applies here, for the ship when at sea put into port owing to the certainty of capture if she proceeded. We do not say here that the voyage of the German ship was illegal, but that the commercial adventure was terminated by illegality. It is plain that if the owner of the jute had been neutral he could not have succeeded against the underwriters as regards "restraint." A notice of abandonment is not good or bad according to whether its giver gives the right reason; the object of the notice is to give information for the benefit of the insurer, not reasons of abandonment. The plaintiffs are entitled to recover because this was a case of British goods going to Germany and the venture was frustrated by "men-of-war," "restraint of princes," and enemies. He referred to

Cur. adv. vult.

May 12, 1916.—Swinfen Eady, L.J. read the following judgment:—The facts which give rise to the dispute in this case may be very shortly stated.

The plaintiffs are British merchants, and in June 1914 they sold in Calcutta to German buyers 500 bales of jute for shipment to Hamburg, upon the terms that the property was not to pass until arrival of the goods at port of destination and payment of the price. Part of this quantity—namely, 218 bales—was shipped on board a general ship, the German steamship Kattenturm, for carriage from Calcutta to Hamburg, and a policy of marine insurance dated the 28th July was effected with the defendants. The clause "warranted free from capture, seizure, &c." is struck out, in consideration of an additional premium. The perils which the insurers are contented to bear include "men-of-war, enemies, takings at sea, arrests, restraints, and detainments of all kings, princes, and people of what nation, condition, or quality soever."

The ship sailed from Calcutta at the end of June, or early in July 1914. She was at Malta, we are told, on the 1st Aug., and left about the 2nd or 3rd Aug. On the 4th Aug., at 11 p.m., a state of war arose between this country and Germany. On the 5th or 6th Aug. the Kattenturm put into Messina, then a neutral port. At some later date, which is not material, she left Messina and went to Syracuse. The master put into Messina because he thought it was a prudent thing to do, having regard to the state of war between Germany and the allies. His was a German ship, and the French and English fleets were watching the seas.

By agreement between the parties a letter from the Admiralty has been put in, and is to be treated as evidence in this case. The letter is as follows: "I am commanded to inform you that any German steamer proceeding on or after the 5th Aug. last through the Mediterranean on a voyage to Hamburg would in their Lordships' opinion have been in peril of capture by British or allied warships when outside neutral territorial waters." Bailhache, J. said that he had no doubt that the master, from his point of view, did a very prudent thing, and the most prudent thing that he could do, when he put into Messina. He further found that the master had no thought of further prosecuting the voyage until the termination of the war; that the period of the war is certain to be long and indefinite, that the voyage must be taken to have been abandoned, and was for all practical purposes abandoned, when the master put into Messina. This is the judge's finding of fact with which I agree. On the 1st Sept. the plaintiffs gave notice of abandonment to the defendants, and claimed that the goods were a constructive total loss, but the defendants declined to accept the abandonment.

On the 28th Oct. 1914 a decree was made by the Italian Government prohibiting the exportation of raw jute; this was published in the Official Gazette of the 4th Nov. 1914, and came into operation on the 5th Nov. 1914. After this last-mentioned date the jute could not be exported from Italy.

On the 11th Nov. 1914 a written communication was made (through the British Consul at Rotterdam and with the sanction of the Board of Trade) to the Hansa Company at Bremen (which owns the ships of the Hansa Line, to which the Kattenturm belonged), in order to ascertain whether the company was willing to deliver up such portions of the cargo of the steamship Kattenturm as belonged to the plaintiffs (amongst others), and, if so, upon what terms.

The company answered on the 30th Nov. that the German Government, by way of retaliation against measures taken by the British Government, had issued a prohibition against delivering goods to British subjects.

This was communicated to the defendants, and on the 16th Dec. 1914 a further notice of abandonment was given to them, and on the 17th Dec. 1914 the writ herein was issued. Subsequently further steps were taken to obtain the cargo and dispose of it in Italy, but these steps were taken by arrangement for the benefit of whomsoever it may concern, and are not to affect the rights of the parties.

On behalf of the plaintiffs it is first contended that the venture of the carriage of the goods to Hamburg was lost by one of the perils insured against—namely, men-of-war; that it was solely owing to the presence of hostile men-of-war in the Mediterranean that the ship was unable to continue her voyage; that actual capture or seizure was not necessary, as appears from the case of the Spanish dollars, Butler v. Wildman (3 B & Ald. 398); and reliance was placed on Phillips on Insurance, 3rd edit., sect. 1115, at p. 657, where in a section dealing with the risk of capture and restraints it is said: "Where, after the risk has begun, the voyage is inevitably defeated . . . by a hostile fleet being in the way rendering the proceeding upon it utterly impracticable . . . an assured in the cargo has the right to abandon."

On the other hand, it was contended on behalf of the defendants that the Kattenturm was never in danger of capture, and ran no risk from men-of-war, because she determined to avoid all risk by entering and remaining in a neutral port.

It is well established in the English law of marine insurance that in many cases the loss of an adventure by a resolution not to incur a particular peril is not the same as and does not occasion a loss by the peril itself: (Hadkinson v. Robinson, 3 Bos. & P. 388; Nickels and Co. v. London and Provincial Marine and General Insurance Company, 6 Com. Cas. 15; Lubbock v. Rowcroft, 5 Esp. 50; and the recent case of Kacianoff v. China Traders' Insurance Company (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 524; 111 L. T. Rep. 404; (1914) 3 K. B. 1121). In Lubbock v. Rowcroft, Lord Ellenborough said that the abandonment was from an apprehension of an enemy's capture, and not from any loss within the terms of the policy. That if such was allowed, every ship about to sail from the Port of London for a port which had fallen into the hands of the French might be abandoned.

It was urged that these authorities, except Kacianoff's case, were old ones, and were not applicable to the way in which commerce was conducted at the present time, and that the chance of avoiding a blockading squadron, or the risk of being captured at sea, was very different in the days of sailing ships from the present days of rapid steaming and wireless telegraphy. It was contended that if the Kattenturm had attempted to proceed through the Straits of Gibraltar to Hamburg there was a practical certainty that she would have been captured, and that as the subject-matter insured was reasonably abandoned on account of its actual total loss appearing to be unavoidable, there was a constructive total loss within sect. 60 of the Marine Insurance Act. In the recent case of Sanday v. British and Foreign Marine Insurance Company Limited (sup.) the House of Lords referred to Hadkinson v. Robinson and Lubbock v. Rowcroft without disapproval, and as existing authorities. Lord Atkinson pointed out that in each of those cases the deterrent was the risk of ultimate capture, if the ships proceeded to their destination, and that the vessels prudently resolved not to incur that risk. It is not difficult to draw a line between vessels which determine not to run a particular risk, and vessels which persevere in their voyage and enter a zone in which they are in peril, persisting until it becomes clear that in the existing circumstances they cannot complete the voyage and escape from the peril, and that the only course is either to desist and abandon the voyage, or inevitably incur a loss by the particular peril. There may be difficulty in applying the distinction to the facts of each case, where the case is brought near the dividing line.

In my opinion, the Kattenturm was never in peril of capture by men-of-war. Her commander prudently resolved not to incur that risk. There appears to be some ground for believing that she arrived at Messina earlier than the 5th Aug., but taking the 5th as the accurate date, only one hour would elapse between a state of war at 11 p.m. on the 4th Aug. and the early morning of the 5th, and the time of her arrival on the 5th or the period during which she had been in neutral Italian waters off the Sicilian coast does not appear. Indeed it does not appear that she was at any time outside neutral territorial waters after a state of war had arisen. She left Malta not later than the 3rd Aug., and the distance to Sicily is only about fifty miles. Under these circumstances I am of opinion that no loss by men-of-war was incurred.

It was urged, nevertheless, that, having regard to the construction placed by the House of Lords on the Marine Insurance Act 1906, the plaintiffs were entitled to succeed; that the subject-matter insured included the adventure, and not merely the goods, and that the party assured was irretrievably deprived of it, because all prospect of safe arrival on the voyage to Germany was hopelessly frustrated when the Kattenturm desisted from her voyage and sought refuge in Sicily. It was said that the case came directly within sect. 60 of the Act, as interpreted in Sanday's case (sup.), and that the subject-matter insured (i.e., the adventure) was reasonably abandoned on account of its actual total loss from capture or men-of-war appearing to be unavoidable.

But to entitle the assured to recover under sect. 60, the actual total loss must appear to be unavoidable from the peril insured against, and to use the language of Lord Atkinson in Sanday's case at p. 665: "Actual capture was . . . the peril insured against. The apprehension of capture is an entirely different thing and was not insured against."

The next question is: Was there a loss by restraint of princes? It is said that immediately on the outbreak of war it became unlawful for the plaintiffs, as British subjects, to trade with the enemy, by sending goods to Hamburg; the sale made by the plaintiffs was to a German firm, on terms of cash in London against documents, within twenty-four hours of the official arrival of the steamer at port of destination; final settlement on average landed weights, at port of discharge, expenses of weighing to be paid by seller. The contention of the plaintiffs is that on the outbreak of war the further prosecution of their venture became illegal; the declaration by His Majesty that a state of war existed was an act of State, making it thenceforward illegal for British subjects to trade with Germany; that the declaration of war amounted to an order to every subject of the Crown to conduct himself in such a way as he is bound to conduct himself in a state of war; that every State ultimately enforces obedience to its laws by force; that restraint is equally imposed whether force is immediately available or not; and that in this case the venture was rendered illegal and was destroyed by restraint falling within the words "restraint of kings, princes, and people."

In support of this argument the case of British and Foreign Marine Insurance Company v. Sanday and Co. (sup) was relied upon; it was urged that the effect of that decision was to render every British venture on the high seas, which involved trading with the enemy, a constructive total loss by the peril of a "restraint of kings, princes," &c, whether such peril in fact occasioned the loss or not. It is true that in that case the owners of the goods took no steps to countermand the venture, but, after the cargoes had been landed by the shipowners at British ports, the owners of the goods gave notice of abandonment to the underwriters. After the goods had been landed and warehoused at the instance of the shipowners, and after the owners of the goods had subsequently established to the satisfaction of the Customs authorities that the goods were not enemy goods, they were dealt with for the benefit of whomsoever it might concern. But it was the action of the shipowners in diverting their ships, and landing the cargoes, that prevented the voyage to Hamburg being continued. This clearly appears from the agreed statement of facts upon which the case proceeded, and was decided.

It must be admitted that there is a close resemblance between the present case and Sanday's case, looked at from this point of view. But, on the other hand, it has never yet been held in England that by the mere force of the existence of a state of war all goods owned by British subjects on their way to ports which during the voyage have become enemy ports, even though in neutral ships, or enemy ships, become constructive total losses, on the ground that trading with the enemy is restrained by what is to be deemed to be a "restraint of princes." Now, the maxim Causa proxima non remota spectanda est has been strictly applied in marine insurance cases. Is it true to say that in point of fact what frustrated the adventure in the present case and prevented the goods from being carried to Hamburg was the fact that trading with the German enemy had become unlawful for British subjects? Certainly not. In my judgment, the fact that the adventure had become illegal by the British common law had no weight whatever with the German master of the Kattenturm. The inference which I should draw from the facts proved in this case, including the letter of the 4th Sept. 1914, written by this German master to Baylis Haynes, Lloyd's agent at Messina, is that if he could have been sure of evading all hostile cruisers, and of arriving safely at Hamburg with the goods, he would certainly have proceeded upon the voyage, and given himself the pleasure of taking to Hamburg and landing safely there all British goods. Again, the possibility of forwarding the goods from Italy by some other vessel was effectually prevented by the Italian decree prohibiting jute from being exported from the country even if such a course had previously been practicable, of which there is no evidence whatever. The plaintiffs as owners of the jute on board, did not, and could not, take any steps to prevent the voyage being continued if the master of the ship decided to continue it. The master of the vessel acted as to him seemed best, both with regard to the ship and the goods on board; if the jute had belonged to a neutral owner, not affected by the consideration of trading with an enemy, the position would have been the same; the voyage in the Kattenturm would not have been continued, and transhipment and forwarding by another vessel, even if otherwise practicable in fact, was prevented by the law against the re-exportation of jute.

The ground of the decision in Sanday's case is thus stated by Lord Loreburn: "Among other things, trading to German ports became unlawful, and an instant duty arose for those two ships to discontinue their voyage to Hamburg. The adventure of carrying this merchandise to its destination became in law a serious offence, and in fact impracticable. . . . The destruction of the adventure was directly caused by His Majesty's declaration." That language has no application to the present case. The British shipowner was bound to obey the British law, and he did so. The German captain was not so bound. The continuance of the voyage was illegal for the British captain; perfectly legal for the German captain. The illegality in fact prevented the British captain from proceeding with his voyage to Hamburg; it did not prevent the German captain, or indeed influence him in the very slightest. Except for the risk from a different peril, the German ship might, and probably would, have proceeded on her voyage and arrived safely at Hamburg, and the goods would have been landed from the ship and safely warehoused. Restraint of princes operating to frustrate an adventure by rendering it illegal had no operation in the present case, and in my opinion the plaintiffs cannot succeed on that ground. The mercantile venture of the plaintiffs was frustrated by the detention of the goods for an indefinite time in Italy, but such detention was not occasioned by any peril insured against, not by a restraint of princes rendering illegal the further prosecution of the voyage.

I cannot arrive at a conclusion of fact that the actual total loss of the adventure, from that peril, appeared to be unavoidable within sect. 60, when that peril did not prevent or affect the continuance of the voyage, and when, if the voyage had proceeded, the adventure would probably have been frustrated by a different peril, capture of the German ship, and when in such a case the underwriter would have been in a different position, as these goods on the ship were British goods.

The third ground upon which the plaintiffs relied was that a loss from the peril of "enemies" had arisen, since the master of the Kattenturm and the Hansa Company of Bremen, German subjects and therefore enemies, had refused to give up the goods at Messina when requested to do so. It will be sufficient to say that the goods were given into the possession of the master by the true owners, and a refusal to redeliver them at a port of refuge during the voyage, even if wrongful, is not a peril from "enemies" within the meaning of the policy.

In my judgment Bailhache, J. came to a right conclusion, and this appeal should be dismissed.

PICKFORD, L.J. read the following judgment:—

This was an action upon a policy of insurance effected by the plaintiffs with the defendants upon jute shipped by the plaintiffs upon the German steamer Kattenturm at and from Calcutta to Hamburg, and by the London Jute Association insurance clauses extending to a period not exceeding fifteen days after final discharge of vessel. The policy included war risks and was against the usual perils, of which I need only mention "men-of-war, enemies, takings at sea, arrests, restraints, and detainments of all kings, princes, and peoples."

The facts are stated in the judgment of the court below and of Swinfen Eady, L.J., and I shall only state them generally. At the time of the declaration of war between Great Britain and Germany, the Kattenturm was in the Mediterranean proceeding on her voyage, and about the 5th or 6th Aug. she put into Messina, and afterwards shifted to Syracuse. The plaintiffs did not at the time of the declaration of war know exactly the position of the Kattenturm, but they knew she was on her voyage, and on the 18th Aug. wrote to the defendants mentioning her name as one of the German steamers in which they were or might be interested. Later in the month they seem to have obtained information that she had put into Messina, and on the 1st Sept. they gave notice of abandonment, as a constructive total loss through consequence of hostilities, of the jute on board the steamship Kattenturm stopped at Messina. The defendants declined to accept the abandonment, but agreed to put the plaintiffs in the same position as if a writ had been issued.

There was a dispute with the master of the vessel as to his giving up the goods, which he at first refused to do except upon terms to which the plaintiffs would not agree, but eventually they went to an Italian buyer without prejudice to the rights of the parties to the policy of insurance. In the meantime the plaintiffs had given a second notice of abandonment on the 16th Dec., on another ground. The defendants declined to accept this abandonment also.

Upon these facts the plaintiffs claimed payment from the defendants as for a constructive total loss on the following grounds: that the frustration of the venture was a loss of the goods; that the venture was frustrated by the restraint of princes because the declaration of war rendered it illegal for the plaintiffs to carry it out by sending the goods on to Hamburg and delivering them to an alien enemy; that there was a loss by capture of men-of-war because the Kattenturm at Messina could not continue her voyage without certainty of capture by reason of the proximity of French and English cruisers; that there was a loss by enemies because the goods were in the hands of an alien enemy on an enemy ship. I agree with Bailhache, J. that the master had no intention of prosecuting the voyage further than Messina within a time that would have been commercially practicable, and that if he had in fact prosecuted his voyage, and gone much further, he would almost certainly have been captured by the French or English fleets, and that the voyage was then and there abandoned. I also agree with him that by the abandonment of the voyage there was a destruction of the adventure.

It was argued before us that this was not the fact, and that the adventure was destroyed because the goods were the property of British subjects, because if they had belonged to neutrals they could have been transhipped into a neutral vessel, and carried to their port of discharge. This may well be so theoretically, but there was no evidence that it could have been done within a time that would have been commercially practicable, and I shall not, without evidence, assume a state of facts which I do not think existed. I therefore think that the act of the master in putting into Messina and remaining in Italian waters was a destruction of the adventure, whether the goods belonged to a British owner or not.

I think it is decided by the case of Sanday v. British and Foreign Marine Insurance Company (sup.) that the frustration of the adventure is a loss of the goods, and that the Marine Insurance Act of 1906 has not altered the law in that respect. That case also, I think, decides that a declaration of war by the Sovereign, by making it illegal to have any commercial relations with the enemy, is a restraint of princes, and that if either the cargo owner or the shipowner, by reason of the declaration, terminates the adventure of sending goods to an enemy port, that is a loss by restraint of princes. It is true that in that case the restraint was exercised on the action of the shipowners who gave up the voyages, but I think the principle applies equally to the cargo owner, and if he terminates the adventure by reason of the proclamation, I think the authority of that decision shows that there is equally a loss by restraint of princes. This, I think, is the effect of that decision, and we must accept it.

The respondents, however, contended that in this case the plaintiffs had not terminated the adventure on that ground, but that it was terminated by the act of the master in breaking off the voyage at Messina, and so making it impossible to carry out the venture. It is not necessary to state any reason for abandonment in the notice, and the plaintiffs did not state any, except the wide ground of consequences of hostilities, but I think the only inference to be drawn from the facts is that they intended to abandon because of the breaking off of the voyage, and consequent inability to carry out the venture. I have already said that I think the breaking off of the voyage did frustrate the venture, irrespective of the nationality of the owners of the goods.

The declaration of war did not prevent the master of the German ship from carrying the goods on to Hamburg, if he could escape the enemy cruisers, and the plaintiffs could have done nothing to prevent him, but they could have given notice of abandonment, and they did not do so during the whole of the month of August, but only after they had heard that the Kattenturm had stopped at Messina, and when they repeated the notice it was on the ground that they could not obtain the goods because the master had been prohibited by the German Government from giving them up. I am satisfied that in giving notice of abandonment they were not acting in any way on the declaration of war, and had not it present to their minds in any way. The point was stated to be a new one in insurance law by Lord Reading, C.J. in Sanday v. British and Foreign Marine Insurance Company (20 Com. Cas. 399), and it obviously did not occur at that time to the plaintiffs. If it had, they would have given notice of abandonment at once, if they wished to act on it.

It was, however, argued for the plaintiffs that the declaration acted automatically, as it is called by Bailhache, J. at p. 311 of the report above mentioned, or ipso facto, to use the words of Lord Wrenbury, and immediately destroyed the adventure without any action or exercise of volition on the part of the plaintiffs. I do not think this is so. The adventure is carrying the goods to Hamburg. I think there may be cases in which the adventure would not be frustrated by the declaration of war, and the cargo owner might not be able to prevent the cargo being carried on to the port of destination and delivered, and the maritime adventure so completed, although the result might be the loss of the goods by capture when they arrived. I do not think the decision in Sanday's case did go so far as the contention of the appellants; it decided that after the declaration of war it was the duty of shipowner and cargo owner not to pursue the adventure, and if either in consequence terminated the adventure there was a loss by restraint of princes.

In this case, as I have said, the adventure was in fact terminated for another reason altogether, that is, because the master put into Messina and discontinued the voyage, and it was not possible to send on the goods, whatever the nationality of the owners, within any commercially possible time. It seems to me that this termination of the adventure was the proximate cause of the loss, and that it is not open to the plaintiffs to say that they might have terminated it for another reason, and if they had done so it would have brought the loss of the adventure within another peril. I think, therefore, that there was not a loss from restraint of princes.

On the other two points I agree with the judgment of Bailhache, J., and do not think it necessary to discuss them at length.

I agree with the argument of the appellants that, in considering the series of cases from Hadkinson v. Robinson (sup.) to Kacianoff v. China Traders' Insurance Association (sup.), regard must be had to the changed conditions of war, and that such questions are always one of degree, but I can see no reason for differing from the conclusion of Bailhache, J. that the master in this case put into Messina to avoid a peril, and not in consequence of a peril.

I think the appeal should be dismissed.

BANKES, L.J. read the following judgment:— This is an appeal from a judgment of Bailhache, J. The appellants are merchants in London. In June 1914 they entered into a contract to sell 500 bales of jute to a German firm. The contract provided that the jute was to be shipped from British India to Hamburg between the 1st June and the 30th June of that year, and that payment was to be made in cash in London within twenty-four hours of the official arrival of the steamer of the port of destination in exchange for bill of lading and freight release, and policy or approved letter of insurance. The contract also contained provisions as to the weighing of a certain percentage of the bales at the port of destination. In part fulfilment of this contract the appellants shipped 288 bales on board the German steamer Kattenturm at Calcutta, and took out a policy of insurance with the respondents covering the goods on the voyage from Calcutta to Hamburg, and for a period not exceeding fifteen days from the first discharge of the vessel, if the goods were temporarily placed on quay or in barge at Hamburg awaiting delivery being taken by the consignee.

The Kattenturm sailed from Calcutta on some date in July, and on the 4th Aug, the date when war was declared between this country and Germany, she was in the Mediterranean. On either the 5th or 6th Aug. the vessel put into Messina, and later she was moved to Syracuse. The learned judge came to the conclusion, on the evidence before him, that the master of the vessel, when he put into Messina, did not intend to continue the voyage, and that from a commercial point of view the voyage must be treated as having been abandoned at that time. I agree with the view taken by the learned judge. The immediate effect upon the appellants' position of the declaration of war, coupled with the action of the master of the vessel, and the impossibility of transhipping the goods on to another vessel, was undoubtedly to put an end both to their commercial adventure of selling the goods to the German firm, and to their maritime adventure of having the goods conveyed from Calcutta to Hamburg for delivery to consignees there. It is with the latter adventure only that the respondents are concerned, and their concern in it is limited by the terms of the policy which they issued to the appellants. The risks against which the respondents, by the terms of their policy, undertook to indemnify the appellants, included "men-of-war, enemies, takings at sea, arrests, restraints, and detainments of all kings and princes."

The question raised by the action and in this appeal is, to use the language of sect. 55 of the Marine Insurance Act 1906, whether the loss which the appellants undoubtedly suffered was proximately caused by a peril insured against. The learned judge decided that it was not.

The appellants put their case in a number of different ways, and endeavoured to support it on a number of quite different grounds. They contended, in the first place, that when the Kattenturm put into Messina she was in the zone of peril, and in risk of capture by English and French men-of-war, and that consequently the loss of the adventure was due to a peril insured against. This appears to have been made the main argument in the court below. The learned judge decided against the appellants' contention on the facts. He came to the conclusion that the master of the Kattenturm put into Messina, and afterwards into Syracuse, to keep out of harm's way, and to avoid any peril of capture, and in this view I agree. It was argued before us that modern conditions required a different view to be taken of what constitutes being in actual peril from what was taken in former times under quite different conditions. I do not agree that this argument goes the length contended for. Conditions have certainly entirely altered, but there must still always be a dividing line between the case of a vessel which is in real peril of capture, and the case of a vessel whose master has taken sufficiently early and sufficiently complete steps to keep altogether out of harm's way. In my opinion the earlier authorities on this point are still good law, and I think that this was recognised as being so in the recent decision in the House of Lords in Sandays' case. Upon this first point, therefore, the appellants fail.

A second point taken was that there was a loss caused by "enemies," and this was based upon the contention that the master of the Kattenturm refused to hand over the goods, either at Messina or at Syracuse, and that this refusal amounted to a seizure of the goods by an enemy. In the court below the learned judge treated this as a point which was not proved, and it is sufficient to say with regard to it that when the facts are considered they do not, in my opinion, establish the contention.

The last point is the one which was most pressed in this court, and was put in the forefront of the argument. It was contended that the effect of the declaration of war rendered it unlawful and impossible for the appellants to complete the adventure, and that even if the master had determined to continue the voyage, and had landed the goods at Hamburg, their seizure there by the enemy was inevitable, and that on these grounds there was, within the meaning of sect. 60 of the Marine Insurance Act, a constructive total loss of the subject-matter insured, because that subject-matter had been reasonably abandoned on account of its actual loss appearing to be unavoidable. In support of this contention the decision in Sanday's case was much relied on. There is, however, this essential distinction between the facts in Sanday's case and the facts in the present one. In Sanday's case there was no dispute that the masters of the vessels did in fact desist from their respective voyages because of the declaration of war, and the illegality of proceeding to their destinations, and that the owners of the goods gave notice of abandonment because of the action of the masters in thus determining the adventures. In the present case both points are in dispute. This point Bailhache, J. appears to have dealt with very shortly in the court below. In the report of his judgment in 31 Times L. Rep. 538, he says that the question does not arise having regard to the decision at which he had arrived on the first point. In this conclusion of the learned judge I agree. Having regard to the stress laid upon this part of the appellants' case, I think it necessary to state my reasons. The appellants have insisted upon their right to have attention focussed upon their position and their action as cargo owners, and claim that their position must not be prejudiced by a consideration of the action of the shipowner or his master, over whose actions they have no control, and whose actions do not bind them. They complain that sufficient attention has not been paid to their position and their action in the decision at which the learned judge has arrived. It appears to me that the weak part of the appellants' case on this point is that it fails to pay sufficient attention to what, in my opinion, was the real position and action of the appellants. It is an essential condition of a constructive total loss that there shall have been an abandonment by the assured to the insurer, and abandonment involves an election by the assured. The assured has an option whether he will or will not elect to treat any given set of circumstances as a constructive total loss. If he does so elect he must, in a case like the present, give notice of abandonment within a reasonable time after the receipt of reliable information of the loss: (sect. 62 (3) of the Marine Insurance Act 1906). When once the assured has exercised his option and given notice of abandonment, he must, I think, be bound by his election; further, to render the insurer liable upon a policy, the assured must show that the circumstances which he has elected to treat as a constructive total loss were the proximate cause of the loss sustained. If these conclusions are correct, how do they apply to the present case? They appear to me to put the appellants in this difficulty. If the appellants elected to treat the action of the master, in abandoning the voyage at Messina, as a constructive total loss, then they exercised their option in respect of circumstances which, upon the finding of the learned judge, and in my opinion also, were the proximate cause of the loss sustained, but which, on the other hand, were not brought about by a peril insured against. If, on the other hand, they seek to found their election on some other set of circumstances, they must prove (1) that they did so elect, and (2) that the circumstances were the proximate cause of the loss sustained. As I understand the decision in Sanday's case in the House of Lords, it is an authority for the proposition that had the assured, immediately on the declaration of war, elected to treat that circumstance with its attendant consequences, not only of the illegality but the possibility of completing the adventure, as a constructive total loss, they would have been entitled to recover in this action. In my opinion there is no evidence that the appellants did so elect. On the contrary, I think the evidence is conclusive the other way. No notice of abandonment was given until the 1st Sept., which seems to me very late, if not too late, if the election was founded on the declaration of war, but in any event is quite inconsistent with the idea that the appellants were exercising their option because of the declaration of war, the effects of which were immediate, and required no investigation. In the second place, the notice, when sent, refers to the fact that the Kattenturm was stopped at Messina. The third fact that appears to me to be very material on this point is that a second notice of abandonment was given as late as December, and the ground is stated to be that the owners of the Kattenturm had definitely stated on the 20th Nov. last that the German Government had prohibited any delivery of the goods to British subjects. If this is the true inference from the facts, it seems to me impossible for the appellants to ignore the action of the master in abandoning the voyage as he did; that action did in fact frustrate the adventure, and, unless the appellants can show that they took advantage of some circumstances anterior in date to the action of the master, his action must be the proximate cause of the loss, and any subsequent action of the assured becomes immaterial.

For these reasons I think that the judgment of Bailhache, J. was correct.

CROSSFIELD AND CO. v. KYLE SHIPPING COMPANY. (a)

Bill of lading inconsistent with charter-party—Prevalence of bill of lading—"Perils of the sea."

By a charter-party dated the 28th May 1913 the plaintiffs chartered the steamship K., belonging to the defendants, to proceed to Grindstone Island, New Brunswick, and there load a cargo of timber and therewith proceed to certain ports (including Manchester) as ordered. Freight was to be payable on measurement of quantity delivered as ascertained at port of discharge, and all responsibility of the charterers under the charter was to cease as soon as the cargo was alongside. The mutual exceptions included "perils of the sea." The captain or his agent was empowered to sign bills of lading which, it was agreed, should be "conclusive evidence against the owners as establishing the quantity delivered to the ship as stated therein." The plaintiffs gave instructions that the vessel when loaded should proceed to Manchester. The K. was loaded from lighters, the contents of which was checked by surveyors as it left the shore. Owing to rough weather, a quantity of the timber fell between the lighter and the ship and was lost, but despite this the master of the vessel signed a bill of lading in this form: "Shipped in good order and well conditioned on board the steamship Kylestrome" the quantities of timber contained in the surveyors' reports. The result was that on arrival at Manchester the cargo was found to be short. In an action by the plaintiffs for damages for short delivery the defendants contended that the timber was lost through perils of the sea, since by the charter-party the terms of which must be incorporated in the bill of lading, the responsibility of the charterer ceased as soon as the cargo was alongside, whereby the responsibility of the defendants commenced and the exception of "perils of the sea" came into operation.

Held, that the words in the bill of lading, "shipped . . . on board the steamship Kylestrome," were inconsistent with the provision in the charter-party that the cargo was only to be delivered alongside, and must prevail; that, in consequence, the exception of "perils of the sea" never came into operation, and the plaintiffs were therefore entitled to succeed.

ACTION tried by Bailhache, J.

On the 11th April 1913 the plaintiffs, Crossfield and Co., timber merchants, of Barrow-in-Furness, entered into a contract with J. Nelson Smith, of St. John, New Brunswick, to buy a cargo of wood which was to be shipped at Grindstone Island for Manchester on c.i.f. terms.

On the 28th May J. Nelson Smith chartered the steamship Kylestrome to load the cargo in question. By the charter-party it was agreed that the steamship Kylestrome should, with all convenient speed, sail and proceed to Grindstone Island, New Brunswick, and there load a cargo of timber, and being so loaded should therewith proceed to a number of named ports (including Manchester) as ordered on signing bills of lading.

The charter-party continued in these terms:

2. Freight payable on measurement of quantity delivered as and when ascertained at the port of discharge. . . . All responsibility whatsoever of the charterers hereunder ceases as soon as the cargo is alongside.

3. The act of God, perils of the sea, &c., always mutually excepted, even when occasioned by negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowners.

13. Captain or agent to sign bills of lading as per surveyors' return for the cargo, and, if required, for separate parcels and deliver accordingly.

14. Bills of lading shall be conclusive evidence against the owners as establishing the quantity delivered to ship as stated therein. The captain's or agent's signature to be accepted in all cases as binding on owners.

On the 28th June the Kylestrome arrived at Grindstone Island and moored at the buoys at the back of the island. On the 30th June loading commenced, which was performed from lighters which carried their cargo stowed athwartships. The captain's agent signed the bills of lading in these terms:

Shipped in good order and well conditioned by J. Nelson Smith on board the steamship called the steamship Kylestrome . . . one hundred and seventy-seven thousand two hundred and eighty-one pieces of deals, battens, &c., containing three million one hundred and seventy thousand five hundred and fifty-five superficial feet . . . in accordance with charter-party dated May 28, 1913, the terms, conditions, and exceptions (including negligence clause) contained in which are herewith incorporated and form part hereof. In witness whereof the master of the said vessel hath affirmed to two bills of lading all of this tenor and date, one of which being accomplished, the other to stand void. — (Signed) J. F. KNIGHT AND CO., Agents.— Harvey, N.B., July 16, 1913.

On the 17th July the Kylestrome left Grindstone Island. On arrival at Manchester it was found that the cargo was short by eighty-five standards. The plaintiffs in consequence brought this action against the defendants to recover 558*l.* damages for non-delivery of cargo which they alleged had been lost. The defendants in their defence said that the cargo was lost while alongside the ship; that the loss was therefore due to perils of the sea; and that responsibility on their part was in consequence excluded by the exceptions clause in the charter-party.

BAILHACHE, J.—The Kylestrome was chartered on the 28th May 1913 to proceed to Grindstone Island, New Brunswick, and there load a cargo of timber, and bring it to some port or other in the United Kingdom It brought the cargo to the Manchester Ship Canal, where it arrived on the 31st July 1913, going into berth the same or the next day. So far as the ship was concerned, the cargo was completely discharged on the 9th Aug., and the ship went away.

The cargo was established on a bill of lading, which stated the number of pieces of wood on board and the number of superficial feet. The charter-party, or more particularly the bills of lading, were to be "conclusive evidence against the owners as establishing the quantity delivered to the ship."

When the cargo was discharged—the discharge being entirely by the Manchester Ship Canal Company—it turned out that there was a shortage of eighty-five standards. There was no loss of cargo after it had been received on board, but there was this shortage between the amount said to have been established by the bills of lading and the Manchester out-turn reports.

It is suggested that there may have been some serious mistake in the report of the out-turn from the Manchester Ship Canal Company. It is true that where a tally passes through several hands there is always a liability to error, but in this case nothing has been given to show that there was any error. The method of tallying is most elaborate. I do not propose to go into all its details, but the circumstances of the system are that no tally is made at the ship's side. When the ship arrives, she is allocated a berth, and alongside her on the quay there is a clear space on to which the cargo is taken from the ship. Some of the cargo in the course of discharge goes straight away to customers who have bought it. The goods are delivered either by railway truck or by lorry. When the cargo goes away in this way the cargo is tallied into the truck and into the lorry. When it goes by railway truck a statement of the number of pieces in the truck is given to the railway company, who have an opportunity of checking it. When it goes away by lorry a similar statement is given to the lorry driver.

The rest of the cargo is first of all put on the quay in the space opposite the ship, and tallied. If it is not wanted for delivery it is removed to a storing ground some one and a half miles away, inside a walled area, which is part of the Manchester Ship Canal Company's premises. When it arrives there it is tallied, and stacked in various stacks according to its lengths. These stacks are counted over and tallied there by the persons in charge. When it does go away from there it is also tallied into trucks or lorries. It is true to say that the full basis of the thing is the correct tally, which is made in the first instance by the persons who tally either into the truck or lorry or into this storing ground.

Having regard to the very careful way in which it is done, and the elaborate system which prevails at the Manchester Ship Canal, I should be quite unable to hold that they had made anything like so serious a mistake as would be represented by a deficiency of eighty-five standards of this timber, unless there was some positive evidence that some mistake had in fact been made.

I have come to the conclusion upon the facts of the case that the quantity which the Manchester Ship Canal Company show by their out-turn and the quantity on this steamer is the correct quantity. That being so, it is agreed that that quantity is eighty-five standards short of the quantity mentioned in the bills of lading. The ship is liable for the quantity mentioned in the bills of lading, as conclusively on board the ship.

Whether it is conclusively on board ship depends upon the construction of the bills of lading and the charter-party. Before I come to the construction of the bill of lading and the charter-party, I want to say a word as to what happened at the other end.

The cargo was put into lighters and taken in the lighters to the ship's side. As the cargo was put into the lighters it was tallied by surveyors. The figures in these surveyors' reports are all collected together, and ultimately, when they have been all collected together, are put into the bill of lading which is presented to the master for signature, together with a synopsis of the surveyors' reports as to figures. The master of the ship has an opportunity, if he likes, of seeing the reports.

In the present case the captain did not sign. He wanted to get the ship away, and he gave his agent authority to sign. The agent signed the bill of lading after seeing the reports, or after having an opportunity of seeing the reports. From the master's protest it appears that after the cargo had been delivered into lighters alongside this ship there was one day during the loading which was rough, and a good deal of the timber was battered about, and some of it was lost between the lighter and the ship. Whether that quantity was as much as eighty-five standards I do not know; but plaintiffs, who had a policy which covered the cargo during the loading as well as on the voyage, put the matter before their underwriters, and their underwriters paid for this loss. These are the circumstances on the other side.

By the charter-party the cargo is to be brought alongside, and freight is payable on the quantity delivered as and when ascertained at the port of discharge, less the value of cargo short delivered, if any, and all responsibility of the charterers ceases as soon as the cargo is alongside. Mr. Roche says that shows quite clearly that, so far as the ship is concerned, the ship takes the responsibility for the cargo when the cargo is delivered into lighters alongside the ship and before the cargo has, in fact, reached the ship's deck. It goes on further:

> Captain or agent to sign bills of lading as per surveyors' return for the cargo, and if required for separate parcels, and deliver accordingly. Bills of lading shall be conclusive evidence against the owners as establishing the quantity delivered to ship, as stated therein. The captain's or agent's signature to be accepted in all cases as binding on owners.

By the contract of sale, dated the 11th April 1913, the goods were deliverable by the sellers to the vessel at Grindstone Island, and "the seller is not to be responsible for any deterioration of quality or condition after the goods have been sent alongside the vessel."

Mr. Roche said that if you look at the matter and trace it out all the way through you will find that these documents fall into line thus: He says the responsibility of the seller to the buyer finishes when the goods are alongside the ship. So far as the ship is concerned, the only duty of the shipper is to deliver the goods alongside the ship in lighters, and the ship from that time takes the responsibility.

The ship, taking from that time the responsibility, the exceptions clause in the charty-party comes into play before the wood, so far as the ship is concerned, reaches the ship's deck, and while the goods are in the lighters alongside at the ship's responsibility. He points out that the surveyors' report, the tally made by surveyors on the other side, does not purport to be a tally of anything at the ship's side, and only purports to be figures of the tally of the wood as it is put into the lighters.

He says, seeing how the facts stand, that the bill of lading is to be conclusive evidence of the quantity delivered to the ship, not delivery to the ship in the sense that it actually reaches the ship's deck, but delivery to the ship in this sense, that it is delivered to the ship alongside in a position in which from that time onwards the ship takes full responsibility; that being the case, it is only natural the ship is prepared to take the tally made by the surveyors of the cargo going into the lighters, because they know quite well that if there is any loss by any of the excepted perils they will not be responsible for the cargo so lost.

The shipper's liability ends at a particular place, and the ship's responsibility begins at the same place, the statement in the bill of lading takes effect from the same place, and the buyers know perfectly well that is so because in their policy of insurance they are careful to insure from that point also during the loading and during the voyage. There is, of course, a great deal to be said in favour of this proposition, and of that line of argument. It does seem to make everything, as Mr. Roche says, fall into line and make everything perfectly reasonable.

There is, however, this very serious difficulty in the way. There is the difficulty of the bill of lading itself. The bill of lading says: "Shipped in good order and well conditioned on board the steamship Kylestrome."

It is true the bill of lading incorporates the charter-party, but it is also true to say that where the bill of lading incorporates the charter-party, if there is any inconsistency between the charter-party so incorporated and the bill of lading, the bill of lading must prevail, and any inconsistency in the charter-party must go. It is difficult to see how "shipped in good order and well conditioned on board the Kylestrome" can mean anything else than that the goods which are mentioned in the bill of lading have in fact reached the ship's deck, and if it means that, that the goods have in fact reached the ship's deck, then it is quite clear that the exceptions in the bill of lading relating to what happens to the goods before they reach the ship's deck cannot be incorporated into the bill of lading because ex hypothesi the goods are already on the ship's deck.

However, I should myself, I think, have been so attracted by Mr. Roche's argument and the business sense of it, that I should very likely have acceded to it and come to the same conclusion as that come to by Hawkins, J. in Pyman v. Burt (1 Cab. & E. 207).

But it appears to me this case is distinguishable in principle from the case of Lishman v. Christie (57 L. T. Rep. 552; 19 Q. B. Div. 333). In that case Pyman v. Burt was cited to the court, and the court seems to have thought the circumstances were in some way distinguishable. Lord Esher says they are not distinguishable, and that Pyman v. Burt was wrong.

In Lishman v. Christie (sup.) Lindley, L.J. said: "The question in this case seems to me to turn entirely on the effect of the clause in the charter-party which provides that the bill of lading shall be conclusive evidence against the owners of the quantity of cargo received as stated therein. The reasons for the insertion of such a clause are tolerably obvious. The shipowner in the present case desires to do exactly what he has agreed not to do—viz, to show that the ship did not receive so large a quantity as by the bill of lading it is stated to have received. I cannot see on what principle, in the face of that provision, he can claim to do so. If there had been any fraud the question would have been different, but there can be no suggestion of fraud here. The shipowner has agreed to be bound by the statement in the bill of lading, and by that he must stand or fall. The whole object of such a provision as this is to prevent such a dispute as has here arisen. For these reasons I agree that the appeal should be dismissed."

Inasmuch as the charter-party in that case is practically identical with the charter-party in question here, it seems to me I should be going wrong if I followed Pyman v. Burt or if I yielded to what I think is very likely the business reason of the thing, and followed my own inclination and Mr. Roche's argument.

The result must be that the plaintiffs succeed. There can be no question of figures and, I gather, no question of amount. The amount claimed is 588*l.* 4*s.* 11*d.*, and that is the amount for which I give judgment, with costs.

THE ZAMORA. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (IN PRIZE), ENGLAND.

Prize Court—Neutral cargo—Contraband—Requisition before condemnation—Order in Council—Validity—Prize Court Rules 1915—Order XXIX., rr. 1, 2, 5.

By Order XXIX. of the Prize Court Rules, as authorised by an Order in Council, it is provided that: "Where it is made to appear to the judge on application of the proper officer of the Crown that it is desirable to requisition on behalf of His Majesty a ship in respect of which no final decree of condemnation has been made, he shall order that the ship shall be appraised, and that upon an undertaking being given . . . the ship shall be released and delivered to the Crown."

By Order I. of the Prize Court Rules: "Unless the contrary intention appears, the provisions of these rules relative to ships shall extend and apply, mutatis mutandis, to goods.

A Swedish vessel carrying copper, which was absolute contraband of war, was seized and brought into a British port. A writ was issued that the ship and her cargo should be condemned and confiscated. Before any adjudication as to these claims had taken place the Procurator-General, on behalf of the War Department, took out a summons that the Crown should be entitled to requisition the copper, leaving the question of the right to the same, or the proceeds of the sale thereof, to be decided at some later date.

Held, that Order XXIX., r. 1, as an imperative direction to the court, is not binding; that there was no inherent power in the Prize Court to sell or realise the property in its custody pending decision in such a case as this; that a belligerent Power has by international law the right to requisition vessels or goods in the custody of its Prize Court pending a decision of the question whether they should be condemned or released, but such right is subject to certain limitations: First, the vessel or goods in question must be urgently required for use in connection with the defence of the realm, the prosecution of the war, or other matters involving national security, secondly, there must be a real question to be tried, so that it would be improper to order an immediate release, and, thirdly, the right must be enforced by application to the Prize Court, which must determine judicially whether, under the particular circumstances of the case, the right is exercisable; and that in the present case there was insufficient evidence before the President to justify him making the order appealed from. The order was therefore set aside.

As the copper had been used up by the War Department no order for its restitution could be made, and there must be a declaration instead and leave granted the claimants, in the event of their ultimately succeeding in the proceedings for condemnation, to apply to the court below for damages, if any, as they might have suffered by reason of the order and what had been done under it. In a proper case both damages and costs can be awarded against the Crown or the officer representing the Crown in the proceedings.

APPEAL from an order of the President of the Admiralty Division of the High Court in Prize, reported 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 144; 113 L. T. Rep. 649; (1916) P. 27.

The question raised for decision was whether the War Department had power to requisition 400 tons of copper on board the neutral steamship Zamora, belonging to the Swedish Trading Company of Stockholm, and destined for a neutral port, before the cargo had been properly condemned as prize of war.

The Zamora, when proceeding from New York to Stockholm, was, on the 8th April 1915, stopped by a British warship and taken to Barrow-in-Furness. A writ having been issued in prize claiming confiscation of both the ship and cargo, a summons was taken out by the Procurator-General that the War Department be at liberty forthwith to requisition part of her cargo—namely, the copper—in accordance with the provisions of Order XXIX., r. 5, of the Prize Court Rules as altered by an Order in Council of the 29th April 1915.

(a) Reported by W. E. REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Order XXIX., r. 1, provides that:

Where it is made to appear to the judge on the application of the proper officer of the Crown that it is desired to requisition on behalf of His Majesty a ship in respect of which no final decree of condemnation has been made, he shall order that the ship shall be appraised, and that, upon an undertaking being given in accordance with rule 5 of this order, the ship shall be released and given to the Crown.

Rule 5 provides that:

In every case of requisition under this order an undertaking in writing shall be filed by the proper officer for the Crown for payment into court on behalf of the Crown of the appraised value of the ship. . .

By Order I., r. 2, the provisions of these rules relative to ships are applicable also to goods.

Sir S. T. Evans, P. held that he had power to make the order, and accordingly directed that the copper should be delivered up to the War Department in accordance with rule 5.

The owners of the copper appealed and submitted that the proceedings were not in conformity with the law of nations.

April 7. — The considered judgment of the committee was delivered by Lord PARKER OF WADDINGTON. — On the 8th April 1915 the Zamora, a Swedish steamship bound from New York to Stockholm with a cargo of grain and copper, was stopped by one of His Majesty's cruisers, between the Faroe and Shetland Islands, and taken for purposes of search first to the Orkney Islands and then to Barrow-in-Furness. She was seized as prize in the latter port on the 19th April 1915, and in due course placed in the custody of the marshal of the Prize Court. It is admitted, on the one hand, that the copper was contraband of war, and, on the other hand, that the steamship was ostensibly bound for a neutral port. The question whether either steamship or cargo was lawful prize must therefore depend on whether the steamship had a concealed or ulterior destination in an enemy country, or whether the copper was by means of transhipment or otherwise, in fact, destined for the enemy.

On the 14th May 1915 a writ was issued by His Majesty's Procurator-General claiming confiscation of both vessel and cargo, and on the 14th June 1915 the President, at the instance of the Procurator-General, made an order under Order XXIX., r. 1, of the Prize Court Rules giving leave to the War Department to requisition the copper, but subject to an undertaking being given in accordance with the provisions of Order XXIX., r. 5. This appeal is from the President's order of the 14th June 1915.

It will be convenient in the first place to consider the precise terms of Order XXIX. of the Prize Court Rules. In so doing it must be borne in mind that though the order in terms applies to ships only, it is by virtue of Order I., r. 2, of the Prize Court Rules equally applicable to goods. The first rule of Order XXIX. provides that where it is made to appear to the judge on the application of the proper officer of the Crown that it is desired to requisition, on behalf of His Majesty, a ship in respect of which no final decree of condemnation has been made, he shall order that the ship be appraised, and, upon an undertaking being given in accordance with rule 5 of the order, the ship shall be released and delivered to the Crown. The third rule of the order provides that where in any case of requisition under the order it is made to appear to the judge on behalf of the Crown that the ship is required for the service of His Majesty forthwith, the judge may order the same to be forthwith released and delivered to the Crown without appraisement. In such a case the amount payable by the Crown is to be fixed by the judge under rule 4 of this order. The fifth rule of the order provides that in every case of requisition under the order an undertaking in writing shall be filed by the proper officer of the Crown for payment into court on behalf of the Crown of the appraised value of the ship or of the amount fixed under rule 4 of the order, as the case may be, at such time or times as the court shall declare that the same or any part thereof is required for the purpose of payment out of court.

The first observation which their Lordships desire to make on this order is that the provisions of rule 1 are primâ facie imperative. The judge is to act in a certain way whenever it is made to appear to him that it is desired to requisition the vessel or goods in question on His Majesty's behalf. If this be the true construction of the rule and the judge is, as a matter of law, bound thereby, there is nothing more to be said and the appeal must fail. If, however, it appear that the rule so construed is not, as a matter of law, binding on the judge, it will have, if possible, to be construed in some other way. Their Lordships, propose, therefore, to consider in the first place whether the rule construed as an imperative direction to the judge is to any and what extent binding.

The Prize Court Rules derive their force from orders of His Majesty in Council. These orders are expressed to be made under the powers vested in His Majesty by virtue of the Prize Court Act 1894 or otherwise. The Act of 1894 confers on the King in Council power to make rules as to the procedure and practice of the Prize Courts. So far, therefore, as the Prize Court Rules relate to procedure and practice they have statutory force and are, undoubtedly, binding. But Order XXIX., r. 1, construed as an imperative direction to the judge is not merely a rule of procedure or practice. It can only be a rule of procedure or practice if it be construed as prescribing the course to be followed if the judge is satisfied that according to the law administered in the Prize Court the Crown has, independently of the rule, a right to requisition the vessel or goods in question, or if the judge is minded in exercise of some discretionary power inherent in the Prize Court to sell the vessel or goods in question to the Crown. If, therefore, Order XXIX., r. 1, construed as an imperative direction be binding, it must be by virtue of some power vested in the King in Council otherwise than by virtue of the Act of 1894. It was contended by the Attorney-General that the King in Council has such a power by virtue of the Royal Prerogative, and their Lordships will proceed to consider this contention.

The idea that the King in Council, or indeed any branch of the executive, has power to prescribe or alter the law to be administered by courts of law in this country is out of harmony with the principles of our Constitution. It is true that, under a number of modern statutes, various branches of the executive have power to make rules having the force of statutes, but all such rules derive their validity from the statute which creates the power, and not from the executive body by which they are made. No one would contend that the prerogative involves any power to prescribe or alter the law administered in courts of common law or equity. It is, however, suggested that the manner in which Prize Courts in this country are appointed and the nature of their jurisdiction differentiate them in this respect from other courts.

Prior to the Naval Prize Act 1864, jurisdiction in matters of prize was exercised by the High Court of Admiralty, by virtue of a commission issued by the Crown under the Great Seal at the commencement of each war. The commission no doubt owed its validity to the prerogative, but it cannot on that account be properly inferred that the prerogative extended to prescribing or altering the law to be administered from time to time under the jurisdiction thereby conferred. The courts of common law and equity in like manner originated in an exercise of the prerogative. The form of commission conferring jurisdiction in prize on the Court of Admiralty was always substantially the same. Their Lordships will take that quoted by Lord Mansfield in Lindo v. Rodney (2 Doug. 614) as an example. It required and authorised the Court of Admiralty "to proceed upon all and all manner of captures, seizures, prizes, and reprisals of all ships or goods which are or shall be taken, and to hear and determine according to the course of Admiralty and the law of nations." If these words be considered, there appear to be two points requiring notice, and each of them, so far from suggesting any reason why the prerogative should extend to prescribing or altering the law to be administered by a Court of Prize, suggests strong grounds why it should not.

In the first place, all those matters upon which the court is authorised to proceed are, or arise out of, acts done by the sovereign power in right of war. It follows that the King must, directly or indirectly, be a party to all proceedings in a Court of Prize. In such a court his position is in fact the same as in the ordinary courts of the realm upon a petition of right which has been duly fiated. Rights based on sovereignty are waived, and the Crown for most purposes accepts the position of an ordinary litigant. A Prize Court must of course deal judicially with all questions which come before it for determination, and it would be impossible for it to act judicially if it were bound to take its orders from one of the parties to the proceedings.

In the second place, the law which the Prize Court is to administer is not the national or, as it is sometimes called, the municipal law, but the law of nations—in other words, international law. It is worth while dwelling for a moment on this distinction. Of course, the Prize Court is a municipal court, and its decrees and orders owe their validity to municipal law. The law it enforces may therefore, in one sense, be considered a branch of municipal law. Nevertheless, the distinction between municipal and international law is well defined. A court which administers municipal law is bound by and gives effect to the law as laid down by the sovereign State which calls it into being. It need inquire only what that law is, but a court which administers international law must ascertain and give effect to a law which is not laid down by any particular State, but originates in the practice and usage long observed by civilised nations in their relations towards each other or in express international agreement. It is obvious that, if and so far as a Court of Prize in this country is bound by and gives effect to the orders of the King in Council purporting to prescribe or alter the international law, it is administering not international but municipal law; for an exercise of the prerogative cannot impose legal obligation on anyone outside the King's dominions who is not the King's subject. If an Order in Council were binding on the Prize Court, such court might be compelled to act contrary to the express terms of the commission from which it derived its jurisdiction.

There is yet another consideration which points to the same conclusion. The acts of a belligerent Power in right of war are not justiciable in its own courts unless such Power, as a matter of grace, submit to their jurisdiction. Still less are such acts justiciable in the courts of any other power. As is said by Story, J. in the case of The Invincible (2 Gall. 39, at p. 43) "acts done under the authority of one Sovereign can never be subject to the revision of the tribunals of another Sovereign, and the parties to such acts are not responsible therefor in their individual capacity." It follows that but for the existence of Courts of Prize no one aggrieved by the acts of a belligerent Power in times of war could obtain redress otherwise than through diplomatic channels and at the risk of disturbing international amity. An appropriate remedy is, however, provided by the fact that, according to international law, every belligerent Power must appoint and submit to the jurisdiction of a Prize Court to which any person aggrieved by its acts has access, and which administers international as opposed to municipal law—a law which is theoretically the same, whether the court which administers it is constituted under the municipal law of the belligerent Power or of the Sovereign of the person aggrieved, and is equally binding on both parties to the litigation. It has long been well settled by diplomatic usage that, in view of the remedy thus afforded, a neutral aggrieved by any act of a belligerent Power cognisable in a Court of Prize ought, before resorting to diplomatic intervention, to exhaust his remedies in the Prize Courts of the belligerent Power. A case for such intervention arises only if the decisions of these courts are such as to amount to a gross miscarriage of justice. It is obvious, however, that the reason for this rule of diplomacy would entirely vanish if a Court of Prize, while nominally administering a law of international obligation, were in reality acting under the direction of the executive of the belligerent Power.

It cannot, of course, be disputed that a Prize Court like any other court is bound by the legislative enactments of its own sovereign State. A British Prize Court would certainly be bound by Acts of the Imperial Legislature. But it is none the less true that if the Imperial Legislature passed an Act the provisions of which were inconsistent with the law of nations, the Prize Court in giving effect to such provisions would no longer be administering international law. It would in the field covered by such provisions be deprived of its proper function as a Prize Court. Even if the provisions of the Act were merely declaratory of the international law, the authority of the court as an interpreter of the law of nations would be thereby materially weakened, for no one could say whether its decisions were based on a due consideration of international obligations, or on the binding nature of the Act itself. The fact, however, that the Prize Courts in this country would be bound by Acts of the Imperial Legislature affords no ground for arguing that they are bound by the executive orders of the King in Council.

In connection with the foregoing considerations, their Lordships attach considerable importance to the report dated the 18th Jan. 1753 of the committee appointed by His Britannic Majesty to reply to the complaints of Frederick II. of Prussia as to certain captures of Prussian vessels made by British ships during the war with France and Spain, which broke out in 1744. By way of reprisals for these captures, the Prussian King had suspended the payment of interest on the Silesian loan. The report, which derives additional authority from the fact that it was signed by Mr. William Murray, then Solicitor-General, afterwards Lord Mansfield, contains a valuable statement as to the law administered by Courts of Prize. This is stated to be the law of nations, modified in some cases by particular treaties. "If," says the report, "a subject of the King of Prussia is injured by or has a demand upon any person here, he ought to apply to your Majesty's Courts of Justice, which are equally open and indifferent to foreigner or native; so, vice versâ, if a subject here is wronged by a person living in the dominions of His Prussian Majesty, he ought to apply for redress in the King of Prussia's Courts of Justice. If the matter of complaint be a capture at sea during war, and the question relative to prize, he ought to apply to the judicatures established to try these questions. The law of nations, founded upon justice, equity, conscience, and the reason of the thing, and confirmed by long usage, does not allow of reprisals, except in case of violent injuries directed or supported by the State, and justice absolutely denied in re minime dubia by all the tribunals and afterwards by the Prince. When the judges are left free and give sentence according to their conscience, though it should be erroneous, that would be no ground for reprisals. Upon doubtful questions different men think and judge differently, and all a friend can desire is that justice should be impartially administered to him as it is to the subjects of that Prince in whose courts the matter is tried." The report further points out that in England "the Crown never interferes with the course of justice. No order or intimation is given to any judge." It also contains the following statement: "All captures at sea as prize in time of war must be judged of in the Court of Admiralty according to the law of nations and particular treaties, if there are any. There never existed a case where a court, judging according to the laws of England only, took cognisance of prize. . . . It never was imagined that the property of a foreign subject taken as prize on the high seas could be affected by laws peculiar to England." This report is, in their Lordships' opinion, conclusive that in 1753 any notion of a Prize Court being bound by the executive orders of the Crown, or having to administer municipal as opposed to international law, was contrary to the best legal opinion of the day.

The Attorney-General was unable to cite any case in which an order of the King in Council had as to matters of law been held to be binding on a Court of Prize. He relied chiefly on the judgment of Lord Stowell in the case of The Fox (Roscoe, vol. 2, 61; Edw. 311). The actual decision in this case was to the effect that there was nothing inconsistent with the law of nations in certain Orders in Council made by way of reprisals for the Berlin and Milan Decrees, though if there had been no case for reprisals the orders would not have been justified by international law. The decision proceeded upon the principle that where there is just cause for retaliation neutrals may by the law of nations be required to submit to inconvenience from the acts of a belligerent Power greater in degree than would be justified had no just cause for retaliation arisen, a principle which had been already laid down in The Lucy (Edw. 122).

The judgment of Lord Stowell contains, however, a remarkable passage quoted in full in the court below, which refers to the King in Council possessing "legislative rights" over a Court of Prize analogous to those possessed by Parliament over the Courts of Common Law. At most this amounts to a dictum, and in their Lordships' opinion, with all due respect to so great an authority, the dictum is erroneous. It is, in fact, quite irreconcilable with the principles enunciated by Lord Stowell himself. For example, in The Maria, a Swedish ship (Roscoe's English Prize Cases, vol. 1, 152; 1 C. Rob. 340), his judgment contains the following passage: "The seat of judicial authority is indeed locally here in the belligerent country, according to the known law and practice of nations, but the law itself has no locality. It is the duty of the person who sits here to determine this question exactly as he would determine the same question if sitting at Stockholm, to assert no pretensions on the part of Great Britain which he would not allow to Sweden in the same circumstances, and to impose no duties on Sweden as a neutral country which he would not admit to belong to Great Britain in the same character." It is impossible to reconcile this passage with the proposition that the Prize Court is to take its law from Orders in Council. Moreover, if such a proposition were correct the court might at any time be deprived of the right which is well recognised of determining according to law whether a blockade is rendered invalid either because it is ineffective, or because it is partial in its operation: (see The Franciska, 4 W. R. 100; 10 Moo. P. C. 37). Moreover, in The Lucy above referred to, Lord Stowell had, in effect, refused to give effect to the Order in Council on which the captors relied.

Lord Stowell's dictum gave rise to considerable contemporaneous criticism, and is definitely rejected by Sir R. Phillimore (International Law, vol. 3, sect. 436). It is said to have been approved by Story, J. in the case of Maisonnaire v. Keating (2 Gall. 325), but it will be found that Story, J.'s remarks, on which some reliance seems to have been placed by the President in this case, are directed not to the liability of captors in their own Courts of Prize, but to their liability in the courts of other nations. He is in effect repeating the opinion he expressed in the case of the Invincible, to which their Lordships have already referred. An Act, though illegal by international law, will not on that account be justiciable in the tribunals of another Power—at any rate, if expressly authorised by order of the Sovereign on whose behalf it is done.

Their Lordships have come to the conclusion, therefore, that, at any rate, prior to the Naval Prize Act 1864, there was no power in the Crown, by Order in Council, to prescribe or alter the law which Prize Courts have to administer. It was suggested that the Naval Prize Act 1864 confers such a power. Under that Act the Court of Admiralty became a permanent Court of Prize, independent of any commission issued under the Great Seal. The Act, however, by sect. 55, while saving the King's prerogative, on the one hand, saves, on the other hand, the jurisdiction of the court to decide judicially, and in accordance with international law. Subject, therefore, to any express provisions contained in other sections, it leaves matters exactly as they stood before it was passed. The only express provisions which confer powers on the King in Council are: (1) those contained in sect. 13 (now repealed and superseded by sect. 3 of the Prize Court Act 1894) conferring a power of making rules as to the practice or procedure of Prize Courts; and (2) those contained in sect. 53, conferring power to make such orders as may be necessary for the better execution of the Act.

Their Lordships are of opinion that the latter power does not extend to prescribing or altering the law to be administered by the court, but merely to giving such executive directions as may from time to time be necessary. In all respects material to the present question, the law therefore remains the same as it was before the Act, nor has it been affected by the substitution under the Supreme Court of Judicature Acts 1873 and 1891 of the High Court of Justice for the Court of Admiralty as the permanent Court of Prize in this country.

There are two further points requiring notice in this part of the case. The first arises on the argument addressed to the board by the Solicitor-General. It may be, he said, that the court would not be bound by an Order in Council which is manifestly contrary to the established rules of international law, but there are regions in which such law is imperfectly ascertained and defined; and, when this is so, it would not be unreasonable to hold that the court should subordinate its own opinion to the directions of the executive. This argument is open to the same objection as the argument of the Attorney-General. If the court is to decide judicially in accordance with what it conceives to be the law of nations, it cannot, even in doubtful cases, take its directions from the Crown, which is a party to the proceedings. It must itself determine what the law is according to the best of its ability, and its view, with whatever hesitation it be arrived at, must prevail over any executive order. Only in this way can it fulfil its function as a Prize Court, and justify the confidence which other nations have hitherto placed in its decisions.

The second point requiring notice is this. It does not follow that, because Orders in Council cannot prescribe or alter the law to be administered by the Prize Court, such court will ignore them entirely. On the contrary, it will act on them in every case in which they amount to a mitigation of the Crown rights in favour of the enemy or neutral, as the case may be. As explained in the case of The Odessa (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 215; 114 L. T. Rep. 10; (1916) A. C. 145), the Crown's prerogative of bounty is unaffected by the fact that the proceeds of the Crown rights or Admiralty droits are now made part of the Consolidated Fund, and do not replenish the Privy Purse. Further, the Prize Court will take judicial notice of every Order in Council material to the consideration of matters with which it has to deal, and will give the utmost weight and importance to every such order short of treating it as an authoritative and binding declaration of law. Thus an order declaring a blockade will primâ facie justify the capture and condemnation of vessels attempting to enter the blockaded ports, but will not preclude evidence to show that the blockade is ineffective, and therefore unlawful. An order authorising reprisals will be conclusive as to the facts which are recited as showing that a case for reprisals exists, and will have due weight as showing what, in the opinion of His Majesty's advisers, are the best or only means of meeting the emergency; but this will not preclude the right of any party aggrieved to contend, or the right of the court to hold, that these means are unlawful, as entailing on neutrals a degree of inconvenience unreasonable, considering all the circumstances of the case. Further, it cannot be assumed, until there be a decision of the Prize Court to that effect, that any executive order is contrary to law, and all such orders, if acquiesced in and not declared to be illegal, will, in the course of time, be themselves evidence by which international law and usage may be established: (see Wheaton's International Law, 4th English edit., pp. 25 and 26.)

On this part of the case, therefore, their Lordships hold that Order XXIX., r. 1, of the Prize Court Rules, construed as an imperative direction to the court, is not binding. Under these circumstances the rule must, if possible, be construed merely as a direction to the court in cases in which it may be determined that, according to international law, the Crown has a right to requisition the vessels or goods of enemies or neutrals. There is much to warrant this construction, for the Order in Council, by which the Prize Court Rules were made, conforms to the provisions of the Rules Publication Act 1893, and on reference to that Act it will be found inapplicable to Orders in Council, the validity of which depends on an exercise of the prerogative. It is reasonable, therefore, to assume that the words "or otherwise," contained in the Order in Council, refer to such other powers, if any, as the Crown possesses of making rules, and not to powers vested in the Crown by virtue of the prerogative.

The next question which arises for decision is whether the order appealed from can be justified under any power inherent in the court as to the sale or realisation of property in its custody pending decision of the question to whom such property belongs. It cannot, in their Lordships' opinion, be held that the court has any such inherent power as laid down by the President in this case. The primary duty of the Prize Court (as indeed of all courts having the custody of property the subject of litigation) is to preserve the res for delivery to the persons who ultimately establish their title. The inherent power of the court as to sale or realisation is confined to cases where this cannot be done, either because the res is perishable in its nature, or because there is some other circumstance which renders its preservation impossible or difficult. In such cases it is in the interest of all parties to the litigation that it should be sold or realised, and the court will not allow the interests of the real owner to be prejudiced by any perverse opposition on the part of a rival claimant. Such a limited power would not justify the court in directing a sale of the res merely because it thought fit so to do, or merely because one of the parties desired the sale or claimed to become the purchaser.

It remains to consider the third and perhaps the most difficult question which arises on this appeal—the question whether the Crown has, independently of Order XXIX., r. 1, any and what right to requisition vessels or goods in the custody of the Prize Court pending the decision of the court as to their condemnation or release. In arguing this question the Attorney-General again laid considerable stress on the Crown's prerogative, referring to the recent decision of the Court of Appeal in this country Re Petition of Right (113 L. T. Rep. 575; (1915) 3 K. B. 649). There is no doubt that under certain circumstances and for certain purposes the Crown may requisition any property within the realm belonging to its own subjects. But this right being one conferred by municipal law is not, as such, enforceable in a court which administers international law. The fact, however, that the Crown possesses such a right in this country, and that somewhat similar rights are claimed by most civilised nations may well give rise to the expectation that, at any rate in times of war, some right on the part of a belligerent Power to requisition the goods of neutrals within its jurisdiction will be found to be recognised by international usage. Such usage might be expected either to sanction the right of each country to apply in this respect its own municipal law, or to recognise a similar right of international obligation.

In support of the former alternative, which is apparently accepted by Albrecht (Zeitschrift für Völkerrecht und Bundesstaatsrecht, VI. Band, Breslau, 1912), it may be argued that the mere fact of the property of neutrals being found within the jurisdiction of a belligerent Power ought, according to international law, to render it subject to the municipal law of that jurisdiction. The argument is certainly plausible and may in certain cases and for some purposes be sound. In general, property belonging to the subject of one Power is not found within territory of another Power without the consent of the true owner, and this consent may well operate as a submission to the municipal law. A distinction may perhaps be drawn in this respect between property, the presence of which within the jurisdiction is of a permanent nature, and property the presence of which within the jurisdiction is temporary only. The goods of a foreigner carrying on business here are not in the same position as a vessel using an English port as a port of call. Even in the latter case, however, it is clear that for some purposes, as, for example, sanitary or police regulations, it would become subject to the lex loci. After all, no vessel is under ordinary circumstances under any compulsion to come within the jurisdiction. Different considerations arise with regard to a vessel brought within the territorial jurisdiction in exercise of a right of war. In the latter case there is no consent of the owner or of anyone whose consent might impose obligations on the owner. Nevertheless, even here, the vessel might well for police and sanitary purposes become subject to the municipal law. To hold, however, that it became so subject for all purposes, including the municipal right of requisition, would give rise to various anomalies.

The municipal law of one nation in respect of the right to requisition the property of its subjects differs or may differ from that of another nation. The circumstances under which, the purposes for which, and the conditions subject to which the right may be exercised need not be the same. The municipal law of this country does not give compensation to a subject whose land or goods are requisitioned by the Crown. The municipal law of other nations may insist on compensation as a condition of the right. The circumstances and purposes under and for which the right can be exercised may similarly vary. It would be anomalous if the international law by which all nations are bound could only be ascertained by an inquiry into the municipal law which prevails in each. It would be a still greater anomaly if in times of war a belligerent could, by altering his municipal law in this respect, affect the rights of other nations or their subjects. The authorities point to the conclusion that international usage has in this respect developed a law of its own, and has not recognised the right of each nation to apply its own municipal law.

The right of a belligerent to requisition the goods of neutrals found within its territory, or territory of which it is in military occupation, is recognised by a number of writers on international law. It is sometimes referred to as the right of angary, and is generally recognised as involving an obligation to make full compensation There is, however, much difference of opinion as to the precise circumstances under which and the precise purposes for which it may be lawfully exercised. It was exercised by Germany during the Franco-German War of 1870 in respect of property belonging to British and Austrian subjects. The German military authorities seized certain British ships and sunk them in the Seine. They also seized certain Austrian rolling stock and utilised it for the transport of troops and munitions of war. The German Government offered full compensation, and its action was not made the subject of diplomatic protest, at any rate by Great Britain. In justifying the action of the military authorities with regard to the British ships, Count von Bismarck laid stress on the fact "that a pressing danger was at hand and every other method of meeting it was wanting, so that the case was one of necessity," and he referred to Phillimore, International Law, vol. 3, sect. 29. He did not rely on the municipal law of either France or Germany.(a)

On reference to Phillimore it will be found that he limits the right to cases of "clear and overwhelming necessity." In this he agrees with De Martens, who speaks of the right existing only in cases of "extreme necessity" (Law of Nations, book 6, sect. 7), and with Gessner, who says the necessity must be real, that there must be no other means less violent "de sauver l'existence," and that neither the desire to injure the enemy nor the greatest degree of convenience to the belligerent is sufficient: (Droits des Neutres, p. 154, 2nd edit., Berlin, 1876). It is difficult to see how the acts of the German Government to which reference has been made come within the limits thus laid down. It might have been convenient to Germany and hurtful to France to sink English vessels in the Seine or to utilise Austrian rolling stock for transport purposes, but clearly no extreme necessity involving actual existence had arisen. Azuni, on the other hand (Droit maritime de l'Europe, vol. 1, c. 3, art. 5), thought that an exercise of the right would be justified by necessity or public utility; in other words, that a very high degree of convenience to the belligerent Power would be sufficient. Germany must be taken to have asserted and England and Austria to have acquiesced in the latter view, which is the view taken by Bluntschli (Droit International, sect. 795 bis) and in the only British prize decision dealing with this point.

The case to which their Lordships refer is that of the Curlew, Magnet, &c., reported in Stewart's Vice-Admiralty Cases (Nova Scotia), p. 312. The ships in question with their cargoes had been seized by the British authorities as prize in the early days of the war with the United States of America, which broke out in 1812, and had been brought into port for adjudication. The Lieutenant-Governor of the province and the Admiral and Commander-in-Chief of His Majesty's ships on that station thereupon presented a petition for leave to requisition some of the ships and parts of the cargoes pending adjudication. In his judgment Dr. Croke lays it down that though as a rule the court has no power of selling or bartering vessels or goods in its custody, prior to adjudication, to any departments of His Majesty's service, nevertheless there may be cases of necessity in which the right of self-defence supersedes and dispenses with the usual modes of procedure. He held that such a case had in fact arisen, and accordingly granted the prayer of the petitioners: (1) As to certain small arms "very much and immediately needed for the defence of the province"; (2) as to certain oak timbers of which there was "great want" in His Majesty's naval yard at Halifax; and (3) as to a vessel immediately required for use as a prison ship. The appraised value of the property requisitioned was in each case ordered to be brought into court.

It should be observed that with regard to ships and goods of neutrals in the custody of the Prize Court for adjudication, there are special reasons which render it reasonable that the belligerent should in a proper case have the power to requisition them. The legal property or dominion is, no doubt, still in the neutral, but ultimate condemnation will vest it in the Crown, as from the date of the seizure as prize, and meanwhile all beneficial enjoyment is suspended. In cases where the ships or the goods are required for immediate use, this may well entail hardship on the party who ultimately establishes his title. To mitigate the hardship in the case of a ship a custom has arisen of releasing it to the claimant on bail—that is, on giving security for the payment of its appraised value. It may well be that in practice this was never done without the consent of the Crown, but such consent would not be likely to be withheld, unless the Crown itself desired to use the ship after condemnation. The 25th section of the Naval Prize Act 1864 now confers on the judge full discretion in the matter. This being so, it is not unreasonable that the Crown on its side should in a proper case have power to requisition either vessel or goods for the national safety. It must be remembered that the neutral may obtain compensation for loss suffered by reason of an improper seizure of his vessel or goods, but the Crown can never obtain compensation from the neutral in respect of loss occasioned by a claim to release which ultimately fails.

The power in question was asserted by the United States of America in the Civil War which broke out in 1861. In The Memphis (Blatchford, 202), in The Ella Warley (Blatchford, 204), and in The Stephen Hart (Blatchford, 387) Betts, J. allowed the War Department to requisition goods in the custody of the Prize Court, and required for purposes in connection with the prosecution of the war. In the case of The Peterhoff (Blatchford, 381) he allowed the vessel itself to be similarly requisitioned by the Navy Department. The reasons of Betts, J., as reported, are not very satisfactory, for they leave it in doubt whether he considered the right he was enforcing to be a right according to the municipal law of the United States overriding the international law, or to be a right according to the international law. But his decisions were not appealed, nor does it appear that they led to any diplomatic protest.

On the 3rd March 1863, after the decisions above referred to, the United States Legislature passed an Act (Congress, Sess. III., c. 86, of 1863) whereby it was enacted (sect. 2) that the Secretary of the Navy or the Secretary of War should be and they or either of them were thereby authorised to take any captured vessel, any arms or munitions of war or other material for the use of the Government, and when the same should have been taken before being sent in for adjudication or afterwards, the department for whose use it was taken should deposit the value of the same in the Treasury of the United States, subject to the order of the court in which prize proceedings might be taken, or, if no proceedings in prize should be taken, to be credited to the Navy Department, and dealt with according to law.

It is impossible to suppose that the United States Legislature in passing this Act intended to alter or modify the principles of international law in its own interest or against the interest of neutrals. On the contrary, the Act must be regarded as embodying the considered opinion of the United States authorities as to the right possessed by a belligerent to requisition vessels or goods seized as prize before adjudication. Nevertheless, their Lordships regard the passing of the Act as somewhat unfortunate from the standpoint of the international lawyer. In the first place, it seems to cast some doubt upon the decisions already given by Betts, J. In the second place, it tends to weaken all subsequent decisions of the United States Prize Courts on the right to requisition vessels or goods, as authorities on international law, for these courts are bound by the provisions of the Act, whether it be in accordance with international law or otherwise. In the third place, their Lordships are of opinion that the provisions of the Act go beyond what is justified by international usage. The right to requisition recognised by international law is not, in their opinion, an absolute right, but a right exercisable in certain circumstances and for certain purposes only. Further, international usage requires all captures to be brought promptly into the Prize Court for adjudication, and the right to requisition, therefore, ought as a general rule to be exercised only when this has been done. It is for the court and not the executive of the belligerent State to decide whether the right claimed can be lawfully exercised in any particular case.

It appears that the British Government, shortly after the Act was passed, protested against the provisions of the second section. The grounds for such protest appear in Lord Russell's dispatch of the 21st April 1863. The first is the primary duty of the court to preserve the subject-matter of the litigation for the party who ultimately establishes his title. In stating it Lord Russell ignores, and (having regard to the provisions of the section) was probably entitled to ignore, all exceptional cases based on the right of angary. The second ground is that such a general right as asserted in the section would encourage the making of seizures known at the time when they are made to be unwarrantable by law merely because the property seized might be useful to the belligerent. This objection is more serious, but it derives its chief force from the fact that the right asserted in the section can be exercised before the property seized is brought into the Prize Court for adjudication, and, even when it has been so brought in, precludes the judge from dealing judicially with the matter. If the right accorded by international law to requisition vessels or goods in the custody of the court be exercised through the court, and be confined to cases in which there is really a question to be tried, and the vessel or goods cannot, therefore, be released forthwith, the objection is obviated.

It further appears that the United States took the opinion of their own Attorney-General on the matter (10th vol., Opinions of A.-G. of U.S., p. 519), and were advised that there was no warrant for the section in international law, and that it would not be advisable to put it into force in cases where controversy was likely to arise. The Attorney-General did not, any more than Lord Russell, refer to exceptional cases based on the right of angary, but dealt only with the provisions of the section as a whole.

Some stress was laid in argument on the cases cited in the judgment in the court below upon what is known as "the right of pre-emption," but in their Lordships' opinion these cases have little if any bearing on the matter now in controversy. The right of pre-emption appears to have arisen in the following manner: According to the British view of international law, naval stores were absolute contraband, and if found on a neutral vessel bound for an enemy port were lawful prize. Other countries contended that such stores were only contraband if destined for the use of the enemy Government. If destined for the use of civilians they were not contraband at all. Under these circumstances the British Government, by way of mitigation of the severity of its own view, consented to a kind of compromise. Instead of condemning such stores as lawful prize, it bought them out and out from their neutral owners, and this practice, after forming the subject of many particular treaties, at last came to be recognised as fully warranted by international law. It was, however, always confined to naval stores, and a purchase pursuant to it put an end to all litigation between the Crown on the one hand and the neutral owner on the other. Only in cases where the title of the neutral was in doubt and the property might turn out to be enemy property was the purchase money paid into court. It is obvious, therefore, that this "right of pre-emption" differs widely from the right to requisition the vessels or goods of neutrals, which is exercised without prejudice to, and does not conclude or otherwise affect the question whether the vessel or goods should or should not be condemned as prize.

On the whole question their Lordships have come to the following conclusion: A belligerent Power has by international law the right to requisition vessels or goods in the custody of its Prize Court pending a decision of the question whether they should be condemned or released, but such right is subject to certain limitations. First, the vessel or goods in question must be urgently required for use in connection with the defence of the realm, the prosecution of the war, or other matters involving national security. Secondly, there must be a real question to be tried, so that it would be improper to order an immediate release. And, thirdly, the right must be enforced by application to the Prize Court, which must determine judicially whether, under the particular circumstances of the case, the right is exercisable.

With regard to the first of these limitations, their Lordships are of opinion that the judge ought, as a rule, to treat the statement on oath of the proper officer of the Crown to the effect that the vessel or goods which it desired to requisition are urgently required for use in connection with the defence of the realm, the prosecution of the war, or other matters involving national security, as conclusive of the fact. This is so in the analogous case of property being requisitioned under the municipal law (see Warrington, L.J. in the case of Re Petition of Right already cited (113 L. T. Rep. 575; (1915) 3 K. B., at p. 666), and there is every reason why it should be so also in the case of property requisitioned under the international law. Those who are responsible for the national security must be the sole judges of what the national security requires. It would be obviously undesirable that such matters should be made the subject of evidence in a court of law or otherwise discussed in public.

With regard to the second limitation, it can be best illustrated by referring to the old practice. The first hearing of a case in prize was upon the ship's papers, the answers of the master and others to the standing interrogatories and such special interrogatories as might have been allowed, and any further evidence which the judge, under special circumstances, thought it reasonable to admit. If, on this hearing, the judge was of opinion that the vessel or goods ought to be released forthwith, an order for release would in general be made. A further hearing was not readily granted at the instance of the Crown. If, on the other hand, the judge was of opinion that the vessel or goods could not be released forthwith, a further hearing would be granted at the instance of the claimant. If the claimant did not desire a further hearing, the vessel or goods would be condemned. This practice, though obviously unsuitable in many respects to modern conditions, had the advantage of demonstrating at an early stage of the proceedings whether there was a real question to be tried, or whether there ought to be an immediate release of the vessel or goods in question. In their Lordships' opinion, the judge should, before allowing a vessel or goods to be requisitioned, satisfy himself (having regard of course to modern conditions) that there is a real case for investigation and trial, and that the circumstances are not such as would justify the immediate release of the vessel or goods. The application for leave to requisition must, under the existing practice, be an interlocutory application, and, in view of what has been said, it should be supported by evidence sufficient to satisfy the judge in this respect. In this manner Lord Russell's objection as to the encouragement of unwarranted seizures is altogether obviated.

With regard to the third limitation, it is based on the principle that the jurisdiction of the Prize Court commences as soon as there is a seizure in prize. If the captors do not promptly bring in the property seized for adjudication, the court will, at the instance of any party aggrieved, compel them so to do. From the moment of seizure, the rights of all parties are governed by international law. It was suggested in argument that a vessel brought into harbour for search might, before seizure, be requisitioned under the municipal law. This point, if it ever arises, would fall to be decided by a court administering municipal law, but from the point of view of international law it would be a misfortune if the practice of bringing a vessel into harbour for the purpose of search—a practice which is justifiable because search at sea is impossible under the conditions of modern warfare—were held to give rise to rights which could not arise if the search took place at sea.

It remains to apply what has been said to the present case. In their Lordships' opinion, the order appealed from was wrong, not because, as contended by the appellants, there is by international law no right at all to requisition ships or goods in the custody of the court, but because the judge had before him no satisfactory evidence that such a right was exercisable. The affidavit of the director of army contracts, following the words of Order XXIX., r. 1, merely states that it is desired on behalf of His Majesty to requisition the copper in question. It does not state that the copper is urgently required for national purposes. Further, the affidavit of Sven Hoglund, which is unanswered, so far from showing that there was any real case to be tried, suggests a case for immediate release. Under these circumstances the normal course would be to discharge the order appealed from without prejudice to another application by the Procurator-General supported by proper evidence. But the copper in question has long since been handed over to the War Department, and, if not used up, at any rate cannot now be identified. No order for its restoration can therefore be made, and it would be wrong to require the Government to provide other copper in its place. Under the old procedure, the proper course would have been to give the appellant, in case his claim to the copper be ultimately allowed, leave to apply to the court for any damage he may have suffered by reason of its having been taken by the Government under the order.

It was, however, suggested that the procedure prescribed by the existing Prize Court Rules precludes the possibility of the court awarding damages or costs in the existing proceedings. Under the old practice the captors were parties to every proceeding for condemnation, and damages and costs could in a proper case have been awarded as against them. But every action for condemnation is now instituted by the Procurator-General on behalf of the Crown, and the captors are not necessarily parties. It is said that neither damages nor costs can be awarded against the Crown. It is not suggested that the persons entitled to such damages or costs are deprived of all remedy, but it is urged that in order to recover either damages or costs, if damages or costs are claimed, they must themselves institute fresh proceedings as plaintiffs, not against the Crown, but against the actual captors. This result would, in their Lordships' opinion, be extremely inconvenient, and would entail considerable hardship on claimants. If possible, therefore, the Prize Court Rules ought to be construed so as to avoid it, and, in their Lordships' opinion, the Prize Court Rules can be so construed.

It will be observed that by Order I., r. 1, the expression "captor" is, for the purposes of proceedings in any cause or matter, to include "the proper officer of the Crown," and "the proper officer of the Crown" is defined as the King's Proctor or other law officer or agent authorised to conduct prize proceedings on behalf of the Crown within the jurisdiction of the court.

It is provided by Order II., r. 3, that every cause instituted for the condemnation of a ship or (by virtue of Order I., r. 2) goods, shall be instituted in the name of the Crown, though the proceedings therein may, with the consent of the Crown, be conducted by the actual captors. By Order II., r. 7, in a cause instituted against the "captor" for restitution or damages, the writ is to be in the form of No. 4 of Appendix A. This would appear to contemplate that an action for damages can be instituted against the proper officer of the Crown, any argument to the contrary, based upon the form of writ as originally framed, being rendered invalid by the alterations in such form introduced by rule 5 of the Prize Court Rules under the Order in Council dated the 11th March 1915. It is not, however, necessary to decide this point.

Order V. provides for proceedings in case of failure to proceed by captors. Under rules 1 and 2, which contemplate the case of no proceedings having been yet instituted, the claimant must issue a writ, and can then apply for relief by way of restitution, with or without damages and costs. It does not appear against whom the writ is to be issued, whether against the actual captors or the proper officer of the Crown who ought to have instituted proceedings. Under rule 3, however, which contemplates that proceedings have been instituted, it is provided that, if the captors (which, in the case of an action for condemnation must of course mean the proper officer of the Crown) fail to take any steps within the respective times provided by the rules, or, in the opinion of the judge, fail to prosecute with effect the proceedings for adjudication, the judge may, on the application of a claimant, order the property to be released to the claimant, and may make such order as to damages or costs as he thinks fit. This rule, therefore, distinctly contemplates that the Crown or its proper officer may be made liable for damages or costs. Neither damages nor costs could be awarded against persons who were not parties to the proceedings, and it can hardly have been the intention of the rules to make third parties liable for the default of those who were actually conducting the proceedings.

By Order VI. proceedings may be discontinued by leave of the judge, but such discontinuance is not to affect the right, if any, of the claimant to costs and damages. This, again, contemplates that in an action for condemnation the claimant may have a right to costs and damages, and, as the Crown is the only proper plaintiff in such an action, to costs and damages against the Crown.

Order XIII. is concerned with releases. They are to be issued out of the registry, and, except in the six cases referred to in rule 3, only with the consent of the judge. One of the excepted cases is when the property is the subject of proceedings for condemnation, that is, of proceedings in which the Crown by its proper officer is plaintiff, and when a consent to restitution signed by the captor (again by the proper officer of the Crown) has been filed. Another excepted case is when proceedings instituted by or on behalf of the Crown are discontinued. By rule 4 no release is to affect the right of any of the owners of the property to costs and damages against the "captor," unless so ordered by the judge. In the cases last referred to "captor" must again mean the proper officer who is suing on behalf of the Crown.

Order XLIV. deals with appeals, and provides that in every case the appellant must give security for costs to the satisfaction of the judge. In cases of appeals from a condemnation or in other cases in which the Crown by its proper officer would be a respondent, this provision could serve no useful purpose unless costs could be awarded in favour of the Crown, and if costs can be awarded in favour of, it follows that they can similarly be awarded against the Crown.

It is to be observed that unless the judgment or order appealed from be stayed pending appeal, rule 4 of this order contemplates that persons in whose favour it is executed will give security for the due performance of such order as His Majesty in Council may think fit to make. Their Lordships were not informed whether such security was given in the present case.

In their Lordships' opinion these rules are framed on the footing that where the Crown by its proper officer is a party to the proceedings it takes upon itself the liability as to damages and costs to which under the old procedure the actual captors were subject. This is precisely what might be expected, for otherwise the rules would tend to hamper claimants in pursuing the remedies open to them according to international law. The matter is somewhat technical, for even under the old procedure the Crown, as a general rule, in fact defrayed the damages and costs to which the captors might be held liable. The common law rule that the Crown neither paid nor received costs is, as pointed out by Lord Macnaghten in Johnson v. The King (91 L. T. Rep. 234; (1904) A. C. 817), subject to exceptions.

Their Lordships, therefore, have come to the conclusion that, in proceedings to which under the new practice the Crown instead of the actual captors is a party, both damages and costs may in a proper case be awarded against the Crown or the officer who in such proceedings represents the Crown.

The proper course, therefore, in the present case is to declare that upon the evidence before the President he was not justified in making the order the subject of this appeal and to give the appellants leave, in the event of their ultimately succeeding in the proceedings for condemnation, to apply to the court below for such damages, if any, as they may have sustained by reason of the order and what has been done under it. Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly; but, inasmuch as the case put forward by the appellants has succeeded in part only, they do not think that any order should be made as to the costs of the appeal.

SCHEEPVAART MAATSCHAPPIJ GYLSEN v. NORTH AFRICAN COALING COMPANY. (a)

Coaling contract—Exception of "Interference by war"—Necessity of suppliers to procure coal — Increased freights — Scarcity of ships — Refusal by suppliers to supply coal—Breach of contract—Liability.

On the 5th Dec. 1914 a coaling contract was entered into between the plaintiffs, the owners of a line of steamships, and the defendants, a coaling company, by which it was agreed that the plaintiffs should take all the bunker coal they wanted at (inter alia) Algiers from the defendants, and that the defendants should supply all the coal normally needed by the plaintiffs at that port. The form of contract utilised was one in use before the outbreak of the war, and contained a clause allowing the defendants to cancel the contract if either Great Britain or France became engaged in war with any other Power. A slip, however, was pasted on the contract, which provided that, "notwithstanding the war clause in the contract, it is understood that the depots will supply during the present hostilities . . . and, should circumstances arise to further interfere in any manner with the supply, shipment, carriage, or delivery of the coals, this contract is subject to cancelment by suppliers." In Feb. 1915 the defendants refused to supply one of the plaintiffs' ships with coal at Algiers, and the plaintiffs were thereby put to expense in obtaining coal elsewhere. In an action by the plaintiffs for breach of contract the defendants contended that they were protected from liability by the exception clause in the contract and the added slip. It appeared that between Dec. 1914 and Feb. 1915 there was a great rise in freights between Cardiff and Algiers. The judge held that the word "supply" in the slip meant supply to the defendants at Cardiff, and not to the plaintiffs at Algiers, and was satisfied that if the defendants carried out the contract they would have had difficulty in chartering a vessel between these places at more than double the freights prevalent when the contract was made.

Held, that since, to fulfil their contract, the defendants would not only have been put to extra expense, but would have had difficulty in obtaining ships, there was "interference" within the meaning of the slip, and that, therefore, the defendants were excused from liability.

Commercial List.

Action tried by Scrutton, J.

By a contract in writing dated the 5th Dec. 1914, and made between the agents of the respective parties, the defendants, the North African Coaling Company, agreed to supply to vessels belonging to the plaintiffs, Sheepvaart Maatschappij Gylsen, a firm of shipowners, bunker coal at Algiers. The contract, which was a pre-war form of contract, contained a clause providing that "in the event of war, hostilities, or other hindrance of any kind whatever, beyond the control of the suppliers affecting the normal working of the contract, the suppliers shall, during the continuance of those events, and until normal conditions again prevail, be relieved from all obligation under the contract. If Great Britain shall be engaged in war with a European Power the contract is subject to cancelment by the suppliers." As war was, in fact, prevailing at the time of the making of the contract, an additional clause in these terms, printed on a slip, was attached to the contract:

Clause A.—Notwithstanding the war clause in the attached contract, it is understood that the depots will supply during present hostilities so long and in such quantities as the port authorities will permit, and should circumstances arise to further interfere in any manner with the supply, shipment, carriage, or delivery of coals, this contract is subject to cancellation by the suppliers.

Subsequently, freights between Cardiff and Algiers rose greatly. The result was that coal became expensive at Algiers, and the defendants were not in a position to carry out their contract with the defendants at a profit. On the 31st Dec. a steamship, the Norton, which had been chartered by the defendants and loaded with coal, was requisitioned by the British Government at Cardiff. The defendants procured another vessel in her place at a higher price, and this steamer did not arrive for a month after the Norton would have done, and great inconvenience was caused thereby.

On the 15th Jan. 1915 the defendants wrote to the plaintiffs to the effect that in consequence of abnormal circumstances having arisen they were compelled to cancel the contract in accordance with the provisions of clause A. Acting upon this letter the defendants, in February, refused to provide the Fruithandel, a vessel belonging to the defendants, with bunker coal. The plaintiffs in consequence had to purchase 680 tons of coal elsewhere at a price—18*s.* a ton—in advance of the contract price. They now brought this action for breach of contract, claiming as damages the difference—viz., 612*l.*—between the price they had had to pay for the coal and the contract price.

The defendants contended that "circumstances had arisen to further interfere with the supply of coals" within the meaning of clause A on the slip attached to the contract, and that they were entitled to repudiate the contract by that clause.

Scrutton, J. read the following judgment:—

Scheepvaart Maatschappij Gylsen, whom I call the shipowners, sue the North African Coaling Company, whom I call the Coaling Company, for damages for failing to supply bunker coal to their steamer Fruithandel at Algiers in Feb. 1915. The coaling company reply that they had cancelled their coaling contract with the shipowners in Jan. 1915, and were not bound to supply them with coal in February.

The coaling contract between the parties was made on the 5th Dec. 1914, after the outbreak of war. It was in a common coaling depot form used before the war, binding the shipowners to take their entire bunker coal requirements at Algiers and Malta from the coaling company, and the coaling company to supply all the bunker coal normally required by the shipowners for the use of their steamers coaling en route in the customary manner.

The Fruithandel, going from Barcelona to the United States, in ballast, proposed to take her coal for the voyage at Algiers. This, which sometimes happened before the war, had become quite usual during the war, and the coaling company did not contend that it was not within the contract.

There was an exception clause in the original contract, which the coaling company did not contend protected them in the events which happened, and which contained a power to the coaling company to cancel if Great Britain was at war, and to suspend the contract if France (the owner of Algiers) was at war. On this ante-war contract was pasted a slip "A," which I suspect to be a general clause agreed to by the owners of coal depots, and patched into their contracts without any minute consideration whether its language suited the particular contract in question. It ran as follows:

Notwithstanding the war clause in the attached contract, it is understood that depots will supply during the present hostilities so long and in such quantities as the port authorities will permit, and should circumstances arise to further interfere in any manner with the supply, shipment, carriage, or delivery of coals, this contract is subject to cancelment by suppliers.

I think the war clause referred to is the power to cancel or to suspend in case of war. The question in the case was whether the events which happened were sufficient to relieve the coaling company under the provisions of this clause. The matters which freed the coaling company were said to be interference with supplies at the Algiers depot by the French authorities, and the requisitioning of large numbers of steamers by the Government with the consequent reduction of steamers available for trade, and increase of freights. The facts are as follows: The French authorities at Algiers on the outbreak of war put an embargo on all coal. This was soon removed, but permission for each shipment was required, and various regulations as to quantities for each steamer, and quantities of coal to be retained in Algiers by the coal depots collectively, were made from time to time.

I am not satisfied that the Government regulations would have prevented the shipment of the 500 tons asked for on the Fruithandel in February, for the coaling company supplied several steamers with larger quantities from the end of December to the end of February, e.g., Highbury, 682 tons; Harewood, 686 tons; Armuru, 536 tons; Black Head, 602 tons. I am satisfied that the Government regulations would not have allowed the coaling company to supply coal to all the shipowners who in January and February would have claimed coal if their contracts, made before the middle of December, were still in force.

The facts on the second head of exemption claimed are as follows: After the first shock of the outbreak of war freights from Cardiff to Algiers were fairly steady; 14 and 15 francs a ton against 10 francs in peace time; and were so up to the middle of December, and when the coaling contract was made. From the middle of December till March they rose violently from 15 francs to 30 francs. A number of coaling contracts were made just before this big rise of freights, and consequently at quite inadequate prices, and it was undoubtedly to the pecuniary interest of the coaling company to cancel them if it could.

The history of the rise in freights was this: At first shipowners offered to charter to the Government. Ships thus chartered were removed from the commercial market, freights in which accordingly rose, and private owners thereupon chartered in that market. The Government then wanted ships and requisitioned, with the result that there was a great scarcity of ships in the commercial market, and freights rose rapidly.

In particular the coaling company had a vessel, the Norton, chartered at 18 francs, and just going under the tips at Cardiff on the 31st Dec., when the Government requisitioned her. The coaling company were able to replace her at 20 francs, but the substituted steamer did not arrive for a month after the Norton would have arrived, and considerable inconvenience was caused by the non-arrival of the Norton's cargo.

This was the beginning of a rapid rise in freights, due almost entirely to the number of vessels requisitioned by the Government, which brought freights by the end of the year to 70 francs a ton to Algiers. I am satisfied that if the coaling company was unable to cancel its contracts the coal it would have been required to supply by its contract would have required the charter of vessels which it would have been difficult to obtain at more than double the freights prevalent when the contract was made.

The question then is: Have, within the meaning of the contract, "circumstances arisen further to interfere in any manner with the supply, shipment, carriage, or delivery of the coal"? I have come to the conclusion that the last words are not limited to supply at Algiers, though the word "supply" in many parts of the contract has that meaning. I think the words may be paraphrased "the supply of the coal in Wales for shipment for and carriage to Algiers and delivery to ships there."

To limit the words to Algiers makes it very difficult to give any reasonable meaning to the four words used, while the wider meaning has a good business reason involved in it. Then did circumstances arise further to interfere with this?

In Rolo v. Agius (unreported), heard on the 3rd June 1915, Bailhache, J., of whose judgment I have seen a shorthand note, had to consider whether "war" had "interfered" with chartering so as to relieve the vendors of coal. It was proved before him that the outbreak of war with Turkey had rendered boats for the Eastern Mediterranean very difficult to obtain.

The rise in freight was not large, but boats were difficult to get, there being only two or three charters for Alexandria in a period when normally there would have been twelve. As I read his judgment, he would not have found the war "prevented" chartering, in this taking the same view as my recent judgment in W. Blythe and Co. v. Richards Turpin and Co. (ante, p. 753). But he held that though a moderate rise in freights would not "interfere," such a rise as proved shortage of ships, or the shortage of ships itself, would be an interference within the meaning of such a clause.

Mere extra expense would not do, if you could get all the ships you wanted by paying extra for them, but if you could not get the ships there would be "interference" and high freights for those you did get, or in the market generally would be evidence of shortage of ships. I do not think the mere variations of the market with the tonnage available in a particular place are enough to prove the physical scarcity, the results of which would amount to "interference." It must always be a question of degree, for every rise of price may be attributed to short supply, or supply too small for the demand, and what is a question of degree may often be a very difficult question, but a question of fact.

On the 15th Jan., when the coaling company cancelled, what had happened? They had been deprived of their ship, chartered to carry coal which was ready for her, by the unexpected requisition of the Government, and could not replace her coal at Algiers within a month. That, in my view, was certainly a fresh circumstance, further interfering with shipment and carriage. There was a shortage of ships, due to Government requisitions, which showed itself in a very rapid increase of freights, which quintupled themselves during the year.

This was, in my opinion, a fresh circumstance further interfering with shipment and delivery. And, I think, though I am not so clear about this, that the French regulations requiring a minimum of coal to be kept at Algiers, having in view the number of demands under contracts which might be expected in view of the rapid rise in price of coal, due to the rise in freights, which in turn was due to shortage of ships, was also a fresh circumstance further interfering with the delivery of coal.

In my view, the coaling company, following the principle laid down in Crawford v. Wilson (1 Com. Cas. 277), were entitled to look at the matter from the point of view of all their trade, not of the individual demand of coal for one ship of one customer. From that point of view I think they have established their right to cancel, and I give judgment for them with costs.

Contract of sale — Provision of suspension of deliveries "in case of war"—Rise in freights—Liability of shippers.

Sellers in Spain agreed to deliver iron ore to buyers in Middlesbrough, the contract of sale (which was made after the commencement of the war) containing the provision that: "In case of war . . . the supply of minerals now contracted for may be wholly or partially suspended during the continuation thereof." The sellers possessed a fleet of steamers. Owing to the course of events in the war freights rose very considerably, and the sellers then contended that they were entitled under the above provision in the contract of sale to "suspend wholly or partially" further deliveries.

Held, that the sellers were not entitled to suspend, since the sole effect of the contract of sale was to prevent them taking advantage in the rise of freights, but not to prevent them from fulfilling the contract.

Per Bailhache, J.: The only prevention of this nature on which the sellers could insist would be such an increased cost of carrying out their contract due to the war as made it commercially impossible.

A rise in freights due to an excepted cause can amount to prevention of the fulfilment of a contract to deliver oversea goods if it be indicative of a great scarcity in ships. The extent to which the rise in freights must be indicative of a scarcity in ships before it amounts to a prevention is a question of fact in each particular case. Where sellers would have to give away their goods, and, further, to make a loss on the goods delivered, such a scarcity of tonnage due to the war is indicated as will amount to commercial prevention.

Commercial Court.

Action tried by Bailhache, J.

By a contract in writing dated the 4th Nov. 1914 the defendants, the Compania Minera de Sierra Menera, owners of mines in Spain, agreed to sell to the plaintiffs, Bolckow, Vaughan, and Co., ironfounders and smelters carrying on business at Middlesbrough, 50,000 tons of ore during the year 1915. The contract contained the following provision:

> In case of strikes, accidents, war, or any unavoidable total or partial stoppage of works or mines, the supply of minerals now contracted for may be wholly or partially suspended drring the continuation thereof, and the time for delivery extended proportionately. In case of partial stoppage of works or mines, delivery to be pro rata with other then existing engagements.

The defendants made two deliveries under the contract, one of 5439 tons and another of 1365 tons. By the time the second delivery had been made, however, freights had risen to a considerable extent. The defendants thereupon repudiated the contract and refused to make any further deliveries until the end of the war unless the plaintiffs paid an increased purchase price. This the plaintiffs refused to do and the deliveries ceased.

The plaintiffs now brought this action for breach of contract, claiming damages in respect of the whole of the ore undelivered.

The facts are set out more fully in the judgment of his Lordship (infra).

A. A. Roche, K.C. and C. F. Lowenthal for the plaintiffs.—The defendants cannot rely upon the exception clause in the contract (sup.) as excusing them from their obligation to fulfil their part of the contract. They say that the war caused a rise in freights which rendered it impossible for them to carry out the contract at a profit, and that they were thereby brought within the provisions of the exception clause relating to war, and were entitled, wholly or partially, to suspend deliveries during the continuance of the war. But the exception clause dealt with events incidental to the production of the ore and in no way with transit.

Maurice Hill, K.C. and R. A. Wright for the defendants.—The defendants were entitled to repudiate the contract under the exception clause. It is true that the contract was made after the outbreak of war, but if anything occurred in the progress of the war to make the state of affairs different from what they had been when the contract was made (e.g., here an enormous increase of freights) the clause came into operation. In any case, even if the defendants have broken their contract with the plaintiffs, the plaintiffs have suffered no recoverable damage.

A. A. Roche, K.C. replied.

(a) Reported by Leonard C. Thomas, Esq., Barrister-at-law.

March 30.—Bailhache, J. read the following judgment:—

This is an action by buyers against sellers for damages for breach of a contract dated the 4th Nov. 1914 for the sale of 50,000 tons of Sagunto Rubio iron ore, to be delivered free ex ship at Middlesbrough, in about equal quantities over the year 1915. The price was 13*s.* 6*d.* per ton delivered.

The sellers delivered a cargo of 5439 tons on account of the contract, by arrangement with the buyers in Dec. 1914. They delivered a further part cargo of 1365 tons in Feb. 1915, but have made no further deliveries. After correspondence, to some of which I shall have occasion to refer later, the sellers, by their solicitors' letter of the 15th March 1915, refused to make further deliveries until after the war. The buyers elected to treat the claim to suspension as a repudiation of the contract, and on the 7th April issued their writ.

The right to suspend deliveries ultimately falls to be determined upon the construction of a few words in the exceptions clause in the contract and its application to the facts and circumstances of the case.

The crucial words are "In case of war."

Before discussing their meaning I had better mention a small incidental point. The defendants, after the contract was made, wrote to the plaintiffs on the 16th Nov. 1914 stating that: "In the event of the North Sea being closed to Spanish tonnage by the Admiralty authorities they would be compelled to suspend deliveries."

To this the plaintiffs assented, and it was argued for the plaintiffs that the defendants in writing this letter must be taken to have put their own interpretation on the exception "In case of war," and to have limited it to the closing of the North Sea to Spanish vessels.

I do not agree. I do not even now understand why this stipulation was made, but I do not think it was intended to be a limitation of the exception, but an extension of it.

Turning now to the crucial words it is, of course, clear that as a contract made after the war broke out the words "In case of war" cannot mean "If war should be declared." It must be treated as an elliptical expression requiring expansion. The most usual words where the sentence is written in full are "affecting or interfering with or preventing the performance of the contract." My selection is "preventing." That word seems to me most in accord with the general tenor of the clause, and the word which, having regard to all the circumstances, the parties themselves would have chosen at the time if they had considered and discussed the point. It is noteworthy that the closing of the North Sea to Spanish steamships would prevent and not merely interfere with deliveries. Mr. Roche suggested that the words now expressed did not apply to the transit of the ore, as none of the other words in the clause do so, but again I do not agree.

Having got thus far, I have to see whether the defendants were prevented by war from fulfilling their contract with the plaintiffs.

In order to do this I must, I fear, set out the facts in considerable detail.

The sellers are a Spanish company, controlled and managed by a Spanish firm, Messrs. Sota and Aznar.

This firm are, among other things, the owners of a fleet of steamers, and, having made the contract in question for the defendants, they made a freight contract in the form of a charter-party between the defendants and themselves on the 25th Nov. 1914 whereby they contracted to carry about 44,500 tons of iron ore during the year 1915 in about equal monthly quantities from Sagunto to Middlesbrough, at the freight of 5*s.* 9*d.* per ton. The defendants made separate arrangements for the carrying of the December cargo, and the quantity of about 44,500 tons was the quantity of ore remaining to be delivered by the defendants to the plaintiffs over 1915. The freight contract was, in fact, made to enable the defendants to carry out their contract with the plaintiffs

The charter-party was in English and in an English form, and contained the usual exceptions, the only material one being "restraints of princes."

Messrs. Sota and Aznar, through their representative, a Mr. Harrison, held out as an inducement to the plaintiffs to make the contract sued upon that there need be no fear of non-delivery as Messrs. Sota and Aznar would carry the ore in their own steamers.

I may observe in passing, that shortly after making the contract sued upon, and on the 11th Nov., the defendants made similar contracts with the plaintiffs at a slightly increased price for 25,000 tons of the same ore, for delivery over each of the years 1916 and 1917, at the price of 14*s.* a ton delivered. It seems to me strange that in war time, with the enormous fluctuations likely to take place from time to time in prices of goods and in freights, the defendants should have been willing to contract so far ahead. I attribute it to the fact that Messrs. Sota and Aznar knew that they had the ore under their hands in the mines, and also the ships to carry it, and that what they had to fear was not a rise in market prices, but in cost.

The freight at which Messrs. Sota and Aznar contracted with the defendants to carry the plaintiffs' ore was 5*s.* 9*d.* per ton, about the market rate when the contract of the 25th Nov. was made. Freights rose sharply afterwards, and in January they had risen to 15*s.* or 16*s.* a ton, and they continued at or about that figure at all material times. The present rates are something like 24*s.* a ton.

The reason for the sharp and continued rise is this. Immediately upon the declaration of war, and down to December, merchants were anxious and doubtful and were not making engagements. The Government were taking up ships. Shipowners, finding cargoes scarce, were in most instances glad to get their ships taken for Government purposes. The Government were also requisitioning ships. The requirements of the Government about counter-balanced the absence of commercial cargoes, and freights did not advance. By the middle of December things altered. The requirements of the Government increased. Merchants gained confidence in the ability of the Admiralty to protect maritime ventures, and were eagerly seeking ships. The result was an all-round demand or shortage of supply, and as a consequence a sharp rise in freights, which has been continuous and increasing.

An incident which contributed to the increased Government demand for ships and a consequent rise in freights was the intervention of Turkey in the war on the 5th Nov. 1915.

On the 1st Dec. 1914 the Admiralty issued stringent regulations, from time to time repeated and amplified, for the navigation of the Channel from the Isle of Wight to the North-East Coast. Pilotage was made compulsory from the Isle of Wight to Yarmouth and from Yarmouth to the Tees. Neutral vessels were for a short time convoyed by torpedo-boats, but later one armed guard was put on board to ensure their going to their destination; moreover, navigation at night was prohibited. All this entailed delays, considerable at first but less later on. These delays were the subject of interviews and correspondence with the Board of Trade.

I have no reason to doubt that the complaints made were well founded, if somewhat exaggerated.

The result of these delays was that Messrs. Sota and Aznar found it difficult to carry out by their own ships the freight engagements they had made in respect of the ore sold to the plaintiffs and to other customers. Difficult, but by no means impossible, as the correspondence shows. The delays, in fact, tended to decrease as time went on, partly through smoother working and partly due to the fact that as the days lengthened so did the hours during which navigation was permitted.

The cost to shipowners was increased by concessions having to be made to the crews in raising wages and providing better food. The price of coal, too, rose. Altogether Mr. Harrison put the extra cost of carriage at 8*s.* a ton, of which 6*d.* was for wages, 1*s.* for coal, and 4*s.* for delay. This last item I think excessive.

Messrs. Sota and Aznar somewhat added to their difficulties by taking advantage of the high prices steamers were fetching to sell three-quarters of their old steamers. They replaced them by others to some extent, but there was, I gather, a reduction of their fleet by one-half.

Early in January Messrs. Sota and Aznar approached buyers in England, with whom they had made contracts for the sale of ores, with a view to getting them to meet them by sharing with them the extra cost of carriage. Their views were communicated to Messrs. Bagley and Co., their agents at Middlesbrough, in a letter of the 8th Jan. 1915.

On the 14th Jan. Messrs. Bagley and Co. wrote the plaintiffs on the subject:

Referring to conversation yesterday, kindly note the steamship Urko Mendi sailed from Sagunto on the 8th inst., and will bring about 1000-1500 tons of Sagunto Rubio for you. All being well, the steamer should arrive towards the end of this month, although owing to the exceptional delays and increased Government restrictions on the north-east coast, the voyage will probably take double the usual time. The agent of the steamer will be Mr. Geo. S. Rosevear, with whom please keep in touch.

Our principals, Messrs. Sota and Aznar, advise that the freights from the Mediterranean are now equal to the c.i.f. price of the ore, and there is a probability of their going still higher. Under the circumstances, they consider that they are entitled to ask you for some relief, as the conditions now prevailing in the North Sea are very much worse than they were at the time the contract was made. Since the bombardment of Hartlepool a new set of circumstances has arisen, notably the much greater delay and risk by mines, seeing that the whole of the coast is now mined by the British Government, resulting in increased rates of freight to the east coast by at least 6*s.* to 7*s.* a ton as compared with the west coast, while the crews have to be paid double, and in many cases will not even come at all. Messrs. Sota and Aznar reluctantly have to ask for your assistance, but, under the exceptional circumstances now current, we trust you will appreciate their point of view and make them some contribution towards the extra rates of freight which they have to pay.

Upon this Messrs. Sota and Aznar and their agents, Messrs. Bagley, exchanged views in letters of the 21st and 22nd Jan.:

Messrs. T. Bagley and Co., Middlesbrough.—Dear Sirs,—We are in receipt of your letter of yesterday. . Of course you may point out to Bolckows or thers in reply to their contention that the shippers have hips, that the Menera Company have no ships at all, and that the freight question does very much affect them. The reasons we have urged have not been adequately dealt with by any of your receivers, except to try and airily push them on one side, which is no answer at all. However, we hope to revert to the whole position to-morrow. . . .—Yours faithfully, p.pro Sota and Aznar.—E. Toda, Manager.

Messrs. Sota and Aznar, London.—Dear Sirs,—We thank you for your letter of yesterday. Bolckows—We await to hear further from you. We are afraid they will think, seeing the Menera Company and the ships are both managed by Messrs. Sota and Aznar, that the excuse is a trifle thin. . . .—Yours faithfully T. Bagley and Co.

On the 6th Feb. there appeared in the Times a German official announcement in the following terms:

The waters round Great Britain and Ireland, including the whole of the English Channel, are herewith proclaimed a war region.

On and after the 18th Feb. every enemy merchant vessel found in this war region will be destroyed without its always being possible to warn the crew or passengers of the dangers threatening.

Neutral ships will also incur danger in the war region, where, in view of the misuse of neutral flags ordered by the British Government, and incidents inevitable in sea warfare, attacks intended for hostile ships may affect neutral ships also.

The Times headed the announcement "A Blockade of England," but that is no part of the German announcement and is incorrect.

Messrs. Sota and Aznar on the same day wrote to Messrs. Bagley a letter in these terms. It is unnecessary to comment upon this letter except to say that iron ore was not declared contraband by the Germans until the 18th April, a month after the defendants' claim to suspend all further deliveries:

Dear Sirs,—We are in receipt of yours of yesterday. . . . The German declaration of attack starting by 18th we think makes our case absolutely clear for relief. Contrary to your opinion, we declare that the Tees is a fortified area. It is protected by batteries both at West Hartlepool and the South Gare. We have lately been in the position of delivering contraband to a fortified area, and now we are going to be in the position of having to run a blockade, and, looked at from a neutral point of view, this is altogether too thick to manage without relief.

Meanwhile the defendants had delivered to the plaintiffs the part cargo in February to which I have already referred. They were delivering to such of their buyers as had met their claim for an increasing price, and were offering to deliver to the plaintiffs, with 5*s.* a ton relief, and to make further deliveries on mutually acceptable terms, offers which the plaintiffs declined, while pointing out that the fact of making them showed the defendants' ability to deliver them if they would.

The German threat had no effect upon freights, but it caused a rise in premiums on war risks at Lloyd's. The rate at Lloyd's for three months' insurance on Spanish ships became about 60*s.* per cent., as against about 30*s.* This did not affect Messrs. Sota and Aznar, as they did not insure at Lloyd's. They had insured in a Spanish club shortly after war broke out. Ships entered in that club paid a premium, and this premium has always remained the same. I understand there has up to the present time been one loss.

Lloyd's records show that the losses of ships of all nationalities in or near waters which would be traversed between Spain and the Tees was in February, fifteen; March, fifteen; April, nine. In other waters the losses were in February, eight; March, nineteen; April, twenty-two; or just under 1 per cent. of the arrivals in the United Kingdom during these same months. There was no increase in the number of neutral vessels sunk by mines or submarines in the first three months of 1915 as compared with the last three months of 1914.

These are the relevant facts, and I am now in a position to consider whether the defendants' claim to suspend deliveries was a justifiable one or was one which the plaintiffs were entitled to treat as a repudiation of the contract. Mr. Hill contended that the covering contract which the defendants made with Messrs. Sota and Aznar had become unenforceable by the 17th March, and that the defendants must be treated as sellers, who would have needed to go into the market and charter at about 16s. a ton to fulfil their contract with the plaintiffs to deliver ore to them at the price of 13*s.* 6*d.* delivered, and that the rise was due to the war, and the defendants were therefore prevented in a commercial sense from performing this contract.

I will deal with the matter firstly on the assumption that the contention that the defendants were left without a covering freight contract is correct. I do this in deference to Mr. Hill's very able argument, and to the general importance of the point so raised. Upon this assumption the question to be first decided is whether a rise in freights due to an excepted cause, in this case war, can ever amount to prevention of fulfilment of a contract to deliver oversea goods.

I am of an opinion that there may be such a rise in freights due to war as to entitle a seller who has to pay freight to say that he was thereby prevented by war from making delivery. The expression "rise in freights" in this connection, and in this case in particular, really means war has caused a scarcity of ships for commercial purposes, of which the rise in freights is at once the sign and the measure. Scarcity of ships due to war, and rise of freights due to war, are interchangeable expressions, but, as the thing that matters to a seller who is seeking a ship to enable him to make delivery is the price he must pay for her, he more usually speaks of the rise in freights. It would simplify matters to say that no rise in freights can amount to prevention of performance, but I think that is impossible in a case where rise in freights due to war connotes scarcity of ships due to war. Suppose, for example, that all British ships were commandeered by the Admiralty, they leaving only neutral ships for private commerce. It seems clear to me that in such a case a seller might truly say, "War has prevented my chartering," and it would be equally correct for him to express himself as being prevented by scarcity of ships or by a rise in freights, a rise which in such a case would, of course, be enormous.

Prevention in a commercial sense is, in my judgment, sufficient, and what is prevention in that sense is a question of degree which could theoretically be expressed either in terms of tonnage or freight, but for practical purposes can be most intelligibly stated in terms of freight.

A scarcely less difficult question is to what extent must a rise in freights be indicative of a scarcity of ships before it amounts to prevention. This must depend, to some extent, upon the circumstances of each particular case. In this case the rise was 5*s.* 9*d.*, to, say, 16*s.* A 16*s.* freight means that the defendants would have had to give away their goods, and, further, to lose 2*s.* 6*d.* a ton on each ton delivered.

As at present advised, I should be inclined to hold that such a rise in freights did indicate such a scarcity of tonnage due to the war as amounted to commercial prevention.

I am, however, relieved from definitely deciding this very difficult question because I have come to the conclusion that Messrs. Sota and Aznar were not, in this case, released from this freight contract, and that the defendants were not in the position of having to charter ships at the increased freight in order to fulfil their contract with the plaintiffs.

Before, however, leaving the subject I should like, in view of its general interests, to make one or two further observations.

It may be objected to this doctrine of commercial prevention that it presses hardly on the buyer who is injured to precisely the extent to which the seller is relieved. To this I would say that it must be borne in mind that, where the contract provides for exemption in the case of war preventing deliveries, the parties clearly contemplate the possibility of prevention, and the seller's contract is not that he will deliver in all events.

The other observation is that no seller can claim exemption if he has failed to protect himself by the requisite covering contracts in a case where it is usual and prudent so to do. A seller cannot choose to take the risks of the market and then, when the market has gone against him, claim protection. In such a case he is prevented, not by war, but by his own imprudence.

It remains to give my reasons why I think Messrs. Sota and Aznar were bound by this carrying contract with the defendants.

They cannot make any use of rise in freights as they had the ships. The effect of their contract with the defendants was to prevent them from taking advantage of the rise in freights, a sufficiently galling situation, no doubt, but not prevention.

The only prevention of this nature on which they could insist would be such an increased cost of carrying out their contract due to the war as made it commercially impossible.

I think there was no sufficient rise in cost, but it is immaterial to consider the matter because they have no clause or words in their contracts with the defendants which in any way entitle them to raise the point. The only possible words are "restraints of princes," and these obviously will not do.

Mr. Hill, as a last resource, sought to make out a case of "restraint of princes" on quite other grounds, and he directed my attention to the delays in the voyage due to the Admiralty Regulations and to the German threat of February.

As to delays, I doubt whether the Admiralty Regulations for the safe navigation of the home waters from the Isle of Wight to the Tees can be called "restraints of princes," although, no doubt, they involve compliance with Admiralty requirements. These requirements, however, were more in the nature of encouraging navigation than preventing it.

Moreover, I remember the defendants' stipulation about the closing of the North Sea to Spanish ships, and in the face of that stipulation I should not hold any regulations for the safer navigation of the North Sea a restraint of princes, even though they involve delays.

Apart from all this, these delays, such as they were, did not in any way prevent their fulfilling their contract, or compel them to get outside tonnage, for they persistently offered cargoes to the plaintiffs at current market prices, and their requests for an increase of a few shillings in the contract price were based, not upon want of ships, but upon increased cost of running them plus the added risk of submarines after the German threat of Feb. 5.

This threat, which is Mr. Hill's other instance of restraint of princes, is, indeed, the only ground upon which they could hope to escape from their contract. I think the point is quite unsound. The German notice is not notice of a blockade. They were not in a position in any case to give notice of blockade, and indeed the only danger which neutrals ran, according to the notice, was the danger of falling victims to attacks intended for British ships. One may pardon Spanish owners being sceptical of the Germans being at much pains to discriminate between neutral and British ships, but I cannot regard either the notice or the subsequent action of the Germans as "restraints of princes." I am glad to find that upon this point my view is in accord with that of Messrs. Sota and Aznar, as shown by the fact that they ran their steamers as readily as before, and made no change at all in their insurances.

The real truth of the case is that Messrs. Sota and Aznar, as managers and controllers of the defendant company and their contracts, would not hold themselves as shipowners to an enforceable but unprofitable freight contract.

By no stretch of imagination can this be brought within the words "in the case of war," however one contemplates that imperfect phrase, whether by "affecting or interfering with or preventing performance," and the result is there must be judgment for the plaintiffs.

ON APPEAL FROM H.B.M. SUPREME COURT FOR EGYPT (IN PRIZE).

Prize Court—Merchant ship in enemy port—Use of Suez Canal port as port of refuge—Commencement of hostilities—Permission to leave—No offer of pass—Attitude of Germany—Reciprocal obligations—Detention—Sixth Hague Convention of 1907, art. 1, 2, 5—Form of Order.

By art. 1 of the Sixth Hague Convention 1907: "When a merchant ship belonging to one of the belligerent Powers is at the commencement of hostilities in an enemy port, it is desirable that it should be allowed to depart freely, either immediately or after a reasonable number of days of grace, and to proceed, after being furnished with a pass, direct to the port of destination or any other port indicated to it. The same principle applies in the case of a ship which has left its last port of departure before the commencement of the war, and has entered a port belonging to the enemy whilst still ignorant that hostilities have broken out."

By art. 2: "A merchant ship which owing to circumstances beyond its control may have been unable to leave the enemy port within the period contemplated in the preceding article or which was not allowed to leave may not be confiscated. The belligerent may merely detain it, on condition of restoring it after the war, without payment of compensation or he may requisition it on payment of compensation."

The G., a German ship, arrived at Port Said on the 5th Aug. 1914 in ignorance that war had been declared between Great Britain and Germany. From her arrival till the 14th Aug. she was not free to leave, but on the latter date she was informed that she was free to proceed if she liked. Matters so remained until the 13th Oct. She never asked for a pass. She was never offered one. On the 13th Oct. the Egyptian Government by arrangement with the British Government put a crew on board her, and on the 16th she was conducted out to sea, where she was seized by a British cruiser as prize. War was not declared between Great Britain and Turkey until the 5th Nov. 1914, and Egypt had not then been declared a British protectorate.

The Egyptian Prize Court held that the G. was entitled to detention in lieu of confiscation, and that in accordance with art. 2 (sup.) she should be detained during the war and restored to her owners at the conclusion of hostilities.

Held, that Egyptian ports must be treated as enemy ports, and that, assuming the Hague Convention applied and the Order in Council of the 4th Aug. 1914 extended to Egypt and was operative at the time the vessel was taken as prize, the failure of Germany to concur in recognising art. 1 left the question whether art. 2 or any part of it was obligatory, or whether, if the course referred to in art. 1 as "desirable" was not taken, art. 2 had any application to an enemy ship in an enemy port at the outbreak of hostilities, or had subsequently without knowledge of the war entered it, was one of international law involving a reciprocal obligation performable only at the end of the war. The British Government was entitled in such circumstances to seize and detain the ship during the war, and the proper order was one merely for the detention of the ship, leaving the ultimate rights of the parties to be determined after the war.

THESE were three appeals from orders of His Britannic Majesty's Supreme Court for Egypt.

In the case of the Gutenfels and the Barenfels the appeal was by the Crown.

In the case of the Derfflinger the Crown was the respondent.

Counsel appearing in the appeals were in the Gutenfels:

Sir F. E. Smith, (A.-G.), Sir George Cave, (S.-G.), Stuart Bevan, Pearce Higgins, and C. R. Dunlop for the Crown.

Sir Robert Finlay, K.C. and R. A. Wright for the respondents.

In the case of the Barenfels it was admitted that it must be governed by the decision in the Gutenfels. The only substantial difference in the facts was that in this case the ship entered Port Said in ignorance that war had been declared and was already in port at the time of the outbreak between Germany and Great Britain.

Sir F. E. Smith (A.-G.), Sir George Cave (S.-G.), and Darby for the appellant.

Sir Robert Finlay, K.C. and R. A. Wright for the respondents.

In the case of the Derfflinger the Hague Convention did not apply, as, although a merchant ship, it was intended to convert her into a warship. She took refuge in Port Said on the 2nd Aug. 1914 on account of war between Germany and France and Russia. She intended to pass through the Suez Canal, but was detained, and the Egyptian Prize Court made an order for her confiscation.

Sir Robert Finlay, K.C. and Dumas for the appellants.

Sir George Cave (S.-G.) and A. Clive Lawrence for the respondent the Procurator of Egypt were not called on.

The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by Lord WRENBURY.—The Gutenfels is a German ship. Bound from Antwerp for Bombay and Karachi, she arrived at Port Said in the afternoon of the 5th Aug. 1914, and entered the port while still ignorant (as is now admitted) that hostilities had broken out between Great Britain and Germany. From the 5th Aug. to the 14th Aug. she was not free to leave. On the 14th Aug. she was informed that she was free to proceed if she liked. Matters so remained until the 13th Oct. She never asked for a pass. She was not offered one. On the 13th Oct. 1914 the Egyptian Government put a crew on board, and on the 16th Oct. they took her to sea and conducted her to H.M.S. Warrior, who seized her as prize and took her to Alexandria. It is admitted that this was done by arrangement between the Egyptian Government and the British Government.

At the date of these events war had not been declared between Great Britain and Turkey, and Great Britain had not declared Egypt to be a protectorate. The date of the declaration of war with Turkey was the 5th Nov. 1914. The date of the declaration of the protectorate was the 18th Dec. 1914.

The Egyptian Prize Court has pronounced the ship to have belonged at the time of seizure to enemies of the Crown, and to have been seized under such circumstances as to be entitled to detention in lieu of confiscation, and has ordered the ship to be detained by the marshal until further order; and has further declared that, in accordance with the provisions of art. 2 of No. VI. of the Hague Conventions, the ship must be restored or her value paid to the owners at the conclusion of hostilities. From this order the Crown appeals. There is no cross-appeal. The Crown contends that the ship ought to be confiscated, or, at any rate, that the question whether she ought to be confiscated, or, on the contrary, whether she must be restored or her value paid to the owners at the conclusion of hostilities, should be left to be determined after the war, and that in default of confiscation the order should be for detention till further order, with liberty to apply as in the case of The Chile (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 598; 112 L. T. Rep. 248; (1914) P. 217). The respondents, having no cross-appeal, cannot contest the order which imposes detention.

The points which have been argued before their Lordships are numerous. Upon some of them it is unnecessary to pronounce any opinion:

First, to the Hague Convention No. VI. (which is the relevant Hague Convention, and will hereinafter be styled simply the Hague Convention) Egypt was not a party. The question has been raised whether, having regard to the anomalous position in which Egypt stood, the Hague Convention applies to Egypt. Their Lordships find it unnecessary to determine this question. They will assume, in favour of the respondents, that the Hague Convention does apply to the case before them.

Secondly, the question has been argued whether Port Said was, within the meaning of the Hague Convention, an "enemy port," that is, a port enemy to Germany. Having regard to the relations between Great Britain and Egypt, to the anomalous position of Turkey, and to the military occupation of Egypt by Great Britain, their Lordships do not doubt that it was. In Hall's International Law, 6th edit., p. 595, the learned author writes: "When a place is militarily occupied by an enemy the fact that it is under his control, and that he consequently can use it for the purposes of his war, outweighs all considerations founded on the bare legal ownership of the soil." Their Lordships think this to be right.

Thirdly, a question has been raised whether, in the events which have happened, the Hague Convention was operative and binding at the date of the events with which the board are concerned in this case. The respondents say that it was. The law officers of the Crown have stated in the plainest terms that the British Government abide by the Hague Convention and look to Germany to do the same. The British Government, by the Order in Council of the 4th Aug. 1914, presently mentioned, acted under the Hague Convention. It is unnecessary to determine whether the Hague Convention applies or not. Their Lordships will assume in favour of the respondents that it does.

It results that the only question for determination is the construction and meaning of the Hague Convention, and that question reduces itself to the decision of a single point—namely, whether art. 2 is, or whether any part of it is, obligatory, or whether, if the course referred to as "desirable" in art. 1 be not taken, art. 2 has or has not any application to a vessel which finds itself in an enemy port at the commencement of hostilities, or which, having left its last port of call before the commencement of hostilities, enters an enemy port without having heard of the hostilities. The respondents contend that it has, the appellants that it has not. The question is one of law arising on an international document involving a reciprocal obligation performable only at the end of the war. If this board were now to determine this question of construction, Germany might hereafter take a different view, and the performance of the obligation, as a reciprocal obligation, might become impossible.

The order made by the Egyptian court determines that the ship must be restored, or her value paid at the conclusion of hostilities. If this order were to stand and at the conclusion of hostilities Germany maintained that the construction upon which that order is based was wrong and refused to restore or pay the value of British ships seized and detained by Germany in like circumstances, the performance of the obligation as a reciprocal obligation would be impossible unless achieved by diplomatic action. Under these circumstances the construction for which the respondents contend, involving as it does a reciprocal obligation performable only at the end of the war, cannot at present be fully determined by their Lordships in the absence of knowledge of the future attitude of the respective belligerents in that regard. Accordingly they think it incompetent to dispose of this question of construction at present.

It remains to apply the above considerations—subject to the above reservations—to the case before the board.

On the 4th Aug. 1914 an Order in Council was issued recognising and acting upon art. 1 of the Hague Convention, conditionally upon Germany within a limited time doing the same. Germany did not do so, and the Order in Council did not come into operation. If this Order in Council included Egypt, the result of Germany's refusal to concur was that neither art. 1 nor art. 2, so far as it is complementary to art. 1, took effect as regards Port Said. If, as their Lordships incline to think, it did not extend to Egypt, it may, of course, be set out of consideration. In either case nothing turns upon this Order in Council, except that it evidences the desire of Great Britain to take that which the Hague Convention indicated as the reasonable course. Their Lordships do not forget that the respondents placed some reliance upon this Order in Council as assisting in the construction which they place upon the Hague Convention, but their Lordships are unable to accept the view that it is of any service for this purpose. Even if at the date of this Order in Council Great Britain took a particular view of the construction of the Hague Convention, that fact throws no light upon the question as to what is, in fact, the true construction.

On the 5th Aug. 1914 the Egyptian Government issued a "Décision," or Decree, similar in some respects to the Order in Council of the 4th Aug. This granted days of grace to sunset on the 14th August to ships of not more than 5000 tons gross. But as the Gutenfels was more than 5000 tons it did not apply to her.

The facts then are (assuming, as for the purposes of this judgment their Lordships do assume, that the Hague Convention applies) that art. 2, so far as it was complementary to art. 1, never came into operation by reason of the fact that as between Great Britain and Germany the recommendation agreed by art. 1 failed, by reason of the action, or, rather, the inaction, of Germany, to be carried into effect by the contracting parties. Under these circumstances, there being nothing which entitled the Gutenfels to remain in the port (for she had long exceeded any such limited right as might arise from a right of passage through the canal, assuming that she had such a right), there was nothing to prevent the Egyptian Government and British Government acting as they did, and at the least seizing and detaining her during the war, to await at the conclusion of the war the determination of the questions above reserved. The order which, in their Lordships' judgment, will be right will be an order allowing the appeal, and substituting an order in the terms of that in the case of The Chile (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 598; 112 L. T. Rep. 248; (1914) P. 217), leaving the ultimate rights between the parties to be determined after the war.

Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

They think that each party should bear his own costs of this appeal.

THE BARENFELS.

This vessel, bound from Hamburg and Antwerp to Colombo, Madras, and Calcutta, arrived at Port Said on the 1st Aug. 1914, and was still there on the 4th and 5th Aug. Except that she was in Port Said before and at the commencement of the war, the relevant facts are identical with those in the case of the Gutenfels. This case is governed by the decision in the Gutenfels, and their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that the same order should be made.

THE DERFFLINGER.

This vessel showed by her build that she was intended for conversion into a warship. The Hague Convention therefore does not apply (see art. 5). She passed through the canal and arrived at Port Said on the 2nd Aug. on a voyage from Yokohama to Bremen. Her log contains the following entries:

1914, August 2: Arrived Port Said. The journey cannot be continued on account of the war.

August 3rd: Passengers and baggage landed.

Under the International Suez Canal Convention of 1889, she was entitled to use the canal for the purposes of passage. She had used it, and the above entries show that her voyage of passage was over; that her journey was, in her view, rendered abortive by reason of the war, and that she had accordingly landed her passengers and cargo. Port Said was, on the 2nd and 3rd Aug., a neutral port. The war which caused the discontinuance of the ship's voyage was the war between Germany and France and that between Germany and Russia. When war broke out on the 4th Aug. between Germany and Great Britain the vessel was lying in Port Said, not in exercise of a right of passage, but by way of user of the port as a port of refuge. Under these circumstances, the Canal Convention had ceased to be operative and she was not entitled to any protection. The ship was a German ship lying in an enemy port, and was a ship to which the Hague Convention did not apply.

If any justification were necessary for the subsequent acts of the Egyptian and British Governments it is found in the fact that the ship, while lying in the port, was using her wireless for communicating information to the German warships, the Goeben and the Breslau. In their Lordships' opinion, the order for her confiscation was right, and this appeal should be dismissed. The order should be varied, however, so as to run "and as such or otherwise subject and liable to confiscation and condemned the said ship as good and lawful prize seized on behalf of the Crown" and in other respects should be in the form of the order under appeal. Their Lordships will advise His Majesty accordingly. The appellants will pay the costs of the appeal.

THE ACHAIA. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM H.B.M. SUPREME COURT FOR EGYPT.

Prize Court—Ship in enemy port at outbreak of hostilities—Refusal of offer of pass—Liability to confiscation—Hague Conference 1907, Convention VI., arts. 1, 2.

If a merchant ship in an enemy port at the outbreak of hostilities rejects the offer of a pass and elects to remain in that port, she is not protected by arts. 1 and 2 of the Hague Conference 1907, Convention VI., from condemnation and confiscation as prize.

Decision of the Supreme Court for Egypt (in Prize) affirmed.

APPEAL by the owners of the German steamship Achaia from a judgment of H.B.M. Supreme Court for Egypt ordering the condemnation and confiscation of the ship as prize.

Sir Robert Finlay, K.C. and Dunlop for the appellants.

Ernest Pollock, K.C. and Rayner Goddard for the respondent, the Procurator-General in Egypt.

At the close of the arguments for the appellants their Lordships reserved judgment.

The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by

Lord PARKER OF WADDINGTON.—The Achaia was a German steamship of 2732 tons, belonging to the Deutsche Devante Linie, of Hamburg. She arrived at the port of Alexandria on the 31st July 1914 in the course of a voyage from Bremen to Alexandria, and thence to certain Syrian ports. She carried a general cargo, part of which was consigned to Alexandria. She had discharged this part of her cargo by 4 p.m. on the 4th Aug. Upon the outbreak of war between Germany and this country she was, under the Egyptian Decision of the 5th Aug., allowed till sunset on the 14th Aug. to leave the port of Alexandria. On the 12th Aug. she was offered a pass for the Piræus available till sunset on the 14th Aug., signed by Lieutenant Grogan Bey, Inspector of Marine of the Egyptian Ports and Lights Administration. According to the evidence of Max Stross, the ship's agent, she made all arrangements to leave, but at the last moment came to the conclusion that it would be too dangerous unless the pass were viséd by the French Consul. Moreover, she believed that all Egyptian ports were neutral. She accordingly elected to remain where she was. The port authorities thereupon seized the ship and disabled her engines. Subsequently, on the 19th Oct. 1914, the captain and crew were made prisoners of war, and the ship placed in the custody of the marshal of the Prize Court. There can be no doubt that what happened amounted to a seizure as prize.

Their Lordships have already decided in the case of the Gutenfels that Egyptian ports must be treated as enemy ports within the meaning of the Sixth Hague Convention. Under the circumstances, however, they are of opinion that the recommendation contained in the first article of that Convention was fully complied with. The vessel was given sufficient time to leave the port of Alexandria. She was offered a pass to a neutral port, and there is no reason to suppose that such pass was insufficient, or would not have been recognised as valid by any belligerent Power. The fact that the vessel did not leave Alexandra under this pass was not due to force majeure, but to her own deliberate election not to do so. She cannot, therefore, rely on the provisions of art. 2 of the Convention. Even if Alexandria could be regarded as a neutral port, the fact would be immaterial. The seizure of an enemy vessel in a neutral port, though a breach of neutrality, would not in a Court of Prize afford any ground for its release.

The case is, in their Lordships' opinion, a clear one. The appeal should be dismissed, and the appellants will pay the costs. Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

THE BELGIA. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (IN PRIZE), ENGLAND.

Prize Court—Enemy merchant ship in enemy port—Outbreak of war—Capture "in port" or "at sea"—Meaning of "port"—Capture in open roadstead—Hague Peace Conference 1907, Convention VI., arts. 1, 2.

By art. 1 of the Sixth Hague Convention 1907: "When a merchant ship belonging to one of the belligerent Powers is at the commencement of hostilities in an enemy port, it is desirable that it should be allowed to depart freely, either immediately or after a reasonable number of days of grace, and to proceed, after being furnished with a pass direct to the port of destination or any other port indicated to it. . . ."

By art. 2: "A merchant ship which, owing to circumstances beyond its control, may have been unable to leave the enemy port within the period contemplated in the preceding article, or which was not allowed to leave, may not be confiscated," but may be detained.

Held, that these articles applied only to vessels within a "port" in the ordinary mercantile sense of the word, and did not apply to a vessel captured while lying in an open roadstead at the commencement of hostilities, although at a place within the limits of the fiscal port.

Decision of Sir S. T. Evans affirmed.

APPEAL from a decree of Sir Samuel Evans, sitting in the Prize Court, whereby the steamship Belgia, belonging to the appellants the Hamburg-Amerika Line, was condemned as lawful prize.

Sir Robert Finlay, K.C. and Lumas, for the appellants.

Sir F. E. Smith (A.-G.), Butler Aspinall, K.C., and C. R. Dunlop, for the Procurator-General, respondent, were not called on.

The following cases were referred to by the appellants:

Garston Steamship Company v. Hickie and Co., 15 Q. B. Div. 580;
Hunter v. North Marine Insurance Company, 13 App. Cas. 717;
The Erymanthos, 1 P. Cas. 339;

The considered judgment of their Lordships was delivered by Lord PARMOOR.—The question raised in this appeal is whether the steamship Belgia is entitled to the benefit of the 1st and 2nd articles of the Sixth Convention of the Second Hague Peace Conference 1907. The appellants are a German company, known as the Hamburg-Amerika Line. The master of the Belgia, which was bound from Boston to Hamburg, received information at about 9 p.m. on the 3rd Aug. 1914, when off the Scilly Isles, that war had broken out between Germany and France. The master decided to deviate from the voyage to Hamburg and to go to the Bristol Channel, on the ground, as stated in his evidence, "because I was afraid of being captured by a French man-of-war." When off Trevose Head, a Newport pilot was taken on board. The Belgia arrived off Newport in the afternoon of the 4th Aug. 1914, and at about 5.50 p.m. proceeded as far as the Bell Buoy at the entrance to the river Usk. Among other places vessels are discharged at the port of Newport in the Alexandra Dock, which is approached by a dredged channel, at the entrance to which is the Bell Buoy. At this point the Belgia was stopped by the dockmaster, and ordered to anchor off the English and Welsh lightship, in a position alleged to be within the fiscal port of Newport. On the afternoon of the 4th Aug. war had not broken out between Germany and England, and Newport was not an enemy port to a German vessel. Art. 1 and 2 of the Sixth Convention only apply to merchant ships at the commencement of hostilities in an enemy port, or entering an enemy port whilst still ignorant that hostilities have broken out. Their Lordships, therefore, cannot hold that, when the steamship Belgia reached Newport on the afternoon of the 4th Aug., the first and second articles of the Sixth Convention had any application. It was argued by Sir Robert Finlay that the dockmaster had no right to stop the Belgia at the Bell Buoy, but in the opinion of their Lordships the dockmaster was not exceeding the limits of his authority. Their was no obligation to admit the Belgia to the Alexandra Dock, admission being a matter of courtesy and not of right.

On the morning of the 5th Aug., and after war had broken out between Germany and England, the Belgia was captured in the position described in para. 6 of the affidavit of the dockmaster as follows:

> The position of the Belgia was then as follows: The English and Welsh light vessel bearing about E.S.E. three-quarters of a mile, and the Spit lay about N.E. one mile. She was, therefore, 3¾ miles from the Somersetshire coast, and 5 miles from the Bell Buoy (marking the mouth of the River Usk).

It is proved in evidence that the position in which the Belgia was anchored at the time of capture is in an open roadstead, and that no cargoes are ever discharged or unloaded at or near this position, and that the only places at Newport where cargoes are discharged or unloaded are in the docks or at wharves up the river Usk. In ordinary mercantile language, a merchant vessel in such a position would not be within the port of Newport. A port denotes a place to which merchant vessels are in the habit of going to load or discharge cargo, and not a place in an open roadstead at which no cargoes are ever discharged or unloaded. It was, however, argued on behalf of the appellants that the word "port" in arts. 1 and 2 of the sixth convention included not only a port in the ordinary mercantile sense, but a fiscal port, and that at the time of capture the Belgia was within the fiscal port of Newport.

It is not necessary to determine whether the Belgia at the time of capture was in fact within the fiscal port of Newport, since, in the opinion of their Lordships, arts. 1 and 2 of the sixth Convention do not include vessels merely within a fiscal port. These articles are limited to merchant ships, and refer to commercial transactions, not to fiscal regulations. The word "port" is used not only in the collocation

(a) Reported by W. E. REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

"enemy port," but of "a port of destination" and a "port of departure"—well recognised terms in the language of commerce. To extend the benefit of arts. 1 and 2 of the Sixth Convention to vessels within a fiscal port would be not only to interpolate a word not used in the articles, but to introduce a new test not relevant to their subject-matter and involving different considerations. That the scope of arts. 1 and 2 is commercial and not fiscal is further confirmed by the language of the preamble of the Convention. The parties to the Convention are not concerned with the fiscal regulations in any particular country, but anxious to ensure the security of international commerce against the surprises of war, and to protect, as far as possible, operations undertaken in good faith and in process of being carried out before the outbreak of hostilities.

It is not necessary in this appeal to consider the questions which have arisen as to the conditions under which the provisions of arts. 1 and 2 of the Sixth Convention become applicable, since, assuming their applicability, the facts do not bring the Belgia within their benefit. In the opinion of their Lordships, the Belgia was captured at sea, and is not entitled to the benefits of arts. 1 and 2. They will humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

THE MARQUIS BACQUEHEM. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM H.B.M. SUPREME COURT FOR EGYPT (IN PRIZE).

Prize Court—Ship entering enemy port after declaration of war with knowledge, but under leave to proceed on voyage—Boarding at sea—Leave to proceed on voyage—Detention—Liability to confiscation—Hague Peace Conference 1907, Convention VI., arts. 1 and 2.

A merchant ship belonging to a belligerent Power was stopped by a British warship at sea and was informed of the outbreak of hostilities. She was, however, allowed to proceed on her voyage apparently under a misapprehension that some period of grace had been allowed her. She proceeded to the port of Suez, regarding it as a neutral port, with the intention of remaining there.

Held, that she was not protected by arts. 1 and 2 of the Sixth Hague Convention 1907, and was liable to condemnation.

Decision of the Supreme Court for Egypt (in prize) reversed.

APPEAL by the Procurator-General in Egypt from a judgment of His Britannic Majesty's Supreme Court for Egypt in Prize (Cator, J. and Grain, J.) ordering the detention of the Austrian-Lloyd steamship Marquis Bacquehem, and asking for the condemnation and confiscation of the ship as prize.

Sir F. E. Smith (A.-G.) and J. B. Aspinall for the appellant.

Sir Robert Finlay, K.C. and Balloch for the respondents.

The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by

Sir SAMUEL EVANS.—The subject-matter of this appeal is an Austria-Hungarian steamship of about 4400 tons gross register.

The court at Alexandria pronounced that the ship had been seized under such circumstances as to be entitled to detention in lieu of confiscation, and ordered that she should be detained until further order. The court further declared that the ship should be restored or her value paid to the owners at the conclusion of the war, in accordance with the provisions of the Hague Convention No. VI. of 1907.

The appellant contends that this order should be set aside, and asks for the condemnation and confiscation of the ship as prize.

The respondents seek to uphold the order. They have not brought a cross-appeal, and do not ask for restitution.

The facts alleged and relied upon by the respondents in support of the order were that on the 17th Aug. 1914, when the ship was in the Red Sea about 150 miles north of Port Sudan on her voyage from Karachi to Trieste, she was boarded by officers from H.M.S. Duke of Edinburgh, and informed of the hostilities between Great Britain and Austria-Hungary; that until then those on board of her were ignorant of such hostilities; that an officer from H.M.S. Duke of Edinburgh informed her master that he was at liberty to proceed on the voyage, and made an entry to that effect in the ship's log-book; that she so proceeded and entered the port of Suez; and that she intended to prosecute the voyage through the Suez Canal to its termination at Trieste, but was prevented from so doing by the disabling of her engines on the 20th Aug.

As was done in reference to Port Said and the captures of vessels which had been lying there, in the cases of the Gutenfels and others, their Lordships in the present case accept that the port of Suez, in the circumstances of the time, is to be regarded as an "enemy port" within the meaning of The Hague Convention.

Assuming this in favour of the respondents, and assuming, for the purposes of this appeal, that the Hague Convention is binding upon Great Britain and Austria-Hungary, their Lordships consider it clear that the case of this ship is not one of those specified in the Convention, where only an order for detention during the war, on condition of restoration or of making compensation after the war, should be made.

Upon the undisputed facts the vessel was not in a belligerent or enemy port at the outbreak of war; nor did she enter such a port while ignorant of the hostilities between the two countries; nor was she captured on the high seas while ignorant of such hostilities.

Accordingly, in their Lordships' opinion, the order made in the court below in the terms of the Hague Convention cannot stand.

(a) Reported by W. E. REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

But even if the ship was not entitled to direct protection under the provisions of The Hague Convention, counsel for her owners contended that, inasmuch as the only knowledge of hostilities which her master had was derived from H.M.S. Duke of Edinburgh, and as she had been allowed to proceed on her voyage by the visiting officer from H.M.S. Duke of Edinburgh, she ought not to be deprived of the protection she had claimed under The Hague Convention or to be in a worse position than she would have been if the Duke of Edinburgh had captured her at sea and exercised the right to detain her.

These contentions were not formulated in accordance with any principle of law, and their Lordships are unable to accept them, even if the facts were as alleged.

In order to appreciate the real situation relating to the voyage, visit, search, and seizure of the vessel, it is deemed useful to make a short statement of the true facts as they present themselves to their Lordships.

The ship was loaded at Karachi, bound with a cargo of cotton for Trieste, and with a cargo of 4600 sacks of grain for Aden. She set out on her voyage from Karachi on the 4th Aug. 1914. The following entry appears in the ship's log:

Aug. 4, 1914.—Left Karachi. A few minutes before the steamer left the port the agent of the society repeated a telegram to the commander of the ship received from the directors of the Austrian Lloyd ordering the captain to go direct to Trieste—not to stop at Aden—and on arrival at Suez the passengers would be shipped on to another steamer and taken to their destination.

The vessel was not constructed for passenger traffic. No information was given as to what passengers were on board or what were their respective destinations. Nor was anything said about any steamer on which they were to be shipped at Suez. But an entry in the log on the 26th Aug. refers to "arrangements for fifteen Austrian reservists to go to Alexandria en route for Europe."

The summary of the contents of the log between Karachi and Suez (from the 4th to the 20th Aug.) is unusually meagre. It only records the visit from H.M.S. Duke of Edinburgh on the 17th. But on a loose sheet of paper discovered in the log-book by His Honour Judge Cator were found these entries:

Aug. 12-13, 1914.—We navigate at the same speed. At 8.30 Ras Marshay was sighted. As by approaching Aden we might meet the "natanti" and in order not to be seen we navigate without lights, this all the more as we had seen some searchlights from the direction of the harbour.

Aug. 13.—At night we navigate without lights towards the Straits of Perim, keeping our steamer out of the way in order to avoid encounters.

Thus, darkly and furtively, did the ship sail past Aden—a British possession—the port to which a large part of her cargo was destined. There is a significant omission of any reference to the Aden cargo in the master's affidavit and in the petition filed for the claimants.

The ship was navigated with similar precautions through the Straits and past Perim Island, also a British possession.

When, on the 17th Aug., after travelling some 700 miles or more up the Red Sea, she was visited and searched by the officer from H.M.S. Duke of Edinburgh, these incidents of the voyage and entries on the loose sheet were not disclosed to him. The lieutenant commander acted (no doubt upon the information imparted, to which he appears to have given the unsuspecting credence of an honest sailor) upon the assumption that the master of the enemy vessel was not aware of hostilities. He also acted under a misapprehension that some period of grace had been allowed to the ship. He accordingly refrained from capturing her, and made the following entry in the ship's log-book:

Boarded steamship Marquis Bacquehem in latitude 22° 25′ N., longitude 37° 8′ E., and informed captain that a state of war exists between England and Austria. Being within the period of grace, allowed ship to proceed on her voyage.—(Signed) J. K. B. BIRCH, Lieutenant Commander, R.N., H.M.S. Duke of Edinburgh, commanded by Captain H. Blackett, R.N.

It was argued, or suggested, that this constituted some kind of licence for the ship to proceed upon her voyage without any risk of capture, or at any rate, of any capture or seizure involving more than detention as a penal consequence. But the entry, in fact, was nothing more than a memorandum of his visit and search which the boarding officer was bound, as part of his duty, to record on the ship's log.

The instructions to officers in such a case are prescribed thus:

The visiting officer should enter on the log-book of the vessel a memorandum of the search. The memorandum should specify the date and place of the search, and the name of Her Majesty's ship and of the commander; and the visiting officer should sign the memorandum, adding his rank in the navy.—(See Manual of Naval Prize Law, by Holland, issued by authority of the Admiralty, 1888, art. 225)

What the officer did amounted to no more than if he had said, "From what you have told me, so far as I am concerned you can go."

Having thus escaped capture by H.M.S. Duke of Edinburgh, the ship reached Suez on the 20th Aug.

There her engines were partly disabled so as to prevent her from entering the canal; and there she remained until she was taken out to the roads and captured on the 27th Oct.

It was admitted by the respondents' counsel that notwithstanding anything contained in any of the Suez Canal Conventions, it was right for the safety of the canal to disable the ship so as to make it impossible for her to enter it.

In these circumstances their Lordships are of opinion that the owners of the ship could not after that claim any rights or privileges under any of the Canal Conventions.

In the course of his argument for the respondents, Sir Robert Finlay did not rely upon any protection or privilege under the Canal Conventions. After the reply of the Attorney-General, however, in answer to their Lordships, he put forward tentatively an argument that under the Conventions the vessel while at Suez was immune from any act of hostility. As to this, it is sufficient to state, in addition to what has already been said, that their Lordships find, as a fact, that the ship did not intend to pass through the canal in the course of her voyage. She intended to, and did, use Suez as a port of refuge. She made direct for it, although Aden with a cargo destined for Aden which would have to be reshipped and carried back about 1300 miles to be delivered at Aden. At Suez her "passengers" were to be shipped on to another steamer and thence "taken to their destination." She regarded Suez as a neutral port and intended to stay there indefinitely; and, indeed, on the 26th Oct. a protest was made against her expulsion from the neutral port.

His Honour Judge Cator, in the court below, said he greatly doubted if the ship ever intended to proceed beyond Suez. Their Lordships do not share any such doubt. On the contrary, they have come to the conclusions above stated.

As to the order made in the court below, the judgments express in terms the difficulties the court felt in ordering detention instead of confiscation.

Judge Cator in one passage said: "If the news of hostilities had reached her through any source but that of a British man-of-war, I apprehend that we should have no option but to condemn her to confiscation. That would have been her fate under the old law, and she can only escape by bringing her case within the exceptions specified in the Hague Convention, and when the language of the Convention is clear we must abide by it. For although I have every wish to construe its articles in a liberal spirit, the court cannot modify or add to them."

Their Lordships have already declared their opinion that the ship could not be brought within the provisions of the Sixth Hague Convention at all.

In another passage His Honour expressed himself as follows: "I find it hard to decide whether we should confiscate the ship or only order her detention. I have had more difficulty in making up my mind upon this point than any that I have yet had to determine in prize. For although it is true that, after being warned, the Marquis Bacquehem might have run for a neutral port, it certainly does seem hard that she should be in a worse plight because the Duke of Edinburgh allowed her to proceed instead of taking her before a Prize Court, especially as this permission seems to have been given in the belief that the ship was entitled to consideration in consequence of her ignorance that war had broken out. Moreover, no stipulation was made that she should go to a neutral port, and she may have been encouraged in the belief that she could enter Suez in security. On the whole, I think that we should only order detention."

Their Lordships have already shown that this view of the effect of what was done by the Lieutenant Commander of the Duke of Edinburgh was erroneous, and that no such result could properly be held to follow his visit and search and his record thereof in the ship's log.

Indeed, if the officer had been truthfully informed of the facts, he would have been justified himself in capturing the ship on the high seas; and if that had been done, the facts would supply sufficient evidence to enable the court to order her confiscation.

It is not necessary to comment further upon the judgments. Their Lordships have only dealt as fully as they have with the case because they differ in opinion from the learned judges of the court below. Upon the simple ground that the ship, after knowledge of hostilities, entered into an enemy port, where in the circumstances she was not entitled to protection or immunity under any international Convention, their Lordships are of opinion that she was properly seized as prize, and is subject to confiscation.

Their Lordships will accordingly humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal should be allowed; that the order appealed against should be reversed; and that an order be made condemning the vessel as lawful prize to the Crown. The respondents must pay the costs of the appeal.

THE PINDOS.
THE HELGOLAND.
THE ROSTOCK. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM H.B.M. SUPREME COURT FOR EGYPT (IN PRIZE).

Prize Court—Enemy ship—Port of refuge—Suez Canal port—Rejection of safe conduct pass—Seizure—Suez Canal Convention 1888, arts. 1 and 4*—Question of international convention—Right of enemy owners to be heard.*

Art. 4 of the Suez Canal Convention of 1888, confirmed by the subsequent Anglo-French Agreement of 1904, contains the following provisions: "The Maritime Canal remaining open in time of war as a free passage even to the ships of war of belligerents, according to the terms of art. 1 of the present treaty, the high contracting parties agree that no right of war, no act of hostility, nor any act having for its object to obstruct the free navigation of the Canal, shall be committed in the Canal and its ports of access, as well as within a radius of three miles from those ports, even though the Ottoman Empire should be one of the belligerent Powers."

Held, that the Convention had no application to enemy ships which were using the Canal ports of access, not for the purpose of passing through the Suez Canal, but as a neutral port in which to seclude themselves for an indefinite time in order to defeat belligerents' rights of capture.

Held, further, that as the alleged immunity from capture was based on international conventions, the enemy owners were entitled to be heard.

The considered judgment of their Lordships was delivered by Lord SUMNER.—These are three appeals from three decrees of His Majesty's Court of Prize in Egypt, condemning these vessels as lawful prize. In view of the fact that reliance was placed on immunities alleged to be claimable under international conventions, no objection has been raised, such as was raised in The Möwe (ante, p. 17; 112 L. T. Rep. 261; (1915) P. 1), to the presence of enemy owners to be heard before their Lordships on appeal.

The steamship Pindos is a steamship of 2933 tons gross, which belonged to the Deutsches Levant Linie, of Hamburg. In the course of a round voyage from Antwerp to Eastern Mediterranean ports she entered Port Said at 2 a.m. on the 1st Aug. 1914. Her next port would have been on the Syrian coast. Through her agents at Port Said she "received orders not to proceed until further instructions." She discharged her Port Said cargo and continued to lie in her berth. On the 14th Aug. the captain was informed by the authorities that he was free to sail and would receive a pass, if he would call for it at the port office. This he did not do, having been informed by someone, but inaccurately, that the harbour of Port Said had been declared neutral. In fact, by that date Egypt was in a state of hostility de facto to the German Empire. On the 22nd Aug. a pass for Beirut was actually delivered to him. He says that he doubted its validity—which, in truth, he had no grounds for doing—but, since he was advised by his agents to stay in Port Said, as it was a neutral port, his reasons for staying there are clear.

On the 15th Oct. he was taken outside the limits of Port Said and of territorial waters in charge of persons appointed for the purpose by the Egyptian authorities, and then was captured by H.M.S. Warrior in latitude 31 degrees 24¼ minutes north and longitude 32 degrees 20¾ minutes east. Upon these facts a decree of condemnation as prize was pronounced in His Majesty's Supreme Court for Egypt in Prize on the 17th Feb. 1915, from which this appeal is brought.

The steamship Helgoland is a steamship of 5666 tons gross, which belonged to the Norddeutscher Lloyd, of Bremen. On the 29th July 1914 she entered the Suez Canal bound with a general cargo from Singapore to Rotterdam and Bremen, and reached Port Said on the 30th July. Her captain had made preparations to continue his voyage and leave Port Said on the 31st July, but on his arrival he received instructions from his owners to stay there. He recorded in his log on that day "German mobilisation," and on the 17th and 18th Aug. he paid off a large number of his crew. A pass was offered to him in the same way as to the captain of the Pindos, but he did not avail himself of the offer. Another was actually delivered, also as in that case, of which, though it was valid, no use was made. The reason for this again was that the captain, on the same pretext, had definitely decided, in accordance with his owners' instructions, to stay where he was. Subsequently the Helgoland also was taken outside Egyptian territorial waters by persons employed by the Egyptian authorities, and there captured by H.M.S. Warrior on the 15th Oct. at about the same place. She was duly condemned as prize on the 17th Feb. 1915.

The Rostock was a steamship of 4957 tons gross, which belonged to the Deutsche-Australische Dampfschiffsgesellschaft, of Hamburg. She came through the Suez Canal from Eastern ports with general cargo, bound, no doubt, for a home port, and arrived at Port Said on the 31st July and began to discharge such part of her cargo as was deliverable there. While doing so her captain received a cablegram from his owners at Hamburg to wait further orders. His log records on the 1st Aug.: "In order to protect ship and cargo from the attacks of the enemy, shall remain until further notice in Port Said, as the harbour is neutral." On the 17th to 19th Aug. the ship discharged her cargo of frozen meat. After the 31st July the captain received no further communication from his owners. He was treated by the Egyptian authorities in respect of the offer of a pass, the actual delivery of a valid pass subsequently, and the removal of his ship outside Egyptian territorial waters, exactly as the captains of the Pindos and the Helgoland were treated. He behaved in the same way and for the same reasons. The Rostock was captured by the Warrior on the 15th Oct., and was condemned as prize on the 17th Feb. 1915.

The claimants in their petitions formerly relied on what in each case were substantially the same defences—namely: (1) the benefit of the Sixth Hague Convention of 1907, arts. 1 and 2; (2) the benefit of art. 4 of the Suez Canal Convention of 1888, confirmed by art. 6 of the Anglo-French Agreement of 1904; (3) the formal invalidity and the practical inefficiency of the passes which were offered by the Egyptian authorities; (4) considerations of equity and natural justice arising out of the circumstances under which the ships were ejected from Egyptian waters.

Of these points the first has already been dealt with sufficiently by their Lordships in the case of The Gutenfels (ante, p. 346; 114 L. T. Rep. 953; (1916) A. C. 112) and the third in that of The Achaia (ante, p. 349; (1916) 2 A. C. 198). Of the second all that need be said is this: Whatever question can be raised as to the parties, to and between whom the Suez Canal Convention 1888 is applicable and as to the interpretation of its articles, one thing is plain, that the Convention is not applicable to ships which are using Port Said not for the purposes of passage through the Suez Canal or as one of its ports of access, but as a neutral port in which to seclude themselves for an indefinite time, in order to defeat belligerents' rights of capture, after abandoning any intention there may ever have been to use the port as a port of access in connection with transit through the canal. Those responsible for the ships took their course deliberately, and took it before the 14th Aug. The captains appear, as was only natural, to have consulted together and to have acted in concert. In the case of the Helgoland, her owners in Bremen, doubtless well informed persons, as early as Thursday, the 30th July 1914, if not earlier, were so assured, though no ultimatum had then been issued, that Germany would shortly be at war, and England and Egypt would be neutral, that they ordered her captain to stop in Port Said instead of trying to reach a Turkish, a Greek, an Italian, or an Austrian port. It is no light responsibility to stop a ship of over 5000 tons with general cargo in midvoyage for an indefinite period, and thus to imperil insurances alike on ship and cargo, and to incur heavy expenses and probably heavy claims from cargo owners as well; but this responsibility was taken. Their Lordships are of opinion that the evidence amply justified the decision of the Prize Court in each case, that the ships were using Port Said simply as a port of refuge, and therefore without any right or privilege arising out of the Suez Canal Convention 1888. Hence their expulsion by the Egyptian authorities when it had become plain that they would not leave of themselves, affords no answer to the claim for condemnation in natural justice, or equity, or law. In view of their common election to remain, no distinction can be drawn between the ships which had used the canal and the Pindos, which never meant to use it at all. By the 14th Aug. liability to capture and condemnation had accrued in each case, and no circumstance then existing or arising thereafter had annulled that liability. The general question of costs has been dealt with in the case of The Zamora (ante, p. 330; 114 L. T. Rep. 626; (1916) 1 A. C. 77).

Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that in each of these three cases the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

The orders should in each case be varied, however, so as to run, "and as such or otherwise subject and liable to confiscation and condemned the said ship as good and lawful prize seized on behalf of the Crown," and in other respects should be in the form of the orders under appeal.

THE CONCADORO. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM H.B.M. SUPREME COURT FOR EGYPT (IN PRIZE).

Prize Court—Enemy merchant ship—Offer of pass to neutral port—Conditions—Failure to use pass—"Force majeure"—Ship detained "owing to circumstances beyond its control"—Hague Conference 1907, Convention VI., arts. 1 and 2.

A merchant ship in an enemy port is not entitled to receive an unconditional pass under art. 1 of the Hague Convention VI., and reasonable conditions attached to the offer of the pass do not invalidate it; and the expression "force majeure" in art. 2 of the same Convention has reference to circumstances which render the ship unable to leave the port within the days of grace allowed her, and cannot be construed to include the circumstance that the master has not been provided with sufficient money by the owners to continue the voyage.

Decision of the Supreme Court for Egypt (in Prize) affirmed.

APPEAL by the owners of the Austrian steamship Concadoro from a judgment of H.B.M. Supreme Court for Egypt condemning the vessel as prize.

Sir Robert Finlay, K.C. and Theobald Mathew for the appellants.

Sir F. E. Smith (A.-G.) and Branson for the Procurator-General, respondent.

The considered judgment of their Lordships was delivered by Lord PARMOOR.—The steamship Concadoro is an Austrian vessel (1813 tons gross and 1198 tons net register) registered at Trieste. On the 1st Aug. 1914 the Concadoro left the port of Cardiff under charter to Messrs. D. L. Flack and Son, with a cargo of patent fuel destined for consignees at Port Soudan. She arrived at Port Said on the 18th Aug. 1914, her master being ignorant that war had broken out between Great Britain and Austria-Hungary. Owing to the outbreak of war, the master was not provided by the managing owner with funds to enable him to continue his voyage, and decided to remain at Port Said, fearing to put to sea lest he should be captured by British men-of-war. The master says that he believed Port Said to be a neutral port. Their Lordships have already found that Port Said was not at this date in fact a neutral port, and that, under the Suez Convention, the ships of belligerents had no right to make it a port of refuge. It is only because Port Said has at the said date to be regarded as an enemy, and not a neutral, port, that the appellants are able to found their case on the application of arts. 1 and 2 of the Hague Convention No. VI. of 1907, assuming for the purposes of the appeal that the Hague Convention applies, as their Lordships have done in other appeals from the Egyptian court.

Immediately on arrival the Concadoro came under the general precautionary order issued by the general officer commanding British troops, that no enemy vessel was to enter the canal. The Concadoro was free to return to the Mediterranean. On the 22nd Sept. 1914 the master of the Concadoro was offered a safe conduct to Port Soudan, and thence to Basra, on the terms comprised in the following document:

Sir,—I am instructed to inform you as follows:—The coal cargo of the Concadoro being required at Port Soudan, you are requested to proceed to that port and discharge it to the consignees' order. If you will agree to do so, the Egyptian Government is authorised by the British Foreign Office to grant you a safe conduct to the said port, and from thence to the port of Basra, a neutral port, on the following conditions: (1) The Concadoro must leave Port Said on or before the 27th Sept., and must proceed direct to Port Soudan, arriving there not later than six days from date of departure from Port Said; (2) she must discharge without delay the 1900 tons of patent fuel to the consignees, Messrs. Contomichalos, Darke, and Co., and forty-eight hours after completion must leave Port Soudan for the neutral port named above; (3) the Concadoro will be liable to capture in the event of any infringement of the foregoing conditions. You are requested to give me a written answer to this letter as soon as possible, and, in the event of your acceptance of the conditions named, you will be good enough to apply to this office for the safe-conduct referred to, at the same time informing me of the date and time you propose to enter the canal.

(Signed) C. E. D. TRELAWNEY, Captain of Port.

On the 23rd Sept. the master replied: "I beg to thank you for your letter of the 22nd, but in reply I regret to inform you that, on account of the present political situation, I cannot see my way to undertake the vogage to Port Soudan before the end of hostilities. I can only deliver the cargo here against original bill of lading and signature of bond with deposit for general average."

Their Lordships would not desire to place undue weight on this letter, but the claim of the master not to prosecute the voyage to Port Soudan before the end of hostilities in substance amounts to a claim to use Port Said as a port of refuge. It is material that at this date the master of the Concadoro had received an offer by the consignees of the cargo to advance the sum of 530*l.* for the canal dues and disbursements at Port Said. On the 22nd Oct. the Concadoro was taken out to sea, under instruction from the Director-General to the Port and Lights Administration of Egypt, and steered northwards towards a British destroyer which was laying outside the harbour. The vessel was boarded by officers and crew of the destroyer, brought back to the point from which she had started in the morning, and was then taken over by a crew from H.M.S. Warrior. The next day the Concadoro, in charge of a crew from the Warrior, left Port Said for Port Soudan. The cargo was discharged at Port Soudan and the Concadoro was taken to Alexandria, where she arrived on the 17th Nov. The Concadoro was subsequently condemned as an enemy ship properly seized as prize, and this appeal is against the order for condemnation.

On the hearing of the appeal, two arguments were urged on behalf of the Concadoro as differentiating her case from that of the other appeals from His Britannic Majesty's Supreme Court of Egypt (in Prize), which had come before their Lordships. In the first place, it was argued that the words in art. 1, "il est désirable qu'il lui soit permis de sortir librement, immédiatement ou après un délai de faveur suffisant, et de gagner directement, après avoir été muni d'un laissez-passer, son port de destination ou tel autre port qui lui sera désigné," entitled the master to receive a pass, and more than that, a wholly unconditional pass, direct to the port of destination or any other port indicated, and that by reason of the conditions attached to the offer made on the 22nd Sept. 1914, the safe-conduct was not a proper pass within the meaning of art. 1. Their Lordships agree with the view of Grain, J., that the conditions attached under the circumstances were manifestly reasonable. The conditions were that the master of the Concadoro should discharge his cargo at the port to which it was consigned, arriving there after the allowance of a sufficient time for the voyage from Port Said; that she must discharge her cargo without delay, and that forty-eight hours after completion she must leave Port Soudan for Basra, a neutral port, to which the master had originally intended to proceed after discharging the cargo at Port Soudan. Their Lordships hold that manifestly reasonable conditions do not invalidate a pass offered under art. 1. To adopt so narrow a construction of the article would, in their opinion, unduly restrict the benefits intended to be conferred for the protection of mercantile international operations undertaken in good faith, and in process of being carried out before the outbreak of hostilities.

In the second place, it was argued that the inability of the master to procure the necessary funds for his voyage brought the Concadora under art. 2, and that she was unable to leave the enemy port within the days of grace "par suite de circonstances de force majeure." In their Lordships' opinion, this contention cannot be maintained. The force majeure contemplated in the article is one which renders the vessel unable to leave the port, and cannot be construed to include the circumstance that the master has not been provided by the owners with sufficient financial resources to continue his voyage. Moreover, in the present case, the master of the Concadoro was offered a loan of 530*l.*, which was a sufficient sum, to enable him to pay the charges at Port Said and of the Suez Canal, and to take his vessel to Port Soudan.

Their Lordships are of opinion that the order appealed against was properly made, and will humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal be dismissed with costs. The order should be varied, however, so as to run "and as such or otherwise subject and liable to confiscation and condemned the said ship as good and lawful prize seized on behalf of the Crown," and in other respects should be in the form under appeal.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Feb. 9, 10, and 11, 1916.

THE BROADMAYNE. (a)

Salvage — Action in rem — Requisitioned ship — Exemption from arrest—Motion by Crown to stay proceedings—Costs—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 557—Proclamation of the 3rd Aug. 1914 (Transports and Auxiliaries).

An action was instituted for salvage services rendered by a tug to a ship requisitioned by the Admiralty and her freight, and the owners of the ship and her freight entered an appearance as defendants and gave the usual undertaking in lieu of bail.

Under the powers conferred by the Royal Proclamation (Transports and Auxiliaries) of the 3rd Aug. 1914, the ship had become a ship belonging to His Majesty within the meaning of sect. 557 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894.

Upon an application by the Crown that the writ and all subsequent proceedings in the action be set aside, or that the proceedings against the ship and her freight be stayed so long as she remained in the service of the Crown.

Held, that no proceedings ought to be taken with a view to arresting the ship so long as she was in the service of the Crown and under requisition, and that there would be no order as to costs as the application had been made directly on behalf of the Crown.

APPEAL by the Crown from an order of Bargrave Deane, J. in an action for salvage in rem.

On the 30th July 1914 the owners of the tug Revenger received a telegram from "Dockyard Sheerness" for the "Vanquisher or tug of similar description" to be sent, and on the following day they received a further telegram "Request Revenger be sent Sheerness forthwith." In accordance with this telegram the Revenger was employed on Admiralty work. On the 5th Feb. 1915 the tank steamship Broadmayne with a cargo of oil fuel for the use of the Navy stranded outside Harwich Harbour, and the Revenger was sent to her assistance. On the 8th Feb. 1915 the plaintiffs, the Elliott Steam Tug Company Limited, of London, as the owners, and the master and crew of the Revenger issued a writ in an action in rem against the owners of the Broadmayne, her cargo and freight, for an award in respect of salvage services rendered. On the 11th Feb. the owners of the Broadmayne entered an appearance and gave an undertaking in lieu of bail. The statement of claim was delivered on the 22nd June, and on the 6th August the defence. On the 3rd Nov. the plaintiffs gave notice of the abandonment of their claim against the cargo, which was the property of the Crown.

On the 24th Nov. the Treasury solicitor, on behalf of the Crown, gave notice of motion to the plaintiffs for an order that "the writ and all subsequent proceedings in the action be set aside or that the proceedings against the Broadmayne and her freight be stayed so long as the ship shall remain in the service of the Crown or for such further or other order as to the Court may seem just."

On the 14th Jan. 1916 Bargrave Deane, J. dismissed the motion with costs to be paid by the Crown. The learned judge held that at the time the salvage services were rendered the Broadmayne had not been requisitioned by the Admiralty and therefore could not claim immunity as being a King's ship under sect. 557 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894; that the action which had been commenced as an action in rem had by the fact that the owners of the Broadmayne had given a personal undertaking in lieu of bail been converted into an action in personam and that the Crown had no ground for intervention.

The Crown appealed.

The Attorney-General (Sir Frederick Smith, K.C.), Butler Aspinall, K.C., and R. H. Balloch for the Crown.

Bateson, K.C. and C. R. Dunlop for the plaintiffs.

Laing, K.C. and Lewis Noad for the defendants the owners of the Broadmayne and freight.

The following cases were referred to in argument:

SWINFEN EADY, L.J.—This is a motion by way of appeal made on behalf of the Crown "that the writ and all subsequent proceedings in this action be set aside, or, in the alternative, that the proceedings against the ship and freight may be stayed so long as the ship shall remain in the service of the Crown."

The application was made, in the first instance, to Bargrave Deane, J., and he refused the application and ordered the Crown to pay the costs of the plaintiffs and of the defendants; the present motion is made by way of appeal from that order. The facts are, shortly, these: Immediately before the outbreak of war—the state of war commenced as from 11 p.m. on the 4th Aug. 1914—a proclamation was issued stating that "a national emergency exists rendering it necessary to take steps for preserving and defending national interests" and authorising "the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty . . . to requisition and take up . . . any British ship or British vessel as defined in the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, within the British Isles or the waters adjacent thereto, for such period of time as may be necessary, on condition that the owners of all ships and vessels so requisitioned shall receive payment for their use, and for services rendered during their employment in the Government service . . . according to terms to be arranged as soon as possible after the said ship has been taken up, either by mutual agreement between the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty and the owners or failing such agreement by the award of a board of arbitration." The proclamation bears date the 3rd Aug. 1914. It is not disputed, indeed it is beyond dispute, that it is part of the prerogative of the Crown in times of emergency to requisition British ships. In Chitty's

Prerogatives of the Crown (at p. 50) this passage occurs: "To finish this part of the subject, in the words of Lord Erskine, 'The King may relax from the utmost rights of war, and from its extreme severities. What is termed the war prerogative of the King is created by the perils and exigencies of war for the public safety, and by its perils and exigencies is therefore limited. The King may lay on a general embargo, and may do various acts growing out of sudden emergencies; but in all these cases the emergency is the avowed cause, and the act done is as temporary as the occasion. The King cannot change by his prerogative of war either the law of nations or the law of the land by general and unlimited regulations.'"

As I have already said the recital to the proclamation authorising requisitioning is: "Whereas a national emergency exists rendering it necessary to take steps for preserving and defending national interests."

In these circumstances the Crown had power to requisition British ships, and on the 3rd Sept. 1914 requisitioned the ship in question, the Broadmayne. The ship, a tank steamer, at the time in question when the salvage services were rendered was carrying fuel oil for the British Government. She, having been requisitioned on the 3rd Sept., was under requisition and remained so at the time of the events that took place and which led up to these proceedings.

On the 5th Feb. 1915 the steamer, laden with her cargo of fuel oil, stranded outside Harwich Harbour. Instructions were given by the King's Harbour Master to the tug Revenger to proceed to her assistance.

Nothing now turns upon the character of the tug. No question arises in these proceeding as to whether the tug could, or could not, claim salvage remuneration. That is a claim to be adjudicated upon in the action.

The Revenger proceeded to the assistance of the Broadmayne. On the 5th Feb. she attempted to tow her off but failed. She renewed the attempt the next day, the 6th Feb., and succeeded, and the Broadmayne was successfully towed into the harbour.

On the 8th Feb. the writ in the present proceedings was issued. The writ is a writ in rem. The plaintiffs are "the owners, master, and crew of the steam tug Revenger," and the defendants "the owners of the steamship Broadmayne and the cargo now or lately laden thereon and the freight due for the transportation thereof." The writ is in the ordinary form directed to the owners and the parties interested in the steam vessel Broadmayne and the cargo, and commanding them to enter an appearance. No address is given of the defendants beyond the name of the ship. The essential for a writ in a personal action, that the address of the defendant should be inserted, does not appear here.

The memorandum with regard to the service of the writ, which is prescribed by the rules to be placed upon a writ in rem, appears in this writ. It was a service on the vessel and cargo by nailing the original writ for a time on the mast and then by leaving a true copy of it only. There can be no question that it is an ordinary writ in rem against the ship and cargo and freight. On the 11th Feb. an undertaking was given by the solicitors, thus: "We accept service and undertake to appear and put in bail and prove value on the defendants' behalf in due course."

On the 17th Feb. an appearance was entered—a common appearance, not an appearance under protest. Under Order IX., r. 10, of the Rules of the Supreme Court: "In Admiralty actions in rem no service of writ or warrant shall be required where the solicitor of the defendant agrees to accept service and to put in bail, or to pay money into court in lieu of bail."

That applies to this case. On the 22nd June the statement of claim was delivered in the action, and on the 6th Aug. the defence. Then on the 24th Nov. notice of motion was served in the Admiralty Division on behalf of the Crown asking to set aside the writ, or, alternatively, for a stay of proceedings. The cargo of fuel oil belonged to the Crown, and the Crown is not liable to be impleaded—that is, is not liable to be sued in respect of the cargo on board; and when it was pointed out that the cargo belonged to the Crown, notice of discontinuance of the action against the owners of the cargo was served, though, true it is, that formal discontinuance was not till after formal notification of the present motion was given. The writ was admittedly wrong in that an attempt was made to sue the owners of the cargo in the circumstances in question; but as notice of discontinuance has been served and no claim is now made in regard to the cargo, all further reference to the cargo may be omitted.

It is clear that a ship which is requisitioned by the Crown is as free from arrest as a King's ship of war would be, and the exemption extends as well to claims of salvage as to claims of collision or other claims. The grounds upon which the exemption exists were fully stated in the judgment of the Court of Appeal in the case of The Parlement Belge (sup.), where the whole question is discussed. The late Master of the Rolls, Lord Esher, in giving the judgment of the court, said at p. 210: "On the one side it is urged that the only ships exempted from the jurisdiction are armed ships of war, or ships which, though not armed, are in the employ of the Government as part of the military force of the State. On the other side it is contended that all movable property, which is the public property of a Sovereign and nation used for public purposes, is exempt from adverse interference by any Court of Judicature. The point and force of this argument is that the public property of every State, being destined to public uses, cannot with reason be submitted to the jurisdiction of the courts of such State because such jurisdiction, if exercised, must divert the public property from its destined public uses; and that by international comity, which acknowledges the equality of States, if such immunity, grounded on such reasons, exist in each State with regard to its own public property, the same immunity must be granted by each State to similar property of all other States. The dignity and independence of each State require this reciprocity. It was this reasoning which induced Sir William Scott to hesitate to exercise jurisdiction, and so to act as to intimate his opinion that the reason could not be controverted. The case has always been considered as conveying his opinion to have been to that effect. Such was the view of Lord Campbell, who in De Haber v. Queen of Portugal (sup.) says that the difficulties suggested by the argument were, in the opinion of Sir William Scott, insuperable. But if so, he assented to an argument which embraced in one class 'all public property' of the State and treated 'armed ships of war' as a member of that class."

It was urged by Mr. Bateson that the effect of requisitioning a ship is not to change the ownership—the ship requisitioned remains the property of the owners notwithstanding the requisitioning—and that when the use of the ship by the Crown ceases the ship is restored to her owners. That is so, but it does not prevent a ship so long as she remains under requisition being in the service of the Crown, and as such exempt from process of arrest.

In these circumstances the question arises what ought to be done on the present motion. By reason of the writ having been issued the plaintiffs have been given an undertaking for bail, but bail has not been given. In the present case no doubt bail will be given in ordinary course. But technically the ship is not free from arrest because bail has not been given, and I am of opinion that an order ought to be made in this action restraining any further proceedings in the action with a view to the arrest of the ship, and consequently that all proceedings in the action for that purpose ought to be stayed for so long as the ship shall remain under requisition by and in the service of the Crown.

It may be that in other cases that may arise, different orders will have to be made. At present we are only dealing with the case before us, and having regard to the present position I am satisfied that an order in that form will give ample protection to the Crown in this case, because, in addition, there is the statement of the law that ships so requisitioned are exempt from arrest, and that no proceedings with a view to her arrest can properly be taken so long as a ship is under requisition.

There remains the question of costs. Below, the learned judge ordered the Crown to pay the costs both of the plaintiffs and of the defendants. Now the ordinary rule is that the Crown does not pay or receive costs, except so far as that rule was affected by the Crown Suits Act. It is not suggested that this case is within that Act. In Admiralty proceedings the rule was "no costs either side." The point was settled in the case of The Leda (sup.), decided in 1863. Then came the Admiralty Suits Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 78), and by that statute "the term 'Admiralty' means the Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom for the time being, or the Commissioners for the time being for executing the office of Lord High Admiral," and by sect. 3 power is given to the Admiralty to "institute any action, suit, or proceeding . . . concerning any debt, damages, claim, demand, or cause of action or suit whatever arising out of any matter in anywise relating to the rights, powers, or duties of the Admiralty, or to property vested in or purchased by or being under the management or control of the Admiralty." And then sect. 5: "In any such action, suit, or proceeding the Admiralty shall be liable and entitled to pay or receive costs according to the ordinary law and practice relative to costs." Again sect. 6: "Nothing in this Act (except as expressly otherwise provided) shall take away or abridge in any such action, suit, or proceeding any legal right, privilege, or prerogative of the Crown. . . ."

The Commissioners of the Admiralty are not parties to these proceedings. This is a motion directly on behalf of the Crown, and is not within the provisions of the Admiralty Suits Act. In these circumstances I am of opinion that the order below was wrong so far as regards costs, and that the learned judge had no jurisdiction to order the Crown to pay the costs of either the plaintiffs or the defendants.

There was a slip in the proceedings in the court below because the learned judge treated the Broadmayne as a ship which had not been requisitioned. He gave the date of the requisitioning as the 3rd Sept. 1915, and by some misunderstanding it was not appreciated that the ship had been requisitioned on and as from the 3rd Sept. 1914. So that the basis on which he dealt with the case that she was not a requisitioned ship at the time of the salvage services and at the time of the commencement of the proceedings, the material dates, was erroneous in point of fact.

In these circumstances I am of opinion that the appeal ought to be allowed, and an order made in the form I have indicated. A suggestion was made that certain instructions or directions should be given in regard to the future. In my judgment it is impracticable to do anything of that kind here. If there are instructions to be given they must be given by the judges of the Admiralty Court. All that we can do is to say in terms that ships in this position are not liable to be arrested, and therefore no proceedings ought to be taken with a view to arresting a ship so long as the ship is in the service of the Crown and under requisition.

Pickford, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

The motion by the Crown is for an order that the writ and all subsequent proceedings in this action may be set aside, or that the proceedings against the Broadmayne and her freight be stayed so long as the ship shall remain in the service of the Crown. The writ was originally issued against the cargo as well as the freight; but as soon as it was ascertained that the cargo was the property of the Crown the action was discontinued so far as the cargo was concerned. It is true that the formal notice of discontinuance was not filed until after this notice of motion; but it is clear from the terms of the notice of motion that the Crown at this time were aware that no proceedings were going to be taken against the cargo, and therefore in their notice of motion they do not mention the cargo at all, but merely ask that the proceedings be set aside as against the Broadmayne and her freight. Therefore the question of the cargo may be considered as out of this case so far as we are concerned.

The ground of this notice of motion was this, that the Broadmayne was a requisitioned ship. She had been requisitioned for the services of the Crown, and, in order to see what the position is with regard to such a ship, one has to see what "requisition" means. There is no particular magic in the word itself; it does not connote the same state of things in every particular case. In this case it was under the proclamation of the 3rd Aug. 1914 that the ship was requisitioned, and that authorised the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty to requisition and take up for the service of the Crown any British ship for certain services on condition that the owners of all ships and vessels so requisitioned should receive payment for their use and for services rendered at an agreed amount, or, if there be not an agreed amount, an amount to be settled by a board of arbitration appointed by the Crown. In this case no arrangement had been arrived at at the time of the services rendered. A certain form of charter, which is well known as the Government time charter, was sent to the owners of the ship, and they returned it with some alterations which were not assented to by the Crown, and therefore no agreement was come to. It must be taken that she was requisitioned for the service of the Crown at a rate of remuneration which had not then been settled, but which would be settled in the future, or, if not settled, at a reasonable rate of remuneration. That is really nothing more than a hiring of the ship, and the effect of the requisition, of course, is that His Majesty has the power to make the owner of the ship come to that hiring agreement. The owner of the ship has no alternative as to whether he will accept the proposition of hiring or not, but the vessel is, after all, a hired ship. It does not take the property of the ship out of the owner and vest it in the Crown, and therefore this vessel is not for all purposes in the same position as a vessel which is the property of the Crown. You cannot take proceedings in rem against a ship which is the property of the Crown, because the result of doing so is to attempt to bring the King as a defendant into his own court just as much as if you were to try to serve a writ in personam upon him personally.

You bring him, or attempt to bring him, into his court by means of his property instead of by means of his person, but that really does not make any difference, and therefore in the case of these ships, the property of the Crown, proceedings cannot be taken against them because they are proceedings against the King. That is not this state of things. Here the vessel remains the property of her previous owners, the American Oil Company I think they were. She still remains their property and is liable to satisfy claims upon them subject to the right of the Crown not to have its prerogative interfered with, and not to have its interest in any way deteriorated.

What happened was this. The writ was communicated to the solicitors for the owners of the Broadmayne. The owners of the Broadmayne, I suppose, not having any more information about the ownership of the cargo than the plaintiffs, had given an undertaking to appear and put in bail for the ship and cargo, but, as I have said, the proceedings against the cargo are out of this case, and we need not say anything more about it. They undertook to put in bail for the ship. As long as that undertaking remains the ship is free from arrest. The result of it is that so long as the undertaking exists it is the same as putting in bail, and if you put in bail the ship is released and cannot be re-arrested except in some very exceptional circumstances, though I think ships have been re-arrested for costs or something of that kind. But for all practical purposes the ship is free from arrest as soon as bail is put in, and also she is free from arrest when an undertaking to give bail is put in unless that undertaking falls through for some reason, which is not suggested in this case. Now that being so, the position is this. The plaintiffs had brought on proceedings against the owners of the Broadmayne, which in my opinion they were entitled to bring. The owners of the Broadmayne had appeared and undertaken to give bail, and had thereby put themselves in this position, that they were liable to the amount of the bail, and also, according to The Gemma (sup.) and The Dictator (sup.), if a judgment were obtained to a larger amount than the bail, they were also liable for that personally, but nothing more could be done as against the ship. Now that was, as I say, an action between two private litigants, perfectly properly constituted and which could and would, if it were not interfered with, go on to its appropriate end and judgment on either one side or the other without any possibility, except the very remotest—I do not think I ought to say no possibility—of interference with the rights of the Crown. The learned counsel for the Crown to whom I put the question said he could not suggest anything in these proceedings, if they went on, which would affect the rights of the Crown except that they possibly might encourage other people to bring similar litigation under other circumstances which would affect its rights. I confess I could not quite follow that argument. I do not see why, if there is not a right to interfere with the litigation itself, it should be interfered with in order to prevent a possibility of somebody else doing wrong. That was the position. Why the Crown should have chosen this particular litigation in which the interests of the Crown were not in the least concerned to intervene I do not know. I dare say they had some reason for doing so and not waiting until there was a proceeding in which their interests were possibly compromised, but that was the position. I agree entirely with what has been said by my Lord as to the position. I think nobody has any right to arrest a ship requisitioned under these circumstances so long as she is in the service of the Crown any more than he has the right to arrest a man-of-war. He may bring his action, if he likes, against the owners, but he cannot interfere with the rights of the Crown in a ship. The rights of the Crown are to have her services during the time she is requisitioned. During that time, as I have said, I do not think anybody has a right to arrest her, and therefore I think that the position is this: that this action should be allowed to go on; there is no ground for interfering with it at all except to this extent, that the plaintiffs should be restrained—I am not speaking exactly of the form at the moment—from doing that which they have always said they had not the slightest intention of doing, and which I cannot help thinking the Crown knew quite well they had no intention of doing, namely, taking any proceedings to arrest this ship, or in any way to interfere with her so long as she is in the service of the Crown. That, I think, is the right position, and that is the order (I do not mean the words in which I put it) in substance which in my opinion should be made. I may say that I think, except for the point of deciding, as we have decided, that a ship so long as she is requisitioned cannot be arrested as long as she is in the service of the Crown, we ought not to lay down any general rule as to what ought to be done in the case of actions against the owners of requisitioned ships. It was suggested by Mr. Aspinall, and I think also by the Attorney-General, that we should suggest some rule for the conduct of the marshal in cases of this kind. I do not think we ought to do anything of the sort. If any directions are to be given to the officials of the Admiralty Court, general instructions of that kind, it seems to me that they should be given by the judges of the Admiralty Court, who are far more familiar with the practice, and who can do it far better than we can, and I am inclined to think that it is, I will not say outside our jurisdiction, really outside the scope of what we have to do to lay down any such general rules. I agree also with my Lord on that point, and also as to costs.

BANKES, L.J.—Two questions arise for decision in this appeal: first, the effect upon an action in rem in the Admiralty Division of the appearance in the action of the owner of the res, and the giving by him of bail or an equivalent undertaking; and, secondly, the position with regard to liability to arrest of a requisitioned vessel against which an action in rem has been brought. In my opinion an action which has been commenced as an action in rem continues until its termination as an action in rem unless it undergoes some alteration in its character by amendment by order of the court or under the rules of court. It is, in my opinion, a mistake to say that the action changes its character and ceases to be an action in rem and becomes an action in personam when the owner of the res appears and gives bail. It is no doubt true that when this is done the action, so far as its special characteristic as an action in rem is concerned, has served its purpose, or possibly its chief purpose, when the owner of the res has been induced by reason of the arrest, or fear of arrest, of the vessel to enter an appearance and to give bail in order to obtain the release, or avoid the seizure, of his vessel. It is also true that when once the owner of the res has appeared the plaintiff has the advantage of being able in case of necessity to take his property in satisfaction of the judgment in addition to the bail. These consequences, however, are, in my opinion, incidents which arise only in the course of the action in rem, which add to its value, but which in no way alter or deprive it of its special character.

The position is, I think, quite clearly indicated in the passage from Clerke's Praxis Curiae Admiralitatis, cited with approval by Jeune, J. in The Dictator (sup.), where the writer says that after appearance the case proceeds ut in actione instituta contra personam debitoris—that is to say, that the action is to proceed as if, but only as if, it was an action in personam. The advantage of the action being an action in rem still remains, in the sense that, should the exceptional occasion arise, the court in a proper case would no doubt still have jurisdiction to order the arrest of the vessel.

With regard to the second point, I entertain no doubt that a vessel if and so long as she is under requisition is privileged from arrest. The requisition is made under the prerogative of the Crown, and the fact that the proclamation of the 3rd Aug. 1914 indicates that payment will be made for the use of the vessel and for services rendered during her employment in the Government service does not, in my opinion, alter the nature or the consequences of the act of requisition. It is, in my opinion, equally immaterial that the terms of payment and employment are incorporated in a charter-party or other form of agreement. The vessel whilst the requisition lasts is, to use the language of Dr. Arnold in his argument in the case of The Prins Frederik (sup), approved by Lord Esher in The Parlement Belge (sup.), publicis usibus destinata, and as such not liable to the claims or demands of private persons.

I agree with the proposed order which is to be made in this case.

Appeal allowed.

The court made the following order: "On the motion of the Crown discharge order of Mr. Justice Bargrave Deane, and, the plaintiffs having discontinued this action so far as concerns any claim as against the owners of the cargo, it is ordered that all further proceedings in this action with a view to the arrest or detention of the ship be stayed for so long as the ship shall remain under requisition in the service of the Crown."

CAPEL AND CO. v. SOULIDI. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party — Construction of — Cancellation if ship "commandeered."

The plaintiffs were time charterers of a Greek steamer. The charter-party contained the following clause: "32. Should steamer be commandeered by the Greek Government this charter shall be cancelled." Whilst the steamer was at Marseilles discharging a cargo of coal for the charterers, on the 25th Sept. 1915, a notice was served upon her captain by the Greek Consul-General ordering him to proceed immediately to the Piræus, pursuant to an order of the Royal Greek Government. On the 27th Sept. the defendant gave to the plaintiffs formal notice of cancellation of the charter-party pursuant to clause 32. On the 11th Oct., and while the steamer was still at Marseilles, the Greek Government withdrew their notice of the 25th Sept. and released the ship.

Held, that the defendant's vessel had been effectively commandeered by the Greek Government, which had taken control of the vessel, and that the charter-party was therefore cancelled.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from the decision of Atkin, J.

The action was brought by the plaintiffs for a declaration that the charter-party remained valid and binding on the defendant and for an injunction restraining him from employing the ship otherwise than in accordance with the terms of the charter-party.

The facts, which are sufficiently summarised in the headnote, appear fully in the judgments.

MacKinnon, K.C. and Raeburn for the plaintiffs.

Roche, K.C. and C. R. Dunlop for the defendant.

ATKIN, J.—This case I understand, raises an important question, and I appreciate it to be an important question; but it is also a somewhat urgent question, because it relates to the disposal of a ship which is now in a British port. An interim injunction has been granted pending the hearing of this action restraining the owner from dealing with the ship. Therefore I proceed to give judgment at once, although no doubt if I could have taken a little time I could possibly have put my judgment into more suitable language.

The dispute arises between the plaintiffs, who are the time charterers of a cargo vessel called the Kardamila, and the owner. The ship was chartered by a time charter dated the 6th May 1915, by which the defendant's ship, which is about 3500 tons dead weight, was hired for twelve months to the charterers to carry certain cargoes within the limits of the West Coast, United Kingdom, France (not east of Calais) and Portugal, Spain, and the Mediterranean (not east of Sicily). The hire was payable monthly in advance in Cardiff. There is a provision in clause 12 for the ship being off hire under certain circumstances that are mentioned there. The exception clause provides "that throughout this charter losses or damages, whether in respect of goods carried or to be carried, or in other respects arising or occasioned by the following causes, shall be absolutely excepted — namely . . . enemies, pirates, robbers, or thieves; arrests and restraints of princes, rulers, and peoples." Then follows a clause which I am informed was inserted at the charterers' instance, although I do not know that that makes any difference in this case. The clause, which is numbered 32, is written in and added to the printed clauses and runs thus: "Should steamer be commandeered by the Greek Government this charter shall be cancelled." The dispute between the parties is whether the steamer has been commandeered by the Greek Government. Apparently this vessel was employed by the time charterers to carry coal from South Wales to Marseilles, and on the 25th Sept. the ship was in Marseilles harbour engaged in discharging a cargo of coal. Upon that day a notice addressed to the captain was served upon him by the Greek Consul-General at Marseilles, which as translated is in these terms: "I beg to advise you that pursuant to the telegraphic orders of the Royal Greek Government all Greek steamers in the harbour of Marseilles, in ballast or loaded with coal or grain, must proceed immediately to Piræus, and the steamers loaded with other cargoes to discharge with all speed and sail immediately for Piræus. In informing you of the above order of the Royal Greek Government I beg you to strictly and without fail conform to same and acknowledge receipt." It is signed by the consul-general. Upon that correspondence followed, but upon the 27th Sept. the defendant wrote to the plaintiffs: "I hereby beg to formally notify you that the steamship Kardamila having been commandeered by the Greek Government the charter-party of the 6th May last is cancelled pursuant to clause 32.—Yours faithfully, D. SOULIDI." What followed was that certain negotiations took place between the defendant and the consul-general with a view to enabling the ship to proceed to Cardiff for the purpose of undergoing repairs which the defendant said he had arranged for at that port, and he wrote to say that after those repairs were effected he would proceed to the Piræus. Eventually permission was given to him to proceed to Cardiff and he was told that he was in fact free of the requisition. That appears from the evidence which I have heard to have been in pursuance of the general policy of the Greek Government, who, I think, afterwards changed their orders, certainly in respect to some of the available vessels, so that on the 11th Oct. the Kardamila, which had completed the discharge of her coal, was free from the requisition and was in a condition to and did in fact proceed to Cardiff, as I understand she has just arrived there.

The question, therefore, is whether the charter-party is cancelled or not, and that depends upon whether the vessel was or was not commandeered. I have to form the best conclusion I can as to what is the meaning of the word "commandeer." It is, I understand, a word of recent origin in ordinary use, and a word as to which there has been no previous judicial interpretation to guide me. It certainly seems to me to involve the exercise by the Government of the executive power, the sovereign power, with a view to compelling the owner of the ship to surrender the control of that ship to the Government. I think that it involves the intention of the Government to have the ship put in such circumstances that they may hereafter, if they elect so to do, have the use of the ship. In other words I think that the word "commandeer" involves the seizing or obtaining control of the ship for the purposes of the Government, not for general political purposes or for the protection of the ship. I do not think that if a Government were to give orders to a ship to deviate or take refuge at a friendly port, war being imminent, that would be a commandeering of the ship. I think that it involves the Government having in prospect, at any rate, the taking of the ship for its own purposes. I think, as the best conclusion I can form here, that is what happened.

It was contended that this notice was merely equivalent to the Government issuing a general order to all ships to proceed home for general political purposes, that it was equivalent to an embargo as if the ship had actually been in a Greek port, that it did not connote any intention at all on the part of the Greek Government necessarily to use the ship, and that it was only a step which was preliminary to that which would be commandeering if in fact the Government afterwards decided to use the ship.

On the facts I do not think that that is what took place here. It appears to me that the right inference to draw from the facts is that the Government required Greek ships to proceed to Greece for the purposes of the Government, so as to enable them to use the ships themselves if the Government so desired. It does not appear to me that it necessarily follows that the Government would avail themselves of the ship when it arrived; but I think that it is quite plain that the Government required the particular voyage to be made back to Greece for the purposes of the Government using that ship on its arrival if they thought fit. To my mind that is the object of commandeering. Now, I have had evidence before me to the effect that as soon as the order is given, by Greek law the crew of the ship are deemed to be members of the Royal Greek Navy, and as such I presume would be subject to naval discipline, and I think that that indicates also that the Government have assumed control of the ship from the time that they gave the order, so as to make the ship, at any rate until it arrived in Greece, their ship. They no doubt would be able to decide when it arrived whether they had any further use for it.

It was suggested here that the order of the Government was substantially inoperative, because in fact it did not prevent the ship from performing its obligations under the charter, as notice was given on the 25th Sept., and the ship remained all the time in Marseilles and eventually sailed back to Cardiff, where it would sail under the charter. But that seems to me to have no real bearing upon the construction of the clause. The clause says that if the ship is commandeered then the charter shall be cancelled. I think myself that the true construction of that clause, at any rate, is that upon the occurrence of the event—namely, the commandeering—the charter is ipso facto cancelled, and I think that that is the effect of the decision in Adamson and another v. Newcastle Steamship Freight Insurance Association (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 150; 41 L. T. Rep. 160; 4 Q. B. Div. 462). What happened afterwards is immaterial. But even if the construction were that upon that event happening the owner had an option to cancel, I think that clearly the option was exercised by the letter of the 27th Sept.

It was further said by Mr. MacKinnon that in fact all that happened here was not that the Government commandeered the ship, but that they exercised such rights over it as would amount to restraint of princes, and that for any damage suffered by the charterer by reason of that act the shipowner would be protected by reason of the lause giving an exception as to the restraint of princes.

That may be so, that is to say the act of commandeering may also be restraint of princes (I should think that it probably is), but it appears to me that none the less it was in fact a commandeering, and I think that one can see the business object of this clause, because obviously such an act as is in question here is by the Government and one which one has to assume from the evidence was within the powers of the Greek Government; it is an act that, of course, defeats for the time being entirely the operation of any contractual obligation which the shipowner has entered upon. I think that it was the intention of both parties—no doubt for the reasons mentioned in the judgment of Cockburn, C.J., namely, in order to prevent all further question or delay upon such an event happening as this—that the charter should be put an end to. I think that that reason applies whether the ship was ordered to Athens in order that the Greek Government might then make up its mind whether it would further use it, or whether it at the time it was in Marseilles made up its mind that it was going to use it for the purpose of the carrying of troops or otherwise. Commercially the effect seems to me to be exactly the same. I do not think that I need add anything, therefore, to what I have said. It appears to me on the consideration of the arguments that have been put before me—and I am satisfied that everything has been said that could have been said in the case—that this ship was in fact commandeered by the Greek Government, and under those circumstances I think the charter-party was cancelled. I suppose that the result of that is that upon the claim of the plaintiffs there should be judgment for the defendant with costs.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Sir Robert Finlay, K.C., MacKinnon, K.C., and Raeburn for the appellants.—All that the Greek Government did was to take a preliminary step towards commandeering. They never, in fact, exercised any control over her.

Roche, K.C. and C. R. Dunlop for the respondent.—By serving that notice the Greek Government prevented the ship from performing its obligations under the charter-party. That notice in effect amounted to commandeering.

Sir Robert Finlay, K.C., in reply.

Lord READING, C.J.—This is an appeal from a judgment of Atkin, J., who tried the case without a jury and gave judgment for the defendant. The claim was made by Messrs. Capel and Co., who were the charterers under a charter-party dated the 6th May 1915, entered into between them and the defendant, Mr. D. Soulidi, the owner of a vessel, which was under the Greek flag and is called the Kardamila. The charter was a time charter for twelve months at the rate of 2300*l.* per calendar month, and clause 32 of the charter is in these words: "Should steamer be commandeered by the Greek Government this charter shall be cancelled."

In the events that happened it is alleged by the shipowner that commandeering did happen, and consequently that the charter-party was cancelled. The charterers objected to that. They say there was no commandeering, or if there was a commandeering, it was not such a commandeering of the vessel as was provided for in clause 32, and consequently the charter-party was not cancelled. The question we have to determine is whether the event had happened as mentioned in clause 32.

To my mind the facts of the case are of the utmost importance, because on the conclusion at which I have arrived the facts dispose of this case, without giving rise to the various difficulties which have been suggested by Sir R. Finlay and Mr. MacKinnon in their arguments on behalf of the plaintiffs. The vessel being at Marseilles several months after the time charter had begun to be effective, notice was given to the person responsible on the Kardomila from the Consul-General of Greece at Marseilles, where the vessel then was, in these words: "I beg to advise you that pursuant to the telegraphic orders of the Royal Greek Government all Greek steamers in the harbour of Marseilles in ballast, or loaded with coal or grain, must proceed immediately to Piræus, and the steamers loaded with other cargoes to discharge with all speed and sail immediately for Piræus. In informing you of the above order of the Royal Greek Government I beg you to strictly and without fail conform to same and acknowledge receipt."

According to the evidence given by a Greek lawyer in this country, the effect of that document was to place the vessel under the orders of the Greek Government and to bring those who were on board—Greek subjects—under the orders of the Greek Government, as if they were belonging to the Royal Greek Navy. They were to consider that that notice applied to them as if they were in the Royal Greek Navy. As I understand the arguments presented to us to-day, it is not suggested that that cannot be the effect of the order, but what is said is that the order never became effective, and consequently the commandeering was never an effective commandeering.

True, a notice of this kind may be sufficient to constitute commandeering within the meaning of the clause if in truth that which follows shows that the notice was effective, and that the vessel was brought under the control, or, as it has been said during the latter part of the argument, taken to the use of the Greek Government. In my judgment the suspension of the order, which, it is suggested, took place between the 25th Sept. and the 11th Oct., never in fact took place. There were negotiations proceeding to enable the shipowner to send his vessel to England for the purpose of repairs being executed before the vessel proceeded on voyages for the Greek Government, but the correspondence shows that the owner of the vessel was desirous that the Greek Government should understand that he was sailing his vessel under seaworthy certificates, and that in order to enable him to do what the Greek Government required his vessel must be put into a perfectly seaworthy condition, and that necessitated his bringing the ship to England. Therefore he asked permission to go, and negotiations went on for some time. Before he got this permission on the 11th Oct., the Greek Government changed its view with regard to this vessel, and set her free. She then proceeded home on the 13th Oct., where she was repaired.

During the time that elapsed between the 25th Sept. and the 11th Oct. I am of opinion upon the facts as found by the learned judge that this vessel was under the control of the Greek Government, and that she was actually being used by the Greek Government in that one sense, although, to my mind, it is by no means necessary to say that she was actually being used in the sense of having to proceed on a voyage for the Greek Government in order to bring her within this clause. If she once came under the control of the Greek Government she was commandeered by the Greek Government and, having regard to the facts of the case, effectively commandeered.

I can see very difficult problems which might arise if the facts warranted the hypothesis upon which Sir Robert Finlay argued the case, and, in my judgment, in this case we have no such difficulties, because there was a clear, and, in my opinion, effective commandeering until the release took place, which was some fifteen or sixteen days after. In fact, when one considers what was happening, it seems to me beyond question that this was the kind of commandeering intended to be covered by clause 32, because the charterers were paying 2300*l.* a month for the use of the vessel, and stipulating that, in the event of the Greek Government taking control of the vessel, the charter should be cancelled. Nevertheless, during fifteen or sixteen days the vessel was kept there at Marseilles under the orders and because of the orders of the Greek Government, with the result that if the charter had been running all the time the money would have had to be paid, notwithstanding that the Greek Government had taken control.

I have come to the conclusion that there was no difficulty in this case owing to the facts, and that Atkin, J.'s judgment was right, and that the appeal must be dismissed.

Warrington, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think the captain and crew of the steamer became members of the Greek Navy by virtue of the order issued by the Greek Government on the 25th Sept. 1915. That order became effective as soon as it was made, and accepted by the shipowner. In my opinion it is impossible to say that this vessel was not commandeered by the Greek Government within the meaning of clause 32.

Lush, J.—I agree. I think that the mere service of a notice commandeering a vessel does not necessarily affect the commandeering of the vessel. On the facts of this case, however, the Greek Government took over control of this vessel as from the 25th Sept. 1915, and in my opinion she was commandeered as from that date.

Appeal dismissed.

(Before Atkin, J.)

Owners of Steamship Nolisement v. Bunge and Born. (a)

Charter-party—Lay days—Completion of loading before expiration of lay days—Acceptance of dispatch money—Failure to free ship as soon as possible—Whether charterers liable in damages.

By a charter-party dated the 1st Feb. 1915 a steamer was to be loaded at an Argentine port and to proceed therefrom as ordered by the charterers to a European port as port of discharge. Dispatch money at the rate of 15*l. per day was payable for all time saved in loading, and the charterers had the right to keep the steamer for twenty-four hours after completion of loading for the purpose of settling accounts. The steamer was loaded nineteen days before the expiration of the lay or loading* days, and in respect of the nineteen days the charterers received dispatch money. Owing to delay by the charterers in deciding as to the port of call, the steamer was kept waiting for the bills of lading and orders for three days. The shipowners claimed damages in respect of this delay, and in arbitration proceedings were awarded 300l., being damages at the rate of 150l. for two days.

Held, that, the loading time granted to the charterers not having been exceeded, the shipowners were not entitled to claim for demurrage or detention, but only to a return of the dispatch money as money paid for a consideration which had failed.

AWARD in the form of a special case stated by an arbitrator.

By a charter-party dated the 1st Feb. 1915, made between the owners of the steamship Nolisement and Ernest A. Bunge and J. Born (hereinafter called "the charterers"), it was agreed (by clause 2) that the steamer should with all convenient speed after arrival at Monte Video proceed as ordered by the charterers to various ports or places to receive a full and complete cargo of wheat or other grain.

By clause 4 the steamer when loaded was to proceed to one or other of various European ports at the master's option for orders, "unless these be given to him by the charterers on signing bills of lading to discharge at a safe port on the Continent. . . ."

By clause 13 the steamer was to load at a certain rate (the details of which are not material to this report), otherwise demurrage to be paid at the rate of 3*d.* sterling per ton per running day, the time for loading to commence twelve hours after written notice to be given by the master to the charterers or their agents that the steamer was ready to receive cargo.

By clause 16 dispatch money, which was to be paid to the charterers before the steamer sailed, was payable for all time saved in loading at the rate of 15*l.* sterling per day.

By clause 30 disputes were referred to arbitration.

The cargo was duly loaded under the said charter-party and a dispute arose between the parties as to what damages (if any) the owners were entitled to receive in consequence of the steamer being unable to sail from her port of loading for three days after she was ready to sail and the loading was completed owing to the failure of the charterers to make out the bills of lading, they not having made up their minds as to the port of discharge, although they had decided to give orders as to the destination pursuant to clause 4 (sup.) on signing the bills of lading.

The loading of the vessel proceeded so rapidly that it was completed nineteen days before the lay days were completed, and the charterers received in account dispatch money in respect of those nineteen days.

The arbitrators having failed to agree, their umpire found the following facts in a special case:

That on the 16th March 1915 at 4 p.m. the loading of the steamship Nolisement was finished, and at that time the master applied for his bills of lading and orders as to destination from the charterers, but the same were not forthcoming. The steamer was kept waiting for the bills of lading and orders for three days, viz., until 4 p.m. on the 19th March 1915, owing to the charterers, who had decided to give orders for the discharging port on signing bills of lading, not having made up their minds as to the port to which they should order the steamer. The steamer sailed at 5 p.m. on the said 19th March 1915. It was agreed between the parties and I find that the charterers had the right to keep the steamer for twenty-four hours for the purpose of settling accounts, and that the dispute arises in relation to two remaining days that the steamer was kept waiting.

I find as a fact that the steamer was kept two days over and above the said twenty-four hours owing to a breach by the charterers of their obligation to present to the captain the bills of lading and orders as to the port of discharge.

I further find the fact that the owners paid to the charterers on accounts made out by the charterers dispatch money pursuant to clause 16 of the charter-party on the footing that the loading of the steamer was completed at 4 p.m. on the 16th March 1915, and that they included in their account for dispatch money the time the captain was waiting for his bills of lading and orders, and that the time taken was not paid under any mistake of fact.

The charterers contended:—

(a) That the loading time granted by the charter-party not having been exceeded, the shipowners were not entitled to claim for demurrage or detention, but only to a return of the dispatch money so paid under a mistake of fact.

(b) Alternatively, that if the shipowners were entitled to claim for the time occupied at the port of loading in waiting for orders, their claim should be for a return of the dispatch money paid for the two days on the ground that the freight was based on ten days being occupied in loading, or, in the alternative, their claim should be for demurrage at the charter-party rate.

[There were other contentions which are immaterial to this report].

The shipowners contended:—

(a) That on completion of the loading of the steamer the charterers were bound within twenty-four hours to present to the captain his bills of lading and orders and so enable the steamer to sail.

(b) That on the expiration of the said twenty-four hours the steamer was entitled to proceed to sea, and that, having been prevented for two days from doing so owing to the wrongful action of the charterers in not giving orders and presenting the bills of lading, they were entitled to claim damages for such detention.

(c) Alternatively, that, having paid the charterers' dispatch money for the unexpired time within which they were bound to load the steamer, the loading time must be taken to have expired on the completion of the loading, and that for any time during which the steamer was prevented from sailing by the charterers they were entitled to claim damages for such detention subject to allowing the charterers twenty-four hours for making out the accounts and the bills of lading and giving orders.

Subject to the opinion of the court, he found that the shipowners were right, and were entitled to 300*l.* and costs. Alternatively, if the charterers were correct, he awarded that they should only pay 30*l.* to the owners. He also found that, assuming the damages should have been assessed upon the basis of the demurrage rate, they came to 94*l.* 14*s.*

By clause 12 of the charter-party:

Lay days shall not commence before the 1st March 1915, unless charterers begin loading sooner, and, should the steamer not be ready to load by 6 p.m. on the 31st March 1915, charterers shall have the option of cancelling.

Leck, K.C. (R. A. Wright with him) for the charterers.—The contention of the charterers is correct, but the point now raised is not covered by authority. So long as they do not exceed the lay days, the charterers may load at any time. They are under no obligation to ship within a reasonable time. In fixing the rates of freight and demurrage, the parties have taken the possibility of all the lay days being occupied into account. The mere fact that dispatch money has been paid and accepted makes no difference. The number of lay days was twenty-five, and the loading was completed in five days.

Maurice Hill, K.C. (Raeburn with him) for the owners.—The charterers were under obligation to present the bills of lading within a reasonable time after the loading was complete. [Atkin, J.—Do you say the charterer is obliged to load at any particular rate?] No; but here he had nineteen days to spare. Moreover, the dispatch money has been paid. In effect, the lay days came to an end on the 16th March. [He referred to Oakville Steamship Company v. Holmes (5 Com. Cas. 48).] As to the damages, they were at large. The ship was not kept in any state of circumstances for which a fixed rate is provided by the charter-party. Having regard to the date, the arbitrator awarded moderate damages. The lay days constitute a period given for the total operation of loading. The charterer need not begin that operation until the lay days are half through; but, if he completes before the time, he should allow the ship to sail.

Leck, K.C., in reply, referred to clause 12 of the charter-party (sup.).

Atkin, J.—This is a short point arising on a charter-party, dated the 1st Feb. 1915, made between the owners of the steamship Nolisement and Ernest A. Bunge and J. Born. The charter-party provided that the steamer should with all convenient speed after arrival at Monte Video or at an Argentine port proceed as ordered by the charterers or their agents to various ports or places mentioned to receive cargo. [His Lordship read the case and stated the facts as above set out, and continued:]

It is clear from the charter-party that the vessel had an exact and substantial number of lay days within which to take in cargo; in fact, she saved nineteen days in carrying out the work of loading, and became entitled to have, and was in fact paid, dispatch money in respect of those days. The loading having been completed, the vessel was delayed (as the arbitrator has found) for two days in getting her orders. The arbitrator held that twenty-four hours was a reasonable allowance of time and that she in fact took three days. The shipowners allege that this was a breach of contract for which they are entitled to claim damages. The exact obligation of the charterers, of which they are said to have committed a breach, has not been clearly defined, but it appears to be an obligation to present the bills of lading within a reasonable time. The arbitrator has awarded damages at the rate of 150*l.* a day.

The charterers contended before the arbitrator and again before me that they have committed no breach of contract. They say, in effect, that if there is a certain number of lay days, and the charterer contrives to load the ship in less, he commits no breach of any obligation if he detains the ship for the whole lay period. In my view that contention is sound. The charterer is entitled to hold the ship at the port of loading for the full number of the lay days. He is under no obligation to employ the lay days reasonably or in any particular way. He may, if he so choose, refrain from commencing to load until the lay days are half up and then complete his loading during the latter half of the period. I fail to see why he cannot do the work of loading at any time within the lay period. It was further contended that while the charterers might not have been bound to commence to load at once, yet they were bound to see that the loading was proceeded with with all dispatch. In my opinion that is not so. So long as the ship is not detained beyond the stipulated period the charterer is not liable.

It was also contended by Mr. Hill that, inasmuch as the charterers have taken and accepted the dispatch money in respect of no less than nineteen days, they cannot be heard to deny that there has been delay. In my opinion the mere acceptance of dispatch money has no bearing on the point, and the authority cited has no bearing on the question which I have to decide. I ought to add, however, that the charterers have clearly lost their right to the dispatch money for the two days, which can now be recovered from them as money paid upon a consideration which has failed. With regard to what has been contended as to measure of damages, it is unnecessary, having regard to the view I have expressed, for me to say anything; but I ought to say that there was nothing in my opinion to prevent the arbitrator awarding the damages which he did award. The measure of damages was at large. The result is that I answer the question propounded by the arbitrator upholding the contention of the charterers, and I find that there is due to the owners from the charterers 30*l.* and no more. The shipowners will pay the costs of the proceedings before me.

Award in favour of the charterers.

PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

PRIZE COURT.

March 6 and 30, 1916.

(Before Sir S. T. EVANS, President.)

THE ANGLO-MEXICAN. (a)

Prize Court—Goods of enemy firm—Goods shipped before the outbreak of war—Rights of neutral partner—Protection of his share—Conditions under which share is protected from confiscation.

A neutral subject was a partner in an enemy firm which had its headquarters in Germany. Goods which were the property of the firm were shipped from America before the outbreak of war and were consigned to a German port. During the voyage, hostilities having commenced in the meantime, the goods were seized as prize. Upon the Crown claiming condemnation of the goods, the neutral asserted that he was entitled to his share in the same.

Held, that a neutral partner does not lose his right to have his share in the partnership property protected from confiscation merely because he allows the delivery of the goods to proceed in the ordinary course, provided that he does nothing actively after the commencement of hostilities to further or to facilitate the delivery of the goods to the enemy house.

THIS was a suit for the condemnation as prize of a part of the cargo of the Anglo-Mexican.

The Anglo-Mexican was a British steamship, and on the 3rd Aug. 1914, the day before the outbreak of war between Great Britain and Germany, she sailed from Savannah with a cargo which included 276 bales of cotton sweepings, fifty of which were to be delivered at Antwerp and the remainder at Hamburg, in each case to the order of the shippers. The bills of lading specified that notification of the shipment was to be given to Messrs. Reis and Co., Friedrichsfeld, Heidelberg, Germany. On the 5th Sept. 1914 the vessel put into the port of London, where, in consequence of the direction in the bills of lading that notification was to be given to a German firm, the cotton was seized by the officer of Customs as prize.

There was no question as to the cotton sweepings being the property of Messrs. Reis and Co. This firm had three offices, one at Friedrichsfeld, near Heidelberg, Germany; another at Salford, Manchester, in England; and the third at Boston, in the United States of America. The head office was the German one. There were four partners—Edwin Reis and Ludwig Reis, both Germans, who resided at Heidelberg; Karl Bachert Strauss, a naturalised Englishman, who managed the Manchester office; and Richard Mayer, a naturalised American, who conducted the business of the firm in Boston. The share of Strauss in the business was one-fourth, that of Mayer one-fifth, whilst the remainder belonged to the two German partners. Strauss was in Germany at the time of the outbreak of war, and had since remained there. He made no claim to his share in the goods seized. Mayer was also in Germany in Aug. 1914, but he afterwards left that country, and he now claimed restitution of his share upon the ground that he was a neutral partner, and that the goods had been innocently shipped by him to the German house before the commencement of hostilities. The evidence showed that after the shipment of the goods Mayer had done nothing whatever in respect of them, and had left the delivery according to the terms of the bills of lading to take its course.

Maurice Hill, K.C. and Pilcher for the Procurator-General.—The only question which arises in the case is as to the share of Mayer. He was a member of the enemy firm, who were the owners of the goods, and, although Mayer was, a neutral, it was incumbent upon him, if he was to succeed, to show that he had dissociated himself entirely from the other members of the firm immediately after the declaration of war. There was no evidence before the court that he had done so, and consequently he could not claim any protection for his share in the partnership goods. They cited

The Manningtry, 32 Times L. Rep. 37.

Inskip, K.C. and Conway for Mayer.—The position of Mayer as to the right of claiming restitution was different from that of an English citizen. As a neutral he owed no duty to the British Crown, and, so long as he took no active part in the delivery of the goods after the outbreak of the war he was perfectly entitled to his share in the same as it stood at the time when hostilities commenced. He simply stood by and allowed matters to take their course. There was no necessity for him to dissociate himself from the enemy partners as he would have had to do if he had been an English citizen instead of a neutral. The goods were shipped on a date before the war, and restitution ought to be made.

Maurice Hill, K.C. in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 30.—The PRESIDENT.—The claim to the part cargo in this case—namely, 276 bales of factory or cotton sweepings—was originally made by Messrs. Reis and Co., of Manchester, as alleged owners, and alternatively by Messrs. Reis and Co., of Boston, United States, as alleged owners. The facts have now been fully investigated, and the following are the results: The property in question belonged to Messrs. Reis and Co., of Friedrichsfeld, Heidelberg, Germany. That firm consisted of four partners—namely, two German subjects, a naturalised Englishman of the name of Karl Bachert Strauss, and a naturalised American of the name of Richard Mayer. The share of Strauss was one-fourth and that of Mayer one-fifth. The remainder belonged to the Germans. Strauss was in Germany at the date of the outbreak of the war, and apparently has remained there, adhering to the enemy ever since. The branch office which he managed in Manchester was raided, and one of his clerks was convicted of trading with the enemy. It is not surprising that no claim is now made on his behalf.

The shares of the German partners and the share of Strauss himself, making up four-fifths of the whole, must be condemned as property of the enemies of the country and of a naturalised Englishman who has put himself in the same category.

There is now nothing more than the claim of Richard Mayer to be considered, and that is a claim to one-fifth share in the goods. Mr. Mayer had become a naturalised American before the outbreak of the war, and he puts forward his claim as a neutral partner in the German house. There is no doctrine in prize law which is more clearly and firmly settled than that the property of such a house of trade or business as that of Messrs. Reis and Co., in Heidelberg, established in the enemy's country, is subject to capture or seizure and to condemnation as prize during war, whatever may be the domicil of the partners. But with regard to transactions and shipments made before the war this doctrine is subject to certain qualifications in the case of subjects of the other belligerent and of neutrals in reference to trades or businesses in which they might be engaged at the beginning of a war.

An early and authoritative statement upon the subject was made by Sir William Scott in the case of The Vigilantia (ubi sup). In dealing with three unreported cases which had been decided by the Lords Commissioners of Appeal in Prize Cases between 1785 and 1798—namely, the Jacobus Johannes, the Osprey, and the Nancy (Coopman's claim)—Sir William Scott said: "It was then [i.e., in the last case] said by the Lords that the former cases were cases merely at the commencement of a war; that in the case of a person carrying on trade habitually in the country of the enemy, though not resident there, he should have time to withdraw himself from that commerce; and that it would press too heavy on neutrals to say that immediately on the first breaking out of a war their goods should become subject to confiscation; but it was then expressly laid down that if a person entered into a house of trade in the enemy's country in time of war, or continued that connection during the war, he should not protect himself by mere residence in a neutral country."

These have been the doctrines adopted by America and by this country ever since: (see The Antonia Johanna, 14 U. S. 159; The Friendschaft, 17 U. S. 105; The San Jose Indiano, 2 Gall 268; and The Cheshire, 70 U. S. 231). I have dealt recently with the case of British subjects who were partners in enemy firms and their position and duties at the outbreak of war in The Manningtry (ubi sup.). Incidentally the position of neutral subjects similarly situated was also there considered. It is not necessary for me to repeat what I said on that occasion.

It it obvious that in one respect there is a difference between the duties of a British subject and a neutral in such cases. There is an absolute duty strictly incumbent upon a British subject not to do anything which may amount to trading with the enemy, or to have any business intercourse with him. There is no such duty imposed upon a neutral partner. He acts fully within his rights in remaining in the partnership after hostilities have commenced if he cares to subject his share in the goods to the risk of capture and confiscation by the opposite belligerent during the war.

The question turns upon the stage at which in the case of a shipment made before the war a neutral partner in an enemy house of trade ceases to have his share in the partnership property protected from confiscation. It is a question of fact upon which side of the line a particular case falls. One test would be whether the neutral partner has done anything actively after the commencement of hostilities to further or to facilitate the delivery of the goods to the enemy house. This test does not seem to me to be unfavourable to the neutral or unfair to the belligerent. If the neutral does no act after the war in regard to the goods, but merely allows them to proceed in the ordinary course, I find it difficult to hold that his share in the goods innocently shipped should be forfeited. He has no duty in regard to the goods towards the belligerent State to stop their delivery because he has an undivided share in them. His situation appears to me to differ in that respect from that of a partner who is a subject of the belligerent State.

At the outbreak of the war Mr. Mayer happened to be in Germany. He did not inform the court as to this fact, nor as to his business there, nor as to the date of his return to America. His affidavit on these matters is disingenuous, and his counsel did not attempt to justify it. I do not wish to say that the deponent had any intention to mislead. I do not know how he may have been advised in framing his affidavit. I have had some doubt as to whether, because of the non-disclosure of what may have been material facts, he ought not to forfeit his protection, but I give him the benefit of the doubt.

I order restitution of his one-fifth share in the goods or their proceeds, and condemnation of the remaining four-fifths as prize to the Crown in its right to droits of Admiralty.

Order for restitution of Mayer's share.

THE BOLIVAR. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (IN PRIZE).

Prize Court — Practice — Decree condemning cargo—Bonâ fide claims by third parties who had no opportunity of being heard—Rehearing —Jurisdiction of court to set aside its own judgments.

Where substantial injustice would otherwise result, the court has an inherent power to set aside its own judgments of condemnation so as to let in bonâ fide claims by third parties who had not in fact been heard and who had had no opportunity of appearing. But such power is discretionary and should not be exercised except where there would be substantial injustice if the decree were allowed to stand and where the application for relief had been promptly made.

So held, remitting the summons to the Prize Court, with leave to the appellants to amend it and to file the proper evidence in support thereof.

APPEAL by special leave from an order of the Admiralty Division (in Prize).

The appeal was brought by Juan E. Paris and Co., neutrals, carrying on business in Venezuela.

Before the outbreak of war they chartered the German schooner Bolivar to proceed to Maracaibo and there to load a cargo, which by bills of lading was to be delivered at Hamburg "for and in the name of" the appellants to one Weil or to his order. The Bolivar sailed from Maracaibo on the 23rd June 1914, and was captured in the course of her voyage.

A writ was issued on the 31st Aug. 1914 claiming condemnation of ship and cargo, but no appearance was entered. On the 1st Oct. 1914 Sir Samuel Evans, P., after hearing evidence, condemned the ship and cargo, and they were subsequently sold under the terms of the decree and the proceeds paid into court. Subsequently the appellants, who apparently had not heard of the proceedings, claimed the goods through their London agents. The Procurator-General replied, stating that the cargo had been condemned and sold, and that he had handed the documents to the secretary of the Prize Committee.

On Jan. 1915 solicitors on behalf of the appellants inquired whether any decision had been arrived at, and, on being informed that the claim would be placed before the committee as soon as possible, asked for and obtained a return of the documents.

On the 7th May 1915 a summons was issued in the Prize Court for an order that the appellants' London agents might have liberty to enter an appearance and put in a claim to the proceeds on behalf of the appellants. No affidavit was filed. The Prize Claims Committee refused the application, and the President declined to give leave to appeal on the ground of delay and of acquiescence in the claim being considered by the Prize Claims Committee.

Sir R. Finlay, K.C. and Dunlop for the appellants.

Sir George Cave (S.-G.) and A. B. Marten (for G. T. Simonds, serving with His Majesty's forces) for the Procurator-General, respondent.

The judgment of their Lordships was delivered by Lord PARKER.—Where substantial injustice would otherwise result, the court has, in their Lordships' opinion, an inherent power to set aside its own judgments of condemnation so as to let in bonâ fide claims by third parties who have not in fact been heard, and who have had no opportunity of appearing. This power is discretionary, and should not be exercised, except where there would be substantial injustice if the judgment in question were allowed to stand, and where the application for relief has been promptly made. In the present case the learned President has refused the relief on the ground of delay, apparently under the impression that the appellants invoked the assistance of the Prize Claims Committee, whereas in fact the papers were sent to such committee by the Procurator-General. It was not, under the circumstances, unreasonable for the appellants to have awaited the result of what the Procurator-General was doing before instituting further proceedings in the matter.

Their Lordships therefore think that the proper order would be to allow the appeal, and remit the summons to the court below, with leave to the appellants to amend it in such manner as they may be advised, and file the proper evidence in support thereof.

With regard to the costs of this appeal, their Lordships are of opinion that no costs should be allowed on either side. The costs below will be dealt with by the President on the further hearing of the summons.

Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

THE SARPEN. (a)

Salvage—Services rendered by ship requisitioned by Admiralty—King's ship—Claim by owners of ship—Whether consent of Admiralty necessary—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 557 (1)—Voluntariness.

The plaintiffs were the owners of a steam tug which had been requisitioned by the Admiralty on terms whereby the owners were to pay the wages of the crew, to provide for all stores and necessary equipment of the vessel, and to take marine risks, and the Admiralty were to accept war risks on the vessel and crew and to provide coal.

Whilst thus under requisition the tug rendered salvage services to a ship belonging to the defendants, and a claim was made against the defendants by the owners, master, and crew of the tug in respect of these services.

Held, that the tug could not be regarded as a King's ship when rendering the salvage services, and was not prevented by sect. 557 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 from claiming ordinary salvage remuneration by the fact that she was hired to the Admiralty, nor did the master and crew require the consent of the Admiralty to the prosecution of their claim.

Per Pickford, L.J.: The test of voluntariness is only applicable as between the salvor and salved.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from the decision of Bargrave Deane, J.

The action was brought by the owners, master, and crew of the steam tug Simla for salvage services rendered to the Norwegian steamship Sarpen when she was ashore on Papa Stronsa, in the Orkneys, in April 1915. The Simla had been requisitioned by the Admiralty under the Royal Proclamation of the 3rd Aug. 1914 (Transports and Auxiliaries) authorising "the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty . . . to requisition and take up . . . any British ship or British vessel as defined in the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, within the British Isles or the waters adjacent thereto, for such period of time as may be necessary, on condition that the owners of all ships and vessels so requisitioned shall receive payment for their use and for services rendered during their employment in the Government service, . . . according to terms to be arranged as soon as possible after the said ship has been taken up, either by mutual agreement between the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty and the owners, or, failing such agreement, by the award of a board of arbitration." No agreement had been come to between the Admiralty and the tug owners settling the terms of the engagement of the Simla until after the trial of this action before Bargrave Deane, J. The terms of the agreement as subsequently arrived at were that the master and crew of the Simla were paid by the owners, who also provided the stores and provisions, but the Admiralty provided and paid for the coal and accepted all war risks on the vessel.

Bargrave Deane, J. held that, the Simla being in the same position as a King's ship, no claim for salvage services could be allowed by sect. 557 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. In case there should be an appeal, he fixed the amount to be awarded for the salvage services rendered at 800*l.*

Cur. adv. vult.

June 5.—SWINFEN EADY, L.J. read the following judgment:—The tug Simla rendered valuable salvage services to the Norwegian steamship Sarpen, a vessel laden with dry wood pulp, when the latter was on the rocks at Papa Stronsa, one of the Orkney Islands, in the month of April 1915. This action was brought by the owners, master, and crew of the tug against the Sarpen, her cargo and freight, to recover salvage. The judge decided that the Simla was a vessel in the service of the Crown, and in the position of a King's ship, and precluded by sect. 557 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 from making any claim for salvage; and that the master and crew of the vessel were not entitled to have their claim for salvage services finally adjudicated upon, unless the consent of the Admiralty to the prosecution of that claim was proved, which had not been done. He therefore held that the claim failed. In case there should be an appeal, the judge proceeded to consider what would be a proper amount to award for the salvage services rendered, if a claim could be maintained, and he fixed the amount at 800*l.*

The owners, master, and crew of the tug appeal, and ask to have it determined that the ship was not and ought not to be regarded as a King's ship at the time when the services were rendered, and accordingly that the claim can be maintained, and that the consent of the Admiralty is not required for the due prosecution of the claim by the master and crew. The appellants also contend that if they are entitled to recover salvage the sum of 800*l.* determined by Bargrave Deane, J. is inadequate compensation for services rendered.

In order to determine whether the tug is to be regarded as a King's ship, it is necessary to consider her position and the terms upon which she had been acquired and was held by the British Admiralty when the salvage services were rendered. She was sent to Sheerness dock by her owners in response to a telegram from the dockyard authority of the 30th July 1914 requesting that certain named tugs (not including the Simla) be dispatched to Sheerness forthwith, but, if not available, that tugs of similar description be dispatched; the plaintiffs in their reply admitted that the tug Simla was under requisition by the Admiralty, and accordingly the learned judge said that he accepted "the position which both parties seem to agree to, that the requisition was duly effected, and when so requisitioned the Simla went to Sheerness, and then to Kirkwall Bay, and lay in the harbour there under the direction of the naval harbour master." I treat the matter upon the same footing as by agreement it was treated in the court below, and regard the tug Simla as requisitioned and taken up on the terms of the proclamation of the 3rd Aug. 1914. The proclamation, however, contains a recital that, owing to the urgency of the need, it is impossible to delay the employment of the vessels taken until the terms of engagement have been mutually agreed upon, and it provides for terms being arranged as soon as possible after a ship has been taken up, either by mutual agreement between the Admiralty and the shipowner, or, failing such agreement, by the award of a board of arbitration. Since the trial of the action before Bargrave Deane, J. an agreement has been come to between the Admiralty and the tug owners, settling the terms of the engagement of the tug Simla. By this agreement the Admiralty are to pay an agreed sum per day for the hire of the tug; the rate is framed on the following conditions: Owners are to pay wages and health insurance of the crew; to provide and pay for all stores and the necessary equipment for the proper and efficient working of the vessel, and to take marine risks on the vessel and crew. Admiralty to accept war risks on the vessel and crew and to provide coal. In the event of loss of time or prevention of a vessel working owing to deficiency of men or stores, defect, or damage not due to a contingency coming under the category of war risks, payment of hire shall cease until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service, and the costs of repair of such defects or damage shall be an owner's charge. A charter-party to be issued later. These terms are retrospective and date back to the 30th July 1914. This court, having now before it the terms so settled, is in a much better position than Bargrave Deane, J. was to determine whether the ship is to be deemed to be a ship belonging to His Majesty, within the meaning of sect. 557 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894.

By the terms of that section, "where salvage services are rendered by any ship belonging to Her Majesty, or by the commander or crew thereof, no claim shall be allowed for any loss, damage, or risk caused to the ship or her stores, tackle, or furniture, or for the use of any stores or other articles belonging to Her Majesty, supplied in order to effect those services, or for any other expense or loss sustained by Her Majesty by reason of that service." This provision is a re-enactment of sect. 484 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1844. Where salvage services are rendered by a King's ship, no claim to salvage can be made in respect of the ship, but the commander and crew may prosecute a claim with the consent of the Admiralty: (sect. 557 of the Act of 1894). Previous to this provision and the corresponding enactment in the Act of 1854 there was in force an order of the Board of Admiralty of the 30th Jan. 1852 directing the officers of Her Majesty's ships not to claim reward for salvage services rendered to vessels in distress unless the service was one of real importance, or was accompanied with hazard: (Kennedy on Civil Salvage, 2nd edit., p. 113). The question is whether the Simla is to be considered a King's ship for the purpose of determining whether a claim for salvage can be made on behalf of the ship and her owners. In the case of The Nile (sup.) salvage services were rendered by the Finisterre, and the officers of H.M.S. Simoom and the Nile admitted liability for salvage, and paid 1000*l.*, which was accepted, and the only question actually raised was as to the apportionment of the amount, and whether Commander Peile was entitled to a share as well as the naval officers who actually assisted at the operations. In that case the Finisterre had been chartered by the Government by a charter not demising the ship; all sea damage was at the risk of the owners of the ship. and the salvage services were outside the scope of the vessel's employment as a transport. Sir Robert Phillimore pointed out that the ship was never demised; and that there was no temporary transfer of her ownership to Her Majesty, and that her owners were therefore entitled to the ship's share of salvage remuneration. The inference from this is that if there had been an actual demise of the Finisterre to the Admiralty, and if sea damage had been at the risk of the Admiralty, the ship would have been for the time being "a ship belonging to Her Majesty" within the meaning of sect. 484 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854—now sect. 557 of the Act of 1894. This is in accordance with the decision of the King's Bench in 1815 in Master, &c., of the Trinity House v. Clark (sup.), where Lord Ellenborough delivered the judgment of the court, which determined that where the ship Britannia was under a time charter to the Crown which amounted to a demise of the ship, a temporary ownership in the vessel passed to the Crown. In Weir and Co. v. Union Steamship Company 83 L. T. Rep. 90; (1900) A.C. 525). Lord Davey, referring to this case, said that it was decided on very special circumstances, and could hardly be a precedent for any other. But the passage which follows indicates that in his opinion if the contract is one in which the ship is completely handed over to the charterers, to be navigated by them at their own risk and responsibility, there would be a transfer of temporary ownership. Certainly a ship may belong to a person as "owner," although such ownership may be only temporary: (see The Lemington, sup., at p. 478; The Ripon City, sup., at pp. 242, 244). In the case before us, however, it now appears that the tug Simla was taken by the Admiralty upon the terms of the owners paying wages and health insurance of crew, providing and paying for all stores and the necessary equipment for the proper and efficient working of the vessel, and taking the marine risk on the vessel and crew. When, therefore, the Simla was rendering (with the permission of the naval authorities) the services for which salvage reward was claimed, it was the owners of the Simla and not the Admiralty who were incurring risks of sea damage and injury to the vessel and her crew, and the Admiralty were not at risk in the matter.

Now that the facts have been more fully ascertained, I am of opinion that the Simla cannot be regarded as a King's ship when rendering the salvage services, and that the ship is not prevented from claiming ordinary salvage remuneration by the fact of the vessel's hiring to the Admiralty, nor do the commander and crew require the consent of the Admiralty to the prosecution of their claim. I observe that Bargrave Deane, J., after holding that the vessel was in the service of the Crown, added that without the sanction of the Admiralty she could not claim any salvage reward for salvage services. But if the ship were a King's ship, no claim to salvage can be made on behalf of the ship, whether with or without the consent of the Admiralty; the claim must be limited to a claim by the commander and crew; it is this claim which requires the consent of the Admiralty for its prosecution in the case of a vessel belonging to His Majesty.

It may be urged that the settlement of the terms of hire between the Admiralty and the tug owners, come to since the trial of the action before Bargrave Deane, J., although operating retrospectively, ought not to prejudice the defence of the Sarpen to the demand for salvage. But the terms upon which the vessel was acquired by the Admiralty had been left open; primâ facie a ship rendering services such as the Simla rendered to the Sarpen would be entitled to a salvage award; the burden of showing that the Simla was not so entitled was upon the Sarpen; and if at the trial the terms of hire had not been sufficiently settled to determine the character and position of the Simla, the owners of the Sarpen might have applied for an adjournment of the hearing until either agreement or arbitration had determined whether the Simla was in the position of a King's ship. No adjournment, however, was asked for; the evidence before Bargrave Deane, J. was quite insufficient to establish that the Simla was in the position of a vessel belonging to His Majesty; and the subsequent agreement shows that the Simla has not at any time since it was taken up acquired that character. It was also contended on behalf of the Sarpen that there could be no salvage award, as the services rendered were not voluntary on the part of the tug, since she had been directed by the naval officer in command at Kirkwall to proceed to the assistance of the Sarpen. But the services were rendered voluntarily as between the salvors and the salved, which is all that is material; the Simla owed no duty towards the Sarpen. In all cases of salvage by a King's ship, where the commander and crew are entitled to obtain a salvage award, they are acting under orders, given either in general instructions or by a superior officer in the particular instance.

With regard to the amount to be awarded, which Bargrave Deane, J. assessed at 800*l.*, if this court should be of opinion that salvage could be recovered, I see no ground for differing from the learned judge on the question of amount. There does not appear to have been any misapprehension on his part as to the facts of the case, or any error in point of principle.

In my judgment the appeal should be allowed, and 800*l.* awarded to the salvors.

Pickford, L.J. read the following judgment:—This is an action of salvage brought by the owners, master, and crew of the steam tug Simla against the owners of the steamship Sarpen, a Norwegian vessel, her cargo and freight, for services rendered while the "Sarpen was ashore on Papa Stronsa, in the Orkneys." The services are not denied, but the defendants allege that the plaintiffs are not entitled to claim salvage because they are prohibited from doing so by sect. 557 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. This is not the form of the pleading, but it is the substantial question. It is also alleged that the services were not voluntary because they were rendered by the orders of the naval authorities. It may be as well to dispose of this point at once. It rests in my opinion on no sound basis. The test of voluntariness is only applicable as between the salvor and salved, and if the services be voluntary in relation to the salved—i.e., not rendered by reason of any obligation towards him—it is quite immaterial that the salvor has been ordered by someone who has control of his movements to render them. To decide the main question it is necessary to see in what way the Simla was employed at the time of the services. She was owned by Mr. Watkins and was placed at the disposal of the Government in consequence of two telegrams received on the 30th July which requested certain named tugs or others of a similar description to be sent to Sheerness. The proclamation under which vessels were requisitioned was issued two or three days later, and it is admitted by the reply that at the time of the services the Simla was under requisition, but it is denied that such requisition amounted to a demise of the tug or a transfer of ownership to His Majesty. So far as the facts were known at the trial and on the argument before us, they were that the owners were to be paid a monthly hire, the amount of which was not ascertained; that they provided and paid the master and crew and provided the stores and provisions, bunker coal being supplied by the Admiralty. I think that the learned judge described the position correctly when he said that the tug was in sole employment of the Crown, which had actual discretion as to her use, and it was necessary to obtain the permission of the Admiralty authorities before she could go out and render salvage services. I cannot, however, agree with him when he says that under those circumstances she could not claim any salvage reward for salvage services without the sanction of the Admiralty.

The sanction of the Admiralty has nothing to do with the claim of the owners of the tug; if they come within the provisions of sect. 557 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, no claim can be made by them at all either with or without such sanction; if they do not come within the provisions, no such sanction is necessary. In order to defeat their claim it must be shown that the Simla was a ship belonging to His Majesty within the meaning of that section. The section is as follows: [His Lordship then read the section.] Probably the reason of the provision is that it is not considered right that risk or loss to property provided by the public should be paid for by a member of that public. It is true that this reason does not apply to risk and loss occasioned by services to foreigners, and it was contended before us that the section must be limited to services rendered to British ships or cargo, but I see no such limitation in the section, and it was probably extended to foreign ships by the comity of nations. But to bring the salving vessel within the section she must belong to the Crown. It is not enough that she is chartered by the Crown, which has the sole directing power over her, and that she cannot render salvage services without the Crown's consent. She does not necessarily belong to the Crown in that case any more than a vessel under charter not by way of demise to anyone else belongs to the charterer. See The Nile (sup.) and The Bertie (sup.), with which I agree. Those cases are not authorities which govern this, the salving vessels were under charter as transports only and not hired for any purpose which the Crown required, and they were not, so far as I can tell, under requisition; but I think they are authorities, with which I agree, that the owner of a vessel is not excluded from the right to salvage because she is in the service of the Crown and cannot render such services without its consent, and the services are rendered under the instructions of the naval authorities.

It is necessary to see if the fact of being under requisition makes any difference. In my opinion it does not necessarily do so. I do not deny that there may be a requisition under such terms as to give the Crown the dominion as well as the control of the ship, and it may be that in such a case she may be said to belong to the Crown, although not in the ordinary sense belonging to it. But I am of the same opinion that I expressed in The Broadmayne (sup.), that the word "requisition" does not necessarily connote such a state of things; it means that the Crown has the right to require the services of the ship without the consent of the owner, but it does not define the terms upon which the Crown may see fit to take those services. It is well known that some vessels are employed under requisition on terms of charter-parties and some are not, that the terms of the charter-parties are not always the same, and a case was mentioned at the Bar in which express terms were made entitling the tug so requisitioned to the benefit of salvage. The proclamation under which the ship is to be taken to be requisitioned seems to me to contemplate that all vessels will not be requisitioned on the same terms. It is as follows: [His Lordship read the proclamation as above set out.]

It may very well be that the words "according to terms to be arranged" strictly and grammatically refer only to payment for services and compensation, but it is obvious that in arranging such payment and compensation it is necessary to look at the other terms of the hiring—e.g., whether the owner or the Crown pays the crew; on whom war and marine risks fall, and such matters, and, as I have pointed out, it is well known that the Crown does under requisition hire the services of ships on different terms as to such matters. The Crown cannot be forced by arbitration to accept any particular conditions, but it can and does agree to such conditions, and then the only question for arbitration is, given those conditions, what is the proper amount to be paid. In my opinion when there is a hiring under requisition as in this case, on terms to be settled after the hiring, the question of whether the requisitioned ship is a ship belonging to His Majesty cannot be ascertained until those terms are settled. I do not think in this case there was a taking over of the absolute dominion of the vessel, subject to being afterwards altered at the will of the Crown, but a taking over on terms which the Crown had not then settled, and which when settled might or might not confer such dominion. In this case there were not, in my opinion, materials before the court on which it could come to the conclusion that the Simla was a ship belonging to His Majesty, and I think, therefore, that the plaintiffs are entitled to an award. On Mr. Watkins' evidence the tug belonged to him and was entitled to salvage reward, and to show that the Crown was employing her under terms which were not ascertained was not sufficient to displace that primâ facie case. It is to be noticed that the Admiralty have in no way interfered; in fact, so far as any intelligible meaning can be given to the communications from the Transport Department, they seem to be willing that the plaintiffs should recover salvage so long as it is not against Crown property, and the defendants have not taken the trouble to obtain any evidence from the Admiralty as to anything. I think, therefore, that upon the evidence before the learned judge the plaintiffs were entitled to succeed. The defendants would, I think, have been entitled to object to judgment being given against them while the terms were unsettled and to ask for an adjournment until it was decided what they were, but they did not do so. We have, however, since the case was argued, had sent to us in substance the terms agreed between the plaintiffs and the Government. They are finally to be embodied in a charter-party, and that has not yet been done, but they have been accepted by the parties as substantially correct, and we have heard argument on them on that basis. Those terms have been read. They are in effect a hiring by the Government, which is not a demise of the vessel, and leave the marine risk to fall upon the owners, and they take effect from July 1914.

The result is that when the salvage services were rendered the tug was employed under terms which did not constitute her a ship belonging to His Majesty, and therefore her owners, master, and crew were entitled to recover a salvage reward. There remains to be considered the amount of the award. The learned judge assessed it at 800*l.* in case the plaintiffs were entitled to recover, and they have appealed on the ground that the amount was insufficient.

This court is always loth to interfere with the amount of salvage awarded, even where it might possibly not take exactly the same view as the court below, and I do not see in this case sufficient grounds for interfering with the discretion of Bargrave Deane, J.

BANKES, L.J. — This is an appeal from a decision of Bargrave Deane, J., who decided against the claim of the owners, master, and crew of the steam tug Simla for salvage services rendered to the Norwegian steamship Sarpen. The decision proceeded entirely upon the ground that the Simla was a "ship belonging to His Majesty" and that the claim of the owners must therefore be disallowed, and that, so far as the claim of the master and crew was concerned, the consent of the Admiralty not having been obtained for the prosecution of the claim, that claim must be disallowed also.

The rule restricting any claim for salvage by a vessel belonging to His Majesty appears to be of very old standing. It was referred to in the case of the Iodine by Mr. Lushington in the year 1844, in 3 Notes of Cases, at p. 141, in the following terms: "Observations have been made in the argument respecting one of Her Majesty's vessels preferring a claim of this nature, though that question had long ago been settled; for from the very earliest date of my experience as an advocate, as far back as 1808, I thought the opinion expressed by Lord Stowell had decided this question. I apprehend that where assistance is rendered by any vessel belonging to Her Majesty the following principles are to be applied: that where a service is done, and there is personal risk and labour, Her Majesty's officers and seamen are entitled to be rewarded precisely in a similar manner, on the same principles, and in the same degree, as where any other persons render that service. But, with regard to the use of the vessel, a different consideration would apply, and a less remuneration would always be made on account of the vessel being the property of the country, and the property of the owners under these circumstances never being risked." Ten years later the rule as extended was incorporated in the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (sects. 484 and 485); and is now to be found in sect. 557 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894. It has never been expressly decided what constitutes a vessel belonging to His Majesty so as to render the owners incapable of claiming for salvage services. The question can, of course, only arise in relation to vessels engaged in Government service and privately owned, or owned by the Government of some colony or dependency. The question was discussed in the cases of Cargo ex Woosung (sup.) and The Dalhousie (sup.) with reference to vessels belonging to the Bombay Government. The most instructive case on the point to which we have been referred is, I think, that of The Nile (sup.). That case raised the question as to whether the owners of the steamship Finisterre were entitled to salvage. The vessel was at the time engaged under charter in Her Majesty's transport service. In dealing with the question Sir R. Phillimore, at p. 455, says this: "Having reference to these documents, I am of opinion that the Finisterre was never demised—indeed, it was not so contended—to Her Majesty; that there was no temporary transfer of her ownership to Her Majesty; and that her owners are entitled (a point faintly, if at all, contested) to her share of salvage remuneration. I think, however, that she was so far under the control of the senior naval officer, Captain Peile, that on the one hand she could not have acted as salvor without his permission, though, on the other hand, she could not have been ordered by him to perform this service, which was not, in my judgment, within the terms of the charter." In this passage Sir Robert Phillimore clearly indicates that in his opinion if there had been a temporary transfer of ownership the Finisterre would have become for the time being, and for the purposes of the Merchant Shipping Act and the earning of salvage, a vessel belonging to Her Majesty. In this view I agree; and it is therefore unnecessary to consider the cases, to several of which we have been referred, in which it has been held that for certain purposes a vessel may be considered as having a dual ownership—the ownership of what I may call the actual owner, and the ownership of the temporary owner.

In the present case there is no question that the actual owners of the Simla are the plaintiffs in the action. The only question is whether the requisitioning of the Simla by the Government placed her, for the time being in the temporary ownership of the Government so as to constitute her a vessel belonging to His Majesty, and as such disentitled to earn salvage. I should entertain no doubt at all on this subject had the requisition been a formal unqualified exercise of the Royal Prerogative. Such an exercise of the prerogative must, I think, be interpreted as a taking over of a vessel in the fullest possible sense, which would include the claim to exercise and the exercising of the rights of the owner to the full extent. The difficulty in the present case arises from the circumstances under which the Simla was taken for Government service, and the terms of the proclamation of the 3rd Aug. 1914. The only documents which passed between the Government and the owners before and in reference to the taking of the Simla were two telegrams, both dated the 30th July, in which the Admiralty requested the owners to send certain named tugs or tugs of similar description to Sheerness. In pursuance of this request the Simla was sent with others, and she has since been continuously retained in Government employ. For the purposes of this action the parties are agreed that the Simla must be treated as having been requisitioned under the proclamation, although no warrant was ever issued for that purpose. It becomes, therefore, very material to consider the terms of the proclamation. The proclamation confers upon the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty the power to requisition and take up for the service of His Majesty any ship as defined by the proclamation for such period of time as may be necessary, but only on condition that the owner shall receive payment for the use, and for services rendered, during the employment in Government service, and compensation for loss and damage thereby occasioned according to terms to be arranged as soon as possible after the ship has been taken up either by mutual agreement or by arbitration. This language appears to me to give the Admiralty a wide discretion in arranging terms with the owner of a requisitioned vessel. The payment to be made is to depend upon the use to which the vessel is put, or the services which she is required to render, and the terms of employment may therefore extend from the full requisitioning of the vessel upon terms at least as extensive as a demise of the vessel to the mere occasional employment of the vessel to render some specified and intermittent service. The language of the proclamation appears to me to indicate that it was intended to provide for the possibility of there being cases in which the continuous use of the vessel might not be required, but that she might be required to render certain services only at stated periods, leaving her free for her owner's purposes at other times, and that other terms might be agreed upon which might affect the amount of compensation which an owner could properly claim. As an instance I cannot think of a better illustration than the present, where conceivably it may be in the interest of everyone that the Simla should be at liberty to undertake services for reward if and when the Admiralty authorities thought it right to give her permission to undertake them. If this was permitted, the rate of payment to the owners would presumably be less than if it was not permitted, while the Admiralty would be free to give or refuse permission as it suited their purpose. This question of the right to charge for salvage services must necessarily, as it seems to me, come up for settlement if and whenever the terms of payment are discussed between the Admiralty and the owners of the requisitioned tug. In the present case when the matter was before the Admiralty Court the question of the tug's position and the terms of payment had not come up for discussion. I certainly am not prepared to assume and I do not think that the learned judge was right in assuming either that the effect of a requisition under the proclamation was ipso facto to put the Simla into the class of a ship "belonging to His Majesty," or that the terms which would be eventually mutually agreed or settled by arbitration must necessarily involve a transfer of the temporary ownership to the Crown. During the argument before this court counsel for the plaintiffs mentioned the fact that since the case was before the Admiralty Court terms had been agreed between the owners and the Admiralty. We were not told the terms at the time, but the court has been furnished at its own request with a copy of the correspondence which has passed and counsel have been further heard upon it. It now appears that one of the terms which have been agreed is that marine risks are for the owner and war risks only for the Crown.

In my opinion this agreement concludes the question as to the real position of the Simla with regard to salvage while she remains under requisition, and that it is no longer possible to contend that she was at the time the salvage services were rendered a ship belonging to His Majesty. Apart from the question of the agreement, however, the evidence before the learned judge was not in my opinion such as to justify a finding that the Simla was at the time the salvage services were rendered in the position of "a ship belonging to His Majesty." I regard her at that time as only conditionally requisitioned—that is to say, that she was requisitioned upon terms which might or might not place her in the position of "a ship belonging to His Majesty"; but, as the terms had not at that time even come under discussion, she had not become fixed with the disabilities, so far as salvage services are concerned, of one of His Majesty's ships. Under these circumstances I consider that the appeal on the question of liability should succeed. The amount fixed by the learned judge is, I consider, low, but not so low as to justify any interference by this court.

PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

PRIZE COURT.

May 4 and 11, 1916.

(Before Sir S. T. EVANS, President.)

THE ASTURIAN. (a)

Prize—Cargo—Shipment of cargo before outbreak of war—Goods the produce of enemy soil—Neutral claimants — Company domiciled in neutral country—Branch office in enemy country—Domicil—Effect of Turkish Capitulations.

A Greek company, having its head offices at Athens, carried on a branch business in Asia Minor, where it owned certain vineyards. Before the outbreak of hostilities between Great Britain and Turkey a cargo of sultanas, the produce of the vineyards, was shipped by the company in a British vessel and consigned to the order of the company at Liverpool. At the last-named port the goods were seized as enemy property and claimed as prize by the Crown.

Held, that, although the Greek company was neutral, the goods claimed were the produce of land owned or held by the claimants in an enemy country and were liable to confiscation and condemnation, even though the goods were shipped before the outbreak of war, and that the effect of the Turkish Capitulation as to the holding of land in the Turkish Empire by persons of foreign nationality was irrelevant.

THIS was a case in which the Crown asked for the condemnation of a cargo of sultanas shipped on the Asturian at Smyrna and consigned to Liverpool.

The Asturian was a British steamship which shipped (inter alia) a cargo of 2500 boxes of sultanas at Smyrna, in Asia Minor, before the date of the outbreak of war between Great Britain and Turkey—namely, the 5th Nov. 1914. No question arose as to any portion of the cargo except the sultanas, which were shipped by the Banque d'Orient, a Greek company having its head office at Athens, and a branch at Smyrna, where it owned a vineyard, of which the sultanas in question were the produce. The cargo of sultanas was consigned to the order of the Banque d'Orient at Liverpool, where the Asturian arrived on the 29th Oct. 1914. The goods were seized as enemy property at the port of Liverpool on the 12th Nov. 1914.

The Attorney-General (Sir F. E. Smith, K.C.) and Pearce Higgins for the Procurator-General. —The goods in question in this case must be regarded as having an enemy character. They were the produce of a vineyard situated in enemy territory, which was admittedly the property of the claimants. If a merchant or a trading company had places of business in two countries, that merchant or that company was to be considered, for business purposes, as a subject of both countries. And it was clearly established that if one of the places of business was in a neutral country and the other in an enemy country, the connection between the two must be severed at the earliest opportunity after the outbreak of hostilities. It was also an established proposition of international law that the produce of the soil of an enemy country was enemy property. It was immaterial what was the nationality of the owner. The claimants had endeavoured to set up an exception to this rule, by contending that under the Turkish Capitulation systems Europeans in Turkey possessed certain ex-territorial rights. But even if it was assumed that Turkey had not repudiated the capitulations, the fact of their existence did not affect the principle contended for by the Crown, that the produce of enemy soil, which soil was under the control of the enemy Government, was undoubtedly enemy property. Leslie Scott, K.C. and Dunlop for the claimants. —The claim put forward by the Crown was stated too high. The rule as regarding neutrals residing in a neutral country with a branch place of business in an enemy country was that goods shipped from the enemy country would only be treated as enemy goods if an enemy character was, under the circumstances, attributable to them. This followed from the judgment in the case of The Phœnix (Roscoe, vol. 1, 495*a*; 5 Ch. Rob. 20). There was, however, a distinction to be drawn in the present case. An enemy character could not be attributed to the owners of the goods, and therefore the goods must be treated as of a neutral character. This applied equally to the produce of the soil owned by them, even though that soil was a part of the enemy territory. Again, in the absence of proof that the neutral owners had continued to carry on their business in the enemy country, there was no ground for attributing an enemy character to goods which were shipped before the outbreak of war. The Banque d'Orient had kept open their branch at Smyrna for the purpose of preserving the property of the bank. There was not a particle of evidence that they had continued to carry on business. The Banque d'Orient retained its neutral character under the Turkish Capitulations, and should be treated, in spite of its branch house in Smyrna, as a company established in Greece. They cited

The Attorney-General in reply. Cur. adv. vult.

May 11.—THE PRESIDENT.—Part of the cargo laden on board this vessel consisted of 2560 boxes of sultanas shipped at Smyrna before the war by the Banque d'Orient, and consigned to their order at Liverpool. The said boxes were seized at Liverpool on the 12th Nov. 1914. On the 1st Jan. 1915 appearance was entered in these prize proceedings on behalf of the Banque d'Orient as the owners of the 2560 boxes. On the 19th April 1915 the claim was made to the same or to the proceeds thereof by or on behalf of the Banque d'Orient, on the ground that they were neutrals, and were at all material times the owners of the goods.

The Banque d'Orient was a Greek company, with a head office at Athens and with a branch at Smyrna. The company carried on business as bankers and merchants. It owned and controlled land and dealt with the produce. Among other landed property, it owned a vineyard at Magnessia, near Smyrna. The sultanas claimed in these proceedings were the produce of that vineyard. They were shipped by the claimants in the steamship Asturian to their order at Liverpool for sale by their agents. The said land or vineyard was admittedly the property of the claimants. It was nominally held for them by some or one of their staff at Smyrna as the registered trustees or trustee on their behalf. This was a mere formality necessitated by the fact that the Ottoman Government did not allow land to be registered in the name of a foreign limited company.

According to the affidavit of Manuel Camara, there were three registered trustees who held the land and managed it for the Banque d'Orient. But according to a letter of the 4th or the 17th April 1916 (which depends on the styles) and its inclosures, it would appear that the property was nominally held for them by one of their directors, Loncas, who signed what amounts to a declaration of trust, in which he declared that the property was in the indisputable possession of the Banque d'Orient, and that its registration in his name was "merely fictitious." Whatever may have been the technical form, the claimants themselves asserted that they were the real owners of the vineyard, and their claim was founded on the ownership of the land and its produce.

The argument on their behalf was in the main based upon their alleged neutral domicil, as their head office was in Athens; and the business at Smyrna was that of a mere branch, in relation to which it was said that they had the benefit of the privileges of the Turkish Capitulations system. Under this system they claimed that their position in Smyrna, and their character as owners of the vineyard, was that of neutral subjects of the kingdom of Greece. In that regard, much of the argument before me revolved round the questions of commercial domicil, and the effect of the Turkish Capitulations, and their alleged abolition before the war by the Sublime Porte.

In the view that I take of this case all such questions are irrelevant. The simple fact upon which the decision of the court depends is that the goods claimed were the produce of land owned or held by the claimants in an enemy country. The law applicable is well settled—namely, that the produce of such land, while in the possession or ownership of the person owning or holding such land, even though he be a neutral, and resident in a neutral country, is confiscable if captured or seized by a belligerent with whom the State where the land is situate is at war. This doctrine was declared as long ago as 1803 to have been so repeatedly decided, both in the English Prize Court and in the Court of the Commissioners of Appeal in Prize Cases, that it was no longer open to question or discussion: (see The Phœnix, ubi sup.). It was also fully adopted and indorsed by the Supreme Court of the United States of America in Thirty Hogsheads of Sugar v. Boyle (ubi sup.).

This doctrine has not been doubted, and still remains in full force as part of the law of nations. It is well stated by the late Mr. Hall, in the 6th edit. of his work on International Law, at pp. 497, 498, in this passage: "Property is considered to be necessarily hostile by its origin when it consists in the produce of estates owned by a neutral in belligerent territory, although he may not be resident there. Land it is held, being fixed, is necessarily associated with the permanent interests of the State to which it belongs; and its proprietor, so far from being able to impress his own character if he happens to be neutral upon it or its produce, is drawn by the intimacy of his association with property which cannot be moved into identification in respect of it with its national character. The produce of such property, therefore, is liable to capture under all circumstances in which enemy's property can be seized."

The fact was relied upon by the claimants that the shipment of the goods was before the state of war existed between this country and Turkey. Upon the principle enunciated in the above passage from Mr. Hall's work, this fact does not affect the question of the confiscability of the goods; and, indeed, it was expressly declared by Sir William Scott, in the Vrow Anna Catharina (5 Ch. Rob. 161), that the produce of land in an enemy country was subject to confiscation, although shipped in time of peace.

The judgment of the court, therefore, is that the goods claimed by the claimants must be treated as if they were enemy property, and that they were accordingly subject to seizure as lawful prize, and that they or their proceeds must be condemned as prize to the Crown as droits of Admiralty.

THE OPHELIA. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (IN PRIZE).

Prize Court—Military hospital ship—Evidence pointing to user for other purposes—Claim of protection under the Hague Convention—Appeal involving question of fact only—Practice—Hague Conference 1907, Convention 10, arts. 1 and 8.

By the provisions of Convention 10 of the Hague Convention 1907 it is provided:

Art. 1. Military hospital ships—that is to say, ships constructed or adapted by States wholly and solely with a view to aiding the wounded, sick, and shipwrecked, the names of which have been communicated to the belligerent Powers—shall be respected and cannot be captured.

Art. 8. The protection to which hospital ships are entitled ceases if they are used to commit acts harmful to the enemy. The presence of wireless telegraphy apparatus on board is not a sufficient reason for withdrawing protection.

Held, on the evidence that the German ship O, which claimed to be a military hospital ship, had been made use of to commit acts harmful to the enemy, and therefore had forfeited protection under the Hague Convention and had rightly been condemned as lawful prize.

An appeal from a decision of the Prize Court on a question of fact must be treated as a rehearing in the same way as an appeal to the Court of Appeal from a judge sitting without a jury in the High Court. There is jurisdiction to review the findings of the judge, but the Appeal Court attaches great weight to the fact that the judge below has heard the witnesses and practically acts on the opinion of the judge as to the credibility of the witnesses before him and the weight to be attached to their evidence.

Without laying down an absolute rule that the mere sending by a hospital ship of a wireless message in secret code will of itself forfeit her right to protection and subject her to capture and condemnation, if such messages are sent a clear and satisfactory record of them should be kept, so that when the right to search is exercised there may be reasonable evidence of the messages and of the necessity—if there can be any on the part of a hospital ship—for sending them in secret code.

Semble, that the principle of the Prize Court condemning the spoliation of ships' papers is especially applicable to vessels claiming to be hospital ships.

Decision of Sir Samuel Evans, P. affirmed.

APPEAL from a decision of the Prize Court (England), condemning the steamship Ophelia. The appellant claimed that the vessel was an auxiliary military hospital ship and privileged under The Hague Convention 1907 (art. 8).

(a) Reported by W. E. REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The appellant was Naval Staff Surgeon J. V. C. Pfeiffer, commander of the Ophelia, who lodged the appeal on behalf of the Imperial German Government.

Leslie Scott, K.C., Leck, K.C., Darby, and V. Holmes for the appellant.

Sir F. E. Smith (A.-G.), Sir George Cave (S.-G.), and C. R. Dunlop for the respondent.

The considered judgment of their Lordships was delivered by

Sir ARTHUR CHANNELL.—This is an appeal from a decree of the President of the Admiralty Division, sitting in Prize, condemning as lawful prize the German steamship Ophelia and rejecting the claim of the appellant, made on behalf of the German Government, to her release as a hospital ship protected by the provisions of Convention X. of the Hague Conventions of 1907. A very complete abstract of these provisions is set out in the judgment of the learned President, and it is only necessary to refer to the most material of them, which are the following:

Art. 1. Military hospital ships, that is to say, ships constructed or adapted by States wholly and solely with a view to aiding the wounded, sick, and shipwrecked, the names of which have been communicatod to the belligerent Powers, shall be respected and cannot be captured.

Art. 8. The protection to which hospital ships are entitled ceases if they are used to commit acts harmful to the enemy. The presence of wireless telegraphy apparatus on board is not a sufficient reason for withdrawing protection.

The question whether the Ophelia was entitled to protection from capture, as complying with these provisions, or whether, by reason of her equipment or the acts of her captain and crew, she had lost that right to protection, is almost entirely a question of fact. The only question which is at all in the nature of a point of law arises on the words of the Convention as to the presence of a wireless telegraphy apparatus, and that question can most conveniently be dealt with after the facts have been stated which raise it. It is necessary, therefore, to consider what is open upon an appeal to this board from the Prize Court on facts.

The Attorney-General has contended that the findings of the judge below should be held conclusive, and he quotes The Julia (14 Moore, Rep. 210) and The Princess Alice (19 L. T. Rep. 678; L. Rep. 2 P. C. 245). These cases, however, which were collision cases heard on appeal from the Admiralty Court, and not prize cases, only point out the advantage which the judge below had in seeing and hearing the witnesses, and also in the knowledge of navigation which he necessarily acquired in the exercise of his office, and the Judicial Committee merely emphasised the rules on which Appeal Courts always profess to act.

Their Lordships are of opinion that this appeal must be treated as a rehearing, in the same way as an appeal to the Court of Appeal from a judge sitting without a jury in the High Court. There is a jurisdiction to review the findings of the judge, but the Appeal Court gives very great weight to the fact that the judge below hears the witnesses, which they do not, and practically acts on the opinion of the judge as to the credibility of the witnesses before him and the weight to be attached to their evidence. Here the evidence for the Crown was all on affidavit and the evidence for the claimant was given orally after his witnesses had had an opportunity of studying the evidence for the Crown. The affidavits for the Crown were sworn before the case for the claimant had been disclosed, except so far as it was very slightly disclosed by an affidavit sworn by the claimant on the 13th Feb. 1915 (p. 6 of the Record), which did little more than verify the claim. The claimant did not apply to cross-examine any of the Crown witnesses on their affidavits, and his counsel accounts for this by saying that he does not substantially dispute the facts deposed to by the witnesses, but only the inferences drawn by the witnesses from the facts; and it is contended that the claimant's evidence explains rather than contradicts the facts on which the Crown relies. To a great extent that is so, but there seem some contradictions of fact, and some points on which the learned President appears not to have accepted as reliable the oral evidence which he heard. On these points their Lordships would not lightly differ from the learned President, but many matters have been raised on the argument of the appeal which cannot be satisfactorily disposed of by treating them as matters of fact concluded by the views of the President. Their Lordships therefore feel it their duty to review the facts in some detail.

No question is raised as to the necessary formalities to constitute the Ophelia a hospital-ship having been complied with. She had a proper certificate, and her name had been duly communicated to the belligerent Powers. She was painted properly as a hospital-ship, and was furnished with the proper flags, although a question is raised as to whether she displayed them properly on the 8th Oct., one of the days to which the evidence relates.

The first point to be considered seems to be whether the fitting and equipment of the Ophelia were such that she can be said, as required by the Convention, to be constructed or adapted "wholly and solely" for affording relief to the wounded, sick, and shipwrecked. The affidavits for the Crown and the admission of witnesses for the claimant show that the vessel, although she had some special fittings appropriate only to a hospital-ship, was not, according to British requirements, at all well adapted and fitted for that purpose; but it is unnecessary to go into the details of this, as their Lordships agree with the view of the learned President (who, it may be observed, himself inspected the ship) that no standard of fitness can be laid down, and although not well adapted, this vessel cannot be said not to be adapted, and that the real question therefore is whether she was solely adapted for hospital purposes. The inadequacy and the, in some respects, curious character of the sanitary and other hospital equipment is not, however, without significance on the question of the use which it was really intended to make of the vessel.

In the opinion of Commander Newman, who had special experience in the fitting of hospital ships, the Ophelia was not only unsuitable for use as a hospital ship, but was undoubtedly fitted and intended for signalling purposes. He came to that conclusion without knowing that the ship was suspected of acting as a signalling ship, and when he had merely been instructed to report on her suitability as a hospital ship. It is obvious that there could hardly be a greater or more dangerous abuse of the privileges of a hospital ship than the communicating to the naval authorities of her nation information which she would be constantly in a position to obtain by virtue of her immunity. Her signalling apparatus ought to be confined strictly to what would be necessary for receiving instruction as to her duties and for calling assistance in the performance of them and such like legitimate purposes. That the risk of such abuse was present to the minds of the framers of the Hague Convention is shown by the mention of wireless telegraphy. Instead of the signalling apparatus and equipment of the Ophelia being confined within the narrow limits necessary for a bonâ fide hospital ship, it was obviously very largely in excess of them. She had a very unusual number of signal halliards working on brackets from the funnel, which brackets were fitted to her in Kiel after her first fit-out and very shortly before her capture; but it is said by the German witnesses that this was merely in substitution for another arrangement of signal halliards working on a stay between the masts, and that the stay interfered with the wireless apparatus which had been supplied. It appeared, however, that the flags of the international commercial code which she had on board were kept stowed away in the charthouse; whilst on each side of the funnel, which was thus equipped with an abnormal number of signal halliards, there were stowed on hooks, obviously kept there for immediate use, special German flags which must have been provided for her when adapted for a hospital-ship, and must have been meant for secret signalling. Her masts were, on this last visit to Kiel, lengthened, which would have the effect of extending the receiving capacity of her wireless installation. This, it was said, was done not for the purpose of so increasing the range, but because the signal halliards on the brackets were interfered with by the wireless. This explanation in itself shows the great attention which was being paid to the signalling equipment of the ship. It is, however, the enormous number of Verey's signal lights which were on board which seemed to the President, and seems also to the board, practically conclusive that the vessel was specially equipped for signalling. These lights are fired from a special kind of pistol, of which there were two on board. Of these Verey's lights she had on board no less than 600 green, 480 red, and 140 white lights, obviously a most abnormal number. It is said by Commander Newman that a British vessel of the same class would have about twelve of each. At the trial it was discovered for the first time that a record of the number of these lights, which had been used, had been kept, but that it was destroyed by the paymaster by the order of Captain Pfeiffer after the capture, and on the evening of the day when they had been informed that the vessel was to be put in the Prize Court.

The subject of spoliation of documents will be dealt with hereafter, but the destruction of this particular book indicates in a most significant manner that the signal lights were provided for an illegitimate purpose, and none the less so because at that time the British officers had not made any complaint on this point. If any doubt could have remained as to the intended use of these lights, it seems cleared away by the incredible explanation which Captain Pfeifferwas driven to give of the large number of them. He actually swore that the green and red lights were intended to illuminate the surface of the sea and assist in searching at night for shipwrecked mariners or their corpses. Even with lights fired two at a time from the two pistols would be of little use for such a purpose, and green and red lights obviously of no use at all. They were, he suggested, to be so used because curiously enough the vessel had no searchlight, which as an auxiliary hospital ship she certainly ought to have had. This was the only way in which the number of lights could be accounted for; but a much better explanation, which would account for a moderate number, was that they were used to acknowledge Morse signals received from a distance greater than the Morse lamp which they had on board would carry, and a suggestion was also made that they would be used to identify the ship on coming into German harbours at night, for which obviously such a number as were on board would not have been wanted. No evidence was given of what the identification signal of the Ophelia was, and as to how many, if any, green, red, and white lights would be required to make it.

On these facts the learned President found that the Ophelia was not adapted or equipped solely as a hospital ship and with that finding their Lordship's agree. This finding would in itself justify the condemnation, but the matter ought not to be left to rest there, and the use actually made of the vessel must now be considered.

The Ophelia was before the war a German merchant vessel—a few days before the war she was in the Thames, and on the 3rd Aug. 1914 she received orders from the German consulate by an order of the German Government that she was to return to Germany for military service, and she sailed on the 4th Aug. with a party of German reservists on board. She was met by a German gunboat off Nordeney and was directed to go to Heligoland, which she did, and shortly afterwards went on to Hamburg, where her fitting as a hospital-ship was commenced by the Hamburg-American Steamship Company for the German Government. On the 12th Aug. she went to Kiel, where her fitting was continued. On the 5th Sept. she received orders to go to Cuxhaven, and arrived there on the 6th, but shortly afterwards came back to the Kaiser Wilhelm Canal, and got her certificate as a hospital-ship on the 11th Sept. On the 19th she went to Heligoland. There she stayed until the 3rd Oct., when she went to Wilhelmshaven. During all this time she did no hospital work, but according to the witnesses at trial, the time was occupied in drilling the crew in boat work and stretcher work and the like. The witnesses denied the suggestion that during that period she did any scouting, and there is no evidence that she did. On the 6th Oct. she proceeded from Wilhelmshaven to Schellinghorn roads, at the mouth of the Weser River, and at 11 a.m. of that day, whilst she was on her passage down the river, a German torpedo-boat, S 116, was sunk by a British submarine in the mouth of the Ems. The Ophelia arrived at Schellinghorn roads about noon, and at 8 30 p.m. received orders to steam at once to the mouth of the Ems. There is considerable mystery as to the orders received on this evening and the next morning. Captain Pfeiffer "thinks" that they were received by Morse code from the Schellinghorn signal station. He also "thinks that it was also said that S 116 had been sunk, but he cannot say for certain, and he thinks that it was even mentioned that there were nine survivors, or something of that kind." He is, however, quite certain that he never was given any statement as to the place where the torpedo-boat was sunk, except that it was at the mouth of the Ems, and equally certain that he never asked anyone where the spot was, and did not know it on the 8th. On receipt of the order at 8 30 p.m. on the 6th the Ophelia got her anchor and proceeded to sea, having taken a pilot on board, from whom, of course, it is possible that Captain Pfeiffer got some of the information of which he cannot recollect the source. On passing the German warship Beowulf, which apparently was acting as guardship somewhere to the west of the entrance to the Weser, she received orders to return. This was a verbal order, and the captain's memory is again at fault as to the particulars of it. In the log the entry is "Received counter-orders, steamed back." The captain "thinks" that the reason of this order, either stated or conjectured, was that navigation was dangerous at night, which when lights were extinguished and buoys removed was probably the case; but if there had been a reasonable prospect or real idea of saving life the risk, one would think, would have been run. On the following morning, about 9.30, orders were received again from Schellinghorn signal station to proceed "to the place of the accident." These orders are not entered in the log, although both the orders of the previous evening are, and they are stated only on the recollection of the captain. He does not appear surprised at receiving orders to go to a place he did not know, and again he asked no questions.

They weighed anchor at 10 a.m. and got off the Eastern Ems buoy at 5.40 p.m. They apparently anchored outside of Borkum to wait for a pilot, and having taken one on board at 7.30 p.m., proceeded and came to anchor for the night in the Ems, somewhere off Borkum, at 8.30 p.m. There were some discussions as to the place of anchorage, but it does not seem very material. There was no information obtained from the shore except such as may have been obtained from the local pilot, and Captain Pfeiffer does not say that he asked for any information from him as to the place of the accident, and does not say that the pilot, who either remained on board or came on board again to take them out on the morning of the 8th, knew it.

It seems very odd that no inquiry should be made for the information which would appear so necessary, and which, it is said, was never given, and it is impossible to avoid a suspicion in the absence of any reliable record of the signals received, that there were some directions given as to what was to be done which were of a nature that it is not desirable to disclose.

At 6.50 on the morning of the 8th Oct. the Ophelia got her anchor and, to use the words recorded in her log, "Steamed under directions of the pilot out of the Ems by land and sea marks on the search for a sunken torpedo-boat." The movements of the Ophelia on that day were the subject of much controversy, both in the court below and on the argument of the appeal. Indeed, the counsel for the appellant devoted a large part of his argument to the events of that day, and contended strongly that the President was wrong in the view he took of these events, and in his finding as to the speed of the Ophelia, which was material in its bearing on the events of the 8th Oct. and possibly on the credibility of the German witnesses, who all swore most positively that the Ophelia was incapable of going faster than about 9½ knots.

A British submarine was on that day on patrol duty off the mouth of the Ems, and her commanding officer, Lieutenant-Commander Moncreiffe, makes an affidavit as to what he observed, which he thought so suspicious that he reported it at the first opportunity to his superior officer. This affidavit was sworn before Commander Moncreiffe had any information as to the German version of the events of the day, except by seeing a copy of the Ophelia's log. The affidavit of Captain Pfeiffer verifying the claim makes no mention of the 8th Oct. Commander Moncreiffe, in reference to the entry in the log quoted above, says that he was quite certain that the Ophelia was not searching for a sunken torpedo-boat or any sunken vessel, and that, of course, is absolutely true. It is clear from the German evidence, as well as from Commander Moncreiffe's own observations, that she was not sweeping the bottom to locate the position of the sunken wreck, and the entry in the log is, taking it literally, clearly untrue; but it would, perhaps, be unfair to take the words so literally and not to assume that the words used refer to a search for floating wreckage, survivors, and corpses from the sunken vessel, rather than to a search for the wreck itself at the bottom of the sea. The result, however, is that Commander Moncreiffe has not dealt with the story now told by the German witnesses, on this and on some other points. No notice to cross-examine him on his affidavit having been given, the Crown did not think it necessary to call the witness away from his naval duties, and he was not in attendance at the trial, otherwise he might have cleared up, one way or the other, several of the matters which have been the subject of much argument.

His account of the matter shortly is that about 9.15 English time, by his clock (which he does not vouch as quite accurate), he saw to the south-east the smoke of a vessel, which afterwards proved to be the Ophelia, coming from the Huibert Gat (the southernmost of the three passages into the Ems between the shoals) and proceeding in a westerly direction. He proceeded in a southerly direction, and at 9.28, when in latitude 53° 45′ and longitude 5° 41′ E., he sighted the masts and funnel of the vessel, which had then altered her course "to the northward." Comparing this with the account of the Ophelia, she started at 6.50 German time, or 6.50 English time, and went out of the Huibert Gat. On the way out she passed close to the German torpedo-boat No. 119, the commanding officer of which was called as a witness at the trial, he being then a prisoner of war. The Ophelia made no inquiry of that torpedo-boat as to the place of the accident, and received no information on the point. At 9.30 German time (8.30 English) she sighted an English submarine to the north or north-west, "about eleven miles off Schiermonnikoog," according to her deck log. The deck log gives no courses, which, however, can be accounted for if she was at first following a channel and afterwards zigzagging on a search; but as the engine-room log records running full speed ahead from 7 to 10 a.m. (6 to 9 English time), she would, if running on anything like a straight course, have been well outside the Huibert Gat, and at least as far to the westward as the place where she is described by Commander Moncreiffe as being at 9.15 and 9.28 English time. She might even have done some zigzagging, and still have been as far out as that. The Ophelia's engine log records that between 10.10 and 10.28 she twice stopped, went full speed astern, and then ahead again. These would be the manœuvres of a steamer picking up a boat or anything floating, and Captain Pfeiffer at first explained them by saying he picked up a pilot, but afterwards corrected this, and said that he did that before coming out of the Ems, so it could not have been after ten o'clock. Pfeiffer also said that at some time, which, however, he puts as happening on the return journey, while searching on this day they sighted a floating object, which might have been wreckage, but turned out to be a fisherman's basket. This cannot be the explanation of the manœuvres between 10 a.m. and half-past. Whatever those manœuvres were, they were not observed by Commander Moncreiffe, the vessel being hull down when they began; but the time when they ended and when the Ophelia went full speed ahead again corresponds with the time (9.28 English, 10.28 German) when Commander Moncreiffe made out the two masts and funnel of the Ophelia, and saw that she had altered her course to the northward," which would not, of course, necessarily mean that she was heading due north. So far there is little, if any, contradiction, and nothing making it clear that the story of the Ophelia taking zigzag courses in order to search was untrue. At 9.45 Commander Moncreiffe speaks of another alteration of the Ophelia's course, and he then made out she was painted as a hospital ship. At ten, he says, she evidently made out his presence and "hoisted" her Red Cross flag. Later on he said that she "hauled down" that flag. If that means that the commander actually had his glasses to his eyes and saw the flag actually going up or coming down it is significant, although not quite easy to say why she should do it; but if it only means that he saw the flag flying and then shortly afterwards failed to see it when he looked for it and thought it was hauled down, it means very little. A steamer's flags in a moderate wind will not fly out when she is going with the wind. It happens that at the time he says the flag was hoisted the Ophelia was heading north-west and then north, and on either course, the wind being W.N.W., the flag would fly out well, and when he says it was hauled down she was heading very nearly east down wind, and he was very nearly astern of her and to windward, and would not be very likely to see her flag. It is unfortunate that the commander could not be called to clear up the doubts which arise on his affidavit made under the circumstances it was. The next thing stated by the commander is that after standing to the northward for five minutes from 10 to 10.5 the Ophelia altered her course to east, and at 10.18 was steering S. 85 degrees E. true (that is, very nearly E.), and being right ahead of him on the same course he could at this time speak with absolute accuracy as to the course she was steering, whereas before he could only do so approximately.

The log of the Ophelia records that at eleven o'clock (ten o'clock English time) she steered back up the Ems. She went up the Western Ems Channel, and S. 85 degrees E. true would be a course which would take her up that channel. There is, therefore, a remarkable coincidence here. Although the German log is very meagre and possibly not very reliable, this entry must have been written in without the writer knowing Commander Moncreiffe's story. According to the plotting on the chart of the course of the two vessels given to the board on behalf of the Crown, after correction of an obvious error in the first plotting, the Ophelia, when at ten o'clock English and eleven o'clock German time, she turned to the east, was a long way north of the entrance to the Western Ems Channel, and after standing in that direction for something like three-quarters of an hour had to come to the southward to make the entrance. This depends on the accuracy of the plotting; and that further depends upon the exact correctness of the courses of the Ophelia as estimated from the submarine. It is remarkable that the affidavit, in rather curious language, states that at ten o'clock the Ophelia was "in a position which would be accurately described as near Schiermonnikoog." If she was at the position plotted she would be somewhere about eighteen miles from Schiermonnikoog, which could hardly in any sense be called near; whereas if she was near the Western Ems Buoy, and about to proceed up the Western Ems Channel, she would only be about eight miles from Schiermonnikoog; and if, as is more probable, she was to the westward of the position of that buoy, but at a point from which the Borkum Island Lighthouse bore anywhere near S. 85 degrees E. (true), she would be a very great deal nearer to Schiermonnikoog than if at the plotted position, and if steering that course from such a point she would get to the entrance to the Western Ems Channel and a long way up it without having to alter the course. This rather suggests that the plotting cannot be right. At this point the question of the speed which the Ophelia was capable of going becomes material. Commander Moncreiffe says that she was obviously running away from him, and appeared to have increased her speed by two to three knots, and that finding he could not "overtake" her he gave up the chase. He made no signal for her to stop. He was going eleven knots. She was shortly before this four and a half to five miles away from him, and, putting it at only four miles, it would have taken him two hours to catch her if she was only going nine knots (her admitted speed) to his eleven, and by that time, if she was going where she says, both would have been near Borkum, or beyond it, and he would have been in a trap, with the difficulty a submarine has in diving in shallow water or among shoals. If, however, both were considerably to the northward, he would have had plenty of sea room, and if going faster than she was would of course have caught her. It is suggested that in saying he could not "overtake" her he merely meant that she would have got into shelter before he could do so, and that, as to running away, the Ophelia was, it is true, going straight away from the submarine, but was on her proper course home. Why, however, she should have started for home when she did with plenty of daylight left, and without having searched all the channels into the Ems, is quite unexplained.

The President expressed the opinion that the Ophelia must be able to go more than nine knots, because it appeared by her log of the 5th Aug. that she had done so when escaping from England at the outbreak of the war. According to the readings of the patent log, on that day, as entered in the log book, she undoubtedly in some hours did more; but it has been pointed out on the argument of the appeal that there are obvious inconsistencies in the readings for that day, and that there must be some mistake. On the other hand, the Attorney-General produces the figures from the log of other voyages of the Ophelia when she was a German trading vessel, which, if correct, show that she then constantly averaged eleven knots. The account of the German witnesses on this matter is peculiar, as most vessels can at a pinch do more than their usual so-called maximum. On the whole, it certainly seems probable that she can go faster than her witnesses swear to, and the experienced officer who thought she was running away was probably in the right on such a point. Certainly the movements of the Ophelia on the 8th Oct. are most suspicious. The evidence shows that at that time there was in the Ems the flotilla of German torpedo-boats which a few days afterwards made a dash out of the Ems on some unknown destination and which were then intercepted by a British squadron, pursued in a north-easterly direction, and sunk on the 17th Oct. near the spot where the Ophelia afterwards appeared again. Probably this flotilla was on the 8th Oct. looking out for an opportunity to make this dash, and if the German naval authorities were unscrupulous enough it would have been very useful to them to use the Ophelia in order to ascertain whether the British submarines were still off the mouth of the Ems, rather than to have to send out one of the torpedo-boats to scout when she might have met with the fate of S 116. It is also possible that the Ophelia may have been trying to tempt the submarine into a trap. But the question is whether there is proof of this, or merely suspicion. Having regard to the fact that a search by a hospital ship for corpses of sailors drowned by the sinking of their ship would be a legitimate operation for such a ship, even after a search for survivors had become practically hopeless, and that such a search, if made four tides after the disaster, must be made over rather a wide area and would be made at a fair speed, with men on the look-out for floating objects; and having regard to the matters which appear somewhat ambiguous in Commander Moncreiffe's affidavit, their Lordships would probably hesitate to find it proved that the Ophelia was scouting on the 8th if there was no other case proved against her; but when subsequent events are considered there is much more to show her to be a scout.

After anchoring on the 8th Captain Pfeiffer landed at Borkum and sent a telegram, a copy of which was not produced, and which, he says, was only to ask for orders. In the course of that night he got, by Morse signal, orders to go to Hamburg to clean boilers. They did go to Hamburg, and remained about five days; the boilers are said to have been cleaned, and the masts were then lengthened, and the signalling equipment altered as already mentioned. There is no entry in the log of the cleaning of the boilers or of the orders to do it, and it looks rather as if the real object of the visit to Hamburg were to have the signalling equipment improved. They left Hamburg on the 15th and, after stopping a night at the mouth of the Elbe, arrived at Heligoland on the 16th. On the evening of the 17th (at 7 p.m.) they are said to have received an order by wireless telegraphy. When the ship was captured on the 18th there was produced what purported to be the original copy of this message as taken down by the operator. That original was produced on the hearing before the President and on the argument of the appeal, and a translation is at p. 12 of the record. The original was on a form which has on it the three words, "open," "sealed," "decoded," for the purpose. apparently, of the inappropriate words being struck through. On the copy produced, the words "open" and "decoded" are struck through, "sealed" being left, and this was in accordance with the evidence that this message came in the second German code known as "H V B." This code was used by non-combatant Government ships. Warships had another secret code for use between themselves, but they also had copies of the "H V B" code in order to communicate with auxiliary ships. Wireless messages to the Ophelia were taken down on a pad, and, obviously, when in code they must be taken down as they come and be afterwards translated or decoded. They could not, therefore, be taken down when heard on the form produced. The operator Grau was called as a witness and explained that he did not khow the code without the book. There were also on the form printed words with spaces for the time and date to be filled in, and this was done on the message of the 17th. The message of the 17th, which there is no reason to suppose was not genuine, reads "Go at once to the Haaks Lightship. Further instructions to follow." At the trial evidence was given both by Pfeiffer and Grau that a book for entering wireless signals in was kept; that signals which had been sent by the Ophelia on ordinary ship's matters when at Kiel were entered in it. In the preliminary affidavit sworn by Pfeiffer on the 13th Feb. 1915 he had said that "a separate log for wireless messages was intended to be kept, but had not, in fact, been opened at the time of capture, as the messages were so few." The accounts of the witnesses as to the books which were kept were by no means clear and consistent, and whatever it was that they kept, it was thrown overboard, as will hereafter appear.

On the 17th Oct., the day when the message was received by the Ophelia at 7 p.m., the four German torpedo-boats which were in the Ems on the 8th Oct. were sunk by a British squadron between 2.30 p.m. and 4.30 p.m. Greenwich time (3.30 p.m. and 5.30 p.m. German time) within a radius of six miles from latitude 53° 7′ N. and longitude 3° 40′ E. These torpedo-boats, when on their flight before the British squadron, no doubt sent wireless messages to Norddeich of their peril, and no doubt this was the reason for the wireless message to the Ophelia; but the German authorities could hardly have known the particulars of the disaster, and certainly not the exact place of the sinking of their boats when the message was sent off. The Haaks Light-vessel's situation is 52° 57′ 8″ N. and 4° 18′ 3″ E., and was therefore a suitable point to direct the Ophelia to go to, and doubtless it was intended to send her further instructions whilst she was on her way there. She got under way at 7·30 and proceeded along the coast towards the position where the Haaks Lightship, which of course had been removed, should have been. The deck log had not been written up at the time of her capture, but we have the loose sheets torn out of the rough log and also translations of them. The figures on the originals are almost undecipherable. The track of the vessel as indicated by the entries on the rough log has been plotted out on the chart handed up, and if this plotting is correctly done it shows that the Ophelia did not after noon of the 18th steer straight for the Haaks Lightship, but considerably to the west of it—that is to say, very nearly towards the place of the engagement. A British squadron was at midday of the 18th approaching the place of the engagement of the previous day. At 1.20 p.m., James Alexander Cox, the wireless operator on H.M.S. Lawford, one of this squadron, heard a very loud signal in code on the 300-metre wave used by German ships. He did not hear the beginning of the message, but he took down and recorded what he did hear, and the letters are set out in his affidavit, p. 13 of the record. He found it was a message from a German ship using the call letters D O P to K A V which means Norddeich. At the end of the message he heard an answering signal from Norddeich apparently answering or indicating the receipt of the message he had taken down. At 1.30 he reported to his captain that a German ship in their vicinity was making code messages to Norddeich, and in a very few minutes the ship was sighted and proved to be the Ophelia. From the affidavit of the captain of the Lawford, it appears that the Lawford at 1.30 was in latitude 52° 56′ N. and longitude 3° 50′ E. The Ophelia when sighted was about six miles from the Lawford, and, from the affidavit of Lieutenant Peters, of the Meteor, another ship of the same British squadron, it appears that the Ophelia, when sighted, was to the eastward of the squadron and proceeding westward. The position of the Ophelia at the time she sent the message which was overheard by Cox must therefore have been approximately latitude 52° 56′ N. and longitude 4° E. The time when she sent that message was 1.20 p.m. English time, 2.20 p.m. German. It is most important to bear in mind this time and this approximate position.

The Ophelia was stopped and was boarded by Lieutenant Peters, who gives his account of what happened in an affidavit. He requested to see the ship's papers, and was shown the certificates of the ship being adapted for a hospital ship, and of her name having been sent in, which he states appeared to him to be in order, as in fact they were. He was told that the ship had been ordered to proceed to latitude 52° 51′ N. and longitude 3° 55′ E. and to look around. The lieutenant asked if these orders were in writing. He was told by Captain Pfeiffer that in the first instance he had been ordered to proceed to sea, but that, when outside the harbour, he had received the order as to the locality by wireless telegraphy. The harbour being Heligoland, which he had left on the previous night, this would be a curious way of saying that he received the orders about an hour and a half or less before the conversation. On demand, the paper purporting to be the wireless message was produced, and it was produced before their Lordships. It is on a similar form to the previous message, but the time and date of its receipt are not entered in the space provided for the purpose. The words "open," "sealed," "decoded," are all left unstruck through, but it was stated at the trial by the German witnesses that it was an open message. The captain told Lieutenant Peters that he did not know what he was to look for, but possibly it was dead bodies. He was unable at the trial to say for certain when he first heard of the sinking of the four German gunboats, but he thinks that it was Lieutenant Peters who told him of it. Nothing appears to have been said on Lieutenant Peters' visit as to any wireless message being sent from the ship, either asking for orders or any other message, and Lieutenant Peters did not tell Pfeiffer that any message had been overheard. The vagueness of the answers given and the circumstances generally excited suspicion, and the Ophelia was ordered to follow the Meteor to Yarmouth, which she did. In the affidavit of Pfeiffer of the 13th Feb., stating the grounds of the claim, he swore (par. 5): "To the best of my knowledge, the wireless telegraphy apparatus on board the said ship was used on two or three occasions only to receive urgent orders. No wireless message was sent from the ship, except one to Norddeich on the 18th Oct., asking for orders, which message was evidently heard by the British squadron. . . . A true record of all messages received or sent by this means during the voyage was kept on slips of paper, intended to be copied into a log, to which slips I crave leave to refer. A separate log for wireless messages was intended to be kept, but had not in fact been opened at the time of capture, as the messages were so few."

This is, of course, not in strict accordance with the facts as afterwards stated by him in evidence. In evidence Pfeiffer stated that he got to the place of the Haaks Lightship at noon of the 18th. That he then sent a wireless message to Norddeich, of which there was no copy, but which he recollected to be: "Please send on following message to Würtemberg. Am at Haaks Lightship. Request further instructions."

Being asked at what time this message was sent, he said: "It must have been about one o'clock, but it may have been half-past twelve or later."

Then he said that he received the reply, "Search 3° 55′ E. 52° 51′ N. and neighbourhood," and that he received that message about two o'clock. In cross-examination by the Attorney-General, when asked about the two messages to the ship, he said: "The latter [i.e., the message to the ship in code] was chronologically the earlier. It was on the 17th, while the other (i.e., the open one) was on the 18th at noon."

Then at question 435 he says that message from the ship was sent about one o'clock. Captain Ridder, the navigating captain of the Ophelia, in his evidence said that they got near the Haaks Lightship about one o'clock, and that they then had had no further instructions; that he did not know what messages were sent or received, but that he afterwards had instructions from Pfeiffer to go to a particular latitude and longitude, which he could not remember. Grau, the wireless operator of the Ophelia, deposed to the receipt and sending of the various messages on the 17th and 18th. As to the time of his sending the wireless message he said, "That was towards noon—about noon." This was wholly inconsistent with the case of the claimant, which was that the message overheard by Cox at 1.20 English time, 2.20 German, was that sent by the Ophelia asking for directions. An effort was made to explain Grau's evidence by suggesting that by noon he merely meant midday, and that this would not be inconsistent with 2.20 p.m., but that cannot be accepted.

At the trial the then Attorney-General assumed that the overheard message was, as the other side asserted, a message asking for further directions, but the learned President evidently was not satisfied about this. Question 437 shows this, and also his examination of the witness Grau (questions 1388 to 1392) as to there being in the code used four letters to every word. In a passage not printed in the record, but which was read by counsel from the shorthand notes of the Solicitor-General's reply, the President said:

"At the present moment the message which was intercepted has been rather assumed to be the message which was said to have been sent; but it might not have been, and I was trying to get from the witness this morning something which would enable me to say whether that was so or not."

In giving judgment the President no doubt proceeded on the assumption of the Attorney-General that the messages were the same. On the argument of the appeal it was contended that it was not open to the present Attorney-General to rely on the point that the overheard message could not be that which the German witnesses say that it was. Their Lordships are not of that opinion. If the claimant had been induced by the late Attorney-General's conceding this point to him to refrain from tendering evidence which he otherwise might have given, it might have been otherwise, but that was not so. The evidence was all given and it is upon that evidence that the point arises. If the judgment below had been against the Crown it might have been more doubtful whether an appeal could have been supported on a ground not taken, but it is clearly admissible to support a judgment upon a point not relied on below where the evidence which raised the point is all before the court.

As has been pointed out, not only was the time when the message was overheard quite inconsistent with the German story, but also the place where the vessel was when the overheard message was sent off was also inconsistent with it. The Haaks Lightship is situated (or would be if in her place) in latitude 52° 57′ 8″ N. and longitude 4° 18′ 3″. As already pointed out, the Ophelia when she sent off the message must have been approximately in latitude 52° 56′ N. and longitude 4° E. That is to say, if she ever was at the station of the Haaks Lightship, she had before asking for or getting the directions to go to 52° 51′ N. and 3° 55′ E. already by some prophetic instinct gone a considerable distance in the general direction she was afterwards ordered to go, and that without any knowledge of the disaster which had in fact taken place on the previous day. Further, the information which the President elicited from the witness Grau as to the character of the H V B code makes it difficult to see that the message as taken down by Cox could correspond with the message stated by Pfeiffer. He professes to swear to the exact words, but he might be clever enough to vary them in order to avoid giving a clue to the code, so perhaps this point is not a very strong one. Further, again, if the message to go to the named latitude and longitude which was not in code was really received after the message which was overheard by Cox, it is remarkable that that open message was not heard either by Cox or any other wireless operator of the squadron. True, to hear it the operator must have been listening on the German wave, but that they probably all did from time to time as Cox did. On this evidence it appears certain that the Ophelia must have received the directions where to go to a considerable time before 2.30 German time when Cox heard her message in code, and if so that message could not have been a request for directions. There is, therefore, very strong reason on the evidence before the court for distrusting the claimant's explanation of the message which the Ophelia was detected in sending. Apart from these reasons, the conduct of those in charge of the Ophelia was such as to disentitle them to credit, and it is on that ground that the judgment of the learned President mainly proceeds. There are three matters to be considered in their admitted conduct: First, the propriety of a hospital ship sending any message in a secret code; secondly, the neglect to keep proper records of the orders to and the doings of the ship; and, thirdly and most important, the destruction of such records as there were.

What the Hague Convention says as to wireless installation is that "the fact of the presence on board" ("le fait de la présence à bord") of a wireless installation shall not take away the protection, but it says nothing to justify sending messages—all of which when sent by a hospital-ship ought to be of innocent character—in a secret code. Counsel in arguing the appellant's case were able to put various cases where orders sent to a hospital ship might be such as it would be justifiable to give in a secret code to avoid their disclosure to the enemy, but they were unable to suggest any message which it would be right for a hospital ship to send and which could properly be concealed from the enemy. As to the message alleged by German witnesses to have been that sent by the Ophelia asking for instructions, there can be no possibility of suggesting any necessity for sending it in secret code. The message which is alleged to have been sent in answer to it was itself an open one. Their Lordships are quite unable to suggest any circumstances which could justify a hospital ship in sending a message by a secret code; but without laying down an absolute rule that the mere sending by a hospital ship of such a message would of itself forfeit her right to protection and subject her to capture and condemnation, it may certainly be said that if such messages are sent, a clear and satisfactory record of them must be kept, so that when the right of search is exercised there may be reasonable evidence to produce of the messages which have been sent and of their innocent character and of the necessity for sending them in a secret code. It would not be necessary in such a record to set out the identical words so as to give a key to the code in the event of the message having been overheard and taken down. The effect might be stated, and in a regularly kept and apparently full signal log such entries would be entitled to considerable credit.

It would, in their Lordships' opinion, be the duty of a hospital ship, even if not equipped with a wireless installation, and still more so when so equipped, to keep a full and correct log. It is a custom of the sea, very long established, that seagoing vessels shall keep logs. Originally, no doubt, logs would be required, as indeed they are now, for the navigation of the vessel, and when the weather prevented astronomical observations being taken, a ship would be ignorant of her position without a record of courses steered and estimated rates of sailing. But it has been the custom to make the log a full record of the voyage and all that happens on it. In some countries the log is legal evidence of the matters contained in it. In this country it is subject to the overriding rule of evidence that a man cannot (subject to some exceptions in case of death and the like) make evidence in his own favour by entries in his own books. But even in our Law Courts a well-kept log is in all disputes arising out of or in connection with the voyage treated as of very great weight; and between merchants and underwriters and others doing business connected with the sea, it is in practice treated as conclusive, unless by external or internal evidence it is falsified.

In Prize Courts in particular the log has always been treated as a most important document. Formerly, no doubt, all entries connected with the voyage were in one book, the log, but at the present time often more than one log is kept: a steamer has her engine log, because the entries in it can thus be made direct by the engineer instead of his having to give details to the mate for entering in the ship's log. So it has become fairly common in vessels which do much signalling to keep a separate signal log, the entries in which are made by the signalling officer. In the case of the Ophelia, the principal log, or deck log, is not very satisfactorily kept. It often omits courses and other things which would be useful to throw light on the employment of the ship. As incidentally remarked already, it occasionally contains an entry of a signal received, but omits to record the next signal said to have been received. This would be likely to occur if no separate signal log were kept. Having regard to the danger of improper signalling by hospital ships, a signal log should certainly be kept by them. As to what was done in the way of keeping a signal log by the Ophelia, the evidence is most confused and conflicting. Some of it has already been referred to.

As to the Morse signals, the witnesses say a book was kept, but no one knows much about it, and the signalmen who kept it are vouched, but they are not called. The only signalman called was Grau, the wireless operator, and he, after giving a good deal of confusing evidence, finally said that he knew nothing about the Morse signals. As to wireless messages, he said he did make entries of them in what he called the F. T. book ("Funken Telegraphie"), and that in that book he entered various quite unimportant messages which he sent on ship's business at Kiel. At question 1260 he distinctly told the President there were two books: one the F. T. book and another for the wireless news of events supposed to be happening circulated from Norddeich for the benefit of the world in general. This evidence as to the F. T. book was, of course, in contradiction of the affidavit of Pfeiffer already referred to. There seems, taking the evidence as a whole, the greatest uncertainty as to what books recording signals were really kept, but the one thing which is certain is, that any which were kept, except the news log, were thrown overboard when it was seen that the vessel was about to be searched. If nothing but innocent signals had been sent, the signal log was the very book of all others which should have been preserved. The result, therefore, is that the appellant has nothing to show to vouch his story that all signals sent (including the one so unnecessarily, according to his account of its purport, sent in secret code) were of an innocent character. Further, the absence of such evidence, if any ever existed, is caused by his own act.

This leads to the subject of what is technically called spoliation of documents, on which the President, rightly, as their Lordships think, laid much stress. The authorities on the subject are carefully reviewed in his judgment, and these authorities and others were quoted on the appeal by the appellant's counsel. In considering these authorities it is necessary to recollect that the procedure in the Prize Court has been very substantially altered by the new rules abolishing the preliminary hearing. The alterations in modes of doing business in modern times may have made this preliminary hearing not quite so useful as it was formerly, and some modification of procedure may have been desirable; but the total abolition of a preliminary hearing seems to their Lordships, as has been remarked during the argument of this and other cases before this board recently, to operate occasionally against the interests of the Crown. Certainly the procedure in the present case has given an advantage to the claimant which he would not have had under the old procedure.

In the cases as to spoliation of documents, the point has frequently arisen on the preliminary hearing on documents, and the question has been debated whether or not further proof should be allowed. This point cannot arise under the present procedure, and it may be that in some respects the old doctrine was rather technical. The substance of it, however, remains and is as forcible now as ever, and it is applicable not merely in prize cases, but to almost all kinds of disputes. If anyone by a deliberate act destroys a document which, according to what its contents may have been, would have told strongly either for him or against him, the strongest possible presumption arises that if it had been produced it would have told against him; and even if the document is destroyed by his own act, but under circumstances in which the intention to destroy evidence may fairly be considered rebutted, still he has to suffer. He is in the position that he is without corroboration which might have been expected in his case.

In the present case there are two separate destructions of documents: one the throwing overboard documents when the vessel was about to be searched, the other the destruction of the accounts relating to the stock and the consumption of signal lights. As to the first, the Attorney-General admits that the destruction of the code book to prevent it getting into enemy hands is at least excusable. It is, indeed, so obvious that that must at any rate be done that complaint could not be made of it. But Captain Pfeiffer naïvely admitted that, when throwing overboard documents to avoid their getting into enemy hands, he acted on the principle of throwing overboard too many rather than too few, and adds that the Morse signal book contained absolutely innocent messages, which could be read by anyone. That probably was so, but it may also have contained some which were not so innocent; and it is pretty obvious that when he threw it overboard he either knew it did, or was not sure that it did not.

The Morse signal book could not have disclosed or given any key to the wireless signal code, so there could be no reason for destroying it except the consciousness that as something wrong had in fact taken place, it might be disclosed by the book. As pointed out, a wireless signal log might have been kept in such a way as not to disclose the code or give any key to it. The destruction of the stock book of signal lights cannot be excused by any fear of disclosing a secret code. It is suggested that it was innocent because the guard on the ship was told it was being done, and that British officers had already examined it. British officers would not in the first instance examine minutely documents of that kind, but would assume that if wanted they could be looked over afterwards. Pfeiffer and the paymaster doubtless knew what the signal lights really were for, and hoped that the British, who up to that time had made no point about it, would not find it out, so they destroyed the book. Nothing that can be called a reason was given for doing so. Even if the books had become waste paper, why destroy them?

Their Lordships are of opinion that Captain Pfeiffer and the other witnesses have by their acts put themselves in such a position that their evidence cannot be relied on; that the evidence discloses facts of which no satisfactory explanations are or can be given; and that although on the Crown affidavit evidence some ambiguities have been pointed out which have not been cleared up by cross-examination, or re-examination, yet there are incriminatory matters in those affidavits to which no answer has been given. They are of opinion that the President was fully justified in finding that "the Ophelia was not constructed or adapted or used for the special and sole purpose of affording aid and relief to the wounded, sick, and shipwrecked, and that she was adapted and used as a signalling ship for military purposes." Their Lordships agree in that finding, which of course justifies the condemnation of the vessel as lawful prize. They will humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal should be dismissed, with costs.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Wednesday, April 5, 1916.

(Before SWINFEN EADY, PICKFORD, and BANKES, L.JJ.)

GROVES AND SONS v. WEBB AND KENWARD. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Contract—Indemnity — Warehouseman — Issue of clean warrants — Lighterage — Damage to cargo in possession of lighterman — Warehouseman's liability to purchasers under warrants—Right to indemnity.

In Nov. 1914 the defendants, who were grain merchants, had a cargo of wheat in the steamship G., discharging in the S. Dock, London. The plaintiffs, who were wharfingers, carrying on business in the port of London, agreed to store the wheat. A lighterman was employed to lighter the wheat, and the defendants requested the plaintiffs to issue clean warrants for the wheat, making them deliverable to the defendants or their assigns by indorsement, so that they might sell the wheat. The plaintiffs duly made out the warrants, and the defendants sold the wheat to W. and Co., who came to take delivery of the wheat towards the end of Jan. 1915, when it was discovered that, owing to a leaky barge and exposure to the weather, some of the wheat was unsound, having become damaged before the delivery to the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs in consequence became liable on their warrants in damages to W. and Co. Scrutton, J. found that the lighterman was the agent of the defendants. In an action by the plaintiffs against the defendants claiming an indemnity:

Held, that the plaintiffs having issued the warrants at the request of the defendants, there was an implied contract by the defendants to indemnify the plaintiffs for the loss, and the defendants were therefore liable.

Decision of Scrutton, J. affirmed.

APPEAL from a judgment of Scrutton, J. in the commercial list.

The plaintiffs brought an action against the defendants claiming to recover 107*l.* under an implied undertaking by the defendants to indemnify the plaintiffs.

The following facts are taken from the judgment of Scrutton, J.: The plaintiffs are wharfingers and granary keepers in the Port of London. The defendants had some wheat coming by the steamship Glenstrae. The wheat was lightered from the ship to the wharf by a lighter-man named Fletcher. When not more than a small portion of it had arrived the defendants asked the plaintiffs to issue warrants which the defendants could use for the purpose of selling the wheat, and the plaintiffs, having received a letter from Fletcher, stating that he held the wheat to their order, and a letter from the defendants addressed to Fletcher ordering Fletcher to deliver to the plaintiffs, issued in November the warrants, which the defendants sold to W. P. Wood and Co. When in January W. P. Wood and Co. came to take delivery, it was found that owing to one of the barges being leaky and apparently owing also to exposure to the weather, some of the grain was damaged. Thereupon the plaintiffs, having issued clean warrants, without any qualification as to damage, to W. P. Wood and Company, were called upon to pay, and did pay, 107*l.* for the damage. The damaged wheat was dried and sold, the value realised was credited, and the difference between the amount paid and the value realised was claimed.

Scrutton, J. found in the course of his judgment that as between the plaintiffs and the defendants, the plaintiffs declined to do any lighterage, and the defendants undertook to do the lighterage; that the defendants ordered the barges from Fletcher at 1s. 6*d.* a ton; that the defendants for their own purposes asked the plaintiffs for warrants, and that the plaintiffs having got both the defendants and Fletcher to agree to deliver to them issued the warrants; and that this did not amount to the plaintiffs taking over the liability which they had previously refused, but only to the plaintiffs issuing for the defendants' benefit certain warrants in order that the defendants might sell the goods.

SCRUTTON, J. (after finding the facts).—Those being the facts, what is the legal position? It is a matter of some difficulty. That is quite obvious to anyone who reads the judgments in the case of Kruger and Co. Limited v. Moel Tryvan Ship Company Limited (97 L. T. Rep. 143; 10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 465; (1907) A. C. 272). There there was a charter under which charterers were to sign bills of lading as presented to them, and they were not to be liable for negligence. It took place in Rangoon. The charterers presented bills of lading containing a clause: "Freight and all other conditions as per charter-party," and apparently both the captain and the charterers were under the impression that that meant what it said, and that all the conditions of the charter-party were not put into the bill of lading, not knowing that some fifty years before the opposite had been decided by the House or Lords and that it had been so stated in all the commercial text books since 1864 when the principle was determined. The result was that there was a bill of lading which, when indorsed to a third party, made the ship liable for negligence, although by the charter they were not liable for negligence. The ship was lost through negligence, the shipowners had to pay the whole value of the cargo to the owners of the goods, the holders of the bill of lading, and they then claimed to recover from the charterers in various ways as a breach of the charter, and under an implied indemnity to be given if they signed the bills of lading presented by the charterers. They succeeded in all the courts, but they succeeded on a variety of grounds and with considerable contradiction in the judgments. They succeeded before Phillimore, J. (10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 310; 95 L. T. Rep. 614; (1906) 2 K. B. 792) on the ground of implied indemnity; they succeeded in the Court of Appeal, according to the judgment of Lord Gorrell, because presenting the bills of lading in that form was a breach of the charter, and Lord Gorrell said he thought they might have succeeded on an implied indemnity, but he was not going to decide that. Farwell, L.J. said they had succeeded on breach of the charter, but could not have succeeded on an implied indemnity for reasons which he pointed out. Buckley, L.J. said they had succeeded on a breach of the charter, and could have succeeded on implied indemnity for reasons which he pointed out. The matter then went to the House of Lords, who said they certainly could succeed for breach of the charter, but they did not agree with a number of the things which the Court of Appeal had said, but they did not say which parts of the Court of Appeal judgments they disagreed with. I think as I read the judgments, and as I thought at the time, they were mainly disagreeing with the suggestion that it might be a ministerial act on the part of the captain in signing bills of lading, as he was bound to sign whatever bill of lading was presented. I think that was, from the indications in the House of Lords' judgments, what they were disagreeing with. This case is not quite the same as that, because there is no express agreement between the plaintiffs and the defendants here as to liability for lighterage. Perhaps that is a technical way of putting it, because it can be said the plaintiffs had not agreed to do the lighterage and the defendants had, and it is not suggested—as of course it was in Kruger v. Moel Tryvan Ship Company (10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 465; 97 L. T. Rep. 143; (1907) A. C. 276)—that these warrants were signed in any purported following out of a previous contract made, unless it can be said that they are signed because of the contract to warehouse, and it is an implied duty of the warehouseman to issue warrants. I did not hear any suggestion on that point as to whether it was the duty of a wharfinger to issue warrants if he was asked.

The first question in controversy between the parties was: Who is liable for the lightering apart from the warrants? I have decided that, and have held that the defendants are liable for the lightering apart from the warrants. Then it appears to me that it is possible, although I am not sure that it is the soundest way of putting it, to adopt the same line as the House of Lords adopted in the Moel Tryvan case, and to say, as was the second line of the argument put forward by the plaintiffs, "By the contractual relations between you, we, the plaintiffs, were not liable for lighterage or for damage in lighters, but you have requested us to do something which has made us liable, you have requested us entirely for your own purposes and without any benefit to us, and from that it follows that is a breach or alteration of the contractual relations between us, and you must pay." I am not sure that that is a sound view, because although it is an alteration of the contractual relations, it is difficult to say it is a breach of the contractual relations between the two parties. Then I do not think that any liability of the defendants in this case can be put upon the lines of Sheffield Corporation v. Barclay (93 L. T. Rep. 83; (1905) A. C. 397), for the reason that that case has been limited to cases where the person claiming the indemnity has only to do a ministerial duty on request, and, having done the ministerial duty on request, suffers damage and claims an implied indemnity from the person who requested him. I do not think that issuing warrants here was a ministerial duty. The plaintiffs certainly were not bound to issue warrants for goods which had not come into their custody, and I do not think it can be put upon the lines of the Sheffield Corporation v. Barclay (sup.).

The other branch of indemnity to which one is always referred is the principle laid down by the Court of Appeal in Birmingham and District Land Company v. London and North-Western Railway Company (55 L. T. Rep. 699; 34 Ch. Div. 261), and the passages I am reading are at pp. 272 and 274 of 34 Ch. Div. In that case Cotton, L.J. said: "If A. requests B. to do a thing for him, and B. in consequence of his doing that act is subject to some liability or loss, then in consequence of the request to do the act the law implies a contract by A. to indemnify B. from the consequences of his doing it." Bowen, L.J. put it in this way: "In nine cases out of ten a right to indemnity, if it exists at all as such, must be created either by express contract or by implied contract—by express contract if it is given in terms by the contract between the two parties; by implied contract if the true inference to be drawn from the facts is that the parties intended such indemnity, even if they did not express themselves to that effect, or if there is a state of circumstances to which the law attaches a legal or equitable duty to indemnify, there being many cases in which a remedy is given upon an assumed promise by a person to do what, under the circumstances, he ought to do." To see whether there is such an implied indemnity here, I can quite appreciate that you do not imply terms unless there is any business necessity for doing it. As between A. and B, A. has nothing to do with goods in lighters; I have found that to be the fact. But thereupon B., for his own purposes, says to A: "To enable me to sell these goods, do something which will make you liable for the goods in the lighters," and A. assents. Now, in my view, that comes within the principle laid down in the Birmingham and District Land Company's case. It is a case in which an indemnity can be implied from the request. It follows, therefore, that in my view the plaintiffs' claim in this case succeeds, and there must be judgment for the amount claimed less the amount already paid, with the usual consequences as to costs.

The defendants appealed.

T. W. H. Inskip, K.C., and E. A. Harney for the defendants.—There was no implied contract that the defendants would indemnify the plaintiffs. Fletcher lightered on behalf of the plaintiffs, and not the defendants. All the defendants did was to put Fletcher in touch with the plaintiffs. The request for the warrants was merely a request to the plaintiffs to do what was in the ordinary course of business. The plaintiffs charged rent as if the wheat were in their warehouse, and they insured it. The deposit of the goods was not controlled by the defendants, who did not know whether they had been transferred to the warehouse. The plaintiffs had the option of giving the warrants and taking the responsibility on themselves, and this they did. The defendants never gave any assurance or made any representation that would lead to an implied undertaking to indemnify. They referred to Sheffield Corporation v. Barclay, 93 L. T. Rep. 83; (1905) A. C. 392;

Birmingham and District Land Company v. London and North-Western Railway Company, 55 L. T. Rep. 699; 34 Ch. Div. 261;
Childers v. Wooller, 2 E. & E. 288.

J. B. Matthews, K.C. and J. G. Trapnell for the plaintiffs.—On the evidence Fletcher lightered for the defendants, and their remedy for negligence is against him. The plaintiffs here were under no liability as long as the goods remained in the lighters. The plaintiffs at the request of the defendants, and merely to oblige the defendants, in order to enable them to sell the wheat, issued warrants for goods which were not in their possession, and the lightering of which they had refused, and having rendered themselves thereby liable in damages to the purchasers, have a right to be indemnified by the defendants. They referred to

T. W. H. Inskip, K.C., in reply.

April 5.—SWINFEN EADY, L.J.—This is an appeal by the defendants, Messrs. Webb and Kenward Limited, from the judgment of Scrutton, J. at the trial without a jury in Middlesex. The action is brought by Thomas Groves and Sons, plaintiffs, against Webb and Kenward Limited, defendants, and the plaintiffs claim to have it determined that defendants were liable to indemnify the plaintiffs in respect of a liability incurred by them, the plaintiffs, in connection with the landing and delivery of a parcel of wheat ex the steamship Glenstrae, in Nov. 1914. The learned judge who tried the action found that the defendants were liable to indemnify the plaintiffs, and he gave judgment for the plaintiffs for the amount in dispute, which was, I think, 106*l.* and a few shillings, and it is from that judgment that the defendants appeal.

The circumstances out of which the action arose were these: In Nov. 1914 the defendants, Webb and Kenward Limited, were expecting a consignment of wheat, and they mentioned it to the plaintiffs, who carry on business at the Granaries and Sufferance Wharves at Rotherhithe and Bermondsey. They referred to the plaintiffs, saying they were carrying some 5000 quarters of wheat, and would the plaintiffs be able to land and warehouse that? There was a general discussion. Nothing came of it. The wheat had not arrived.

Subsequently the wheat arrived, and on the arrival of the wheat the defendants wished the plaintiffs to deal with about 2000 quarters. I do not know whether the other 3000 quarters arrived at the defendants', or whether they made arrangements elsewhere for dealing with it. Two thousand quarters were all that were mentioned by the defendants to the plaintiffs.

Mr. Groom, representing the plaintiffs, said that between five and six o'clock in the evening he was rung up on the telephone by Mr. Falby, who is a grain superintendent and had been employed for many years by the defendants to assist them in receiving and discharging cargoes of wheat, to examine them, and generally superintend the discharge of the cargoes—that is Falby's business. He acts for the defendants and for other people as well. In respect of this transaction he was acting for the defendants, and he rang up plaintiffs on the telephone Of course, Falby was known to the plaintiffs. I think Groom said he had known Falby for forty years. So that the parties were dealing through him, the defendants employing him and the plaintiffs knowing him. He was then in Webb and Kenward's office, and he asked plaintiffs if they would undertake to land the wheat ex Glenstrae on the usual terms. The answer was they would not undertake it at all; they were so full of Government work they could do nothing at all. Groom's evidence was:

> I said, when he asked me the reason and all the rest of it, that we were so full of Government work and that the barges—that was the principal objection—were so exceedingly scarce that we could not undertake to do any more work from the ship to the wharf. He then said, "If I can arrange to provide craft, can you land wheat in your warehouse?" I said, "So far as the room is concerned, we have room, and shall be able to put in the wheat some day, but I will not promise any definite day for landing it." I said, "I will do the best I can, but I cannot be bound to any particular day or date." He then said, "If I can arrange this lighterage, I will ring you up in a few minutes again."

He, Groom, was asked "What was the reason that you were not able to arrange for the unloading of the lighters within any definite or assignable date?" And his answer was, "Because this Government work that we were doing was very important and we were pressed." Again he was asked, "Do you mean your wharfage frontage was full and occupied?" and the answer was, "Yes, with other craft. The berths at our wharves were already occupied, and not only that but they kept coming on to us." Q. "It was occupied continuously by other matters?"—A. "Yes, continuously." Q. "To which preference had to be given?"—A. "Yes."

Now, upon that Falby got into communication with a man named Fletcher, a lighterman. Fletcher was prepared to undertake the discharge, he said, of about 1800 quarters of wheat. As a matter of fact, the actual quantity that is in dispute in these proceedings is a little under that. It is 1630 quarters. But when Fletcher, the lighterman, was approached, he said he could obtain barges for about 1800 quarters. There is a dispute between the parties with regard to the price to be paid to Fletcher, and who was to pay it, and the way it was to be paid. The story told by Groom is this: "I was to have nothing to do with the lighterage. Defendants were to arrange it. But then they asked me what we (the plaintiffs) would allow off our lump sum charge of 2*s.* 9*d.*" Now, the lump sum charge of 2*s.* 9*d.* is an inclusive charge made in respect of landing, delivering, weighing, and warehousing for, I think, the first fortnight; and it is a charge of 2*s.* 9*d.* Groom said: "We will allow off that lump sum charge for lightering, which we are not to do—we will allow 1*s.*" And the plaintiffs added this: "According to an arrangement with the Granary Keepers' Association, we are under a penalty of 100*l.* not to allow more than 1*s.*"

In the judgment of the learned judge below that 1*s.* is taken into account, and the plaintiffs have paid that 1*s.* In other words, it is deducted from the sum for which judgment has been given, and is taken into account in arriving at the judgment. The plaintiffs admit liability to make a deduction of 1*s.* in respect of lighterage. So that plaintiffs' story is that they were to allow 1*s.* in respect of lighterage, and that the defendants were to undertake the burden of lighterage, to obtain barges, to obtain lightermen to lighter the goods from the ship to the Sufferance Wharf, and the defendants were to pay them.

The defendants' story is quite different. The defendants' story is: True it is that Falby on our behalf found Fletcher, who in turn found four barges to lighter goods, but that is all we were to do. We simply put Fletcher into communication with the plaintiffs and everything else was to be arranged by the plaintiffs. All we did was to find a man named Fletcher, who found barges, and to give the plaintiffs Fletcher's telephone number and let them do the rest. True it is Fletcher said he would not lighter at 1*s.* 4*d.*, which was the ordinary charge; that he would want 2*d.* more. True it is that subsequently, upon a communication from the plaintiffs, we agreed to pay the extra 2*d*, that in other words, the plaintiffs were to pay 1*s.* 4*d.* for lightering and defendants were to find the extra 2*d.* That is the defendants' story.

Having regard to the evidence given and to the documents, I should draw the same conclusion as the judge drew from the evidence which was adduced before him, and, furthermore, he speaks of the conflict of evidence there was. He refers to the conflict as being not unusual in cases of lighterage, and arrives at the conclusion that the truth is on this occasion on the plaintiffs' side. He found that the plaintiffs' story is in substance the true one, that the defendants were to find the lighterage and pay the lightermen, and all the plaintiffs were to do was to contribute 1*s.* towards the cost to the defendants.

The judge says: "I find that the truth is this, so far as I can find it out of this inconsistent evidence, that as between the plaintiffs and the defendants, the plaintiffs declined to do any lighterage, and the defendants undertook to do it. I find, secondly, that the defendants ordered the barges from Fletcher at 1*s.* 6*d.*" And then he goes on to deal with another matter. So that so far as the conflict of evidence is concerned the judge comes to the conclusion that the plaintiffs' story is right; and that the contract for employing lighters was between the defendants and Fletcher and not with the plaintiffs; the only concern of the plaintiffs was to allow the abatement of 1s. Thereupon the wheat in question was delivered ex this steamship to Fletcher's barges and it was laden on four barges. The Marian carried a small quantity, 135 quarters, which was only about a quarter of the capacity of the barge. The Percy took the bulk, 588 quarters. And the rest of the wheat was divided between two barges, the Minnie and the Spray. The next thing that happened was this. An order was given and lodged with the ship to deliver the wheat to Fletcher, and Fletcher, on the 17th Nov., wrote this letter to the plaintiffs:

Dear Sir,—Ex Glenstrae.—Please note that we hold to your orders 1630½ qrs. wheat at 62.

That is 62lb. to the bushel. And then he mentions the particular barges on which the wheat was loaded.

The next thing that happened is that defendants wanted warrants for the goods, and they applied to the plaintiffs to give warrants. The wheat was in barges, having been delivered over the side of the ship; and the position which the plaintiffs had indicated, the difficulty there was in discharging the barges, seems to have accurately described the position. Because the barges were discharged on these days: The first barge that had only 135 quarters was discharged on the 20th Nov.—a special effort was made to discharge that barge because she had only a small quantity of wheat compared with her capacity, and the barge was required. The next barge, the Percy, discharged on the 25th Nov. The other barges were not discharged for a long time afterwards; and, as I gather, there was no opportunity to discharge them, because the evidence was that the frontage was continuously occupied with Government craft, to which preference had to be given. The Minnie and the Spray did not discharge until the following January, one on the 9th Jan. and the other on the 19th Jan.

In the meantime those barges were, as we are told, not at the plaintiffs' wharf, but were detained in the dock until there was vacant space at the frontage for these barges to discharge.

Meantime the defendants, having asked for warrants, had sold the wheat.

Now the warrants were dated the 18th Nov., and were given by the defendants on the 19th Nov. When the plaintiffs were asked for warrants they wished to have something in writing from Fletcher to show that he held the wheat to the plaintiffs' order, so that they might consider that the wheat was under their control. Otherwise they would be giving warrants for wheat not only in their warehouse, but in respect of which they had no documents to show they were entitled to the wheat or would ever receive it.

The documents were two in number. One was a letter from Fletcher to Thos. Groves and Sons, showing that Fletcher held to plaintiffs' order 1630 quarters of wheat, and the other was an authority which Fletcher obtained from the defendants dated the 18th Nov., and in these words:

Dear Sir,—Please deliver the above 1630 quarters wheat ex s.s. Glenstrae to Messrs. Thomas Groves and Sons' Platform Wharf, and oblige.—Yours truly, WEBB and KENWARD.

So that the documents were first a letter from the defendants to Fletcher to deliver the wheat to Thos. Groves and Sons, the plaintiffs; and then a letter from Fletcher to Thos. Groves and Sons that they held the wheat to Thos. Groves and Sons' order.

In that way the plaintiffs obtained some documentary evidence that the wheat was under their control.

Thereupon warrants were issued dated the 18th Nov., and were handed over to the defendants on the 19th Nov.

Application for the warrants was not made to the plaintiffs personally, but to Smith, their manager or representative, and by Smith passed on to Groves, who gave evidence.

According to Smith's evidence, the defendants wanted the warrants as soon as possible. Groom was called, and he said the message that reached him was that the warrants were urgently required, and they were given at the date they were said to have been given, and for weeks and weeks afterwards the wheat that was damaged was not in their warehouse, but remained in the barges. And the question is whether and what implied undertaking to indemnify is to be inferred from the circumstances under which these warrants were given.

The warrants were certainly given. The applications for the warrants was made at a time when the defendants must in my judgment be taken to have known that the wheat was not in the warehouse, and was not likely to reach the warehouse for a considerable time, and not likely to be landed for some time—that is the effect of the conversation with the plaintiffs, and it turned out to be true in the events which have happened.

The defendants also required the warrants, as I think, for the purposes of sale—it was not absolutely essential, but it would be convenient to have the warrants for sale—because they did sell the wheat within a very few days of obtaining the warrants.

The warrants dated the 18th Nov. were handed to them on the 19th Nov., and they sold the wheat within nine days. On the 28th Nov. was the contract for sale. They indorsed the warrants, and delivered them to the purchaser, and the purchaser claimed possession of the wheat under the warrants.

It so happened that at the time the wheat was delivered, I think some time in January—part on the 14th and part on the 19th—when the wheat was claimed and delivered under the warrants part of it was damaged. It appears that one of the barges was leaky. Water leaked into the barge and damaged the wheat and, apparently, the wheat had not been sufficiently covered with tarpaulins to keep it from the rain, and rain had also damaged it. The consequence is that the plaintiffs having issued warrants in respect of wheat without any reference to damage—clean warrants—the purchasers were entitled to rely on the warrants as being clean warrants entitling them to wheat undamaged by fresh water; and then when the wheat came to be delivered there was damage for which the wharfingers were liable on their warrants. A sum of something over 100*l.*, which is the amount in dispute in this action, had to be paid by the plaintiffs to the holders of the warrants for damage, and it is in respect of that claim that the present action is brought.

It is said first that the defendants only asked for warrants in the ordinary course of business, and that being so there is no presumption that they were to indemnify the wharfinger in respect of any damage to the goods. In my judgment the application was not in the ordinary course of business. It was anticipating what would be the ordinary course of business. No doubt when the goods reach the warehouseman he should on demand issue warrants. But this was before they reached the warehouse, when all he had was a letter placing them under his control, when he had had no opportunity of examining them to see whether the wheat actually given into his custody was damaged or not.

Secondly, I think the true inference from the facts is that the defendants must have known, and certainly their agents, the lightermen, knew the wheat was still in the barges, and they had no reason to believe at this short interval of two days after the conversation that the wheat was in the warehouse. On the contrary, they had every reason to believe it was not, and if they had asked the lightermen employed by them they would have been told at once that it was not.

The learned judge, with regard to that part of the case, says: "I find next that the defendants, for their own purposes, asked Groves for warrants, and that Groves, having got both the defendants and Fletcher to agree to deliver to him, issued the warrants. In my view this did not disturb in any way the relations between the plaintiffs and the defendants as to lighterage; it did not amount to the plaintiffs taking over the liability for lighterage, which they previously refused to do; it did amount to the plaintiffs issuing, for the defendants' benefit, certain warrants in order that they might sell the goods which the plaintiffs, by reason of the documents they had got, thought they were safe in thinking would cover them."

Now the consequence of having obtained these clean warrants was that the defendants were able to sell this wheat as undamaged and to receive the full price of the wheat as undamaged wheat. For any damage due to the negligence of the lightermen the defendants would have a claim against the lightermen, and the result has been that the plaintiffs, who have not received the price of the wheat, the plaintiffs as warehousemen have had to pay for the damage caused to the wheat simply by reason of the fact that they issued clean warrants, while the defendants, who were the proprietors of the damaged wheat, who have a right of action against the lightermen, have received the full price of the wheat.

It is under these circumstances that the present action is brought. In my opinion the view the Judge took at the trial was the right one. The plaintiffs never accepted as between them and the defendants any liability in respect of damage occasioned by the lightermen. I think the case comes well within the principle of various cases that have been cited to us. I am not sure that it is not best expressed by Bowen, L.J. in Birmingham and District Land Company v. London and North-Western Railway Company (55 L. T. Rep. 699; 34 Ch. Div. 274). He first deals with the right to indemnity by express contract, and then he goes on to deal with the right to indemnity by implied contract. Thus: "By implied contract if the true inference to be drawn from the facts is that the parties intended such indemnity, even if they did not express themselves to that effect, or if there is a state of circumstances to which the law attaches a legal or equitable duty to indemnify, there being many cases in which a remedy is given upon an assumed promise by a person to do what under the circumstances he ought to do." Now, here the defendants asked the plaintiffs to issue warrants before they had an opportunity of examining the wheat. They did issue clean warrants, and it is, to my mind, obvious that under these circumstances for any damage to the wheat before it is actually in the custody of the plaintiffs, the defendants ought to indemnify the plaintiffs, they in turn having their right of action over against the lightermen by whose negligence the damage was caused.

Again, Lord Halsbury, in Sheffield Corporation v. Barclay (93 L. T. Rep. 83; (1905) A. C. 397), adopts as an accurate statement of the law the contention put forward by Mr. Cave, who was arguing for the plaintiff in Dugdale v. Lovering (32 L. T. Rep. 155; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 196): "It is a general principle of law when an act is done by one person at the request of another which act is not in itself manifestly tortious to the knowledge of the person doing it, and such act turns out to be injurious to the rights of a third party, the person doing it is entitled to an indemnity from him who requested that it should be done." That was the contention, and Lord Halsbury said: "The principle insisted upon by Mr. Cave in his argument quoted above has been undoubtedly sanctioned as part of the law by several old decisions, and I think the principle as enunciated is well established." What happened here is this. One person at the request of another, the plaintiffs at the request of the defendants, did an act—they issued warrants as clean warrants before the wheat was in their warehouse. It turns out to be injurious to the rights of third parties, that is to say, the purchasers of the wheat having purchased on the faith of the warrants, it turned out that wheat they obtained was not clean wheat but damaged wheat. They were injured thereby. The person doing that act is entitled to an indemnity from him who requested that it should be done. The defendants having requested that it should be done, the plaintiffs are entitled to an indemnity in respect of the loss and damage they incurred through liability to the third party, who acted on the assurance of their warrants.

Under these circumstances I am of opinion that on all grounds the judgment of Scrutton, J. was quite right. The liability, according to his judgment, falls where it ought honestly and in good conscience to fall, and where, in my opinion, it also falls legally. I think the appeal fails and should be dismissed.

PICKFORD, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

I do not intend to go through all the facts again. The first, and perhaps the most important question is, who employed the lighterman? Scrutton, J. has found, after hearing and considering all the evidence, that it was the defendants who employed him. I see no reason to differ. The conduct of both parties is not unnaturally inconsistent with the case they set up, but Scrutton, J. considered the evidence of the witnesses and the inconsistencies on either side. The defendants then employed the lighterman, so far as the evidence goes—the question whether the damage was occasioned by the default of the lighterman was not tried, of course; if that case is ever tried the evidence may turn out different, but if the lighterman was negligent the defendants would have a remedy against him. The plaintiffs, who did not employ the lighterman, and, in my opinion, never had privity established between them and him at any time, would have no remedy against him. The defendants obtained warrants from the plaintiffs which they used in this sale of wheat. I quite agree it would be possible to sell it without the warrants, but it is usual to obtain them, for it facilitates matters. They did obtain them, and they sold the wheat, and have received the whole proceeds without any deduction or any counterclaim for damage at all. In consequence of having issued those warrants the plaintiffs became liable to the purchasers of the wheat and have paid to them the amount claimed for damage to the wheat, so that the plaintiffs who did not employ the lighterman, who had nothing whatever to do with the damage, and who have received nothing but the warehouse charges, part of which they have credited in the action, have got to bear the whole of the loss occasioned by the damage to the wheat, and the defendants who, by their agent or contractor, had occasioned the damage, have received the full price of it, and have not to pay for the damage at all. Still, if the legal result is to leave the damage upon the plaintiffs they must bear it. We have to see whether the legal position leaves that damage upon the plaintiffs. They were asked to give warrants when the wheat was in the lighters and not in their warehouse. That is contrary to the usual practice where the lighterman is not employed by the warehouseman, and in order to make themselves safe, as they thought, at any rate, to a certain extent, the plaintiffs got the documents which have been mentioned from Fletcher and from the defendants to assure themselves that the wheat would not be delivered to any one else They secured themselves to that extent. They did not secure themselves against the risk of the wheat being damaged in the lighters, because neither party thought that was to be contemplated. Of course, it was always possible; but neither the plaintiffs nor the defendants thought it was a matter to be considered. If the lighterman was employed by the defendants, the damage was not due to any act or default of the plaintiffs or their servants, and they had no opportunity of finding it out before they gave the warrants which they gave for the convenience of the defendants. Is the proper inference in those circumstances that the plaintiffs intended to take the risk of that unknown quantity or that it still continued a risk of the defendants, who had a remedy against the lighterman? In my opinion the conclusion to be drawn from the facts, as they appear in the evidence, is that the latter was the case. It still continued a risk of the defendants, and they had a remedy against the lighterman for it, if it were to be occasioned by the lighterman's default. If that be so, it seems to me, applying the principle which is stated in the passage from Lord Bowen, L.J.'s judgment which has just been read, there is a state of circumstances from which an implied promise to indemnify the plaintiff against that risk, which was really the risk of the defendants, arises.

That was the conclusion to which the learned judge came, and in my opinion it was the right conclusion. I think the appeal should be dismissed.

BANKES, L.J.—I agree.

There are two questions raised in this appeal. The first is a question of fact, as to which I do not desire to say anything, except to say that I agree with the view which Scrutton, J. took, the question being whether it was the plaintiffs or whether it was the defendants who engaged the lighterman.

The second question is as to the proper inference to be drawn from the facts as found. Upon that I must say I have had very considerable doubt during the course of the argument as to what the true view of the facts is, but I have come to the conclusion that the view taken by Scrutton, J. was the right view. In the case of Sheffield Corporation v. Barclay (sup.), Lord Davey, at p. 401, speaks of the inference as an inference of fact; whether it is an inference of fact or a mixed inference of law and fact it does not seem to matter very much. In the case of Birmingham and District Land Company v. London and North-Western Railway Company (sup.), Bowen, L.J. sums up the cases in a passage which I desire to adopt. He says: "They all proceeded upon the notion of a request which one person makes under circumstances from which the law implies that both parties understand that the person who acts upon the request is to be indemnified if he does so." That raises two questions—first of all, as to what the request was; and, secondly, as to the circumstances under which it was made. Now, in this case, there is no doubt that the defendants did request, and, accepting Scrutton's, J. finding, there is no doubt at all as to the circumstances under which it was made. The request was a request to issue warrants for this wheat, and the warrants, of course, when once issued, made the plaintiffs responsible for the delivery of the wheat in the condition in which it was stated to be according to the warrants. That was the request that was made. The circumstances under which it was made were these: The wheat at the time at which the request was made was in lighters, and it was in lighters, I am satisfied, to the knowledge of both parties, and in lighters which had been engaged by the defendants. It was also known or contemplated that the wheat might remain in these lighters longer than ordinary—that is to say, longer than was just necessary to convey the wheat from the ship's side to the warehouse, because the plaintiffs had intimated that they would not be responsible, and could not undertake to place the wheat in the warehouse on any particular day or at any particular time. Now, under those circumstances, it followed that the wheat during the time it remained in the lighters, whether it was long or whether it was short, was exposed to risk of injury from negligence on the part of the lightermen in charge or from some defect in the craft, and it also followed as part of the circumstances from the fact that the defendants had engaged the lighterman and the plaintiffs had not that if the wheat did suffer any such injury the defendants would have a remedy against the lightermen in respect of that injury, but the plaintiffs would not. The circumstances also included this fact, that if the plaintiffs gave the warrants in the form of clean warrants they would become liable to anybody in whose hands those warrants came for the delivery of the wheat as undamaged wheat, whereas, as a matter of fact, it might have become damaged, and under circumstances which would give them no remedy for the damage, but would give the defendants a remedy. Those being the circumstances, what is the true inference to be drawn? Now, it seems to me plain from a consideration of the cases that this doctrine of implied warranty is not confined to risks which are in the contemplation of the parties at the time the request is made, but it extends to risks which actually occur, provided they are the direct result of acting upon the request. Now, in this particular case the plaintiffs had been exposed to this risk of paying for the damage to the wheat as a result of giving clean warrants, and they had been exposed to that risk in consequence of acting upon the request of the defendants. Under these circumstances, in my opinion, the true inference to draw, whether it be an inference of fact or an inference of law, or mixed fact and law, is that the defendants must be taken to have impliedly promised—that is to say, it must be taken that they would have promised as a matter of ordinary business had the circumstances been brought to their attention—that if the wheat was injured whilst it was in the lighters engaged by the defendants, and paid for by the defendants, the defendants would accept responsibility and not the plaintiffs. On these grounds I think that the judgment must stand. I wish to say what I think I omitted, that I am quite satisfied on the evidence that when the defendants asked for the warrants they knew that the wheat was still in the lighters and would continue to be there for some time, though for how long they did not know.

Appeal dismissed.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

April 10 and 18, 1916.

(Before Horridge and Rowlatt, JJ.)

Olympia Oil and Cake Company Limited v. Produce Brokers Company Limited. (a)

Contract—Sale of goods—Resale—Custom—Buyers to accept original shipper's appropriation—Reasonableness of custom.

In connection with a contract for the sale of goods a dispute had arisen between the parties as to whether a certain tender was a good tender or not. The question was referred to arbitration under a clause in the contract, and an award was duly made. That was carried to the Board of Appeal, and they stated a special case for the opinion of the court. Certain questions were put to the court, and the material one was whether under the terms of a certain contract there could be a valid tender or appropriation of a cargo shipped on board the C. to the buyers at a time when the vessel was wrecked and the cargo had become a total loss. The Divisional Court answered those questions in the negative: (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 570; 111 L. T. Rep. 1107). Thereupon the matter went back to the Board of Appeal, and they made an award in which they stated that while they "unreservedly accepted the said answers upon he construction of the contract as a matter of law, apart from the custom of the trade" they nevertheless found that by a long-established and well-recognised custom of the trade in cases of resales buyers under the form of contract impliedly agree (1) that they will accept the original shipper's appropriation passed on without delay if valid at the time of being made by the original shipper; and (2) that sellers shall be under no obligation to make any appropriation other than that of passing on a copy of original shipper's appropriation without delay, even though that appropriation at the time of being passed on might, apart from the custom and implied agreement, be invalid; and they found that there was a valid appropriation to the buyers under this contract.

On a motion by the buyers to set aside the award on the ground that it was bad on the face of it or wrong in point of law, they contended (1) that the custom was unreasonable, and (2) that it was not applicable to the contract in question, the contract not being a "resale," and the original shipper's appropriation not being valid, as the goods were lost before that appropriation was made.

Held (dismissing the motion), that the custom being one which honest and fair-minded men would adopt was reasonable; and that the buyers' other contentions could not be established, the special case, by which alone (if at all) they could be established, not forming part of the award.

Further consideration of a motion to set aside an award.

On the 30th May 1915 the Produce Brokers Company Limited (hereinafter called the sellers) agreed to sell and the Olympia Oil and Cake Company Limited (hereinafter called the buyers) agreed to buy 6000 (10 per cent. more or less) tons of 2240lb. each Harbin and (or) Dalny Soya beans to be shipped from an Oriental port or ports during Dec. 1912 and (or) Jan. 1913 by steamer direct or indirect viâ Suez Canal or Cape to Hull, at 7*l.* 18*s.* 9*d.* per ton, gross weight, ex ship, usual new bags included. The contract provided: "If shipped as a cargo buyers to have the option of charter-party."

Clause 3 of the contract provided:

Particulars of shipment, with date of bill or bills of lading and approximate weights marks (if any), and number of bags to be declared by original sellers not later than forty days from the date of last bill of lading. . . . In case of resales copy of original appropriation shall be accepted by buyers and passed on without delay. Buyers shall not object to slight deviations in marks so long as the beans can be identified on arrival as the bonâ fide shipment intended to be delivered on the declaration. . . .

Clause 10 of the contract provided:

This contract is to be void as regards any portion shipped that may not arrive by the ship or ships declared against this contract, and also if shipment or delivery be prevented by embargo, hostilities, prohibition of export, or blockade.

The form of contract used was the printed form of contract used by the Incorporated Oil Seed Association for adoption by persons engaged in the oil seed trade in sales of cargoes of Manchurian Soya beans with slight variations adopted by the parties.

By a contract dated the 9th Sept. 1912 the sellers purchased from the East Asiatic Company (the shippers of the cargo), under a contract similar to the above-mentioned contract, an identical quantity of 6000 tons, 10 per cent. more or less, Harbin and (or) Dalny Soya beans for shipment in Dec. 1912 and (or) Jan. 1913.

By letter dated the 24th Jan. 1913 the sellers informed the buyers that they had not yet received a tender, but believed that the same would be in the Canterbury.

On the 29th Jan. 1913 the sellers agreed to purchase from the buyers 6000 tons Harbin and (or) Dalna Soya beans, December-January, to Hull, and stated in their letter of this date confirming the purchase: "We shall put this against our sale to you of the 30th May 1912."

On or about the 4th Feb. 1913 the sellers received a notice of appropriation of 6400-6600 tons per Canterbury, stated to have sailed from Vladivostok on the 31st Jan. By letter dated the 4th Feb. the sellers declared and appropriated this shipment to their contract with the buyers, and claimed that the buyers should retender the same in fulfilment of the contract of the 29th Jan. 1913.

The Canterbury sailed from Vladivostok on the evening of the 3rd Feb., and shortly after sailing struck submerged rocks fifteen miles from Karatsu. She was towed off on the 4th Feb., but foundered immediately afterwards. The loss was known in London at about 3 p.m. on the 4th Feb. It was not known to the East Asiatic Company at the time of their tender, but the sellers were aware of it at the time of making their said tender.

The buyers contending that they were not bound to accept the tender per Canterbury, arbitration was claimed under the terms of the contract and the dispute was referred to arbitration in pursuance of the rules indorsed on the contract. The umpire, by his award dated the 19th May 1913, awarded "that the appropriation per Canterbury is a good appropriation in the terms of the contract, and must be accepted by the buyers."

The buyers thereupon appealed from the award to the committee of appeal of the Incorporated Oil Seed Association, and certain members were elected as a board of Appeal to hear the appeal, in accordance with the provisions of the contract and the rules and regulations of the association.

The buyers contended before the board:

(1) That, the steamship Canterbury having sunk or been lost with her cargo before the tender by the sellers, the said tender was bad.

(2) Alternatively that the said tender was bad because the sellers knew of the said sinking or loss of the Canterbury and (or) her cargo before they made the said tender.

(3) That there was not a resale within the meaning of clause 3 of the contract, the sale to the buyers having taken place before the sellers purchased the beans under the contract of the 9th Sept. 1912, and that the buyers were not bound to accept the tender as an appropriation passed on by their sellers on a resale.

(4) That the provisions of clause 3 as to resales could not in this case apply, the Canterbury and her cargo being at the bottom of the sea when the sellers made or purported to make the appropriation.

The buyers requested the board to state a case for the opinion of the court on the question of law arising in the reference.

The sellers contended:

(1) That under clause 3 of the contract the buyers as "buyers" from the sellers under a resale, were bound to accept as a valid declaration, the copy of the original appropriation received by the sellers and handed on by them to the buyers.

(2) Alternatively that by clause 3 the sellers, having passed on without delay to the buyers the copy of the original appropriation, received and accepted by them as "buyers," were entitled to call on the buyers to accept such copy as a valid declaration.

(3) That by reason of the loss of the Canterbury with all her cargo the contract became void pursuant to clause 10 of the contract.

The questions of law submitted in the special case stated by the board at the request of the buyers were:

(1) Whether, regard being had to the terms of the contract of the 30th May 1912, a tender or appropriation under clause 3 could validly be made if at the material time, and whether to the knowledge of the sellers or not, the vessel and her cargo had already become a total loss.

(2) Whether there was any difference "in case of resales," and, if so, whether the sentence in clause 3, "In case of resales copy of original appropriation shall be accepted by buyers and passed on without delay," applied to the facts of this case.

(3) Whether under the circumstances above detailed the provisions of clause 10 of the contract applied so as to render the contract void as regards the beans shipped by the Canterbury which had not arrivsd by that vessel.

(4) (a) and (b) was not relevant to this case.

(5) Whether the sellers were relieved from every obligation to the buyers under the said contract by tendering the cargo shipped per steamship Canterbury.

The court answered questions 1, 2, 3, and 5 in the negative, and sent back these answers to the board of appeal: (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 570; 111 L. T. Rep. 1107; (1915) 1 K. B. 233).

On the 25th June 1914, the board of appeal, having considered the case and the answers of the High Court of Justice to the questions stated in the special case in the matter of the said arbitration, unreservedly accepted the said answers upon the construction of the contract, as a matter of law, apart from the custom of the trade, but it nevertheless found:

(1) That by the long established and well recognised custom of the trade in cases of resales buyers under the form of contract impliedly agree with their sellers (a) that they will accept the original shipper's appropriation passed on without delay, provided that the original shippers' appropriation was valid and in order at the time of being made by the original shipper to his buyer, and (b) that those sellers shall be under no obligation to make any appropriation other than that of passing a copy of original shipper's appropriation without delay, even though the said appropriation at the time of being passed on might, apart from such custom and implied agreement, be invalid and not in order.

(2) That the appropriation by Messrs. the Produce Brokers to the Olympia was made under a resale, to which the said custom of the trade applies; and

(3) That the appropriation of the original shippers, the East Asiatic Company Limited, to their buyers, Messrs. the Produce Brokers, was valid and in order, and they do hereby decide and award that the original award, dated the 19th May 1913, of Berthold Pinner, the umpire appointed in the arbitration, be varied, and award that Messrs. the Olympia are bound to accept as a valid appropriation under the contract of the 30th May 1912 copy of the original shippers' appropriation, passed on to them by Messrs. the Produce Brokers.

The buyers then moved to set aside the awards of the 19th May 1913 and the 25th June 1914 on the following grounds:

(1) That each of the awards was bad on its face or wrong in point of law.

(2) That the appeal committee exceeded their jurisdiction in determining whether the custom mentioned in the award dated the 25th June 1914 had any existence in fact or in deciding that the Olympia Oil and Cake Company Limited were bound by the alleged custom to accept the appropriation therein referred to, which was invalid under the terms of the contract.

(3) That the members of the appeal committee misconducted themselves as arbitrators in not giving proper effect to the answers of the court to the questions of law submitted by them in the form of a special case for the opinion of the court, and the judgments delivered by the court on the 19th May 1914 in exceeding their jurisdiction as aforesaid; and in determining the question of custom without any evidence, or without giving the Olympia Oil and Cake Company Limited any opportunity of adducing evidence to disprove the alleged custom or of putting their contentions with reference to the alleged custom before the appeal committee, or of requesting the appeal committee to state a case for the opinion of the court on the question of law arising out of the question of the alleged custom, or in not holding any proper judicial investigation of the matters relating to the alleged custom.

(4) That the award of the 25th June 1914 was improperly procured by reason of the matters mentioned in par. 3 hereof.

The Divisional Court (Horridge and Rowlatt, JJ.) (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 71; 112 L. T. Rep. 744) held that the custom was not inconsistent with the terms of the contract, but that the arbitrators had no jurisdiction to find the existence of the custom, and that therefore there must be a further inquiry by the Divisional Court as to the existence or non-existence of the custom. They accordingly adjourned the motion in order that the parties might have an opportunity of filing further affidavits on this question.

The Court of Appeal (Buckley, Phillimore, and Pickford, L.JJ.) (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 71; 112 L. T. Rep. 744), affirmed the decision of the Divisional Court solely on the authority of Hutcheson and Co. v. Eaton and Son (51 L. T. Rep. 846; 13 Q. B. Div. 861) and Re Arbitration, North-Western Rubber Company v. Hüttenbach and Co. (99 L. T. Rep. 680; (1908) 2 K. B. 907.).

The sellers appealed, and the House of Lords (114 L. T. Rep. 94; (1916) A. C. 314) allowed the appeal, and declared that the motion of which notice was given on the 11th July 1914 ought to be dismissed as to grounds 2, 3, and 4 contained therein, and the case remitted to the Divisional Court to determine it upon the first ground contained in the notice.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 18.—Horridge, J. read the following judgment:—

The notice of motion in this case asked that two awards dated the 17th May 1913 and the 25th June 1914 might be set aside upon the four grounds therein stated. Grounds 2, 3, and 4 have now been disposed of by the decision of the House of Lords reported in 114 L. T. Rep. 94; (1916) App. Cas. 314, but the first ground remains to be disposed of.

This ground is that each of the awards was bad on its face or wrong in point of law. The points relied upon under this head were as follows: (1) That on the face of the awards there was an incompatibility between the contract and the custom; (2) that the custom was unreasonable; (3) that the custom was not applicable to the contract in question. As regards (1), it was admitted before us we had already on the previous hearing decided that the custom was not incompatible with the written contract.

The second question is whether or not the custom was unreasonable. A usage is not reasonable unless it be fair and proper and such as reasonable, honest, and fair-minded men would adopt: (Paxton v. Courtnay, 2 Foster and Finlayson, p. 131). The custom found in this case by the arbitrators was (a) that the buyers impliedly agreed with their sellers that they would accept the original shipper's appropriation if passed on without delay, provided that the original shipper's appropriation was valid and in order at the time of being made by the original shipper to his buyer, and (b) that the sellers should be under no obligation to make any appropriation other than that of passing on a copy of original shipper's appropriation without delay, even though the said appropriation at the time of being passed on might, apart from such custom and implied agreement, be invalid and not in order.

To put the above more shortly it amounts in my view to saying that when the parcel of goods to be shipped has been resold and a proper appropriation has been made of a particular shipment in the first instance, a copy of that appropriation will be accepted by the purchaser under the second contract, even though the goods have at the time of the appropriation been lost. I cannot see why such an agreement cannot be fairly and properly made between reasonable, honest, and fair-minded men. On behalf of the respondents it was said that the finding of the arbitrators was conclusive as to the custom being a legal custom, and therefore a reasonable custom; but I think, notwithstanding the finding of the arbitrators, if the custom as set out in the award was, in our opinion, unreasonable, we should have been entitled to say so, as the nature of the custom fully appears from the finding. I have already said I do not think it is unreasonable.

The third ground that the custom was not applicable was based on two contentions, (a) that the second finding in the award that it appeared the appropriation was made under a resale was wrong on the face of the award; (b) that on the face of the award it appeared that there was no original shipper's appropriation which was valid and in order, inasmuch as the loss of the parcel took place before the first appropriation was made. It was admitted that in order to establish either of these contentions it was necessary to hold the special case formed part of the award. Whilst not deciding that either of these contentions could in fact be established from the findings of the special case, I base my judgment on my view that the special case formed no portion of the award. The arbitrators merely accept the law as decided by the Divisional Court upon this case, and they in no way incorporate it in the final award. The objection that the award is bad in law on the face of it must be dealt with strictly, and the award is limited to the documents which really form part of it. The motion must be dismissed with costs.

Rowlatt, J.—I am of the same opinion. We decided on the former occasion that this custom was not contradictory to the written contract. The points now raised are that the award is bad on the face of it, first of all because it is wrong in law, this not being, it is said, a resale; secondly, because it is unreasonable; and thirdly, because the original appropriation is said not to have been valid.

Now the award, whatever it does, incorporates the submission which is the contract, and I wish to say what I think the word "resale" now means. This contract cannot at the time of making it be classified either as an original sale or as a resale. It is a contract for the sale of future goods against which the seller may declare either a cargo which he possesses by reason of having himself shipped it, or a cargo which he may have bought as a cargo from the shipper, or a cargo which he may thereafter ship or buy from a shipper. If at the time of the contract the seller has a cargo which he has shipped himself that does not make it an original sale, for he may ultimately tender a cargo which he has bought, nor if when he makes the contract he has a cargo which he has bought does that make it a resale, for he may tender a cargo which he has shipped already or afterwards ships. Mr. Dunlop argued that it was only when at the time of making the contract the seller has a cargo which he has bought that his contract can be a resale. Supposing a man makes two contracts, having at the time both a cargo which he has bought and a cargo which he has shipped, which is the original sale and which is the resale? No answer is possible. It is clear, therefore, that it is only when the cargo is declared under the contract that it is determined whether we are in the presence of what the contract calls, not very accurately, a resale. A case of resale arises if the seller declares a cargo which he has not shipped himself but bought, and whether he bought it before or after the contract can make no difference whatever. Now that is, in my view, what a resale is. It was argued by Mr. Dunlop that this was not a resale. From what I have said it appears that I do not agree with Mr. Dunlop's argument; at the same time I do not think that for the purpose of showing this was not a resale he can go into the point, because he cannot get the necessary facts although they are not of course in dispute, without referring to the previous special case. I do not think that that special case is incorporated in this award; it is mentioned in the award, but not mentioned so as to incorporate it. Why should it be incorporated? The arbitrators are not now stating a special case or desiring to bring to the notice of the court any evidence at all; on the contrary, they are stating what they intend to be a final award, as to which it is Mr. Dunlop's task to show an error in law apparent on the face of it. I do not think he can do it, because he cannot get the necessary facts, even if his view of what is a resale is right.

Now, it is said the custom is unreasonable. I am not prepared to go the length that Mr. Leck contended for, and say that when the arbitrators have found a custom therefore the court is bound to hold that it is a reasonable one. It may come to that in time, but certainly so far as I am concerned I should not be inclined to lay that down without a good deal of argument. Anyhow, it is not necessary to decide that now. This contract is a contract, I am bound to say, as I have said on a previous occasion, which in my judgment may lead to very curious, indeed whimsical results, because it enables a man in whose hands the contract is void to elect to keep it alive and to hand it on to somebody in whose hands it is also void who may elect to keep it alive and hand it on to somebody else until it reaches the hands of somebody who is not a seller, when it is no good and comes to an end. I think it is very curious, but if they like to do it I cannot say it is unreasonable. It seems to me that before the court can say that a custom known to both parties, not when introduced against an ignorant purchaser, but a custom of this kind, is unreasonable, it has to say the custom outrages justice and common sense. I cannot express it more narrowly that that. I think it is quite out of the question to suggest this is such a custom.

The third ground which is raised is that the original tender was not a valid one, and therefore that the tender on what was called the resale could not be valid either under what is called the custom. The short answer to that is that it is not open to Mr. Dunlop, because the facts which are necessary for him are only to be found in the special case, which is not part of the award. There is the fact on the special case itself, but Mr. Dunlop cannot get that far, and therefore I think that that question may be left alone.

Motion dismissed.

THE BANGOR. (a)

Prize Court—Neutral ship—Capture—Unneutral service—Capture in neutral territorial waters—Validity of capture—Restitution—Right to demand restitution—Hague Conference 1907, Convention XIII.

It is an established rule of international law that a capture within the territorial waters of a neutral is, as between enemy belligerents, rightful for all purposes, and it is only by the neutral State concerned that the legal validity of the capture can be questioned. Neither an enemy, nor a neutral acting the part of an enemy, as, for instance, by being guilty of unneutral service, can demand the restitution of captured property on the sole ground of its capture within neutral waters.

This rule of international law has been in no way modified by Convention XIII. of the Hague Conference 1907.

THIS was a case in which the Procurator-General asked for the condemnation of a neutral vessel and her cargo on the ground that at the time of her capture she was engaged in unneutral service. The cargo consisted of coal and stores, and the unneutral service complained of was that the vessel was acting as an enemy supply ship.

The Bangor was a steamship of 5133 tons register and, until Oct. 1914, was owned by a Norwegian company. In Oct. 1914, whilst at sea, she was sold to one R. Suhren, a United States citizen, but she continued to fly the Norwegian flag. On the 25th Dec. 1914 the Bangor left Copenhagen for New York, carrying a small general cargo, and reached her destination on the 17th Jan. 1915. Two days before her arrival at New York permission had been given by the Collector of Customs at Christiania for the name of the ship to be changed to Seattle, and on the 28th Jan. a note of the change of name was made on the ship's papers by the Norwegian Consul in New York. It appeared, however, that the new name was not painted up until a long time afterwards.

On the 28th Jan. 1915 the Bangor sailed from New York for Baltimore in ballast. She arrived at Baltimore on the 30th Jan., where she remained until she left for Buenos Aires on the 4th Feb. Whilst at Baltimore, the Bangor took in a cargo of 6895 tons of coal (in addition to 1274 tons in her bunkers), 50 tons of stores in the shape of preserved provisions, and ten cases of electrical gear. The bills of lading were not forthcoming, but the manifest as well as the log heading showed that the coal and the electrical gear were consigned to one firm in Buenos Aires and the provisions to another firm in the same city. On the day before sailing the Bangor received an addition to her complement in the shape of three persons named, respectively, Vielmetter, Farnow, and Maisch. Vielmetter signed on as purser, although he was in fact a supercargo; Farnow was entered as an electrician; and Maisch signed on as second steward, although he was really a wireless operator. From a statement made by Vielmetter it appeared that an agent of the German Government had arranged with him that he should have an opportunity of leaving the United States by some supply ship; that, independently of any message or messages which he might receive by wireless, he controlled the whole cargo and the destination of the vessel; and that it was intended that the coal and the stores, but not the electrical gear, should be delivered to any of the German warships which might make a call for the same by wireless.

During her voyage from Baltimore, the electrical gear was brought out and proved to be wireless apparatus. It was duly set up and wireless messages were received by the Bangor. The apparatus was taken down before the vessel put in at Montevideo, at which place new bills of lading where made out whereby the cargo was expressed to be consigned to Corral, with the option of Valparaiso or Iquique, to a Valparaiso firm. After leaving Montevideo the Bangor proceeded direct to Corral—she never attempted to call at Buenos Aires—and passed through the Strait of Magellan. As she neared the mouth of the strait and was making for the open sea of the Pacific Ocean, the wireless apparatus was once again set up, but it was quickly taken down when H.M.S. Bristol came in sight. Whilst a boarding party was coming from the Bristol to the Bangor, Vielmetter threw the wireless code overboard and Farnow burnt certain papers and the records of wireless messages which he had received. The vessel was then seized and taken to the Falkland Islands, where Prize Court proceedings were commenced for the condemnation of the ship and cargo, but, by an order dated the 11th Aug. 1915, the suit was transferred to London under sect. 1 of the Prize Court Act 1915 (5 & 6 Geo. 5, c. 57).

No claim was put in, nor was there any appearance, in respect of the cargo, but there was a claim in respect of the ship by the Norwegian company as well as by a Danish company, who asserted that they had a beneficial interest in the same. The grounds of the claim were:

(1) That the Bangor was at the time of her capture the property of neutral subjects.

(2) That the ship was not liable to capture or condemnation on the ground of unneutral service or otherwise.

(3) That the ship was captured in neutral territorial waters.

The facts of the case were really not in dispute, and the sole question argued was the third ground of resistance to the claim of the Crown, which, it was contended, had been modified by Convention XIII. of the Hague Conference 1907. The material articles of this Convention, which was signed by Great Britain and by Chile (but not ratified by either Power), and was both signed and ratified by Norway, are as follows:

1. Belligerents are bound to respect the sovereign rights of neutral Powers, and to abstain, in neutral territory or neutral waters, from any act which would, if knowingly permitted by any Power, constitute a violation of neutrality.

2. Any act of hostility, including therein capture and the exercise of the right of search, committed by belligerent warships in the territorial waters of a neutral Power, constitutes a violation of neutrality and is strictly forbidden.

(a) Reported by J. A. SLATER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

3. When a ship has been captured in the territorial waters of a neutral Power, such Power must, if the prize is still within its jurisdiction, employ the means at its disposal to release the prize with its officers and crew, and to intern the prize crew. If the prize is not within the jurisdiction of a neutral Power, the captor Government, on the demand of that Power, must liberate the prize with its officers and crew.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 9.—The PRESIDENT.—This is a flagrant case of a vessel flying the Norwegian flag, and commanded by a Norwegian master, being fitted and manned from New York for the purposes of rendering services to German warships. Circumstances of aggravation of almost every kind attended her conduct and management. They are set out in the evidence to which the Attorney-General adverted. The master, one Hansen, attempted some kind of repudiation of the charges made against him. His efforts did not relieve the weight of those charges. He only added to his discredit the disgrace of giving false evidence.

It is unnecessary to make a statement of the facts, because counsel for the shipowners admitted that their vessel must suffer judgment of condemnation, unless she was immune from capture on the technical ground that she was at the time in waters alleged to be territorial waters of a neutral State.

The vessel was captured in the Strait of Magellan. According to the entry in the log, the vessel was captured when she was in the middle of the Strait of Magellan, about opposite Port Tamar anchorage. This agreed with the statement of the British naval officers. The Strait of Magellan is admitted to be seven miles wide at that place. Strictly, therefore, the middle would not be within three miles of the land on either side.

The ship's master gave evidence that he took bearings which fixed his position much nearer the south shore than the line midway between the land on the north and south sides. His evidence is not worthy of any credence, and I cannot accept any part of it as being true. Accordingly, if it is material to establish that the capture took place within three miles, or a marine league, of either shore, the claimants have not proved to my satisfaction that it did.

The limits of territorial waters, in relation to national and international rights and privileges, have of recent years been subject to much discussion. It may well be that the old marine league, which for long determined the boundaries of territorial waters, ought to be extended by reason of the enlarged range of guns used for shore protection.

This case does not, in my view, call for any pronouncement upon that question. I am content to decide the question of law raised by the claimants upon the assumption that the capture took place within the territorial waters of the Republic of Chile. This assumption, of course, does not imply any expression of opinion as to the character of the Strait of Magellan as between Chile and other nations. This strait connects the two vast free oceans of the Atlantic and the Pacific. As such, the strait must be considered free for the commerce of all nations passing between the two oceans.

In 1879 the Government of the United States of America declared that it would not tolerate exclusive claims by any nation whatsoever to the Strait of Magellan, and would hold responsible any Government that undertook, no matter on what pretext, to lay any impost on its commerce through the strait.

Later, in 1881, the Republic of Chile entered into a treaty with the Argentine Republic by which the Strait of Magellan was declared to be neutralised for ever, and free navigation was guaranteed to the flags of all nations.

I have referred to these matters in order to show that there is a right of free passage through the Strait of Magellan for commercial purposes. It is not inconsistent with this that during war between any nations entitled to use it for commerce the Strait of Magellan should be regarded in whole or in part as the territorial waters of Chile, whose lands bound it on both sides.

Upon the assumption made for the purposes of this case that the Bangor was in fact captured within the territorial waters of a neutral country, the question is whether the vessel was immune from legal capture and its consequences according to the law of nations. In other words, can the owners of the vessel, who are, ex hypothesi, to be treated as enemies, rely upon the territorial rights of a neutral State and object to the capture? Or must the objection to the validity of the capture come from the neutral State alone?

No proposition in international law is clearer or more surely established than that a capture within the territorial waters of a neutral country is, as between enemy belligerents, for all purposes rightful, and that it is only by the neutral country concerned that the legal validity of the capture can be questioned. It can only be declared void as to the neutral State and not as to the enemy. This proposition is very clearly established by the cases of The Anne (3 Wheaton, 435), The Lilla (2 Sprague, 177), The Sir Wm. Peel (5 Wall, 517, and The Adela (6 Wall, 263), and is neatly stated in The Sir Wm. Peel (ubi sup., at p. 536) as follows: "Neither an enemy nor a neutral acting the part of an enemy can demand restitution of captured property on the sole ground of capture in neutral waters."

It was contended by counsel for the shipowners that this well established rule of international law had been modified by Convention XIII. of the Hague Convention of 1907. Assuming for the purpose of this judgment that Convention XIII. is binding, it is clear that the Convention was only directed to the relations between neutral Powers and belligerent Powers, and was only intended to apply to questions arising between neutral Powers and belligerent Powers as such. Its provisions were not intended to deal with any question between belligerents, and did not affect the rule relating to capture in territorial waters of a neutral State as between two belligerent Powers where the neutral State did not intervene.

For these reasons I decide that the objection made by the claimants to the validity of the capture, even if it took place in neutral territorial waters, is not well founded, and I disallow the claim with costs.

The judgment of the court is that the vessel and her cargo are condemned as good and lawful prize.

THE KATWIJK. (a)

Prize Court—Neutral ship—Cargo—Cargo lawful at commencement of voyage—Cargo declared conditional contraband before voyage completed—Seizure—Consideration—Claim for freight—Claim for demurrage.

A neutral vessel started from a neutral port for a neutral destination after the outbreak of war. Part of her cargo consisted of goods which were declared conditional contraband after her departure. The vessel was stopped on her way and sent into a British port for examination. Later on, but after the date of the order making the particular cargo conditional contraband, the cargo was seized as prize, on the assumption that it was ultimately intended for delivery to the enemy. The vessel was delayed a considerable time, but was ultimately released, and the shipowners put in a claim for freight and demurrage.

Held, that the cargo was a proper subject for condemnation, but that the shipowners were entitled to a certain amount for freight, to be settled by the registrar and merchants, though not to anything for demurrage, which was an unfortunate incident of a state of war.

THIS was a case in which the Procurator-General on behalf of the Crown asked for the condemnation of a cargo of iron ore on board the steamship Katwijk, which had been seized as contraband. The case was first heard on the 15th Feb. 1915, when it was adjourned for further and fuller argument.

The Katwijk was a Dutch steamer belonging to the port of Rotterdam. Some time after the outbreak of war on the 4th Aug. 1914—namely, on the 16th Sept. 1914—the steamer sailed from Decido, a port near Bilbao, in the north of Spain, with a cargo of 3350 tons of iron ore. The charter-party was dated the 10th Sept. 1914, and the bill of lading was dated as of the date of sailing, the 16th Sept. The iron ore was deliverable under the bill of lading to Messrs. Ruys and Co., a Dutch firm, who were alleged to be the agents of Krupp's, of Essen. It was not disputed that the iron ore was destined for Krupps. Whilst the steamship was proceeding up the English Channel she was directed, on the 19th Sept., to Ryde Roads. After an examination had been made she was sent on to Middlesbrough, where the cargo was discharged and the steamship was released. Later on the Katwijk, whilst on a voyage to Holland with a general cargo, was torpedoed and sunk in the North Sea. The cargo was seized as prize on the 4th Oct. 1914, and in the meantime—namely, on the 21st Sept.—iron ore had been declared conditional contraband by the British Government, whereas it had previously been held free.

In an affidavit of the Collector of Customs at Portsmouth it was stated that the ship, with her cargo, was seized as prize on the 4th Oct. 1914, and in a further affidavit it was stated the Katwijk was sent into Ryde Roads for examination on the 26th Sept. 1914. These dates were of importance in view of the Order in Council declaring metallic ores as conditional contraband dated the 21st Sept. 1914.

As the ship had been lost there was no application to condemn the same, and there was no appearance as to the cargo. The only claim put forward was one by the shipowners for freight and demurrage.

The Attorney-General (Sir John Simon, K.C.) and Stuart Bevan for the Crown.

Dunlop for the shipowners.

The PRESIDENT.—In this case the Crown seeks for a decree of condemnation of 3350 tons of iron ore, a cargo found upon the Dutch ship Katwijk, which was seized in Sept. 1914. There has been some discussion here as to when the cargo was definitely seized. Nobody appears for the owners of the cargo and nobody claims the cargo, but Mr. Dunlop, acting for the ship, has suggested the seizure was before the 21st Sept.

I decide upon the evidence in this case and upon the affidavits read by the Attorney-General, that the cargo was not seized before the 26th Sept. It is not necessary for me to go further and declare whether it was in fact seized on that date or on the 4th Oct. If it was not seized until the 26th Sept., then by that date the proclamation of the 21st Sept. had been issued in which it was declared that iron ore would be regarded as contraband. It is, of course, within the power of the Crown to add to the list of contraband from time to time, and acting in pursuance of that power the Crown issued the proclamation referred to. I therefore decree condemnation of this cargo as contraband, seized after the proclamation was issued.

Now a claim has been put forward by the owners of the ship for freight and other sums of money for what was called demurrage or damage for detention. The Katwijk belonged to a Dutch company. It is admitted that the ship sailed on the 16th Sept., carrying a cargo which was not then contraband, and therefore she started upon a perfectly innocent voyage.

According to the principles which have been agreed upon in the Declaration of London, which I think it would be right for the court to act upon, the ship could not be condemned by reason of the cargo being declared contraband after starting on the voyage. Primâ facie, therefore, the company and owners of the ship would be entitled to some freight. The Attorney-General, however, has pointed out to me certain facts with reference to the position of the firm of Messrs. Erhardt and Dekkers, and their relationship in business with Krupp's Company. Now, whatever their position was at the time when they started on this voyage to carry cargo to be delivered to Messrs. Krupp for the purpose of being converted into munitions of war—though they do not seem to have been on very friendly terms with the Germans because this ship has been torpedoed—the question is, is there enough before me to displace the primâ facie claim of this firm, the owners of the ship, for freight? At that time there was no reason whatever why Messrs. Erhardt and Dekkers should not be engaged in business transactions with Messrs. Krupp and make a profit out of them if they could, and I see no reason here for deciding to deprive the owners of a neutral vessel of such freight as in all the circumstances ought to be given to them, the amount of the freight to be decided by reference to the registrar and merchants.

With regard to the further claim for demurrage and detention, I disallow it. This vessel, like all others, ran some risk, and no doubt, if they considered it at all, the master and charterers might very well have said: "Well, we are starting on an innocent voyage, but we wonder whether iron ore will be added to the list of contraband before we reach Rotterdam," as in fact it was. Now such detention as they were put to, and such losses as they suffered, are unfortunately suffered by even neutrals in the dire circumstances of war. I therefore disallow any claim except such claim for freight as ought reasonably to be allowed.

Jan. 3, and Feb. 1, 1916.

JAMES MORRISON AND CO. LIMITED v. SHAW, SAVILL, AND ALBION COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

Carriage by direct route—Liberty to call at intermediate port — Exception of King's enemies — Deviation to intermediate port not usually visited by owners' ships—Destruction by enemy vessel—Liability of owners.

In Nov. 1914 the defendants, a steamship company, contracted to carry a cargo of wool from New Zealand to London in their steamship. The bills of lading provided for "Direct service between New Zealand and London," and contained these two clauses: "Clause 1. With liberty on the way to London to call and stay at any intermediate port or ports to discharge or take on board passengers, cargo, coal, or other supplies." Clause 3. "The owners are to be at liberty to carry the said goods to their port of destination by the above or other steamer or steamers, ship or ships, either belonging to themselves or to other persons proceeding by any route, and whether directly or indirectly to such port, and in so doing to carry the goods beyond their port of destination, and to tranship or land and store the goods either on shore or afloat and reship and forward the same at the owner's expense, but at merchant's risk." The exception clause excepted the "King's enemies." Besides the wool the steamship carried a quantity of frozen meat for delivery at Havre. The vessel kept a direct course from New Zealand to London until she reached the Casquets, when she turned and made for Havre, which was not one of the usual ports visited by the defendants' steamships. Before reaching Havre she was sunk by a German submarine. The plaintiffs, who were indorsees and holders of the bills of lading under which the wool was shipped, brought an action against the defendants claiming damages for breach of contract.

Held, (1) that clause 3 of the bills of lading did not avail the defendants, since it only applied when transhipment of the cargo from the T. to another vessel had taken place, and, even if that were not so, the bills of lading would be ambiguous (Elderslie Steamship Company v. Borthwick (10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 24; 92 L. T. Rep. 274; (1905) A. C. 93); (2) that the provisions of clause 1 did not constitute a defence to the plaintiffs' claim, since, assuming that Havre was an intermediate port within the meaning of the clause, when the route and ports of call of a line of steamships had become stereotyped mere general words in the owners' own bill of lading giving liberty to call at intermediate ports would not justify their calling at some entirely fresh intermediate port; (3) that after deviation the defendants were only common carriers and were not protected by the common law exception of the King's enemies, since in deviating they were breaking their contract with the plaintiffs and not fulfilling it; and (4) that it was unnecessary for the plaintiffs in order to substantiate their claim to show that the natural and probable result of deviating to Havre was that the T. would be sunk by hostile craft. The plaintiffs were, therefore, entitled to judgment.

COMMERCIAL LIST.

Action tried by Bailhache, J.

The plaintiffs were consignees and owners of 158 bales of wool shipped from Wellington, New Zealand, in the steamship Tokomaru, owned by the defendants, the Shaw, Savill, and Albion Company Limited. The Tokomaru was one of the defendant company's regular line from New Zealand to the United Kingdom. The goods were shipped under a bill of lading, dated Nov. 1914, which was headed: "Direct service between New Zealand and London." The bill of lading gave the shipowners extensive liberty to load at any port in New Zealand, and contained these clauses:

1. . . . And bound (subject to the before-mentioned liberties) on finally leaving New Zealand for London and with liberty on the way to London to call and stay at any intermediate port or ports to discharge or take on board passengers, cargo, coal, or other supplies, with permission, if desired, for the vessel to call at Rio de Janeiro and (or) Montevideo and (or) La Plata.

3. The owners are to be at liberty to carry the said goods to their port of destination by the above or other steamer or steamers, ship or ships, either belonging to themselves or to other persons, proceeding by any route, and whether directly or indirectly to such port, and in so doing to carry the goods beyond their port of destination and to tranship or land and store goods either on shore or afloat and reship and forward the same at the owner's expense, but at merchant's risk.

The exceptions clause included "act of God" and the "King's enemies."

The regular course taken by steamers of the defendant line from New Zealand to London after leaving Ushant was to proceed direct to the south side of the Isle of Wight and thence up the Channel, through the Straits of Dover, to the Thames. On the occasion in question the defendants undertook the carriage of a quantity of frozen meat to Havre.

The Tokomaru commenced her voyage, and was within twelve or thirteen miles from Havre when she was torpedoed by a German submarine and sank, all her cargo being lost.

The plaintiffs thereupon commenced this action claiming 4013*l.* agreed damages from the defendants for loss of the cargo.

F. D. MacKinnon, K.C. and R. A. Wright for the plaintiffs.—The defendants are liable to the plaintiffs in the sum claimed. In proceeding to Havre the Tokomaru was guilty of deviation, and such deviation was not permissible under clause 1 in the bill of lading, since Havre was not an "intermediate port" between New Zealand and London. Nor can clause 3 avail the defendants, since that clause only applies after transhipment of the goods from the Tokomaru to another vessel. It is admitted by the defendants that deviation would put an end to the contract of carriage contained in the bill of lading and charter-party, but it is contended that the defendants must then be considered as common carriers and as such entitled to invoke the common law right of immunity from liability where damage to or loss of goods carried is caused by the King's enemies. Here the goods were lost through the sinking of the Tokomaru by an enemy submarine. It is submitted that that is not so, and that the deviation of the defendants suffices to deprive them of their common law rights.

Sir Robert Finlay, K.C., Maurice Hill, K.C., and W. N. Raeburn for the defendants.—The Tokomaru by the terms of the bill of lading was entitled to call at Havre. This interpretation is the only commercially reasonable interpretation to place upon clauses (1) and (3) in the bill of lading. Moreover, a shipowner can only be liable for the direct consequences of deviation. Here the direct cause of the vessel's loss was attack by enemy craft, and it must be remembered that there was no more risk in proceeding to Havre than in steaming straight to London. The Tokomaru never received any warning of the presence of hostile vessels in the vicinity, and the defendants were therefore not robbed of their common law rights, since they could not be prevented from availing themselves of them unless they had deliberately or, at least, with reckless carelessness thrown themselves in the way of the enemy.

MacKinnon, K.C. replied.

Feb. 11.—Bailhache, J. read the following judgment:—The defendants' steamship Tokomaru, bound from New Zealand to London with a valuable cargo on board, was making for the port of Havre on the 30th Jan. 1915. She was within some seven or eight miles of the coast and some twelve or thirteen miles from Havre when, at about nine o'clock in the morning, she was torpedoed by the German submarine U 21 and sank with her cargo.

Amongst the cargo were 158 bales of greasy wool belonging to the plaintiffs, who held two bills of lading covering this shipment at Napier, in New Zealand. Both bills of lading are in the same form, and both are dated the 19th Nov. 1914. The agreed value of the wool is 4013*l.* 19*s.* 7*d.*, and the plaintiffs sue the defendants for this sum upon the simple and, as they allege, sufficient ground that the wool was lost while the Tokomaru was deviating from her voyage to London.

The defendants deny that there was any deviation. They assert that the Tokomaru was intending to call at Havre to discharge a parcel of frozen meat, and that her so doing was within the liberties reserved to them by the bills of lading held by the plaintiffs. Alternatively, and while admitting that deviation destroys the bill of lading exceptions, they say that they were common carriers, with the common law exceptions of act of God and the King's enemies, and that they are thus protected, and they further say that the deviation was not the cause of the loss. It is between these conflicting contentions that I have to decide.

The facts of the case are that the Tokomaru was one of the defendants' well-known line of steamships running from New Zealand to London. She loads, as do the other vessels of this line, on the berth in New Zealand at different ports there, not always in the same order. As the shippers load their goods they receive their bills of lading. After the plaintiffs' goods had been shipped and their bills of lading handed over, the defendants, on or shortly before the 30th Nov. 1914, took on board a parcel of frozen meat from Messrs. Fletcher Limited for carriage, as it turned out, to Havre. The negotiations for this parcel began in London in October, and about the same time in New Zealand, and several cables and letters passed between the defendants and their agent, Mr. Findlay, of Wellington, on the subject.

Bordeaux and Marseilles were both spoken of as ports of discharge, but Havre was finally arranged, and the master had instructions at Teneriffe to proceed to Havre to discharge the meat before coming to London. In accepting this meat for discharge at a French port the defendants were embarrassed by the fact that they had already issued bills of lading in their usual form to the earlier shippers, including the plaintiffs. They might have protected themselves from all difficulties with regard to cargo loaded after the meat by an appropriate clause added to the later bills of lading, but they were unfortunately under the impression that Bordeaux would be the port of discharge, and so they added a clause to the later bills of lading, giving express liberty to call at Bordeaux. This, of course, to say the least of it, made things no better.

The defendants' uneasiness is expressed with such knowledge of the position and with such lucidity in their letter to Mr. Findlay of the 8th Jan 1915 that I cannot do better than read it.

> Bordeaux.—It appears that this port is not so convenient for discharging meat as Havre, and Vesteys have asked us to give delivery of the Tokomaru meat at Havre, instead of at Bordeaux. On looking into the matter we conclude that we are not free to do so under the bill of lading without running a risk of claims from the consignees of the other cargo, should anything happen to the vessel. Our only chance was in the possibility that you had claused the bills in an open way for French ports and not for Bordeaux exclusively, but your reply to our cabled inquiry as to this precludes any hope of assistance in that direction. There remains only the alternative of insuring the risk or going to Havre under orders from the Government. The latter is not available, and the former would have cost 10s. per cent, and this on a cargo worth a quarter of a million pounds is more than we could afford to pay. The consignees, however, may elect to pay this themselves, which will settle the matter and incidentally will show what magnificent profits the meat, which cannot afford to pay an increased rate of freight, is bringing to the shipper. Our experience in regard to this matter led us to ask you to clause all bills of lading of any steamer likely to call at any port outside of our ordinary course, "with liberty to call at any French port or ports." You will doubtless understand that although our bills of lading give full permission to wander about on the New Zealand coast, and although the clauses otherwise seem fairly full, there is a distinct risk in deviating from our ordinary route without specific provision being made for it in the bill of lading.

It is obvious from this letter that the defendants feared and were inclined to think that calling at Havre would be a deviation from the voyage to which they had committed themselves both by their earlier and later bills of lading; that there was possibility of damage and, if so, claims would result which they would be ill-equipped to meet. Havre is not one of their usual ports of call. I gather that no boat of this line, bound from New Zealand to London, had ever called there before. Their ports of call were well known. After leaving one or more named ports on the South American coast they proceed to the Canary Islands, where they call either at Teneriffe or Madeira, and thence direct to London, except in the case of their mail steamships, which, I understand, call at Plymouth to land passengers and mails for London.

This has always been their practice, nor were they able to call anyone to prove that Havre is a usual port of call for any steamship bound from New Zealand to London. After making Ushant the courses for London and Havre are the same until shortly after passing the Casquets, when the course for London goes straight ahead till off Dover, and the course for Havre sharply deflects to the eastward at an angle from the London course of approximately 45 degrees. The distance to Havre from the point where the two courses diverge is about 100 miles.

On leaving Havre the London course is picked up again off Dover. The actual difference in distance between proceeding from Ushant direct to London, and proceeding to Havre and thence to London, is some fifty-eight miles. The defendants proved that submarines had not been active before the 30th Jan. 1915. Down to that date they had only sunk three ships. The master of the Tokomaru had received no warning that any danger was to be anticipated in calling at Havre, and there was no greater likelihood of damage in going there than in going to London.

The question which lies at the root of the case is whether calling at Havre was within the liberties reserved to the defendants by the bills of lading held by the plaintiffs, and only so can the making for Havre be justified. To answer this question I must examine the bill of lading. It is in the defendants' own form. It bears upon it the words: "Direct service between New Zealand and London."

The first portion, which is in larger type than the exceptions and conditions clauses, states that the Tokomaru is now lying in the port of Napier and is bound for London. It gives the fullest liberty to load at ports or places in New Zealand in any order and for any purpose, and continues:

> And bound (subject to the before-mentioned liberties) on finally leaving New Zealand for London and with liberty on the way to London to call and stay at any intermediate port or ports to discharge or take on board passengers, cargo, coal or other supplies, with permission if desired for the vessel to call at Rio de Janeiro and (or) Montevideo and (or) La Plata.

I will call this clause 1. There are seventeen other clauses in small print. The only material one is clause 3, which reads thus:

> The owners are to be at liberty to carry the said goods to their port of destination by the above or other steamer or steamers, ship or ships, either belonging to themselves or to other persons, proceeding by any route, and whether directly or indirectly to such port, and in so doing to carry the goods beyond their port of destination and to tranship or land and store the goods either on shore or afloat and reship and forward the same at the owners' expense, but at merchant's risk.

It was suggested for the defendants that whatever may be the effect of clause 1 there can be no doubt that clause 3 gave them liberty to call at Havre. I cannot accept this suggestion. As a mere matter of construction if clause 3 stood alone it might be held to apply to the Tokomaru, but I have to look at the bill of lading as a whole and to read clauses 1 and 3 together, and so reading them I think the true result is that the shipowners are in fact saying to the shippers: If we carry your goods by the Tokomaru we will carry them upon the terms of clause 1, but we may have to tranship and possibly into a steamer not belonging to us; in that case we must have greater latitude, and must have the liberties reserved by clause 3.

If this is not so, we get a situation very similar to that in Elderslie v. Borthwick (10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 24; 92 L. T. Rep. 274; (1905) A. C. 93), and the bill of lading becomes an ambiguous document, which will not assist the defendants. It is instructive to compare the bill of lading in this case with that in the case of Hadji Ali Akbar v. Anglo-Arabian Steamship Company (10 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 307; 95 L. T. Rep. 610), in which the decision was the other way.

A more formidable point was taken by the defendants, based upon clause 1. Sir Robert Finlay strongly insisted that the words "and with liberty on the way to London to call and stay at any intermediate port or ports to discharge or take on board passengers, cargo, coal, or other supplies" fully justified a call at Havre to discharge the frozen meat. Havre, he said, is clearly an intermediate port.

If I were asked, as a mere matter of geography, whether Havre was an intermediate port between New Zealand and London, I might be inclined to say "Yes." If I was at the same time shown a chart with the respective courses from Ushant to London and from Ushant to Havre laid out upon it, I should hesitate and doubt and be inclined to say "No." It seems to me a question of degree. Any port which can be reached directly by diverging from the course to London, and which is not north of London, is in a sense an intermediate port between New Zealand and London, say, for instance, Lisbon or Bordeaux. No port, however near the course, can be entered without some divergence.

It is not very helpful to say that a port is intermediate which can be reached by divergence, is not north of London, and not too far from the direct route to London. What is "too far"? About that opinions in a given case must differ, and if it should hereafter be thought necessary to decide the point as a mere question of geography, I leave it to wiser heads than mine.

The question, in truth, seems to me one in which the question of geography is only one element, and I will assume, without so deciding, that Havre is geographically an intermediate port. The real question is: Were the defendants entitled to call there under the terms of their bill of lading? In deciding this question I must bear in mind that deviation has always been looked upon as a grave breach of contract. It entails upon the shipowner the displacement of his contract of carriage. It avoids the cargo-owner's policy as and from the point of deviation unless, as is now sometimes the case, the rigour of the law is mitigated by apt words added to the policy. It causes what in these days every shipper wishes to avoid—delay in delivery, a delay not measured by the actual extra distance covered, but also by the time occupied in entering and leaving port and loading or discharging cargo.

It is, further, to be borne in mind that in the course of a long series of years the route taken and the ports called at by a particular line become fixed, and are well known to shippers and to underwriters. The defendants have themselves, by their conduct, put their own construction upon clause 1 of the bill of lading. Teneriffe or Madeira are their intermediate ports. Underwriters, therefore, in insuring cargo by the defendants' line from New Zealand to London, are writing what they understand to be a well-defined risk, a matter of importance both to shippers and underwriters, and one into which it is undesirable to introduce an element of uncertainty.

Lastly, "liberty to call at intermediate ports" has become common form in bills of lading, and has come to mean very little. I am of opinion that the fears expressed by the defendants in their letter, which I read a few minutes ago, of incurring liability to claims if they called at Havre and cargo was damaged, were well founded.

In my judgment, the Tokomaru was not justified, to use their own words, "in deviating from our ordinary route without specific provision being made for it in the bill of lading."

That sentence exactly expresses my view. In my judgment, when the route and ports of call of a line of steamships have become stereotyped, mere general words in their own bill of lading giving liberty to call at intermediate ports will not justify their calling at some entirely fresh intermediate port. The truth is, the defendants were tempted by a high rate of freight to run risks which they recognised as possible, but regarded as improbable. Unfortunately, the improbable happened.

The remaining points may be dealt with briefly. The effect of deviation is to displace the contract of carriage during and after deviation, and ab initio if Pickford, J. is right in his judgment in Internationale Guano-en-Superphosphaatwerken v. MacAndrew and Co. (11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 271; 100 L. T. Rep. 850; (1909) 2 K. B. 360). From the point of deviation, at any rate, the shipowner becomes at best a common carrier. The defendants say that they are common carriers, with the common law exceptions of act of God and King's enemies in their favour.

Let me assume that. Of what use are those exceptions to the defendants in this case? As I understand it, the law stands thus. When a ship deviates and loss or damage to cargo occurs, either by act of God or, as here, by the King's enemies, it is not open to her owners to set up either exception. Those exceptions apply and apply only to a carrier who is performing his contract, and never to a carrier who is breaking it, unless he can show that the loss or damage must have occurred in any event: (see Davis v. Garrett, 6 Bing. 716; and Lilley v. Doubleday, 44 L. T. Rep. 814; 7 Q. B. Div. 510). That he can obviously never do in such a case as the present.

The most that can be said is that the Tokomaru might have been torpedoed if she had continued on her course to London, and that avails the defendants nothing. The only case that occurs to me as likely to arise in practice in which a shipowner can hope to escape liability for damage to or loss of goods during or after deviation is when the goods perish from inherent vice and would have so perished without deviation: (see, for example, Internationale Guano-en-Superphosphaatwerken v. MacAndrew and Co., sup.).

The defendants lastly say that the deviation was not the cause of the loss, and that the plaintiffs cannot recover because they cannot show that the natural and probable result of deviating to Havre was that the Tokomaru would be torpedoed. This seems to me rank heresy. A shipowner is an insurer of the goods he carries, subject, if there is a special contract, to the contractual exceptions, and subject, if there is no special contract, to the common law exceptions of act of God, the King's enemies, and inherent vice. If the goods are lost while in his ship, it is not for the goods owner in the first instance to prove anything but the loss. The shipowner, if he denies liability, must then set up the particular exception upon which he relies and bring himself within it. Here the exception is the King's enemies, but the defendants are in the difficulty pointed out by Lord Watson in Hamilton, Fraser, and Co. v. Pandorf and Co. (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 202; 57 L. T. Rep. 726; 12 A. C. 518), where he says: "When a shipowner . . . claims the benefit of the exception, the court will, if necessary, go behind the proximate cause of damage, for the purpose of ascertaining whether that cause was brought into operation by the negligent act or default of the shipowner or of those for whom he is responsible."

This is equally true whether the exception be contractual or implied by law. Deviation leaves a shipowner defenceless in the face of such a loss as occurred in this case. I have to add that throughout this judgment whenever I have spoken of "deviation" I must be taken to mean

"wrongful deviation." My judgment is for the plaintiffs for 4013*l.* 19*s.* 7*d.* and costs.

Orpheus Steam Shipping Company v. Bovill and Sons (a)

Demurrage — Certain rate at port of loading — Restricted liability of charterers—"Same rate to apply at port of discharge" — Liability of charterers not thereby restricted at port of discharge—"Working days of twenty-four hours each."

By a charter-party dated the 13th April 1915 the plaintiffs chartered their vessel, the O., to an American export company to carry a cargo of 6350 tons of grain from Newport News to Avonmouth. By a contract of sale the ownership of the cargo passed to the defendants. The charter-party and the bill of lading (which was to complete and supersede the charter-party) provided that the vessel should "be loaded according to berth terms, and with customary berth dispatch, and if detained longer than five days, Sundays and holidays excepted, charterers to pay demurrage [at a certain rate] . . . provided that such detention shall occur by default of charterers or their agents, and same rate of demurrage to apply at port of discharge," and further, that she should discharge at Avonmouth, "in accordance with the rules of the Bristol Channel and West of England Corn Trade Association." It was also provided that the steamer might discharge at all hours when the customs authorities would allow her to do so, provided that any extra expense in working at night or on Sundays should be borne by the party ordering the work. The rules of the Bristol Channel and West of England Corn Trade Association provided that a steamer carrying a cargo of 6350 tons should be allowed eight "working days of twenty-four hours each" (Sundays excluded) to discharge. The O. arrived off Avonmouth at 8.15 a.m. on Tuesday, the 6th July, and by the terms of the charter-party and bill of lading the lay days began at that time. The discharge was finished at 5 p.m. on the 23rd July. The plaintiffs claimed demurrage in respect of eight days nine hours, alleging that (allowing for exclusion of Sunday, the 11th July) the lay days ended at 8.15 a.m. on the 15th July.

Held, (1) that the provision that the same rate of demurrage should apply at the port of discharge as at the port of shipment did not necessarily imply that the liability of the charterers was restricted at the port of discharge as at the port of shipment; and (2) that "a working day of twenty-four hours" meant a period of twenty-four hours commencing at the time when the ship was ready to discharge, excluding Sundays and certain other excepted days. Judgment was therefore entered for the plaintiffs.

(a) Reported by Leonard C. Thomas, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Commercial Court.

Action tried by Scrutton, J.

By a charter-party dated the 13th April 1915 the Grain Growers Export Company of Winnipeg chartered from the agents of the plaintiffs the steamship Orpheus, a vessel of 2731 tons registered tonnage, to carry a cargo of 6350 tons of oats from Newport News to (inter alia) Avonmouth. The charter-party further provided that

If ordered to Avonmouth, vessel to discharge in accordance with the rules of the Bristol Channel and West of England Corn Trade Association, time to count from arrival off Avonmouth whether berthed or not. . . . Steamer to be loaded according to berth terms, with customary berth dispatch, and if detained longer that five days, Sundays and holidays excepted, charterers to pay demurrage at the rate of 8*d.* British sterling or its equivalent per net register ton per day, or pro rata, payable day by day, provided such detention shall occur by default of charterers or their agents, and same rate of demurrage to apply at port of discharge.

The bill of lading, the signing of which was to complete and supersede the charter-party, provided that the Steamer may commence discharging immediately on arrival and discharge continuously, at all such hours as the Customs House authorities may give permission for the ship to work, any custom of the port to the contrary notwithstanding, provided that all extra expense in working at night or on Sundays or on holidays shall be borne by the party ordering such work.

Rule 4 of the rules of the Bristol Channel and West of England Corn Trade Association was as follows:

Discharge Clause.—Sellers undertake that if the grain forming the subject-matter of the contract shall be carried by general steamer loading on the berth, the time for discharging such grain shall be regulated according to the scale printed below:

	If discharged at Avonmouth Dock or Portishead Dock, whether the grain forms the entire cargo or forms part of cargo.
For steamers carrying not exceeding 2750 tons of grain	5
Exceeding 2750 tons and not exceeding 4800 tons	6
Exceeding 4800 tons, one extra day for each extra 1000 tons or part thereof	Working days of twenty-four hours each.

Working days under this contract are exclusive of Sundays, Good Fridays, Christmas Day, and Bank Holidays, and begin to run at Avonmouth or Portishead Dock from the time of the steamer being berthed and ready to discharge . . . except on Saturdays, when if vessel is not ready to discharge at 8 a.m. the day not to count.

By a contract of sale dated the 7th April 1915 the property in the cargo passed to the defendants, Messrs. Bovill and Sons.

The Orpheus arrived off Avonmouth on Tuesday, the 6th July, at 8.15 a.m., and anchored at the place where vessels customarily lay waiting for orders to proceed into dock as berths became available. She received orders to dock at 3 a.m. on Friday, the 9th July, and was moored in berth at 5 a.m. The work of discharging was commenced on the following Monday, and was not completed until Friday, the 23rd July, at 5 p.m.

The plaintiffs now claimed demurrage in respect of alleged delay by the defendants in discharging the cargo. In their points of claim they said that by rule 4 of the rules of the Bristol Channel and West of England Corn Trade Association the time for discharging a cargo of 4800 tons was six days; that one extra day was allowed for each 1000 tons, or part of 1000 tons, beyond 4800 tons; and that as the cargo of the Orpheus was 6350 tons she was entitled to eight days for discharging. At 8.15 a.m. on Tuesday, the 6th July, the Orpheus arrived off Avonmouth and the lay days began, and, allowing for the exclusion of Sunday, the 11th July, they ended at 8.15 a.m. on the 15th July. The discharge not being completed until 5 p.m. on the 23rd July, the plaintiffs alleged that the defendants were liable to pay demurrage in respect of eight days nine hours, and claimed therefor at 8*d.* per register ton (i.e., 2731) per day — i.e., 762*l.* 8*s.* 1*d.*

The defendants contended that the time only ran from the time when the vessel was docked, and that by the terms of the charter-party not only did the same rate of demurrage apply at the port of discharge as at the port of loading, but that, for demurrage to become due at the port of discharge, the detention of the vessel must, as at the port of loading, not occur by default of the charterers or their agents. The defendants further said that the term in rule 4 "working days of twenty-four hours each" meant a "day" composed of twenty-four actual working hours. Where, they maintained, men were accustomed to work eight hours per day, a "working day" within the meaning of rule 4 would be comprised of three calendar days, as all hours when work was not in progress were to be excluded from consideration. Following this interpretation the lay days to which the Orpheus was entitled had not ceased when she finished discharging.

A. A. Roche, K.C. and S. L. Porter for the plaintiffs.

George Wallace, K.C. and Stuart Bevan for the defendants.

Scrutton, J.—In this case the plaintiffs, the Orpheus Steam Shipping Company Limited, bring an action against Messrs. Bovill and Sons, the bill of lading owners of the cargo, for demurrage. The defendants raise various points, one of which is of considerable importance to the port of Bristol, and perhaps elsewhere.

The charter was to take a cargo to Avonmouth if ordered there, the vessel to discharge according to the rules of the Bristol Channel and West of England Corn Trade Association, and time was to count from the arrival of the vessel whether berthed or not. I mention that point only in order to dispose of it. The loading clause says that the steamer was to be loaded according to berth terms with customary berth dispatch, and if the vessel was detained longer than five days, then the charterers were to pay demurrage at the rate of 8*d.* per register ton per day, provided such detention was caused by the fault of the charterers or their agents, and the same rate of demurrage was to apply to the port of discharge.

Counsel for the defendants says the "same rate of demurrage" includes the condition of liability, among other things, including the phrase "provided such detention shall be caused by the fault of the charterers or their agents," and says that if it can be shown that the detention of the vessel at the port was not caused by the fault of the charterers or their agents, the charterers shall be free from liability. In my opinion, that is putting on the word "rate" a meaning which I do not think it is possible it can bear. I think the word "rate" there refers to the sum per ton and not to the condition of liability under which it is to be paid. I say no more on that point.

The bill of lading, which is under certain conditions to supersede the charter, contains in the margin:

> Vessel to discharge in accordance with the rules of the Bristol Channel and West of England Corn Trade Association and to count from arrival off Avonmouth, whether berthed or not.

And also contains a clause that:

> The steamer may commence discharge immediately on arrival, and discharge continuously at all such hours as the Customs House authorities may give permission for the ship to work, any custom of the port to the contrary notwithstanding, provided that all extra cost incurred in working at night or on Sundays or holidays shall be borne by the party ordering such work.

The remaining document in which the contract is to be discovered is the rules of the Bristol Channel and West of England Corn Trade Association, of which rule 4, indorsed on the back of the contract, is as follows:

> Discharging Clause.—Time for discharging such grain shall be regulated according to the scale printed below. [The scale provided that for a ship carrying the weight borne by that in this case the time for discharging should be eight days.]

Then followed the words:

> Working days of twenty-four hours each.

There was also a provision that:

> Working days under this contract are exclusive of Sundays, Good Fridays, Christmas Day, and bank holidays, and begin to run at Avonmouth or Portishead from the time of the steamer being berthed and ready to discharge at railway wharf . . . except on Saturdays at either dock, when if vessel is not ready to commence discharge at 8 a.m. the day not to count.

The substantial point is, therefore, what does "working days of twenty-four hours each" mean?

The shipowners say that that means that you take periods of twenty-four hours, commencing at the hour when the ship is ready to discharge—not at midnight, but when the ship is ready to discharge—and going on continuously, except that you exclude matters you are told to exclude—i.e., Sundays, Good Fridays, Christmas Day, and bank holidays, and Saturdays in particular circumstances, namely, if the vessel is not ready to commence to discharge at 8 a.m.

The cargo-owners, on the other hand, say that clause means: You are to make a conventional working day out of the ordinary working hours of the port. The ordinary working hours of the port are eight to five. If, therefore, the vessel is ready at eight o'clock on a particular day, you are to take from eight to five of that day—Mr. Wallace is not sure whether you should exclude the luncheon hour—then you are to go from five to eight o'clock next working day.

He says it is immaterial that after five o'clock in the clause in the bill of lading the ship has power to work, and it may be in view of the odd words that the charterer has power to require the ship to work. It may be, though it is immaterial—although he is inclined to think that if work is done in fact the hours will count.

The practical difference between the two contentions is that, if the ship's version is right, a considerable sum for demurrage is payable; if the charterer's version is right, if there were provision for dispatch money, the charterer would have earned a considerable amount of dispatch money because he has done the discharging well within the time he says.

One has the advantage or disadvantage of reported decisions on clauses which are rather like this in charters which are rather like this, and in my view a judge is not bound by a decision on a charter rather like the one he is considering unless he can extract some principle which it is obvious that he should follow.

A day or running day is a consecutive day of the calendar from midnight to midnight. You cut down a running day by speaking of working day. It has been decided in several cases, and the case of Saxon Steamship Company Limited v. Union Steamship Company Limited (9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 114; 83 L. T. Rep. 106) is one example that a working day does not mean the day on which the work is done, but a day on which it can be done, and that a working day ordinarily is twenty-four hours from midnight to midnight, part of it being the time in which work is ordinarily done.

There came before the courts a question of what happened if you worked part of the day, the case of The Katy (7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 527; 71 L. T. Rep. 709; (1895) P. 56) being the first authority in which the matter was prominently brought forward. The Court of Appeal said that if you begin late in the day on work you may infer that the whole day is to count. You are entitled to a whole day, and then if you do not begin till part of the day has gone, the day does count against you.

This brought the attention of shipowners and charterers to the fact that you may be zealous in discharging a ship and find yourself charged with a whole day, although you had only enjoyed the benefit of part it, and, in my view, that was why the shipowners and charterers began to put in their charters "working days of twenty-four hours each" meaning that when you were entitled to so many days you would have days of twenty-four hours and not days of six hours, because if you had worked only six hours it would be treated as a whole day. Shortly after that clause began to get into charters a case arose on a complicated charter which went to the House of Lords.

In that case, Forest Steamship Company v. Iberian Iron Company (9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 1; 81 L. T. Rep. 563), the charter-party provided that the charterers were

> To be allowed 350 tons per working day of twenty-four hours, weather permitting (Sundays and holidays excepted), for loading and discharging . . . to count from six a.m. of the day following the day when steamer is reported at the Custom House, unless she be reported before noon, in which case time to count from notice of readiness and in every respect ready to load or discharge respectively and in free pratique. Steamer to work at night if required, also on Sundays and holidays, such days not to count as lay days unless used.

Having to interpret that the question was raised, what did these people mean when they talked about a working day of twenty-four hours? Did they mean a calendar day from midnight to midnight, which is twenty-four hours? It was said against that that to give some meaning to the twenty-four hours you must make it a conventional day and add up the times to count and exclude the times that are not to count. The House of Lords decided that a conventional day was the right meaning.

In 1910, in the case of Watson Brothers Shipping Company Limited v. Mysore Manganese Company Limited (11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 364; 102 L. T. Rep. 169), a similar form of charter-party came before Hamilton, J. There again there was a very complicated series of provisions, the new provision being that it was to be shipped and discharged at the rate of 500 tons per "clear" working day of twenty-four hours. The same contention was raised in that case, and Hamilton, J. decided in favour of the contention that it was not a calendar day but a conventional day, made up of periods. But in doing so he undoubtedly used some language which suggested that it was to be made up of usual hours of working at the port, and not the hours which were unusual hours, but which the shipowners or charterers could desire each other to work. He says: "It does not seem to me that the circumstance that the charterer stipulates that if he can arrange to work in hours when ordinarily men in the port would not work he is to be entitled to call upon the ship to allow work to be done prevents the working day of twenty-four hours mentioned in the charter-party from being in itself a day made up of working hours whenever they may occur. I take it that if he does require the ship to work in hours not usually worked on, and the ship complies with its obligation, the shipper could not deny that such hours having been used were part of the working day of twenty-four hours; but I do not think that the fact that the ship is bound to work if requested, while the charterer is not so bound unless he chooses, entitles the ship to say: "The day for the purpose of this charter-party is a day and a night, twenty-four hours consecutively within which I may be called upon to work during the whole twenty-four hours at the charterer's option."

It is quite unnecessary to say that I usually follow with the greatest respect any opinion of Lord Sumner, but I find great difficulty in following that passage. These being the authorities I turn to the rule.

The rule provides that you are not to take from midnight to midnight, but from the hour the ship is ready to discharge, with a proviso that if that is after eight o'clock on a Saturday you are not to count that day. From that hour you are to take working days of twenty-four hours, but you are to exclude Sundays, Good Fridays, Christmas Day, and bank holidays, and Saturday if the vessel is only ready to discharge after eight o'clock. There is no provision that you are to exclude anything else. There is no provision as there was in the other cases about what you are to do with the period after the working hours.

In Forest Steamship Company v. Iberian Iron Ore Company (sup.) you were not to count that; in the other case you have to do so. In this case there is no provision either authorising you to exclude it or saying what will happen if it is worked. In these circumstances it seems to me that it is part of the working day. It is a day on which work can be done between the parties and the parties can require work to be done during that time. I see no reason to exclude it.

I have dealt with that on the construction of the documents. On that construction the plaintiffs are right and the defendants are wrong.

It is further said that I ought to come to the same conclusion because everybody at Bristol thinks it is the right one; and a large quantity of evidence has been given by witnesses, some of whose names I recognise as those of people concerned in the Bristol trade. They say that for the last ten years Bristol people, and everyone who came to Bristol, had thought it means this, and had settled disputes on the basis that it does mean it.

I am doubtful whether I ought to recognise that evidence. Mr. Wallace admits that the evidence does show that people at Bristol for ten years or so have thought the words mean what I say and acted on that supposition. He is not able to call evidence to contradict it.

It is clear that if that goes on long enough a custom or usage will be established showing what the words mean in cases where the words without such evidence are ambiguous. The case cited by Mr. Roche, where thirty years' practice was treated by the Court of Appeal as showing what was meant, is sufficient for that. But in this case it has not been in existence for much more than ten years, and I do not think ten years is sufficient to make a custom or usage. A little longer may, but I do not feel able to decide on the ground of the alleged usage.

It is some satisfaction to know, in dealing with the matter on construction, that I have decided in accordance with the views of mercantile people, but I do not decide it on that ground. I decide on the ground that the words mean what the plaintiffs say they mean. If that view is taken of the construction I do not understand that there is any dispute as to amount.

BLYTHE AND CO. v. RICHARDS, TURPIN, AND CO. (a)

Contract — Sale — No liability if shipment and delivery prevented by war — Increased freights owing to war—Impossibility of profit—Refusal of seller to deliver—Liability.

By a written contract dated Dec. 1914 defendants agreed to sell and the plaintiffs agreed to buy iron pyrites as produced at certain mines in Portugal to the amount of about 6000 tons per year for three years. Delivery was to be c.i.f. at Manchester. The contract contained this clause: "If war, epidemics, quarantine, strikes of men, accidents, diminution of output at the mine, or any other cause over which the sellers have no control should prevent them from shipping or exporting the ore from the river Guadiana, Portugal, or delivering under normal conditions, the obligation to ship and (or) deliver under this contract shall be partially or entirely suspended during the continuance of such impediment, and for a reasonable time afterwards to allow the sellers time to prepare to recommence shipments." Owing to the continuance of the European war freights rose to such an extent that the defendants found that they could no longer carry out the contract except at a loss. They thereupon gave notice to the plaintiffs that the "conditions of delivering pyrites under our contract with you have become abnormal, and therefore we must claim relief," and refused to make any deliveries at the contract price. The plaintiffs therefore brought this action, in which they claimed damages for the breach of contract of sale. The learned judge found that there was never any difficulty in effecting shipment in Portugal, that the words "under normal conditions" in the suspension clause referred to "shipping and delivery," and that "delivery" was "delivery at Manchester."

Held, (1) that "prevention" within the meaning of the suspension clause was physical or legal prevention, and not economic unprofitableness; (2) that a provision enabling the defendants to take advantage of a fall in the freight market, but to repudiate the contract if freights rose, must, to avail them, be in clearer language than that used in the suspension clause; (3) that the clause applied to shipping and delivery which were required to be effected under normal conditions, but did not apply to the intermediate transit; and (4) that it was doubtful what the term "normal conditions" meant in a contract made during a war. Judgment was therefore entered for the plaintiffs.

COMMERCIAL COURT.

Action tried by Scrutton, J.

By a contract dated the 8th Dec. 1914 the defendants, Richards, Turpin, and Co., merchants and sellers of ore purchased by them in Spain and Portugal, agreed to sell to the plaintiffs, W. Blythe and Co., chemical manufacturers carrying on business in England, 6000 tons of iron pyrites in each year, 1915, 1916, and 1917. The ore was to be delivered c.i.f. at Manchester in cargoes to be arranged. The contract contained this clause:

If war, or any other cause over which the sellers have no control, should prevent them from shipping or exporting ore from the river Guadiana or delivering under normal conditions, the obligation to ship and (or) deliver under the said contract shall be partially or entirely suspended during the continuance of such impediment, and for a reasonable time afterwards to allow the sellers time to recommence shipments.

The pyrites were to be obtained from mines in Portugal and shipped from Pomaron. In Jan. 1915 there was a sudden and great increase in the rate of freights between Pomaron and Manchester, the freight rising from 6*s.* to 8*s.* per ton to more than 15*s.* per ton. The result was that the defendants could no longer fulfil their contract with the plaintiffs at a profit. They accordingly sent a notice to the plaintiffs to the effect that the conditions of delivering the pyrites had become abnormal and refused to make any deliveries at the contract price although they were willing and able to do so at a profit to themselves at an increased price.

The plaintiffs in consequence brought this action claiming (1) a declaration that the defendants were not entitled to suspend deliveries under the contract and had committed, in the claiming to suspend, a breach of such contract; (2) a declaration that the plaintiffs were entitled to claim damages from defendants for so suspending deliveries.

A. A. Roche, K.C. and R. A. Wright for the plaintiffs.—The defendants have been guilty of a clear breach of contract for which the plaintiffs are entitled to damages.

F. D. MacKinnon, K.C. and A. E. Nelson for the defendants.—There has been no breach of contract. The defendants were entitled to suspend deliveries by the exceptions clause in the contract. The rise of freights in the early months of 1915 made the position abnormal. "Abnormality" in the exceptions clause meant a state considerably and materially different from that existing at the time of the contract.

A. A. Roche, K.C. in reply.—The clause does not protect the defendants as is contended. It does not apply to transit at all.

Feb. 28.—SCRUTTON, J. read the following judgment:—

Messrs. W. Blythe and Co. Limited, manufacturers of sulphuric acid, sue Messrs. Richards, Turpin, and Co. Limited for damages for failure to supply, between the 8th Dec. 1914 and the 12th Nov. 1915, certain iron pyrites from which sulphuric acid was to be made. The defendants reply that their failure to do so at the contract price was excused by an exception clause in their contract. There is very little dispute about the facts. The real contest and the difficulty of the case is in the construction of the exception clause.

By the contract the defendants were to supply for three years the buyers' requirements of pyrites, estimated to be about 6000 tons per annum, in lots, cargoes, or parcels as arranged at reasonably regular intervals during the year. Delivery c.i.f. Manchester, payment cash against invoice after assay is agreed, price 22*s.* per ton delivered. The pyrites were described "as produced from the mines in Portugal known as Guadiana ore." This ore, in fact, was produced by Messrs. Mason and Barry Limited, and shipped at Pomaron, a town twenty miles up the Guadiana River in Portugal. The depth on the bar and windings of this river limited the use of the port to vessels under a certain length and tonnage.

When the contract was made the present war was in progress. After its outbreak, for a short period, no one would enter into charters. After a month or so chartering recommenced, and freights from Pomaron to the West Coast of England were about as usual, rising slightly, say, from 6*s.* to 7*s.* 6*d.* a ton. The defendants supplied a part cargo of 696 tons under the contract. They had two steamers, the Mauranger and Trudvang, chartered for consecutive voyages during 1915 to 1917 at 7*s.* a ton Pomaron to Manchester. The round voyage had been thirty days. By difficulties of transit and congestion it increased to sixty days by the end of 1915. One of these steamers was torpedoed in May-June 1915, but the two actually carried some 16,000 tons of ore in 1915 at the same freight as was prevalent at the making of the ore contract.

The defendants sold some 50,000 to 100,000 tons in the year, and chartered other vessels to carry the balance. In Jan. 1915, in consequence of various economic and naval events in the war, freights rose very rapidly, and varied from 11*s.* to 20*s.* Pomaron to West Coast of England, some of the lower freights being for parcels of dead-weight cargo in boats on regular lines. This rise of freight would turn the defendants' contract into a losing one, and they were desirous of avoiding the loss if possible. They, therefore, on the 15th Jan. 1915 sent out a notice to all their customers:

> Dear Sirs,—We are reluctantly obliged to give you formal notice that in consequence of the British Government having commandeered a large amount of tonnage in pursuance of the war against Germany, and of other tonnage being held up through warlike operations, the conditions of delivering pyrites under our contract with you have become abnormal; therefore we must claim relief, and continued during the time in question to refuse to supply under their contracts at the contract price. They made fresh bargains to supply ore with such customers as would pay increased freight. The plaintiffs made one such bargain without prejudice to rights, and bought two other lots of pyrites from other sellers at a higher price against the defendants.

I need only further state that there was never any difficulty in shipping ore at Pomaron. More ore was supplied in 1915 than in 1914. There may have been congestion at Manchester, though I had no specific evidence of it. The buyers undertook to take ore at 350 tons a day. I had no evidence to show whether the state of the port prevented delivery at that rate.

The question which was argued before me was whether the rise of freights was a circumstance excusing the defendants, the vendors, from performance of their contract under their exception clause, to which I now turn. The defendants had covered themselves in the plaintiffs' contract by a contract with Messrs. Mason and Barry Limited for ore f.o.b. Pomaron. That contract contains the following exception clause:

> If war, epidemics, quarantine, strikes of men, lock-outs, labour troubles, or any other cause over which the sellers have no control should prevent them from shipping or exporting the ore from Portugal or delivering under normal conditions the obligation to ship and (or) deliver under this contract shall be suspended during the continuance of such impediment and for a reasonable time afterwards to allow the sellers time to prepare to recommence shipments.

In this clause it is clear that "shipping, exporting, or delivery" refers to what happens at Pomaron. It is also fairly clear that the defendants to cover themselves copied this clause with minor alterations and one substantial addition in their favour, as follows:

If war, epidemics, quarantine, strikes of men, accidents, diminution of output at the mine, or any other cause over which the sellers have no control should prevent them from shipping or exporting the ore from the River Guadiana, Portugal, or delivering under normal conditions, the obligation to ship and (or) deliver under this contract shall be partially or entirely suspended during the continuance of such impediment and for a reasonable time afterwards to allow the sellers time to prepare to recommence shipments; and then there is a clause at the end which is immaterial to this case. They inserted it in their contract, without considering whether it made any difference that their contract was a c.i.f. Manchester contract, payment by weight delivered, and that the contract from which the clause came was a contract for sale f.o.b. Pomaron.

I do not use the Mason and Barry clause to construe the defendants' clause, but I bear in mind in the attempt to construe the latter (1) that its language was obviously originally framed for a different subject-matter; (2) that as the material part of it was inserted in favour of the defendants, it must be construed against them; and (3) that, as frequently stated, an ambiguous clause is no protection. I think the term "under normal conditions," whatever it may mean, must apply to shipping and delivering.

Mr. Roche for the plaintiffs argued that "delivering" means the putting of the goods on the ship under a contract of carriage, which is the first step towards performing a c.i.f. contract. This argument is tempting, as it would give "delivery" the same meaning as in the Mason and Barry contract, and would harmonise with the later language "prepare to recommence shipments." But on consideration, I think it is more probable that the phrase in this clause refers to the delivery at Manchester, which is essential for payment. The question then is: Did war prevent the sellers from shipping or delivering under normal conditions? It is said that it did, because war caused freights to become so high that shipping and delivery under normal conditions was prevented, freights being higher than normal.

I have come to the conclusion that this argument is unsound, for several reasons. I think prevention by the matters referred to is physical or legal prevention, not economic unprofitableness. You are not prevented from buying a thing if you think its cost higher than you can afford, or that it is not worth the price. You are prevented from buying a thing by a given cause if, owing to that cause, there are none to be had. This appears to be the reasoning of Bailhache, J. in the two cases to which I was referred of Rolo v. Aquis (June 3, 1915, unreported) and Instone and Co. v. Speeding, Marshall, and Co. (114 L. T. Rep. 370), both decided on slightly different clauses.

In this case the defendants could, and did, get the ships, but as to some three-fourths of them at a cost which made their contract, if carried out by those ships, a losing one. The war did not prevent them performing their contract, but did indirectly by its action on freights make it an unprofitable one. If the defendants wished to say, "We will keep the benefit of any turn of the freight market which helps us, but if the market goes against us we will not perform our contract," they must, in my opinion, use clearer words than they have done.

But, further, I do not think this language is applicable to transit at all; it is applicable to the shipping at the commencement of the transit and the delivery at the end of it. Transit was not provided for in the original Mason and Barry clause, the contract being f.o.b, and it is provided for in this contract by the "addenda" clause inserted by the defendants and dealing with the perils, such as perils of the sea or restraint of princes, which may affect the goods afloat. This clause contains nothing about the transits being too expensive.

I have considerable difficulty in understanding what is meant by "normal conditions." It cannot mean the conditions existing at the date of the contract; at that date there may be quarantine, or a strike of a temporary nature, which clearly would not be treated as normal conditions; and I should have thought in war time there were no normal conditions, everything being subject to constant change and almost beyond prophecy. I do not see any difficulty in allowing the clause to operate on a number of ships, though the excepted peril would not hinder any one ship alone. This is in accordance with the view expressed in Crawford and Rowat v. Wilson, Sons, and Co. (1 Com. Cas. 277) by the Court of Appeal.

If I am wrong in the view that the clause does not protect the defendants at all, it may be that the fact that as to one quarter of their shipments they had old charters which protected them as to freight may cause the prevention, if any, to be only a "partial suspension" within the words of the contract. But the grounds on which I decide against the defendants are: (1) That here there is no evidence of prevention, but only of increased cost; (2) that the clause does not apply to transit, but only to shipment or delivery; and (3) that the defendants have not made clear what they mean, in a contract made in time of war, by "normal conditions" in war time, particularly as relating to cost of transit.

The plaintiffs are therefore entitled to damages, which I assess at 1900*l*., and I give judgment for that amount with costs.

CROSSFIELD AND CO. v. KYLE SHIPPING COMPANY. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Bill of lading—Bill of lading "conclusive evidence of quantity delivered to ship as stated therein"—Statement in bill of lading that goods were "shipped on board"—Short delivery—Estoppel—Authority of master—"Perils of the sea."

By a charter-party dated the 28th May 1913 the steamship K., belonging to the defendants, was chartered to proceed to Grindstone Island, New Brunswick, and there load a cargo of timber and therewith proceed to certain ports (including Manchester) as ordered. Freight was to be payable on measurement of quantity delivered as ascertained at port of discharge, and all responsibilty of the charterers under the charter was to cease as soon as the cargo was alongside. The exceptions included "perils of the sea." The captain or his agent was empowered to sign bills of lading which, it was agreed, should be "conclusive evidence against the owners as establishing the quantity delivered to the ship as stated therein." The charterers gave instructions that the vessel when loaded should proceed to Manchester. The K. was loaded from lighters, the contents of which was checked by surveyors as they left the shore. Owing to rough weather, a quantity of the timber fell between the lighters and the ship and was lost, but despite this the master of the vessel signed a bill of lading in this form: "Shipped, in good order and well conditioned, on board the steamship Kylestrome" the quantities of timber contained in the surveyors' reports. The result was that on arrival at Manchester the cargo was found to be short.

In an action by the plaintiffs, who were indorsees of the bill of lading, for damages for short delivery the defendants contended that the timber was lost through perils of the sea, since by the charter-party, the terms of which must be incorporated in the bill of lading, the responsibility of the charterer ceased as soon as the cargo was alongside, whereby the responsibility of the defendants commenced and the exception of "perils of the sea" came into operation.

Held, that the defendants were bound by the statement in the bill of lading that the whole of the timber had been shipped on board, and could not give evidence that certain portions of the timber had been lost after they had been put into lighters, but before they had been received on board.

(a) Reported by EDWARD J. M. CHAPLIN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

DEFENDANTS' appeal from a judgment of Bailhache, J. in the Commercial list, reported ante, p. 327; 114 L. T. Rep. 743.

On the 11th April 1913 the plaintiffs, Crossfield and Co., timber merchants, of Barrow-in-Furness, entered into a contract with J. Nelson Smith, of St. John, New Brunswick, to buy a cargo of wood which was to be shipped at Grindstone Island for Manchester on c.i.f. terms.

On the 28th May J. Nelson Smith chartered the steamship Kylestrome to load the cargo in question. By the charter-party it was agreed that the steamship Kylestrome should, with all convenient speed, sail and proceed to Grindstone Island, New Brunswick, and there load a cargo of timber, and being so loaded should therewith proceed to a number of named ports (including Manchester) as ordered on signing bills of lading.

The charter-party continued in these terms:

2. Freight payable on measurement of quantity delivered as and when ascertained at the port of discharge. . . . All responsibility whatsoever of the charterers hereunder ceases as soon as the cargo is alongside.

3. The act of God, perils of the sea, &c., always mutually excepted, even when occasioned by negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, or other servants of the shipowners.

12. The usual custom of the wood trade of each port is to be observed by each party on customary terms.

13. Captain or agent to sign bills of lading as per surveyors' return for the cargo, and, if required, for separate parcels and delivery accordingly.

14. Bills of lading shall be conclusive evidence against the owners as establishing the quantity delivered to ship as stated therein. The captain's or agent's signature to be accepted in all cases as binding on owners.

On the 28th June the Kylestrome arrived at Grindstone Island, and moored at the buoys at the back of the island. On the 30th June loading commenced, which was performed from lighters which carried their cargo stowed athwartships. The captain's agent signed the bills of lading in these terms:

Shipped in good order and well conditioned by J. Nelson Smith on board the steamship called the Kylestrome . . . one hundred and seventy-seven thousand two hundred and eighty-one pieces of deals, battens, &c., containing three million one hundred and seventy thousand five hundred and fifty-five superficial feet . . . in accordance with charter-party dated the 28th May 1913, the terms, conditions, and exceptions (including negligence clause) contained in which are herewith incorporated and form part hereof. In witness whereof the master of the said vessel hath affirmed to two bills of lading all of this tenor and date, one of which being accomplished, the other to stand void.—(Signed) J. F. KNIGHT and Co., Agents.—Harvey, N.B., July 16, 1913.

On the 17th July the Kylestrome left Grindstone Island. On arrival at Manchester it was found that the cargo was short by eighty-five standards. The plaintiffs in consequence brought this action against the defendants to recover 558*l.* damages for non-delivery of cargo, which they alleged had been lost. The defendants in their defence said that the cargo was lost while alongside the ship; that the loss was therefore due to perils of the sea; and that responsibility on their part was in consequence excluded by the exceptions clause in the charter-party.

Bailhache, J. held (ante, p. 327; 114 L. T. Rep. 743) that the words in the bill of lading "shipped . . . on board the steamship Kylestrome" were inconsistent with the provision in the charter-party that the cargo was only to be delivered alongside, and must prevail; that in consequence the exception of "perils of the sea" never came into operation, and the plaintiffs were therefore entitled to succeed.

The defendants appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 10.—The following written judgments were delivered:—

SWINFEN EADY, L.J.—The plaintiffs in this action, as indorsees of a bill of lading for a timber cargo, sued the defendants, who are the owners of the ship Kylestrome, upon which the cargo was loaded, for short delivery. The judge found for the plaintiffs for 588*l.* 4*s.* 11*d.*, and against this judgment the defendants appeal.

The shipment was from New Brunswick to Manchester.

It is not now disputed that the quantity of timber delivered from the ship at Manchester was eighty-five standards of the value of 588*l.* 4*s.* 11*d.*, less than the quantity stated in the bills of lading to have been shipped on board; nor, on the other hand, is it disputed that all the cargo, which was actually placed on board the ship, was duly discharged at Manchester. The uprights and surface of this deck load timber had been marked with paint at regular intervals, and the stowage was regular and unbroken throughout, and on arrival at Manchester showed no signs of any cargo having been lost.

How so large a quantity of timber as eighty-five standards came to be lost does not clearly appear. The loading of the ship commenced on Monday, the 30th June, and was not completed until about the 16th July, and it is only on one day that any loss from weather is definitely stated to have occurred. In the log, under date the 30th June, there is an entry, "A nasty choppy sea, causing lighters to roll, and losing a quantity of timber overboard," and in the master's protest of the 15th July he states that "On the 30th June I commenced taking in a cargo of lumber, and in consequence of the lighters striking against the sides of the ship, and from the strong winds and choppy seas and exceptionally strong current, a quantity of lumber in being transferred from the said lighters to the said ship was washed overboard and lost, and every effort was made to recover same, and a quantity was bruised, broken, and split"; and that "due care, diligence, and skill were observed in transferring the said lumber from the said lighters to the said ship."

No further details of the loss are given. It appears that the cargo for the steamship was brought down from the interior, and was loaded into lighters at Grindstone Island, and was checked and tallied into the lighters by licensed and sworn surveyors, and that such measurements are conclusive as between the sellers and buyers—upon these figures the timber is invoiced and the buyer pays. There is no further checking or tallying when the timber is brought alongside for shipment. It would probably be impracticable, except at very considerable expense, as the original entries with details of the lumber loaded into lighters occupied seventy sheets. The master signs the bills of lading for the figures arrived at by the surveyors, stating the whole quantity to be shipped on board.

The defendants contend that they are not estopped and precluded by the terms of the bill of lading (which incorporates the material provisions of the charter-party) from showing that the full amount of cargo stated therein was not actually shipped on board.

If defendants are entitled to show that a smaller quantity than that mentioned in the bill of lading was all that was really shipped on board, then it was doubtless proved as a fact that such was the case.

The bill of lading, dated the 16th July 1913, is as follows: "Shipped in good order and well conditioned by J. Nelson Smith on board the steamship Kylestrome, whereof David Muir is master, now lying in the port of Harvey, New Brunswick, and bound for Manchester, England . . . [then follows a detailed specification of 177,281 pieces of wood containing in the whole 3,170.555 superficial feet] being marked and numbered as in the margin, and are to be delivered in like good order and condition at the port of Manchester, England, unto Messrs. Price and Price Limited, or to their assigns, he or they paying freight for the said goods in accordance with charter-party dated the 28th May 1913. All the terms, conditions, and exceptions (including negligence clause) contained in which are herein incorporated and form part hereof."

Clause 2 of the said charter-party is as follows: "Freight payable on measurement of quantity delivered as and when ascertained at the port of discharge. . . . All responsibility whatsoever of the charterers hereunder ceases as soon as the cargo is alongside."

Having regard to the terms of this charter-party, and especially to clause 14, the plaintiffs contend that the defendants have bound themselves by contract to treat the bills of lading as conclusive evidence of the quantity delivered to the ship as stated therein—that is, as they contend, of the quantity "shipped on board"—and cannot now question the amount. A bill of lading is, generally speaking, primâ facie evidence against the shipowner of the shipment on board of the quantity of goods thereby acknowledged by him to have been so shipped, but it is not conclusive; the parties, however, may by contract agree to make it conclusive evidence, and the question here is whether that is the true effect of the clause in the charter-party incorporated in the bill of lading.

If the true meaning of clause 14 is that the bill of lading is to be conclusive evidence against the owners that the quantity stated therein as having been "shipped . . . on board" has in fact been actually shipped and placed on board, then the appeal cannot succeed; there was the short delivery of eighty-five standards, and it is not suggested that any lumber actually shipped on board was subsequently lost by any excepted peril.

The defendants, however, contend that clause 14 only means that the bill of lading is to be conclusive evidence of the quantity "delivered to ship"; that if, in accordance with the contract, delivery of lumber by the shipper alongside the ship, in lighters, or floating in the water, is delivery to the shipowner, so that his responsibility for cargo then commences, and his lien for freight then attaches, the bill of lading is only conclusive evidence of such delivery; that the words "as stated therein" refer only to quantity as stated in bill of lading; and that the words "as stated therein" do not refer to and make conclusive the statement in the bill of lading "shipped . . . on board."

It must be assumed that the parties to the charter-party contemplated that the bill of lading would be in the form in common use in the timber trade at the port of loading, which states the quantity of timber mentioned therein as having been "shipped on board," which can only mean actually shipped on board. What is the object of such a provision in a charter-party? This question was put and answered by Lord Esher, M.R. in Lishman v. Christie (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 186; 57 L. T. Rep. 552; 19 Q. B. Div. 333, at p. 338). He said: "What can be the meaning of such a provision but to get rid of the liberty of the shipowners to show that the quantity stated to have been shipped was not really put on board and to make the bill of lading an estoppel? The provision is a good business provision for the purpose of avoiding disputes as to quantity shipped where there is no dishonesty on either side."

In that case it was provided by the charter-party that the bills of lading should be conclusive evidence against the owners of the quantity of cargo "received as stated therein." Here it is "delivered to ship as stated therein." I see no distinction between delivered to ship and received by ship. They both describe the same transaction looked at from opposite points of view. The Master of the Rolls said (p. 338): "The provision is that the bill of lading is to be conclusive evidence of the quantity of cargo received as stated therein. How is any quantity stated to have been received by a bill of lading? By the word "shipped," of course.

In that case the express terms of the contract required the cargo which was to be carried to be brought alongside the ship at merchants' risk and expense, and excluded the custom of the port of Memel, by which the captains of ships took delivery of timber to be shipped at timber ponds a mile and a half away, the timber being subsequently rafted down to the ships; and it was urged that the captain had exceeded his authority in signing bills of lading with regard to goods for which the mate gave receipts a mile or more away, and which had been lost in rafting down. But assuming that the shipowner was bound by the bills of lading (as the court held he was), the further question arose as to the meaning of the words "received as therein stated"; indeed, the same point was open in that case as is raised here—that "received" did not mean more than received by the ship, and did not extend to shipped on board as stated in the bill of lading; and accordingly, as the owners were held liable for goods received by the mate at the timber ponds, that the owner ought to be allowed to prove loss by an excepted peril in process of loading while being rafted down the river.

It was, however, determined that the object of the clause as to conclusive evidence was to prevent that very kind of dispute and to make the statement in the bill of lading as to shipment on board an absolute estoppel as against the shipowner. As Lindley, L.J. said: "The shipowner has agreed to be bound by the statement in the bill of lading, and by that he must stand or fall." Fisher, Renwick, and Co. v. Calder and Co. (1 Com. Cas. 456) is to the same effect.

In that case, tried before Mathew, J., timber had been brought alongside the vessel to be shipped therein, and was then delivered into the custody of those in charge of the vessel, by whom it was properly secured alongside her by booms and ropes. Subsequently, by reason of violent weather, a quantity of that timber was lost before it could be actually shipped on board. The master signed bills of lading for the whole quantity brought alongside, without deducting so much as had never been actually shipped on board. In an action by the consignees against the shipowners for the value of the timber so lost, it was held that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover. Mathew, J. said: "In the shipment of timber cargoes troublesome questions frequently arise as to whether timber, which is found at the time of delivery to be missing, was lost before or after shipment. With a view to disposing of all such questions, the clause in this charter-party provides that the bills of lading shall be conclusive evidence against the owners of the quantity of cargo shipped on board as stated therein. What is contemplated is that the bills of lading should pass from hand to hand, and that the consignee should have by the acknowledgment therein conclusive evidence of the quantity shipped. In this particular case the shipowners have sought to show that the timber in question was lost by reason of the excepted perils. But I must give effect to the words of the contract. These goods never were shipped, and therefore the exception of the specified perils did not operate." Pyman v. Burt (Cab. & Ell. 207) cannot be considered an authority to the contrary, as the case was decided upon the grounds that the special circumstances were such as to prevent the conclusive evidence clause in the charter-party from being held binding.

I am of opinion that no encouragement should be given to a practice of signing clean bills of lading for goods which the master knows have not been put on board, and with the intention that the actual shipment shall be subsequently disputed.

In the seventh edition of Scrutton on Charter-parties (1914) the learned author states (at p. 58) that recently "shipowners have met the difficulty by adding to the statement of cargo shipped in the bill of lading a marginal note 'so many timbers of above lost alongside' or similar words. This seems to make the bill of lading contain no conclusive statement of quantity shipped, and it was so treated (by Bigham, J.) in Lohden v. Charles Calder and Co. (14 Times L. Rep. 311)." The bill of lading there stated that the full quantity of whole sleepers or half-sleepers had been shipped on board, but a note was put in the margin in these words: "Hereof about 1000 half pieces, and about 400 whole pieces lost through weather as per protest dated Riga, 5-17 Nov. 1897." In that case it was held that there was no estoppel (although the charter-party contained a conclusive evidence clause), as the bill of lading did not amount to such a clear statement of the quantity taken on board as to justify the court in holding that the owners of the ship were precluded from showing that part of the goods were not shipped on board the vessel.

In my opinion the effect of the conclusive evidence clause was settled by Lishman v. Christie (sup.) nearly thirty years ago, and a method has since been pointed out by which, by means of a note in the margin of a bill of lading, shipowners can protect themselves if cargo is known to be lost before actual shipment on board, and it would only unsettle the law if fine distinctions were now to be drawn depending upon slight verbal differences in the language of the conclusive evidence clause.

In my judgment the appeal fails and should be dismissed.

Phillimore, L.J.—The plaintiffs in this case, being the receivers of a cargo of timber delivered at the port of Manchester, sought for and have obtained judgment against the defendants, the shipowners, for short delivery. Hence this appeal.

There is no doubt that upon its final ascertainment it was settled that the cargo was about eighty-five standards short of the total quantity entered upon the bill of lading.

On the other hand it is not disputed that the ship brought all the cargo which she actually took on board.

No other explanations of the discrepancy are offered, except that the bill of lading follows (as it should do) the surveyor's return at the port of shipment, and that either the surveyor made some serious miscalculation or the cargo was lost after it had been brought by schooners or scows from various places further inland to the place where the ship was lying, and had been finally checked by the surveyor.

There was a statement in the log and protest which would account for some of it having been so lost. It is not very probable that the statement would cover so large a loss; but, having regard to the letter of the plaintiffs' solicitors of the 11th Feb. 1914 and other matters, I am of opinion that it was intended to try this action upon the supposition that the missing cargo had been lost during the loading operations and, if so, by perils of the seas.

The bill of lading incorporates all the terms, conditions, and exceptions of the charter-party; and by the terms of the latter all responsibility of the charterer ceases "as soon as per cargo is alongside" (clause 2). Certain perils are excepted (clause 3). The usual custom of the wood trade of each port is to be observed (clause 12). The captain is to sign bills of lading as per surveyor's return (clause 13). And the "bills of lading shall be conclusive evidence against the shipowners as establishing the quantity delivered to the ship as stated therein. The captain's or agent's signature to be accepted in all cases as binding on owners" (clause 14).

The defences raised for the shipowners are: (1) That if the bill of lading is to be construed as meaning that the quantities mentioned had been actually taken on board, the statement therein is not a statement establishing the quantity delivered to the ship as stated therein" within the meaning of clause 14 of the charter-party, and is therefore a simple statement by the master which, though primâ facie evidence against the shipowners, is rebuttable and was rebutted. (2) If, on the other hand, the bill of lading means that the quantities had been delivered into the possession of the master so that the shipper's risk was ended and that of the shipowner had begun, then the loss was subsequent and was due to a peril excepted by the bill of lading—to wit, perils of the seas.

For the second question, which I propose to take first, it is necessary to ascertain at what period of the adventure the risk of the shipper ended and that of the shipowners began.

For some time I was of opinion that the risk of the shipowners began at a period anterior to the actual shipment, and, indeed, I think that in the argument there was almost an agreement between the two parties as to this, except that counsel for the shippers would date back the dividing period even further than the shipowners need for the purposes of their defence.

In the case of Lishman v. Christie (sup.), decided in this court, and in some cases in courts of first instance, the dividing period was that which is usual in cases of shipment. The cargo had to be brought alongside at merchants' risk and expense, "alongside" meaning in ordinary cases by and level with the ship's rail, but very likely in shipments of timber or other bulky materials which must be raised by the ship's gear within reach of the ship's tackles.

In these cases the short period of time spent in the act of shipping is not treated as a separate period, and the master signs or should sign for goods so brought level with the rail, or in appropriate cases within reach of the ship's tackles, as "shipped on board."

Counsel for the shipowners contended that the effect of clause 13 that the captain was to sign bills of lading as per surveyors' return, coupled with the practice by which the final surveyor's return was merely an arithmetical result of the several returns made by the surveyors who measured the timber as it was put upon the several lighters up country, made the shipowners responsible at least for the totals of cargo put on board the lighters which arrived at the ship without apparent loss by the way, and counsel for the shippers (as I understood the argument) ante-dated this liability to the times of the original shipments up country. If either of these contentions were correct, I should think that whenever the shipowner's liability began the excepted perils also attached. Otherwise there would be two contracts by the shipowner, one of ordinary bailment and another for carriage upon the terms of the bills of lading. But upon reflection I do not think that either of these contentions is correct. The clause by which the charterer's responsibility ceases as soon as the cargo is alongside, though in form a cesser clause, sufficiently shows what is intended. There is no reason for giving "alongside" any other meaning than the usual one, which was that given to it in Lishman v. Christie (sup.).

The clause requiring the captain to sign bills of lading as per surveyors' return must be given a reasonable construction. By it the captain may be precluded from questioning the measurements of the original surveyors or the arithmetic of the final surveyor. But he is not compelled to sign bills of lading according to a return which neglects such an occurrence as the non-arrival of a lighter or its arrival with half its cargo. Nor is he compelled to sign clean bills of lading if after the arrival of the lighters he knows that portions of the cargo have got adrift before they were actually brought on board. He can either insist upon the proper deductions being made, or he can (as has been done in other cases) sign for the quantities specified in the final return, with a note that so many pieces of such and such a description were lost or are short. If there is a dispute, the matter must be settled by arbitration, as provided by clause 16 of the charter-party. If this be so, then the present case is on all fours with Lishman v. Christie (sup.).

In this case, as in that, the master was not bound to sign bills of lading which admitted without qualification that the sum of the quantities of timber collected up country had been shipped on board. Having, however, so signed and the conclusive evidence clause being in the charter-party, his owners were precluded from contesting the quantity, and could not rely upon an excepted peril as no such peril had occurred after shipment.

I should say a word on the phrase in the charter-party "as stated therein." I think that the meaning is that the bill of lading is to be conclusive evidence establishing not only the quantity delivered to the ship, but also that the total quantity is made up according to the details stated therein—that is to say, that there are so many "pieces," so many "deals and battens" containing so many cubic feet, so much "scantling," so many "deal ends" and "boards," and thus conclude the shipowner from raising, or successfully raising, the point raised in Mediterranean and New York Steamship Company v. A. F. and D. Mackay (1903) 1 K. B. 297).

Therefore I think that these words do not help the shippers. But, for the reasons already given, the second point taken for the defence fails.

As to the first point taken for the defence, that, if the words "shipped on board" are to be given their precise meaning, then the master had no authority within the conclusive evidence clause to make this admission, but had only authority to sign for what was delivered to the ship; if delivery and receipt are correlative terms, and if receipt is by shipment, then the master has, by signing the bills of lading, established the quantity delivered to the ship, and this is what he had authority to do.

I think, therefore, that the appeal fails.

BANKES, L.J.—This is an action in which the plaintiffs claimed as indorsees of a bill of lading for damages for short delivery of a quantity of timber. The bill of lading incorporated all the terms, conditions, and exceptions of a charter-party, and the main contest between the parties was whether, by the terms of the charter-party, the bill of lading was made conclusive evidence against the shipowner in regard to the quantity of timber short delivered at the port of discharge. Bailhache, J. decided against the defendants, the shipowners, upon the ground that he considered the case was covered by the decision of this court in Lishman v. Christie (sup.).

The facts of the case lie in a small compass. On the 11th April 1913 the plaintiffs entered into a contract with J. Nelson Smith for the purchase from him of a cargo of timber upon c.i.f. terms. The goods were deliverable to the vessel at Grindstone Island, New Brunswick, agreeably to the customs of the port. The contract contained a provision that the seller was not responsible for any deterioration of quality or condition after the goods had been sent alongside the vessel.

The provision as to payment contained the following terms: "The freight is to be deducted from invoice on foreign measure and paid by buyers as per usual charter-party and (or) liner bill of lading, which they hereby agree to adopt, remainder by approved acceptance of sellers, sellers' agents, or brokers' draft, payable in London in exchange for bill of lading and other shipping documents." "Foreign measure" was explained to mean measurement according to the custom of the port. Evidence was given by affidavit as to what the custom was, and a good deal of discussion took place before us as to what was the proper inference to be drawn from that evidence. It seems to me clear from the affidavits that in the case of wood goods dispatched from the interior, of which the present cargo consisted, the only measurements taken were those taken by the appointed surveyors when the goods are loaded on board lighters for the purpose of being conveyed alongside the ship. These measurements are taken in the first instance for the purpose of ascertaining the price to be paid for the timber as between the original vendors of the timber and their buyer or buyers, and the measurements may be (as they were in this case) taken by a number of different surveyors at a number of different places. The measurements so taken are checked by a selected surveyor. Having regard to the purpose for which the measurements are taken, this checking must, I think, be a checking of the figures as relating to the quantities loaded on board the lighters, and not as relating to the quantities which arrive alongside the ship. This conclusion appears to agree with what is stated in par. 3 of Mr. Nelson Smith's affidavit. The position created by the purchase contract, therefore, appears to be this. The invoice is made out on, and the buyer must pay for, the quantities of timber loaded into the lighters; but the seller must deliver the timber to the vessel, and is responsible for any deterioration of quality or condition until the timber is sent alongside the vessel—the seller consequently is responsible in damages for any loss or deterioration arising between the time when the goods are loaded on to the lighter and the time when they arrive alongside. The question which has to be determined in the present appeal has reference to the position of the charterer and the shipowner, and the contract of purchase can only be material (if material at all) as explaining the course of business and the custom of the port. The custom so far as it affects the position of the charterer and shipowner is stated in par. 4 of Mr. Smith Sleeves' affidavit in these terms: "For the preparation of complete surveyors' return all the returns so prepared as sent in to a selected surveyor, who checks the same and prepares a summary thereof; the total figures so arrived at are then inserted in a bill of lading which is presented to the captain or ship's agent for signature."

For the purpose of enabling him to fulfil his contract with the respondents, Mr. Nelson Smith chartered the steamship Kylestrome. The charter-party is dated the 28th May 1913. It provides (clause 2) for payment of freight on measurement of quantity delivered as and when ascertained at port of discharge, and that all responsibility of the charterers is to cease as soon as the cargo is alongside, the vessel holding a lien upon the cargo for freight and demurrage. Clause 3 contains the excepted peril, which includes perils of the sea. Clauses 12 and 13 are as follows: "(12) The usual custom of the wood trade of each port is to be observed by each party on customary terms. (13) Captain or agent to sign bills of lading as per surveyor's return for the cargo, and, if required, for separate parcels and deliver accordingly."

The parties in the present case appear to have expressed in their written contract the extent to which they intended to be bound by the custom of the port, so that no question arises with regard to the custom apart from the construction of the written contract. By clause 13 the appellants agreed that the captain or agent should sign bill of lading "as per surveyors' return." The result of this agreement is that in the present case the parties assented to the course of business indicated in par. 4 of Mr. Smith Sleeves' affidavit. The conclusive evidence clause is the one upon which the questions involved in this appeal turn. The custom of the port does not touch this clause, in the sense that the shipowner is perfectly free, so far as the custom of the port is concerned, to decide whether he will or will not agree to any form of conclusive evidence clause. The shipowner must be taken to understand what his position is when he has undertaken to sign bills of lading "as per surveyors' return," and he must protect himself by the language used in the clause itself if he decides to bind himself by a conclusive evidence clause, or by a note in the margin of the bill of lading, if the master is compellable to sign for a quantity not received. The form of the clause to which the shipowner in the present case agreed provides (clause 14): "Bills of lading shall be conclusive evidence against the owners as establishing the quantity delivered to ship as stated therein." Having regard to the other provisions of the charter-party, I think that the expression "delivered to ship" means delivered alongside in the sense that the goods have reached the ship and are under the control of the master, so that the responsibility of the charterer under clause 2 ceased.

The precise dispute between the parties may conveniently be stated at this point. The appellants do not now dispute that the out-turn of the cargo at the port of discharge was some eighty-five standards short of the bill of lading quantity, nor do they dispute that the bill of lading quantity was delivered alongside the ship, but they allege that the whole of the missing timber was lost by peril of the sea whilst being loaded from alongside on to the vessel, and they claim the right to give evidence of that fact. The respondents on the other hand say, "No—you cannot do that—you are estopped by the terms of the bill of lading from disputing that the full bill of lading quantity was shipped on board your vessel."

This brings me to a consideration of the terms of the bill of lading. The question of the proper construction to be put upon that document, having regard to the provisions of clause 14 of the charter-party, is the real question in the case. The bill of lading is in the usual form "shipped in good order and well conditioned by J. Nelson Smith on board the steamship Kylestrome." Then follows a statement of pieces and quantities as per surveyor's return. The concluding paragraph incorporates all the terms, conditions, and exceptions contained in the charter-party.

The appellants put their argument in two ways. Their first contention was that the bill of lading should be construed as an acknowledgment merely that the goods were delivered alongside. I cannot accept this argument. The language of the bill of lading is too clear to admit of any such construction. The expression "shipped on board" means and means only, in my opinion, what it says. The alternative contention is in substance this. If the bill of lading is to be treated as an acknowledgment of the receipt of the goods on board, then it does not come within the exclusive evidence clause of the charter-party at all. If the charterer had desired to bind the shipowner by that clause he should have tendered a document which dealt with the delivery of the goods alongside, and not with the receipt of the goods on board.

At this point it becomes material to consider whether any distinction can be drawn between the present case and Lishman v. Christie (sup.). In that case, as in this, by the terms of the charter-parties (though in different language) the cargo had to be brought to the ship at charterer's risk and expense. In that case the conclusive evidence clause was framed to cover "cargo received as stated therein." In the present case it is "quantity delivered to ship as stated therein." In that case the bill of lading contained the word "shipped" only. In the present case the words are "shipped on board." The argument in that case was, as here, that the conclusive evidence clause provided that the bill of lading should be conclusive evidence only that the goods were received as therein stated, not that they were shipped on board. In that case the charter-party contained no similar provision to that contained in the charter-party under consideration requiring the master to sign bills of lading in any particular form or for any particular quantity, but, material as such a clause may be as between as shipowner and the holder of the bill of lading, it does not, in my opinion, affect the liability of the charterer to bring the goods alongside. Under these circumstances I am unable to draw any sufficient distinction between the facts in Lishman v. Christie (sup.) and those in the present case to justify the conclusion that the decision in that case does not apply also to the present.

For these reasons I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

WULFSBERG AND CO. v. OWNERS OF STEAMSHIP WEARDALE. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party—Withdrawal by owners before expiration of term—Subsequent issue of writ for hire due—Whether withdrawal waived.

A vessel was chartered in June 1914 for five months at so much per month, payable in advance. On the 13*th Aug., a month's hire being due and unpaid, the owners telegraphed to the charterers, saying that they withdrew the steamer pursuant to a clause in the charter-party. Half an hour later they issued a writ in an action to recover the month's hire. Arbitrators found as a fact that the ship was properly withdrawn, but they reserved for the opinion of the court the question whether the notice of withdrawal, if properly given, was withdrawn or waived by the subsequent conduct of the owners in issuing the writ.*

Held, on the facts, that notice of the withdrawal of the steamer from the service of the charterers had been properly given by the owners, and that the subsequent conduct of the owners did not constitute a waiver of that notice.

Decision of Bailhache, J. (reported ante, p. 296; 114 L. T. Rep. 371) affirmed.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from the decision of Bailhache, J. (reported ante, p. 296; 114 L. T. Rep. 371) on an award stated in the form of a special case.

By a time charter dated the 19th May 1914 Messrs. Wulfsberg and Co. (hereinafter referred to as the charterers) chartered the steamship Weardale to be employed in, amongst other places, the Baltic, at the rate at 690*l.* per calendar month, for a period of about five months as from the 1st June 1914.

On the 3rd July the vessel was sub-chartered for a voyage to Archangel with a cargo of wood pulp, and on the 23rd July she sailed on this voyage, losing a propeller blade by the way.

On the 3rd Aug. loading was commenced.

On the 4th Aug. war broke out between the United Kingdom and Germany, the loading being stopped on that day by order of the harbour master.

On the 5th Aug. the owners wired to the master not to sail, but loading was resumed on the 6th Aug. and again stopped on the 8th Aug., on which day a month's hire in advance became due.

(a) Reported by EDWARD J. M. CHAPLIN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Loading was continued for a short time on the 10th Aug., stopped, resumed again on the 15th Aug., and, after various interruptions, was finally completed on the 26th Aug.

On the 27th Aug. the vessel sailed for home and was injured in the North Sea, arriving in tow at Aberdeen on the 15th Sept. and at Hartlepool on the 30th Sept.

On the 13th Aug, the hire being still unpaid, the owners telegraphed to say that in consequence they withdrew the steamer under a power enabling them so to do contained in clause 5 of the charter-party.

Half an hour after the telegram was received they issued a writ in an action to recover the month's hire, which was payable in advance.

On the 25th Aug. the charterers paid the hire claimed in the action.

Arbitrators, to whom questions in dispute were referred, found that the owners did in fact withdraw the steamer from the service of the charterers as from the date of the notice of the 13th Aug., and reserved for the opinion of the court the question whether the notice of withdrawal, if properly given on the 13th Aug., was withdrawn or waived by the subsequent conduct of the owners in issuing a writ.

The following findings of the arbitrators are material to this report:

We find as follows: . . . (d) That the owners did in fact withdraw the steamer from the service of the charterers from the date of their said notice of the 13th Aug. 1914. (e) That the steamer completed her voyage from Archangel to West Hartlepool and delivered the sub-charterer's cargo at the last-named port, and the owners collected the freights thereon, and that, while not admitting that they were liable to account to the charterers for the amount of the said freight, the owners have in fact accounted to the charterers for the same without prejudice to their rights and to the charter-party. (f) That the owners have not, in issuing the said writ or by receiving payment of the hire money thereunder, or by completing the said voyage and collecting the freight thereunder, or by accounting for the said freight in the circumstances aforesaid to the charterers or otherwise waived or abandoned their notice of withdrawal of the said steamer.

By clause 26 of the award the arbitrators found as a fact that the solicitor's telegram of the 13th Aug., which reached the owners before the writ in the action was issued, was in fact a withdrawal of the steamer.

Bailhache, J. held that in the circumstances of the case the notice of withdrawal had been properly given, and that it had not been withdrawn by the subsequent conduct of the owners.

The plaintiffs appealed.

Lord READING, C.J.—This is an appeal from the judgment of Bailhache, J. in a case that came before him in the form of a special case stated by arbitrators. The dispute between the parties arose under a charter in reference to the steamship Weardale. Messrs. Wulfsberg and Co. became the charterers, and the question in the case was whether the steamer was rightly withdrawn, in accordance with the terms of the agreement between the parties, from the service of the time charterers in the month of Aug. 1914. The facts are stated in the case, and I do not propose to repeat them, except very briefly, for the purposes of making plain the actual dispute between the parties.

The charter was in operation at the time of the declaration of war at the end of July, and also on the 4th Aug. when war was declared between Great Britain and Germany. The vessel was at Archangel. She had proceeded there, and was going to load, under a sub-charter which had been made in July, a cargo to be carried from Archangel to Aberdeen.

She had started loading on the 3rd Aug., and on the 8th Aug. a month's hire became due under the charter-party. Payment was to be made monthly in advance, and in default of payment the owners were to have the opportunity of withdrawing the steamer from the service of the charterers without prejudice to any claim which the owners might have upon the charterers. According to the charter, on the 8th Aug. 1914 390*l.* became payable, representing the freight or hire for one month running from the 8th Aug. to the 8th Sept. The vessel continued to load from the 8th Aug. until the 13th Aug., when disputes arose with regard to the vessel.

It is unnecessary to go into them in any detail. The consequence was that the hire was not in fact paid. Thereupon the owners on the 13th Aug. claimed the right under clause 5 of the charter-party to withdraw the steamer from the service of the charterers, and gave notice to that effect on the 13th Aug. The owners withdrew the steamer under the power obtained under clause 5 of the charter. Then, one or two hours after this notice was given by the owners to the charterers, a writ was issued by the owners claiming payment of one month's hire from the 8th Aug. to the 8th Sept.

On the 14th Aug. the owners telegraphed to the British Consul at St. Petersburg, giving him instructions to wire the British Consul at Archangel that he on his part was to instruct the master of the Weardale that if loading had not commenced the vessel was to sail forthwith for Barry Roads, and that if loading had been partially done then she was to complete the loading and sail for her destination—that was Aberdeen—under the sub-charter. And then he adds: "Ship withdrawn time charter; non-payment of hire."

The effect of that telegram was, of course, communicated to the master of the ship, who received it on the 19th Aug. On a later date the vessel sailed and arrived in this country, and, in fact, discharged at some time after the 8th Sept.; at any rate, she was completely discharged on some day apparently about the end of September. Upon that it is said on behalf of the charterers that the notice of withdrawal of the ship was, in fact, of no value for the purpose of the matter being determined by arbitration, inasmuch as, however good it might be at the time when it was given, it was waived or abandoned by the issue of the writ and the completion of the loading of the vessel and the sailing of the vessel for her destination under the sub-charter.

The argument addressed to us was that under these circumstances, on these facts, the arbitrators were bound to find as a matter of law that the notice of the withdrawal had been abandoned, and that the only point before us, and the only point before the learned judge, was whether on these facts the arbitrators or the tribunal as a matter of law must come to the conclusion that the notice of withdrawal had been waived or abandoned. It is not enough for Mr. Roche to persuade us that there was evidence upon which it would have been open to the tribunal, in determining the issue of fact, to conclude that there was a waiver or abandonment of the withdrawal of the ship by reason of these facts.

It is a question of intention to be decided according to the facts presented to the court. In this case I cannot accept the contention that the facts relied upon by the appellants do afford conclusive evidence. There is no appeal from the decision, unless the finding of fact can be changed into a finding of law.

I have already stated that the contention of Mr. Roche is, in my opinion, not supported by the evidence, and I do not think that the cases of Dendy v. Nicholl (sup.) and Croft v. Lumley (sup.) support the argument put forward on behalf of the appellants. I agree with the views expressed by Bailhache, J., that the findings are findings of fact against Mr. Roche's client, and, therefore, are not appealable.

It is wrong to say that on the facts which he put before us the court, in determining the facts, must as a matter of law conclude that there had been a waiver. It seems to me that the issue of the writ in itself amounted to nothing more than a claim put forward for payment of the rent or hire which was due on the 8th Aug. There is no authority which affords me conclusive evidence that the issue of that writ for the purpose of enforcing a claim then in existence amounted to a waiver of the right of withdrawal, which the person issuing the writ was at that moment asserting, and which he continued to assert by the telegram which he sent on the next day.

So far as this is evidence of intention it is quite plain that he was asserting that there had been a withdrawal. Clause 12 of the charter states that the captain was to be put under the orders of the charterers, and when the notice of withdrawal was given the owners immediately gave instructions to the captain that he resumed his employment under them. That is the explanation of the telegram of the 14th Aug. It is consistent with the case that they had withdrawn the charter; it is inconsistent with the case that the charter had not been withdrawn, or that the notice of withdrawal had been waived

It was pointed out that loading of the cargo was continued. The captain was entitled to do that and to keep the freight as he did for carriage to Aberdeen, and it seems to me to be quite immaterial that it happens that the port is the port of destination in the sub-charter. Therefore, I think there was evidence on which the arbitrators could find as they did find, and there is nothing to disturb their findings. We are bound by the case as stated by them. Bailhache, J.'s decision was right, and the appeal must be dismissed.

WARRINGTON, L.J.—I agree, and have nothing to add.

LUSH, J.—I agree.

I think that the terms of the notice which was given to the charterers on the 13th Aug. established that the owners had as from that date withdrawn the steamer from the service of the charterers. The contract having been once determined, no subsequent recognition can possibly revive it; in fact there is no evidence of any such recognition. In my opinion the charterers have failed to discharge the burden which was upon them. The result is that the appeal fails and must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

PHOSPHATE MINING COMPANY AND CORONET PHOSPHATE COMPANY v. RANKIN, GILMOUR, AND CO. (a)

Contract—Provision of ship—Exception of "public enemies and restraint of princes"—Outbreak of war—Failure to provide ship—Liability of contractor.

In 1913 the defendants, steamship owners, contracted to provide a steamship (to be nominated) in Aug.-Sept. 1915 to carry phosphate from Florida to Delfzyl, in Holland, up the river Ems. The exceptions clause included "public enemies and restraint of princes." In Aug.-Sept. 1915, during the continuance of a state of war between Great Britain and Germany, the Germans had assumed full control of the fairways of the Ems. All vessels bound for Delfzyl were boarded by them and compelled to take a German pilot. The ship's papers were overhauled or liable to be overhauled, and the channel was mined. Freights had risen since 1913 from about 13*s.* 6*d.* to three or four times as much. The defendants in these circumstances refused to tender a vessel, maintaining that they need only nominate one of their own vessels and, having done so, to rely upon the exceptions clause in the contract as they were prevented from performing the contract by "public enemies and restraint of princes." The plaintiffs, in an action for breach of the contract, argued that the exceptions clause did not come into operation until a steamer was nominated.

Held, that as the defendants contracted not as owners, but as contractors, it was not sufficient for them merely to nominate one of their own vessels and not to try to procure another steamer in the market; but that, on the other hand, it was not necessary that a steamer should have been nominated for the exceptions clause to come into operation, since such a conclusion would leave the defendants without excuse if the operation of the exception were such that it was impossible to procure any steamer which could, or would, undertake the voyage.

The German control of the Ems shut out from the market not only the defendants' own steamers, but also the ships of Great Britain and her allies, amounting probably to more than three-quarters of the tonnage available but for the excepted peril. Neutral shipowners would have been very reluctant of getting their ships under German control when proceeding under an English charter-party, and the cargo would probably have been seized by the Germans with the result that no freight would have been earned. The rate of insurance (if insurance had been possible) would have been extremely high. The defendants would have had to prepay the freight, or pay the premium, or run the risk themselves, or to have paid the shipowner such a freight as would have enabled him to cover the risk or induce him to run it.

Held, that, even leaving out of consideration the general and enormous rise in freights, it would be wholly unreasonable to expect the defendants to pay large sums of money, or to run big risks, or both, in order to deprive themselves of the protection of an exception inserted in the contract on their behalf.

Action tried by Bailhache, J.

A. A. Roche, K.C. and H. F. Andorsen for the plaintiffs.

Leslie Scott, K.C. and W. N. Raeburn for the defendants.

Roche, K.C. in reply.

April 17.—BAILHACHE, J. read the following judgment:—The defendants, who are steamship owners, made two contracts, both dated the 3rd Nov. 1913, one with the plaintiffs the Phosphate Mining Company and one with the plaintiffs the Coronet Phosphate Company. Each contract was in charter-party form, and each was to provide a steamship to be afterwards named to carry 1500 tons of phosphate from Tampa, in Florida, to Delfzyl, a Dutch port situated some distance up the river Ems. The loading date was to be between the 1st Aug. and the 20th Sept. 1915. The freight was in each case 13*s.* 6*d.* per ton. Both charter-parties were in the same form, and contained an exception clause. The material words to be considered are "public enemies and restraint of princes." The facts in both cases are precisely alike, and I shall treat the questions to be solved as though there was only one plaintiff and one charter-party.

On the 6th Aug. 1915, in answer to an inquiry as to the probable date of readiness to load, the defendants stated that they did not intend to tender a vessel, alleging that the state of war existing between this country and Germany made it both illegal and impossible for them safely to carry and deliver a cargo destined for Delfzyl. Some negotiations took place between the parties with a view to some compromise or arrangement, but they led to nothing, and the plaintiffs thereupon brought this action, claiming as damages the difference between the contractual freight and the market rate of 43*s.* 6*d.* per ton.

In order to appreciate the defence and the points at issue between the parties, it is necessary to state a few facts. The German fortress of Borkum is at the mouth of the Ems, and the Germans had before Aug. 1915 assumed full control of the fairway of the Ems. All vessels bound for Delfzyl were boarded by them and compelled to take a German pilot. The ship's papers were overhauled, or liable to be overhauled, and the channel was mined. Freights to Rotterdam had risen to about 43*s.* 6*d.*, the figure mentioned in the points of claim. In normal times freights to Delfzyl are from 6*d.* to 1*s.* per ton higher than to Rotterdam. On the 8th Sept. 1915 the plaintiffs' solicitors wrote to the defendants: "Our clients have already made some inquiries as to the rate at which other vessels might be obtained, and the best indication they have so far got is that a steamship was recently fixed from Tampa to Rotterdam for phosphates at 42*s.* 6d., and that the rate to Delfzyl for these parcels will certainly be more, and probably very considerably more than the rate to Rotterdam."

There was no evidence before me that any shipowner had quoted a rate to Delfzyl, but I have no doubt that had he done so the extra rate as compared with Rotterdam would have borne no relation at all to the ordinary excess of 6*d.* to 1*s.* per ton for reasons I shall hereafter state.

In August and September the plaintiffs sold some 10,000 tons of phosphate for Holland, but the Dutch port was Rotterdam or Amsterdam. They sold none for Delfzyl.

In the six months from the 1st Feb. to 1st July 1914 a considerable number of vessels had entered Delfzyl from American ports with cargoes, or part cargoes, of saltpetre, wood, and phosphate, and, of course, of all nationalities and some of large size. During the whole of 1915 the only vessel from an American port was the steamship Mizar, which arrived at Delfzyl on the 31st Aug. 1915, with a cargo of timber from a Gulf port. The only other cargoes taken to Delfzyl during this period were cargoes of timber, with the exception of three cargoes of iron ore, which latter were all carried in German bottoms.

I cannot reconcile the list furnished by the plaintiffs with those of the defendants, but it is evident from the plaintiffs' list, signed by the lockmaster at Delfzyl, that the neutral steamers entering the port between Sept. and Dec. 1915 were small Swedish boats from Scandinavian ports, and they all carried wood cargoes. During the same period steamers of all nationalities, except German and Austrian, were going freely to Rotterdam.

I shall have to mention some other facts later on, but the foregoing are sufficient to render the defence intelligible. Mr. Leslie Scott for the defendants raised three points: (1) That the defendants were entitled to nominate one of their own steamers for the carriage of the phosphate, and, having done so, to rely on the exception clause in the charter-party. (2) That the defendants were prevented from performing this contract by "public enemies and restraint of princes." (3) That it would have been illegal for them to charter a neutral ship, even if one could have been found, as she would have had to pay pilotage dues to a German pilot, and it would have been illegal for the defendants to make a contract involving such consequences.

Mr. Roche, for the plaintiffs, denied that any of these points was sound, and argued that the exceptions clause did not come into operation until a boat was nominated and it could be said that the boat so named was prevented from performing the voyage by the exception relied on.

As to the first point, the defendants own a fleet of steamers known as the Saint Line. They run from Galveston to Bremen, and their object in making this freight contract was to obtain some weight cargo for their steamers, and they intended to fill up with cotton. Unfortunately, as it turned out, they did not contract as owners, but as contractors.

I cannot accept Mr. Scott's suggestion that it was open to the defendants to nominate one of their own steamers, rely upon the exception, and do no more. Nor can I agree with Mr. Roche that the exception does not come into operation until an available steamer has been nominated. The former suggestion puts the exception too high, the latter too low. The former omits to notice that the defendants contracted not as owners, but as contractors; the latter would leave the defendants without excuse if the operation of the exception were such that it was impossible to procure any steamer which could, or would, undertake the voyage.

Mr. Roche put the same point in another way, and argued that as the defendants refused to nominate any steamer, even one of their own, they could not rely on the exception. The defendants were not, in my opinion, bound to go through the empty form of nominating an impossible steamer.

I pass to the next point. Were the defendants prevented from procuring a steamer to perform the contractual voyage as they allege? Now, if Delfzyl had been an open port like Rotterdam, they clearly would not have been prevented. They could have carried it in one of their own steamers, and the rise in freight would have been irrelevant, as I had recently occasion to point out.

Moreover, although freights to Delfzyl would no doubt have risen proportionately, and would have been some three-fourths more than to Rotterdam, yet the total rise would in such case be merely an instance of the general rise due to the war. It would not, ex hypothesi, be due to the German control of the Ems, and would afford the defendants no excuse.

Delfzyl was not, however, an open port, and the defendants were clearly prevented by the peril relied upon from carrying out their contract in the way they had originally intended; but, having made the charter-party in question as contractors and not as owners, it is no answer to the plaintiffs' claim to say that the defendants' own steamer could not go to Delfzyl. It was clearly the defendants' duty to seek other steamers if they could be found, and to do everything that could reasonably be required of them to overcome the difficulty created by the German control of the Ems.

The limits of the endeavours which the defendants were bound to make to procure some steamer to carry the plaintiffs' phosphate are indicated by a passage in the judgment of Lord Esher in Crawford and Rowat v. Wilson, Sons, and Co. (1 Com. Cas. 277, at p. 280), which, if I may paraphrase it so as to make it applicable to the precise facts of this case, would then read thus: "If owing to an excepted peril the defendants could not provide a steamer without doing something which it was wholly unreasonable they should be called upon to do, they would be excused although by doing an unreasonable thing they might possibly have provided a steamer."

This passage from Lord Esher's judgment has lately been referred to with approval in an unreported judgment of the Divisional Court, delivered on the 12th Jan. last, in the case of Corrie McColl and Sons v. Sargent and Son, and is, I believe, the test which is now always applied by the court to the problem presented by such a case as this. The difficulty, indeed, is not in the principle, but in its application to the almost infinitely varying circumstances of each particular case.

Applying the test as laid down to this case I proceed to ask what were the special difficulties which the German control of the Ems placed in the defendants' way? First, it shut out from the market not only the defendants' own steamers but also all the ships of Great Britain and her allies—probably more than three-fourths of the tonnage of which would have been available but for the excepted peril. Second, it was explained to me by experienced brokers, and I find as a fact, that neutral shipowners would have been very shy of getting their ships within German control and having their papers subject to German overhaul if proceeding under an English charter-party. Third, the cargo was a tempting one for the Germans. They are very large buyers of phosphates in normal times, and at the relevant time had been shut off from all direct supplies for months. Fourth, if they had seized the cargo no freight would have been earned.

In view of this possibility it is doubtful if the freight could have been insured. If insurable the rate would have been high. The defendants would have had either to prepay the freight or pay the premium, or run the risk themselves, or to have paid the shipowner such a freight as would have enabled him to cover the risk or induce him to run it. It is easy to see why the plaintiffs' solicitors wrote that the freight to Delfzyl would be very considerably higher than that to Rotterdam.

Now I ask myself: Would it be reasonable or wholly unreasonable to expect the defendants to find a possible neutral shipowner willing to send his ship to Delfzyl and to pay a freight calculated on the scale which such a shipowner would, under the circumstances, require, remembering, too, that there would be little or no competition for such a venture by other shipowners? I think it would be wholly unreasonable.

I cannot see my way to hold that the defendants were bound to pay large sums of money or to run big risks or both, in order to deprive themselves of the protection of an exception inserted in the contract for their own benefit.

It is a question of degree no doubt, and the dividing line between reasonable and unreasonable steps to avoid an excepted peril will be drawn at different points by different people, but the steps which the defendants would have had to take in this case seem to me well on the unreasonable side of the line, even after leaving altogether out of account, as I agree in this case I must, the general and enormous rise in freights.

I am, indeed, prepared to go further. The evidence has satisfied me that no neutral ship could, in fact, have been procured. The plaintiffs tried the market, but got no further than an intimation that the freight would be very considerably higher than to Rotterdam. They got no offer of a steamer. The defendants did not try the market (it would have been better if they had done so), but they called brokers of experience, who assured me that no shipowner would have entertained the venture.

I accept this evidence. It entirely coincides with my view of the probabilities of the case. I can see no reason why a neutral owner besieged with offers of cargoes to ports less open to objection should have accepted a charter to Delfzyl.

The evidence is, moreover, strongly confirmed by the fact that in 1915 only one neutral ship did perform an oversea voyage to Delfzyl and that with a wood cargo. If it is said "It is all a question of money," then the point is the same as that which I have already discussed, but in an aggravated form.

I am satisfied that the defendants could not have procured a neutral steamer to have performed their contract, and that their inability to do so was due to the excepted perils of public enemies and restraints of princes.

In view of my conclusions on the second point, it is not necessary for me to express any opinion on the third point (the illegality point), and it is perhaps wiser not to do so.

I ought, perhaps, to say a word about the measure of damages. The plaintiffs claim the difference between the contract freight, 13*s.* 6*d.*, and an assumed freight to Delfzyl of 43*s.* 6*d.* They did not charter against the defendants, but cancelled their contracts with their Dutch buyers as, under the terms of those contracts, they were entitled to do. In these circumstances the true measure of damages is, I think, that adopted in the case of Ströms Bruks Aktie Bolag v. Hutchison (10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 138; 93 L. T. Rep. 562; (1905) A. C. 515). The difference between the two measures is probably not large in this particular case, and I do not need to go further into the question. My judgment is for the defendants with costs.

HUMBER CONSERVANCY BOARD v. GRANT. (a)

Pilotage — Compulsory pilotage through mined area — Remuneration of pilot — Liability of shipowner.

In consequence of the war between Great Britain and Germany, certain coast defences became necessary on the east coast of England, among them being the establishment of a minefield in the Humber. The scheme of this minefield was confided to certain pilots, and the Admiralty directed that vessels using the Humber should be piloted through the minefield. The Humber Conservancy Board were requested to provide the pilots, for whose services charges were made. The defendant used the Humber for the passage of his vessels and took pilots aboard in compliance with the Admiralty order, but refused to pay pilotage fees on the ground that the regulation directing him to take pilots on board was ultra vires the Admiralty and void.

Held, that, apart from any statutory authority, the Admiralty had power to take the steps which they had taken, and that the defendant must pay for the pilotage services rendered to him.

COMMERCIAL COURT.

Action tried by Atkin, J.

The facts appear sufficiently from the headnote and his Lordship's judgment.

A. A. Roche, K.C. and W. N. Raeburn for the Humber Conservancy Board.—The Admiralty orders were issued under His Majesty's prerogative in time of war and under the Defence of the Realm Acts. The Admiralty were competent to issue those orders, which were good. The defendant has taken advantage of the services of the pilots and cannot now refuse to pay for them.

The Attorney-General (Sir F. E. Smith, K.C.) and Branson for the Crown.—The Admiralty had power to issue the order for compulsory pilotage through the minefield under the King's prerogative.

Hollis Walker, K.C. and C. M. Knowles for the defendant.—The orders of the Admiralty making pilotage within the areas named were ultra vires and void. Even if they were good, the defendant could not be compelled to pay for services which he could not avoid being rendered.

ATKIN, J.—This is an action by the plaintiffs to recover against the defendant, William Grant, of Great Grimsby, a steam trawl owner, charges for pilotage between the 28th Nov. 1914 and the 4th Jan. 1915.

The matter arises in this way. War broke out between this country and Germany on the 4th Aug. 1914. I mention that fact as one of which I am entitled to take judicial notice, and which I assume has come to the knowledge of the defendant and the persons whom he represents. Thereupon it appeared necessary to the Admiralty to take steps to protect these coasts, and in particular to protect the Humber, that being a part of the sea which enables the defendant by his trawlers to enter the port of Grimsby.

The Admiralty took certain precautions which have been made to some extent a mystery in this court, but which it is quite clear from the documents which have been read, and it was known, I have no doubt, to all the world, consisted of certain minefields in the Humber. The Admiralty, therefore, having created these defences in the Humber, the position of the navigation was that it was quite impossible that these defences should have been maintained as they were, and yet that free access should be given to the whole of the fairway to ordinary sea traffic, because our own vessels would first of all run the risk of being blown up by mines, and, secondly, if they were blown up by mines there would be the further disadvantage that they would disarrange the minefield.

Therefore, I think it is quite clear that it was essentially necessary that some provision should be made for defence, and there were only two alternatives. One was to obstruct the traffic altogether, in which case the defendant and those associated with him would not have been able to carry on their business at all, and the other was to entrust the secret of the minefield to certain persons, and to enable them to convoy vessels up the Humber through the minefields, and thereby enable navigation to be carried on. The latter was the course that was adopted.

It seems to me to be a course which was essentially necessary to be adopted, and the only course that could be adopted, and in order to carry it out Rear-Admiral Ballard, the admiral of patrols along the East Coast at this particular time, gave certain notices to the effect that all vessels would be required to take a pilot at a point which was outside the jurisdiction of the plaintiffs, who would pilot vessels through the danger zone and then they were at liberty to drop the pilot at a point that was mentioned.

The defendant's vessels were, in fact, piloted through this zone, and the defendant was thereby enabled to carry on his business. He says that these orders made by the admiral were ultra vires. I have not quite been able to follow how far it is said these orders were ultra vires. At one time the argument seemed to go to this length, that it was ultra vires to defend the Humber against the Germans at all; but I do not think that is the effect of the legal argument, and I do not think that Mr. Walker meant to put it quite as high as that.

It was further contended that so much of the orders as compelled the defendant to take a pilot was ultra vires, and that certainly so much of the orders as compelled him to pay for a pilot was ultra vires. I fancy the real point in the case is an objection by the defendant to pay for the pilots. We have had references to the authorities that entitled the admiral to impose this obligation upon the owners of vessels. It appears to me that it is an essential part of the powers of any Government, civilised or uncivilised, that it should have, at any rate, the means of ordering such measures as are necessary in time of war to protect its realm against enemies, and I think it is quite plain that the Crown in this country has, in time of war, the power, in connection with naval and military operations, to take such naval or military steps as are necessary for the defence of the realm.

It appears to me that there was ample power in the Admiralty to take all the steps that were taken in this case without needing any statutory authority at all. The steps taken seem to me to be steps which were essential for the protection of the realm as naval measures of precaution, and I think they necessarily involved the doing of that which was done—namely, the provision that the traffic of His Majesty's subjects should be continued as far as was reasonably possible, and in order to enable that to be done no other steps appeared possible except to provide that they should be guided through the danger zone by people whom it was thought might be safely trusted with the knowledge of the particular defences. It appears to me also to follow that if there was power to make these provisions there was power to say you must employ these particular people, and if you are going to employ them you must pay them. That is the extent of the orders which were made in this case, and I think, speaking from that plain point of view, every step which was taken here was well within the authority and jurisdiction of the person who in fact made these orders and issued these notices.

What really has been done in this case is that nobody has been compelled to take a pilot in the sense that when a vessel has arrived off the Humber a pilot was put on board her, but in fact people were told that if they wanted to arrive at their destination and did not want to be blown up, they must take a pilot, and they must not go to their destination without, because if they did, not only was there a peril to their vessel, which was in itself a matter of regard to the naval authorities, but they might, in the event of an accident, disarrange the mines. The defendant seems to have accepted that position, as he was obviously bound to do. I think, quite apart from any question of the validity of the orders made, that, having availed himself of the services of the pilots which enabled his ships to arrive at their destination safely, the defendant ought to pay for the services he has used.

But I also think that the orders made were made with complete power and complete jurisdiction, and that no objection can be made to them on the ground that they are ultra vires. I think, therefore, it is unnecessary to consider the question whether the orders that were made were valid under the regulations for the defence of the realm. All I need say is that I am by no means satisfied that these orders were not justified under the first set of regulations that were made, and also under the regulations which were made on the 28th Nov., but I need not discuss these matters because I am clearly of opinion that the orders made by the admiral were competent orders for him to make without any statutory authority at all, and in these circumstances the defendant is liable to pay reasonable pilotage charges in respect of the services which he has received.

I have only to determine the question of liability. Any question as to the particular vessels will have to be adjusted between the parties, and I understand there will be no difficulty in doing that. There will be judgment for the plaintiffs for an amount to be agreed, with costs on the High Court scale.

STEIN FORBES AND CO. v. COUNTY TAILORING COMPANY, (a)

Sale of goods—Contract—Shipments — Payment against documents on arrival of steamer—Refusal of buyers to take up documents—Breach of contract—Competency of sellers to recover price of goods—Sale of Goods Act 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 71), ss. 16, 17, 19, 49 (2).

By a contract of sale the defendants agreed to buy from the plaintiffs certain shipments of sheepskins. Payment was to be "net cash against documents on arrival of the steamer." On the arrival of the third shipment the defendants refused to take up the documents. In an action by the plaintiffs for breach of contract, the learned judge was of opinion that the defendants had in these circumstances been guilty of breach of contract. The plaintiffs in the action claimed the price of the goods, and on this point:

Held, that the price of the goods was not recoverable since it was not a sum payable to the plaintiffs on a day certain irrespective of delivery, and since the property in the goods had not passed to the defendants.

COMMERCIAL COURT.

Action tried by Atkin, J.

By a c.i.f. contract dated the 18th Sept. 1915 the plaintiffs agreed to deliver and the defendants to buy three cargoes of sheepskins to be shipped from New York to Liverpool. Payment was to be net cash against documents on arrival of the steamer. Two shipments were duly delivered and paid for and no disputes arose thereon. The third shipment, consisting of some 2000 skins, arrived at Liverpool on the 29th Oct. 1915, but the defendants refused to take up the documents.

The plaintiffs thereupon instituted these proceedings for breach of contract, claiming the price of the goods. The defendants denied the alleged breach, and contended that the price of the goods was not recoverable by the plaintiffs.

R. A. Wright for the plaintiffs.

Greer, K.C. and Elkin for the defendants.

The arguments appear sufficiently from the judgment of the learned judge.

May 18.—ATKIN, J. read the following judgment:—

In this case the plaintiffs are suing the defendants to recover the price of six bales of sheepskins agreed to be sold to the defendants under a contract dated the 17th Sept. 1915. The contract note is as follows. It is dated the 17th Sept. 1915, London.

The County Tailoring Company Limited, 1 Hoxton-square, London, N.—We beg to confirm having this day sold to you the undermentioned goods of our usual standard assortment and quality, mark: About 12,000 dressed sheepskins for prompt shipment, and about 33,000 ditto for shipment as quickly as possible (September, if possible) at 8*d.* per square foot, c.i.f. London or Liverpool. Payment: Net cash against documents on arrival of the steamer.

Then there is an arbitration clause. That is signed by the County Tailoring Company Limited.

(a) Reported by LEONARD C. THOMAS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The goods were shipped by three different steamers, in lots of ninety-four bales per steamship Devonian, 217 bales per steamship Bohemian, and six bales per steamship Den of Glamis. The first two lots were taken up and paid for by the defendants after some little delay; the question here arises as to the third lot.

The Devonian arrived at Liverpool on the 5th Oct., and the goods were paid for about the 11th Oct. The Bohemian arrived on the 13th Oct, and the goods were paid for about the 29th Oct. The Den of Glamis arrived on the 25th Oct., and the defendants have not taken up the documents. They allege that the documents were never tendered to them, and that they were not informed of the vessel's arrival until the 8th Nov., which date they say was outside the contract date for delivery, which provided for net cash against documents on arrival of steamer.

I am satisfied that the defendants were informed by telephone of the arrival of the steamer immediately after she arrived. It was said, however, that the plaintiffs should have tendered the documents to the defendants at the defendants' office. In the absence of any express stipulation to this effect, or some trade usage or course of business between the parties importing such a stipulation, I doubt whether the obligation on the vendor exists.

Sect. 29, sub-sect. 1, of the Sale of Goods Act 1893 appears to provide the contrary. That provides:

> Whether it is for the buyer to take possession of the goods or for the seller to send them to the buyer is a question depending in each case on the contract, express or implied, between the parties. Apart from any such contract, express or implied, the place of delivery is the seller's place of business, if he have one, and if not, his residence.

Then there is a proviso which I think is irrelevant. But if such an obligation would have existed normally I am satisfied that the defendants by their conduct absolved the plaintiffs of any such duty.

In the other two shipments the defendants desired delay in taking up the documents and expressly promised to come to the plaintiffs' place of business to take up the documents and did in fact take them up there. In the present case I am satisfied that the defendants made the same promises over the telephone. I think this objection fails.

It was further contended that the contract provides for only two shipments and not for three. I do not think that this is the true construction of the agreement.

Then it was said that the shipments arrived too late. There is no doubt that the goods were bought by the defendants to perform a contract with the Italian Government and this the plaintiffs knew; but they had no knowledge of any limits of time in such contract; and I think they performed the contract with reasonable dispatch and without departing from its terms.

Last of all it was said that the contract was for about 33,000 sheepskins, and that the contract was performed by the delivery of the first two shipments, amounting to 31,000. I cannot accept this view. In the absence of any trade usage to that effect I do not think that the first two shipments did amount to a fulfilment of the contract. The defendants received an invoice on the 26th Oct. for the further 2000 skins, and they made repeated promises up to and including December to take them up and pay for them. There seems to me no substance in this point.

The result is that I think the defendants have broken the contract. The material question that remains is as to the plaintiffs' remedy. The plaintiffs have sued only for the price. If they are not entitled to the price they ask for leave to amend and claim damages. I intimated that I should give leave, but the defendants intimated that they were not prepared with evidence on that footing, and should require an adjournment if such was the relief that the plaintiffs were entitled to. I think the defendants' request not unreasonable, and, therefore, there must be an adjournment unless I come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover the price.

Mr. Wright contended that the plaintiffs were entitled to the price, even though the property in the goods had not passed to the defendants, on the ground that here was a sum certain payable at a fixed time and that, as the defendants had prevented delivery, they could not rely upon non-delivery as a condition precedent.

I do not think that he can establish his claim on that footing. This is not the case of a day being appointed for payment of money and the day happening before the thing which is the consideration for the payment. In such a case, which falls within one of the well-known rules in the notes to Portage v. Cole (1 William Saunders, 5th edit., p. 320), the money can be claimed before performance. Such a case is provided for by the Sale of Goods Act 1893, s. 49, sub-s. 2:

> Where, under a contract of sale, the price is payable on a day certain irrespective of delivery, and the buyer wrongfully neglects or refuses to pay such price, the seller may maintain an action for the price, although the property in the goods has not passed, and the goods have not been appropriated to the contract.

But this is not a case where the price is payable on a day certain irrespective of delivery. On the contrary, it is payable expressly against delivery. I think, therefore, no action will lie for the price on this ground.

But it was further said by Mr. Wright that the property in fact had passed to the defendants and that upon the plaintiffs being willing to transfer possession they were entitled to the price as in the case of goods bargained and sold. I think that there are many objections to this view. At what time property passes under a contract of sale depends upon the intention of the parties. Sect. 16 of the Sale of Goods Act 1893 says:

> Where there is a contract for the sale of unascertained goods no property in the goods is transferred to the buyer unless and until the goods are ascertained.

Then sect. 17 (1) says:

> Where there is a contract for the sale of specific or ascertained goods, the property in them is transferred to the buyer at such time as the parties to the contract intend it to be transferred. (2) For the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the parties regard shall be had to the terms of the contract, the conduct of the parties, and the circumstances of the case.

The Act provides certain rules for ascertaining the intention of the parties unless a different intention appears. Many cases have dealt with the problem as to when property passes in contracts of sale on c.i.f. terms. Mr. Wright contends that as soon as the goods are unconditionally appropriated to the contract and the seller holds the documents at the disposal of the buyer the property passes. The value of that proposition depends on the meaning of unconditionally.

I doubt whether goods are appropriated unconditionally if the seller does not mean the buyer to have them unless he pays for them. But it seems to me impossible to lay down a general rule applicable to all c.i.f. contracts. The overruling question is: Does the intention of the parties appear in the course of the making and the fulfilment of the contract? By sect. 19 of the Sale of Goods Act 1893, sub ss. 1, 2, and 3, it is provided as follows:

(1) Where there is a contract for the sale of specific goods, or where goods are subsequently appropriated to the contract, the seller may, by the terms of the contract or appropriation, reserve the right of disposal of the goods until certain conditions are fulfilled. In such case, notwithstanding the delivery of the goods to a buyer, or to a carrier or other bailee or custodier for the purpose of transmission to the buyer, the property in the goods does not pass to the buyer until the conditions imposed by the seller are fulfilled. (2) Where goods are shipped, and by the bill of lading the goods are deliverable to the order of the seller or his agent, the seller is primâ facie deemed to reserve the right of disposal. (3) Where the seller of goods draws on the buyer for the price, and transmits the bill of exchange and bill of lading to the buyer together to secure acceptance or payment of the bill of exchange, the buyer is bound to return the bill of lading if he does not honour the bill of exchange, and if he wrongfully retains the bill of lading the property in the goods does not pass to him.

In the present case, the goods were shipped at New York on behalf of the plaintiffs, and the bill of lading was taken to the order of the banking firm who financed the transaction for the plaintiffs. On arrival of the ship the plaintiffs had to take up the bill of lading from the bankers; and, inasmuch as the defendants would not take up the documents, the plaintiffs had to take delivery of the goods from the ship. It seems quite plain that the seller or his banker reserved the jus disponendi.

It was said that the property passed to the buyer on shipment, but the seller only reserved his unpaid vendor's lien. That view seems to me inconsistent with the section I have read and with every business probability. In the majority of cases where the seller takes the bill of lading to his order the goods come forward through a banker, and it seems to me very improbable that the seller means to give to the banker or the banker to take a document representing goods the property in which is in some third person, the only security given being a right to retain possession till the fine is paid. I think the intention is to keep the property in the seller till payment.

Then it is said, whatever the original intention may be, at any rate the property passes when there is an appropriation of specific goods, as by the invoice in this case, and a tender or a willingness to tender. It would be a remarkable intention in a commercial man to keep the property on shipment in order to secure payment, but yet in taking the necessary steps to procure payment by appropriation and tender to part with the property before payment is in fact made. I think that in such cases the ordinary inference to be drawn is that the seller does not intend to part with the property, except against payment. It seems to me that this view is confirmed by the statutory provisions in sect. 19, sub-sect. 3 which I have read.

Unless the property has passed I do not think that in this case the plaintiffs can sue for the price; and in my opinion it has not passed. The plaintiffs' claim, therefore, is for damages. The case will be adjourned to enable the defendants to deal with the question of damages in case the parties cannot agree. There will be liberty to apply, and I shall reserve all questions of costs.

Case adjourned.

BARNETT AND CO. v. JAVERI AND CO. (a)

Sale of goods—Contract—"Subject to safe arrival"—Failure to deliver—Goods never in seller's hands—Liability of seller.

J. contracted to deliver to B. goods at a certain price ex Liverpool "subject to safe arrival." The goods were never delivered because J. never had them to ship. In an action for breach of contract where J. sought to protect himself by the clause "subject to safe arrival" on the ground that the goods had never "arrived" safely or at all:

Held, that the clause referred to the danger to which the goods must be subjected in course of transit and protected J. if any accident occurred during transit, but that J. was under an obligation to ship the goods, and judgment must therefore be entered for B.

COMMERCIAL COURT.

Action tried by Bailhache, J.

By a contract in writing dated the 24th Sept. 1915 the plaintiffs agreed to buy and the defendants to deliver four tons of hematine crystals at 2*s.* per lb. ex Liverpool. The contract provided that the defendants "booked for the plaintiffs" about four tons of hematine crystals at 2*s.* per lb. ex Liverpool, net cash against invoice and subject to safe arrival; delivery about three to four weeks." The goods were never delivered, and it subsequently appeared that the defendants had never had them to ship. The plaintiffs thereupon brought this action alleging breach of contract and claiming damages for loss of profits and a declaration that they were entitled to be indemnified in respect of their liability to a sub-seller.

Maurice Hill, K.C. and Harold Morris for the plaintiffs.—The provision that the contract was to be "subject to safe arrival" of the goods does not avail the defendants in this action. This phrase protects goods in transit, but there must be goods in existence for it to operate upon.

Langdon, K.C. and T. B. Leigh for the defendants.—There has been no breach of contract here. The defendants are protected by the words "subject to safe arrival" in the contract. The goods did not arrive safely or at all, and the contract therefore never operated.

BAILHACHE, J.—In this case I have come to a clear conclusion in my own mind as to the construction of the contract, and I will deliver judgment straight away.

The action is by Messrs. Barnett and Co. against Messrs. Javeri and Co., and it relates to the sale of hematine crystals. Hematine crystals apparently are some products of logwood, and they are used for dyeing purposes. The matter arises on a contract, the terms of which are sufficiently set out in the letter of Messrs. Javeri and Co. to Messrs. Barnett and Co. of the 24th Sept. 1915. That letter is in these terms:

> With reference to our conversation over the telephone this afternoon, we have pleasure in booking for you about four tons of hematine crystals at 2*s.* per lb. ex Liverpool, net cash against invoice, and subject to safe arrival; delivery about three to four weeks.

The point and the whole difficulty of the case turns upon the meaning of the words "subject to safe arrival."

Messrs. Javeri and Co. at this time had made a contract with a Mr. Whittle for the delivery to them of four tons of hematine crystals at 1s. 9d. per lb. I may assume for the purpose of this case that they had made such a firm contract. I am aware that there may be a difference of opinion about that which may have to be dealt with hereafter. No hematine crystals have arrived. We know from Mr. Whittle's evidence that crystals which he may have sold to Messrs. Javeri he expected to come from Alexandria; that they had not come from Alexandria in the first instance, but that these were a surplus lot to be sent back from Alexandria. As a matter of fact, these crystals come either from Jamaica or from America.

In this particular instance probably it was expected by Messrs. Barnett and Co. that they were coming from Jamaica. Various excuses were made for non-delivery, but there is nothing in the excuses that were, in fact, made, and I need not trouble to go into them. One was that they could not get vessels from Jamaica, which was untrue, and another was that there was an embargo on the export of these crystals from Jamaica, which was incorrect. Ultimately, on the 19th Jan. 1916, Messrs. Javeri and Co., finding it was quite impossible to get these crystals, repudiated the contract, stating that they could not get them. That repudiation was accepted a few days afterwards, and upon it this action was brought.

The whole question turns upon the construction of the letter of the 24th Sept. 1915. The words "subject to safe arrival" are new words now in a contract of this description. Years ago "subject to safe arrival" or words similar, such as "subject to arrive," and expressions of that kind, were very common indeed, but they have dropped out of modern contracts and have only been re-introduced since the beginning of the war.

The question, therefore, is: What do these words mean? Some evidence was given that there is, by custom among merchants, a customary meaning to be attached to these words, and that these words according to that customary meaning mean that the contract is off if the goods, the subject-matter of the contract, are lost in the course of transit, and that the words refer entirely to accidental loss, fortuitous loss through war, or perhaps by sea perils, in the course of transit.

I am not quite sure that the evidence was strictly admissible. I rather think that the construction of the contract is for me. It is not suggested that the words have any particular trade meaning, and I have really to give effect to what I think is their natural meaning, as I find them in a contract of this description. I only mention the fact that there was evidence to this effect, and I proceed to consider the words and the construction of the contract.

In the old days in cases where this matter has been debated the words in the contract have always referred to the arrival of a particular named steamer, and, speaking generally, the question has turned upon whether there was, or was not, to be found in the terms of the contract a warranty that the goods, the subject-matter of the contract, were in fact on board a particular steamer. Wherever there was such a warranty the vendor was to be held to be liable to deliver or pay damages for failure to deliver; where there was not a warranty the vendor succeeded, and the buyer failed to get either his goods or his damages. It seems to me there is a great deal of difference, a fundamental difference, between contracts which referred to the arrival of a particular steamer, and an indefinite contract of this description, which refers to no particular steamer at all, but merely relates to the safe arrival of the goods.

Messrs. Javeri and Co. have definitely contracted in this case that they will sell four tons of hematine crystals at a particular price, ex Liverpool, to be delivered within a period of three or four weeks, but they have protected themselves against one contingency during war time. We know of the activities of the submarines and the dangers of mines, and they have protected themselves against contingencies of this nature by providing that the goods shall arrive safely.

I attach a good deal of importance to the word "safely" in this action. It seems to me to show that what the parties are dealing with in this case when speaking of arrival is the danger to which these goods are likely to be subjected in the course of transit.

This contract for the sale of four tons of hematine crystals is subject to their safe arrival. I think under this contract the seller's obligation is, at any rate, to ship the goods, to pack the goods, or to get the goods so far under his control as to put them on board some ship or other. Having shipped them, if any accident occurs in transit, then he is not liable to deliver, because the goods have not arrived safely.

It seems to me that under this contract he is clearly under the obligation to ship the goods. In order to excuse non-delivery, the seller must bring himself within the exception provided by the words "subject to safe arrival."

In my judgment the plaintiff was right in this case, and the seller is without excuse. There is then the question as to the measure of the damages. We seem to have arrived at a common conclusion about that. The measure of the damages would, in ordinary circumstances, have been the value of the goods to the buyer at the time when they ought to have arrived in this country. They ought to have arrived long before the 19th Jan., but the buyer waited at the seller's request, the seller constantly telling him that the goods would come. The buyer, therefore, is entitled to take the measure of his damages at the date, about the 19th Jan., when the seller expressed his belief that he was unable to fulfil his contract. There is some slight difference as to the price at that date, the highest amount being put at 5*s.* 6*d.*, but, I think, if I take it at 5*s.* I shall be doing justice in the case. That will give, I think, a considerable sum, but that is the sum which the vendors have to pay.

LEYLAND SHIPPING COMPANY v. NORWICH UNION FIRE INSURANCE SOCIETY. (a)

Insurance — Perils of the sea — Exception of "consequences of hostilities"—Vessel torpedoed —Removal into harbour—Transfer to outer berth —Grounding—Loss—Liability of insurer.

The plaintiffs insured their vessel, the I., with the defendants against ordinary marine perils. The policy contained an exception clause by which "consequences of hostilities" were excepted from its scope. The I. was torpedoed near Havre. Although the vessel was badly damaged, the incoming water was kept under by the pumps, and she contrived to get into Havre Harbour. Bad weather during the night caused her to bump, and the harbour authorities, fearing she would sink in the inner berth which she then occupied, directed her removal to an outer berth. When the tide fell the vessel grounded, and the additional strain caused her to make more water. Subsequent tides caused further damage, and the vessel ultimately became a total loss. In an action on the policy:

Held, that the vessel was lost as a "consequence of hostilities" and not through ordinary perils of the sea, and that, therefore, the defendants were not liable under the policy,

Action tried by Rowlatt, J.

The facts appear sufficiently from the headnote and from his Lordship's judgment.

Leslie Scott, K.C. and W. N. Raeburn for the plaintiffs.—The approximate cause of the loss of the vessel was perils of the sea and not hostilities, and the defendants are consequently liable. The vessel would never have become a total loss if she had not grounded while in the outer berth.

A. A. Roche, K.C. and R. A. Wright for the defendants.—The vessel was lost through the entrance of water into her holds. That would not have occurred if she had not been torpedoed. Had she not been torpedoed she would never have grounded. Her loss was the natural result of the torpedoing.

Scott, K.C. replied.

ROWLATT, J.—This is an important case, and as I have made up my mind about it I shall give my judgment now. In the first place I had better give shortly my view of the facts.

This ship was torpedoed some miles from Havre, in the way of No. 1 hold, and a hole was blown in her side, which filled that hold with water. The crew left the vessel thinking that she would sink, but after a time, seeing that although she settled by the head, that settling was arrested, they returned to her, and found that there was 3ft. of water in No. 2 hold, showing that there had been some injury affecting the water-tightness of No. 2 hold. That water was kept under by the pumps. In that condition she was navigated to Havre and got alongside the Quai d'Escale. While there, on the Saturday night and on Sunday, operations were commenced with a view of lightening her and getting her into dry dock. The salvage pump was kept in the forepeak, and the ballast pump was put into No. 2 hold. There was this leak going on in No. 2 hold. It had been caused undoubtedly by the explosion, and there is some doubt as to its extent, because, although the deck log shows that the water was kept down until the vessel had been moored to the other berth, the engineer's log appears to show that the water in No. 2 hold gained rapidly on the ballast pump. At this period I have to consider the probabilities of what had happened to the bulkhead at No. 1 and No. 2 holds. The leak in the No. 2 hold may have been caused by the injury to the bulkhead making a small local hole or fracture without weakening its general stability. On the other hand, it may have been caused by an injury which did weaken the general stability. The witness, Mr. Swainston, said he thought the latter was the more probable view. I am bound to say that that is what common sense points to. There had been an explosion in No. 1 hold—an explosion, not a puncturing casualty, but a disrupting casualty—and undoubtedly the bulkhead between No. 1 hold and the peak had been very largely destroyed because the peak was full of water. Therefore I shall take it that the bulkhead between No. 1 hold and No. 2 held was seriously weakened.

That being the state in which the ship arrived at the Quai d'Escale, operations were commenced upon her. But unfortunately the weather became bad, and the salvage steamer, which had a pump on board, was ranging badly outside this ship, and the ship herself was also ranging badly against the quay. The salvage steamer's pipe was broken by the ranging, and the ropes that held her in position kept breaking. She therefore gave up pumping, and then the authorities at the port, seeing the state of affairs, did not like leaving the ship in that dangerous condition, as they thought, and ordered her off to another berth.

At this point I pause to make my conclusion so far. I think that when the vessel got to the Quai d'Escale she had got to a place where she would have been in safety if she could have stayed there. But you cannot say that a ship or anything else reaches a place of safety if the tenure of the place of safety is not permitted to be long enough to ensure complete safety. My conclusion of fact, therefore, is that if she could have stayed there and pumping could have gone on, she would have been likely ultimately to get into dry dock. But that did not happen, because the authorities of the port could not let her stay there. They had her moved to the Batardeau, where she took the ground by the hold. Therefore I conclude, and I think the evidence and common sense warrant me coming to that conclusion—that the ship was ultimately lost because of two combined causes—the weakness of the bulkhead and the grounding of the ship. The ship was open in the side, the shell plating was open in the way that the sketches show me, which suggests to my mind that there was a buckling of the ship by lifting, so that she ultimately became a loss by reason of her grounding there in the condition in which she was. I have endeavoured to state what I think are the grounds on which I come to my conclusion of fact.

What is the law? Primâ facie the vessel was lost by perils of the sea, but then there is an exception clause covering hostilities and its consequences to be considered. The question I have to decide is whether the loss was due to a cause within the meaning of that exception, and if that exception is applicable to the explosion of the torpedo against her side. Mr. Leslie Scott says the loss is primâ facie due to the inrush of water; that the defendants had got to bring this within the exception, and must show that the loss inevitably flowed from the explosion. If he means by "inevitably" that in no circumstances could she have been saved, I cannot agree with him. That does not seem to me to be what is necessary. When a ship is torpedoed on the sea, she may be saved and she may not. It is not inevitable that she should sink. With good fortune she may be saved. But if she does sink it does not follow that it is approximately owing to the torpedoing. In this case I have got to consider whether she really became a loss because she was torpedoed; we have got rid of that question of inevitability. I was referred to the case of Pink v. Fleming (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 554; 63 L. T. Rep. 413; 25 Q. B. Div. 436); but there, of course, it was an entirely new casualty which supervened; it was damage to the goods while the ship was being repaired. On the other hand, I was referred to the case of Reischer v. Borwick (71 L. T. Rep. 238; (1894) 2 Q. B. 548), to circumstances which in my judgment are not present here. I am bound to say that I have arrived at a pretty clear view of this case that the defendants are right. It seems to me that this is really a simple case in point of law. This ship was torpedoed. Every effort was made to take her to a place of safety. She never got to a place which was safe. She was never saved after being injured by the torpedo, and when you have said that you have said the whole of my judgment.

Mr. Leslie Scott says there was an intervening cause similar to that in the case of Pink v. Fleming (sup.). I can conceive that there were circumstances which thwarted the attempt to save the ship, but they did not constitute a new departure as a casualty. I cannot say more upon the law than that. Here you have a torpedoed ship which makes for harbour. She finds a berth where she might be saved if she could stay there. She cannot stay there, and she is moved on to a berth where she cannot be saved, and the struggles she makes there, in the course of which she receives further injury to some extent by bumping on the ground, are merely efforts to escape from that casualty in the grip of which she has been throughout. On these grounds I hold that this loss was due to the "consequences of hostilities" with the exception clause, and therefore that the defendants are not liable. I must give judgment for them with costs.

MITSUI AND CO. LIMITED v. WATTS, WATTS, AND CO. LIMITED. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party — Exception of "restraint of princes"—Reasonable anticipation of restraint—Breach by shipowner—Liability—Measure of damages.

The plaintiffs chartered a vessel from the defendants, who were shipowners, to enable them to fulfil a contract by which they agreed to buy a cargo of sulphate of ammonia from a Belgian firm. The charter-party excepted "arrests and restraints of princes," and provided that the penalty for non-performance should be proved damages not exceeding the estimated amount of freight. The defendants refused to provide a ship which by the charter-party they had agreed to provide, upon the ground that there was reasonable apprehension that if they fulfilled the charter the ship would be seized by the King's enemies. In these circumstances the plaintiffs were compelled to repudiate their contract with their sellers, and paid them, as the result of arbitration proceedings, 4500l. for so doing.

In an action by the plaintiffs against the defendants for damages for breach of the charter:

Held, that the defendants were guilty of a breach of the charter-party by not sending a vessel to load, but that as regards the amount of damages the proper amount to fix was the difference between the price which would have been realised by the sale of the goods in Japan at or about the time the vessel should under ordinary circumstances have arrived and the cost of the goods at the port of loading at the time of shipment together with the cost of freight and insurance, and that the penalty clause had no reference to general damages.

(a) Reported by EDWARD J. M. CHAPLIN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

Appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Bailhache, J., reported 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 300; 114 L. T. Rep. 326; (1916) W. N. 62.

By a contract, dated the 23rd April 1914, between the sellers, Evence Coppée et Cie., of Brussels, and the buyers, Mitsui and Co., of Lime-street, in the City of London, the sellers sold to the buyers 3500 tons of Russian sulphate of ammonia. The ammonia was to be delivered in bulk by the sellers free on board at Mariopol at the rate of 125 tons (minimum) per hatchway, with a maximum of 500 tons per weather working day, Sundays and holidays excepted. It was provided that any dispute or difference whatsoever at any time arising under the contract should be referred to arbitration.

By a charter-party, dated the 5th June 1914, between Watts, Watts, and Co. Limited as owners and Mitsui and Co. Limited as charterers, it was agreed that a steamer, whose name was to be declared at least twenty-one days before expected date of readiness, should with all possible dispatch proceed to Mariopol and there load, always afloat, a full and complete cargo of the 3500 tons of sulphate of ammonia in bulk specified in the contract of sale, and, being so loaded, should therewith proceed to Japan and there deliver the same, freight at the rate of 20*s.* per ton delivered. The cargo to be loaded at the rate of 125 tons per hatch, but not exceeding in all 500 tons per weather working day, Sundays and holidays excepted. Loading time not to commence before the 1st Sept., except by consent of the charterers, who had also the option of cancelling the charter if the steamer was not ready to receive cargo before noon on the 20th Sept. 1914.

"Arrests and restraints of princes" were included in the exception clause, and by clause 13 it was provided that the penalty for non-performance of the agreement should be proved damages not exceeding the estimated amount of freight.

Early in Aug. 1914 war was declared by Germany and Austria on the one hand and Great Britain, France, and Russia on the other. On the 1st Sept. the plaintiffs wrote asking the defendants to declare a steamship to load under the charter-party as they had not done so. The defendants declined to comply with this request, giving as their excuse the prevailing state of war. The plaintiffs attempted to recharter, but were unsuccessful. There was some suggestion of a possible steamer at 60*s.* a ton, and, had the plaintiffs secured the vessel at that price, their loss would have been 7000*l.* The plaintiffs thereupon repudiated their contract with the sellers and paid them, as the result of arbitration proceedings, 4500*l.* The plaintiffs then commenced this action claiming damages. They alleged:

1. By a charter-party, dated the 5th June 1914, between the plaintiffs as charterers and the defendants as owners or deponents, the defendants agreed that a steamer to be named twenty-one days before expected date of readiness should with all possible dispatch proceed to Mariopol and there load a full and complete cargo of sulphate of ammonia, not more than 3500 nor less than 3500 tons, and, so loaded, proceed viâ Suez Canal to one port south side Middle Islands or South Island, Japan, and deliver the same on being paid freight at the rate of 20*s.* per ton. Loading time was not to commence before the 1st Sept. 1914, and the plaintiffs were to have the option of cancelling if steamer should not be ready to load before the 20th Sept. 1914.

2. The defendants have wholly failed to perform the said charter-party. By letter, dated the 3rd Sept. 1914, the plaintiffs gave notice that they would hold the defendants liable for the loss resulting from their repudiation of the contract.

3. As the defendants knew at the date of the said contract, the plaintiffs made the said charter for the purpose of taking delivery of a cargo of sulphate of ammonia purchased by them under a contract in writing, dated the 23rd April 1914, from Evence Coppée et Cie. By reason of the defendants' said breach of contract the plaintiffs failed to take up the said sulphate of ammonia and have reasonably compromised the consequent claim against them by the said sellers by paying 4500*l.* and 30*l.* for costs. The plaintiffs have also lost the enhanced value (or profit) on the said goods had they been delivered in Japan in accordance with the said charter-party, and have incurred legal charges in connection with the claim of the said Evence Coppée amounting to 97*l.* 11*s.* 2*d.*

The defendants by their defence said:

1. The said charter-party is admitted and referred to for its terms, which included an exception of arrests and restraints of princes, rulers, and people.

2. The defendants admit that they did not send a vessel to load at Mariopol under the said charter-party, but say that, owing to piratical seizures of cargoes by the Turkish Government and reasonable apprehension of Turkey becoming involved in the European war and of the Dardanelles being thereupon closed, they were justified, by reason of the exception of arrests and restraints of princes, in not sending a vessel to load.

3. None of the allegations in par. 3 of the points of claim is admitted. In any event the defendants will contend that the damages therein specified are too remote and are not recoverable from the defendants.

4. The defendants will further, if necessary, rely upon clause 13 of the said charter-party, and will contend that the damages (if any) recoverable by the plaintiffs are limited to the estimated amount of freight.

Bailhache, J. held that the shipowners were guilty of a breach of the charter-party, and that the plaintiffs could not recover from the defendants the 4500*l.*, such damage being too remote, but that they were entitled to recover 3800*l.* as estimated profit if the cargo had been carried to Japan.

He accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

Leck, K.C. and Raeburn for the appellants.

Leslie Scott, K.C. and R. A. Wright for the respondents.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 29. — The following judgments were delivered:—

Swinfen Eady, L.J.—This is an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Bailhache, J. at the trial of an action before him without a jury. The plaintiffs brought an action against the defendants claiming damages for breach of contract contained in a charter-party; the learned judge found in favour of the plaintiffs, and gave judgment for them for 3800*l.* damages. From that judgment the defendants appeal, and they have raised various points upon the appeal. The first question is whether there was any breach of the charter-party.

The defendants contend, first, that there was no breach of the charter-party at all; secondly, they say that, if there was a breach, the plaintiffs are only entitled to recover nominal damages; and, thirdly, they say that if they are wrong in that and the plaintiffs are entitled to recover substantial damages, then, having regard to a clause in the charter-party, the amount which they can recover is limited to 3500*l*. The learned judge has given judgment for 3890*l*., and they say that in that respect the judgment must be erroneous. The charter-party is dated the 5th June 1914, and it is agreed that the defendants were to send a ship, the steamer's name to be declared at least twenty-one days before the expected date of readiness, and then followed the classification 100 A1 or British corporation. The steamer was to go to Mariopol, in the Sea of Azoff, and there load a cargo of sulphate of ammonia, not more nor less than 3500 tons, and then was to proceed, viâ the Suez Canal, to Japan, on being paid freight at the rate of 20s. a ton. Then by clause 2 provision was made as to the rate of loading—the maximum rate not exceeding 500 tons per day. The loading time is not to commence before the 1st Sept. except by the consent of the charterers, who also have the option to cancel the charter-party on the forenoon of the 20th Sept.; and then clause 13 provides: "Penalty for non-performance of this agreement proved damages not exceeding the estimated amount of freight." It appears that the plaintiffs provided themselves with a cargo of sulphate of ammonia, having entered into an agreement for that purpose, but the defendants failed to send the ship. We were told that at one time the defendants had a certain ship which they contemplated sending, and that they intended to sell the cargo in Japan. Apparently the position changed; at all events the ship was not sent. Time ran on, and on the 1st Sept. the plaintiffs' agent wrote to the defendants referring to the clause in the charter-party under which the steamer's name should be declared twenty-one days before the expected date of readiness: "We observe now we are within twenty-one days of the cancelling date. Messrs. Mitsui and Co. will be obliged if you will let them have this information immediately so that they may advise the suppliers of the cargo," and the answer on the same date was: "In reply to your letter of to-day's date, as we already informed you"—there was some verbal conversation—"the above-mentioned charter must be considered as cancelled, owing to the war, our Government prohibiting steamers going into the Black Sea to load." After some communications between the parties, that was accepted as a repudiation, and the present action was brought.

The ground stated in the letter was inaccurate—namely, that "our Government prohibiting steamers going into the Black Sea to load"; that was written doubtless under a misapprehension; there had been no such prohibition. It may well be that the British Admiralty had looked upon a voyage to the Black Sea at this time as a dangerous voyage, and as one not being within the Government scheme of marine insurance; but the writers of the letter were altogether under a misapprehension in saying that steamers were prohibited going to the Black Sea to load. Except for the increased danger, there was no reason why the steamer should not proceed to the Black Sea to load. The Dardanelles were open at this time, and, having regard to the terms of the charter, the defendants were bound to send a ship to load this cargo. It was urged that at a later date the Dardanelles were closed, and that if the steamer had been sent not later than the cancelling date and had then loaded her cargo, having regard to the subsequent closing of the Dardanelles, the cargo could not have been carried to Japan. But there was nothing at this date to excuse the defendants from their obligation to send the ship to load.

In support of their contention the appellants relied upon Geipel and others v. Smith and another (1 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 268; 26 L. T. Rep. 361; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 404); but in that case, at the date of the alleged breach, the performance of the one entire contract had been rendered impossible by an obstacle which it was impossible to expect would be removed within a reasonable time. In the present case, at the date of the alleged breach there was nothing to prevent the ship going to load pursuant to the terms of the contract. In these circumstances Bailhache, J. said: "No authority was cited to me in support of the defendants' proposition that a breach of contract is excused by reasonable anticipation of the happening of an event which, if it happens, will excuse the performance of the contract, and, in my opinion, such a proposition will not bear examination. The closing of the Dardanelles was too late for the defendants, whether one treats their refusal to send the Henley as a repudiation of this contract accepted by the plaintiffs or whether one regards the contract as still open down to the 20th Sept. The defendants were entirely without excuse, and the breach alleged is proved." I concur in the view of the learned judge, and in my opinion it is clear in this case that the defendants committed a breach of their contract in not sending the ship to load pursuant to the charter-party.

The second point which was urged on behalf of the defendants is this: They say that, assuming there was a breach of the contract, the plaintiffs are only entitled to nominal damages, and they put it in this way. It was not the breach of the contract that caused the failure of carriage of this sulphate of ammonia to Japan, because, apart from the breach, the goods could not have been carried to Japan. On the facts found by the learned judge, having regard to the cancelling date, namely, the 30th Sept., and to the maximum rate of loading—500 tons a day—and to the quantity of cargo to be shipped—3500 tons—it would have taken seven working days to load the ship, and then, having regard to the time that the steamer would take to proceed from Mariopol, in the Sea of Azoff, through the Dardanelles, by the time the steamer arrived at the Dardanelles they would have been closed, and closed perhaps for several days, and it was the closing of the Dardanelles that in any case prevented the cargo from going to Japan; the voyage would have been prevented by a restraint of princes and the defendants would then have been under no liability. That is the way it is put, but it seems to me that that is only putting part of the proposition. If the ship had been loaded, in the events that have happened the plaintiffs would have obtained the same benefit as if the goods had been carried to Japan. In considering whether the plaintiffs are entitled to recover anything more than nominal damages, regard must be had to the ordinary rule as to the measure of damages in an action for breach of contract. When two parties have made a contract which one of them has broken, the damages which the other party ought to receive in respect of such breach of contract should be such as may fairly and reasonably be considered to arise naturally according to the usual course of business. That is the ordinary rule as laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale (9 Ex. 341). If you apply that rule to the facts of this present case, what would have happened? Assuming the defendants had sent the ship pursuant to the contract, the ship would have been sent to Mariopol, the sulphate of ammonia would have been loaded on board, proper insurances on the cargo would have been effected, and the shipper would have been in this position: Either the ship would arrive in due course in Japan and he would receive the proceeds of the sale of the cargo there, or, in default, supposing that the ship was prevented by a restraint of princes or some other reason, he would have been entitled to recover the loss in one way or the other; either under the policy or by reason of the safe arrival of the ship he would have obtained the benefit of his contract.

In a case of this kind it appears to me that the proper measure of damages is the amount which he would have received if the contract had been kept. What would he have received if this contract had been kept? The learned judge awarded 3800*l.*, but in my opinion that figure was not properly arrived at; it does not represent the true measure of damages. It was urged by the appellants in the first place that in arriving at that figure the learned judge had taken into account that the shippers would have effected an insurance against the excepted peril "free of capture and seizure," but it was argued that there was no evidence that the shippers had any intention of effecting such an insurance. But as the argument proceeded it became evident—at least in one view of the case—that it was to the advantage of the appellants to argue the other way, because, if there was a liability for damages, the greater the cost of insuring the cargo the less amount the plaintiffs would have received, and therefore it would go to reduce the amount of damages, and that if the appellants were wrong and they were held to be liable for substantial damages, if the shippers had effected an insurance against "free of capture and seizure," against the consequences of hostilities, the premium payable in respect of that would have been an expense connected with the cargo, an expense of getting that cargo to Japan, and therefore an additional sum to deduct from the selling price of the cargo. That sum was not taken into account. On the other hand, another error into which I think the learned judge fell was this. In assessing the amount of damages at 3800*l.* as being the probable profit, he gave credit to the defendants for the higher cost of the sulphate of ammonia under a contract into which the plaintiffs had previously entered. It appeared that the plaintiffs had entered into a contract for sulphate of ammonia; but between the date of their contract and the date at which the steamer ought to have been loaded at Mariopol there was a substantial fall in the price of sulphate of ammonia, and the learned judge did not take the cost at the port of loading at or about the date of loading, but he took the contract price, the effect of which was materially to diminish the profit which the shippers would otherwise have made. In those two respects and proceeding on that footing and in omitting the premium for the insurance against hostilities, I am of opinion that the judgment of the learned judge was wrong, and that the proper measure of damages was not taken.

The question then arises as to what is the proper measure of damages in a case of this sort. In my opinion it may be stated in a very few words. The proper measure of damages is the difference between the price which would have been realised by the sale of the goods in Japan if they had arrived in due course at or about the probable date of arrival of the steamer and the cost at the port of loading at or about the date when the cargo should have been loaded together with freight and insurance, and having regard to what has happened in the present case, and to the circumstances under which the ship would have left Mariopol if she had sailed, there must be included in the cost of insurance the cost of insuring against hostilities. In a recent case in the House of Lords of Ström Bruks Aktie Bolag v. Hutchison (10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 138; 93 L. T. Rep. 562; (1905) A. C. 515) the only question which arose on the appeal was as to what was the proper measure of damages for the breach of the contract. In that case the plaintiffs had secured tonnage for wood pulp from Sweden to Cardiff. There was a failure to supply the wood pulp, in consequence whereof it was not delivered to Cardiff and was bought in against the vendors, and they had to pay the difference in price resulting from its being bought in against them. In the action they put the sum which they had to pay their disappointed purchasers as the measure of their damages. The damages which the appellants claimed was the amount which they paid in this country to their customers to whom they had contracted to supply the wood pulp. That was not the true measure of damages. The shipowners had nothing to do with the particular contract into which the charterers had entered any more than in this case I think the shipowners have anything to do with the particular contract to acquire the sulphate of ammonia into which the plaintiffs had entered. In the next place it was argued in that case that they having claimed that particular damage upon that footing could not succeed; they had not claimed general damages, and were only entitled to nominal damages for breach of contract. That was the point that was taken. It was said that, having failed to claim general damage, they were only entitled to nominal damages. Lord Davey, at p. 529, put the rule in this way: "I am of opinion that the proper measure of damages would have been the cost of replacing the goods at their place of destination at the time when they ought to have arrived less the value of the goods in Sweden and the amount of the freight and insurance."

Applying that rule to the facts of the present case, the proper measure of damages is the amount which would have been realised by the sale of the goods in Japan at or about the date when the steamer would have arrived less the cost of the goods, taking the cost price at the port of loading at or about the date when the steamer would have been loaded together with freight and insurance. The total amount of damages on that footing has not yet been ascertained, and there will have to be an inquiry to ascertain that amount. Part of the figure was ascertained; it was ascertained—and I gather there is no dispute as to this—what sum the cargo would have fetched at the date at which the steamer would have arrived in Japan in due course if it had been sold. There is a certificate which seems to have been accepted from a gentleman in Japan fixing both the date and the price. I think the market price at the end of Nov. 1914, when the goods would have arrived, works out at 13*l.* 11s. 10*d.* per ton, if I have read the figures correctly. At all events, that is an agreed figure. It is the total sum, and, when one considers the amount for which the insurance should have been effected, I think one cannot accept the figures which during the argument counsel for the appellants handed up to us. There is no warranty for those figures. One must take it that the amount for which the cargo would have been insured is the sum at which it would have been sold on arrival in Japan, and there must be deducted from that the cost of freight and insurance. Then the question arises at what date should the cost price be ascertained? I think the proper date to take would be a middle date between the first date for loading mentioned in the charter-party—namely, the 1st Sept.—and the cancelling date, the 20th Sept. I do not know and it is not in evidence as to whether there was during the first fortnight in September any fluctuation in the price of sulphate of ammonia that would make one date more advantageous to the parties than another. We have no evidence upon than point at all. I think it may be put in this way. Take the nearest market date, that is not a Sunday and not a public holiday, to the 10th Sept. as being the middle date between the 1st Sept. and the cancelling date as the date the parties must have contemplated for the loading. That fixes the mode in which the damages could be arrived at. It was put forward on behalf of the plaintiffs that they had sustained a heavy loss as between themselves and their vendors, and in an arbitration they have in fact ultimately paid by way of compromise a sum of between 4000*l.* and 5000*l.* to their vendors as damages for breach of their contract. That sum cannot be an item in the calculation of damages; it must be ignored. The damages which have to be calculated are the difference between the two sums which I have mentioned.

There remains one further point to be considered. It was argued that, having regard to clause 13 in the charter-party, no larger sum could be recovered than 3500*l.*, the estimated amount of freight, and it was said that, having regard to that clause, the general damages recoverable under the charter-party were limited to the estimated amount of freight—namely, 3500*l.* This clause is in a somewhat different form from the earlier clause which used to be inserted in charter-parties. Previously to this clause coming into use the old form was: "Penalty for non-performance of this agreement estimated amount of freight." There is no doubt that in such a case the estimated amount of the freight was a penalty, but, on proof of the breach, judgment could be recovered for the amount of the penalty, but only as a penalty, and execution was limited to the damages which were proved at the time, the judgment only standing by way of security for such damages as should be proved. That was the position if the action was brought in respect of penalty; but otherwise, at the same time, the charterer would have been entitled to general damages, and in respect of that whatever damages were sustained and were proved to have happened in the ordinary course could have been recovered. In the present case the clause is in a slightly different form. It is "penalty for non-performance of this agreement," not "estimated amount of freight," but "proved damages not exceeding the estimated amount of freight." It is a form that seems to have been in use a considerable time, because I see in the fourth edition of Scrutton's, J. book on charter-parties, which was published in 1899 (seventeen years ago), that the form given is in exactly the same language as this: "Penalty for non-performance of this agreement to be proved damages not exceeding estimated amount of freight," and then he adds "due under this charter," and there is a footnote added: "This clause is worthless and unenforceable." Bailhache, J. arrived at the view that the parties here only intended to express in an extended form the effect of the ordinary penalty clause. Under such a clause you cannot obtain execution for the amount of the penalty, but it stands as security for the proved damages, and the learned judge arrived at the conclusion that the clause in this charter-party is nothing more than the common form writ large—that is to say, that it sets out what would be the effect of the common form, namely, to stand as security for the proved damages. I do not think it is quite that, because under the old form there is no doubt that the price was recoverable as a penalty—that is to say, you could obtain judgment for it as a penalty. Under the amended form you could not recover judgment for the entire estimated freight as a penalty because it is not so mentioned. The words are "proved damages not exceeding the amount of freight." The penalty, if it were recoverable as a penalty, would be the proved damages, and the proved damages as such cannot be a penalty because that is the sum which the plaintiffs are absolutely entitled to recover. To my mind the true explanation of the clause is what the learned judge says: They had endeavoured to state what the effect of the old form would be, and they endeavoured to improve the old form, but in any case it is dealing with that head of the charter-party which in the ordinary way provides a penalty for non-performance of the charter, and it has no reference to a claim for general damages irrespective of that, and whether the clause be meaningless or not—and it probably is with regard to the penalty for non-performance—it does not limit the amount which can be recovered under the charter-party to general damages. An instance could be given. Supposing an action were brought on the charter-party against the shipowner for breach of the implied condition of supplying a seaworthy ship, it might be the loss would be very great. The action could be brought on the charter-party, although it is usually brought on the bills of lading, but, if it were brought effectively upon the charter-party, it could not be contended that in such a case the damages were so limited. In fact, in the case of Elderslie Steamship Company v. Borthwick (10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 24; 92 L. T. Rep. 274; (1905) A. C. 93), Lord Macnaghten said, at p. 96: "It is a wholesome rule that a shipowner who wishes to escape the liability which might attach to him for sending an unseaworthy vessel to sea must say so in plain words." In my opinion, having regard to the construction of the charter-party as a whole, this clause has no reference to general damages; it has only reference to the penalty, and it may be that, having regard to the language in which it is expressed, there is in strictness no penalty, but in no case can it be held to limit the general damages that can be recovered for breach of contract.

Under these circumstances I am of opinion that this contention of the appellants fails, and that it must be determined that the appellants are liable in substantial damages on the footing which I have mentioned with a reference to ascertain the amount. With regard to the costs, the proper plan will be to reserve the costs of the appeal until after the official referee has made his finding. He will probably be the best tribunal to ascertain the amount.

PHILLIMORE, L.J.—I agree with the judgment which has just been pronounced.

To deal with the questions which have been raised seriatim, in the first place I am of opinion that Bailhache, J. rightly held that the defendants were liable. This case is entirely distinguishable from Geipel and others v. Smith and another (sup.). Where it is certain, or so nearly certain as in commercial matters can be considered as certain, that the adventure cannot be successfully completed, the shipowner or charterer may be excused from taking preliminary steps which will obviously be futile. If the port to which the ship is to go is a port blockaded under an operation of war, the rule being that the termination of war is so uncertain that the state of war is to be regarded as indefinitely and almost infinitely prolonged, there is no duty to prepare a cargo or to bring a cargo to the port which the ship will not be able to enter. But in this case there was at the moment no reason to suppose that the adventure might not be carried through—carried through at greater cost because obviously it would be prudent to insure against war risks—and therefore it was the duty of each party to perform the contract as long as they could or up to the point to which they could perform it until the performance would be excused. That being the case, there was no reason why the ship should not have sailed for Mariopol, and there was a breach of contract by the shipowners in refusing to declare a ship and in refusing to send her.

Again I agree that the damages are not nominal, but substantial. Let us try the matter in this way. Suppose there had been no closing of the Dardanelles, what would have been the loss to the cargo owner? He would have lost the profit which he would have made upon the transportation of his goods from Mariopol to a port in Japan. The closing of the Dardanelles makes no difference, because in the ordinary course of business the cargo owner would have insured against the loss of his profit. Treating it in another way, on every contract for transportation, unless the element of insurance is introduced, the damages would have to be speculative and calculated on a speculative basis. A charterer says: "You contracted to send your ship to port A and to transport my cargo to port B. I have lost the profit which I should have gained if the cargo had gone to port B." The answer is: "But what are those profits? Was there any certainty that you would get to port B.? The ship might have been lost by perils of the sea with your cargo on board between port A and port B." And that is a perfectly sound answer. It is based on the same principle upon which juries are always directed in any event in which there is any uncertainty of life or any other physical uncertainty with regard to the profit to be earned. But the answer is: "This is measured by the insurance. The profit that you have lost you could have insured and made certain of. We will deduct from your profit the cost of insurance, and then we will treat your profit as certain." And that was the right of the cargo owner in this case. He was entitled to say: "If you had sent your ship to Mariopol, I should in the ordinary course of business have made my profit certain by insuring against the loss. I am prepared to deduct the cost of insurance in order to make my profit smaller but certain, instead of larger but uncertain." It is upon that principle that the House of Lords laid down the measure in damages in the case of Ström Bruks Aktie Bolag v. Hutchison (sup.). Looking at it in another way, it comes, as the Lord Justice has observed, under the old rule laid down in Hadley v. Baxendale (sup.). The measure of damages for breach of contract may be larger than the damages in tort. The suffering party ought to have either such damages as may fairly and reasonably be considered as arising according to the usual course of things from such breach of contract or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties at the time they made the contract as the probable result of the breach of it. I think that those damages may be supported under either of those heads; either they are so much in the ordinary nature of things as to be certain to have followed from the breach of contract or you may put it that the parties would contemplate that the cargo owner would insure, and that therefore his damages would be the loss and that which he would have recovered under the insurance minus the cost of procuring the insurance. That being so, I think Bailhache, J. was right in saying that the charterers were entitled to a substantial award. The block in the Dardanelles, which would have stopped the ship from completing her voyage from the Sea of Azoff to Japan, may be regarded for this purpose as permanent, because we know that it lasted till a state of war broke out between Turkey and Russia and England, under which no English ship coming from a Russian port, or any English or Russian ship at all, could have safely navigated the narrow waters in the control of the Turkish arms. But it is important to consider that a loss by reason of that could not be a loss under the free from capture and seizure clause; it would be a loss by restraint of princes, or, possibly, a loss by perils of the sea. If the Turkish Government forbade the navigation of the Dardanelles it would be put as a loss by restraint of princes. If all that they did was to make the navigation of the Dardanelles so perilous as to be impracticable, it is exactly the same thing as if there had been a long block of ice or as if there had been some convulsion of nature and a great rock had fallen either into the Bosphorus or the Dardanelles, making the passage for a time impossible. The cargo owners would have been entitled, if they had had their cargo put on board and had insured it in the ordinary way with the free from capture and seizure clause without provision against war risks, to recover upon proof that the Dardanelles were blocked for so long a time as to render the continuance of the adventure impracticable.

So far as regards the fact that there should be substantial damages awarded to the plaintiffs, but in my opinion the learned judge in arriving at his figure has been led into a wrong calculation. He has certainly given the respondents too much, and he has probably under another head given them too little. He has certainly given them too much because, in order to make this profit certain, it was not sufficient to have an ordinary insurance; to make the profit certain it was necessary to add to the ordinary insurance an insurance against war risks, otherwise the certainty of the profit would have been reduced very greatly indeed, and in fact it was admitted by Mr. Leslie Scott that it was proper to add to the cost of insurance the cost of insurance against war risks. I understood him to take it at 3000*l.*, and, as far as I can see, that is a reasonable way of looking at the matter, and taking Bailhache, J.'s 3800*l.* as the figure of profit, that would reduce the profits to 800*l.* But now there is an enhancement of those profits which is almost certain—I do not know that it is quite certain, and certainly the calculation of it is very uncertain—and Bailhache, J., in order to arrive at the loss of profit, has saddled the charterers with the price at which they bought these goods in April. If that is the same price at which they would have been bound to buy the goods on the date which the Lord Justice has intimated as being the proper date—namely, the 10th Sept.—that would be right; but if in fact the goods were cheaper on the 10th Sept., to that extent the damages are too little. Putting it in another way, the shipowner was entitled to say: "I have nothing to do with the contract of purchase which you made in April; I have only got to be saddled with what would be the market value of these goods at Mariopol at the proper date"; but if he does choose to say that or to say, "I am not going to pay what you had to pay your vendors for breach of contract," then he must not rely upon the fact that these people bought these goods at probably a larger price. The true price is the price at which the goods would have been bought at the date we have fixed. There seems great reason to suppose that that price would be less—as to how much less I confess I see very little reason for arriving at any conclusion about at all. It may be that the fall was more than 3000*l.*, in which case what the appellants have successfully taken off would be more than counterbalanced by what the respondents on their cross-appeal would add. It may very likely be that it is a good deal less than 3000*l.*, in which case the appellants will have gained something by reason of their appeal.

As far as I understand the view of the court, it is to be the one figure and the only figure which need be found by the official referee. Given that one figure, the rest, as I understand it, is a mere matter of arithmetic.

Now we have got to consider, supposing that figure should come to over 3500*l.*, what is the effect of the penalty clause. I am personally a little sorry that it is thought that we ought to settle that to-day, because I think it is quite likely that it will not arise, but I may be mistaken over that. At any rate, it may be right that we should settle it as the matter has been fully argued to-day, and, if it is to be settled to-day, I concur in the view which the Lord Justice has expressed. But I am bound to say that I concur in it with very great hesitation. I myself belong to the school which holds that parties when they say a thing should be held to mean it, and that artificial constructions should not be put upon their words. It may be that the cases are too strong for me in that respect. I have, then, very great difficulty with this clause. It has been running pari passu with the old clause. The Lord Justice has pointed out that this clause is at least as old as 1899. On the other hand, in a case now pending before us for judgment, I find that the charter-party has got the old form, so that the two clauses are running side by side. As far as I can make out, the result of the decision which we are now going to express is this: that the new form is less in favour of the claimant than the old one under which the claimant could not only recover his damages, but he could also, if his damages were less than the amount of freights, obtain a judgment for the penalty—that is to say, for the amount of the freight which would be of some value to him. Under the new form, as the Lord Justice has pointed out, he cannot get the penalty; he can only get the proved damages. It may be that that is the result of the alteration. I am sure I do not know. I am not prepared to accede to the reasoning of Bailhache, J., or to accept the very able argument on this point of Mr. Wright in its entirety. I am, on the whole, although reluctantly, ready to agree, in order to decide the point to-day, upon this ground only, that the parties have used the word "penalty," which primâ facie means that the thing is a penalty, and that they have not sufficiently varied from the old form, which had an established construction, to show that they meant any very serious variation other than that which I have just mentioned, and that it would have been very easy, if they really meant to make a limitation of liability, to have expressed it in words about which there could be no doubt.

BANKES, L.J.—I agree. The material facts seem to me to lie in a very small compass. On the 23rd April 1914 the plaintiffs entered into a contract for the purchase of a large quantity of sulphate of ammonia from a Belgian company to be shipped at Mariopol, in the Sea of Azoff. I agree that the defendants are not bound by the terms of that contract, and that the only materiality of the contract, if it has any materiality, is as evidence, if evidence is wanted, that the plaintiffs had a cargo ready and available for shipment if the defendants had sent their vessel to the port of loading. On the 5th June 1914 the plaintiffs entered into a charter-party with the defendants under which the defendants undertook to send a steamer, to be named by a certain date, to Mariopol, the port of loading, for the purpose of receiving a cargo of sulphate of ammonia with which the vessel was to proceed to Japan. The loading time was not to be before the 1st Sept. and not to be after the 20th Sept. On the 1st Sept. the defendants wrote a letter to the plaintiffs announcing their intention of not sending the vessel, and intimating that in their opinion they thought that they had good reasons for cancelling the contract.

The first point which arises in this case is whether the defendants were right in their view that they had a good and sufficient reason for refusing to send the steamer to the port of loading. Bailhache, J. has held that they had not, and in that I agree. I really need add nothing to what has fallen on this point from the other members of the court, except to say that in all the cases to which Mr. Leck referred I think it will be found that there was at the time at which the repudiation of the contract occurred an actual existing restraint of princes, whereas here the most that can be said is that there was reasonable anticipation that before the time came to complete the performance of the contract some restraint of princes would arise which would prevent the complete performance of the contract. In my opinion that is no answer to the allegation that there was a breach of contract.

There is only one other matter, it seems to me, that need be mentioned, and that is this, that on the 26th or 27th Sept. the Dardanelles were closed for traffic. Under those circumstances what was the position of the parties? Bailhache, J. has held—and I think quite rightly—that it was only in the ordinary course of business that, had the defendants sent the steamer to the port of loading, the plaintiffs would have insured the cargo in the ordinary way, and that the insurance would have included war risks. Upon that finding, what was the position of the parties? The position was this, that there was no reason whatever to prevent the defendants from sending the steamer to Mariopol, and there was nothing to prevent the cargo being loaded upon the vessel at Mariopol. It is quite true that when once the cargo had been loaded events occurred which prevented or would have prevented the vessel from proceeding to Japan, and as a result the plaintiffs would have been entitled to abandon their cargo to the underwriters upon the ground that the adventure was impossible of performance. If they had done that they would have been entitled to receive from the underwriters the amount for which they had insured the cargo, and, as Bailhache, J. puts it, the amount for which they would have been insured would have been a sum sufficient to cover the cost of the goods, the freight, the cost of insurance, and a reasonable sum for profit, or, in other words, what would have been the fair value of the goods at the port of destination. Under those circumstances it is, in my opinion, quite clear that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover substantial damages and not merely nominal damages, and I agree with the other members of the court as to the proper measure of damages and the way in which the amount should be ascertained.

There remains one further point, and that has reference to clause 13 of the charter-party. It is said that upon the true interpretation of the language of that clause it ought to be construed as a clause limiting liability, and not as a mere penalty clause. If it was open to the shipowner to claim the strict construction of that clause, I am not prepared to say that that is not the meaning that ought to be put upon it or, at any rate, might be put upon it; but Mr. Wright has appealed to the principle which has been laid down in many cases and, amongst others, in the case of Elderslie Steamship Company v. Borthwick (sup.), to which reference has already been made, where Lord Macnaghten said: "It is a wholesome rule that a shipowner who wishes to escape the liability which might attach to him for sending an unseaworthy vessel to sea must say so in plain words." Now, what is the position with regard to this clause? For a very long period of time there has been inserted in charter-parties a clause which has come to be known as the penalty clause, and it has been expressed in a well-known form of words, and the commencement of the clause has been "Penalty for non-performance of this charter" or "this agreement," and it has ended with the words "estimated amount of freight." It has been accepted both by business men and by lawyers that the clause so commencing and so known as the penalty clause was a worthless and unenforceable clause. In my opinion, applying the principle to which Lord Macnaghten referred, if a shipowner desires to clothe this clause with vitality, he must dress it up in an entirely new suit of clothes, and, so long as its identity is concealed either wholly or partially by the old clothes, he cannot escape the application of the rule—namely, that if he desires to limit his liability, he must do so in plain words. It certainly cannot be said that the words are plain words so long as the well-known form of words which was accepted to represent a worthless and unenforceable clause is adopted as the opening sentence or the opening expression in the clause itself. On that ground, in my opinion, the shipowners are not entitled to be heard to say that this is a clause limiting their liability.

Judgment accordingly.

Modern Transport Company Limited v. Duneric Steamship Company Limited. (a)

Charter-party—Restraint of princes—Admiralty requisition—Liability of charterers for hire—Withdrawal of vessel.

A charter-party contained an exception clause which included restraint of princes, and also provided that the owners might withdraw the vessel for nonpayment of hire. During the currency of the charter-party the vessel was requisitioned by the Admiralty for a period of about six months, for which period the charterers refused to pay the hire. The owners threatened to withdraw the vessel, whereupon the plaintiffs (the charterers) brought an action claiming an injunction to restrain the defendants from withdrawing the vessel, in which the owners counter-claimed for hire during the period of the requisition.

Held, that the owners were not entitled to withdraw the vessel, but the plaintiffs were liable to pay the charter-party hire to the owners during the period of the requisition, they receiving the hire paid by the Admiralty.

COMMERCIAL COURT.

Action tried by Sankey, J.

The plaintiffs were time charterers of the steamship Duneric, and their claim was for an injunction to restrain the defendants, the owners, from withdrawing the vessel from their service.

The defendants defended the action on the ground that they were entitled to withdraw the vessel, and counter-claimed for about 8000*l.* for hire.

Roche, K.C. and R. A. Wright for the plaintiffs.

MacKinnon, K.C. and Raeburn for the defendants.

The facts and arguments are sufficiently stated in the judgment.

SANKEY, J.—In this case the plaintiffs, who were time charterers of the defendants' steamship Duneric, claimed an injunction to restrain the defendants from withdrawing her from their service. The defendants contended that they were entitled so to withdraw the vessel by reason of the failure of the plaintiffs to pay her hire punctually, and they bring a counter-claim for a sum alleged to be owing to them for such hire. The plaintiffs reply that the hire claimed is for a period during which the Duneric was requisitioned and used by His Majesty's Government, and that no hire is due, and those are the issues which fall for my decision.

The facts are as follows: By a time charter-party dated the 2nd March 1915 made between the defendants, as owners, and the plaintiffs, as charterers, it was agreed that the defendants should let and plaintiffs should hire the Duneric for a period of twelve calendar months from the date of being placed at the charterers' disposal, at a rate of 2350*l.* per calendar month, payable monthly in advance.

The several clauses of the charter-party material to the present case are as follows:

(1) There was a clause limiting the cargo which the vessel was entitled to carry. She was forbidden to carry contraband of war.

(2) There was a clause limiting the voyages she might perform—she was only to be employed between safe ports of the United Kingdom and the Continent of Europe not east of Dieppe nor east of Sicily.

(3) There was a cesser clause prescribing the events upon which the hire should cease, or be suspended.

(4) There was an exception clause under which the restraint of princes was mutually excepted.

(5) There was a clause giving the plaintiffs an option of sub-letting the steamer.

The vessel was duly placed at the plaintiffs' disposal upon the 15th April 1915. Upon the 21st May the Admiralty, by a requisition notice of that date, delivered to the defendants' agents, Messrs. Andrew Weir and Co., gave notice requisitioning the Duneric from the defendants for immediate use on Government services. A few days afterwards a form of Government charter was sent to Messrs. Andrew Weir and Co., which was completed by them, under which there was no such limitation either as regards cargo or voyage as there was in the time charter between the plaintiffs and defendants.

Upon the 26th May Messrs. Andrew Weir and Co. informed the plaintiffs by a letter of that date that the Government had requisitioned the Duneric, and upon the 11th June the vessel was placed at the disposal of the Admiralty, and was employed on Government business up till the 29th Nov., when the Government gave her up.

The sum which the Government paid for the use of the vessel was 1220*l.* 14*s.* monthly. As above pointed out, the monthly hire under the time charter between plaintiffs and defendants was 2350*l.*, a sum greatly in excess of the amount paid by the Government.

Considerable correspondence took place between the parties and their solicitors as to whether the Government had hired the vessel from the plaintiffs or from the defendants, and upon the 20th May 1915 the Admiralty agents sent to the plaintiffs a requisition similar to the one they had already sent to the defendants.

The plaintiffs argued in such correspondence that they were not liable to pay the hire during the time the vessel was used by the Government. The defendants argued the other way. Both parties being naturally and properly anxious to assist the authorities, the defendants agreed to collect the hire payable from time to time by the Government, and they wrote on the 10th June saying:

> We still maintain the position we have taken up, but, in order to carry out the wishes of the Admiralty, and entirely without prejudice to our claim, we have ordered the master to follow the instructions of the Admiralty.

Upon the 14th June the defendants sent in their account for the third month's hire, which would certainly have been due on the next day if nothing had happened in the meanwhile to alter the state of affairs.

Correspondence again ensued between the parties, the gist of which is that the plaintiffs refused to pay the hire, and the defendants suggested arbitration. By the end of June the parties had consulted their solicitors, who were discussing whether going to arbitration or to the courts would be preferable, but on the 9th July the defendants nominated their arbitrator, and upon the 15th July the plaintiffs nominated theirs. Upon the 20th July, when it will be noted that another month's hire, if the defendants' contention was correct, had fallen due, Messrs. Andrew Weir and Co. wrote on behalf of the defendants:

> We are in receipt of your letter of yesterday. The matter of the time charter, hire, interest, &c., will be dealt with by the arbitrators.

And upon the 22nd July the plaintiffs' solicitors wrote that their clients had no objection at all to the Government paying the hire to the defendants pending the arbitration.

The arbitration proceedings dragged on, and the defendants from time to time sent in their account for hire. Before the next hire accrued due—namely, the 2nd Nov.—the Government wrote informing the defendants that the Duneric would be discharged from His Majesty's service when clear of her cargo at Middlesbrough, and upon the 30th Nov. defendants passed that information on to the plaintiffs. No award had as yet been made in the arbitration.

Upon the 16th Nov. the defendants again wrote demanding the hire, and on the 17th Nov. the plaintiffs replied that they were content to leave the question of the responsibility for the difference between the Admiralty rate and their own time charter rate to the decision of the arbitrators, or to the courts. Upon the next day the defendants threatened to withdraw the steamer. She was not given up by the Government till the 29th Nov., but on the 25th Nov. the plaintiffs issued a writ claiming an injunction to restrain the defendants withdrawing the Duneric from their service. The 2nd Dec. was, in fact, the first day upon which the plaintiffs could have had the vessel, and upon that day they tendered a cheque for the hire, which was refused.

The first point which falls for my decision is, whether the defendants are entitled to withdraw the Duneric, but as that is bound up with the question whether the plaintiffs are liable to pay the hire, I propose to discuss the latter question first. It was argued on behalf of the plaintiffs that the Proclamation of the 3rd Aug. 1914, under which the Admiralty are entitled to requisition ships, is one which entitles them so to do from owners—that, in this case, the requisition was made upon the owners, who consequently were unable to allow the plaintiffs to have the use of the vessel, and thus there had been a total failure of the consideration, and no hire was due during the period the vessel had been employed by the Government.

It was further urged on their behalf that the Admiralty had requistioned a larger interest than the plaintiffs had in the vessel, because there was no such limitation either with regard to the cargo to be carried or the voyages to be undertaken in the Admiralty charter as there was in the plaintiffs' time charter.

I do not think these contentions are sound. It appears to me: (1) That there is a special clause in the plaintiffs' time charter which provides for the circumstances, upon the happening of which hire is to cease, and the events which have happened do not come within that clause. (2) Further, I am of opinion that there has been no failure of consideration.

I think that the true view is that the owners of the vessel granted the use of their ship subject to the restraint of princes. It will be observed that the exception clause, which is a mutual one, includes such events as perils of the seas, as well as restraint of princes, and I do not think that if a vessel were delayed, say, for a fortnight, either by perils of the sea or by a temporary embargo, the hire would cease during such a period: (see Brown v. Turner, Brightman, and Co., 12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 79; 105 L. T. Rep. 562; (1912) A. C. 12). In fact, there has been no failure of consideration. The consideration is a promise to give such use of the ship as defendants are capable of giving, subject to restraint of princes, and this the defendants have done.

In my view, therefore, the plaintiffs were liable to pay the hire to the defendants, and were entitled to receive for themselves those sums paid by the Admiralty for the use of the vessel. In this case, as above pointed out, the hire paid by the Admiralty was very much less than the hire contracted to be paid by the plaintiffs.

A somewhat similar case, where the sum paid by the Admiralty was very much more than the sum contracted to be paid by the charterers, has been decided by Atkin, J. in Tamplin Steamship Company v. Anglo-Mexican Products Company (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 284; 114 L. T. Rep. 259; (1915) 3 K. B. 668; (1916) 1 K. B. 485), where that learned judge held that the charterers were bound to pay the hire contracted for, and were entitled to receive the amount paid by the Admiralty.

Speaking generally, unless there are some special clauses in such a charter-party, the position is that the time charterer is entitled to the use of the ship during the period in question, and it is his use of the ship which the Admiralty puts an end to. Under these circumstances, it would appear to be proper that he should pay the owners for what they have always been willing to give him, and should himself receive from the Admiralty the fair compensation for the loss of the fruits of his bargain.

I now turn to the question whether the defendants were entitled to withdraw the ship. A clause in the charter-party gives them the right so to do if the hire is not paid punctually and regularly in advance. It was contended by the defendants that as the charter-party so stipulated, and as, in fact, the hire had not been so paid, it was incumbent upon the plaintiffs to show some agreement whereby they were excused from so paying the hire. The plaintiffs, on the other hand, contended that it was possible for the defendants either to waive the punctual payment of hire or to elect not to rely thereon.

There are numerous cases to this effect, and one of the elements to be considered is the lapse of time which has taken place before an owner exercises or purports to exercise his right. I have already set out the facts on this point.

I am satisfied that the defendants meant to refer to arbitration the question of the payment of hire during the whole time the ship was requisitioned by the Government. I remember how the arbitration had not been concluded when the defendants threatened to withdraw the vessel; also that she remained in Government service till the 29th Nov., in fact till after the issue of the writ in this case, and that she was not free for the plaintiffs till the 2nd Dec., upon which date they tendered a cheque for the future hire.

I am of opinion, under the circumstances, that the defendants were not entitled to withdraw her, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to an injunction as asked.

I cannot pass from this case without remarking that it is one of doubt and perplexity, and I am glad to hear that the opinion of higher tribunals is likely to be invoked. As far as this court is concerned, there must be judgment for the plaintiffs for the injunction asked for and judgment for the defendants for the balance of hire, 8627*l.* 0*s.* 9*d.* in each case, with costs.

DENNY v. SKELTON. (a)

Carriage of goods—Contract—Sale—Two buyers purchase two parcels from same cargo—Parcel intended for one buyer delivered to lighter of other buyer—Innocent mistake—Title to goods—Sale of Goods Act 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 71), ss. 16, 18, 62 (4).

From a cargo of oats in bulk while in transit 500 quarters were sold to D. and 500 quarters to S. Both parties instructed the same lighterman to take delivery of their respective parcels of oats on their behalf. The lighterman, intending to take delivery of the parcel sold to S., sent a lighter to the vessel. The lighter was loaded, but, through a misunderstanding, the clerk on the vessel prepared documents which showed that he intended to make delivery of the oats to the lighterman on behalf, not of S., but of D., and believed that he was so doing. Subsequently, another lighter was sent by the lighterman, who now intended to take delivery of the parcel sold to D., and the same misunderstanding occurred, documents being handed over which demonstrated the intention of the clerk to make delivery to S. and not to D. The last lighter became jammed and sunk, and the oats were damaged. The result of these two mistakes was that the unharmed parcel came into the possession of S., although the documents relating thereto showed an intention that they should be delivered to D. In an action for wrongful detention of the oats: Held, that in these circumstances the property in the undamaged goods had passed to the plaintiff D., who was entitled to judgment.

COMMERCIAL COURT.

Action tried by Atkin, J.

The facts appear sufficiently from the headnote and his Lordship's judgment.

Holman Gregory, K.C. and Douglas Hogg for the plaintiff.

A. A. Roche, K.C. and H. C. S. Dumas for the defendants.

ATKIN, J.—In this case a question arises which raises somewhat interesting questions, partly of law and partly of fact. There was a ship called the Bland Hall, which arrived in London with a cargo of oats in bulk. There were two original shippers, but we are only concerned with one here—Messrs. Bunge and Born, who had shipped a certain amount of oats in bulk, which were kept separate in the ship. During the voyage certain portions of the cargo had been sold to different purchasers, and these purchasers again had resold the goods.

By the time the ship arrived in London 500 quarters of the oats had been sold to the plaintiff, Mr. Oliver Chas. Denny, through Messrs. Guerrier, Marshall, and Co., who were sub-purchasers from another firm, Messrs. Taylor and Co. Another 500 quarters of the oats of the same quality had been sold to the defendants, Messrs. T. Skelton and Co., who had purchased through Messrs. G. C. Giddins and Co. Therefore, when the vessel arrived in London deliveries had to be made by the sellers to these purchasers of the oats, which seem to have been sold ex the ship. The practice is for the buyer who has obtained the bill of lading for the amount of his purchase to lodge the bill of lading with the ship, or the representative of the ship, and then to give the delivery orders to his sub-purchaser against the amount of the bill of lading.

The purchaser takes delivery from the ship overside. In this case the two purchasers took delivery of the goods overside in barges. They both employed the same lighterman, Mr. Jameson. They both of them gave delivery orders to Mr. Jameson, which were substantially in the same form.

The one given by plaintiff was signed by Messrs. Guerrier, Marshall, and Co., and was as follows:

> Date Sept. 29, 1915.—To the captain of the Bland Hall, lying at Victoria Docks: Deliver to the buyer, Mr. O. C. Denny, 500 quarters 38lb. oats. Must be worked at once.

Messrs. G. C. Giddins and Co. had given a similar order in respect to their 500 quarters to Messrs. T. Skelton and Co. Both these gentlemen handed over their delivery orders to Mr. Jameson and instructed him to collect the oats, to put them on craft, and take them to their respective wharves. The plaintiff's wharf was up the river from the Royal Victoria Dock, and Messrs. T. Skelton and Co.'s wharf was in Bermondsey.

Mr. Jameson, therefore, duly sent these delivery orders to the Port of London Authority on, I think, the 29th Sept., the Port of London Authority being the proper persons to deal with these matters.

The practice in delivery is this: The ship's clerk is on board the ship, and he has a record in his book of the bills of lading which have been delivered to him. He enters the delivery order when it comes in against the bill of lading, and then he is prepared to deliver to craft.

When the craft comes alongside, representing the person who has lodged the delivery order, he makes out a tally card containing the bill of lading number, against which he is transferring, and the person to whom the goods are to be delivered. He delivers the tally card to the ganger, who is delivering the particular hold, for the purpose of carrying out the goods and seeing that they are delivered in accordance with the delivery order. The ganger, or the weigher, if the goods have to be weighed, has to ascertain whether the actual barge to which he is about to deliver the goods is the barge that corresponds with the tally card, and his instructions from the shipping clerk. Having made inquiries as to the barge, he thereupon proceeds to deliver into that barge, and on his card he marks or tallies the number of sacks he delivers, and when he is finished he completes the card by filling up the date he commenced and the date he finished and the name of the actual craft, and he then either takes it to the shipping clerk or gives it to the man in charge of the lighter, who takes it to the shipping clerk, and it is then exchanged for a weigh note and for a pass out of the dock.

The weigh note is in the nature of a consignment note. It is then handed to the waterman in charge of the lighter, and in this particular case it says:

> Deliver on account of Messrs. C. and J. Denny to craft Oliver ex Bland Hall per order of Messrs. Guerrier, Marshall, and Co., 500 quarters of oats.

That is to say, it contains reference to the particulars of the delivery order and the name of the craft, and it is then handed with a pass to the man in charge of the lighter, who takes both documents, and is able in that way to take the goods to their proper destination. That is the practice.

In this case there is no doubt that a mistake has arisen, because what happened was this: The Oliver arrived on the 2nd Oct., which was a Saturday, in charge of a lighterman. It is quite plain to my mind that that craft, in fact, was intended by Mr. Jameson, and intended by Messrs. T. Skelton and Co.. to carry their goods. Not that Messrs. T. Skelton and Co. had bargained that any particular craft should carry their goods, because they had not, but they had apparently given sacks, for the purpose of carrying out the contract, to the barge, or the man in charge of the barge, and Mr. Jameson intended that his man in charge of the barge should receive the 500 quarters that were intended for Messrs. T. Skelton and Co.

I have no doubt about that as a matter of fact. On the other hand, the goods were handed over to that craft on the 2nd Oct., and the clerk, Mr. Vincent, prepared a tally card, intending to deliver the goods to this particular craft for Mr. Denny, the plaintiff. He prepared a tally card with that object before the loading began. He prepared a tally card in which he inserted bill of lading 15; that was the number of the bill of lading which had been lodged in respect of Messrs. Guerrier, Marshall, and Co.'s goods which they had sold to Mr. Denny. He put down upon it the description of grain:

> Oats, quarters, 500, deliver to Messrs. C. and J. Denny, account Messrs. Guerrier, Marshall, and Co.

It is quite plain that the goods that were in fact put into that craft were intended to be a delivery against Messrs. Guerrier, Marshall, and Co.'s delivery order for Mr. Denny. The goods were, in fact, delivered to the craft and a weigh note was prepared carrying out the same intention:

> Delivery on account of Messrs. C. and J. Denny to craft Oliver ex Bland Hall per order of Messrs. Guerrier, Marshall, and Co.

That document was handed to the lighterman. I do not think there can be clearer evidence of the intention on the part of the Port of London Authority by their clerk, Mr. Vincent, to make delivery on account of the delivery order lodged by Mr. Jameson and signed by Messrs. Guerrier, Marshall, and Co., and to make delivery in that way to Mr. Jameson for Mr. Denny. I am quite satisfied that was the intention.

Therefore you have got this result, that the person delivering, who I think quite plainly is delivering on account of the seller, intended to deliver to Mr. Denny, while the craft intended to receive on behalf of Messrs. T. Skelton and Co. Leaving the transaction there for the time being, exactly the same position arises in respect of Messrs. T. Skelton and Co.'s order, because the craft that arrived—the Cedric—arrived on the Monday after the Oliver had completed loading, and the Cedric had been lying at Denny's wharf.

No doubt they contemplated that their oats would be delivered to them in that ship, although, again, they were not bound as between themselves and Mr. Denny, nor was Mr. Denny bound to use that craft. He could use any craft, but Mr. Jameson had given instructions to the man in charge to take delivery of Mr. Denny's oats in that craft. And in the same way a similar mistake was made in connection with the Port of London Authority, plainly showing that they intended to deliver the goods for Messrs. T. Skelton and Co., and exactly the same position arose there.

I do not think it is necessary for me to decide whether that was due to the fault of anybody, but if I had to decide that I should come to the conclusion, so far as I am concerned, that it was nobody's fault. I think there was a misunderstanding. It might be due to the fact that undoubtedly the first lighterman in charge of the Oliver was deaf, and if he spoke in the way he did here that he also possesses rather an indistinct utterance.

It appears to me that what happened was that Mr. Vincent prepared his tally note for Mr. Denny, seeing there was the Jameson craft there, and possibly without being told that it was there for Messrs. T. Skelton and Co. or Mr. Denny Then in the ordinary course of business I am satisfied an inquiry would be made, and the probability is that an inquiry was made and that there probably arose a misunderstanding. I cannot find anybody to blame. It is one of those mischances that happen without amounting to neglect on either side. That is how I think the matter happened.

The unfortunate thing was that the Cedric, which was the last craft loaded, when she was being taken off by the lighterman—as she certainly was for Mr. Denny, although the lighterman had got a weigh note which said the goods were delivered on account of Messrs. T. Skelton and Co.—got jammed and sunk and the oats were much damaged by water, whereas the Oliver, having in her possession a weigh note which said the goods were delivered on account of Mr. Denny, duly delivered her goods to Messrs. T. Skelton and Co., who dealt with the goods and sold part of them, apparently before the mistake was discovered.

In three or four days time the documents were examined, and the mistake was discovered, and I do not think it necessary to go into the question of what took place between the parties, or whether there was any admission one side or the other. It is quite sufficient, that Messrs. T. Skelton and Co. dealt with the goods as I have mentioned, on board the Oliver.

The point is what is the true construction of the law in these circumstances. The question is, I think, whether or not the property in these goods in the Oliver had, in fact, passed to Mr. Denny, because it is with regard to these goods that the claim is made by him. I think that must depend on the question of whether or not the goods had been appropriated under the Sale of Goods Act 1893, ss. 16, 17, and 18. Sect 16 provides that:

> Where there is a contract for the sale of unascertained goods no property in the goods is transferred to the buyer unless and until the goods are ascertained.

Sect. 18 provides rules for ascertaining the intention of the parties. The rule one has to deal with here is rule 5 (1):

> Where there is a contract for the sale of unascertained future goods by description, and goods of that description, and in a deliverable state, are unconditionally appropriated to the contract, either by the seller with the assent of the buyer or by the buyer with the assent of the seller, the property in the goods thereupon passes to the buyer. Such assent may be express or implied, and may be given either before or after the appropriation is made.

(2) Where, in pursuance of the contract, the seller delivers the goods to the buyer or to a carrier or other bailee or custodier (whether named by the buyer or not) for the purpose of transmission to the buyer, and does not reserve the right of disposal, he is deemed to have unconditionally appropriated the goods to the contract.

I think the only other section I ought to refer to is sect. 62, sub-sect. 4, which says:

Goods are in a "deliverable state" within the meaning of this Act when they are in such a state that the buyer would under the contract be bound to take delivery of them.

The assent of the buyer may be express or implied and given before or after the appropriation is made, and it seems to me the principle in cases like this is that the buyer does give an assent before appropriation. That is to say, he is not supposed to assent afterwards, but beforehand. But I do not think it is an absolute assent, as suggested by Mr. Gregory, to his making an appropriation in the terms of the contract. I doubt much whether there is an intention that the seller shall have the right of passing before an opportunity arises for delivery in accordance with the terms of the contract.

The question seems to be whether or not the seller in this case did act in accordance with the contract and unconditionally appropriate the goods to the contract.

What was the assent given? It seems to me that the assent was that delivery should be made to Mr. Jameson, and therefore it seems to me that if the seller should deliver the goods to Mr. Jameson in accordance with the contract that he would be delivering in accordance with the contract, that he would be delivering properly, and that the appropriation made in the course of that delivery would be an appropriation which passed the property. It appears in this case that was done. That there was an intention to appropriate to the contract there can be no question at all. And it was done in the ordinary way, over the side of the vessel, in making the delivery into craft provided by Mr. Jameson.

It is perfectly true, as far as Mr. Jameson was concerned, that he did not desire to take delivery for Mr. Denny, but intended to take delivery for Messrs. T. Skelton and Co., in the barge Oliver. As far as the sellers are concerned, that is irrelevant, as long as they delivered to the person they were told to deliver to, and unless it is made plain that it was a mistake, and that the property in question was going to some other buyer than Mr. Denny, it appears to me they were justified in making the delivery. I have found that they were not so told, and that they believed, without any default on their part, that the property here was going to Mr. Denny. If it were necessary to show authority in fact, I cannot conceive of anything stronger than the fact that they did show the weigh note to the person to whom they were making delivery. It is said that he would not look at it. That is his fault.

It is clear that any mistake could have been corrected, but when the goods are accepted and taken away it seems to me that the sellers are justified in treating that matter as conclusive, and that the delivery thereupon was final.

There was one further point made. It was said that it was quite plain that this was in fact only asked for as Messrs. T. Skelton and Co.'s goods, because the sacks had only one name upon them in large letters. The name upon the sacks was the "London Grist Mills," and I accept the evidence which was given to me on behalf of the weigher that he did not know at the time of delivery, or at all, that the London Grist Mills was another name for defendants.

It appears to me that the authority is to deliver to the lighterman in the sacks the lighterman provides for the purpose, whatever name is on the sacks. And when the goods are put in the sacks they seem to me to be in a deliverable state, and I do not think it can be said that delivery was appropriated because the grain was put in certain sacks provided by the agent. There was proper delivery in this case, and it appears to me, therefore, that the plaintiff is entitled to recover. Mr Roche has said that Messrs. T. Skelton and Co. are entitled to sue Mr. Denny for converting their goods. I have not to decide that matter, and I express no opinion about it. I do not know whether the damages are agreed, but the result will be that the plaintiff is entitled to recover in this case, and that Messrs. T. Skelton and Co. are entitled to the salvage upon the goods.

Re An Arbitration between O. T. Tonnevold and Finn Friis. (a)

Charter-party—Option of cancelling in the event of war—Risk of seizure, capture by rulers or Governments — Voyage contemplated involving risk—Submarines and mines—Refusal of owner to proceed—Subsequent agreement for extra hire —Arbitration.

By a charter-party dated the 5th Aug. 1912 a vessel was chartered for five years within the limits of the European trade. By clause 24 it was provided: "That no voyage be undertaken and no goods, documents, or persons shipped that would involve risk of seizure, capture, repatriation, or penalty by rulers of Governments." In June 1915 the vessel was at Leith fixed to load coals for Rouen, but the owner refused to allow her to proceed on the voyage owing to the risk of German submarines. Eventually the vessel was allowed to sail in consideration of extra hire money being paid, and in an arbitration it was decided that the owner was justified in refusing to allow the vessel to proceed. The vessel having completed this voyage and two other voyages upon similar terms, arbitration proceedings took place, and the umpire found that the voyages involved the risk of the vessel being attacked and sunk by German submarines, and he awarded that the owner was justified in refusing to allow the vessel to proceed on the voyages inasmuch as they involved risk of seizure or capture by rulers or Governments. A case having been stated for the opinion of the court:

Held, that the risk of being attacked and sunk by German submarines was a risk of "seizure or capture" by rulers or Governments within the meaning of clause 24 of the charter-party, and that the shipowner was justified in refusing to allow his vessel to proceed upon voyages involving that risk.

By a charter-party dated the 5th Aug. 1912, and made between the plaintiff as owner and the defendant as charterer, the steamer Thelma was chartered at the monthly hire of 500*l.* for a period of five years within the following limits: "European trade . . . excluding regular coal trade and regular ore trade and regular coasting trade. The charterer to have the option to send the steamer over in ballast to load coal, but not for more than two following voyages." Clause 24 provided: "That in the event of war between the nation to whose flag the chartered steamer belongs and any European Power or any other Power operating or likely to operate in European waters the charterers and the (or) owners shall have the option of cancelling this charter. That no voyage be undertaken and no goods, documents, or persons shipped that would involve risk of seizure, capture, repatriation, or penalty by rulers or Governments." The charter-party also contained an arbitration clause. On the 16th June 1915 the Thelma was at Leith fixed to load coals for Rouen, but the owner declined to proceed on the voyage owing to the risk of German submarines and mines. Subsequently, after some negotiations between the parties, the vessel was allowed to proceed on her voyage subject to the payment of 100*l.* monthly increase of hire by the charterer if in an arbitration it was decided that the owner was entitled to refuse to allow the vessel to proceed to Rouen with coals.

Subsequently the charterer desired to load a cargo from Liverpool to Throndjem, thence to Archangel, and back to Hull. The owners declined to agree to the vessel going on such a voyage, and it was agreed between the parties that if in an arbitration it was decided that there was no obligation upon the owner to allow the steamer to proceed on such a voyage, the charterer would pay 700*l.* extra hire per month for the time taken to carry out the voyage. The Thelma duly completed the voyage in respect of which the extra hire was stipulated and arrived at Hull on the 1st Oct., and she completed her discharge on the 20th Oct. Arbitration proceedings then took place, and, the arbitrators failing to agree, the umpire stated his award in the form of a special case. He found that those voyages involved the risk of the vessel being attacked and sunk by German submarines, and he awarded that on the true construction of the contract and on the facts found those voyages involved the "risk of seizure, capture, or penalty by rulers or Governments," and that the owner was therefore not obliged to sail upon the voyage from Leith to Rouen or on the voyage from Liverpool to Archangel and back to Hull, and he awarded that there was due to the owner from the charterer 180*l.* extra hire for the voyage to Rouen and 2100*l.* extra hire for the voyage from Liverpool to Archangel and back to Hull.

The case for the opinion of the court was whether the fact that the said voyages involved the risk of being attacked and sunk by German submarines entitled the shipowner to refuse to proceed on those voyages under clause 24 of the charter-party.

D. C. Leck, K.C. and Leonard C. Thomas for the owner.

Scrutton, J.—This case raises an interesting point, and it arises under a charter-party on a printed form which is called the Baltic and White Sea Conference Uniform Time Charter 1912, which I observe was revised at Berlin. The vessel was chartered for the European trade at a fixed rate per month, and there is a provision in clause 24 of the charter-party in regard to war which does not apply to the facts of this case. The second part of clause 24 is as follows: No voyage shall be undertaken and no goods, documents, or persons shipped that would involve risk or seizure, capture, repatriation, or penalty by rulers or Governments." What happened was that the charterer proposed to send the vessel on two voyages in 1915, the one from Leith to Rouen and the other from Liverpool to Throndjem and Archangel and back to Hull. The shipowner said that as these voyages involved risk of seizure and capture he would not undertake them. His reluctance to allow the vessel to proceed on these voyages was overcome by an agreement whereby he should have extra pay if the vessel undertook these voyages conditional upon its being determined that he had a right to refuse. The arbitrator has found as a fact that these voyages did involve a risk of the vessel being attacked or sunk by German submarines, and the question here is whether that finding brings the case within the words of the second part of clause 24 which I have just read. I doubt very much when this charter-party was revised in Berlin or when this particular charter was entered into between the parties whether they had present to their minds danger from submarines. I think it is pretty clear that the intention of these parties was that the shipowner was not to be required to undertake voyages under the charter which would expose him to the risk of having his vessel taken out of his possession by rulers or Governments. I think it is quite clear that they had in their minds any legislation there might be against undesirable aliens being carried to countries which would not admit them, because that would involve the shipowner in the expense of bringing them back to their own country. I think it is quite likely that when the word "penalty" was used they had in their minds the particular kind of penalty for carrying certain classes of goods or persons, but the words "seizure, capture," in the same clause must, I think, be taken to point to acts of rulers or Governments which deprive owners of their vessels. It has been argued that sinking by submarine or mine is not seizure or capture, but I suppose that, although the Government which owns the submarine does not enter into possession of the vessel after she has been sunk, yet the practical effect remains the same—namely, that the shipowner is deprived of the possession of his ship by the action of the Government which owns the submarine. I agree with the arbitrator in thinking that it would be putting much too fine and technical a meaning upon the words of clause 24 to hold that where the captain of a submarine went on board a vessel and ordered her crew to leave her and then sank her it would constitute capture, but that if he did not go on board, but merely ordered the crew off and then sank her, it would not be seizure or capture.

I think I must take the commercial view of the clause just as the arbitrator has done, and I agree with the conclusions at which he has arrived. The result is that the charterer must pay the cost of this hearing.

Award confirmed.

HOOD v. WEST END MOTOR CAR PACKING COMPANY. (a)

Carriage of goods—Insurance (marine)—"Held covered"—Insurance of motor-car for voyage—Shipment of car on deck—Liability of underwriter.

A motor-car, which it was proposed to ship from England to Italy, was insured against general risks of breakage and damage during the voyage. The policy of insurance contained a "held covered" clause "at a premium to be arranged in case of omission or error in the description of the interest." The motor-car was carried on deck and was found to be badly damaged on arrival. In an action by the owner against the shipping agents for shipping the car in an improper manner and failing to protect it adequately by insurance:

Held, that a motor-car carried on the deck of a vessel was outside the insurance policy, and that the defendants were liable.

COMMERCIAL COURT.

Action tried by Rowlatt, J.

In Nov. 1914 the plaintiff instructed the defendants, as his agents, to arrange for the conveyance and insurance during transit of a motor-car valued at 500*l.* from this country to Messina. The defendants sent the car on the deck of the steamship Hero and during the voyage it was very badly damaged. The insurance which they effected was against general risks of breakage and damage during the voyage, and made no provision where the car was to be carried. Evidence was given that, whereas most underwriters dealing in this class of risk would effect an insurance on a car carried in the hold of a ship, it was a matter of some difficulty to get one to accept the risk when the car was conveyed on deck. The insurers having refused to pay the amount of the policy, the plaintiff brought this action claiming damages for alleged breach of contract to ship the car in a proper manner and to protect it sufficiently by insurance.

Barnard Lailey, K.C. and E. F. Spence for the plaintiff.—The fact that the car was improperly placed on the deck of the steamer takes it out of the policy altogether.

ROWLATT, J.—The plaintiff was a gentleman who wanted a motor-car for use in Sicily. He bought it in England, and went to defendants to pack it and send it out. The defendants estimated in these terms: "To packing and freight to Messina 31*l.* 10*s.*, all risks of breakage except war risks 12*s.* 6*d.* per cent."

That estimate was accepted. I think defendants contracted with the plaintiffs as agents to pack and freight the car to Messina and to procure it to be insured against all risks and breakage. It was sent to the ship to be carried on deck, and what the plaintiff complains of in substance is, that being shipped in fact on deck, it was not insured so as to protect it. The first contention was that it was insured in fact, and that the insurance had not been paid because of the refusal of the underwriters to meet their liabilities. I come to the conclusion, notwithstanding the excellent arguments used, that this case is not within the policy. A motor-car carried on deck is not within the description in the body of the policy. A point was made that what was called the "Institute Cargo Clauses" bring it in. Clauses 4 and 7 are the important clauses:

(4) Held covered, at a premium to be arranged, in case of deviation or change of voyage, or of any omission or error in the description of the interest, vessel or voyage.

(7) Including all liberties as per contract of affreightment. The assured are not to be prejudiced by the presence of the negligence clause and (or) latent defect clause in the bills of lading and (or) charter-party. The seaworthiness of the vessel as between the assured and the assurers is hereby admitted.

It has been held that "interest" there must mean subject-matter, and I have to decide whether a motor-car on the deck of a ship can be brought within this policy by treating the omission of the statement that it was on deck as an error in the description of the "interest" or subject-matter of the policy. I have got to consider some evidence which is very material, which I must accept as if it was called for the defendants. One of the witnesses said a risk was very much increased by the car being on deck, and that a great many underwriters would not touch such a risk; that it would certainly be a matter of special bargain, and that it was necessary to tell the underwriters about the position of the car. I read this "held covered" clause as intended to apply to a case where there has been some error in description—an error sufficient to put the subject-matter outside the terms of the policy. I think the subject-matter to be brought in must be subject-matter which could be insured at some trifling increase of the premium; and it must be subject-matter which the parties contemplate as certainly insurable by any underwriter in the market. That is involved in the words "held covered at a premium to be arranged," in which case the market rate would be paid. That seems to be the real key to the ultimate operation of this clause. When I am told that as between a motor-car on the deck and a motor-car in the hold of the ship there is all this difference—that a car on deck is a risk that underwriters would hardly look at, and would certainly charge more for—I am constrained to hold that a car on deck is outside this policy, in which there is no reference to the position of the car. I must decide against the defendants on that point.

In regard to clause 7 there is no question here of any increase of premiums being arranged. These "liberties" are thrown into the contract as it stands at the premium named, and I do not think that "liberties" covers the case of a motor-car being carried on deck. There are other liberties, liberty to sail with or without a pilot, liberty to deviate, &c., which do not substantially affect the risk covered by the policy of insurance, although they might be used as a defence if the "liberties" clause was not in the policy.

When one finds that the shipping of a car on deck makes a very great difference as to the difficulty of placing the insurance at all, I cannot think that even though you may give a right to ship on deck in the form of liberty in words, I cannot think that that is the sort of liberty intended in this case. After all, we are dealing with a motor-car. I cannot believe that anyone would contemplate, knowing that this was an insurance of a motor-car, that under the "liberties" would be included liberty to put a motor-car on the deck of a ship. Were the defendants negligent? Their duty was to pack, freight, and insure. What they did was to leave it to others. I think at the very least they should have gone to a Lloyd's broker and not merely have started the matter through a series of commission agents, with the result that finally it got to a broker who insured at Lloyd's. I do not think they did their duty by going to Messrs. Sheldon and Co. and getting them to go to an agent. I do not think they could possibly be held to be discharging their duty to insure by this procedure. So the defendants must be responsible in damages for the amount which would have been recoverable if the car had been properly insured, because that is what they contracted to do, but credit must be allowed for the premium which I understand has not been paid. Judgment will therefore be for the plaintiff for 500*l.*, less 37*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.*, the premium and freight.

MACBETH AND CO. v. KING. (a)

Insurance (marine)—Insurance of vessel against all perils—Exception of loss as result of hostilities—Unexplained loss of vessel during time of war—Liability of underwriter.

By a policy of insurance a vessel was insured against all perils of the sea for twelve months. Loss in consequence of hostilities and warlike operations was excepted. During the currency of the policy, and during the continuance of a state of war between England and Germany, the vessel in fair weather commenced a voyage from Hull to the Tyne. After leaving the mouth of the Humber she was never seen again. In an action by the assured upon the policy in respect of her total loss:

Held, that, in these circumstances, the vessel must be presumed to have been lost by being torpedoed or by striking a floating mine, and not by ordinary perils of the sea, and that the defendant was accordingly entitled to judgment.

COMMERCIAL LIST.

By a policy of marine insurance the plaintiffs insured with the defendant and other underwriters the steamship Membland for a period of twelve calendar months from the 15th Feb. 1915 to the 14th Feb. 1916 against all perils of the sea. The policy further contained this clause:

Warranted free from capture, seizure, and detention, and the consequences thereof or at any time thereat, piracy excepted, and also from all consequences of hostilities and warlike operations, whether before or after the declaration of war.

On the 15th Feb. 1915 the vessel sailed from Hull on a voyage to the Tyne and thence to South America. The Humber pilot left her at the mouth of the Humber, and after that time no information as to her whereabouts was received. No wreckage had been found belonging to her and the Admiralty had informed the plaintiffs that at the material dates there was no interruption in the Hull-Tyne traffic.

The defendant having refused to make any payment under the policy, the plaintiffs instituted these proceedings claiming in respect of the total loss of the Membland. The plaintiffs contended that the vessel must be taken to have been lost by "perils of the sea," against which they were insured with the defendant. The defendant maintained that where a ship commenced a voyage in fair weather conditions, but during the existence of a war closely affecting the seas in which she was sailing, the presumption would be that her loss was occasioned in consequence of hostilities or warlike operations, and that therefore the defendant was free from liability.

The facts will appear in greater detail in his Lordship's judgment.

Sir Maurice Hill, K.C. and Lewis Noad for the defendant.

MacKinnon, K.C. in reply.

BAILHACHE, J.—This is an action brought by Messrs. Macbeth and Co. Limited against an underwriter, Mr. J. King, upon a time policy dated 23rd Feb. 1915 on the steamship Membland. The policy is for one year from the 15th Feb. 1915. It appears that about that time Messrs. Macbeth and Co. Limited bought the steamer Membland. She was then at Hull. They had her drydocked and surveyed and sent her round on a passage from Hull to the Tyne in order to load a cargo of coal. The Membland was a steamer of considerable size, about 325ft. long, 47ft. wide, with a depth of about 26ft., and she had five watertight bulkheads. It was intended that she should leave Hull on Saturday, the

(a) Reported by LEONARD C. THOMAS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

13th Feb., but it appears that it was blowing hard from the north-east, and on the 14th Feb. it continued to blow hard also from the same direction. The result was that it was thought advisable that she should not sail until the Monday. On the Monday the weather had moderated considerably and the wind had somewhat changed, and there was then blowing a fresh wind from the N.N.W. She left Hull on the 15th Feb. at eight o'clock in the morning. She had on board two pilots—one was the Humber River pilot to take her down to the Spurn Lightship, and the other was the pilot to take her up the coast to the Tyne. She reached the Spurn Lightship about 10.40 on the same morning. At the Spurn Lightship the Humber pilot, a man named Hildred, left her. He got into his boat and came back, I suppose, to Hull. That was the last time that anyone saw her. In the ordinary course of her passage to the Tyne she would, by reason of the Admiralty directions, have kept fairly close in shore, and in particular she would have passed Flamborough Head within a distance of not exceeding five miles and probably of between two and three miles off Flamborough Head. If everything had gone well she would have reached Flamborough Head, according to calculations made, and which I see no reason to doubt, about three o'clock that afternoon. At Flamborough Head there is a signalling and coastguard station, and a look-out is kept there by men who are relieved from time to time. There are always two men on duty, and they were rather expecting her to come by, but she never appeared—and, as I say, from the time the pilot left her at the Spurn Lightship she was never seen again. That is all we know about the facts of this case.

In these circumstances, the plaintiffs seek to recover as for a total loss under this policy. The body of the policy is in the usual form, against the usual perils, and is expressed in the well-known clause with which we are all familiar in regard to adventures, perils of the sea, and so on. To the policy is attached the time clause, and the clause that matters here is this one :

Warranted free of capture, seizure, and detention, and the consequences thereof or any time thereat, piracy excepted, and also from all consequences of hostilities or warlike operations, whether before or after the declaration of war.

The defence which the underwriter on that policy sets up is that in this case the Membland was not lost by perils of the sea, but by one of the causes mentioned in that clause. The defendant says in all probability the vessel was sunk either by a torpedo or by striking a mine. There is some difference of opinion between counsel as to what is the effect of the "warranted free of capture and seizure" clause. It has been suggested by Sir Maurice Hill that its effect is to delete from the list of perils which are insured against in the body of the policy all those perils which have to do with seizure, capture, and, roughly, all war risks. Mr. MacKinnon, on the other hand, argues that that is not the effect of it at all, but that it must be read that the underwriter insures against all risks named in the body of the policy; but, as a sort of proviso, they add that they are not to be liable if the vessel is lost by capture, seizure, detention, and so on. I think Mr. MacKinnon is right, and I think he is further right in saying that, if the effect was to delete the war risks from the policy, it would not be such a good policy for Sir Maurice Hill's client as it in fact is. No one knows exactly, or at all, how the ship went to the bottom. It is rather material to decide what the assured must prove in order to make out a primâ facie case, and where they are entitled to stop. In my judgment, they do make out a primâ facie case when they satisfy us that the Membland is at the bottom of the sea. There cannot be a more obvious peril of the sea than that a ship sailing the seas should sink to the bottom.

In any policy in this form, with the warranty f.c. and s. clause attached to it, the assured does make out a primâ facie case when he establishes that the ship, the subject-matter of the policy, is at the bottom of the sea. It is one thing to make out a primâ facie case and another thing to make out a satisfactory case. In this case the Membland had been drydocked and surveyed, and she was, as far as we know and have been informed, a "well-found" ship. Her engines were working perfectly satisfactorily. She was answering her helm, and there was no suggestion at all that she was in any way unseaworthy or unfitted for this particular voyage. The weather was moderately fine. I have had weather experts from various stations and have had the weather described by persons who were about at the time, and I think I am right in saying that the highest force of the wind was "6," which is a fresh breeze. The weather during the 15th and 16th Feb. 1915 moderated, and from "6" the force of the wind went down as low as "3" and "2." At midnight on the 16th Feb. I believe the wind increased and something in the nature of a gale or half a gale sprung up. There can be little doubt whatever that the mischief happened to the ship before the wind freshened at midnight on the 16th Feb. The sea was moderately calm and there was nothing at all in any way to account for the loss of the steamer. She was light and drew 11ft. aft—that we know for certain. What she drew forward we do not know for certain, but it was somewhere about 8ft. or 9ft. She would have a considerable surface exposed to the wind. The tides run up and down, the ebb tide running northwards and the flood tide running southwards, and both of them within fifteen miles of the English coast, with an inset towards the English coast. The wind, as I have said, was N.N.W.

It is suggested by the plaintiffs that she was lost by perils of the sea and not by some war risk; that by reason of some accident happening to her machinery she became helpless, and was driven out into the North Sea. They say, and say with truth, that if she had been driven out some fifteen miles or so, she would have been out of reach of vessels going up and down the coast, because those vessels at that time were navigating within a few miles of the coast in pursuance of Admiralty instructions. No wreckage came ashore from her at all, unless it may be a small piece of a stave of a tub or bucket. A piece has been produced to me which was picked up on the beach a couple of months afterwards, which has on it writing in pencil which says: "Steamship Membland torpedoed engine-room port side good-bye." And then followed some rather unintelligible words. It is suggested that I ought to receive that as evidence that the ship was in fact torpedoed or mined, and that this was written by someone who was on board at the time.

An expert in handwriting has been called, and he tells me that it is probable that the words on this little bit of wood were written by a seaman of the name of Ellis, who was one of the men on board this ill-fated vessel. I have come to the conclusion that I cannot trust the evidence from this bit of bucket as being a bit of the bucket from the Membland, and cannot trust to the writing upon it. It may be so, but I am not satisfied that it is, and I disregard the piece of bucket and the writing upon it. I have to consider the probabilities of this case and come to a conclusion as though that writing upon it had not been produced. Mr. Blackwood, the secretary of the plaintiff company, was called, and if I may say so, he was a thoroughly intelligent gentleman and gave his evidence very well. When he was asked why he thought that the Membland had gone down from an ordinary sea peril rather than as the result of a torpedo, he said the sole reason which he could give for that was that no wreckage was washed ashore. It was upon that, and upon that alone, that he based his opinion that he thought she had sunk by a peril of the sea. As against that, it is obvious that whatever disaster overtook the Membland was a disaster of a sudden character. Unless she was blown out of the track, she was well in the way of vessels going up to the Spurn Lightship and Flamborough Head, and vessels were passing at frequent intervals during this period. No vessel, however, saw her at all. She must have gone down, therefore, with great suddenness.

It is very doubtful whether the wind, which was prevailing at the time from the N.N.W., could have driven her far. It must be remembered, it is true, that there was a considerable surface of the vessel exposed to the wind, but, on the other hand, there was a slight inset of the tides, setting her in. No doubt the wind must have overcome the force of the tide to a certain extent, but I am satisfied she could not have been driven out of the track of vessels under many hours. It is, then, difficult to see what disaster which one could class with a "peril of the sea," other than some explosion, that could have happened to her which would have sunk her at all rapidly. She carried boats, and they were not brought out, as far as one knows, certainly they never came ashore and no one came ashore in them. She was also "light," and if she was sinking by springing a leak she had a good deal of bouyancy and flotation to lose before she would sink, and if she was lost in that way there must have been ample time, and more than ample time, for the boats to have been got out and for the crew to have been saved. There is no reason to suppose that the master of the vessel, who was an experienced man and had been in her before, would have allowed himself to be drifted out into the North Sea if he was in a helpless condition. There was no great depth of water and there was no reason why he should not have anchored and tried to check his ship. It is very difficult indeed to suppose or imagine any disaster which can have happened to the steamer other than some sudden explosion which would have sent her to the bottom quickly. Even if she had struck some piece of sunken wreckage the most she would have done would have been to have sprung a leak; but not a leak so large that she would have sunk without giving time for the people on board to take some measures for their own safety and without giving them time to get the boats out. On the other hand, there was at the time, and there is now, for all I know, not very far from Flamborough Head, and in a position which it would not be desirable to describe, an English minefield.

It had been blowing hard, particularly on the Sunday, from the north-east. If that minefield had been disturbed by a gale from the north-east, it is possible some of the mines might have got in the track of vessels coming up from the Spurn Light to Flamborough Head. It was notorious there were from time to time stray floating German mines over this part of the sea. Moreover, it is also notorious that there had been in these parts of the sea submarines, and a list was given to me of the vessels that had been torpedoed by submarines in this vicinity, but there is no record of any vessel close about this particular time. There appear to have been one or two in February, but none about the 15th Feb.

In these circumstances, I have to make up my mind whether this was a loss from an ordinary peril of the sea or whether it was a loss from war risks—whether from torpedo or mine it matters not which, either of them being equally a war risk. Forming the best judgment I can upon the whole matter, I am quite satisfied in my own mind that the Membland was not lost by an ordinary peril of the sea. I cannot imagine any peril of the sea which would have caused her loss so that she could have completely disappeared in so short a time that vessels coming up and down the coast at this time would not have observed her. The fact that no wreckage ever reached the shore struck me at first as very strong evidence that she was lost by some peril of the sea, and not by explosion; but Mr. Balfre, who is in charge of the coastguard station at Flamborough Head, and the "look-out" there, has given rather remarkable evidence. He speaks of having seen three trawlers struck by mines within half an hour of each other, and of another ship also striking a mine within his own observation from Flamborough Head; and he tells me that in not one of the four cases was any wreckage washed ashore at all.

It is, therefore, perfectly obvious that a ship might meet with this disaster by explosion without any wreckage coming ashore, and that disposes of one of the things that seems strongest in favour of a loss by "perils of the sea." Once that is out of the way I can see nothing to suggest a loss by perils of the sea. I can see a number of possibilities by mines, torpedoes and submarines, and I have come to the conclusion that I must find without any doubt in my mind that the Membland either struck a mine or was torpedoed. In any event she was not lost by a peril of the sea, and there must be judgment for the defendant with costs.

LE QUELLEC ET FILS v. THOMSON. (a)

Insurance (marine)—War risks—Extinction of lights—Loss of vessel—Remoteness of cause—Liability of insurer.

A vessel was insured against war risks, "including extinction of lights." While off the coast of Normandy, on a voyage from Rouen to Bristol, she went on the rocks at the Cap de la Hague, where, owing to war, the light in the lighthouse had been extinguished. The master was not attempting to steer by the light, but said in evidence that had it been alight he would have seen it when he deviated from the course he had set and so managed to save the vessel. The learned judge was not satisfied that the master, in the weather existing at the time of the accident, could have seen the light had it been there.

Held, upon these facts, that the owners of the vessel could not recover on the policy as the extinction of the Cap de la Hague light was too remote a cause of the loss of the vessel.

COMMERCIAL COURT.

Action tried by Rowlatt, J.

By a policy of insurance dated the 15th Jan. 1915 the plaintiffs, a French firm, insured their steamship the Astree with the defendant

Against war risks only (French conditions), including extinction of lights, &c., but excluding all claims arising from delay, including mines, torpedoes, bombs, &c.

The French conditions included the following:

Risks of civil or foreign war are not at the charge of the underwriters, excepting in so far as there is an express agreement to that effect. In the latter case the underwriters are responsible for damage or loss consequent upon war hostilities, reprisals, arrests, captures, and molestation of every kind of Government, friendly or hostile, recognised or not recognised, and generally of all accidents and fortunes of war.

On the night of the 22nd-23rd Jan. 1916 the vessel was on a voyage from Rouen to the Bristol Channel and was off the coast of Normandy. Owing to war conditions, there was no light in the lighthouse on the Cap de la Hague, a promontory in the extreme north-west of Normandy. At about 2.40 in the morning of the 23rd the Astree got on the rocks at the Cap de la Hague. The master of the vessel, in evidence, said that the calamity would never have occurred if the Cap de la Hague light had been burning. He was not attempting to steer by the light, but had it been there, he would have seen where he had left his course and could have saved the vessel. In these circumstances the plaintiffs claimed the amount of the policy, alleging that the defendant was liable under the "war risk" clause, which included "extinction of lights." The defendant denied that the loss was actually caused by the extinction of the Cap de la Hague light, though its existence might have enabled the vessel to avoid the disaster.

(a) Reported by LEONARD C. THOMAS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

ROWLATT, J.—In this case, this vessel, the Astree, was insured "to cover war risks, French conditions, including extinction of lights, &c." It is clear, therefore, that I must treat the policy as one which covers loss by extinction of lights, and I do not think I need inquire whether French war risks, on French conditions, would have included without express mention of the words, "extinction of lights." When underwriters subscribe to a policy covering loss due to extinction of lights in time of war, it is obvious that they are taking a departure which must involve some relinquishment of that well-known guide, proximate cause, because, as has been justly observed, the extinction of lights never can be exactly the proximate cause of the casualty to a vessel. It may mean that, in one way or other, it may facilitate a collision or stranding of a ship, which is a peril of the sea, but the extinction of lights is not the proximate cause in that case. However, here is a policy in which the extinction of lights has been included as a peril, and effect must be given to it, and therefore, though it does mean skipping over the immediate proximate cause, it must be done.

When you have once taken leave of the doctrine of proximate cause one is in difficulties how to make up one's mind where to draw the line. Apparently the French have never found themselves bound by any limit to confine them to the proximate cause, but according to the evidence before me they will not travel beyond what is the real and only and direct or determining cause, and in certain cases they have held that the extinguishing of lights must be a cause of that kind. It seems to me that there must be some limitation introduced somewhere; and where that should be may be a very difficult question. It is quite clear that in certain circumstances the extinguishing of lights would lead very directly to an immediate casualty. If a ship collided with another ship under way or at anchor, although the immediate cause of the damage was collision, still, without any doubt at all, the extinction of lights might be said to be the cause of the catastrophe. Even the extinction of shore lights could, it seems to me, sometimes be the immediate cause of a stranding. Where a master is expecting to find a light and is carrying on his course in reliance of seeing whether it is necessary to alter his course by the light, and where a light is not lit, the darkness causes his destruction as much as a false light would. I do not know, and I do not intend to express any opinion upon it, whether under a policy such as this the assured is limited to causes like those, but in this case it is a good deal more remote.

To begin with, the captain was not steering by the Cap de la Hague light, or any other light, as they were not lit. Really he was steering—or attempting to steer—for the English coast. His idea was not to steer by the Cap de la Hague light, but to steer direct to the English coast. That, unfortunately, was not what he succeeded in doing. Owing, not to the extinction of the lights, but possibly to something the matter with the compass or to extremely inefficient navigation, but in circumstances when neither the light of Cap de la Hague nor any other light would have helped him, because the weather was so bad, he got right in shore out of his course. He was nowhere near where he ought to have been or where he thought he was. Mr. Roche says: "Take this ship at two o'clock or just before two o'clock in the morning. It does not matter how she got there, but she was right in to shore. If she had seen the light she would have escaped. Therefore the loss of the vessel was due to the extinction of that light."

I am by no means clear that that is the right way to deal with the matter. I think the proper plan is to take the story all through and to say that the Cap de la Hague light was never a light which the captain really set out to steer by or set his course by. You must take the story all through, and when you have found he got out of his course without anything to do with the extinction of the Cap de la Hague light, you must treat that getting out of his course as nothing whatever to do with the Cap de la Hague light. I do not wish to go into that, because it seems to me the evidence is absolutely insufficient to convince me that this light would have saved him at all. He was right in shore within two or three miles of where he ultimately struck. It is not contended that up to that time he could see the Cap de la Hague light. How he got where he was I am quite unable to say. I am not at all certain that he steered the course which he traced on the map, but somehow or other he got where he did. There is just a chance that if the Cap de la Hague light had been lit the captain would have seen it. I cannot find he would have seen it. If I hold that, I cannot find for the plaintiffs in this case. In the deck log there is the entry: "Weather thick, raining, very little breeze. About two o'clock weather lifting and became clear in the west. About 2.30 squall of misty rain, it became misty, rain." The official log says: "About two o'clock there was a good clearing up of the weather leaving a clear sea in front. About 2.30 weather misty again," and so on. At two o'clock the captain was about four to six miles off, and at 2.30 he was still about six miles off this Cap de la Hague. How can I assume from evidence like that that he could have seen it? Here is a man who is looking into the darkness in the middle of the night in January. He sees nothing through the darkness, nor can he know how far his vision is penetrating. He says it was clear, but it is impossible to my thinking to say he can convince me on that point. There is no evidence of any weather report by any local authority produced before me. I should have thought it might have been possible to obtain evidence of that to be admitted into this court for the purpose of throwing some little light on the point. I am left simply with these materials.

In these circumstances, I cannot come to the conclusion that even if the light had been lighted the captain would have seen it during that critical twenty minutes. Therefore the whole basis of the plaintiffs' contention fails, and I must give judgment for the defendant, with costs.

RICHARDS v. JOHN PAYNE AND CO. (a)

Charter-party — Reference to arbitration of disputes "as to meaning and intentions of the charter"—Extent of clause.

A charter-party provided that "any disputes arising between the owner and the charterers as to the meaning and intentions of the charter should be referred to arbitration."

Held, that this phrase did not mean merely that there should be submitted to the arbitrators questions of construction as to the rights of the parties arising upon the words of the charter-party, but included the application of the charter to the facts which had arisen involving the determination of what facts had arisen, but did not entitle the arbitrator to award damages.

COMMERCIAL COURT.

Action tried by Rowlatt, J.

A charter-party under which the plaintiff let a tug to the defendants provided that the hire was to be paid in advance with punctuality and regularity, and that, in default of payment, the plaintiff was to be at liberty to withdraw the tug. The charter-party also provided that "should any differences arise between the owner and the charterers as to the meaning and intentions of the charter, the same should be referred to arbitration." Disputes having arisen in which (inter alia) the plaintiff alleged that the defendants were in arrear with payments of hire, recourse was had to arbitration. The arbitrators in due course published an award in which they found that the defendants were in arrear as regarded the payment of hire and ordered the delivery up by them of the tug. The plaintiff subsequently brought this action on the award. The defendants contended that under the agreement to refer the arbitrators had no power to make the award which they had made. They argued that the reference of disputes as to the meanings and intentions of the charter "meant a submission to the arbitrators of questions as to the construction of the charter involving the rights of the parties under that document," and nothing more.

R. A. Wright for the plaintiff.

C. R. Dunlop for the defendants.

ROWLATT, J.—In this case the plaintiff sues for the delivery up of a tug and for damages for its detention, founding his claim for delivery up upon an award made under a clause in the charter-party. He claimed before the arbitrators that the charter had come to an end. The award determined that the plaintiff had a right to withdraw the tug from the service of the charterers on the 4th Feb. 1916, and that it is made under the submission which provides that, should any difference arise between the owner and the charterers as to the meanings and intentions of the charter, the same should be referred to arbitration. The phrase, "meanings and intentions" is a very curious one, but it falls to be construed in these proceedings. What the owner said was that there had been default in payment of the hire, and that by the charter-party he was thereby entitled to withdraw the tug. It is said that this arbitration clause referring to the meanings and intentions of the charter only submits to arbitration the question of construction as to the rights of the parties arising upon the words of the charter-party, and does not include any application of the conditions of the charter-party to the facts which have arisen and given rise to the dispute. In other words, that the arbitrators had no jurisdiction to determine whether the hire was in arrear or not, so as to give rise to the clause for re-delivery. I do not think the words are clear or satisfactory, but upon the whole I think that that is too narrow a construction. I think that "meanings and intentions of the charter" include the application of it to the facts which have arisen, and not merely the construction of it as a piece of paper, and that, of course, involves the determination of what facts have arisen. It has not been treated, and I do not think it can be treated, as entitling the arbitrators to go on and give damages.

That really is enough to determine the main point in the case. But I think the plaintiff has two other points on which he can win. When you come to the letters I think it is clear that the parties interpreted this clause in the way I have interpreted it, and appointed their arbitrators to proceed upon it in the sense which I have given to it. The matter appears in a few letters as follows:

In December the plaintiff, thinking he had a right, altogether apart from the question of non-payment of hire, to determine the charter by fourteen days' notice, gave fourteen days' notice. That was not accepted by the charterers, who said the charter-party was not so determinable at the owner's instance. But when it came to the 4th Feb. the owner, then alleging that hire was in arrear, telegraphed demanding immediate re-delivery of the tug by reason of the breach of clause 7 by non-payment of hire. He wrote confirming on the same day, saying that he should proceed under the arbitration clause if re-delivery was refused, and would claim damages. On the next day he writes returning the cheque which had been sent to him, and reaffirming his intention to submit the matter in dispute to arbitration, saying he would let the other side know his arbitrator in due course, and suggesting that it would be better to have one arbitrator than two, as provided in the charter. The matter he is speaking of there seems to me quite clearly the matter last raised—namely, the claim for re-delivery on the ground of non-payment of hire. On the 7th Feb. there is an answer from the charterers' solicitor, saying: "We see no reason why the terms of the charter-party should be deviated from." That refers to the only proposal to deviate from the terms of the arbitration clause—namely, the proposal to substitute one arbitrator for two. On the 18th Feb. the plaintiff's solicitors write back declining, and saying they will proceed to arbitration, and will claim damages as from the 11th Jan.—meaning damages as from the date applicable to the fourteen days' notice given in December—and in the alternative the 4th Feb., when re-delivery of the tug was claimed. Thus there were being put forward two cases of non-delivery and two claims for damages. In these circumstances it seems to me that the parties have construed the matter and have referred both these claims to the arbitrators. They have not agreed, of course, to the arbitrators awarding damages for them, for they have no jurisdiction, but it seems to me that they have agreed that both the claims for re-delivery shall be arbitrated upon with such consequences as shall properly follow. Therefore it seems to me that on that ground also the award can be supported.

Then it is said that the award is not good because it is silent as to the claim for non-delivery upon the fourteen days' notice given in December. It is true that arbitrators must decide all matters submitted to them, but I think Mr. Wright's answer to that argument is correct when he says they really have decided it. If you ask for re-delivery and for damages based on an early date and also on a later date, and as here the award is made on the later date, I think that is sufficient. Therefore I think the award is good, and that the plaintiff succeeds.

With regard to the hire, that might be paid at the option of the owner monthly or weekly in advance. Nothing seems to have been said about that particularly, but something had to be paid in advance, and accounts were stated and money paid up to the 18th Jan. 1916. On the 10th Jan. a cheque was sent on by defendants for 90*l.*, four weeks' hire, and that took matters up to the 29th Jan. Therefore, on the 29th Jan., something more had to be paid, but nothing at all was paid, and there seems to be no answer to the claim that unless the money was paid on the 29th Jan. the owner was entitled to re-delivery of the tug. These clauses must be strictly applied. The owners of a tug have no sort of security for their money. They cannot distrain like the lessor of a house, and the only security they have, if money is not paid when due, is to have the tug back again.

It is also argued that after all the money was not really due till the 4th Feb., but I do not think that will do. There was said to be a question of some 2½ per cent. commission on the charter-party, but the fact was they were treating the hire as a separate matter, and if there was going to be an account between the parties, that should have been put to the plaintiff. But the parties have gone on treating the hire as becoming due on the 29th Jan., and therefore I think the arbitrators have taken a reasonable and business-like view when they said there was default made on the part of the defendants on the 29th Jan. Therefore I hold that plaintiff must recover.

In regard to the question of damages Mr. Dunlop said he was ignorant as to the value of tugs. I do not know if he really meant that, but he was right when he said the matter of the value of the tug had not been brought strictly to his notice in the case. I think the plaintiff is entitled to the value of the tug as from the 4th Feb., always allowing for the fact that this tug seems to have been "out of health" now and then, and was for some days off running. That must be allowed for, but I cannot possibly decide the question of figures, and I cannot adjourn the case, which would not be fair to others. In the same way, I cannot try the amount of repairs and commission claimed by defendants against the plaintiff. What I think is that if the parties cannot agree as to the figures they ought to find someone to settle it for them, and in default of that there will be liberty to apply.

I shall therefore give judgment for the plaintiff with costs, with a reference as to damages and for an account of all claims between the parties.

COMMERCIAL COURT.

Action tried by Rowlatt, J.

By a charter-party dated the 13th July 1915 the plaintiffs, as owners, chartered the steamship Mary Baird to the defendants to load timber at Archangel for conveyance to Sharpness Docks, where it was to be discharged.

By clause 10 of the charter-party the cargo was to be discharged with the customary steamer dispatch of the port, and in the ordinary working hours. By clause 11 demurrage was to be payable at the rate of 90*l.* per day, where the delay was occasioned "through any fault of the charterer or merchant." By clause 20 the steamer was to be discharged at Sharpness Docks at the average rate of ninety standards per weather working day. In the negotiations for the charter-party it was agreed that, notwithstanding clause 20, steamer dispatch at the Sharpness Docks for the ship should be at the average rate of 100 standards per weather working day. By clause 21 the stevedores employed by the steamer for the discharge of the cargo were to be approved by the charterers.

On the 22nd Sept. 1915 the Mary Baird with a cargo of 747 standards of timber arrived at Sharpness Docks. The lay days commenced on the following day. By the supplementary agreement between the parties the cargo should have been discharged in eight weather working days—i.e., on the 1st Oct. Unloading was not, however, completed until 2 p.m. on the 19th Oct. The plaintiffs now brought this action claiming 1582*l.* 10*s.* demurrage in respect of detention of the vessel for seventeen days fourteen hours after the 1st Oct.

The plaintiffs contended that this sum was due since by its terms the charter-party was a "fixed time" charter-party, and that the defendants were bound to unload at the rate of 100 standards per day or pay demurrage. The defendants argued that it was a "reasonable time" charter-party, and they fulfilled their part under it when they unloaded with all possible dispatch.

F. D. MacKinnon, K.C. and W. N. Raeburn for the plaintiffs.

A. A. Roche, K.C. and C. R. Dunlop for the defendants.

ROWLATT, J. — The first question for my decision is whether this charter-party is to be treated as one providing for fixed lay days. Mr. MacKinnon was willing to concede that apart from clause 20 (that is in its application to ports other than Sharpness) it only provided for reasonable diligence in discharge. But for the purposes of the present case we have to consider the effect of clause 20 and also the interlineations and the letter of July 19.

Without considering the interlineations as to Archangel and the special bargaining about the increase of ninety standards in clause 20 to 100 (on both of which matters a good deal of argument was expended which does not appear to me to come to very much in the end), I think that the effect of clause 20 is to quantify by agreement in the case of Sharpness what will be achieved by the application of clause 10, and that makes the combination of the two a fixed lay day discharging clause. Mr. Roche said that clause 20 only made ninety standards a maximum, reaching which, however easily, the charterer was not to be called on to do more. On the words of the document I cannot see why it should be a maximum more than a minimum. But Mr. Roche said that history showed that that is what the merchants have been contending for, and referred to Sea Steamship Company v. Price (8 Com. Cas. 292) and Ropner v. Stoate (10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 32; 92 L. T. Rep. 328).

Admitting the argument, I do not see why the controversy should be settled by the adoption of a maximum any more than by the adoption of a fixed rate. At any rate I do not feel constrained to depart from what I think is the straightforward meaning of the words used. No doubt ninety standards was the figure which was regarded as suitable for the general run of steamers chartered for Sharpness. If there was an extra large one or a very small one the figure could easily be altered.

This then, in my view, is a fixed lay day charter-party. But then Mr. Roche says that the ship could not do her part in discharging 100 standards a day, and that the rule in Budgett v. Billington (1891) 1 Q. B. 35) is excluded by clause 11, which says that demurrage is to be payable for delay "by the fault of the charterer." The first difficulty is that if clause 11 limits the consequences to the charterer of this being a fixed lay day charter-party I cannot see how it is limited to delivering him from the doctrine of Budgett v. Billington (sup.), and does not protect him from the consequences of something which is not his fault—in other words, gets rid of the effect of the fixed lay days altogether. The words do undoubtedly create a difficulty, but I think the solution is what was suggested by Mr. MacKinnon. The general frame of this printed form and its effect, except as regards Sharpness, is that of a charter-party without fixed lay days. The words of clause 11 now under discussion are suitable enough for a charter-party of that kind. The breach of contract involving payment of demurrage is not using due diligence, which may be called a fault. Turn the charter for the purposes of Sharpness into a fixed lay day charter, and the breach of contract becomes merely the fact (excepted causes excluded) of not keeping time. That would not naturally have been described as the result of a "fault" of the charterer, but the word is there, and it must be read when clause 20 applies as descriptive merely of his breach of an absolute contract, though actually it is not his fault. Or to put it more shortly, it may be said that where clause 20 operates the words "through any fault of the charterer or merchant" become inapplicable.

The next question is, when did the time begin to run? Under the charter-party as printed the ship having by the express words to proceed to a berth as ordered, was not an arrived ship, and could not be ready to discharge until she got to the berth. Of a ship under such a charter-party it can never be said that she is ready in herself to unload before she gets to the berth, that expression being only applicable, in the absence of some special provision ante dating her readiness, to a ship which has arrived. It can only apply to a ship not yet in an unloading berth if under the terms of the charter-party, and in accordance with the rules expounded in Leonis Steamship Company v. Rank (11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 142; (1908) 1 K. B. 499), her arrival is complete on reaching a port or dock and before she reaches an unloading berth.

By the letter of the 19th July time was made to count by reference to the time when the ship is reported ready to discharge. If it had only said "is reported" the time would, of course, have run from the report, and arrival, within the meaning of the charter-party, could have nothing to do with it. The position would have been as in Horsley Line v. Roechling Brothers (1908, S. C. 866). But she has also to be ready to discharge, and I read that as meaning ready to discharge in conformity with the printed charter-party under which, as I have already said, she could not be ready till she had got to her berth, because till then she would not be an arrived ship.

I can see nothing in this letter to alter the destination at which this ship is to arrive from the berth to be named in Sharpness Docks generally, so as to bring her in this respect under a different class of charter-party altogether. This provision is designed to draw a line at noon, and not to vary the conditions under which the ship could be said to be ready to discharge. To do that in the sense contended for it would be necessary to insert some such words as "whether in berth or not," as was done in Northfield Steamship Company v. Compagnie l'Union de Gaz (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 87; 105 L. T. Rep. 853; (1912) 1 K. B. 434), where the decision turned on that provision. In fact, the defendants here did unload a little of the cargo in the tidal dock on the 23rd, doubtless to save time and be so much to the good, but there is nothing from which I can infer that there was an agreement to ante-date the running of time. In the result, time began to count on the morning of the 24th, from which time the charterers had eight days.

The only other question is whether half a day is to be allowed for rain on Tuesday, the 28th Sept. According to the log, the day began with light rain and ended with heavy rain. Meteorological records state that 40in. of rain fell that day. Work, in fact, went on till one o'clock.

Mr. Reece, the stevedore for the ship, being in fact the stevedore to the dock company and approved as acting for the ship by the charterers under clause 21 of the charter-party, reported to the owners a few days afterwards that rain stopped work at the same time as the only lighter available was fully loaded—namely, at one o'clock. Mr. Reece gave evidence before me, but was unable to tell me when the other timber vessels stopped for the rain. It is clear that work having proceeded till one o'clock—that is to say, an hour and a half into the second half of the day—it was getting near the time when enough work would have been done in the latter half of the day to prevent that half-day being allowed for rain.

In these circumstances, in the absence of information as to when the other ships stopped, I am not satisfied, and it was for the charterers, who are local people at Gloucester, to satisfy me that rain stopped work precisely at one, or early enough thereafter to entitle the charterers to claim the half-day. Judgment must be for the plaintiffs.

EASTERN COUNTIES FARMERS' CO-OPERATIVE ASSOCIATION LIMITED v. NEWHOUSE AND CO. (a)

Carriage of goods—Delivery ex ship to railway—Deposit in carriers' warehouse—Destruction by fire—Liability of carriers.

The plaintiffs directed the defendants—the owners of a line of steamships which were carrying certain goods for delivery to the plaintiffs—to "deliver ex ship to the railway company to our order." The contract contained a clause protecting the defendants from liability for damage to goods by fire. On arrival the goods were not taken direct to the railway station, but were placed in the defendants' warehouse adjoining the quay. Here a fire broke out, and the goods were destroyed. The plaintiffs brought an action for breach of contract and duty in handling the goods, contending that, in view of the instructions sent to the defendants, the goods should never have been put into the warehouse, and that, as they had been so dealt with, the defendants were liable for their loss and could not avail themselves of the protection afforded by the terms of the contract.

Held, that the expression "ex ship" did not exclude the taking of goods into warehouse for the purpose of dispatching them by cart to a railway, and that in this case, the removal of the goods into the warehouse being justifiable, the defendants were entitled to avail themselves of the protection afforded by the contract.

COMMERCIAL COURT.

Action tried by Rowlatt, J.

The plaintiffs were a limited company dealing in agricultural produce generally. The defendants were a company owning a line of steamers sailing from Hull to various places, among which was Yarmouth. In July 1915 the plaintiffs, who were expecting delivery of thirty tons of oil cake from the north of England, which was being conveyed by the defendants' line of steamers, sent a notice to the defendants in the following terms: "Deliver ex ship to the railway company to our order." The goods were in consequence only insured against marine risks until delivery.

Instead, however, of being delivered direct from the ship to the railway station, on arrival the oil cake was put into the defendants' warehouse adjoining the quay. On the 19th July 1915 a fire broke out in the warehouse and the oil cake was destroyed.

The contract between the parties contained this clause:

> Newhouse and Co. are not responsible for loss or damage by fire while lying for shipment, collection, delivery, or in the course of transit, at their wharf or warehouse, or any other wharf or warehouse at which they may be placed, landed, or kept, nor for any loss or damage occasioned to the goods while shipping, wharfing, storing, carting, landing, or lightering the same, or in any way after discharge, nor for the acts, neglects, or defaults of servants.

The plaintiffs brought this action against the defendants for breach of contract and duty in regard to the carriage and delivery of the oil cake which, they alleged, had resulted in its loss.

Greer, K.C. and H. A. McCardie for the plaintiffs.—The oil cake should never have been put into the warehouse. It should have been taken straight from the ship to the railway station, or, if that was impossible, it should have been placed upon the quay until such time as conveyance to the station was practicable. The defendants acted wrongly in putting it into the warehouse, and are responsible for its loss. The protection afforded them by the contract cannot in the circumstances avail them.

A. A. Roche, K.C. and Alec Neilson for the defendants.—The conduct of the defendants was throughout reasonable, and the defendants, in consequence, are not liable to the plaintiffs in respect of the damage to the goods. It was impossible for the defendants to deal with all the cargo of the ship at once. They are clearly protected by the terms of the contract.

ROWLATT, J.—This is an action for the loss of goods intrusted to the defendants for carriage. There were certain exceptions in the printed document under which the business was done between the parties, and the point was taken on the pleadings that these exceptions did not form part of the contract. That point was quite properly given up by Mr. Greer at the commencement of the case. It is a point of which nothing whatever could have been made, because, when business people are dealing together, it is quite hopeless to raise any question as to whether printed conditions of this kind are part of the contract. It is also quite rightly admitted that if the condition, being part of the contract, applied to the goods at the time of the loss, that could not be maintained.

The defendants are shipowners, and their contract was to carry the goods in question from Hull to Yarmouth, and there deliver them ex ship on rail. They were to be paid for carting and some other small charges, and the carriage included landing and carting to the rail. The loss resulted from a fire at the defendants' quay at Yarmouth, where they had put the goods into a warehouse pending carting to the railway. The fire was on the 19th July 1915, and some of the goods had been in the warehouse from the 14th or 15th. Others had only arrived, I think, the day before the fire, and had only just been put into the warehouse.

The plaintiffs say that putting the goods into the warehouse was a dealing with them not warranted by the contract at all, and therefore the exceptions, referring as they do only to risks occurring when the goods are being handled, accordingly did not apply to goods in the warehouse. Further, they say that not only are the expressed exceptions not applicable, but that, the goods having been put by the defendants into warehouse without authority, the defendants are absolutely responsible for their loss by a risk, external to the goods themselves, operating in a place where the defendants had no business to put the goods.

The principles involved are clear. The only difficulty is to appreciate correctly the facts connected with the business so as to see whether or not the defendants had authority to put the goods into warehouse for the purpose and for the time they did put them there.

These goods were to be put on rail ex ship. The practice was for the plaintiffs, if they desired the goods so dealt with, to advise to that effect the defendants before the arrival of the ship, and they did so in this case. If they did not so advise, the goods went into warehouse. The plaintiffs afterwards ordered them ex warehouse, and in this latter case defendants made a small charge, and after a certain time they also charged a warehouse rent.

The plaintiffs at first argued that these two courses of dealing being in the contract, the goods ex ship could not be put into warehouse at all; that they must be hoisted straight out of the ship into carts, or, if that could not be done, placed on the quay, and wait there under a tarpaulin, and that on no account could they have been put into warehouse.

I find no difficulty in rejecting this argument. The expression "ex ship" does not exclude taking the goods into warehouse for the purpose of dispatching them by cart to the railway. The defendants, as the owners of these small coasting steamers, carrying cargoes of multifarious parcels which they require to unload with all dispatch and without loss of time, cannot be expected to sort the goods at the ship as they are being hoisted from the hull. Common sense requires that they should have terminal premises, as in fact they have on the quay, where they can sort goods for forwarding to where they require to send them in due course. The real point made by the plaintiffs is that the goods were not here for the purpose of being forwarded, but were taken here in order to allow the defendants, for their own convenience, to delay the forwarding of them, and that this was the interposition of a new stage in the transaction not contemplated, and the plaintiffs further say there was no distinction between the goods which came in on the day of the fire and those which had been in four or five days. The purpose for which they were there was the same in either case, and I am inclined to agree that, from the point of view of the plaintiffs' argument, there was no distinction.

What I have to determine is whether the purposes for which they were taken into the warehouse was justifiable.

The defendants' steamers come in at somewhat irregular intervals of a week or less. The defendants contract for the cartage required to take the goods to the rail, and their arrangements are made so as to keep deliveries in general level with arrivals, getting rid of the cargo of each steamer by the time the next comes in, thus keeping their cartage requirements fairly constant. Some of the goods are perishable, and they go first. They might also send other goods if they are required. Plaintiffs' oil cake, not being perishable, was left to the end. Does that, so far as the oil cake is concerned, introduce a new and unauthorised stage in connection with the transaction? I do not think it does, and I think the defendants, carrying on as they do the business of carriers by these local steamers, and performing also for the plaintiffs the function of forwarding agents, must be contemplated as arranging their business in the way they have arranged it, not intending to cope instantly with each cargo as it arrived, and then relapsing into comparative inertia until the next one comes in.

Therefore, I think they were covered by the exception. Mr. Roche argued that if I held that the removal into the warehouse was justifiable, their detention there could not be complained of. That does not deal with Mr. Greer's point, which was that this was not a prolongation of a mere passage through warehouse on the way to the carts, but was a subsequent deposit of another kind, which was not warranted. I have come to a conclusion against Mr. Greer on the facts.

Therefore I must give judgment for defendants with costs.

COURT OF APPEAL.

March 15, 16, and May 23, 1916.

(Before Lord Reading, C.J., Warrington, L.J. and Scrutton, J.)

Booth Steamship Company Limited v. Cargo Fleet Iron Company Limited. (a)

Sale of goods—Stoppage in transitu—Liability of unpaid vendor for freight—Sale of Goods Act 1893, ss. 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 61.

A notice of stoppage given during the transit and persisted in upon arrival of the goods involves an obligation upon the vendor to discharge the shipowner's lien for freight. If the vendor repudiates the obligation and so conducts himself as to prevent the shipowner completing his voyage and earning his freight, an action can be maintained by the shipowner against the vendor for damages for the breach of the obligation created by the notice to take actual possession of the goods upon arrival and to discharge the shipowner's lien for the freight in respect of the goods.

By a contract of carriage entered into by the plaintiffs, who were shipowners, with the Construction Company, the plaintiffs carried in the autumn of 1913 by their steamers certain parcels of railway material from England to C., a small island owned by the plaintiffs in the Gulf of Tutoya, in Brazil. The ultimate destination of the goods was P., a place which was sixty miles up the river and could only be reached by lighters at certain states of the tide. Tutoya was the end of the ocean transit. The defendants, who were the vendors of the goods to the Construction Company, were not parties to the contract of affreightment with the plaintiffs. The Construction Company being in financial difficulties, the defendants, as unpaid vendors of the goods, exercised their right of stoppage in transitu by giving due notice to the plaintiffs before the steamers arrived at the port of destination. By the contract of carriage freight was payable before the departure of the steamers, and the plaintiffs had a lien upon the goods for unpaid freight. Upon the arrival of the steamers at Tutoya the plaintiffs landed the goods in question upon the island of C. and notified the defendants accordingly, but the defendants repudiated all responsibility in respect of the goods. At the time of the trial the goods were still at C., and no duty had been paid on them, nor had the plaintiffs received their freight.

Held, that the plaintiffs were entitled to treat the voyage as completed when the goods were landed at C., and to recover as damages for the breach of the obligation the full amount of freight which they would have earned had the voyage been completed.

Appeal by the plaintiffs from the decision of Bailhache, J. The facts, which are sufficiently summarised in the headnote, appear fully from the judgments.

Bailhache, J. held that the plaintiffs had not completed the voyage, and that they had failed to prove that the defendants had prevented them carrying the goods to their destination and tendering them there. He accordingly gave judgment for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 23.—The following written judgments were delivered:—

Lord READING, C.J.—This case raises a novel and interesting point of law, of some importance to carriers and merchants—namely, whether an unpaid vendor who has stopped goods in transitu can be made liable for the freight on the goods, or for damages for having prevented the carrier earning the freight.

The plaintiffs claim to recover freight or damages from the defendants, the unpaid vendors of certain goods carried by the plaintiffs and consigned to the purchasers. The defendants were not parties to the contract of carriage, but gave notice of stoppage in transitu whilst the goods were being carried by the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs acted on this notice, and claim that in the circumstances the defendants are liable to them for the amount of the freight on the goods. The defendants deny that they have incurred any liability to the plaintiffs for freight or damages by the giving of this notice or otherwise. Bailhache, J. came to the conclusion that the plaintiffs had not completed the voyage, and that they had failed to prove that the defendants had prevented them carrying the goods to their destination and tendering them there, and for these reasons he gave judgment for the defendants. The learned judge did not decide whether the defendants would have been liable to the plaintiffs if he had found in their favour on the facts, but expressed the view that he should have been disposed to grant the relief claimed. From that judgment the plaintiffs appeal.

The plaintiffs are shipowners trading from the United Kingdom to ports in Brazil. The defendants are manufacturers of steel rails and other material used in the construction of railways. They sold certain steel rails and fish-plates to the South American Railway Construction Company Limited, which was constructing a railway in Brazil under a concession from the Brazilian Government. In the autumn of 1913 the defendants, acting under the instructions of the British Maritime Trust Limited, given on behalf of the Construction Company, delivered certain parcels of steel rails and fish-plates to be carried by the plaintiffs' steamships to Paranahyba in Brazil. The defendants were under obligations to deliver the goods "f.o.b. Middlesbrough" or on certain terms "f.o.b. Liverpool," payment to be made in exchange for shipping documents. Six hundred tons of rails and fifty-five tons of fish-plates were shipped at Middlesbrough in the Napo and 400 tons were shipped in the Ravonia for transhipment at Liverpool into the Crispin. The Napo and the Crispin were steamships owned by the plaintiffs. Although the defendants were the actual shippers of the rails and plates on these vessels for carriage to Paranahyba, they were not parties to the contract of affreightment with the plaintiffs. Under engagements made between the British Maritime Trust Limited, on behalf of the Construction Company, and the plaintiffs, the Construction Company were the consignees of the goods, and were also treated as the shippers, and the freight was payable by them before the departure of the ship. The mates' receipts for the goods as shipped were received by the defendants and forwarded by them to the plaintiffs, who, after making out the bills of lading, cancelled the mates' receipts and returned them to the defendants. The bills of lading for the goods on the Napo and the Crispin, dated the 6th and 8th Oct. 1913 respectively, were held by the plaintiffs until payment of the freight. The freight has not been paid and the bills of lading have never been issued. The rails and plates were never carried to Paranahyba, their destination under the contract, but were landed at Cajueiro, a small island owned by the plaintiffs in the Bay of Tutoya, in Brazil, Paranahyba being situate at a distance of sixty miles from Tutoya up the river. On a voyage to Paranahyba the ocean transport ends at Tutoya, and the carriage up the river to Paranahyba is made by means of lighters. This river is navigable for the lighters only when the tides serve, which occurs twice or thrice in a month. In the ordinary course, and if the tide is serving, the goods are taken from the ship at Tutoya and immediately placed in the lighters for carriage to Paranahyba. If the tide does not serve, the goods are landed by the plaintiffs at Cajueiro and are left there until the lighters can carry them to Paranahyba. There is a bonded warehouse at Paranahyba capable of receiving 300 or 400 tons of cargo, but steel rails and fish-plates are never placed in the warehouse. The practice is that Custom House guards accompany the lighters to Paranahyba, and, in the case of heavy goods, such as steel rails and fish-plates, the duty is assessed and paid in the lighters, and the goods are thus "dispatched." This term is used to denote the passing of the goods through the customs and the payment of the duty leviable upon them. If the rails are not sent forward at once for use, they must lie at Paranahyba in the open, as there is no warehouse accommodation for them. They cannot, however, be landed at Paranahyba unless the duty has been paid upon them.

On the 14th Oct. 1913 the defendants became aware that the purchasers were in financial difficulties, and on that date wrote to the plaintiffs' agents requesting them to refrain from handing over the bills of lading until further notice from the defendants. On the 27th Oct. 1913 the defendants gave notice to the plaintiffs in the following terms: "Please arrange to prevent any rails and fish-plates shipped per Napo and Crispin being handed over to South American Construction Company at Paranahyba without bill of lading or our authority to release." On the same day the plaintiffs' agents wrote to the defendants: "We may say that we have declined to part with the bills of lading for the cargo shipped by you per steamship Napo and steamship Crispin to the shippers, the South American Railway Construction Company, pending payment by them of the freight due, and we now take note that you desire us not to part with them irrespective of this condition. We are forwarding to Messrs. the Booth Steamship Company Limited, Liverpool, a copy of your message. They may perhaps address you direct on the subject, as we understand the steamship Napo is getting due at her destination, but, failing this, we will advise you as soon as we receive their reply—the question of lien in a Brazilian port is a difficult one. Would it simplify matters if you paid the freight and took up the bills of lading under a guarantee of indemnity to the shipowners?" On the next day the defendants refused to fall in with this suggestion as to the payment by them of the freight. On the 29th Oct. 1913 the defendants gave them the following notice to the plaintiffs:

We beg to inclose copies of letters which we have exchanged with your agents, Messrs. Moxon, Salt, and Co. Please note that we look to you not to hand over the material shipped per steamship Napo and steamship Crispin to the South American Railway Construction Company or anyone else without authority from us. We give you this notice as we understand you are holding our bills of lading for freight.

It is not in dispute that these letters constituted an effective notice of stoppage in transitu and that the defendants, as unpaid vendors, had the right to give it, and that the plaintiffs accepted it and promised to act upon it. The plaintiffs had no alternative in the matter; they were bound to act upon the notice, and, if they disregarded it and delivered the goods to the consignees, they would be liable to the defendants for damages for wrongful conversion: (The Tigress, sup.). On the 29th Oct. the Napo arrived at Tutoya; the Crispin did not arrive until the 25th Nov. 1913. On the 30th Oct. the plaintiffs' agents at Middlesbrough advised the defendants of the arrival of the Napo at Tutoya, and informed them that it was necessary to take some prompt action to deal with the rails on board the vessel. They added that the plaintiffs were willing to take the defendants' instructions regarding the disposal of the rails, and in this connection would act as agents for the defendants to hold the rails under their orders, subject to the payment of any charges which might be incurred. On the 31st Oct. 1913 the plaintiffs wrote to the defendants:

"We beg to confirm our telegram of to-day as follows: "Acting on your instructions we shall not surrender bills of lading to the South American Railway Company without your authority. We shall commence landing rails forthwith for your account, holding bills of lading at your disposal." We shall be glad to have your specific instructions without delay.

On the same day the defendants replied:

Telegram received. Note you will not surrender bills of lading without our authority, which is in order. For the rest we cannot accept responsibility for your landing rails at Tutoya.

On the 1st Nov. 1913 the plaintiffs telegraphed to defendants:

You have instructed us not to deliver the goods ex Napo to the bill of lading consignees, thus stopping the goods on the basis of your lien in transit. We are carrying out your instructions, and must land cargo at Paranahyba for your account, and look to you for all consequent charges.

On the 1st Nov. 1913 the defendants wrote to plaintiffs:

While we have nothing to do with the decision you have apparently arrived at for your protection to land the material at Tutoya instead of Paranahyba . . . we look to you to hold the bills of lading at our disposal, so far as they relate to the goods supplied by us, until further notice.

The plaintiffs then advised the defendants to appeal to the judicial tribunal at Paranahyba for restraint of delivery. On the 4th Nov. 1913 the defendants requested the plaintiffs to make this appeal in respect of the shipment per Napo and Crispin, but later, and before effective steps had been taken, withdrew the request (the 26th Nov. 1913), stating that "our friends the South American Railway Construction Company have given us their undertaking that they will not deal with the goods or take any steps to our detriment until our account has been paid." A number of letters and telegrams passed thereafter between the parties and their agents which did not change the situation. The plaintiffs continued to insist that, as the defendants had given instructions to stop the goods and also not to deliver them, the plaintiffs looked to them for all attendant charges, including freight. The defendants, on the other hand, persisted in repudiating all responsibility for freight or other expenses payable by the shippers for the landing of the goods or otherwise. They would only admit responsibility for expenses incurred on their behalf by the plaintiffs after the goods had been landed. The shipowners had carried the goods to Tutoya, and were ready and willing to forward them by lighter to Paranahyba, but it was useless to send them to Paranahyba unless it was intended to pay the duty upon them, as they could not be landed at Paranahyba until the duty had been paid, and, if not paid, the goods must either be brought back to Tutoya or left indefinitely in the lighters. Who was to pay the duty? The unpaid vendors repudiated all responsibility. The consignees were insolvent and could, or in any event would not pay the duty. They could not pay the purchase money, and had agreed with the defendants that they would not deal with the goods until it was paid. In these circumstances what were the shipowners to do? Clearly they were under no obligation to pay the duty. But the goods must be discharged; they could not remain in the ship or the lighters, and the ship could not remain indefinitely at Tutoya—neither could the lighters remain indefinitely at Paranahyba or Tutoya. The course taken by the plaintiffs was to deposit them at Cajueiro, where they lie to this day. By the freight contract the plaintiffs have a lien upon the goods for unpaid freight, and the goods are held by the plaintiffs subject to their lien. At the date of the trial the duty had not been paid upon the goods, delivery had not been made at Paranahyba, the plaintiffs had not received their freight, and the defendants had not obtained their purchase money.

Upon these facts the question arises whether the plaintiffs can recover the freight or damages from the defendants. Bailhache, J. thought not. In order to determine whether the learned judge's conclusion was right, it is, in my judgment, necessary to ascertain the legal position of the carrier and the vendor when a valid notice of stoppage in transitu has been given. When goods are stopped, there is usually no difficulty as to the payment of the freight to the shipowner; the vendor pays it in order to discharge the shipowner's lien and to regain actual possession of the goods. The present case is exceptional in that the vendors insist upon the stoppage but refuse to pay the freight. They say to the shipowners: "The goods must not be handed to the consignee because of our notice of stoppage, and we will not take actual possession of the goods as we should have to pay the freight. You must continue to hold the goods subject to our notice of stoppage." The plaintiffs say: "You, the vendors, are the only persons to whom the actual possession of the goods can be given, and you are under obligation to take actual possession, which will involve the payment by you of the freight."

In the circumstances, what are the rights and obligations of the parties? The right of stoppage in transitu was introduced into English law in the seventeenth century, and the first reported case on the subject is in the year 1690: (Wiseman v. Vandeputt, 2 Vern. 203). As the right arises only in the case of insolvency, it came to be recognised in our courts in the first instance through the medium of the bankruptcy jurisdiction of the Lord Chancellor, which was of statutory creation. The right is not peculiar to the law of England; it was part of the law merchant existing in most of the commercial States of Europe before it was recognised as part of our law. In 1743 Lord Hardwicke received evidence of the custom of merchants as to stoppage in transitu and then applied the rule. He based his decree both upon the custom proved before him and upon the justice of the case. (Snee v. Prescot, 1 Atk. 245). In 1841 Lord Abinger in Gibson v. Carruthers (8 M. & W. 321, 338) gave a full and interesting account of the history of the introduction of stoppage in transitu into our law and reviewed the authorities. He referred to the opinions expressed by courts of equity that the right was founded upon some principle of the common law and of the practice in courts of law to call the right a principle of equity which the common law had adopted. He pointed out the difficulty, owing, perhaps, to its foreign parentage, of reducing this right to some analogy with the principles which govern the law of contract as it prevails in this country between vendor and purchaser. This difficulty, in spite of decisions and legislation, has not been entirely solved. Lord Abinger came to the conclusion that the right had been adopted as part of the law merchant and formed part of the common law of England.

What is the right? It is the right of the unpaid vendor, on discovery of the insolvency of the buyer, and notwithstanding that he has made constructive delivery of the goods to the buyer, to retake them if he can before they reach the buyer's possession. It is a right founded upon the plain reason that one man's goods shall not be applied to the payment of another man's debt: (D'Aquila v. Lambert, 2 Eden, 77; Benjamin on Sales, p. 817). It is the right not only to countermand delivery to the purchaser, but to order delivery to the vendor: (The Tigress, sup.; United States Steel Products Company v. Great Western Railway Company (sup., at p. 202, per Lord Atkinson). Dr. Lushington adds, in The Tigress (sup.): "Were it otherwise, the right to stop would be useless and trade would be impeded." That the vendor has the right to order delivery to himself cannot be disputed; but does the notice to the carrier place the vendor under obligation to the carrier to take delivery or to give directions for delivery of the goods? I think it does. The goods have been received by the carrier to be delivered to the purchaser. When the vendor has placed the goods in the actual possession of the carrier he has performed his contract of sale and has made delivery to the purchaser. The property in the goods and the right to possession have passed to the purchaser, but the notice of stoppage operates to defeat the purchaser's right to the possession of the goods and transfers it to the vendor. Although doubts existed in the past as to whether or not the contract of sale was rescinded by the exercise of the vendor's right of stoppage in transitu, they have long since been dispelled: (Kemp v. Falk, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 1; 47 L. T. Rep. 454; 7 App. Cas. 573, 581, per Lord Blackburn; and the law is now to be found in the Sale of Goods Act 1893, 56 & 57 Vict. c. 71). Stoppage in transitu is dealt with in the statute by sects. 44 to 48. By sect. 61, sub-sect. 2, the rules of the common law, including the law merchant, save in so far as they are inconsistent with the express provisions of the Act, continue to be applicable to contracts for the sale of goods. By sect. 48, sub-sect. 1, it is provided that the mere exercise by an unpaid vendor of his right to stop in transitu does not rescind the contract of sale: (see also United States Steel Products Company v. Great Western Railway Company, sup., at p. 203, per Lord Atkinson). The vendor may resell the goods, provided he has complied with certain conditions, and recover damages from his original buyer for loss occasioned by the breach of the contract: (sect. 48, sub-sect. 3). But after the notice is given by the vendor to the carrier the right to possession of the goods is resumed by the vendor; that is the effect of the notice, and the carrier is under obligation to give actual possession to the vendor only or according to his directions. To use the words of the codifying statute, the carrier "must deliver the goods to or according to the directions of the seller": (sect. 46, sub-sect. 2). The carrier cannot be under obligation to deliver the goods upon arrival to the purchaser, his consignee, and also to the vendor who has given notice of stoppage. From the giving of the notice, and so long as the notice is operative, his obligation is to deliver, not to the consignee, but to the vendor.

It was argued in this case that the vendor obtained all the benefits of the notice without incurring any liabilities. As I have already said, I cannot accept this argument. The vendor, by the act of giving notice of stoppage, has prevented the shipowner making delivery to his consignee, and the vendor, in my judgment, is under the correlative obligation to the shipowner to take delivery or give directions for delivery. If there is a lien for freight due in respect of the goods, the vendor's obligation to take delivery involves the further obligation upon him to pay the freight, for he cannot get actual possession until he has discharged the shipowner's lien for freight due in respect of the carriage of the goods in question, but not in respect of freight due by the consignee to the shipowner on other goods: (Oppenheim v. Russell, sup.; United States Steel Products Company v. Great Western Railway Company, sup.). Although there is no decision to be found in the books making the vendor liable in the circumstances for the freight upon the goods stopped by him, I think the earlier cases point in the direction of such an obligation upon him.

The history of the recognition of this right of stoppage in transitu in English law is that, at first, it was thought actual possession of the goods was necessary to constitute a valid stoppage in transitu. Lord Hardwicke was at one time of this opinion (see Snee v. Prescot (sup.); but later it was held that actual possession by the vendor was not necessary. In 1787 it was held by Grose, J. in Lickbarrow v. Mason (1 Sm. L. C., 12th edit., pp. 726, 740) that "it is now the clear, known, and established law that the consignor may seize the goods in transitu, if the consignee become insolvent before the delivery of them." In 1798 Lord Kenyon said in Northey and Lewis v. Field (2 Esp. 613): "The courts had of late years leaned much in favour of the power of the consignor to stop his goods in transitu; it was a leaning to the furtherance of justice. Lord Hardwicke had been of opinion that, in order to stop goods in transitu, there must be an actual possession of them obtained by the consignor before they come to the hands of the consignee; but that rule has since been relaxed; and it was now held that an actual possession was not necessary; that a claim was sufficient; and to that rule he subscribed." In 1802 Lord Alvanley expressed the same view in Oppenheim v. Russell (sup.). He said: "This was an action brought by the plaintiff as consignor against a carrier for the recovery of goods, and it is stated upon the case that the goods were demanded by the plaintiffs before they either actually or constructively reached the hands of the consignee. According to the general rule the carrier under these circumstances was bound to deliver them and was liable, as Lord Kenyon very properly determined, to an action of trover if he did not deliver them. Though no act of seizure ensue, yet if tender be made of the sum due for the carriage, the person sending the goods has the right to resume them, and that was done in this case." In Litt v. Cowley (7 Taunt. 169, 170) Gibbs, C.J., referring to past cases, said: "It was formerly held that the only way of stoppage in transitu was by actual corporal touch of the goods. It has since been held that after notice to a carrier not to deliver, he is liable for the goods in trover against himself if he does not deliver them."

Now, by sect. 44 of the statute, when the buyer becomes insolvent, the unpaid vendor has the right to resume possession of the goods so long as they are in course of transit, and he has rights of sale under sect. 48. The method of effecting the right of stoppage is by taking actual possession of the goods, or by giving notice of the claim to the carrier or other bailee in whose possession the goods are: (sect. 46, sub-sect. 1).

The statute thus gives two ways of effecting stoppage. The first is by taking actual possession, and the second by notice of claim, the latter, as Lord Kenyon observed, being a relaxation of the old rule that required actual possession to be taken. To get actual possession of goods carried the vendor must discharge the shipowner's lien (if any) for freight. Therefore satisfaction of the lien for freight must have been and still is an integral part of the stoppage of goods in transitu by the method of taking actual possession. Actual possession can only be taken of goods in transit when the goods arrive; by sect. 45, sub-sect. 1, they are deemed to be in transit until the buyer takes delivery—until that time there is a right in the unpaid vendor to resume the possession on arrival if he can. If the stoppage is by means of notice given, the vendor, upon arrival of the goods, is in the same position as if he had taken actual possession of the goods—that is to say, he is the sole person entitled, and, as I think, obliged, to take or order delivery of the goods. He cannot get actual possession unless he is ready and willing to discharge the lien for freight. I am therefore of opinion that a notice of stoppage given during the transit, and persisted in upon arrival of the goods, involves an obligation upon the vendor to discharge the shipowner's lien for freight—that is, to pay the freight due in respect of the goods carried. To get the goods he must free them from the lien.

There being, then, an obligation upon the vendor to take delivery and discharge the lien by paying the freight, it follows that, if he repudiates the obligation and so conducts himself as to prevent the shipowner completing his voyage and earning his freight, an action can be maintained by the shipowner against the vendor for damages for the breach of the obligation created by the notice to take actual possession of the goods upon arrival, and to discharge the shipowner's lien for the freight in respect of the goods. The damages may be the equivalent of the freight.

Having arrived at this conclusion, it must now be considered whether in the present case the plaintiffs' right of action is defeated by their failure to complete the voyage to Paranahyba. Bailhache, J. decided, without determining whether or not there would otherwise have been a right of action in the plaintiffs, that they could not recover because the plaintiffs had not proved that the defendants had prevented the completion of the voyage. With all respect to the learned judge I cannot arrive at the same conclusion, having regard to my view of the legal position of the defendants. In my judgment, when the goods arrived at Tutoya, the plaintiffs were ready and willing, then and at all material times, to complete the voyage and carry the goods to Paranahyba. The obstacle to the continuance of the voyage was the non-payment of the duty and the repudiation by the defendants of all responsibility for freight, charges, or expenses. For the reasons already given, I think this was a repudiation of their obligation to take delivery, and that they were bound to provide the duty, or to make arrangements for its payment, so as to enable the voyage to be completed. As they refused, the goods were landed and are still at Cajueiro. In my opinion the plaintiffs are entitled in these circumstances to treat the voyage as completed, and to recover, as damages for the breach of the obligation, the full amount of freight which they would have earned had the voyage been completed: see (Stewart v. Rogerson, L. Rep. 6 C. P. 424). They claim, and I think rightly, to be placed in the same position as if the vendors had discharged their obligation and enabled the voyage to be continued to Paranahyba. It is immaterial that, after the repudiation by the defendants, the plaintiffs acted in their own interests and for their own protection as regards the freight.

The defendants strenuously contended that Pontifex v. Midland Railway Company (sup.) was a decision which supported their view, but upon examination of that case I do not think it has any bearing upon the problem now before the court. There the vendor had given to the defendants, a railway company, notice of stoppage in transitu of goods consigned to the purchasers, but the railway company refused to act on the notice and delivered the goods to the consignee. The vendor thereupon brought an action for damages for the wrongful conversion of the goods, and the sole question in dispute in the case was whether the plaintiff, having recovered a sum exceeding 10*l*, was or was not to be deprived of costs. The decision turned upon the meaning of certain words in sect. 5 of the County Courts Act 1867, and the question was whether the action was "founded on tort," and not on contract, within the meaning of that section. The court held that it was founded on tort, and Cockburn, C.J., in delivering the judgment, said, at p. 26: "The difficulty arises in a case like the present, where there is undoubtedly an unauthorised intermeddling with property, but the act is connected with a contract originally entered into, and there is ground for regarding it as founded on that contract, or some new contract implied from the circumstances"; and later on he says, at p. 28: "The contract of the defendants was to carry and deliver. But under the circumstances which arose, the law gave the plaintiff the right to put an end to that contract and to demand back the possession of the goods, and he did so. From that time the retention of the goods and the dealing with them by the defendants became tortious." And this agrees with the view which was always taken of such a case when the action for trover existed, for such a misdelivery after notice was always treated as a wrongful conversion.

The defendants argued that this case established that the refusal of the carrier to act upon the notice, and the delivery by him of the goods to the purchaser notwithstanding the notice, was a tortious act and not the breach of a contractual obligation. The decision was that an action for wrongful conversion of the goods was an action "founded on tort" within the meaning of the section, notwithstanding that there might be ground for regarding it as an action founded on "some new contract implied from the circumstances," just as an action by a passenger against a railway company for damages for personal injuries caused by the negligence of the defendants in the conveyance of passengers has been held under similar statutes to be founded on tort notwithstanding that it might also be founded upon contract: (Taylor v. Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Company, 71 L. T. Rep. 596; (1895) 1 Q. B. 134). In the present case the plaintiffs had not refused to act upon the notice, but, on the contrary, had expressly agreed with the vendors, upon receipt of the notice, that they would act upon it.

I am of opinion, for the reason expressed, that this appeal should be allowed and judgment entered for the plaintiffs for 2743*l*. 14*s*. 7*d*. with costs here and below.

Warrington, L.J.—The plaintiffs are shipowners. Under a contract of carriage entered into by them with the South American Railway Construction Company, they carried in the autumn of 1913, in two ships called the Napo and the Crispin, certain parcels of steel rails and other railway material from ports in England to Tutoya, a place on the coast of Brazil. The ultimate destination of the goods was Paranahyba, a place about sixty miles up a river from Tutoya, from which the goods have to be conveyed in lighters. Tutoya is the end of the ocean transit. The defendants are the vendors of the goods to the Construction Company. The contract of carriage was not made with them, nor were they in any sense parties to it. Believing, as it turned out to be the fact, that the Construction Company was insolvent, the defendants exercised their right of stoppage in transitu by giving the proper notice to the plaintiffs. Though the contract of carriage provided for payment of the freight in London and Liverpool respectively before the departure of the steamers, the freight was and still remains unpaid. For reasons sufficient and intelligible from their own point of view, the defendants have not seen fit to take actual delivery of the goods to themselves or to give directions for their delivery to any other person. The plaintiffs' lien for freight remains effective with such rights as are attached to it. The plaintiffs had not parted with the actual possession of the goods.

The plaintiffs, by the present action, seek to establish and enforce a personal liability on the part of the defendants for the freight or for an equivalent amount by way of damages.

There was at first some uncertainty as to the mode in which their case was presented, but before the close of the argument it was, I think, made clear that they asserted as against the defendants a contractual or quasi-contractual obligation arising out of the relation brought about by the stoppage in transitu. The case was put in this way: That by preventing delivery to the consignees the defendants ought to be treated as put in their place, and, while they are on the one hand entitled to require delivery of the goods to themselves, or according to their directions, they are on the other hand bound to accept or give directions for such delivery and thus incidentally to pay the freight. Before the learned judge the matter was dealt with in a somewhat different way. It appears to have been assumed on the facts that the contract of carriage was not performed by the plaintiffs so as to entitle them to recover from the buyers because they did not carry the goods from Tutoya to Paranahyba, but landed them on an island belonging to themselves off the former port, and it was alleged by the plaintiffs that they were prevented by the action of the defendants, in neglecting either to take delivery of the goods or to give directions for delivery, from performing their duty and earning their freight, and that the defendants must make good the amount of freight by way of damages for such neglect. The learned judge, on the facts, came to the conclusion that, assuming the contract of carriage had not been performed, the plaintiffs had not established that they were prevented from so doing by the action of the defendants, and on that ground gave judgment for them. In the view he took it became unnecessary for him to consider whether there lay upon the defendants the obligation the neglect of which was relied on in support of the plaintiffs' claim.

I have come to the conclusion on the facts that, as between the plaintiffs and the defendants at all events, the plaintiffs have, in the peculiar circumstances of this case, done all that was reasonably necessary to entitle them to require the defendants to take delivery of the goods if the latter are in law bound to do so.

At Tutoya there is no Custom House or bonded warehouse of any kind. All goods have to be conveyed to Paranahyba in lighters. The bonded warehouse at Paranahyba is unsuited for the accommodation of a cargo such as that in question. Inasmuch as the defendants refused to pay the duties and thus enable the goods to be dispatched at Paranahyba, the only practical course, in my opinion, was that adopted by the plaintiffs, namely, to deposit the goods on their own island at Tutoya.

I think, therefore, the question of law avoided by the learned judge arises, and I proceed to deal with it. The question is: "Does the unpaid vendor of goods, by exercising his right to stop them in transitu, bring himself under a personal obligation to the carrier to take, or give directions for, delivery of the goods, involving, of course, the discharge of the carrier's lien for unpaid freight?" I think it must be answered in the affirmative. The question seems to be an entirely novel one. It can only arise in a very rare case such as the present, where, owing to the nature of the goods and the circumstances surrounding them at the end of the transit, it is not worth the vendor's while to take actual possession.

There is no direct authority to be found in support of or against the plaintiffs' claim, and I think a solution of the question must be found in an examination of the nature of the right of stoppage in transitu. It is a right to resume possession of the goods. The vendor, by the contract of sale, has transferred the property therein to the purchaser, and by delivery to the carrier has also transferred the possession thereof. If the vendor is unpaid and the purchaser is insolvent, the former may resume possession. He may do so either physically—in which case, of course, the lien for freight has ex hypothesi been discharged or released—or he may do so by giving notice to the carrier of his claim, and the latter must then deliver the goods to or according to the directions of the vendor. This is, in my opinion, merely an alternative mode of resuming possession, and appears to have been introduced as a relaxation of the previous stricter rule, which required physical possession in order to the effective exercise of the right of stoppage: (see Lord Kenyon, C.J. in Northey and Lewis v. Field, sup.). Are we to say that the vendor is at liberty to give notice to the carrier of his claim and yet to refuse to take delivery himself or to give directions therefor, leaving the carrier with no person to whom the goods can be delivered? So to hold would be to impose a very serious burden on the carrier. Under the contract of carriage his obligation is to deliver to the consignee. The vendor's notice prevents him from so doing, and, if the vendor is entitled to refuse to take delivery himself, or to give directions for delivery to someone else, it is difficult to see how the carrier is to rid himself of the goods. The whole doctrine of stoppage in transitu appears to have originated in the law merchant and to have been founded on the customs of traders, and I cannot believe that it can have been part of such customs to leave the carrier in such a position that he has goods of which he can require nobody to relieve him at the end of his transit.

I think, on the whole, seeing that the power of stopping in transitu is one of two forms of resuming possession, it may fairly be held that the right thereby confirmed of obtaining possession by notice is accompanied by the correlative duty of actually obtaining it, with the necessity, if freight is unpaid, of paying the freight and thus discharging the carrier's lien.

The vendor's obligation seems to me to arise, not because he becomes directly liable to perform the particular part of the contract of carriage, including the payment of freight—this, in my opinion, he does not—but from the relation into which he enters with the carrier by placing him in such a position that he cannot deliver to the consignee or to anyone else but the vendor or according to his directions.

I think, therefore, that the appeal ought to be allowed, and that the defendants ought to be ordered to pay to the plaintiffs the sum claimed, being that which they would have had to pay in order to obtain delivery of the goods.

Scrutton, J.—The Booth Steamship Company, whom I call "the shipowners," brought an action against the Cargo Fleet Iron Company Limited, whom I call "the vendors," for a sum of 2743*l.* 14*s.* 7*d.* as freight or damages. The defendants allege that in the events which happened they are under no liability to the plaintiffs. Bailhache, J. has given judgment for the defendants, the vendors, and the plaintiffs, the shipowners, appeal to this court.

The facts are shortly as follows: The vendors sold to the South American Railway Construction Company Limited, whom I call "the purchasers," certain rails "f.o.b. Middlesbrough. Payment against shipping documents in London." This contract contemplates that the vendors shall receive the shipping documents from the ship and hold them against the price. The purchasers made a freight engagement with the plaintiffs, the shipowners, under which the goods were to be carried to various Brazilian ports at shippers' option, including Paranahyba, "freight payable by the shippers in London or Liverpool before the departure of the ship." The vendors shipped goods f.o.b. Middlesbrough, but, in circumstances not clearly stated, the ships' and purchasers' agents followed a course of business by which on shipment the ships' agents received and cancelled the mates' receipts. They cancelled them because they drew up bills of lading against them ready to be handed against payment of freight to the purchasers with whom they had made the freight engagement; and they sent the mates' receipts to the vendors as evidence of shipment, but cancelled so that the vendors, with whom they had no freight engagement, could not claim bills of lading against them. The vendors, as between themselves and the purchasers, might probably have objected to this course of business, which prevented their having shipping documents to hold against payment of the price, but they did not do so before the shipments in question in this action. On the 29th Sept. 1913 400 tons of rails were shipped by the defendants, the vendors, at Middlesbrough in the Ravonia for transhipment at Liverpool into the Crispin, bound for Paranahyba. On the 4th Oct. 600 tons of rails were shipped by the vendors at Middlesbrough on the Napo, bound for Paranahyba. Apparently in each case the ships' agents prepared bills of lading in accordance with the mates' receipts, cancelled the mates' receipts and sent them to the vendors, and held the bills of lading against payment of freight by the purchasers, to whom they rendered an account for freight. The bill of lading by the Napo made the purchasers shippers, and delivery was to be at "Tutoya (Paranahyba)" to the purchasers or their assigns, freight to be payable by the shippers in London before the departure of the ship. A lien was given for freight, whether payable in advance or not. The shipowners were not liable for any "duties or taxes." "Any duty, tax, or impost of whatever nature, levied by any authority at the ports of transhipment, destination, or elsewhere upon the ship, for or in respect of the goods at any time between the signing of this bill of lading and the delivery of the goods shall be paid on demand by, or collected from, the shippers or consignees at ship's option." The bill of lading by the Crispin was in the same terms, except that the destination was stated to be Paranahyba, and the freight was payable at Liverpool. Both bills of lading included other goods shipped by the purchasers but not supplied by the vendors.

At the beginning of Oct. 1913 the purchasers were in pecuniary difficulties, owing to some dispute with the Brazilian Government as to the payment of instalments. The vendors then appear to have found that they had not shipping documents. On the 14th Oct. they asked the shipowners not to deliver bills of lading for the Napo and Ravonia (Crispin) to the purchasers without their consent, and in future to give them separate bills of lading for their parcel. The shipowners agreed to the first request, and as to the second replied, as was true, that their carrying arrangements were with the purchasers, not with the vendors.

The purchasers did not pay either freight to the shipowners or the cost of the rails to the vendors, and accordingly on the 27th Oct. the vendors, being unpaid, gave the shipowners' London agents a notice—"Please arrange to prevent any rails and fish-plates shipped per Napo or Crispin being handed over to South American Construction Company at Paranahyba without proper bill of lading or our authority to release"—which has been treated throughout as a notice to stop in transitu. The shipowners' agents treated this as a notice to hold the bills of lading to the order of the vendors, whether freight was paid or not, forwarded it to their principals, and added, with great prudence from their point of view, "Would it not simplify matters if you paid the freight and took up the bills of lading under a guarantee of indemnity to the shipowners?" To which the vendors, with equal prudence from their point of view, replied: "We do not see our way to fall in with your suggestion." The shipowners were at first disposed to take the view that the vendors had nothing to do with the bills of lading; but, after taking legal advice, expressed their willingness "to take the vendors' instructions regarding the disposal of the rails at Tutoya," "and in this connection we would of course act as your agents subject to the payment of any charges which may be incurred." Meanwhile, on the 29th Oct., the vendors gave a notice: "Please note that we look to you not to hand over the material shipped per the steamship Napo and steamship Crispin to the South American Railway Construction Company or anyone else without authority from us. We give you this notice as we understand you are holding the bills of lading for freight." This is a genuine "stop in transitu" notice, subject to the point that, while it gives directions not to hand the goods to the purchasers, it gives no positive directions what is to be done with them. The shipowners at once instructed their Maranham agents to stop discharge, giving as the reason "difficulties payment freight and cargo." The Maranham agents passed this on to the Paranahyba agent, but only gave as the reason "difficulties payment freight." Bailhache, J. notes this, but as it was partly corrected in two days and wholly corrected by the 6th Nov., and discharge was in every event stopped, I attach no importance to the variation. On the 29th Oct. the Napo arrived at Tutoya.

Cargo for Paranahyba, which is sixty miles up a river which flows into the bay on which Tutoya is situated, only goes in the ocean ship to Tutoya. It is then transhipped into lighters, which are towed up the river to Paranahyba at such times as the draught of water permits, sometimes only three days a month. The stock of lighters will hold about 175 tons of cargo, enough for the ordinary cargo from a steamer for Paranahyba. With vessels like the Napo, carrying 950 tons of rails for one shipper for Paranahyba, it is necessary, to avoid detaining the ship, to put the cargo ashore on an island called Cajueiro, belonging to the shipowners, whence it is gradually removed by the lighters. The Custom House is at Paranahyba, and will hold some 300 or 400 tons of cargo Goods like rails are not put in the Custom House, but in charge of the customs officials on the beach, and in this case before they are landed on the beach the customs duties must be paid. The customs officials come down to Tutoya and accompany the lighters to Paranahyba. If things were going smoothly, probably in this case the goods would be admitted free of duty under the purchasers' concession and landed and taken away by them. But if goods were not landed by the purchasers, but by the vendors and (or) shipowners to secure their lien, duty must be paid before the goods were landed at Paranahyba, and, if not paid, the goods would either stay in the lighters or be taken back to Cajueiro island and there stored. If the purchasers were not to receive the goods because they had not paid cost and (or) freight, someone, the vendor or the shipowner, must pay the duty, or else it was no use going through the formality of lightering the goods from Tutoya to Paranahyba in order to lighter them back again.

On the 31st Oct., by telegram and letter, the shipowners told the vendors they were going to land the rails, i.e., at Tutoya, and asked for further specific instructions. The vendors replied: "We cannot accept responsibility for landing rails at Tutoya." They did not, I think, understand that the greater part of the rails must, anyhow, be landed at Tutoya before they went into lighters, or that duty must be paid before they could be landed on behalf of the vendors at Paranahyba. Discharge of the Napo began on the 31st Oct. On the 1st Nov. the shipowners wired: "You have instructed us not to deliver the cargo ex Napo to the bill of lading consignees, thus stopping the goods on the basis of your lien in transit. We are carrying out your instructions and must land cargo Paranahyba for your account and look to you for all consequent charges," and wrote repeating the telegram and adding: "We are, however, advised that the wisest procedure for your protection is to file a formal legal protest with the federal judge's representative at Paranahyba, appealing for restraint of delivery; and we shall be glad of your specific instructions on this point at the earliest possible moment. We should like to say that we are desirous of helping you in this matter, and, if you think well to follow the procedure suggested, we shall be glad to place the services of our Paranahyba agents, Messrs. Booth and Co., at your disposal." Crossing this, came the vendors' letter: "We have yours of yesterday and confirm ours of the same date. While we have nothing to do with the decision you have apparently arrived at for your own protection, to land the material at Tutoya instead of Paranahyba, or any additional expenses that may be occasioned thereby, we look to you to hold the bills of lading at our disposal until further notice," which still misunderstands the reason of landing at Tutoya. The matter was made more difficult by the fact that, for reasons of their own connected with their quarrel with the Brazilian Government, the purchasers were delighted not to receive the rails, and did not intend to make any endeavour to get them. On the 3rd Nov. the shipowners state what they then proposed to do: "You seem to have misunderstood our intended action with regard to the discharge of the rails. These we will land, ex the lighters, at Paranahyba (not Tutoya), thus fulfilling the bill of lading contract, for which you have made yourselves responsible by the instructions which we have accepted from you. We await your instructions with regard to the suggested legal protest at Paranahyba." And on the 4th Nov. the vendors ask them to take legal proceedings at Paranahyba to restrain delivery. This is the only instruction to do anything which the vendors ever gave, and they revoked the instructions on the 26th Nov.

On the 7th Nov. the vendors again repudiate liability for freight and expenses payable by the shippers, which would include the duty, but admit it for "expenses incurred by you on our behalf after the goods have been landed." They apparently thought, wrongly, that the goods could be landed without paying duty and kept in some safe place for them. On the 8th Nov. the shipowners' agents wire that only an "embargo with documents proving non-payment" will prevent delivery of cargo to consignees. On the 11th Nov. the shipowners again put forward their claim on the vendors for freight: "You appear to have forgotten that you have not only given us instructions to stop the goods in transitu, but also instructions not to deliver. This being so, you are, as far as we are concerned, the owners of the goods, and we must look to you for all attendant charges including freight"; and received another repudiation: "We have told you all along that we will not be in any way responsible for the freight and landing charges. We have no contract with you whereby we are liable for the freight and landing charges. You have your right to freight against the South American Railway Construction Company and also your lien on the goods, and we do not ask you, and have never asked you, to part with possession of the goods until the freight has been paid. All we have done is to give you notice that we are unpaid vendors, and to ask your assistance to enable us to get payment of the purchase money, but we are not prepared, as we have previously stated, to make ourselves responsible for the payment of the freight and landing charges or to take delivery of the goods on any such condition," a repudiation which entirely omits to say what is to happen to the goods stopped and where they are to be put. The letter of the 13th Nov. from the shipowners to their Paranahyba agents, a letter not referred to by Bailhache, J., shows that the shipowners were then acting on the view that they must look for their freight to those who had given them instructions to stop in transitu, the vendors, and not claim it against the purchasers, except in the case of some rails by the Crispin, for which the suppliers, Dorman, Long, and Co., had been paid, and which, therefore, they had not stopped in transitu.

Following the letter of the 13th Nov. the shipowners instructed an embargo in the case of the Crispin for the cost and freight of the vendors' rails in the names of the vendors; it does not appear the vendors were told of this. The Crispin arrived at Tutoya on the 25th Nov. But on the 26th Nov. the vendors made a surprising communication to the shipowners, writing: "In reply to your letter of the 25th inst., we beg to inform you that we have decided not to give the suggested power of attorney to your firm at Paranahyba, as our friends, the South American Construction Company, have given us their undertaking that they will not deal with the goods or take any steps to our detriment until our account has been paid. We are, therefore, for the present not taking any further steps for the protection of our interests in these cargoes." The vendors agree with the consignees that the consignees shall not receive the goods; the vendors themselves will not give any instructions to the ship as to the goods, except that they are not to be delivered to the consignees.

On the 29th Nov. the plaintiffs' agents propose to send all possible rails, except the Dorman, Long rails, ex Crispin to Paranahyba at once; but on the 2nd Dec. they call the shipowners' attention to the fact that duty will have to be paid on rails they embargo on their behalf, and on the 3rd Dec. they send a very important telegram to the effect that the purchasers' representatives do not want the rails at Paranahyba, and will not sign the necessary document; that the rails are not through the Custom House and will not be allowed to discharge, and that the rails are on the island of Cajueiro except three lighters which they now propose to discharge there.

There the matter stops—with the rails at Cajueiro, because no one will pay the duty on them and receive them at Paranahyba, where the shipowners are quite ready to send them, subject to the lien for freight. The purchasers refuse to receive them or pay for them; the vendors, who have stopped them in transitu, will not give any instructions what to do with them; and the question now is whether in any way the vendors are liable to the shipowners for the freight on them.

The rest of the history is that, the purchasers having gone into liquidation on the 23rd Feb. 1914, the vendors wrote to the receiver that they had stopped delivery in transitu and claimed ownership of the goods. They could not at this time have had more than possession of the goods through the shipowners, if they had that. Two days later they told the liquidator they proposed to sell the goods. The receiver would have nothing to do with the goods. The vendors persisted in their refusal to pay freight, and have by this time probably lost the goods.

The plaintiffs, the shipowners, alleged in their statement of claim that in stopping in transitu it became the duty of the vendors to give directions for the delivery of the cargo, and to pay freight and expenses, and they claimed either the freight or the same amount in damages. The defendants, the vendors, denied their liability, and raised the question whether the shipowners had any right to stop the transit at Tutoya. Bailhache, J. states the question to be whether the completion of the voyage was prevented by the vendors' action in giving the stop notice, and finds that the plaintiffs have failed to satisfy him that they were prevented by the stop notice given by the defendants "from performing their freight contract, carrying these rails to Paranahyba, and making a tender of them there." I do not understand to whom the learned judge suggested they should be tendered. The vendors had forbidden the shipowners to tender them to the purchasers; and had refused to take them themselves. To land them at Paranahyba would risk their seizure by the Government or their coming into possession of the purchasers, neither of which the vendors desired, and would involve the payment of duties which the vendors would not, and the shipowners were not bound to, pay. I do not think either the vendors or the purchasers could complain of the goods not going forward from Tutoya to Paranahyba, or, if otherwise liable, use it as an excuse for not paying freight. The judge thinks the landing at Tutoya was to protect the shipowners' lien for freight. I think he has overlooked that on the 28th Nov. the shipowners were only putting an embargo for freight on the goods not stopped in transitu, and were looking to the vendors for their freight.

I should therefore on the evidence come to a different conclusion from Bailhache, J. and find that in the circumstances the shipowners had done all that was necessary to claim freight from whomsoever was liable. If the judge below had found that, he states, without giving reasons, that the inclination of his opinion is that the plaintiffs would succeed in their claim. Whether this is right raises very difficult questions of great general importance on the nature and consequences of the right of stoppage in transitu, which I now proceed to consider.

The right of stoppage in transitu came into the English law in the seventeenth century from the custom of merchants, both English and foreign—a custom, therefore, which had grown up with no special reference or congruity to the English law. As it enabled an unpaid vendor whose purchaser was insolvent to exercise some control over goods in which he had no property and of which he had no possession, while in the hands of a shipowner with whom he had no contract, and to prevent that shipowner from performing a contract to which the unpaid vendor was no party, it was obvious there would be considerable difficulty in fitting in this international usage and the national law. As Lord Abinger says, in the well-known judgment in Gibson v. Carruthers (sup., at pp. 338, 339, 340): "In courts of equity it has been a received opinion that it was founded on some principle of common law. In courts of law it is just as much the practice to call it a principle of equity, which the common law has adopted. . . . Many unsatisfactory and inconsistent attempts have been made to reduce it to some analogy with the principles which govern the law of contract, as it prevails in this country between vendor and vendee. . . ." And, again, he refers to "the reasoning and dicta by which it has been attempted, not very successfully, to develop the principle, and make it conformable in appearance and dress . . . with the family of English law into which it has been adopted."

Great difference of opinion has existed as to the nature of the right, whether or not stoppage in transitu revested the property and cancelled the contract. In 1761, in D'Aquila v. Lambert (1 Amb. 399, 400), it was said that the goods of one man (i.e., the unpaid vendor) should not be applied in payment of another man's (i.e., the purchaser's) debts, and as late as 1877 Cockburn, C.J., in Pontifex v. Midland Railway Company (sup., at p. 27), said that the effect of the stoppage in transitu was "to revest the property" in the unpaid vendor. Yet it is clear now that it does not, but only enables him to resume possession. In 1842 it was quite an open question whether stoppage in transitu entirely rescinded the contract, or only replaced the vendor in the same position as if he had not parted with possession: (Wentworth v. Outhwaite, 10 M. & W. 436, 452). As late as 1885 Cotton, L.J., in Phelps, Stokes, and Co. v. Comber (5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 428; 52 L. T. Rep. 873; 29 Ch. Div. 813, 821), treated it as still an open question, though he preferred the latter alternative.

Fortunately, in 1893, the Sale of Goods Act, purporting to codify the common law, and (see sect. 61, sub sect. 2) preserving "the rules of the common law, including the law merchant, save in so far as they are inconsistent with the express provisions of this Act," finally settled some of the doubtful points. The right of stoppage in transitu does not by its mere exercise rescind the contract of sale: (sect. 48, sub-sect. 1). It is a resumption of possession, made while the goods are in course of transit, entitling the unpaid vendor to retain the goods until payment or tender of the price": (sect. 44). But it is more than a mere lien, for the unpaid vendor may, if the goods are perishable, or if, after notice to the buyer of intention to resell, the buyer does not within a reasonable time tender the price, resell the goods, and claim damages from the buyer for any loss occasioned by breach of contract: (sect. 48, sub-sect. 2). The unpaid vendor may retake actual possession if he can get it. If the unpaid vendor "had got the goods back again by any means, provided he did not steal them, I would not blame him," said Lord Hardwicke in Snee v. Prescot (sup., at p. 250); or he may exercise his right "by giving notice to the carrier . . . in whose possession the goods are" at such a time that by reasonable diligence the carrier may stop delivery to the buyer, which he ought to make according to his contract with the buyer: (sect. 46, sub-sect. 1). Lord Hardwicke says, at p. 248, that if goods "are actually delivered to a carrier to be delivered to A. and while the carrier is upon the road, and before actual delivery to A. by the carrier, the consignor hears A. his consignee is likely to become bankrupt, or is actually one, and countermands the delivery, and gets them back into his own possession again, I am of opinion that no action of trover would lie for the assignees of A. because the goods, while they were in transitu, might be so countermanded." And if such notice is given to the carrier "he must redeliver the goods to or according to the directions of the seller. The expenses of such redelivery must be borne by the seller": (sect. 46, sub-sect. 2). In general practice the unpaid vendor is only too ready to get back the goods which he has sold to an insolvent consignee. It is clear that, to get them from the carrier, he must discharge any lien the carrier has for particular charges or freight on the goods in question, but not any general lien by contract or usage for other sums due from the consignee but not due in respect of the particular goods. This has recently been authoritatively restated by the House of Lords in United States Steel Products Company v. Great Western Railway Company (sup., at p. 196). I notice, to show I have not overlooked it, that the shipowners' lien for freight in the case now before us is not a common law lien for freight on delivery, but a contractual lien for advance freight, but it is in my view "charges payable on the carriage of the particular goods" within the decision of the House of Lords (sup.) The unpaid vendor is usually quite ready to do this to get the goods; and it is not till, in this case, an unpaid vendor contents himself with the negative attitude "do not deliver bills of lading or goods to the consignees under your contract," and declines to give any further instructions as to what is to be done with the goods at the end of the transit, that the question arises, what are the duties to the carrier of the unpaid vendor who stops in transitu, the Sale of Goods Acts having only stated some of his rights against the carrier. It will be noted that the unpaid vendor goes further in this case: he not only says, "Do not deliver to the consignee," and abstains from giving instructions to whom the carrier is to deliver, but he actually gets an undertaking from the consignee that he will not take delivery under his contract: (see letter of the 26th Nov.).

This raises the question what the unpaid vendor is bound or entitled to do when he "stops in transitu." May he during the transit, as of right, direct the carrier to deliver to him before the contractual place of destination? Must he at the end of the transit take delivery if he prevents delivery to the contractual consignee? Or can he say, as in this case: "Don't deliver to the consignee; I won't take the goods or tell you what to do with them; you must provide for the goods, but I shall sue you if you deliver to the consignee under your contract"? First, what is the effect on the transit or voyage under the contract of affreightment? The unpaid vendor may "stop"; that is, retake possession by the carriers holding for him in transitu—that is, during the transit; but he cannot, in my view, demand actual possession during the transit against the will of the carrier, or direct the shipowner to deliver to him except at the contractual place of destination. The goods may be under other goods in the hold; the ship may have contractual engagements to carry other goods to other parts; policies of insurance may be affected by detention or delay. The contract of sale is not cancelled by stoppage in transitu; neither, in my view, is the contract of affreightment, except in so far as delivery at the port of destination to the consignee is stopped by the unpaid vendor, and other delivery there is ordered by him. It is true that in Whithead v. Anderson (sup., at p. 534) Parke, B. uses language like this: "The law is clearly settled that the unpaid vendor has a right to retake the goods before they have arrived at the destination originally contemplated by the purchaser." But the same learned judge, in Wentworth v. Outhwaite (sup.) in the same year, says, at p. 452: "The vendor is entitled to retain the part actually stopped in transitu till he is paid the price of the whole, but has no right to retake that which has arrived at its journey's end." He is either using "retain" and "retake" as equivalent words meaning "holding adverse possession," or is confining "retaking" to the journey's end. In the same way, when Dr. Lushington says in The Tigress (sup.), "The right to stop means the right not only to countermand delivery to the vendee, but to order delivery to the vendor," he is, I think, speaking of the place where the carrier by contract has to deliver. The carrier may, and it is frequently convenient he should, redeliver, before the contract place of delivery, to the unpaid vendor on an indemnity; but he cannot, in my view, be forced to do it. The delivery of the goods may be stopped, but not their transit to the place of delivery.

The goods then arrive at the contract place of delivery where, if there had been no stop, they would have been delivered to the consignee, subject to the shipowner's lien for freight. If the shipowner exercises that lien against a demand by the consignee, he will have to bear the cost of exercising the lien—Somes v. British Empire Shipping Company Limited (2 L. T. Rep. 547; 8 H. of L. Cas. 338)—and provide for the safe custody of the goods while he keeps his hand on them; and he cannot sell the goods. But supposing he is told not to deliver to the consignee by an unpaid vendor who has the right to order delivery to himself and does not, on what principle can he be compelled to retain and provide for the custody of the goods after he has arrived at the contract place of destination, or is ready to go there, if anyone will take delivery? What is he to do with the goods? Is his ship to go sailing round the world, like the "Flying Dutchman," on an endless, hopeless voyage for ever carrying goods that no one will take? Is his ship to stay at the port of destination till it is convenient to someone to take the goods from her? Why, if he discharges the goods, must he pay duties which by the contract should be paid by the person taking delivery, and provide for the custody of the goods, as here, for an uncertain time, on the chance that someone will some day recoup him? And does it make any difference, when he is stopped by the unpaid vendor from tendering the goods to the consignee, that, if he had been permitted to tender them, he might have been in similar difficulties if he chose to assert his lien for freight? He is prevented from having the chance of offering the goods to the consignee.

It is said that both the shipowner for his freight and the unpaid vendor for his price have to look to the goods and must take their chance. This is not quite exact, as the unpaid vendor can sell the goods, and the shipowner cannot; but, further, the unpaid vendor is claiming to exercise his lien through the shipowner, and, if he must bear the expense of exercising his own lien, cannot make the shipowner bear the expense of exercising the vendor's lien for the benefit of the vendor. It is also suggested that the shipowner makes his contract subject to the possibility of an unpaid vendor stopping in transitu, and must put up with the consequences. But, if I am right that the unpaid vendor cannot stop the transit, but only the delivery to the vendee, it follows that he cannot prolong the transit or the shipowner's obligation to hold the goods after the shipowner is ready to make delivery at the end of the transit. This question must be considered, not only from the point of view of the shipowner's claim for freight for the transit, but from the point of view of his claim for demurrage or damages for detention at the end of the transit. Freight is now frequently paid in advance; but when the shipowner arrives at the end of the transit, and is forbidden by the unpaid vendor to deliver to the consignee, what is his position as to custody of the goods if the unpaid vendor refuses to give positive instructions as to their delivery? What is the shipowner to do? If he keeps the goods in his ship, ought not the person who compels him to do so to pay the demurrage? If he lands the goods in a warehouse to keep the unpaid vendor's lien, ought not the person for whom the lien is exercised to bear the expense of using the lien? And why is the shipowner to be compelled to take any responsibility for the goods after his contract voyage is over? Surely it is for the person who stops the transit and desires to exercise his lien to take the goods and exercise his lien for himself. And must he not, before he does so, satisfy any liens already existing?

Further, in my view, the shipowner has fulfilled his contract when he has reached a point where the consignee or person taking delivery is bound to do something, and is not bound himself to incur further expense when no one will take delivery. He is not bound to go into a dock and incur dock dues if he is told that the consignee will not take delivery even if he goes in. He was not in this case bound to send the goods up from Tutoya, when no one would pay the duties without which the goods could not be landed, and he was not allowed by the vendor to deliver the goods to the contractual consignees.

On these events happening the shipowners had, in my view, no further obligation to provide for the goods. The unpaid vendors had the right to stop delivery to the consignee and the right to require delivery at the port of destination to themselves. In my view this imposed on them a corresponding duty to take delivery from the shipowners, if they continued to prevent them from delivering to the consignees. The vendors are not obliged to perform this duty, for they may release the goods and withdraw the stop before the end of the transit, but if they do not withdraw the stop, but insist on it, in my opinion they substitute themselves for the original consignees and must take delivery. They can only do so on the terms of discharging the shipowners' lien for freight, and, as these vendors are quite solvent, the damages for their failing to take delivery will be at least the amount of freight the shipowners would have received if the vendors had fulfilled their obligation and taken delivery. The question is, not what the shipowners have lost by being stopped from tendering to the consignees; it is quite possible in this case that they have lost nothing, as the consignees would not or could not pay, and expenses might be incurred in asserting the lien. The question is what the shipowners have lost by the vendors refusing to take delivery at the end of the transit when they have stopped the contractual delivery. And if, as I have held, they were bound to take delivery in such a case, the shipowners have lost at least the amount of the freight which the vendors must have paid before they took delivery. It is not necessary to hold that the vendors become a party to the original contract; their obligation follows, in my view, from their interfering with that contract and persisting in their interference at the end of the transit.

It is true that this point has never been determined before, but the fact that unpaid vendors have in fact always acted in accordance with the obligation that I think is imposed on them shows that it is in accordance with commercial usage and in favour of commerce. On this part of the case the conclusion I have arrived at is apparently the same as that reached by Bailhache, J., though, as he does not state his reasons, I do not know that we have travelled by the same road. But as I differ from him in the view I take of the documents in the case, and see nothing in those documents to destroy the vendors' obligation to take delivery at the end of the transit of the goods which they have stopped from going to their contractual destinations, I am of opinion that the appeal should succeed and that judgment should be entered for the plaintiffs for 2743*l.* 14*s.* 7*d.* with costs here and below.

WEIGALL AND Co. v. RUNCIMAN AND Co. AND OTHERS. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Principal and agent—Instructions to agent—Warranty of authority—Ambiguity—Hire of ship—Whether principal bound by agent's contract founded on his interpretation of instructions.

The plaintiffs brought an action against the defendants for breach of warranty of authority to charter to the plaintiffs a ship belonging to one A. The authority relied upon was given to the defendants by A., a shipowner at Naples, who sent a telegram to the defendants in the following words: "You authorise fix steamer prompt loading 3000 tons coal Newport Cagliari Mersina or Palermo twenty shillings. If cannot better wire immediately." A. refused to let a ship and repudiated the charter, his reason being that his authority to the defendants was to hire a ship and not to let one.

Rowlatt, J. held that if the telegram was ambiguous the defendants had acted bonâ fide and reasonably in interpreting it as they had done; that the shipowner would have been responsible to the plaintiffs for the interpretation which his agents had bonâ fide and reasonably placed upon ambiguous instructions; but that the actual charter-party entered into was outside the authority in whatever way it was read, and that therefore the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment.

Ireland v. Livingston (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 389; 27 L. T. Rep. 79; L. Rep. 5 E. & I. App. 395) considered.

The defendants appealed.

Held, that the decision of Rowlatt, J. was right.

APPEAL by the defendants from the decision of Rowlatt, J.

The facts of the case sufficiently appear from the headnote and judgments. The following written judgment was delivered by ROWLATT, J.—This action was brought against Runciman and Co. for breach of warranty of authority to sign a charter-party as agents for Tommaso Astarita, a shipowner of Naples. The first point taken was that Runciman and Co. were liable as principals because Tommaso Astarita was a foreign principal.

They signed a charter-party which says that it was mutually agreed between Astarita and Weigall and Co. as follows, then it is signed "For and by authority of owners, Walter Runciman and Co. of London. As agents."

Upon that document it is said that Tomaso Astarita is not liable, but that Runciman and Co. are. All I can say about that point is that such a construction absolutely contradicts the plain words of the document itself. And I think that this suggestion involves an entirely unwarranted extension of the somewhat narrow rule affecting foreign principals. I need not say any more about that part of the case.

(a) Reported by E. A. SCRATCHLEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The next way in which the case was put was that there was a breach of warranty of authority. The first point pleaded to that was, that there was no warranty because the authority was contained in a telegram, and the telegram had been read to Mr. Weigall.

To make that point good it would be necessary that the evidence should go this length that the telegram was read to Mr. Weigall, that the reading of it should have been addressed to him so that the result would be that he took upon himself the responsibility of construing the telegram, and did not rely upon any warranty of authority by the defendants. The evidence did not at all come up to that, and Mr. Roche agreed that it did not, and that point disappears.

I come now to the real points in the case. The defendants, as I have already said, signed the charter-party as agents for Astarita and warranted his authority. Was there a breach of that warranty? The authority was contained in a telegram of the 10th April 1915 in these words: "You authorise fix steamer prompt loading three thousand tons coal Newport Cagliari Messina or Palermo twenty shillings. If cannot better wire immediately."

It was suggested to me by the evidence on the one side and on the other that that telegram was insufficient on one side to enable Runciman and Co. to let a steamer, and on the other side to enable them to hire a steamer. I think I may say that probably from both points of view it was sketchy. But as between willing parties it might have served well enough from a business point of view. It was probably sketchy from whichever way you look at it.

The real difficulty arises as to the meaning to be attached to the word "fix." Fix means letting or means hiring, according as you look at it from one point of view or from the other. I may observe that in one letter in this correspondence in two lines that word is used in two senses—first from one point of view and then from the other. But Astarita was known to Runciman and Co. as a shipowner.

Probably shipowners abroad may want to hire ships sometimes to bring coal for their ships to foreign ports. But he was known to Runciman and Co. as a shipowner, and they had been in correspondence with his brokers with a view of letting his ships, and under the circumstances, in my judgment, the word "fix" in the mouth of Astarita, speaking to Runciman and Co., meant "let," and not "hire" a ship.

That is what I think, independently altogether of the doctrine of Ireland v. Livingston (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 389; 27 L. T. Rep. 79; L. Rep. 5 E. & I. App. 395), was the meaning of that word as addressed in this wire by Asterita to Runciman and Co. But if one has to have recourse to the doctrine of Ireland v. Livingston (ubi sup.) I think the same result follows. If this telegram is to be regarded as ambiguous I have no doubt whatever that Runciman and Co. acted bonâ fide and reasonably in the interpretation which they gave to it. I do not think there can be any question about that.

But then it was said—and it is a very important point—that the rule in Ireland v. Livingston (ubi sup.) does not apply between these parties. As I understand the rule as enunciated by Lord Chelmsford in the well-known passage that has been read to the court, it does not lay down that an agent is entitled to a remedy against his principal by way of a special indemnity arising out of the difficulty in which he has been placed by the ambiguity of the principal, but that he is protected by the transaction being upheld.

I think that Loring v. Davis (54 L. T. Rep. 899; 31 Ch. Div. 625) is a clear authority to that effect. I do not think it is possible to read the judgment of Chitty, J. (as he then was) on p. 631 of 32 Ch. Div., without seeing that he took that view. In reality he assumed it. He did not discuss it; he assumed it. But he clearly took that view. Therefore, he laid down that the rule applies as between two principals as well as between the principal and the agent who had ambiguous instructions.

It was said in this case that nevertheless it does not apply where the principal dealt with by the agent is suing the agent under the doctrine of Collen v. Wright (8 Ell. & Bl. 647) for breach of warranty of authority. If that is so, it would mean that in this case Weigall and Co. ought to sue Runciman and Co. and recover damages against them, and then that Runciman and Co. ought to sue Astarita and recover as damages from him the damages and costs, I suppose, which they had had to pay to Weigall and Co. But Loring v. Davis (ubi sup.)., if I am right, shows that Astarita is liable to Weigall and Co., and I do not see how at the same time he can be liable to Runciman and Co., that firm being liable to Weigall and Co.

Still that did not make an end of the matter, because Mr. Leck said, granting that that is so, nevertheless Runciman and Co. had not authority. Astarita may be bound to Weigall and Co. under Ireland v. Livingston (ubi sup) and Loring v. Davis (ubi sup.), but he is not bound because he gave authority. He is bound by virtue of that rule upon some principle which may be said to be analogous to an estoppel, and there is still a breach because Runciman and Co. had not authority really.

It seems to me that that is a very subtle argument, and I do not think that even as a subtlety it is correct. But assume that it is, still as Astarita is bound to Weigall and Co. there could be no possible damages for the breach which Mr. Leck's argument suggests exists, and it would be really a technical and academic matter. I think that Loring v. Davis (ubi sup.), as I have said, really makes an end of this point. I am bound by Loring v. Davis (ubi sup), but perhaps I may say, without disrespect, that I entirely agree with it.

If the basis of the rule is that the principal is bound to protect those whom his ambiguity has led into peril, why does not that apply to requiring him to protect the other principal as much as it applies to requiring him to protect his own agent? He has led the other principal into peril by the act of his agent acting reasonably and bonâ fide on the ambiguous instructions which he took the risk of giving. I think the result is that he is responsible for the interpretation which the agent, reasonably and bonâ fide, put upon those ambiguous instructions.

That is not the end of this case, because Mr. Leck raised yet another point. He said, apart altogether from Ireland v. Livingston (ubi sup.) and any ambiguity attaching to the word "fix," the charter-party which Runciman and Co. assumed to enter into is outside the authority, read it as you please, because it gave the charterer the right to ship, I think it was 200 to 300 tons of coke in lieu of coal.

Astarita did not repudiate on that ground. He took a much wider ground, that he was not a letter of a ship at all, but was a hirer. As a matter of fact the telegram which Runciman and Co. sent to Astarita on the 12th April 1915, which appears on p. 30 of the copy correspondence before me, did not reveal this coke option at all, and so Astarita perhaps had not the opportunity of taking if he wanted to this small and, I am bound to say, rather subsidiary point. But Mr. Leck says that does not matter.

The question is whether he is actually bound by Runciman and Co.'s act. It seems to me that the breach of a warranty of authority is established by showing there was no authority. The breach is not the repudiation, but the breach is the want of authority whereby the principal is not bound. If he adopts it afterwards, whether there has still been a breach becomes unimportant because there are no damages. It becomes merely a technical matter; but the breach is want of authority, whereby the principal is not bound.

It seems to me, therefore, I have to examine two things. I have first of all to say, Was Astarita bound; secondly, if he was not, would he have adopted or would he have repudiated? Now, as to the second matter I can have no doubt at all that he would have repudiated. He had not the ship, so he says, and he was going to be off this bargain; and I have not the least doubt that being advised this point was an arguable point he insisted upon it.

Therefore, the only question for me is, Was he bound, having regard to the coke clause? Now, the telegram of authority mentioned 3000 tons of coal. That is all it says as to the cargo, and coke is not coal. Of course it is not the same substance, but apart from that, from a shipowner's point of view it is a different cargo because it is light.

There is no evidence before me that an order to a broker to charter a ship to carry coal impliedly by custom or anything of that kind authorises him to include an option for any particular percentage of coke or any coke at all. There was a certain amount of evidence dealing with the coke option. Mr. Reece said, when he was called for the plaintiffs, the coke option was often objected to, especially with old ships. I have no evidence of the age of this ship, although there was a suggestion made about it. Mr. Young, who was called for the defendants, said: "We thought the coke option was within our authority, especially as we were doing better all round, a shilling a ton more was given, and another shilling extra in respect of such coke as was loaded."

That seems to me to come to no more than this, that the willing owner who would ask 20*s.* for coal would not have objected in point of fact, in point of business, to this coke option in this charter, having regard to all its terms. I think that is all it proves. But that is not the same thing as showing that the agent had authority, as between himself and his principal, to include this option for coke. I think, therefore, that Runciman and Co. did presume to make a charter-party for which they had no authority from their principal. Nor can I say that the principal would be bound if he knew the point and took it by reason of Runciman and Co. having acted within the scope of their authority in any way. I have not any evidence upon the point except to the effect that I have mentioned. There is nothing in the customary printed form of charter for South Wales coal that lends colour to any such idea.

This coke option was introduced by a type-written clause added to the print, and I am absolutely at a loss to know how much coke it would be within the scope of an agent's authority to include among the cargo of coal. Could it be all coke? How am I to say (I have not the material for saying) that it was within the scope of an agent's authority to include any particular percentage of coke. Therefore I come to the conclusion, although it is a somewhat by-point, I might also say perhaps a "lawyer's point," that Runciman and Co. had no authority to make this charter-party, and therefore they are liable to the plaintiffs, Weigall and Co., for the damages for breach of warranty or authority.

The only question that remains is as to the amount of damages. I think that Mr. Weigall acted reasonably and properly. I am sure, having seen him, that he acted in good faith in the matter. He got the ship which he substituted for the ship which he hoped to get from Astarita, another ship in about a week's time. There was a good deal of evidence that there were ships chartered for Italian ports, and there was some evidence that one might have been got for Palermo, which is perhaps rather a different thing.

But, after all, I cannot help feeling that if there had been really a ship to be got Runciman and Co., who knew of the difficulty, might have heard of one. It is true they act rather for shipowners than for coalowners, but still I cannot help feeling that if really a ship could have been replaced on terms that left a small margin of loss promptly they might very probably have heard of it.

What Weigall and Co. did was to charter a ship which was larger than the ship named in the charter. I have already said that I think they acted reasonably in doing so. They could not get a ship the exact size, so they got a ship that was rather larger.

If they had only loaded the amount that they could have loaded in the ship anticipated from Astarita, she would have sailed insufficiently loaded, and dead freight would have to have been paid, and that would, I think, in effect have increased the level of freights all round. But Weigall and Co. did not do that. They had coal at their call, and they loaded that coal on this ship, and shipped it abroad really on speculation. They sacrificed that coal that was in their hands in order to fill up this ship.

It is true that they succeeded in selling the coal for not less than they bought it for, and therefore did not make a loss upon that. But the question is, in a case like this, as I conceive, how much did it cost them to replace the ship? They replaced the ship by another ship which they used to the best advantage, and it meant that they had to pay higher freight for the amount of coal originally contemplated, and they had either to pay dead freight for the balance of the capacity of the ship, or a higher freight for that also. They chose to do the latter, which was the more economical course, and I think their damages as put in the statement are rightly framed.

Therefore I think that they are entitled to recover against Runciman and Co. the difference between the freight named in the charter-party and the freight which they paid on the whole capacity of the ship which they chartered to take her place. The figure is 2929*l.* 10*s.* 9*d.* I give judgment for the plaintiff for that amount with costs.

From that decision the defendants now appealed.

Roche, K.C. (with him Alexander Neilson) for the appellants referred to

Loring v. Davis, 54 L. T. Rep. 899, 32 Ch. Div. 623;

Cur. adv. vult.

June 3.—The following written judgments were delivered:—

Lord Cozens-Hardy, M.R.—I have had an opportunity of reading the judgment which Pickford, L.J. is about to deliver, and I agree with it and have nothing to add thereto.

Pickford, L.J.—This was an action against the defendants for damages arising from their breach of warranty of authority to charter to the plaintiffs a ship belonging to an Italian gentleman of the name of Astarita.

The facts may be shortly stated as follows: The defendants had been in negotiation with Mr. Astarita's agents for the charter of one of his ships, and the ship which had been mentioned as likely to perform the charter if effected was the steamship Maria Vittoria.

The defendants knew Mr. Astarita as a shipowner, but did not know that he was also a merchant, as was in fact the case.

On the 10th April 1915 they received the following cable from him: "You authorise fix steamer prompt loading 3000 tons coal Newport Cagliari Messina or Palermo twenty shillings. If cannot better wire immediately."

On receiving this cable they put themselves into communication with the plaintiffs, and eventually concluded a charter. The charter was on the Chamber of Shipping Welsh Coal charter form, which contained blanks as to loading and discharging time, cancelling date and other matters of that kind. These blanks were filled up by the defendants after negotiation with the plaintiffs, and the charter was signed by them for and by authority of owners as agents.

The defendants then informed Mr. Astarita of what they had done, and he at once repudiated the charter, on the ground that he had intended by his cable to instruct the defendants not to charter a ship of his to carry a cargo of coals, but to procure a ship to carry a cargo of coals for him.

The defendants were in consequence unable to provide a ship for the plaintiffs, who had to charter another ship at greatly increased terms. They then brought this action to recover the difference between the freights under the charter and that which they had to pay.

The defendants' defence was that there was no breach of warranty of authority, and that the cable gave them authority to make the charter which they had made. The plaintiffs alleged that the cable did not give the defendants authority to charter a ship of Mr. Astarita at all, and that even if as against him the defendants were justified on the authority of Ireland v. Livingston (27 L. T. Rep. 79; L. Rep. 5 E. & I. App. 395) in reading it as giving them such authority they could not set that up as a defence to the plaintiff's claim because Mr. Astarita had no intention of giving such authority, and had not in fact given it.

On this point Rowlatt, J. held that the defendants' contention was right, and I agree with him. I need not say anything further on the point.

The plaintiffs, however, also contended that even if the defendants had authority to effect a charter it must be one in accordance with the authority given, and that this charter was not so in accordance. The main points of their argument on this point was that clause 16, giving what was called the Coke option, was beyond their authority, and they also contended that they had exceeded their authority in filling up the blanks as to loading days and without referring them to Mr. Astarita.

I think there is no ground for this last contention. If a foreign shipowner gives authority to a ship broker to effect a charter I think he must be taken to give authority to settle matters of that kind, otherwise business could not be done at all.

But I regret to say that I do not think the charter was within the authority of the defendants. I agree that it is what Rowlatt, J. calls a "lawyers' point," and that if Mr. Astarita had not wished to repudiate the charter on another ground altogether he probably would not have thought of quarrelling with what the defendants had done.

But he has repudiated it, and therefore the defendants must show that they had authority to make the charter which they did make.

The authority must be read reasonably and the amount of 3000 tons of coal cannot be read as confining the defendants to that amount accurately, and the words "if cannot better" give a certain latitude, although they refer directly to the amount of freight. The defendants, although the ship was not named, concluded that the Maria Vittoria would be the vessel named, and made a charter which would have been a favourable one for her, but under the charter any other vessel might have been named. The authority was to fix a steamer to load 3000 tons coal at 20*s*.—if cannot better. The charter was to load a full and complete cargo of coal with a maximum of 3630 and a minimum of 2970, and an option to the charterer to load 200 to 300 tons of coke, they paying an extra 1*s*. freight and all extra charges.

The maximum in the charter was therefore 20 per cent. above the amount named in the authority, although the minimum was only 1 per cent. below, and whether the maximum or minimum were shipped the charterer had an option to ship 300 tons of coke instead of coal.

There was evidence that many shipowners objected to this coke option, and the plaintiffs' representative said that in chartering for an English shipowner he would refer such a matter to him, but he did not think it necessary to do so in case of a foreigner. No customs or usage of trade with regard to the matter was proved.

On these facts I cannot come to the conclusion that the charter was within the authority given, and therefore with regret, for I think the defendants bonâ fide did their best under the circumstances, I agree with Rowlatt, J. on this point, and think the appeal should be dismissed.

The appellants asked for leave to give further evidence to show that the charter was an unfavourable one for the Maria Vittoria and ships of her class, and that Mr. Astarita's ships were of that class, but I do not think such leave should be given.

I doubt if a sufficient case of surprise was made out, but in any case I do not think the evidence would be relevant, as I do not think it would bring what was done within the words "if cannot better."

NEVILLE J.—In this case a shipowner in Italy telegraphs to the defendants, Messrs. Runciman and Co., as follows: "You authorise fix steamer prompt loading 3000 tons coal Newport Cagliari Messina or Palermo twenty shillings. If cannot better wire immediately."

The telegram was intended to authorise the chartering of a ship to carry 3000 tons of coal. The defendants read it as a direction to secure a cargo of coal for a ship. The wording was ambiguous. It has been found that the defendants were justified in putting the interpretation upon it that they did, and I do not dissent from that decision.

The telegram was certainly intended to be acted upon without further instructions, and I think, therefore, the defendants had authority to fix all the necessary terms of the charter party at their discretion. On the other hand the name of the ship was not given, and I think they had no right to speculate as to what ship might be intended. Having authority, as they were entitled to think, to contract to carry 3000 tons of coal by ship they, on behalf of their principals, did in fact sign a charter party under which their principals might be called upon to carry 3630 tons of coal or 3330 tons of coal and 300 tons of coke, the obligation to carry the coke depending upon an option added in writing to the printed terms of the charter party.

According to the evidence, coke bulking larger for its weight than coal, whether a shipowner would or would not accept the insertion of such an option in a charter party would depend upon the space for cargo available in his ship. It appears to me therefore that the ship not being named the authority in the present case would not justify the insertion of a coke option even if the contract had been confined to the carriage of 3000 tons, but it is not necessary to decide that question because here it included the carriage of 630 tons more than the telegram authorised.

This appears to me to be beyond the authority given the defendants upon their construction of the telegram. It is said that evidence could have been given to show that the principal must have been benefited by this, and that therefore it was within the terms of their authority. In all probability the defendants were thinking of the Maria Vittoria, of the capacity of which ship they had some knowledge when they signed the charter party, but they had no right, I think, to take any particular ship into consideration. It is to be remembered that no ship was intended, there being no actual authority at all for what the defendants did, the principal intending a quite different transaction.

The only authority being by estoppel, how any evidence could show that some ship which never in fact existed would have been adapted to carry the increased cargo I confess I am unable to understand.

In my opinion the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord Buckmaster), Earl LOREBURN, Viscount HALDANE, Lord ATKINSON, and Lord PARKER OF WADDINGTON.)

Re ARBITRATION BETWEEN F. A. TAMPLIN STEAMSHIP COMPANY LIMITED AND ANGLO-MEXICAN PETROLEUM PRODUCTS COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Time charter-party—Oil tank steamer—Period of charter unexpired—Requisition by British Government—Structural alterations to adapt her for use as transport—Restraint of princes—Frustration of adventure—Effect on contract.

By a charter-party, dated in May 1912, the owners of a ship designed to carry cargoes of oil in bulk agreed to let and the charterers agreed to hire the ship for a period of sixty calendar months—which period would expire in Dec. 1917—to be employed in lawful trades for voyages between certain specified ports for the carriage of refined petroleum and (or) crude oil and (or) its products as the charterers or their agents should direct.

The charterers were to pay as freight a fixed sum per month. Under certain restrictions the carriage of other suitable cargo than oil was to be allowed. Power was conferred on the charterers to underlet the ship on Admiralty or other service, but without prejudice to the charter-party. The charter also contained the usual exception of restraint of princes.

The ship was requisitioned by the Government in Dec. 1914 and again in Feb. 1915, when she was altered to fit her for the transport of troops. The charterers had paid and were willing to continue to pay the stipulated freight.

In these circumstances the owners (the appellants) claimed they were entitled to treat the contract as at an end.

Held (Viscount Haldane and Lord Atkinson dissenting), that under the circumstances this charter-party was not determined when the steamer was requisitioned, and that the requisition did not suspend it or affect the rights of the owners or charterers under it.

Query: Does the doctrine of frustration apply to a time charter?

Decision of the Court of Appeal (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 284; 114 L. T. Rep. 259; (1916) 1 K. B. 485) affirmed.

APPEAL by the steamship company from a decision of the Court of Appeal (Lord Cozens-Hardy, M.R. and Bankes and Warrington, L.JJ.), reported 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas 284; 114 L. T. Rep. 259; (1916) 1 K. B. 485, which affirmed a judgment (1915) 3 K. B. 668) of Atkin, J. upon an award stated in the form of a special case by an arbitrator.

The question arising on the facts, which are fully stated in the judgments of their Lordships, was whether a charter-party of a tank steamer had been determined (or suspended) by the requisitioning of the vessel by the British Government, and by her structural alteration and conversion into, and use as, a troopship.

The appellants, the owners, affirmed this; the respondents, the charterers, denied it.

The arbitrator awarded, subject to the opinion of the court, that the charter-party was terminated by the requisition, but Atkin, J. held that it remained in force, and the Court of Appeal affirmed that decision.

The House, having taken time for consideration, dismissed the appeal.

Earl LOREBURN.—It is unnecessary to repeat the narrative of what has happened in this case or to analyse again the charter-party. This ship was chartered for five years. She was to be managed and controlled by the owners, but the use to be made of her in carrying merchandise within prescribed limitations depended upon the direction of the charterers. From Dec. 1912 till Dec. 1914 she was employed accordingly. From that date till the hearing of the case she has been employed by His Majesty's Government for purposes connected with the war. There are, therefore, nineteen months of the five years unexpired. No one knows how long the Government will continue to use this vessel, but, so long as they do use her, neither party to the contract can carry out their common adventure.

It may be as well to say that the first requisition of this ship was in Dec. 1914 and the second in Feb. 1915, but she was not released from the day she was first taken over.

In these circumstances the owners maintain that Mr. Leck's award, holding that this charter-party came to an end when the steamer was requisitioned in Feb. 1915, is right.

In order to decide this question it is necessary to ascertain the principle of law which underlies the authorities. I believe it to be as follows. When a lawful contract has been made and there is no default, a court of law has no power to discharge either party from the performance of it unless either the rights of someone else or some Act of Parliament give the necessary jurisdiction. But a court can and ought to examine the contract and circumstances in which it was made, not, of course, to vary, but only to explain it, in order to see whether or not from the nature of it the parties must have made their bargain on the footing that a particular thing or state of things would continue to exist. And if they must have done so, then a term to that effect will be implied, though it be not expressed in the contract. In applying this rule it is manifest that such a term can rarely be implied except where the discontinuance is such as to upset altogether the purpose of the contract. Some delay or some change is very common in all human affairs, and it cannot be supposed that any bargain has been made on the tacit condition that such a thing will not happen in any degree.

In the recent case of Horlock v. Beal (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 250; 114 L. T. Rep. 193; (1916) 1 A. C. 486) this House considered the law upon this subject, and previous decisions were fully reviewed, especially in the opinion delivered by Lord Atkinson. An examination of those decisions confirms me in the view that, when our courts have held innocent contracting parties absolved from further performance of their promises, it has been upon the ground that there was an implied term in the contract which entitled them to be absolved. Sometimes it is put that performance has become impossible and that the party concerned did not promise to perform an impossibility. Sometimes it is put that the parties contemplated a certain state of things which fell out otherwise. In most of the cases it is said that there was an implied condition in the contract which operated to release the parties from performing it, and in all of them I think that was at bottom the principle upon which the court proceeded. It is, in my opinion, the true principle, for no court has an absolving power, but it can infer from the nature of the contract and the surrounding circumstances that a condition which is not expressed was a foundation on which the parties contracted.

When this question arises in regard to commercial contracts, as happened in Dahl v. Nelson (44 L. T. Rep. 381; 6 App. Cas. 38), Geipel v. Smith (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 268; 26 L. T. Rep. 361), and Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Company (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 435; 31 L. T. Rep. 789; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 125), the principle is the same, and the language used as to "frustration of the adventure" merely adapts it to the class of cases in hand. In all these three cases it was held, to use the language of Lord Blackburn, "that a delay in carrying out a charter-party, caused by something for which neither party was responsible, if so great and long as to make it unreasonable to require the parties to go on with the adventure, entitled either of them, at least while the contract was executory, to consider it at end." That seems to me another way of saying that from the nature of the contract it cannot be supposed the parties, as reasonable men, intended it to be binding on them under such altered conditions. Were the altered conditions such that, had they thought of them, they would have taken their chance of them, or such that as sensible men they would have said, "If that happens, of course it is all over between us"? What, in fact, was the true meaning of the contract? Since the parties have not provided for the contingency, ought a court to say it is obvious they would have treated the thing as at an end?

Applying the principle to the present case, I find that these contracting parties stipulated for the use of this ship during a period of five years, which would naturally cover the duration of many voyages. Certainly both sides expected that these years would be years of peace. They also expected, no doubt, that they would be left in joint control of the ship, as agreed, and that they would not be deprived of it by any act of State. But I cannot say that the continuance of peace or freedom from any interruption in their use of the vessel was a tacit condition of this contract. On the contrary, one at all events of the parties might probably have thought, if he thought of it at all, that war would enhance the value of the contract, and both would have been considerably surprised to be told that interruption for a few months was to release them both from a time charter that was to last five years. On the other hand, if the interruption can be pronounced, in the language of Lord Blackburn already cited, "so great and long as to make it unreasonable to require the parties to go on with the adventure," then it would be different. Both of them must have contracted on the footing that such an interruption as that would not take place, and I should imply a condition to that effect. Taking into account, however, all that has happened, I cannot infer that the interruption either has been or will be in this case such as makes it unreasonable to require the parties to go on. There may be many months during which this ship will be available for commercial purposes before the five years have expired. It might be a valuable right for the charterer during those months to have the use of this ship at the stipulated freight. Why should he be deprived of it? No one can say that he will or that he will not regain the use of the ship, for it depends upon contingencies which are incalculable. The owner will continue to receive the freight he bargained for so long as the contract entitles him to it, and if, during the time for which the charterer is entitled to the use of the ship, the owner received from the Government any sums of money for the use of her he will be accountable to the charterer. Should the upshot of it all be loss to either party, and I do not suppose it will be so, then each will lose according as the action of the Crown has deprived either of the benefit he would otherwise have derived from the contract. It may be hard on them as it was on the plaintiff in Appleby v. Myers (16 L. T. Rep. 669; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 651). The violent interruption of a contract always may damage one or both of the contracting parties. Any interruption does so. Loss may arise to someone whether it be decided that these people are or that they are not still bound by the charter-party. But the test for answering that question is not the loss that either may sustain. It is this: ought we to imply a condition in the contract that an interruption such as this shall excuse the parties from further performance of it? I think not. I think they took their chance of lesser interruptions and the condition I should imply goes no further than that they should be excused if substantially the whole contract became impossible of performance, or, in other words, impracticable, by some cause for which neither was responsible. Accordingly I am of opinion that this charter-party did not come to an end when the steamer was requisitioned and that the requisition did not suspend it or affect the rights of the owners or charterers under it, and that the appeal fails.

It it were established that this ship would be used by the Government for substantially the remainder of the five years, I should be of a different opinion.

The Lord Chancellor desires me to say he concurs in the judgment prepared by Lord Parker.

Viscount HALDANE.—The general principles by which this appeal must be decided do not appear to me to be difficult of ascertainment. The real uncertainty in the case lies in their application. As to this it is with reluctance that I find myself differing from the conclusions at which others of your Lordships have arrived.

When people enter into a contract which is dependent for the possibility of its performance on the continued availability of a specific thing, and that availability comes to an end by reason of circumstances beyond the control of the parties, the contract is regarded as dissolved. The contingency which has arisen is treated, in the absence of a contrary intention made plain, as being one about which no bargain at all was made. The principle applies equally whether performance of the contract has not commenced or has in part taken place. There may be included in the terms of the contract itself a stipulation which provides for the merely partial or temporary suspension of certain of its obligations, should some event (such, for instance, as in the case of the charter-party under consideration, restraint of princes) so happen as to impede performance. In that case the question arises whether the event which has actually made the specific thing no longer available for performance is such that it can be regarded as being of a nature sufficiently limited to fall within the suspensory stipulation, and to admit of the contract being deemed to have provided for it and to have been intended to continue for other purposes. Although the words of the stipulation may be such that the mere letter would describe what has occurred, the occurrence itself may yet be of a character and extent so sweeping that the foundation of what the parties are deemed to have had in contemplation has disappeared, and the contract itself has vanished with that foundation. If the course of events can be regarded as consistent with the continuance of the contract, it will follow that when the event possesses the more limited character there will, under the terms of the special stipulation, be mere suspension of particular rights and duties which would otherwise arise under the general terms agreed on. The circumstances that the contract is one, not for a single service, but for a succession of such services, to continue for a definite time, is a relevant fact in considering whether there is a mere temporary suspension. And where the interruption is simply one of an interim character and likely to cease so soon as to leave the rest of the period stipulated free for the revival of the rights and duties of the parties after what amounts to no more than a temporary cessation of the power of performance, then, not only where there is an express stipulation covering the case which has occurred, but possibly even where there is no such stipulation, the contract may be regarded as not becoming destroyed, but only suspended. The question must always turn mainly on the facts. But if the facts be such that it appears that the power of performance has been wholly swept away to such an extent that there is no longer in view a definite prospect of this power being restored, then the contract must be looked upon as being wholly dissolved, and the courts cannot take any course which would in reality impose new and different terms on the parties.

On the general principle there is a long series of authorities, extending from the decision of Paradine v. Jane (Aleyn, 26), more than two centuries ago, through such cases as Taylor v. Caldwell (3 B. & S. 826) down to the recent appeal to this House in Horlock v. Beal (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 250; 114 L. T. Rep. 193; (1916) 1 A. C. 486), in which last case many of the previous authorities were considered and classified. In the main the decisions given are consistent, although there are dicta which are not everywhere easy to reconcile. But the differences in expression which these authorities disclose do not affect the fundamental principles which they recognise, and I think that what I have ventured to state as the law is in accordance with the weight of judicial opinion. It is important to endeavour to formulate these principles in a case like the present, where the task of the tribunal is essentially one of ascertaining the true bearing on the particular facts of the case.

To these facts I now turn. By a charter-party dated the 18th May 1912, on which the question arises, the owners of the tank steamer F. A. Tamplin agreed to let the steamer to the respondents as charterers for sixty calendar months from the date at which she was placed at the disposal of the latter, a term which would expire on the 4th Dec. 1917. The steamer was to be employed "in such lawful trades for voyages between any safe port or ports in the United Kingdom and (or) Continent of Europe and (or) any safe port or ports in the United States of America and (or) Mexico and (or) North and South America and (or) Africa and (or) Asia and (or) Australasia and back, finally to a coal port in the United Kingdom, for the carriage of refined petroleum and (or) crude oil and (or) its products, but warranted no B N A. or Atlantic except for coaling; warranted no Baltic between the 1st Oct. and the 1st April; warranted no White Sea between the 1st Oct. and the 1st April, as charterers or his agents shall direct," on certain conditions. Among these was that the charterers should pay 1750*l*, reducible later on to 1700*l*, a month, that on the last voyage the charterers should, if the vessel had been carrying other than refined oil or spirit, clean the vessel, and load a cargo of refined oil or spirit on that voyage under the charter; that no goods contraband of war were to be shipped, and the vessel was not to be required to enter any port which was blockaded or where hostilities were in progress; that no voyage was to be undertaken or goods or cargoes loaded which would involve risk of seizure, capture, or penalty by British or foreign rulers, and no acids or cargoes injurious to the steamer were to be shipped; that the charterers were to have the option of subletting the steamer to the Admiralty or other service without prejudice to the charter-party, but the charterers to remain responsible. The owners were to provide and pay the crew and for stores and maintenance. Any dispute arising during the execution of the charter-party was to be settled by arbitration.

It is, of course, obvious that, although the contract was described as one of lease, there was and could have been no lease properly so called. The real relation was that the owners retained through the officers and crew the possession of the vessel, and that the charterers were entitled to use it for certain purposes and under certain restrictions during a term of five years.

There was another important clause in the charter-party to which I have to refer. This was the usual one providing that certain perils should be excepted. These perils included "arrests and restraints of princes, rulers, and people." The effect of the clause was that if and to the extent to which the perils mentioned interfered with the fulfilment of their obligations the parties were exempted from liability for non-performance.

Early in Dec. 1914 the steamer was requisitioned by the British Government for Admiralty transport service and was engaged in such service until about the 10th Feb. 1915. No question has been raised as to this requisition, which appears to have been accepted by both parties as a merely temporary burden upon their rights under the charter-party. But about the latter date notice was given by the Admiralty Director of Transports to the charterers that the steamer was again requisitioned and that she would be specially fitted by the Government for the service on which she was to be employed. This was done shortly thereafter, and the Government made structural alterations, and used her for the transport of troops. She has since then, according to what was stated at the Bar, been in part at all events restored to something resembling her original condition, and has been used for the carriage of oil. But I think it is clear that the Admiralty neither regarded their powers as in any way restricted, nor had any intention of limiting the period during which they claimed to use the steamer. Had the charterers done what the Government has done, their action would have constituted such a breach of contract as would have entitled the owners to treat the contract as at an end.

Under these circumstances a dispute arose between the owners and the charterers as to their rights, and this dispute was, under the arbitration clause, referred to Mr. Leck, one of His Majesty's counsel. The owners claimed that what had happened could not be treated as a subletting under the contract, but that the basis of the contract was gone, inasmuch as the steamer could no longer be made available under the charter party, which was therefore either entirely at an end or was indefinitely suspended under the restraint of princes clause. The charterers argued that in reality there had been what was tantamount to a subletting to the Admiralty, and that the uses by the latter for purposes outside those prescribed by the charter-party, and the making of the structural alterations, did not amount to breaches of contract by the charterers, inasmuch as they were covered by the restraint of princes clause. If the charterers were right it would no doubt follow that they would be entitled to retain the largely increased monthly payment which Government has been making for the use of the steamer, paying to the owners only the monthly sum stipulated for by the charter-party. If the owners, on the other hand were right, the charterers would be able to claim compensation from the Government for loss of rights under the terms of a general proclamation issued by the latter, but the owners would be the persons entitled to the hire paid by the Admiralty for the steamer to the use of which the charterers would no longer be entitled. The question of compensation was not, however, raised before the arbitrator, and it is not before us. The only point referred was whether the charter-party was brought to an end or at all events fully suspended by the second requisition and what was done under it.

The arbitrator decided this question in the affirmative, but stated a special case. On the argument of this special case, Atkin, J. and the Court of Appeal differed from him, and gave judgments to the effect that the contract remained in existence, and that the restraint of princes clause kept the contract alive while precluding the owners from insisting that the diversion of use and alteration of structure were breaches for which the charterers could be held responsible.

It may well be that, at all events where there is such a clause, in the case of a time charter with a substantial period yet to run, an event might occur which, while it temporarily interfered with its performance, would not destroy its existence. On the other hand, in the case of a charter for a single voyage, the same event might be sufficient to destroy the very basis in the case of voyage charter when it would not have been sufficient to destroy that of a time charter. The question in each case is one of the application of the general principles to which I referred earlier to the facts and circumstances of the particular case. And I think that similar considerations must govern the question whether what has happened in the present case can be regarded as falling within the meaning of the restraint of princes clause. That clause may apply to mere structural alterations made by a Government. It is a more difficult question whether it can cover a taking possession which may, so far as appears, outlast the period of the charter. In one aspect the act of the Government may come within the clause, but in another and equally important aspect it may mean so much more that by destroying the possibility of performing the contract as a whole it destroys the applicability of the clause.

In the case before us I am accordingly of opinion that if the conclusion is once reached that the requisition was of such a character that it would otherwise supersede or indefinitely suspend the contract, the special clause cannot assist the charterers. Now it is no doubt true that the charter was to remain in force until the 4th Dec. 1917. But the requisition by the Admiralty was one which enabled it to use the steamer for purposes altogether outside the contract, and that for a time to which no limit could be assigned. The time might extend until after the period of the charter-party had run out. It is impossible for any court to speculate as to the duration of the war on which the Admiralty requirements may depend. It is enough that events which are of public notoriety indicate the duration as one about which there is no apparent certainty as to a speedy close of which a court of justice can take cognisance. The question whether the contract was brought to an end must be judged in the light of events as they were in Feb. 1915. The requisition was of a character so sweeping that I think the burden of showing that the purposes of the charter could continue to subsist concurrently with its operation rested on those who maintained the affirmative. Primâ facie the entire basis of the contract, so far as concerned either performance in Feb. 1915, or performance at any calculable period in the future, seems to me to have been swept away. It might thereafter have proved possible to make a fresh start within what turned out to remain over of the time of the charter. But it equally might not. I am therefore unable to see how the contract can be properly looked on as only temporarily interrupted. Such interruption has a meaning if the restraint of princes clause covers the interrupting event. The clause is introduced for the very purpose of saving the foundation of the contract. But if that foundation is gone the contract is gone and the clause with it. Now the basis of the contract here was that the owners should provide a steamer to be used by the charterers for certain purposes only. The use of the ship and the fulfilment of the purposes are swept away by vis major for a period to which no limit can be assigned. It is possible that under different circumstances and with a period as to which there was an obvious inference of fact that it would in all probability outlast the duration of the war the vis major might have been regarded as a mere temporary interruption which the special clause covered. But it seems to me that the charterers cannot bring their case up to the point at which it is legitimate to draw such an inference. I am therefore driven to the conclusion that there was here no mere temporary suspension of a subordinate obligation of the charterers. I think that the entire contract was avoided, and and with it the clause providing for restraint of princes, and that the appellants were consequently entitled to judgmen .

Lord ATKINSON. — This case came before Atkin, J. upon an award in the form of a special case stated by an arbitrator, and the question for the court to determine was stated to be whether, on the facts stated in the case, the arbitrator was right in holding that the charter-party dated the 18th May 1912 came to an end when the steamer (i.e., the tank steamer F. A. Tamplin) was requisitioned by the British Government on the 15th Feb. 1915.

Your Lordships were informed that this is a test case, and the parties on both sides desired that the House should not confine its attention to the facts found by the arbitrator, but should consider in addition all relevant matters which have take place since the hearing before him, with a view of determining whether or not this charter has come to an end.

By the charter-party the British tank steamer F. A. Tamplin, in process of being built at the date of the document, was chartered to the respondents for a period of sixty calendar months, commencing from the 4th Dec. 1912 and expiring on the 4th Dec. 1917, at the hire of 1750*l.* per calendar month for the first twelve months and 1700*l.* per month for the remaining forty-eight months. Under the terms of the charter-party the steamer, described as a tank steamer, was to be placed at the disposal of the charterers at Newcastle-on-Tyne, in a dock or place in which she could safely lie afloat, as the charterers should direct immediately on being ready, she being then tight, staunch, and strong, fully equipped with a full complement of officers, seamen, engineers, and firemen necessary for that service. Now the service for which she was rendered fit and for which she was delivered was this. For voyages between any safe port or ports in the United Kingdom, the Continent of Europe, or the seven other countries named, and back finally to a coal port in the United Kingdom, for the carriage of refined petroleum or crude oil or its products. It is quite true that the charterers are not, according to the letter of this clause, bound to employ this vessel on the particular service named, but they are bound not to employ her on any other service. They might possibly retain her in dock during the entire period of five years, or any part of it, at a cost of 1750*l.* or 1700*l.* per month. But if the parties were not business people, as they are, but merely rational beings, they could not when they entered into the charter-party have contemplated anything of the kind. Whether that be so or not, the contract had secured to the charterers the power to determine whether or not the vessel should be employed in the trade authorised on such voyages as they might select between the ports named; and one of the assumptions upon which I think the contract must have been based was that the charterers should remain free to exercise, as and when they deemed fit, the powers secured to them by their contract. Else why enter into it at all. The same remark applies to the owner. The parties have, no doubt, in one article—art. 20, with which I shall presently deal—specified several instances in which the will and intentions of each of them might be overborne by force majeure, but if one looks through the conditions upon which the contract was made, it will plainly appear that neither party could perform his side of the contract unless he be left a free agent. For instance, the first condition requires that the owners shall provide all provisions and wages for the crew and maintain the ship in a thoroughly efficient state in hull, machinery, and equipment for and during the service. Art. 6 requires that the crew, the servants of the owners, for whom they are responsible, shall do certain work in a particular manner, in the process of loading the ship.

By art. 2 the charterers are bound to provide and pay for oil fuel, galley coals, port charges, pilotage, &c. By art. 3 the hire is to continue for the time specified for termination of the charter and until the redelivery to the owners (unless lost) at a coal port in the United Kingdom, as provided. By art. 13 the captain, although appointed by the owners, is put under the order and direction of the charterers as regards employment, agency, or other arrangements. By art. 12 the captain is bound to prosecute his voyages with the utmost dispatch, and render all customary assistance with ship's crew, winches, and boats, and proceed to sea when ordered, if tide and weather permit. If the charterers have reason to be dissatisfied with the conduct of the captain, officers, or engineers, the owners, on receiving particulars of the complaint should investigate the same and, if necessary, make a change in the appointment. By art. 15 it is provided that the master should be furnished from time to time with all requisite instructions and sailing directions and shall keep a full and correct log of the voyage or voyages, which shall be submitted to the charterers or their agents when required.

Thus by these several articles, and many others which might be referred to, powers are conferred and obligations imposed upon each of the contracting parties; and active duties are required to be performed by each. None of these things can be done unless the charterers retain possession and control of the ship, and both parties retain their freedom of action. It cannot, in my view, be possibly supposed that they by this charter, apart from art. 20, even intended to enter into an absolute contract to perform the impossible—that is, to exercise these powers, fulfil these obligations, and discharge these duties after the ship, in and upon which all these things were to be done, had been taken possession of by a third party who had lawfully removed her from the control of both of them for a considerable portion of the period of hiring, and might continue so to do for the whole of that period.

Now I turn to art. 20. It is immediately preceded by art. 19, which provides that "if the vessel be lost the hire is to cease." But why? Surely because the charterers would thereby lose, possibly through one of the excepted perils, such as the act of God or perils of the sea, the thing they had contracted to pay for—namely, the use of the ship. Yet according to the contention of the respondents the hire is not to cease, though they should lose for the entire period of hiring the use of the ship by another of the excepted perils, the restraint of princes.

Art. 20 then provides: That the "Act of God, perils of the sea, fire, barratry of the master and crew, pirates, thieves, arrest and restraint of princes, rulers, and peoples, collisions, strandings, and other accidents of navigation always excepted, even when occasioned by the negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, master mariners, or other servants of the shipowner." I think it plain that this clause was introduced mainly for the protection of the shipowner. Either party could, however, rely upon it as a defence to an action brought upon the charter-party to recover damages for a breach of contract, consisting in the omission to do an act that party was bound to do if he was prevented from doing it by one of the excepted perils. This, however, is not all. If the act omitted to be done was the performance or non-fulfilment of a condition precedent, then, in addition, the contract might come to an end, and both parties be released from all obligations under it. The fallacy underlying the respondents' contention appears to me to be this, that such a contract can never be put an end to through the operation of one of the excepted perils. The following authorities show, I think, that is not the law.

Two well-known cases, many times approved of and followed, establish, in my view, this proposition. First, Geipel v. Smith (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 268; 26 L. T. Rep. 361; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 404) and, second, Jackson v. Marine Insurance Company (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 435; 31 L. T. Rep. 789; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 125), decided in the Exchequer Chamber on appeal from the Court of Common Pleas, and reported in the court below in L. Rep. 8 C. P. 572. In the first of these two cases the charter-party contained a clause somewhat similar to this 20th article, excepting the act of God, Queen's enemies, restraint of princes, rulers, &c. Yet the owners were relieved from their contract to take on board a cargo and carry it to Hamburg, since the port of Hamburg was blockaded by the French fleet; that blockade clearly being a restraint of princes and peoples. Blackburn, J., as he then was, at p. 412, said: "The defendants, therefore, the shipowners, could not fulfil their contract by delivery of the cargo without running the blockade. I am unable to see why this was not a restraint of princes; it was clearly a restraint of the then Emperor of France, preventing the cargo from being carried to Hamburg. But then comes another question: Conceding that while the blockade lasted there was a restraint—an obstacle to the fulfilment by the defendants of their obligations under the charter-party, it is said that the moment the blockade was raised the ship might have gone off, and therefore she ought to have been ready with her cargo on board to start at any moment. But I cannot agree that, however long the blockade existed—which might be during all the time the war lasted, and therefore might have been for years—the ship and cargo must be ready to sail as soon as wind and weather permitted after the blockade was raised. It would be most inconvenient to give such a construction to the contract, and would be to frustrate the very object of such a contract —namely, the speedy transfer of the shippers' goods and the remunerative employment of the shipowners' vessel." And Lush, J., at p. 414, said: "I think the fifth plea may also be treated as valid. It alleges the breaking-out of war between France and Germany and a blockade of the port of Hamburg. If the impediment had been in its nature temporary, I should have thought the plea bad; but a state of war must be presumed to be likely to continue so long, and so to disturb the commerce of merchants as to defeat and destroy a commercial adventure like this." In the second of the cases the action was brought on a policy of insurance effected by the plaintiff on chartered freight valued at 2900*l.* to be earned by the plaintiffs' vessel, the Spirit of Dawn, on a voyage at and from Liverpool to Newport, in tow, and thence to San Francisco. By the charter dated the 22nd Nov. 1871, entered into between the plaintiff and Messrs. Rathbone and Co., this ship was to proceed with all convenient speed from Liverpool to Newport (dangers and accidents of navigation excepted), and there load a cargo of iron rails for San Francisco. The ship, in performance of her owners' obligation under the charter-party, started on the first stage of her voyage, i.e., from Liverpool to Newport, but, en route, took the rocks in Carnarvon Bay, and was got off after considerable delay much damaged. It is an error to suppose that at the time of the accident the owners' contract was in the position of a merely executory contract. It was, in truth, part performed. The rails were required for the construction of a railway in San Francisco. Time was a matter of importance to the charterers. They accordingly immediately threw up the charter and chartered another ship. The defendants, relying on the clause excepting "dangers and accidents of navigation," denied in their defence that there was any loss by a peril insured against. The case was tried before Brett, J., as he then was. The jury answered in the affirmative three questions left to them. First, "whether there was a constructive total loss of the ship?" Second, "whether the time necessary for getting the ship off the rocks and repairing her so as to be a cargo-carrying ship was so long as to make it unreasonable for the charterers to supply the agreed cargo at the end of such time"; and third, "whether such time was so long as to put an end to it in a commercial sense? &c." The learned judge being of opinion that there was no evidence of a constructive total loss of the ship, and no evidence of a loss of freight by the perils insured against, directed a verdict to be entered for the defendants, reserving leave to the plaintiff to move to enter a verdict for him. A rule nisi having been obtained by the plaintiff to enter a verdict for him, on cause being shown, it was held by Keating and Brett, JJ. that the charterers were absolved from loading the vessel, and that the shipowner, therefore, might recover for the loss of the freight. Bovill, C.J., on the contrary, held that the charterers were not entitled to throw up the charter, and that consequently the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover against the underwriters, and that the findings of the jury were immaterial. The decision of the majority was affirmed in the Exchequer Chamber by Bramwell, B., Blackburn, Mellor, and Lush, JJ., Amphlett, B. dissenting. It is therefore a case of high authority. The judgment of the majority was delivered by Bramwell, B., as he then was. At p. 144 that distinguished judge points out that as no date was fixed for the arrival of the ship at Newport, it should be held that there was an implied condition in the charter-party that she should arrive within a reasonable time. He then proceeds: "Now what is the effect of the exception of perils of the seas and of a delay caused thereby? Suppose it were not there and not implied, the shipowner would be subject to an action for the ship not arriving in a reasonable time, and the charterers would be discharged. Mr. Benjamin says the exception would be implied. How that is it is not necessary to discuss, as the words are there; but if it is so, it is remarkable as showing what must be implied from the necessity of the case. The words are there. What is their effect? I think it is this. They excuse the shipowner, but give him no right. The charterers have no cause of action, but are released from the charter. When I say he is, I think both are. The condition precedent has not been performed by the default of neither. It is as though the charter were conditional on peace being made between countries A and B, and it was not, or as though the charterers agreed to load a cargo of coal (strike of pitmen excepted). If a strike of probably long duration began, he would be excused from putting the coals on board, and would have no right to call upon the charterer to wait till the strike is over. The shipowner would be excused from keeping his ship waiting, and have no right to call on the charterer to load at a future time. This seems in accordance with general principles. The exception is an excuse for him who has to do the act, and operates to save him from an action and makes his non-performance not a breach of contract, but does not take away the right the other party would have had, if the non-performance had been a breach of contract, to retire from the engagement. And if one party may, so may the other." If, therefore, it be an implied condition precedent of the contract in the present case that both the parties to it should not without any default on their respective parts be, by the operation of a force majeure, such as the restraint of princes, deprived for the whole or a substantial portion of this period of five years of all power to exercise the rights or discharge the obligations conferred and imposed by it, the action of the Admiralty destroyed the basis upon which the contract was in the contemplation of the parties based. And in this sense rendered the fulfilment of the condition precedent impossible: (see judgment of Lord Blackburn in Taylor v. Caldwell, 3 B. & S. 826, at p. 833). Art. 20 saves each of the parties from a claim for damages for breach of contract at the suit of the other, but it does not deprive either of them of the right to free himself or themselves from the contract on the ground that the basis upon which it rested has been destroyed.

It is only necessary, I think, to cite one authority in addition to those cited in Horlock v. Beal (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 250; 114 L. T. Rep. 193; (1916) 1 A. C. 486). It is Poussard v. Spiers (34 L. T. Rep. 572; 1 Q. B. Div. 410). There the plaintiff agreed in writing with the defendants to sing and play in the chief female part in a new opera about to be brought out at the defendants' theatre at a weekly salary of 11*l.* for three months commencing about the 14th Nov., provided the opera should so long run. The first performance of the piece was not announced till the 28th Nov., but no complaint was made as to this delay. It was an implied, though not an express, term of the contract, that Madame Poussard should attend rehearsals. Owing to delays on the part of the composer, the music was not in the hands of the defendants till a few days before the 28th Nov. The later and final rehearsals did not take place till the week ending the 28th Nov. Madame Poussard, though she attended some of the rehearsals, unfortunately got ill on the 23rd Nov. and had to leave the rehearsal. On the 4th Dec., having recovered, she offered to take her place in the opera, but was refused, another artiste having, in the meantime, been engaged to fill the part. The judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench was delivered by Blackburn, J. He said (p. 413): "My brother Field, at the trial, expressed the opinion that the failure of Madame Poussard to be ready to perform under the circumstances went so much to the root of the consideration as to discharge the defendants, and that he should therefore enter judgment for the defendants," but he left five questions to the jury. They found that the non-attendance of Madame Poussard on the night of the opening was not of such material consequence to the defendants as to entitle them to rescind the contract; but in answer to another question they found that it was of such consequence as to render it reasonable for the defendants to employ another artiste, and that the engagement of this other artiste was reasonable. Lord Blackburn held that this finding enabled the court to decide, as a matter of law, that the defendants were discharged. At p. 414 he said: "The analogy is complete between this case and that of a charter-party in the ordinary terms, where the ship is to proceed in ballast (the act of God, &c., excepted) to a port and there load a cargo. If the delay is occasioned by excepted perils the shipowner is excused, but if it is so great as to go to the root of the matter, it frees the charterer from his obligation to furnish a cargo. See per Bramwell, B. delivering the judgment of the majority of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Company. And we think that the question whether the failure of a skilled and capable artiste to perform in a new piece through serious illness is so important as to go to the root of the consideration must, to some extent, depend on the evidence, and is a mixed question of law and fact." The case of Horlock v. Beal (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 250; 114 L. T. Rep. 193; (1916) A. C. 486) decided that these principles apply to the contract of a sailor to serve on a very lengthened voyage or series of voyages, the duration of which was not to extend beyond a period of two years. The detention of a ship by a hostile Power, which might last for more than two years, was held to terminate, before that period had arrived, the contract of the owners to pay the sailor wages.

I am quite unable to agree with the contention urged by the respondents that the principle of these decisions can never apply to a time charter. It is by no means true that a time charter must necessarily be of longer duration than a charter for a single voyage or a round voyage to many different ports. That depends upon the length of the term for which the ship is chartered. It may well be that the "impediment," to use the words of Lush, J. in Geipel v. Smith (sup.), should be of longer duration in the case of a time charter than in that of a charter for a single voyage, in order to be treated as "defeating and destroying" the object of the commercial adventure of the charterer and shipowner. For instance, I think it would be impossible to contend that this adventure would not be "destroyed and defeated" if the restraint was, to the knowledge of both parties, expressly imposed by the prince or Government for the entire length of the period of hiring, or for that portion of it which remained unexpired when the restraint was imposed. I do not think it can make any substantial difference if possession should be taken for a substantial portion of the whole or of the unexpired portion of that period, coupled, as in this case, with a probability or possibility that it may continue till the end of the period. In any of these events the charterer would not get anything like the thing he contracted for—namely, the use of the ship for the stipulated period, but something wholly different. He could hardly be obliged, while deprived of the use of the ship, to pay her hire. That would be monstrously unjust. This is not like a grant or demise of land, where the right of property passes though the possession should be withheld. In truth the imposition of the restraint for a lengthened period creates a condition of things to which the charter-party is inapplicable. I can find no authority for the proposition that such a contract as the present sinks into abeyance while the restraint is imposed and the possession of the ship is withheld, and springs into active existence again when the restraint terminates, regulating the right of the parties for the residue of the period of hiring. If the restraint be prolonged for a substantial portion of that period it goes, I think, to the root of the consideration as it did in the case of Jackson v. Mutual Insurance Company and Poussard v. Spiers, and relieves both parties to the contract from their engagements. And this though the contract be not in the merely executory stage, but part performed, as it was in both these cases. Now, turning to the facts of this case, one finds that early in Dec. 1914 the steamship F. A. Tamplin was requisitioned by the British Government for the Admiralty transport service, and was retained in that service until the 10th Feb. 1915, a period of some fourteen months. No question was raised before the arbitrator as to this requisition. At its date over two years of the period of hiring had elapsed. On this 10th Feb., about two years and nine months of that period remained unexpired. The ship was again requisitioned by the Government, and immediately after that date alterations were made in her to fit her for the transport of troops. She has been since retained in the service of the Admiralty, and it is said she has been restored to her former condition as a tank steamer. She may be retained in the same service while the present war lasts, and even after it has terminated. Nobody can possibly tell how long it will last. At the present moment about one year and eight months of the five years remain unexpired. Up to the present time the charterers have only had, during the two years from Dec. 1912 till Dec. 1914, what they contracted for and what they were only bound to pay for. They may never get any further use of her. The owners cannot deliver the ship into their possession and control and may not for years be in a position to do so. Neither of the parties are in default. In the month of March 1915 the owners refused to be longer bound by the charter-party. In my view there is here involved such a substantial invasion of that freedom of both parties to exercise the rights and discharge the obligations secured to and imposed on them by the charter, the continued existence of which must, I think, have necessarily been in their contemplation as to the foundation of this contract when they entered into it that, in the events which have happened, each of them is now entitled to treat it as at an end.

I have dealt with the case altogether apart from the question of the amount which the charterers have received as compensation for the use of the ship. The charterers have been treated by the Crown as if they had sublet the ship to the Admiralty. They have not, in fact, done so. What they have received they have got from the bounty of the Crown. They have no legal right to it. The receipt of it is, therefore, in my view, quite irrelevant. To consider it, it only obscures the legal point for decision. When the legal rights of the parties have been determined, the Crown will, no doubt, endeavour to do justice to the parties according to those rights. Judging from what has happened up to the hearing of this appeal, I am of opinion that the charter-party is now at an end and that the parties to it are released from all obligations under it. The appeal, under these circumstances, I think, succeeds.

Lord PARKER OF WADDINGTON.—In considering the question arising on this appeal, it is, I think, important to bear in mind the principle which really underlies all cases in which a contract has been held to determine upon the happening of some event which renders its performance impossible, or otherwise frustrates the objects which the parties to the contract have in view. This principle is one of contract law, depending on some term or condition to be implied in the contract itself and not on something entirely dehors the contract which brings the contract to an end. It is, of course, impossible to imply in a contract any term or condition inconsistent with its express provisions, or with the intention of the parties as gathered from those provisions. The first thing, therefore, in every case is to compare the term or condition which it sought to imply with the express provisions of the contract, and with the intention of the parties as gathered from those provisions, and ascertain whether there is any such inconsistency.

Again, in determining whether any such term or condition can be properly implied, the nature of the contract is of considerable materiality. If, for example, the contract be for the hire of a particular horse on a particular day, it would be easy to imply a condition that the horse should still be living on the day in question. If, however, the contract were for the hire of a horse generally, it would be difficult, if not impossible, to imply a term relieving the hirer from liability, if his only horse died before the day arrived.

Moreover, some conditions can be more readily implied than others. Speaking generally, it seems to me easier to imply a condition precedent defeating a contract before its execution has commenced than a condition subsequent defeating the contract when it is part performed. A contract under which A. is to have the use of B.'s horse for two days' hunting might well be defeated by the death of the horse before the two days commenced. It would be easy to imply a condition precedent to that effect. But the case would be very different if the horse died at the end of the first day, and it was sought to imply a condition subsequent relieving A. in that event of liability to pay the sum agreed for the hire.

The simplest cases of the application of the principle are, no doubt, those of contracts de certo corpore, as in Taylor v. Caldwell (3 B. & S., 826). Here there was an agreement by A. to allow B. the use of his music hall on certain specified days, and the music hall was burnt down before the first of those days arrived. A condition precedent could easily be implied. A similar case is that of Appleby v. Myers (16 L. T. Rep. 669; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 651). Here A. contracted to erect machinery in buildings belonging to B., and the buildings were burnt down before the work was finished. It was not difficult to imply a condition subsequent.

But the principle applies also to cases when the existence or continued existence of some specific thing is in no way involved, and in such cases its application is not so easy. It applies, for instance, to contracts of service which, from some causes not contemplated by the contract itself, have become impossible of fulfilment. A good instance of this may be found in the recent decision of your Lordships' House in Horlock v. Beal (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 250; 114 L. T. Rep. 193; (1916) 1 A. C. 486). It applies also to charter-parties where some commercial adventure contemplated by the parties, and in the fulfilment of which both are interested, is brought to an end by the happening of some event for which neither is to blame. The leading case on this branch of the law is Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Company (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 435; 31 L. T. Rep. 789; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 125). Here the ship was to proceed with all possible dispatch (dangers and accidents of navigation excepted) from Liverpool to Newport, and there load and carry to San Francisco a cargo of iron rails. The ship left Liverpool on the 2nd Jan., and on the 3rd Jan. ran aground in Carnarvon Bay, sustaining considerable damage. It would necessarily be many months before she could be got off and put in such repair as to be able to continue her voyage. In the commercial sense, therefore, the voyage contemplated in the charter-party had been brought to an end, and under these circumstances the contract was held to have determined. The voyage, if resumed when the ship had been got off and repaired, would have been a different voyage, "as different," to use Lord Bramwell's words, "as though it had been described as intended to be a spring voyage, while the one after the repairs would have been an autumn voyage." The season within which the adventure was to be carried out was, in fact, of importance to both parties to the bargain, and it was thus easy to imply a condition that if the voyage became impossible of completion within that season the contract should be at an end. The exception as to dangers of the sea and accidents of navigation no doubt showed that the parties were contemplating and providing for the case of some delay arising from these causes, but they were evidently not contemplating a delay so great that the spring voyage would become altogether impossible. The particular adventure being a voyage to be carried out within reasonable limits of time furnished a definite standard by which it could be determined whether the delay which actually occurred was or was not within the exception clause. There was, therefore, no inconsistency between the implied condition and the express provisions of the contract.

There is, so far as I can find, no case in which this principle has been applied to time charter-parties as distinguished from charter-parties which contemplate particular voyages. It was suggested in argument that Tully v. Howling (36 L. T. Rep. 163; 2 Q. B. Div. 182) was such a case. There the charter-party was a time charter-party for twelve months from the completion of the voyage on which the vessel was then engaged. After the completion of this voyage, and when the charterer was ready to load, the vessel was detained by the Board of Trade as unseaworthy. It took two months to make the vessel seaworthy, and meanwhile the charterer had repudiated the contract. It was held that he was justified in so doing on the ground that time was of the essence. There had been, in fact, a breach of the contract by the owners so material as to give the charterer a right to rescind. Only Brett, J. put the case as one of the frustration of a commercial adventure. Without laying it down that the principle can in no circumstances be applicable to time charter-parties, I am of opinion that its application is in such cases much more difficult than in the case of charter-parties which contemplate a definite voyage within certain limits of time. I concur in this respect with what is said by Bailhache, J. in Admiral Shipping Company v. Weidner and Co. (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 246; 114 L. T. Rep. 171; (1916) 1 K. B., at pp. 437-8). My reasons will appear when I come to consider the terms of the charter-party in the present case.

The contract in the present case is contained in the charter-party of the 18th May 1912, whereby the owners of the steamship F. A. Tamplin agreed to provide her with a full complement of officers, seamen, engineers, and firemen, and hold her at the disposition of the charterers for the voyages and other purposes therein mentioned for a period of sixty calendar months from the 4th Dec. 1912, subject, nevertheless, to the conditions therein specified. The charterers were to pay the owners monthly in advance for the first twelve calendar months 1750*l.*, and thereafter 1700*l.* per month by way of freight. By the seventeenth condition the freight was suspended in the event of loss of time by reason of deficiency in men or stores, or any defect or breakdown of machinery or damage or accident preventing the working of the vessel for more than twenty-four consecutive hours. By the nineteenth condition the payment of freight was to cease altogether in the event of the vessel being lost. By the twentieth condition the act of God, perils of the sea, fire, barratry of the master and crew, enemies, pirates and thieves, arrests or restraints of princes, rulers, or people, and strandings and other accidents of navigation were excepted even when occasioned by negligence, default, or error of the pilot, master mariners, or other servants of the owners.

As I read this contract, the parties are not contemplating the prosecution of any commercial adventure in which both are interested. They are not contemplating the performance of any definite adventure at all. The owners are not concerned in the charterers doing any specific thing beyond the payment of freight as it becomes due. They are only concerned that the charterers shall pay the freight and shall not use the ship contrary to the provisions of the charter-party. It would be to the interest of the owners that the charterers should not make any use of the ship at all. They would thus save the cost of repairs due to wear and tear. On the other hand, the charterers only stipulated that the vessel shall be at their disposal for certain defined purposes. If they so desire, they retain full liberty not to use the vessel for any purpose whatever. Further, the contract contemplates that though the charterers desire to use the vessel, it may for intermittent periods of indefinite duration be impossible for them so to do. In such cases there are express provisions differing according to the particular circumstances from which such impossibility arises. In cases within condition 17 there is a suspension of freight only. In cases within condition 20, and not within condition 17, the payment of freight continues, and the owners incur no liability. Thus if the ship cannot put to sea because of deficiency of seamen, freight will be suspended. If, however, the vessel cannot put to sea because of an embargo, the freight continues to be payable, nor are the owners liable in damages. It makes no difference at what period during the term of the charter the deficiency of seamen or embargo occurs. Whether it occurs within the first or last six months of the term the result is to be the same.

I entertain no doubt that the requisitioning of the steamship by His Majesty's Government in the present case is a "restraint of princes" within the twentieth condition. The parties therefore have expressly contracted that during the period during which by reason of such restraint the owners are unable to keep the ship at the disposition of the charterers, the freight is to continue payable, and the owners are to be free from liability. This period may be long or short. It may be certain or indefinite. It may occur towards the beginning or towards the end of the term of the charter-party. The result is to be the same, unless indeed the circumstances are such that the ship can be said to be lost within the meaning of condition 19. Moreover (and this seems to me the vital point), the charter-party does not contemplate any definite adventure or object to be performed or carried out within reasonable limits of time, so as to justify a distinction being drawn between delays which may render such adventure or object impossible and delays which may not.

Under these circumstances it appears to me to be difficult, if not impossible, to frame any condition by virtue of which the contract of the parties is at an end, without contradicting the express provisions of the contract, and defeating the intention of the parties as disclosed by these provisions. The nearest I can get is a proviso to the twentieth condition conceived as follows: "Provided that if the period during which the ship cannot be held at the disposition of the charterers by reason of any of the matters referred to in this condition, though indefinite, be such as will in all reasonable probability extend beyond the term of the charter-party, the contract between the parties shall be determined." But, in my opinion, even this would contradict the express term of contract. It could, for example, except from its provisions cases in which the ship ran aground so near the end of the term of the charter-party that it would be impossible to get her off or ready to put to sea once more within such term. This would, in my opinion, be contrary to the provisions of condition 20. Further, even if it were permissible to imply such a proviso to the twentieth condition, there is, in my opinion, no reason for holding that the Government will, in all reasonable probability, retain the vessel for the remainder of the term of the charter-party. Whether they will do so or not seems to me to depend on all sorts of circumstances as to which a court of justice cannot speculate. They may do so or they may not. I do not think that one event is more likely than the other.

Having regard to the difficulty of framing any conditions which can be implied without contradicting the express terms of the contract, having regard to the nature of the contract, which is a time charter only and does not contemplate any commercial adventure in which both parties are interested, or indeed any definite commercial adventure at all—and finally, having regard to the fact that the condition which is sought to be implied is a condition defeating a contract already part performed and not a condition precedent to a contract which remains purely executory—I have come to the conclusion that the decision of the Court of Appeal was right and ought not to be disturbed.

I desire to add this. I cannot help thinking that the question really at issue has been somewhat obscured by the fact that the Government has under the terms of the Royal Proclamation of the 3rd Aug. 1914 to pay compensation to "the owners," to be settled in case of difference by arbitration. Owners must in this proclamation include all parties interested. It cannot, in the present case, mean the owners exclusive of the charterers or the charterers exclusive of the owners. Both are entitled to compensation, and if such compensation be not agreed with either separately, but with both together, the amount so agreed will be divisible between them according to their respective rights and interests. The case was argued before your Lordships on the footing that it would determine which of two possible claimants was to be held entitled to all which might be payable by the Government by way of compensation under the proclamation. I entirely dissent from this view.

The appeal should, in my opinion, be dismissed with costs.

FOWLES v. EASTERN AND AUSTRALIAN STEAMSHIP COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF QUEENSLAND.

Queensland—Compulsory pilotage—Negligence of pilot—Government not liable.

Under the statutes of Queensland relating to navigation and pilotage, a duty is imposed upon the Government of that State to license and appoint duly qualified pilots.

A firm of shipowners claimed damages from the defendant as the nominal representative of the Government of Queensland for the stranding of their vessel while compulsorily in charge of a duly licensed and appointed pilot, by whose negligence the stranding was caused.

Held, that the defendant was entitled to judgment as the statutes imposed no duty upon the Government to pilot the plaintiffs' ship, and it was not liable for the negligence of such a pilot, who was not alleged to have been improperly licensed.

The duty of the Government is merely to provide qualified pilots.

Decision of the Full Court of the Supreme Court of Queensland reversed.

APPEALS by the Government of Queensland, represented by Mr. William Lambert Fowles, in accordance with a statutory provision for that purpose, against orders of the Supreme Court of Queensland upon a special case stated which affirmed a judgment of Chubb, J.

The question was whether the Government of Queensland was liable in respect of the alleged negligence of licensed and qualified pilots appointed pursuant to the statutes in force in the colony. The respondents brought their actions claiming damages from the Government for the stranding of their vessel, the steamship Eastern, in the port of Brisbane owing to the alleged negligence of and whilst compulsorily in charge of a duly licensed and qualified pilot named Maxwell on the 22nd Jan. 1911.

A similar claim was made by the same plaintiffs in the case of the same ship, which had previously stranded in the port of Rockhampton on the 6th Aug. 1910, while in charge of a duly licensed and qualified assistant pilot named Dunmall.

The question of liability was tried before Chubb, J., who decided in favour of the plaintiffs, and his decision was affirmed by a judgment of the Full Court, but leave to appeal was given.

The two appeals were taken together.

ship company sues the Government of Queensland (represented by Mr. Fowles as nominal defendant under statutory provisions for that purpose) to recover damages in respect of a vessel named the Eastern, belonging to the company, which was stranded in the port of Brisbane. It is to be taken that the damage was caused by the negligence of one Maxwell, a pilot duly licensed and qualified for the port pursuant to the statutes there in force, and the pilotage was compulsory. The only question is whether the Government are liable for this negligence.

Chubb, J. held the Government liable, and his order was affirmed by the Supreme Court of Queensland, from which this appeal directly comes. But the board has also the advantage of judgments in the High Court of Australia, delivered at an earlier stage of the case. In both courts the whole of the law was very carefully considered. Isaacs, J. expressed an opinion that the Government were not liable, but the balance of opinion was decided in favour of the plaintiff company. It is therefore undoubtedly a difficult case.

It will be convenient to begin by considering the actual relations between the plaintiffs and the defendants, as created by law. The plaintiffs claim damages for breach of a duty owing to them. What was that duty? There was no contract between these parties. The duty, whatever it may have been, must be one that depends upon the statute. It is not, of course, necessary that the statute should contain an express statement of the duty, but it is necessary that the obligation should result from these enactments. Coming closer to the present case, the plaintiffs say that their ship was stranded owing to the negligence of a pilot named Maxwell. In order to succeed, they must show that the law imposed upon the defendants the conduct and management of that particular ship by that particular pilot; and this they seek to do by reasoning which would make the Government liable for the conduct and management of all ships compelled to accept the pilotage of pilots in the same position as Maxwell. There is nothing inherently unreasonable in such a contention, but its weight depends upon the extent and nature of the duty which the Government owe to the shipowner. It is very necessary, for this reason, to look into the true position of Maxwell and other pilots, because that may help in answering the true question—namely, whether or not the Government had laid upon them the conduct and management of the ship. If so, then they were bound to use proper care and skill and are liable for failure to do so.

In examining the statutes it is well to bear in mind the condition of things in regard to pilots before Parliament interposed. Originally the business was simply a matter of private enterprise; seamen of local experience made their own bargains with masters of ships. Barton, J. traces the sequel in his judgment. A licence was required in the interests of public safety, then pilotage fees were turned by statute into pilotage rates, no doubt for public reasons, but still the rates were paid to the men for their private emolument. Then the Treasury took the rates and empowered the Government to fix the remuneration of pilots. "The statutes also provided for constitution of a Marine Board acting in the execution of its powers and functions under the control of the Crown. The same statutes regulated the pilots in their duties after the manner of public servants and provided for a pilotage service, and, indeed, as was admitted, the Government supplied the port pilots with the instruments of their calling in the shape of boats maintained and crews paid, at Government cost, while the admissions and the regulations show that, on the other hand, the coast pilots were allowed to receive fees for themselves, and had to find their own boats and crews. The port pilots were made regular officers of the Government service, paid from the public funds, though the department called the Marine Board managed the pilot service under the immediate control of the Government. The port pilots were classified under the public service laws, according to salary, as professional servants of the Government." To this it may be added that pilotage in prescribed ports was made compulsory.

The language thus used by the learned judge is general in its terms, and was not of course intended to extend the words of the statutes, which lay down the functions of the board and the nature of Governmental control, but it presents the general result in a way from which their Lordships are not at all disposed to differ. They also entirely agree with the way in which Barton, J. puts, a little earlier in his judgment, the resulting question, "Was it the duty (of the Government) to undertake with due care and skill the pilotage of such vessels, or was it only a duty to supply qualified pilots to those who were bound to accept the services of such officers?" The learned judge comes to the former conclusion, though expressing the same difficulty which their Lordships also feel, and which, in their case, is enhanced by the adverse authority, not only of himself and the majority of his colleagues, but also of the Supreme Court of Queensland.

Nevertheless, their Lordships have been constrained to the conclusion that no greater obligation is laid on the defendants than that of providing qualified pilots. The fact that pilotage is compulsory cannot affect them. It is not they but the law that makes it so. The fact that, through the Marine Board, they license pilots cannot affect them. That has been repeatedly laid down and is not questioned. Yet, though the argument is placed on other grounds, the real thought behind the argument, which makes it forcible, is that if you compel a master to place his ship in the hands of someone else whom you designate without consulting him you ought to make good any loss arising from his negligence. There is an appearance of natural equity in this view, and, perhaps, more than an appearance; but it is clearly established that this will not suffice, and, were it relevant, ample considerations might be adduced in support of the view which has prevailed. If, then, the defendants are to be made liable, it must be on the ground that they charge pilotage rates, which go into the Treasury, that they pay salaries to the pilots, whom they choose, dismiss, or reprimand, and that they class them in the Civil Service and supply them with boats, implements, and crews; also that they make regulations which control them, but not regulations interfering with their conduct and management of ships.

Now if the crucial question here were whether or not Maxwell was in the service of the defendants, as might arise in an action of wrongful dismissal, this class of evidence would be very cogent to show that he was in their service. It is the kind of evidence common in such cases. But if the question be, as their Lordships think it is, whether or not the defendants were bound to navigate this ship and employed Maxwell to do for them the work which they were bound to do, then it is not conclusive to say that he was in their service unless it can also be said that the Government were "the principals in the piloting of ships," to borrow the happy phrase of Mr. Justice Isaacs. That phrase seems to hit the point exactly. If Maxwell himself was the principal in the piloting of ships, then the defendants cannot be liable. It was he and not they that owed the duty of careful piloting to the plaintiffs.

In their Lordships' opinion these Acts of Parliament did not alter the original status of a pilot, which is, in effect, that he must be regarded as an independent professional man in discharging his skilled duties. If it had been intended to alter this old and familiar status, it is to be supposed that the Legislature would have done it more explicitly. What it has done is more consistent with a different and limited purpose—namely, to secure a proper selection, a proper supply, a proper supervision, and a proper remuneration of men to whose skill life and property is committed, whether the shipowner likes it or not. For this purpose they become servants of the Government. For the purpose of navigating ships, they remain what they were, and the duty which the State or Government owes to a shipowner, exercised, it is true, by various authorities, is to provide a qualified man in the terms of the statutes, but not to take the conduct or management of the ship. It is not said that they have failed in this duty of providing a qualified man.

Taking this view of the statutes themselves, their Lordships do not think it is necessary to review the authorities, which were exhaustively considered, both in the High Court of Australia and the Supreme Court of Queensland. They will only say that, if they had thought the Government were directed to carry on the business of pilotage, they would have held them responsible for negligence in that business, as in the case of Brabant and Co. v. King (72 L. T. Rep. 785; (1895) A. C. 632), where the relation of bailor and bailee for hire was established.

Their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal should be allowed, and judgment entered for the appellant with costs throughout. The respondents must pay the costs of the appeal.

The facts of the Rockhampton case are similar, and their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal should also be allowed, and judgment entered for the appellant with costs throughout.

The respondents must pay the costs of the appeal.

THE HAKAN. (a)

Prize Court—Neutral vessel—Carriage of contraband—Liability to confiscation of vessel and cargo — Old rule — Relaxation — Practice of maritime States—Art. 40 of Declaration of London — Adoption of article by Order in Council—Validity—Rule of international law as to contraband since 1908.

Although there is no formal instrument binding as an international convention, the attitude and the action of the more important maritime States before and since the holding of the International Naval Conference at London in 1908-9 have resulted in the establishment of a rule of international law that neutral vessels carrying to an enemy port contraband which by value, weight, volume, or freight value forms more than one-half of the cargo are subject to confiscation and to condemnation.

THIS was a case in which the Crown claimed the condemnation of the Hakan and its cargo, the latter being alleged to be contraband of war.

The Hakan was a Swedish vessel, and on the 8th Jan. 1916 she was chartered to a firm of German fish dealers, Messrs. Franz Witte and Co., carrying on business at Altona, Stettin, and Hamburg, for six weeks, "information to be given to the charterers at Gothenburg or Stettin at their option." The vessel left Haugesund in Norway for Lübeck early in April 1916, but was captured almost immediately by a British cruiser in the North Sea and sent to Kirkwall. The cargo consisted largely of salted herrings, which were conditional contraband. The shipowners contested the claim of the Crown. There was no appearance on the part of the cargo owners.

The whole of the arguments in the case were directed to the question of the liability of a neutral vessel carrying contraband to confiscation according to modern international law. These are fully set out in the judgment of the President.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 3.—The PRESIDENT.—The claim of the shipowners for the release of this captured vessel, the Hakan, is founded upon a proposition that it is a well-established rule of the law of nations that neutral vessels carrying contraband of war are free from capture, subject to certain exceptions in cases where the owners of the vessels are also the owners of the contraband, or where they attempt to defraud a belligerent of his belligerent rights to capture the contraband by concealment of its destination, by departure from the voyage, or by false papers, or by other similar methods. Following upon this, it is contended that the provisions adopted by the Order in Council from art. 40 of the Declaration of London offended against the rule; and that effect should not be given to them by this court. Those provisions are as follows: "A vessel carrying contraband may be condemned if the contraband, reckoned either by value, weight, volume, or freight, forms more than half the cargo."

In the present case the whole cargo carried by the vessel was conditional contraband. The ship was a Swedish vessel, belonging to a Swedish company. Her gross tonnage was 484 tons, and her net tonnage was 271 tons. At the time of her capture she was under a time charter (namely, six weeks, with powers of extension for four months) to Messrs. Franz Witte and Co., well-known German fish dealers, carrying on business at Altona and Stettin, as well as at Gothenburg. The agreed hire to be paid by the charterers was 520 kr. per day. The charter-party and the bills of lading are in evidence, and can be referred to. The cargo consisted of 3238 barrels of salted herrings, consigned from Haugesund, in Norway, to Lübeck. Lübeck is a German base of supply. It is also a port which has been used on a very extensive scale since the war began for the importation of goods from Scandinavia into Germany. Moreover, orders have been made by the German Federal Council regulating the import of salted herrings into the German Empire, whereby they must all be delivered to the Central Purchasing Company Limited, of Berlin, a company acting under the directions of the German Imperial Chancellor. No appearance or claim was entered or made by any of the named consignors or consignees of the cargo or by the charterers, who, of course, knew its destination. There is no doubt of its contraband character, nor of its destination for the enemy Government or its forces.

The shipowners, although not expressly admitting this, did not contend that in the circumstances it was not confiscable contraband. Their whole case was argued upon the basis that it was. The shipowners' claim, therefore, raises in a precise form the question of the soundness of their legal proposition. Is there, at the present day, according to the law of nations, a well-established rule in favour of a contraband-carrying vessel to the effect stated? There is no doubt that the law to be administered in this court is the law of nations (or international law, as it is often called) and not our municipal law. As was recently stated by the Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, it is "a law which is not laid down by any particular State, but originates in the practice and usage long observed by civilised nations in their relations towards each other, or in express international agreement": (The Zamora, 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 144; 114 L. T. Rep. 626; (1916) 2 A. C. 77). It has naturally fallen in course of time within general principles—easily understood although not always capable of precise definition—which have been approved of as equitable by jurists and judges, and acted upon in practice by States. From its nature it is subject to modifications as time rolls on, and the world's international conditions change; but its development should be along the lines of the same equitable principles as between nations.

The law as to contraband goods illustrates these developments as well as any of the subjects with which it deals. It is not necessary to elaborate this theme. But it is essential in considering the law of contraband, in its relation both to ships and goods, to bear in mind that the principle upon which it is founded is that it must be allowed to belligerents to use their maritime powers to interfere to some extent, and, indeed, as has been established, to a considerable extent, with the commerce of neutral countries in order to prevent goods being conveyed to the enemy, which might enable or might help the enemy to carry on or to prolong a war with success. If a belligerent has a right by means of capture and subsequent condemnation to prevent contraband goods from reaching the enemy and to have them confiscated, it would appear to be not unfair or unreasonable that the belligerent should also have rights of a like kind against the vessel in which the goods are being carried. The goods could not reach the enemy without the help of the vessel. The transaction in the ordinary course involves the conjoint operation of the owner of the goods and the owner of the vessel. The one trader is selling his goods for profit; the other trader is letting his vessel on hire for profit to transport them. Why should one of these two classes of traders in case of capture lose his property, and the other have it preserved? It may be urged that this comparison of the position imports to the shipowner actual knowledge of the character of the goods carried on his vessel. But this is not necessarily the case. If a shipowner allows his vessel to be chartered or to be used in such a way that contraband goods may be laden upon it for transport to an enemy, whether he is aware of the use to which his vessel is being put or not, it does not appear to be inequitable that he should suffer from the results of such a use of his vessel as would enure to the enemy's benefit. This element of the knowledge of the shipowner has entered into the discussions upon the question of his ship being involved in liability, and it will be considered hereafter in the general aspect of the law, and also in reference to the facts of this particular case.

The ancient practice in this country, before the Napoleonic wars—apart from special treaties—was that neutral vessels carrying contraband goods were subject to capture and condemnation, as were the goods themselves. Upon general principles, such a practice seems to me to be consistent with equitable rights as between belligerents and neutral traders. In the case of The Neutralitet (Roscoe's English Prize Cases, vol. 1, 309; 3 Ch. Rob. 295) Sir William Scott said that "it cannot be denied that it was perfectly defensible on every principle of justice. If to supply the enemy with such (i.e., contraband) articles is a noxious act with respect to the owner of the cargo, the vehicle which is instrumental in effecting that illegal purpose cannot be innocent." The confiscation of the ship had been justified by Bynkershoek and other jurists of authority. It is true, however, that by the time of Lord Stowell a relaxation of the practice was introduced, whereby the ship was regarded as non-confiscable, except in certain cases of the character already mentioned. But it is to be noted that if the owner of any part of the contraband cargo was also the owner of the ship, or any share in it, the ship, or his share, was still held to be subject to confiscation: (see The Jonge Tobias, Roscoe, vol. 1, 146; 1 Ch. Rob. 329). It is difficult to ascertain precisely the reasons for the relaxation made in those times. It was probably due partly to the policy of this country in relation to neutral commerce, and to the frequency of treaties dealing with the subject. The legal ground for its introduction, however, was "the supposition that freights of noxious or doubtful articles might be taken without the personal knowledge of the owner": (see per Sir William Scott in The Neutralitet, ubi sup.).

On reference to the practice of other nations it will be found that at this very period the French Règlement of the 26th July 1778 was in force. Under the Règlement the ship was declared subject to confiscation if three-fourths in value of the cargo consisted of contraband goods. It is true that this was regarded by some authorities as merely part of the municipal law; but by others (including Ortolan) as applicable between States, unless, of course, treaties contained different provisions, as, for example, the treaty of Sept. 1800, made for a period of eight years between France and the United States. Its provisions were maintained by the French instructions of the 31st March 1854, and those of the 25th July 1870: (see Bonfils' Manuel de Droit International Public, 7th edit., par. 1578) Indeed, the Règlement remained in force ever since, at any rate until 1914, when the Government of France adopted the provisions of art. 40 of the Declaration of London.

During the Crimean War the question relating to vessels does not appear to have come up for decision in any Court of Prize. But not only did France adhere to the Règlement referred to during that war, but Russia also, by a Declaration issued on the 19th April 1854, pronounced that neutral vessels carrying contraband would be stopped by her cruisers and declared lawful prizes of war in conformity with the declaration of the 27th Nov. 1853: (see the London Gazette, May 2, 1854, p. 1364).

The matter was dealt with during the American Civil War in The Bermuda (3 Wall. 514). The relaxation of the time of Lord Stowell was referred to in that case as follows: "This has been called an indulgent rule, and so it is. It is a great, but very popular, relaxation of the ancient rule which condemned the vessel carrying contraband as well as the cargo." Then comes the following passage: "But it is founded on the presumption that the contraband shipment was made without the consent of the owner given in fraud of belligerent rights, or, at least, without intent on his part to take hostile part against the country of the captors; and it must be recognised and enforced in all cases where that presumption is not repelled by proof": (p. 555).

The "presumption" seems to refer to the knowledge of the shipowner of the nature of the cargo. It is not easy to understand the meaning of the phrase "intent to take hostile part." If the shipowner had knowledge of the contraband character of the goods, it would appear to follow that in allowing their shipment he had the "intent" to help the enemy. However this may be, the so-called indulgent rule which primâ facie permitted the ship to escape confiscation was clearly regarded by the United States Court as subject to qualification by reason either of the knowledge or the intention of the shipowner as to the enemy destination of the contraband cargo. The attitude of the United States upon this question in later times will be pointed out hereafter in the appropriate period, as exemplified and defined in their Naval War Code promulgated in 1900 (amended in a few particulars in 1903), which was commended by the United States to the International Naval Conference of London in 1908.

In Europe, about the same time as the American Civil War was proceeding, Prussia, Denmark, and Austria promulgated prize regulations (in the early part of 1864) whereby ships carrying contraband goods were declared subject to confiscation, if the whole cargo consisted of contraband. Later, in the war of 1866, Austria went further and declared ships to be lawful prizes which carried contraband bearing a proportion of contraband which was considerable in reference to the whole cargo: (see Kleen, De la Contrebande de Guerre, p. 210 (n).) Italy, according to art. 215 of her Mercantile Marine Code, admitted the confiscability of the ship and contraband goods laden in her, but freed the innocent goods; and this rule was applied by her during the war of 1866: (see Bonfils, 7th edit, par. 1578). Reference has been made to the reiteration by France in 1870 of the three-fourths rule. In the development of the history of the subject, the next important stage is reached in the theories and practices of the Empires of Russia and Japan before, and in the course of, the Russo-Japanese War. These two Powers waged war on sea, as well as on land. Their rules and practices in naval warfare are, therefore, of importance in ascertaining the Law of Nations at a period when the conditions of neutral and international trade carried over the seas were, to all intents and purposes, the same as those of the present day. The decisions of their respective Prize Courts in cases arising out of that war must also have a close bearing upon the rules of International Law, regarded by these two States as governing the liability of ships carrying contraband.

The Russian prize regulations were decreed on the 27th March 1895, nine years before the outbreak of war between Russia and Japan. By these regulations merchant vessels of neutral nationality were declared liable to confiscation as prizes if found conveying to the enemy or to an enemy port certain contraband articles and substances for firearms or explosives, whatever the amount of such might be; and other articles of contraband of war amounting in bulk or weight to more than half the entire cargo, provided that it was not proved that the masters of the vessels concerned were unaware of the declaration of war: (Regulations 11 (1).

After the declaration of war no other knowledge either on the part of the owners or masters was required to be proved or to exist. These provisions were applied in the cases of British, German, and Danish vessels, with the effect that vessels were condemned where the contraband carried was more than half the cargo and released where it was less: (see The Arabia, Russian and Japanese Prize Cases, vol. 1, p. 42; The Knight Commander, ibid., p. 54; The Calchas, ibid., p. 118; The St. Kilda, ibid., p. 188; and The Prinsesse Marie, ibid., p. 276). British ships were condemned on this ground, and no protest against the condemnation was made by the British Government to the Russian Government.

The Japanese regulations as to capture at sea are not so precise. They were issued after the war with Russia had begun. They came into force on the 15th March 1904. They provided that ships carrying contraband of war were liable to capture without regard to their nationality, and that the fact that a master was ignorant that contraband articles were on board could not be held to be a reason for exemption from capture: (arts. 37 and 38). They also provided that the ship should be condemned if the owner of the ship and of the contraband articles were one and the same person: (art. 43). But they contained a general rule which prescribed that with regard to matters which were not determined by law, treaty, or the Japanese regulations, the principles of international law should be followed: (art. 10). If the cases decided by the Japanese Prize Courts are examined, it will be seen that the principle of international law most often applied was the one which may be formulated from the statement of the reasons of the court in various cases, thus: International law recognises the liability to condemnation of a vessel the object of whose voyage is the carriage of contraband of war; and this rule is in accordance with what is just and reasonable, and with correct and fundamental principles.

As to the determination of what was "the object of the voyage" the Japanese Higher Prize Court held that if the greater part of the cargo was contraband, it must be concluded that the "object of the voyage" was the carriage of contraband. Applying this test and the rule referred to, the Japanese courts condemned as prizes ships of various nationalities, British, British Colonial (chartered by Americans), German, and Norwegian: (see The Roseley, Russian and Japanese Prize Cases, vol. 2, p. 228; The Aphrodite, ibid., p. 240; The Scotsman, ibid., p. 256; The Bawtry, ibid., p. 265; The M.S. Dollar, ibid., p. 284; The Wyefield, ibid., p. 291; The Paros, ibid., p. 301; The Henry Bolckow, ibid., p. 331; The Lydia, ibid., p. 359; and The Antiope, ibid., p. 389).

The next important phase in the history of the question was the attitude of the various Powers which took part in the International Naval Conference held in London in 1908-1909. Before the conference was held, and in order to provide a basis for its discussion, the various Governments were invited by the British Foreign Secretary to "interchange memoranda setting out concisely what they regard as the correct rule of international law" on each of the heads enumerated, among which was the following: "Contraband, including the circumstances under which particular articles can be considered as contraband, the penalties for their carriage, &c."

It will be noted that the Powers were thus asked to state what they regarded as the correct rule of international law at the time on the subject of the confiscability of neutral vessels carrying contraband, and not what changes they desired to effect. It therefore seems material to have regard to the views then expressed by the various States called into international consultation in considering the question whether there was any, and, if so what, well-established rule on the subject according to the Law of Nations. The statements for the various countries will be taken in the order in which they appear in the proceedings. Concisely summarised they are as follows:—

Germany.—The ship carrying contraband of war is subject to confiscation, if the owner, or the charterer of the whole ship, or the master, knew, or ought to have known, that there was contraband on board, and if that contraband forms more than a quarter of the cargo, either by value, weight, or volume.

The United States of America.—For the views of the Republic, the Department of State referred to its Naval War Code of 1900, as amended in a few particulars in 1903. The Naval Code of 1900 was prepared for the guidance and use of the naval service of the United States by Charles H. Stockton (Captain and afterwards Rear-Admiral of the United States Navy and President of the George Washington University), under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, and was approved by the President of the United States, and published "for the use of the navy, and for the information of all concerned." Rear-Admiral Stockton was a Delegate Plenipotentiary of the United States at the London Naval Conference. According to the code, a neutral vessel carrying the goods of an enemy is, with her cargo, exempt from capture except when carrying contraband of war, or endeavouring to force a blockade, or guilty of having rendered hostile assistance to the enemy. And, further, vessels, whether neutral or otherwise, carrying contraband of war destined for the enemy, are liable to seizure and detention, unless treaty stipulations otherwise provide.

Austria-Hungary.—The memorandum did not state what was regarded as the international law on the subject. It contained observations as to the desirability of making certain changes in the law. (The regulations and practice of Austria in 1864 and during the war of 1866 have already been adverted to.)

Spain.—This memorandum also omits a statement of what Spain regarded as the law; but it contained the suggestion that between the system which allows the confiscation of ships carrying some contraband, whatever the quantity, and that which only entails that result in cases of resistance or fraud, it might be possible to provide an intermediate rule to the effect that if the shipmaster and shipowner knew or could have known that the ship carried contraband, the ship should be responsible to the captor in a ransom or confiscation equal to three times the value of the contraband and five times that of the total freight, and, in default of freight, the captor should only have recourse in execution against the ship, and while she remained in his hands.

France.—Neutral vessels, and the whole of their cargo—contraband or otherwise—are confiscable if the contraband cargo forms three-quarters in value of the whole cargo. (This is according to the rule of 1778 above referred to, and the French rules and practice ever since.)

Great Britain.—Any interest in the ship carrying the contraband which belongs to the owner of the contraband is subject to condemnation.

The ship is also subject to condemnation in case of forcible resistance, or of the carrying of false or simulated papers, or of other circumstances amounting to fraud.

Italy.—Neutral ships with cargo finally destined for the enemy country, which consists in whole or in part of contraband of war, are subject to capture, and the ships and contraband goods will be confiscated; but only when it appears that the owner was not aware that his vessel was intended to be used for the carrying of contraband.

Japan.—Ships carrying contraband of war and their cargoes belonging to the shipowner are subject to confiscation if fraudulent means are used for the carriage of the contraband; also when the carriage of contraband goods is the principal object of the ship's voyage—and also when the contraband goods belong to the shipowner. But a ship having contraband goods on board is not on that ground alone subject to capture if the master had no knowledge actual or presumed of the outbreak of hostilities.

Holland.—A ship carrying contraband is subject to confiscation if an important part of the cargo consists of contraband, unless it appears that the master or the charterer could not have known the real nature of the cargo; or if the master resists the arrest, visit, or capture of the vessel.

Russia.—Neutral vessels are subject to confiscation when they carry contraband of war forming by volume, weight, or value more than a quarter of the whole cargo; or when they carry contraband goods in lesser quantity, if their presence on board by their nature or quality could obviously be known to the master; and ships carrying contraband goods less than a quarter of the cargo are liable to make compensation to the extent of five times the value of the contraband part of the cargo.

Such were the views put forward by the various High Powers before the holding of the conference. The result of the deliberations of their representatives at the conference upon this question was the adoption of the rule in art. 40 of the Declaration of London that the vessel is subject to condemnation if the contraband reckoned either by value, weight, volume, or freight, forms more than half the cargo. It is not unimportant to note that this was adopted unanimously.

There was no ratification of the Declaration of London as a whole by this country; nor, so far as I am aware, by any other of the States represented. But by Orders in Council the provisions of art. 40 were adopted by the Crown. They have also been adopted by our allies, France, Russia, Italy, and Japan. Russia's Prize Regulations decreed in 1895 were the same, except that value or freight have now been added as tests of confiscability. Germany, shortly after the conference, incorporated art. 40 in her Prize Code of the 30th Sept. 1909—and it still forms part of the German Prize Law. It has also been acted upon in decisions of the German Prize Court. Austria-Hungary also included it in her Navy Regulations in May 1913, which had the following introduction: "By agreement between the commercial and maritime countries most concerned, including the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, a large number of questions with regard to international law on maritime war have been regulated. The provisions of international law on war, in so far as such have been fixed by agreements, are hereby published, so that they may be observed in the event of war." As to America, the rule formulated in art. 40 is assumed to be the present law in the last work of Mr. Charles H. Stockton on International Law (published at the end of Oct. 1914), whose position I have already described. Of it he wrote in the report of the American delegation to the Secretary of State that "much relief is afforded to neutrals in respect to the penalty of carrying contraband. In the first place, the ship is not subject to confiscation unless more than half the cargo is contraband, to be determined either by weight, volume, value, or freight value": (p. 437).

What has been stated shows the attitude of the chief maritime Powers to what was unanimously agreed by their representatives at the Conference of London. Sweden was not then represented, and I do not know whether any step has since been taken by Sweden in respect of the liability of neutral ships. But one thing is clear, and that is that Sweden and her shipowners and merchants had abundant notice of what the belligerents had declared they would do in such cases. It is certain that no Swedish shipowner indulging himself in the warm prospect of abundant profit, or anyone else engaged in the cold contemplation of unprofitable theory, ever thought that if a Swedish ship was captured by a British cruiser while carrying a full cargo of contraband to Germany she would be immune from condemnation; while, if she was carrying something over half her cargo (in weight, volume, value, or freight) to the United Kingdom she would, if captured by a German war-vessel, be subject to condemnation. In the interest of neutrality such a temptation to neutrals to serve one belligerent with contraband goods to the exclusion of the other ought to be removed if it can be done consistently with fair principles and with the rules of international law.

In the light of what has been set out the case has to be considered from two or perhaps three points of view. First, apart from any resolutions or articles of the London Conference, what was the rule of the law of nations affecting a vessel which in the circumstances of this case was carrying a cargo consisting wholly of contraband destined for the enemy? Secondly, was the order in council adopting art. 40 of the Declaration of London so contrary to such a rule that the order was invalid; or was it sufficiently consistent with such a rule, or did it so mitigate the rule in favour of the enemy that it acquired validity, in accordance with the doctrine stated by the Privy Council in The Zamora (ubi sup.)? Or, thirdly, did the acts of the representatives of the various Powers at the conference and the subsequent action and practice of their States bring into existence, by a sufficiently general consensus of view and assent, a new or modified rule of the law of nations upon the subject, to which effect ought to be given in their Prize Courts at the present day, apart from any Order in Council?

As to the first, having regard to the decrees and practices of the nations for the last hundred years I should feel bound to declare that the old rule which prevailed before the relaxation introduced a century or more ago should be regarded as valid at the present day. This means that the so-called well-established rule in favour of a contraband laden ship contended for by the claimants does not exist. In the days of the relaxation referred to the ship was subject to confiscation in many respects, which were sometimes called exceptions. It has always been held that if any part of the contraband carried belonged to the owner of the ship the ship itself was subject to the penalty of confiscation as was the contraband. According to our most recent writers the vessel suffered if her owner was privy to the carriage of the contraband goods, whether they belonged to him or not: (see Westlake, p. 291; Hall, p. 666).

In the present day even more than in the past the owner must be taken to know either directly or through the master how his vessel is laden, or to what use she is being put. In the days of Lord Stowell it was made clear that the master was bound in time of war to know what his cargo consisted of; for to hold otherwise would be to excuse real or feigned ignorance and so admit without penalty the carrying of contraband: (cf. The Oster Risoer, Roscoe, vol. 1, 382; 4 Ch. Rob. 199; and The Richmond, 5 Ch. Rob. 325).

This leads me to advert to the special facts of the present case upon the question of the knowledge of the shipowners. The vessel was chartered, as stated, for a short time to German merchants. The value of the vessel was not given; it might be estimated from her tonnage. But from the charter-party it appears that the vessel was hired at a rate per annum equal to nearly double the sum at which she had to be insured under the charter-party. She was therefore hired at a sum which represented close upon 200 per cent. per annum of her capital or insurable value. She was not an ocean-going vessel. Can there be any doubt that her owners knew she was going to be engaged in the contraband trade between Scandinavia and Lübeck or some German Baltic port?

No evidence was given for the owners that they had no knowledge of the purposes for which she was hired. Indeed, no suggestion was made that they did not know how she was to be employed. I should have no hesitation in drawing the inference that they did know. Moreover, if owners in times of war, and in waters favourable to contraband trading, enter into time charter contracts, it would be placing premiums upon contraband trading to allow the owners to protect themselves by relying on charter-parties, and sheltering themselves behind a screen of ignorance of their own deliberate construction. The vessel's immunity, or penal responsibility, ought not to depend upon such arrangements.

Apart, therefore, from any Order in Council adopting the half-cargo rule of art. 40 of the Declaration of London, I should pronounce judgment for the condemnation of the vessel as prize.

Secondly, it follows from what I have stated, that the provisions of art. 40 were a limitation or mitigation of some of the rights of the Crown; and the result of The Zamora (ubi sup.) decision is that accordingly the provisions in the Order in Council are valid.

Thirdly, although there is no formal instrument binding as an international convention, I think that the attitude and the action of the most important maritime States before and since 1908 have been such as to justify the court in accepting as forming part of the law of nations at the present date a rule that neutral vessels carrying contraband which by value, weight, volume, or freight value forms more than half the cargo are subject to confiscation and to condemnation as good and lawful prizes of war.

The judgment of the court is that the Hakan and her cargo are condemned as good and lawful prize, and that they be sold by the marshal of the court.

As the question of law raised in this particular case was new in one sense, and also an important one, I shall make no order as to costs.

There will be leave to appeal on security for costs of the appeal being given to the extent of 350*l*.

THE PANARIELLOS. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (IN PRIZE), ENGLAND.

Prize Court—Trading with the enemy—Goods of ally—Consignment to enemy—Contract of sale at date prior to outbreak of war—Neutral vessel — Dispatch from neutral port after date of outbreak of hostilities—Liability to seizure and condemnation—General principles to be applied —Obligations as to trading binding confederate States.

On the outbreak of a war in which a belligerent has allies, the citizens of each of the allied States are under the same obligations to each other allied State as its own subjects would be to a single belligerent State with relation to intercourse with the enemy.

Prior to the outbreak of war between Great Britain and her allies and Germany and Austria, a French company contracted to sell certain goods to a German firm. The goods were shipped from a neutral State in a neutral vessel. War broke out while the ship was being loaded. She afterwards sailed with the goods on board for Antwerp and Newcastle. The French company later on directed her to Swansea, where the goods were seized and sold. It was admitted that at the time of seizure the property in the goods was still in the French company.

Held, that although the French company had acted honestly and bonâ fide in the transaction, what they had done constituted a trading with the enemy after the outbreak of war. They had failed to discharge the onus of establishing that the transaction had been abandoned before the seizure of the goods, which were therefore confiscable as those of a British citizen would have been under similar circumstances.

Decision of Evans P., reported 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 52; 112 L. T. Rep. 777, affirmed.

APPEAL from a decree of the President of the Admiralty Division, sitting in Prize, reported 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 52; 112 L. T. Rep. 777, pronouncing as good and lawful prize 1020 tons of silver lead laden in the Greek ship Panariellos, and belonging to the Compagnie Française des Mines du Laurium.

The cargo was seized the 25th Sept. 1914 as prize at Swansea by the Collector of Customs. On the 1st Oct. 1914 an order of the court was made for sale of the part cargo, which was duly effected, and the proceeds, about 16,000*l.*, were lodged in court. The present proceedings were commenced by the Procurator-General, claiming a decree that the goods in question belonged at the time of seizure to the Compagnie Française des Mines du Larium "trading in the said goods with enemies of the Crown and of the President of the French Republic, the ally of the Crown," and as such or otherwise were liable to confiscation as good and lawful prize.

The question at issue was whether the French company were trading in the goods with enemies of the Crown or the President of the French Republic, the ally of the Crown.

The facts are fully stated in the considered judgment of their Lordships.

Sir Robert Finlay, K.C., Aspinall, K.C., and R. A. Wright for the appellants.

Sir George Cave (S.-G.) and G. W. Ricketts for the Crown.

The judgment of the board was delivered by Lord SUMNER.—This is the claimants' appeal from the condemnation, for trading with the enemy, of 1020 tons of silver-lead ex steamship Panariellos, as droits of Admiralty. They raise points little, if at all, relied upon below. This explains how it is that evidence, now much needed, was given below scantily or not at all, though often it was in the claimants' possession. The appellants now accept much that before was disputed, and raise issues before their Lordships which must be decided by inference from indefinite and imperfect materials. It may be that they suffer from the course so taken.

On the 11th Aug. 1914 the Greek steamer Panariellos sailed from Ergasteria for Belgium and the United Kingdom with a cargo of minerals belonging to the appellants, the Compagnie Française des Mines du Laurium. The cargo consisted of about 1020 tons of lead, stowed in the bottom of the ship, and about 3500 tons of calamine and 600 of speiss stowed above the lead. There were three bills of lading: one for the entire cargo, one for half of the lead, another for the other half. Each bill of lading expressed that the cargo which it covered was consigned to the appellants themselves. The lead was made deliverable at Newcastle; the bill of lading for the entire cargo made it deliverable at Antwerp and Newcastle, but the calamine, at any rate, was in fact to be discharged at Antwerp. The bills of lading incorporated a voyage charter, dated the 18th July 1914, for Antwerp and Tyne below bridges. It gave a lien for freight and demurrage.

The loading of this cargo began on the 29th July 1914 and finished on the 10th Aug. The appellants, whose siege social is in Paris with an office at Laurium, where they exploit mines, have not contested that at all material times they were aware of the outbreak of war between Great Britain and France and Germany. The appellants have long been in commercial relations with the firm of Beer Sondheimer and Co., of Frankfort-on-the-Main, who traded in metallic ores. Running contracts existed between them, under which Beer Sondheimer and Co. sent cargoes of galena from Tunis to Ergasteria, where the appellants treated them and reshipped the resulting lead ore as arranged with their German customers. In form, the appellants bought the galena from Beer Sondheimer and Co. and sold to them the lead extracted from it. As these transactions regularly followed one another, there was a running account between the parties on which a balance was outstanding in favour of the appellants. In this way the shipment of lead ore in question came to be made. It is common ground in the present proceedings that the lead still belonged to the appellant company at all material times. At one time a claim was made on behalf of Beer Sondheimer and Co., as owners, but it was abandoned, and the ownership of the cargo need not be pursued further.

As soon as war broke out Beer Sondheimer and Co. set to work to get possession of the bills of lading. Communication being suspended between Frankfort and Paris, they telegraphed to the appellants' office at Ergasteria on or before the 4th Aug. to send the bills of lading direct to Beer Sondheimer and Co., of London, and asked that the appellants' Paris house might be directed to transmit these instructions to this London firm. The appellants forwarded these instructions, but at that time the bills of lading had been signed, and nothing further was done.

The London firm of Beer Sondheimer and Co. consisted of one person, a German named Emil Beer. Whether he had any other business than that of agent in London for Beer Sondheimer and Co., of Frankfort, does not appear. At any rate, his firm in London were sole agents for the Frankfort firm, and, as he is said to be "a partner" in the Frankfort firm, presumably that firm had other members. The Frankfort and the London firms were distinct, but in intimate relations with one another. On the 21st Aug. the London firm, then in charge of an Austrian clerk named Weissberger, began inquiring of the appellants' Paris office where the bills of lading were, and the appellants' secrétaire général replied that they were not yet to hand, but would be forwarded as soon as they were received in accordance with the instruction of the Frankfort firm. On the 22nd Aug. the appellants' administrateur délégué, M. le Baron Jules de Catelin, was in London and saw Herr Weissberger, whose business had not up to that time been interfered with by the authorities. It was verbally agreed that, if the parcel of lead was delivered by the London firm, a complete settlement of accounts would follow. Such a settlement was a matter of some anxiety to M. de Catelin both then and for some time afterwards, and, as far as can be ascertained from the evidence, the appellants would have been substantially better off if they could have got a full settlement of this account against delivery of the bills of lading for the lead than if they took delivery of the lead themselves under the bills of lading and sold it, after paying freight, demurrage, and warehouse charges.

On the 25th Aug. the appellants' secrétaire général sent from Paris to Beer Sondheimer and Co., of London, the two bills of lading for the lead in accordance with the promise contained in his letter of the 21st Aug. He purported to indorse both per procuration of the administrateur délégué, but by some accident only one indorsement was completed with the secretary's signature. Baron de Catelin asserted that the secretary had no authority to indorse away the appellants' property at all, but it does not appear that his action was ever repudiated, nor does it appear whether the administrateur was himself in Paris on that day or not. The learned President, sitting in Prize below, expressly refrained from accepting the statement that the act of the secretary in writing the letter which covered the bills of lading was beyond his authority, and said that on the evidence he must take it to have been done in the ordinary course of business. Presumably he intended his observation to extend to the secretary's indorsement of one of the bills of lading as well. As things turned out, these bills of lading did not fall into the hands of Beer Sondheimer and Co., of London, for on the 25th Aug. their office was closed and their papers were impounded by the Home Secretary's orders. M. de Catelin was speedily informed. He held no further communication with Beer Sondheimer and Co.

On the 26th Aug. the Panariellos arrived in the Downs. It was already questionable whether it was wise to proceed to deliver the calamine at Antwerp, and the captain demanded instructions. As to the cargo in the upper part of the holds, something had to be done. The lead, which was stowed underneath the calamine, was a less pressing matter. On that day M. de Catelin was in London, and, although after the 22nd Aug. he was entirely unable to fix any dates in his evidence, it is tolerably clear from the documents produced that he went to Swansea, sold part of the calamine for delivery there ex ship, and then returned to Paris. There he found that his company still had the general bill of lading covering both the calamine, the speiss, and the lead, and so was in a position to claim delivery of the whole cargo at Swansea if the ship went there to discharge. He must have returned to London on or after the 29th Aug. and there began or went on trying to sell the lead either to or through Messrs. Enthoven for delivery at Swansea or elsewhere. When this negotiation was concluded does not appear. It certainly took some time. It clearly was still unsettled on the 31st Aug., on which day M. de Catelin wrote from Paris again, contemplating the possibility that either Beer Sondheimer and Co., of London, or His Majesty's Government might claim part of this lead as bill of lading holders, and insisting that, if so, the balance of Beer Sondheimer and Co.'s account ought to be discharged. On the 1st Sept. the appellants telegraphed to their agents in London, Messrs. Walford, that they accepted the Panariellos at Swansea, and that the lead, speiss, and unsold balance of the calamine were to be warehoused, and they sent the general bill of lading over to London by messenger. From this it would seem that, although the owners of the Panariellos were entitled under the charter to insist on proceeding to Antwerp and Newcastle, they were soliciting the nomination of some safer ports, and the substitution of Swansea was agreed without other alteration of the chartered terms. The Panariellos left Deal on the 3rd Sept., and Messrs. Walford instructed agents in Swansea on the 4th and 5th Sept., in accordance with the appellants' telegram of the 1st Sept, to put the lead into warehouse "for our account." They made it plain that their clients' chief concern as to the lead was that their claim against Beer Sondheimer and Co. should take priority over any other claimant under any bill of lading.

It is very improbable that the appellants would have thus directed that the lead should be landed and warehoused at their own expense if any sale had as yet been concluded by or through Messrs. Enthoven. No document evidencing such a sale earlier than the 24th Sept. has been produced. The Panariellos arrived at Swansea on the 7th Sept., and the collector of customs on its arrival at once gave notice of detention of the lead. It was ultimately discharged into the warehouses of the Swansea Harbour Trust, and storage charges were incurred. The discharge of the lead clearly took some considerable time, and the ship was three days on demurrage, but the dates of the commencement and completion of the discharge do not appear. Ultimately the lead seems to have been sold by M. de Catelin on the 24th Sept. for delivery to buyers at Newcastle-on-Tyne, but this sale was afterwards cancelled. On the 25th Sept. the lead was formally seized as prize by the collector of customs at Swansea, and it was subsequently sold, and the proceeds, 16,000*l.* or thereabouts, were paid into court.

The general principles upon which trading with the enemy is forbidden to the subjects, or those who stand in the place of subjects, of His Majesty and of his allies, are well settled and need not be restated. Ample citations from the authorities are to be found in the learned and elaborate judgment in the court below. Before their Lordships little, if any, stress was laid on points much relied on at the trial—namely, that the administrateur délégué of the company had no intention to offend and believed that what was done was legitimate as long as Beer Sondheimer and Co.'s office had not been closed; that in these proceedings a French company was more favourably situated than an English company; and that the intercourse in this case fell short, somehow, of technical "trading." Their Lordships think it sufficient to say that none of these points avail the appellants.

The questions with which it is necessary to deal are, first, whether at any time the goods condemned were engaged in trading with the enemy; and, secondly, whether such trading had not ended before seizure, so that the goods were no longer liable to condemnation.

In their Lordships' opinion, the despatch of the ore from Ergasteria, for delivery as directed by Beer Sondheimer and Co. of Frankfort and for their benefit, engaged the goods in forbidden intercourse with the enemy. Consignment of goods to an enemy port and vesting of them in an enemy while on passage, though common features in the reported cases, are not essential to the imputation of forbidden trading. Geographical destination alone is not the test. Intercourse with an enemy subject, resident in the enemy country, is forbidden even though it takes place through his agent in the United Kingdom. The development of communications, the increased complexity of commercial intercourse, and the multiplication of facilities for enemy dealings with goods though at a distance from the enemy country, are incidents in the growth of modern commerce, to which in its application the rule of law must be adapted. They do not in themselves operate to defeat the application of an established principle. In the present case it is true that on shipment the consignors retained the indicia of title to the goods and the jus disponendi over them; that the lead ore was shipped for discharge at an English port, and that the enemy buyers selected as the actual recipients of the ore a firm carrying on business in London, which had a manager there who, though not licensed to trade, was in one sense tolerated, since for some days his business premises were not officially closed. Indeed, this agent was informed by the Board of Trade (with what authority, if any, does not appear) that he needed no licence; but this advice was given on the express representation, made on his behalf, that his intention was to trade only in the United Kingdom or with allied or neutral countries. Hence this official reply had no reference to or effect upon dealings with this ore, which, if Beer Sondheimer and Co. of London entered into them at all would plainly be dealings on behalf of Beer Sondheimer and Co. of Frankfort. These circumstances do not take the case out of the rule.

Their Lordships being of opinion that the ore was so shipped as to be engaged in commercial intercourse with the enemy, the burden is upon the claimants to establish that subsequently such events happened or such a course was taken as effectually relieved it from liability to forfeiture.

The affidavit of the collector of customs at Swansea at the beginning of the record says: "The said ship arrived at Swansea on the 7th day of September last, having on board the said goods . . . which were detained by the pending inquiry as to the ownership thereof, and were ultimately seized by me as prize on the 25th day of September last." Not till this appeal was heard does it appear that any question was raised which made it necessary to inquire into the exact steps taken or the exact formalities observed at Swansea on the 7th Sept. Their Lordships, therefore, presume that the collector, as his duty required under the circumstances, assumed effective control over the ore immediately on the ship's arrival and before the voyage was over. Thenceforward, wherever the ore actually was stored, it was no longer controlled by the consignors or their agents and could no longer physically be dealt with on their behalf. If so, the 7th Sept. becomes the critical date. It may be that when, in the interest alike of the goods owner and of the Crown, a reasonable time is necessary for proper inquiry and deliberation in order to avoid delay, litigation, and expense, detention during such a period without seizure is a correct incident in the regular course of the exercise of the rights which are given to a captor by prize law and is not opposed to the established rules of Prize Court procedure. It may be again the better opinion in such a case to regard the detention, when it culminates in seizure, as one with it and to hold that the seizure commences provisionally with the first detention, though the ultimate character of that detention cannot yet be known. It is not necessary to decide this somewhat theoretic point, for it is plain that after the 7th Sept. the claimants did and could do nothing to the ore itself, and as proceedings for the forfeiture of this ore are proceedings in rem, there must be some dealing with the goods themselves to terminate that engagement in prohibited trade, which was constituted by loading and dispatching them from Ergasteria to abide the directions of Beer Sondheimer and Co. of Frankfort. For this purpose mere personal declarations of intention or negotiations or even contracts with reference to them would not suffice. The appellants' contention that at the time of the seizure all trading with the enemy had ceased, and that the appellants were selling the lead on their own account, only begs the question.

The French company can only be said to have thus dealt with the goods by sending them to Swansea, and by retaining control through bills of lading made out to their own order, subject to the effect of the de facto indorsement and delivery of one parcel bill of lading. In the circumstances of this case the alteration of the port of delivery certainly did not constitute an abandonment of the old voyage and an undertaking of a new one. Not as an exercise of dominion over the goods, so as to change their character, but largely at the instance and for the safety of the ship, a Bristol Channel port was substituted for a north-east coast port. If the destination of the ore was for enemy hands and enemy control, this change did not affect it. Moreover, as late as the 4th Sept., the claimants, in their letters and those of their agents, still contemplated that some at least of the ore might be delivered in such circumstances that the claim to hold the ore until final settlement of the account of Beer Sondheimer and Co. of Frankfort might be successfully asserted. Up to the 7th Sept. nothing else appears except negotiations for a possible sale of the lead if new buyers could be found, and it certainly is not established, nor is it even probable, that these negotiations had been concluded before the critical date.

Their Lordships are of opinion that upon these facts the appellants have failed to discharge their obligation to show that the engagement of the ore in enemy trading had been abandoned in time. It is not enough to show a mere repentance or a change of intention without some dealing with the res. There must be something which withdraws the goods from the forbidden adventure. Up to the 7th Sept. even the intentions of Baron de Catelin are obscure and evidently provisional, and after that date it must be observed that, in view of the action of the Crown, they are rather intentions to avert, if possible, the consequences of what had been done, than to abandon a course of business which financially was beneficial to the company though exposed to the hazards involved in trading with the enemy. In short, what he did after the 7th Sept. was rather mending his hand than changing his mind. Accordingly, some of the appellants' contentions of law do not arise. They cited cases to show that unless seized in delicto their goods escape, and that their delictum, if any, was over when the Panariellos arrived in Swansea Dock. These cases, however, related to neutral goods seized for breach of blockade or as contraband of war. They differ from the present case in one important respect. Maritime trade in contraband goods and breach of blockade are acts on the part of neutrals which belligerents are entitled to prevent. Trading with the enemy on the part of his subjects or the subject of his allies is an act which the belligerent Sovereign is entitled to prohibit. To hold that, if a neutral engages in enterprises which, to him, are permitted though undertaken at his peril, his goods are only liable to condemnation if seized in delicto, is no warrant for further holding that, if a subject engages his goods in enterprises which to him are prohibited and unlawful, they may not be visited with the penalty of forfeiture, even if seized after the actual delictum has come to an end. It is not necessary to pursue the point, as no case applicable to trading with the enemy was brought forward.

The learned President in his judgment stated that "the Baron de Catelin disavowed with emphasis any intention in these transactions to do anything which would be helpful to the enemy or prejudicial to this country" and accepted the disavowal. Their Lordships do so too, and they recognise further that Baron de Catelin found his company engaged in a financial difficulty of considerable magnitude, from which it was not easy to extricate it without loss, and probably only desired to protect its interests in a way which appeared to him to be void of illegality or of offence. These, however, are considerations which, though weighty, can only be addressed to the clemency of the Crown. They cannot affect the judgment which a Court of Prize, strictly administering the universal rule as it finds it, is bound to pronounce in the grave case of trading with the enemy.

Their Lordships will, therefore, humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed, but, as the Procurator-General made no submission that costs should be allowed, that this appeal should be dismissed without costs.

ON APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (IN PRIZE).

Prize Court—General jurisdiction where there has been a seizure in prize—Cargo—Release—Action for freight in King's Bench Division—Subsequent motion in Prize Court—Order directing payment of a sum in lieu of freight—Order in effect varying contractual relations of parties—Order ultra vires.

The general jurisdiction which attaches in every case where there has been a seizure in prize includes the power to deal with all incidental matters, including questions of freight and compensation in lieu of freight, but does not include power to make an order which in effect varies the contractual relations of the parties.

Decision of the President reversed.

APPEAL from an order of Sir Samuel Evans, P. (in prize) whereby he decided that he had jurisdiction to deal with the respondents' claim to be paid freight in respect of the carriage of a part of a cargo of phosphates, and that they were entitled to claim remuneration for carriage, and thereby he ordered that the matter should be referred to the registrar to report as to the amount thereof.

The considered judgment of their Lordships was delivered by Lord PARKER OF WADDINGTON.—The jurisdiction of the Prize Court attaches in every case in which there has been a seizure in prize, and in exercising this jurisdiction the court can and will deal with all incidental matters, including questions of freight or compensation in lieu of freight. In the present case the goods in question were seized as prize on the 12th Aug. 1914. The jurisdiction of the court having thus attached, the onus of proving its determination must rest on those who allege it. The appellants have not, in their Lordships' opinion, discharged this onus. Though it is possible that the release of a vessel or goods seized as prize in the manner prescribed by the Prize Court Rules (Order XIII.) may determine the jurisdiction of the court, their Lordships do not consider that the mere handing over of the vessel or goods to the persons who claimed to be entitled, without any compliance with the prescribed formalities, can have this effect. The real question, therefore, is whether the circumstances of this case justify the order under appeal.

When the present war broke out on the 4th Aug. 1914, the British steamship St. Helena was on a voyage from Tampa and Galveston to Bremen and Hamburg with a cargo consisting (inter alia) of phosphate rock deliverable under bills of lading at Hamburg to the order of the appellant, an American company. She arrived at the Lizard on the 7th Aug. and, having been informed of the outbreak of war, abandoned her voyage, which had become unlawful, and proceeded to Manchester. She arrived at Manchester on the 10th Aug. and there discharged part of her cargo, consisting of cotton and grain. On the 12th Aug. the phosphate rock, being still on board, was seized as prize and came into the possession of the Prize Court marshal. It had been shipped by the appellants in order to be delivered to two German companies under certain contracts c.i.f. at Hamburg and was thought to be enemy property. The ship was subsequently removed to Runcorn, where the phosphate rock was discharged into the custody of the Manchester Ship Canal Company on account of the marshal. On the 8th Sept. 1914 the marshal's substitute, being satisfied that the property in the phosphate rock still remained in the appellants, wrote that he was authorised to release the same without presentation of documents or payment of freight, and that all transactions as regarded bills of lading and freight were to be dealt with as between ship and consignee. It appears that on the strength of this letter the canal company delivered the phosphate rock to the appellants against deposit in the usual way of the amount claimed by the ship for freight. The respondents, the shipowners, subsequently instituted an action in the King's Bench Division to enforce their claim to freight, but this action was dismissed with costs on the ground that the respondents, not having carried the goods to Hamburg in accordance with their contract, could not recover the agreed freight or any part thereof. The respondents thereupon applied by motion to the Prize Court asking for a declaration that they were entitled to some remuneration for the carriage of the appellants' goods, and a reference to the registrar and merchants to ascertain the amount. On the hearing of this motion the President made an order declaring that the respondents were entitled to claim for remuneration in respect of the carriage of the goods, and referring such claim to the registrar and merchants for report. Some discussion took place before their Lordships as to the precise meaning of this order. In their Lordships' opinion it cannot be regarded merely as affirming the jurisdiction of the court to entertain the application, leaving the question whether the application should be granted for subsequent determination after report by the registrar and merchants. In effect it allows the application, the reference to the registrar and merchants being for the purpose of ascertaining the amount only. The question their Lordships have to decide is whether the order so construed was rightly made.

In their Lordships' opinion it is quite clear that as a matter of contract no freight was payable. Under the contract between the parties nothing could become due for freight until the ship had performed her part of the bargain by carrying the goods to their port of destination. In order to succeed, therefore, the respondents had to establish that, according to the law administered in a Court of Prize, they were entitled to some compensation in lieu of freight. It is pertinent to inquire on what ground they should be entitled to such compensation in the present case? If the goods had never been seized as prize they could have claimed nothing for freight. They abandoned the voyage on the 7th Aug., long before the seizure. They could not do otherwise, for the war rendered its continuance unlawful. Why should a subsequent seizure of the goods, unlawful as against the neutral owners, subject such owners to a liability from which they would otherwise have been free, or confer on the shipowners rights which these latter would not otherwise have had? Their Lordships failed to find any satisfactory answer to these difficulties in the arguments advanced or the cases cited on behalf of the respondents. In their opinion, compensation in lieu of freight may well be awarded against the captors where, by reason of a seizure jure belli which turns out to be unlawful, the ship has been deprived of the opportunity of earning freight which but for such seizure it could lawfully have earned. This might, for example, be the case where the ship on which the goods have been carried is a neutral ship, and as such entitled to continue the voyage. Again, it may well be that where enemy goods on board either a neutral or British ship are lawfully seized as prize the ship may be entitled to compensation in lieu of freight. In such a case the captors are the gainers from the fact that the ship has brought the goods to the place of seizure. But where prior to the seizure the voyage has become unlawful, and all possibility of earning the freight has been already lost, there appears to their Lordships to be nothing for which compensation can be properly awarded. It is no part of the function of the Prize Court to alter the contractual relations between ship and cargo owner, and this would be the only result of allowing such compensation.

Some stress was laid by the respondents' counsel on the case of The Friends (1810, Edw. 246). There, a British ship bound for the port of Lisbon, a friendly port, found it blockaded by the British Fleet during the temporary occupation of the French. After waiting some days with the blockading squadron in hopes that the blockade would terminate, she was blown out to sea and captured by a Spaniard. She was almost immediately recaptured by a British ship, and taken as prize to Madeira, where both ship and cargo were sold by the captors to pay the salvage. In adjusting the rights of ship and cargo owners respectively, Lord Stowell allowed the ship compensation in lieu of freight. His reason was that both ship and goods had met with a common misfortune, neither being in any way to blame, so that it was fair to divide the loss between them. In the present case there was no common misfortune, the ship was not seized as prize at all, and the seizure of the goods was unlawful. The case of the Friends is therefore clearly distinguishable.

In their Lordships' opinion the appeal ought to be allowed with costs here and below, and they will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party — Ship requisitioned by the Admiralty — Restraint of princes—Whether hire payable during requisition — Arbitration — Whether contract subsisting—Nonpayment of hire—Notice to withdraw ship—Whether owners entitled to withdraw vessel—Liability of charterers for hire.

The plaintiffs were time charterers of the steamship D., and their claim was to restrain the defendants, the owners, from withdrawing the ship from their service. The defendants counter-claimed for hire during a period when the ship was requisitioned by the Admiralty. The charter-party contained exception clauses which included restraint of princes, and also provided that the owners might withdraw the ship for nonpayment of hire. There was a cesser clause prescribing the events upon which the hire should cease or be suspended, which did not include requisition by the Admiralty. During the currency of the charter-party the ship was requisitioned by the Admiralty for a period of about six months, for which period the charterers refused to pay the hire. The parties went to arbitration on the question whether the contract was still subsisting; and, during the arbitration proceedings, the defendants gave notice to withdraw the ship. Sankey, J. held that the defendants were not entitled to withdraw the ship, but that the plaintiffs were liable to pay the hire to the defendants during the period of the requisition by the Admiralty. The plaintiffs appealed and the defendants gave notice of cross-appeal.

Held, that the appeal of the charterers and the cross-appeal of the shipowners failed. The charterers' contention was that there had been an entire failure of consideration, and that they could not be liable for hire as they had not had the use of the ship, for which alone they were liable to pay hire, during the requisition by the Admiralty. That contention, however, had been disposed of by the decision of the House of Lords in F. A. Tamplin Steamship Company Limited v. Anglo-Mexican Petroleum Products Company Limited (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 467; 115 L. T. Rep. 315; (1916) 2 A. C. 397), and the charterers in the present case had been rightly held liable to pay the chartered hire for the time during which the ship was under requisition. As regards the cross-appeal, the shipowners were not entitled to ignore the arbitration proceedings and, pending those proceedings, serve notice of withdrawal of the ship. The position was such as to lead the charterers to believe that any right to require payment of the hire or to withdraw the ship was suspended until it had been determined in the arbitration what the respective rights of the parties were—whether the time charter was still subsisting and whether the charterers remained liable to pay the hire.

Decisions of Sankey, J. (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 434; 115 L. T. Rep. 265; (1916) 1 K. B. 726) affirmed.

F. A. Tamplin Steamship Company Limited v. Anglo-Mexican Petroleum Products Company Limited (sup.) applied.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs, the charterers, and cross-appeal by the defendants, the shipowners, from decisions of Sankey, J. in the Commercial list.

The plaintiffs were time charterers of the steamship Duneric, and their claim was for an injunction to restrain the defendants, the owners, from withdrawing the ship from their service.

The defendants claimed that they were entitled to withdraw the ship for nonpayment of hire, and they counter-claimed for some 8000*l.* for hire.

The clauses of the charter-party material to the case were as follows:

(1) There was a clause limiting the cargo which the vessel was entitled to carry. She was forbidden to carry contraband of war.

(2) There was a clause limiting the voyages she might perform. She was only to be employed between safe ports of the United Kingdom and the continent of Europe not east of Dieppe nor east of Sicily.

(3) There was a cesser clause prescribing the events upon which the hire should cease, or be suspended.

(4) There was an exception clause under which the restraint of princes was mutually excepted.

(5) There was a clause giving the plaintiffs an option of sub-letting the steamer.

Sankey, J. gave judgment for the plaintiffs on the claim, and for the defendants on the counter-claim.

The plaintiffs appealed and the defendants gave cross-notice of appeal.

Roche, K.C. (R. A. Wright and Le Quesne with him) for the plaintiffs, the charterers.—The charterers are not liable to pay hire, as there has been a failure of consideration. There was an implied term in the charter-party that the plaintiffs need not pay hire in the events which have happened. The plaintiffs were to pay for the use of the ship; and in so far as there was no use there was no hire payable. The Tamplin case (sup.) was decided on different facts. In that case the shipowner was getting what he contracted for, but here it was otherwise. He referred also to

Brown v. Turner, Brightman, and Co., 12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 79; 105 L. T. Rep. 562; (1912) A. C. 12.

MacKinnon, K.C. (W. N. Raeburn with him) for the defendants, the shipowners.—If the whole contract is looked at, the contention that if there was no use there was no hire cannot be maintained. All that the defendants promised was the use of the ship subject to the exceptions, including "restraint of princes." The clause in Brown v. Turner, Brightman, and Co. (sup.) was different from the present one, and a decision on that clause would have no application here. The plaintiffs are not discharged from liability to pay hire by the clause under which "restraint of princes" was mutually excepted. There was here a cesser clause prescribing the events upon which the hire should cease, or be suspended, and none of those events have happened. The shipowners rely on the Tamplin case, the charters being practically identical in the two cases. He referred to Barrie v. Peruvian Corporation, 2 Com. Cas. 50.

As to the cross-appeal, the defendants were entitled to withdraw the vessel for nonpayment of hire. It cannot be suggested that the right to withdraw was referred to the arbitrators, nor had the question of withdrawal then arisen. Even if that question had been referred, the defendants were entitled to change their minds and give notice of withdrawal. [Swinfen Eady, L.J.—You cannot claim rent subsequent to the forfeiture, and still say you have not waived the forfeiture.]

Roche, in reply, and on the cross-appeal.—There was ample evidence that the defendants meant to refer to arbitration the question whether the contract was still subsisting, and their conduct amounted to a waiver of any right to repudiate the contract:

Bentsen v. Taylor, Sons, and Co., 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 385; 69 L. T. Rep. 487; (1893) 2 Q. B. 274.

The cesser clause here was not exhaustive—for instance, the case of withdrawal is not provided for. The Tamplin case is distinguishable. He referred to

Poussard v. Spiers, 34 L. T. Rep. 572; 1 Q. B. Div. 410;

Wehner v. Dene Steam Shipping Company, (1905) 2 K. B. 92;

Horlock v. Beal, 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 250; 114 L. T. Rep. 193; (1916) A. C. 486.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 10. — The following judgments were read:—

Swinfen Eady, L.J.—The plaintiffs, the charterers, appeal from the judgment of Sankey, J. upon the defendants' counter-claim, which determined that the plaintiffs were liable to pay the hire of a steamship under a time charter for the period during which she was requisitioned by the Government, although the amount paid by the Government was substantially less than the chartered hire. The defendants, the shipowners, do not make any claim to any part of the hire paid by the Government; they are content that the time charterers should receive the whole of it, subject, nevertheless, to the charterers paying the chartered hire. The appellants contend that as during the period when the ship was under requisition they no longer had the use of the ship, there was an entire failure of consideration, and that they are not under any legal liability for the hire during that time. The defendants recovered judgment against the plaintiffs for 8627*l.* 0*s.* 9*d.*, and from this judgment the plaintiffs appeal.

By a time charter, dated the 2nd March 1915, made between the defendants as owners and the plaintiffs as charterers, it was agreed that the defendants should let and the plaintiffs should hire the steamship Duneric for a period of twelve calendar months from the date of the ship being placed at charterers' disposal, at a rate of 2350*l.* per calendar month, payable monthly in advance, and at and after the same rate for any part of a month, for the use and hire of the vessel, any hire paid in advance, and not earned, to be refunded; and the owners to provide and pay for all provisions and wages of captain and crew and all stores, and insurance on the vessel, including war risks. The owners had power to withdraw the vessel in default of punctual and regular payment of the hire. The charter-party contained restrictions as to the trades in which the vessel was to be engaged, and also as to the limits of the voyages.

The ship was placed at charterers' disposal on the 15th April 1915, and the period of twelve months ran from that date.

On the 21st May 1915 the ship was requisitioned by the Admiralty, and on the 11th June 1915 the Admiralty service began. The monthly hire paid by the Government was 1173*l.* 15*s.*, while the chartered monthly hire was 2350*l.* Under these circumstances disputes arose between the parties.

The defendants contended that the charter-party was subsisting, and that the monthly chartered hire was still payable by the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs contended that, by reason of the requisition, they were absolutely free of the time charter. On the 17th June the defendants wrote that unless the month's hire, which became due in advance on the 15th June, was paid by the plaintiffs, the defendants would be forced to ask the plaintiffs to arbitrate in the terms of the charter. The plaintiffs expressed their willingness to have the matter arbitrated upon, but pointed out that, as the arbitrators would doubtless be requested to state a case for the opinion of the court on the legal points involved, they would prefer the matter being referred straight to the court, and thus save unnecessary expense. The defendants, however, said that they did not see why they should be asked to give up their right to a commercial arbitration under the charter-party, and insisted on arbitration. The defendants then, on the 9th July, appointed an arbitrator, and required the plaintiffs to do the same, and to appoint a person not a lawyer within seven days. On the 15th July, accordingly, the plaintiffs appointed a commercial gentleman as arbitrator. Correspondence then took place with regard to discovery and inspection of documents, and on the 22nd July the plaintiffs, at the suggestion of the arbitrators, agreed that the defendants should receive the hire payable by the Admiralty, without prejudice to any question.

On the 2nd Nov. the Admiralty gave notice that the vessel would be discharged from Government service when cleared of her cargo at Middlesbrough. By this time the conditions of the freight market were changed, and if the vessel were surrendered by the Admiralty it would be more beneficial to the owners to be free from the residue of the charter-party. On the 16th Nov. the defendants sent a debit note for chartered hire and interest claimed to be due. This included hire in advance for the month up to 15th Dec., and gave credit for the Admiralty hire. Whether the sum so arrived at gives credit for the whole of the hire payable by the Admiralty up to the time of actually redelivering the ship does not appear; but no question of figures has been raised before us on this appeal, and the sum appearing in this debit note is the exact sum for which the defendants obtained judgment. The defendants required payment, and threatened to withdraw the vessel if not paid; the plaintiffs answered that they were content to leave the question of their liability to the decision of the arbitrators or the court, but that as the defendants themselves had insisted on arbitration, it was not right for them to ask the plaintiffs to abandon their legitimate rights pending the arbitration proceedings. It must be remembered that the arbitration involved the question whether the charter-party was a subsisting agreement between the parties. On the 18th Nov. the defendants nevertheless insisted on payment by the 19th, and on the 19th Nov., in default of payment, they gave notice purporting to withdraw the vessel. The plaintiffs took up the position that, whether they were right or wrong in their contention that they were not liable to pay chartered hire while the vessel was under requisition, the defendants were not entitled to take the law into their own hands and withdraw the vessel while the dispute as to liability was being arbitrated upon. The plaintiffs then, on the 25th Nov. 1915 issued a writ claiming an injunction, and they obtained an interim injunction on the 1st Dec., so that when the vessel was actually released and redelivered by the Admiralty on the 4th Dec., they obtained the use of the vessel. On the 10th Dec. the action was tried and the injunction continued, and the plaintiffs continued to have the undisturbed use of the ship until the 6th May 1916, when, on the termination of the time charter and the completion of the current voyage, the plaintiffs redelivered her to the defendants.

Upon the plaintiffs' appeal, the only question is whether they continued liable to pay the monthly hire while the vessel was under Admiralty requisition. The plaintiffs contended that there was an entire failure of consideration, and that they could not be liable as they did not have the use of the vessel, for which alone they were to pay the hire. The first answer is that the defendants did not agree to give the use of the ship absolutely and unconditionally; but only unless prevented (amongst other things) by the restraint of princes. Again, there was not an entire failure of the consideration, as the plaintiffs would, if the charter-party was subsisting, become entitled to the hire payable by the Admiralty.

No question is raised in this case as to any apportionment between owners and time charterers of the Admiralty hire, as the owners agree that charterers may have the benefit of the whole of it, and notwithstanding that the form of the Admiralty charter T. 99 gives the Admiralty as charterers larger powers and rights than the charterer alone could have conferred upon any sub-charterer, having regard to the terms of their own charter-party.

The question raised by the plaintiffs is, however, in my judgment completely disposed of by the decision of the House of Lords in Tamplin Steamship Company v. Anglo-Mexican Petroleum Products Company (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 467; 115 L. T. Rep. 315; (1916) 2 A. C. 397). That was the case of a time charter, where the charterer was to pay for "the use and hire" of a steamer, and the charter contained an exception of "restraint of princes," and there was power to sub let. When requisitioned by the Government, there were three years unexpired of the charter term of five years, and when the case was decided in the House of Lords there were still about nineteen months unexpired. It was held by the House of Lords that the charter-party did not come to an end when the steamer was requisitioned, and that the requisition did not suspend it, or affect the rights of owners or charterers under it. Accordingly the time charterers remained liable to pay the chartered hire, and became entitled to receive the Admiralty hire, subject, however, to any question of apportionment, which, I have already pointed out, does not arise in the present case. In this case the Admiralty requisition proved to be for less than half the period of the time charter, and, in my judgment, the plaintiffs were properly held liable for the chartered hire while the ship was under requisition. No question arises about the chartered hire after the ship was restored by the Government to the time charterers, as this was duly paid by the plaintiffs monthly in advance as required by the charter-party.

There remains the question raised by the defendants by their cross notice of appeal. The defendants ask for a declaration that they were entitled to withdraw the vessel by reason of non-payment of hire, and that the notice of withdrawal given on the 19th Nov. was valid and effectual, and that since that date the plaintiffs have had no right to any further use of the vessel under the charter-party. The defendants do not claim any consequential damages, nor do they offer to repay the chartered hire, which they have been receiving from Dec. 1915 to May 1916. They also ask for the dissolution of the injunction granted by the judgment, and for an inquiry as to damages in respect of the interim injunction, that is to say, in respect of the six days' user of the vessel by the plaintiffs between the 4th Dec. 1915, when she was actually restored by the Admiralty, and the 10th Dec. 1915, when the action was tried. The facts which I have already stated in detail show that there was a bonâ fide dispute between the parties as to whether the charter was still subsisting after the requisition, and, if so, whether the hire continued payable by the charterers during the period of the Government requisition. The defendants insisted on their right to refer this matter to commercial arbitration; this arbitration appears to have dragged its slow length along, beginning in July, and to have made but little progress by November, when the defendants threatened to take the law into their own hands and decide the case in their own favour by actually withdrawing the ship. The interim injunction was then granted on the 1st Dec. 1915, and the case was finally heard and judgment was given within fifteen days from the issue of the writ. But for the defendants insisting upon commercial arbitrators first dealing with the matter the dispute could have been decided by the judge long previously. In my judgment the defendants were not entitled to anticipate the arbitrators' decision and withdraw the vessel by the notice of the 19th Nov., when the matter was before the arbitrators, and no decision had been given.

The circumstances of this case were of a character to lead the plaintiffs to believe that any right to require payment, or to withdraw the ship for non-payment, would be suspended until there had been determined in the arbitration what the respective rights of the parties were, whether the time charter was still subsisting or not, and whether or not the plaintiffs remained liable to pay the hire. Pending the arbitration, and immediately upon it appearing that the Admiralty were about to release the ship, when it would be to the advantage of the owners to have their ship free from the charter, it was not open to them to ignore the arbitration proceedings, and serve notice of withdrawal.

It was said by Lord Cairns in Hughes v. Metropolitan Railway Company (36 L. T. Rep. 932; 2 App. Cas. 439, at p. 448): "It is the first principle on which all courts of equity proceed, that if parties who have entered into definite and distinct terms involving certain legal results—certain penalties or legal forfeiture—afterwards by their own act or with their own consent enter upon a course of negotiation which has the effect of leading one of the parties to suppose that the strict rights arising under the contract will not be enforced, or will be kept in suspense, or held in abeyance, the person who otherwise might have enforced those rights will not be allowed to enforce them where it would be inequitable having regard to the dealings which have thus taken place between the parties."

These observations are directly applicable to the present case, and it would be highly inequitable, having regard to the correspondence and the arbitration proceedings, to allow the defendants by their notice of the 19th Nov. to enforce any right to withdraw the ship for non-payment by hire. And this is the only notice of withdrawal on which the defendants rely. It is also to be observed that the defendants have recovered judgment on their counterclaim for hire in respect of a period subsequent to the alleged forfeiture. I am of opinion that, under the circumstances, the interim injunction was properly granted, and was properly continued at the hearing. Even if the plaintiffs at the hearing had not been able to maintain their claim to a continuance of the injunction, the question would still remain whether the defendants ought to be awarded any damages upon the undertaking. The undertaking, in its expanded form, is as follows: "The plaintiffs undertaking to abide by any order this court may make as to damages in case this court should hereafter be of opinion that the defendants shall have sustained any by reason of this order, which the plaintiffs ought to pay."

Having regard to the circumstances under which the notice to withdraw of the 19th Nov. was given, I am of opinion that the plaintiffs were fully justified in applying to the court immediately for an injunction, and that the plaintiffs ought not to be required to make any payment to the defendants in respect thereof, even if it should have happened that at the trial the plaintiffs could not have sustained their claim to a continuance of the injunction. The special circumstances are such that no inquiry as to damages ought to be granted, even if the claim for injunction could not be sustained at the trial.

In my opinion the appeal and the cross-appeal should both be dismissed with costs with the usual set-off on taxation.

Bankes, L.J.—In this case the Modern Transport Company, the time charterers of the steamship Duneric, sued the Duneric Steamship Company Limited, the owners of that vessel, claiming an injunction to restrain them from acting on a notice dated the 19th Nov. 1915, purporting to determine the charter, and for a declaration that the charter-party remained valid and binding. In that action the Duneric Steamship Company counterclaimed for a declaration that they were entitled to withdraw the vessel and that the notice of the 19th Nov. was valid and effectual, and that since that date the Modern Transport Company had no right to any user of the vessel under the charter-party, and they also counter-claimed for the sum of 8627*l.* 0*s* 9*d.*, the amount which at the date of the counter-claim they alleged to be due for unpaid hire and for interest thereon.

The action was tried before Sankey, J., who decided in favour of the Duneric Steamship Company upon the claim for hire and interest, but against them on all the other issues raised upon the pleadings, and he granted an injunction restraining the Duneric Steamship Company from employing the vessel otherwise than in accordance with the terms of the charter-party, or from dealing with the vessel in any way so as to interfere with the Modern Transport Company's right of user of the vessel under the charter-party after the requisition of the Admiralty came to an end. On the counterclaim he entered judgment for the Duneric Steamship Company for 8627*l.* 0*s.* 9*d.*

Against this decision both parties appealed. No question arises in the case as to whether the adventure was determined by the requisition by the Admiralty. The two questions upon which the rights of the parties depend are: first, whether during the time that the vessel was requisitioned payment of hire was suspended. Second, whether in the event which happened the owners were entitled to take advantage of the clause of the charter-party giving them a right, in the event of a failure to pay the hire punctually, to withdraw the vessel from the service of the charterers. In my opinion the learned judge was right on both points.

The first point is I think completely covered by the decision in the Tamplin case (sup.), where the charter-party was practically identical with the present one, and where the decision proceeded upon the ground that, in spite of the requisition by the Admiralty, the time charterer continued liable to pay the hire to the owners of the vessel. If the present case is distinguishable from the Tamplin case, it is sufficient for me to say that I agree with the construction put upon the charter-party by Sankey, J., and for the reasons he has given.

On the second point I agree with the conclusion arrived at by the learned judge, but upon what are possibly somewhat different grounds. The material facts to be taken into consideration are as follows: The charter-party provided for the payment of hire at the rate of 2350*l.* per month, payable in advance in London, with a provision that failing the regular and punctual payment of the hire the owners should be at liberty to withdraw the vessel from the services of the charterers without prejudice to any claim which they (the owners) might otherwise have on the charterers in pursuance of the charter. The charter-party contained an arbitration clause,

The first and second payments of hire which became due respectively on the 15th April and the 15th May 1915 were duly paid. On the 21st May the vessel was requisitioned by the Admiralty, and service under the requisition began on the 11th June. Immediately upon the requisition being made the parties were at issue as to the effect of the requisition; the charterers contending, by their letter of the 28th May, that the charter had become null and void; the shipowners on the other hand insisting that the charter was still a subsisting contract, and that the hire continued payable. The question was one of very considerable importance to the parties, as the hire paid by the Government was very considerably less than the amount agreed to be paid by the charterers. The charterers failed to pay the hire due on the 15th June, and on the 17th June the owners' agent wrote to Messrs. Shallet, Dale, and Co. informing them that if this hire was not paid they would be forced to arbitrate in terms of the charter, and on the 30th June they wrote to the charterers' solicitors informing them that they were not prepared to give up their rights under the charter-party in respect of arbitration. In July the parties discussed with each other by correspondence the effect of Atkin, J.'s decision in the Tamplin case, and it is clear that each was maintaining the position which they had originally taken up with regard to the effect of the requisition of the vessel by the Government. On July 9th the owners' agent wrote to the charterers intimating that they had appointed their arbitrator, as "the matter" must go to arbitration, and on the 15th July the charterers' solicitors wrote in reply that the charterers had appointed their arbitrator "in the differences which had arisen between our clients and the Duneric Steamship Company as to the meaning and intention of the charter-party of the 2nd March 1915." Under these circumstances it appears to me plain that what the parties agreed to refer to arbitration was not a mere incidental question as to the payment of hire at its due date, but whether the contract between them was or was not a still subsisting contract, conferring rights or imposing obligations upon either party. At that time, and for some months after, it suited the shipowners from a business point of view to hold the charterers to their bargain, and accordingly each month, down to and including the 15th Nov., an ungratified demand was made for each month's hire in advance. Apart from all other consideration, the effect of these demands was to waive the forfeiture (if any) which had accrued down to the date of the last demand made. At the time the last demand was made it was known that the Government intended to release the vessel, and the state of the freight market was then such that it would suit the owners better to have control of the vessel than to continue her under the charter. As a result they served notice on the 18th Nov. that, unless the charterers paid the overdue hire in twenty-four hours, they would withdraw the vessel, and this on the 19th Nov. they purported to do. On the 25th Nov. the charterers issued their writ claiming an injunction restraining the shipowners from proceeding on this notice, and an interim injunction was obtained. The action came on for trial on the 7th Dec., and judgment was delivered on the 10th—that is to say, before the month's hire due on the 15th Dec. fell due. In the counterclaim in the action the shipowners claimed the month's hire due in advance on the 15th Nov. and recovered judgment for the full amount, and they have since been paid and have received each month's hire as it became due. The only question tried in the action was whether the notice of the 19th Nov. was a good notice at the time it was given and effectual to put an end to the charter at that date. In my opinion it was not. The shipowners had submitted to the arbitrators the very question upon which their right to give the notice depended—namely, whether the charter-party was a subsisting contract or not. Until that question was decided by the arbitrators, or the submission revoked, the right of the shipowners to take the law into their own hands and put an immediate end to the charter was, in my opinion, necessarily suspended. What had been a right under the contract immediately enforceable upon the happening of the events named necessarily ceased to be such a right when the parties had agreed that as a condition precedent to the enforcing of either right or obligation under the contract by either of them, the arbitrators should decide whether the contract itself was still a subsisting one.

In my opinion the appeals fail.

Charter-party—Employment between "safe ports" —What constitutes a "safe port."

The word "safe" when used in connection with the word "port" in a charter-party implies that the port must be both physically and politically safe, and the action either of nature or war may render a port unsafe. In each case it is a question of fact and a question of degree.

Action tried by Sankey, J.

The plaintiffs' claim was for a declaration that Newcastle-upon-Tyne was not in Feb. 1915 a safe port within the meaning of a charter-party dated the 18th April 1913.

Roche, K.C. and A. Hyslop Maxwell for the plaintiffs.

The facts and arguments are sufficiently stated in the written judgment.

(a) Reported by Leonard C. Thomas, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Sankey, J.—In this case the plaintiffs claim a declaration that Newcastle-upon-Tyne was not in Feb. 1915 a safe port within the meaning of clause 3 of a charter-party dated the 18th April 1913 and made between them and the defendants; and, further, that the defendants by ordering the plaintiffs' steamship Frankby to proceed to Newcastle during that month to load a cargo for Barcelona committed a breach of the charter-party which entitled them to withdraw the ship from the defendants' service.

The facts are as follows: By a charter-party of the above date the plaintiffs agreed to let and the defendants agreed to hire the British steamship Frankby for a term of five years at the rate of 1440*l.* per calendar month for employment between a safe port or safe ports between 50 degrees N. and 50 degrees S., subject to certain exceptions which are not material to the present case. The northern limit was afterwards extended to 60 degrees N. There was a stipulation in the charter-party that upon any breach thereof the plaintiffs should be at liberty to withdraw the vessel from the service of the defendants.

In the first week of Feb. 1915 the vessel was at Havre, and had been provisionally ordered to proceed to Cardiff to load. The owners thereupon arranged to fit her up with stores and a new donkey boiler at that port. On the 11th Feb. the German Government promulgated the following announcement: "The waters round Great Britain and Ireland, including the entire English Channel, are hereby declared a military area. From the 18th Feb. every hostile merchant ship within these waters will be destroyed even if it is not always possible to avoid dangers which thereby threaten the crews and passengers."

On the 13th Feb. the defendants, by their agents, cancelled their provisional instructions for the vessel to go Cardiff and ordered her to the Tyne. This order was a serious inconvenience to the plaintiffs, who had already got their stores and donkey boiler at Cardiff, and they wrote protesting against it, not only on this ground, but also upon the ground that Newcastle was not a safe port within the meaning of the charter-party. They did not, however, withdraw the vessel from the service of the defendants, but allowed her to leave Havre upon the 19th Feb., the day after that upon which, according to the German declaration, every hostile ship in the waters round Great Britain and Ireland was to be destroyed.

In spite of the German threat, the vessel appears to have had a safe and not very speedy voyage to Newcastle. She there loaded a cargo of coals for Barcelona, left, and had a similar voyage down the North Sea and English Channel. As far as I am able to judge from her logbook, she was from first to last in no real danger or apprehension of danger.

The plaintiffs contend that the order for the steamer to proceed to Newcastle was a breach of the charter-party because Newcastle was not a safe port.

The defendants contend that Newcastle was perfectly safe, and, secondly, that, at any rate, the plaintiffs have waived their rights and are not entitled to withdraw the vessel because, after their protest, they allowed her to continue in the defendants' service.

The first point I have to decide is whether Newcastle was a safe port in February. It is admitted by both parties that Newcastle itself was safe, but the plaintiffs say that the dangers of the voyage there must be taken into account, and were such as to make the port unsafe within the meaning of the charter-party.

The defendants, on the other hand, contend that the dangers of the voyage are not material to the question whether the port was a safe one, and, further, that such dangers as either existed or might be apprehended on the voyage were not of a character to make the port unsafe. Two cases were cited to me—namely, Ogden v. Graham (1 B. & S. 773) and Nobel's Explosives Company v. Jenkins (8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 181; 75 L. T. Rep. 163; (1896) 2 Q. B. 326)—but neither seems to be conclusive.

In my view the word "safe," when used in connection with the word "port," implies that the port must be both physically and politically safe, and I think that the action either of nature or war may render a port unsafe. I have only to deal with the agency of war in the present case. At the moment no English port would be a safe port for a German vessel. Neither is a place which a vessel can only go to at a certain risk of confiscation a safe port: (see the observations of Blackburn, J. in Ogden's case, sup.).

There does not appear to be any sound distinction between a port to which a vessel is proceeding with a liability to be sunk or confiscated by enemy vessels lying thereat or in the approaches thereto and a port to which a vessel is proceeding with a liability to be sunk or confiscated by enemy vessels at a greater distance. Modern inventions like wireless telegraphy and submarines have quite altered old rules and old conceptions, and I am of opinion that dangers likely to be incurred on a voyage to a port may be taken into account in considering the question whether such port is safe to go to or not. In each case it is a question of act and a question of degree.

I now proceed to the consideration of the question of fact whether the port of Newcastle had become unsafe. It will be remembered that the German threat was that as from the 18th Feb. every hostile merchant ship in English waters would be destroyed. The performance, however, fell short of the promise. The number of arrivals in and sailings from the time of overseas nationalities was 752 for Feb. 1915; the number lost or damaged from enemy causes in the North Sea was three; for the whole of the United Kingdom the numbers were 5645 and twelve respectively.

It seems clear that such circumstances cannot be said to have made the port of Newcastle unsafe in February last. However much one may regret the loss of the lives of innocent and non-combatant crews and passengers which has been caused by those responsible for the actions of the German Navy, it is impossible to regard the results achieved as other than insignificant, or as even appreciably affecting the strength and spirit of the British mercantile marine.

Finding, as I do, therefore, that Newcastle was a safe port within the meaning of the charter-party, it is unnecessary to consider whether the plaintiffs have waived their rights, and the result is that I dismiss the action with costs.

Charter-party — Sub-charter — Sub-charterer's breach—Cancellation—Measure of damages.

A ship was chartered by the plaintiffs for a voyage to a port in Chile under the terms of a charter-party dated the 1st July 1912, which provided (inter alia) that freight should be payable at the rate of 21s. per ton, and that the plaintiffs should have the option of cancelling the charter-party if the ship should not be ready for stiffening before the 15th Sept. 1913. The plaintiffs re-chartered the ship to the defendants by a charter-party dated the 2nd May 1913 for a voyage to the same port in Chile, the rate of freight being 28s. 6d. per ton. The defendants, in breach of their contract, refused to load the ship at a time when the market rate of freight had fallen to 17s. per ton.

In an action by the plaintiffs to recover the difference between 17s. and 28s. 6d. per ton:

Held, that they were only entitled to recover the difference between 21s. and 28s. 6d.

COMMERCIAL COURT.

Action tried by Rowlatt, J.

The plaintiffs claimed damages for breach of a charter-party.

The sailing vessel Kensington was chartered by her owners to the plaintiffs for the carriage of a cargo of coals to a port in Chile, and, after the discharge of the coal, to load a cargo of nitrate of soda for a port in the United Kingdom or the Continent. It was provided by the charter-party that freight should be payable at the rate of 21s. per ton, and also that "should the vessel not be ready for stiffening before the 15th Sept. 1913, charterers' agents to have the option of cancelling this charter-party."

A sub-charter was subsequently entered into dated the 2nd May 1913 by which it was agreed between the plaintiffs as chartered owners and the defendants as sub-charterers that the Kensington should proceed to Pisagua, and, after delivery of her outward cargo, should load a cargo of nitrate of soda and then proceed to a safe port in the United Kingdom or the Continent as ordered at a freight of 28s. 6d. per ton. The sub-charter also contained the provisions that sufficient cargo for stiffening should be supplied when required by the master, and, should the vessel not have arrived at Pisagua and be ready to load on or before the 15th Dec. 1913, charterers or their agents should have the option of cancelling the charter-party.

The Kensington arrived at Pisagua on the 3rd Dec., and proceeded to discharge her cargo. It was not until the 11th Dec. that the master was in a position to ask for stiffening, when the defendants took the view that it was impossible for the vessel to load the stiffening and discharge the remainder of the coal cargo in time to be ready to load the nitrate by the 15th Dec. In accordance with this view they declined to load the stiffening, and cancelled the charter-party. The plaintiffs thereupon cancelled their contract with the owners, as they were entitled to do under the terms of the original charter-party. The plaintiffs by their claim alleged that the defendants had committed a breach of the charter-party in refusing to load, and, the market rate of freight at the time of the alleged breach being 17s. per ton, they claimed as damages the difference between that sum and 28s. 6d. per ton, the rate fixed by the sub-charter.

Leck, K.C. and Jowitt for the plaintiffs.—The proper measure of damages is the difference between the market rate of freight at the date of breach and the rate paid by the sub-charter. They referred to

Rodocanachi v. Milburn, 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 100; 56 L. T. Rep. 594; 18 Q. B. Div. 67, 77;
Williams Brothers v. E. T. Agius Limited, 110 L. T. Rep. 865; (1914) A. C. 510.

Greer, K.C. and A. R. Kennedy for the defendants.—The principle applicable in the case of sale of unascertained goods has no bearing where the subject-matter of the sale is specific. By cancelling their contract with the owners, the plaintiffs saved themselves 21s. per ton, and the proper measure of damages is therefore the difference between the contract rate of 28s. 6d. and the 21s.

Cur. adv. vult.

ROWLATT, J. delivered a written judgment, in the course of which His Lordship found that the defendants had failed to prove the impossibility of loading by the date fixed by the contract and therefore had committed a breach of contract. His Lordship proceeded:—

The only remaining question is as to the measure of damages. The freight under the charter-party was 28s. 6d. The market rate at the time of the breach was 17s. The plaintiffs, however, were not owners of the ship. They held her under charter at 21s, and that charter-party would come to an end after the voyage for which they had re-chartered to the defendants. Further, the charter between the owners and plaintiffs contained a cancelling clause which in the events that had happened entitled the plaintiffs at the time of the breach by the defendants to cancel and get rid of the ship; and this they did.

As the plaintiffs only had the ship for this voyage, giving her up and saving 21s. per ton was the same thing as finding a charterer for her at 21s. for that voyage, though if they had held her under a longer charter the effect of surrendering her could not have been so measured. Under these circumstances the defendants say that the only damages suffered by the plaintiffs is the difference between 28s. 6d. and 21s., whereas the plaintiffs say it is 11s. 6d., the difference between the freight defendants were to pay and the market rate.

It is to be observed that if this is right the plaintiffs would put in their pockets 11s. 6d. as the result of the defendants' breach of contract, whereas if the contract had been fulfilled they would have put in their pockets only 7s. 6d.

(a) Reported by LEONARD C. THOMAS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

per ton. It was said for the plaintiffs that the circumstance that the plaintiffs had the right to cancel their own charter was collateral, and had no more effect upon the measure of damage than if the ship had been lost. In that case, however, the plaintiffs would merely have been delivered from an accrued loss by an independent circumstance accidentally supervening.

The true position in the case before me is that the right of the plaintiffs to cancel, that is to say, to dispose of the ship for 21*s.*, saved to themselves, was a circumstance essentially affecting the value to the plaintiffs of the specific thing which was thrown upon their hands—namely, the use of the ship for this voyage. They could either fix her in the market, receiving 17*s.* and paying 21*s.*, or save the 21*s.* and receive nothing. I think they were bound to choose the latter course, as they in fact did.

It all turns, of course, on the circumstance that the plaintiffs' charter was co-extensive with the defendants', otherwise they could not have dealt with the specific interest thrown on their hands, but only with a different and larger interest at 21*s.* It was, however, urged that the case is covered by the authority of Williams Brothers v. E. T. Agius Limited (sup.).

That, however, in the view which the House of Lords took of the facts, was simply a case of breach of contract to deliver unascertained goods, the vendee having made a forward contract to deliver similar goods. In such a case the well-established rule, which the House of Lords were asked to disturb but would not, is that goods to be delivered under a contract of sale must be taken to be worth to the purchaser the market price of the day, and that the state of his own contracts is immaterial.

Upon the whole, therefore, I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover damages at the rate of 7*s.* 6*d.* per ton on a full and complete cargo agreed at 2730 tons, that is to say, 955*l.* 10*s.*

Charter-party—Charter of vessel for an illegal voyage of which owners are ignorant—Rights of the owners.

The shipment of goods upon an illegal voyage, i.e., a voyage that cannot be performed without violating the law of the flag of the country or the law of the place where the goods are to be carried to, being a voyage which would involve the ship in consequences either of forfeiture or delay, is analogous to the shipment of dangerous goods which may involve the destruction of the ship. The shipper undertakes that he will not ship goods which involve the risk of unusual danger or delay to the ship which the owner does not know of, or might not reasonably know of, without communicating to the owner facts which are within his knowledge indicating that there is such a risk.

AWARD in the form of a special case.

This was a case arising on a claim for demurrage, brought by the owners of the steamship Kaijo Maru against the charterers. It arose upon a case stated by the arbitrator. The charter-party was dated March 1915, for the carriage of a cargo of rice from Bassein to Alexandria at a certain fixed price per ton. There was fifteen days' demurrage over and above the stipulated number of lay days at a certain rate per ton. The ship was loaded under the charter-party, and left her port of loading on the 18th April bound for Alexandria.

While she was on her way to Alexandria the parties had negotiations for a variance in the charter-party. There had been a conversation with reference to an option to send the ship to Piræus, and on the 28th April the charterers wrote:

> With reference to our conversation with Mr. Cotts in regard to the Piræus option for this steamer, we are now working this cargo to the Piræus at a difference of 7*s.* 6*d.* per ton over the Alexandria rate, say 77*s.* 6*d.* per ton, as agreed to by Mr. Cotts, and there is a good prospect of the cargo being fixed to that port.

On the 29th April the shipowners wrote to the charterers:

> We are in receipt of your favour of yesterday, from which we note you confirm the terms on which you are working Piræus option. These are in order, and we await to hear definitely just what you are able to do.

On the supposition that it was an option, which is possibly what the parties meant, on the 30th April the charterers wrote to the shipowners:

> We confirm our telephone conversation, &c., and shall be glad if you will instruct the captain at Port Said to proceed to Piræus.

Accordingly on the 6th May the owners sent orders to the captain of the vessel at Suez to arrange to discharge at Piræus at 7*s.* 6*d.* extra freight.

The ship arrived at Suez on the 10th May, and when she arrived at Suez the charterers tried to get the consent of the Admiralty authorities to her proceeding on the voyage, which they had agreed, to Piræus. There were negotiations about it, and eventually it was refused. The Admiralty never would consent to her going to Piræus, and eventually, after she remained there at Suez about twenty-one or twenty-two days, she was sent to her original destination, Alexandria, and the Piræus voyage became impossible.

The shipowners alleged that they were entitled to recover damages caused by the ship being delayed.

The arbitrator found that the ship was delayed at Port Said for twenty-two days; that such detention was wholly due to the fact that the charterers had not obtained permission of the Government authorities for the destination of the ship and cargo being changed to Piræus; that, when negotiating with the owners to send the ship to Piræus, the charterers were aware of the fact that to send the ship to that destination the permission from the Government authorities was necessary; that they did not communicate this to the owners; and that the charterers were aware in May 1915 that the required permission would not be granted.

On those findings the arbitrator made an award in favour of the shipowners.

In the course of the argument it became necessary to ascertain whether or not the shipowners were also aware that permission was or might be required. The case was sent back to the arbitrator with the view of dealing with that question. In a supplemental award made by the arbitrator in April 1916, he found that the owners had no knowledge and might not reasonably have known that permission from the Government authorities was necessary to discharge the cargo at Piræus.

Roche, K.C. and Norman Raeburn for the shipowners.

Leslie Scott, K.C. and R. A. Wright for the charterers.

The arguments of counsel sufficiently appear in the judgment of the court. The following cases were referred to:

Brass v. Maitland, 6 E. & B. 470; 26 L. J. 57, Q. B.;
Dunn v. Bucknall, 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 336; 87 L. T. Rep. 497;
Greenshields, Cowie, and Co. v. Stephens and Sons, 11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 167; 99 L. T. Rep. 597.

Atkin, J.—This is a case which arises on a claim for demurrage, brought by the owners of the steamship Kaijo Maru against the charterers. It arose upon a case stated by the arbitrator. The charter-party was dated March 1915 and the charterers of the ship required it for the carriage of a cargo of rice from Bassein to Alexandria at a certain fixed price per ton. There was fifteen days' demurrage over and above the stipulated number of lay days at a certain rate per ton.

The ship was loaded under the charter-party, and left her port of loading on the 18th April, bound for Alexandria. While she was on her way to Alexandria the parties had negotiations for a variance in the charter-party. There had been a conversation with reference to an option to send the ship to Piræus, and on the 28th April the charterers write: [His Lordship read the two letters of the 28th and 29th April as above set out and continued:]

I am inclined to think that, in itself, did amount to a variation of the charter, and was intended to fix Piræus. But on the supposition that it was an option, which is possibly what the parties meant, on the 30th April the charterers wrote to the shipowners:

> We confirm our telephone conversation, &c., and shall be glad if you will instruct the captain at Port Said to proceed to Piræus.

Accordingly on the 6th May the owners sent orders to the captain of the vessel at Suez to arrange to discharge at Piræus at 7*s.* 6d. extra freight. It appears to me that after that had happened, the terms of the charter-party had been varied, and the port of destination became Piræus instead of Alexandria. I do not think there was any longer, after the 30th April, any question of option. The charterers had determined the option they had, and it appears if they had wanted to send the ship to any other destination after that date they would have had to bargain again. I think after that date there was a fresh agreement made for a voyage to Piræus.

The ship arrived at Suez on the 10th May, and when she arrived at Suez the charterers tried to get the consent of the Admiralty authorities to her proceeding on the voyage, which they had agreed, to Piræus. There were negotiations about it, and eventually it was refused. The Admiralty never would consent to her going to Piræus, and eventually, after she remained there at Suez about twenty-one or twenty-two days, she was sent to her original destination, Alexandria, and the Piræus voyage became impossible.

Thereupon the shipowners say they are entitled to recover damages caused by the ship being delayed. I think that the right view in law is that the liabilities of the parties must be taken to be the same as though the cargo had been shipped at its port of loading on the original charter for Piræus. What was the position?

The arbitrator has found: [His Lordship read the findings of fact as above set out and continued:]

On those findings the arbitrator has made an award in favour of the shipowners. In the course of the discussion it appeared relevant to discover whether or not the shipowners were also aware that permission was required or might be required. The case was sent back to the arbitrator with the view of dealing with that question. In the supplemental award that the arbitrator has made, in April of this year, he found that the owners had no knowledge and might not reasonably have known that permission from the Government authorities was necessary to discharge the cargo at Piræus.

It was said by the shipowners first of all that this was a case where the charterers detained the ship at a port of call with a view of determining what port they should finally order her upon the then existing option that they had. I do not think that is the state of facts, because I think at the time when she was delayed there was no question of any option. Therefore, upon that footing, I do not think they would be entitled to recover. They further say the case is analogous to the case of shipping goods which are known to the charterers to be dangerous, in which case the charterers would be responsible for such damage as happened to the ship or shipowners in the course of the voyage. I was referred to Brass v. Maitland (sup.), where the majority of the court seem to have laid down that there is an absolute obligation on a shipper to make good damage caused by a shipment of dangerous goods. Crompton, J., however, took a narrower view. He said (at 26 L. J. 57, Q. B.): "Suppose, for instance, that a shipment was made of goods to a foreign port to which, according to the information known at the shipping port, such consignments might be properly and safely made, but that by some recent law the foreign country has made such shipment illegal, would the shipper be liable in such case? I entertain great doubt whether either the duty or the warranty extends beyond the cases where the shipper has knowledge or means of knowledge of the dangerous nature of the goods when shipped or when he has been guilty of some negligence as shipper, as by shipping without communicating danger which he had the means of knowing and ought to have communicated."

I think there can be no question but that the shipment of goods upon an illegal voyage, viz., upon a voyage that cannot be performed without violating the law of the flag of the country or the law of the place where the goods are to be carried to—a shipment of goods which would involve the ship in consequences either of forfeiture or delay—is precisely analogous to a shipment of dangerous goods which might cause the destruction of the ship. What is the full extent of the shipper's obligation? It appears to me that it amounts to this, that he stipulates that he will not ship goods which involve the risk of unusual danger or delay to the ship, which the owner does not know of or might not reasonably know of without communicating to the owner facts which are within his knowledge indicating that there is such a risk. That, I think, is to be the stipulation on behalf of the shipper within certainly very moderate limits. I do not say it is not wider than that.

I take the findings of the arbitrator to be here that the shippers did know when they made this contract of affreightment with the shipowners that the goods could not be taken to Piræus; that that was the position in respect of them, though the Government might, if the shippers succeeded in inducing them to do so, give them a licence. In other words, that the destination in itself was an illegal destination because the British Government would not allow the goods to go through unless a special permission was given.

I think it must be taken on the findings themselves, by which of course I am bound, that the shippers knew, and the shipowners did not know, and could not reasonably have known, that the vessel would not be allowed to proceed without special permission. The arbitrator has found that as a fact, and I am bound by his finding in that respect. In these circumstances it appears to me that it follows on the findings of the arbitrator that this delay arose from a breach by the charterers. I think, therefore, the shipowners have a cause of action against the charterers for the delay so caused, and the arbitrator has found what that should be, and with that, of course, I cannot interfere.

Therefore, I think this award on the findings of the arbitrator must stand, and the shipowners must have the costs of this hearing.

Commercial List.

Action tried by Rowlatt, J. without a jury.

In May 1914 the defendants agreed to buy from the plaintiffs a quantity of Calcutta hessian at a price c.i.f. Smyrna, to be shipped from Calcutta so as to arrive at Smyrna in Sept. 1914. On the 20th July 1914 the hessian was shipped at Calcutta on the British steamship City of Winchester, being insured by a policy containing the f.c. and s. clause. On the 4th Aug. 1914 war was declared between this country and Germany, and on the 13th Aug. the City of Winchester was sunk with her cargo by a German vessel.

The defendants were not informed that the goods had been shipped by the City of Winchester in time to enable them to effect an insurance of the goods against war risks. They complained that they should have been given this information in time for them to effect such insurance, and refused to take up the shipping documents and pay for the goods.

The plaintiffs thereupon brought this action for damages for breach of contract.

The defendants denied liability, and counterclaimed for damages for breach of duty.

Leslie Scott, K.C. and Stuart Bevan for the plaintiffs.—Under a contract on c.i.f. terms entered into in peace time a seller is only liable to insure against those risks against which it is usual to insure. Therefore, if a state of war subsequently arises, he is not liable to insure against war risks. They referred to

Roche, K.C. and Harold Smith for the defendants.—Sect. 32 (3) of the Sale of Goods Act 1893 provides:

Unless otherwise agreed, where goods are sent by the seller to the buyer by a route involving sea transit, under circumstances in which it is usual to insure, the seller must give such notice to the buyer as may enable him to insure them during their sea transit, and if the seller fails to do so, the goods shall be deemed to be at his risk during such sea transit.

That section clearly applies here. The goods were sent by the plaintiffs to the defendants by a route involving sea transit, and under the circumstances at the time of shipment (i.e., at the end of July 1914), owing to the strained relations between Great Britain and Germany, it was usual to insure against war risks. The plaintiffs, therefore, should have given notice to the defendants so as to enable them to insure the goods against war risks during the voyage from Calcutta to Smyrna. As they failed to do so, the goods are at their risk, and the defendants are entitled to succeed on the counter-claim. They referred to Leslie Scott, K.C. replied.

ROWLATT, J. stated the facts and dealt with other points raised in the case, and then continued:—In my opinion sect. 32 (3) of the Sale of Goods Act 1893 clearly does not apply to this case. It does not apply to a c.i.f. contract in time of peace when war is not contemplated, because such a contract provides for all the insurance which is customary. The contract in this case is a c.i.f. contract and was made at a time when no one anticipated that within three months a state of war would be in existence. Subsequently, it is true, strained relations between Great Britain and Germany came into being, followed by an outbreak of hostilities, and there were risks which were in addition to those insured against in times of peace. But I do not think that a new obligation thereby arose for the seller, for sect. 32 (3) applies to a contract as at the time that contract is made—that is to say, in this case, in May 1914. The question whether sect 32 (3) would apply to a c.i.f. contract made when insurances other than those to be provided by the seller—e.g., war risks—are usual does not arise, and I leave it open. There is no real evidence here that it was usual to insure against war risks at any material time. The plaintiffs are, therefore, entitled to judgment.

LOVE AND STEWART LIMITED v. ROWTOR STEAMSHIP COMPANY LIMITED. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE SECOND DIVISION OF THE COURT OF SESSION IN SCOTLAND

Charter-party — Lay days — Demurrage — Loading and discharge at a certain rate "Reversible" — Custom of port.

Under a charter-party the appellants chartered a ship belonging to the respondents to carry a cargo of pit-props from the Baltic to Newport, Mon., the cargo "to be loaded at the rate of 125 fathoms daily and discharged at the rate of 125 fathoms daily reversible with customary steamship dispatch as fast as the steamer can receive and deliver during the ordinary working hours of the respective ports, but according to the custom of the respective ports, Sundays, general or local holidays (unless used) in both loading and discharging excepted."

The agreed rate was equivalent to thirteen days for loading and discharging respectively.

At the port of loading the ship was loaded in nine days and, by arrangement between the master and the shipper, four days' dispatch money was deducted from freight and thirteen days were stated in the bill of lading to have been used. According to the custom of the port at Newport, Monmouth, the discharge of Baltic pit-props is suspended during wet weather and during the half of each Saturday. The ship began discharging on the 19th July, but owing to wet weather did not complete doing so until midday on the 9th Aug., and the shipowners contended that the thirteen days available for discharge expired on the 2nd Aug. and that the ship was on demurrage six and a half days, and to this contention the Court of Session gave effect.

Held, that as the intention was to have a fixed number of lay days, and these could not be affected by the custom of the port, the charterers could not except Saturday afternoons or wet days; but the effect of the word "reversible" was to entitle them to add the four days saved in loading to the days available for discharge as the shipper had no authority to "sell" the four days, and that in the circumstances the charterers were not barred from disputing the statement in the bill of lading that thirteen days had been "used for loading." The ship was accordingly only on demurrage for half a day.

APPEAL from an interlocutor of the Second Division of the Court of Session in Scotland (Lord Justice-Clerk (Scott Dickson), Lord Dundas, Lord Salvesen, and Lord Guthrie) which reversed a decision of the Lord Ordinary (Lord Hunter).

The respondents were the registered owners of the steamship Glamorgan of Cardiff; the appellants were pitwood importers and coal exporters at Glasgow.

By charter-party in form of the Chamber of Shipping Wood Charter (Scandinavia and Finland) to the United Kingdom 1899 between the respondents and the appellants, dated the 11th June 1912, the appellants chartered the steamship Glamorgan to carry a cargo of pit-props from the Baltic to Newport, Monmouth.

By clause 3 of the charter-party it was provided that the cargo was to be loaded at the rate of 125 fathoms daily and discharged at the rate of 125 fathoms daily reversible with customary steamship dispatch as fast as the steamer can receive and deliver during the ordinary working hours of the respective ports, but according to the custom of the respective ports, Sundays, general or local holidays (unless used) in both loading and discharging excepted."

(a) Reported by W. E. REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The cargo consisted of 1613 fathoms, so that the stipulated time for discharging amounted to thirteen days.

At the port of loading the Glamorgan was loaded in nine days, and four days' dispatch money was deducted from the freight. At Newport, Monmouth, where the Glamorgan was ordered to discharge, it is the custom not to work on Saturdays and not to unload pit-props in wet weather.

The ship began to unload on the 19th July, but owing to wet weather did not complete her discharge until midday on the 9th Aug.

The shipowners claimed six and a half days' demurrage. The charterers denied the claim, and alternatively said that they were entitled to add the four days saved in loading to the days available for discharge. In that case seventeen days were available for discharging, and, the 4th Aug. having been a Sunday and the 5th Aug. a Bank Holiday, which admittedly did not fall to be computed as lay days, the lay days did not expire till the 8th Aug. The steamer was accordingly only on demurrage for half a day.

In an action by the shipowners to recover demurrage for six and a half days, the Lord Ordinary held that only demurrage for half a day could be claimed.

On appeal that judgment was reversed, and the claim for six and a half days' demurrage allowed.

The charterers appealed.

The House took time for consideration.

Lord PARKER OF WADDINGTON —In this case I have had the advantage of reading and I agree with the opinion about to be read by Lord Sumner. To that opinion I desire to add nothing.

Lord SUMNER then read the following judgment:—The defenders, Messrs. Love and Stewart Limited, by a contract dated the 21st Oct. 1911, bought from Erland Grankull, of Kristinestad, in Finland, a large parcel of pit-props for delivery in the following season, f.o.b. at Kristinestad, by steamers which they would provide for the purpose. Payment was to be by bill at sight in Glasgow for the invoice amount against indorsed bills of lading. There was a further term for Grankull's benefit, that the ship should clear with him or his agents and also employ his stevedores, paying him for the services rendered.

To provide for the carriage of part of this parcel Messrs. Love and Stewart Limited chartered the pursuers' steamship Glamorgan, by a charter dated the 11th June 1912. It was in the well-known "Scanfin" form with some manuscript alterations. In particular, clause 3, the lay day and demurrage clause, was altered by interlineating after "loaded" the words "at the rate of 125 fathoms daily," and after "discharged" the words "at the rate of 125 fathoms daily, reversible." None of the printed words as to loading were struck out and no question of mistake or rectification was raised. The ship loaded and discharged a quantity of pit-props, which at the agreed rate gave thirteen days each at the ports of loading and discharge respectively. She was ordered to Newport, Monmouth, and there discharged her cargo to Messrs. Love and Stewart Limited.

The question which arises on this clause relates to wet days and Saturday half-holidays. The pursuers admitted that "according to the custom of the port at Newport, Monmouth, the discharge of Baltic pit-props is suspended during wet weather and during the half of each Saturday." The question is whether on the words of the charter the time when the discharge of the Glamorgan was suspended for these reasons counts as laying time against the receivers of the cargo.

I think that the parties have manifested a clear intention in the charter to contract on the basis of a fixed number of lay days, for discharge at a daily rate enables the number of lay days to be fixed as soon as the quantity of the cargo is known and is equivalent to fixing the number of lay days beforehand. The clause, having begun with the expression of such a stipulation, then proceeds in the words of the form, words which refer to the customs of the port and to the circumstances of the shipowner and his ship and of the receiver and his appliances as they happen to exist at the particular port at the time of the loading or discharge as the case may be. Your Lordships' House placed an interpretation on these printed words in Hulthen v. Stewart (9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 403; 89 L. T. Rep. 702; (1903) A. C. 389), which is not only final in law, but is exceedingly well known among all persons concerned in chartering steamers in this trade. That decision was in accordance with the earlier decision in Postlethwaite v. Freeland (4 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 302; 42 L. T. Rep. 845; 5 A. C. 599). In view of those cases I think it is so clear that these printed provisions for lay days based on a time which is reasonable under all the circumstances stand in antithesis to lay days based on a number of days fixed or capable of being fixed, such as the written words provide for, as to make it impossible in the present case to give effect to both sets of words as measures of the time allowed for loading and discharging. The intention to have fixed lay days is clear and must prevail. Furthermore, the days which are to be excepted in computing the lay days are the subject of an express provision which is complete in itself. Accordingly, as I think that in view of this circumstance neither the ordinary working hours nor the custom of the respective ports can be availed of to introduce into the fixed lay days further exceptions of days or parts of days, it is sufficient to say that these printed provisions must refer to the manner of discharge for any effect they may have, and that matter need not further be considered.

I think that time during which the weather is wet, which is time that may be measured by minutes or by hours, and the half of each Saturday, which though half of a calendar day may not be the same as a moiety of the number of working hours on an ordinary day, cannot be brought within the exception of "Sundays, general or local holidays." They are not days within the exception in the clause. A wet day, even if it rains all day, is not a day in the sense in which Sunday or Monday or Bank Holiday is a day. Consecutive days are running even though rain may prevent the receiver from getting any benefit from them. Saturday afternoons are the more plausible case of the two, but the exception in the charter is clearly based on days, not on parts of days. I do not think the term extends to the latter part of a weekday, on which it is usual not to work, although we all call it and enjoy it under the name of a Saturday half-holiday. Really it is a half-day, which while it lasts is wholly holiday, and I do not think that "general or local holidays" cover it. No case to that effect was cited out of the many cases decided on lay days, and one must remember that this form of words was meant to apply to the varying conditions of a great variety of foreign ports as well as to those of ports in the United Kingdom.

At Kristinestad the whole cargo was loaded in nine days, and the effect of the word "reversible" in the charter is that the receivers were entitled to seventeen lay days under the charter for discharging the ship at Newport. The pursuers claim (and the burden is on them) to be able to show that in the circumstances only thirteen days were available for the receiver. The circumstances are these. By a memorandum written in the margin of the charter the captain was instructed to apply for cargo to a Mr. Easton, of Wiborg. Mr. Easton was the defenders' general agent in Finland, though what the precise limits of his authority may have been we do not know. By him the captain was referred to Mr Grankull. In loading the cargo Mr. Grankull partly acted on his own account to deliver the pit-props on board of a ship of the purchasers' providing in accordance with the contract of sale, partly as the charterers' agent to fulfil their charter obligations to load a full cargo and to make advances on account of freight for ship's disbursements, and partly as the ship's agent to report and clear her at the custom house at Kristinestad, and to do her business generally, and particularly to engage her stevedores, all for some moderate fees to himself.

As is very commonly done, the captain and Grankull made an arrangement for a payment to the latter, if he gave the ship dispatch. Accordingly he worked overtime, saved four days on the total of thirteen which the ship was bound to allow him under the charter, and earned 31*l.* 10*s.* If the captain had carried 40*l.* or 50*l.* about with him in cash he might have paid the money then and there. Instead, the amount was, by agreement, included in the ship's disbursements and brought up the sum of 436*l.* 5*s.* 6*d.* disbursed for customs and port dues, stowage, and so forth, to a total of 467*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.* The captain was to acknowledge this sum to have been received by him under the charter as an advance on freight to be earned on the voyage. In substance, having to pay Grankull 31*l.* 10*s.* for himself, he did so by borrowing the money for the purpose from Grankull as the charterers' agent under the charter to advance money for ships' disbursements at the port of loading. He then enabled Grankull to obtain the money for himself from the defenders by including it in the sum acknowledged by him on the bill of lading as advance freight, and Grankull in due course included in his invoice for the timber sold the sum of 467*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.* advanced for disbursements, and his bill for the total amount was duly met by the defendants on taking up the bill of lading.

What is the effect of this? The captain, using a familiar phrase, says that Grankull "sold" him the four days, and when the bill of lading came to be made out he wished to write in the margin "thirteen days left for discharging,' pursuant to instructions from his owners to "try and get under the bill of lading the days left for discharging inserted in the margin." A Mr. M'Kerrachar, a clerk of Mr. Easton's, whose business had been to superintend the loading in the interest of the defenders, was present when the bill of lading was completed and successfully stood out for the words "thirteen days used for loading." They were written seemingly by M'Kerrachar himself in the margin of the bill of lading, but not among the words which express a contract of carriage. The bill of lading incorporated the charter, of which the captain had a copy.

There is no evidence that M'Kerrachar had any authority or purported to have or to exercise any authority to bind the defenders in this matter. The insertion of the note in the bill of lading evidenced no new bargain with the captain. His bargain for dispatch money had been made with Grankull some days before. Grankull had no authority to make any variation of the terms of the charter so as to bind the defenders, and as far as we know he purported to act on his own behalf. The captain says he looked on him as the defenders' agent, but, having the charter before him which showed the scope of the authority, such as it was, he could not rely on any ostensible authority ultra, even if Grankull had purported to act for the defenders in the matter, which was not the case. It is said that if the days "bought" from Grankull were to be added to the defenders' days at Newport, the captain was throwing his owners' money away, for they might have to "buy" them over again at the port of discharge, and that was plain to the captain, to Grankull and to M'Kerrachar at Kristinestad, and must have been plain to the defenders too at Newport. There is some truth in this. If the defenders had insisted on their pound of flesh they might have detained the ship at Newport for seventeen days, when thirteen would have sufficed, or have extorted more dispatch money as the price of earlier discharge, but there is no evidence that this was feared on the one side or intended on the other. If they did not do so, then four days' dispatch at Kristinestad was worth money to the ship, for this might be the saving of another open water voyage to the Baltic in the autumn, and in any case four days of the steamship's time somewhere were saved. The bargain itself evidently did not purport to include as a term that there should only be thirteen days for discharging, for the captain was only to "try" to get this on the bill of lading. He failed, and the statement put on it was incorrect to the knowledge of all parties, nor did it operate as an admission against the defenders, for M'Kerrachar had no authority to admit anything.

I think that what occurred at Kristinestad in itself effected no alteration of the defendants' rights under the charter. At Newport they presented the bill of lading, knowing by that time from M'Kerrachar's letters that some dispatch had been given and paid for, but not the number of days nor the price, and knowing also that the advance freight came to 467*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.*, but not how the disbursements were made up. They knew that the note on the bill of lading as to days used was wrong, but not how far it was wrong. They drew no attention to the matter on presenting the bill of lading. The witness who gave this evidence was expressly accepted by the Lord Ordinary as truthful. As was natural the balance of freight was not paid in one sum, but in instalments as the discharge proceeded. The first payment of 350*l.* was on the 1st Aug., the twelfth lay day; there were several other payments on account, and the balance, partly made up of 467*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.*, the advance of freight for disbursements at Kristinestad, was only settled on the 18th Aug., nine days after the end of the discharge.

It is suggested by the pursuers that in some way the defenders are barred by this conduct from disputing that thirteen days were in fact used at Kristinestad, and from disputing that Grankull had authority to sell four days for them for 31*l.* 10s., which he kept for himself. In the alternative it is suggested that in presenting the bill of lading without protest and in taking the benefit of the amount of 467*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.* as an advance of freight the defenders either ratified what was done at Kristinestad or approbated it in part, namely, the advance of 31*l.* 10*s.* to the captain by Grankull as their agent, and must approbate the transaction in whole or not at all.

With all respect to the learned judges of the Extra Division of the Court of Session, with whom these considerations prevailed, I think the arguments are unfounded. Grankull did not purport to act for the defenders, so there can be no ratification. If the presentation of the bill of lading could be treated as a representation by the defenders to the pursuers that thirteen days had been used at Kristinestad, it was a representation as to which the pursuers knew the truth, and they did not act or change their position on the faith of it. When the defenders took the benefit of the alleged advance of freight up to 467*l.* 15*s.* 6*d.*, the present dispute as to lay days at Newport was in full swing. They had, in fact, allowed Grankull that amount as money advanced for ship's disbursements and they declined to pay any more freight to the shipowners. Whether they need have paid Grankull or not is a matter which cannot affect the shipowners' rights; that could only be done by some bargain binding between the defenders and the pursuers. Grankull found the captain the money with which to pay for dispatch, not in a cash loan, but by an entry in an account, which was intended to be available to the defenders, as in fact they have availed themselves of it, but it was not accompanied by any agreement binding on them that they should be prejudiced in respect of discharging time.

Furthermore, in presenting the bill of lading the defenders merely did what they must needs do in order to get delivery of their cargo. They received it from Grankull under the contract of sale as the symbol of the delivery of goods while afloat. Nothing had occurred by which any contract for the carriage of the goods arose between them and the shipowners other than the charter itself. No new bargain had been made, under which the pursuers carried for the defenders under a bill of lading instead of a charter. The freight earned was chartered freight and the bill of lading in the defenders' hands was only the ship's receipt for the goods. This is the ordinary effect of documents such as these under such circumstances, and the cases cited do not bear upon them.

In the result the defenders were entitled to seventeen, not thirteen, lay days at Newport. As they cannot except days when it rained and Saturday afternoons the ship was on demurrage but for half a day only, and not, as the Lord Ordinary held, for two and a half days, or, as the Extra Division held, for six and a half. I think, therefore, that this appeal should be allowed with costs; that the interlocutor appealed from should be discharged with costs here and in the Extra Division, and that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be restored with the substitution only of 23*l.* 10*s.* for the sum of 117*l.* 12*s.* 1*d.* which he awarded.

Lord Wrenbury.—I agree with the opinion delivered and I have nothing to add.

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Carriage by direct route—Liberty to call at intermediate port—Exception of King's enemies—Deviation to intermediate port not usually visited by owners' ships—Destruction by enemy vessel—Liability of owners.

In Nov. 1914 the defendants, a steamship company, contracted to carry a cargo of wool from New Zealand to London in their steamship the T. The bills of lading provided for "direct service between New Zealand and London," and contained these two clauses: Clause 1. "With liberty on the way to London to call and stay at any intermediate port or ports to discharge or take on board passengers, cargo, coal, or other supplies." Clause 3. "The owners are to be at liberty to carry the said goods to their port of destination by the above or other steamer or steamers, ship or ships, either belonging to themselves or to other persons proceeding by any route, and whether directly or indirectly to such port, and in so doing to carry the goods beyond their port of destination, and to tranship or land and store the goods either on shore or afloat and reship and forward the same at the owner's expense, but at merchant's risk." The exception clause excepted the "King's enemies." Besides the wool the T. carried a quantity of frozen meat for delivery at Havre. The vessel kept a direct course from New Zealand to London until she reached the Casquets, when she turned and made for Havre, which was not one of the usual ports visited by the defendants' steamships. When a few miles from Havre she was sunk by a German submarine. The plaintiffs, who were indorsees and holders of the bills of lading under which the wool was shipped, brought an action against the defendants claiming damages for breach of contract.

Held, that Havre was not an intermediate port within the meaning of the bills of lading on the voyage of this vessel from New Zealand to London, and that in making for that port she was deviating from her voyage and the defendants thereby lost the benefits of the exceptions in the bill of lading.

And, further, that, inasmuch as the defendants by deviating were breaking their contract as carriers, they were liable for the loss occasioned by the King's enemies.

Decision of Bailhache, J. (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 400; 114 L. T. Rep. 746; (1916) 1 K. B. 747) affirmed.

Appeal from the decision of Bailhache, J. (reported 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 400; 114 L. T. Rep. 746; (1916) 1 K. B. 747). The plaintiffs were consignees and owners of 158 bales of wool shipped from Wellington, New Zealand, in the steamship Tokomaru, owned by the defendants, the Shaw, Savill, and Albion Company Limited. The Tokomaru was one of the defendant company's regular line from New Zealand to the United Kingdom. The goods were shipped under a bill of lading dated the 19th Nov. 1914, which was headed: "Direct service between New Zealand and London." The bill of lading gave the shipowners extensive liberty to load at any port in New Zealand, and contained these clauses:

1. . . . And bound (subject to the before-mentioned liberties) on finally leaving New Zealand for London and with liberty on the way to London to call and stay at any intermediate port or ports to discharge or take on board passengers, cargo, coal, or other supplies, with permission, if desired, for the vessel to call at Rio de Janeiro and (or) Montevideo and (or) La Plata.

3. The owners are to be at liberty to carry the said goods to their port of destination by the above or other steamer or steamers, ship or ships, either belonging to themselves or to other persons, proceeding by any route, and whether directly or indirectly to such port, and in so doing to carry the goods beyond their port of destination, and to tranship or load and store goods either on shore or afloat and reship and forward the same at the owner's expense, but at merchant's risk.

The exceptions clause included "act of God" and the "King's enemies."

The regular course taken by steamers of the defendant line from New Zealand to London after leaving Ushant was to proceed direct to the south side of the Isle of Wight and thence up the Channel, through the Straits of Dover, to the Thames. On the occasion in question the defendants undertook the carriage of a quantity of frozen meat to Havre.

The Tokomaru commenced her voyage and was within seven or eight miles from Havre when she was torpedoed by a German submarine and sank, all her cargo being lost.

The plaintiffs thereupon commenced this action claiming 4013*l.* agreed damages from the defendants for loss of the cargo. Bailhache, J. held (1) that clause 3 of the bills of lading did not avail the defendants, since it only applied when transhipment of the cargo from the T. to another vessel had taken place, and, even if that were not so, the bills of lading would be ambiguous (Elderslie Steamship Company v. Borthwick, 92 L. T. Rep. 274; (1905) A. C. 93); (2) that the provisions of clause 1 did not constitute a defence to the plaintiffs' claim, since, assuming that Havre was an intermediate port within the meaning of the clause, when the route and ports of call of a line of steamships had become stereotyped, mere general words in the owners' own bill of lading giving liberty to call at intermediate ports would not justify their calling at some entirely fresh intermediate port; (3) that after deviation the defendants were only common carriers and were not protected by the common law exception of the King's enemies, since in deviating they were breaking their contract with the plaintiffs and not fulfilling it; and (4) that it was unnecessary for the plaintiffs, in order to substantiate their claim, to show that the natural and probable result of deviating to Havre was that the T. would be sunk by hostile craft. The plaintiffs were therefore entitled to judgment.

The defendants appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 28. — Swinfen Eady, L.J. read the following judgment:—The plaintiffs are holders for value of two bills of lading for a quantity of wool shipped at Napier, New Zealand, for London by the defendants' steamship Tokomaru. This ship was torpedoed on the 30th Jan. 1915 by a German submarine when between seven and eight miles from Havre, and ship and cargo were an actual total loss. The plaintiffs sue for breach of the contract evidenced by the bill of lading. The defendants, while admitting the total loss of the goods, dispute their liability. They say that the loss occurred by an excepted peril, the King's enemies. The plaintiffs contend that the defendants are not entitled to rely upon the exception contained in the bill of lading, as they say the Tokomaru was deviating from the contract voyage by leaving the direct course for London and proceeding to Havre when the disaster occurred, and that the liberties contained in the bill of lading did not permit that to be done. This raises the first question—namely, whether the Tokomaru was deviating in proceeding towards Havre. If not deviating, there is an end of the matter, and the shipowners are protected from liability by the bill of lading. If, however, the Tokomaru was deviating, the further question arises as to the liability of the defendants as carriers under the circumstances. The defendants contend that they incurred no greater liability than that of common carriers, and are therefore not liable for acts of the King's enemies.

The bills of lading are dated in Nov. 1914, and are in the following form: [His Lordship read the words in the margin of the bills of lading, "Direct service between New Zealand and London," and the clause set out above.] Clause 3 of the bill of lading was referred to, but seems to me to have no bearing on the present dispute. There was not any transhipment.

The ordinary route for steamers of this line is, outbound bound, viâ Cape of Good Hope to New Zealand; homeward bound, from New Zealand viâ Cape Horn and west of the Falkland Islands to Montevideo, then to Teneriffe or Madeira, and thence direct to London.

Owing to certain instructions given by reason of the war the Tokomaru on her last voyage passed east of the Falkland Islands, and when off Pernambuco passed considerably to the east of her ordinary course. But nothing turns in this case upon any such variation, upon Admiralty instructions given by reason of the war. This ship was a cargo boat. Passenger ships of the same line going to and from New Zealand frequently call at Plymouth, but not so cargo boats. So far as appears from the evidence, this was the first time that a vessel of this line coming from New Zealand and bound for London had been instructed to call at Havre. The intended call was brought about in this way. A special arrangement was made to carry some frozen meat to France. At one time it was contemplated calling at Bordeaux to discharge this cargo, and in some of the bills of lading for part cargo of this ship liberty to call at Bordeaux was inserted, but on reaching Teneriffe the captain was instructed by the owners to proceed to Havre and discharge the meat cargo there. On leaving Teneriffe the course, whether for Havre or to London direct, is the same to a point about ten miles off the Casquets. There the routes diverge. From the point of divergence it is 107 miles to Havre and 118 miles Havre to Dover. Thus from the point of divergence to Dover viâ Havre it is 225 miles; from the point of divergence to Dover direct it is 171 miles; so by proceeding to Havre the length of the voyage would be increased by fifty-four miles. From Havre to the nearest point of the ship's ordinary route to Dover is a distance of sixty-eight miles. The direct service between New Zealand and London by the Shaw, Savill, and Albion Line has been long established and is well known, and the boats always follow substantially the same route outwards or homewards, as the case may be.

The first question is, Can it be said that the ship had liberty to go to Havre to discharge cargo by reason of the "liberty on the way to London to call and stay at any immediate port or ports to discharge or take on board passengers, cargo, coal, or other supplies"? It must be borne in mind when considering the true construction and effect of bills of lading that it is important to everyone concerned in the carriage of goods by sea—whether shipper, shipowner, or insurer—that the route by which the ship and goods are to pass should be determined, that the risks may be estimated on that basis. Lord Esher said in Leduc and Co. v. Ward and others (sup.): "It is obviously a most important part of the contract of carriage by sea that the route by which the goods are to be brought should be determined," and he has referred just previously to the difficulty of insuring the goods if it is not known for what voyage they were to be insured. Bowen, L.J. in Glynn v. Margetson (sup.) and Cozens-Hardy, L.J. in Joseph Thorley Limited v. Orchis Steamship Company Limited (sup.) regarded the matter from the same point of view.

Again, where parties have agreed upon a voyage, and have specified that voyage in the bill of lading, the definition of the voyage must, as a matter of business, cut down the general words of the bill of lading to what is fairly applicable to the voyage which has been agreed upon and defined. Any other construction would make business impossible: (Glynn v. Margetson, sup.). In the same case in the House of Lords Lord Herschell referred to the necessity of construing a bill of lading from a business point of view and in limiting general words by the main object and intent of the contract. He said: "The ports a visit to which would be justified under this contract would, no doubt, differ according to the particular voyage stipulated for between the shipper and the shipowner; but it must, in my view, be a liberty consistent with the main object of the contract—a liberty only to proceed to and stay at the ports which are in the course of the voyage. In saying that I am, of course, speaking in a business sense. It may be said that no port is directly in the course of the voyage (indeed that was argued by the learned counsel for the appellants) inasmuch as in merely entering a port or approaching it nearly you deviate from the direct course between the port of shipment and the ultimate port of destination. That is perfectly true; but in a business sense it would be perfectly well understood to say that there were certain ports on the way between Malaga and Liverpool, and those are the ports at which I think the right to touch and stay is given." In the bill of lading in question in this action there is given a very wide liberty to proceed backwards and forwards to ports and places in New Zealand, and notwithstanding that such ports or places are out of or away from the customary or geographical route to the port of discharge. This gives the shipowners wide facilities for taking in cargo in New Zealand, but after having done so the ship is "bound (subject to the before-mentioned liberties) on finally leaving New Zealand for London." This is the main object of the voyage. It is a voyage from New Zealand to London. Then follows the liberty "on the way to London" to call and stay at any intermediate port or ports, and then with permission to call at three named places in South America, but for a limited purpose only—taking on board coal, supplies, and (or) cargo, and (or) live stock. There is no liberty to call there for discharging cargo. The ships of this line habitually avail themselves of the liberty "on the way to London" to call at any intermediate port or ports by calling at Teneriffe or Madeira, where they coal. That port lies on the route which they habitually take "on the way to London." But can it be said that Havre is an intermediate port in any proper sense of the term, as used in the bill of lading? It is distant sixty-eight miles from the nearest point of the route to London, and in order to reach it involves the vessel going off her course in one direction 107 miles. It is not shown to be a usual or customary port for vessels of this size and class coming from New Zealand to enter. In this particular case it was only for a special purpose, and by reason of a special bargain made after the plaintiffs' goods were shipped, that the captain was instructed to go to Havre. If the question be put, as in Leduc and Co. v. Ward and others (sup), is Havre substantially a port which will be passed on the named voyage, New Zealand to London? the answer must be in the negative. If the question be put is Havre a port which would naturally and usually be a port of call on the named voyage? the answer must be certainly not. If the question suggested by Lord Esher's judgment in Glynn v. Margetson (sup.) be put is Havre a port in the course of the voyage, in the sense that it may be reached by the ship going slightly out of her course? the answer must again be in the negative. By slightly out of her course is meant does the ship on her course go fairly close to the port, and in order to enter the port, or call off it, would she only have to go a very short distance out of her course? Whether you take the distance in the present case as 107 miles or as sixty-eight miles only, the departure from the course of the voyage is quite substantial, and not slight.

Again, the liberty is to call and stay at any intermediate port or ports, and if this liberty extends to Havre it seems to follow that almost any port in the English Channel available for a steamer of this size and draught, and on either the French or English coast, would be within the liberty, which certainly cannot have been intended or contemplated by the parties. The defendants take advantage of the liberty by calling at Teneriffe or Madeira, which are intermediate ports, but, in my judgment, Havre is not such port within the meaning of this bill of lading. The defendants' letter to Mr. Findlay dated the 8th Jan. 1915 shows that they themselves correctly appreciated the risk they would run in departing from their accustomed route.

I am of opinion that it is impossible to lay down any hard and fast rule by which it may be determined whether any particular port is an intermediate port within the meaning of a bill of lading. In construing the document all the surrounding circumstances must be taken into consideration. The size and class of ship, the nature of the voyage, the usual and customary course, the natural or usual ports of call, the nature and position of the port in question. It is a question of fact in each case, and, in my judgment, Bailhache, J. was right in deciding that Havre was not an intermediate port on the voyage of this vessel from New Zealand to London, and that the Tokomaru in making for that port was deviating from her voyage, and that the defendants thereby lost the benefit of the exceptions in the bill of lading: (Joseph Thorley Limited v. Orchis Steamship Company Limited (sup.); Internationale Guano-en-Superphosphaatwerken v. Robert MacAndrew and Co. (sup.).

If that be so, the remaining question is whether the defendants are protected from liability as carriers by the fact that the loss occurred through the King's enemies. If they, as carriers, were duly performing their contract of carriage, they would not be liable for loss occasioned by the King's enemies. But they are breaking their contract. They are quite unable to show that the loss must have occurred in any event, and whether they had deviated or not. True it is that there had been no previous warning of danger from submarines, and that the event which occasioned the loss was wholly unexpected, but this does not assist the defendants. The answer to the argument of the defendants on this point is that given by Tindal, C.J. in Davis v. Garrett (sup.): "But we think the real answer to the objection is that no wrong-doer can be allowed to apportion or qualify his own wrong, and that as a loss has actually happened whilst his wrongful act was in operation and force, and which is attributable to his wrongful act, he cannot set up as an answer to the action the bare possibility of a loss if his wrongful act had never been done. It might admit of a different construction if he could show, not only that the same loss might have happened, but that it must have happened if the act complained of had not been done; but there is no evidence to that extent in the present case." In Parker v. James (sup) the loss occurred from capture by the King's enemies while the vessel was deviating, and Lord Ellenborough held that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the value of their goods on board the ship at the time she was captured by reason of the deviation. Sleat v. Fagg (5 B. & Ald. 342) and Lilley v. Doubleday (sup.) are also authorities against the defendants' contention.

In my judgment the appeal fails and should be dismissed.

PHILLIMORE, L.J. read the following judgment:—

The plaintiff company, owners of two parcels of goods shipped on board the Tokomaru, a vessel belonging to the defendant company, complains of the loss of these goods, which were sunk with the ship when she, being on a course for Havre and not far from that port, was torpedoed by a German submarine. The plaintiff company complains that it had shipped the goods for a voyage from New Zealand to London, and that the ship was deviating from her course and on a deviated course when she was lost.

This makes it necessary to determine, first, what was the course of the voyage; and, secondly, if there was a departure from that course, whether it was justified by the liberties given by the bill of lading. The material parts of the bill of lading are as follows: It is stated that certain bales of wool are shipped in good order and condition at the port of Napier. Then follow wide liberties as to trading in New Zealand. Then the ship is described as "bound (subject to the before-mentioned liberties) on finally leaving New Zealand for London, and with liberty on the way to London to call and stay at any intermediate port or ports to discharge or take on board passengers, cargo, coals, or other supplies, with permission, if desired, for the vessel to call at Rio de Janeiro and (or) Montevideo and (or) La Plata for the purpose of taking on board coal, supplies, and (or) cargo, and (or) live stock," the goods to be delivered, subject to all the above liberties to deviate and to the exceptions and conditions at foot thereof, in like good order and condition at the Port of London. I do not think it necessary to dwell upon the exception 3, although it was relied on by the shipowners.

The course adopted by the ships of this line not being mail boats) is to come round the Horn, then put into one of the three named ports on the east coast of South America, then make a call at one of the coaling ports in the Atlantic islands, generally Teneriffe, and thence proceed straight to London. This is the usual course, and (except in respect of the South American ports) needs, I think, no use of any of the liberties or permissions to justify it. It was suggested that the call at the coaling port could only be justified under the liberty to call at intermediate ports. I do not think so. This call is one of the incidents of the voyage and is no departure. There are many similar instances, such as calling at weather stations to inquire about ice, or going to some station for a Government pass through territorial waters, or to pick up a pilot, or calling at a preliminary port to lighten the ship in order that she may finish the voyage with a less draught. These are not, in my view, departures from the usual and customary course of the voyage.

It is possible to carry the rule as to acceptance of that which is customary even further. It may be, if it is customary for the line to which the ship belongs, and of which the shipper knows, to touch at some intermediate port, not mentioned in the bill of lading, that touching at this port may be regarded as part of the customary course of navigation. For instance, it is possible that the practice of the mail boats of this line to call at Plymouth might be justified even without having recourse to the liberty to call at intermediate ports. The case of Evans, Sons, and Co. v. Cunard Steamship Company Limited (sup.) seems to support this. I only mention this suggestion to show that I have not forgotten it, but I do not want to pronounce any opinion upon it.

I now come to the liberty clause. Bailhache, J. seems to give no effect to this liberty, or only to give it effect as enforcing the proposition that such departures from the direct geographical route as are incidental to the navigation may be be made—that is, to justify that which I think needs no justification. In this I cannot agree with him. Lord Esher in Leduc and Co. v. Ward and others (sup.) and Lord Herschell in Glynn v. Margetson (sup.) treat the clause as having a meaning and one to which effect must be given. I will quote the passages. Lord Esher in Leduc and Co. v. Ward and others (sup.) says: "Here again it is a question of the construction of a mercantile expression used in a mercantile document, and I think that as such the term can have but one meaning—namely, that the ports, liberty to call at which is intended to be given, must be ports which are substantially ports which will be passed on the named voyage. Of course such a term must entitle the vessel to go somewhat out of the ordinary track by sea of the named voyage, for going into the port of call in itself would involve that. To 'call' at a port is a well-known sea term; it means to call for the purposes of business, generally to take in or unload cargo, or to receive orders; it must mean that the vessel may stop at the port of call for a time, or else the liberty to call would be idle. I believe the term has always been interpreted to mean that the ship may call at such ports as would naturally and usually be ports of call on the voyage named." In Glynn v. Margetson (sup.) Lord Herschell said: "There is no difficulty in construing this clause to apply to a liberty in the performance of the stipulated voyage to call at a particular port or ports in the course of the voyage. That port or those ports would differ according to what the stipulated voyage was, inasmuch as at the time when this document was framed the parties who framed it did not know what the particular voyage would be, and intended it to be equally used whatever that voyage is. The ports a visit to which would be justified under this contract would, no doubt, differ according to the particular voyage stipulated for between the shipper and the shipowner; but it must, in my view, be a liberty consistent with the main object of the contract—a liberty only to proceed to and stay at the ports which are in the course of the voyage. In saying that I am, of course, speaking in a business sense. It may be said that no port is directly in the course of the voyage (indeed that was argued by the learned counsel for the appellants) inasmuch as in merely entering a port or approaching it nearly you deviate from the direct course between the port of shipment and the ultimate port of destination. That is perfectly true; but in a business sense it would be perfectly well understood to say that there were certain ports on the way between Malaga and Liverpool, and those are the ports at which I think the right to touch and stay is given." On the other hand, the words, however large, do not warrant more than a limited extent of departure. This is well settled. None, however, of the cases cited come close to this one. They are all cases where either the ship went back on her track or made an enormous change of voyage, bringing her when at the so-called intermediate port no nearer her port of destination than she had been at the beginning of her deviation. Some guide, I think, can be got from the limited permission to use the three named ports in South America. This is evidence that the parties did not contemplate an unspecified departure from the course which would be as great as that involved in touching at these ports. But the alteration of course necessary for going to Havre is less than the alteration for the nearest of those named ports. It is very difficult to draw the line, and the question is largely one of degree, but, on the whole, I think that the degree has been exceeded in this case. And there is another ground which seems to me a safer one for affirming this decision. Lord Esher indicates—and I think rightly indicates—that there is a necessary condition which must be present to make a port an intermediate port. It must be one which "would naturally and usually be a port of call on the voyage." By this he does not mean so much as "customary." What he means is that as a matter of commerce and business ships are frequently sent upon an adventure which includes touching at these intermediate ports. If, for instance, it was common for vessels dispatched to Rouen to call at Havre, or dispatched to Malaga to call at Cadiz, to this extent Havre and Cadiz would be intermediate ports. Now, as Bailhache, J. points out, no evidence was given to show that it was usual for New Zealand vessels, or, I may add, vessels from South America, bound for London to call at Havre. It is indeed true that the Ikaria was bound from the South American coast to London viâ Havre, but this one instance is not enough. It is not, as far as we are informed, a known or usual voyage for vessels bound from New Zealand, or even from South America, to call at Havre on the way to London. I may add that the burden is on the shipowner to bring himself within the liberty.

As to the second point in the case, I can deal with it shortly. The cases of Davis v. Garrett (sup.) and Lilley v. Doubleday (sup.) lay down the true principle. As the accident occurred at the time and place when it did, the ship being then on her deviating course, the shipowner is responsible unless he can show that the loss or damage would have occurred if she had been on her proper course for London. There are circumstances in which conceivably this could be proved, but it could not be and was not proved in this case. Therefore the judgment is right and must be affirmed.

Bankes, L.J. read the following judgment:—It is well settled that where in a printed form of charter-party or bill of lading general words are found giving liberty to deviate those words must be construed in reference to the main intent and object of the contract. In Glynn v. Margetson (sup.), both in the Court of Appeal and in the House of Lords, and in Leduc and Co. v. Ward and others (sup.) some rules will be found indicating some necessary limitations upon such general words. In the last of these cases Lord Esher speaks of the liberty as extending only to putting into a port which is substantially on the course of the voyage. In Glynn v. Margetson (sup.) in the House of Lords, Lord Herschell restricts the liberty to a port which is in a business sense on the way to the port of destination. In the same case in the Court of Appeal Lord Esher speaks of what is permissible as a going slightly out of the sea course which the ship would take on the way to her destination. In the absence of any special considerations arising out of the terms or the subject-matter of any particular contract the question of what is or is not permissible under a general liberty to deviate must resolve itself largely into a question of fact, in which the geographical position of the port visited in relation to that of the port of destination and the additional distance to be covered as the result of departing from the direct or customary course will be material, but not necessarily the only material, matters for consideration.

There may, however, be cases where as a matter of construction of the contract it may be necessary to give a much wider limitation to the general words than those indicated above in order to give effect to the manifest object and intention of the contract: (see per Lord Herschell in Glynn v. Margetson, sup.). This, as I understand his decision, is the principle upon which Bailhache, J. has acted in the present case. The bill of lading describes the service provided by the defendants' fleet of steamers as a "Direct service between New Zealand and London." It describes the course to be taken by the steamers as "the customary or geographical route to the port of discharge." It confines the liberty to call at "intermediate ports on the way to London." Bailhache, J. treats the subject-matter of the agreement between the parties as a contract to carry wool from New Zealand to London by one of this regular line of steamers trading between London and New Zealand ports, and having a recognised route and recognised ports of call both out and home. To such ports the liberty to call will naturally apply; but it seems obvious that in such a contract some limitation must be placed upon the number of ports at which it is permissible to call, even though they may come within the description of being "intermediate ports on the way" to London; otherwise, from a business point of view, the manifest object and intention of shipping goods by such a line of steamers as those in question would appear to be defeated. If some limitation is to be placed upon the number, then where is the line to be drawn? It must be a question of degree. The circumstances may be such that, from a business point of view, any exercise of the liberty, even to a single port outside the recognised ports of call, must, except in cases of emergency, be considered as beyond the contemplation of the parties and therefore as defeating the object and intention of the contract. That, I take it, is the view adopted by Bailhache, J., who had evidence before him as to the regular route and ports of call of this line of steamers, and who had also the evidence of the owners as contained in their letter in reference to the course of business as between themselves and shippers by their line of steamers. This view is strengthened and confirmed by the special liberty inserted in the bill of lading to call at Rio de Janeiro, Montevideo, or La Plata for limited purposes only, a provision which would not have been necessary had the intention been to give full effect to the general words. The owners in their letter to which I have already referred emphasise this point when they ask that in future liberty shall be inserted in the bill of lading to call at French ports. In my opinion Bailhache, J. took a view which was quite justified by the evidence before him and I am certainly not prepared to differ from him upon it.

With regard to the appellants' second point that they can only be made responsible for such results of the deviation as could have been reasonably anticipated, I can see no ground derived either from principle or from authority in support of it. On the contrary, I think that the authorities to which reference has been already made are distinctly against it.

I agree that the appeal fails.

THE NINGCHOW. (a)

Prize Court—Enemy goods—Enemy pledgor of goods—Default of pledgor—Contract of sale by pledgees — Right of pledgor to redeem — Loss of right—Release to purchaser.

Before the outbreak of war in Aug. 1914, a firm of enemy subjects contracted to sell to a British firm a certain quantity of vegetable tallow. The tallow was shipped in a British steamship at Hankow, and the steamship started for Liverpool before the declaration of hostilities. The vendors of the tallow pledged the same, also before the outbreak of war, to a firm of Japanese bankers, who were indorsees and holders of the bills of lading, both at the time of the shipment of the goods and of their arrival at Liverpool. The steamship did not arrive at Liverpool until after the outbreak of the war, and thereupon the consignees declined to take delivery of the tallow, as being the goods of enemy subjects. The Japanese bankers, owing to the refusal of the purchasers to take delivery of the goods, entered into a contract to sell the tallow to a British firm. The tallow was afterwards seized by the Customs officers as being enemy property.

Held, that the enemy pledgors had lost their right to redeem the tallow when the contract of sale was made, and that by such contract they had ceased to be owners of the same. The tallow, therefore, was no longer enemy property and was not liable to seizure.

THIS was a case in which the Crown claimed (inter alia) the condemnation of a certain quantity of vegetable tallow, shipped in the British steamship Ningchow, on the ground that the same was enemy property.

The Ningchow, a British ship, sailed from Hankow, in China, in July 1914, before the outbreak of hostilities between Great Britain and the German Empire, and a part of her cargo consisted of vegetable tallow, which was shipped by a German firm in China and consigned to a British firm. The steamship did not arrive at Liverpool until the 17th Aug. 1914, a fortnight after the declaration of war, and the consignees refused to take acceptance of the tallow, as being the goods of enemy subjects. The tallow was seized by the officers of His Majesty's Customs on the 29th Oct. 1914. At the time of the shipment of the tallow and also at the date of its arrival at Liverpool the Yokohama Specie Bank Limited were the indorsees and holders of the bills of lading representing the tallow, in respect of advances made before the outbreak of war. On the refusal of the consignees to take acceptance, the Yokohama Specie Bank Limited sold the tallow, as pledgees of the same, to Messrs. Thornett and Fehr, a British firm. The sole question for the court was whether, at the date of seizure, the tallow was the property of enemy subjects.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 4, 1915.—The PRESIDENT.—The subject-matter of this claim consists of 233 packages of green vegetable tallow, which formed part of the cargo laden on the steamship Ningchow, of Liverpool. This part of the cargo was seized by the officers of His Majesty's Customs at the port of Liverpool on the 29th Oct. 1914.

The claimants are the Yokohama Specie Bank Limited, of 7, Bishopsgate, in the City of London, subjects of His Majesty the Emperor of Japan, and Messrs. Thornett and Fehr, of Baltic House, in the City of London, tallow brokers, subjects of His Majesty the King of this realm.

(a) Reported by J. A. SLATER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The goods were shipped at Hankow before the war, and were consigned by subjects of the German Empire. The vessel in which they were laden arrived in the port of Liverpool on the 17th Aug. 1914.

The Yokohama Specie Bank were indorsees and holders of the bills of lading, representing the goods at the time of their shipment and at the time of their arrival at Liverpool, and were, at all material times up to the contracts of sale of the 14th and 22nd Oct. 1914, hereinafter referred to, the pledgees of the goods, in respect of advances amounting to about 660*l.* made upon the security of this pledge. These advances had been made before the commencement of the war. The rights of the bank have therefore to be regarded upon principles applicable to ante bellum conditions, as nothing happened subsequently which affected these rights. The pledgors were enemy subjects—Messrs. Schnabel, Gaumer, and Co.

The enemy subjects had contracted to sell the goods to a British firm (Messrs. MacAndrew, Moreland, and Co.), who declined to take up the documents representing the goods, or to take delivery of the goods themselves after the declaration of war, from enemy subjects.

Thereupon the bank, as pledgees, proceeded to deal with the goods. It was admitted by counsel for the Crown that the enemy subjects, who were the pledgors to the bank, were in default, and that the bank, as pledgees by reason of such default and after the requisite notice to their pledgors, became entitled to exercise their power of sale, in order to make the pledge effective, before the goods were seized as prize.

The bank accordingly, in exercise of their rights as pledgees, entered into two contracts of sale with Messrs. Thornett and Fehr, dated respectively the 14th and 22nd Oct. 1914, whereby they contracted to sell the goods in question to Messrs. Thornett and Fehr on the terms set out in the written contracts.

Counsel for the Crown contended (1) that Messrs. Thornett and Fehr were not the real purchasers, but only brokers, acting on behalf of the bank; and (2) that, even if they were the purchasers, the property in the goods had not passed to them; and that, notwithstanding the contracts of sale, the goods remained confiscable as enemy property belonging to the pledgors.

As to the first contention, I was satisfied upon the evidence, and find as a fact, that Messrs. Thornett and Fehr were not acting as brokers, but as principals. Upon the second contention, arguments were addressed to the court that, according to the law applicable to the sale of goods, the property in the goods had not at the time of their seizure passed to the intending purchasers; and that the goods still remained the property of the enemy subjects, notwithstanding their pledge to the bank, and the action that the bank took.

In my view, the inquiry as to whether the property in the goods had so passed is irrelevant to the question which has to be determined in this case, which is whether the goods belonged to enemy subjects at the time of the seizure.

The rights of a pledgee have been succinctly stated in the judgment of Cotton, L.J. (which was the joint judgment of the Lord Justice himself and of Lindley and Bowen, L JJ.) in the case of Ex parte Official Receiver; Re Moyritt (56 L. T. Rep. 42; 18 Q B Div. 222) in this passage: "A contract of pledge carries with it the implication that the security may be made available to satisfy the obligation, and enables the pledgee in possession (though he has not the general property in the thing pledged, but a special property only) to sell on default in payment, and after notice to the pledgor, although the pledgor may redeem at any moment up to sale."

As I have before said, it was admitted by counsel for the Crown that in this case there was default by the pledgors, and that notice had been given by the pledgees before they entered into the contracts for sale. In short, it was admitted that the pledgees were entitled to exercise their power of sale. I think that the phrase in Cotton, L J.'s judgment that the pledgor may redeem "at any moment up to sale" means at any moment up to the time of the exercise by the pledgee of his power of sale by entering into a valid contract for sale.

The right of the enemy pledgors to redeem had therefore been lost to them, and accordingly they ceased to be in any sense the owners of the pledged goods when the bank contracted to sell, apart entirely from any question which might exist as between the sellers (the pledgees) and their purchasers, of whether, according to the law of the sale of goods, the property remained in the sellers or had passed to the purchasers.

In the view that I take of the case it is unnecessary to deal with the facts relating to the orders to the warehousemen to hold the goods for the purchasers.

I hold that when the contracts for sale of the 14th and 22nd Oct. 1914 were made the enemy pledgors had ceased to be the owners of the goods which were subsequently seized. These goods were therefore not subject to seizure as enemy goods.

The bank and the purchasers from them make common cause, and the bank assent to the claim of their purchasers.

I decree accordingly that the goods in question be released to the claimants, Messrs. Thornett and Fehr.

After the outbreak of war between Great Britain and Germany, a German ship, laden with a cargo which was the property of Austrian subjects, was captured on the high seas and brought into a British port. A writ was issued against the cargo on the day before hostilities broke out between Great Britain and Austria. Subsequently, after the outbreak of war between the last-named countries, a second writ was issued, the cargo being all the time in the custody of the Crown authorities. Later on, before the case was heard, the goods were sold and the proceeds paid into court.

Held, that the goods or their proceeds were liable to condemnation as enemy property, as Germany had refused to accede to the protective articles of the Sixth Hague Convention.

THIS was a case in which the Crown claimed the condemnation of the cargo of the steamship Schlesien. The vessel was a German one, belonging to the port of Bremen, and she sailed from Bangkok before the outbreak of war with a cargo which consisted of white gum, rubber, and gamboge. The Schlesien was the property of the Norddeutscher Lloyd Steamship Company, a German company, and the cargo was shipped by the branch house at Bangkok of Messrs. Alois Schweiger and Co. Limited, a company incorporated in Vienna. Counsel for the claimants appeared on behalf of Mr Kempton, the manager of the Manchester branch of the Austrian company, and the claim was made by the branch at Bangkok as shippers of the goods to the Manchester branch. The Schlesien was captured in the Bay of Biscay on the 7th Aug. 1914, three days after the outbreak of war between Great Britain and Germany. She was brought into Plymouth. Proceedings were taken against the vessel, and both the ship and her submarine signalling apparatus were condemned as prize on the 30th Nov. 1914 (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 26; 112 L. T. Rep. 353).

The writ against the cargo on board the Schlesien was issued on the 11th Aug. 1914. This was the day before the outbreak of hostilities between Great Britain and Austria. Unlivery began on the 15th Aug. 1914. An appearance to the writ was entered on the 21st Aug. 1914. Some doubt having arisen as to the regularity of the procedure, a new writ was issued on the 7th Dec. 1914, in which the Crown claimed the goods, alleging continuous seizure, and asked for a decree "that the said goods, which on and after the outbreak of war between Great Britain and Austria-Hungary were and remained in the custody and possession of His Majesty's Officer of Customs at Plymouth as prize of war and as droits of Admiralty, belonged on the outbreak of war as aforesaid and afterwards to enemies of the Crown."

By the consent of all parties the goods were sold during the year 1915 and the proceeds of the sale were in court.

By Convention VI. of the Hague Conference 1907 it is provided:

Art. 1. When a merchant ship of one of the belligerent Powers is at the commencement of hostilities in an enemy port, it is desirable that it should be allowed to depart freely, either immediately, or after a sufficient time of grace, and to proceed direct, after being furnished with a passport, to its port of destination or such other port as shall be named for it. The same applies in the case of a ship which left its last port of departure before the commencement of the war and enters an enemy port in ignorance of the hostilities.

Art. 2. A merchant ship which, owing to circumstances of force majeure, may have been unable to leave the enemy port during the period contemplated in the preceding article, or which may not have been allowed to leave, may not be confiscated. The belligerent may only detain it, under an obligation of restoring it after the war, without indemnity, or he may requisition it on condition of paying an indemnity.

Art. 3. Enemy merchant ships which left the last port of departure before the commencement of the war and are encountered on the high seas while still ignorant of the outbreak of hostilities, may not be confiscated. They are merely liable to be detained on condition that they are restored after the war without payment of compensation, or to be requisitioned, or even destroyed, on payment of compensation, but in such case provision must be made for the safety of the persons on board as well as the preservation of the ship's papers. After touching at a port in their own country, or at a neutral port, such ships are subject to the laws and customs of naval war.

Art. 4. Enemy cargo on board the vessels referred to in arts. 1 and 2 is likewise liable to be detained and restored after the war without indemnity, or to be requisitioned on payment of indemnity, with the ship or separately. The same applies in the case of cargo on board the vessels referred to in art. 3.

Maurice Hill, K.C. and Balloch for the Procurator-General. — The Crown was entitled to an order of condemnation of the goods, or rather of their proceeds. The vessel and its cargo were seized and brought into Plymouth on the 7th Aug. 1914, after the outbreak of war with Germany, and they lay at Plymouth until the 15th Aug 1914. This was three days after hostilities commenced between Great Britain and Austria-Hungary. The goods remained in the custody of the Customs during the whole of the time, and they were enemy property within the jurisdiction of the Prize Court. This point had been decided in the case of The Roumanian (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 8; 112 L. T. Rep. 464; (1915) P. 26; affirmed, 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 208; 114 L. T. Rep. 3; (1916) 1 A. C. 124). This was a case of continuous seizure. As Germany had refused to accede to the terms of arts. 3 and 4 of the Sixth Hague Convention, the rules laid down there as to mere detention as opposed to condemnation as prize did not apply. There was a presumption as to identification of ship and cargo. The vessel was German and not protected. The same applied to the cargo, although the owners were Austrians, who were not actually enemies at the date of the seizure.

Latter for the claimants.—No point in connection with that Convention was raised in the present case. But the seizure was wrongful in the first instance. The goods were the property of neutrals on the 7th Aug. 1914, and so they were also at the date of the issue of the writ—namely, the 11th Aug. 1914. The wrongful seizure could not be cured by the issue of a second writ. The suggestion that the character of the goods was decided by the enemy character of the ship could not be upheld.

Maurice Hill in reply.

THE PRESIDENT.—In this case the court is now dealing with three consignments on board the steamship Schlesien—white gum, rubber, and yellow gamboge. All the goods have been sold in the course of the prize proceedings, and they are now represented by the proceeds which have been paid into court as the result of those sales. It is admitted that the cargo belonged to Austrian subjects, and in that sense it was enemy property.

Certain curious points arise in the case. The cargo in question was laden on board an enemy ship, and the ship was in fact condemned in this court as a German ship. She was encountered on the high seas on the 7th Aug. 1914, and brought into a British port. This was three days after the outbreak of hostilities between Great Britain and Germany, but before a state of war existed between this country and Austria Whether the ship when encountered on the high seas was or was not ignorant of the outbreak of war I do not know. But in any event that does not matter, because, however binding the Hague Convention may be in general, as I have assumed it to be in so many cases, Germany cannot claim any privilege under art. 3 of the Convention, as that is one of the articles in respect of which Germany made a reservation. She also made a reservation as to the privileges which would have been accorded to the cargo on a vessel to which art. 3 applied by the second part of art. 4.

Two points have been raised by counsel on behalf of the claimants to these goods. The first is that there was no seizure of their property after the seizure of the 7th Aug 1914, and that that was not a proper seizure, because on that date the goods were not enemy property, but the property of neutrals on board an enemy ship, and as such should have been protected The goods were brought into a British port, Plymouth, and the writ was originally issued on the 11th Aug. 1914 When the case came before me in the first instance, it was pointed out that at the time of seizure war had not broken out between Great Britain and Austria-Hungary, and consequently the case was adjourned in order that a new writ might be issued. The new writ was issued. But all this time the goods were under the control of the Crown, and whatever might have been said before the 12th Aug. 1914, on which date war was declared between this country and Austria, as to an improper seizure of the goods, that point has not been raised, and, under the circumstances, I cannot come to any other conclusion than that the goods were seized and were intended to be held by the authorities on behalf of the Crown after the 12th Aug. 1914, when war broke out between Great Britain and Austria-Hungary. If that is so, then, according to the decision in the case of The Roumanian (ubi sup.), these goods, although still on board the vessel in port, were goods subject to seizure and must be regarded as enemy property. The goods have been sold by consent, but what applies to the goods applies equally to the proceeds of the sale.

Counsel for the claimants has practically abandoned any claim under the Hague Convention, and, for reasons which I have stated on various occasions, I do not think that the articles of the Convention apply at all in the present case.

The judgment of the court, therefore, is that the proceeds of these goods, seeing that the goods have been sold, must be considered as good and lawful prize.

THE PALM BRANCH. (a)

Prize Court—Cargo—Neutral goods—War risks—Insurance—Seizure of goods before outbreak of hostilities—Transfer of property in goods to enemy—Payment of insurance by enemy underwriters—Condemnation.

A certain cargo was shipped in a British vessel before the war from a neutral country by a neutral firm to their own order, and under an option the same was to be delivered to a German firm at a German port, and this German firm were to act as the shippers' agents for sale. The goods were insured against war risks by enemy underwriters. At the time of the seizure the property in the goods was still in the shippers. The shippers' German agents claimed against the underwriters for a total loss, which claim was paid in full, and the underwriters became the owners of the goods, there thus being a transfer of ownership from neutrals to enemies. The cargo was sold and the proceeds paid into court. In a suit for the condemnation of the cargo or its proceeds as prize and droits of Admiralty, the shippers put in a claim, doing so at the instigation of the German underwriters, that the cargo was at the time of seizure and still remained their property.

Held, that the cargo was enemy property and must be condemned.

THIS was a case in which the Crown asked for the condemnation of the proceeds of 4000 bags of cocoa, part of the cargo of the British steamship Palm Branch.

Prior to the outbreak of hostilities between Great Britain and Germany—namely, the 4th Aug. 1914—the British steamship Palm Branch sailed from Guayaquil, in Ecuador, South America, with a cargo of cocoa, 4000 bags, which was shipped by the Associacion de Agricultores del Ecuador. The cocoa was consigned to the order of the shippers, at Hamburg, and under an option the cocoa was to be delivered at Hamburg to a German firm, as agents for sale of the shippers. On the 3rd Aug. 1914 the Palm Branch arrived at Liverpool, and on the 18th Sept. 1914 the cocoa was seized as prize. It was subsequently sold, and the proceeds were paid into court. After the seizure the German firm claimed against the German underwriters at Hamburg, who paid the claim in full. More than a year later a claim to the proceeds of the sale of the cocoa was put in by the Associacion de Agricultores del Ecuador under circumstances which are fully set out in the judgment.

Sect. 63 (1). Where there is a valid abandonment the insurer is entitled to take over the interest of the assured in whatever may remain of the subject-matter insured, and all proprietary rights incidental thereto. (2) Upon the abandonment of a ship, the insurer thereof is entitled to any freight in course of being earned, and which is earned by her subsequent to the casualty causing the loss, less the expenses of earning it incurred after the casualty; and, where the ship is carrying the owner's goods, the insurer is entitled to a reasonable remuneration for the carriage of them subsequent to the casualty causing the loss.

Sect. 79 (1). Where the insurer pays for a total loss, either of the whole, or in the case of goods of any apportionable part, of the subject-matter insured, he thereupon becomes entitled to take over the interest of the assured in whatever may remain of the subject-matter so paid for, and he is thereby subrogated to all the rights and remedies of the assured in and in respect of the subject-matter as from the time of the casualty causing the loss. (2) Subject to the foregoing provisions, where the insurer pays for a partial loss, he acquires no title to the subject-matter insured, or such part of it as may remain, but he is thereupon subrogated to all the rights and remedies of the assured in and in respect of the subject-matter insured as from the time of the casualty causing the loss, in so far as the assured has been indemnified, according to the Act, by such payment for the loss.

Sect. 81. Where the assured is insured for an amount less than the insurable value or, in the case of a valued policy, for an amount less than the policy valuation, he is deemed to be his own insurer in respect of the uninsured balance.

The facts and the arguments are sufficiently set out in the judgment.

Cur. adv. vult.

July 31.—The PRESIDENT.—A novel point has arisen with regard to this claim by reason of a change of ownership of the goods seized between the dates of the seizure and the claim.

The goods seized were 4000 bags of cocoa laden on the Palm Branch, which is a British vessel and were shipped before the war. They were consigned by the shippers, the Associacion de Agricultores del Ecuador, to their own order, and under an option they were to be delivered at Hamburg to a German firm, Messrs. Schlubach, Thiemer, and Co., as agents for sale of the shippers. They were invoiced at 18,676*l*., with a deduction of 1143*l*. for freight. After the goods were seized they were sold under an order of this court, and realised 20,285*l*. gross. The claim, as it stands at present, is for the release of the proceeds of sale. The goods were insured against war risks by German underwriters of Hamburg. At the time of the seizure the property in the goods had not passed from the neutral shippers. After the seizure Messrs. Schlubach, Thiemer, and Co., the shippers' agents in Germany, made a claim against the Hamburg underwriters for a total loss. The underwriters paid the claim in full. Messrs. Schlubach, Thiemer, and Co. received it for the claimants and, according to an affidavit filed by one of the partners, Mr. Schlubach, dealt with it in account. It was admitted that thereupon the German underwriters became owners of the goods.

The claim in these proceedings was not made until nearly a year after the seizure. The position is not in dispute. It is that at the time of the seizure the property in the goods was in the neutral shippers, and at the time of the claim in the German underwriters. The question is what, in view of this position, the judgment of this court should be. For some time the shippers were disposed to put forward a claim to the goods upon the assumption that the property remained in them. Messrs. Schlubach, Thiemer, and Co., however, protested against that attitude, and practically said to the shippers "hands off," on the ground that the goods belonged to the underwriters. In accordance with their view of the matter, and pursuant to the request of the underwriters, the bills of lading were indorsed successively to Messrs. de Waal, Duyvis, and Co., Messrs. Wambersie and Co., Messrs. Kruthoffer and Doll, and generally.

Explanations of these indorsements have been put forward. They are not satisfactory. What is plain is that they were intended to found or to support a claim by or on behalf of the underwriters. Mr. Schlubach, in his affidavit already referred to, deposed that his firm were requested by the underwriters to forward the bills of lading and all the documents relating to the goods in question to Messrs. Kruthoffer and Doll, of Rotterdam, in order that they might claim the goods from the British authorities.

For this purpose Messrs. Kruthoffer and Doll engaged the services of the firm of Messrs. Wendt and Co., of London. This firm for some time were under the impression—and naturally under the impression—that Messrs. Kruthoffer and Doll, being a Dutch firm, were the neutral receivers of the goods. It is clear that Messrs. Kruthoffer and Doll so claimed the goods. Ultimately Messrs. Wendt and Co. knew that Messrs. Kruthoffer and Doll were not genuinely the receivers, but were only acting for the German underwriters to try and secure the goods for them. The underwriters had not only become in law the owners of the goods upon payment of the total loss claim, but they asserted their position, and assumed and asserted dominion over them.

When the case first came before me a long correspondence was given in evidence which, however, did not go beyond the 10th May 1915. In order to ascertain how the claim came to be made ultimately on behalf of the Associacion de Agricultores del Ecuador in Oct 1915, and in order to find out who the real claimants were, I adjourned the hearing and directed that all the communications between the German and the Dutch firms, and the Associacion de Agricultores del Ecuador and their representatives, and Messrs. Wendt and Co., should be placed before the court. The complete correspondence is voluminous. It would be a waste of time to refer to it in detail. It speaks for itself. Messrs. Schlubach, Thiemer, and Co. protested against any claim or interference by the shippers on the ground that they had agreed to abstain from so acting, and that the goods had become the property of the underwriters, and that the latter had the sole right to claim the proceeds of the sale of the goods, including the excess of their insured value. Messrs. Wendt and Co. were not acting for the shippers. Messrs. Schlubach, Thiemer, and Co., however, insisted so far as they could upon the shippers' London representatives co-operating with Messrs. Wendt and Co. to protect the interests of the German underwriters before the Prize Court in order that the proceeds of the sale of the cocoa might be refunded to them.

The shippers, after having received from Messrs. Schlubach, Thiemer, and Co. account sales for the amount paid for the total loss by the underwriters, instructed their representatives not to make any claim to the goods or to their proceeds, or to do anything further in the matter. They appreciated the situation perfectly, as is seen by their letter to their representative on the 20th March 1915, in which they say:

The underwriters when paying Schlubach and receiving from him the bills of lading in order to make themselves the owners of the cocoa no doubt thought that they would completely avoid their loss and even do a good stroke of business with the present high price of cocoa, and therefore they no doubt commenced to take steps in order to recover it.

The cocoa was sold above the invoice price in this country, and would have fetched a much higher price still if it had been sold in the German markets.

The correspondence disclosed after the adjournment shows that Messrs. Schlubach, Thiemer, and Co., by threats and otherwise, continued to insist upon the neutral shippers at Ecuador either making a claim in their own name or allowing a claim to be made in their name by the German underwriters. In a letter of the 26th April 1915 Messrs. Schlubach, Thiemer, and Co. write to the Asociacion de Agricultores del Ecuador as follows:

We will inform the underwriters of your communications and we hope that we shall be able to convince them that you, in intervening in this matter, have acted with the best intention of protecting, not merely your own interests, but also those of the underwriters. But the charge which they may make against you is that your representatives in London have refused to take legal steps in conjunction with Messrs. Wendt and Co. in order to obtain from the English Government the delivery of the proceeds of sale of the cocoa. Those steps with the hope of good success of course can only be taken by you because you can rely on your character and your rights as neutrals, whereas for the underwriters it is very difficult or impossible to litigate with a probability of winning their case. For these reasons the judicial steps must be taken in your name, but it is obvious that all expenses will be for the account of the underwriters, which according to what they tell us Messrs. Wendt and Co. will without doubt have mentioned and confirmed to Messrs. Stagg and Nevares. For these reasons these gentlemen ought not to have refused to give their co-operation to Messrs. Wendt and Co., and in order to avoid difficulties we have thought fit to write your said agents through our agent in Copenhagen a letter of which we inclose a copy, in which, of course, so that it may reach its destination, we have had to suppress the name of our firm. We trust that in this way Mr. Stagg will receive it and will understand what its contents treat of and that he will place himself in communication with Messrs. Wendt and Co.

In a long letter of the 17th May 1915 in reply the Asociacion de Agricultores del Ecuador says:

In this way we fulfilled your instructions and the matter of the Palm Branch was definitely finished for us. As this cocoa is confiscated by the English authorities, which cocoa we had insured against war risks, the value paid to you by the insurance legitimately belongs to us without our having anything to do with the result of the claim for the return of the cocoa. [And:] Our opinion is that the underwriters ought to resign themselves to lose the insured value which they have paid, for it was for that reason that the premium was paid to them. They can take their steps in order to recover the cocoa, if it is possible for them to do so, but they must not make us forcibly intervene for that purpose, and still less with the threat of serious consequences, no doubt to us, without any reason or ground whatsoever.

The Asociacion de Agricultores del Ecuador again on the 31st May 1915 write fully to Messrs. Schlubach, Thiemer, and Co. Although it takes a little longer, it is better to set out the material part of the letter than to summarise it. They say:

As you recognise in your letter of the 26th April, we acted in this matter with the best intentions of protecting not merely our own interests, but also those of the underwriters, and we had no doubt for a single moment about taking up that attitude in order to recover from the English authorities the cocoa per Palm Branch or its value, because we understood that it was not the agents of the German underwriters who could obtain from the British authorities even a single penny for the payment of the said cocoa. However, that attitude on our part received the strong censure of the underwriters, which you transmitted to us in your turn, impugning our steps, and the underwriters, with an intervention which from the outset we qualified most certainly as inopportune, alleged that they could obtain more than we could, and then had to recognise that we, owing to our capacity as neutrals, are the only ones in this case capable of realising the claim with success. As a matter of fact, that was what we thought from the beginning, but what we so thought was impugned, and direct intervention took place on the part of the underwriters, with the result that our first well-directed measures were cancelled, because no doubt the intervention of the agents of the underwriters caused the English authorities to presume, to say the least, that it was a question of the protection of German interests. We therefore were willing to protect the interests of the underwriters, taking all possible steps, and in acting thus we fulfilled the obligations, namely, according to what you state, that we had to avoid by our intervention any possible prejudice to the underwriters, but we would not agree to that, because we are certain that no law can impose such an obligation on us, namely, to enter into litigation with the English authorities in protection of interests which we are almost certain those authorities know are German interests, because by so doing our agent exposes himself, and even we expose ourselves, to who knows what serious consequences, having regard to the present circumstances due to the present war. You yourselves say that the only thing which the underwriters complain of is that we did not commence legal proceedings, but we do not think for a single moment that one could demand from us that we should take such proceedings, because they are com pletely outside our sphere of action, and they can, as stated above, expose us to consequences which we ought not to suffer.

They stated their attitude briefly in a letter of the 21st June written to their London representative:

As the cocoa was ours before the underwriters paid Schlubach for it, we did right in claiming it on the basis that it was the property of neutrals; but if we have been paid for it by the underwriters, and it is already their property, how can we come forward and claim it as our property?

Their representative had an interview with Mr. Wendt, the head of the firm of Messrs. Wendt and Co., on the 30th June, which he reported to his principals as follows:

He did not know, or he feigned that he did not know, that the underwriters had paid the insured value to the consignees, and asked me what object they would have had in making that payment. Although they must presume it, I told him that it was evidently for the purpose of speculating on the cocoa, which was insured for its cost price, very low, while the prices had risen to almost double by reason of the war. That made a great impression on him. We did not go into this shipment any further.

On the 28th Aug. the Associacion de Agricultores del Ecuador wrote to Messrs. Schlubach, Thiemer, and Co.:

We think that in England we shall not be deemed to be the owners of that cocoa in consequence of the various indorsements stamped on the corresponding bills of lading, and still less if the British authorities come to suspect that that cocoa has been paid for by the German underwriters, or even that it was insured by German companies. The English would certainly pay for the cocoa if there were no intervention of German interests in this matter; but if they know that the payment for it, even though it is not in order to benefit German interests, serves to avoid prejudice to German interests, they will abstain from making such payment in their desire that the said prejudice should take place.

Messrs. Wendt and Co., in Sept. 1915, for some reason not stated, changed their name to Messrs. W. K. Webster and Co., in which guise they appear after that date. They displayed under both appellations a zeal and energy for the German underwriters which may deserve and possibly obtain praise and recognition from them. Knowing the real claimants, they pressed for a power of attorney from the neutral shippers to make a claim to the goods in this court.

Meantime Messrs. Wendt and Co. (then Messrs. W. K Webster and Co.) caused an appearance to be entered for the Associacion de Agricultores del Ecuador on the 6th Oct. They also caused a claim to be filed on the 29th Oct. 1915 on the ground that "the goods were and are the property of the claimants, who are neutrals."

A couple of months afterwards they received an authority, prepared by themselves, signed by the Associacion de Agricultores del Ecuador at Guayaquil on the 26th Nov. 1915, to instruct solicitors to appear and to claim the goods or the proceeds thereof, or such part thereof as such solicitors should consider that they were entitled to claim.

The method and the object with which this was obtained have been sufficiently indicated. The underwriters were to pay the costs of the proceedings. Before this authority was received or even signed, Messrs. Wendt and Co. had been advised by counsel that after the seizure of the goods the property had passed to enemy underwriters. The claim is undoubtedly made on behalf of these underwriters, and if the proceeds were released to the claimants it was admitted that they would receive them as trustees for the Germans, and would have to pay them over accordingly.

What, in the circumstances, is the order which the court should make?

It was contended that the court should only inquire into the real tangible ownership at the time of seizure without regard to any contractual obligations or complications on the principles in The Miramichi (ubi sup.) and The Odessa (ubi sup.). I adhere to the views which I expressed in those cases. But I apprehend that the question now raised is a different one. The absolute ownership of enemy traders at the time of claim and the hearing is as clear as that of the neutral consignors at the time of seizure. When, at the time of the claim and now, the goods were and are the property of enemy owners, who are the claimants in reality—although not in name—should the court order the release of the goods to the nominal claimants admittedly for the benefit of the enemy owners?

There does not appear to be any reported decision governing the case. But the practice and forms of the Prize Court for a lengthened period aid to a decision consonant with recognised principles and sound sense. In the "Formulare Instrumentorum" of Sir James Marriott, a judge of the Courts of Admiralty in Prize and Instance (published as "perused and approved as correct" by that learned judge in 1802) will be found an order of the Prize Court, dated the 29th April 1779. It is as follows:

Ordered that in every affidavit to be offered by any neutral claimant in further proof of his property, the claimant shall make oath that the several goods claimed did belong to the claimant at the time of lading, and at the time of the capture, and do belong at the present time, and would have so belonged in case that the said goods had not been seized and taken, and will belong to the claimant in case the same shall be restored and arrive, and be unladen at the original and true port of destination, until the said goods shall be sold or disposed of for the sole account and benefit of the said claimant. And that neither the King of France, nor his vassals and subjects, nor any persons inhabiting within his territories or dominions, nor any inhabitants of the British American Colonies in rebellion, nor their factors or agents, nor any person whosoever, other than the said claimant, have, hath, or had any right, title, or interest in the said goods at the said several periods of time, nor will have until sold or disposed of in manner and for the real account of the claimant as aforesaid.—JAMES MARRIOTT.

So in the form of an attestation in support of a claim for a ship, there is an oath that "no enemies of the Crown of Great Britain had at the time of capture, or now have, directly or indirectly, any right, title, or interest in the ship, her tackle, apparel, or furniture, or in any part thereof": (see the Formulare, pp. 209, 211; also the usual form of claim as made in The Fortuna, 2 Ch. Rob. 170, and App. V. to that volume).

In the Standing Interrogatories in force at the end of the eighteenth century is the following:

XII. Interrogate. What are the names of the respective laders or owners, or consignees, of the said goods? What countrymen are they? Where do they now live and carry on their business or trade? How long have they resided there? Where did they reside before, to the best of your knowledge? And where were the said goods to be delivered, and for whose real account, risk, or benefit? Have any of the said consignees or laders any and what interest in the said goods? If yea, whereon do you found your belief that they have such interest? Can you take upon yourself to swear that you believe, that at the time of the lading the cargo, and at the present time, and also if the said goods shall be restored and unladen at the destined parts, the goods did, do, and will belong to the same persons, and to none others?

And also in Interrogatory XXX. as to the ship is contained this question:

Do you verily believe that, if the ship should be restored, she will belong to the persons now asserted to be the owners, and to none others?

In the letter of Sir William Scott and Sir John Nicholl (dated the 10th Sept. 1794) to Mr. Jay, United States Minister to England (afterwards Chief Justice Jay), in describing the steps to be taken in prize proceedings by claimants, they say:

The master, correspondent, or consul applies to a proctor, who prepares a claim, supported by an affidavit of the claimant, stating briefly to whom, as he believes, the ship and goods claimed belong, and that no enemy has any right or interest in them.

This was reproduced in Story's Notes on the Practice (Pratt's Story, p. 7).

This practice was adopted in the United States of America. In the schooner Adeline (9 Cranch, 244) it was said by the Supreme Court that:

The test affidavit should state that the property, at the time of shipment, and also at the time of capture, did belong and will, if restored, belong to the claimant.

The forms of claim and affidavit in support were the same at the time of the Crimean War. The form of affidavit will be found in a note to the Panaja Drapaniotisa (Roscoe's English Prize Cases, vol. 2, 560; Spinks, 337). I extract from the affidavit the following paragraph:

And the appearer further made oath that he verily believes that neither the Emperor of All the Russias, nor any of his subjects or others inhabiting within any of his countries, territories, or dominions, their factors or agents, nor any other enemies of the Crown of Great Britain and Ireland, had, at the time of the seizure thereof, or now have, directly or indirectly, any right, title, or interest in or to the said ship or freight, but that the same were at the time of the seizure thereof, and still are, and when restored will still be, the property of the claimants only, being neutral subjects.

The forms of standing interrogatory, to which I have already referred, were maintained until the reign of the present King of Great Britain and Ireland. In the forms of the existing Rules of the Prize Court, if an order for release of captured goods is made, they are expressed to be released to the claimants for the use of the owners thereof. If in the present case the cargo of cocoa or its proceeds were ordered to be released to the claimants without qualification the release would in fact be to the trustees for enemy merchants. And if the release was made to the claimants for the use of the owners of the goods, it would be for the use of enemy merchants likewise.

I may add that this is not a claim for damages or compensation for wrongful seizure or detention. It is a claim to the goods themselves. The hands of the captors have remained on the goods and their proceeds from the time when the underwriters obtained and claimed the ownership. No fresh act of seizure was necessary. It was suggested in the course of the argument that my judgment in the case of The Gothland (unreported), on the 3rd April 1916, supported the contention of the claimants. That was a wholly different case. The insurance company in that case, when they paid the claim for total loss, had full knowledge of the seizure of the goods as enemy property, and any rights of ownership which passed to them were subject to the rights already acquired by the captors by the seizure.

In the case now before me my conclusions of fact are:—

(1) That the real claimants are the German underwriters, and not the neutral shippers.

(2) That the owners of the goods at the time of the claim were and now are the German underwriters.

(3) That if by the order of this court the goods or the proceeds were released to the nominal claimants, the claimants would hold the goods or the proceeds thereof as trustees of and for the benefit of the German underwriters.

Upon these facts my judgment is that the claim is disallowed, and that the proceeds of the goods now in court must, as enemy property, be condemned to the Crown as good and lawful prize in the Crown's rights to the droits and perquisites of Admiralty.

The claimants have put forward the claim at the request and on behalf of the German underwriters on the terms that the latter should bear the costs. I therefore order that the claim be disallowed with costs against the claimants.

There will be leave to appeal within one month upon payment of 300*l.* as security for costs.

THE ST. TUDNO (a)

Prize Court—British ship—Registration—Real ownership — Enemy corporation — Control of British company by enemy corporation—Seizure of ship as prize—Seizure in British port—Condemnation or detention—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict., c. 60), s 1.

In ascertaining whether a vessel is or is not enemy property, the Prize Court must consider the whole of the circumstances connected with its registration, management, and employment. If, therefore, a vessel flying the British flag is registered in the name of a British company, which company is bound to an alien enemy corporation in such a manner as to show that the ownership of the British company is simply nominal, whilst that of the enemy corporation is real, the vessel will be treated as enemy property, and either condemned or ordered to be detained in the same manner as any other enemy vessel.

The T. was a steamship, registered as a British ship, and nominally owned by a British company; but in reality the British company was under an agreement entirely controlled by a German corporation, which appointed the directors and found their qualification shares, owned the entire share capital of the company in the person of its nominees, gave all instructions as to the working of the company, and received the whole of the profits earned by the vessel. For some time after the outbreak of war the vessel was used by the Admiralty, but was eventually seized as prize at Southampton.

Held, that under the whole circumstances of the case, the T. was really owned by the German corporation, and not by the British company in whose name she was registered, and must therefore be held to be a German vessel; but that, as she was in port at Southampton at the outbreak of war, the order to be made against her was one of detention, under the Sixth Convention of the Hague Conference 1907, and not of condemnation.

THIS was a suit in which the Crown claimed the condemnation as prize of the St. Tudno, on the ground that at the time of capture and seizure she belonged to the enemies of the Crown, or, alternatively, to a company controlled by enemies of the Crown.

The St. Tudno was a steel paddle steamer of 754 tons register, and was built at Glasgow in 1891. She was originally the property of the Liverpool and North Wales Steamship Company Limited, but on the 17th Sept. 1912 she was purchased by a Mr. Tamplin from the original owners on behalf of the Hamburg-Amerika Linie for 19,500*l.* Acting further on the instructions of the Hamburg Amerika Linie, Mr Tamplin transferred the St. Tudno to the MacIver Steamship Company Limited by a bill of sale, dated the 1st Oct. 1912. The bill of sale was duly registered. At the same time an agreement was entered into between the Hamburg Amerika Linie and the MacIver Steamship Company Limited, by which the former obtained complete control over the latter, and in accordance with the terms of which all dividends earned in connection with the St. Tudno had to be accounted for to the German company. From Oct. 1912 until the outbreak of war in Aug. 1914 the vessel was used as a tender at Southampton to the ships of the Hamburg-Amerika Linie, to whom she was chartered at 330*l* a month. On the 21st Sept. 1914 the St. Tudno was requisitioned by the Admiralty, and from time to time payments were made, without prejudice, to the MacIver Steamship Company Limited in respect of the working expenses of the vessel. On the 24th Dec. 1915 the vessel was seized, and a writ was issued on the 3rd Jan. 1916 claiming the vessel as prize. The claim was resisted by the MacIver Steamship Company Limited.

In an affidavit filed by Mr. Robert Morrell Greenwood, of the Treasury Solicitor's office, it was stated that the number of shares taken up and held by existing members of the MacIver Steamship Company Limited on the 24th Dec. 1915, the date of the seizure of the St. Tudno, was 2500, and of these 2250 were held by the Direction der Disconto Gesellschaft, an enemy company. The position of the MacIver Steamship Company Limited, the nominal owners of the St. Tudno, was set out in the following letter, addressed by Messrs. Pritchard and Sons to the Director of Transports on the 8th Oct. 1914, which letter was made an exhibit to the affidavit:

We have been instructed by the MacIver Steamship Company Limited, and by Mr Tamplin, respectively the owners and registered manager of the St. Tudno, which has been requisitioned by the Government and is now being employed by the Admiralty in Southampton Water and the Solent, to lay before you the following facts as to the constitution of the MacIver Company and the ownership of the steamship St. Tudno.

The St. Tudno is owned by the MacIver Steamship Company Limited, an English company registered in England in accordance with the English Companies Act. The St. Tudno therefore is clearly a British ship and entitled to fly the British flag and to be registered, as she is registered, as a British ship. She is under charter to the Hamburg-Amerika Linie

The MacIver Steamship Company Limited, which was registered as far back as the 6th June 1891, found it impossible to raise sufficient money for the purposes of the company, and the company never before 1911 allotted more than seven shares, or, in fact, did any business. The memorandum of association was signed by seven signatories, who were all British, and who thereby became bound to take one share each in the company. These were the whole of the shares issued or applied for until 1911.

In 1911, four of the original subscribers being dead, there therefore remained only three shareholders holding one share each. The Hamburg-Amerika Linie, a German corporation, came forward and practically took over the company and reconstituted it; that is to say, they procured the alteration of the articles of association so as to bring them up to date, and they appointed and qualified the directors of the company, taking from them an agreement to conform to their instructions.

The directors included Count Friedrich von Wengersky, who was the representative in London of the Hamburg-Amerika Linie He automatically ceased to be a director on the war breaking out. Mr. Gutschow, a Russian subject, and the manager of the Direction der Disconto Gesellschaft, has resigned since the war commenced. The only three directors left are British. The Hamburg-Amerika Linie, also in the name of their nominees, acquired 2500 shares in the company, upon which they paid amounts ranging from 6*l.* to 10*l.*

The following list shows the present members of the company and the number of shares held by each. All the members are nominees of the Hamburg-Amerika Linie:—

Mr. George Adams, fifty shares.
Mr. Ludwig Alexander Gutschow, fifty shares.
Mr. Henry MacIver, fifty shares.
Mr. Thomas Ward Tamplin, fifty shares.
Count Friedrich von Wengersky, fifty shares.
Direction der Disconto Gesellschaft, 2250 shares.

We have advised the company and the directors that the MacIver Steamship Company Limited, being an English corporation, the domicil of the company is English irrespectively of the nationality or residence of its members, that the shareholders have no interest in the company's property, that the title to the property is in the company and not in its members, that the business which is carried on by the directors is the business of the company and not of the members of the company, that the company may hold property although all its members are aliens and disqualified from doing so, that all profits that are made are the profits of the company and not the profits of the individual shareholders, that the individual shareholders have no interest in the real or personal property of the company but merely a right to a share of the profits of the company when realised and divided amongst its members, that the directors are carrying on the business solely for the benefit of the company and not of its shareholders, and that there is no legal objection to the directors receiving from the Government the hire of the St. Tudno, provided the directors pay no dividends until the war is over.

The directors, however, are most anxious not to do anything whatever which might be considered either as unpatriotic or as a trading for the benefit of an enemy, or as infringing the Royal proclamation or their responsibilities as British subjects, and therefore before the question of the hire to be paid by the Government proceeds they are desirous of laying the full facts of the case before the Admiralty, and of asking whether, the facts being as we have stated them, there is any objection on the part of the Admiralty to proceed with the negotiations.

By sect. 1 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60) it is provided (inter alia):

A ship shall not be deemed to be a British ship unless owned wholly by persons of the following description (in this Act referred to as persons qualified to be owners of British ships), namely: (a) Natural-born British subjects; (b) Persons naturalised by or in pursuance of an Act of Parliament of the United Kingdom, or by or in pursuance of an Act or Ordinance of the proper legislative authority in a British possession; (c) Persons made denizens by letters of denization; and (d) Bodies corporate established under and subject to the laws of some part of Her Majesty's Dominions, and having their principal place of business in those dominions.

By the Hague Convention 1907, No. VI., it is provided (inter alia):

Art. 1. When a merchant ship belonging to one of the belligerent Powers is, at the commencement of hostilities, in an enemy port, it is desirable that it shall be allowed to depart freely, either immediately or after a reasonable number of days of grace, and to proceed, after being furnished with a pass, direct to its port of destination or any other port indicated to it. The same principle applies in the case of a ship which has left its last port of departure before the commencement of the war and has entered a port belonging to the enemy while still ignorant that hostilities have broken out.

Art. 2. A merchant ship which, owing to circumstances beyond its control, may have been unable to leave the enemy port within the period contemplated in the preceding article, or which was not allowed to leave, may not be confiscated. The belligerent may merely detain it, on condition of restoring it after the war, without payment of compensation, or he may requisition it on condition of paying compensation.

Attorney-General (Sir F. E Smith, K.C.) and Ricketts for the Procurator-General. — It was admitted that the St. Tudno was owned nominally by a British company, but the affidavits put in showed clearly that the British company was absolutely under the control of the Hamburg-Amerika Linie, and that the latter were the real owners. The directors of the British company were bound hand and foot by the agreement which was entered into at the time of the transfer of the vessel to the MacIver Steamship Company Limited. Therefore, in reality the St. Tudno belonged to an enemy corporation. It was the duty of the Prize Court in dealing with a ship flying the British flag to look beyond the nominal ownership of the vessel. The question as to what might happen in case of seizure if a vessel was owned by a British company composed entirely of enemy shareholders had been discussed, though not decided, by the Prize Court in the cases of The Tommi and The Rothersand (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 5; 112 L. T. Rep. 257; (1914) P 251), and in the case of The Poona (112 L. T. Rep. 782). True, in the present case the directors and shareholders of the British company were not alien enemies, but as they had completely surrendered their rights to an enemy corporation they were in the same position as though they were enemies. And if that was so, the ship, though nominally owned by a British company, was really the property of alien enemies, and as such liable to condemnation. This proposition followed from the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Daimler Co. v. Continental Tyre and Rubber Company (Great Britain) Limited (114 L. T. Rep. 1049; (1916) 2 A. C. 307), which reversed the judgment of the Court of Appeal. The whole object of the Hamburg-Amerika Linie had been to evade the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts, which made it imperative that a ship flying the British flag should be owned by a British subject or subjects or by a British corporation. The St. Tudno was not really owned by a British corporation, but was the property of an enemy corporation, and as such should be dealt with in the same manner as the Court of Appeal had dealt with The Polzeath (1916) P. 241). They further referred to The Vigilantia (Roscoe's English Prize Cases, vol. 1, 31; 1 Ch. Rob. 1) and The Roumanian (112 L. T. Rep. 464; (1915) P. 26; 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 8, 208; 114 L. T. Rep. 3; (1916) 1 A. C. 124).

Dunlop for the claimants.—In order to decide whether a vessel was or was not enemy property, it was necessary to apply two tests: (1) Under what flag did the vessel sail, and what did her papers say; and (2) in what employment was she engaged at the date of seizure? Nothing that took place prior to the outbreak of war was material. On the 24th Dec. 1915, when the St. Tudno was seized, the vessel was engaged in work for the British Admiralty, and any connection that might have existed between the British company in whose name she was registered and the Hamburg-Amerika Linie had long since come to an end. Indeed, there had been no intercourse whatever between the directors of the MacIver Steamship Company Limited and the Hamburg-Amerika Linie since the outbreak of war, and the only German director on the board had been struck off the register after hostilities had begun. The St. Tudno was clearly entitled to fly the British flag, and if the vessel had been captured by the Germans she would certainly have been condemned as a British vessel by a German Prize Court. It was urged against the claimants that the Hamburg-Amerika Linie would derive benefits after the war from the employment of the vessel during the war. That was not a sound reason for condemnation as enemy property: (see Lord Parker's judgment in Daimler Company v. Continental Tyre and Rubber Company (Great Britain) Limited (ubi sup). He cited

The Pedro, 175 U. S. 354;
The Venture, 11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 93; 99 L. T. Rep. 385; (1908) P. 218;
The Tommi and The Rothersand (ubi sup.).

In any case, if the court was of opinion that the St. Tudno was to be treated as a German vessel, she should not be confiscated, but detained under Convention VI. of the Hague Conference 1907, in accordance with the order made in the case of The Chile (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 598; 112 L. T. Rep. 248; (1914) P. 212), as she was in the British port of Southampton at the date of the outbreak of war.

Ricketts in reply.

The PRESIDENT.—In this case the Crown asks for the condemnation of a paddle steamer called the St. Tudno, which, up to the time of the outbreak of war between this country and Germany, was at all material times used as a tender in or about Southampton for the big liners of the Hamburg-Amerika Linie. The claim of the Crown is founded upon the contention that this steamer was enemy property, and that is the question which I have to determine.

The status of companies registered in this country but controlled, and, so far as the possession of shares is concerned, in that sense owned, by enemy persons, has been very much considered during recent months by the courts of this country, and, finally, by the House of Lords in the case of Daimler Company v. Continental Tyre and Rubber Company (Great Britain) Limited (ubi sup.). The question which arose in that case was not precisely the same as the question which arises here. The question there mainly was whether the position of the company was such as to give it an enemy character, whether that was a prohibition against anybody in this country doing anything for it or entering into any commercial intercourse with it, or in any way trading with it against the provisions of the Trading with the Enemy Act, and the proclamations made thereunder. But nevertheless much light is thrown upon the position and status of companies of that description by the discussion and the judgments in the case to which I have referred.

The St. Tudno belonged nominally to a British company registered in this country, the MacIver Steamship Company Limited In my opinion in this court I am entitled, and I think I am bound, to look at something beyond the nominal ownership. The British company had three British directors and some British shareholders, but the documents which are now before me show clearly what is the position of these directors as directors, and what is the position of these gentlemen as shareholders. By an agreement of the 24th Oct. 1911, which has been put in, nothing can be clearer than this, that the whole control and domination over this ship were vested in and exercised not by anybody in this country at all, but by the Hamburg-Amerika Linie, which is well known to be the biggest shipping corporation in Hamburg. The directors were bound hand and foot by fetters of the most complete kind to do anything that they might be required to do at the direction of and by the instructions of the Hamburg-Amerika Linie. They were bound not only to act as directors in accordance with instructions received, but were bound to remove themselves from the position of directors if they had directions to that effect.

The first clause of the agreement says:

Each of the parties hereto of the first five parts in acting as such director will, in all matters which come before the board or a committee of directors of the company, follow the views and conform to the instructions of the Hamburg-Amerika Linie, as the same may be communicated to the said parties individually or to the board in writing under the hand of Director Thomann or other director of the Hamburg-Amerika Linie, or Dr. H pff, or verbally by Director Thomann or other director of the Hamburg-Amerika Linie, or Dr. Hopff, and will, upon the like request, resign his office as director.

For the purpose of qualifying as directors of the company they each acquired fifty shares. They did not pay one penny for these shares, and they were at once called upon to execute, and did execute, blank transfers of the shares. Another clause in this agreement provides clearly for that, and provides for what they were to do in case there was a declaration of a dividend on the shares. The clause to which I refer, namely, clause 2, says:

Each of the parties hereto of the first five parts will execute a blank transfer in the form hereto annexed of his qualification shares and deposit such transfer and the certificates of such shares with the Direction der Disconto Gesellschaft, London, and hereby irrevocably authorises the Hamburg-Amerika Linie to appoint at any time any person to apply to the Direction der Disconto Gesellschaft for the said certificates and transfers so deposited by him and to receive and give a receipt for the same, and fill up the blanks in the said transfers in such manner as the Hamburg-Amerika Linie shall direct, and to lodge the said transfers and certificates with the MacIver Steamship Company Limited for registration.

Clause 3 deals with the dividends. It reads thus:

Until the transfer of the said shares shall have been completed each party of the first five parts, his executors or administrators, shall stand possessed of the said shares in trust for the Hamburg-Amerika Linie, and shall from time to time execute all rights incident to the ownership of the said shares in such manner as the Hamburg-Amerika Linie shall from time to time direct by writing under the hand of the Director Thomann or other director of the Hamburg-Amerika Linie, or Dr. Hopff, and shall account to the Hamburg-Amerika Linie for all dividends and other sums receivable in respect of the said shares.

On one occasion a dividend of 8½ per cent. was declared and duly recorded in the minute book. Cheques were drawn in favour of the various directors representing dividends at that rate, and immediately the cheques were received by them, without even the formality of paying the same into their own banking accounts, they paid the cheques to the Direction der Disconto Gesellschaft to the credit of the Hamburg-Amerika Linie. Not a single person other than the Hamburg-Amerika Linie had the slightest pecuniary interest in this ship.

Now apart from all technicalities, could anybody say that this ship therefore belonged to a British company? If it does belong nominally to a British company it is under the covering of the very thinnest shell, and I intend to break through that shell in order to ascertain who are the real owners of the ship.

There can be no question about it that the real owners of the ship are the Hamburg-Amerika Linie, and the ship's earnings during the war—and it has earned up to now considerable sums—will have to be accounted for to that company. I do not mention that as determining the question, because it may be that sums may be acquired in this country quite properly which have to be accounted for to citizens of Germany after the war. I merely point it out to show that the sole ownership of the ship and everything appertaining to it was and is in the Hamburg-Amerika Linie.

The ship was actually flying the British flag because she had been registered in the name of this British company. But another question might arise upon that in a different form of proceedings, and in some sense it arises in these proceedings, whether she was entitled to fly that flag. Under sect. 1 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 there is a provision that a ship shall not be deemed to be a British ship unless owned wholly by persons of the descriptions mentioned, including registered companies and bodies incorporated under and subject to the laws of some part of His Majesty's Dominions, and having their principal place of business in those dominions. Now, it is quite clear from what was said by the learned lords in the case of Daimler Company v. Continental Tyre and Rubber Company (Great Britain) Limited (ubi sup.) that the place of the registered office of the company does not determine the principal place of business. That phrase "principal place of business" was not very much discussed in the House of Lords, but an analogous phrase was discussed—namely, what was the real "residence" of the company, and upon that I would refer to two passages, one in the judgment of Lord Atkinson, another in the judgment of Lord Parker, speaking for himself and other learned Lords who agreed with him.

Lord Atkinson says: "Strange as it may appear, the minute book of the company, showing, presumably, from what centre the business of the company was managed and directed, was not given in evidence before any one of the three tribunals. The embarrassing, and, as I think, rather unfortunate result of this omission is that the full facts showing in what country, England or Germany, lay the real business centre from which the governing and directing minds of the company or its directors operated, regulating and controlling its important affairs, were, save so far as revealed in the evidence of its secretary, never disclosed. These are, however, the very things which for the purpose of income tax at all events, have been held to determine the place of residence of a company like the respondent company so far as such a fictitious legal entity can have a residence." There Lord Atkinson clearly shows that in his opinion the place or country where "lay the real business centre from which the governing and directing minds of the company or its directors operated, regulating and controlling its important affairs," was to be taken as the real test of residence.

Lord Parker in his judgment, when dealing with this question of residence, says: "I think that the analogy is to be found in control, an idea which, if not very familiar in law, is of capital importance, and is very well understood in commerce and finance. The acts of a company's organs, its directors, managers, secretary, and so forth, functioning within the scope of their authority, are the company's acts, and may invest it definitely with enemy character. It seems to me that similarly the character of those who can make and unmake those officers, dictate their conduct mediately or immediately, prescribe their duties and call them to account, may also be material in a question of the enemy character of the company." Those words are so apt to the circumstances of this case that one would be almost inclined to think that Lord Parker had in his mind the facts either of this case or of a similar one when he said: "The character of those who can make or unmake those officers dictate their conduct mediately or immediately, prescribe their duties and call them to account, may also be material in a question of the enemy character of the company." All these are matters in the present case which were controlled from Hamburg by the officers of the Hamburg-Amerika Linie. Accordingly, if the case had come before me on an application by proper officials for the forfeiture of this ship to the Crown, on the ground that she was not owned by a person qualified to own a British ship, because the principal place of business, where the whole direction of the business was carried out, was not in this country, I should have held in favour of the Crown and should have ordered the forfeiture of the vessel. That is only another way of saying that I have come to the conclusion in this case that the use of the name of the British company is a mere sham, and that to the very minutest particular there was no kind of beneficial interest in this ship residing in anyone except in the Hamburg-Amerika Linie, whose headquarters are, of course, at Hamburg.

The question, therefore, which I have to determine, namely, was this ship of enemy character, and was it enemy property at the time of the seizure, is one which I answer in the affirmative. I only want to say one other thing in deference to the argument put forward on behalf of the claimants. It is argued that you must look at what this ship was actually doing after the outbreak of war. The actual control, wrongfully or otherwise, was that exercised by the English directors. That is not what I have to determine. What I have to find out is what was the character of this vessel at the time of her seizure. Then it is urged that one ought also to have regard to the fact that the English directors actually chartered this ship to the Admiralty. That is perfectly true, and it is a peculiar circumstance that the ship was seized when she was actually employed by the Admiralty. That again is not material to the question I have to determine. Whatever view the Admiralty took—even if they knew all the facts—would not bind this court. Of course, they did not know all the facts. The agreement which is the all-important document here regulating the position of the English nominees with reference to their German masters was not known to the Admiralty.

The Crown are entitled to claim that this was an enemy ship I do not know whether such a case was contemplated—you cannot possibly have in contemplation every case which may arise—by the Hague Convention, but she was undoubtedly an enemy merchant vessel, according to my finding, in a British port, an enemy port within the meaning of the Convention after the war, and I think I should be wrong in saying that this ship should be condemned out and out. She must be treated as any other merchant ship in an enemy port at the outbreak of war, that is, she must be detained, and the proper order to make Prize Court—Prize bounty—Enemy warship—Destruction—Number of crew—"On board"—Meaning of phrase—Amount of prize bounty to be divided—Naval Prize Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict., c. 25), s. 42—Order in Council the 2*nd March* 1915.

By the combined effect of sect. 42 of the Naval Prize Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict., c. 25) and the Order in Council, dated the 2*nd March* 1915, a prize bounty is payable amongst such of the officers and men of any of His Majesty's warships as are actually present at the taking or the destroying of any of the armed vessels of the enemy, calculated at the rate of 5*l. for each person on board the enemy's ship at the beginning of the engagement.*

The Australian cruiser S. encountered and destroyed the enemy cruiser E. at a time when certain members of the crew of the E. were not on the vessel, but were engaged in operations of a warlike character, and in attendance upon the ship.

Held, that in calculating the amount of the prize bounty to be distributed the whole ship's complement was to be taken into consideration, and not merely the number actually on the vessel. So long as the members of the crew are engaged on work which is ancillary to the main object of the enemy vessel they are "on board" within the meaning of sect. 42 of the Naval Prize Act 1864.

THIS was a motion on behalf of H.M.A.S. Sydney for participation in prize money in respect of the destruction of the German cruiser Emden.

On the 9th Nov. 1914 the Sydney, together with other warships, was on escort duty in the Southern Indian Ocean, and encountered the German vessel Emden off the Cocos Islands. After an action which lasted for over an hour and a half, the German boat ran ashore and surrendered. It was found impossible to salve the vessel. The full complement of the Emden was 397. Of these sixteen had been placed on board a collier as a prize crew, and fifty-two were ashore, having been sent to dismantle the telegraph station on the Cocos Islands. When the Emden was destroyed, therefore, the number of persons on board was 329, and the question was whether prize money was to be paid on the basis of this number or upon that of the ship's full complement—namely, 397.

By sect. 42 of the Naval Prize Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 25), it is provided :

If, in relation to any war, Her Majesty is pleased to declare, by proclamation or Order in Council, her intention to grant prize bounty to the officers and crews of her ships of war, then such of the officers and crew of any of Her Majesty's ships of war as are actually present at the taking or destroying of any armed ship of any of Her Majesty's enemies shall be entitled to have distributed among them as prize bounty a sum calculated at the rate of five pounds for each person on board the enemy's ship at the beginning of the engagement.

An Order in Council was made under the above section of the Act, dated the 2nd March 1915.

Commander Maxwell Anderson, R.N. in support of the motion.

M. Shearman for the Procurator-General.

The PRESIDENT.—I declare that the officers and crew of H M.A.S. Sydney were present at the destruction of the Emden, an armed cruiser belonging at the time of her destruction to the German Empire.

I have now to ascertain what prize money can be allowed at the rate of 5*l.* per head of the number of persons who have to be brought into the calulation. The full complement of the crew of the Emden was 397. Of these fifty-two had been sent ashore for the purpose of destroying the telegraphic apparatus on land, and in that way they were doing part of the work that the Emden was set to do. The object of their going on shore was to make it impossible, or, at any rate, difficult for any communications to be sent from the land to the British cruisers which might come otherwise in the way of the Emden as the Sydney did. With regard to the sixteen men, they were part of the crew of the Emden put upon the British vessel which the Emden had captured, and which she was using by compulsion as an attendant ship, as she had done in the case of ships of other nationalities.

If I deduct the fifty-two members of the crew who were ashore for the purpose which I have indicated, as well as the sixteen members of the crew of the Emden who were put in the ship which was in attendance upon her under compulsion, the number of persons on board the Emden which will regulate the amount of prize money will be 329, and the prize bounty, calculated at the statutory rate of 5*l.* per head, will be 1645*l.* If, on the other hand, I take the full complement of the crew—namely, 397, including the fifty-two and the sixteen—the prize bounty will amount to 1985*l.*

In my view, it would be placing a very narrow construction upon the meaning of sect. 42 of the Naval Prize Act 1864 if I was to hold that the words "on board" meant the persons who were actually on the vessel at the time of her destruction. Neither the fifty-two nor the sixteen had gone away of their own accord, nor had they left the vessel entirely. Each party was occupied in belligerent work as a part of the crew of the Emden, and as such were entitled to be considered as a portion of the vessel's fighting complement. To my mind they were clearly in attendance upon her, and for that reason I think that I am entitled to hold that they must be considered to have been "on board" within the meaning of the statute.

I therefore have pleasure in allotting 5*l.* per head, calculated upon the basis of a full crew of 397, and the prize bounty will be 1985*l.*

THE MARACAIBO. (a)

Prize Court—Neutral vessel—Cargo—Contraband goods—Voyage to neutral port—Ultimate enemy destination of cargo—"Continuous voyage"—Knowledge of shipowner—Whether such knowledge necessary—Liability of vessel to condemnation.

A neutral vessel carrying contraband cargo, which cargo by value, weight, volume, or freight forms more than one-half of the whole, is subject to confiscation and to condemnation as good and lawful prize, even when bound to a neutral port, if such cargo is destined ultimately for an enemy country, either by transhipment or land transit.

There is no need for the captors to prove that the shipowner was aware of the ultimate destination of the contraband cargo.

The principle laid down in The Hakan (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 479; 115 L. T. Rep. 389; (1916) P. 266) applied and extended.

THIS was a case in which the Crown claimed the condemnation of the Maracaibo, a Danish steamship, on the ground that at the time of her seizure and detention she was carrying contraband goods to a neutral port, such goods being destined ultimately for the enemy country Germany.

The Maracaibo was owned by a person named Clausen, and in March 1915 she was at Hamburg. In that month she was chartered by one Engelbrecht, a merchant of Amsterdam, to proceed to South America. On her arrival at the port of Maracaibo in Venezuela, she loaded a full cargo of divi-divi, and started for Amsterdam in Aug. or Sept. 1915. On the 18th Oct. 1915, whilst on her voyage, the Maracaibo was met by a British warship and ordered to proceed to Lerwick, where the cargo and the ship were respectively seized as prize on the 9th Nov. and the 5th Dec. Prior to the 14th Oct. 1915 divi-divi had been declared conditional contraband, but on this last-named date it was declared absolute contraband. The writ in the case was issued on the 24th Dec. 1915. The cargo was condemned as absolute contraband destined for the enemy on the 31st July 1916, and the question now before the Prize Court was whether the vessel was liable to condemnation. The claim of the Crown was resisted by the shipowners, the Aktieselskabet Tremast Skonnest Maracaibo's Rederei, of Nordby, Fanö, Denmark.

Sir Maurice Hill, K.C. and T. Mathew for the Procurator-General.—The Maracaibo had been chartered to carry divi-divi to Hamburg on previous occasions. The vessel had on these occasions been chartered to one Weil, a merchant of Hamburg, and the introduction of Engelbrecht was merely a blind. It was well within the knowledge of all the parties that the cargo was contraband—conditional contraband when loaded, and absolute contraband at the time of the capture of the vessel. But knowledge is not essential. All depends upon the proportion of the cargo carried which was contraband. It might be objected that as the Maracaibo was sailing for a neutral port there could be no condemnation. But it was clear that the cargo was intended ultimately for the enemy, and in such a case condemnation should follow capture just in the same manner as if the vessel had been proceeding direct to an enemy port. The principle laid down in the case of The Hakan (ubi sup) should be applied and extended to the Maracaibo. This was clearly in accordance with the rule of international law. The American rule was in some cases too indulgent and should not be followed. They cited

MacKinnon, K.C. and R. A. Wright for the claimants.—There should be no condemnation unless it was shown that the shipowners had been guilty of unneutral service. There was no evidence of such knowledge in the present case. Again, this was a case of carriage to a neutral port, and there was no precedent in our courts for condemning a neutral vessel under the doctrine of "continuous voyage." The question had arisen in the course of the American Civil War, but the result appeared to be, from a consideration of such cases as The Bermuda (ubi sup.), The Springbok (ubi sup.), and The Peterhoff (ubi sup.), that there could be no condemnation unless the vessel implicated had been guilty of fraudulent practices. That did not arise here, and the ship ought not, therefore, to be condemned. They cited

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 6.—The PRESIDENT.—This Danish ship was captured in Oct. 1915, in the course of a voyage from Venezuela to Amsterdam. She carried a full cargo of divi-divi, 287,654 kilos. At the time of the commencement of the voyage divi-divi had been declared conditional contraband. Before the capture it has been declared absolute contraband. The cargo has already been condemned by a judgment of this court. The question now remaining to be determined relates to the vessel. Her owners claim her release, and also freight, costs, and expenses. The Crown asks for judgment for her condemnation.

The application of the Crown is founded upon two contentions, one of fact and the other of law. In the first place it is contended that the vessel is subject to condemnation because her owners or her master—who was also part owner—knew that the vessel was laden with a full cargo of contraband destined ultimately for the enemy at Hamburg; and, further, that they or he participated in the deception by which it was intended and attempted to convey the contraband goods to one Mr. Isidore Weil, at Hamburg, through a nominal agent or intermediary of the name of Mr. William Engelbrecht, at Amsterdam. In the second place, it is contended that the carriage of the contraband goods, forming the whole of her cargo upon a continuous voyage or transit which was to end in enemy territory, renders the vessel subject in law to confiscation and condemnation, whatever the state of knowledge of the owners or the master may have been.

If the Crown succeeds in the first contention upon the facts, the legal question need not be decided. But the question of law has been fully argued; and as it is one of considerable and general importance, and the parties are all anxious that it should be decided, I have thought it right to pronounce the judgment of the court upon this point also.

It is not necessary to repeat what I said about the facts when the cargo was condemned. The charter-party was made on the 27th March 1915, and purported to be signed by Mr. Svarrer, the master, and Mr. William Engelbrecht, the charterer. Where it was signed I was not told. The vessel was at Hamburg at the time. She had been lying at Hamburg from the 16th Sept. 1914. Her last voyage had been from Venezuela to Hamburg with a cargo of divi-divi for Mr. Isidore Weil. The voyage had commenced before the war. She was given a clearance certificate to continue that voyage by one of His Majesty's boarding ships off our shores on the 3rd Sept. 1914. The vessel lay at Hamburg from the 16th Sept. 1914 until the 1st April 1915, when she started upon her outward voyage under the charter-party referred to. She had been chartered for other voyages in previous years by Mr. Isidore Weil to carry divi-divi to Hamburg. On all these voyages Mr. Svarrer was the master of the vessel. What he did, or where he was, while the vessel lay at Hamburg, or when the charter-party was signed, his affidavit does not disclose. He says that the charter-party was arranged between Mr. Hans Hansen Clausen and the said Mr. William Engelbrecht. He gives no information whatsoever as to the position of Mr. William Engelbrecht, nor as to any communications with him.

The Danish Insurance Institute informed the said Mr. H. H. Clausen before the voyage began that divi-divi had been declared contraband by the English. They did not in their communication distinguish between conditional and absolute contraband. When the ship left Hamburg on her outward voyage she proceeded through the Kaiser Wilhelm Canal. Earlier in the proceedings I decided that Mr. William Engelbrecht, of Amsterdam, was a mere tool of Mr. Isidore Weil, of Hamburg. He filed no evidence Later he and Mr. Isidore Weil fell out, and Messrs. Toe, Laer, and Co., of Amsterdam, were installed by Mr. Isidore Weil in Mr. William Engelbrecht's place, and were, by Mr. Isidore Weil's arrangement, to be called "Smith" in any cables which might be sent. The shippers, Messrs. Juan E. Paris and Co., were the same firm who had sent the previous cargoes of divi-divi to Mr. Isidore Weil, at Hamburg, on the same vessel with Mr. Svarrer as master. No evidence was given of any business acquaintanceship or connection between the shippers and Mr. William Engelbrecht. I cannot accept the bald uncorroborated story of the master that neither he nor the owners had any knowledge or suspicion that the goods had an enemy destination or were enemy property, or that they were contraband of war. The last statement is refuted by the letter of the 29th March 1915 from the Danish Insurance Institute to Mr. H. H. Clausen informing him that divi-divi was contraband.

On the whole of the facts I think that the right conclusion is that the master and the owners knew that the goods laden on board this vessel were destined for Mr. Isidore Weil in Hamburg; and that the master of the vessel knew this when he put forward Mr. William Engelbrecht as the bonâ fide neutral consignee in order to form the basis of his support of the owners' claim. It is hardly necessary to add that the claims for the release of the ship, and for freight, expenses, &c., are all barred.

It remains to consider the question of law. It can be done with more brevity, because I have expressed my views upon the penalty attaching to vessels carrying contraband in the judgment pronounced in the case of the steamship Hakan (ubi sup.).

It has been argued that the present case is distinguishable from The Hakan (ubi sup.), on the ground that the voyage of The Hakan (ubi sup.) was to an enemy port, whereas the voyage of The Maracaibo was to a neutral port, and that her cargo was only condemnable because it was carried over part of a "continuous voyage" to the enemy in enemy territory. The principles on which The Hakan (ubi sup.) judgment was based, it was said, did not apply to "continuous voyage" cases. It was contended that in these latter cases knowledge must still be proved, and proved affirmatively, by the captors. There does not seem to me to be any good reason for any such distinction.

A vessel may be carrying conditional contraband to an enemy port, but it is only in certain cases—e.g., where it is proved that the contraband was destined for the enemy Government or forces, or for a base of supply—that they can be condemned. A vessel may also be carrying absolute contraband to a neutral port; but, again, it is only on proof that the contraband goods were destined, by transhipment or land transit, for the enemy country, that they are subject to condemnation. The effect on belligerents would be similar in either case. The trade, if successful, would in both cases be injurious to the belligerent entitled to make the capture, and helpful to the enemy. It is difficult to see why the penalty in the case of the vessel should be different.

It is to be noted that art. 40 of the Declaration of London applied to the carriage even of conditional contraband by continuous voyage and transit over land where the enemy country has no seaboard. Knowledge did not enter into the question. The vessel suffered the same penalty.

I think that in the present state of the law as agreed and understood between nations the element of knowledge of the owners or the master of the vessel has been eliminated altogether, where such a proportion of contraband is being carried as forms half of the cargo in weight, bulk, value, or freight. This principle applies, in my view, whenever the vessel carries that proportion or amount of confiscable contraband (absolute or conditional), whatever the circumstances or the facts may be which make it subject in law to confiscation. In other words, if a vessel proceeding to a neutral port carries such a cargo as is properly captured as prize because it is absolute or conditional contraband destined ultimately for enemy territory, or for enemy forces or bases of supply, the offence of the vessel is the same as if she was carrying conditional or absolute contraband to an enemy port; and it would seem to me that the same penalty in respect of the vessel should follow. If it is not necessary to prove the knowledge of the owners in the one case, it ought not to be so in the other. I cannot see the reason for a distinction between the two cases either in logic or in practice.

The trade in contraband, though one in which neutrals may like to engage, is necessarily of a risky nature. Great risks often mean huge profits. But the risks are ascertainable. And if belligerents are to avail themselves of their acknowledged rights to capture at sea, neutrals must, in order to garner the profits, either face the risks and the ensuing penalties, or provide for them by their contracts, or protect themselves from them by insurance.

The practical rule (adopted in the Hakan case (ubi sup.) of making the quantitative or qualitative extent of the contraband the test instead of knowledge avoids the necessity for the courts embarking upon the very difficult and often unsatisfactory inquiry as to the state of mind or the extent of information of the persons concerned. From experience in this court I can testify to the difficulty. The tribunal might often feel a certainty that knowledge existed which would satisfy any conscientious person, without being able, perhaps, to set out step by step sufficient or precise proof of it. Experience also shows not only the ingenuity and multitudinous character of the devices and shams resorted to in carrying on contraband trading, but how often it is only by the interception of letters, or cables or wireless messages, that the deceptions can be detected and disclosed.

And even if there is not, in truth, any actual knowledge, is the trader to defeat belligerent rights by taking care not to know by a species of "voluntary ignorance"?

I hazard the opinion that not many of the shipowners or masters of ships belonging to the Scandinavian or Dutch countries are suffering from any want of knowledge of how articles of a contraband character are sent to Germany either by water or by land from neutral ports, which could not reach Germany by direct voyages to her own ports. Knowledge of the destinations of such articles in particular cases may be difficult to establish by actual and direct proof. If the rule of law is now as I have stated it, Prize Courts will be able to do substantial justice and to act in accordance with the law, without any apprehension in the mind of anyone that their conclusions are founded on suspicions rather than on facts established by strict proof.

For the reasons which I have given, I decide that upon the facts the Maracaibo must have been condemned on the ground of the knowledge of the owners and the master; and, furthermore, that the principles of The Hakan (ubi sup.) decision apply to "continuous voyages," and that therefore in law, apart from any question of knowledge, the Maracaibo must be condemned.

There will be no order as to costs.

I give leave to appeal if the appeal is entered within six weeks, and I fix the security for costs at 350*l.*

COURT OF APPEAL.

Nov. 1 and 2, 1916.

(Before SWINFEN EADY and BANKES, L.JJ. and A. T. LAWRENCE, J.)

OWNERS OF STEAMSHIP NOLISEMENT v. BUNGE AND BORN. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party—Lay days—Completion of loading before expiration of lay days—Acceptance of dispatch money—Failure to free ship as soon as possible—Whether charterers liable in damages.

By a charter-party dated the 1*st Feb.* 1915 a steamer was to be loaded at an Argentine port and to proceed therefrom as ordered by the charterers to a European port as port of discharge. Dispatch money at the rate of 15*l. per day was payable for all time saved in loading, and the charterers had the right to keep the steamer for twenty-four hours after completion of loading, for the purpose of settling accounts. The steamer was loaded nineteen days before the expiration of the lay or loading days, and in respect of the nineteen days the charterers received dispatch money. Owing to delay by the charterers in deciding as to the port of call, the steamer was kept waiting for the bills of lading and orders for three days. The shipowners claimed damages in respect of this delay, and in arbitration proceedings were awarded* 300*l., being damages at the rate of* 150*l. for two days.*

Held, that the charterers were entitled to dispatch money for the days saved in loading, but that, when the loading was completed, they were not entitled to detain the ship, even if the lay days had not expired, and that the damages for detention, not being provided for by the charter-party, were at large, and the arbitrator had power to award the shipowners 300*l. as such damages.*

Decision of Atkin, J. (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 364; 114 L. T. Rep. 850; (1916) 1 K. B. 805) reversed.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from a decision of Atkin, J. on an award in the form of a special case stated by an arbitrator.

By a charter-party dated the 1st Feb. 1915, made between the owners of the steamship Nolisement and Ernest A. Bunge and J. Born (hereinafter called "the charterers"), it was agreed (by clause 2) that the steamer should with all convenient speed after arrival at Montevideo proceed as ordered by the charterers to various ports or places to receive a full and complete cargo of wheat or other grain.

(a) Reported by EDWARD J. M. CHAPLIN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

By clause 4 the steamer when loaded was to proceed to one or other of various European ports at the master's option for orders, "unless these be given to him by the charterers on signing bills of lading to discharge at a safe port on the Continent. . . ."

By clause 13 the steamer was to load at a certain rate (the details of which are not material to this report), otherwise demurrage to be paid at the rate of 3*d.* sterling per ton per running day, the time for loading to commence twelve hours after written notice to be given by the master to the charterers or their agents that the steamer was ready to receive cargo.

By clause 16 dispatch money, which was to be paid to the charterers before the steamer sailed, was payable for all time saved in loading at the rate of 15*l.* sterling per day.

By clause 30 disputes were referred to arbitration.

The cargo was duly loaded under the said charter-party and a dispute arose between the parties as to what damages (if any) the owners were entitled to receive in consequence of the steamer being unable to sail from her port of loading for three days after she was ready to sail and the loading was completed owing to the failure of the charterers to make out the bills of lading, they not having made up their minds as to the port of discharge, although they had decided to give orders as to the destination pursuant to clause 4 (sup.) on signing the bills of lading.

The loading of the vessel proceeded so rapidly that it was completed nineteen days before the lay days were completed, and the charterers received in account dispatch money in respect of those nineteen days.

The arbitrators having failed to agree, their umpire found the following facts in a special case:

That on the 16th March 1915 at 4 p.m. the loading of the steamship Nolisement was finished, and at that time the master applied for his bills of lading and orders as to destination from the charterers, but the same were not forthcoming. The steamer was kept waiting for the bills of lading and orders for three days, viz., until 4 p.m. on the 19th March 1915, owing to the charterers, who had decided to give orders for the discharging port on signing bills of lading, not having made up their minds as to the port to which they should order the steamer. The steamer sailed at 5 p.m. on the said 19th March 1915. It was agreed between the parties and I find that the charterers had the right to keep the steamer for twenty-four hours for the purpose of settling accounts, and that the dispute arises in relation to two remaining days that the steamer was kept waiting.

I find as a fact that the steamer was kept two days over and above the said twenty-four hours owing to a breach by the charterers of their obligation to present to the captain the bills of lading and orders as to the port of discharge.

I further find the fact that the owners paid to the charterers on accounts made out by the charterers dispatch money pursuant to clause 16 of the charter-party on the footing that the loading of the steamer was completed at 4 p.m. on the 16th March 1915, and that they included in their account for dispatch money the time the captain was waiting for his bills of lading and orders, and that the time taken was not paid under any mistake of fact.

The charterers contended:—

(a) That the loading time granted by the charter-party not having been exceeded, the shipowners were not entitled to claim for demurrage or detention, but only to a return of the dispatch money so paid under a mistake of fact.

(b) Alternatively, that if the shipowners were entitled to claim for the time occupied at the port of loading in waiting for orders, their claim should be for a return of the dispatch money paid for the two days on the ground that the freight was based on ten days being occupied in loading, or, in the alternative, their claim should be for demurrage at the charter-party rate.

[There were other contentions which are immaterial to this report.]

The shipowners contended:—

(a) That on completion of the loading of the steamer the charterers were bound within twenty-four hours to present to the captain his bills of lading and orders and so enable the steamer to sail.

(b) That on the expiration of the said twenty-four hours the steamer was entitled to proceed to sea, and that, having been prevented for two days from doing so owing to the wrongful action of the charterers in not giving orders and presenting the bills of lading, they were entitled to claim damages for such detention.

(c) Alternatively, that, having paid the charterers dispatch money for the unexpired time within which they were bound to load the steamer, the loading time must be taken to have expired on the completion of the loading, and that for any time during which the steamer was prevented from sailing by the charterers they were entitled to claim damages for such detention subject to allowing the charterers twenty-four hours for making out the accounts and the bills of lading and giving orders.

Subject to the opinion of the court, he found that the shipowners were right, and were entitled to 300*l.* and costs. Alternatively, if the charterers were correct, he awarded that they should only pay 30*l.* to the owners. He also found that, assuming the damages should have been assessed upon the basis of the demurrage rate, they came to 94*l.* 14*s.*

By clause 12 of the charter-party:

Lay days shall not commence before the 1st March 1915, unless charterers begin loading sooner, and, should the steamer not be ready to load by 6 p.m. on the 31st March 1915, charterers shall have the option of cancelling.

Atkin, J. held that, the loading time granted to the charterers not having been exceeded, the shipowners were not entitled to claim for demurrage or detention, but only to a return of the dispatch money as money paid for a consideration which had failed.

The shipowners appealed.

Sir Maurice Hill, K.C. (W. N. Raeburn with him) for the appellants.—The charterers had no right to detain the ship after she was once loaded. The fact that she was loaded at an accelerated rate is immaterial in this regard, except as regards the dispatch money. When once the ship was loaded, it was the duty of the charterers to present the bills of lading so as to enable the ship to sail:

Moel Tryvan Ship Company v. Kruger and Co., 10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 416, 465; 96 L. T. Rep. 429, at p. 432; (1907) 1 K. B. 309, at p. 319; 97 L. T. Rep. 143; (1907) A. C. 272

Oriental Steamship Company v. Tylor, 7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 377; 69 L. T. Rep. 577; (1893) 2 Q. B. 518.

Secondly, the charterers, having received dispatch money for the days saved in loading, cannot be heard to say that the loading was not completed on the date from which they claimed and received dispatch money:

Oakville Steamship Company Limited v. Holmes, 5 Com Cas. 48.

D. C. Leck, K.C. (R. A. Wright with him) for the respondents.—On the true construction of the charter-party the charterers had a number of days in gross in which to load, and, provided they loaded within those days, there could be no detention of the ship. In any case, if the ship had not been so detained she would have lost time at the port of call, so little or no damage resulted to the shipowners. The charterers were under no obligation to present any bills of lading to the master at all, and, the facts in Oriental Steamship Company v. Tylor (sup.) being different, that case has no bearing on this. Assuming the shipowners are entitled to damages for demurrage, those damages are assessed by clause 13 of the charter-party, and the arbitrator was not entitled to assess the damages except under that clause. The shipowners are entitled to a return of the dispatch money for the two days.

Nov. 2, 1916.—Swinfen Eady, L.J.—This is an appeal of the owners of the steamship Nolisement from the judgment of Atkin, J. upon a special case stated by an umpire. The question arises in respect of a charter-party dated the 1st Feb. 1915, whereby the ship Nolisement was to proceed to the River Plate and there load a full and complete grain cargo. The charter-party provides for the rate at which the steamer is to be loaded, and it provides for dispatch money. It appears from the facts stated in the case that the ship was loaded in eight days and earned dispatch money for about nineteen and a quarter days, and was duly paid on that basis, but her sailing was delayed for three days after the loading was completed. The umpire found that there was an agreement between the parties that the detainer for one day was proper. He says: "It was agreed between the parties and I find that the charterers had the right to keep the steamer for twenty-four hours for the purpose of settling the accounts, and that the dispute arises in relation to the two remaining days that the steamer was kept waiting"—in other words, after the steamer was fully loaded, at the expiration of the eight days that it took to load her, she was detained a further three, one of which was justified; and so the claim was in respect of the remaining two days that she was detained. The umpire states why she was detained. He says that she was unable to sail from her port of loading for three days after she was ready to sail and the loading was completed, owing to the failure of the charterers to make up the bills of lading, as they had not made up their minds as to the port of discharge, although they had decided to give orders as to the destination pursuant to clause 4 of the charter-party on signing the bills of lading. So that the reason for the detention for the two days was that the charterers were unable to make up their minds as to the port of discharge; and it is in respect of the claim for that two days' detention that the owners' claim went to arbitration. There were two arbitrators and an umpire, and the umpire made his award in an alternative form. He first found that the claim of the shipowners was well founded, and that there was payable by the charterers to the owners a sum of 300*l.* in respect of the detention of the ship. Then he awarded, in the alternative, that, if his award was wrong and the contention of the charterers that at most only dispatch money for those two days should be returned, then he found that 30*l.* was the dispatch money that was payable to the owners. Then, in a further alternative, the umpire awarded that, if his award was wrong and if the contention of the charterers was wrong as to the return of dispatch money, but that the right to damages was to be ascertained on the basis of the demurrage rate in the charter-party, then he fixed that amount at 94*l.* 14*s.* The umpire having made his award in that alternative form, the matter came before the learned judge, who decided, not in accordance with the first finding, but that there was no liability upon the charterers in respect of the detention of the ship; and that they were entitled as of right to detain the ship for all the lay days—that is to say, for the period of time that was necessary for the loading of the ship, if she had been loaded only according to the rate of loading prescribed by the charter-party. But he says on that footing that, although the charterers had the right to detain the ship for the whole of the lay days, nevertheless they could not claim dispatch money when the ship was detained in respect of those two days, and the shipowners had gained nothing by the accelerated rate of loading; and, therefore, he held that the dispatch money in respect of the two days was money paid without consideration, and the charterers must return to the owners that amount.

From that judgment the owners appeal; they contend that they are first entitled to damages for the detention of the vessel; secondly, that there is no contract rate of damage, that the damage is at large; that the umpire, a business man, a man in the shipping world, has arrived at a sum which is a fair and reasonable sum, and which there is no ground to disturb; and that in other respects the award is right.

The charter-party provides, by clause 4, that the steamer being loaded "shall with all reasonable speed therewith proceed to St. Vincent (Cape Verdes), or Las Palmas, or Teneriffe (Canary Islands), or Madeira or Dakar, at the master's option, for orders (unless these be given to him by charterers on signing bills of lading)." So that the charter-party gives to the charterers the option, on signing bills of lading, to name the port of discharge; and it is on that option that the umpire finds that the charterers had decided to give orders as to the destination on signing bills of lading—that is to say, the charterers had decided, not that the ship was to sail and call for orders, but that the port of discharge was to be named by them on signing bills of lading, but before the ship sailed, but they had not made up their minds as to the particular port. Then the provision for lay days is in this way. Clause 12 provides that the lay days shall not commence before the 1st March 1915 unless charterers begin loading sooner; and, should the steamer not be ready to load by 6 p.m. on the 31st March, the charterers should have the option of cancelling; and then by clause 13 it provides for the rate of loading: "The steamer shall be loaded at the rate of 225 tons per running day up to the first 3000 tons, and at the rate of 400 tons per running day for any quantity above 3000 tons, Sundays and holidays excepted, otherwise demurrage shall be paid" at a certain specified rate. The parties have worked out, and there is no dispute between them as to this, the number of days which that rate of loading would give the vessel to load; having regard to the eight days that were occupied in the actual loading, there were nineteen or nineteen and a quarter in respect of which the dispatch money was payable. But it will be observed that demurrage is only payable under clause 13 if the steamer is not loaded at the agreed rate. It says the steamer shall be loaded at a particular rate, otherwise demurrage is to be paid. The steamer was loaded at an accelerated rate; and, in my opinion, the fact that after loading she was detained would give no claim to demurrage under that clause, and, therefore, that clause does not give any contract rate for detention of the steamer after she is fully loaded. It is merely that, unless she is loaded at a particular rate, demurrage shall be paid; and in this case, the steamer having been loaded at an accelerated rate, no claim can arise under that clause. Then clause 16 provides for dispatch money, which the vessel earned and received; and clause 20 provides for advance freight; and clause 21 provides for the signature of the bills of lading: "The master to sign bills of lading in the form indorsed hereon, at any rate of freight that the charterers or their agents may require, but any difference in amount between the bills of lading freight, and the total gross chartered freight, as above, shall be settled at port of loading before the steamer sails; if in the steamer's favour, to be paid in cash on (or) before signing bills of lading; if in charterers' favour, by usual master's bill payable five days after arrival at port of discharge, or upon collection of freight (whichever occurs first), and such bill is hereby made by owners a charge upon bill of lading freight, and the said freight is hereby hypothecated as security for said bill." So that the master was under an obligation to sign bills of lading at any rate of freight that the charterers or their agents might require; and that, no doubt, was a provision for the benefit of the charterers, who could have required the master to sign bills of lading, and, of course, before sailing. Under those circumstances one must consider, in the first place, that it is the duty of the charterers to prepare and present the bills of lading. In the case of Moel Tryvan Ship Company v. Kruger and Co. (10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 416; 96 L. T. Rep. 429, at p. 432; (1907) 1 K. B. 809, at p. 819) the President, Lord Gorell (Sir Gorell Barnes as he then was), after considering the terms of the contract, said he was proposing to apply to the terms of the contract one or two well-known propositions: and the second proposition he puts is this: "That, as a matter of business—and it necessarily must be so—the charterer has to prepare the bills of lading; he has to select how many parcels of goods he wishes the shipment to be divided into, and whether he will send the bills of lading to certain specific persons named or have them made out to order and indorse them. It is obvious that it must be for the charterer, if he wishes to have bills of lading signed, to make out the bills of lading and tender them for signature." Here, of course, it is essential that they should be made out by the charterers, because the rate of freight to be mentioned in the bill of lading is to be the rate of freight directed by the charterers.

If that is their duty, then within what time and when ought the charterers to make out the bills of lading and present them to the master? In the case of Oriental Steamship Company v. Tylor (7 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 377; 69 L. T. Rep. 577; (1893) 2 Q. B. 518, at p. 523) Lord Esher said: "Now, with regard to what time is the signing of the bill of lading to be determined? What is the time at which, or from which, you are to calculate the necessity or the obligation to sign the bill of lading? It is not from the sailing of the ship; it is from the loading of the cargo. No captain has authority to sign a bill of lading unless there is cargo on board, and he has only authority to sign for the cargo which is on board. But when there is a cargo on board, what is the time within which the bills of lading are to be signed? The bills of lading are almost invariably signed before the ship sails. Take an ordinary charter, where there are not the words 'or agent' in it, where the bills of lading are to be signed by the captain only: is it not elementary to say that those bills of lading are to be signed before the ship sails? It is obvious, in almost every case, the bill of lading is signed before the ship sails, and the time from which you are to determine the obligation as to the time of signing the bill of lading is from the time of loading the cargo. Therefore, the time for the signing of these bills of lading is to be calculated from the time of the loading on board." Then, a little later on, he points out that the charterers ought to have presented the bills of lading almost immediately—that is to say, within a reasonable time after the ship was loaded there was an obligation on the charterers to present the bills of lading. Not having done so, was it any breach of duty by the charterers to detain the ship beyond the stipulated number of lay days? The learned judge has held that it was not. In his judgment he says that the true view is that the charterer had a stipulated period of lay days during which he may delay the ship at the port of loading without incurring liability for demurrage or for damages. In other words, he commits no breach for detaining the ship for that particular period. Of course it may well be that if all the lay days are consumed in loading, then there is no breach for which the charterer is liable; but in a charter-party in this form, where the ship is fully loaded at an accelerated rate, the charterer has no right to detain the ship after she is loaded. The charterer has no right under a contract in this form to say: "Although I might have taken more time to load the ship than I did, although I might have taken another nineteen days to load the ship, yet after the ship is fully loaded I can detain her for the rest of the period that I might have occupied in loading without being liable in damages for forfeiting or not retaining any right to the dispatch money." In my opinion, in a charter-party in this form the charterer had no such right, and, after the expiration of the one day allowed by the parties, it was a breach by the charterers to detain the ship by not presenting the bills of lading and enabling the ship to sail.

Then the learned judge has held that acceptance of the dispatch money did not prevent the charterers saying that they were under no obligation to let the ship sail before the lay days expired; and that the charterers could not retain the two days' dispatch money. I am of opinion that the charterers had earned and were entitled to retain the dispatch money. In clause 16 dispatch money which is to be paid to the charterers before the steamer sails shall be payable for all time saved in loading at a certain rate. The time was saved in loading her. True it is the ship was afterwards delayed, but, according to the terms of the contract, the dispatch money is payable for time save in loading; and when once it is ascertained that nineteen or nineteen and a quarter days were saved in loading the ship, then the dispatch money became payable for that time; and the charterers were entitled to receive and retain it, although they might also be liable in damages for afterwards detaining the ship.

Then the next question is: Is there any contract rate for damages? I can find none. I have already pointed out that the demurrage payable if the steamer does not load within the contract time is inapplicable; and I can find no contract for the payment of damages where the ship is detained. Where the umpire finds that she is unreasonably detained for two days at the port of loading, the damage is such sum as may reasonably be taken to be within the contemplation of the parties for the breach of it. It has been referred to a commercial umpire, and he has awarded the sum of 300*l.* as damages. It is urged by counsel for the defendants that the damages were practically nil, because they were damages for detaining the ship two days at the port of loading, and, by reason of that detention, a detention later on in the voyage at the port of call was obviated; and that otherwise, as she would have had to call for orders, she at all events would have been detained under the contract for twenty-four hours there; and if it is a question of only two days at the port of loading, it is merely detaining her two days there instead of later on a similar number of days when she calls at the port of call for orders. In my opinion as a matter of law that cannot be sustained. They are matters to be considered in arriving at the true amount of damage. The ship may not have been detained for that time at the port of call. A commercial arbitrator takes those matters into consideration. I think it was rather put before him, having regard to the contention of the owners, that "in calculating the damages regard must be had to the terms of clause 22 and the consequent saving to the shipowners by reason of waiting for orders at the loading port of time which would otherwise have been lost in calling for orders and waiting for twenty-four hours or more for orders under clause 22." Of course, the commercial arbitrator may well say that, having regard to the state of business, the ship would not have been detained for that time, or anything like it; but that is a matter for the umpire merely to take into consideration with all the rest of the facts of the case in ascertaining the amount of damages. I am of opinion that there is no contract rate, that the dispatch money does not apply, that the demurrage rate does not apply by contract, and that, therefore, the damages were open to be assessed by the arbitration tribunal; and, the amount having been assessed at 300*l.*, I see no ground for disturbing that assessment.

In my opinion the judgment below ought to be reversed; and the judgment should be in accordance with par. 1 of the umpire's award.

Bankes, L.J.—I agree.

As presented to the arbitrators and umpire, it does not appear to me, from the statement of the case, that the charterers disputed their liability to pay something to the shipowners; but they contend that it ought to be limited to the amount of the dispatch money, which they alleged had been paid under a mistake of fact. When the matter came before Atkin, J. the argument which was developed and the case which was presented to the learned judge was this: that the charterers were under no obligation to present any bills of lading to the master at all, but in any event, having regard to the provision in the charter-party with regard to the lay days, the time which the shipowners contended had been wrongly occupied falling within the named lay days, the charterers were under no obligation to pay any damages at all; and, secondly, that with regard to the payment of dispatch money, the right ground upon which to put that question was that there had been a total failure of consideration, and that the money was properly repayable to the shipowners.

To take the second point first. The provision in the charter-party dealing with the dispatch money is contained in clause 16, and it provides that dispatch money shall be payable for all time saved in loading; and that is a short and convenient way of expressing what the parties meant. But time saved in loading must mean for any portion of the full time allowed by the charter-party for loading which remains after the vessel has been fully loaded, and for that time the language of the clause is plain that dispatch money has to be paid. Therefore dispatch money under this case in the contract had to be paid for the full period which remained between the completion of the loading and the last day allowed under clause 13 for the operation of loading. If the construction adopted by Atkin, J. with regard to the other question in dispute is accepted, this, as it seems to me, extraordinary and absurd result follows: that dispatch money is payable under the terms of the charter in respect of a period of time during which the ship is not free to sail, and not free to sail owing to the action of the charterers. That difficulty was, no doubt, felt by the parties when they were at the arbitration, and they tried to get out of it by saying that the dispatch money had been paid under a mistake of fact. That way of getting out of the difficulty obviously fails. Then another attempt was made, and this attempt was accepted by Atkin, J. It was said: "The money ought not to be retained by the charterers because of the total failure of consideration." Now, I am quite unable to accept that view of the position. It seems to me that the consideration for the payment of dispatch money was diligence in loading, and, so far from there being a total failure of consideration, it seems to me that the facts show that the consideration was fully executed. In those circumstances, I can see no ground at all for coming to the conclusion that this dispatch money in respect of those two particular days was not properly payable.

That brings me now to consider the first question, and that depends upon the proper construction of this particular charter-party. Atkin, J. has treated the charter-party and this clause 13 as though it gave some right to the charterers and some right in respect of the ship, and a right in respect of the ship that was not limited to the time actually occupied in loading, but a right in respect of the ship which extended to the full period which might have been occupied, but which was not in fact occupied.

In my opinion, that is not the correct view of clause 13 of the charter-party. It does not specify any number of lay days at all; but, so far from giving the charterers a right, in my opinion, the correct view of this clause is that it places them under an obligation, and the obligation is to load at a certain minimum rate, and there is a further obligation that if they do not so load they must pay demurrage at a certain agreed rate. That is the effect of the clause, as it seems to me—a clause indirectly, you may say, conferring a right, because of the obligation it places upon them; but the primary effect of the clause is to place them under an obligation to load at a certain minimum rate, and an obligation that, if that fails, they are to pay demurrage at a certain rate. If they fail in performing the obligation, the penalty is to pay demurrage. If they, fulfil the obligation and do not occupy the full time which they were entitled to occupy, they receive dispatch money. If they occupy the exact time, they neither pay demurrage nor receive dispatch money. If that is the correct view of the clause, the right upon which the learned judge founded his decision does not appear to me to exist, and the charterers have no right to say: "Although we did not occupy the time which the charter-party allowed us to occupy, we are still in a position to claim the right to detain the ship in the sense of refusing to take action which will allow her to depart just as long as we please, so long as our full loading time is not exceeded."

The next point is this; that, assuming the view of the contract to be right that when the ship is once fully loaded any right (if you call it a right) of the charterers in respect of the ship ceases, then the question arises, what is the position of the parties with reference to the bills of lading? I suppose in practice in almost every case the charterers desire that there shall be a bill of lading, and the owner of the ship, or his representative, the master, also desires that there shall be a bill of lading; and a certain amount of time is necessarily occupied in preparing the necessary document or documents and submitting them to the master; and in this particular case the parties are agreed that a reasonable time would be twenty-four hours. Is there any obligation upon the charterers under those circumstances to present a bill of lading? I should certainly have thought there was; but this case, it seems to me, goes beyond that, because it does not rest upon ordinary commercial practice. It appears to me that upon the correct reading of clause 21 there is an obligation upon the charterers to present bills of lading, and on the master to sign them. The obligation is not inserted there in the interest of the charterers only. It seems to me that the provisions of the clause are for the mutual benefit of the master and the charterers. In this particular contract it is obviously within the contemplation of the parties that the bill of lading is to be presented by the charterers to the shipowner or master. Under those circumstances, within what time? As I have said, the parties have agreed that twenty-four hours would be a reasonable time. If it is within the contemplation of the parties that the act shall be done, there shall be an implied condition that it shall be done, and shall be done within what the parties have agreed is a reasonable time. Under those circumstances it seems to me that there was in this case, upon the facts as found, a breach by the charterers of that implied condition that they should present a bill of lading to the captain for signature within a reasonable time; and as they failed to comply with that condition, they are liable in damages. The damages do not come within any provision of the charter-party fixing the amount of damages for this particular breach. Under those circumstances, the damages were at large; and I see no reason why we should interfere with the view of the umpire, who had all the matters before him, as to the amount of damages that ought to be awarded in this particular case.

A. T. Lawrence, J.—I am of the same opinion.

The question depends upon whether Mr. Leck's contention, that the lay days provided by clauses 12 and 13 are to be taken as a gross period which the charterers are entitled to have the ship at their disposal for absolutely is right; or whether they are really only a means of calculating the rate of loading, and that if the rate of loading does not rise to that level then demurrage is to be paid. I think that they are not gross days at all, but that they are days given for the operation of loading. That is made clear by clause 16, which provides for dispatch money in the event of the loading being at a more rapid rate than the calculation under clauses 12 and 13 would work out at. In this case the loading was completed in a lesser time, and dispatch money was earned and paid; and, in that event, in does not seem to me possible to say that those days were still to the credit of the charterers. Directly the ship was finally loaded it became the charterers' duty, within a reasonable time, to present their bills of lading for signature. If they did not do so, but for an unreasonable time delayed the ship before they presented the bills of lading, that was a breach of duty for which damages are recoverable. Here it is agreed that the reasonable time within which to have done it was twenty-four hours; and that after that period the ship was delayed for two days. Mr. Leck argues that the ship might have gone away without waiting for the bills of lading. I do not think that is a correct view of the charter-party. Clause 21 seems to me to clearly mean that the master has to sign bills of lading at the port of loading before the steamer sails. He could not, in point of fact, have complied with this charter-party by leaving a bill of lading as suggested and going away. He would have had to declare his option as to what port of call he was going to in writing before signing the final bill of lading. It seems to me it is not possible to read this charter-party as one intended to give the charterers the twenty-seven and a quarter days calculated in this case as a time in gross in which the ship was to be at their disposal, and to mean that during that time they could retain her for any purpose they liked. I think they could not. They could only detain her in the operation of loading for that time, and if they detained her otherwise they were committing a breach of duty.

Then as to the measure of damages, that was perhaps a point of some difficulty, but, on the whole, I think that there is no agreed rate of demurrage here for detention. The demurrage provided for in clause 13 is a detention caused by delay in loading, and there are a number of other assessments of damages in the charter-party, none of which apply to this particular detention; and, consequently, I think the damages for the detention in question were at large, and the umpire was entitled to find the sum which he did. I think the judgment which was given by my Lord is correct.

William Cory and Sons Limited v. Lambton and Hetton Collieries Limited. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Carriage of goods—Indemnity—Implied request by shipowners to charterers to unload cargo—Accident happening to charterers' servant while unloading—Compensation paid by charterers to workman's dependants—Implied undertaking by shipowners to indemnify—Liability of shipowners.

The plaintiffs, who were the charterers of a ship from the defendants, the shipowners, gratuitously removed some hatch beams on behalf of and at the implied request of the shipowners. While the beams were being removed by the plaintiffs' servants, one of the plaintiffs' servants engaged in the work was accidentally killed. The plaintiffs paid to his dependants compensation in accordance with the Workmen's Compensation Act 1906. The plaintiffs claimed to recover the sum paid as compensation from the defendants on the ground that the defendants had impliedly undertaken to indemnify the plaintiffs for loss or damage occasioned by the discharge of the cargo.

Held, that there was no evidence of an implied undertaking by the defendants to indemnify the plaintiffs. The accident was not the direct or natural consequence of doing the discharging of the cargo, but was a consequence of the manner in which the discharging was done.

The proposition of Tindal, C.J. in Toplis v. Grane (5 Bing. N. C. 636), cited by Brett, J. in Dugdale v. Lovering (32 L. T. Rep., at p. 158; L. Rep. 10 C. P., at p. 200), considered.

Decision of Ridley, J. reversed.

Defendants' appeal from a decision of Ridley, J., sitting with a jury.

The jury found that the plaintiffs in discharging the cargo from a ship were doing the work of the defendants, the shipowners; that the plaintiffs were doing the work at the implied request of the defendants; and that the defendants had impliedly undertaken to indemnify the plaintiffs for damage or loss occurring during the discharging of the cargo. While the cargo was being unloaded, Peacock, a servant of the plaintiffs employed in the unloading, was accidentally killed. The plaintiffs paid to the dependants of Peacock 283*l.* as compensation in accordance with the Workmen's Compensation Act 1906, and claimed to recover that sum from the defendants, as on an implied indemnity. Ridley, J. gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

Holman Gregory, K.C. and Alexander Neilson for the appellants.—There was no evidence of any implied undertaking by the defendants to indemnify the plaintiffs. The accident to the plaintiffs' servant was not the natural or direct consequence of the plaintiffs' doing the unloading at the implied request of the defendants, if in fact there was any such request. The accident was due to the negligence of the plaintiffs' servants, and it cannot be supposed that if the defendants had been asked if they would be responsible for any injury to the plaintiffs' servants during the unloading, whether due to negligence or not, they would have answered that they would.

Rawlinson, K.C. and M. M. Macnaghten (for Harold Morris, serving with His Majesty's forces) for the respondents.—There was evidence of an implied undertaking by the defendants to indemnify the plaintiffs. They did the work at the request of the defendants, and it must have been understood between the parties that the defendants would be liable for any ordinary consequence, at any rate in the absence of negligence, of the plaintiffs doing the defendants' work. The defendants knew perfectly well that an accident might happen, and the plaintiffs would then have to pay compensation. The defendants asked the plaintiffs to stand in their shoes as regards the work to be done, and took the risk of an accident happening. They ran no greater risk of having to pay compensation than if they themselves had undertaken their own work. In Dugdale v. Lovering (32 L. T. Rep., at p. 158; 10 L. Rep. C. P., at p. 200) Brett, J. said: "In Toplis v. Grane (5 Bing. N. C. 636) Tindal, C.J., one of the most careful expositors of the law ever known, laid down the proposition on the subject in these terms: 'We think this evidence brings the case before us within the principle laid down in Betts v. Gibbins (2 Ad. & E. 57), that when an act has been done by the plaintiff under the express directions of the defendant which occasions an injury to the rights of third persons, yet if such an act is not apparently illegal in itself, but is done honestly and bonâ fide in compliance with the defendant's directions, he shall be bound to indemnify the plaintiff against the consequences thereof.'" This case comes within those words of Tindal, C.J. In Groves and Sons v. Webb and Kenward (115 L. T. Rep., at p. 1089) Bankes, L.J. said: "It seems to me plain, from a consideration of the cases, that this doctrine of implied warranty is not confined to risks which are in the contemplation of the parties at the time the request was made, but it extends to risks which actually occur, provided they are the direct result of acting upon the request. . . . The plaintiffs had been exposed to a risk in consequence of acting upon the request of the defendants. Under these circumstances the true inference to draw . . . is that the defendants must be taken to have impliedly promised, that is, they would have promised as a matter of ordinary business, had the circumstances been brought to their attention . . . that they would accept responsibility and not the plaintiffs." That, it is submitted, is this case. They also referred to

Barclay v. Sheffield Corporation, 93 L. T. Rep. 83; (1905) A. C. 392;

Further, the plaintiffs did this work gratuitously, and there was an implied promise by the defendants to indemnify the plaintiffs for anything and everything they might have to pay out of their own pockets.

No reply was called for.

SWINFEN EADY, L.J.—This is the appeal of the defendants, the Lambton and Hetton Collieries Limited, against the verdict and judgment at the trial of the action before Ridley, J., where, upon certain questions being left to the jury, a verdict was returned for the plaintiffs for 283*l*. Against that verdict and judgment the defendants appeal, and they ask in the alternative, first, to have the judgment set aside and judgment entered for the defendants, upon the ground that there was no evidence to go to the jury with regard to the liability to indemnify the plaintiffs in respect of which the action was brought, or, in the alternative, they ask for a new trial.

The facts out of which this action arises are these. On the 23rd April 1915 the plaintiffs, William Cory and Sons Limited, chartered from the defendants, the Lambton and Hetton Collieries Limited, a steamship for the purpose of carrying a cargo of coal. The ship arrived in the Thames, and was moored at the Albert Dock coal hoists, where the plaintiffs, William Cory and Sons Limited, have certain machinery and hoists for quickly discharging cargoes of their coal. According to the terms of the charter-party, the time for discharging was to commence when the steamer was moored in her discharging berth ready to discharge cargo. What happened was that, on the arrival of the steamer, and after she was moored, the ship's crew removed the hatches. Then the next step, before having the hatchways cleared to discharge the coal, was the removal of the hatch beams. These hatch beams, which rest by their own weight, are heavy, and no tackle of the ship had been rigged for the purpose of removing them, and there was evidence from which I think the jury were entitled to take view which they did, that William Cory and Sons Limited, at the implied request of the ship, proceeded to use their powerful machinery for the purpose of lifting and removing the hatch beams. Now, in doing so, unfortunately an accident occurred to Peacock, who was one of William Cory and Sons' men; he was killed, or he died from the effects of the injuries that he received during the operation. After his death his dependants took proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act and obtained a sum of about 283*l*. compensation. This action was brought by Messrs. William Cory and Sons Limited to obtain from the defendants, the owners of the ship, that sum of 283*l*. upon an implied indemnity, their case being that the plaintiffs did the work of removing the hatch beams at the request of the defendants and under circumstances from which an indemnity can be implied against all consequences of the act they were requested to do, including in those consequences the liability of the plaintiffs to pay compensation to the dependants of a workman who was killed by the operation which they were asked to undertake.

The accident happened in this way. After the removal of the hatches the ship lay there, and William Cory and Sons Limited proceeded to remove the hatch beams. There was evidence that the ship was not ready to discharge within the meaning of the charter-party until the hatch beams had been removed. Thereupon William Cory and Sons' men proceeded to do what was necessary to remove the hatch beams. The deceased, Peacock, went into the hold, either standing on the coal, or on the hatch beam itself, but he passed into the ship, and there was a crane man working the crane. Then, according to the evidence of the crane driver, Robert Wing, Peacock, who was a fellow employee of Wing, both Peacock and Wing being in the employ of William Cory and Sons Limited, gave him from the ship the order to lower the grab. It was intended doubtless to have a chain or something fastened to the end of the grab to remove the hatch beams. "He gave me the order to lower the grab, and it touched the fore and aft, and the grab slipped," and then he tried to pull it up, but it was too late—that is to say, the grab had rested on the beam which had slipped and tipped over, and injured the deceased or pinned him to the side of the ship. Then in cross examination Wing said that "Peacock let me"—the crane man—"go too far; and so it happened." That is to say, Peacock did not give Wing the sign by which he was to stop lowering the grab down, and he let the grab down too far and it tipped over, and although he tried to pull it up and tried to recover himself it was too late. It was in that way that the accident happened. The plaintiffs being liable, and having paid 283*l*. as compensation to their deceased workman, having paid it to, or for the benefit of, his dependants, brought this action, on the ground that the work was done by them for the shipowners; it was the shipowners' duty to remove these hatch beams. William Cory and Sons Limited had done the work for them at their request, and they say the circumstances were such that there must be implied a promise to indemnify them from consequences, including this liability to pay compensation.

The claim was put forward originally in the alternative. It was based upon a usage or custom of the Port of London. That was one part of the claim, and it was alleged by the plaintiffs that there was a usage or custom of the Port of London, in reference to colliers at the port, that when a workman employed by the dischargers is injured by accident arising out of and in the course of his employment in the work of removing the hatches and (or) the hatch beams of a ship, the shipowners indemnify the dischargers against their liability to pay compensation, or the injured workman or his dependants. That was alleged to be a custom or trade usage of the Port of London. That is now out of the way in this case, because it was conceded in the court below, when the matter was before the jury, that there was no evidence upon which the jury could be asked to find such a custom.

Then the plaintiffs put their case in the alternative; they put it upon an implication in law from the facts of the case, and they say that where persons request work to be done they impliedly promise, as a necessary implication of law, to indemnify the party doing that work. The learned judge at the trial left three questions to the jury. The first was: "Were the dischargers"—that is, William Cory and Sons Limited—"doing the working of the ship?" That is to say, were they, in removing the hatch beams, doing the work which the shipowners, as between the ship and charterers, ought to do? The jury answered that they were. The second question the learned judge put was: "Were they doing it by implied request?" and the answer was, Yes. That was having regard to the circumstances, the ship drawing up, and there being no machinery immediately available for removing the hatch beams, and the ship not making preparation for doing it, obviously waiting for William Cory and Sons Limited to do it, and one of their men proceeding on to the ship for the purpose of doing it, there was evidence from which the jury were entitled to draw the conclusion that William Cory and Sons Limited were doing the work of removing the hatch beams at the request of the ship. In respect of those two findings there is really no complaint.

The matter turns upon the third question which was put to the jury: "Was there an implied indemnity?" and the jury said, Yes.

The question which we have to consider is not only whether that verdict of the jury was in accordance with the evidence, but whether there was any evidence to go to the jury from which they could arrive at such a decision.

The learned judge left it to the jury in this way: After dealing with the first and second questions that I have already dealt with, he said, as to the third question, "Was there an implied indemnity?" That is to say, "when they"—the plaintiffs—"were doing it at the request of the ship, if anything should happen which put a liability upon them, an unforeseen liability in the course of doing it, have they a right to say, 'You ought to indemnify us because we were doing this work for you?'" His Lordship says: "Mr. Rawlinson has been able to quote a sentence which was approved by the courts some time ago on a very similar subject, and it is this," and then he reads the extract, which Mr. Rawlinson had read from Dugdale v. Lovering (sup.). Then the learned judge proceeds: "Gentlemen, it seems to fall within that principle. I do not see any fact in this case which militates against it. I do not know whether you do; but, unless you see there is any reason in the facts of this case which would make it unjust that the responsibility for the accident should fall upon those whose work it was when the accident occurred, I think it would be a proper finding on your part to say that there was an implied indemnity." Then the jury answer that by saying there was an implied indemnity.

Was that direction of the learned judge right? The passage which Mr. Rawlinson read was this—it is in Dugdale v. Lovering (sup.), where Brett, L.J. (Brett, J. as he then was) refers to the case of Toplis v. Grane (5 Bing. N. C. 636): "In which," he says, "Tindal, C.J., one of the most careful expositors of the law ever known, laid down the proposition on the subject in these terms: 'We think this evidence brings the case before us within the principle laid down in Betts v. Gibbins (2 Ad. & E. 51) that when an act has been done by the plaintiff under the express directions of the defendant which occasions an injury to the rights of third persons, yet, if such an act is not apparently illegal in itself, but is done honestly and bonâ fide in compliance with the defendant's directions, he shall be bound to indemnify the plaintiff against the consequences thereof.'" Then it is said that this act was done by the plaintiffs, William Cory and Sons Limited, under the express directions or under the implied directions—it is immaterial whether it is express or implied if it was under the directions—of the defendants, and they say that that has occasioned an injury to the rights of a third person, the deceased workman, Peacock, so that if the act is not apparently illegal, but is done honestly and in good faith, then the defendants are bound to indemnify the plaintiffs against the consequences thereof. Mr. Rawlinson and Mr. Macnaghten have urged before us that this case comes within the principle as there laid down.

In my opinion it does not, and I am satisfied that in the present case there was no evidence to go to the jury of any implied indemnity by the defendants, the shipowners, in respect of any liability of the plaintiffs, William Cory and Sons Limited, to their workmen under the Workmen's Compensation Act. The statement of the law which I have just read, in which it is held that the defendant is bound to indemnify the plaintiff against the consequences thereof, must be read as meaning that the plaintiff claiming the indemnity must have acted without negligence, and that the injury to the third party, when it says "the consequences thereof," must be the direct result—that is, the natural and direct consequences—of doing the particular act which he was requested to do, and not a consequence merely arising from the manner in which the act was done.

In my opinion there are no facts in the present case from which any inference whatever can be drawn of any agreement by the ship to indemnify William Cory and Sons Limited, the plaintiffs, against any liability of William Cory and Sons Limited to their workmen under the Workmen's Compensation Act in doing the act complained of.

It was an unfortunate injury to Peacock, but it was not the direct or natural consequence of doing the act—that is, removing these hatch beams—it was but an unfortunate consequence of the manner in which the act was done.

For these reasons I am of opinion that there was no evidence to go to the jury upon the third issue which was material to the success of the plaintiffs, and, that being so, the verdict and judgment ought to be set aside and judgment entered for the defendants.

BANKES, L.J.—I quite agree.

It seems to me that in the court below and here the doctrine, or the principle of the implied request and implied indemnity, or implied contract of indemnity arising out of the request has been attempted to be pressed too far. I think that what Swinfen Eady, L.J. has just said is a necessary correction or addition to the statement of the law as laid down in Dugdale v. Lovering (sup.), and I think what I said myself in the case which has been referred to of Groves and Sons v. Webb and Kenward (114 L. T. Rep. 1082) was substantially correct, and I need say nothing more upon that part of the case.

But Mr. Macnaghten has advanced another and different argument, as I understand it, and his contention is that where a request is made to a person to do an act gratuitously, and he does that act gratuitously, the law implies a contract to indemnify him against all the consequences of that act, whatever they may be. Now, there are two objections to that contention, as it seems to me, as applied to this case, and the first is this: That no such contention was raised in the court below, and no question was asked of the jury upon which they could have come to a decision with regard to that particular point, and it seems to me impossible to contend that such an implied promise could arise as a matter of law. It may be that in some cases the fact that the service is done gratuitously may be an element for consideration. I am expressing no opinion about that, but I say that, so far as my opinion goes, it is impossible to contend, and there is no authority to contend, that the law implies such a contract as Mr. Macnaghten contends for, from the mere fact that the person performing the act is doing it gratuitously. I agree that there was no evidence fit to go to the jury.

A. T. LAWRENCE, J.—I am of the same opinion.

I am assuming that there was sufficient evidence, to justify it being left to the jury, of request to the plaintiffs to do this work. I have some doubt about it myself, but I will assume it for the purpose of the argument. I think the further contention based upon it, that it implied a promise of indemnity, is unsupported by any authority, and is wrong. Mr. Rawlinson applies the doctrine of Dugdale v. Lovering (sup.), but the doctrine is applicable to different facts altogether. There the request was to do an act that was apparently quite lawful, but was in fact tortious, and it is the same thing in the case cited in that case of Tindal, C.J. which is mentioned there; the act was in fact illegal, though it was not known to be so, and it was from that that the indemnity was implied. But here the request was to do a perfectly lawful act, and there was, therefore, no implied promise of indemnity.

Then Mr. Macnaghten tries to get over that difficulty by suggesting that in all cases in which the request is to do the act without reward the law imports an indemnity. I do not think that is so. There is no case that I am aware of that goes that length, and I know many instances in which there would be the most astounding results if an indemnity were imported into the law. It seems to me that here there was no evidence at all upon which the jury could find the promise to indemnify the plaintiffs for what appears upon the evidence to have been the clear negligence of one of their workmen in doing this act.

I therefore think that the appeal succeeds, and that judgment must be entered for the defendants.

NORTH-EASTERN STEEL COMPANY LIMITED v. SAME. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Contract of sale—Provision for suspension of deliveries "in case of war"—War—Rise in freights—"Restraint of princes"—Frustration of adventure—Liability of sellers.

Sellers in Spain agreed to deliver iron ore to buyers in Middlesbrough, the contract of sale (which was made after the outbreak of the war in 1914*) providing that: "In case of strikes, combinations of workmen, accidents, war, or any unavoidable total or partial stoppage of works or mines, the supplies of minerals now contracted for may be wholly or partially suspended during the continuance thereof, and the time for delivery extended proportionately. In the case of partial stoppage of works or mines the deliveries to be* pro rata with other then existing engagements." Owing to the course of events during the war, freights rose very considerably, and the sellers contended that, the character of the war having largely been changed since the making of the contract, they were entitled under the above provision to "suspend wholly or partially" further deliveries.

Held, that the words of the provision should be read as if they were "In case of strikes, combinations of workmen, accidents, war, or any other unavoidable cause occasioning total or partial stoppage of works or mines," and that there was no exception on which the sellers could rely as excusing them from the performance of the contract.

Held, further, that a mere rise in the rate of freights was not alone a sufficient excuse for non-delivery, and the doctrine of "frustration of an adventure" had no application to the case.

Decision of Bailhache, J. (114 L. T. Rep. 758) affirmed.

In the second-named appeal the contract, dated the 14*th Dec.* 1914*, provided that: "In the event of a European war, restraint of princes or Governments, civil commotion, accidents, strikes, imminent hostilities preventing the carrying out of this contract, and all other causes . . . beyond the personal control of the seller, the contract to be suspended during that period at the sellers' option."*

(a) Reported by EDWARD J. M. CHAPLIN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, on similar facts, that the sellers were not prevented from fulfilling their contract by any of the excepted perils.

Decision of Bailhache, J. affirmed.

Appeals by the defendants from the judgments of Bailhache, J. The two appeals were heard together.

The further facts and the arguments appear sufficiently from the judgments.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 8, 1916.—Swinfen Eady, L.J.—These two cases, which were heard together, are appeals of the defendants from the judgments of Bailhache, J., who tried the cases without a jury. In each case they are actions for breach of contract for the sale of considerable quantities of iron ore. They are very similar in their facts, but they are not identical, and it will be convenient to take the Bolckow, Vaughan case first separately and to deal with the North-Eastern Steel case afterwards.

The plaintiff company, who are ironmasters and manufacturers, entered into a contract dated the 4th Nov. 1914 with the defendant company. The defendants are a Spanish mining company, and by the contract the defendants agreed to sell and the plaintiffs agreed to purchase 50,000 tons of iron ore, described as "Sagunto Rubio." The price was to be 13*s.* 6*d.* per ton. It was to be delivered free ex ship at Middlesbrough at the buyers' Middlesbrough or South Bank Wharf, or any good and safe wharf on the Tees. Then there is the price of 13*s.* 6*d.* per ton on a certain basis with regard to the metallic contents, on which nothing turns, and then there is an important clause at the end, beginning "In case of strikes," &c. The terms of the contract will require to be carefully considered later. That contract was entered into on the 4th Nov. with the defendants. The mining company is managed by a Spanish firm of Sota and Aznar. Messrs. Sota and Aznar signed the contract for the defendant mining company, whose affairs Sota and Aznar managed. There is another company which is called the Navigation Company, incorporated under Spanish laws, with a large share capital, of which Sota and Aznar hold a considerable amount, apparently sufficient to carry the majority of the votes, but that company also is managed by Sota and Aznar. It is a large shipping company with a very considerable number of ships, many of which are engaged in carrying ore both from the Valencia district and from the Bilbao district of Spain. The contract having been made on the 4th Nov., the deliveries were to be extended over, and spread equally over, the year 1915. In order to carry out that contract, on the 25th Nov. a contract was entered into between the defendant company, the mining company, and this shipping company whereby the shipping company agreed to carry the ore, 50,000 tons or thereabouts, at this price of 5*s.* 9*d.* mentioned in the original agreement. In the month of December the defendants delivered under the contract one shipment of 5439 tons, and a further cargo in Feb. 1915 of 1365 tons, but no further deliveries have been made under the contract, and the claim of the plaintiffs is for damages for breach of contract to make further deliveries. I should say that after the bought and sold notes had been passed and the contract made there was further correspondence between the parties under which one or two additional terms were added to the contract. On the 16th Nov. Messrs. Bagley and Co., who represent the defendants and where the defendants' agents at Middlesbrough, wrote to the plaintiffs that with regard to the contract notes for the ore in question, "the Sagunto Rubio for next year's delivery, our principals, Sota and Aznar, wish it to be understood that, in the event of the North Sea being closed to Spanish tonnage by the Admiralty authorities, they will be compelled to suspend deliveries. Similarly should you have to stop your furnaces from causes beyond your control the deliveries would also be suspended." The plaintiffs agreed to those terms and their agreement is embodied in the contract.

The first shipment which was delivered under the contract was by the Urkomendi, which sailed from Sagunto about the 24th Nov. with the cargo that I have mentioned. It was advised 5300 tons, but it was, I suppose, 5439 tons, and that was delivered in due course. This particular ore, the Sagunto Rubio, appears to be mined from the defendant company's mines in the district of Valencia and is shipped from the port of Sangunto on the Mediterranean. About the middle of Dec. 1914, complaints began to arise with regard to the delays in the ore boats bringing ore to the East Coast ports, and a complaint was made of the delay especially in respect of vessels arriving at Dover and passing from Dover thence to Middlesbrough. On the 18th Dec. the defendants—I call them the defendants, but the letters are written by Sota and Aznar—wrote that they had just enough tonnage to perform their contracts, and then they refer to the further delays on the East Coast going to throw out their calculations. Early in the following month the defendants took up the position that they ought to have some additional payment for their ore by reason of the extra cost of sending it. The freight contract that was made between the defendant mining company and the shipping company had agreed the freight on the ore at 5*s.* 9*d.* In the beginning of January the defendants first began to press for some extra payment beyond their contract price. There is a letter of the 8th Jan. 1915 in which they disclosed their position to their agents at Middlesbrough, which letter was produced on discovery of documents: "The position on the East Coast is getting so serious, especially with regard to crews of vessels, that we think we are entitled to some relief for the extra freights caused by the difficulties of the crews, the new regulations of the Government since the contracts were made causing delays, and also for the extra insurance." Then they say: "Others"—that is, other people—"are receiving some compensation, and because we may be richer people that is no reason why we should receive different treatment." There we trace the origin of what afterwards led up to the dispute between the parties. It was instructions from the defendants to their agents at Middlesbrough that they must have the claim for extra freight. Then that claim was passed on by the defendants' agents at Middlesbrough to Messrs. Bolckow, Vaughan, and on the 14th Jan. 1915 this claim is made. Messrs. Bagley and Co. write on behalf of the defendants to the plaintiffs: "Our principals, Messrs. Sota and Aznar, advise that the freights from the Mediterranean are now equal to the c.i.f. price of the ore, and there is a probability of their going still higher. Under the circumstances they consider that they are entitled to ask you for some relief, as the conditions now prevailing in the North Sea are very much worse than they were at the time the contract was made. Since the bombardment of Hartlepool a new set of circumstances has arisen, notably the much greater delay and risk by mines, seeing that the whole of the coast is now mined by the British Government, resulting in increased rates of freight to the East Coast by at least 6*s*. to 7*s*. a ton as compared with the West Coast, while the crews have to be paid double, and in many cases will not even come at all. Messrs. Sota and Aznar reluctantly have to ask for your assistance, but, under the exceptional circumstances now current, we trust you will appreciste their point of view and make them some contribution towards the extra rate of freight which they have to pay." The learned judge at the trial found, and no doubt it was a fact, that the statements in that letter were exaggerated; that there was a rise in freights although the amount is exaggerated by the defendants. The position taken up by the plaintiffs was that there was a contract and that the contract ought to be carried out. That is reported on the 25th Jan. by Bagley to his principals. He refers to a meeting of the iron-masters the previous week, and in substance reports to his principals that they will not make any increase. On the 27th Jan. there is a further letter from Sota and Aznar, in which they say that "they are not being fairly treated by the Middlesbrough Works, who ask us to deliver cheap contracts as though nothing had happened. We have told the representative that we are quite willing to deliver the ore we have sold and additional quantities provided the Middlesbrough Works meet our reasonable claim for relief. This representative has found our attitude perfectly reasonable, and quite appreciates the necessity of receiving relief on cheap contracts." Now, the importance of this letter is that it is the defendants pressing for increased payment, complaining that they have to deliver on what they call cheap contracts, but the great importance of it is the words: "We are quite willing to deliver the ore we have sold and additional contracts provided the Middlesbrough Works meet our reasonable claim for relief." That is to say, there is no difficulty in delivering either the whole of the ore that they have contracted to sell, or additional quantities as well, but they want more money for doing it. Then on the 27th Jan. there is a further complaint by the defendants, in which they refer to having to wait for pilots and the limitation only of running in daylight, and other causes of delay to their steamers. "This delay," they say, "with the current earning power of steamers, can be taken as representing 4*s*. per ton of ore carried." In other words, they say at that time the delay was amounting to 4*s*. a ton. They then give other items, such as extra payments to their crew, and so on, under which they bring it up to an additional quantity of about 6*s*. a ton to the East Coast, as compared with going to equivalent places on the West Coast. Then there are further letters to the same effect. We may pass on to the next month of February, and then there is a suggestion that unless relief is given, unless more money is paid than the contract requires to be paid, the greater part of the ore will not be delivered, and, if relief is given, the greater part will be delivered and will be quite sufficient to prevent any scarcity of iron. In that letter they ask for relief, which they say would amount to from 5*s*. to 10*s*. a ton. Then they suggest that the Government shall make a payment, and they wind up the letter by saying—that is, the defendants' representative said: "I have no hesitation in saying that, if this relief is given, an ample supply of suitable iron ore can be supplied during the first quarter to the East Coast ports." It was manifest from this correspondence that there was no difficulty about keeping up the supply except that it was more expensive to do so. The correspondence throughout February is upon the same lines. It is not necessary to go through it. In terms the defendants offer to deliver a cargo if they receive extra payment for so doing. On the 25th Feb. they wrote to their agents with regard to the North-Eastern Steel Company and Messrs. Bolckow, Vaughan, and Co., the plaintiff company: "We confirm telephonic conversation, and we will ship them each a March cargo of Sagunto Rubio under contract with 5*s*. relief, and we would settle future cargoes in due course on mutually acceptable conditions." Then they add: "Also we would like to receive an order for an odd cargo of screened Menera outside our contracts, in order to assist us. This screened Menera is the only ore we have left, and is much lower in silica than Sagunto Rubio, and will anyhow suit Messrs. Bolckow better." So that what they were proposing to do by that letter was this: If they, Bolckow, Vaughan, and Co. and the North-Eastern Steel Company, would only do what the other purchasers from them are doing, pay extra, they will deliver the March cargo to each of them, and remark: "We should like to have an order for an odd cargo—that is, a cargo not contracted for. We could not only deliver the ore that we have contracted to deliver, but we could deliver additional ore ontside the contract if they will give us the order and pay us a little more" Now, there are other instances to the same effect, making the position abundantly clear. But it is not necessary to go into that. The parties were now at arm's length, and on the 6th March the plaintiffs' solicitors write a letter saying that the matter has been placed in their hands. The say: "We are instructed by Messrs. Bolckow, Vaughan, and Co. in this matter, and have had an opportunity of reading all the correspondence which has taken place between you, and it relates particularly to the question raised by you as to delivery of ore against contract, owing to circumstances which you mention." Then they ask for an answer, and then say: "If you intend to maintain your position, will you kindly let us have the name of your solicitor who will accept service of process on your behalf." That is, if you let us know by return of post whether you maintain the position taken up by you, that position being that they will not deliver at contract price, but will deliver if the plaintiffs will pay them something additional. Then the name of the solicitor is given, and then Messrs. Crump and Son write a letter that makes quite clear and definite the position that the defendants take up. On the 17th March they say: "We will accept service of process on behalf of Messrs. Sota and Aznar. We think that the communications which have already passed sufficiently indicate our clients' intention to claim a total suspension of deliveries during the continuance of the war; but, in order that there may be no misunderstanding on this point, we think it better to give you formal notice that our clients do take up this position." Then on the 26th March the plaintiffs accept that definite letter as a repudiation of the contract, and on the 7th April they issued their writ.

I think it is clear that the acts and conduct of the defendants, having regard to the correspondence, amounted to a repudiation by them of the whole contract, and was not merely, as was suggested, a severable breach in respect of the next or March delivery. The defendants' repudiation gave the plaintiffs a right to treat the whole contract as repudiated, which the plaintiffs did by bringing this action, the writ claiming damages for breach of contract generally, and not being limited to March delivery. The plaintiffs were entitled to regard the defendants as repudiating the whole contract, and they did so, and accepted and acted upon the repudiation.

The question, therefore, is whether the defendants are protected by the terms of their contract from liability to the plaintiffs under the circumstances which have arisen. The defendants rely upon a particular clause in the contract, and that clause I will refer to. It is the last clause in the contract: "In case of strikes, combinations of workmen, accidents, war, or any unavoidable total or partial stoppage of works or mines, the supplies of mineral now contracted for may be wholly or partially suspended during the continuance thereof, and the time for delivery extended proportionately. In the case of partial stoppage of works or mines the deliveries to be pro rata with other then existing engagements. This clause applies to buyers and sellers." Having regard to that last paragraph, it is difficult to see why one of the two added terms was necessary with regard to the stoppage of Messrs. Bolckow, Vaughan's works. But I pass that by.

The clause, of which the marginal note is "Strikes, &c.," is elliptical in form and requires the insertion of some words which must be deemed to be understood in order to give a sensible and intelligible meaning to it. The "strikes," "combinations of workmen," "accidents" mentioned in the clause must be events of that character having some reference to the contract. Bailhache, J. read the clause as meaning "In case of strikes, &c.," preventing "the performance of the contract," and he held, as is undoubtedly true, that in fact the defendants were not "prevented" from carrying out their contract by any of the events mentioned in the clause. The defendants, upon the hearing of this appeal, have contended that the clause ought to be read as meaning "In case of strikes, combinations of workmen, accidents, war, preventing, interfering with, or affecting the performance of the contract in a manner or to a degree substantially different from what was prevailing at the date of the contract, or any unavoidable total or partial stoppage of works or mines," &c. The reason why the defendants insist on the first four events—namely, strikes, combinations of workmen, accidents, and war—being regarded as independent of any cause occasioning total or partial stoppage of mines or works is that in fact there was not any total or partial stoppage of works or mines at any time material to the decision of this case; and, moreover, in the event of any partial stoppage and consequential partial suspension of supplies, deliveries of ore were to be made to the buyers pro rata with other then existing engagements, and the defendants refused to make any deliveries whatever to the plaintiffs under their contracts although fulfilling the other contracts.

I am of opinion that the true construction of the contract is that it should be read as if the words were: "In case of strikes, combinations of workmen, accidents, war, or any other unavoidable cause occasioning total or partial stoppage of works or mines." The contract then provides for a suspension of deliveries, total or partial, as the case may be, and, if only partial, then for a delivery to buyers pro rata with other buyers. That is, in my view, the sense and meaning of the words as they stand in the contract. Strikes, combinations of workmen, and accidents are specially mentioned as being very usual, perhaps the most usual, causes of stoppage of works or mines. Again, a war in which Spain was engaged might also necessitate the mines stopping work. A total or partial stoppage might also arise from other unavoidable causes, such as scarcity of labour, or the output might cease for a time by reason of development work being necessary.

The reading contended for by the appellants does not fit in with the structure of the clause. The clause contemplates some event occasioning a total or partial stoppage of works or mines, and provides for a corresponding total or partial suspension of deliveries. It is obvious that this suspension is to be total or partial according to whether the stoppage of works or mines is total or partial, and a pro rata delivery is only provided for in the case of partial stoppage of works or mines. If the first four events were mentioned with reference to, and were intended to provide for, some occurrence not bringing about a total or partial stoppage of works or mines, one would have expected the clause to provide extensively for what was to be done on the occurrence happening, in the same manner as complete provision has been made for what is to happen in the event of a total or partial stoppage of works or mines.

Upon the construction which I hold to be the true construction of the contract, there is no exception upon which the defendants can rely as excusing them from the performance of the contract. They made a freight contract with the shipping company, and there is not any evidence to show that such company was not always ready and willing to carry out the same, notwithstanding the rise in freights. Indeed, the curious letter of Messrs. Sota and Aznar, Bilbao, to Messrs. Sota and Aznar, London, of the 31st Dec. 1914 points distinctly in the opposite direction. Sent with that letter was a list of the contracts for which the shipping company had guaranteed the necessary tonnage at the rates of freight mentioned in the list. This included the plaintiffs' contract, and the rate of freight was 5*s.* 9*d.* a ton, and the instructions contained in this letter are that, whatever freight was shown in the bill of lading and was, therefore, paid by the plaintiffs on obtaining delivery of their goods, only 5*s*. 9*d*. was to be credited to the shipping company, and the balance carried to the credit of the mining company. Moreover, the shipping company continued to make frequent voyages with ore to the East Coast of England, and by preference sent their own ships there, as the additional tonnage which was chartered went mostly to West Coast ports. There is no trace in the documents before us of Messrs. Sota and Aznar, as representing the shipping company, taking up the position with Messrs. Sota and Aznar as representing the mining company, that the charter-party at 5*s*. 9*d*. was no longer binding, or that the shipowners were excused from the further performance of it by reason of any exception contained in it. Moreover, this charter-party was merely an arrangement between the mining company and the shipping company, to which the plaintiffs were not parties, which was not communicated to them and with the terms of which they were not concerned. The defendants had agreed to deliver the ore at Middlesbrough; and, although freights had risen, tonnage was available for the shipments contracted for. Indeed in 1915 the shipping company sent more ships to the Tees than they had ever done before. The defendants delivered in 1915 257,000 tons of ore by Messrs. Sota and Aznar's line, and 131,000 tons by the chartered vessels, and the only ore not delivered appears to have been that contracted to be sold to the plaintiffs and to the North-Eastern Steel Company Limited, who declined to alter their contracts and pay at an increased price. If the shipping company had in fact refused to carry out their freight contract and claimed that they were justified in so doing by an excepted peril, and if they could have sustained that position by reason of the terms of their charter-party, this would not avail the defendants as a defence for not delivering, seeing that other tonnage was available, although at an increased rate of freight.

It was urged that the rise in freight owing to the war and to the German notice of the 4th Feb. proclaiming the waters round Great Britain and Ireland a war region, and to the German submarine attacks, was quite abnormal, and far beyond ordinary market fluctuations, and that by "commercial prevention" the defendants were unable to deliver the ore. This can only mean that the defendants would incur a loss in carrying out their contract. But a mere rise in the price of a commodity to be supplied, or in the rate of freight, is not alone a sufficient excuse for non-delivery. A person is not entitled to be excused from the performance of a contract merely because it has become more costly to perform it. This case has nothing to do with the doctrine of "frustration of an adventure" upon the breaking out of war. The contract was made during the war; iron ore had been declared contraband by the British Government before the date of the contract, and a term was added to the contract immediately after it was made that deliveries would have to be suspended if the North Sea became closed to Spanish tonnage. The parties to the contract were mindful of the existence of a state of war and contemplated its continuance and contracted with reference to it.

In my opinion the appeal fails and should be dismissed.

In the case of the North-Eastern Steel Company the circumstances are very similar, but they are not identical. The contract in this case is dated the 4th Dec. 1914 and is made between the defendant company and the North-Eastern Steel Company Limited. By it the defendants agreed to sell and deliver 25,000 tons of ore in the first half of 1915. This contract is not in the same form as in the previous case. The price is a little more—namely, 13*s*. 9*d*. a ton. The freight contract, too, is for 6*s* 3*d*. a ton as against 5*s*. 9*d*. in the case of Messrs. Bolckow, Vaughan, and Co. Limited. There is a provision for the deliveries being delivered over the first half of 1915, and then comes this clause: "In the event of a European war, restraint of princes or Governments, civil commotion, accidents, strikes, imminent hostilities," that means "preventing the carrying out of this contract," "and all other causes of what nature and kind whatsoever beyond the personal control of the seller, this contract to be suspended during that period at the seller's option. The strike and accident clause applies to buyers." Now, it will be observed that that is a contract only for 25,000 tons over the first half of 1915. But a few days later a further contract was made for a further 25,000 tons of the same ore at the same price and on the same terms, except that it was for deliveries extending over the second half of 1915. Then in the letter making the second contract—that is, the letter dated the 9th Dec. 1914—there is an added term which is not quite in the same language as the added term in the Bolckow, Vaughan case. "Of course it is understood that, should the conditions in the North Sea become worse than they are to-day, and the North Sea should be closed to Spanish tonnage, then these contracts shall be suspended, as Messrs. Sota and Aznar rely mainly upon their own steamers for the fulfilment of these contracts." There was at the same time a corresponding freight contract entered into between the defendants and the shipping company providing for the delivery of this consignment at 6*s*. 3*d*.

There is a similar correspondence with regard to the rise in freights and the demand for extra freight in this case as in the other, and it is not necessary to go through all the correspondence. It is manifest that the defendants' agents at Middlesbrough, Messrs. Bagley and Co., who were putting forward the defendants' claim to be paid additional sums, did not think much of the claim. It was pointed out that the defendants, Sota and Aznar, could not have it both ways, because some of their boats at this time were probably taking advantage of the great increase in the rise of freights; but ultimately the matter passed into the hands of the solicitors, and on the 6th March there is a letter from the plaintiffs' solicitors to the defendants: "We have had an opportunity of perusing the correspondence. We would be much obliged if you would let us know by return of post as to whether you will deliver in the terms of the contract, or whether you maintain the position taken up by you in your letter of the 10th Feb." That is a position similar to that in the Bolckow, Vaughan case, that they would not deliver except they were paid sums additional to the contract price. On the 17th March Messrs.

Crump and Son answer: "We think that the communications which have already passed between the parties are sufficient indication that our clients claim to have exercised their option of suspending all deliveries during the continuance of the war. If there is any question as to this, you may take this letter as our clients' intimation of their position in the matter—namely, that they exercise their right to suspend the contract." Now, it is manifest that in this case, as in the other, the defendants repudiated the contract, and the plaintiffs accepted the repudiation, acted upon it, and brought their action at once. It was urged that this repudiation was really a repudiation of both the contracts, the contract for the first half of 1915 as well as the contract in respect of the second half, but we relieved the counsel for the defendant during the arguments from this part of the case, because it is manifest that here the parties were only corresponding with reference to the contract that was then being performed. The plaintiffs' solicitors letter of the 10th March said: "You will doubtless have looked at the contract." That was the contract that was then in course of performance, the contract for the first half of 1915. The answer of Messrs. Crump and Son has reference to that contract in which they say they exercise their right to suspend the contract. The contract relating to the second half of 1915 was not yet come into operation. There were no deliveries due under it, and no correspondence with regard to it. So that in my opinion it must be taken that the only contract that was the subject of this repudiation was the contract for the first half of 1915.

That being the position, I return to the contract. The question is whether the defendants, having refused further to carry out their contract except on terms that they were not entitled to insist upon, can rely upon any condition in the contract as exempting them from liability "in the event of European war, restraint of princes or Governments," &c. It was urged that the contract in this case between the plaintiffs and the defendants, containing as it does this exception of restraint of princes, the defendants were, in the events that have happened, prevented by restraint of princes from carrying out their contract, and therefore they were under no liability. In my judgment they were not so prevented in fact. This is shown by the facts already stated. The large quantity of ore carried by Sota and Aznar's boats to the East Coast ports over the period in question is conclusive of this. It is shown by the correspondence that it was simply by reason of the refusal of the plaintiffs to pay the increased price that the defendants refused to deliver.

The German notice of the 14th Feb. 1915 with regard to the war region of the waters round Great Britain could not extend to prevent neutral ships sailing with innocent cargoes, and did not even purport to do so. The fact that ships were delayed, or for a time had the protection of a convoy or of an armed guard on board, did not in fact operate to prevent deliveries of ore being made. On the contrary the evidence shows that almost if not quite all of the ore contracts other than plaintiffs' and Bolckow, Vaughan, and Co.'s were fulfilled, and the defendants even offered to deliver ore beyond the amounts contracted for. Moreover, convoy was for the purpose of assisting the defendants to carry their ore to Middlesbrough, and not to prevent their doing so, and, in their letter of the 27th Jan. 1915 to the Board of Trade, Messrs. Sota and Aznar express their gratitude to the British Navy. In no single instance does it appear that any ship belonging to or chartered by the shipping company yielded to any restraint or were prevented by any restraint of princes from carrying out their contract; nor does it appear that the shipping company ever raised any objection to fulfilling the terms of their charter-party on any such ground. The contrary appears, that the ore ships of the defendants continued to make their regular voyages without prevention and without accident and in increasing numbers at all times material for the decision of this case.

In my opinion the defendants were not prevented from fulfilling their contract by any exception, and the appeal fails and should be dismissed.

Bankes, L.J.—I agree.

The Lord Justice has dealt with the facts of the case so very fully that I only need state quite shortly the grounds on which I agree that the appeal should be dismissed. In Bolckow, Vaughan's case the contract was a contract made in November of 1914 for the delivery of 50,000 tons of ore over 1915. The defendants made default in delivery, and they claim that they were excused from delivering by a clause contained in the contract—the clause which refers to strikes and combinations of workmen, and so forth, and if they fail in their construction which they sought to put upon that clause, they fail in their action, because the clause would not apply to the case.

The clause is one in which it is agreed that some words must be inserted in order to make it intelligible, and it seems to me that the rules to be adopted with regard to supplying those words should be these: First of all, as few words as possible should be supplied, and, secondly, the words supplied should be those which, when inserted, render the clause as clear and as definite as possible. Looking at the clause from that point of view, you see that the relief afforded the shipper is a relief which should consist either of a partial suspension or of an entire suspension of deliveries during the period, and, if the construction suggested by the defendants is adopted, it would leave it at the will, apparently, of the sellers as to whether the suspension should be an entire one or a partial one. On the other hand, the construction suggested on behalf of the respondents is that the clause should be confined to a total or partial stoppage of mines, and, if that construction is adopted, the relief will be automatic, if I may use the expression, or the extent of the relief will be automatic, because, if the stoppage of the mines is total, the stoppage of the supply of minerals will be total; if the stoppage of the mines is partial, the supply of minerals will be partial. In my opinion that is sufficient to indicate that the words to be inserted should be words confined to total or partial stoppage of the mines. On that ground I agree with the words suggested by the Lord Justice, the words which, according to the intention of the parties, must have been intended to be supplied, and ought to be supplied. On that ground this appeal fails, because the defendants have failed to bring themselves within the clause of the contract, and the only clause of the contract which would excuse non-delivery. I also agree that upon the facts it is plain there was a repudiation of the contract and not a mere repudiation of one delivery under the contract.

Then with regard to the North-Eastern contract, the words there that are used in the clause are wide enough to cover an interference or a prevention of deliveries under the contract if the appellants had been in a position to show that there was either such a prevention or such an interference; but this is just one of those cases where the arguments are excellent and very full. But the facts are scanty, and, when you consider the facts here, it seems to me that the facts stare one in the face that there was no prevention in fact, and if there was no prevention in fact, if there was no restraint of princes in fact, it is impossible to contend that the appellants in this case were excused. The ground upon which they rest their excuse is this: They say, "We were in fact prevented, or interfered with, in the deliveries, and we were in fact prevented or interfered with because we had a shipping contract, and that shipping contract contained a clause which enabled the shipping company to excuse themselves, or to suspend the contract, or to relieve themselves from the contract in the event of there being a restraint of princes." Now, in order to take advantage of such a clause, it seems to me that the appellants have to show two things. First of all, that this clause which was inserted in the shipping contract for the benefit of the shipping company, and which they could either waive or not as they please, or act upon or not as they please, was in fact acted upon; and, secondly, that, if acted upon, there was a restraint of princes that would justify them in acting upon it.

It seems to me that the appeal fails on both grounds. It is quite true to say that Sota and Aznar were managing both the mining company and the shipping company, and therefore it rested on Sota and Aznar really to say to the shipping company: "You must rely upon this clause in your contract, and you must claim the relief and the benefit of the clause in the contract which deals with the restraint of princes." But the answer is that they never did do that, and it seems to me essential that the appellants should be in a position to prove, in order to succeed in this defence, that the shipping company did in fact take up the attitude and did in fact claim to be relieved from their contract before they could set up this as a defence as against the claim of the plaintiffs. The second ground is that it seems to me plain that there was, as I have said, in fact no restraint of princes. It is quite true that there were many causes in operation which rendered the conveyance of ore to this country more difficult. Voyages were delayed, there was very considerable increase of the risk of conveying ore from Spain to this country, and there were other causes operating to which our attention has been called, and which are claimed to amount to restraint, but which, in my opinion, did not amount to restraint, but all of which operated, of course, to very greatly increase the freights which shipowners were demanding for the carriage of ore under the circumstances then existing.

I only desire to say this on that point, that Bailhache, J., although it was unnecessary for him to decide it, did, in the Bolckow, Vaughan case, indicate that, under those circumstances, there was, in his opinion, such a rise in freight as indicated such a scarcity of tonnage due to the war as amounted to commercial prevention. I only desire to say this, that in my opinion that view was not justified upon the particular circumstances of this case. The Lord Justice has indicated why, and it seems to me that, taking all the circumstances into account, all those circumstances amount to was that there was a very great increase of freights; that although they were very greatly increased and you might call them abnormal, yet the fact was that they were current rates of freight freely paid. Under those circumstances I think it is impossible to say there was anything in the nature of commercial prevention.

A. T. LAWRENCE, J.—I have had the advantage of reading the judgments of Swinfen Eady, L.J. and of Bankes, L.J., and I agree with them. I do not propose to add anything to them.

Appeal dismissed.

SCOTTISH NAVIGATION COMPANY LIMITED v. W. A. SOUTER AND CO.

ADMIRAL SHIPPING COMPANY LIMITED v. WEIDNER, HOPKINS, AND CO. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Charter-party — "Baltic round" — Outbreak of war—Ship detained indefinitely in Baltic port—Restraint of princes—Whether commercial object of voyage frustrated—Proviso for cessation of hire —Cancellation clause.

In the first-named case shipowners by a charter-party, which was headed "time charter," let the steamship D. to charterers for "one Baltic round," the charterers to pay hire at a certain rate per month in advance until redelivery (unless lost) at a coal port in the United Kingdom. Arrests and restraints of princes were mutually excepted. In the event of Great Britain or other European Power being involved in war affecting the working of the steamer at the commencement or during the currency of the charter-party, there was an option to the charterers to cancel the charter or insure the steamer for full value against war risks. The D. came on hire on the 4th July 1914, and the charterers paid the first month's hire. The D. was loading a cargo for sub-charterers at a Baltic port when the war broke out. She was not allowed by the Russian authorities to leave the Baltic, and was uninsurable against war risks. On the 5th Aug., when the D. was partly loaded and the sub-charterers had received bills of lading from the master, the charterers purported to exercise their option to cancel the charter-party. In Nov. 1914 the shipowners sued to recover the hire of the vessel to the 4th Nov. 1914.

In the second-named case the charter-party was the same in form, and the facts were very similar, except that the ship was chartered for two "Baltic rounds," and the charterers did not purport to cancel the charter-party. On an arbitration the arbitrators found that there had been a frustration of the commercial adventure, and that therefore no hire was due from the charterers.

Held, that the cancellation clause was not applicable in the circumstances; that the commercial adventure of a Baltic round had been contemplated by both the shipowners and the charterers; that the delay resulting from the outbreak of war being of indefinite duration had frustrated the commercial adventure; and that the contract having been determined the shipowners could not recover the hire.

SCOTTISH NAVIGATION COMPANY LIMITED v. W. A. SOUTER AND CO.

APPEAL by the defendants from a judgment of Sankey, J., without a jury, in the commercial list.

The following statement of facts is taken from the written judgment of Sankey, J.

The plaintiffs claimed 3412*l.* 10*s.* for hire alleged to be due to them for the use of their steamship Dunolly to the 4th Nov. 1914, when the writ was issued.

The defendants alleged that no hire was due because of the frustration of their adventure, or, alternatively, because they gave notice, as they claimed to be entitled to do, to cancel the charter-party. They further said that in any event no hire was due after the 31st Aug., when the owners removed their crew from the vessel.

By a charter-party, headed "Time Charter," dated the 30th June 1914, the plaintiffs let and the defendants hired the steamship Dunolly for one Baltic round at the rate of 975*l.* per calendar month, payable half monthly in advance. The Dunolly came on hire at 6 a.m. on the 4th July 1914, and the defendants duly paid the hire for the first month. The defendants in their turn let the ship to Messrs. Horsley by a sub-charter dated the 2nd July 1914.

The charter-party of the 30th June 1914 contained the following provisions: First, in the event of Great Britain or other European Power being involved in war affecting the working of the steamer, at the commencement or during the currency of the charter-party, the defendants had the option of cancelling it; secondly, the acts of enemies and restraints of princes were mutually excepted; and, thirdly, in the event of loss of time from deficiency of men, payment of hire was to cease.

The vessel duly sailed to the Baltic, there to load timber for the sub-charterers, and upon the 27th July she began taking in cargo at Friedrickshamn. On the 30th July she arrived at Klamira to take in further cargo, and while there the half-monthly instalments of hire became due. On the 5th Aug. she arrived at Hurppu, where she finished loading on the 8th Aug.

Meanwhile, war broke out between Russia and Germany on the 1st Aug. and between Great Britain and Germany on the 4th Aug. Upon the 5th the defendants purported to cancel the charter-party by the following telegram of that date addressed to the plaintiffs: "We hereby notify you that, owing to Great Britain being at war affecting the working of the Dunolly, we exercise our option and now cancel this steamer's charter, with the proviso that we reserve our claim to proportion of freight to cover hire and charges already paid, and also reserving our right to claim any other losses or damages."

As to the exact position of affairs at the various ports at which the Dunolly had been loading timber, considerable evidence, both oral and documentary, was adduced, and I was satisfied that after the 1st Aug. it was impossible for the Dunolly to leave the Baltic for England. The Russian authorities upon that date proclaimed martial law in the Wiborg district, where Friedrickshamn and Hurppu are situated, and issued an order forbidding all vessels within the district from leaving the same. Permission was later given, but only to neutral vessels, to go viâ Baltischport at their own risk. Upon the 10th Aug. the Russian authorities prohibited the export of wooden goods, and the Dunolly in fact got no permission to carry such goods. No insurance of any sort could be obtained which would cover the ship on leaving Hurppu; and there were a number of other English vessels similarly caught in the Baltic, some of which found their way, as did the Dunolly at a later period, to Petrograd.

When the defendants gave their cancellation notice on the 5th Aug. the vessel had been partly loaded and the master had given bills of lading, which were held by the sub-charterers. She was, therefore, neither free from cargo or commitments. On the 26th Aug. the sub-charterers telegraphed to Friedrickshamn to ascertain the cost of discharging the cargo, and eventually they received the reply, dated the 29th Aug., that it would be 6500 marks. On the 31st Aug. the owners brought the crew home with the exception of the master and the engineer. Mr. Wilson, one of the firm of sub-charterers, stated that this affected the possibility of the discharge of the ship. I do not agree with this statement. The master and the engineer remained behind, and I accepted the evidence of the former that he could have obtained shore labour, which was cheap and plentiful, to discharge.

The defendants on the 7th Sept. wrote making certain offers, both with regard to the cargo and the bills of lading; but they were refused by the plaintiffs on the next day. In my opinion the defendants never took any proper or definite steps as to the cargo, and never came forward with any proper or definite proposals as to the bills of lading. They thought they were entitled to rely on their cancellation notice of the 5th Aug., and washed their hands of the matter. I was confirmed in this opinion by their solicitors' letter of the 21st Sept., where they said: "Our clients' contention is and has always been that in the events which have happened the time charter came to an end on the 4th Aug., and that it has since been your duty to deal with the cargo on account of whom it might concern."

Dec. 21, 1915.—Sankey, J. read the following judgment, which, after stating the facts as set out above, continued: In these circumstances the defendants rely, first, upon the well-known cases of Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Company (2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 435; 31 L. T. Rep. 789; L. Rep. 10 C. P. 125) and Embiricos v. Reid and Co. (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 513; 111 L. T. Rep. 291; (1914) 3 K. B. 45), and contend that they were entitled to throw up the charter-party upon the ground of the frustration of the adventure. They say that the charter-party, although headed "Time Charter," was really a voyage charter for a Baltic round; and after the 1st Aug. the adventure became impossible, and both parties were discharged.

In my view this contention is not correct. I think that the charter is a time charter. It is expressed to be such; the hire is calculated monthly, and there is a wide area in which the vessel may trade. The real meaning of the contract between the parties is that the plaintiffs agreed to allow the defendants to have the use of the vessel, subject to restraint of princes. This they have done, and have always been willing to do. The doctrine of frustration of adventure appears to me to apply only where the object which both parties have in view is frustrated. I doubt whether the doctrine is ever applicable to the general hiring of a vessel under a time charter-party, where the owner's only object is to earn freight. I think that it is confined to cases where it can be inferred from the charter itself that it is a contract for a definite voyage, or a definite object contemplated at first by both parties — Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Company (sup.) and Hudson v. Hill (30 L. T. Rep. 555). In the present case the object of the plaintiffs has not been frustrated, the restraint of princes has not prevented the payment of hire by the defendants, nor have any of the events occurred which under the charter-party excuse them from that obligation. I therefore decide against the defendants' first contention, and proceed to the consideration of the cancellation points.

The first one which falls for decision is, When and in what circumstances are charterers entitled to give notice of cancellation? In my view charterers are only entitled to give such a notice when they are ready and willing to hand over the vessel free of cargo and free of commitments, or when they will be ready and are willing to do so in a reasonable time. In the circumstances of this case I hold that the defendants were not in a position to, and did not, hand the vessel over free of cargo and free of commitments in a reasonable time, and are therefore not entitled to rely upon their cancellation notice. The hire ran on, because the events which happened were not such as entitled the defendants to rely upon the hire-cesser clause.

As to the validity of the cancellation notice, I consider, on the whole, that the notice is not a good one. I am disposed to think that such a notice should make it clear that the vessel is free of cargo and free of commitments, or will be so in a reasonable time. The present notice does neither, but rather seems to make certain reservations. In the view I take, however, it is not necessary to decide this question.

Finally, the defendants contend that hire does not run after the 31st Aug., the day on which the crew were sent home, because there was then a deficiency of men within the meaning of the hire-cesser clause. In my opinion this is unsound. The point could not have been taken if the plaintiffs had kept all their men upon the ship with practically nothing to do. I cannot think that the rights of the parties depend upon the plaintiffs having to take such an unreasonable course; but beyond that, as I have above found, the master had at his disposal all the labour necessary for the defendants' use for the discharge of the ship.

The result is that the defences fail, and the plaintiffs are entitled to my judgment.

Judgment for plaintiffs.

The defendants appealed.

Admiral Shipping Company Limited v. Weidner, Hopkins, and Co.

Appeal by the defendants from a judgment of Bailhache, J. on an award stated in the form of a special case, reported 13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 246; 114 L. T. Rep. 171; (1916) 1 K. B. 429:—

1. Differences having arisen between the Admiral Shipping Company Limited (hereinafter called "the owners") and Weidner, Hopkins, and Co. of Newcastle-upon-Tyne (hereinafter called "the charterers"), under a contract of affreightment dated the 22nd June 1914, for the hire of the steamship Auldmuir, as to whether any time hire is due by the charterers to the owners during the time the said vessel has been and is stopped at the port of Kotka in the Gulf of Finland, such differences and any other matters incidental thereto were by agreement dated the 25th Sept. 1914, and made between the owners of the one part and the charterers of the other part, referred to the arbitrament, &c., of Thomas Walter Purchas and George Morrel Stamp, and an umpire, if necessary, appointed by the said arbitrators, whose decision, or the decision of any two of them, should be final and binding upon all parties.

2. [Reciting disagreement of arbitrators and appointment of umpire.]

3. And whereas Thomas Walter Purchas, George Morrel Stamp, and William Robertson Heatley, having on the 21st Oct. 1914 heard and considered the evidence and arguments of both parties, find that the following facts were proved or admitted: (a) By the said charter-party dated the 22nd June 1914 the owners agree to let and the charterers to hire the said steamship Auldmuir for two Baltic rounds, commencing as therein mentioned. The said charter-party and the copy bills of lading which were put in evidence at the said hearing are fastened together and appended hereto and are to be deemed part of this case. (b) The said steamship was delivered to the charterers on the 29th June 1914. She left Hull on the 4th July for Cronstadt with a cargo of coals. (c) By a charter-party dated the 9th July 1914, and made between the charterers as time-chartered owners of the said steamship and Pyman, Bell, and Co. as charterers, the said steamship was chartered for a voyage from Sorfs, in Finland, to, amongst other places, Blyth, in Northumberland. (d) On the 17th July, having discharged her cargo of coals at Cronstadt, the said steamship left for Viborg and Kotka to load a cargo of wood goods for Blyth. (e) The said steamship arrived at Viborg on the 18th July and there loaded part of her cargo. She left Viborg on the 25th July and arrived at Kotka on the 26th July for the purpose of receiving the balance of her cargo. (f) On the 30th July 1914 the agents of the owners, by telegram addressed to the said steamship at Kotka, instructed the captain of the said steamship to hurry departure from Kotka. (g) On the 1st Aug. the loading of the said steamship was completed at Kotka, and bills of lading in respect of the cargo were duly signed, and the said steamship was on that day ready to sail for Blyth. (h) On the 1st Aug. the customs authorities at Kotka refused to allow the said steamship to be cleared or to authorise her to leave Kotka. On the same day a state of war came into existence between Russia and Germany. (i) Notwithstanding the said refusal of the said customs authorities, the captain of the said steamship sailed with the said steamship from Kotka on the 1st Aug. (j) When the said steamship arrived in the neighbourhood of Revel (in the Gulf of Finland) she was stopped by the Russian naval authorities and ordered back to Kotka, where she returned on or about the 2nd Aug. (k) The hire for the said steamship had been paid by the charterers to the owners in advance up to and including the 14th Aug. 1914, and no hire has since been paid. (l) On the 14th Aug. the agents of the owners, by telegram addressed to the said steamship at Kotka, instructed the captain of the said steamship to remain in port and await further orders, and on the 19th Aug. the said agents telegraphed to the British Consul at Kotka that the said steamship must remain in port. (m) On the 25th Aug. the said agents of the owners by telegram instructed the British Consul at Kotka to repatriate the crew of the said steamship (other than the captain and chief engineer). (n) The said steamship has been detained at Kotka by or in consequence of the Russian naval authorities as aforesaid, and at the date of the hearing of the evidence herein—namely, the 20th Oct.—the said steamship was still so detained.

4. A copy of the correspondence put in evidence is appended hereto for the purpose of reference in the event of the point of law being argued before the court and for the purpose of identification is marked "b" and initialed by the undersigned William Robertson Heatley.

5. On behalf of the owners it was contended that the words "restraints of princes, rulers, and people" contained in the charter-party of the 22nd June did not under the circumstances above mentioned relieve the charterers from the obligation to pay hire, and that they continued liable for the hire of the said steamship notwithstanding the detention of the said steamship at Kotka. They further contended that the charter-party contained a clause providing in what events payment of hire was to cease, and, "restraints of princes, of rulers, and people" not being one of such events, the exception of "restraints of princes, rulers, and people" contained in the general exceptions clause must be disregarded in connection with the cessation of hire. They also contended that as the said steamship was burdened with obligations to third parties by reason of the presence of cargo on board shipped under the charter-party of the 9th July, and in respect of which bills of lading had been signed, the charterers were liable for the hire of the said steamship. It was further contended on behalf of the owners that the owners by communicating with the captain of the said steamship did not commit a breach of the charter-party, but that they were justified in so communicating, having regard to the circumstances, and that though the crew, with the exception of the captain and chief engineer, had been repatriated, the said steamship was still efficient and efficiently manned for the purpose required of her—viz., lying at Kotka. Further, that repatriation of the crew as aforesaid took place after the initial breach of the charter-party by the charterers in failing to pay the hire due on the 14th Aug. 1914.

6. On behalf of the charterers it was contended that the meaning and intention of the parties to the charter-party of the 22nd June 1914 must be ascertained at the time the charter-party was entered into. That both parties at the time meant and intended by the expression "restraints of princes, rulers, and people . . . always mutually excepted" that this had relation to the use and hire of the said steamship, and that in the event of the use of the said steamship being restrained by princes, rulers, or people, no hire was due from the charterers during such restraint. They further contended that the owners had committed breaches of the said charter-party of the 22nd June: (a) By instructing the captain by the telegram of the 13th July to hurry his departure from Kotka. (b) In ordering by the telegram of the 14th Aug. the captain to remain in port. (c) By removing the crew from the said steamship, and that under no circumstances could hire be due on and after the 14th Aug.

7. Now we, the undersigned arbitrators and umpire, find and award (subject to the opinion of the court if either of the parties should decide to take it upon the question of law hereinafter mentioned) that no time hire is due by the charterers to the owners during the time the said vessel has been at the said port of Kotka under the circumstances aforesaid.

8. (Provision as to costs.)

9. If either of the parties should decide to take the opinion of the court, then the question for the court is whether upon the facts herein stated and the true construction of the charter-party of the 22nd June, we are right in finding an award or whether the charterers are liable to pay any hire to the owners during the time the said vessel has been and is stopped at the said port of Kotka under the circumstances aforesaid.

10. If the court should hold that the charterers are liable to pay hire to the owners during the time the said vessel has been stopped at the said port of Kotka under the circumstances aforesaid, then we find the amount hereof to be the sum of 1897*l.* 8*s.* 4*d.* up to and including the 20th Oct. 1914 (being the date of the hearing of the said arbitration), and we award that the charterers do pay that sum to the owners with interest at 5*l.* per cent. per annum from the date of this award until payment.

11. If the court should hold that the charterers are liable to pay hire to the owners during the time the said vessel has been and is stopped at the said port of Kotka under the circumstances aforesaid then we award and direct that the owners and charterers shall bear and pay their own costs and expenses of and incidental to the reference, and that the charterers do pay the costs, amounting to 74*l*, relating to this award, including our fees as arbitrators and umpire respectively.

12. In any event we leave to the court the costs of all proceedings subsequent to this award.

By a supplementary award dated the 21st Sept. 1915 the arbitrators found—

(a) That at no time between the 14th Aug. and the 20th Oct. was there any reasonable probability of the steamship Auldmuir proceeding with the chartered voyage in such a time as that the commercial adventure would not have been frustrated; (b) that no voyage could have been taken from Kotka between the 14th Aug. and the 20th Oct. 1914 which would not have involved risk of seizure or capture by a foreign ruler; (c) that neither the charterers nor their agents had been given any information as to or were aware of the facts contained in the telegram of the 30th July 1914 (referred to in clause 3 (f) of the special case), in the telegrams of the 14th and 19th Aug. 1914 referred to in clause 3 (l) of the special case), and in that of the 28th Aug. 1914 (referred in clause 3 (m) of the special case) before the 19th Oct., the day previous to the day on which the matter first came before the arbitrators.

Bailhache, J. held (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 246; 114 L. T. Rep. 171) that the charterers were liable for hire, that the telegram of the owners directing repatriation of the crew did not amount to a withdrawal of the ship; that even if the vessel was detained by "restraint of princes" that did not excuse payment of hire; and that in finding "frustration" as a fact, the arbitrators had misdirected themselves, inasmuch as delay due to a cause contemplated and provided for by the charter-party, even though the delay itself is protracted beyond what might have been expected, does not amount to frustration of the adventure.

The charterers in both cases appealed.

The appeals were heard together.

Sir John Simon, K.C., Sir Maurice Hill, K.C., and R. A Wright for W. A. Souter and Co.; and Sir John Simon, K.C., F. D. MacKinnon, K.C., and R. A. Wright for Weidner, Hopkins, and Co.—These charter-parties were not time charter-parties; they were in the one case for a "Baltic round," and in the other case for two "Baltic rounds"—that is, for the commercial adventure of a "Baltic round." The adventure of a "Baltic round" means taking cargo into the Baltic, calling at ports in the Baltic, putting out and taking in cargo thereat, returning from the Baltic, calling at ports en route for home, and returning to a coal port in the United Kingdom. In both cases the adventure was frustrated by the act of the Russian Government which prevented the adventure being proceeded with. It was an implied term of the charter-parties that the contract should be dissolved if circumstances beyond the control of the defendants should render the performance of the round impossible; and the implied term does not contradict any express terms of the charter parties. An express term dealing with the same subject matter does not exclude an implied term on which the whole basis of the contract rests. They referred to

The doctrine of commercial frustration applies to both a time charter and a voyage charter. In F. A. Tamplin Steamship Company v. Anglo-American Products Company (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 467; 115 L. T. Rep. 315; (1916) 2 A. C. 397) Lord Parker did not say that the principle of commercial frustration did not apply to a time charter, though he said that it was more difficult to apply it to a time charter than to a voyage charter. In that case the House of Lords only held that on the facts the interruption by the requisition did not put an end to the charter-party.

Leck, K.C. and W. N. Raeburn for the shipowners in both cases.—Although the charter-parties contemplated a "Baltic round," they were nevertheless time charter-parties. The forms were time charter-party forms, and in the sub-charter-parties the charterers were described as time chartered owners" and "time charterers." In a voyage charter the charterers and the owners have a common object, and are both interested in the completion of the voyage; but in a time charter the only object of the shipowner is to receive the time freight, and to have his ship redelivered. Here, provided that the shipowner received the freight, his object in letting the ship was in no way frustrated. In the present cases the mercantile adventure was not completely frustrated, for the charterers had the use of the vessel for a considerable period, and the interruption was not so great as in the Tamplin case, where the contract was held not to have been determined. There was no frustration of the commercial adventures in the present cases. They referred to

Hudson v. Hill, 30 L. T. Rep. 555
Tully v. Howling (sup.);
Horlock v. Bew (sup.);
Braemont Steamship Company v. Weir (sup.);
Herne Bay Steamboat Company v. Hutton, 19 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 472; 89 L. T. Rep. 422.

Further, the term sought to be implied is inconsistent with the express provision of the charter-party as to insuring or cancelling in case of war affecting the working of the ship. By that provision the charterers had the option of either cancelling or maintaining the charter-party, but if they maintained it they were bound to insure. The charterers cannot say that the charter-party was determined by frustration of the adventure, when they had the option to cancel.

Sir John Simon, K.C. in reply.—If the parties contracted on the basis of a certain state of circumstances subsisting, and that state of circumstances fails to subsist, it is no answer to say that the shipowner's sole interest was to receive his freight. In Krell v. Henry (sup.) the plaintiff's only interest was to receive the money payment.

Nov. 17, 1916.—SWINFEN EADY, L.J. read the following judgment:—

The circumstances in these two appeals are very similar, but I will deal first with Scottish Navigation Company v. W. A. Souter and Co. The question raised by the appeal is whether the defendants are liable to pay to the plaintiffs certain arrears of hire under a charter-party.

By a charter-party dated the 30th June 1914 the plaintiffs agreed to let and the defendants to hire the steamship Dunolly for "one Baltic round" at the rate of 975*l.* per calendar month, commencing on and from delivery of the vessel to the defendants as therein provided, and at and after the same rate for any part of a month used to complete a voyage until redelivery (unless lost) to the owners in the same good order and condition as when accepted at a coal port in the United Kingdom, the said hire to be paid half-monthly in advance at Glasgow, charterers to have the option of sub-letting. The charter-party provided for cesser of hire in the event of loss of time from deficiency of men or stores or break-down of machinery; but should the vessel be driven into port or to an anchorage by stress of weather, or from an accident to the cargo, such detention or loss of time to be at charterers' expense; and should steamer be detained by ice or quarantine, same to be for charterers' account, and time to count. Arrests and restraints of princes (inter alia) always mutually excepted. Should the vessel be lost, hire to cease and determine on the day of her loss, and any hire paid in advance and not earned to be returned to the charterers. The vessel came on hire on the 4th July, and proceeded from Hull to Kronstadt with a cargo of coals.

The parties were agreed that a "Baltic round" ordinarily means a voyage to a Baltic port or ports, with leave to call at a port or ports substantially on the route thither, and returning from the Baltic to a coal port here, with leave to call at a port or ports substantially on the route to such coal port. By a sub-charter-party dated the 2nd July 1914, the defendants sub-chartered the vessel to Messrs. George Horsley and Co. Limited, for a voyage from Petrograd or 1/2 places in one district between Viborg and Helsingfors districts inclusive, with a full and complete cargo of props to the Tyne, Wear, West Hartlepool, or Humber (one place only), on being paid freight at the rate of 27*s.* 6*d.* per intaken piled fathom of 216 cubic feet.

By the 27th July 1914 the vessel had discharged her outward cargo of coal and had begun loading props under the sub-charter at Frederikshamn in the Gulf of Finland, whence she proceeded to Kalciyarvi, where she continued loading. On the 1st Aug. 1914 war broke out between Russia and Germany. Ever since this date the vessel has been, and still is, detained in the Gulf of Finland by orders of the Russian Government and is not allowed to leave. Considerable difficulty and delay arose in telegraphic communication. The master of the steamer on the 2nd Aug. sent a telegram to the charterers that the Customs refused clearance for the vessel. On the 4th Aug. war broke out between this country and Germany. On the 5th Aug. the defendants telegraphed a notice to the plaintiffs that owing to Great Britain being at war, affecting the working of the steamer, they exercised their option and cancelled the steamer's charter, reserving their claim to proportion of freight to cover hire and charges already paid. On the same day the defendants wrote to plaintiffs confirming this telegram; and in a letter of the 14th Aug. 1914 the defendants added:

> Now that we know the whereabouts of the vessel, it is our duty to notify you that we transfer her homeward charter to you, also the responsibility for any expenses and charges connected therewith. Enclosed we beg to hand you copy of the homeward charter for your guidance. The rate of freight inserted in same, namely, 27*s.* 6*d.* per fathom, is our contract rate with Messrs. Horsley. The current rate at the time the vessel was stemmed was 25*s.* 6*d.* and we reserve our right to claim this difference of freight. Any further documents or charges that we may receive we will pass on to you in due course.

The plaintiffs declined to accept the notice of cancellation of the charter, and the parties were at issue. On the 31st Aug. 1914, pursuant to the instructions of the owners, the crew left the vessel and returned home to England, only the captain and the engineer remaining on board in charge of the vessel. The detention of the vessel, owing to the existence of a state of war, has continued now for two years and three months, and may continue for an indefinite longer period. The judge was satisfied that it was impossible for the Dunolly to leave the Baltic for England after the 1st Aug. No insurance could be obtained which would cover the ship on leaving the Gulf of Finland.

The plaintiffs contended that the notice of cancellation was invalid, and that there was not any right to cancel under the circumstances, and that the hire had continued to run on and that the arrears were payable because the events which had happened did not bring the case within the cesser clause.

The writ in the action was issued on the 6th Nov. 1914, and the plaintiffs thereby claim 3412*l.* 10*s.*, being the amount of hire alleged to have accrued under the charter-party between the 4th Aug. and the 4th Nov. 1914, and at the trial the plaintiffs obtained judgment for that amount. The hire for the calendar month the 4th July to the 3rd Aug. was paid in due course in July.

I am of opinion that according to the true construction of the charter-party the defendants had not any right to give a notice cancelling it under the circumstances which arose. The clause in the the charter-party provides that no voyage is to be undertaken that would involve risk of seizure or capture, and this provision alone was sufficient to preclude the vessel from sailing from the Gulf of Finland on and after the 1st Aug. 1914. The clause next provides that in the event of Great Britain or other European Power being involved in war, affecting the working of the steamer, at the commencement or during the currency of the charter, the charterers are to have the option of cancelling the charter or insuring the steamer against all war risks for its full value. This clause on its true construction provides for a particular contingency—namely, the event of war—at a time when the charterer is able to take either of two courses, both of which are open, but he must elect which he takes—namely, cancel or insure against war risks. On the 1st Aug. this vessel in the Gulf of Finland was no longer insurable against war risks. It was quite uninsurable. The clause does not in my opinion enable the charterer to cancel the charter after the vessel has been exposed to the risk and has been detained indefinitely by a Sovereign who has become involved in war when the vessel is no longer insurable, and when the charterer is unable to redeliver it to the owner either immediately or within any reasonable time. The notice of cancellation did not when given and could not under the circumstances determine the charter.

There remains the question whether the charterers remain liable for the hire claimed in the action. The charter was for a particular marine adventure compendiously described as a "Baltic round"—a voyage to the Baltic and home, with the liberties before mentioned, and accepted by the parties as coming within what is described as a "Baltic round." The ship is not hired for any definite time, although payment for the Baltic round is calculated by reference to the time occupied. It is not true to say that the ship was merely hired for such period of time as is ordinarily taken in completing a Baltic round. The charterers had no right under the charter-party to require the ship to go elsewhere than on a Baltic round (as, for instance, on a voyage to the Mediterranean), nor had they any right to lay up the ship for a time, instead of sailing her, as they would have under an ordinary time charter for a definite period.

In my judgment, the principle upon which this case falls to be determined is that both parties contemplated from the first a mercantile adventure—a Baltic round; a voyage to the Baltic and back again to be paid for according to the time occupied—and that the enforced delay by reason of the war is of such long and indefinite duration as completely to frustrate the adventure in a mercantile sense, and that the original contract is thereby determined and cannot be enforced. The "Baltic round" which is the subject of the adventure is quite impracticable in a commercial sense. It is not a case in which the charterers have bound themselves absolutely and in any event to continue to pay the hire until the ship is restored to the owners. If that were so, they would continue liable to make the monthly payment of 975*l.* for an indefinite period.

Paraphrasing the language of Lord Loreburn in Horlock v. Beal (sup.), I think it was an implied term of this charter-party that it should be practicable for this ship to sail on this voyage, in that sense which disregards minor interruptions and takes notice only of what substantially ends the possibility of the contemplated adventure being carried out. Both shipowner and charterer made their bargain on the footing that, whatever temporary interruption might supervene, the ship and crew would be available to carry out the adventure of a Baltic round. The further performance of the contract contained in the charter-party became impossible upon the ship being detained for a long and indefinite period. It was urged that here there was no impossibility, as all that the charterers had to do was to continue to pay the monthly hire, and the detention of the ship did not render that impossible. The same argument would have equally applied in Horlock v. Beal (sup.) in the claim for seamen's wages—namely, that the detention of the ship did not prevent the owners from paying the amount of the allotment note, which was all that the plaintiff there claimed. It is the further performance of the contract by one party which formed the consideration for the payment by the other, which has become impossible, and this effects a dissolution of the contract.

It was contended that the charter-party in the present case contained a clause providing for the cesser of hire under certain circumstances, and that the effect of such a clause was to exclude any implication that the hire might cease under other circumstances. The answer to this argument is that the effect of what has happened is not merely to suspend liability to pay hire, but to dissolve the contract, and accordingly there is no longer any subsisting contract under which hire is payable.

In my judgment the charter-party must be taken to have been entered into under the implied condition that, if supervening events (not due to the default of either party) rendered the performance of the "Baltic round" indefinitely impossible, the contract should be deemed to be dissolved: (see Geipel v. Smith, 1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 268; 26 L. T. Rep. 361; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 404, and Horlock v. Beal, sup.). Here a contract has been entered into which by a supervening cause beyond the control of either party has become impossible or impracticable in a commercial sense, and the charterers have not, according to the true construction of the written contract, expressly taken upon themselves the risk of such a supervening cause; upon the occurrence of that cause both parties were and are excused from any further performance. The case comes within the principle of Taylor v. Caldwell (sup) and Appleby v. Myers (16 L. T. Rep. 669; L. Rep. 2 C. P. 651) In Taylor v. Caldwell (sup.) and in Appleby v. Myers (sup.) the further performance of the contract had become absolutely and physically impossible, and not merely impossible in a commercial sense. In the former case the one party could not give to the other the use of a certain music-hall, as it had been destroyed by fire. In the latter case the steam engine and machinery could not be erected upon and affixed to the defendants' premises unless these continued in a fit state to enable the work to be performed on them, and they had in fact been burnt down. Nevertheless, the principle which was applied in these cases is not limited in English law to cases of physical impossibility. In Krell v. Henry (sup.) it was quite possible for the plaintiff to give possession of the flat in Pall Mall, for the occupation of which the defendant had agreed to pay. In that case Vaughan Williams, L.J. pointed out the wider application of the principle, and said that it applied to cases where the event which renders the contract incapable of performance is the cessation or non-existence of an express condition or state of things going to the root of the contract and essential to its performance. It was urged that such a doctrine cannot from its nature properly apply to a charter where there is no "adventure" in which the parties are jointly interested liable to be "frustrated," and reliance was placed upon the observations of Lord Parker in Tamplin Steamship Company v. Anglo-Mexican Petroleum Products Company (sup.): "Without laying it down that the principle" (of the frustration of a commercial adventure) "can in no circumstances be applicable to time charter parties, I am of opinion that its application is in such cases much more difficult than in the case of charter-parties which contemplate a definite voyage within certain limits of time." Whatever difficulty there may be in the application of the principle to ordinary time charters, where no particular voyages are contemplated, and where the time charterer is at liberty to sail the ship or not as he likes, and where he obtains the control of the ship for a definite period, whether he sails her or not, such difficulty is not insuperable in a case like the present, where the charter-party is for a definite voyage out and home, the limits of which are completely defined by the mercantile language used, and which furnishes a definite standard for the computation of the time for which the charter is expected to continue.

I am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed and judgment entered for the charterers, the defendants.

In the case of Admiral Shipping Company v. Weidner, Hopkins, and Co. the facts are fully set out in the report of the case before Bailhache, J. The steamship Auldmuir was the subject of a charter-party dated the 22nd June 1914, and the position is very similar to that of the Dunolly; but the Auldmuir was chartered for two Baltic rounds, the charterers to have the option of cancelling the charter at the end of the first round, paying in that event a slightly increased hire for the period used. No notice of cancellation was ever given. This vessel discharged her outward cargo, and when fully loaded with a return cargo of wood goods for Blyth she was detained by the Russian authorities at Kotka in the Gulf of Finland on the outbreak of war on the 1st Aug., and has not since been allowed to leave. The dispute between the parties was the subject of an arbitration, and the award was made in the form of a special case. It came before Scrutton, J., and he made an order on the 17th March 1915, remitting the case to the arbitrators to find whether at any and what time between the 14th Aug. (up to which date hire had been paid in advance) and the 20th Oct. 1914 (the date of the hearing of the arbitration), there was any reasonable probability of proceeding with the chartered voyage in such a time as that the commercial adventure would not be frustrated, and whether any voyage could have been taken from Kotka in the Gulf of Finland between the 14th Aug. and the 20th Oct. 1914 which would not have involved risk of seizure or capture by a foreign ruler.

On the 21st Sept. 1915 the arbitrators made a further award and found and declared that at no time between the 14th Aug. and the 20th Oct. was there any reasonable probability of the steamship Auldmuir proceeding with the chartered voyage in such a time that the commercial adventure would not be frustrated. And they also found that no voyage could have been taken from Kotka between the 14th Aug. and the 20th Oct. 1914 which would not have involved risk of seizure or capture by a foreign ruler.

In my judgment the same considerations apply in the case of this vessel as in the steamship Dunolly. The contract comprised in the charter-party became impossible of performance and was dissolved and both parties excused from its further performance.

In giving judgment on the hearing before him of the special case and the further award, Bailhache, J. gave a very careful definition of the meaning of the commercial frustration of an adventure by delay. If the object which both parties had in view, when they entered into the charter-party in the present case, was one or two "Baltic rounds," and if it was for the accomplishment of that object that the contract was made and the delay is such as to prevent the fulfilment of that object, then the delay amounts to frustration within that definition. I regret to differ from the learned judge upon the construction of the charter-party, as, in my opinion, the charterers were not entitled, if they pleased, to lay up the Auldmuir, nor might they have sent her to the Mediterranean instead of on a Baltic round. The voyage out and home is particularly defined and described, for which the payment is not to be an agreed sum or at an agreed rate of freight, but is to be according to the time occupied.

By reason of the detention of the ship in the Gulf of Finland the charterers are wholly deprived of the use of her for an indefinite period. Again, it was urged that it was impossible to apply the doctrine of frustration to a case where one of the parties to a contract is fulfilling his part of the contract according to its terms. But this leaves out of consideration the implied term. In Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Company (sup.) the shipowner had observed the terms expressed. He had agreed to send his ship to Newport to load rails there, dangers and accidents of navigation excepted. He did fulfil his part of the contract according to its terms, the vessel being duly sent and only delayed by an accident of navigation. But the court held that an additional term was implied, that the ship should arrive there "at such a time that in a commercial sense the commercial speculation entered into by the shipowner and charterers should not be at an end, but in existence." Not arriving at such a time put an end to the contract, though, as it arose from an excepted peril, it gave no cause of action.

It was also contended that the charter-party had made provision for the war—a contingency that had happened; and where the contract provides for a given contingency it is not for the court to import into the contract a different provision for the same contingency under another name. The provision referred to was the option to cancel the charter, and this option I have already dealt with in the previous case. For the reasons already stated in this case and in the one which has just preceded it, I am of opinion that the appeal should be allowed and the special case should be answered by saying that upon the facts therein and in the further award stated and found, and upon the true construction of the charter-party of the 22nd June 1914, the arbitrators were right in their finding and award that no time hire is due by the charterers to the owners during the time when the vessel has been and is stopped at Kotka. That is the form in which the question was raised before the arbitrators.

Bankes, L.J. read the following judgment:—These two appeals were heard together. The one is an appeal from a judgment of Sankey, J. after the trial of the action in the Commercial Court. The other is an appeal from the judgment of Bailhache, J. on a case stated by arbitrators for the opinion of the court.

It is not necessary that I should restate the facts. They are fully set out in the report of the judgments in the court below. It is sufficient for my purpose to say that except upon one point, to which I refer later, I consider that no material distinction can be drawn between the facts in the two cases. In each case the claim of the respondents was for a sum alleged to be due for the hire of a vessel chartered by the respondents to the appellants. In each case the main defence of the appellants was that the doctrine commonly spoken of as "the frustration of the adventure" applied to their case, and that in consequence they were relieved from any obligation to pay the sums claimed. In each case the judgment in the court below was in favour of the respondents upon the ground that the doctrine had no application having regard to the terms of the contracts into which the appellants had entered.

So far as the facts are concerned both cases must, I think, be treated on the footing that from a business point of view there had been a frustration of the adventure in each case. In the Admiral Shipping Company's case the special case stated by the arbitrators was remitted to them by Scrutton, J. for a finding upon the question whether between the 14th Aug. and the 20th Oct. 1914 there was any reasonable probability of proceeding with the chartered voyage in such a time that the commercial adventure would not be frustrated, and whether any voyage could be taken from Kotka between the 14th Aug. and the 20th Oct. 1914 which would not involve risk of seizure or capture by a foreign ruler. The arbitrators' answer to both questions was in the negative. In the Scottish Navigation Company's case Sankey, J. gave no decision on this point. From the view he took of the case it was not necessary for him to do so. No distinction was sought to be drawn during the argument before us between the two cases so far as the facts material to this point are concerned. I therefore treat the two cases as though in both of them the facts on this point had been found against the respondents.

It remains, therefore, only to consider whether the doctrine of the frustration of the adventure has any application to these cases. Bailhache, J. defines the doctrine thus: "The commercial frustration of an adventure by delay means, as I understand it, the happening of some unforeseen delay without the fault of either party to a contract of such a character as that by it the fulfilment of the contract in the only way in which fulfilment is contemplated and practicable is so inordinately postponed that its fulfilment when the delay is over will not accomplish the only object or objects which both parties to the contract must have known that each of them had in view at the time they made the contract, and for the accomplishment of which object or objects the contract was made." As applicable to the present cases no objection was taken to this definition by any of the counsel for the parties concerned; and it appears to me to be entirely in accordance with the previous decisions upon the point. It is not, I think, necessary to travel through the cases to which our attention has been called in support of this conclusion, and I refer only to the judgment of Vaughan Williams, L.J. in Krell v. Henry (sup.), where the development of the doctrine is historically treated. The speech of Lord Parker in the very recent case of Tamplin Steamship Company v. Anglo-Mexican Petroleum Products Company (sup.) appears to me to contain several passages which are of great value in considering whether the doctrine in question is applicable in the cases which we have now under consideration. In the first place he disposes of the suggestion which has often been made that the doctrine has no application to time charters by pointing out that the true view on this point is, not that the principle can in no circumstances be applicable to time charter-parties, but that its application is in such cases much more difficult than in the case of charter-parties which contemplate a definite voyage within definite limits of time. This view of the law is accepted by the respondents' counsel in these appeals. Again, in speaking of conditions which may be implied as frustrating an adventure he deals both with conditions precedent and conditions subsequent, and points out that though the former may be more easily applied than the latter, it is legitimate to imply the latter where circumstances warrant it. He deals expressly with the case of charter-parties where he says: "It" (the principle) "applies also to charter-parties where some commercial adventure contemplated by the parties, and in the fulfilment of which both are interested, is brought to an end by the happening of some event for which neither is to blame." He deals also with the foundation on which the principle rests, and points out that the principle is one of contract law depending upon some term or condition to be implied in the contract itself, from which it follows that no term or condition can be implied in a contract which is inconsistent with its express provisions, or with the intention of the parties as gathered from those provisions.

I come now to the two questions which, after a consideration of the authorities and the arguments addressed to us, appear to me to be the two questions which require answering in order to dispose of the main point in contest between the parties and which is common to both appeals. These questions are, first, Do the charter-parties which were entered into between the shipowners and the charterers contemplate an adventure in which both were interested? Secondly, If they do, do the terms of those charter-parties exclude the implied condition relied on by the charterers? Both Sankey, J. and Bailhache, J. have answered the first question in the negative, and on that ground have decided against the appellants. There is no doubt as to Bailhache, J.'s view. He construes the charter-parties as time charters pure and simple. He considers that the charterers in the case he was considering might have laid the vessel up, or sent her to Continental ports or to the Mediterranean, and that there was no obligation on the charterers, if they did not lay her up, to employ her in trading to a Baltic port at all. Sankey, J. was content to express the opinion that the charter was a time charter which did not provide for either a definite voyage or a definite object contemplated at first by both parties. I hesitate to differ from these two learned judges who have so much experience in shipping matters, but upon the construction of these particular charter-parties I cannot bring myself to agree with them. After the expression of opinion by Lord Parker to which I have already referred and to which counsel assent, it seems to me immaterial to consider whether these charter-parties can or cannot properly be called time charters. In some senses no doubt they are. The material question, however, which has to be decided is whether the expressions "one Baltic round" in the case of the Dunolly and "two Baltic rounds" in the case of the Auldmuir are, having regard to the other provisions in the charter-parties, words of description of the voyage or voyages, or of parts of the voyage or voyages, to be undertaken by the vessels, or whether they are words descriptive merely of the area within which the charterers may employ the vessels and of the measure of time for which the vessels are respectively chartered. In the one case the doctrine relied upon by the appellants would, in my opinion, apply; in the other it would not. The question is one of construction. In the first place, what is the natural meaning of the words? What is the natural inference to be drawn where one party agrees to let and the other to hire a vessel for "one Baltic round" or for "two Baltic rounds" as the case may be? Are the parties agreeing that the vessel is to be employed as the charterer pleases for the time usually occupied or reasonably occupied in going a Baltic round, or are they agreeing that the vessel shall be employed in actually going a Baltic round? In my opinion the latter is the natural and proper meaning to be given to the language used. It was assumed in the court below that the expression "Baltic round" has a well-known meaning in the shipping trade, but the exact meaning was not gone into. During the hearing in this court counsel were content for the purposes of these appeals to treat a Baltic round as meaning a vogage from a port in the United Kingdom to a port or ports in the Baltic, with liberty to call at United Kingdom or Continental ports substantially on the way there, and returning from a Baltic port or ports to a coal port in the United Kingdom, with the same liberty to call at ports en route.

There is nothing in the charter-parties, in my opinion, which is inconsistent with the view that these charter-parties must be construed as if the words "Baltic round" had been written out at length as above defined. On the contrary I think that the other provisions of the charter-party confirm this view. In both charter-parties the payment of hire is per month commencing on and from delivery and continuing until redelivery of steamer (unless lost) to owners at a coal port in the United Kingdom. When is the redelivery to take place? Is it when the vessel shall have completed the contemplated voyage which fixes the time with certainty, though it may have been longer or shorter than one or both of the parties anticipated; or is it to take place at a time selected by the charterer upon his estimate of what the proper time to be allowed for a Baltic round should be? It seems to me that the latter would be so unlikely an arrangement to make and one so likely to lead to disputes that it is improbable that business people would ever have consented to it. The written clause inserted at the end of each of the charter-parties confirms me in the view I have taken of these contracts. The language employed in the case of the Auldmuir is perhaps stronger than that used in the case of the Dunolly. When the parties in the former case speak of "the end of the first round" the natural meaning of the words appears to me to be when the round is in fact completed, and not at the expiration of a period of time ordinarily or reasonably allowed for a round.

The conclusion, therefore, to which I come on this part of these cases is that the parties did by the language they used contemplate and provide for an adventure—namely, a "Baltic round"—in which they were both interested, and that the doctrine invoked by the appellants applies just as much as if the expression "Baltic round" as explained above had been written out in full in both charter-parties.

I pass now to the second question, and to this I apply the language of Lord Parker to which I have already referred. Is there anything in the express provisions of these charter-parties or in the intention of the parties as gathered from those provisions which is inconsistent with the implied condition sought to be introduced by the appellants? I think not. On the first branch of this question the respondents rely upon the clause with reference to the cancellation of the charter-party, and contend that this clause expressly deals with the event which happened and provides the course, and the only course, the charterers can take if they desire to be relieved from the obligations of the charter. The clause relied on provides that in the event of Great Britain or other European Power being involved in war affecting the working of the steamer charterers to have the option of cancelling the charter or to insure at their expense the steamer against all war risks for the full value under the present policy as approved by the owners. The construction of the clause is not free from difficulty, but, having regard to the language used, it appears to me not to apply at all in the events which have happened. Assuming the existence of the adventure, and the fact that it has become frustrated, the contract as contained in the charter-party has come to an end. Under these circumstances how can the charterer cancel the charter-party or insure the vessel in which he has no longer any insurable interest? To speak, therefore, of the charterers' option to take one or other of these courses is to speak of a state of things which assumes the continued existence of the contract, or in other words a temporary affecting of the working of the steamer as opposed to something of so serious a character as to prevent any working of the steamer at all for a period sufficient to amount to a frustration of the adventure. Assuming this construction of this clause to be correct it practically disposes of any argument on the second branch of this question, because, if the parties have deliberately restricted the expressed provisions of the charter-party to some temporary interruptions by reason of war, they cannot be assumed to have excluded the implied condition which would come into operation in the event of the more serious interruption taking place. Apart from this consideration of this clause I should arrive at the same conclusion from a consideration of the other provisions in these charter-parties. The mere introduction of exceptions or stipulations dealing with certain contemplated contingencies, even if they may be many in number, is not of itself sufficient to indicate an intention to exclude the implied condition. The charter-party in the case of Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Company (sup.) contained an exception of perils of the seas, but this did not prevent the stranding being treated as putting an end to the adventure. The charter-party in the recent Tamplin Steamship Company's case (sup.) contained an exception of restraint of princes, but this, in the opinion of Lord Haldane, did not extend to every restraint however prolonged and the effect of which was to frustrate the adventure. In the present cases I find nothing in the charter-parties which appears to me to indicate an intention that the doctrine relied on should be excluded. On the contrary, the intention apart from the expressed provisions appears to be the other way. Take for instance the payment of the hire. Hire must continue to be paid until the vessel is redelivered at a United Kingdom coal port. No voyage may be undertaken which may involve risk of seizure or capture. Delay in consequence of not being able to start on the homeward voyage in consequence of such risk is not within the cesser of hire clause. It seems to me possible that the parties may from the language they used have contemplated a mere delay in the prosecution of the adventure being at the risk of the charterer, but I cannot gather from that language the intention that the charterer should, after the adventure had become commercially impossible, continue liable to pay the hire for a vessel which by the terms of the charter he was forbidden to bring to the only place at which he could terminate his obligation to pay that hire.

For these reasons I come to the conclusion that the appellants are entitled to succeed on both the questions which I have indicated above.

With the consequences of this decision we are not concerned. It is one of those cases in which one of two innocent parties must suffer. In the present case the shipowner has apparently only been able to reduce the loss by bringing home the crew; but in many cases the circumstances may be such that either by a sale of the vessel or by employing her in some other way a loss may be reduced or altogether avoided; whereas the charterer would under any circumstances be helpless to reduce his loss by a single penny.

Having regard to the conclusion to which I have come with regard to the main point, it is unnecessary to express any opinion upon the point raised in Messrs. Souter's appeal as to the cancellation of the charter-party. In my opinion both appeals succeed, and judgment should be entered in the manner indicated by Swinfen Eady, L.J.

A. T. LAWRENCE, J. read the following judgment:—The facts of these cases have been sufficiently stated. I will only mention two upon which this judgment is founded. (1) It is found as a fact that the steamship Dunolly has since the 1st Aug. 1914 been and still is detained in Russian territorial waters under and by virtue of an order of the Russian Government amounting to a "restraint of princes." (2) In the case of the steamship Auldmuir there is a finding by the arbitrators that her detention under a like order amounted to a "frustration of the adventure" contemplated by the charter-party. The only material difference in the facts of these cases is that in that of the Dunolly a notice purporting to be a cancellation of the charter-party under the clause in line 74 was given by the charterers, whereas in the case of the Auldmuir there was no such notice.

The clause (line 74) does not apply in the circumstances which have occurred. It was not the "working" of the steamer upon the adventure which was "affected." No insurance was possible, and the vessel could not sail down the Baltic at all. This clause was intended to meet and its language covers an entirely different set of facts to those which had arisen in Aug. 1914. I agree with Sankey, J. that the charterers are only entitled to give such a notice when they are ready and willing to hand over the vessel free (within a reasonable time) of cargo and of commitments.

Sir John Simon suggested that the claimants could terminate the contract by cancellation and pay damages for any loss or damage the shipowners might sustain by reason of the circumstances under which the ship then was. I do not think this contention can be sound. They cannot at one and the same time have a right to cancel and a liability in damages for having exercised their right.

This leaves but one question for consideration in the case of each of these vessels—namely, Does the doctrine of the frustration of the commercial adventure apply here? I am inclined to think these are time charters and not voyage charters. I think so because the form is a time charter form, the charterer is called at least once (line 88) a time charterer, and he so describes himself in his sub-charter; but chiefly I think so because the charter-party seems to me to provide for two quite different kinds of voyage—one a round voyage in the Baltic, calling, it may be, at several ports in that sea; the other a voyage to ports on the Continent of Europe and merely entering the Baltic for one port. I agree that it is more difficult to imply a condition defeating the contract in the case of a time charter than in the case of a voyage charter. Especially is this so if the time for which the ship is still under charter when the question arises is of long duration; this because it is then difficult if not impossible to say that the adventures contemplated by the parties are all defeated. It becomes comparatively easy when the adventure is definite and specific as in the case of a voyage charter. Here the charter-party is of very limited duration and scope. The doctrine is not peculiar to charters; it is applicable to all contracts. No such condition should be implied when it is possible to hold that reasonable men could have contemplated the circumstances as they exist and yet have entered into the bargain expressed in the document.

I think that all reasonable commercial men would agree that charters are subject to the condition that the circumstances remain such that the chartered services of the ship shall not for an unreasonable time be rendered unavailable; that if from no default of either party those services can neither be rendered by the shipowner nor enjoyed by the charterer for an unreasonable time then the contract shall be at an end. In commerce time and money depend the one upon the other. Here a Baltic round, though of uncertain duration, is admittedly a matter of a few months. During the argument counsel on both sides seemed to speak of it as occupying three or four months, and I should think this is about the usual duration. These ships are still in the Baltic unable to get away; this war may last for many more months, or even years.

If some such condition is not to be implied the charter-party still binds the parties, the one to pay the hire, the other to have the ship ready and willing to sail under the charter. The one who contemplated an expenditure of 5000*l.* or 6000*l.* may have to pay 30,000*l.*—40,000*l.* or even 100,000*l.* The other who contemplated having his ship free and at his own disposal in a few months has to wait years. It seems to me that a condition whereby such a restraint as this determines the charter-party must be implied if we are to attribute ordinary commercial reason to the parties to it. The charterer pays hire and gets no commercial advantage; the shipowner keeps his ship ready to sail and gets only pre-war rates of hire. Unless the Russian Government is much more farsighted than the English Government, freights have risen there as here, and the shipowner might be earning the higher rates in that portion of the Baltic commanded by the Russian fleet.

Sankey, J. holds that "frustration of the adventure" cannot be applied upon these facts because he regards the shipowner's only object as being to earn the charter-party freight or hire. I cannot agree with this. The subject of the contract is the service of the ship in accordance with the terms of the charter-party; the owner's object is, or should be, to afford those services, while the charterer's object is to enjoy them; it is true that the motive of each is money. Bailhache, J. in his judgment states the common object, and also states in language that I adopt the doctrine as to frustration of the adventure. He declines to apply it to the facts of the case before him (notwithstanding the finding of the arbitrators) because he would have to consider the duration of the restraint in order to see whether it amounted to a "frustration" of the adventure, and this would be to make a new contract for the parties.

I cannot accept this view. One must, of course, consider the duration of the restraint in order to see whether it determines the contract; but doing so does not make a new contract. Whenever a term is implied in a contract, it is a term added to those which are expressed; but it is not a new contract, because, if it is properly implied, then by the hypothesis it was in the contract already. The fact that if you improperly imply a term you make a new contract for the parties is a strong reason for being careful in seeing that it must have been intended by the parties, if you are to regard them as reasonable men entering upon a commercial adventure. In Jackson v. Union Marine Insurance Company (sup.) the exception "perils of the seas" was expressed, yet because the delay caused by the stranding was unreasonable in duration the adventure was held to be frustrated. In Tamplin Shipping Company's case (sup.) Lord Parker of Waddington does not deny, he admits, the doctrine of frustration; he merely declines to apply it to the facts of that case. There the facts were widely different from these. There was a time charter of five years, of which time there was still nearly one-third unexpired when the judgment in the House of Lords was delivered; the charterer was ready and willing to continue to pay the hire, and the British Government, who were imposing the restraint, were ready and willing to pay both owner and charterer according to their respective interests. I think that case cannot govern these cases. It is to be observed that in Hadley v. Clarke (sup.) the exception is stated to be "the dangers of the seas only excepted." There appears to have been no exception of restraint of princes, and therefore nothing to cover "embargo." The shipowner's promise to carry thus stood as an absolute promise, and there was no finding in the special case that the adventure had been frustrated. This case, therefore, is not an authority against the view I have stated.

I think the findings of fact in these cases, taken with the great lapse of time that has occurred, show that in each the "adventure" was "frustrated" and the contracts at an end.

The appeals should be allowed.

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Bill of lading—General ship—Restowage of cargo at intermediate port — Damage to cargo on quay during restowage—Liability of shipowners.

The plaintiffs were shippers of certain mining machinery on board the defendants' steamship from London to Buenos Aires via Newport. A cylinder, part of this machinery, was accidentally injured on the quay at Newport during restowage operations there. The defendants admitted the accident, but relied upon an exception contained in the bill of lading which excepted breakage, even though occasioned by the negligence of the shipowners' servants. The plaintiffs contended that the shipowners had no right, having once stowed their goods in one hold, to remove them from the ship in order to restow them in another hold and to deposit them on the quay for this purpose, and that, as the defendants were acting in breach of their contract of carriage when the accident occurred, they were not protected by the exception.

Held, that the defendants were protected by the exception of the bill of lading. Where a general ship loads cargo at various ports which is intended to be discharged at different places, the cargo could not always be taken on board in such order that the last loaded shall be the first to be discharged; the proper stowage of the cargo and the necessary readjustment of weight to preserve the proper trim of the ship may necessitate changes in stowage from time to time, and in the present case these were necessarily incidental to the voyage of the ship. The defendants, therefore, in removing and restowing the cargo were not acting in breach of the contract of carriage.

Appeal by the defendants from a decision of Rowlatt, J., sitting without a jury.

The plaintiffs' claim was for damages for breach of contract and breach of duty in and about the carriage of goods by sea by the defendants' steamship Denby Grange.

The plaintiffs shipped on board the Denby Grange in London some packages of mining machinery for Buenos Aires, the bill of lading being dated the 14th March 1914. According to the bill of lading, the machinery was shipped in apparent good order and condition on the Denby Grange, Sailing from the Port of London for carriage to Buenos Aires viâ Newport, but with liberty to the steamer, either before or after proceeding towards that port, to proceed to and stay at any ports or places whatsoever (although in a contrary direction to or out of or beyond the route to the said port of discharge) once or oftener in any order, backwards or forwards, for loading or discharging cargo or passengers, or for any purpose whatsoever, and all such ports, places, and sailings shall be deemed included within the intended voyage.

The goods were, subject to the exceptions, to be delivered

In the like apparent good order and condition from the ship's tackle (where the ship's responsibility shall cease) at the port of Buenos Aires or so near thereto as she may safely get and always afloat.

Clause 1 of the exceptions and stipulations provided

That the master, owners, or agents of the vessel, or its connections, shall not be responsible for loss, damage, or injury arising from any of the following perils, causes, or things, namely: . . . breakage . . . whether any of the perils, causes, or things above mentioned, or the loss, damage, or injury arising therefrom, be occasioned by or arise from any act or omission, negligence, default, or error in judgment of the pilot, master, mariners, engineers, stevedores, workmen, or other persons in the service of the shipowners or their agents, whether on board the said ship or any other ship belonging to or chartered by them, for whose acts they would otherwise be liable, or otherwise howsoever.

Clause 4:

The master, owners, or agents of the vessel have liberty to carry the said goods by the above steamer or other steamer or steamers . . . and, in so doing, without notice to shippers or consignees, to carry the goods past their port of destination, or land them at intermediate ports, and to tranship or land and store the goods, either on shore or afloat, and re-ship and forward the same by land, or by water, by craft steam, sail, or barge, whether in tow or otherwise, at the steamer's expense but merchant's risk, it being understood that all claims for loss or damage consequent upon delay or detention of the goods from the foregoing or any other cause are excluded.

The Denby Grange was a general ship carrying cargoes to different ports in the River Plate. She started from Antwerp, put on board the plaintiffs' machinery in London, and then proceeded to Newport, where the plaintiffs' machinery was taken out of one hold for the purpose of restowage in another and was damaged by accident while on the quay.

Before Rowlatt, J. the facts as to the restowage at Newport were agreed as stated in a letter of the 22nd March 1914 from the defendants' representative at Newport to the defendants in London, which was as follows:

As informed you previously, we had to shift the cylinder forming portion of condensing plant on account of the Bruce Marriott and Co. shipped in London in order to make stowage for earthenware pipes here. This we landed on the quay alongside the ship for the time being, and whilst shipping underframes yesterday in the No. 3 hold a gust of wind caught one of the frames as it was being lifted on board, with the result that it swung round, breaking the sling, and the underframes fell on the quay on to the cylinder No. 2366, breaking the cast-iron flange, indenting the tube and crushing same.

Rowlatt, J. gave judgment for the plaintiffs on the ground (inter alia) that the defendants were not entitled under the bill of lading to take the cylinder out of the ship and place it on the quay for the purposes of restowage, and that, therefore, they were not protected by clause 1 of the exceptions of the bill of lading.

The defendants appealed.

On the 8th Feb. the Court of Appeal directed the appeal to stand over for further evidence, and consequently the defendants' manager at Newport made an affidavit to the following effect:

(3) On the steamer's arrival at Newport two cylinders for San Juan had been stowed in the wings of No. 4 'tween deck and a casting for Zarate had been stowed in the square of the hatch. These cylinders weighed 3 tons 11cwt., but occupied very large space and were light cargo. (4) The steamer loaded a quantity of railway material at Antwerp and also at Newport, including several heavy lifts. She was to discharge this cargo at Zarate, and I was informed that there was no crane there capable of dealing with this heavy stuff. The owners accordingly arranged that the steamer's masts should be specially strengthened to enable them to deal with it. (5) The steamer's masts had to be lifted out, and it was therefore impossible to load any cargo in the after part of Nos. 1 and 3 'tween decks until this work was completed. (6) No. 2 'tween deck was to be used for bunker coals as that is the only 'tween deck available for the purpose. It was for these reasons that the casting for Zarate and the cylinders were loaded in No. 4 'tween deck.

Par. 7 stated that the cargo to be loaded at Newport weighed 1756 tons, and included railway material, galvanised sheets, tinplates, ironplates, and a very large quantity of earthenware pipes for Buenos Aires. "These pipes were very brittle and require very careful stowage, and should not be stowed with any other heavy cargo. It is also most important that any broken stowage should be avoided, otherwise the pipes are apt to get adrift and get broken."

(8) The steamer was to discharge at several ports in the River Plate and to go up to Zarate, which was some way up the river. The cargo had therefore to be stowed so as to maintain the steamer as far as possible on an even keel after the discharge of part of it in order that she might draw as little water as possible. In order to effect this it was necessary to stow light cargo in No. 4 so that the steamer might start a little down by the head. If the cylinders and casting had been left in No. 4 'tween deck it would have been necessary to block them off with heavy cargo, which would have put the steamer down by the stern. As the bunker coal in No. 2 'tween deck was consumed on the outward passage, the steamer would get to some extent down by the stern, and it was for this reason that she had to start down by the head. (9) The draft of the steamer on sailing was 22ft. 5in. forward and 22ft. 2in. aft. (10) For those reasons I found that the only practical method of stowing the ship safely was to take the castings out of No. 4 'tween deck and put them into No. 1 'tween deck. By this means the whole of No. 4 'tween deck contained earthenware pipes. The cylinder and casting were placed in No. 1 'tween deck in the square of the hatch, where they could be safely stowed. The earthenware pipes in No. 1 hold were shut off from the rest of the cargo at the forward end by a number of cases of stonework which were well secured. It was absolutely necessary for the safe stowage of the cargo and for the trim of the ship that this method of stowage should be adopted, and this could only be done by shifting the cylinders. (11) It is by no means unusual with liners like the Denby Grange loading cargo at various ports and discharging at various ports to find it necessary to restow part of the cargo at Newport, and in some cases it is necessary to take the cargo out of the ship and put it on the quay for a short time in order to enable the cargo to be safely stowed. It is not always possible to ascertain what cargo will be available for a particular ship at Newport before she commences to load her cargo at Antwerp or London, and even if this were possible sometimes it is impossible to stow the cargo at the previous ports in such a way that it does not require restowage at Newport when the fresh cargo is put in owing to the order in which the cargo has to be discharged. (12) In the circumstances wherever these cylinders and casting had been stowed in London it would have been necessary to take them out and restow them at Newport. (13) To shift the cargo is a source of great trouble to the shipowner and delay to the steamer, and I never shift any cargo unless it is absolutely necessary for safety.

The appeal was reargued upon this statement of facts on the 30th and 31st Oct. 1916.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 10, 1916.—The following judgments were read:—

SWINFEN EADY, L.J. — The plaintiffs were shippers of certain mining machinery on board the defendants' steamship Denby Grange for conveyance from London to Buenos Aires viâ Newport, Mon. A large cylinder 16ft. by 5ft. diameter, part of this machinery, was accidentally injured on the quay at Newport during the course of restowage operations there. The plaintiffs claim the amount of the damage sustained by them by reason of the defendants' failure to deliver the goods at Buenos Aires in the like good order and condition as at the time of shipment. The defendants admit the accident, but rely upon the exceptions contained in the bill of lading as exempting them from liability. Rowlatt, J. at the trial held that the defendants were not protected from the loss which had happened by the terms of the bill of lading, and against this decision the defendants appeal.

The case was tried before the judge upon an agreed statement of facts, but during the hearing of the appeal on the 8th Feb. 1916 it became manifest that the facts were insufficiently stated to enable the court to determine the real dispute between the parties, and, moreover, the parties were at issue as to the meaning of their respective admissions, and the court allowed the matter to stand over for further evidence. This has since been filed, and the case now comes on again for rehearing before a court differently constituted, and with this further evidence before it.

The Denby Grange is a steamer of the Houlder Line, of a dead weight capacity of upwards of 7000 tons, carrying a general cargo on this voyage. She commenced her voyage at Antwerp, where she loaded a quantity of railway material; she then proceeded to London, where she took on board a quantity of general cargo, including the plaintiffs' machinery, which consisted of 105 pieces or packages in all, weighing upwards of 43 tons. She then proceeded to Newport, where she was to take on board upwards of 1750 tons of cargo, including a large quantity of heavy railway material, galvanised sheets, tinplates, and ironplates, and including also a very large quantity of earthenware pipes for Buenos Aires, which are very brittle, require careful stowage, and should not be stowed with any other heavy cargo.

Amongst the plaintiffs' machinery loaded in London were two cylinders, each weighing 3 tons 11cwt., one of which was subsequently damaged at Newport. On the voyage from London to Newport these cylinders had been stowed in the wings of No. 4 'tween deck hold. The steamer was to discharge at several ports in the River Plate and to go up to Zarate, which is some way up the river. The cargo had to be stowed so as to maintain the steamer on an even keel after the discharge of part of it in order that she might draw as little water as possible.

The defendants established by their evidence, which was uncontradicted, that the only practicable method of stowing the ship safely, having regard to the nature and extent of her cargo and the ports and places to which it was consigned, was to take the plaintiffs' cylinders out of No. 4 'tween deck hold and put them into No. 1 'tween deck hold. The defendants' manager at Newport deposed that it was absolutely necessary for the safe stowage of the cargo and for the trim of the ship that the method of stowage which was adopted, and which in the evidence is described in detail, should be followed, and this could only be done by shifting the plaintiffs' cylinders. There was also evidence that it is by no means unusual with liners like the Denby Grange, which load cargo at various ports and discharge at various ports or places, to find it necessary to re-stow part of the cargo, and in some cases it is necessary to take the cargo out of the ship and put it on the quay for a short time in order to enable the cargo to be safely stowed. Moreover, it is not always possible to ascertain what cargo will be available for a particular ship at Newport before she commences to load her cargo at Antwerp or London, and, even if this were possible, it is sometimes impossible to stow the cargo at the previous ports in such a way that it will not require restowage at Newport, when the fresh cargo is put on board, owing to the order in which the cargo has to be discharged. Shifting the cargo is a source of trouble and expense to the shipowner and delay to the steamer, and according to the evidence of the defendants they never shift any cargo unless absolutely necessary for safety.

The damage in question in this action occurred while the cylinder was resting on the quay; an underframe of a railway carriage was caught by the wind, broke several strands of a wire hawser, and fell upon and fractured a portion of the cylinder. Breakage, even though occasioned by the negligence of the shipowners' servants, is an excepted peril; but the plaintiffs contended that the rule was "once stowed always stowed"; that the shipowners had no right, having once stowed their goods in No. 4 hold, to remove them to No. 1 hold, and certainly not to remove them from the ship and deposit them on the quay in order to re-stow them in No. 1 hold; and that, as the defendants were acting in breach of their contract of carriage when the accident occurred, they were not protected by the exception. The defendants did not dispute that if they were acting in breach of their contract they could not rely upon the protection afforded by the bill of lading, but they claimed that the contract of affreightment entitled them to restow in the manner they did.

The question therefore resolves itself into this: Were the defendants, under the circumstances which I have stated, entitled to remove the cylinder from No. 4 to No. 1 'tween deck hold? In my opinion they were. Both parties must be presumed to have contracted with reference to the known, ordinary, usual, well-established, and necessary course of business. The presumption is that the parties intended to contract with regard to the well-known usages of trade. When necessary to restow for the safety of the ship, or to obtain and preserve a proper trim, or to enable the rest of the cargo to be safely and properly stowed, a usage to do so is certainly reasonable.

Where a general ship loads cargo at various ports which is intended to be discharged at various different places, it is manifest that the cargo cannot always be taken on board in such order that the last loaded shall be the first to be discharged, or that the cargo last taken on board is suitable for being overstowed on cargo already shipped. The proper stowage of the cargo and the necessary readjustment of weight to preserve the proper trim of the ship may necessitate changes in stowage from time to time, and these were necessarily incidental to the voyage of this ship.

I am of opinion that in removing the cylinder from No. 4 with a view to stowing it in No. 1 and in the meantime temporarily depositing it on the quay the defendants were not committing any breach of their contract of carriage as contained in the bill of lading, and accordingly that they are exempted from liability for the damage which occurred. The appeal must be allowed and judgment entered for the defendants with costs here and below.

Bankes, L.J.—In this case the respondents shipped a quantity of mining machinery, including two cylinders, on board the appellants' steamship Denby Grange, then in the Port of London, for conveyance to Buenos Aires. The said vessel was one of the appellants' line trading with general cargo between English and Continental ports and ports in South America. The next port at which the vessel was due to call for cargo after leaving London was Newport. The bill of lading described the intended voyage as a voyage from London to Buenos Aires viâ Newport, but with liberty to the steamer, either before or after proceeding towards that port, to proceed to and stay at any ports or places whatsoever (although in a contrary direction to or out of or beyond the route to the said port of discharge) once or oftener in any order, backwards or forwards, for loading or discharging cargo or passengers, or for any purpose whatsoever, and all such ports, places, and sailings should be deemed included within the intended voyage.

The bill of lading contained the usual long list of exceptions in which stowage, breakage, landing at any time or in any place, and negligence of the shipowners' servants or agents are included. It also contained a special clause dealing with transhipment. The cylinders when loaded on board in London were stowed in No. 4 'tween deck hold. On arrival at Newport the cylinders were taken out of that hold and laid on the quay, the intention being to replace them into No. 1 'tween deck hold. While on the quay one of the cylinders was damaged. The respondents brought their action alleging that the appellants had committed a breach of contract in unloading the cylinder and placing it on the quay and in failing to deliver it at Buenos Aires. The appellants denied the alleged breach of contract, and asserted their right to deal with the cylinder under the contract of carriage in the way in which they had dealt with it.

The action was tried before Rowlatt, J. upon an agreed statement of the facts relating to the damage to the cylinder contained in a letter dated the 22nd March 1914. The statement in this letter was in the following terms: [His Lordship read the statement as set out above.]

On this statement of facts Rowlatt, J. decided in favour of the respondents. When the appeal came on it appeared to the court that upon the agreed statement of facts the question as to the circumstances under which the cylinder came to be taken out of No. 4 hold and laid on the quay was left in a very uncertain and unsatisfactory position. The appeal therefore stood over for a further statement, and as a result the appellants' manager at Newport made an affidavit upon which he has been cross-examined. The effect of his affidavit is that it was necessary to remove the cylinder from the No. 4 hold and to place it where it was temporarily, with a view to its being stowed in No. 1 hold in order to enable the ship to be properly stowed and to secure a proper trim. He also stated that such a dealing with portions of the cargo was quite usual. In my opinion the cross-examination did not displace the statements contained in the affidavit.

Under these circumstances the question which has to be decided is whether, upon the facts as now disclosed, a term must be implied in the contract as contained in the bill of lading by which the appellants are entitled to move any goods after they have been placed on board, even to the extent of taking them out of the ship, if such moving is either usual in the course of loading or unloading the vessel at the authorised ports of call, or necessary for the safety or trim of the ship or the safety of the cargo. We were referred to the test applied by Lord Esher in Hamlyn and Co. v. Wood and Co. (sup.), where he says: "I have for a long time understood that rule to be that the court has no right to imply in a written contract any such stipulation, unless on considering the terms of the contract in a reasonable and business manner, an implication necessarily arises that the parties must have intended that the suggested stipulation should exist."

Having regard to the fact that this vessel was, under the terms of the contract, to call at a number of ports to take in cargo, and at a number of ports to discharge cargo, it appears to me a necessary implication that the parties must have intended that the shipowners should have liberty to shift the cargo, should necessity arise to do so, either for the safety of the ship or cargo, or in the usual course of loading or unloading at the port of call. I cannot see any limitation to that right to shift provided what is done comes within the limits of what is reasonable or customary. If the right to shift extends to a right to shift from one part of a hold to another part of the same hold, or from one hold to another hold, it must, I think, necessarily extend to placing the cargo on the quay for such time as may be reasonably necessary to enable this to be effectively done.

The question is necessarily a business question. The only evidence before the court is that of the appellants' manager. So far as my own experience of such matters is concerned, it appears to me that the view he presents is a reasonable one, and that the stowing and discharging of a general cargo, consisting possibly of very many parcels of goods belonging to different owners, taken in at a number of ports, and to be discharged at a number of other ports, would be practically impossible unless such a liberty existed. In this view of the contract the appellants are entitled to succeed, because it is not disputed that if what the appellants did was within the terms of the contract the exceptions are wide enough to protect them from liability.

For these reasons I think that the appeal succeeds.

A. T. LAWRENCE, J.—The question in this case is whether the landing of these cylinders at Newport for the purpose of restowing them was within the contract of carriage, that is, was the exercise of a right of the shipowner under it. I think it was. In my opinion it was incident to the voyage contemplated by this bill of lading. The ship was a general ship, intending to call at several ports, and the voyage involved going up the river, where banks and shallows make the trim and handiness of the ship of great importance. The cylinders were very light relatively to the space they occupied. It must have been obviously probable that the cargo to be taken in after the ship left London would involve some readjustment of weights to enable her to keep her trim. These considerations make it easy to accept the evidence called after the first hearing by the leave of the court. This evidence is to the effect that upon such a voyage it is the ordinary course to land and re-stow cargo where necessary.

The next question is: Does the bill of lading contain exceptions covering the shipowner against risks in so doing? I think it does. I agree with my brother Rowlatt that clause 4 of the exceptions does not apply here. It is directed to a different set of circumstances, namely, to a case of transhipment to another ship or to some form of land carriage. But I think clause 1 excepts the shipowner from liability for this damage to the cylinder. It excepts liability for loss or damage arising from (inter alia) "breakage" "stowage," "landing," and this even though due to negligence. The "delivery" to be made by the ship is "from the ship's tackle at . . . the port of Buenos Aires or so near thereto as she may safely get and always lie afloat." These exceptions seem to me to include such a "breakage" as occurred to this cylinder when landed for re-stowage at Newport.

I think, therefore, that the defendants are not liable, and that this appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Thursday, Oct. 26, 1916.

(Before Lord READING, C.J. and LOW, J.)

SHELFORD (app.) v. MOSEY (resp.). (a)

Seaman — Agreement — Rate of wages — Special stipulation as to bonus—Nature of bonus—"Wages"—"Emoluments"—Stipulation as to forfeiture of bonus—Legality—Desertion of seaman—Delivery account—Payment of amount due to "proper officer"—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 114, 742—Merchant Shipping Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 48), s. 28.

By sect. 28 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 48) it is provided (inter alia) that the master of a British ship shall, within forty-eight hours of the termination of the voyage at the port where the voyage terminates, deliver to the "proper officer"—as defined by sub-sect 11 of the said section—the amount due on account of wages as shown in the delivery account, and subject to any deductions allowed under the section, to any seaman belonging to the ship who has been left behind out of the British Islands during the course of the voyage.

The appellant was the master of the British ship O., which started on a voyage to Australia and back in Feb. 1916 and terminated its voyage at T. in June 1916. Among the members of the crew was one F., and it was a special term of the agreement made in accordance with sect. 114 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 that all members of the crew, with the exception of certain classes of the crew to which F. did not belong, were to be paid a 15 per cent. war bonus over and above the rates appearing against their names on the articles for the voyage or during the period of the war, whichever terminated first, but "in cases of desertion and/or being paid off abroad the above bonuses will be forfeited." F. deserted at Sydney, and on the return of the ship to England the appellant paid to the proper officer—namely, the Superintendent of Mercantile Marine at T.—the proportion of the wages due up to the time of desertion, after deductions, but paid no part of the bonus, as it was contended that the bonus was not wages, but consideration for the performances of an entire contract, which contract had been broken by F., and that under the above term F. had forfeited any right to any share in such bonus. An information was laid by the respondent, the proper officer, against the appellant, for failing to comply with the provisions of sect. 28 of the Act of 1906, and the justices held that the sum stipulated for as a bonus in the agreement was "wages" within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Acts of 1894 and 1906, and that as such wages it could not be forfeited by agreement between the master and the seamen. The justices accordingly convicted the appellant.

Held, on appeal, that the decision of the justices was correct.

CASE stated by justices of the peace for the county of Essex.

At a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Grays, in the county of Essex, an information was preferred by James Yeoman Mosey (hereinafter called "the respondent"), he being an officer of the Board of Trade and the "proper officer" under sect. 28 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 48), against William Sopwith Shelford, master of the British ship Omrah (hereinafter called "the appellant") for that he, the appellant, on the 12th June 1916, at the Mercantile Marine Office, Tilbury, in the county of Essex, after the termination of the voyage of the said ship at Tilbury on or about the 11th June 1916 did unlawfully fail without reasonable cause to comply with the above section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1906 in that he, the said appellant, having dealt with the account of the wages of a certain seaman named Joseph Fay, the said seaman having been left behind out of the British Islands, and the absence of the said seaman being alleged to be due to desertion, refused or neglected to deliver to the proper officer, to wit, the superintendent of Mercantile Marine at the Mercantile Marine Office, Tilbury, the sum of 3*l.* 5*s.*, being the amount due on account of wages as shown on the delivery account furnished by the appellant in respect of the said seaman as amended by the proper officer in red ink after deducting such sums as were set out in the said account, there being no re-imbursement account allowed under the said section, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

The appellant, Lieutenant-Commander William Sopwith Shelford, was the master of the British steamship Omrah, owned by the Orient Line. The ship signed on a crew at Tilbury in the month of February 1916 for a voyage to Australia and back to this country. Amongst those who signed on was Joseph Fay, who was employed as a hospital attendant on board ship. The wages of Fay were 5*l.* 5*s.* per month, and there was a clause added to the agreement as follows:

It is further agreed that all members of the crew will be paid 15 per cent. war bonus over and above the rates appearing against their names on the articles for the voyage or during the period of the war, that is, whichever terminates first, with the exception of the seamen, storekeepers, donkeymen, greasers, firemen, and trimmers. In cases of desertion and (or) being paid off abroad the above bonuses will be forfeited. The wages entered against the respective names therein represent increases over the company's scale of rates ruling at the outbreak of war, which increases are added as a war bonus.

Fay deserted at Sydney on the 21st April 1916. The Omrah returned to England and arrived at Tilbury on or about the 11th June 1916, and the appellant then tendered the balance of the wages due to Fay to the superintendent of the mercantile marine at his office at Tilbury, but no part of the special war bonus. The superintendent wrote a letter dated the 13th June 1916 to the appellant demanding the proportion of the 15 per cent. war bonus, and as the applicant declined to pay proceedings were taken as above stated.

The information was heard on the 30th June 1916, and the justices convicted the appellant, imposing a fine of 2*l.*

Upon the hearing of the information the following were proved or admitted:—

(a) A certified copy of the register of the steamship Omrah.

(b) The agreement with the crew of the steamship Omrah for the voyage in question.

(c) The official log of the vessel.

(d) The delivery account furnished by the appellant to the respondent in respect of the wages of the said Joseph Fay.

(e) A letter, dated the 13th June 1916, from the respondent to the appellant.

(f) The agreement with the crew of the steamship Omrah on the previous voyage of the ship.

It was conceded and the justices found as facts: (1) That the seaman Joseph Fay was to be treated for the purposes of the case as a seaman left behind out of the British Islands; and (2) that the proper proportion of wages as distinct from any question of bonus due to the seaman had been tendered by the appellant to the respondent and refused by him.

On behalf of the appellant it was contended:

(1) That the bonus in question was not "wages," but consideration for the performance of an entire contract.

(2) That no part of such bonus accrued due or became payable till the fulfilment of the said contract on completion by the said seaman of the return voyage.

(3) That by his desertion the seaman had forfeited any rights under the said stipulation.

(4) That the stipulation in the said agreement with the crew of the steamship referring to the bonus had been duly initialled and passed as being in compliance with the requirements of the Board of Trade and the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Acts 1894 and 1906, both on this voyage and on the previous voyage by the proper officer.

(5) That if the said stipulation was contrary to law no demand for its inclusion in the delivery account would lie, and the seaman could not claim thereunder for the whole or any part of the bonus.

On behalf of the respondent it was contended:

(1) That the bonus was "wages" or "emoluments" as defined by sect. 742 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894.

(2) That it therefore accrued de die in diem and should have been included in the "wages" in the delivery account.

(3) That if the bonus was "wages" or "emoluments" it was only liable to forfeiture under the decision of a court of law and not by virtue of any agreement between the master and the crew.

The following cases were referred to:

Keslake v. Board of Trade, 9 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 491; 89 L. T. Rep. 534; (1903) 2 K. B. 453;
Mercantile Steamship Company Limited and Dale v. Hall, 11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 273; 100 L. T. Rep. 885; (1909) 2 K. B. 423;
Halliday v. Taffs, 11 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 574; 104 L. T. Rep. 188; (1911) 1 K. B. 594;
Deacon v. Quaile and Neate v. Wilson, 12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 125; 106 L. T. Rep. 269; (1912) 1 K. B. 445.

The justices were of opinion that the sum stipulated for as bonus in the agreement was "wages" within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Acts, and as such "wages" it could not be forfeited by agreement between the master and the seaman, and accordingly held that the appellant had failed to comply with the requirements of sect. 28, sub-sects. 1 and 2, of the Merchant Shipping Act 1906. They convicted the appellant of the offence alleged against him as before stated.

By the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60) it is provided:

Sect. 742. In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires, the following expressions have the meanings hereby assigned to them, that is say . . . "wages" includes emoluments.

By sect. 28 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 48) it is provided:

(1) If a seaman belonging to any British ship is left behind out of the British Islands, the master of the ship shall, subject to the provision of this section, (a) as soon as may be, enter in the official log-book a statement of the effects left on board by the seaman and of the amount due to the seaman on account of wages at the time when he was left behind; (b) on the termination of the voyage during which the seaman was left behind, furnish to the proper officer within forty-eight hours after the arrival of the ship at the port at which the voyage terminates, accounts in a form approved by the Board of Trade, one (in this section referred to as the delivery account) of the effects and wages, and the other (in this section referred to as the reimbursement account) of any expenses caused to the master or owner of the ship by the absence of the seaman in cases where the absence is due to desertion, neglect to join his ship, or any other conduct constituting an offence under sect. 221 of the principal Act. The master shall, if required by the proper officer, furnish such vouchers as may be reasonably required to verify the accounts. (2) The master of the ship shall deliver to the proper officer the effects of the seaman as shown in the delivery account, and, subject to any deductions allowed under this section, the amount due on account of wages as shown in that account, and the officer shall give to the master a receipt, in a form approved by the Board of Trade, for any effects or amount so delivered. (3) The master of the ship shall be entitled to be reimbursed out of the wages or effects any sums shown in the reimbursement account which appear to the proper officer, or, in case of an appeal under this section, to a court of summary jurisdiction to be properly chargeable, and for that purpose the officer, or, if necessary, in the case of an appeal, the Board of Trade, shall allow those sums to be deducted from the account due on account of wages shown in the delivery account, and, so far as that amount is not sufficient, to be repaid to the master out of the effects. The proper officer, before allowing any sums to be deducted or repaid under this provision, may require such evidence as he thinks fit as to the sums being properly chargeable to be given by the master of the ship, either by statutory declaration or otherwise. Where the master of a ship whose voyage terminates in the United Kingdom is aggrieved by the decision of the proper officer as to the sums to be allowed as properly chargeable on his reimbursement account, and the amount in dispute exceeds ten pounds, he may appeal from the decision of the proper officer to a court of summary jurisdiction. . . . (10) If the master of a ship fails without reasonable cause to comply with this section he shall (without prejudice to any other liability) for each offence be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding twenty pounds, and, if he delivers a false account or makes a false statement or representation for the purposes of this section, he shall in respect of each offence be guilty of a misdemeanour. (11) The proper officer for the purpose of this section shall be: (i.) At a port in the United Kingdom, a superintendent; (ii.) at a port in a British possession, a superintendent, or, in the absence of any such superintendent, the chief officer of customs at or near the port; (iii.) at a port elsewhere, the consular officer at the port. (12) This section shall not apply in the case of an absent seaman: (a) Where the master of the ship satisfies the proper officer that none of the effects of the seaman have to his knowledge been left on board the ship, and that he has paid the wages due to the seaman; or (b) where the amount of wages earned by the seaman (after taking into account any deductions made in respect of allotments or advances for which provision is made by the agreement with the crew) appears from the agreement to be less than five pounds, and the master does not exercise his option to deal with the delivery and reimbursement accounts collectively; or (c) where the master of the ship satisfies the proper officer that the net amount due to the seaman on account of wages (after taking into account any deductions lawfully made in respect of allotments, advances, or otherwise) is less than three pounds, and the master does not exercise his option to deal with the delivery and reimbursement accounts collectively; or (d) where the question of the forfeiture of the wages and effects of the seaman has been dealt with in legal proceedings lawfully instituted before the termination of the voyage, or within forty-eight hours of the arrival of the ship at the port at which the voyage terminates.

W. H. Duckworth for the appellant.—The point for consideration was whether the bonus in question was to be included in the wages payable to the man Fay. It was an amount stipulated for quite distinct from the rate of pay set out in the agreement. It was a valid contract, one which had been approved by the Board of Trade, and it was an entire contract. As Fay deserted in Australia he had no claim at all to any part of the bonus. Indeed, unless he completed the voyage out and home again, he had no right to it. That the bonus was distinct from wages was shown by what had taken place with regard to some of the men. A certain portion of the seamen and firemen, backed by their union, had arranged to get an increase of wages instead of a war bonus. That made it clear that the two things were kept distinct. Under all the circumstances of the case Fay had forfeited whatever rights he might have possessed upon the completion of the voyage, and the appellant was justified in withholding the proportion of the bonus when he tendered the amount of the wages due.

The Attorney-General (Sir F. E. Smith, K.C.), Branson, and Ginsburg, for the respondents, were not called upon.

LORD READING, C.J.—Notwithstanding all the ingenious and subtle attempts on the part of counsel for the appellant to introduce other questions into this case, there is really but one point for us to consider, and that is whether or not a bonus agreed to be paid to a man sailing on a vessel and recorded in the ship's articles is to be treated as wages, or whether it can be regarded as something altogether apart from wages. That is a question of importance in these times of war. Familiar as we are with the many cases, the vast majority of cases presumably of ships that sail have either some agreement to pay extra wages or higher wages than were paid before the war, or else have a stipulation to pay a bonus.

In the present case the seaman did not return with the ship—he did not complete the voyage. Whatever the reason he did an act which put an end to his contract. But by virtue of the Merchant Shipping Act it is provided that when a seaman does that, notwithstanding the strict reading of the contract, if you have to deal with it according to the common law, he is to be entitled to the payment of his wages up to the time when he leaves the ship. That is something which applies peculiarly to seamen. There are special provisions in the Act regarding seamen. That part of the law is not, and cannot be, impugned. There is no question but that the wages of the seaman would become payable up to a certain time in accordance with the provisions of the Act, notwithstanding the man had deserted at a port abroad, or had forfeited his right of continued employment. That being so, it disposes of any question as to wages. But that is a point which is not raised before us in the present case, and the only reason why I mention it is because the moment it is admitted that that is the law with regard to wages, it seems to me to follow inevitably that it is also the law with regard to bonus. The bonus in such a case as the present is really nothing else than a euphemism for an addition to wages. There may be special reasons for calling it a bonus. It may be a convenient method of conveying to the seaman that he is receiving extra pay during the period of the war; but whatever it is it means an addition to wages. It has been argued on behalf of the appellant that it is not really an addition to wages, because the seaman is only entitled to the payment if he returns with the ship, and because it is stated at the end of the stipulation as to the payment of the 15 per cent. bonus that "in cases of desertion and (or) being paid off abroad the above bonuses will be forfeited." If that clause stood, if it could be regarded as a part of the contract, the appellant would be right in his contention. The seaman did not return, and according to the wording of the contract he had forfeited his bonus. But the law says that there shall be no forfeiture of the wages of a seaman, and consequently, if such a clause is inserted in the agreement providing for the payment of wages, it is inoperative because it is illegal.

The true effect of the argument of counsel for the appellant is this: Either you must regard this particular clause, which would defeat the right of the seaman to payment unless he returns home with the ship, or if you say that it is to be regarded as inoperative, then you must delete the whole clause as to the bonus. But there is this difficulty about the matter, namely, that it is clearly not the law. The grant of the bonus is a payment which is agreed to be made to the seaman for sailing in the ship just as much as an agreement for wages. Now, suppose there was an agreement with a seaman that he should be paid so much, but that if he deserted or was put off abroad he should get nothing, it is perfectly clear law that such a stipulation would be of no avail whatever, and that the Legislature interferes, as it had done long before the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, for the protection of the seaman, who, whatever his merits and qualifications may be in other affairs of life, does not as a rule pay too much attention to the documents which he signs. The Legislature has said: "Although a seaman may agree to something of the kind, he shall not be held to it, and shall be paid his wages notwithstanding any stipulation, and we shall interfere to see that he gets them, notwithstanding that a crafty shipowner or master may have got him to sign a document containing a stipulation which puts him absolutely at the mercy of the owner or the master." The Legislature interfered to do that which it alone could do, namely, to say that such a contract should be invalid.

The stipulation is invalid, but the agreement to pay wages remains. That is really the whole question in the case. In my view it is not possible to separate bonus from wages. The bonus is nothing else but an addition to wages, and if the clause is examined there can be no doubt about it. In this very clause you have an addition of fifteen per cent. as a war bonus. Therefore, in my judgment, we are bound to hold that a bonus is part of the emoluments, and that the Act of Parliament applies to wages and emoluments—a word added expressly to include something which might strictly not come within the term wages. We need not stop to define "emoluments," a term not usually applicable to wages paid to a seaman, but it is meant to include something paid to him for his work over and above the actual wages agreed to be paid. Wages and emoluments are the things to which the Act applies.

The definition of the word "wages" in sect. 742 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 makes that perfectly plain by saying in terms that wages include emoluments, and I would add, although it is not in the Act of Parliament, it includes bonus. That being so, the law is quite simple and plain that this defeasance clause, the right of forfeiture given to the shipowner, falls to the ground, and this man is entitled to be treated just as if it had been stated in the articles of the ship which he signed that he shipped on the terms of being paid wages at so much, plus 15 per cent.

For the reasons I have stated, I think that the justices arrived at a correct decision in this case, and the appeal will be dismissed. As the point raised is one which it was desirable should be settled, there will be no order as to costs.

LOW, J.—I agree.

Appeal dismissed. No order as to costs.

THE AMERIKA. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Admiralty—Collision—Submarine sunk by liner—Liner alone to blame—Cause of action for loss of life of seaman apart from statute—Pensions and grants to relatives of deceased officers and seamen.

A submarine having been sunk through the negligent navigation of a steamship and all but one of her crew drowned, the Commissioners of the Admiralty brought an action against the steamship owners to recover the damage they had sustained. They included in their claim a number of items, one of which was a sum representing the capitalised amount of pensions and grants paid or payable by them to the relatives of the crew who were drowned. At the reference the assistant registrar disallowed this item of claim on the ground that loss or damage suffered by the plaintiffs due to the loss of life of the crew of the submarine was not recoverable in civil action. This decision of the assistant registrar was upheld by the President and subsequently by the Court of Appeal who expressed themselves bound to follow the ruling of Lord Ellenborough in Baker v Bolton (1808, 1 Camp. 493) that "in a civil court the death of a human being could not be complained of as an injury."

Held, (1) that, whether or not the common law ought originally to have been differently interpreted than as interpreted by Lord Ellenborough in Baker v. Bolton (sup.), it was too late to disturb it; and (2) that the damages claimed were in no way recoverable, because, being money which the Admiralty Commissioners were not legally required to pay to the relatives of the deceased men, such damage was too remote.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 536; 111 L. T. Rep. 623; (1914) P. 167) affirmed.

APPEAL by the Commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral of the United Kingdom from a judgment of the Court of Appeal, reported 12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 536; 111 L. T. Rep. 623 affirming a judgment of the President (Sir S. T. Evans), which confirmed a report of the assistant registrar disallowing a claim made by the commissioners as plaintiffs in an action for damage by collision in respect of the loss of life of the crew of His Majesty's submarine B2.

The Court of Appeal decided that the effect of the decisions in Osborn v. Gillett (L.Rep. 8 Ex. 88), Clark v. London General Omnibus Company (95 L. T. Rep. 435; (1906) 2 K. B. 648), and Jackson v. Watson and Sons (100 L T. Rep. 799; (1909) 2 K. B. 193) was to render binding upon the Court of Appeal the ruling of Lord Ellenborough in Baker v. Bolton (1808, 1 Camp. 493) that "in a civil court the death of a human being could not be complained of as an injury," and that the law as to damages suffered owing to the death of a human being not being recoverable must be reviewed, if at all, in the House of Lords.

The sole question involved in the appeal was whether any claim in respect of the loss or damage suffered by the appellants owing to the loss of life of the crew of the submarine was recoverable in law.

Sir George Cave (S.-G.), Laing, K.C., Sir John Simon, K.C., and Dunlop for the appellants.

Inskip, K.C. and Arthur Pritchard for the respondents.

At the close of the appellants' case judgment was reserved.

The cases cited are fully dealt with in the judgments.

Earl LOREBURN.—In my opinion this appeal fails. It is far too late for this House to disturb the rule expressed by Lord Ellenborough in Baker v. Bolton (1 Camp. 493), even were we of opinion that the common law ought originally to have been differently interpreted, of which I am by no means persuaded. When a rule has become inveterate from the earliest time, as this rule appears to have been, it would be legislation pure and simple were we to disturb it. I also think that the damages sought are not in any way recoverable, because they represent sums of money which the appellants were not legally required to pay.

Your Lordships have been interested in ascertaining the origin of Lord Ellenborough's decision. I share in that interest, but I cannot throw any light on the subject beyond what may be derived from the opinions of Lord Parker and Lord Sumner, both of which I have had the advantage and the pleasure of reading.

Lord PARKER OF WADDINGTON.—I agree.

There are in my opinion two sufficient reasons why this appeal cannot succeed. The first is that the items of damage which the appellants desire to be allowed are too remote. The second is that no sufficient case has been made for overruling Lord Ellenborough's decision in Baker v. Bolton (1 Camp. 493) to the effect that in a civil court the death of a human being cannot be complained of as an injury. I will deal with each of these reasons separately.

The items of damage which the appellants desire to have allowed consist of certain pensions and allowances, particulars of which they set out in the appendix. These pensions and allowances are granted under statutory authority, but it does not appear that their grant formed any part of the contract between the Admiralty and the seamen whose lives have been lost through the respondents' negligence. They are, it seems, compassionate pensions and allowances only, which, from a legal standpoint, the Admiralty might have granted or withheld at its discretion. Under these circumstances they cannot constitute an item of damage. No person aggrieved by an injury is by common law entitled to increase his claim for damage by any voluntary act; on the contrary, it is his duty, if he reasonably can, to abstain from any act by which the damage could be in any way increased. But further, even if the pensions and allowances in question were granted pursuant to contracts between the Admiralty and the deceased seamen, I should still be of opinion that they could not properly constitute an item of damage for loss of service. They would in this case constitute deferred payment for services already rendered, and have no possible connection with the future services of which the Admiralty had been deprived.

Passing to the second of the reasons above mentioned, I may point out that the correctness of the ruling in Baker v. Bolton (sup.) has since been accepted, not only by all courts in this country, but by the Supreme Court of the United States, nor can anything be found in the earlier authorities inconsistent with it. It was, it is true, severely criticised by Lord Bramwell in Osborn v. Gillett (L. Rep. 8 Ex. 88). It was, he considered, anomalous that a master should be entitled to recover for loss of service if his servant were wrongfully injured, but should be without any remedy if his servant were wrongfully killed. If it were any part of the functions of this House to consider what rules ought to prevail in a logical and scientific system of jurisprudence, much might no doubt be said for this criticism; though it is not, in my opinion, by any means clear that the anomaly does not in reality consist rather in granting the remedy in the former case than in refusing it in the latter. In a society based so largely as our own is at the present day upon contractual obligations, it does not appear why the wrongful injury of A., whereby he is prevented from fulfilling his contractual obligations to B., should confer on B. a right of action only where these obligations are those arising out of the relationship of master and servant, or, indeed, why the right should not be extended so as to cover all loss, whether arising out of inability to perform a contract or otherwise.

This House, however, is bound to administer the law as it finds it. The mere fact that the law involves some anomaly is immaterial unless it be clear that the anomaly has been introduced by erroneous judicial decision. The appellants have accordingly attempted to show that Lord Ellenborough's ruling was erroneous, as being based either (1) upon a misconception of the limits within which the maxim Actio personalis cum personâ moritur is applicable, or (2) upon the mistaken notion that the rule of public policy which, in cases of felony, admittedly requires the person aggrieved to institute criminal proceedings before pursuing any civil remedy against the felon, precluded such civil remedy altogether, or (3) upon doctrines of Roman law which ought not to be applied at all. It is to be observed that Lord Ellenborough gave no reasons for his ruling; he treated the proposition he laid down as a well-known proposition of law, and the reasoning on which the proposition was based must therefore be found, if at all, in the earlier authorities. The only earlier authority to which your Lordships' attention was called was the case of Huggins v. Butcher (Noy, 18; Yelv. 89). This was an action in trespass by a husband for wrongful injury causing his wife's death. The action was dismissed. If it were looked on as an action in right of the deceased wife, the maxim actio personalis, &c., was clearly applicable. If on the other hand it were looked on as an action by the husband in his own right, then the trespass was "drowned in the felony." Obviously the limits within which the maxim mentioned is applicable were already well known when Huggins v. Butcher was decided, and Lord Ellenborough with that case in his mind can hardly have fallen into the error suggested. Nor can I find any reason to suppose that any weight has ever been given in the courts of this country to the Roman law on the subject. It remains, therefore, to consider whether the reason given in Huggins v. Butcher that the trespass was drowned in the felony can be rejected as erroneous. It was contended that the reason must be rejected as a misconception of the rule of public policy above referred to. Whatever may have been thought in the early part of the seventeenth century, or even in Lord Ellenborough's day, it is now quite clear that the rule only suspends and does not require the destruction of the civil remedy. There can, therefore, it is argued, be no drowning of the trespass in the felony, and if the reason given for the decision in Huggins v. Butcher be bad, there is, it is contended, no reason why that case should stand, or why Lord Ellenborough's ruling, which was dependent on it, should not now be overruled by this House.

Before proceeding to deal with this point, I should like to call the attention of the House to certain historical considerations which appear to me to be of considerable materiality. I do this with some diffidence, as I cannot lay claim to any special knowledge. I have, however, read a good deal of history in connection with this case, for it is almost a commonplace that apparent anomalies in our law can generally be explained if we consider the conditions of its historical growth.

If we carry our minds back to a period prior to the development under the influence of the Statute of Westminster II. (13 Edw. 1, c. 24) of the action on the case, we find that the law of contract based on the doctrine of consideration had not yet taken shape. The basis of society was still status rather than contract, and the King's courts had not yet invented any procedure for the enforcement of simple contract obligations. Nevertheless, among the writs which had become de cursu, there were several writs which a master could obtain from the Chancery in respect of wrongs done to his servant. Fitzherbert, in his De Natura Brevium, mentions (1) a writ of trespass for taking away an apprentice or servant, and (2) a writ of trespass for injury done to a servant per quod servitium amisit. These writs are in all respects analogous to the writs of trespass for taking away a wife or child, or for injury done to a wife or child per quod consortium or servitium amisit; and also to the writs of trespass for debauching a wife, daughter, or female servant. The inference is that all these writs arose out of status at a time when the servant or apprentice, as well as the wife and child, was a member of the family, and the relation between him and the head of the family had not yet come to be looked upon as resting upon contract. This would appear to me to account for the fact that, except in the case of master and servant, the loss of A. arising out of an injury, whereby B. is unable to perform his contract, is not actionable. It is only in a society based on contractual obligation that the existence of such an action in the case of master and servant and in no other case can appear illogical.

Further, during the period in question the writ of trespass was the only remedy for wrongs such as those we are considering. According to Professor Maitland, trespass was a remedy for acts of violence not amounting to a felony. Certainly no writ of trespass can be found in which the acts of which the plaintiff complains necessarily amount to a felony. In some cases they may or they may not. Take for example the writ for breaking into the plaintiff's house and taking away his money. The acts complained of do not constitute burglary or larceny. There may be a burglary or larceny, according to whether certain additional facts be or be not proved, but the defendant cannot plead these additional facts: (Lutterell v. Reynell, 1 Mod. 282). He cannot set up his own felony by way of defence. The facts alleged in the writ are wrongful and actionable, whether these additional facts be proved or otherwise. It is not the felony which is made the subject of complaint. It should be remembered that for felony there was the appeal, and that, to use Professor Maitland's expression, the writ of trespass may be called "an attenuated appeal" dealing with acts of violence for which the appeal did not lie. It arose out of the appeal, and was a criminal as well as a civil proceeding, leading not only to the plaintiff recovering damage, but to the defendant being fined or imprisoned.

During the period we are considering it is probable that all homicide by act of violence amounted to felony. Certainly intentional homicide or homicide through negligence was felonious. It follows that the death of a human being occasioned by an act of violence on the part of the defendant could not be the ground of complaint in an action of trespass. It could not be alleged without alleging felony, and for felony trespass would not lie. If the writ alleged only an injury per quod servitium or consortium amisit, the writ would be unobjectionable, but if death ensued, damage could be obtained up to the date of the death only. If the injured person had been killed on the spot the action would fail altogether. The plaintiff's remedy, if he had any, would be the appeal.

If for the reasons above suggested trespass did not lie on the part of a master for an injury causing the death of his servant, it is easy to see how this fact would influence the subsequent development of the action on the case. The writ-making powers of the Chancery, which for a time had fallen into disuse largely because they were thought to infringe on the legislative function of Parliament, received in 1285 A.D. a new impulse by the passing of the Statute of Westminster II., and began to be again used, as they had been originally used, to meet the needs of a growing civilisation by providing legal remedies for grievances which, however much they might be recognised as such by the general sense of the community, were not yet actionable in the King's courts. Consider for a moment the following examples: First, A.'s servant, in the course of serving A., negligently throws a beam of wood on to a highway, and in so doing injures B.'s servant. Under these circumstances B.'s servant had a writ of trespass against the wrongdoer, and B. also had a writ of trespass (per quod servitium amisit), but neither of them had any remedy against A., for trespass was in fact a criminal proceeding, and according to the common law no one could be called upon to answer in a criminal proceeding for another's crime. Nevertheless, the general sense of the community demanded such a remedy, and this was supplied by giving B. and B.'s servant an action on the case against A. By this means the modern law as to a master's liability for the acts of his servant was enabled to develop. The remedy of B.'s servant against A.'s servant was always confined to an action in trespass: (see Holms v. Mather, L. Rep. 10 Ex. 241, per Lord Bramwell at p. 268). Secondly, suppose A.'s servant, in the course of serving A., placed a beam of wood on the highway and negligently left it there, so that B.'s servant fell over it and was injured. Under these circumstances neither B.'s servant nor B. himself had any remedy in trespass, for A.'s servant had committed no act of violence for which alone a writ of trespass could be obtained from the Chancery. Nevertheless, the general sense of the community demanded a remedy and such a remedy was again supplied by giving both B. and B.'s servant an action in case against both A.'s servant and A.

If in the first of the two examples I have given B.'s servant had been killed and not injured only, A.'s servant would have committed a felony and no action against him would lie in trespass. In developing the principle of respondeat superior, it may well have been thought that A.'s liability for the act of his servant ought not in any case to be greater than the liability of the servant himself. Again, if in the second of the two examples B.'s servant, in falling over the beam, had broken his neck, it may well have been thought that neither A.'s servant nor A. himself ought to incur, by reason of mere nonfeasance, a liability greater than would have been incurred by actual violence. These considerations may well account for the doctrine that the death of a human being could not be complained of as an injury in an action on the case any more than it could in an action of trespass.

I will now return to the case of Huggins v. Butcher, and I desire to suggest that it was not really based on any rule or supposed rule of public policy, but merely on the nature of an action in trespass. The declaration was by a husband for an injury to his wife. Primâ facie, therefore, what was complained of was a trespass, but the declaration proceeded to state that the wife died of the injury. What was primâ facie a trespass thus became a felony, for which no action in trespass lay. The trespass was "drowned in the felony. It was for the King only to punish, except the party brought an appeal": (Noy, 18). If the case had turned on a rule of public policy, such rule would have been applicable to a writ in trespass for breaking into the plaintiff's house and taking away his money, where what had been done in fact amounted to burglary or larceny. I cannot discover that it was ever so applied. On the contrary, Markham v. Cobb (Latch, 144; Noy, 82) decided in 1625, and Dawes v. Coveneigh (Style, 346) decided in 1652, are authorities that in such a case the trespass is not drowned in the felony, so as to preclude an action for the trespass provided the requirements of public policy are first satisfied. These cases were quoted with approval by Sir Matthew Hale

(1 Hale, P.C. 546), and it cannot be disputed that they are good law. Lord Ellenborough himself acted on them in Crossby v. Leng (12 East, 409) without any apparent hesitation, though Baker v. Bolton had been decided by him only a few years previously, namely, in 1808. It is true that neither Huggins v. Butcher nor Baker v. Bolton were cited in argument. Of course, this may have been due to carelessness in examining the authorities, but it is quite possible that counsel did not consider that they had any bearing on a question of public policy.

The case of Gimson v. Woodfall (2 C. & P. 41) strikes the first discordant note. This was in 1825, and in 1827 the matter was discussed in the case of Stone v. Marsh (6 B. & C. 551), Lord Tenterden using language which might be construed to favour the view taken in Gimson v. Woodfall. The point was left open in White v. Spettigue (13 M. & W. 603), though that case overruled Gimson v. Woodfall on other grounds.

In Wellock v. Constantine, decided in 1863 (7 L.T. Rep. 751; 2 H. & C. 146), the plaintiff sought to recover damages for rape. Of course, if she had consented to the act alleged, there could be no civil remedy. If, on the other hand, she had not consented, she was in fact complaining of a felony, for which an action in trespass, at any rate, would not lie. Willes, J., being of opinion that no civil action would lie for a felony, intimated that he would direct a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff thereupon consented to a non-suit. The case, therefore, appears to resemble Huggins v. Butcher, and has no necessary reference to public policy, though Pollock, B., in discharging a rule for a new trial, seems to suggest that public policy was the real ground of decision. This also appears to have been the view of Blackburn, J. in Wells v. Abrahams (26 L. T. Rep. 326; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 554), for he disapproves Wellock v. Constantine on the ground that public policy demands only the suspension and not the destruction of the civil remedy, thus approving the earlier authorities to which I have referred. He obviously disagreed with the ruling of Willes, J. that no civil action would lie for a felony, for though he expressly approves the case of Huggins v. Butcher, he says it is a mistake to suppose it was decided on that ground. Unfortunately, he does not suggest on what grounds he thought the decision could be supported.

That the rule of public policy only suspends or does not destroy the civil remedy is also shown by the subsequent cases of Ex parte Ball (10 Ch. Div. 667) and Midland Insurance Company v. Smith (45 L. T. Rep. 411; 6 Q. B Div. 561).

It should be noticed that Baggallay, L.J., in laying down in Ex parte Ball the propositions resulting from the authorities, says that a felonious act may (not that it must) give rise to a civil action. Before any question of public policy can arise it has first to be ascertained whether civil proceedings will lie at all. Most felonies involve a wrong less than a felony, and for such a wrong civil proceedings will lie when once the demands of public policy have been satisfied. But there may be felonies where the only wrong is the felony itself, and it may well be that the felony cannot be made the subject of complaint in civil proceedings.

It was in this state of the law as to public policy that Baker v. Bolton came up for consideration before the Court of Appeal in Clark v. London General Omnibus Company (95 L. T. Rep. 435; (1906) 2 K. B. 648), and, if that case be referred to, it is quite apparent that neither the counsel who argued it nor the judges who were party to the decision considered that public policy had anything to do with the matter. Not one of the cases on the latter subject to which I have referred was so much as mentioned. Under these circumstances it seems impossible to suppose that the decision in either Huggins v. Butcher or Baker v. Bolton depended on a misconception of the rule of public policy. I think it more probable that this misconception which at one time no doubt prevailed but which has been now dispelled was itself due to a mistake as to the meaning of what was said in Huggins v. Butcher, that case itself merely deciding that felony could not be made a ground of complaint in trespass, a decision which in Baker v. Bolton was extended to cover all civil proceedings.

Perhaps I ought to add one word on the case of Smith v. Selwyn (111 L. T. Rep. 195; (1914) 3 K. B. 98). That case resembled Wellock v. Constantine. The statement of claim alleged and complained of a felony. There was an application to stay further proceedings or dismiss the action on the ground that it was based on a felony for which there had been no prosecution. Liberty was given to amend the claim by alleging only a wrong less than felony; otherwise the action was ordered to be stayed pending criminal proceedings. The question whether felony could itself be made a ground of complaint in a civil action, quite apart from any rule of public policy, does not appear to have been considered, and supposing the statement of claim had been amended in the way suggested, it would still seem that, under the authorities I have cited, public policy would, if there had been an actual felony, demand a stay until the plaintiff had done her duty by prosecuting the felon.

Under these circumstances I do not think the appellants can be said to have advanced any sound reasons why your Lordships' House should disturb a rule of law which has been so long recognised in our courts and which, however anomalous it may appear to the scientific jurist, is almost certainly explicable on historical grounds.

I agree that the appeal fails.

Lord SUMNER.—This appeal has been brought principally to test the rule in Baker v. Bolton (1 Camp. 493), that "in a civil court the death of a human being cannot be complained of as an injury," a rule which has long been treated as universally applicable at common law. Some attempt was made to contest it only in its application to the case of master and servant. I will discuss both the narrower and the wider proposition, but it is clear that the action was not brought for the loss to a master of the services of his employee, but for the respondents' bad navigation, which sank the Crown's submarine, and the item of damage now in dispute, namely, pensions and allowances to dependants of seamen who were drowned, was claimed merely as one of the natural consequences of the tort, which consisted in sinking the ship. No claim has been made and no evidence has been given relating to damage sustained by the appellants in losing the further services of those who were drowned, and so different both in its nature and its incidents is the service of the seamen of His Majesty's Navy from the service of those who are in private employment that it may be questioned whether in any case an action per quod servitium amisit could have been brought at all.

Never during the many centuries that have passed since reports of the decisions of English courts first began has the recovery of damages for the death of a human being as a civil injury been recorded. Since Lord Ellenborough's time the contrary has been uniformly decided by the Court of Exchequer and by the Court of Appeal. In addition to the weight of Lord Ellenborough's name (no mean authority even when sitting at Nisi Prius in spite of Lord Campbell's sneer), the rule has been definitely asserted by Lord Selborne (Clarke v. Carfin Coal Company (1891) A. C., at p. 414), Lord Bowen (The Vera Cruz, L. Rep. 9 P. Div., at p 96), and Lord Alverstone and Lord Gorell (Clark v. London General Omnibus Company (95 L. T. Rep. 435; (1906) 2 K. B. 648). It has been accepted as the rule of the common law by the Supreme Court of the Dominion of Canada (Monaghan v. Horn, 7 Can. S. C. R. 409), and the Supreme Court of the United States of America (The Corsair, 145 U. S. Rep. 335).

That the rule has also received statutory recognition appears to me to be abundantly plain. I agree that the preamble to the first section of Lord Campbell's Act should be read as applying to the particular defect in the existing law, which it was passed to remedy, namely, the disadvantageous position of widows and children, and not to the limited rights of masters and employers, though only Bramwell, B.'s intrepid individualism could dismiss it as a "loose recital in an incorrectly drawn section of a statute, on which the courts had to put a meaning from what it did not rather than what it did say": (Osborn v. Gillett, L. Rep. 8 Ex., at p. 95). Still I think that the view taken by the Legislature in 1846 is clear. Sect. 6 of Lord Campbell's Act provides that "nothing therein contained shall apply to that part of the United Kingdom called Scotland." Why? Because Scottish law differed from English law in the very point in question, and in this respect is for once illogical. The rule, says Lord Watson, in Clarke v. Carfin Coal Company (1891) A. C., at p. 419), and again in Wood v. Gray (67 L. T. Rep. 628; (1892) A. C., at p. 581), which allows "actions of solatium and damages at the instance of husband, wife, or legitimate child in respect of the death of a spouse, child, or parent . . . does not rest upon any definite principle, but constitutes an arbitrary exception from the general law, which excludes all such actions, founded in inveterate custom and having no other ratio to support it." "Lord Campbell's Act," says Turner, L.J., with the concurrence of Knight-Bruce, L.J., in Glaholm v. Barker (13 L. T. Rep. 653; L. Rep. 1 Ch., at p. 227), "first introduced into this country a remedy in case of injuries attended with loss of life, the law up to the time of the passing of this Act having stood thus—that in case of death resulting from injury the remedy for the injury died with the person." It provided a new cause of action and did not merely regulate or enlarge an old one. It excluded Scotland from its operation because a sufficient remedy already existed there, when in England none existed at all. So much seems to me to be indubitable. It did not deal with the case of master and servant as such, presumably because the Legislature found nothing in the common law rule in this regard which called for reconsideration. I think the observation of Pigott, B. in Osborn v. Gillett (L. Rep. 8 Ex., at p. 93) was perfectly just. "We are not at liberty to disregard the law thus established so long ago and expressly recognised by the Legislature, nor in effect to add by the decision of this court another clause to Lord Campbell's Act." It is worthy of observation that the passing of Lord Campbell's Act was followed shortly afterwards by similar legislation in the States of New York in 1847 and 1849 and of Maryland in 1852, and statutes similar in effect have since been passed in most of the older States of the Union, where the common law prevails. Massachusetts had already dealt with the matter, though only tentatively, by direct enactment (c. 81 of 1786), which made the township as the highway authority liable in certain cases, when death was caused on highways, and by an Act of 1840, which provided that a railway company, whose negligence had caused a fatal accident, should be liable on indictment to payment of a fine to the use of the personal representative of the deceased for the benefit of his family. Plainly it was, and long had been, the general opinion among students of the common law that the rule was as stated by Lord Ellenborough. "The authorities are so numerous and so uniform," said the Supreme Court of the United States in 1877 (Mobile Railway v. Brame, 95 U. S. Rep. 758), "that by the common law no civil action lies for an injury which results in death, that it is impossible to speak of it as a proposition open to question." Since the early part of the last century the subject has been learnedly discussed on many occasions in the United States, both in connection with claims for the death of a servant and claims for the death of a relative. The reargument in Hubgh v. New Orleans and Cincinnati Railway (6 Louisiana Annual, 495) is particularly valuable for its contrast of the common law with the old French law and with the effect of art. 1382 and art. 2294 of the Code Napoléon, as repeatedly interpreted in the Cour de Cassation. So much for this rule as a proposition of general application.

I think that, as the appellants have argued this case as if the action had been brought by a master for the loss of a servant's service, it is better to deal also with this aspect of it. The point was concluded against the appellants in the courts below by Osborn v. Gillett and Clark v. London General Omnibus Company. The question is whether there is any ground of principle on which your Lordships ought to overrule decisions of such authority and long standing. The case is put thus: "It is admitted that a master has an interest in his servant's life, such as to support an action if the servant is maimed; how can it be right that the tortfeasor should escape if instead of maiming the servant he kills him? Is the general rule of liability for tortious injury to the servant's health subject to an exception in relief of the tortfeasor if death ensue?" Some most learned writers have expressed dissatisfaction with the rule. It has been even suggested that Lord Ellenborough was "the victim of a confusion of ideas" and that the rule arose from a misunderstanding of the principle that a right of action for a tort, where the act done was felonious, is suspended till the tortfeasor has been prosecuted. The hope—perhaps a faint one—was long ago expressed that some day your Lordships might overrule Baker v. Bolton.

I think it is clear that the relation of master and servant presents in this matter some peculiar features. What is the right in the master which the tortfeasor infringes, or the duty towards him which he disregards? Ordinarily an action of tort is given to defend rights of property or rights of personal safety, personal freedom, and personal reputation. The latter must be confined to the person of the master, and in the person of the servant he has no property. Here is the beginning of anomaly.

I do not know, and doubt if it can now be ascertained, when or pursuant to what theory this special right of the master in relation to his servant was first established. The inquiry belongs to history rather than to positive law. Tindall, C.J. in Grinnell v. Wells (7 M. & G., at p. 1041) observes of the most highly artificial aspect of this cause of action: "The foundation of the action by a father to recover damages against the wrongdoer for the seduction of his daughter has been uniformly placed from the earliest times hitherto not upon the seduction itself, which is the wrongful act of the defendant, but upon the loss of service of the daughter, in which service he is supposed to have a legal right or interest. . . . It is the invasion of the legal right of the master to the services of his servant that gives him the right of action for beating his servant, and it is the invasion of the same legal right, and no other, which gives the father the right of action against the seducer of his daughter." So nearly did the wrong, which is the subject of this cause of action, approximate to wrongs to his property that a count for debauching the plaintiff's daughter could be joined with a count for breaking and entering his house (Woodward v. Walker, 2 B. & P. New Reports, 476), and a man could join with a count for an assault on himself another for an assault on his wife "per quod consortium uxoris for three days amisit": (Guy v. Livesey, Cro. Jac. 501). Thus it is that the tortfeasor is liable to another's servant if he beats him, for the act is actionable per se; but he is only liable to the master of the servant if the beating interferes with the service, for at the master's suit it is only actionable per quod (Robert Marys' case, Coke's Rep. Pt. 9, 113A). They are two separate causes of action in two different persons in respect of the same act. Again, where there is no capacity for service, as in the case of an infant of tender years, the father's action per quod servitium amisit will not lie: (Hall v. Hollander, 4 B. & C. 660). If the contract of service had already determined before the wrongful act had any disabling effect upon the capacity to serve, as might be the case when a wrongful act is done to a servant under notice, I take it likewise that the action would not lie. It is the loss of service, which is the gist of the action, and loss of service depends upon a right to the service, and that depends on the contract between the master and the servant. The contract of service being purely personal determines with the servant's death. As he dies, eo instanti the master's right is extinguished. A cause of action, which essentially depends on the present existence of a right to services, cannot be asserted in respect of a state of things which is inconsistent with the existence of such a right. It cannot be changed from an action for injury to the right (for in tort the wrongful act of the defendant and an invasion of the right of the plaintiff must concur) into an action for damage arising upon an event, otherwise an action would lie for causing the death of one's cestui que vie. A similar explanation is applicable to the case of a husband's action for injury to his wife per quod consortium amisit. The right is not in the life but in the service or consortium during life. "Death following instantly upon the act complained of," says the Supreme Court of the United States in Lucas v. New York Central Railway (21 Barber, 245), "there was no time during her life when it could be said that the husband had lost the services of his wife in consequence of the injury complained of." Such an explanation was offered by the court in Monaghan v. Horn (7 Can. S..C. R. 409), and it has the approval of Sir Gorell Barnes, P. in Clark's case. For my own part I think it is sound in this sense that whether or not it be the theory on which those who introduced these causes of action would have justified them, as indeed we may be sure it is not, it, at any rate, provides, though somewhat imperfectly, an intelligible basis for the existing rule, sufficient to prevent your Lordships from interfering with long-standing decisions on the plea that they are insensible or arbitrary.

Mr. Solicitor urged that such a principle is highly technical and that, if a minor hurt to a servant gives a course of action to a master, à fortiori must the major hurt, which results fatally, and he reminded your Lordships that this House in the case of The Bernina (6 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 257; 58 L. T. Rep. 423; 13 App. Cas. 1) overruled Thorogood v. Bryan (8 C. B. 115), a case of long standing, and exhorted your Lordships to take heart and do likewise. This is hardly the right view to take of your Lordships' judicial functions nowadays, nor does it follow, in the case of a legal system such as ours, that a principle can be said to be truly a part of the law merely because it would be a more perfect expression of imperfect rules, which, however imperfect, are well established and well defined. Again, an established rule does not become questionable merely because different conjectural justifications of it have been offered, or because none is forthcoming that is not fanciful. The explanations given of the rule in question are singularly varied. Hale (Pleas of the Crown, i. 476) says that a man shall forfeit his goods, though the verdict be quod interfecit per infortunium et non per felonium, "because the King has lost his subject and that men should be more careful." Certainly the idea of liability for breach of a duty to use care towards one's fellow-subjects was of slow growth. Again, Parke, B. says in Armsworth v. South-Eastern Railway (11 Jurist O. Ser. p. 758) that the rule had two reasons, "first, because the law provides remedies for such mischiefs only as affect legal rights and a man has no such legal right in the life of his parent as he has in his own, while, secondly, it was considered impossible to form an estimate of the value of human life either to a man himself or to others connected with him."

Whether as some have thought the Roman law affected the matter in the distinction which it drew in various connections between the value of a slave's life and that of a free man it is probably impossible now to tell. The true explanation and the basis may be, and in our law often are, purely historical. As is well known it was long part of English law when civil injuries and criminal offences had not been clearly distinguished, that among emendable offences there was included homicide, for which payment of wite to the King, or in some cases to the lord, and of bot to the kinsfolk constituted satisfaction. The elaboration of this tariff and the heavy burden of the payments for which it provided in the case of various injuries seem to have been the cause of the disappearance of this system. It passed away very rapidly, partly through the rise of criminal jurisdiction over offences against the King's peace and partly through the attraction of the new action of trespass. The change had taken place before records of decisions begin. Thereafter, while damages were recoverable by the injured man in his lifetime for trespass to his person, homicide became punishable upon indictment, and in Bracton's day was regarded as felonious. Those homicides, which were due to negligence, could be and were dealt with by the exercise of the King's mercy. On the one hand homicide, which deserved punishment, ceased to be emendable; on the other personal torts, actionable in trespass, were compensated in damages; the intermediate case of an act, tortious but not heinous, causing death was dealt with by the Royal mitigation of the punishment naturally attaching to homicide. There was I imagine in early times no actual decision in which it was held that in a civil court the death of a human being could not be complained of, still less was any legal theory advanced in justification of such a rule. Following the development of law through the modification and development of procedure, the system of making satisfaction for homicide by payment of wer and wite died out after the twelfth century; it was dealt with as a punishable felony, with or without mitigation of punishment, in proceedings on the King's behalf. Relatives, who in the time of Henry I. would have been paid by the manslayer in accordance with the rank of his victim, in the time of Edward I. had lost that right and yet could not bring trespass, and this by a process of procedural change and not, so far at least as is known, on any analysis of the nature of the cause of action. Doubtless lawyers as familiar with fatal accidents due to mere negligence as we are would have analysed the injury and have distinguished fully between killing with intent to kill, killing by an intended act without intent to kill but in breach of a duty towards the victim, and killing without either intent or breach of duty by mere misadventure, but in days when negligence causing death was probably rare as compared with our day, and the guilty party more often than not had nothing with which to pay damages, men acquiesced without discussion in a procedure by which the Royal justice dealt with homicide of all kinds, and actions of trespass did not deal with homicide t all. No doubt it is the tradition of this change that was preserved in the language of Tanfield, J. in Huggins v. Butcher (Yelverton, 89), "the servant dying of the extremity of the battery it is now become an offence to the Crown, being converted into felony," to which the report in Noy, p. 18, adds "for the King only is to pursue felony except the party brings an appeal." Though no longer in accordance with the formal law as stated by Cockburn, C.J. in Wells v. Abrahams (26 L. T. Rep. 326; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 554) and by Baggallay, L.J. in Ex parte Ball (10 Ch. Div., at p. 674), this was historically not far from the truth.

Pari passu with the respective proceedings in trespass and on the case and on indictment there remained the right of appeal. For many years an appeal was more common than an indictment in cases of homicide, and the judges were careful to preserve the relatives' private right to the appeal and to secure that they should not be prejudiced by the course taken by or in the name of the Crown. The liability of the manslayer to punishment might be discharged by the King's pardon, or by the appellant's release, but in case of the former the appellant's right was saved, so that the King's pardon could not be pleaded to defeat the appeal. Out of this there arose the practice of using the appeal as an engine of compulsion, by which the slayer was driven to make compensation in order to obtain the appellant's release. In the appeal there were risks on both sides, for if the appeal failed the appellee had his action on the case for a false and malicious appeal. Down to the end of the fifteenth century appeals were nevertheless common, but the statute 3 Hen. 7, c. 1, after reciting that "in appeals the party is oftentimes slow and also agreed with . . . also he that will sue any appeal must sue in proper person, which suit is long and costly, that it maketh the party appellant weary to sue," enacts that indictments should no longer be held back "so that the suit of the party may be saved," but are to be proceeded with at once. Eventually appeals fell much into disuse; but they are mentioned from time to time and a reported instance occurs, which is instructive, in Croke's Eliz., pp. 632 and 682, Phillida Shackborough v. Biggins or Biggen, Here in a widow's appeal for murder, in which the act was held to have only been manslaughter, the Queen's pardon was relied on. It was decided, with some difference of opinion, that the pardon did not get rid of the appellee's liability to be burnt in the hand, it being the suit of the party and not an information in the Star Chamber, which is the suit of the Queen. On this the appellee promptly paid the appellant forty marks, and the suit was discontinued. There is little subsequent record of similar cases. In 1770 in Bigby v. Kennedy (5 Burr. 2643) it is stated that there had been no such case for nearly half a century, and, as eventually the appellant did not appear and a non-suit was entered, no doubt the appellee had satisfied her demands. In Ashford v. Thornton in 1818 (1 B. & Ald. 405), the case which led to the abolition of appeals by 59 Geo. 3, c. 46, s. 1, Bayley, B. observes: "This mode of proceeding by appeal is unusual in our law, being brought not for the benefit of the public, but for that of the party, and being a private suit wholly under his control it ought therefore to be watched very narrowly by the court, for it may take place after trial and acquitment on an indictment at the suit of the King, and the execution under it is entirely at the option of the party suing, whose sole object may be to obtain pecuniary satisfaction." In this sense down to 1819 the death of a human being could be complained of in a civil court, for the appeal, though "a vindictive action," was on the civil side of the court, but it could not be complained of "as an injury," and the rule as stated by Lord Ellenborough stands untouched.

I think the history of the disappearance of wergild and the persistence of the appeal for homicide, which is to be found in full in the works of Hawkins, Fitzjames Stephen, and Pollock and Maitland, proves, if proof were needed, that Lord Ellenborough's canon correctly states the law, and is one which is not now susceptible of expansion by judicial interpretation. There never was an action in the sense now contended for to recover damages for the death of a human being, and the remedy by appeal, which so long persisted in the case of the widow, the most crying case of all, was one which the most hardened formalist would not have tolerated, had any such action at law been possible, for it was long a form of legalised blackmail.

The historical explanation of the absence of such an action at the suit of relatives applies equally to the case of a master's claim for the death of a member of his familia, for example, a servant. It is equally incapable of judicial creation. Indeed, what is anomalous about the action per quod servitium amisit is not that it does not extend to the loss of service, in the event of the servant being killed, but that it should exist at all. It appears to be a survival from the time when service was a status.

The canon in question has often been classified under the maxim actio personalis moritur cum personâ, and ill-advised arguments have sometimes suggested that, even as applied to the case of master and servant, it has something to do with the abatement of actions. The maxim itself has many critics; it has been coldly disparaged as post-classical, meaning thereby that it is bad Latin (Finlay v. Chirney, 58 L. T. Rep. 664; 20 Q. B. Div., at p. 502); it has been suggested to be a mistake for actio poenalis (Poste Gaius 493), whence it is sometimes insinuated that it is bad law; and it has been peevishly described as "a wretched saw" and as "a purely identical proposition" (Austin II. 1013). Of course, reliance on the maxim in this connection leads to the effective retort that the person who has the action is the master and he is alive and sues just because someone else, his servant to wit, is dead. If, however, this maxim is put aside, since in the present case it is irrelevant, I think that the argument, that your Lordships should discover under this ancient form of action some principle hitherto undetected, is really an appeal to this House in its legislative and not in its judicial capacity.

Apart from the question of civil liability for the death of a human being, there is another aspect of this case. Injury is the gist of any action of negligence—if the negligence does no damage no action lies. In the present case the sums claimed were paid to widows and other dependants of the drowned men under Admiralty Regulations (pars. 1974 A 1 and 2011 A), which expressly declare that these are compassionate payments, and granted of grace and not of right both in kind and in degree. True that in such cases they are always made, and most properly made, but none the less the money claimed was lost to the Exchequer directly because the Crown through its officers was pleased to pay it. The collision was the causa sine qua non; the consequent drowning of the men was the occasion of the bounty; but the causa causans of the payment was the voluntary act of the Crown. Had the present action been brought upon a contract it might well be the case that these payments would have been within the contemplation of the contracting parties, but they are not the natural consequences of the tort which is sued for. Nor would it have assisted the appellants' case if they could have established that the making of these compassionate allowances by the Crown was in the nature of a contractual obligation. In any case the contract would have been a contract with the deceased man, and the damages must be measured by the value of his services which were lost, not by the incidents of his remuneration under the terms of his contract of employment. Just as the damages recoverable by an injured man cannot be reduced by the fact that he has effected and recovered upon an accident policy (Bradburn v. Great Western Railway, 31 L. T. Rep. 464; L. Rep. 10 Ex. 1), and those recovered under Lord Campbell's Act are not affected by the fact that his life was insured, so conversely a master cannot count as part of his damage by the loss of his employee's service sums which he has to pay because his contract of employment binds him to pay wages to the servant while alive and a pension to his widow when he is dead. The appeal is enterprising and has been of considerable interest, but, I think, it fails.

THE CANTON. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE PROBATE, DIVORCE, AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (IN PRIZE), ENGLAND.

Prize Court—Requisition of goods by Crown—Order of Prize Court—Refusal of special leave to appeal—Reasons for withholding leave.

On the hearing of a petition presented by the claimant for special leave to appeal from an order of the President of the Prize Court in chambers refusing an adjournment and giving leave to requisition for the use of the Crown certain copper:

Held, that, as the goods were urgently required for the prosecution of the war and it was impossible to say that there was no reasonable cause for suspicion or that the goods ought to be released without further investigation, special leave would be refused, but, while so deciding, their Lordships desired to express no opinion as to whether the applicant could in the circumstances have appealed as of right.

Rule as explained in The Zamora (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 330; 114 L. T. Rep. 626; (1916) 2 A. C. 77) applied.

A PETITION was presented by Mr. Hugo Tillquist, a Swede by birth and a merchant of Stockholm, for special leave to appeal from orders made by the President of the Prize Court (Sir Samuel Evans) in chambers on the 2nd Nov. 1916, refusing an adjournment and giving leave to requisition about 150 tons of electrolytic copper on board the steamship Canton for the use of His Majesty. The copper was shipped at New York in the Canton for delivery at Stockholm to the petitioner, the claimant in the Prize Court, who had bought it from an American company in New York. The vessel left New York on the 16th Nov. 1914, and was brought into Kirkwall for search on the 2nd Dec. A writ in the Prize Court was issued on the 1st Jan. 1915 claiming condemnation of the copper as contraband of war or otherwise. The claimant lodged a formal claim to the copper, and in his affidavit in support deposed that the copper was for use in Sweden. No further steps had been taken on behalf of the Procurator-General to obtain an adjudication in the Prize Court. On the 1st Nov. the claimant's solicitors received a telephone message from the Procurator-General's office that a summons would be served asking for liberty to requisition the copper forthwith. The next morning the summons came before the President in chambers, and an application was made on behalf of the claimant for an adjournment in order that certain statements contained in an affidavit made by Mr. Greenwood of the Treasury Solicitor's department might be answered.

The President refused to adjourn the case.

Thereupon it was submitted on behalf of the claimant that on the evidence there was no real cause for investigation and trial, and that the circumstances were such as would justify an order directing the immediate release of the goods.

The President made the order as prayed, and refused leave to appeal and a stay of execution pending an appeal.

It was intimated that possession of the copper would be taken immediately on behalf of the Minister of Munitions.

The claimant now petitioned for special leave to appeal from the order of the President, and asked that if the goods had been removed from the custody of the Admiralty marshal an order for their immediate return to his custody. It appeared from an affidavit made by the petitioner that he had for more than twenty years carried on business at Stockholm as an agent for English, French, and German export firms in engines and materials for electrical installation, and had in that way been associated with many important Swedish firms. Before the copper was shipped he had made a declaration at the Swedish Foreign Office that the goods would be used for manufacturing in Sweden, and, on the express understanding that the copper should be so used in Sweden, it was insured. On the 11th March he sold two parcels which were on board the Canton and another ship to the Royal Telegraph Department of the State of Sweden, who required the copper for their own purposes in Sweden.

At the close of the arguments:

Lord PARKER OF WADDINGTON said that their Lordships would humbly advise His Majesty that the application for special leave under the prerogative to grant leave to appeal should be refused. The board would express no opinion whether the right of appeal lay or not. The reasons for their decision they proposed to put into writing. There would, of course, meantime be no stay.

The reasons for the report of the Lords of the Judicial Committee upon the petition were delivered by

Lord PARKER OF WADDINGTON.—This was an application by the owner of a parcel of copper ex the steamship Canton for special leave under the prerogative to appeal against an order of the President, whereby the Crown obtained leave to requisition it. The form of the application admitted that there was no appeal of right. Their Lordships refused to advise His Majesty to grant the application for the following reasons: The limits of the Crown's right to requisition goods the subject of proceedings for condemnation in prize were recently laid down by this board in the case of The Zamora (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 330; 114 L. T. Rep. 626; (1916) 2 A. C. 77). It was there decided that, in order to justify an exercise of the Crown's right, two conditions must be fulfilled. First, the goods in question must be urgently required for use in connection with the defence of the realm, the prosecution of the war, or other matters involving national security. Secondly, there must be a real question to be tried, so that it would be improper to order an immediate release. It was not disputed in the present case that the first condition was satisfied, but it was contended that there was no real case for investigation or trial, the facts being such that the goods ought to be immediately released. Their Lordships were of opinion that the question whether there be any case for investigation or trial is one which can be better determined by the judge before whom the proceedings are pending than by this board. They did not think they could advise an exercise of the prerogative unless they were of opinion that the judge had proceeded on wrong principles, or had come to a conclusion which was obviously erroneous. It appeared that the applicant was before the war an export agent for Swedish, English, French, and German firms engaged in the manufacture of engines and materials for electrical installations. He had at times sold copper to his Swedish principals, but had not theretofore been an importer of copper on his own account. He found that the business of the several firms for whom he acted as agent was adversely affected by the war, and he gives this as his reason (in their Lordships' opinion a somewhat doubtful reason) for himself commencing to import copper on a large scale. Copper was declared to be conditional contraband on the 21st Sept., and absolute contraband on the 29th Oct. 1914. The appellant purchased the copper in question in America in Oct. 1914. He insured it with German underwriters, among others, and procured it to be shipped on board the steamship Canton under bills of lading, by which it was made deliverable to the order of himself and his assigns at Stockholm, or as near thereto as the vessel might safely get, the vessel being at liberty to call at any other port. He thus retained a complete power of disposition over the goods. The copper was seized on behalf of His Majesty, and proceedings for condemnation were commenced on the 1st Jan. 1915. In March 1915 the applicant sold the copper to the telegraph department of the Swedish Government, delivery to be effected before the 1st July 1915. Nevertheless, he took no steps (as he might have done under Order V.) to accelerate the trial of the action or to obtain a release on the ground of failure to prosecute it, so as to enable him to perform his contract. On the contrary, their Lordships were informed by the Attorney-General, without contradiction, that he failed to comply with requests on the part of the Crown for disclosure of documents, and he still remains in close business communication with German firms. Under these circumstances, their Lordships found it impossible to say that there was no reasonable cause for suspicion, or that the goods ought to be released without further investigation.

It may be desirable to add that their Lordships expressed no opinion as to whether the applicant could, under the circumstances, have appealed as of right.

Prize Court—International law—Neutral vessels — Contraband goods — Freight — Claim by neutral shipowners.

By international law the owners of neutral ships are not entitled to any freight in respect of the carriage of contraband goods, except as a matter of grace or as a matter of discretion.

THIS was a case in which claims were put forward by the owners and charterers of the four vessels above named in respect of freight, expenses, and damages.

A German steamer, Neuenfels, sailed from Moulmein, in Burmah, laden with a cargo of rice for consignees in Germany and Austria, before the outbreak of hostilities in Aug. 1914. Upon hearing of the existence of a state of war, the master of the Neuenfels took refuge in the port of Vigo, in Spain, where the vessel remained. In Feb. 1915 the four vessels above named were chartered by Mr. Tycho Roberg, of Gothenburg, in Sweden. The first two vessels, the Jeanne and the Vera, were owned by the Dampskibsselskab Heimdal, of Copenhagen, in Denmark; the Albania was owned by the Förnyade Angfartyge Aktiebolaget Svenska Lloyd, of Gothenburg, in Sweden; and the last-named company were also the charterers of the Forsvik. The rice was then transferred from the Neuenfels to these four vessels, and the bills of lading made the rice deliverable at Gothenburg to Mr. Tycho Roberg or his assigns, the shipper being stated to be a merchant of Vigo. In the course of their voyage from Vigo the four vessels were captured and their cargoes were seized as prize, the same being afterwards sold and the proceeds condemned, but the ships were allowed to continue their voyages.

On behalf of the shipowners and charterers it was argued that freight, &c., was payable unless it was proved that they were aware of the ultimate destination of the contraband cargo which they were carrying, whilst on behalf of the Crown it was contended that no freight is ever due, whether owners or charterers do or do not know of the destination.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 6, 1916. — The PRESIDENT.—In these cases the shipowners put forward claims for freight in respect of contraband goods carried on the respective neutral vessels. The facts have been very fully laid before the court, and counsel on both sides have dealt most exhaustively with the law affecting the subject. The whole point which I have to decide is whether freight ought to be paid under the circumstances, and the argument on behalf of the neutral shipowners is that it is payable unless it is shown that the shipowners had knowledge of the contraband nature of the goods.

In my opinion it is quite clear from all the authorities and from the text-books that freight is never paid to neutrals in respect of the carriage of contraband goods, except as a matter of grace or as a matter of discretion. In the American case of The Commercen (ubi sup) Mr. Wheaton, in his headnote of that case, says, "Freight is never due to the neutral carrier of contraband"; and in his note at p. 394 he says, "Freight and expenses are almost always refused by the British Prize Courts to a carrier of contraband. There is but one case in the books of an exception to this rule, which was of sailcloth carried to Amsterdam, the contraband being in a small quantity amongst a variety of other articles." That was the case of The Neptunus (ubi sup.).

Later on, in America, the point was definitely and specifically decided in the case of The Peterhoff (ubi sup.), where freight was refused although knowledge was negatived. It is clear also, from the deliberations of the representatives of the various Powers at the International Naval Conference held in London, that it was assumed that freight was never payable in respect of contraband. This being the rule, and I have not been able to find that it has ever been doubted, it is unnecessary for me to waste any time in stating the facts of this case. It must not be assumed, however, in the present instance that I find that the shipowners were unaware of the property in and the destination of the contraband cargo which they were carrying.

The claims are disallowed with costs.

THE UNITED STATES. (a)

Prize Court — International law — Reprisals — Goods of enemy origin — Ownership — Transfer to neutrals—Passing of property in goods during continuance of war—Goods dispatched by parcel post — Seizure on neutral vessel — Detention — Order in Council of the 11*th March* 1915 — Reprisals Order, art. 4.

Where goods are sent from a belligerent country to a neutral country during the progress of the war, or vice versâ, they are to be regarded, as far as the rights of a belligerent captor are concerned, as enemy property so long as they are in transit. It is immaterial what are the terms of the contract between the vendor and the purchaser as to the passing of the property in the goods, and it makes no difference in the general principle of international law that there is a transit by land through a neutral country at one end or other of the journey.

A number of firms in America ordered goods from various firms in Austria and Germany. Some of the goods were ordered before the outbreak of war, and some after hostilities had commenced. A certain portion of the goods had also been paid for before the war. Towards the end of 1915 a number of packages was sent from Germany and Austria to America via Copenhagen, the same being forwarded by parcel post on board a Danish vessel. By virtue of the provisions of the Reprisals Order in Council of the 11*th March* 1915, the vessel was diverted on its journey to a British port, where the parcel packets were seized and the goods detained as being of enemy origin and enemy character.

Held, that the goods were of enemy origin and enemy character, and that an order for their detention—or the proceeds of the goods if sold—until the conclusion of peace must be made.

THIS was a case in which the Procurator-General, on behalf of the Crown, claimed the detention and (or) sale of 1724 parcels of various kinds of goods seized from the parcels mail of the Danish steamship United States, whilst on a voyage from Copenhagen to New York. The United States left Copenhagen on the 30th Dec. 1915 and was diverted to Kirkwall, where the packages in question were seized on the 20th Jan. 1916. The claim of the Crown was made under art. 4 of the Reprisals Order in Council dated the 11th March 1915.

There were numerous claimants to the goods, but the nature of the claim put forward was practically the same in each case, and therefore that of the American Bead Company, Inc, was taken as typical of the whole. The grounds of the claim of the American Bead Company were as follows: (1) The goods were ordered and purchased from various manufacturers in Germany and Austria by the claimant corporation, which was organised and carried on business in New York, under and by virtue of the laws of the State of New York, in the United States of America, or by and through their commission agents, Carl Pollak, of Gablonz, Austria, and Leonard Kaiser, of Lauscha, Germany, and were at all material times the property of the said corporation.

(a) Reported by J. A. SLATER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

(2) The goods were ordered by the claimants on various dates between the 4th April and the 18th Dec. 1914. (3) By the terms of purchase and by the course of business between the parties the said goods were at the risk of the claimant corporation, and became its property on dispatch from the several factories in Germany and Austria. (4) Postal correspondence of neutrals and belligerents is not, or was not, at any time material to these proceedings within the provisions of the Order in Council of the 11th March 1915, and is and was inviolable. Alternatively no effective intimation had been given by the British Government that postal correspondence would be treated as coming within the provisions of the Order in Council.

There was no question raised as to the enemy origin of the goods, and the whole matter at issue turned upon the point as to whether they were, considering the various facts of the case, of enemy character, seeing that they had been ordered in some instances before the outbreak of war, that some of them had been paid for, and that by the terms of the contract the property passed to the claimants when they left Germany. On behalf of the Crown it was contended that the property in the goods in cases of this kind only passed to the consignee when the goods actually reached him, and that the sending of them from the port of a neutral country was an attempt to evade the provisions of the Order in Council.

By the Order in Council framing reprisals for restricting further the commerce of Germany, dated the 11th March 1916, it is enacted (inter alia) :—

Whereas the German Government has issued certain orders which, in violation of the usages of war, purport to declare the waters surrounding the United Kingdom a military area, in which all British and allied merchant vessels will be destroyed irrespective of the safety of the lives of passengers and crew, and in which neutral shipping will be exposed to similar danger in view of the uncertainties of naval warfare; and whereas in a memorandum accompanying the said orders neutrals are warned against intrusting crews, passengers, or goods to British or allied ships; and whereas such attempts on the part of the enemy give to His Majesty an unquestionable right of retaliation; and whereas His Majesty has therefore decided to adopt further measures in order to prevent commodities of any kind from reaching or leaving Germany, though such measures will be enforced without risk to neutral ships or to neutral or noncombatant life, and in strict observance of the dictates of humanity ; and whereas the allies of His Majesty are associated with him in the steps now to be announced for restricting the commerce of Germany ; His Majesty is therefore pleased, by and with the advice of his Privy Council, to order, and it is hereby ordered, as follows : . . .

IV. Every merchant vessel which sailed from a port other than a German port after the 1st March 1915, having on board goods which are of enemy origin or are enemy property, may be required to discharge such goods in a British or allied port. Goods so discharged in a British port shall be placed in the custody of the marshal of the Prize Court, and if not requisitioned for the use of His Majesty, shall be detained or sold under the direction of the Prize Court. The proceeds of goods so sold shall be paid into court and dealt with in such manner as the court may in the circumstances deem to be just. Provided that no proceeds of the sale of such goods shall be paid out of court until the conclusion of peace except on the application of the proper officer of the Crown, unless it be shown that the goods had become neutral property before the issue of this order. Provided also that nothing herein shall prevent the release of neutral property of enemy origin on the application of the proper officer of the Crown.

The Attorney-General (Sir F. E. Smith, K.C.), the Solicitor-General (Sir George Cave, K.C.), and R. A. Wright for the Procurator-General.

Bateson, K.C. and L. C. Thomas for the claimant, the American Bead Company.

L. C. Thomas for the other claimants.

The arguments in the case are sufficiently indicated in the judgment. Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 18, 1916.—The PRESIDENT.—The Crown claims an order for the detention or sale of certain goods seized on a voyage from Copenhagen to the United States on the double ground (a) that the goods were of enemy origin, and (b) that they were enemy property. The application is made under art. 4 of the Reprisals Order in Council of the 11th March 1915.

It is not disputed that the goods were of enemy origin. But the claimants contended that they were neutral property, on the ground that before seizure the property had passed from the respective vendors in Germany to the respective purchasers in America.

The goods were dispatched by the parcel mail on the United States, a Danish vessel. They were goods of multifarious kinds, and not such as would be sent by mail in times of peace. It is well known in this court that since the war the mails have been used for the clandestine transmission of contraband and other goods and merchandise from foreign countries to Germany and of goods and merchandise of various kinds from Germany to foreign countries.

The goods in the present case comprised such things as metal chains and bags, glass beads, cotton goods, skins, gloves, and musical instruments. The descriptions appear in the manifest. Short particulars of the goods claimed are as follows:—

Claimants.	No. of separate parcels.	Invoice value in marks.
American Bead Company, Inc.	129	15,622
C. Bruno and Co., Inc.	106	5,201

The goods had been ordered before the date of the Reprisals Order in Council, and in some cases payment had been made before that date. The goods had to be manufactured.

The contentions of the claimants were that the goods became their properties when they left the various factories in Germany. They left the factories in every case after the Reprisals Order in Council was made.

The question for decision is whether they were "enemy property" for the purpose of that order. Putting it in another form, had the goods in the circumstances lost their enemy character and acquired a neutral character before the seizure?

The Reprisals Order in Council deals with maritime commerce between belligerents (and of necessary consequence with that commerce in relation to neutrals also) in a state of war.

As I have pointed out before, it does not add to the articles which are confiscable and subject to condemnation as maritime prize of war. In that respect it deals more tenderly and generously with neutral commerce than was done under the old and existing law of strict blockade. Under the latter ships and cargoes were condemned out and out as prize on breach or attempted breach of blockade. Under the Reprisals Order in Council the ships are released and the cargoes or their proceeds, if a sale is ordered, are only detained until the conclusion of peace.

But, although there is this important distinction between the results of the working of the reprisals order and of the strict application of the law of blockade, it is obvious that the order deals with maritime commerce during war upon the analogy of the law of prize. Indeed, it is under the international law of prize that the order, as one of reprisal, derives its validity.

It is essential, therefore, to see how the question of the passing of property was regarded by the international law of prize.

The passing of property shipped on the seas during war is regarded by international law from a wholly different standpoint from that adopted by that law or by the municipal law in time of peace. In the case of The Southfield (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 150; 113 L. T. Rep. 655) this subject has already been dealt with in this court. I there cited passages from Story, J.'s work and from the judgment of Lord Stowell in The Vrow Margaretha (Roscoe's English Prize Cases, vol. 1, 149; 1 Ch. Rob. 336) and of Lord Kingsdown in The Baltica (Roscoe, vol. 2, 628; 11 Moo. P. C. 141), so that their repetition is not necessary.

Stating the rule quite shortly, it is this: Where goods are sent by sea, captors' rights cannot be defeated by a mere transfer of legal ownership, by documents, without actual delivery of the goods themselves; such rights cannot be defeated unless and until the actual possession of the goods, as well as the property in them, has been changed before the seizure.

Such transfers have been described as transfers in transitu. This does not mean transfers made only while the goods are on the seas, between the shipment and the delivery. I take some concrete cases. If goods of a contraband nature had been bought by the enemy in America before shipment at New York, in circumstances where the legal ownership would remain in a neutral vendor according to the law in times of peace, they could still be captured on the voyage to Germany to the enemy purchaser, on the ground that they would be his on delivery, on whatever vessel, neutral or otherwise, they might be carried. So if goods of any kind so bought were shipped on an enemy vessel, or on a British or allied ship, they would be capturable. It would be no answer to say that the matter had been so arranged that by municipal law the property would not pass until the goods had safely reached the hands of the enemy. The goods would be regarded in such cases as enemy property.

So in regard to goods shipped from the enemy country; if purchased by neutrals during a state of war the contract is held invalid, and the property is deemed to continue as it was at the time of shipment until the actual delivery: (see Story's Notes on the Principles and Practice of Prize Courts, p. 64.)

Having regard to the doctrine of continuous voyage, it makes no material difference that at the one end or the other there is a transit by land. And just as goods from New York to Germany intended to be delivered to the enemy are regarded as "enemy property," so goods from Germany to New York are also regarded as "enemy property," quâ the rights of the captors. The same principles must be applied whether the goods are being carried from east to west, or from west to east. To hold otherwise would be to encourage colourable transactions set up for the purpose of misleading and defrauding captors: (see The Baltica, ubi sup.).

Upon this analogy I hold that "enemy property" in the Reprisals Order in Council was intended to mean, and does mean, property which is to be regarded as of "enemy character" in time of war. This view seems to me to be in accordance with the proviso to art. 4 of the order, which refers to goods which had become neutral property before the order was promulgated. To hold otherwise would make all the provisions of the order as to "enemy property" nugatory; because in order to defeat them all that would be necessary would be that an enemy and his sympathetic neutral should take such steps as would make all goods shipped to and from Germany in theory and on paper the property of the neutral in the strictly legal sense during the whole of the transit.

For the reasons given I decide that the goods were enemy property as well as of enemy origin; and I order their detention until the conclusion of peace, with liberty to the Crown to apply for an order for their sale and detention of the proceeds.

Prize Court — International law — Reprisals — German Government bonds — Seizure in mails on board neutral ship — "Goods" or "commodities" — Meaning of terms — Order in Council of the 11*th March* 1915 — Reprisals Order, art. 4.

Certain German Government bonds sent by a banking company in Berlin to a firm in Copenhagen were forwarded by registered post by the Copenhagen firm to a bank in Chicago on a Danish ship bound from that port to the United States. The vessel was, during its voyage, ordered to proceed to a British port, where the mail was overhauled and the bonds seized under the Reprisals Order in Council of the 11*th March* 1915.

Held, that the bonds were "goods" or "commodities" and liable to detention under the order, as being of enemy origin, until the conclusion of peace, when they would be dealt with as the court might direct.

THIS was a case in which the Procurator-General, on behalf of the Crown, claimed the detention and (or) sale of thirty German Government bonds under the Reprisals Order in Council dated the 11th March 1915.

The writ in the case was issued on the 15th June 1916, and asked for "an order for the detention and for the sale of the goods and commodities as being of enemy origin and (or) enemy property or otherwise."

From an affidavit of Mr. Hans Mittelhauser, the Vice-President of the State Commercial and Savings Bank, Chicago, it appeared that on the 25th Feb. 1916 the bank remitted 30,000 marks by cable through Messrs. Goldman, Sachs, and Co., of New York, to the Direktion der Disconto Gesellschaft, Berlin, for the purchase of Deutsche Reichsanleiha (German Government bonds), and that on the 14th March 1916 the Disconto Gesellschaft sent the securities in question to the firm of Messrs. Beckmann and Jorgensen, Copenhagen, to be forwarded by them to the State Commercial and Savings Bank, Chicago. The securities in question consisted of ten German Government 1908 4 per cent. bonds of 1000 marks each and twenty German Government 1914 5 per cent. bonds of 1000 marks each. They were forwarded by registered letter by Messrs. Beckmann and Jorgensen to the State Commercial and Savings Bank, Chicago. The bonds were contained in a letter which was on board the Frederik VIII., a Danish steamship which sailed from Copenhagen for the United States about the end of March 1916. A few days later the vessel was ordered to put in at Kirkwall, and the mail letters were ordered to be discharged under the Reprisals Order of the 11th March 1915. The mail letter containing the bonds was examined, and on the 11th May 1916 the bonds were seized as prize to the use of His Majesty.

There was no appearance or claim entered with respect to the bonds.

The Attorney-General (Sir F. E. Smith, K.C.) and R. A. Wright for the Procurator-General.—There is no appearance before the court on the part of any claimant, and it is difficult to see how there could be any claim. The point raised was whether the bonds seized were "goods" or "commodities" within the meaning of the Order in Council of the 11th March 1915. Although the point was of a novel character, it created no difficulty. The nature of the documents, such as those which were now in question, had been the subject of discussion in the Court of Appeal in the case of Embiricos v. Anglo-Australian Bank (92 L. T. Rep. 305; (1905) 1 K. B. 677), and the judgments then delivered were in favour of the contention of the Crown. They referred to

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 18, 1916.—The PRESIDENT.—The question of law that is raised in this case is whether bonds of the German Government are comprised in the words "goods" or "commodities" within the meaning and operation of the Reprisals Order in Council of the 11th March 1915.

German Government bonds of the nominal value of 30,000 marks were sent by the Direktion der Disconto Gesellschaft, of Berlin, to the firm of Messrs. Beckmann and Jorgensen, of Copenhagen, for transmission to the State Commercial and Savings Bank, of Chicago. They were shipped on the steamship Frederik VIII. on the 30th March 1916. A few days afterwards they were required to be discharged under the said Reprisals Order in Council. The present application by the Crown is for an order for their detention as goods of enemy origin and (or) enemy property. No claimant has appeared. But an affidavit was made on behalf of the American bank and submitted to the Procurator-General. No order for their detention can be made unless the bonds come within the description "commodities" or "goods." The Order in Council deals with matters analogous to maritime prize, though it refrains from subjecting the goods to confiscation.

In prize the bonds and their accompanying coupons would be goods subject to seizure and confiscation as realisable securities, negotiable instruments, or choses in action, if they were enemy property on an enemy, British, or allied vessel. Story says that the ordinary prize jurisdiction of the Admiralty extends to all captures made on the sea, "whether the property so captured be goods, ships, or mere choses in action": (see Story's Notes on the Principles and Practice of Prize Courts, p. 28). It may be observed that for the purposes of the Naval Prize Act 1864 the term "goods" includes "all such things as are by the course of Admiralty and law of nations the subject of adjudication as prize" (sect. 2).

Primâ facie, if bonds were "goods" capturable as prize, one would expect them also to be included within an Order in Council for reprisal. Various interpretations have been given to the word in cases relating to wills, contracts, and legal documents of many kinds, and to Acts of Parliament dealing with various subjects. But it would serve no good purpose to cite or to discuss such cases. The question is whether the securities are "goods" or "commodities" under the Order in Council referred to.

The reasons for the Order in Council, which was due to the enemy's method of maritime warfare, and its recitals are well known. The object is stated to be the further restriction of the commerce of Germany, and it is stated in a recital as follows: "And whereas His Majesty has therefore decided to adopt further measures in order to prevent commodities of any kind from reaching or leaving Germany, though such measures will be enforced without risk to neutral ships, or to neutral or non-combatant life, and in strict observance of the dictates of humanity." The word "commodity" is one of extensive meaning, denoting anything that is useful, convenient, or serviceable. And it would not be easy to conceive a wider or more comprehensive phrase than "commodities of any kind." It is a phrase more used in common speech than in legal terminology; so it is not surprising that in the operative part of the Order in Council the legal words "goods" and "property" are used simply, without the colloca-tion of any such words as "chattels, wares, or merchandise."

I think that it is abundantly clear that the bonds in question come within those words. If money, notes, or cheques were shipped from America to Germany for the purchase of these bonds they would clearly be goods or property with an enemy destination, and equally so are the bonds sent in return goods or property of enemy origin.

It may also be mentioned that in the proclamation of the 14th April 1916 "gold, silver, paper money, and all negotiable instruments and realisable securities" are treated as articles of absolute contraband capturable and confiscable as prize.

There being no claimant before the court, I give no decision upon the question as to whether the bonds were enemy property. But as being goods of enemy origin I order their detention until the conclusion of peace, to be then dealt with as the court may order.

By the combined effect of sect. 42 of the Naval Prize Act 1864 (27 & 28 Vict. c. 25) and the Order in Council dated the 2*nd March* 1915, a prize bounty is payable amongst such of the officers and men of His Majesty's warships as are actually present at the taking or destroying of any of the armed vessels of the enemy, calculated at the rate of 5*l. for each person on board the enemy's ships at the beginning of the engagement.*

It is a question of fact to be decided by the court whether a warship was or was not "actually present" at the taking or destroying of an armed ship, or of armed ships, of the enemy. Upon a finding by the court that H.M.S. Canopus did not in any sense take part in the chase of the enemy or in the subsequent naval engagement of the Falkland Islands, that she was detached for other duties outside the engagement, and that she was not present in any sense when the enemy ships were destroyed:

THIS was a motion on behalf of the commander, officers, and crew of H.M.S. Canopus, who claimed that they were entitled to a share in the sum of 12,160*l.* awarded as prize bounty to the officers and crews of the squadron of Vice-Admiral Sturdee —the said squadron consisting of H.M. Ships Invincible, Inflexible, Cornwall, Carnarvon, Kent, and Glasgow—for the destruction of the four German warships, Scharnhorst, Gneisenau, Leipzig, and Nürnberg, in the battle of the Falkland Islands, on the 8th Dec. 1914.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 21, 1916.—The PRESIDENT.—This is an application by the commander, officers, and ship's company of His Majesty's ship Canopus claiming to share the prize bounty of 12,160*l.*, which I awarded in August last to the squadron of Vice-Admiral Sir Frederick Sturdee in respect of the destruction of the German warships Scharnhorst, Gneisenau, Leipzig, and Nürnberg in the naval battle off the Falkland Islands in December 1914.

The enactment now in force regulating the grant of prize bounty is sect. 42 of the Naval Prize Act 1864. The section is as follows:

> If in relation to any war Her Majesty is pleased to declare by Proclamation or Order in Council Her intention to grant prize bounty to the officers and crews of Her ships of war, then such of the officers and crew of any of Her Majesty's ships of war as are actually present at the taking or destroying of any armed ship or of any of Her Majesty's enemies shall be entitled to have distributed among them as prize bounty a sum calculated at the rate of five pounds for each person on board the enemy's ship at the beginning of the engagement.

The test to be applied to the present claim is, accordingly, whether the commander, officers, and crew of His Majesty's ship Canopus were actually present at the destruction of the aforesaid four German warships.

It is well to advert to the nature of prize bounty, or head-money as it was called in former times. It had no necessary connection with the capture or joint capture of prize of war. It is "the peculiar and appropriate reward of immediate personal exertion," and was originally "to be paid only to the actual captor": (see La Gloire, Edw. 280). It was established "expressly for the purpose of exciting personal enterprise, and of counterbalancing present danger, by peculiar and appropriate rewards": (see note to case of L'Alerte, 6 Ch. Rob., 238).

In order to determine whether the officers and crew of the Canopus can be considered to have been actually present at the destruction of the German ships, it is necessary to examine the facts closely,

The naval battle of the Falkland Islands took place on the afternoon of the 8th Dec. 1914. The facts are set out in Vice-Admiral Sturdee's dispatch of the 19th Dec. 1914. He does not include the Canopus among his squadron, which arrived at Port Stanley (Falkland Islands) on the morning of the 7th Dec. 1914, ready to resume a search for the enemy's squadron on the next day The Canopus had been at the port since the 12th Nov. 1914, She had been ordered there by the Admiralty to arrange the defence of the port against attack by the enemy. The work of defending the harbour and possible landing places in the vicinity was at once commenced under the direction of the commander, Captain (now Rear-Admiral) Heathcote Grant. It comprised the landing of the ten 12-pounder guns from the Canopus, the construction of shore batteries and of mines at the entrance, the erection of look-out stations, the establishment of an examination service of vessels entering or leaving the harbour, and the censoring of correspondence.

Ultimately the Canopus was grounded in a position to obtain an all-round fire to seaward, and to protect the harbour and the town of Stanley from bombardment from seaward. Her double bottoms were flooded to keep her steady, and she was secured with anchors out ahead and astern. For some time before the squadron arrived she was firmly embedded in the bottom. Rear-Admiral Grant had no information as to the concentration of Vice-Admiral Sturdee's squadron before its arrival on the morning of the 7th Dec. 1914. After his arrival Vice-Admiral Sturdee expressed himself satisfied with the arrangements which had been made for the defence of the port, and appointed Rear-Admiral Grant as senior officer of the Falklands, in charge of the defences, berthing of auxiliaries, and provisioning of the squadron.

During the afternoon of the 7th Dec., a meeting of the commanding officers of the vessels of the squadron was held aboard the flagship, at which the commander of the Canopus was present. In the words of the latter: "The decision arrived at included the Canopus remaining at Port Stanley in order to defend the same during the absence of the fleet."

On the next morning some enemy ships were sighted and duly reported from the signal station to the flagship of the squadron. At 9.20 a.m. the armoured cruisers Gneisenau and Nürnberg came within range of the Canopus, with guns trained on the wireless station inland. The Canopus opened fire at them across the lowland at a range of 11,000 yards. Two salvoes were fired. The two cruisers at once hoisted their colours and steamed away. A ricochet from the second salvo was thought to have hit, and probably did hit, the Gneisenau. At 9.45 a.m. the squadron, which had been lying in harbour, weighed and proceeded out to sea. At 10.20 the signal for a general chase was made. At 12.47 the signal to "open fire and engage the enemy" was given. The range was from 15,000 to 16,500 yards.

Details of the action are described in Vice-Admiral Sturdee's dispatch. It is enough here to say that in the main action the Scharnhorst was sunk at 4.17 p.m., the Gneisenau turned on her beam ends and sank at six o'clock, and in the action with the light cruisers the Nürnberg sank at 7.27 and the Leipzig turned over and disappeared at nine o'clock that night. Vice-Admiral Sturdee returned to Port Stanley on the 11th Dec. It is gratifying to mention that he expressed his thanks to Rear-Admiral Grant for the work done by the Canopus, and also expressed his appreciation to the ship's company later.

The Canopus did not, and could not, join in the chase. Her speed was much less than the slowest of the squadron. If she had been ordered to do so, she could not have put out to sea from the position where she was fixed till about four o'clock in the afternoon. Meanwhile the naval action was at its height over 100 miles away, and the first armoured cruiser was being destroyed about that time, while the Canopus remained at her post of duty near the harbour.

Upon these facts Rear-Admiral Grant, on behalf of his ship's officers and crew, claimed to participate in the prize bounty on the grounds: (a) That His Majesty's ship Canopus had made Port Stanley a defended port, and held it until the arrival of the squadron. (b) That by her gunfire she drove off the Gneisenau and Nürnberg, and prevented them from making a reconnaissance of the superior strength of the British squadron in the port. (c) That the defence of the port allowed of the safe coaling and revictualling of the squadron on the 7th and 8th Dec. (d) That the look-out stations and communications established by the Canopus were the means of giving the squadron sufficient warning to raise steam, cast off colliers, and leave in pursuit to catch the enemy. (e) That probably the ricochet shot from the Canopus struck the base of the after funnel of the Gneisenau and killed five of her men.

I believe that Rear-Admiral Grant was actuated by motives of the best kind towards his officers and men in making this application to the court that his ship should share in the prize bounty. It is only right also that this court should testify, and testify gratefully, to the good work done by the Rear-Admiral and his ship from the 12th Nov. up to and including the 8th Dec. They know that they have the gratitude of their country, and must feel the satisfaction themselves which comes from the sense of a good and faithful performance of serious duties.

But upon an application of this kind this court has also its duty to carry out in accordance with the law which prescribes it. I am not left without the guidance of precedents well established long ago. There is no real difference as to prize bounty between the provisions of the Naval Prize Act of 1864 and the former Act of 1805, which enacted that it should be paid to persons "who shall have been actually on board any of His Majesty's ships at the actual taking, sinking, burning, or otherwise destroying any enemy ship of war." Such cases as l'Hercule, decided by the Lords of Appeal in Prize in 1799, and cited in the case of l'Alerte (ubi sup.), decided by Lord Stowell in 1806; La Gloire (ubi sup.), in 1810; and La Melanie (Roscoe, vol. 2, 217; 2 Dods. 122) state the principles upon which this court should act and illustrate their application.

In my opinion the Canopus did not form a part of the squadron; did not in any sense join in the chase or take part in the naval engagement; was detached for other duties outside the engagement; and her commander, officers, and crew were not actually present at the destruction of the four enemy ships, in any sense within the meaning or intent of the enactment referred to.

Accordingly my decision must be that they are not entitled to share in the distribution of the prize bounty allotted, and the application is dismissed.

As the motion has been, in my opinion, properly brought, and has raised an important and new point as far as the present case is concerned, there will be no order as to costs.

THE HYPATIA. (a)

Prize Court—International law—Domicil—Commercial domicil—Partnership firm in neutral country—Members of partnership enemy subjects—No partner resident in neutral country—Property in goods shipped by firm in neutral country—Passing of property—Seizure—Condemnation as enemy property.

In order that a person may acquire a commercial domicil in any country, residence in that country is an essential condition of the acquisition of such domicil. Even a subject of a belligerent country may acquire a commercial domicil so as to protect his property at sea during a state of war if he fulfils the above necessary condition. If, however, he is not resident in the neutral country, though he carries on business there through agents, any goods which are his property and are being carried in a British ship during the progress of hostilities are liable to condemnation.

A partnership firm which carried on business in A., a neutral country, was composed exclusively of persons of German nationality. None of the members resided in A., and the business was carried on by agents. The firm consigned certain goods to a German house before the outbreak of war on a British ship. During the voyage, and after the declaration of war, the vessel was diverted to an English port and the goods were seized as enemy property. On an application being made by the Crown for their condemnation as prize, the consignors put in a claim on the ground that the goods were the property of a firm which had a commercial domicil in a neutral country, and were therefore not liable to be confiscated.

Held, that, as all the partners of the firm were enemy subjects, and as none of the partners resided in the neutral country so as to possess a commercial domicil, the goods were enemy property and must be condemned as such.

THIS was a case in which the Procurator-General, on behalf of the Crown, claimed the condemnation of certain bales of wool which were seized on board the British ship Hypatia, which sailed for Buenos Ayres in July 1914, about a month before the declaration of war between Great Britain and Germany.

The wool was shipped by a firm named H. Fuhrmann and Co., who carried on business in Buenos Ayres, and was consigned to a company carrying on business in Germany. The firm of Fuhrmann was composed of four persons, all of whom were German subjects. None of them resided in Argentina, and the only active member who had ever resided in Buenos Ayres had left that city for Europe in 1910. The South American business was transacted entirely by agents and clerks. After the outbreak of war the Hypatia was diverted to Liverpool whilst on her voyage, and the wool was seized as prize. The consignors then put in a claim, on the ground that as the wool was the property of a firm which had a commercial domicil in a neutral country, it had a neutral character and was not liable to condemnation.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 21, 1916.—The PRESIDENT.—The subject-matter of this claim is a consignment of 100 bales of wool shipped from Buenos Ayres to Hamburg upon a British vessel before the outbreak of war. The wool was shipped under a bill of lading to the order of the shippers, for delivery at Hamburg. The shippers were a partnership of Messrs. H. Fuhrmann and Co., of Buenos Ayres. They had contracted to sell the wool to a German company, the Spinnerei Cossmannsdorf G.m.b.H. Payment was to be made by drafts on the Dresden Bank, of Dresden, on account of the purchasers. The transaction was to be carried through on behalf of the shippers by a firm of Messrs Fuhrmann and Co., of Antwerp.

The goods were seized at Liverpool on the 14th Aug. 1914. The writ was issued on the 5th Sept. 1914. Appearances were entered at first by Messrs. Fuhrmann and Co., afterwards by Messrs. H. Fuhrmann and Co., and lastly by the liquidators of Messrs. H. Fuhrmann and Co. The claimants were Messrs. H. Fuhrmann and Co., of Buenos Ayres, the vendors and shippers. They claimed the goods as neutrals on the ground that the property had not passed from them to the German buyers.

After an investigation of the facts, I find, upon the principles adopted in The Miramichi (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 21; 112 L. T. Rep. 349; (1915) P. 71) that at the time of the capture the property in the goods was in Messrs. H. Fuhrmann and Co., of Buenos Ayres.

The remaining question is whether, according to the principles of international law, that firm is entitled to the release of the goods. The dramatis personæ are four persons, all German subjects. Between them they constituted at all material times three firms—one in Antwerp, another in Buenos Ayres, and the third in Berlin. The four persons are Mr. Peter Fuhrmann, Mrs. Laura Fuhrmann (widow of Mr. Johann Daniel Fuhrmann, deceased), Mr. Heinrich Fuhrmann, and Mr. Richard Fuhrmann. The Antwerp firm was simply called Messrs. Fuhrmann and Co. It consisted of Peter, Heinrich, and Richard (the active partners), and Laura (a sleeping partner). The Buenos Ayres firm was called Messrs. H. Fuhrmann and Co. It consisted of Heinrich (the active partner), and Peter and Laura (sleeping partners). The Berlin firm was called Messrs. Richard Fuhrmann and Co. It consisted of Richard (the active partner), and Peter and Laura (sleeping partners).

The claimants (the Buenos Ayres firm) contended that they had a neutral domicil, either Argentine or Belgian. As members of the firm at Buenos Ayres they claimed a commercial domicil; and as residents in or about Antwerp they claimed an acquired domicil in Belgium. As to the latter claim, I find that it is clear from the evidence that they never acquired a Belgian domicil, and never abandoned their German nationality. It is possible that they would be entitled to be regarded as having a commercial domicil in Belgium quâ their Antwerp house of trade, while they resided there; but the transaction in question was not the business of that house, and the Antwerp firm made no claim to the goods.

Not one of the partners of the firm of Messrs. H. Fuhrmann and Co. resided at Buenos Ayres, or in any part of the Argentine Republic. At the beginning of the war they were all expelled from Belgium as subjects of Germany, and as enemies of Belgium. It was admitted by counsel for the claimants that probably Heinrich and Laura were expelled before the seizure of the goods. Peter may have been arrested and expelled later. I do not think, however, that that matters.

Heinrich shortly after his expulsion was in Dusseldorf. He was in bad health, and died in Germany in July 1915. He never ceased to be a German subject. Mrs. Laura Fuhrmann was the mother of Heinrich. She accompanied him to Germany. She was also a sleeping partner in the firm of Messrs. Richard Fuhrmann and Co., of Berlin. She swore her affidavit in support of the claim in Germany. She has never ceased to be a German subject. Peter served with the Prussian Army in the Franco-Prussian War. While he was in Antwerp he was one of the heads of the German colony there, and he has contributed to the German war loan. He was also arrested, imprisoned, and afterwards expelled by the Belgian authorities; and he subsequently returned to Antwerp after the occupation by the Germans. He is also a sleeping partner in the firm of Messrs. Richard Fuhrmann & Co., of Berlin, and he has never ceased to be a German subject.

The three partners in the claimants' firm being Germans, the question arises whether they in fact or in law acquired a commercial domicil in the Argentine Republic. It is well known that according to the English and American views of international law (although not according to the French or German or general European view) a subject of a belligerent State can have a commercial domicil in a neutral State, which would protect his property from capture at sea. But I think that residence in a neutral State is an essential condition of such a domicil. I know of no case where, merely by reason of carrying on business through agents or clerks in a neutral State, subjects of an enemy can acquire a commercial domicil without residence in that State.

In his celebrated judgment in The Indian Chief (Roscoe's English Prize Cases, vol. 1, 251; 3 Ch. Rob. 12) Lord Stowell said of Mr. Johnson, the American Consul: "He came to this country in 1783, and engaged in trade, and has resided in this country till 1797; during that time he was undoubtedly to be considered as an English trader, for no position is more established than this, that if a person goes into another country and engages in trade, and resides there, he is, by the law of nations, to be considered as a merchant of that country."

In the case of The Venus (8 Cranch, 253), where the Supreme Court of the United States discussed questions of commercial domicil so fully, it will be seen that throughout the judgments residence was regarded as an essential ingredient. On this question Chancellor Kent says: "If a person resides in a belligerent country his property is liable to capture as enemy's property; and if he resides in a neutral country he enjoys all the privileges, and is subject to all the inconveniences, of the neutral trade": (see Kent's Commentaries, vol. 1, 103).

Mr. Dicey also, in his Conflict of Laws, at p. 742, deals with the matter thus:—"A commercial domicil, on the other hand, is such a residence in a country for the purpose of trading there as makes the person's trade or business contribute to or form part of the resources of such country, and renders it, therefore, reasonable that his hostile, friendly, or neutral character should be determined by reference to the character of such country. When a person's civil domicil is in question, the matter to be determined is whether he has or has not so settled in a given country so as to make it his home. When a person's commercial domicil is in question, the matter to be determined is whether he is or is not residing in a given country with the intention of continuing to trade there."

It is sometimes said that Lord Stowell in The Jonge Klassina (Roscoe, vol. 1, 485; 5 Ch. Rob. 297) expressed the opinion that a man may acquire a commercial domicil in more countries than one. The passage referred to is as follows: "A man may have mercantile concerns in two countries, and if he acts as a merchant of both he must be liable to be considered as a subject of both with regard to the transactions originating respectively in those countries. That he has no fixed compting house in the enemy's country will not be decisive. How much of the great mercantile concerns of this kingdom is carried on in coffee-houses? A very considerable portion of the great insurance business is so conducted. It is indeed a vain idea that a counting-house or fixed establishment is necessary to make a man a merchant of any place. If he is there himself and acts as a merchant of that place, it is sufficient; and the mere want of a fixed compting-house there will make no breach in the mercantile character, which may well exist without it."

That case was one involving the question of carrying on a trade outside and beyond that authorised by a particular licence to trade. It is no decision that the existence of a fixed compting house or house of trade in a neutral country without residence by a trader or partner in that country will endow him with a neutral commercial domicil which will give him, though an enemy subject, protection for his goods from maritime seizure. Indeed, the passage itself seems to assume the presence of the trader in the neutral country.

I note that in dealing with this case, the late Mr. Westlake said (International Law, Part 2, p. 164): "Without having or being a partner in a house of business established in a given country, a man may in that country make contracts or do other acts of a trader, not linked together otherwise than through his person. Then we have the state of facts with regard to which Lord Stowell said that 'a man may have mercantile concerns in two countries, and if he acts as a merchant of both he must be liable to be considered as a subject of both, with regard to the transactions originating respectively in those countries.'"

It must not be taken that I am expressing any opinion as to whether a man can have a commercial domicil in two neutral countries which would entitle him to be regarded as a neutral trader in both. I can conceive that it is possible that he might establish a sufficient residence in both for the purpose. Nor am I considering the case of a corporation or an incorporated company which might theoretically have a residence in the country where it was registered. Dealing with the case now before the court, in my view a commercial domicil such as is here claimed cannot be established without proof of a sufficient residence of the partners or some of them in the country where the business is carried on, or where the house of trade is situate.

A further argument remains to be dealt with. It was contended that the partners in the firm were Belgians, and resident in Belgium. I have already expressed the opinion that they had not become Belgians, and that they remained German subjects. But the argument was that residence in one neutral country was enough to constitute a commercial domicil in another country in respect of transactions originated in the latter. I cannot think that can be so. But in any event, the facts in this case show that there was no residence by any of the Buenos Ayres partners in Antwerp at the time of the capture. It is clearly established in the law of nations that claimants must prove their non-hostile character at the time of capture. I have also decided in other cases that they must prove this at the time of the claim, and of the adjudication.

What then was the character of the claimant partners when the goods were captured? Two of them, if not the three, had before then been expelled from Antwerp and Belgium and sent back to Germany. Their residence in Belgium had therefore been terminated. Indeed, as they were German subjects it came to an end when Germany made war on Belgium. The position of such persons is aptly described by Marshall, C.J. in The Venus (ubi sup.), at p. 290, in the following passage: "The right of the citizens or subjects of one country to remain in another depends on the will of the Sovereign of that other; and if that will be not expressed otherwise than by that general hospitality which receives and affords security to strangers, it is supposed to terminate with the relations of peace between the two countries. When war breaks out, the subjects of one belligerent in the country of the other are considered as enemies, and have no right to remain there."

Moreover, the proper inference to draw from the facts, in my view, is that the claimants adhered at once to their country—the enemy—upon the outbreak of war. If the three Fuhrmanns had no right to remain in Antwerp after their country made war on Belgium, whether they were expelled before the capture or not, it is not possible that they could set up a residence, to which they had no right, as a ground for protection against capture at sea of any goods the subject-matter of transactions of their Belgian or Argentine or any other of their businesses.

The claim of Messrs. H. Fuhrmann and Co. is disallowed. I find that the wool at the time of capture was enemy property on a British vessel, and accordingly I adjudge its condemnation as prize to the Crown as droits of Admiralty.

The buyers objected to this method of sending the rubber. Arbitrators found that there was at the date of the contract such a course of business established as would make it within the contemplation of the parties that the goods might be sent by the route adopted, and they awarded that the sellers' tender was a good tender.*

Held, that by the written contract, which was clear and unambiguous in its terms, the rubber was to be carried by sea throughout, and that evidence of a temporary usage in a particular trade to forward the goods partly by sea and partly by land was not admissible to vary the written contract. The tender, therefore, was bad, and the buyers were not bound to accept the goods.

(a) Reported by W. V. BALL, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

AWARD stated by arbitrators in the form of a special case.

By a contract in writing dated the 27th March 1916 Messrs. Heilbut, Symons, and Co. (sellers) through Messrs. Lewis and Peat sold to Messrs. Sutro and Co. (buyers) 25 tons of Hevea Crepe Plantation Rubber at the price of 3*s.* 5*d.* per pound, cost, freight, and insurance, shipping weights to be shipped during March-April 1916 by a vessel or vessels from the East to New York direct and (or) indirect with liberty to call and (or) tranship at other ports, but if to France no transhipment west of Port Said except at a French port, or by force majeure.

The contract further provided: "To be insured by sellers against marine war risk insurance with particular average at the price of this contract plus 10 per cent. Any question regarding quality to be settled by arbitration, such arbitration to be demanded within twenty-eight days and held within six weeks after the arrival of the vessel. The goods to be weighed at buyer's expense at the port of discharge named in the contract or duly declared by the buyers according to the contract, and buyers shall furnish, where sold on delivered weights, as soon as possible a properly certified copy of landing weights. Each shipment, if by more than one vessel, and each mark or countermark to be treated separately. The name of the vessel or vessels, marks, and full particulars to be declared to the buyers in writing with due dispatch. If to ports other than London, samples to be drawn and sealed in the presence of representatives of buyers and sellers, or if in London, by the Port of London Authority or wharfingers and forwarded to selling brokers in London. Failing sellers naming their representatives on or before arrival of vessel, the buyers' accredited sealed samples to be accepted. Should the vessel or vessels which may apply to this contract be lost before declaration, this contract to be cancelled for the whole of such portion (as the case may be) unless the goods shall have been previously paid for, but should the vessel or vessels be lost and the goods or any portion thereof be transhipped to any other vessel or vessels and arrive on account of the original importer, this contract to stand good for such portion. Cash against documents in London on or (at buyers' option) before arrival of vessel or vessels at port of discharge. Any dispute arising out of this contract to be settled by arbitration in London in the usual manner, according to the constitution and rules of the Rubber Trade Association of London. Brokerage per cent., ship lost or not lost."

A dispute having arisen out of the contract it was duly referred to arbitration, and an award was made in favour of the sellers, and the buyers, in accordance with the rules of the Rubber Trade Association, appealed to the committee of the said association. The appeal duly came before the committee of the association, and upon the hearing of the appeal the buyers applied to the committee to state a special case for the opinion of the court on certain questions of law.

The committee, having duly heard and considered the evidence and documents put before them, found the facts to be as follows:—

(1) On the 4th April 1916 sellers declared to the buyers provisionally on cable advice and subject to correction 10 tons (part of the said 25 tons) per the steamships Teucer/Ixion, viâ Seattle.

(2) On the 9th May 1916 sellers' brokers wrote to the buyers with reference to the said contract for 25 tons of rubber, as follows: "Sellers write: We believe the balance of this contract is on board the steamships Lycaon/Teucer, viâ Seattle.

(3) Buyers objected to this as an irregular shipment upon the ground that they understood thatthe rubber was shipped to the Pacific port and thence by rail to New York.

(4) On the 5th June 1916 a formal delaration was made of the remaining 15 tons under the contract in question as having been shipped per the steamships Lycaon/Teucer, viâ Seattle, under a bill of lading dated the 30th April 1916.

(5) This declaration the buyers objected to as irregular, and demanded arbitration to settle the dispute.

(6) The said 15 tons of rubber, together with the 10 tons, were shipped at Singapore in due time in accordance with the contract, and through bills of lading per steamship Lycaon, dated the 30th April 1916, were issued by the shipowner's agents to New York, viâ Seattle.

(7) As to the 10 tons, the buyers having resold this quantity to others who accepted the buyers' tender to them, the buyers (Sutro and Co.) raised no objection, and no question arises with regard to rejection of this portion of contract, the dispute being as to the remaining 15 tons only. As regards the remaining 15 tons, the buyers insisted upon their rejection thereof.

(8) The shipping documents included a policy which covered the goods against all risks to New York and to the form of which no objection was taken. These documents have been initialed for the purpose of identification, and may be referred to as part of this award in case of need.

(9) After the outbreak of war great difficulty was experienced in obtaining space for shipment for the East, and in consequence of this difficulty in about Oct. 1915 shipments to the Eastern States of the United States which had hitherto gone directly or indirectly the whole distance to New York by water, began to be made by steamer to a port of the western seaboard of the United States, whence they were transmitted by rail to destination.

(10) At the date when the said contract was entered into this route from the East by sea and rail from the Pacific seaboard was well known to those in the trade as one of the usual routes for rubber sold on contracts in the form of the one now in question.

(11) If, and so far as it be material, we find that there was at the date of the contract such a course of business established as would make it within the contemplation of parties to the contract that the goods in question might come by this route.

(12) We further find, if and so far as it may be a question of fact, that goods forwarded by such a route would be a good tender under such a contract.

(13) We further find, if and so far as it be a question of fact, that the shipment was duly made in accordance with the terms of the contract.

(14) Subject to the opinion of the court on the above findings of fact, we find and award that the tender was a good tender, and the buyers were bound to accept same.

(15) We direct that the sellers' costs of this appeal and the fees and expenses of the arbitrators and the expenses and fees of committee, including the statement of this case, shall be borne and paid by the buyers.

(16) In the event of the court being of opinion on the above findings of fact that the tender was not a good tender, then we award and direct that the buyers were not liable to accept same, and that their costs of appeal and the fees and expenses of the arbitrators and of the committee and the expenses of the stating of this case shall be borne and paid by the sellers.

Leslie Scott, K.C., D. M. Hogg, and Barrington Ward for the buyers.—This written contract is plain and cannot be varied by evidence of custom:

Bowes v. Shand, 36 L. T. Rep. 857; 2 App. Cas. 455;

Alexander v. Vanderzee, L. Rep. 7 C. P. 530.

The buyers had good business reasons for insisting on all-sea route. If the sellers wanted to send the goods partly by land, they should have made it an express condition of the contract.

A. A. Roche, K.C. and Neilson for the sellers.—Evidence of a trade custom was admissible, not for the purpose of varying a written contract, but in order to show that the parties had in contemplation the sending of the goods partly by sea and partly by land, and that they contracted on that basis, having regard to commercial usage.

LUSH, J.—This case raises a question of some difficulty, but I have come to the conclusion, after the very clear arguments that have been addressed to me, that the contention of the buyers is the right one. The first question, I think, that I have to consider is whether this contract is clear, unambiguous, and definite in its terms—in other words, whether the contract construed in its entirety provides for a shipment of this cargo, or, rather, the balance of 15 tons, so that it may be conveyed by sea from the East to New York.

I will consider, after discussing the terms of the contract, what the effect is of the finding of the arbitrators with regard to this so-called usage.

The contract is a contract by which the sellers purport to sell to the buyers this 25 tons at the price stated; it provides how the goods are to be conveyed and delivered to the buyers, and it says this: "To be shipped during the months of March and April 1916, by vessel or vessels (steam or motor) from the East to New York direct and (or) indirect, with liberty to call and (or) tranship at other ports. The words "March-April 1916" are added in writing to the print, and so are the words "the East" and "New York"; otherwise the contract is in stereotyped form, and provides that the goods are to be shipped by vessel or vessels from place A. to place B., which have to be filled in when the contract is concluded. The contract goes on: "Any question regarding quality to be settled by arbitration, such arbitration to be demanded within twenty-eight days, and held within six weeks after the arrival of the vessel." Then there is this in the sampling clause: "If to ports other than London, samples to be drawn and sealed," and so on. Then the next clause is this: "Loss or transhipment.—Should the vessel or vessels which may apply to this contract be lost before declaration, this contract to be cancelled," and so on. Then the payment clause: "Cash against documents in London on or (at buyers' option) before arrival of vessel or vessels at port of discharge." Can that contract when construed in its entirety mean anything else than this, that by the contract the goods were to be conveyed by sea from the port of loading in the East to the port of discharge at New York? It seems to me that it is quite impossible to say that the contract has any ambiguity in it or that it has not provided for the method of conveyance of the goods. There is no ambiguity. The parties have agreed that the goods shall be conveyed by vessel or vessels from point A to point B. They have agreed that the time within which the dispute, if any, that may arise with regard to the quality of the goods is to be made the subject of arbitration is to date from the arrival of the vessel, in other words, the point of time at which you calculate the period within which the question is to be raised is from the arrival of the vessel at New York, and the payment clause equally, which provides for the date of payment, regulates the periods by reference to the arrival of the vessel at New York. How can it be said, when one looks at the contract and considers it as one entire contract, that the parties have either not bargained with regard to the method of conveyance or that they have used terms of an ambiguous character with reference to that method of conveyance. I cannot for myself think that the contract is open to any question with regard to its interpretation, and therefore I start by considering the question that Mr. Roche has raised on this basis, that here there is a clear definite and unequivocal agreement between the parties with regard to the mode of conveyance.

That being so, am I or am I not at liberty to put upon that contract some other interpretation by reason of the findings of the arbitrators set out in clauses 10, 11, 12, and 13? Mr. Roche says that I am, and that I should defeat the contract upon its true interpretation, taking into consideration the facts found by the arbitrators, if I give to it the meaning which I have already said appears to me as a question of construction to be free from any ambiguity. What the arbitrators have found is this, that, at the date when the contract was entered into, this route from the East by sea and rail from the Pacific seaboard was well known to those engaged in the trade as one of the usual routes for rubber sold in the form of the contract now in question. They next go on to find: "If and so far as it be material we find that there was at the date of the contract such a course of business established as would make it within the contemplation of the parties to the contract that the goods in question might come by this route." Then, again, they find: "If, and so far as it may be a question of fact that goods forwarded by such a route would be a good tender under such a contract," and, lastly, they find: "If and so far as it be a question of fact that the shipment was duly made in accordance with the terms of the contract." In other words they say this, not that there was an old and well-established usage by which in contracts in these terms the seller had an option either to send the goods by sea from the East to New York or to send them from the East to the Pacific coast and thence by rail to New York. They do not suggest that. What they do find is that at the time the contract was entered into, owing to recent events, it had been so usual for that route to be adopted as to make it within the contemplation of the parties to the contract that the goods might come by that route, and that goods forwarded by that route would be a good tender under such a contract. As I have said, I very much doubt whether that can be called a usage, or, as Lord Cairns called it in Bowes v. Shand (26 L. T. Rep. 857; 2 App. Cas. 455), a custom of the trade at all. But assuming that it is, is it legitimate when a contract is clear and unambiguous in its terms to seek to alter the terms by importing evidence of a usage, not a general and universal custom, but evidence of a usage in that particular trade which would alter the terms of the written agreement?

As I understand the law, it stands thus: If you find that the parties to the written agreement have not provided for or bargained with regard to a certain subject-matter, then you are not contradicting or you are not altering the terms of the contract by admitting evidence with regard to the subject-matter as to which the contract is silent. That is clear enough, and I find there is this second rule, which was the one I think that was referred to in the case of Bowes v. Shand (sup), that where you have in a mercantile contract a term used which may be susceptible of one meaning and may be susceptible of another, although its ordinary meaning would be one of those two, yet you may allow evidence of usage to be given, provided it is perfectly clear and well established in order to show that when the parties used that term they were not using it in its ordinary meaning, but were using it in the other meaning of which that term was susceptible, and I think one arrives at that conclusion by tracing the history of the dispute which arose in Bowes v. Shand (sup.), and seeing how the question in Bowes v. Shand (sup.) came to arise. In Alexander v. Vanderzee (L. Rep. 7 C. P. 530), there was a contract for the sale of a large quantity of Danubian maize "fair average quality of the season and port of shipment when shipped. To be shipped from Danube . . . by three or more first-class vessels. . . . For shipment in June and (or) July 1869, seller's option." There was a question whether the particular date of shipment in the circumstances of that case did or did not comply with the contract, and there was a question left to the jury at the trial with regard to it. The question was whether the meaning that the jury put upon the term was or was not so different from the ordinary and necessary meaning which the term itself bore as to contradict the written document, and I think it is clear that both Blackburn, J. and Lush, J. considered the expression "the shipment of grain in June and (or) July" was in itself an expression which was susceptible of one of two meanings, and the court there took the view that the question as to the meaning of the term was a question for the jury.

In Bowes v. Shand (sup.) a similar question arose with regard to practically the same term. The case went to the House of Lords. There the contract or contracts, because there were two, provided for the sale of 300 tons of rice to be shipped at Madras or coast for this period "during the months of March and (or) April 1874." A ship arrived at Madras in February, and most of the cargo was put on board in February, not one of the specified months. There was a small proportion put on board on the 3rd March. The buyers refused to accept the rice on the ground that it had not been shipped during the months of March or April, and there it is important to observe that no evidence was given of the usage with a view to altering the meaning of the words "shipment in March and (or) April"; but, on the contrary, evidence was given to show that the words meant in that trade what they meant ordinarily and plainly on the face of the contract. Lord Cairns undoubtedly does say this at p. 468: "It was of course competent for those who were resisting the application of this natural construction of the contract to have said: "We will prove by evidence that according to the custom of the trade" —which I take to mean usage in the trade— "these words, which have this natural signification, are used in a wider or in a different sense. The natural meaning of the words is, no doubt, that the rice shall be shipped during those two particular months; but we will show that by the custom of the trade a latitude is allowed, and that provided the shipment has been conducted in such a way as that the ship will be able to sail during those two months, that means by the custom of the trade the shipping of rice on board during the months in question. That, of course, would, according to the well known rule of law, which admits parole evidence not to contradict a document, but to explain the words used in it, supply, as it were, the mercantile dictionary in which you are to find the mercantile meaning of the words which are used." Then Lord Blackburn uses similar language to that which was used by Lord Cairns. If there was any term the mercantile meaning of which one had to ascertain, then here, no doubt, evidence having been given of that which I assume for this purpose is a usage, unquestionably one would not only be able to refer to it, but one would be bound to refer to it in order to give the mercantile meaning to the words that the parties have used. But there is no such term. There is no reason, in my opinion, for the application of the principle referred to by Lord Cairns and Lord Blackburn. All that the arbitrators say is this, that if it is material there was when the contract was made such a course of business established as would make it within the contemplation of the parties to the contract that the goods might come by that route. What does that amount to? At the most it seems to me to amount to this, that the course of business was such that the parties did not mean what the contract in writing said they meant. To my mind that is utterly inadmissible. That is contradicting the contract. It is importing evidence of usage with a view to altering it. I think the facts found are immaterial, because the parties have in clear terms provided otherwise, provided, in fact, for a method of shipment contrary to that which the arbitrators say might be taken to be the contract.

I think, therefore, that the question must be answered in favour of the buyers, and therefore that the contention of the sellers fails.

WATTS, WATTS, AND CO. LIMITED v. MITSUI AND CO. LIMITED. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Charter-party — Exception of "restraint of princes"—Reasonable anticipation of restraint —Actual restraint in existence—Breach by shipowner—Measure of damages—Penalty clause—Limitation of liability.

The plaintiffs chartered a vessel from the defendants, who were shipowners, to proceed to M. and to load and carry to Japan a cargo of sulphate of ammonia which the plaintiffs had bought. The charter-party excepted "arrests and restraints of princes." The defendants refused to provide a ship which by the charter-party they agreed to provide, on the ground that there was reasonable apprehension that if they fulfilled the charter the ship would be seized by the King's enemies. In these circumstances the plaintiffs were compelled to repudiate their contract with their sellers, and paid them, as the result of arbitration proceedings, 4500l. for so doing.

In an action by the plaintiffs against the defendants for damages for breach of charter, Bailhache, J. held that the shipowners were guilty of a breach of the charter-party, and that the plaintiffs could not recover from them 4500l., such damage being too remote, but that they were entitled to recover 3800l., the amount of profit they would have insured. This amount was the difference between the price at which they had purchased the goods and the market price of the goods in Japan on the date at which the goods might have been expected to arrive. The Court of Appeal were agreed that the defendants were guilty of a breach of charter-party in not sending a vessel to load, but that as regards the amount of damage the proper amount to fix was the difference between the price which would have been realised by the sale of the goods in Japan at or about the time the vessel should, under ordinary circumstances, have arrived, and the cost price of the goods at the port of loading at the time of the shipment, together with the cost of freight and insurance.

Held, that the mere apprehension of seizure was insufficient to justify the defendant's failure to supply a steamer, as to make the exception operative there must be such a declaration of war as to cause an actual restraint of princes.

But on the main point, the measure of damages, their Lordships were of opinion that Bailhache, J. had proceeded on a right basis, and his order would be restored, subject to correcting the omission to deduct the amount of insurance premium, which, taking the premium to be 6 per cent., would reduce the amount of damages to 800l.

Decision of the Court of Appeal (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 427; 115 L. T. Rep. 248; (1916) 2 K. B. 826) set aside and judgment of Bailhache, J. (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 300; 114 L. T. Rep. 326) restored with a modification.

(a) Reported by W. E. REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

APPEAL by the defendants from an order of the Court of Appeal, reported 115 L. T. Rep. 248; (1916) 2 K. B. 826).

Leck, K.C. and Raeburn for the appellants.

Greer, K.C. and R. A. Wright for the respondents.

The facts and cases cited sufficiently appear from the considered judgment of their Lordships.

The Lord CHANCELLOR (Lord Finlay).—The appellants in this case are shipowners who had entered into a charter-party dated the 5th June 1914 with the respondents, the charterers, by which it was provided that a steamer, the name of which was to be declared, should proceed to Mariopol on the Sea of Azov, and having there taken on board a cargo of sulphate of ammonia should carry it to Japan for delivery there. By the seventh clause the charterers had the option of cancelling the charter if the vessel was not ready to load by the 20th Sept. 1914. By the twelfth clause there was an exception for the arrests and restraints of princes. The thirteenth clause was as follows: "Penalty for non-performance of this agreement proved damages not exceeding the estimated amount of freight."

The respondents had, in April 1914, purchased from the Coppee Company in Russia 3500 tons of sulphate of ammonia, and if the steamship had arrived the goods so purchased would have been shipped by it for Japan.

At the beginning of August war broke out between Germany and Great Britain, Russia, and France. Turkey did not enter into the war until Nov. 1914. On the 1st Sept. the respondents through their brokers requested that the name of the steamer should be declared. On the same day the appellants replied that the charter-party must be considered cancelled. The reason given was that the British Government had prohibited steamers from going into the Black Sea to load, but in fact there had been no such prohibition.

The Dardanelles were closed to navigation after sunset on the 26th Sept.

The action was brought by the charterers for not providing a steamer according to the charter-party. The defence was that on the reasonable apprehension of Turkey becoming involved in the European War, and of the Dardanelles being thereupon closed, the shipowners were justified by reason of the exception of arrests and restraints of princes in not sending a vessel to load.

The action was tried by Bailhache, J. in the Commercial Court. He decided: (1) That there was no justification for the breach. (2) That even if the steamship had arrived by the cancelling date (the 20th Sept.) she could not have loaded and got to the Dardanelles before they were closed. (3) That if the steamship had been provided at Mariopol the charterers could have insured the goods for Japan, and that they had lost the chance of doing so owing to the shipowners' default. (4) That no other charter-party being procurable the charterers were entitled to 3800l., being the amount of profit which they would have insured on the voyage to Japan. The learned judge arrived at this amount by taking the difference between the price at which the charterers had purchased the goods under the contract of April 1914 and the market price in Japan in Nov. 1914, the date at which the goods might have been expected to arrive, but by a lapse no allowance was made for the premium which the respondents would have had to pay on the insurance.

A claim for 4500*l.* which the charterers had paid to their sellers (the Coppee Company) to have their contract of purchase cancelled was disallowed as being too remote.

Both sides appealed to the Court of Appeal; the shipowners on the ground that they ought to have been held not liable, and the charterers on the ground that they ought have been allowed the sum of 4500*l.* which they had paid to their sellers. The Court of Appeal disallowed the claim for 4500*l.*, agreeing in this with Bailhache, J.; and while holding the shipowners liable in damages, varied the order of Bailhache, J. by directing a reference to ascertain the amount of the damages, and declaring that the measure of damages was the difference between the price which the goods would have realised if they had been sold in Japan at the end of Nov. 1914, and the cost price of the goods at the port of loading at the current price at the nearest available date to the 10th Sept. 1914, in addition to freight, insurance premiums for war risks, and brokerage.

The effect of the decision of the Court of Appeal was that while the damages would be reduced by the allowance for the amount of the premium, they might have been largely increased if it proved to be the case that the cost price at Mariopol at the time of the breach was less than the price under the contract of April 1914.

The shipowners appealed to this House; there was no cross appeal in respect of the 4500*l.* disallowed by both courts below.

In my opinion the contention of the appellants that they could justify the failure to provide a steamship on the ground of the exception for restraint of princes was not made good. There was not, in fact, any restraint of princes to prevent the passage of the steamship through the Dardanelles and to Mariopol until the closing of the Dardanelles on the evening of the 26th Sept. There was a reasonable apprehension that the Dardanelles might be closed, but such an apprehension does not constitute a restraint of princes. To bring the case within the exception there must be an actual restraint in existence, and in the present case there was nothing to prevent the steamship from passing the Dardanelles and arriving at the port of loading by the cancelling date (20th Sept.).

It is quite true that her going there, so far as the actual voyage to Japan was concerned, would have been useless, as the Dardanelles were closed before she could have got out, but if the vessel had arrived at Mariopol the charterers might have insured against war risks. I confess I have some doubt whether the respondents might not have abandoned the adventure instead of having to insure at a heavy premium, but having regard to what passed at the trial, as stated to us by counsel on both sides, I think we must deal with the case on the footing that the insurance against war risks would have been effected. The only controversy between the parties on this point appears to have been as to whether such an insurance was practicable. It was proved by the one witness called that the insurance could have been effected. There was no contradiction, and I think that the courts below were right in holding that the loss of insurance may be recovered. I do not think that the opportunity of effecting an insurance can be regarded as too remote to constitute an element of damage.

As regards the amount of the damages, the basis adopted by Bailhache, J.—correcting of course the mistake as to the non-allowance of the premium—was in my opinion correct. It was strenuously argued for the respondents that as the 4500*l.* paid by the respondents to their sellers had been disallowed as too remote, the contract of April must be disregarded for all purposes, and the loss ascertained on the difference between the market price at the port of loading at the date of the breach, and what would have been the market price in Japan on arrival. It would follow, on the assumption that the cost price at Mariopol had fallen by the time of the breach to a point below the price under the contract of April, that the damages recoverable would be correspondingly increased. In my opinion the respondents' contention on this point fails. It is quite clear and indeed was not disputed that if the steamship had arrived at Mariopol the sulphate of ammonia which the respondents had contracted to purchase under the contract of April would have been the goods shipped, and this of course involved taking delivery of these goods, and paying for them to the seller. If the respondents having so shipped the goods had started the steamship upon a voyage to Japan insuring against war risks the adventure would have been frustrated by the closing of the Dardanelles, and this should have constituted a constructive total loss. The respondents would have recovered on the insurance the value of the goods as at the time of their expected arrival in Japan, but they would ex hypothesi have had to pay the price for the goods under the contract of April, and the difference between these two amounts would have represented their profit after deduction of premium, &c. This seems to me to exclude any inquiry as to a possible lower market value at Mariopol at the time of the breach.

The case of Rodocanachi v. Milburn (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 100; 56 L. T. Rep. 594; 18 Q. B. Div. 67) has in my opinion no application. That was a case in which the goods had been lost on the voyage by the fault of the ship, and it was held that the damages could not be reduced by reference to a contract for sale at a price below the market price at the date when they ought to have been delivered.

The claim of the respondents to enhance the damages by reference to a supposed fall in the market at Mariopol at the time of the breach appears to me also to fall upon another ground. There was no evidence that there was any market at Mariopol for such goods, or that they could be obtained from any person other than the Coppee Company (the respondents' vendors), and there is no evidence of any fall in the cost price of such goods at the time of the breach. It is indeed probable that the price may have fallen after exit from the Black Sea had been barred by the closing of the Dardanelles on the 26th Sept. The Court of Appeal ought not in my opinion to have directed an inquiry as to damages on a basis for which no foundation had been laid by the evidence at the trial.

I agree with the construction put in the courts below on clause 13—the penalty clause. If this clause had appeared for the first time, I think it might have been construed as imposing a limitation on the damages to be recovered, but the penalty clause is an old one with a settled meaning, and the intention, if it existed, to make so fundamental a change in its effect as is suggested ought to have been much more clearly shown in order to bind the other party to the contract.

In my opinion the judgments of Bailhache, J. in the present and in the earlier case before him on this point were right.

In my opinion the respondents are entitled to 3800*l.*, less the cost of insurance, &c.

Bailhache, J. took the premium to be 6 per cent., and on this basis the amount will be 800*l.*

I think that the respondents should have costs in the Commercial Court and in the Court of Appeal, but that there should be no costs of the appeal to this House.

I am authorised to say that Lord Parker of Waddington concurs in the opinion I have just read.

Earl LOREBURN.—I need not recapitulate the facts of this case. In my opinion there was no restraint of princes on the 1st Sept. when the shipowners declared their intention of not carrying out their contract. There was an available force at hand in the Dardanelles, and if the situation had been so menacing that a man of sound judgment would think it foolhardiness to proceed with the voyage I should have regarded that as in fact a restraint of princes. It is true that mere apprehension will not suffice, but on the other hand it has never been held that a ship must continue her voyage till physical force is actually exercised. I agree, however, with Lord Dunedin's expression that "it would be useless to try and fix by definition the precise imminence of peril which would make the restraint a present fact as contrasted with a future fear." No form of words is likely to cover automatically all contingencies. In the present case the lists of ships that went through the Dardanelles to and fro during the material days, which were furnished to us during the argument, though not printed in the book, show that there was no restraint of princes when the voyage was abandoned. I cannot agree with the learned counsel for the appellants that we are to judge merely by the event. The decision must be made at the time by those concerned.

If this be so, the sole remaining question relates to the measure of damages. What the plaintiffs claim was the sum they had to pay as compensation to the sellers of the cargo which they had bought in order to load it on the ship, but were disabled from loading because the defendants failed to provide the ship. Now this would not be the measure of damage in the absence of any notice to the shipowner. It is unnecessary to quote authority for this familiar rule. After the case had been heard on this footing the learned judge allowed an adjournment to hear evidence on another footing altogether. The plaintiffs then argued that if this ship had entered the Black Sea and reached the port of loading on the 20th Sept. (the last day allowable under the contract and the earliest day on which she could have arrived) they could have loaded her with the cargo intended. They also said that they could and would have insured the cargo against war risks, and that, though she would have been captured by the Turks on her way down through the Dardanelles, they would have recovered from the underwriters. The evidence on this case was very meagre, and indeed unsatisfactory, but it was uncontradicted. We are therefore bound to take it that this cargo could and would have been insured against war risks at a premium of 6 per cent. They would have done so, we must assume, because a sensible man of business would so act, and they were deprived of their opportunity of so doing.

In these circumstances I think it is legitimate to recognise this as an element in damages. A man of business in such a position would naturally load the cargo and insure against war risks if he could, even if the premium swallowed up nearly all the profits of his voyage, because he would thereby be free from any liability which might fall upon him for not himself taking delivery from his sellers, or if he himself had already taken delivery he would not be left with the goods on his hands in a port to which access might soon be made impossible by war. In short, I think the plaintiffs are entitled to say to the defendants, "You broke your contract in not sending your ship to the port of loading. If you had sent her we could have loaded her with a cargo which we had ready. True, it would never have reached its destination by reason of the war, but we should have insured against war risks, as any practical man would do, and we could have done so at 6 per cent. premium. Pay us what we have lost by your default. It is the avowed value at port of destination, less the actual price we paid at port of loading and the expenses, and less also the premium we had to pay for insuring against war risks." That sum leaves 800*l.* as the damages.

Lord DUNEDIN.—In terms of the contract contained in the charter-party of the 5th June 1914 the appellants were bound to send a steamer to Mariopol, on the Sea of Azov, not to arrive before the 1st and the contract cancellable if it arrived after the 20th Sept. 1914, to receive a cargo of 3500 tons of sulphate of ammonia to be carried to Japan viâ the Suez Canal. On the 1st Sept. 1914 the appellants informed the respondents that they considered the contract as cancelled. On the 2nd the respondents in a letter to the appellants refused to accept that proposition and called on them to proceed with the contract and give the name of the steamer which they proposed to send to Mariopol. The appellants persisted in their attitude, and no steamer was sent. The present action is to recover damages for this alleged breach of contract.

The first question that arises is whether there was a breach of contract. The non-fulfilment is admitted, but the appellants say that under the circumstances that is excused under one of the exceptions in the charter-party—namely, restraint of princes. On the 1st Aug. 1914 Germany had declared war against Russia and had begun hostile action against France, and on the night of the 4th Great Britain declared war against Germany. There was, however, at this time no activity on Germany's part in the Black Sea or in the passage from the Black Sea to the Mediterranean, or in the Levant. Turkey was a neutral. Restraint of princes, to fall within the words of the exception, must be an existing fact and not a mere apprehension. This was held long ago by Lord Ellenborough in Atkinson v. Ritchie (10 East, 530). The more recent cases cited by the appellants, such as Geipel and another v. Smith and another (1 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 268; 26 L. T. Rep. 361; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 404) and Nobel's Explosives Company v. Jenkins (8 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 181; 75 L. T. Rep. 163; (1896) 2 Q.B.326), do not in any way touch that proposition. They only show that it may be possible to invoke the exception when a reasonable man in face of an existing restraint may consider that the restraint, though it does not affect him at the moment, will do so if he continue the adventure. It would be useless to try to fix by definition the precise imminence of peril which would make the restraint a present fact as contrasted with a future fear. The circumstances in each particular case must be considered. In the present case, while there was natural and great apprehension on the 1st. Aug., and while the decision of the British Government immediately after to exclude Black Sea voyages from the benefits of the Government Insurance Scheme might well deter British subjects from sending their ships to the Black Sea, yet it is clearly proved by the production of lists of ships which after that date, and up to the 26th Sept., passed inwards and outwards through the Dardanelles that there was no such restraint as would have actually prevented the appellants presenting a ship at Mariopol before or by the appointed date of the 20th Sept. I agree on this matter with the conclusion arrived at by the courts below.

Breach of contract being ascertained damages are due. What happened subsequently, so far as material, was as follows: The respondents attempted, but without success, to secure another ship at Mariopol. On the 26th Sept. the Dardanelles were finally closed and have never been open since. On the 5th Nov. Great Britain declared war against Turkey. The respondents had by a contract of date the 23rd April 1914 secured a cargo of sulphate of ammonia from a company, Coppee Company Limited, registered in England but trading in Russia at Mariopol. Under the contract the sulphate was to be accepted by the buyers not later than the end of October, but the respondents asked and obtained a prolongation of the period to the end of November. In November the respondents, who had been sounding the Coppee Company as to terms for cancelling the contract, finally intimated that they did not propose to accept delivery. A lengthened correspondence ensued as to what damages were to be paid, and the matter was finally settled in July 1915, upon the respondents paying the Coppee Company 4500*l.* with certain costs of an inchoate arbitration.

The respondents in the case as raised set forth the breach of contract by the appellants and their own consequent inability to accept delivery of the sulphate, and claimed as damages the said sum of 4500*l.* together with such a sum as would represent their loss of profit on the venture, said loss to be arrived at by taking the difference between what the sulphate would have fetched if sold in Japan in November, and the sum they would have had to pay for it at Mariopol under the contract. They went to trial, and the respondents contented themselves with proving the charter-party, the failure of the appellants to send a ship, and their own inability to procure another ship, the facts as to the contract and the payment they had made to the Coppee Company, and the facts as to the position at the Dardanelles and the Black Sea in August and September. The evidence of the appellants was directed to the sole point of showing that there was such danger as at the 1st Sept. as justified them in refusing to send a ship.

The evidence being closed and counsel having addressed the court, the learned judge seems to have expressed an opinion that the restraint of princes was not, in his view, made out in fact, and that in law the liability of the respondents to the seller under the contract was as regards the appellants res inter alios acta and too remote to be taken as the measure of damages as against them. He also seems to have indicated that in his view, the Dardanelles having been finally shut on the 26th Sept., the voyage could not have been made at all, as the ship, even if sent by the due date, could not after loading have repassed the Dardanelles. At the same time he indicated that it might have been possible for the respondents, if the ship had been at Mariopol, to have insured the cargo for safe arrival, and in so doing to have valued the goods at arrival value in Japan. He accordingly, without amendment of the pleadings, allowed a continuation of the cause to a future day for further evidence on that point. This evidence was subsequently led, and thereafter the learned judge gave his judgment. He found first, as already stated, as to the restraint of princes; second, as a fact that the Dardanelles having been finally closed on the 26th Sept., the ship, even if sent, could not have made out the voyage; and third, as a mixed question of fact and law, that the respondents, had the ship been duly sent to Mariopol, could and would as reasonable men have effected an insurance against loss, including war risks, on the arrived value of the goods in Japan. On this third finding he repeated his view as to the payment under the contract between the respondents and the Russian sellers not being the measure of damages as against the appellants; but he found due as damages the sum of 3800*l.*, being the difference between the proved value of the cargo as it would have sold in Japan, which he assumed covered by insurance, and the sum payable for the sulphate of ammonia if the respondents had shipped the intended cargo, which would have given them an insurable subject.

Both parties appealed to the Court of Appeal. The learned judges there affirmed all the findings of the trial judge in fact and law, but on the third finding they came to a different conclusion. While affirming the view that the damages paid under the contract could not be taken as the measure between the respondents and appellants, they decided that the proper way of arriving at the damage was to take the arrived value of the goods, which, like the trial judge, they held could be covered by insurance, and then to find the loss which the respondents suffered by comparing that sum with the cost of buying a cargo at Mariopol on or about the 10th Sept. 1914, plus freight, insurance premium for war risk, and brokerage; and they referred it to the official referee to determine this sum.

The general rules for assessment of damages for breach of contract have been often stated, but nowhere more succinctly than by Parke, B. in Robinson v. Harman (1 Ex. 850): "Where a party sustains a loss by reason of a breach of contract he is so far as money can do it, to be placed in the same situation with respect to damages as if the contract had been performed." The matter was further elucidated in the case of Hadley v. Baxendale (9 Ex. 341).

Now, what would have been the position of the respondents if the ship had been duly sent to Mariopol? They would have been able to ship their cargo. But what then? Once it is found as a fact that the final closing of the Dardanelles on the 26th would have prevented the ship after loading from reaching the Mediterranean it is obvious that the intended voyage could not have been performed. The appellants argued that that being so damages should be merely nominal, the true cause of the failure of the adventure being, not their breach of contract, but the facts of war. I agree with the learned judges in the courts below that that does not conclude the matter, but that one must next inquire what would a reasonable man have done in the supposed position. As a matter of ordinary common sense he would have insured his cargo against sea and war risks, and the possibility of so doing was, I think, rightly affirmed by the trial judge upon the evidence led. The result arrived at by him after this seems to me right, subject to correction of what is an obvious inadvertence—though it must be admitted an inadvertence which makes a great difference in the pecuniary result. I refer to the omission to deduct from the sum receivable under the insurance the amount of the insurance premium. This premium has been proved—not very satisfactorily, but I think sufficiently—to be calculable at 6 per cent.

This method of assessing the damage was, as already stated, altered by the Court of Appeal.

I am not satisfied that the view taken by the learned judges of the Court of Appeal is correct. The respondents' counsel sought to support it by citing the case of Rodocanachi v. Milburn (6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 100; 56 L. T. Rep. 594; 18 Q. B. Div. 67), a case which, although not binding on your Lordships, was, I apprehend, rightly decided, and is indeed in consonance with the case in this House of Ströms Bruks Aktie Bolag v. Hutchison (10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 138; 93 L. T. Rep. 562; (1905) A.C. 515). In that case the plaintiffs chartered a ship to bring cotton from Alexandria to the United Kingdom. The goods were lost by the fault of the shipowner. It was held that the damages due to the plaintiffs were the value of the goods at market price in the United Kingdom at the date at which the goods ought to have arrived, and that it made no difference that the plaintiffs had sold the goods "to arrive" at a figure less than that market price. It does not appear to me that the present case is in the same position. In that case the plaintiff, owing to the breach of contract, was actually left without his goods, and he was therefore entitled to be presented with the sum which it would have cost him to get other goods of the same quality and quantity. Whether, having the goods, he sold them to someone else at a profit or a loss was a matter with which the shipowner had no concern, and the fact of the sale being antecedent to the possession made no difference.

In this case the respondents were not without goods; they had no ship to put them in owing to the breach of contract. But the failure of the venture was due not to the breach of the contract but to the war. In order to estimate the damage an ideal situation has to be created—namely, the idea that the respondents having got the ship would have insured the arrival of the goods in Japan against all risks, and the respondents are given credit for the arrived value of the cargo intended to be shipped. But then I think we must take the ideal situation as it would have existed in fact; that they would have shipped the cargo they intended to ship—that is to say, the sulphate of ammonia acquired under the contract; and that, therefore, their only real loss is the difference between the price they would actually have had to pay for the cargo and the arrived value of the cargo under deduction of the insurance premiums. Taking it the other way, and assuming there had been a fall in the market, then, inasmuch as the venture was, in truth, frustrated not by the breach of contract but by the war, you really come to throw on the back of the shipowner the loss in value of the goods which was truly due to the war.

Besides this there is, in my view, something else which ought to prevent judgment passing in terms of the order of the Court of Appeal. The respondents here entered court with a claim based entirely on their own payment to the Russian seller, and they made no other case. After the case was really concluded the learned judge intimated that he could not accept their view, and indicating the point as to insurance he allowed an adjournment for further evidence. The respondents had then the opportunity of making out any case they could as to insurance. They did so by proving the possibility of insuring against war risks at a premium of 6 per cent. up to at least the middle of September, and by proving what would have been the selling value of sulphate of ammonia in Japan in November. They proved nothing as to the state of the market at Mariopol in mid-September, nor indicated in any way that the price would have been less than the price they had agreed to pay under the contract.

It is true that there are some references to the market for sulphate of ammonia having fallen, but they are of the most vague description. They are not the subject of direct testimony, but are all, such as they are, contained in the negotiations in correspondence between the respondents and the Coppee Company as to the amount of damages to be charged against the respondents for having broken the contract of sale, correspondence which, strictly speaking, is not evidence at all in regard to statements made in it as against the appellants.

The earliest and, indeed, the only reference which is at all direct is in a letter of the 17th Sept. from the Coppee Company to the respondents, in which, with reference to a verbal communication made by the respondents that they were not ready to accept delivery of the sulphate, and would like to know what would be the terms for cancellation, the Coppee Company point out that the sulphate is all lying ready to be delivered, and that if it is not taken at the stipulated time they will have to arrange either to build or to hire a store in order to prevent deterioration of the sulphate during the cold weather. They add: "In addition the market price has diminished, and we should have to take into consideration the probability whether the price would further diminish during the period the sulphate is in store." That means, of course, till the spring. On the 6th Nov. they write again: "We went into the question of the fall of price in sulphate, and so far as we are able to estimate any future loss in this respect and for the storage," &c. Actual figures are not approached till Jan. 1915, when the fall in price is quoted at 2*l.* 3*s.* 9*d.* per ton. But by this time the war with Turkey was well established and the Black Sea was absolutely sealed for exit to the Mediterranean. It is obvious that the price at that time reflects no light on the price in mid-Sept. 1914, at a time when both in fact and ex hypothesi of the present calculation the sea was still open and a voyage from Mariopol to Japan was insurable. This exhausts the references to be found in their correspondence. There is one piece of direct testimony given by the respondents' own manager which, so far as it goes, tends the other way. He says that in July 1915 it was rumoured that the price of sulphate in Russia was very high. He also says that there is no market price for sulphate of ammonia in Russia, except the prices advertised by Coppee and Co. There is not a shred of evidence that Coppee and Co. would have supplied sulphate in mid-September at a reduced price. This being so it seems to me that there is no justification for allowing a new and fresh inquiry to make a new case. I am aware that the Commercial Court is not bound by the stricter rules of pleading which obtain in the ordinary courts. But I cannot think it would be right at this time to start a new case as has been done by the Court of Appeal in the order complained of. The respondents have already had two cases adjudicated. It is not right, in my opinion, that they should now be allowed to embark on a third without having proved the fact which forms the foundation of it, basing the hope on the strength of casual references in a correspondence with other parties that something may turn up which will allow of a larger computation of the damages due.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the appeal should be allowed and that the respondent should be found entitled to the sum of 800*l.*, being the sum allowed by Bailhache, J., minus the premium calculated at 6 per cent. This view makes the discussion as to the limitation of liability under the penalty clause of no practical importance. But I wish to say that, had it been necessary to decide the point, I should have only wished to express my approval of the admirable judgment of Bailhache, J. in the case of Wall v. Rederiaktiebolaget Luggude (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 271; 114 L. T. Rep. 286; (1915) 3 K. B. 66).

Lord SUMNER. — Restraint of princes is, I think, no excuse for the appellants' breach of charter-party in not sending a steamer to load at Mariopol. No such restraint even existed, still less operated to restrain them, when they intimated their intention of not sending any steamer, or at any time thereafter till the Dardanelles were closed on the 26th Sept. 1914. They do not so contend, nor that the ambiguous and arbitrary conduct of the Porte before that date amounted to restraint.

The words "restraint of princes" do not, in my opinion, extend to the apprehension of restraint. Such is neither the meaning of the words nor the sense of the clause. No decided case has gone so far, and the language of Lord Ellenborough in Atkinson v. Ritchie (10 East, 530) is authority to the contrary, though, as the ship there could have loaded a full cargo before any embargo was imposed, the case on the facts is distinguishable. The exceptions clause contemplates matters which cause a breach or prevent performance of the charter. The reasonable apprehension of a prudent man and the inutility of doing something, which cannot lead to any good result, are considerations material in deciding at what distance of time or over what area an existing restraint of princes may be deemed to be operative so as to restrain; but restraints in themselves they are not. The appellants admit that apprehension alone will not suffice, and say that the shipowner must take the risk of his fears being justified by the event. This argument converts a provision stipulating the effects of the operation of certain causes into a speculation upon the chances of their coming into operation. To some of the excepted matters, for example, fire, explosions, or collisions, such a contention is obviously unfitted. In any case its application would lead to the interpolation of a period of suspense during which neither party could be certain of his rights until the course of events determined the speculation in one way or the other. As Scrutton, L.J. (then Scrutton, J.) well observes in Embiricos v. Sidney Reid and Co. (12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 513; 111 L. T. Rep. 291; (1914) 3 K. B., at p. 54): "Commercial men must not be asked to wait till the end of a long delay to find out from what in fact happens whether they are bound by a contract or not." Such a construction would unsettle the foundation of the contract as a matter of business, which is that the ship shall proceed upon a named voyage, unless prevented by named causes. Here, as the facts stood, the shipowners, by refusing to send a ship to Mariopol, evinced such an intention not to perform their bargain as justified the charterers in treating it as an offer of repudiation and in accepting it as such.

I have no doubt that clause 13 is a penalty clause and immaterial in the present case. To read it otherwise is to ignore the first word "penalty." True the use of that word is not decisive; but it is not impossible to read the residue of the clause as defining a mode of calculating a mere penal sum, and to read it as a limitation of the right to recover proved damages seems to me to produce an absurd result in business. Whatever the value of the cargo or the extent of the injury to it, the shipowner's liability in respect of it would be limited to the estimated amount of the freight, however that estimate is to be made. If the cargo owner is uninsured, he stands to lose large sums for the ship's default. If he is insured he upsets the ordinary course of insurance business by depriving his underwriter of a valuable right of recourse and must suffer for this in one way or another. Nothing could be less like a "genuine covenanted pre-estimate of damage": (Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Company v. New Garage and Motor Company, 108 L. T. Rep. 679; (1914) A. C., per Lord Dunedin, at p. 86). The whole matter has been fully and, if I may say so, admirably discussed by Bailhache, J. in the recent case of Wall v. Rederiaktiebolaget Luggude (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 271; 114 L. T. Rep. 286; (1915) 3 K. B. 66). Your Lordships decided the point in Ströms Bruks Aktie Bolag v. Hutchison (10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 138; 93 L. T. Rep. 562; (1905) A. C. 515) upon a somewhat similar clause, and I think that the present case cannot really be distinguished. My only difficulty is to understand why such a provision should be inserted at all.

I should be loth to hold that, if insurance of the war risk was feasible, proof that the charterers would have insured it was really needed. As is admitted, to insure the cargo against marine risks would be the ordinary thing to do, and it would have been obviously imprudent in a merchant to stand his own insurer of the war risk of such an adventure. I should have thought it would be within the legitimate inferences of fact to be drawn from the known circumstances of this case to find that a war-risk policy would be effected, but, as it is, the point need not be decided. What passed between the solicitors to the parties before the adjourned hearing in effect dispensed the plaintiffs from calling any witness on the point, almost formal as that witness would have been. The evidence called was very brief, but it sufficiently supports a finding that the whole line would have been covered. If so, no further inquiry on the point is needed. In effect, the breach of charter-party caused the plaintiffs to lose the chance of shipping and dispatching an insured cargo and of recovering on the policy when the cargo was lost, as it would have been actually and constructively, in consequence of the outbreak of war with Turkey. The legal presumption must be that the amount to be insured would be such as would indemnify the plaintiffs for their actual loss and pecuniary damage. This will accordingly eliminate the factor of war and bring the case within the ordinary rules as to damages for breach of contracts of carriage by sea.

On the measure of damages a point of considerable nicety was discussed, but in my opinion it is not really raised by the evidence. The principle of measuring damages for breach of a contract for the sale of merchandise by a ruling market price at a given date is not always equally applicable to contracts of charter-party. Nor do I think that the canon expressed by Lord Davey in Ströms Bruks Aktie Bolag v. Hutchison (sup.) is in point in the present case. There the charterers were themselves producers of the intended cargo, and could have loaded the ship from their own factory if she had arrived to load. Their claim arose because the shipowner's breach of contract prevented them from delivering the cargo at the port of discharge as they had contracted to do. Naturally, in measuring their loss, the cost of replacing it there was a factor to be compared with the value of an equivalent quantity never shipped at all. In the present case there is no evidence that there was any market or even any market price for sulphate of ammonia at Mariopol about the 10th Sept. 1914. There is no evidence that the charterers could have bought a cargo of it there or then, so as to load it on the arrival of the defendants' ship. Such evidence as there is shows that, if there was any sulphate of ammonia except the cargo in question, it all belonged to the firm from whom the charterers had contracted to buy it. If so, the charterers would have held to their bargain if the price had risen, and the vendors if it had not. A good deal can be said for the argument that, if this bargain is to be disregarded as too remote (which is admitted) so far as the plaintiffs claimed to recover the damages paid for its non-fulfilment, then, too, it should be disregarded for all purposes connected with the present case, and that the position is truly an inversion of that in Rodocanachi v. Milburn (sup.), "The value is to be taken independently of any circumstances peculiar to the plaintiff." This argument, however, is based on a supposition of fact as to the existence of a market price at Mariopol, which on the evidence fails.

I think that in the main the appeal succeeds, and I concur in the motion proposed by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack.

THE STANTON (CARGO EX). (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION (IN PRIZE), ENGLAND.

Prize Court—Claim to goods—Security for costs—Prize Court Rules 1914, Order XVIII., r. 2.

Order XVIII., r. 2, of the Prize Court Rules 1914 provides that: "Any person instituting a proceeding, other than a cause for condemnation, and making a claim, and being ordinarily resident outside the jurisdiction of the court, may be ordered to give security for costs, though he may be temporarily resident within the jurisdiction of the court, and the proceedings may be stayed until the order is complied with.

Rule 3 of the same order provides that: "In any cause in which security for costs is required, the security shall be of such amount and be given at such times and in such manner or form, as by bond, payment into court, or otherwise, as the judge shall direct.

Held, that the discretion of a judge in prize matters conferred by the above rules was a judicial discretion, and that in the case before the board there was no evidence that it had been exercised otherwise. The appeal therefore failed.

Principles that should guide the judge's discretion when deciding the question of security for costs considered and explained.

APPEAL by special leave from an interlocutory order made by the President of the Admiralty

(a) Reported by W. E. REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Division (in Prize), dated the 16th Oct. 1916, relating to security for costs in prize cases.

The appellant, Charles M. Lindvall, was a Swedish subject carrying on business at Gottenburg as a wholesale dealer in colonial produce. On the 27th Jan. 1916 a writ was issued by the Procurator-General claiming the condemnation of about 800*l.* worth of pork, seized at the port of Bristol, consigned to the appellant by Swift and Co., of Chicago, in the Swedish steamship Stanton. The writ claimed that the goods had an enemy destination or were enemy property. The appellant entered an appearance. A summons was then taken out asking that the appellant might be ordered to give security under Order XVIII., r. 2, of the Prize Court Rules. The summons was adjourned, and the appellant ordered to file his claim and evidence.

On the 16th Oct. 1916, no evidence having been filed on behalf of the Crown, the President ordered the appellant to give security in the sum of 100*l.*, and stayed the claim pending the order being complied with.

Le Quesne for the appellant.

Sir Frederick Smith (A. G.) and R. A. Wright for the Procurator-General.

The considered opinion of the board was delivered by Lord PARKER OF WADDINGTON.—This appeal turns entirely on the true meaning and effect of rules 2 and 3 of Order XVIII. of the Prize Court Rules 1914. These rules govern the practice of the court with regard to security for costs, and no question is raised as to their validity. It should be noticed that by Order XLV., in cases not provided for by the rules, the old practice in prize proceedings is to be followed, and in considering the question at issue on this appeal it is both legitimate and useful to refer to the former practice.

The practice of the High Court of Admiralty in prize proceedings, with reference to security for costs, was from time to time prescribed or sanctioned by statute. The last statute dealing with the matter was the Naval Prize Act 1864. By sect. 23 of that Act all claimants in proceedings for condemnation were required to give security for costs in a sum of 60*l.* This is remarkable for two reasons. First, a claimant in condemnation proceedings was not as a general rule ordered to pay costs unless he had put forward a fraudulent or unjustifiable claim. Secondly, a claimant was at any rate, up to the preliminary hearing, in the position of a defendant rather than a plaintiff, the onus probandi till then at any rate resting with the captors. Nevertheless, he was required to give security.

The twenty-third section of the Naval Prize Act 1864 was repealed by the first section of the Prize Courts (Procedure) Act 1914 as from the day on which the Prize Court Rules 1914 came into operation. Under these circumstances rules 2 and 3 of Order XVIII. must be looked upon as relaxing in favour of claimants the rights with regard to security for costs which the Crown, or the captors who represented the Crown, possessed under the earlier practice. Claimants ordinarily resident within the jurisdiction of the court need no longer give security. Claimants ordinarily resident out of the jurisdiction of the court may, even though temporarily resident within such jurisdiction, be ordered to give security in such manner and amount as the judge may direct. Whatever be the precise meaning of the expression "within the jurisdiction of the court" the present claimant certainly does not ordinarily reside within such jurisdiction, and therefore the President had power to make the order appealed from.

It is, however, contended that the discretion vested in the judge under the rules in question is a judicial discretion, and that the President, if he can be said to have exercised any discretion at all, did not exercise it judicially, but in complete disregard of all considerations by which a judge in exercising such a discretion ought to be influenced. In particular, he is said to have entirely disregarded the fact that on the evidence before him the Crown had entirely failed to make out any case for condemnation of the goods the subject of the claim, and that the claimant on the other hand had fully made out a case for their release. The onus probandi, it was said, still rested with the Crown, and the appellant being in the position of a defendant and not of a plaintiff should not have been ordered to give security at all.

Their Lordships entertain no doubt that the discretion conferred on the Prize Court judge by the rules in question is a judicial discretion, but except to this extent they do not think the appellant's argument is sound. The rules to be interpreted are not rules to be followed by a court which had not, according to its usual practice, ordered security against litigants who were not in the position of plaintiffs. On the contrary, they are rules to be followed by a court in which, according to its former practice extending back for over a century, all claimants wherever they resided, and whether in the position of plaintiffs or otherwise, had been compelled to give security. If, according to the former practice of the High Court of Admiralty, claimants in prize proceedings had only been ordered to give security if they asked for and were granted further proof after the preliminary hearing, the case might have been different; but this was not the practice. Moreover, the second rule of Order XVIII. expressly places claimants in condemnation proceedings on the same footing as persons instituting proceedings other than proceedings for condemnation. In other words, it treats all claimants as it treats plaintiffs. Their Lordships therefore are of opinion that neither the merits of the claim as they appear from the evidence already filed nor the onus probandi, having regard to such evidence, are the determining factors in considering whether the discretion has been properly exercised.

The object of the rules appears to be this. Persons ordinarily resident within the jurisdiction usually have property within the jurisdiction against which process of execution will lie should they be ordered to pay costs. These, therefore, need not be required to give security. Persons ordinarily resident out of the jurisdiction have, as a rule, no property within the jurisdiction against which process will lie in a similar event. These, therefore, may be ordered to give security. The fact that they are ordinarily resident outside the jurisdiction, if nothing more be proved, will in an ordinary case justify the judge in ordering security. But if something more be proved—for example, if it be established that the claimant has property within the jurisdiction against which process will lie—the judge, in exercising his discretion, must take this into account. It would be in the highest degree inconvenient if the judge were in every case bound to consider the onus probandi as it appears on the evidence already filed or the merits of the claim if it fell to be determined upon this evidence. He is, no doubt, entitled to look into both matters if he thinks fit—at any rate, on the question of the amount to which security should be ordered; but neither point affords the criterion as to whether security ought or ought not to be directed. The judge is entitled, on the one hand, to bear in mind that when the claim is bonâ fide made costs are not as a rule ordered against an unsuccessful claimant. He is, on the other hand, entitled to be guided by his own experience as to the type or kind of claim which usually turns out to be fraudulent. While bearing in mind that the object of the rule is to safeguard the Crown in the event of unsuccessful claimants being ordered to pay costs, he should not, either in ordering security or fixing its amount, ignore the effect of the order he proposes to make in increasing the difficulty of enforcing bonâ fide rights.

Their Lordships are not satisfied that in making the order appealed from the President either ignored any matter which he ought to have considered, or took into account any matter which he ought to have ignored. In other words, they are not satisfied that he did not exercise the discretion conferred on him by the rules in a judicial manner and on proper grounds, both as to amount and otherwise. It follows that this appeal must be dismissed with costs, and their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

APPEAL on behalf of the owner, Herr Gustav Krupp von Bohlen, of the sailing schooner racing yacht Germania from a decree of the President of the Admiralty Division (in Prize) directing that the yacht should be condemned as lawful prize and declaring her as such to have been lawfully seized by the Customs authorities at Southampton as a droit of Admiralty, and ordering that she should be sold by the marshal.

Bateson, K.C. and Dunlop for the appellant.

Sir Frederick Smith (A.-G.) and Gavin T. Simonds for the Crown.

The considered opinion of their Lordships was delivered by Lord PARMOOR.—The Germania is a sailing schooner racing yacht of 366 tons Y.M., 191 tons gross and 123 tons net register, built and registered at the port of Kiel. She was built in 1908 and belonged to Gustav Krupp von Bohlen. In the claim of Baron Friedrich von Bülow, on behalf of the owner, she is described as a racing sailing yacht of no value or utility for any commercial, naval, or military purpose, nor adaptable for any such purpose, and as being no part of the commercial, naval, or military resources of the enemy.

On the 27th July 1914 the Germania arrived at Southampton to take part in the Cowes Regatta, and was dry-docked for the purpose of repairs, cleaning, and painting. On the outbreak of war she was in the yard of Messrs. Summers and Payne, at Southampton, and was seized and detained by the officer of Customs. A decree of detention, until further order of the court, was made on the 24th Sept. 1914. Subsequently, on the 23rd Sept. 1915, notice was sent to the appellant's solicitors that an application would be made to the Prize Court to condemn the Germania. The application was made on the 28th Oct. 1915, and on the same day a decree was made condemning the Germania as lawful prize. It is against this decree that the appeal, on behalf of the owner of the Germania, is brought.

Two contentions were raised before their Lordships at the hearing of the appeal. In the first place, it was said that a racing yacht, such as the Germania, should not be regarded as property liable to confiscation and condemnation, as droits of Admiralty. No authority was adduced in support of this contention. In the opinion of their Lordships, there is no principle in Prize Law which would place a racing yacht in a special category, or exempt it, from the ordinary rule, that enemy property seized in port, after the outbreak of war, is liable to confiscation and condemnation as droits of Admiralty.

It was contended, secondly, and to this point the argument of the counsel for the appellant was mainly directed, that the Germania was un navire de commerce within the meaning of art. 1 of the Sixth Hague Convention, and as such was not liable to confiscation. If the Germania is not un navire de commerce, it is not within the protection of art. 1, and it is unnecessary to consider the further conditions specified in the article. In order to make good his contention that the Germania was un navire de commerce, Mr. Bateson argued that any private vessel should be regarded as un navire de commerce, and that every vessel is included within that designation which is not un navire d'État.

There is nothing in the context of art. 1 which would suggest that the expression un navire de commerce includes every class of private vessel; but reference was made to the proceedings of the International Naval Conference held in London on the 25th Feb. 1909, and to an extract from a Prize Court order published in Berlin on the 15th April 1911. The object of these references was apparently to suggest that there was some ambiguity in the language of art. 1, but their Lordships do not find that the language is ambiguous, and quotations from documents published subsequently to the Sixth Hague Convention, and dealing with a different subject in another context, cannot affect the question of construction which comes before their Lordships for decision in this appeal.

The preamble of the Sixth Hague Convention states that the signatory Powers "anxious to ensure the security of international commerce against the surprises of war, and wishing, in accordance with modern practice, to protect as fas as possible operations undertaken in good faith and in process of being carried out before the outbreak of hostilities, have resolved to conclude a convention to this effect."

These words clearly indicate that the purpose of the convention is the security of international commerce, and that the operations undertaken in good faith and in process of being carried out are operations of a commercial character. It is in accordance with this purpose that art. 1 protects under the specified conditions le navire de commerce, or, to use the English translation, "a merchant ship." A vessel which is described in the claim as a vessel of no value or utility for any commercial purpose, nor adaptable for such purpose, and not any part of the commercial resources of the enemy, is not in any sense a merchant ship or entitled to the protection of art. 1 of the Sixth Hague Convention.

The appellant further asked that an order should be made in the same form as in the case of The Gutenfels (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 346; 114 L. T. Rep. 953; (1916) 2 A. C. 112), but their Lordships are of opinion that that form of order is not applicable to the case of a vessel which is clearly not comprehended within the class of vessels to which alone the Sixth Hague Convention affords protection.

In the result the appeal fails and should be dismissed with costs, and their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

THE ELEFTHERIOS K. VENIZELOS (PART CARGO EX). (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COMMERCIAL COURT FOR MALTA (IN PRIZE).

Prize Court—Cargo—Whether destined for enemy—Onus of proof.

The Commercial Court for Malta (in Prize) found that a cargo of wheat seized as prize was on its way to an enemy destination and made an order that it should be condemned. At the hearing, the captors adduced no evidence in contradiction of the claimants' case, but subjected the whole of the transactions to the closest scrutiny, and suggested that in truth the wheat was on its way to an enemy destination.

Held, that, as the documents produced by the claimants were genuine and regular in form, in the absence of evidence to refute them they were deserving of credit. The decision below was based on assumptions that were mere conjectures and were therefore inadmissible, whereas the claimants' evidence discharged such burthen as rested on them and sufficed to establish their claim on the facts so proved.

Decision appealed from reversed.

APPEAL from a judgment of His Majesty's Commercial Court for Malta (in Prize), dated the 15th July 1915, relating to 1,000,000 kilos of wheat, forming part of the cargo on board the Greek steamship Eleftherios K. Venizelos, which was captured by H.M.S. York.

The claimants were the Società Anonima Alfredo Kun, of Genoa, and the respondent His Majesty's Crown Advocate (acting as Procurator-General) in Malta.

Roche, K.C. and R. A. Wright for the appellants.

Sir Gordon Hewart (S.-G.) and A. R. Kennedy for the respondent.

The considered opinion of the board was delivered by Lord SUMNER.—This appeal relates to a part cargo of wheat, 1,000,000 kilos in weight, which was captured on the 27th Feb. 1915 by H.M.S. York, on board the Greek steamer Eleftherios K. Venizelos, V. Velivanakis master, and condemned as prize by a judgment of His Majesty's Commercial Court for the Island of Malta and its Dependencies (in Prize), dated the 15th July 1915, upon the ground of enemy destination on a continuous voyage.

The appellants, who were claimants below, are an Italian company, the Società Anonima Alfredo Kun, of Genoa, of which the shares are, as appears from the evidence, largely owned by a firm of Bunge and Born, grain merchants, of Buenos Ayres. The partners in this firm are two subjects of the Argentine Republic, named Ernesto Bunge and Alfredo Hirsch, and one J. Born, a Belgian subject. The whole cargo, consisting of various cereals, was shipped by Bunge and Born at Bahia Blanca, and the parcel in question was represented by a single bill of lading, which made the wheat deliverable at

(a) Reported by W. E. REID, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Genoa, the vessel's port of discharge, to the Untermühle Zug Actiengesellschaft, Zug, Switzerland, or their assigns.

The appellants' case was as follows. The parcel in question was shipped in performance of a prior contract of sale between Bunge and Born, represented by the appellants as their agents, and the Untermühle Zug Actiengesellschaft. The residue of the cargo was consigned to various other named Swiss consignees. To the other parcels the captors made no claim; but, as at any rate a large portion of them had been acquired by the Italian Government, in favour of whom His Majesty's Government were willing, for the sake of amity, to waive any claim they might have, no inference ought to be drawn from this circumstance. On the very day on which the Eleftherios K. Venizelos finished loading at Bahia Blanca, the Società Anonima Alfredo Kun, without the receipt of any communication on the subject from Bunge and Born, so far as appears, began a negotiation by telegram for the purpose of purchasing the wheat from the Untermühle Company of Zug. They did this, as they say, because, as the market stood, the parcel was cheap, and accordingly they began by offering a premium or allowance for it of 30,000fr. The Swiss company at once stood out for 50,000fr. Four days later, bargaining going on meantime, the appellants learnt by cable from Bunge and Born that the wheat, actually shipped under the Swiss company's bill of lading in question, weighed 3 kilos per hectolitre more than the buyers were entitled to under the purchase contract.

Fortified by this private information, the appellants continued the haggling for the rest of the day, and eventually agreed to pay the 50,000fr. originally demanded, while protesting that the price was "enormous." They stipulated, naturally, that the bill of lading, which was then in course of transit by post, should be indorsed to them by the consignees, when it arrived, and this was done. The fourteen telegrams by means of which this negotiation was carried out were produced. They record in ordinary terms the interchanges that might be expected between two hard bargainers, acting at arm's length and each determined to get the better of the other. The subsequent course of the market, according to the appellants' evidence, showed that they had the best of it.

Subsequently the Società Anonima Alfredo Kun disposed of their purchase by sales to the Molino Carlo Molinari, fu Carlo, of Genoa, and Arturo Baranzini, of Milan, and by delivery under a prior sale to the Molino Bossi, of Lugano. Baranzini, in his turn, sold over to Fioruzzi and Co., of Piacenza, and the Molino Bossi to La Banca Russa per il Commercio Estero, at Genoa, who sold again to the Molino Sismondi, of Pinerolo. When the last of these sales was made by the appellants, the Eleftherios K. Venizelos was still on passage in the Atlantic, and they gave directions accordingly to the firm of cargo superintendents, who were to act in the discharge at Genoa, and sent bills of lading or delivery orders to the buyers to enable them to get delivery.

With few and immaterial exceptions, all the relevant mercantile documents, which would be brought into existence in the course of, and would constitute the best evidence of, the transactions above detailed, were placed by the claimants before the court below. Nor did counsel for the captors, at their Lordships' bar at least, contest their genuineness or suggest that any of them were fabricated. The learned judge at the trial appears to have been satisfied that, as documents, they were in the fullest sense what they purported to be.

The captors adduced no evidence in contradiction of the claimants' case, but subjected the whole of the transactions to the closest scrutiny, and suggested that in truth the wheat was on its way to an enemy destination. After full and careful examination, but by reasoning which their Lordships are not able to accept or indeed entirely to appreciate, the learned judge at the trial arrived at that conclusion.

Two assumptions appear to underlie this view: The first is that the Società Anonima Alfredo Kun desired to recover control of the bill of lading because it would enable them to effect the transmission of the wheat through Switzerland to Germany, without interference on the part either of the Italian or of the Swiss authorities; the second is that some and probably all of the above transactions were entered into merely to cloak the truth—namely, the enemy destination of the wheat.

Their Lordships are of opinion that all the evidence is to the contrary, and that, being regular in form, genuine in themselves, and contemporary in date, the documents, in the absence of evidence to refute them, are deserving of credit. It follows that the above assumptions are, in their opinion, mere conjectures and therefore inadmissible.

To deal with the latter first. It implies that, in pursuit of a scheme too tortuous to be intelligible, the appellants paid 50,000fr. to their Swiss partners in the operation, in order to obtain their consent to a change which was necessary to give effect to their common desires, and entangled themselves in serious claims for damages by various purchasers for no object except to give verisimilitude to a sham transaction in case they should be called on to support it in a Court of Prize. Of the former assumption it is sufficient to say that the matter was one for proof, and the evidence given tended to establish the contrary. Their Lordships fully appreciate that the learned judge may have been possessed of and influenced by information as to the course of transportation as it existed at the time in question over the Gothard Railway, whether obtained from other cases in prize tried before him or otherwise, which might well have seemed to him to support the view which he took upon this point; but as the evidence given in the case failed to support it, they are unable to agree with his conclusion.

In the result their Lordships are of opinion that the claimants' evidence discharged such burthen as rested on them and sufficed to establish their claim. They will accordingly humbly advise His Majesty that the appeal ought to be allowed, with costs, and the order appealed against ought to be reversed so far as it condemns the cargo in question; and that the sum in court, being the proceeds of the wheat which, on requisition by His Majesty's proper officer, was sold, less any sum paid by the Crown to the master for freight or otherwise under the order of the court below, ought to be paid out to the appellants.

THE DAKSA (CARGO EX). (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE SUPREME COURT OF GIBRALTAR, ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION (IN PRIZE).

Prize Court—Goods afloat—Shipment prior to outbreak of war—Apprehension of war—Transfer in fraud of belligerent—Capture by allied belligerent—Rights of captor.

Where upon the facts of the case it appears that the transfer of goods at sea was induced by apprehension on the part of the transferor of war being declared between the State to which he owed allegiance and another State, such transfer is deemed to be in fraud of the belligerent rights of the latter State if war is subsequently declared. But there is no such presumption in the case of an allied belligerent State, which State neither the vendor nor purchaser at the time of the transfer contemplated would declare war with the vendor's country.

Principles upon which a transfer of goods consigned to an enemy subject at an enemy port, made in apprehension of hostilities, is deemed to be made in fraud of captors considered.

Decision in The Southfield (13 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 150; 113 L. T. Rep. 655) approved and followed.

APPEAL by the Attorney-General and King's Proctor of Gibraltar from a decree of the Chief Justice of the island (the Hon. B. H. T. Freer), who directed that the proceeds of certain barley ex Daksa should be released to the respondents.

The respondents, Messrs. Louis Dreyfus and Co., were a French firm of grain merchants who had until the outbreak of the war a branch office at Hamburg. By their affidavits they stated that their Hamburg house had purchased the barley from the German firm of Messrs. Ehlers and Loewenthal, of Hamburg, by a c.i.f. contract made on the 13th June 1914; that on the 31st July 1914 the German firm had handed to their Hamburg manager an invoice for the barley and had tendered the shipping documents; and that on the following day their manager had paid to the sellers the amount of the invoice in exchange for the shipping documents.

The Chief Justice of Gibraltar found that, although the transfer of the barley was made by the German firm in fraud of possible French or Russian captors, it was not made in fraud of British captors, and, following The Southfield (13 Asp. Mar. Cas. 150; 113 L. T. Rep. 655) he directed that the proceeds of the barley should be released to the respondents.

Sir Gordon Hewart (S.-G.) and T. Mathew for the appellant.

Leck, K.C. and Raeburn for the respondents.

The considered judgment of the board was delivered by Lord PARKER OF WADDINGTON.—Their Lordships are of opinion that in view of the course taken both here and below the parties to this appeal must be deemed to have made all such admissions of fact as were necessary to reduce the issue to one single question—namely, Was the transfer of the 1st Aug. 1914 to the respondents by the German sellers made under such circumstances as to entitle the captors to treat the barley transferred as retaining, notwithstanding the transfer, the character of enemy property at the date of its seizure as prize?

The principles of prize law upon which the answer to this question depends may, so far as material, be summarised as follows: (1) Where a transfer of goods at sea is induced by apprehension on the part of the transferor of the outbreak of hostilities between the State to which he owes allegiance and another State, such transfer is deemed to be in fraud of the belligerent rights of the latter State, and should such hostilities subsequently arise and the goods be seized as prize, the transferee cannot (at any rate if he were aware of the apprehension which induced the transfer) set up his own title in order to show that the goods had at the date of seizure lost their enemy character. (2) If at the date of the transfer the circumstances were such as to give rise to a general apprehension of war the onus is on the transferee to prove the complete innocence of the transaction. It will not be enough to prove his own innocence. He must prove also that the contract was not induced by apprehension of war on the part of the transferor. (3) The transferee may discharge this onus by showing that the transfer was pursuant to a contract made at a time when no such hostilities were apprehended.

In the present case the respondents set up that the transfer of the 1st Aug. 1914 was made pursuant to a contract dated the 13th July 1914. This may very probably have been the case, but it can hardly be said to have been proved; for the contract of the 13th July 1914 was not produced, nor is there any satisfactory evidence as to its terms. Their Lordships prefer to base their advice to His Majesty upon another ground.

The learned judge in the court below held that there was at the date of the transfer no such general apprehension of hostilities between this country and Germany as to throw upon the transferee the onus of proving that the transfer was not in fraud of our belligerent rights. This was in accordance with the view expressed by the President in the case of The Southfield (ubi sup.), and their Lordships are not prepared to differ from the learned judge upon what is in reality a finding of fact. The only question, therefore, is whether the British captors are, because war between France and Germany was at the date of transfer undoubtedly generally apprehended and subsequently broke out, in a better position than they could otherwise have been. In their Lordships' opinion they are not. A transfer induced by apprehension of hostilities is not void. It merely cannot be set up against those in fraud of whose rights it is deemed to have been made. Here there was no transfer which can be deemed to be in fraud of the rights of British captors because there is nothing to show and nothing to raise any presumption that the transferor was induced to make the transfer by apprehension of war between Germany and the United Kingdom. Their Lordships agree in this respect with the judgment of the court below and with the decision of the President in the case of The Southfield already referred to.

Under the circumstances their Lordships will humbly advise His Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed with costs.

COURT OF APPEAL.

The Thorsa. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Damage to cargo — Seaworthiness — Fitness to carry cargo—Contract of carriage—Improper stowage—Excepted peril.

Chocolate was put on board a steamship for carriage from Genoa to London. The chocolate was shipped in good condition, but was delivered in a damaged state owing to the chocolate having been stowed in a hold in which cheeses were stowed. The consignees of the chocolate brought an action to recover the damage they had sustained. The shipowners pleaded as a defence an exception in the bill of lading relieving them from liability for negligent stowage. The consignees by their reply alleged that the shipowners could not rely on the exception, as the ship was unfit to carry the chocolate when the ship was loaded or when the voyage began.

Held, affirming the decision of Bargrave Deane, J., that the ship was not unseaworthy; that the damage was caused by improper stowage; and that the respondents were protected by the exception in the bill of lading and were entitled to rely on the exception.

Appeal from a decision of Bargrave Deane, J. by which he held that the appellants were not entitled to recover from the respondents the damage sustained by them by reason of certain chocolate, owned by the appellants, being stowed in the respondents' ship near certain cheese.

The appellants were the owners of cargo laden on the Thorsa; the respondents were the owners of the Thorsa.

The appellants shipped 1838 cases of chocolate in good order and condition on board the Thorsa, under a bill of lading dated the 8th Dec. 1914, for carriage from Genoa to London. The appellants alleged that it was the duty of the respondents to deliver the chocolate in like good order and condition, and that in breach of that duty they failed to deliver it in good order and condition, and in fact delivered it tainted and deteriorated by taint from cheese.

The respondents admitted that the chocolate was shipped on the Thorsa under the terms and on the conditions contained in the bill of lading, but denied that they had been guilty of any breach of duty, or that they had delivered the chocolate tainted or deteriorated by taint from cheese. The respondents relied upon the following clauses in the bill of lading:

1. Not responsible for "all loss and damage whatsoever from . . . perils of the sea . . . all loss and damage arising from any act, neglect, or default whatsoever . . . of the officers, engineers, crew, stevedores, or agents of the owners in the management, loading, or stowing . . . of the ship . . . or otherwise, and the owners being in no way liable for any consequences of the causes before mentioned."

2. ". . . Not answerable for . . . contact with other goods . . ."

3. ". . . Owners of the vessel shall not be liable for any claim whatever, unless the same or notice thereof be made or given in writing before the craft or the goods leave the ship's side, when in case of damage or dispute a survey . . . may be held."

The respondents alleged that reasonable means for the ventilation of the cargo were provided, but that the weather was such that all the ventilation covers had to be kept on and the hatches had to be closed during the voyage. They further alleged that the notice specified in clause 3 was not given to them.

The appellants in their reply alleged that the respondents were not entitled to rely on the clauses in the bill of lading because the Thorsa when the chocolate was loaded or when the voyage commenced was not seaworthy or fit to carry the chocolate in that it was carried where it was liable to become and did become tainted by cheese.

The action was heard by Bargrave Deane, J. on the 21st Dec. 1915. The appellants called certain evidence, and at the close of the appellants' ase the respondents submitted that the appellants had made out no case. The learned judge gave judgment for the respondents.

Bargrave Deane, J.—In my opinion this ship was seaworthy when she started on her voyage, and there was no reason why she should not carry both the cheese and the chocolate. They were not dangerous cargoes either of them—this case is not like the cases which have been quoted—and the whole matter resolves itself into a question of stowage. It is a case of bad stowage and nothing else, and that bad stowage did not render the ship unseaworthy. Therefore there must be judgment for the defendants.

On the 15th March 1916 the appellants gave notice of appeal against the judgment of Bargrave Deane, J., asking that the judgment should be set aside and that judgment should be entered for them.

MacKinnon, K.C. and C. R. Dunlop for the appellants.—If a vessel is unfit to carry the particular cargo her owners have contracted to carry she is unseaworthy:

Kopitoff v. Wilson, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 163; 34 L. T. Rep. 677; 1 Q. B. Div. 377;

Ingram and Royle v. Services Maritimes, 12 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 295; 108 L. T. Rep. 304; (1913) 1 K. B. 538.

Exceptions can only protect the shipowners if they have provided a ship which is seaworthy at the beginning of the voyage:

The Glenfruin, 5 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 413; 52 L. T. Rep. 769; 10 P. Div. 103.

[Phillimore, L.J.—That proposition is too wide: (Cohn v. Davidson, 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 374; 36 L. T. Rep. 244; 2 Q. B. Div. 455).] The respondents have not discharged the burden of proof which was on them. To enable them to defeat the claim they should have proved that the negligence which caused the damage was the negligence of those mentioned in the exceptions. This they have not done.

Bateson, K.C. and A. Neilson, for the respondents, were only called on to deal with the point raised by the appellants as to the burden of proof.

Swinfen Eady, L.J.—In this case the owners of cargo on board the steamship Thorsa sued the shipowners for damage to cargo. Bargrave Deane, J. found that the damage had resulted from bad stowage and from nothing else, and that the defendants were protected by the exception in the bill of lading, and he gave judgment for the defendants. It is against that judgment that the plaintiffs now appeal.

The plaintiffs were the owners of 1838 cases of chocolate that were shipped on board the Thorsa at Genoa for carriage to London. The bill of lading is dated the 8th Dec. 1914. The case made by the plaintiffs was that on the arrival of the goods at the port of discharge and on the consignees receiving the goods they were so tainted and affected by the smell of cheese as to be damaged and almost, if not quite, unmerchantable. The extent of the damage is immaterial; there would have been a reference to the registrar to ascertain the amount of the damage if the plaintiffs had succeeded, so the amount of it is not in question here, and that damage was occasioned is not in dispute. The question is whether the defendants can rely on the provisions of the bill of lading and so be absolved from liability for the damage.

The ship carried in addition to the chocolate a quantity of Gorgonzola cheese and a number of turkeys. Apparently the ship met with exceptionally bad weather and the consequence was that the hatches were kept on during the voyage. There was no opportunity of obtaining further ventilation by removing the hatches, and when the cargo arrived in London there was an offensive smell given off from it. I think it is clear from the evidence of the lighterman in control of the barges discharging the ship that the smell was very offensive and that it was caused particularly by the turkeys, which were in a state of decomposition; but it was also established, or it must be taken, I think, on the evidence of the plaintiffs to be established, that the chocolate was affected by the cheese which was carried on the ship. It was suggested that it was the boxes in which the chocolate was contained and not the chocolate itself which was affected, but I think the fair result of the evidence given on behalf of the plaintiffs is that the chocolate was seriously tainted by reason of its proximity to the Gorgonzola cheese, and that it had become tainted by the cheese. That fact the plaintiffs established.

But the plaintiffs were not content with merely proving that the cargo arrived damaged; they produced evidence to show what had occasioned the damage, and, in my opinion, it is established by the plaintiffs' evidence that what caused the damage was the improper stowage. The exact details of the stowage are not proved. A stowage plan was produced to which both parties referred, and which, although not formally proved, was referred to in turn, first by one side and then by the other. It was referred to by Bargrave Deane, J. and it has been handed up to us, and for what it is worth, making the same use of it that was made by both sides and by Bargrave Deane, J. in the court below, it would appear that the chocolate was stowed at the bottom of the hold in question and the cheese in the upper part. In other words, it would appear that the chocolate was put on board first and the cheese was stowed on top of it. But, in any case, the plaintiffs established that cheese and chocolate were stowed in the same hold, and that, by reason of the hatches being kept on throughout the voyage, the ventilation was insufficient, and the chocolate was affected and deteriorated in quality by the proximity of the cheese. I should add this, that it does not appear that this was the first shipment of the kind in which cheese and chocolate had been placed in the same hold. Before the war the ordinary way in which chocolate was sent from Switzerland to this country was by a different route. By reason of that route being closed owing to the war this chocolate was sent from Switzerland to Genoa and was shipped from Genoa by sea to London. The voyages of the Thorsa began in Aug. 1914, when the war began. The date of this bill of lading was Dec. 1914, and both before and afterwards similar cargoes, chocolate and cheese, had travelled together in a similar manner in the same ship, in the same hold, without damage; but on this voyage the plaintiffs proved damage.

The defendants plead the exceptions in the bill of lading, and the only one which it is necessary to refer to is the exception relieving them from liability for "all loss and damage arising from any act, neglect, or default whatsoever . . . of the officers, engineers, crew, stevedores, servants, or agents of the owners in the management, loading, or stowage . . . of the ship . . . or otherwise, and the owners being in no way liable for any consequences of the causes before mentioned." Put shortly, that is improper stowage, and the defendants rely on that exception. The plaintiffs in their reply after joinder of issue meet that by saying, "The defendants are not entitled to rely on clauses 1, 2, or 3 of the bill of lading by reason of the fact that the Thorsa, when the chocolate was loaded and (or) the voyage commenced was not seaworthy or fit for carrying the chocolate in that the chocolate was carried where it was liable to become and did become tainted by cheese." That is to say, they reply that it was the improper stowage which occasioned the damage, and then they allege that that rendered the vessel unseaworthy.

It was contended for the plaintiffs that the defendants had failed to make out their defence, as they had not shown that the servants of the owners were responsible for the bad stowage, and that it might have been that the owners themselves had actually directed the ship to be stowed in the way she was. Having regard to the way it is pleaded and to the conduct of the case in the court below, I am of opinion that this point is not open to the appellants. If there were any facts upon which the plaintiffs intended to rely as showing some active intervention of the owners in directing the stowage, they should have specially pleaded them. They have not only failed to do this, but they point to the fact that improper stowage, and not the persons by whom it was done, is the ground of their complaint. That is their defence, and it was upon that defence that they went to trial.

In the present case it is not contended that the ship was in any way defective in design or in structure or in condition or equipment at the time she sailed. The sole point is the way in which the cargo was stowed. It is not contended that on the date when the ship was empty and ready to receive cargo that she was in any way defective, nor is it contended that the cargo or any part of it was stowed so as to be a danger to the ship herself. In other words, the case is not brought within the principle of cases like Tattersall v. National Steamship Company (ubi sup.), where the defendants had not proved the ship to be reasonably fit for the purpose of the carriage of cattle which they had contracted to take; nor is it governed by cases like Kopitoff v. Wilson (ubi sup.) or Ingram and Royle Limited v. Services Maritimes de Tréport (ubi sup.), where bad stowage endangered the safety of the vessel. The contention put forward amounts to this, that if two parcels of cargo are so stowed that one can injure the other during the course of the voyage, the ship is unseaworthy. I am not prepared to accept that. It would be an extension of the meaning of unseaworthiness going far beyond any reported case.

In these circumstances I am of opinion that, having regard to the facts established by the plaintiffs' evidence, the ship was not unseaworthy; that the plaintiffs failed to prove unseaworthiness, and that there is nothing to prevent the defendants relying upon and being freed from liability by the exception in the bill of lading of "All loss and damage arising from any act . . . of the officers, engineers, crew, stevedores, servants, or agents of the owners in the management, loading, or stowing . . . of the ship."

I am of opinion, therefore, that the learned judge in the court below was right in the judgment that he gave dismissing the action, and that the appeal fails.

Phillimore, L.J.—In this case the steamship which carried the cargo in question is either owned or chartered by a limited company residing in London, and the home port is London. The damage to the chocolate was either proved or admitted. I think the nature of the damage was proved. I assume that this damage was caused by the chocolate being tainted by cheese. In that case the cause of the damage was the negligent stowage of the cheese and chocolate in the same hold. The bill of lading excepts the owners from liability for loss "from any act, neglect, or default whatsoever of the pilot, master, officers, crew . . . stevedores, servants, or agents of the owners in the management, loading, stowage, discharge, or navigation of the ship." This being a foreign port, one assumes that the ship was under the control of the master, and that the negligent stowage was due to his action or inaction, or that of the crew, or of the stevedores whom he would employ. No doubt it is possible that there might be express directions by the owners that the cargo should be stowed in a particular way, but in the absence of proof of that, and in the absence of any suggestion of that in the pleading or in letters written before action, I think the defendants were not called on to prove that this stowage was not done by the express direction of the owners, and I take it we must assume that it was done either by the master, the crew, the stevedores, or other servants or agents of the owners for whose negligence they have contracted not to be responsible.

The point taken in answer to that is that the stowage made the ship unseaworthy—not unseaworthy altogether, but unseaworthy quo ad this parcel of cargo, unfit to carry it in the way in which it was proposed to carry it. Taking it as not proved that the cheese was there first, taking it as most probable that the cheese came there afterwards, I do not think that it made the ship unseaworthy quo ad the chocolate. The point taken upon this by counsel for the appellants was that the moment when seaworthiness is to be tested is the moment when the ship leaves the harbour, and by that time there had been the wrong juxtaposition, and therefore the ship was unfit to continue to carry, in the way in which it was carried, this chocolate. I do not think that is the way to test this particular kind of unseaworthiness. I am aware of the case of Cohn v. Davidson (ubi sup.), but I do not think it is applicable to this case. When one is dealing with the structure of the ship, a ship may be and must be seaworthy according to stages. If the first stage is the less dangerous stage and it is intended and supposed, as in the ordinary course would be the case, that after the first stage the ship should be further fitted for the second stage, it will be enough that the ship is, as it is sometimes called, riverworthy for the first stage, and seaworthy for the second stage. If the first stage is the more dangerous stage, the ship must be worthy or fit for it from the beginning. In Cohn v. Davidson (ubi sup.) the ship was seaworthy when she was brought to the quay, but an injury to her hull made her unseaworthy before she left the harbour. She was sufficiently seaworthy to take in the cargo and to move about the harbour; she was not sufficiently seaworthy to go to sea and confront the perils of the seas; and, by reason of the principle that you must look at structural seaworthiness in stages, the ship was held not to be seaworthy. I see no reason to apply such a principle to the question of the stowage of two parcels of cargo which are placed in juxtaposition in the hold of a ship.

Having regard to all the circumstances of this case, and confining myself to this case, and the way in which I apprehend the stowage took place and the damage happened, I am not prepared to say that this ship was in any sense of the word unseaworthy.

I will only add that, if this did constitute unseaworthiness, it would be well worth inquiring whether it is not the very unseaworthiness whichthe owners of the ship contracted not to be responsible for in the clause that I have already cited of exception in the bill of lading.

Bankes, L.J.—I agree. The plaintiffs' complaint here was that the defendants had failed to deliver their chocolate in the like good order and condition in which they had shipped it, and they alleged that the mischief was caused because the chocolate had been placed in contact with and had become tainted by cheese. The defendants' answer was: "We are relieved from any liability in respect of that complaint because the stowage was done either by the master or the officers or the crew or the stevedores—either by the stevedores alone or by them in conjunction with the officers of the ship—and there is a provision in the bill of lading which relieves us from any liability for any such stowage." The plaintiffs' reply to that was that the placing of the cheese and the chocolate in immediate contact in the stowage rendered the ship unseaworthy, and the case therefore came within the principle of those cases which say that where a shipowner seeks to relieve himself from the obligation to provide a seaworthy ship he must do so in clear and unambiguous language, which he failed to do in this bill of lading.

Junior counsel for the plaintiffs has taken the point that the defendants failed to give the necessary evidence that the stowage was the act of the master, officers, crew, or stevedores, either singly or combined. If that had been made a part of the case from the beginning, it may be that he would have been entitled to rely on that contention; but, looking at the pleadings and at the way the case was conducted, and judging as far as one can from the evidence, the examination, and the cross-examination, I quite agree with what has already fallen from the other members of the court, that that point was really not the point in the case in the court below; it was only raised by counsel at the last moment at a time when it was not open to him to do so. That being so, one has to consider what the position is with regard to the rest of the case.

The case for the plaintiffs rests entirely on their establishing this alleged unseaworthiness. We have been referred to certain cases and it is admitted that there is no case which has gone as far as the appellants' contention, and, without expressing any opinion as to what constitutes unseaworthiness, it is sufficient to say that in this case, if it be unseaworthiness at all, it is unseaworthiness using that term in a particularly narrow sense. But even if the appellants could establish unseaworthiness, they have got to take the next step, which is to show that they bring themselves within the principle I have stated, and that the respondents have failed to indicate in sufficiently clear and unambiguous language that they seek to protect themselves by the clause in the bill of lading from the particular act or class of act of which the appellants are complaining. Upon that point it seems to me that the appellants fail.

The complaint here is negligent stowage, negligent stowage which is said to amount to unseaworthiness. I fail to see that there is anything wanting in the language used, that it can be said to be either ambiguous or wanting in clearness when the shipowner provides that with regard to stowage he will not be responsible for the act of the stevedore or the master or the officers.

In my opinion, in this case, this appeal fails, and fails upon the ground that the shipowner has clearly and in unambiguous language protected himself against the very class of act of which the appellants complain.

The Polzeath. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE ADMIRALTY DIVISION.

Right to register a ship as a British ship—Ship owned by a limited company registered in England — Principal place of business of the company — Control of company in Germany — Forfeiture of ship—Position of British shareholders in the company owning the forfeited ship—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 1, 9, 76—Merchant Shipping Act 1906 (6 Edw. 7, c. 48), s. 51.

A ship owned by a limited company was registered as a British ship. A doubt having arisen as to whether the ship was rightly registered as a British ship, inquiry was made by the Registrar of Shipping at the port of registry of the ship under sect. 51 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1906 as to whether the ship was rightly registered. It appeared that the business of the company was controlled by a German, who was a naturalised British subject, and who had resided in Hamburg for some considerable time before and after the outbreak of war. Proceedings were then instituted, asking for the forfeiture of the ship. Bargrave Deane, J. declared the ship to be forfeited to the Crown, and subsequently allowed the British shareholders to intervene in the proceedings to protect their interests, but refused to order that when the ship was sold they should be granted an amount out of the sum realised by the sale proportionate to their interest in the company. The company and the British shareholders appealed.

Held, by the Court of Appeal, affirming the decision of Bargrave Deane, J. that the ship was rightly forfeited to the Crown, as the general superintendence of the business was carried on in Hamburg and the company was controlled from Hamburg.

Held, further, that the British shareholders were not entitled to intervene in the proceedings, and that the court had no power to order any payment to be made to them when the ship was sold.

Appeal from a decision of Bargrave Deane, J. holding that the steamship Polzeath was subject to forfeiture to the Crown, and further holding that the court could not grant certain relief to the British shareholders in the company which owned the Polzeath.

(a) Reported by L. F. C. Darby, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The plaintiff in the action was W. C. Searley; the defendants were the owners of the steamship Polzeath.

The plaintiff was an officer of customs and excise. In Oct. 1914 the steamship Polzeath, which was then named the Walter Dammeyer, was registered as a British ship at the port of King's Lynn, in Norfolk, in the name of the Lynn and Hamburg Steamship Company. The Commissioners of Customs being doubtful whether the ship was entitled to be registered as a British ship, directed the plaintiff, who was acting as registrar of shipping at King's Lynn, to require evidence to be given to his satisfaction within thirty days that the said ship was entitled to be registered as a British ship. The plaintiff, on the 2nd Nov. 1914, wrote requiring the company to give evidence to his satisfaction within thirty days from that date that the ship was entitled to be registered as a British ship. The statement of claim alleged that no satisfactory evidence was given within that time, and the plaintiff claimed a declaration that the said ship, with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, became and was forfeited to His Majesty, or that the said ship should be forfeited to His Majesty and might be sold by the marshal of the court.

The defendants by their defence alleged that the ship was owned by the Lynn and Hamburg Steamship Company; that the company was duly formed under the Companies Acts in 1888, and had its registered office and principal place of business in England. They alleged that the steamship was duly registered as a British ship in 1911. They denied that no satifactory evidence had been given as to the title of the ship to be registered, and alleged that the plaintiff was not entitled to the declaration or judgment claimed.

The Attorney-General (Sir F. E. Smith, K.C.), Leslie Scott, K.C., and J. Wylie, for the plaintiff, contended that the principal place of business of the company was in Hamburg, and, in addition to the sections of the Act of Parliament set out in the judgment of Swinfen Eady, L J., referred to the following authorities:

De Beers v. Howe, 95 L. T. Rep. 221; (1906) A. C. 455;
San Paulo Railway Company v. Carter, 73 L. T. Rep. 538; (1896) A. C. 31;
American Thread Company v. Joyce, 108 L. T. Rep. 353; 29 Times L. Rep. 266;
Palmer v. Caledonian Railway Company, 66 L. T. Rep. 771; (1892) Q. B. 823;
Dicey's Conflict of Laws, rule 19, p. 160;
Lindley on Companies, 6th edit., p. 1223.

MacKinnon, K.C. and Dunlop, for the company, contended that the principal place of business of the company was at King's Lynn, and that the vessel was managed at King's Lynn.

Judgment was reserved and was delivered by Bargrave Deane, J. on the 28th March 1916.

BARGRAVE DEANE, J.—Before and on the 30th Oct. 1914 a vessel named the Walter Dammeyer was registered as a British ship at the port of King's Lynn, Norfolk, in the name of the Lynn and Hamburg Steamship Company Limited.

The Lynn and Hamburg Steamship Company Limited was duly formed under the Companies Acts in 1888, and has its registered office and principal place of business in England. So far as appears in the evidence, the Walter Dammeyer is the only steamship owned by this company. She was registered as a British ship in 1911, and her port of registry was and is King's Lynn, in Norfolk.

According to the declaration of Arthur Lyon Tassell, the manager of the said company, dated the 19th Nov. 1914, the shares in the said company are held by fourteen persons in all, four of whom are directors—namely: Hermann Dammeyer, of Hamburg; G. A. Meves, of London; Henry Ruffer, of London; and Carl Breithan, of Hamburg.

The fourteen shareholders are:—

	Shares.
(1) Hermann Dammeyer, Hamburg	845
(2) Gertrude Dammeyer, his wife	6
(3) Carl Breithan, Hamburg	50
(4) Henry Ruffer, London	160
(5) Walter Savage, Hamburg...	2
(6) G. A. Meves, London...	100
(7) Hallack and Bond, Cambridge...	10
(8) Helene Schrader, Brunswick	10
(9) Frederick Cleves, London...	10
(10) Charles Ford, St. Leonards-on-Sea	16
(11) Alfred Bone, Streatham Hill	1
(12) George Charles Vasmer, London	210
(13) Charles John Bailey, London	150
(14) Thomas G. Bilton, Wallington, Surrey ...	40
	1610

The four directors, according to Mr. Tassell, are:

Dammeyer: A naturalised British subject, living in London till six or seven years ago, when he went with Walter Savage, the secretary of the company, to Hamburg, where he has lived ever since. When war broke out the secretary was interned by the German authorities, but Dammeyer has remained at liberty in Hamburg.

Meves: A British subject, born and living in London.

Ruffer: A naturalised British subject, 1891, of Swiss origin, but born in France.

Breithan: A German subject, living in Hamburg.

I have no doubt, from the history of Dammeyer, and the fact that he is now living freely in Hamburg, though the secretary, who lived with him there, has been interned, that though naturalised here he is recognised as a German subject by the German authorities.

It was proved to my satisfaction that Dammeyer has been to all intents and purposes an autocrat in managing the affairs of this so-called English company from Hamburg before and since the war, and especially in the management of the only steamship belonging to this steamship company.

The correspondence and minute book of the company show this, but I do not propose to go through them in detail in my judgment. They were put in evidence before me.

I am satisfied that this company, though nominally composed of these fourteen shareholders, of whom four were directors (of whom two were Germans), was entirely managed and directed from Hamburg by Hermann Dammeyer. The declaration of Mr. Tassell shows that when the London directors wished to let the ship on charter, Mr. Dammeyer, by his agent in Holland, peremptorily forbade it, with the result that the London directors at once submitted and abandoned the idea.

The name of the ship was subsequently changed from that of Walter Dammeyer to Polzeath, and she is now in the hands of the Admiralty.

On or about the 30th Oct. 1914, after war had been declared between this country and Germany, the plaintiff Walter Charles Searley, acting Registrar of Shipping at King's Lynn, pursuant to sect. 51 of 6 Edw. 7, c. 48, required from Mr. Tassell, the manager at King's Lynn, evidence to be given to his satisfaction that the ship was entitled to be registered as a British ship, and Mr. Tassell made the declaration and furnished the other information to which I have before referred.

Not being satisfied, Mr. Searley commenced this action under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 1, 69, 71, and 76), to have the ship declared forfeit to His Majesty.

The question I have to ask myself is whether the Polzeath is entitled to her registry as a British ship, or whether she is in fact a German ship assuming a British character and using the British flag wrongfully, being, in fact, subject to the orders and direction of a company German in feeling and controlled by a German resident in Germany.

My attention has been called to several decisions as to what is to be looked to in order to ascertain the true character of this so-called English company and English ship. These cases are: Palmer v. Caledonian Railway Company (ubi sup.), San Paulo Railway Company v. Carter (ubi sup), and De Beers Consolidated Mines Limited v. Howe (ubi sup.).

The cases come to this, that to decide the true character and entity of a business or company you must ascertain where the motive or directing force of the business or company comes from; in other words, where the real life is, and not where the limbs move to give effect to that living motive power.

The whole of the documents in this case point to Mr. Hermann Dammeyer as the life and driving force of this so-called English company and director of the use to which this single ship of the company is to be put, and the English shareholders and directors as mere puppets pulled by his strings. In my opinion, the whole history of this gentleman, although he has been naturalised in this country, leads me to the belief that he still considers himself a German, and by residing at Hamburg during this war without molestation by the German authorities he is recognised by them as a German subject, and as such must be considered in this court, and the company and ship which he so controls are not entitled to registration as an English company or an English ship.

I therefore declare the Polzeath to be forfeited to His Majesty.

There will be judgment for the plaintiff with costs.

June 8, 1916.—Raeburn moved the court on behalf of the British shareholders in the company, asking that they might be made parties to the suit, and that the court should hear an application in support of their interest. If the British shareholders were made parties to the proceedings they would ask for an order that the forfeiture of the ship should not entail the forfeiture of their interest in her. The questions raised were whether the court had power to make any such order; whether, if the court had such power, the court would, under the circumstances, exercise it, and what the nature of the relief ought to be. It is submitted that the court has power to make an order to protect the British shareholders under sect. 76 (1) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, which provided that "where any ship has either wholly, or as to any share therein, become subject to forfeiture . . . the court may . . . make such order in the case as to the court seems just." The circumstances were such that, if the court had power to make the order, the court should make it for the British shareholders, who held 699 shares out of a total 1610 in the company, could have done nothing to prevent the managing director from adopting the course which resulted in the forfeiture. [BARGRAVE DEANE, J.—Could they not have got rid of the managing director?] It might have been possible, but the action of the British shareholders in not doing so was not a matter which should tell against them, as the circumstances were so novel. With regard to the nature of the relief that might be granted, the shareholders submitted that when the Crown sold the vessel the British shareholders should receive an amount out of the sum realised proportionate to their holding in the company.

Leslie Scott, K.C. and James Wylie for the Crown—The ship was owned by the defendant company. The shareholders in the company have no locus standi whatever, and ought not to be made parties to the proceedings. The words "make such order in the case" in sect. 76 (1) referred to the case before the court, and that case was not concerned with the rights of individual shareholders, it only dealt with the question whether a company owning the ship was a body corporate established under and subject to the laws of some part of His Majesty's dominions, and having its principal place of business in those dominions. As to whether the court should make an order in favour of the British shareholders. Even if the court had the power to make such an order, in this case it ought not to exercise its power in favour of the shareholders because they had allowed the principal place of business to be outside His Majesty's dominions, and were breaking the law in allowing that. The court should not make the order asked for by the applicants.

Raeburn in reply.

BARGRAVE DEANE, J.—I will give the British shareholders leave to become parties to the proceedings. The question which I have now to determine is whether I can discriminate between the British shareholders and the German shareholders in the company which owns this ship. I do not think I can discriminate. My view is that the British shareholders had the right if they had liked to exercise it as soon as they found that the principal place of business of the company was not in a place in His Majesty's dominions, to have had the administration of the company taken out of the hands of the managing director.

They did nothing of this kind, but allowed things to go on as before, therefore I think I ought not to grant them any relief even if I have the power to do so.

The ship having been forfeited to the Crown it is, of course, open to the Crown to exercise that consideration towards the British shareholders which the Crown in its clemency may think they are entitled to.

I must reject this motion with costs.

The company and the British shareholders appealed from the decision of Bargrave Deane, J.

MacKinnon, K.C. and Dunlop for the appellants, the owners of the Polzeath.

The Attorney-General (Sir F. E. Smith, K.C), Leslie Scott, K.C., and J. Wylie for the respondent.

The arguments were the same as in the court below, and, in addition to the cases cited in the court below, the following was cited:

The Annandale, 37 L. T. Rep. 139; 3 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 489; 2 Prob. Div. 218.

Swinfen Eady, L.J.—The question raised by this appeal is whether the ship that was formerly called the Walter Dammeyer, but since she has been chartered by the British Government, has been called the Polzeath, was rightly pronounced by the judgment now under appeal to have been forfeited.

The proceedings have been taken under the Merchant Shipping Acts to sustain a cause of forfeiture of the ship to the Crown. It is provided by the Merchant Shipping Act 1906, s. 51, sub-sect. 1, that:

Where it appears to the Commissioners of Customs that there is any doubt as to the title of any ship registered as a British ship to be so registered, they may direct the registrar of the port of registry of the ship to require evidence to be given to his satisfaction that the ship is entitled to be registered as a British ship.

And then by sub-sect. 2:

If within such time, not less than thirty days, as the commissioners fix, satisfactory evidence of the title of the ship to be registered is not so given, the ship shall be subject to forfeiture under part 1 of the principal Act.

Part 1 of the principal Act (Merchant Shipping Act 1894) provides, by sect. 76, that:

Where any ship has either wholly or as to any share therein become subject to forfeiture under this part of this Act, (a) any commissioned officer on full pay in the military or naval service of Her Majesty; (b) any officer of customs in Her Majesty's dominions; or (c) any British Consular officer, may seize and detain the ship and bring her for adjudication before the High Court in England or Ireland, or before the Court of Sessions in Scotland and elsewhere before any Colonial Court of Admiralty, or Vice-Admiralty Court in Her Majesty's dominions, and the court may thereupon adjudge the ship with her tackle, apparel and furniture to be forfeited to Her Majesty and make such order in the case as to the court seems just, and may award to the officer bringing in the ship for adjudication such portion of the proceeds of the sale of the ship or any share therein as the court think fit.

Now the qualification for owning British ships contained in sect. 1 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 provides that:

A ship shall not be deemed to be a British ship unless owned wholly by persons of the following description in this Act referred to as persons qualified to be owners of British ships.

And then clause D of that section extends to Bodies corporate established under and subject to the laws of some part of Her Majesty's dominions, and having their principal place of business in those dominions.

And sect. 9, which provides for the declaration of ownership that has to be made on registry of a British ship, provides that:

A person shall not be entitled to be registered as owner of a ship or of a share therein until he, or in the case of a corporation the person authorised by this Act to make declarations on behalf of the corporation, has made and signed a declaration of ownership, referring to the ship as described in the certificate of the surveyor, and containing the following particulars.

And then sub-sect. 1:

A statement of his qualifications to own a British ship, or in the case of a corporation of such circumstances of the constitution and business thereof as prove it to be qualified to own a British ship.

I refer to sub-sect. 1 of sect. 9 as aiding the construction of clause D of sect. 1, which provides that the body corporate must have its principal place of business in Her Majesty's Dominions.

It is claimed that in the present case the company's ship was not properly registered in the name of the defendant company, which has not, as is alleged, its principal place of business in Her Majesty's dominions. The company is registered under the English Companies Acts, and at one time its principal place of business was in England. The case made against the company is that at all material times its principal place of business has been not in England, but in Hamburg. In considering what is the principal place of business of a company, assistance is derived from the case of Palmer v. Caledonian Railway Company (ubi sup.). There the words that were being considered were the principal office or one of the principal offices of a railway company. Lord Esher, then Master of the Rolls, said: "I should have thought without any authority that the principal office of the company must be the place at which the business of the company is controlled and managed. The only office that answers this description is the company's office at Glasgow. No part of the business of the company is controlled or managed, in the sense that it is independently controlled or managed, at Carlisle."

The point there was whether service upon the company at Carlisle was a good service upon the company at one of their principal offices, and Lopes, L.J. said: "What I understand by principal office is that office where the general superintendence and management of the business of the railway is carried on. . . ."

And so here, in considering what is the principal place of business of the company, one has to consider the centre from which instructions are given, and from which control is exercised on behalf of the company over the employees of and business of the company, and where control is exercised and the centre from which the company is managed without any further control except such control as every company or the directors of the company are liable to by the larger body which they represent—the shareholders of the company in general meeting.

To apply these considerations to the facts of this case, it appears that the Lynn and Hamburg Steamship Company Limited, being an English limited company, has an issued capital of 1610 shares. Of those shares one person, Hermann Dammeyer, owns more than half, so that as the voting power is a vote per share, each share carrying a vote, he controls the company in the sense that in general meeting he could carry by a majority of votes any proposition, and no vote adverse to his view could be carried in general meeting. His wife holds six shares, and there is another gentleman, Carl Breithan, a German, also living in Hamburg, who holds fifty shares. Thus Dammeyer, his wife, and Breithan hold 901 shares out of the total of 1610. Those three persons are German subjects. They hold an absolute majority of the shares, and in that way hold the control of the company.

There are, or were, until the outbreak of war, four directors, Mr. Dammeyer, Mr. Breithan, the two German gentlemen, and Mr. Henry Ruffer and Mr. G. A. Meves, both of whom reside in England. The German director, Dammeyer, is chairman of the board, and as such, according to the constitution of the company, has a casting vote in case of equality of votes on the board. If therefore the two German directors were to take one view at a board meeting, and the two English directors another, then Mr. Dammeyer's view, by reason of his being chairman and having a casting vote, would prevail.

Until some six or seven years before the year 1914—the year in which the answers are given to certain questions—Mr. Dammeyer was in England, but at that time, which would make it either 1907 or 1908, Mr. Dammeyer removed to Germany, and took up his residence in Hamburg. The secretary of the company, Mr. Savage, also went with Mr. Dammeyer to Hamburg. He has remained ever since as the paid secretary of the company. Upon the outbreak of the war it appears that Mr. Savage, who is English, was interned in Germany at Ruhleben, and remains interned. Mr. Dammeyer apparently is treated in Germany as a German subject, notwithstanding his English naturalisation, and is at large in Hamburg.

In order to see the way in which and the centre from which the company has hitherto been managed, the first source of information to which one would turn in the ordinary course would be the minute-book, which contains the record of the meetings of the board and what was done at them. But the minute-book is not forthcoming. It would be kept by the secretary, and we are told that it is in Germany.

Questions having arisen—perhaps I will say suspicions having arisen—with regard to this vessel, at the end of Oct. 1914, the Commissioners of Customs and Excise directed the registrar of shipping at the port of King's Lynn to make inquiries with regard to her, pursuant to sect. 51 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1906, and on Nov. 2 the acting collector at King's Lynn (Mr. Searley), as an officer of Customs, wrote to the company as follows: "I have been directed by the Commissioners of Customs and Excise to hold an inquiry under the above Act"—the letter is headed, "Merchant Shipping Act 1906, s. 51"—"as to the title of the steamship Walter Dammeyer to be registered as a British ship. You are therefore requested to produce evidence in order to prove to the satisfaction of the commissioners that the above-named vessel is so entitled to be registered. The evidence in answer hereto, which should be in affidavit form, should embody in addition to any other statement you may desire to make." And then there are various matters which are set out in the affidavit—statements as to six matters that are mentioned in the affidavit.

It will be observed that this request refers to sect. 51 of the Act. It requests the company to produce evidence that the vessel is entitled to be registered as a British ship, and whatever evidence they produce is entirely open to them; they may produce as evidence what they please, but, in addition to assist them, specific questions are asked with regard to certain details of the evidence.

They are asked the names and addresses of the directors, and where they reside. Then they are asked: "(3) Has an attempt been made to charter the ship since the outbreak of war? If so, who gave instructions to do so?" Then: "(4) Where is the chairman of the company and the other German director? Have they communicated in any way with the other directors since the outbreak of war? (5) Where is the secretary of the company? Is he taking any part in the business? (6) Is the business of the company controlled and the management of the business conducted at meetings of directors held at the registered office of the company at King's Lynn? Who have attended the meetings since the outbreak of war?"

That letter is answered by Mr. Tassell, the manager of the company. He gives the information which I have referred to with regard to the directors. As to Mr. Hermann Dammeyer, he says: "This director was, to my knowledge, a naturalised British subject during the whole of my acquaintance with him, extending for twenty-four years. He resided in London until six or seven years ago"—it is in Nov. 1914 that this information is given—"when he went to live at Hamburg, and, so far as I am aware, is still a British subject." Then he says that Meves, a director, is a British subject, that Henry Ruffer is a naturalised British subject of Swiss origin born in France, and that the fourth director, Carl Breithan, is a German. Those are the particulars of the two German and the two English directors. Then Mr. Tassell says: "I am the manager of the company, and reside at King's Lynn, and I am a British subject. The secretary of the company, Walter Savage, is a British-born subject, and until Mr. Hermann Dammeyer left London, resided also in London, but left with Mr. Dammeyer, and now resides at Hamburg." He then goes on to say that the company is managed by him subject to the control of the directors. Then No. 3 is an important question: "Has an attempt been made to charter the ship since the outbreak of war?" He says: "Since the outbreak of war no attempt has been made to charter the steamship Walter Dammeyer, although it was originally the intention of the London directors and myself to engage the vessel in the home trade, if profitable employment could be obtained, but Mr. Dammeyer, the director above referred to, communicated through a Mr. Sinnema, of Amsterdam, with me, and intimated that he did not approve of the chartering of the steamer for this purpose, but wished the steamer to remain in dock"; and then he exhibits the correspondence.

The Crown relies strongly upon this correspondence as showing what, without taking it at any fixed date, the real position of affairs is. Counsel for the appellants submitted that it should be taken roughly as since the war. Since the outbreak of war have the control of the company and the principal place of business of the company been in Hamburg? In my opinion we cannot look only to what has happened since the war. We must consider what the position was before the war. But for the moment, looking only to what has happened since the war, what is the position with regard to the chartering of this ship? The two directors being in Hamburg and the minute-book being in Hamburg, what took place on the outbreak of war was that in an informal manner, and in an irregular manner according to the constitution of the company, the two directors in England called to their aid two of the largest shareholders in England, and those four persons met from time to time, and with the assistance of Mr. Tassell, the manager, purported to exercise in England some of the powers of the company. The two shareholders had never been elected on the board, and it is not suggested that they were qualified to act as directors. It is not suggested that this irregular meeting purporting to assume to itself the functions of a board was a regular or legal method of carrying on the business of the company in accordance with its constitution, but it was an honest attempt to do the best they could under the circumstances. As I have said, the minute-book is not forthcoming; the minute-book is in Hamburg; but they started a memorandum-book in which they entered particulars of what this little committee did. One of the first things that they resolved upon was that this ship, which at the moment was idle, should be chartered or worked at a profit, and on the 17th Aug. they enter a memorandum of what they determined to do; they enter it as if it were a resolution of the board meeting: "It was further resolved that the marine and war risk insurance be covered over the period to be arranged if the steamer can be chartered or worked at a fair profit to the company." Then it appears that on the 26th Aug. Mr. Tassell wrote to Mr. Sinnema at Amsterdam — Mr. Sinnema being the medium of communication between London and Hamburg — and he passed the matter on to the chairman of the company in Hamburg. Mr. Tassell communicated in that way the decision at which this committee had arrived at the 17th Aug. He said: "If you are communicating with Mr. Dammeyer please inform him that everything is in good order;" and then the letter contains this statement: "If we can cover her marine insurance at Lloyd's later on, at a reasonable rate, also the war insurance, and can see a chance of running her in the coasting trade at a profit, we propose to do so." As soon as that was communicated to the chairman of the company the authority of the chairman was immediately put in force, and the next thing was a telegram of the 1st Sept. It was apparently a telegram sent from Hamburg to Amsterdam, and from Amsterdam to London. Sinnema on the 1st Sept. telegraphs: "Dammeyer telegraphs not to charter steamer. Expect letter.—Sinnema." The next day there is a letter. I suppose it is sent by the chairman, Dammeyer, to Mr. Tassell, but, obviously, through Amsterdam. On the 2nd Sept. the chairman says: "Referring to my yesterday's communication, kindly put forward to you by Mr. Sinnema, I wish to tell you once more that I will not run any risk with the steamer in the way of a charter or employing the vessel in any way during present hostilities. To cover all the risks seems to me simply impossible, and anyhow, if covered not safe enough for us." The chairman was manifestly exercising the control from Hamburg over the affairs of the company. On the 4th Sept. Sinnema wrote further: "Mr. Dammeyer is of opinion that the employment of the steamer during the war is subject to too much risk, and without mentioning that the insurers (Lloyd's), under circumstances, could not be safe enough for the insurance accounts, the high war premiums will make a remunerating business impossible. Mr. D. therefore does not agree previously the chartering of the steamer for coasting trade, and begs to let the steamer in dock"—that is to say, the steamer is to remain in dock—"awaiting the further development." On the 8th Sept. there is a letter from Mr. Tassell in answer to this: "I have this morning received your letter of 4th instant" from Sinnema. "Will you kindly inform Mr. Dammeyer that his instructions with reference to the steamer shall be carried out, and that we will keep her in dock during the present hostilities, unless requisitioned by the Government, which is not probable." Therefore, notwithstanding the resolution of the 17th Aug. of the informal committee in London, it is overridden by Mr. Dammeyer, and for the rest of that year nothing further is heard about chartering or working the vessel. Mr. Tassell was as good as his word, and the chairman's instructions with regard to the steamer were carried out.

The next question is with reference to the financial control. Having regard to the letter of the 8th Sept. 1914 and to Mr. Tassell's answers, it seems to me to be manifest that the company has three banking accounts, Nos. 1, 2, 3. Nos. 2 and 3 were apparently only fed from No. 1 account. They were operated upon by the manager of the company for local payments, and they were small matters, apparently, which were left in the control of the manager. The principal account of the company is the No. 1. Having regard to what is stated, I think it cannot be doubted that up to the outbreak of war the cheques were all signed by two directors in Hamburg; but whatever cheques were signed they were all countersigned by the secretary, who was resident in Hamburg, acting under the chairman's instructions. Therefore the financial control was in Hamburg. True it is that after the outbreak of war, as the banking account is here, an arrangement had to be made with the bank, and an arrangement was made under which cheques drawn on No. 1 account and signed by two directors, with Mr. Tassell countersigning, were honoured. But that was only in consequence of a special arrangement made after the outbreak of war, and was not the case up to the commencement of the war; and I think upon the evidence it cannot be doubted that the real position was that all the financial control was exercised in Hamburg, where the secretary lived and where all the cheques were countersigned.

Then there was a question with regard to the insurance of the ship, and so late as the 14th Oct. 1914 instructions are being given through Mr. Sinnema by the chairman in Hamburg with regard to insurance. He is directing matters. On that date Sinnema writes: "To-day I have to write you at the request of Mr. Dammeyer"; and then, in inverted commas, is set out Dammeyer's instructions: "As regards the steamer, which as you know has to remain in dock until my further orders, I wish to see her covered against war risk. Seeing this risk being a harbour risk only, the rate is bound to be very moderate, and I should be glad to hear from you the rate for three and six months on, say, 13,000*l*. On receipt of your reply I will give you instructions."—I, the chairman of the company. It cannot be doubted when regard is had to the facts of the case, that both before and after the war, and at all the material dates, the control and management of this company were in Hamburg.

It was suggested that perhaps at one time the questions that were addressed by the officer of customs did not point to the case that is now raised; but that cannot be maintained, because the second request for information is in this form: "Is not Mr. Hermann Dammeyer the managing director of the company, and has not he had virtual control of the vessel both prior to the outbreak of war and subsequently?" and "How long has the secretary resided in Hamburg?" Those questions point directly to the virtual control and management, and ask whether both before and since the war they have not been in Hamburg. Mr. Tassell answered that, no doubt, to the best of his ability. He says: "Mr. Dammeyer is chairman of the directors of the company, not managing director. The company has never to my knowledge ever had a managing director. The manager at King's Lynn has always practically had a free hand as to chartering steamers, surveys, repairs, freights, arranging officers and crews, &c., advising Mr. Dammeyer as chairman of directors what has been done." That is to say, he acts under the direction of the chairman at Hamburg. To the question whether Dammeyer had not had virtual control both before and after the war, the further answer is: "Mr. Dammeyer has not had virtual control since outbreak of war"—since.

Then a further question was put in regard to the meeting of the directors; and reading carefully what Mr. Tassell says—I have no doubt that he did the best he could for his company—I think it is manifest that until the outbreak of war, except for one meeting of the board yearly in London, all the meetings of the board were held in Hamburg. He is asked where they are held, the question being: "Is the business of the company controlled and the management of the business conducted at meetings of the directors held at the registered office? Who have attended the meetings?" He answers it in this way: "The business of the company is controlled at meetings of the directors, one of which, until the outbreak of war, was held yearly in London." But where were all the other meetings held? The obvious inference is, at Hamburg. Then he says: "Since then all the directors meetings have been held in London"—that is, since the outbreak of war—"not at the registered offices of the company at King's Lynn. These meetings have been attended by the two English directors above referred to, by me as manager of the company, and by two of the largest English shareholders, Mr. Vasmer and Mr. Bilton."

Under those circumstances I think it is clear to demonstration that both before and since the war the principal place of business of this company has been Hamburg; and that being so, I am of opinion that the conclusion of fact at which the judge below arrived was right, and that the evidence which the court has to consider is not satisfactory of the title of the ship to be registered as a British ship. I think it is clear that the principal place of business of the defendant company is not within the British dominions, but in Hamburg. It is true that many of its operations are carried on in England. In addition to owning the ship, it appears to have carried on a considerable business as a trader both in coal and in sugar, and it may well be, as regards the purchase and shipment of coal, that the details were arranged in England; with regard to the purchase and export of sugar from Hamburg, probably all the arrangements were made in Hamburg. One has to consider upon the evidence where is the principal place of business. I am satisfied that the principal place of business is not within His Majesty's dominions. The ship, therefore, is not entitled to be registered as a British ship, and the judgment below condemning the ship to forfeiture was right and must stand.

PHILLIMORE, L.J.—I agree that this appeal must fail. On the 8th March 1911 the appellant company was registered with the collector of customs at King's Lynn as the owner of a ship intended to be a British ship. The appellant company, being a body corporate, in order to entitle itself to own a British ship, had to be one established under and subject to the laws of some part of His Majesty's dominions, and having its principal place of business in those dominions. And, having regard to sect. 9, which establishes the procedure by which a ship is to get upon the register or by which an owner is to get upon the register in respect of a ship, it appears that the corporation must at the time it seeks registration, and to enable it to get the registration, have the same conditions—I use the expression of the section—the same "circumstances of the constitution and business as prove it to be qualified to own a British ship"—that is under sect. 1 of the Act of 1894. At that time the constitution of the company was as stated by Swinfen Eady, L.J. The majority of the shares were held by Mr. Dammeyer. Other shares were held by other Germans. One of the three directors and shareholders was a German resident at Hamburg; Mr. Dammeyer had moved to Hamburg some years before, and had taken the secretary with him. From the time that Mr. Dammeyer had moved to Hamburg, which was before the time the English ship was purchased and registered, only one meeting of directors had been held in England. The general meeting of the company held also been held in England, but it was evident that there were other meetings of directors, and that, as they were not held in England, they must have been held in Hamburg. On those facts and other facts it is, to my mind, plain that until the outbreak of war the principal place of business of this company was not in His Majesty's dominions, but was at Hamburg.

As regards the state of things since the war, there is, I think, more difficulty, and the appellants have fastened upon that point and have said that the duty of the court is not to inquire whether the ship at some previous stage was entitled to be registered, using the words of sect. 51 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1906, but whether she had a title to be registered at the time when the inquiry was made. I think it right to construe sect. 51 as meaning that the inquiry is as to the title of the ship to be on the register, not to have been put upon the register—that the word "register" is not to be considered as a verb of motion denoting the act of putting on the register, but a static verb, remaining or being upon the register, and that it is right to say that the inquiry is whether there is a title of the ship to be on the register. That expresses, I think, exactly what I mean.

That being so, I will, for the purposes of this case only, assume the argument of the appellants that the fact that at some previous stage the ship was not entitled to be upon the register is immaterial—that is, immaterial for this particular form of procedure, though it might be possible for the Crown, if they would establish a case under sect. 69 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894, to proceed for forfeiture under that section, upon the supposition that the ruling in the case of the Annandale (ubi sup.) applies to the latter Act of 1906—a point upon which I desire to express no opinion.

Assuming, however, all that in favour of the appellants, I cannot get over the difficulty that, to be upon the register, the ship must have been lawfully put there; and, in my view, one must not neglect the initial stage when she was put upon the register for the first time, and at that time the company was not qualified to own a British ship or to be put upon the register as owning a British ship, because the circumstances were the same as they were from that time forward until the outbreak of war, and those circumstances were such that the company had its principal place of business at Hamburg. That, in my judgment, is enough to decide this case, and I am personally rather glad to be able to put it upon that ground, but I do not dissent from the view of Swinfen Eady, L.J., that upon the whole, though the case is much more arguable since the war than it was before the war, the principal place of business, which was at Hamburg, has not been moved from Hamburg since the war, and, therefore, that the corporation still has de facto, if not de jure, its principal place of business at Hamburg.

I cannot part from this case, however, without dealing with one other matter. It was contended by the Crown in the court below that the only evidence admissible upon this inquiry was the information supplied to the registrar. It was so ruled by the judge, but it was ruled with the consent of counsel for the company, and no point has been made on this appeal by counsel for the company that evidence was improperly excluded which he desired to take. That being the case, this court is not in a position to decide whether or not that ruling of the learned judge was right, and I do not intend to express any opinion upon it, except that I think it is a matter which would on a proper occasion require very serious consideration.

Bankes, L.J.—I agree. The only question which arises in this appeal for decision is, as it appears to me, a question of fact. I think that the materials upon which the court is asked to decide, or rather was in the court below asked to decide, are very insufficient and unsatisfactory, and the amount of information which is given as to the way in which this company has carried on its business is very scanty. But neither party sought to adduce any other evidence in the court below, and both parties are content in this court that the decision should be given upon materials which were in the court below.

Under those circumstances, dealing with those materials, the inference that I draw is that before the war the principal place of business of this company was in Germany. Since the war the inference I draw is that under stress of circumstances the English directors and shareholders have made the best makeshift arrangements they can to do what they consider to be best in their interests, but without any transfer of the principal place of business to this country at all. Under those circumstances it appears to me that the proper conclusion upon these materials as a matter of fact is that the principal place of business of this company has been, and is, without His Majesty's dominions, and that is sufficient for the decision of this appeal.

But two very important questions have been touched upon, and upon those no decision is arrived at by this court. I only mention them in order to avoid the conclusion at any future time that these questions have been considered and decided. They are these: first, whether upon an inquiry under sect. 51 of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1906 it is sufficient to give evidence that at some period in the past history of the vessel the provisions of the statute have not been complied with; and, secondly, whether or not upon an inquiry after the matter has been referred to the court, the parties are limited to the evidence which was supplied to the commissioners. In my opinion both these matters are open for discussion at any future time, and the decision in this case should be treated as a decision upon the facts only.

Raeburn for the English shareholders.—This appeal is an appeal from a refusal of Bargrave Deane, J. to grant them relief in respect of their interest in the Lynn and Hamburg Steamship Company. They seek to have the ship appraised and ask for an order that the British shareholders should be paid a sum proportionate to their holding in the company.

Leslie Scott, K.C.—I object. The shareholders have no right to intervene.

Swinfen Eady, L.J.—What right have your clients to intervene? They have no interest in the ship.

Raeburn.—They have no direct interest in the ship, but they have an interest in the company owning the ship.

SWINFEN EADY, L.J. We are not administering the affairs of the company.

Raeburn.—That is so, but under sect. 76 (1) of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 the court has power to make such an order as may seem just to the court. Bargrave Deane, J. in his judgment did not decide whether he had power to grant any relief; he assumed that he had such power; but he refused to exercise it in favour of the English shareholders under the circumstance which existed in this case. It is submitted that the court should make an order giving them relief.

SWINFEN EADY, L.J.—In my judgment the British shareholders are not entitled to intervene in this litigation. They are not owners of the ship, nor are they owners of any shares in the ship. They are shareholders in the company, and the company owns the ship. Counsel for these shareholders has suggested that the proper course to pursue would be to have the vessel appraised, and to ascertain in that way what its value is, and if it is sold, either out of the proceeds of the sale or out of the appraised value, there should be paid to the British shareholders such a proportion of the value of the vessel as the number of their shares bear to the entire issued capital of the company. That is to say, there being 1610 issued shares in the company, they should be paid so many 1610th parts of the appraised value or its proceeds if sold. Of course, the court has no power whatever to make any order of that kind. That would be administering the affairs of the company, and it may be that, if the vessel still belonged to the company and the ship were sold, the money might be required to go to the creditors of the company. The court cannot administer the affairs of the company in that way.

In my judgment the British shareholders are not entitled to intervene at all. Their true position is this, that, if by reason of the judgment of the court there is any case of hardship to innocent British shareholders, they can only appeal to the merciful consideration of the Crown. The order giving them leave to intervene will be discharged.

THE FANCY. (a)

Collision—Examination steamer proceeding to speak another steamship—Crossing rule—Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea 1897, arts. 19, 21, 29.

An examination steamer in the Bristol Channel, on a course of N.W., sighted a steamship four points on her port bow and proceeded towards her to speak her. The other steamship was on a course of about E. by N. It was in the ordinary course the duty of the vessel on the E. by N. course to port and pass under the stern of the examination vessel. Instead of doing so, she kept her course and speed as she expected the examination steamer to round to on her starboard side. The examination steamer hard-a-ported and increased her speed to get across the course of the steamship she was approaching.

Held, that both vessels were to blame, the steamship on the E. by N. course for not complying with the crossing rule as there was no special circumstance which excused her departure from it, and the examination steamer for altering her course and speed; but that, as the steamship on the E. by N. course was primarily to blame, the loss would be apportioned, the steamship on the E. by N. course to bear three-fourths and the examination steamer one-fourth of it.

DAMAGE ACTION.

The plaintiffs were the owners of the steamship Eirene. The defendants and counter-claimants were the owners of the steamship Fancy.

The plaintiffs' case was that shortly before 7.30 p.m. on the 9th Oct. 1914 the Eirene, a steel screw steamship, belonging to the port of London, of 67 tons gross and 26 tons net register, 75ft. in length, manned by a crew of nine hands, was in the Bristol Channel, near the Welsh Hook Buoy, engaged on examination duty. After examining a sailing vessel the Eirene was headed north-west, making about four knots through the water with engines at half-speed. The weather at such time was fine and clear, the wind E.N.E., a light breeze, and the tide flood of two to three knots force. The regulation lights for a steamship under way, including a stern light and three vertical white lights (patrol duty lights), were being duly exhibited and burning brightly, and a good look-out was being kept on board of her.

In these circumstances the masthead and, shortly after, the green light of the Fancy, which had been previously observed, was particularly noticed about four miles distant about four points on the port bow. The Eirene kept her course and speed, carefully watching the lights of the approaching vessel, until she had come so close, without taking any step to keep clear, that collision could not be avoided by her action alone, when the engines of the Eirene were thereupon put full speed ahead and her helm hard-a-port as the only possible means of avoiding collision, but the Fancy continued on at high speed and with her stem struck the port side of the Eirene, doing so much damage that the Eirene sank soon afterwards.

The plaintiffs charged the defendants with bad look-out, failing to keep clear, failing to ease stop, and reverse in due time, and failing to port.

The case of the defendants and counter-claimants was that shortly before 7.30 p.m. on the 9th Oct. 1914 the Fancy, an iron screw steamship, of the port of Tonsberg, in Norway, of 1612 tons gross and 995 tons net register, 260ft. in length, manned by a crew of nineteen hands all told, was proceeding up the Bristol Channel, between Clevedon and Portishead, in the course of a voyage from Hernosund, Sweden, to Sharpness with a cargo of timber. The weather was fine and clear, the wind about N.E., light, and the tide flood of the force of about three knots. The Fancy, in charge of a duly licensed pilot, was heading about E. ¾ N. magnetic, and was making about six knots. She carried the regulation masthead, additional masthead, side and stern lights duly exhibited and burning brightly, and a good look-out was being kept on board of her.

In these circumstances those on the Fancy observed, distant about one and a half miles and bearing about two points on the starboard bow, the masthead and red lights of the Eirene, which also exhibited three white lights placed vertically, indicating that she was on patrol duty. The Fancy kept her course, and as the Eirene approached apparently for the purpose of speaking the Fancy the latter's whistle was sounded, the local pilot's signal of three long blasts to inform those on board the Eirene that the Fancy was bound to Sharpness. As the Eirene came nearer it was seen that the Eirene, instead of rounding up on the starboard side of the Fancy, as it was expected she would do, and as she could and ought to have done, was shaping to cross the bows of the Fancy, and appeared to be increasing her speed, whereupon the engines of the Fancy were put full speed astern and her helm hard-a-port, but the Eirene came on and with her port side about amidships struck the stem of the Fancy, causing her damage, for which her owners counter-claimed.

The defendants and counter-claimants charged those on the Eirene with bad look-out, with failing to keep clear when approaching to speak her, with improperly attempting to cross her bows, with failing to follow the usual and ordinary and seamanlike practice of rounding to on her side and failing to port, with improperly increasing her speed, and with neglecting to ease or stop or reverse.

The following collision regulations were referred to:

19. When two steam vessels are crossing so as to involve risk of collision, the vessel which has the other on her own starboard side shall keep out of the way of the other.

21. Where by any of these rules one of two vessels is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course and speed.

Note.—When in consequence of thick weather or other causes such vessel finds herself so close that collision cannot be avoided by the action of the giving-way vessel alone, she also shall take such action as will best aid to avert collision.

22. Every vessel which is directed by these rules to keep out of the way of another vessel shall, if the circumstances of the case admit, avoid crossing ahead of the other.

23. Every steam vessel which is directed by these rules to keep out of the way of another vessel shall, on approaching her, if necessary, slacken her speed or stop or reverse.

27. In obeying and construing these rules, due regard shall be had to all dangers of navigation and collision, and to any special circumstances which may render a departure from the above rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger.

28. The words "short blast" used in this article shall mean a blast of about one second's duration.

When vessels are in sight of one another, a steam vessel under way, in taking any course authorised or required by these rules, shall indicate that course by the following signals on her whistle or siren—viz.: One short blast to mean "I am directing my course to starboard." Two short blasts to mean "I am directing my course to port." Three short blasts to mean "My engines are going full speed astern."

29. Nothing in these rules shall exonerate any ship, or the owner, or master, or crew thereof, from the consequences of any neglect to carry lights or signals, or of any neglect to keep a proper look-out, or of the neglect of any precaution which may be required by the ordinary practice of seamen, or by the special circumstances of the case.

Bateson, K.C. and Noad for the plaintiffs, the owners of the Eirene.—The vessels were crossing vessels, and, art. 19 of the collision regulations applies. It was the duty of the Fancy to keep clear, and there being no special circumstance present which justified a departure from art. 19, she is to blame. The crossing rule applies when two vessels are making for the same pilot boat:

The Ada; The Sappho, 2 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 4; 28 L. T. Rep. 825;
The Albano, 10 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 365; 96 L. T. Rep. 335; (1907) A. C. 193.

The reasoning in those cases applies to the facts of this case. The Eirene is not to blame. It is admitted she did not keep her course and speed as she ought to have done under art. 21, but, when she saw the Fancy breaking art. 22 by crossing ahead of her, she did the right thing in porting and increasing her speed as it assisted the manœuvre adopted by the Fancy. The action of the Eirene was justified by the note to art. 21.

Laing, K.C. and D. Stephens for the defendants, the owners of the Fancy.—The Eirene was coming out to speak the Fancy; both vessels wanted to meet each other, so art. 19 does not apply. The only rule which applies is art. 29. The Roanoke (11 Asp. Mar. Law. Cas. 253; 99 L. T. Rep. 78; (1908) P. 231) governs this case. The sole cause of the collision was the Eirene crossing the bows of the Fancy instead of rounding-to on the starboard side.

Bateson, K.C. in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 23.—THE PRESIDENT.—The collision in this case happened in the Bristol Channel off Walton Bay.

The Eirene was a small steamship engaged in patrol duty. The Fancy was a Norwegian steamship of 1612 tons gross, laden with timber, and proceeding on her voyage up the Channel towards Sharpness. The patrol vessel sank in a few minutes after the collision; but, fortunately, all her crew were saved.

The Eirene at the material times was in the sole charge of a second mate. He not only had to navigate her, but also steered at the wheel. The Fancy was navigated by a Sharpness pilot.

The collision happened in the early days of the war—about two months after its outbreak.

The Eirene had been ordered by the examination officer to "head off the steamer coming up channel"—viz, the Fancy. The second mate accordingly proceeded, with the engines at half-speed, towards the up-coming steamer. The latter's speed was not far from double that of the patrol vessel. The patrol vessel showed, in addition to the regulation navigating lights, three white lights placed vertically indicating that she was on patrol duty. The two vessels were on converging courses, and would in the ordinary way be crossing vessels. As such the Fancy would have the duty of keeping out of the way of the Eirene, which was on her starboard side; and the Eirene the correlative duty of keeping course and speed. But it was contended for the Fancy that in the special circumstances the International Rules as to crossing vessels did not apply.

At the time of the accident no special regulations, instructions, or notices as to signals or methods of approach, as between patrol vessels whose duty it was to make examinations and vessels who would be subject to examination, seem to have been made or given. And I have no information that any such exist now.

The case is therefore of importance to those engaged in the navigation of mercantile ships and of Government vessels.

It was assumed, and correctly assumed, by the pilot of the Fancy that the Eirene was proceeding on her way towards her to speak her. That was in fact the object of the Eirene at the time. But it might not have been. She might have been performing some other work in pursuance of her duties. She was no doubt engaged in special work, and in this sense some special circumstances existed. But in the interest of safety, some rules of navigation must apply; and what others should be substituted for the old and well-established International Sea Rules? Canons of good seamanship would be too general to govern the conduct of vessels in all cases. This does not mean that effect is not to be given in proper cases to the provisions of art. 29, which is generally referred to as the "good seamanship" article.

I deem it my duty to hold that the rules as to crossing ships applied to these two vessels, notwithstanding the special character of the work of the patrol vessel.

The Fancy's pilot and officers said they "expected" that the Eirene would round-to on the starboard side of the vessel under a port helm in order to speak her.

There was no obligation upon the Eirene to adopt that manœuvre; and the Fancy had no right to act in contravention of rules under the expectation or impression that she would do so; certainly not without some definite indication from the Eirene that her manœuvres would be other than those of a crossing vessel. It was admitted that the Fancy did not take steps to keep out of the way of the Eirene. It is strange that the pilot did not even take off any of her speed in order to enable the Eirene to do what he says he expected. She kept her full speed until the last, although if the orders "Full speed astern" and "hard-a-port" had been given only some few seconds earlier, the collision might have been avoided. In thus failing to take the proper steps to keep out of the way of the crossing vessel on her starboard side, the Fancy must be held to be in fault, and must bear blame for the collision.

Even if the prescribed rules did not apply, in my opinion, and in that of my nautical assessors, she must be blamed for acting as she did when those on her bridge admitted they saw the Eirene increase her speed an appreciable time before the accident, and at a considerable distance away.

Next, the navigation of the Eirene must be considered. Can she be exonerated? It has already been observed that the second mate, who also had to work at the wheel, was solely intrusted with the navigation of the ship. The only other person who seems to have been on deck was an A.B. on the forecastle head. I do not wish to say anything harsh about the second mate. He seemed a man of good character. He had served on coasting sailing ships for some years. But he had never served on a steamer till he joined the Eirene about two months before the accident. He had never before been left in sole charge. He held no certificate. He probably thought that the order to "head off" the steamer was tantamount to an order to cross her bows. His mind was not troubled by any crossing rule. It was exercised, seemingly, with one idea, viz., to get red to red to the other vessel. To try to get into this position he ordered his engines "Full speed ahead" from the half-speed at which his vessel had been travelling.

According to the evidence of the engineer this was done some three minutes or so before the vessels collided. This receives corroboration by evidence from the Fancy. As there was no record of the time, and estimates of it are uncertain, it is appropriate to note that the engineer said he had increased his revolutions from ninety up to the full-speed number of 147 before the actual collision. The Eirene was a small vessel, 75ft. in length, and she was struck amidships. Her course was also altered about the same time by a hard-a-port helm. The alteration of speed and course was not, in the circumstances, justified under the note to art. 21.

Under the articles which I have held to apply, this was wrong navigation for the stand-on vessel. Her case is not one of those (of which The Roanoke (1908) P. 231, affords an example) where in special circumstances the give-way ship is precluded from complaining of an alteration of speed and course by a stand-on vessel known to be pursuing her object in the ordinary course of good seamanship.

If in approaching the ship to be examined the patrol vessel had reduced her speed, or even altered her course in seamanlike fashion in order to effect her expected or known object, the position would be different.

The Eirene must also be held to blame under the rules.

I will add that, as in the case of the Fancy so in the case of the Eirene, too, if considerations of good seamanship are applied, apart from the sea rules, I am of the opinion (in which my assessors also concur) that her navigation was faulty in making to cross the bows of the Fancy without clearly indicating that she was proceeding to the port side in order to speak her. But the primary and main fault was that of the Fancy.

The blame for the unfortunate collision must be distributed in the proportions of three-fourth parts to the Fancy and one-fourth part to the Eirene.

Judgment will be entered on the claim and counter-claim accordingly; and there will be an order for the usual reference to the registrar and merchants.

THE NORD. (a)

Collision — Compulsory pilotage — Exempt ship —Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), ss. 603, 625—Pilotage Act 1913 (2 & 3 Geo. 5, c. 31), ss. 10, 14, 15—Defence of the Realm Consolidation Act 1914 (5 Geo. 5, c. 8)—Defence of the Realm Regulations 1914, No. 39—Notice to mariners, 27th March 1915—Liability of owners of vessel for damage—Vessel being conducted.

In a damage action the owners of a Swedish steamship pleaded that their vessel was in charge of a compulsory pilot, and that if there was any negligence in the navigation of the vessel it was solely that of the pilot, for whose negligence they were not responsible. The pilot was found alone to blame. Under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 the Swedish vessel was an exempt ship, although she was navigating in a compulsory pilotage district. Under the Defence of the Realm Regulations all ships, other than certain British ships, while navigating from Gravesend to London Bridge have to be conducted by pilots licensed by the London Trinity House.

Held, that, though the Swedish vessel was an exempt ship under the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, yet the order issued under the Defence of the Realm Regulations 1914 made pilotage for the vessel compulsory; and that the owners were not responsible for the damage caused by the collision.

DAMAGE ACTION.

The plaintiffs' ship, the Levensau, was a German steamship which had been ordered to be detained by the Prize Court, and which was registered in the name of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty, and employed by the Admiralty coasting trade office. The defendants were the owners of the Swedish steamship Nord.

The Levensau, a steamship of 2155 tons gross and 1358 tons net register, in charge of a duly licensed Trinity House pilot, was in Halfway Reach of the river Thames, proceeding from Dagenham Jetty to Erith to discharge her cargo. The Levensau was heading down river, angling to the south shore, with her helm a-port, and was making about one and a half knots over the ground, shaping over towards the south side of the river. She carried the regulation lights, and a good look-out was being kept on board of her.

In these circumstances those on the Levensau saw, three to four cables off and bearing about two points on the port bow, the masthead lights of the Nord. The whistle of the Levensau was sounded a short blast, her helm was put more a-port, and when the Nord, which as she came clear of a dredger below showed her red light, opened her green light, the whistle of the Levensau was again sounded a short blast, and her helm was put hard-a-port. Directly afterwards the Nord shut in her red light and sounded two short blasts on her whistle, and thereupon the engines of the Levensau were put full speed astern and her whistle was sounded three short blasts, but, notwithstanding these measures, the Nord came on at great speed under starboard helm, and with her starboard side about amidships struck the stem of the Levensau, causing her considerable damage. Shortly before the collision the starboard anchor of the Levensau was dropped.

Those on the Levensau charged those on the Nord with bad look-out, with improperly starboarding, with neglecting to pass port to port, with neglecting to navigate and keep on her proper side of the channel, with proceeding at an excessive speed, and with neglecting to ease, stop, or reverse.

The defendants' case was that the Nord, a steamship of 2204 tons gross and 1093 tons net register, bound from Umea to London with a cargo of timber, was proceeding up Halfway Reach, on the north side of mid-channel, in charge of a duly licensed pilot, and was making about five and a half knots. The regulation lights were being exhibited, and a good look-out was being kept.

In these circumstances the masthead and green lights of the Levensau were particularly noticed about three-quarters of a mile off, just on the starboard bow. She was angled partly across the river towards the north shore, and appeared to be going to Dagenham Jetty, and there was another steamer above her, also on the north side of the river, showing her masthead and green lights. Accordingly the helm of the Nord was starboarded and two short blasts were sounded. The steamer above the Levensau sounded two short blasts.

Afterwards the Levensau opened her red light and shut in her green, and the helm of the Nord was put hard-a-starboard, two short blasts were sounded on her whistle, and her engines were put full speed ahead. The Levensau then sounded a two-blast signal, the second blast being a short blast and the first blast being longer than the second, and the Nord again sounded two short blasts.

The Levensau then sounded one short blast, the Nord replied with two short blasts, and the Levensau afterwards sounded three short blasts, and, though the Nord reversed her engines and hard-a-ported when her bows had crossed the bows of the Levensau, the Levensau came on and with her stem struck the Nord on the starboard side at the after-part of the engine-room.

Those on the Nord charged the Levensau with bad look-out, with not keeping clear of the Nord, with being on the wrong side of the river, with attempting to cross to the south side of the river, with porting, with not passing the Nord starboard to starboard, with not stopping or reversing their engines, with not letting go their anchor, and with not indicating their manœuvres by proper sound signals.

Alternatively the defendants alleged that if there was any negligence in the navigation of the Nord, which they denied, the same was solely that of the pilot who was in charge of her by compulsion of law.

BARGRAVE DEANE, J. held that the collision was caused by negligence on the Nord, and further, held that the negligence which caused the collision was solely that of the pilot.

The following are the material sections of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894:

603 (1). Subject to any alteration to be made by the Board of Trade or by any pilotage authority in pursuance of the powers hereinbefore contained, the employment of pilots shall continue to be compulsory in all districts where it was compulsory immediately before the commencement of this Act, but all exemptions from that compulsory pilotage shall continue to be in force. (2) If, within a district where pilotage is compulsory, the master of an unexempted ship, after a qualified pilot has offered to take charge of the ship or has made a signal for the purpose, pilots his ship himself without holding the necessary certificate, he shall be liable for each offence to a fine of double the amount of the pilotage dues that could be demanded for the conduct of the ship.

625. The following ships, when not carrying passengers, shall, without prejudice to any general exemption under this part of this Act, be exempted from compulsory pilotage in the London district and in the Trinity House outport districts; (that is to say) . . . (4) Ships trading from the port of Brest, or any port in Europe north and east of Brest . . . to any port in Great Britain within the said London or Trinity House outport district.

The following are the material sections of the Pilotage Act 1913:

Sect. 10 (1). Subject to the provisions of any Pilotage Order, pilotage shall continue to be compulsory in every pilotage district in which it was compulsory at the time of the passing of this Act, and shall continue not to be compulsory in every pilotage district in which it was not compulsory at the time of the passing of this Act, and subject to the provisions of this Act all exemptions from compulsory pilotage in force at the date of the passing of this Act shall cease to have effect. (2) Any reference in this Act to a pilotage district in which pilotage is compulsory shall, in the case of a district in which pilotage is compulsory only in part of the district, be construed, if the context so requires, as a reference to that part of the district only.

Sect. 14. Notwithstanding anything in any pilotage order made under this Act, any area in which pilotage was not compulsory at the date of the passing of this Act shall be deemed to be an area in which pilotage is not compulsory for the purpose of determining the liability of the owner or master of a ship being navigated in the area for any loss or damage occasioned by or arising out of the navigation of such ship.

Sect. 15 (1). Notwithstanding anything in any public or local Act the owner or master of a vessel navigating under circumstances in which pilotage is compulsory shall be answerable for any loss or damage caused by the vessel or by any fault of the navigation of the vessel in the same manner as he would if pilotage were not compulsory. (2) This section shall not take effect until the first day of January nineteen hundred and eighteen, or such earlier date as His Majesty may fix by order in Council, certifying that it is necessary to bring the section into operation in order to enable His Majesty to comply with an international convention. (3) As from the date of the coming into operation of this section, section six hundred and thirty-three of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 shall cease to have effect.

The following is the material section of the Defence of the Realm Consolidation Act 1914:

1 (1). His Majesty in Council has power during the continuance of the present war to issue regulations for securing the public safety and the defence of the realm, and as to the powers and duties for that purpose of the Admiralty and Army Council and of the members of His Majesty's forces and other persons acting in his behalf; and may by such regulations authorise the trial by courts-martial, or in the case of minor offences by courts of summary jurisdiction, and punishment of persons committing offences against the regulations, and in particular against any of the provisions of such regulations designed . . . (d) to secure the navigation of vessels in accordance with directions given by or under the authority of the Admiralty. . . .

The following is the regulation under which the order referred to in the judgment was issued:

39. The Admiralty or Army Council, or any pilotage authority acting under their instructions, may make orders as to the pilotage of vessels entering, leaving, or making use of any port, or navigating within any part of the territorial waters adjacent to the United Kingdom, and any such order may provide for pilotage being compulsory for all or any class of such vessels within such limits as may be specified in the order, for the granting of special pilotage licences and the suspension of existing pilotage licences and certificates, and for the supply, employment, and payment of pilots.

Any enactment, order, charter, custom, by-law, regulation, or provision in force for the time being in any area to which any such order relates shall have effect subject to the provisions of the order.

The notice to mariners issued under this regulation, which was in force at the time of the collision, is set out in the judgment of Bargrave Deane, J. The notice is No. 239 of 1915, and was published in the London Gazette of Tuesday, the 30th March 1915, No. 29,116, at p. 3122. The notice was issued by command of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty; it was dated the 27th March 1915, and came into force at 6 a.m. on the 31st March 1915.

Bateson, K.C. and Stephens for the plaintiffs — Even if the pilot of the Nord were compulsorily in charge and were solely to blame for the collision, the defendants would still be liable for the damage. Under sects. 603 and 625 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 the Nord was an exempt ship, and her owners would have been liable for damage caused by the negligence of a pilot on board her. The object of the Pilotage Act 1913 was to ultimately abolish the defence of compulsory pilotage, and the Act was not intended to give the owner of a vessel a right to set up that defence in cases in which he could not have set it up before the Act was passed. The Defence of the Realm Consolidation Act 1914 and the regulations made under that Act may enable the proper authority to make the owners of vessels take pilots on exempt ships, but that fact does not make pilotage compulsory. The Legislature did not intend when passing the Act to give owners the right to set up the defence of compulsory pilotage in cases in which they had no such right before.

Laing, K.C. and Dunlop for the defendants.—The owners of the defendants' ship have no power to refuse the services of the pilot. The pilot in this case does not act as the adviser of the master. The master does not retain the control of the vessel, and it is only in such cases that the owners escape responsibility for damage done through the negligence of the pilot:

The Guy Mannering, 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 558; 46 L. T. Rep. 110; 7 P. Div. 132;
The Augusta, 6 Asp. Mar. Law Cas. 161; 57 L. T. Rep. 326.

The reason why owners are not liable for the negligence of a compulsory pilot is that they are compelled to take the pilot on board and have no control over him:

In this case the owners were compelled to take the pilot, who was in sole charge of the navigation, and they are not responsible for the damage done.

BARGRAVE DEANE, J.—The question of compulsory pilotage was quite simple up to 1913, but in 1913 there was a movement on foot to get rid of the defence of compulsory pilotage. There was a good deal of talk about it, and a great deal appeared in the public Press about it, and various opinions were expressed as to the advisability of getting rid of it. The result has been an Act of Parliament, called the Pilotage Act 1913, which has caused much confusion.

It was felt that it was very difficult to alter things without proper notice, and the Act provides for certain things which are not to take effect till a subsequent date, and meanwhile things are to remain the same, and meanwhile also the old Act is not altogether repealed. So that we have contradictory provisions, but I do not think that interferes with my judgment in this particular case.

In this case the question of pilotage arose in July 1915, and the question is, What was the law applicable at that date? The whole state of things was different then, because war had broken out. It was found necessary to pass special legislation with a view of providing for a different state of things from that which was in force at the time of the Act of 1913; and by the Defence of the Realm Act 1914 His Majesty the King was given power, by Order in Council, to issue any regulations he thought fit for the better carrying on of the defence of the realm; and it was enacted that His Majesty by Order in Council might direct any of his naval or military authorities, or any officer thereunder, to issue such regulations as were necessary, and if those regulations were not obeyed penalties would follow.

Among other regulations which were issued is this one to which I have had my attention called: "Notice to Mariners." The date of the "Notice to Mariners" is the 27th March 1915. That is before the date when this question with regard to the Nord and compulsory pilotage arose, and the Nord was subject to the regulation. The notice provides:

> The following orders as to compulsory pilotage between the Downs and Great Yarmouth made under the Defence of the Realm (Consolidation) Regulations 1914 will come into operation at 6 a.m. on the 31st March 1915, and will supersede those now in force.

Therefore here is a new regulation, having the effect of an Act of Parliament, which is made to come into force on the 31st March 1915, and supersedes everything before it. Therefore we start with an absolutely clean sheet. What does it say? I leave out the first two paragraphs, which do not apply: All ships—it does not say except ships subject to exemption—but (other than British ships of less than 3500 tons gross tonnage, when trading coastwise or to or from the Channel Islands, and when not carrying passengers) whilst navigating in the waters from Gravesend to London Bridge or vice versâ, must be conducted by pilots licensed by the London Trinity House.

That is compulsory pilotage in the old form, without any exemption of any sort or kind, and the regulation is passed for the express purposes of war time. Under that regulation it was compulsory, in my opinion, on the Nord, which is a Swedish and not a British ship, to take a pilot from Gravesend to London. She took her pilot on board at Gravesend for the purpose of being "conducted" by him to London. I think the word "conducted" means that the pilot is in charge under the old system—that is, in full charge—and entitled to all the assistance he can get from the master and crew. He is in command. Therefore I hold in this case that there was compulsory pilotage in the proper sense of the words, and there will be judgment for the defendants without costs.
